8. Dening pointed out that the draft expected from Washington was to have been in a form which would have permitted revisions based upon views which might emerge from the Commonwealth conference, and that the Foreign Office had attached great importance to this. It was equally to be hoped that the Colombo Conference would be able to avoid establishing fixed positions which it might be difficult to maintain later on when the United States views are more fully known.

(III) Recognition of the Communist regime in China

9. Dening recalled that Foreign Office had informed Commonwealth Governments that the United Kingdom was thinking in terms of recognition on January 2nd, and said Foreign Office now understands that India would probably recognize about December 30th. His estimate was that Pakistan would be likely to act about the same time as the United Kingdom, but he thought that Australia and New Zealand would not act until after the Colombo Conference. In the case of Australia, there was some feeling that early recognition of the Communist regime in China would be inconsistent with the Menzies Government's programme to declare the Communist party within Australia illegal. In Dening's view there would be no inconsistency, and he stressed that when United Kingdom had recognized the Peking Government they would not for one moment abandon present policy of resisting Communist infiltration and activity in the areas outside Chinese borders for which the United Kingdom bears responsibility.

10. The French difficulty about recognition of the Chinese Government was, of course, linked up with Indo-China. The United Kingdom was anxious to assist the French in strengthening the hand of the Bao Dai, and at Colombo it might be possible, he suggested, to get some sort of agreement on de facto recognition of the Bao Dai regime in Indo-China, although considerable resistance from India could be anticipated.

11. On question of China, Dening referred to Mao Tse Tung's present visit to Moscow, and said that Foreign Office had received recent reports from the United Kingdom Embassy indicating that possibly some kind of Sino-Soviet agreement would result from the visit, but no details were available.

12. Dening added that the Foreign Secretary had agreed that after recognition of the Chinese Communist Government the Chinese Ambassador in London, and those members of his staff who so wished, would be permitted to reside as private individuals in the United Kingdom.

(IV) General problems of South East Asia

13. This would be essentially a review of the situation in the countries of South East Asia in the light of the position created after recognition of the new Chinese Government. The security of this area was a matter of great concern to all the members of the Commonwealth, and it was imperative that views should be exchanged and measures concerted on the best methods of resisting Communist infiltration and activity. From an economic point of view, Burma, Siam and Indo-China were the three principal rice-growing areas of the world, and the source of Asia's main food supply. If these territories should come within the Communist framework, the whole future of Asia would be affected. Because of India's importance and strategic position, it was to be hoped that her leaders could be persuaded to play a less negative role in this whole area. It was, of course, entirely premature to talk of a South East Asia Security Pact, and Dening agreed that the conditions for such a regional defence association did not exist, first, because of the present unwillingness of the United States and India to play a leading part, and secondly because of the internal conflicts between the component States of the area. Dening had little new to add about Indonesia, but was much more hopeful than at time of opening of Hague Conference.

14. On the question of possible aggression by Communist China, Dening expressed a view similar to that held by Malcolm MacDonald³³ (see our letter to Mr. Heeney of 16th June) that there is no sign that the Chinese Communists intend, once they have liquidated the Nationalist armies in China, to carry their aggression over into the bordering territories. Dening thought that they had taken on an enormous task and would be kept busy in the work of the reconstitution and unification of China itself. The principal threat was indirect, i.e., of continued infiltration, subversion and propaganda, directed particularly to the large Chinese communities in the borderlands. While agreeing that after recognition of the Communist regime in China a careful eye should be kept on Chinese diplomatic missions and consulates abroad, Dening did not feel that this would be too great a problem, providing the countries concerned could be persuaded to act in concert, and to insist on "reciprocal" representation.

15. Questioned about press reports that the Burmese had been invited to the Colombo Conference, Dening said that these had been quite erroneous. The Foreign Office understood that these reports had arisen because of the fact that Thakin Nu had accepted an invitation to be present at a Buddhist ceremony to be held in Colombo about January 20th, and that there was no connection between this visit and the Conference, which would have ended about that time.

Colombo Conference.

If you have an opportunity to have a further talk with a senior officer of the State Department and could let me have a report before our departure Monday afternoon, January 2, it would be most helpful. Our preparations here have been rather slow in being brought into final focus. The agenda has been so broadly worded as to make preparation difficult. In addition, both in regard to our financial position as the only non-sterling country participating, and as the only country without direct regional interests in the Indian Ocean-South West Pacific area, we shall not have as much in common with the other countries represented as they will have with each other. Nevertheless I look forward to this opportunity for a broad exchange of views on current international questions with other members of the Commonwealth, some of whom are in the front line of the struggle against Communist encroachment in East Asia.

Commissioner General of the United Kingdom in Southeast Asia.

2. I expect that my path may cross or come close to that of Ambassador Jessup during our tours of the Far East. If it could be conveniently arranged, without upsetting schedules too much, for us to meet for an exchange of views it would be useful. If not, arrangements can be made for Reid, Menzies or LePan to go down to Washington after our return to talk over our observations with interested officials of the State Department.

Settlement with Japan

3. This is one of the principal items proposed for discussion at the Colombo Conference. If the State Department and the Department of National Defence have ironed out their differences on security requirements and there is anything the State Department has to pass on, however informally, concerning the broad principles along which they would like to see settlement reached with Japan it would be helpful to know about these. In their absence, it is unlikely that discussion of this subject will be postponed. I imagine, therefore, that the views expressed at the Canberra Conference in 1947 will serve as a point of departure for our discussions.

4. The State Department is already aware of our broad views on the Japanese settlement which were conveyed informally by Menzies during his visit to Washington during September. We consider the present piecemeal approach toward restoring Japan to a state of peaceful international intercourse unsatisfactory. It has appeared to us to have been carried out with greater regard to the United States and Japanese susceptibilities than to those of the other countries interested in the settlement. If the United States could set out for the rest of us their overall proposals for a settlement with Japan, and these proved generally acceptable to the majority of states members of the Far Eastern Commission then even if it should be decided that it would be unwise to proceed with a peace settlement without the Russians and Chinese Communists (on the assumption they might not be prepared to accept United States security requirements) it should be at least possible to arrive at some interim understanding among the rest of us concerning Japan's status that would be a good deal more satisfactory to the Japanese and the non-Communist countries than the present unsatisfactory situation is. However naive it may appear to our American friends, we continue to hold to the view that some account must be taken in any settlement with Japan of the possibility of Japan again becoming an aggressive power. Much would be done to allay the suspicions that continue to exist in the minds of the people of many allied countries if emphasis were put upon the need to make permanent the democratic reforms instituted in Japan after the war, thereby lessening the danger that Japan may one day re-emerge as an aggressor.

China

5. At the time of the Conference, some of the Commonwealth countries will have recognized the Communist-controlled Government in Peking. Others will not. The Cabinet has decided here to defer further consideration of the question of recognition until after the Colombo Conference. It will be too early at the time of the Conference to tell what results will have been achieved by recognition. However, I look forward to some useful discussion of the means by which the democratic countries can seek to maintain influence in China.

6. There may also be some discussion of the control of exports to Communist China. As you know, we are putting on an area control of exports to all Far Eastern countries by Order-in-Council. The policy regarding issue of permits is, however, a matter for continuing discussion and study and it will be useful to us to learn at Colombo something about the policies which other Commonwealth Governments intend to follow in regard to trade with Communist China.

Indo-China

7. Mr. Malcolm Macdonald will be a member of the United Kingdom delegation and I expect that he will report on his visit to Indo-China in November when he formed an optimistic impression of the prospects for Bao Dai increasing his influence. The Indians, as you know, have not responded to suggestions that they should give some encouragement to Bao Dai. It will be interesting to learn from them whether they have any alternatives to suggest to the present policy now being pursued by the French Government. As you know, we have informed the French that while our information concerning developments in Indo-China is limited we take a sympathetic view of what they are trying to do there now.

Burma

8. We can look forward to some discussion of the present position and prospects of the Burmese Government. Some of the Commonwealth Governments have shown a direct interest in assisting the Burmese Government and discussed this problem at a Conference in New Delhi a year ago. Our interest in Burma is not a direct one and I am glad, therefore, that in your conversations with Sir Oliver Franks and Mr. Acheson reported in your WA-3434 of December 16† you indicated that it is not likely that the Commonwealth as such would act collectively in respect to assistance to Burma or Malaya. At the same time, we would certainly not stand in the way of other Commonwealth Governments with more direct interest in that area taking advantage of the present meeting to further their discussions of ways and means to give assistance to the Government of Burma.

Economic Problems

9. The concurrent economic discussion will probably be focused on ways and means by which the sterling countries can conserve their foreign exchange. We shall have to make our own special position clear there and endeavour to see that this dollar saving program is not carried out at our expense. There may, however, be some further discussion of the economic means of stemming the Communist advance in East Asia. We shall certainly be interested in following these discussions closely. As you know, we have already devoted a good deal of time to the study of technical assistance under the "Point Four Program". However, I am inclined to think that the initiative in these matters will have to come from those countries attending the Conference who have a more direct interest than we have.

Your EX-3059 of December 29th, Colombo Conference, paragraph 4. Settlement with Japan.

1. [R.E.] Collins saw Allison briefly yesterday afternoon to follow up his previous informal suggestion that Allison might wish to give us the benefit of some of their thinking on the peace settlement for use in connection with discussions at Colombo. Collins also put forward the idea contained in your message that even if security considerations make it difficult to proceed at this time with a formal settlement, it might be useful for the friendly and interested Governments to be informed of the conclusion reached with regard to the proposed settlement and the future status of Japan, aside from the security aspect, to allay doubts regarding the present piecemeal approach and to facilitate constructive action, perhaps in the context of the F.E.C. Allison agreed that this would be useful, and said that an approach along these lines had been considered. However, they had found that it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, to separate the security problem from other aspects of a settlement for Japan, and in any event had not given up hope that they might be able to resolve the security question. If it is finally decided that they definitely cannot proceed with preparations for a settlement, they will probably try to do something along the lines you suggest. Allison regretted that at this time he was unable to give us anything, however informally, that might be helpful in the Colombo discussions.

2. Allison did say, however, that while he hoped the Colombo Conference would not result in too rigid conclusions on the Japanese settlement, he thought it would be very useful if the Conference attempted to make an analysis of the security problem and explored ways and means of solving it.

3. With reference to Formosa, Allison said that recent newspaper speculation on a dramatic shift in United States policy had been unwarranted. He denied the reports of a demand from the President for an immediate and positive policy, and said that the situation had not been changed as a result of the meeting of the Secretary of State and the Defence Secretaries on Wednesday. The Joint Chiefs of Staff still hold that Formosa is not essential, although it would be desirable to keep it out of Communist hands if possible. According to Allison, the military planners, being congenitally restive in the absence of a positive plan, had wished to explore the possibility of doing something to help keep Formosa non-Communist. It was pointed out to them, however, that any active commitment, such as the sending of a strong military advisory group, might put the United States in a very awkward position if the majority of other countries in the United Nations recognized the Communist regime. United States Intelligence appreciation of the situation is that only United States military occupation can ensure that Formosa does not fall to the Communists, and this the Joint Chiefs do not contemplate. It is also apparently agreed that it would be unwise to supply heavy military equipment, although some assistance in the form of the provision of arms will probably be continued.

4. Returning to the Japanese peace settlement Allison suggested that one way out of the Formosa problem might be to leave it over for future consideration. This would be almost essential if at the time of a settlement there were still a division among the interested Governments regarding the recognition of the Communists in China.

CANADA-IRELAND TRADE AND TARIFF RELATIONS

18. The Prime Minister reported that the Cabinet Committee on External Trade Policy had considered a report of the Interdepartmental Committee on the effects of the recent Irish legislation making Ireland an independent republic outside the Commonwealth.

The Cabinet Committee had been advised that, under the relevant provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the Canadian Customs Tariff, Canada could continue existing preferential arrangements with Ireland. These were relatively unimportant, although there would be some value in their retention for future bargaining purposes. In the event that the present regime were continued, some modifications might have to be made in Canadian agreements with countries outside GATT and the Commonwealth with which Canada had most-favoured-nation agreements. Should a case be taken by any such country to the International Court of Justice for treatment similar to that accorded Ireland, the claim would probably be sustained.

The Cabinet Committee, after consideration of the factors involved, had decided that it would not be desirable to alter the existing arrangements at present and that the position could be reconsidered at a later date as circumstances might require.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, January 20, 1949

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I refer to your letter of December 30[†] concerning the future status in Canada of citizens of Ireland. I also wish to thank you and Mr. Wershof for a number of earlier telegrams and despatches containing references to possible amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act. This letter may serve to bring you up to date in respect of the discussions which have taken place here in connection with such amendments. May I say at the outset that our general approach to the problem corresponds to your own as set forth in your letter.

2. Following a meeting which took place in the Prime Minister's office on November 28, I wrote to the Deputy Minister of Justice requesting an opinion on the status of Irish citizens under existing Canadian law. Enclosed is a copy of this letter.[†] I have not yet received a reply from the Deputy Minister of Justice.

3. The practice of the Director of Immigration, and the Registrar of Canadian citizenship, has been to regard Irish citizens as British Subjects for immigration and naturalization purposes without regard to the subtle distinctions which may arise between different citizens of Ireland because of the combined effect of Section 28 and the relevant Irish laws. It is probable that certain citizens of Ireland are not British Subjects under the present Canadian law. No attempt has, therefore, so far been made to work out a formula based upon the continuance of existing status.

4. The earliest draft of possible amendments was prepared by Mr. Coleman, Under Secretary of State, following a meeting attended by representatives of the Department of External Affairs. I am enclosing a copy of this draft across the top of which I have written the heading "Mr. Coleman's Draft".[†] You will observe that Mr. Coleman has adopted in sub-sections (1) and (2) of the proposed new Section 28, the wording suggested by Mr. Wershof in his telegram No. 2120 of November 22 (second alternative).[†]

5. After this draft was considered by the Legal Adviser, I wrote to Mr. Coleman suggesting that "Ireland" be substituted in place of "Eire"; that the countries in the First Schedule be listed in alphabetical order, and that the names given to the countries of the Commonwealth should be the same as in the Nationality Acts of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand.

6. In the meantime, a copy of Mr. Coleman's draft had been sent directly to the Hon. Brooke Claxton (then Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs). Mr.

Claxton requested the Legal Adviser to endeavour to prepare an alternative formula which would achieve the same result as Mr. Coleman's draft, but which would not refer specifically to Ireland. I am enclosing a copy of a proposed substitution prepared by the Legal Adviser which I have entitled for convenience "Mr. Claxton's Suggestion".† It should be noted that this involves a partial revision of Mr. Coleman's proposed amendment. Although this was prepared by the Legal Adviser in response to Mr. Claxton's suggestion, it has not yet been discussed with the Department of the Secretary of State, nor has any final decision yet been made by our Department as to the desirability of omitting specific reference to Ireland. From the point of view of clarity and good draftsmanship there is much to be said in favour of referring specifically to Ireland.

7. I shall now make some additional comments in connection with these enclosures in the light of observations contained in your letter;

(a) I agree that Ireland must be deleted from the First Schedule as suggested in your paragraph 6(a). This is provided for in Mr. Coleman's draft and accepted here.

(b) The expedient adopted in Mr. Claxton's suggestion in order to avoid specific reference to Ireland has been to refer to a listing in the First Schedule on or after January 1, 1947. Continued reference would, therefore, be necessary to the existing First Schedule, although it would be replaced by a new First Schedule for the purpose of defining Commonwealth countries.

(c) I agree that a definition of "alien" to exclude citizens of Ireland should be included as suggested in your paragraph 6(b). This is covered by Mr. Coleman's draft and Mr. Claxton's suggestion.

(d) Section 3(2) of the British Nationality Act is the basis for the proposed new Section 28(3) (but see my paragraph 3 above).

(e) Mr. Coleman's draft of the proposed Section 28(3) is open to the objection mentioned in paragraphs 6(d), 7(b), and 7(c) of your letter in that it might conceivably extend to provincial laws. The formula prepared to meet Mr. Claxton's suggestion also contained a revised wording which would confine the operation of the section to Canadian laws.

8. I agree with the comments in your paragraphs 7(a) and (8), to the effect that the importance of a provision that Irish citizens are not aliens lies in the political gesture, and the possible effect on m.f.n. treaties, rather than any disabilities actually suffered by aliens in Canada.

9. In paragraph (9) of your letter you mention the fact that other amendments may be needed in view of the coming into force of the British Nationality Act and prospective changes in the status of India. I have already observed, that Mr. Wershof's suggestions formed the basis of the proposed sub-sections 28(1) and 28(2). In respect of India I might point out that Mr. Claxton's suggestion (which is based on the listings in the First Schedule on or after January 1, 1947) would take care of developments in India if she should secede from the Commonwealth or sever the link through the Crown: Provided, of course, that India were first included in the new First Schedule.

10. We have been giving some thought to "reciprocity". Mr. Costello, in his speech in the Dail, on November 24, 1948, on second reading of the Republic of Ireland Bill 1948, said:

"Accordingly we propose, as and when the Commonwealth countries grant our citizens recognition and rights, to make orders provisionally under Section 23(2) giving their citizens comparable rights. At a later stage, but in the near future, I hope, it is the Government's intention to review our whole Nationality Law and to bring before the Dail a comprehensive measure to rectify many of the anomalies that now exist in the Act of 1935. In the new Bill provisions will be made to ensure that Commonwealth citizens shall be afforded comparable rights to those afforded to our citizens in the British Commonwealth. There is one thing I should like to make clear to our friends in Britain and in the Commonwealth generally. It is that, after the passage of this Bill, we will continue, provided they so desire, the exchange of citizenship rights and privileges. Ireland does not now, and, when the External Relations Act is repealed, Ireland does not intend to regard their citizens as 'foreigners' or their countries as 'foreign' countries."

11. In view of this statement, should Canada:

(a) provide finally by statute (as the U.K. has done) for the status of citizens of Ireland?

(b) provide by statute for citizens of Ireland as in (a), but ensure that the relevant provision will become operative only on proclamation?

(c) provide by statute for a delegation of authority (which the present Irish legislation does) to the Governor General in Council to extend the rights of British Subjects under Canadian law to citizens of Ireland (or citizens of the Commonwealth countries listed, etc.) to the extent to which reciprocity is accorded?

12. Your early comments on the foregoing would be much appreciated.³⁵

Yours sincerely,
ESCOTT REID

Memorandum by High Commissioner Designate in Ireland

SECRET

[Ottawa], January 26, 1949

I had a short talk with Mr. Pearson this morning about our relations with the government and people of Ireland. Mr. Pearson's views briefly are as follows:

(a) Republic of Ireland. Mr. Pearson thinks that any difficulties arising from the proclamation of the Republic of Ireland should be minimized as much as possible. Cordial relations now exist between Canada and Ireland and it should be our hope that they would be maintained and strengthened. We look upon Ireland as one of the mother countries of Canada. The less bitterness there is now the more chance there will be for a new association with Ireland which might in turn serve as a pattern for our relationship with other countries currently in the Commonwealth. We would hope that nothing would be said in either Ireland or Canada which would make it difficult to continue friendly relations. We are aware of the legal difficulties. We propose, however, to continue the present trade privileges at least until they are challenged by a third country. The legal difficulties about citizenship are perhaps more difficult to resolve. We would like to provide that Irish citizens in Canada would not be aliens, and, although not British subjects, would be entitled to the same privileges as British subjects in Canada. To accomplish this legislation would be required. It may not be possible to introduce such legislation at the current session of Parliament.

³⁵ Note marginale/Marginal Note:

My first uninformed preference is for (a) [N.A.] R[obertson]

(b) Title of High Commissioner. From the long-term point of view we do not care whether or not the Irish wish to call the representatives we exchange Ministers or Ambassadors. From the short-term point of view we would hope that the Irish Government would not press for a change. If our representatives continue to be called High Commissioners it might assist us in argument with a third country in maintaining that a special relationship existed between Ireland and Canada and consequently that Ireland is not a foreign country.

(c) Partition. This obviously is a delicate question and one on which I should speak with great caution. We would naturally welcome any solution which is acceptable to the people of Ireland as a whole, and we hope that Ireland will become one country by the free will of the people of both parts.³⁶

(d) North Atlantic Security Pact. Ireland will be invited to join as an original member. It is our hope that she would accept. It is understood, however, that Ireland is not prepared to join except on condition that partition is ended. The security pact stands on its own feet and should increase the security not only of Canada but of Ireland. There can be no question of making any bargain with Ireland about partition as a condition precedent to her signing the pact.

Minute attached to document:

Mr. Pick: I agree with your note on page 2, and think that either the last part of para (c) is badly expressed or that there was some misunderstanding between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Johnson. I can hardly believe that Mr. Pearson would intentionally direct Mr. Johnson to express a hope that Ireland would become one country. Perhaps that is not implied, but obviously it is a point on which supreme caution by the Canadian representative is essential. M[arjorie] Mc[Kenzie]

Dear Mr. Reid,

RE: STATUS OF CITIZENS OF IRELAND

Mr. Robertson is in Geneva at present and, therefore, this letter has not been submitted to him. However, before he left for Geneva, he glanced over your letter of Jan. 20th and said that his "first uninformed preference" was for the plan set forth in (a) of para. 11.

That is also my view. There would perhaps be no harm in specifying that the provision in the Canadian Citizenship Act should become operative only on proclamation, but I see no real reason to add this formality. The Prime Minister of Ireland has pledged himself to grant reciprocity and I am sure that we can count on his fulfilling his pledge.

With all respect to Mr. Claxton, I do not like his plan of avoiding a specific reference to Ireland. I cannot think of any strong reason why a specific reference to Ireland should be avoided. The case of Ireland is "sui generis" and it seems to me that Canada and other Commonwealth countries should be quite willing to say frankly that they are doing something special for Ireland. Furthermore, Mr. Claxton's plan leads to a very cumbersome wording and will have this result—that ordinary people reading the Canadian Citizenship Act will be completely confused as to who is an alien and who is not. Legislation by reference is always a bad thing, and would be particularly confusing to the public in the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Although I think that Canada should provide finally by statute for the status of the citizens of Ireland, I do not think that it is essential that the necessary amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act should be enacted at the present session of Parliament. As suggested in Mr. Robertson's letter of Dec. 30th, the most important thing is the political gesture of saying that citizens of Ireland are not aliens notwithstanding that Ireland is giving up membership in the Commonwealth. I should think that it would be fairly satisfactory if the Canadian Government were in the near future to announce its intention of introducing such an amendment while saying that it will not be done until the next session of Parliament. It seems to me that reasons could be given for delaying legislation while making the announcement. One obvious reason is that the status of India has not yet been settled and we might just as well wait until it has been before amending the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Turning to minor points, I entirely agree with you that, in future, the word "Ireland" should be used in place of "Eire", that the countries of the British Commonwealth should be listed in alphabetical order, and that the names given to these countries should be the same as in the British Nationality Act.

Yours sincerely,

RE: STATUS OF CITIZENS OF IRELAND

I have received a reply written by Mr. Wershof (in the absence of Mr. Robertson) to the letter, which I wrote to Mr. Robertson on January the 20th with your concurrence, in which I summarized the discussions which had taken place here concerning provision in the Canadian Citizenship Act for Citizens of Ireland.

2. Mr. Robertson glanced over my letter before leaving for Geneva and expressed a preference for an amendment which would confer rights upon citizens of Ireland specifically rather than by necessary implication from a general reference such as was proposed by Mr. Claxton.

3. Mr. Wershof has expressed the opinion the "the Prime Minister of Ireland has pledged himself to grant reciprocity and I am sure that we can count on his fulfilling his pledge." The Nationality Acts of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand all make specific reference to Ireland, and provide for the status of Irish citizens in unequivocal terms without imposing conditions of reciprocity.

4. I concur in Mr. Wershof's view that it is not essential to introduce amendments at the present session. However, I think that it is necessary to have the clearest opinion from Justice as to the present status of Irish citizens in Canada, to meet any possible question in the Commons.

5. If you agree that there is no immediate necessity of amending the Canadian Citizenship Act, you may wish to indicate your views to Mr. Gibson.³⁷ Since we have not been in consultation with his Department since Mr. Coleman's draft of amendments was prepared early in December, it would not appear necessary to review the recent correspondence concerning this draft, until it is decided, as a matter of policy, that an amending Act is to be introduced.

6. You have had some correspondence with Mr. Claxton, who, during your absence, showed interest in Mr. Coleman's draft and suggested the desirability of avoiding specific reference to Ireland. The revision which was prepared to meet Mr. Claxton's suggestion is not favoured by the officers in the Department (including the Legal Adviser) who have considered this alternative, or by Mr. Wershof. Juridically it is much better to proceed specifically, and not by reference.

7. I am appending for your convenience copies of the following:

- (a) Mr. Gordon Robertson's memorandum of November 23;†
- (b) My letter to the Deputy Minister of Justice of November 29;†
- (c) Mr. Coleman's draft (December 9);†

CIRCULAR DOCUMENT NO. B.38

Sir,

The Republic of Ireland Act, recently passed by the Irish Parliament, is to come into effect on April 18. This act will have the incidental effect of enabling a clear distinction to be drawn between the island of Ireland, which includes Northern Ireland, and the Republic of Ireland.

2. Since 1937 the practice of Commonwealth countries in referring to the territory previously known as the Irish Free State has varied. Article 4 of the revised constitution adopted by that country in 1937 provided:

The name of the State is Eire, or, in the English language, Ireland.

The meaning of the Gaelic name "Eire" is, as you know, identical with that of the English name "Ireland". Both names, up to 1937, had only one significance: they meant the whole island, which politically was divided between the Irish Free State and Northern Ireland. Since 1937 they have had a dual significance through their adoption as the Gaelic and English forms of the name of the former Irish Free State, while they retain, in addition, their former all-inclusive meaning.

3. The United Kingdom Government, in a statement published on December 30, 1937, recognized implicitly the identical meaning of the names "Ireland" and "Eire" by declaring:

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom...cannot recognize that the adoption of the name Eire or Ireland, or any other provision of those articles, involves any right to territory or jurisdiction over territory forming part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, or affects in any way the position of Northern Ireland as an integral part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. They therefore regard the use of the name Eire or Ireland in this connection as relating only to that area which has hitherto been known as the Irish Free State.

4. In spite of this recognition that both names have identical meaning, the United Kingdom has from the first in the Eire (Confirmation of Agreements) Act, 1938, and elsewhere, adopted the practice of speaking of Eire rather than of Ireland. In 1947 the United Kingdom Home Office issued instructions to United Kingdom government departments to use "Eire". A copy of these instructions was given informally to the Canadian Department of External Affairs by the United Kingdom High Commissioner, and one is attached for your confidential information.†

5. The practice elsewhere has varied. It may be noted, however, that the United Nations and the International Labour Office use the name "Ireland".

6. When in 1938, after the name "Irish Free State" had been discarded, it became necessary for the Canadian Department of External Affairs to decide which of the alternative names "Ireland" or "Eire" should be used, all available information as to the practice of other countries and organizations was obtained. The Irish representatives in Ottawa and London gave their official titles as "High Commissioner for Ireland," and the Irish representative at the League of Nations headquarters in Geneva informed the Canadian representative that "Ireland" was the correct English name for the country. It was observed that the Imperial Communications Advisory Committee, in its minutes of January 27, 1938, "took note that the Representative of the Irish Free State would in future be referred to as the Representative of Ireland." From London, the High Commissioner for Canada reported that the High Commissioners for Australia and South Africa were going to use the word "Ireland", while the High Commissioner for New Zealand favoured "Eire". As for the United Kingdom, the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs had been asked in the House of Commons whether the United Kingdom Government had adopted "Eire" as the correct official way of describing what was formerly known by treaty as the "Irish Free State," and had replied: "We are recognizing and using the term which the people of Eire have constitutionally adopted".

7. A further consideration was that any Canadian Government communication would normally be in English rather than in Gaelic, and that the use of the Gaelic word "Eire" in such a communication might therefore be inappropriate (just as it would scarcely be considered appropriate, in a communication written in English which mentioned the Government of Egypt, to speak of it as the Government of Misr, unless the Egyptian Government specially requested that the Egyptian form of the country's name should be used).

8. The Department of External Affairs therefore adopted the practice of using the name "Ireland". This practice has not been invariable in less formal correspondence, and consideration has occasionally been given to the possibility of changing it. It was felt, however, that a sudden reversal of our longstanding policy in this respect would almost certainly be misunderstood.

9. The Republic of Ireland Act, which will come into force on April 18, 1949, provides:

The description of the State shall be the Republic of Ireland.

This new description will provide a convenient means of distinguishing between the island "Ireland" and "the Republic of Ireland" without using the Gaelic for the purpose.

10. I would therefore suggest that on and after April 18, the designation "Republic of Ireland" should be used in formal references to this country, and in informal references where it is desirable to make it clear that the country rather than the island is intended. For casual mention where there is no likelihood of any misunderstanding, the name "Ireland" will, no doubt, still afford a convenient brief means of referring to the country in question.

11. The titles of "High Commissioner for Ireland" and "High Commissioner for Canada in Ireland" are not affected by this ruling.

I have, etc.

DESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVES EXCHANGED WITH IRELAND

Some consideration has been given to the aide-mémoire of February 8† which Mr. Shannon³⁹ left with you, concerning an expected proposal by the Irish Government to introduce titles and letters of credence for representatives exchanged between Ireland and Commonwealth countries, similar to those employed for representatives exchanged between foreign countries.

2. In this Division we were inclined to advocate that the Canadian Government should agree with and support the United Kingdom policy as set forth in paragraph 2 of the message attached to Mr. Shannon's note, though it was realized that we would no doubt wish to avoid making any long-term commitment to retain the title "High Commissioner" for the representatives we exchange with Commonwealth countries. Some support for this view was found in a short memorandum which Mr. Wershof prepared for Mr. Pearson when the latter was in London last December 15, copy of which is attached.† Furthermore, the following paragraph has been observed in a note which Mr. Johnson made on a conversation he had with Mr. Pearson on January 26, prior to the former's departure for Dublin.

“From the long-term point of view we do not care whether or not the Irish wish to call the representatives we exchange Ministers or Ambassadors. From the short-term point of view we would hope that the Irish Government would not press for a change. If our representatives continue to be called High Commissioners it might assist us in argument with a third country in maintaining that a special relationship existed between Ireland and Canada and consequently that Ireland is not a foreign country.”

3. The subject was referred to the interested Divisions, namely Legal, Protocol, and Economic. Mr. Hopkins simply expressed the opinion that he did not think we should intervene. Mr. Measures stated that unless Canada would be adversely affected under commercial treaties to which Canada is a party, he did not think we would be justified in tying ourselves to the United Kingdom position, and he shared Mr. Hopkins view, adding that it might be to our advantage to inform the Irish High Commissioner at Ottawa informally that we would prefer to continue, for the present at least, on the present basis of inter-Commonwealth representation. The Economic Division has remarked that our trade agreements are just as vulnerable as those of the United Kingdom as they provide for the granting of preferences to countries “under the sovereignty of the King...” This Division did not, however, feel that it could give an opinion on the legal value attached to the continued use of the style “High Commissioner” rather than “Minister” or “Ambassador”.

4. Because of the rather divided opinions among the Divisions interested, we have prepared somewhat of a compromise reply that might be given to the United Kingdom, which is set forth in the attached memorandum to the Minister which is submitted for your signature.†

5. Perhaps we should not be too worried about the legal defence of the “special relationship” with Ireland before an International Court, although we would not be happy to receive a decision to the effect that we had violated international agreements. The matter is perhaps one that the Irish Government itself is as much as or more immediately concerned with than we are. It was the Irish Government which first indicated that it was “anxious to continue the exchange of trade preference and citizenship rights.” This continued exchange they felt could be justified and defended on the grounds of “long-established economic, social and trade arrangements”. They have argued that the existing rights could be justified on grounds of tradition, custom, etc. The Irish seem confident that there is likely to be no challenge to the existing rights and privileges between Ireland and Commonwealth countries but that if such a challenge is made by a foreign country there are sufficient arguments to defend the relationship. If this is the way the Irish feel, perhaps we should not be unduly perturbed. We would, of course, do our utmost to maintain the status quo of trade and citizenship privileges but if successfully challenged in an International Court by a foreign country, then they would have to be abandoned or revised. The fault or responsibility, it would seem, would lie mainly with the Irish rather than ourselves.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], April 7, 1949

MESSAGE TO PRIME MINISTER OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND FOR THE CELEBRATION ON APRIL 18 OF THE COMING INTO FORCE OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND ACT

1. You will have noted from Mr. Johnson's telegrams No. 36 of April 1† and No. 38 of April 2,† copies of which have been referred to you, that Irish representatives abroad are likely to be instructed, when making their official communication regarding the establishment of the Republic of Ireland, to indicate that a message of good wishes would be welcome. In the case of Commonwealth countries, it is expected that the suggestion will be for a message from Prime Minister to Prime Minister.

2. Pending an official approach from Mr. Hearne in the matter, some preliminary consideration has been given to the possible contents of such a message. The following draft is submitted for your consideration:

From the Prime Minister of Canada to the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland

On the occasion of the establishment of the Republic of Ireland, I have pleasure in extending to you, on behalf of the Government and people of Canada, the most cordial good wishes for a happy and prosperous future. At this time we cannot fail to recall the memorable contribution made by pioneers of Irish stock to the building of the Canadian nation. Remembering this, we look forward with confidence to the increasing development of the friendship which has for so many years linked the Irish and Canadian peoples together.⁴⁰

3. I might mention for your information that the passage of the Republic of Ireland Act seems to afford a more convenient means than hitherto of distinguishing between the whole island of Ireland and the country previously known as the Irish Free State, and later as Ireland. There has in the past been a tendency to use the Gaelic name Eire for the country, in the belief that Northern Ireland was thereby necessarily excluded—a belief which seems unfounded. It will now be possible, by the use of the full designation "Republic of Ireland," to make it perfectly clear what territory is intended. The Department of External Affairs and its missions abroad are therefore adopting the policy, on and after April 18, of using this designation in formal references or whenever it is desirable to define carefully what territory is being referred to. The terms "Ireland" and "Irish" are being retained for casual use. The titles "High Commissioner for Ireland" and "High Commissioner for Canada in Ireland" could of course be altered only by government action, which does not at present appear desirable, particularly as the Irish Government had no intention of providing a means of distinguishing between the territory under its jurisdiction and the island as a whole when it introduced the Republic of Ireland Act.

4. In accordance with the new departmental practice, the message in paragraph 2 above is drafted as to the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland. The references in the message to pioneers of Irish stock and to the Irish people do not of course exclude Northern Ireland.

5. In Mr. Johnson's telegrams of April 1 and 2 he also asked confirmation of his assumption that he should attend the ceremonies to which the Dublin diplomatic corps will be invited for April 18. These consist of a mass, a military ceremony at the General Post Office, and a reception. We shall probably instruct him that there is no objection. The only feature as to which there might be any doubt is the military ceremony at the General Post Office, which was the headquarters in 1916 of the revolutionary government which first proclaimed the Republic of Ireland, and which was bombarded and set on fire by British forces in suppressing the revolt. The President of the Republic of Ireland will attend this ceremony, and I think that if Mr. Johnson is invited to attend he should accept. The ceremony will be analogous to a Fourth of July ceremony in Washington, which also commemorates a revolution.

Reference your letter of February 24† and your despatch No. 3 of January 7, 1949, † concerning status of Irish citizens after Easter Monday April 18.

Government does not plan to amend Canadian Citizenship Act during this Session of Parliament. In view of the forthcoming Commonwealth Prime Minister's Conference which we understand may take place in London shortly and in view of the fact that Department of Justice has not yet rendered an opinion concerning questions relating to the coming into force of the Republic of Ireland Statute, it is impossible at this time to give you detailed instructions covering all aspects of this subject.

However, following instructions are for your guidance pending receipt of further detailed instructions at a later date:

(a) You should refrain from making any public statement concerning the position of Irish citizens under Canadian Law.

(b) You should answer all inquiries of a general nature concerning the rights of Irish citizens including such matters as the holding of public positions, exercise of the franchise, liability to military service, double taxation, etcetera, and unemployment or other social insurance benefits, by making general statements that it is the policy of the Canadian Government not to regard Irish citizens as aliens and to accord them as far as possible the same privileges as British subjects. You should refer requests for more detailed information to Ottawa.

(c) You should refer all questions concerning admissibility to Canada to Ottawa for a ruling by the Director of Immigration until further notice. Immigration report that recommendations are being submitted to change P.C. 4849 and P.C. 4851 to provide for admission of citizens of Ireland under the same conditions as British subjects defined in paragraphs 1 of those Orders-in-Council.

(d) All persons inquiring as to their right to acquire Canadian citizenship should be informed that the Canadian Law does not provide for citizenship by registration and that five years residence is required of all persons entering Canada after January 1, 1947 as a condition for acquiring Canadian citizenship regardless of whether they are British subjects or aliens. You should avoid any reference to the procedure and in particular to the necessity of a court hearing under Section 10(1)(a) of the Canadian Citizenship Act.

THE IRELAND BILL AND IRISH REACTIONS

1. Recent telegrams from Dublin, of which a set is attached† for your convenience, indicate that all parties in the Dail are taking the most violent exception to the passage by the United Kingdom Parliament of that part of the Ireland Bill which provides “that Northern Ireland remains part of His Majesty’s dominions and of the United Kingdom” and will not cease to be part of them without the consent of the Parliament of Northern Ireland. Nevertheless today’s newspapers report that the bill, including this provision, has passed the United Kingdom Commons.

2. A debate on the matter took place in the Dail on May 10, on a motion by the Prime Minister placing on record the indignant protest of the Irish Government and calling upon the United Kingdom Government to end the occupation of the Six Counties. De Valera⁴¹ supported the motion, appealing to statesmen in other countries to dissuade the United Kingdom from passing the bill. Mr. Costello stated that his Government would organize a tremendous effort among Irishmen both in Ireland and abroad to undo partition.

3. Mr. Johnson is taking a strictly neutral position and will express no opinion on the merits of the bill, unless he receives instructions to take a more positive line.

4. Mr. MacKay has been spending the week in Ireland, and is leaving for Canada by TCA on Saturday. He will no doubt be able to supplement Mr. Johnson's reports with his personal impressions of the Dail debate.

5. In the agitation over the part of the bill which deals with Northern Ireland, no attention is being paid in Ireland to the bill's primary purpose, which is to ensure that under United Kingdom law the Republic of Ireland shall not be treated as a foreign country. A copy of the bill is attached for your examination.

6. I think that, in the circumstances, Johnson should adhere to his policy of saying nothing as to the merits of the Ireland Bill.⁴² Any intervention in the controversy between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland would be a difficult and delicate matter. It appears from here that the Irish Government is over-optimistic as to the degree of support for abolishing partition which might be expected from the population of Northern Ireland, and that it entirely fails to appreciate the position in which the United Kingdom Government would be placed if it withdrew its protection from a government and people which has stood by it in war so effectively as the Government and people of Northern Ireland have done. However, any hint to this effect from Canada would risk irritating the Irish Government still further, though it might have the advantage of lessening any illusions on their part as to the amount of sympathy on which they could count from the people of Canada in any attempt to high-pressure Northern Ireland into union or federation with them.

7. We might have to take exception to the expressed intention of the Irish Government to "organize a tremendous effort among Irishmen abroad" to undo partition,⁴³ if this involves agents of the Irish Government attempting to organize Canadian citizens of Irish descent into pressure groups designed to serve the ends of the Irish Government. The Canadian Government would not, I think, approve of the United Kingdom High Commissioner undertaking a campaign among the Sons of England and the Sons of Scotland with the idea of inducing them to support some controversial policy of the United Kingdom Government. There is always difficulty in controlling the tendency of the representatives of other countries in Canada to feel that Canadians whose ancestors came from their country are a part of their flock. The activities of German and Italian consuls in Canada before the war are an extreme case which illustrates the need for representatives of other countries to confine themselves to their proper duties of dealing with the Canadian Government, and of looking after the interests of their own nationals within Canada. However, we need make no decision about this at the moment. We can see how the "threat" develops.⁴⁴

8. During the debate in the United Kingdom House of Commons yesterday on the second reading of the Ireland Bill, Mr. Attlee took the opportunity to reply to Irish criticisms. His principal argument was that, just as the United Kingdom had no right to force the Republic of Ireland to remain within the Commonwealth against its will, so it had no right to force Northern Ireland to leave the Commonwealth.

REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

15. Mr. MacKay reported that considerable feeling had been aroused in the Republic of Ireland by the Bill now before the United Kingdom Parliament designed to meet the situation created by the establishment of the Republic. The Bill proposes to give citizens of Ireland resident in the United Kingdom a special non-foreign status in accordance with the general understanding reached with the Government of Ireland after decision to repeal the External Relations Act and declare a Republic. The Preamble of the Bill however includes a clause to the effect that the status and territorial integrity of Northern Ireland will not be changed except by consent of the Parliament of Northern Ireland. The Government of the Republic has objected strongly to this clause, primarily because it puts in statutory form an undertaking which has hitherto been at most a statement made to Parliament by the United Kingdom Government. The Government of the Republic protests that this gives an opportunity to the Government of Northern Ireland for gerry-mandering constituencies where there are Nationalist voters, and freezes the situation with regard to Partition. A resolution introduced in the Dail by the Government was carried unanimously, and at a monster open-air meeting in Dublin on the 12th of May the Leaders of all Parties appeared on the platform to protest against the Bill. The Government of the Republic are urging Irish citizens to appeal to persons of Irish extraction abroad, and they have already sent to other Commonwealth Governments, and possibly to other Governments, copies of their protest to the United Kingdom. They may even try to get their case before the United Nations. There is some danger that Nationalist extremists in Ireland may be incited to take direct action against Northern Ireland. There is also some danger that opinion may be aroused in certain quarters in the United States against the continuance of ECA funds to the United Kingdom on the ground that it is occupying part of Ireland.

DESPATCH NO. 106

Dublin, May 24, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir:

I am sending you notes on conversations which Mr. R. A. MacKay and I had with Mr. Costello, Mr. MacBride, and Mr. Boland (Secretary of the Department of External Affairs), when Mr. MacKay was here during the second week of May. These notes do not add very much to what these same men have said in public, but are interesting in that they show what views they wished to convey to a senior officer of our Department and, through him, to you.

Mr. Costello:

2. Mr. MacKay and I saw Mr. Costello on Thursday afternoon, May 12th, for about an hour in his office in the Dail. The only other person present was Senator James Douglas, who arranged the interview. Mr. Costello's remarks may be summarized as follows:

(a) He emphasized that the feeling against Britain was never so high. The Republic was united on this issue as never before. He was afraid of what might happen in the North. The United Kingdom always makes settlements with Ireland too late, and then grants to force what it refuses to grant to political negotiation. Young Nationalists in the North know all this and will be difficult to restrain.

(b) He said that the new United Kingdom Bill was quite unnecessary. It was a senseless provocation to make at this time. Mr. Costello emphasized that there was a big difference between a declaration of policy made by a Prime Minister, and a declaration of policy incorporated in a statute. The former could be changed so much more easily than the latter. He thinks that there is something sinister about the phrase "territorial integrity". He links it up with the language of the Atlantic Pact, and thinks that the United Kingdom is attempting to enlist the help of the Atlantic powers in maintaining Partition.

(c) Mr. Costello was very bitter about some Members of the United Kingdom Cabinet. In his speech in the Dail on May 10th he said that he acquitted most of the Ministers, but not all of them of vindictiveness. He said that the Minister he did not acquit of vindictiveness was Mr. [Herbert] Morrison. Apparently there was an incident when Mr. Morrison was here last summer. Mr. Costello referred to it in his speech in the Dail on May 10th. Without mentioning Mr. Morrison's name he said: "I had to tell one of them last June that Partition was created by the Act of 1920. He refused to take my word for it; he said that he would have to have it verified." Mr. Costello also had unkind words for the Commonwealth Relations Office. He thinks that Mr. Attlee, Mr. Bevin, and others, had very little idea of what was in the Bill until it was published, and that Mr. Noel-Baker and his staff put in the offending clause without drawing much attention to it. As evidence of this he said that even when Mr. MacBride saw Mr. Attlee, Mr. Bevin, and Mr. Noel Baker, after the Bill was published, Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevin did not realize that the words "or any part thereof" were in the clause.

(d) Mr. Costello spent some time telling us about the arbitrary nature of the boundary between North and South. He said that the original intention was to include in Northern Ireland the whole nine counties of Ulster. It was realized, however, that Northern Ireland would, from the beginning, have had a Nationalist majority. As the area in which there was a Protestant majority was, by itself, too small to make a separate unit the boundary was in the end so drawn as to add to the Belfast area a sufficient number of counties to make it a viable economy and yet leave the area, as a whole, with a reasonable Protestant majority.

(e) Mr. Costello made the same point that he has often made publicly, namely, that by all international tests Ireland is one nation. Ireland has a well defined boundary, historic tradition, and homogeneous population. For some purposes the whole of Ireland is even now considered as an entity. He referred particularly to religion and sport. It is, of course, true that both the Catholic Church and the Church of Ireland are organized on an island basis. Again, in International matches against England, Scotland, Wales, and France, the Irish team is drawn from the whole of Ireland.

(f) Mr. Costello dealt with some objections to the ending of Partition given in the North. He was quite sure there would be no religious discrimination. The Irish are a very tolerant race, and there are already provisions in the Constitution ensuring freedom of religion, speech, and so on, but the Government would be willing to add such additional safeguards as the North might like.

(g) He said that the people of the North need not fear that they would be powerless. From the beginning he thought that they would hold the balance of power between the two main parties and would have more influence than their numbers might warrant. He paid a tribute to their business sagacity and thought that in no time they would be running the business of the country. The people who had cause to fear the end of Partition were, according to Mr. Costello, the business interests in the Republic.

(h) He dealt with the Social Service argument in a superficial way. He admitted that Social Services were much higher in the North than in the South. This, he said, was a mere matter of money. If the United Kingdom was now making a contribution to the Social Services of Northern Ireland then it would be only fair for the United Kingdom to continue to do so, because of its responsibility for creating Partition. If the United Kingdom refused to do this then the Republic would pay the sum necessary to maintain the services at the present level.

(i) As an indication of how difficult it would be to make an arrangement with the ruling class in the North Mr. Costello referred to an incident which had already been mentioned to me. Apparently the suggestion was once put to Sir Basil Brooke⁴⁵ that he might like to meet Mr. Costello. The idea was that they should have a game of golf together. Sir Basil refused.

(j) Mr. Costello is hurt and resentful about the manner in which the British Bill was introduced.

(k) As we were leaving Mr. Costello said that throughout the length and breadth of the Republic there was the greatest good will for Canada. The interview ended on that note.

Mr. MacBride:

3. Mr. MacKay and I were the guests of Mr. Sean MacBride at lunch on May 12th. No other person was present. Mr. MacBride looked tired and drawn. He did not appear anxious to talk about the crisis then at its height, and most of the time was passed discussing other matters. He spoke about his trip to the United States, and said he was on the point of writing a personal letter to you about the discomforts and discourtesies experienced at Gander. About Partition he had the following to say:

(a) Feeling was running high. On his return to Dublin after a month's absence he had been surprised to find the Members of the Cabinet were so angry.

(b) He indicated that he was a restraining influence. Things were being said and done which made his task as Minister for External Affairs more difficult.

(c) He thought that the guarantee clause in the United Kingdom Bill was a stupid blunder. It was unnecessary and provocative.

(d) In response to a question from me he suggested that the best presentation which he had made of the Irish case on Partition was in his speech at Chatham House on 24th February, 1949.

(e) Ireland has no tradition of orderly development. The important thing was to keep the initiative in the hands of political leaders. He thought there was a real danger of violence.

Mr. Boland:

4. Mr. Boland had lunch with Mr. MacKay and me on May 11th. The only other persons present were Mr. Dignam, High Commissioner for Australia, and Mr. Hicks. Mr. Boland is always forthcoming in talks of this kind and gave a lot of interesting information. Here is a summary, prepared by Mr. Hicks, of what he said:

(a) Someone asked Mr. Boland if a formula similar to that proposed by Mr. Mackenzie King with regard to Newfoundland's entry into Canada would have been acceptable to the Irish Government, namely a declaration to the effect that Northern Ireland would not be required to enter into union with the Republic without the freely expressed consent of her people. Mr. Boland said that, under present circumstances, this formula would not be acceptable. The Six-Counties was an artificially created area whose boundaries were defined by Carson so as to exclude three counties of Ulster and only include six counties where the Northern Unionists would have a permanent safe majority. If the formula were to embrace the whole province of Ulster, this would be acceptable.

(b) Mr. Boland was asked why the Irish Government seem to feel there was such a great difference between Mr. Attlee's assurances to Northern Ireland in October and November of last year, and the clause giving a guarantee to Northern Ireland in the present Ireland Bill. Mr. Boland said that the terms of the guarantee referring to the Parliament of Northern Ireland had been a surprise to him. The attitude of the British Labour Government in the past had seemed to be that they hoped that a solution to the Partition of Ireland might be found, but that they would do nothing to coerce Northern Ireland. The wording of the objectionable clause was negative and seemed to encourage what the Irish would regard as Northern Ireland's intransigence. Mr. Boland had hoped that the clause referring to Partition would be phrased to suggest that Britain would welcome the end of Partition but only if it was brought about as a result of a resolution passed by the parliaments of both Northern and Southern Ireland.

(c) There was some discussion as to whether the responsible Ministers in England realised what a storm of protest the present clause would raise in Ireland. Mr. Boland felt that if Lord Rugby⁴⁶ had been consulted he would have given a strong warning. Mr. Boland said that the present action of the British Government had been most unfortunate. There had been real progress in recent years towards a solution of Partition. The idea of a Federation, with Northern Ireland keeping its own local parliament, had been accepted by Irish opinion as a possible solution, which was not the case fifteen years ago.

(d) Mr. Boland was asked why the discussion was so violent. He thought that, in the case of Mr. Costello, it was a matter of personality. Mr. de Valera's speech had in fact been more restrained. Mr. Boland said that the great fear of Irish political leaders was that the issue might get out of hand. There was, after all, a strong revolutionary tradition in Ireland: the people were not trained by centuries of precedent to rely on constitutional and orderly change. It was, therefore, necessary for the Government and the main Party leaders to keep the initiative. The danger was that if one Orangeman was shot in Northern Ireland and an Irish Nationalist executed, then violence might easily break out. A symptom of this type of thinking was various resolutions calling for violent action and in some cases referring to the recent example of Israel, which were being passed by irresponsible local bodies.

(e) Discussing the recent Commonwealth Conference and the Indian solution, Mr. Boland remarked that the formula of referring to the Crown as a symbol and recognizing the King as the Head of the Commonwealth was an Irish formula, and was first advanced in 1920 by Mr. de Valera. United Kingdom officials, in preparing for the recent Conference, had, in fact, studied Mr. de Valera's proposals of that time. Mr. Boland had remarked recently to Mr. de Valera that if he were not careful he would go down in history as a great Commonwealth statesman.

(f) Mr. Boland was asked if Ireland with Partition ended would accept the Indian solution? Granting that this event was most unlikely, Mr. Boland thought that the majority of the people, even of Southern Ireland alone, would accept the Indian solution. Mr. Dignam mentioned the view of some Australian critics of the Indian solution that allegiance to the Crown was an essential part of the nature of the Commonwealth. Mr. Boland thought that the Commonwealth leaders had always been very wise in avoiding any suggestion of exclusiveness in the Commonwealth. To India and to African Colonies approaching Commonwealth status, the Crown was, as it was to Ireland, a symbol of repression commanding no natural feeling of allegiance, and it would be unwise to try to insist on it.

I have, etc.

DAVID. M. JOHNSON

IRELAND BILL

1. On May 25 Mr. Hearne called and left with me the attached copy of a "Memorandum on the Ireland Bill."† He said he had been instructed to deliver it to you personally or, if you were not available, to me. I have sent him a written acknowledgement with an assurance that it would be brought to your attention on your return.

2. The memorandum is simply a summary of the Irish case against that part of the Ireland Bill which deals with Northern Ireland. It does not, unless inferentially, request any action by the Canadian Government, and seems to call for no further reply than the acknowledgement which has already been sent. It is based on the assumption that the right of self-determination inheres in the inhabitants of all Ireland jointly, not in those inhabiting any one part of the island (unless perhaps in the inhabitants of those areas of Northern Ireland in which there is a majority opposed to partition).

3. An interesting point in the memorandum is its contention that the reference in the preamble of the Ireland Bill to "the territorial integrity of Northern Ireland" is meant to place it under the guarantee of the North Atlantic Treaty. It does not seem likely that the phrase was inserted for that purpose. Northern Ireland, as part of the United Kingdom, would automatically share in any protection afforded by the North Atlantic Treaty against aggression from without. Moreover, the United Kingdom would not be likely to need assistance from other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty in coping with an attack on Northern Ireland from south of the border.

4. The Ireland Bill passed second reading in the House of Lords last week. An interesting feature of the earlier passage through the House of Commons was the strength of the opposition within the Labour Party to the section dealing with Northern Ireland. The anti-partition campaign carried on within England by Mr. MacBride and Mr. de Valera during their visits seems to have been quite effective.

[London], November 14, 1949

PERSONAL MESSAGE FOR MR. ST. LAURENT FROM MR. ATTLEE,
DATED 14TH NOVEMBER 1949

The Government of India have indicated informally to our High Commissioner in New Delhi that when India becomes a Republic on 26th January, 1950, they are likely to suggest that their representatives in other Commonwealth countries should be styled "Ambassador".

2. You will remember that we had a somewhat inconclusive discussion on this question of title at the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in October, 1948, and we then agreed to leave the matter over until a later meeting. This is, however, a matter on which it is desirable that there should be uniformity of practice among all members of the Commonwealth;⁴⁷ and if India should finally decide to style her representatives "Ambassador" it would be awkward to leave an obvious disparity of practice until such time as we could all discuss the matter again at the next meeting of Prime Ministers. I should therefore welcome an early expression of your views on the question whether if India makes this change it would be better for other Commonwealth Governments to do the same or to accept the position that India has followed one course while all or most of the other Commonwealth Governments follow another. In considering this you will doubtless keep it in mind that the Republic of Ireland intends that, as new appointments are made, her representatives in Commonwealth countries should be styled "Ambassador". It would not look well if India, which has remained within the Commonwealth as a republic, should adopt the style favoured by the Republic of Ireland, which left the Commonwealth on becoming a republic, while other Commonwealth Governments continued the use of the title "High Commissioner".

⁴⁷ Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree [L.] St. L[Laurent]

3. I need not repeat the general arguments for and against the change which India is contemplating. These were fully stated in our discussion in October, 1948. The main difficulty is that short of accepting the title "Ambassador" we have never been able to find a really satisfactory alternative to the title "High Commissioner". It has recently been suggested to me that "Commonwealth Ambassador" might serve.⁴⁸ Perhaps you would also let me have your views on that suggestion.

4. As Pandit Nehru is in London this week I have taken the opportunity of discussing this matter with him. I am glad to find that he recognises the desirability of maintaining uniformity of practice in this matter on the part of all members of the Commonwealth. And my talk with him left me with the impression that he did not personally think it of very great importance that India's representatives in Commonwealth countries should in future be styled "Ambassador". I do not know, however, whether his Government could be prevailed upon to refrain from making this change of title.

5. I should add that we have ourselves been considering the question of diplomatic immunity for the representatives of Commonwealth countries. As you will see from a separate telegram which is being addressed to your Government on this point, we are prepared to introduce legislation placing the representatives of Commonwealth countries, irrespective of their title, on the same footing as foreign Ambassadors in this matter, provided that the other Commonwealth countries concerned accorded similar immunities to our representatives in their capitals.⁴⁹

[Ottawa], November 17, 1949

There are two or three points arising out of this week's exchange of views between the Prime Minister and Mr. Attlee about the style and status of Commonwealth representatives that might be followed up by External Affairs:

(1) Any general change in style would give us an opportunity to get out of the rather anomalous position in which we withhold the courtesy of "Excellency" from Commonwealth representatives accredited here. The alternative "Honourable", to which I must plead guilty, is awkward, unauthorized and might be quietly dropped when the general change in style takes place.⁵⁰

I think we should be willing to do so too [L.] St. L[aurant]

⁵⁰ Cette note marginale ainsi que les trois suivantes sont de la main de A.D.P. Heeney:

This and the following three marginal notes are by A.D.P. Heeney:

I agree

(2) The rider to last year's agreement about the status and precedence of Commonwealth representatives, viz., that, though they should rank with Ambassadors by date of appointment, they would not, despite seniority, ever be Dean of the Diplomatic Corps, had its real reason, I suspect, in the fact that Commonwealth representatives, though accorded de facto all the privileges of foreign Ambassadors, did not have the legal position on which the immunities, enjoyed by the foreign diplomatic representatives, are based. If, as suggested in the last paragraph of Mr. Attlee's message, we should now proceed to give a statutory base to immunities to Commonwealth representatives, this reason for this rider disappears, because a Commonwealth representative would be in the same position as any other diplomatic representative in upholding the status and privileges of the Diplomatic Corps vis-à-vis the government to which they are accredited. I do not know whether this is a point worth raising in the Prime Minister's reply to Mr. Attlee, but we might think of asking the United Kingdom whether they regard it as one of the consequences which might be expected to flow from the proposed legal definition of the status of Commonwealth diplomatic representatives.⁵¹

(3) If it is generally agreed that the other Commonwealth countries should change the style of the representatives they exchange with each other from High Commissioner to Ambassador because India, on becoming a republic, is going to call its representatives Ambassadors, then I think there is a good deal to be said for anticipating this development and making the change effective from some agreed date prior to the adoption of the new Indian constitution, so that the change in style would not be regarded as a direct consequence of India becoming a republic.⁵²

(4) I think it would be a pardonable indiscretion to tell John Hearne, in confidence, that the whole subject is again under active consideration, and that something may be expected to develop within the next few weeks.⁵³

CONFIDENTIAL

Please deliver the following message from Prime Minister to Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Begins.

⁵¹ Yes—& they sh[oul]d be on all fours with other Ambassadors in this respect

⁵² Very good point

⁵³ I shall do so at first opportunity.

1. I was very glad to learn from your message of November 14 of your own attitude towards the designation of representatives exchanged between Commonwealth countries and of your conversation with Pandit Nehru on this point.

2. I heartily support your opinion that this is a matter on which it is desirable that there should be uniformity of practice among all members of the Commonwealth. To have in the same capital an Ambassador from India and High Commissioners from other Commonwealth countries does not appear to be in keeping with the spirit of the conclusions of the Prime Ministers' meeting held last year. The term "Commonwealth Ambassador" or any other middle term between "High Commissioner" and "Ambassador" would not, in my opinion, be a satisfactory alternative and might not be acceptable to the Indian Government. Consequently, if the Government of India, or of any other Commonwealth country, feels strongly on the point, I believe that there should be a general adoption of the designation "Ambassador".

3. It appears to me that it would be unfortunate to give the impression that the change in designation of Commonwealth representatives results only from India's decision to become a republic. Consequently if Commonwealth Governments are in agreement on the taking of this step, I would suggest that it be made effective before January 26. Perhaps January 1 might be as good a date as any.

4. I am pleased to note that the United Kingdom Government is disposed to give to Commonwealth representatives full diplomatic immunity. I trust that other Commonwealth Governments will take action similar to that of the United Kingdom. Although it might not be possible for us to introduce legislation at an early date on this subject, we shall look into the matter immediately so as to be in a position in the not too distant future to reciprocate immunities which would be extended to Canadian representatives in the United Kingdom or in other countries of the Commonwealth. I assume that one consequence of placing Commonwealth representatives on the same footing as foreign ambassadors will be to permit them to hold the position of dean of the diplomatic corps.

Your telegram No. 2284 of November 24.† The full text of Mr. St. Laurent's reply to Mr. Attlee's message concerning designation of Commonwealth representatives has been sent to Canadian High Commissioners in South Africa, Australia and New Zealand with the request that they present copies to the Prime Ministers of these countries and enquire concerning their attitude to proposed developments. It is pointed out that the suggestion concerning January 1 results from the Canadian Government's desire to demonstrate that the change results from the conviction that it is justified on its merits and not merely as a consequence of constitutional developments in India. We are making similar approach to the Prime Minister of Pakistan, through the Pakistan High Commissioner in Ottawa. Please act similarly with respect to the Prime Minister of Ceylon through the High Commissioner for Ceylon in London.

2. I would be grateful if you would advise the Commonwealth Relations Office of our action and enquire concerning communications to government of India subsequent to Mr. Attlee's conversation with Pandit Nehru. Especially as we are not certain of Indian Government's attitude, it would be improper for other Commonwealth Governments to reach decision without advising Indian Government of the consultations. We shall not approach Indian Government through our High Commissioner until learning from you concerning any further approaches from Mr. Attlee to Pandit Nehru.

Reference your telegram No. 2094 of November 30th re designation of Commonwealth representatives.

1. Text of Mr. St. Laurent's reply and substance of views contained in paragraph 1 of your telegram under reference are being sent at once to High Commissioner for Ceylon in London, for transmission to his Prime Minister.

2. Commonwealth Relations Office was advised today of your action. [Ben] Cockram, with whom this matter was discussed, pointed out that Mr. Attlee's message of November 14th had been based upon an informal indication given to the United Kingdom High Commissioner in New Delhi by the Indian Government that such a change is likely to be suggested when India becomes a Republic. He emphasized, however, that Indian Government had not yet made any formal proposal on these lines, and drew attention particularly to paragraph 5 of Mr. Attlee's message, which indicated that when this matter had been discussed with Pandit Nehru in London, the latter did not seem to take a great interest in the question. Cockram added, confidentially, that he had discussed the same point with Bajpai here, from whom he had obtained the impression that the matter was not one of fixed Indian Government policy, but was rather an informal and exploratory enquiry based in part upon the pressure of certain Indian Government representatives abroad who felt that their status would be enhanced by such a change.

3. Under these circumstances, therefore, Cockram said that the United Kingdom Government had been anxious to secure the views of the other stated Commonwealth Governments, but had not, repeat not, made any communication to the Government of India subsequent to Mr. Attlee's conversation with Pandit Nehru. He added that apart from the Canadian reply, no replies had been received as yet from the other Commonwealth Prime Ministers to whom Mr. Attlee's original message had been sent.

4. Cockram's personal view was that the point made in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 2058 of November 21 was an extremely sensible one. In view of the New Zealand and Australian elections, however, he was dubious personally whether it would be practicable to work out a declaration by the date of January 1st suggested. However, he agreed to let us know when subsequent replies had been received, and was proposing to cable the United Kingdom High Commissioners in South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan and Ceylon asking that they should suggest to those Governments that they should circulate their views to the other Commonwealth Governments to whom the Prime Minister's message of November 14th was originally addressed.

EXCHANGE OF EMBASSIES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

Since December 1948, the Government of Ireland has made a number of informal approaches with a view to ascertaining whether the Canadian Government would be disposed to changing the designation of the representatives exchanged between two countries from "High Commissioner" to "Ambassador." As consideration has been given to so changing the designation of representatives exchanged between Commonwealth countries, no response has been made to the Irish overtures.

2. Without any prior consultation with other Commonwealth countries, India accredited to Ireland an Ambassador who presented his Letters of Credence on July 30th, 1949.

3. By note of December 6th, the Irish Minister of External Affairs informed the Acting High Commissioner for Canada that his Government proposes to appoint Mr. Sean Murphy, presently Irish Minister to France, to Canada and would appreciate, "an early intimation of the Canadian Government's agreement to Mr. Murphy's appointment as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary." One argument against using the term "Ambassador" to describe Irish representatives in Commonwealth countries and Commonwealth representatives to Ireland is that this would remove a symbol of the special relationship which exists between Ireland and the Commonwealth countries, a relationship which we contend is not one between foreign states and which therefore entitles us to continue to grant preferential tariffs to each other. However, if Ireland is willing to take the risk of increasing the chances of third countries successfully challenging this contention, it is hard for Commonwealth countries to base their policy on that argument. Moreover, the argument has already been weakened by the exchange of Ambassadors between India and Ireland.

4. The Governments of the Commonwealth, with the exception of the Government of India, have been informed by telegram dated December 10th† that the Canadian Government is disposed to meeting the Irish request.

5. I recommend, therefore, that Cabinet authority be obtained for seeking the King's approval for the acceptance of Mr. Murphy as Ambassador of the Republic of Ireland to Canada and for the designation in due course of the Canadian representative in Dublin as Ambassador.

PERSONAL MESSAGE TO MR. ST. LAURENT FROM MR. ATTLEE
DATED 23RD DECEMBER, 1949

It seems clear that there is no prospect of agreement being reached on question of title of High Commissioners before 1st January as hoped by Canadian Government. Meanwhile I understand from Delhi that Pandit Nehru has it in mind to raise the matter in an informal way at Colombo Conference. There are indications that Pandit Nehru does not consider that a change, if one is made, need take place immediately on India becoming a republic. The shortness of the interval between conclusion of Conference and 26th January is not therefore the objection which it might otherwise be. I should be glad to know whether in the circumstances you agree that delegates may be authorised to discuss this matter if Pandit Nehru should raise it.

 REPORT RE COMMONWEALTH MEETING ON DEFENCE SCIENCE

You will recall that, at the meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee on December 21, 1948, it was decided—in view of breaches of security in Australia and the risk of the U.S. withholding classified information—that the meeting of Commonwealth and U.S. defence scientists, planned for February, 1949, in Ottawa, should be postponed; that the other countries be so informed; and that future arrangements would be a matter for consideration after informal consultation with the United Kingdom authorities.

Dear Mr. Heeney,

COMMONWEALTH ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON DEFENCE SCIENCE

This Committee met last in London in November, 1947, and then consisted of representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the United Kingdom. In view of the uncertainty which existed in 1947 as to the future relationship of India with the rest of the Commonwealth, India was not invited to take part. Since that date the position in India has changed, but the Government of India did not raise the question of participating in the proceedings of the Committee and no attempt has been made to bring India (or Pakistan) into the Committee. India remained, however, in the agreed composition of the Advisory Committee—see Annex A to I.C.C.D.S./17 (Final) of 4th July, 1946.†

⁵⁴ Solandt rapporta que le Royaume-Uni se préparait pour une réunion non-officielle. Le Comité de défense du Cabinet ne posa pas d'objection à la présence de scientifiques canadiens.

Solandt reported that the United Kingdom was preparing for an informal meeting. The Cabinet Defence Committee did not object to attendance by Canadian scientists.

2. Consideration has recently been given by a working party of the Advisory Committee, as at present constituted, and by the United Kingdom Government, to the possible form of the next meeting of the Committee. Canada has been represented on the working party. The working party agreed unanimously that an attempt should be made to hold a meeting in the United Kingdom in the spring of 1950 and that, provided that the present members of the Committee agree, invitations should be extended to the Government of India, Pakistan and Ceylon to become members of the Committee. A list of fourteen subjects has been drawn up from which an agenda could be chosen which would not involve any security problem.

3. If India, Pakistan and Ceylon do become members of the Committee it will be necessary to amend the Committee's terms of reference. It is contemplated that the working party should examine this question and should make recommendations to the Committee.

4. If it is generally agreed that these three members of the Commonwealth should be invited to join the Committee, and, if they accept the invitation, it is envisaged that papers circulated to the Committee in its enlarged form should be issued in a new series and that the new members should not be given access to papers of the old series. Every effort would be made so to arrange matters as not to provoke from the new members of the Committee requests for previous Committee papers.

5. It is assumed that, if the Committee is re-formed so as to include India, Pakistan and Ceylon, the objections which have been felt in some quarters to designating as a "Commonwealth Committee" a committee which does not actually include all members of the Commonwealth would fall away.

6. I have been asked to inform you that the United Kingdom Government, for their part, agree with the proposals of the working party and will be happy to arrange for a meeting to take place in London in the spring of 1950. I have also been asked to enquire whether the Canadian Government for their part agree with the proposals of the working party and agree that invitations to join the Committee should be extended to India, Pakistan and Ceylon. I should be grateful if you would inform me what I may say to the United Kingdom authorities in reply.

7. Similar enquiries are being addressed to the Governments of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

Dear Mr. Heeney,

Thank you for your letter of September 10th,† enclosing a letter of July 28th from the Deputy High Commissioner for the United Kingdom concerning the proposals of the working party of the Commonwealth Advisory Committee on Defence Science.

I have, as you suggested, discussed this matter with Mr. Claxton. I also raised it at the Meeting of the Defence Research Board at which the Chiefs of Staff of the three Armed Services were present. All agreed that there seemed to be no objections to Canada taking part in the meetings proposed by the United Kingdom. Our discussions made it quite clear that Canada would gain little or no direct advantage from these meetings. We already have excellent liaison arrangements with the United Kingdom and the United States and additional arrangements with other countries of the Commonwealth would add very little to our available knowledge and might even introduce some new complications. However, it was felt that the formation of this Committee should be regarded as a gesture of friendship toward the new Dominions and that this might make a small contribution towards stemming the spread of Communism.

I am personally inclined to suggest that the meetings in 1950 should not be regarded as a further meeting of the existing Commonwealth Advisory Committee on Defence Science. I would rather suggest that this Committee be formally disbanded and that a new Conference be called to discuss the interchange of information on Defence Science between the countries of the Commonwealth. This meeting could discuss the agenda that has already been proposed, but would not be faced with the necessity of restricting the terms of reference of the old Committee to meet the security problems of the new group. I will put this suggestion forward to our representative on the working party in London. Sir Alexander Clutterbuck consulted me informally on this matter and I have already given him the views outlined above, but he agreed not to take official action until he had heard from you.

Items Nos. 5 and 6 on Chiefs of Staff Committee Agenda for October 25, 1949

EXCHANGES OF STAFF COLLEGE CANDIDATES WITH INDIA AND PAKISTAN

Background

As far back as last March, we were considering the advisability of raising this general subject with Chiefs in order to ascertain whether or not a way might be found to overcome the difficulties which have hitherto prevented us from exchanging Staff College trainee officers with these two Commonwealth countries. It was felt at that time, however, that it would be premature to open the matter in view of the following:

(a) India's indefinite position in the Commonwealth prior to the April meeting in London.

(b) The uncertainty surrounding the security precautions that India and Pakistan might be willing and able to undertake.

(c) The limited accommodation available in Canadian Staff Colleges.

It was decided at that time that the matter should be shelved for about six months.

Recent Developments

2. The United Kingdom Government apparently decided in June to offer vacancies to both India and Pakistan for the next courses at the Imperial Defence College and the Joint Services Staff College, even though this meant that changes in syllabi would have to be made to meet the requirements of security. In this connection, as you know, the United States Government has always placed a firm veto on the use of information originating from its sources at any British or Canadian Staff College attended by officers from the Asiatic countries of the Commonwealth, Australasia and South Africa. In spite of the United States veto, officers from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have been accepted as candidates at the Imperial Defence College, although only after a careful check by M.I.5. As officers from India and Pakistan are to attend British Staff courses, it has, of course, been necessary for the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff to ask the United States Chiefs of Staff to reconsider their attitude on the security angle with respect to India and Pakistan. We do not know what the outcome of their representation has been, and consequently do not know exactly what courses Indian and Pakistani officers are to attend at the I.D.C. or J.S.S.C. Four British officers are now attending the Pakistan Staff College at Quetta—an indication that an exchange between the United Kingdom and Pakistan has at least been initiated.

3. Chiefs have learned that the United States position with respect to United States Staff Colleges has remained substantially unchanged. Only British and Canadian officers are invited to attend the Armed Forces Staff College, the National War College and the Industrial College, although Indian and Pakistani officers are permitted to attend, at the Command and General Staff College, Fort Leavenworth, certain courses having a security classification no higher than "Restricted".

Present Position

4. General [Guy] Simonds, Commandant, National Defence College, has written a long letter to Chiefs, dated September 16, 1949, on this general subject. If you have an opportunity, I recommend your reading it in its entirety. Its first three pages contain an excellent summary of the political and military considerations bearing upon Canadian Staff College exchanges with these two countries. In considering the question, General Simonds differentiates between the Staff and Defence Colleges. The former, primarily designed to train officers in tactics and staff techniques, do not require the inclusion of highly classified material. The latter, dealing with high-level strategy cannot be effective if classified material is excluded. Also, it is easier to exclude Asiatics from the National Defence College than from Staff Colleges because it can be explained that the former deals mainly with problems of Canadian and North American defence which would not be of much interest to Asiatic countries. General Simonds makes the following recommendations:

(a) Subject to a satisfactory understanding with the United Kingdom and United States Chiefs of Staff, Canada should exchange two officers with India and one with Pakistan. The Indian and Pakistani officers would attend the Canadian Staff

College at Kingston and the Canadian officers would go to Wellington, India, and Quetta, Pakistan, respectively.

(b) In raising the matter with the United Kingdom and the United States, it should be made clear that the exchange of officers is considered more important than the inclusion of highly-classified material in Staff courses. If the United States Chiefs of Staff so desire, all highly-classified information from United States sources could be excluded without diminishing to any appreciable extent the value of the courses themselves.

(c) If the Governments of India and Pakistan ask to send students to the Canadian National Defence College, they should be put off on the grounds that the subject matter of the N.D.C. courses would be of little interest to them in as much as they deal primarily with matters of North American defence. At the same time, visits to N.D.C. with a view to the establishment of similar colleges in India and Pakistan could be encouraged.

5. General Simonds' recommendations seem entirely reasonable and I think we should support them in Chiefs. Politically, of course, there has never been any question of the stand we should take in the matter. Staff College exchanges of this nature are clearly one of the best means of strengthening Western relationships and of demonstrating the tangible benefits accruing from Commonwealth ties.

6. The hyper-sensitivity of Pakistan about its own position in relation to India might, however, make it advisable to exchange two officers with Pakistan instead of one as recommended by General Simonds. Pakistan has already offered to Canada one vacancy at its Staff College at Quetta. If we accept this offer, we might indicate that we are exchanging on a reciprocal basis, up to a limit of two.

7. We have had conflicting information in recent months as to the nature of the Staff courses to which the United Kingdom plans to admit Indian and Pakistani officers. Also we do not know the outcome of the United Kingdom-United States consultations in this connection. If, therefore, Chiefs approve General Simonds recommendations, I would assume that as a first step we should let the United Kingdom know of the new policy that we have in mind and ask for full details as to:

(1) the nature of the courses to which Indians and Pakistanis are to be admitted in the U.K; and

(2) the outcome of the U.K.-U.S. consultations.

We could then decide what action we wanted to take vis-à-vis the United States authorities and, ultimately, the Indian and Pakistan Governments.

8. This memorandum has been prepared in consultation with the Commonwealth Division.

[J.R. MCKINNEY]

Item No. 6 deals with an offer, received last July from Pakistan, of one vacancy on their Staff course commencing February 6, 1950. We referred it to Chiefs of Staff for a decision on August 4. I assume that our acceptance or refusal of the vacancy will be dependent upon the general policy decision with respect to Item No. 5 above.

INDIA AND PAKISTAN

Arrangements have been concluded for one Indian Army officer and one Pakistan Army officer to attend the next course at the Canadian Army Staff College, Kingston. By reciprocal arrangement, one Canadian Army officer will attend the next course at the Indian Army Staff College, Wellington, and another will attend the next course at the Command and Staff College, Quetta.

The Indian Government first approached the Canadian Government in regard to military training facilities in February 1948. Their first request, which was met, was for information about Armoured Corps courses in Canada. In June 1948, in response to another request, the Indian High Commissioner was given a comprehensive list of technical courses at Canadian Army schools at which it was expected that vacancies might be available. In April 1949 a copy of the official catalogue of Canadian Army schools and courses was sent to him for transmission to New Delhi.

In May 1949, Mr. H.M. Patel, the Secretary of the Indian Ministry of Defence, who was on a visit to Ottawa, raised with the Chiefs of Staff Committee the possibility of an exchange of students between the Staff Colleges of the two countries. About the same time, the Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army told General Simonds in New Delhi that two vacancies at Wellington were being offered to the Canadian forces without any condition of reciprocity. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee decided that it would not be possible at that time to accept any vacancies which might be formally offered. In fact no formal offer seems to have been made.

The Pakistan Government first approached us informally in September 1948 to enquire whether it would be possible to give air training in Canada to a group of twenty-two cadets. We replied that as available facilities were fully utilized we could not undertake to assist in the matter.

In February 1949 the Pakistan Government offered us one vacancy at the Command Staff College, Quetta, the financial proposals to be dependent upon reciprocal facilities at Kingston in due course. We replied that owing to prior commitments the offer could not be accepted. This offer was repeated by Pakistan in July 1949.

The question was reconsidered by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff in October 1949. It was then decided that the Canadian Army would offer one vacancy to the armed forces of India and one vacancy to the armed forces of Pakistan at the Canadian Army Staff College, but that for the present no vacancies would be allocated by the R.C.A.F. Staff College. The Chief of the Air Staff said that at a later date it might be possible for the R.C.A.F. to offer vacancies on a basis comparable to that proposed by the Army.

The offer of one vacancy each at the Army Staff College was made to the Indian and Pakistan Governments in November 1949 and promptly accepted.

Neither India nor Pakistan has raised the question of vacancies at the National Defence College. The view of the Canadian defence authorities is that the value of the Defence College would be seriously affected if vacancies were allotted to any nationals other than those of the United Kingdom and the United States. If necessary, it might perhaps be explained that the courses at the Defence College deal primarily with matters relating to the defence of North America and would therefore be of little interest to Indian and Pakistani officers.

Ceylon. To date the Ceylonese Government has made no approach to the Canadian Government for the exchange of officers to attend military schools or colleges.

VISIT OF PANDIT NEHRU TO WASHINGTON

It has been noted in the press that Pandit Nehru has announced that he has accepted an invitation from President Truman to visit Washington in October. There has been at least one enquiry from the press whether Nehru will be coming to Ottawa.

2. Apart from being Prime Minister of such an important country as India, I think it is generally recognized that Nehru is one of the great statesmen and intellects of our time. Furthermore, in the near future India will enjoy a rather special position in the Commonwealth. For these reasons it is suggested that he should be invited to come to Ottawa as the guest of the Government, following his visit to Washington.

3. Presumably a formal invitation could not be extended to Nehru until after the general elections. However, perhaps our Acting High Commissioner in New Delhi could let it be known in the appropriate quarters that the Canadian authorities are anxious that Nehru should visit Ottawa when he is in this part of the world, but that with elections pending no formal invitation can be made at this time. He could add that it would be appreciated if Nehru would bear in mind a visit to Ottawa when he is making his plans. Immediately after a new Government is formed, the formal invitation could be extended.⁵⁵

4. I have discussed this with Mr. Kearney and he agrees very strongly that Nehru must be invited to Ottawa.

5. Please let me know whether you think some intimation could now be given by Mr. Scott in New Delhi, to be followed up by a formal invitation in the name of the Prime Minister after June 27.

6. Since I dictated this, it has occurred to me that a memorandum to the P.M. is really called for. He may wish to have a word with the Leader of the Opposition now. What is your wish?⁵⁶

Washington, September 28, 1949

Dear Arnold:

I have been thinking a little about the importance of Nehru's visit to this continent, and the subject has also come up in conversation with Franks and Kennan. I believe that the impressions which he derives may well affect his attitude as chief of the Indian Government in a number of ways and for a number of years. While he has come out more clearly on the side of the West during the last year, he has kept himself, I believe, in a position in which he can remain at least neutral in some of the battles in the cold war and in all the battles if we have to face a hot war.

He is said to be deeply distrustful of the spiritual values—this is the sort of language one must use about him—of the United States. I think that this is his first visit to this continent. It seems to me that while he is in Canada he should have the opportunity for long, informal and general talks with people who can express to him their conceptions of the principles upon which our society is founded. No one can do this better than the Prime Minister himself. The danger in the United States, and to some extent in Canada, is that he will go back to India with a personal impression that the society of North America is grossly materialistic. Such an impression would probably be in accordance with his preconceived idea, and he would be receptive to anything which would tend to reinforce it. He is a man who is concerned with spiritual values, and what one hopes may happen is that in quiet talk he will have an opportunity of meeting some important people, both here and in Canada, who can express to him simply and articulately their conception of the democratic society.

I suggest, therefore, that the big problems before us of defence, finance and trade should not occupy too large a place in discussions with Nehru. I hope that while he is here he may be able to spend some time with Dean Acheson, with whom I think he might establish a sympathetic understanding of the sort which he established with Stafford Cripps when Cripps was in India. This does not mean so much agreement on anything specific, but rather a philosophical and spiritual approach. I gather he has altogether too crowded a programme in the United States.

⁵⁶ Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Not necessary [A.D.P. Heeney]

If it is not too late to do so, I hope that some holes may be left in his Canadian programme which would permit the sort of conversations that I have mentioned.

You might think it worth while to pass this letter to Jack Pickergill or to see that these suggestions are mentioned to the Prime Minister through some other channel.

Yours sincerely,

HUME [WRONG]

P.S. In any discussion about the value of the Commonwealth connection, there is probably no one anywhere who could put the case more effectively to Nehru than the Prime Minister.

RE: MR. NEHRU'S VISIT

Wrong has written me certain suggestions concerning the importance which Pandit Nehru's visit to Canada may have in the development of relations between Asia and the Western democracies.

I can do no better than attach, as I do, a copy of his letter. I most heartily agree with him as to the importance of your having talks with the Indian Prime Minister along the lines indicated. In his crowded North American programme there is, I think, real danger that his contacts will be confined to social occasions and the discussion of specific problems. You could do much to correct any such unfortunate impression. The programme in Canada will, I think, leave time for some intimate talk between you which would probably prove of much greater value than any number of "meetings".

If you agree I will do what I can to see that the Ottawa Schedule is adjusted with this in mind.⁵⁷

I agree and suggest that an opportunity for a chat with Mr [Vincent] Massey, who might tell him of the underlying purpose of his Royal Commission, might help along the desired lines. [L.] St. L[aurent]

[Ottawa], October 20, 1949

I attach for your information

(1) a biographical note on Pandit Nehru;†

(2) a note on the Kashmir question;†

(3) a copy of Mr. Nehru's speech of October 17 at Columbia University.† I have marked what I think are some of the more important passages in this speech but as a whole it is a most significant analysis of Indian foreign policy with which I think you would sympathize and which is well worth reading for the light it throws on Mr. Nehru's international standpoint.

We are also preparing notes for your use in introducing Pandit Nehru in the House of Commons and for the state dinner.

Pandit Nehru is not only the undisputed political leader of his country but he is also in a peculiar way the embodiment of its aspirations and the inheritor of the mantle of Mahatma Gandhi.

Throughout his active life he has been alternately involved in passionate resistance to British rule in India, periods of imprisonment, and prolonged intervals of profound reflection. His strongly philosophical and idealistic mind has been deeply affected by his participation in the creation of the new India and his external policies are clearly a direct outcome of his extraordinary life's experience.

They are also strongly influenced by the internal conditions of India itself.

The economy of India was severely damaged by partition and will take years to restore. Its population of over 350 million is growing at the rate of 4 millions a year: there is a desperate need of foodstuffs and the elementary necessities of life and of increasing production: and the organization and expansion of domestic industry under the new regime present the most formidable problems.

Mr. Nehru, like other rulers of countries with a low standard of living and a newly-awakened appetite for the benefits of a "welfare" state is faced with a dilemma. He was responsible for the declaration by the National Congress before India gained its independence, of a policy of nationalization. It is now apparent that owing to other preoccupations he may not be able to press on with this programme as rapidly as many of his people would wish. In consequence, his more radical followers are disappointed at the delay in socialist reform, and the Socialist Party opposition to the Congress Party is growing. At the same time there is some reason to believe that the policy of nationalization to which Mr. Nehru is committed in principle and towards which left wing elements are pushing him, may tend to deter foreign and even native industrial investment.

The partition of the sub-continent has added further to its economic disturbances. India has devalued the rupee in step with the pound. Pakistan has not. This has further dislocated trade between the two countries, and it is reported that India takes such a serious view of the situation that it has placed an embargo on the great bulk of Pakistan imports into India.

Political troubles are added to economic. Disputes with Pakistan have arisen over the diversion of the waters of rivers flowing from India into Pakistan: and over the disposition of refugee property on both sides. And most serious of all, there is the Kashmir question—on which a separate memorandum is attached.

Communism in India is growing and has led to near chaos in many parts. Large numbers of Communists have been imprisoned, the party has been banned in certain areas, and Mr. Nehru himself went to Calcutta a few weeks ago to quell the Communist-inspired riots of that city. He is acutely aware therefore of the national and international dangers of Communist activity but will not align India with any major power or group of powers.

The principles of Mr. Nehru's foreign policy are the outcome of the domestic burdens of his government. His immediate needs as he has said are economic betterment and a higher standard of living. Above everything else he needs time and opportunity to concentrate on building the economic and social fabric of his country.

As regards his relations with the outside world, he desires "detachment" and as he says "we do not wish to forfeit the advantage that our present detachment gives us". Hence while adhering to the U.N. and its obligations, India wishes to make its contribution "in our own way and of our own choice". At the same time its policy, he declares, is neither negative nor neutral.

He is extremely sensitive then both to the danger of entangling relations with other nations and to any hint of interference with the policies of India. Hence his resentment over the personal letters to him from Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman in August in which they publicly urged that the Government of India accept the proposal of the United Nations Commission on India and Pakistan that the issues involved in a truce agreement on the Kashmir question be submitted to arbitration.

All these circumstances will affect Mr. Nehru's public utterances and behaviour while in North America. At the same time, in private, occasion may arise to touch on one or two matters which are of direct concern to Canada.

The chief issue is the Kashmir dispute about which we are apprehensive. It is a threat to the peace of the Indian peninsula and a heavy drain on the military and financial resources of both countries. It is also a tempting ground for Russian trouble-making.

Indonesia is another matter with which we are concerned. Indonesia's future is now being discussed at a Round Table Conference at the Hague. No agreement has yet been reached on financial and military matters. In the Security Council Canada has from the start supported the aspirations of the Indonesians for self-government, which is in keeping with Mr. Nehru's emphasis on the need for emancipation of the people of Asia and Africa. We also consider that the Dutch still have a real contribution that they can make to the development of Indonesia. Because of the great influence which India has in that part of the world we would hope that Mr. Nehru would continue to represent to the Indonesian leaders that the achievement of real national independence lies not merely in the severance of all bonds with other nations—even the former colonial power. Rather, independence for Indonesia is to be secured also through international cooperation in particular, we believe, cooperation with the Western World, including the Dutch, who are able and willing to help the Indonesians.

Communist expansion in Asia

The expansion of areas of Communist control in Asia threatens to engulf half the world's population and some of its most important raw materials. Canada's direct stake in China is small (500 missionaries, some resident businessmen, a $20 million annual trade, and a $75 million loan), but as a Pacific nation we cannot but view with concern the Communist victory in China and its threat to Southeast Asia. Mr. Nehru is believed to minimize the danger of Communist China becoming a tool of Soviet imperialism and to favour establishment of relations with the new Communist Government as less dangerous than isolating them and forcing them into the arms of Russia. He is also known to favour supporting nationalist movements in Southeast Asia and extensive western assistance to economic development projects as a means of countering Communism. It might be useful to draw out his views on this subject.

In his speech to Columbia University on October 17, Mr. Nehru summarized the basic causes of war as: the attempt of one country to dominate another: racial discrimination and the assumption of racial superiorities: and the misery and want of the masses of humanity. While we must never "surrender to aggression" or "compromise with evil", it is clearly his belief that a concerted attack on these "root causes" and not on the "symptoms" is the true way to reconciling the two hostile camps into which the world is now divided and dissolving "the terrible fear" that darkens men's minds.

Canada's relations with India

Since April 1947 when the B.C. legislature enfranchised the "East Indians" or "Hindus" as they have been termed in certain B.C. statutes the Indian community has suffered from no serious disabilities in Canada. Its members, as British subjects, enjoy federal and provincial voting and other political rights. Consisting almost entirely of some 1500 Sikhs (one quarter of whom are over 60 years of age) and resident on the B.C. coast, it now seems to have no grievance about its treatment. Its main complaint is about the restriction on the entry of near relatives, friends and business associates from India. But after legal entry under the immigration regulations there is no discrimination against Indians as to nationality or citizenship.

Immigration of Indians to Canada

Order-in-Council P.C. 2115 of September 16, 1930 prohibits the entry into Canada as immigrants of all persons of Asiatic race except the wives and unmarried children under eighteen years of age of Canadian citizens legally resident in Canada and in a position to care for their dependents. The provision applies to "British Indians" as well as to other "Asiatics", this term being used in a geographical or continental sense. This is a form of discriminatory legislation which is not unnaturally resented by Indians. The former Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa has made some representations to the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources regarding the operation of this Order-in-Council, and the latter has agreed to consider some minor modifications whereby fiancées will under certain conditions be admitted in the same way as wives, and children over eighteen will in certain cases be admitted provided original application was made before December 7, 1941. These minor changes can only be carried out by individual Orders-in-Council and do not affect the basic policy.

Pandit Nehru may raise the problem and object to the Canadian regulations because of the exclusion of Indians on the grounds of their "Asiatic race". It might be mentioned to him that consideration has been given from time to time to the possibilities of devising an immigration policy which would control the entry of persons from Asia without imposing a total exclusion on grounds of race. The Canadian Citizenship Act contains no discrimination of any sort on a racial basis and this country gives a basic equality of treatment for all races now living in Canada. It might be useful, however, to refer to the statement made by Mr. Mackenzie King, as Prime Minister, in the House of Commons on May 1, 1947 when he said that the Canadian Government "is prepared at any time to enter into negotiations with other countries for special agreements for the control of admission of immigrants on a basis of complete equality and reciprocity."

Canadian trade with India

Canada's export trade with India has greatly increased both relatively and absolutely in the decade since 1938. In that year Canadian exports to India were valued at $2,863,000, whereas in 1948 they had arisen to $41,473,000. This increase is accounted for primarily by expanded exports of capital goods such as locomotives, railway rails and automobiles. Exports of newsprint paper and some base metals (aluminum and copper) are also significant. The Indian Government has, on many occasions, attempted to increase imports of Canadian wheat to India and the inability of the Wheat Board to meet Indian demands has been a continuing source of friction. In 1946, wheat to the value of $20,110,000 was exported to India. The following year the Wheat Board were unable to supply India with any wheat, although flour to the value of $16,792,000 was made available. In 1948, the value of exports of wheat and flour were $1,637,000 and $763,000 respectively.

Imports from India have also increased substantially during the last 10 years, although not so sharply. The value of imports from India in 1938 was $8,181,000. By 1948 this had risen to $34,706,000. The composition of these imports has remained comparatively stable. They consist chiefly of jute fabrics, tea, vegetable oils and peanuts. On a number of occasions, there has been considerable difficulty in procuring sufficient quantities of vegetable oils and peanuts (which form the raw materials for a number of food processing manufacturers). This problem was particularly acute in 1947, when the Indians attempted to bargain exports of peanuts and peanut oil against imports of Canadian wheat.

Wheat

In Washington Mr. Nehru has raised with Mr. Acheson the matter of India obtaining a reserve stock of wheat from the United States and Canada. Since nothing definite was suggested, Mr. Nehru may mention the matter while in Ottawa.

The proposal would meet the same difficulties as the suggestion of Mr. Bevin that Canada might stockpile wheat in the United Kingdom, while retaining the ownership of it.

In this connection an approach was made last July by the Cabinet Secretariat in New Delhi to our Mission there. One of the members of the Secretariat told the Acting High Commissioner that he would be grateful for information on three points:

(1) What is the nature and extent of Canada's industrial development, particularly since the war, and to what extent could Canada be regarded by India as a potential source of supply of capital goods?

(2) What are the possibilities of Canadian technicians coming to India to assist in the building up of new industries?

(3) What are the possibilities of Canadian capital being invested in India?

It was suspected here that this information might be wanted in order to brief Pandit Nehru for his visit to Ottawa. But the Acting High Commissioner could not confirm this. Information for the use of the Cabinet Secretariat was provided both by our Mission in New Delhi and by the Department of Trade and Commerce here. The Department of Trade and Commerce, in providing the information, made the point that, although there is very little doubt Canada is well equipped to supply India with capital goods, the basic question remains of how the Indians could pay for them.

As to investments and loans there is evidently a view that of the Commonwealth countries Canada alone is in a position to invest or grant loans on a large scale to India, and that Canada next to the United Kingdom could, "given the will", greatly help India's industrialization by supplying capital goods, both on credit and for cash.

Political

In general our political relations with India are very satisfactory. There are no matters which can be regarded as purely Canadian-Indian problems, the main contact between the two countries arising from their membership in the Commonwealth and in the United Nations. We have endeavoured to consult with the representatives of India and to seek their views on a number of questions such as the Italian Colonies, etc., and thereby to let that country know of the importance we place on her strategic position as an active link between the Western point of view and the abnormally active and complex issues that are now emerging in the East.

*I. General Principles of India's Foreign Policy*⁵⁸

1. The objectives of Indian foreign policy, as enunciated by Pandit Nehru and apparently accepted by most Indians, are briefly the following:

(a) The ultimate aim is to find out what is most advantageous to India. "The foreign minister of a country, whether it is imperialist, socialist or communist, thinks primarily of the interests of his country". This is taken as axiomatic.

(b) India will follow an "independent foreign policy" avoiding any alignment with "rival power blocs." (This position is somewhat analogous to that of George Washington vis-à-vis the struggle between the United Kingdom and revolutionary France). "We very strictly follow the policy of not getting entangled in any kind of commitments.... This does not involve any lack of close relationship with any other country." Again, "this is not merely a policy of neutrality but is a positive approach to the problems of the world." Nehru deprecates talk about Indian leadership in Asia but recognizes that as a matter of inevitable historical development India has become "a pivot of Asia" owing to its position, size, resources and potentiality. Nehru has defended this independent line on four main grounds:

(i) India ought not to function with any Commonwealth bloc at international conferences as a kind of camp follower of the British;

(ii) India should not prejudice its ideals regarding oppressed nations;

(iii) India could risk alienating the sympathy of major powers, unlike smaller countries;

(iv) By avoiding alignments India can play an effective part in a world torn by cleavages.

In commending to the Constituent Assembly the understanding reached in April 1949 regarding India's membership in the Commonwealth as a republic, Nehru illustrated his point that this independence need not mean isolation; indeed the stress of circumstances obliged India to incline in some direction or other.

(c) the individuality of Asia and the need for its re-emergence must be recognized. This objective has two implications for Nehru:

(i) "No foreign power should rule over any Asian country", a principle resembling the Monroe Doctrine. Nehru attached the greatest importance to this objective and regards it as necessary to stability in Asia. "India will uphold the principle of freedom for dependent peoples."

Sent to Jules Léger of the Prime Minister's Office on October 21, 1949.

(ii) The aid being granted for the economic recovery of Western Europe should be extended to the countries of Asia; a colonial and poverty-stricken Asia is sure to operate as a factor disturbing world peace.

(d) Nehru has taken a strong attitude against racial discrimination.

(e) While opposed to any military alliance directed against Communism, Nehru would favour regional arrangements for economic cooperation.

II. United Nations

2. With regard to the United Nations, Nehru has declared: "Anything else we may do will naturally have to be something that does not go against the association with the United Nations."

3. While it was Nehru who sent to the Security Council the resolution of the Delhi conference on Indonesia of January, 1949, he avowed that if the conference led to a permanent organization of Asian countries it would be a regional system working in conjunction with the United Nations and resembling the Pan-American union. He repudiated any notion that an Asian bloc against European countries or the United States was being formed.

4. India was elected a member of the Security Council on October 20. Canada supported the candidature of India. The choice for what some countries regard as "the Commonwealth seat" on the Security Council had lain between New Zealand and India. New Zealand stood down when as a result of consultation more support for India than for New Zealand became apparent. Pakistan has voiced its opposition to India's election on the ground that a dispute involving India is before the Security Council.

III. Situation in Asia

5. India, with Pakistan and Ceylon, has considerable influence to exert on the forces of genuine nationalism in South-east Asia. In common with the United States and the United Kingdom and with other new nation states in South and South-east Asia, India is concerned with the maintenance of a balance of power over the whole European-Asian land mass which would prevent its domination by any one Power. Stalin has made it clear that Soviet Russia sees an excellent opportunity for Communist exploitation in the colonial territories of eastern and southern Asia, "the weakest link in the capitalist chain." Russia caused a decisive turn in the Chinese civil war by allowing the Chinese Communist régime to take over the industries and supplies of arms in Manchuria. The success of the Chinese Communists not only covers the eastern flank of Russia and brings the Communist régime into the Russian sphere of influence: it also urges on Communists elsewhere in Asia.

6. Nearest to home, in Burma, India sees what can happen to a newly independent Asian nation. Farther afield, India sees the revolutionary movements in Asia changing the face of the political and strategic map of the world and takes note of the Communist movements both in South-east Asia and within its own borders. The Indian Communists are strongest in the areas nearest Burma. Their ambitious and detailed plans for India were recently exposed by the Indian government.

7. Western European countries are also gravely concerned. A southward Communist advance means for the United Kingdom (a) insecurity along the line of communication across the Indian Ocean to the East Indies and Australia; (b) danger to the rich supplies of raw materials that are sorely needed by the United Kingdom along with France and Holland; and (c) a threat to the valuable dollar-earnings from Malayan rubber and tin and from the rice, minerals and timber of Burma. The future of Holland as a power depends very largely on the outcome in Indonesia. Eastern Asia as a whole is a main base of Western Europe.

8. United States policy regarding the Far East has been undergoing a drastic revision owing to the success of the Chinese Communists. Of the three Asian countries that are determining the modern history of Asia—China, Japan and India—it is frequently urged that efforts should be concentrated on seeking a strong and stable India. Many Indians feel that the United States has compromised its moral position as a champion of freedom by joining with and aiding Western Europe. There is even a fear that the North Atlantic Treaty might lead to the supporting of “reactionary elements”. We learn from our Embassy in Washington that Nehru’s questions during official conversations this week mainly concerned Europe. Broader questions of political and economic cooperation in the Far East were not discussed. In his speeches before Congress this week Nehru avoided any mention of Soviet Russia or Communism and gave no implied promise of armed intervention. While he did not know whether Gandhi’s technique of peaceful resistance could be applied to “wider spheres of action”, he was sure that the basic approach was the right one in human affairs. He nevertheless continued: “We are neither blind to reality, nor do we propose to acquiesce in any challenge to man’s freedom, from whatever quarter it may come. Where freedom is menaced, or justice threatened, or where aggression takes place, we cannot and shall not be neutral.”

9. While India has the attributes of a potentially Great Power, there will be a lapse of time before that position is reached. At present India has a great need for stable and peaceful conditions in order to develop its resources. As regards defence, India still lacks the necessary technological skills, even though its industrial development has been rapid. Meanwhile Communist China may use the present power vacuum in order to consolidate its position in South-east Asia. This would be to the serious disadvantage of the Indian sub-continent, which seems to hold the key to stability and defence in that region.

10. The Indian government is anxious to recognize the Communist régime in China as soon as possible. It is rumoured that Nehru has already been in correspondence with the Communist “premier” and other leaders in Peiping. He is said to be urging the United Kingdom to act quickly. The United Kingdom is pledged to consult the countries of the Commonwealth and the Atlantic Pact countries. The United States government is seeking to restrain any hasty or unilateral recognition. Our own policy is at present being carefully considered.

IV. India in the Commonwealth

11. India’s future status as a republican member of the Commonwealth was settled in the declaration made at London in April, 1949. Mr Pearson said at that time, “We have, I think, strengthened our Commonwealth association, and above all we have maintained a firm bridge, through that association, between the East and the West.”

12. During his visit last week, the Pakistan Foreign Minister, Sir Mohammad Zafrulla Khan, thought that Nehru might personally have liked to be able to report back to the Constituent Assembly a rather firmer attitude regarding India's status on the part of other Commonwealth countries and to urge its acceptance. However left-wing Congress opinion was critical even of the solution that was reached. (Zafrulla Khan did not mention in the conversation or at the official luncheon any of the Indo-Pakistan disputes. He did so to the press).

13. India's dislike of a Commonwealth bloc has been touched upon in paragraph 1(b) above.

14. “We join the Commonwealth”, Nehru said, “obviously because we think it is beneficial to us and to other causes in the world that we wish to advance.” This approach quite evidently seeks to rise above the rancorous and even dangerous disputes now existing between India and Pakistan and between India and South Africa and to give greater weight to the advantages of the Commonwealth association for a new nation and to the situation in Asia.

15. Many Indians feel that at present the Commonwealth association means chiefly the relationship between India and the United Kingdom and that other Commonwealth countries have so far meant little to them. They look to some concrete benefit to India from the association as much as to common purposes and institutions. They believe that the Commonwealth, containing as it now does both white and coloured peoples, can become an instrument of peace and progress only if equality and fraternity are secured among its members.

16. Indians appear to have no desire for the formal Commonwealth machinery proposed by some Australians but might welcome machinery designed to aid the economically less-favoured members.

MEMORANDUM ON CONVERSATION WITH MR. NEHRU

The Prime Minister and I met Mr. Nehru and Mr. Bajpai at noon today and had a two-hour discussion with them. Much of this discussion dealt with unofficial matters and need not be reported. It is, however, interesting to note that, when the Prime Minister made some complimentary observations regarding Mr. Nehru's speech, at last night's dinner at the Country Club, he (Mr. Nehru) replied that the friendliness of his reception and the warmth of the atmosphere that existed had prompted him to speak more intimately and more from the heart than he had done in the United States. He did indeed seem genuinely moved by the warmth of his reception in Ottawa.

2. There was some discussion of Indian economic and industrial development and how Canada might assist in this regard by the provision of technical help and equipment. It was also agreed, though in general terms, that we should do our best to maintain and increase trade between our two countries. Mr. Nehru was optimistic about the long-term prospects for India through industrialization and better utilization of land which would increase the standard of living of the people.

3. The prospects for peace were touched on and it was felt that though the situation remained uncomfortable there was less chance of war now than a year or so ago. Mr. Nehru felt that there was a greater danger to be feared from Russian imperialism than from ideological communism though he agreed that the greatest danger of all was the use by the Soviet of the latter in their imperialistic and expansionist plans. He felt that it was not enough merely to condemn communism as an economic and social doctrine. Its appeal to the masses of eastern countries, where the standard of living was very low, as providing a better way of life should be understood.

4. The subject of China was touched on and it was felt both by Mr. Nehru and by us that the facts of the situation there could not be ignored and that those facts seemed clearly to demonstrate that the Communist government had established its authority over most of China and might soon establish its authority over the rest.

5. We then pointed out that the Security Council would soon be considering again the question of Kashmir and we would welcome any views from Mr. Nehru on this question. He then gave us a very detailed and impressive analysis of the position from the Indian point of view, going deep into the background of history and culture and the feelings of the people toward India as the foundation for his argument that the culprit in Kashmir had been Pakistan which had committed the original aggression by permitting armed bands to violate its territory and eventually by moving its troops across the border. Mr. Nehru's emotions as well as his political instincts are very deeply engaged in this matter. He has a strong sentimental feeling for Kashmir, the home of his ancestors, and an equally strong feeling that the Government of Pakistan is taking advantage of the position to stir up religious feelings in Kashmir against India. Mr. Nehru emphasized that India is a secular state where Moslems and Hindus are treated alike politically, socially and economically, whereas Pakistan is trying to build up a Moslem theocratic state and using religious fanaticism in Kashmir and elsewhere, as an instrument of policy. Mr. Nehru was greatly disturbed at the prospects of such a campaign succeeding as it would have a disastrous effect in India.

6. Mr. Nehru then argued that India's record in Kashmir had been good and that if only Pakistan had agreed to establish the conditions which would make a plebiscite possible a decision as to the wishes of the people might have been taken by now. He had particularly in mind the disarming of the Azad forces. It was not enough to have the Indian and Pakistan regular forces withdrawn as long as the Azad forces, which now amounted to thirty-one battalions or more, remained armed. As long as they were there, armed, there could be no peaceful plebiscite.

However, Mr. Nehru stated emphatically that war could be ruled out as a solution for this problem and that India would commit no aggression. There remained, therefore, the question how to find a peaceful solution. The United Nations Commission had not been a very effective agency for this purpose. He thought there should be a new approach through the appointment of a mediator. However, he also seemed to feel there should be some kind of recognition of the original Pakistan aggression, though he did not press this position when it was shown how incompatible it would be with mediation. As far as mediation is concerned it was pointed out that it would be very difficult and indeed undesirable to remove the matter from the jurisdiction of the United Nations to which it had been submitted. The Security Council might, however, when the report of the United Nations Commission was being considered in November, decide to appoint a mediator with general terms of reference, which might indeed be extended to cover not only Kashmir but other questions at issue between the two countries. Mr. Nehru seemed to agree with this idea and would, I think, be pleased if we could do anything to advance it. When it was mentioned to him that some quarters felt that India was deliberately holding up a settlement by negotiation because she had much to gain by delay, Mr. Nehru replied that these were malicious and unfounded suspicions. They would be glad to proceed along the line indicated above without delay.

7. In reports which I had received from Washington and in New York it was stated that Mr. Nehru had been not at all responsive previously to the idea of a United Nations mediator acting under general instructions laid down by the Security Council, but that he wished to have a mediator outside the United Nations. The position which he took today represents an encouraging development and we should, I think, discuss it with the United States and the United Kingdom and others prior to the matter coming before the Security Council. We indicated as much to Mr. Nehru today and he seemed to welcome such a procedure.

8. There was also some indication from his talks today that the result of a plebiscite might be such as to warrant some kind of partition of the area covered by it, part to go to Pakistan and part to India. Nehru felt that if all of Kashmir went to Pakistan, there would be a large exodus to India, including some Moslems.

9. It seemed clear from our talk with Mr. Nehru that he finds it difficult to apply his own principles of peaceful settlement and self-rule to Kashmir because such application would likely result in the state for which he has so much affection joining Pakistan. He did suggest that a completely free vote would result in considerable Moslem support for India, but he does not, I think, carry this feeling so far as to believe that such support would determine the issue.

10. It is also depressingly clear that Nehru has a deep sense of grievance against Pakistan. This arises not only out of Kashmir difficulties, but out of the very existence of Pakistan itself, which destroys the unity of India. Nehru has not given up hope that events may peacefully restore that unity, (possibly in the form of a confederation) though he agreed that this would be much more difficult unless an amicable solution to the Kashmir problem is now found.

11. Yet, in spite of the depth of his feeling, Nehru is, I feel sure, quite sincere when he states that force must be ruled out in Pakistan-India relations and that in respect of Kashmir, mediation followed by a plebiscite should go forward as quickly as possible.

12. On this basis, it should be possible to work out a satisfactory solution.

13. When I saw Mr. Nehru off this morning, Wednesday, he expressed great satisfaction at yesterday's talk and the hope that we would use our good offices with our friends on the Security Council to advance the principles of a solution along the lines we had explored. I said that we would do our best to facilitate an agreed arrangement and would pass on to the United States and the United Kingdom representatives, and possibly others, the gist of yesterday's discussion.⁵⁹

Dear Mr. Heeney:

Mr. Sen, the Minister at the Indian Embassy here, remarked to me yesterday that Pandit Nehru, whom he had just seen off in New York, had told him that he had been much impressed by the different atmosphere he had noticed in Canada. According to Mr. Sen Mr. Nehru had remarked that he had encountered a more stable and better-balanced outlook in Canada than in the United States during his visit. I did not gather that he had expressed views which were strongly critical of the United States in these intangible respects, but that he had noted in Canada less excitability and a firmer regard for individual liberty.

As Mr. Nehru moved a good deal in the society of politicians, the differences between the Canadian and American systems of government doubtless had something to do with these remarks. I hope that some day some brilliant authority in the social sciences may write a satisfactory study on the effect on the national characters of the people of the United States and of Canada of the constitutional systems under which they live.

I should have liked to have had an opportunity to draw Mr. Nehru out on this subject. I have long been interested in what people meant when they talked about the differences they saw or felt in going from the United States to Canada. I remember a dozen or more years ago that Lord Lothian made the usual remark to me, and, when I tried to press him into a more exact definition, the only specific answer I could extract from him was: "I saw badly dressed men in the streets again".

I have heard very little about the talks with Mr. Nehru in Canada except for the discussion on the Kashmir affair. If anything has been put on paper, I should be glad to see a copy of it.

Yours sincerely,

CIRCULAR DOCUMENT NO. A.91

SECRET

Sir,

The Prime Minister of India was accompanied on his visit to Canada by the Honourable Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai, K.C.S.I., K.B.E., Secretary-General of the Indian Ministry for External Affairs. Sir Girja was kind enough to accept the invitation of the Under-Secretary to give to the Heads of Divisions a resumé on Indian foreign policy with respect to India's neighbours.

2. In his tour d'horizon which extended from the Far East to the Near East, Sir Girja's comments provided a most interesting and illuminating background to his country's relations with these nations. As it is felt that these remarks, which were made in strictest confidence, will assist materially in giving Canadian Heads of Missions abroad a deeper appreciation of Indian foreign policy, I have given instructions that they be so circularized.

I have, etc.

SIR GIRJA BAJPAI'S VIEWS ON INDIA'S ASIAN POLICY

The Honourable Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai, K.C.S.I., K.B.E., Secretary-General of the Indian Ministry for External Affairs, attended a meeting of Heads of Divisions on Tuesday, October 25, 1949. On the invitation of Mr. Heeney he made a tour d'horizon of India's neighbours, giving his views on salient points of internal conditions and external relations of each country. The remarks which were made in the strictest confidence presumably reflect the viewpoint of Pandit Nehru and thus provide the background for Indian foreign policy in this area.

2. In his introductory comments he pointed out that, in this contracting world, breaches of the peace anywhere had a bearing on the security and welfare of all countries. Furthermore, the United Nations was trying to deal with the problems of the world as a whole and any member of that body had to be prepared to take an interest in the world rather than merely in regional problems. However, just as Canada's immediate interests were dictated by her geographical situation as a North American nation, so were India's by virtue of its situation in Asia and its long historical links with its Asian neighbours.

Australia

3. Sir Girja commenced with Australia by saying that the Australian authorities had made it abundantly clear on a number of occasions during post-war years that they felt that their country should provide leadership in international affairs for South East Asia. Despite the fact that India, which itself had a population of 350,000,000, felt it was rather pretentious that Australia, with a population of about 8,000,000, should even consider giving leadership to an area with a population of many hundreds of million, the Indian authorities were not prepared to enter into controversy over the matter and were glad to invite Australia to send representatives to the conference on Indonesia held in New Delhi in January, 1948, where the Australians again indicated their expectation of the exercise of leadership. Nevertheless relations were quite amicable.

Indonesia

4. Sir Girja felt that the Dutch were at last awakening to a realization of the tremendous nationalist feeling in Indonesia which was simply a part of the nationalist renaissance throughout all of South East Asia. He was bitterly disappointed that the Netherlands authorities in general had been so obtuse as not to see the advantages of following the British example in India. This could have been done two years ago, or last year, or even this year. The Dutch should have seen how strongly the Indians reacted to a broad-minded and statesmanlike policy on the part of the United Kingdom Government. During the Indians' long fight for freedom, considerable bitterness against the British had developed because, despite many concessions from time to time under pressure, it appeared to the majority of the Indians that the British had not really intended to relinquish control and place the sovereignty of India in Indian hands. When, however, the United Kingdom Government finally set a date and took steps which made it clear that they were prepared to meet Indian aspirations, the feeling of the population changed overnight.

5. Recognizing the goodwill towards India which was now evidenced, bearing in mind the long association of the British with India and aware of their own great need of administrative and technical assistance, the Indians requested British officials to continue in the service of the Indian Government and were keen to maintain and develop their economic ties with the United Kingdom.

6. Sir Girja Bajpai felt that, if the Netherlands Government had adopted the same broadminded approach, the Indonesians would likewise have asked Dutch officials to remain in Indonesia, would have wished to maintain close economic connections with the Netherlands and would have in other ways demonstrated appreciation and goodwill towards the former imperial power. Even now the Dutch might be able to salvage something of their position but for obvious reasons the Indonesians will not be so well disposed towards the Dutch if they feel that their freedom has come from their own efforts involving considerable loss of life and economic dislocation.

Malaya

7. The Chinese population in Malaya is almost equal in numbers with the Malayan population. Sir Girja feared that it would be exceedingly difficult to foresee in the near future a homogeneous country because, although approximately equal in numbers, the two main segments of the population vary considerably in ability and influence; the Chinese exercise considerably more economic control than do the indigenous Malaysians. While the lack of homogeneity in the population complicated the political problem of national emancipation, he felt that immediate action should be taken to alleviate the economic condition of the people. One of the basic complaints of the Nationalists against the colonial powers was that they used their political position to enrich themselves. British rubber planters and tin miners in Malaya thought only of making their pile and returning to England as quickly as possible; too little consideration was given to utilizing profits from tin and rubber production to improve the lot of the native population. Sir Girja, therefore, thought that it was incumbent upon the colonial government to see to the more equal distribution of the national income of Malaya.

Indo China

8. Bao Dai is regarded merely as a puppet of the French who unhappily have shown even less appreciation of the nationalist spirit in South East Asia than have the Dutch. The strength of the Communist movement in Indo-China is merely a reflection of the nationalist strength rather than of any devotion to the Communists. Indeed throughout all of South East Asia the Communists have very cleverly capitalized on the desire for nationalist self-expression.

9. The French Ambassador in New Delhi had requested recognition of Bao Dai as the head of the sovereign government but the Indian Government had refused his request because so long as the foreign policy of Indo-China was controlled from France full sovereignty could not be said to reside in the hands of the Bao Dai régime. The Indian authorities were, however, quite prepared to see appointees of Bao Dai attached to the French Embassy in New Delhi with a diplomatic ranking.

China

10. Sir Girja referred to the fact that Generalissimo and Madame Chiang Kai-Shek had visited India during the war and had made public pronouncements in respect of India's bid for freedom, which would always be remembered by the Indian people and in particular by Mr. Nehru. The Indians would be singularly ungrateful if they forgot or ignored the extent to which the Chinese Nationalist Government supported their cause. However, foreign policy could not be based on sentiment alone and the tragic failures of the Nationalist régime and the corresponding victories of the Communists demanded a realistic reappraisal of relations.

11. He expressed his contempt for the almost defunct Chiang Kai-shek régime and felt that it had been particularly stupid in failing, despite many opportunities through recent years, to do something to alleviate the condition of the Chinese people. The success of the Communist forces was therefore, to a great extent, the natural reflection of the desire of the Chinese population to rid itself of a corrupt and inefficient government. From a long-term viewpoint, Sir Girja was quite optimistic that the Chinese people would not become subservient to the Kremlin or to any other foreign control, giving geographic, economic and socio-political reasons to support this view.

12. So far as recognition is concerned, his own disposition was to grant recognition at the earliest appropriate moment. He could not give any indication of any particular date which the Indian Government had in mind but his government was interested in exchanging viewpoints with other interested governments. He felt that little was gained by refusing recognition while goodwill might be obtained by an early indication of the readiness of other nations to co-operate with the new régime in China.

13. Sir Girja stated that he had never been in China and consequently felt rather hesitant to speak too categorically on the subject in the presence of Mr. Davis, the recently returned Canadian Ambassador to China.

Siam

14. Sir Girja was rather pessimistic about the future of Siam. An autocratic régime ruled the country in a comparatively reactionary manner. At the moment it was not suffering from very serious difficulties because Siam had sources of foreign income from the sale of its rice to India. India, however, was vigorously striving toward self-sufficiency in foodstuffs by 1951. If Siam lost its rice market in India, Sir Girja felt that the financial situation would become very precarious and the present régime might well collapse under the pressure of the insurrection which would then arise. He clearly hoped that a more democratic régime would take its place.

Burma

15. Sir Girja felt that sensation-mongers among the press had given a rather distorted picture of the present situation in Burma. According to the newspapers one felt that bloodshed and turmoil existed everywhere. However, in many respects the civil war had the aspects of a musical comedy. In one town, for example, the local citizens for a fee of twenty cents were allowed to fire guns against the rebels. Unfortunately, tremendous quantities of arms had been left behind by the Japanese as well as those supplied by the allies during the war. Consequently, irresponsible individuals were in a position to create havoc. The massacre of the cabinet two years ago was an absolute tragedy for the country. Sir Girja believed, however, that the situation would in due time right itself.

Tibet

16. Sir Girja felt that the theocratic form of government in Tibet had long since outlived its usefulness or effectiveness. India had no desire to interfere in any manner in Tibet's domestic affairs but would not be unhappy to see the expected departure of control by the lamas. The very pressure of economic developments throughout the world would in due course be manifested in the people's desire to rid itself of an antiquated system.

17. The possibility existed that the Chinese Communists might promote the establishment of a Soviet republic in Tibet. In such an eventuality, India would probably not intervene as it had neither the economic interest nor available military power to justify such action; steps were being taken for the defence of India's northern frontier with Tibet.

Kashmir

18. The Indian insistence upon the disbanding of the Azad Kashmir forces resulted from the fact that they were being steadily built up with Pakistan assistance or connivance to very considerable strength. When UNCIP had commenced its activities, the Azad forces numbered only 5,000 and were badly organized and ill-equipped. Today they form a powerful, well-organized force of some 35,000 men. To agree to the withdrawal of Indian and Pakistan forces would simply mean that all of Kashmir would fall under the control of so-called Azad forces. Indian intervention in Kashmir was as a result of the request of the Maharaja who, supported by the government of Sheikh Abdullah, acceded to India and asked for aid from the Indian army. The decision to send the army was prompted to a considerable extent by a very important domestic consideration in India. The Pathans being fanatical Moslems, were committing atrocities involving heavy loss of life against the Hindus in Kashmir. If this had been permitted to continue, not only would there have been serious loss of Hindu life in Kashmir but also a natural reaction in India by the Hindus against the 35,000,000 Moslems who live in India. In order to prevent communal rioting on a tremendous scale, the Indian Government felt that they had no recourse other than to stop the bloodshed in Kashmir. Happily there is now little communal feeling in India and certainly no disposition to enter into hostilities with Pakistan. Sir Girja was confident that in due course all the difficulties between the two countries would be peaceably resolved.

Arab Countries

19. India was established as a secular state and the Indian Government was determined that religious issues should not affect the country's existence as a secular state. At the same time for very practical reasons, it was necessary to keep religious influences in mind. In view of the connection, therefore, between the 35,000,000 Moslems in India and the Mohammedan Arab states, the Government of India was particularly keen to remain on friendly terms with the Arab States.

Israel

20. The Indian Government recognized that in fact Israel was a well-established nation which undoubtedly would continue to exist. India wished to maintain friendly and close relations with Israel but at the moment it was felt impossible to give any official recognition to the Government of Israel because of the offence which would thereby be caused to the Moslem population in India and to the Arab States.

21. In concluding, Sir Girja expressed his great appreciation for the opportunity of placing his views before the Heads of Division and mentioned in particular that he would be very glad if the High Commissioner for Canada in New Delhi would feel free to drop in and call upon him whether or not he had any particular business to discuss. He found that a certain Ambassador was dropping in for occasional chats but he would be much happier if the Canadian High Commissioner was not diffident in this respect. Mr. Heeney assured Sir Girja that the Canadian High Commissioner would be only too happy to avail himself of such an opportunity.

CANADIAN-NEW ZEALAND RELATIONS

Since the war there has been a decline of Canadian prestige in New Zealand. During the war Canada stood very high in New Zealand estimation, particularly because of the Commonwealth Air Training scheme and the treatment of New Zealand airmen in Canada, the magnitude of Canada's war effort and the mutual aid programme.

2. The Canadian war record convinced the New Zealanders that Canada shared their views of the "Empire" and shared New Zealand's loyalty to the United Kingdom. They did not understand that Canada entered the war as a free nation and not because of obligations of loyalty to the "Empire" or parent country or because of any set conception of relations between Commonwealth countries.

3. In 1946, when I first arrived in New Zealand, the text of many welcomes was that the war had brought the "Empire" together, that Canada had shown herself loyal to the "Empire" and that this unity should continue.

4. First doubts of this point of view appeared with the withdrawal of Canadian troops from Europe and the failure of Canada to take part in the occupation of Japan. Later failure to cooperate in the Berlin airlift shocked New Zealand.

5. The Prime Minister, some of the members of the Government and top permanent officers of the Ministry of External Affairs alone seemed to recognize the Canadian position but, even they, do not fully understand it and their reaction, whenever it is brought to their attention, ranges from regret to resentment.

6. The realization that the United Kingdom is no longer on a footing of equality with the United States as a great power impels the New Zealanders to seek means of improving the United Kingdom's position. The argument is constantly heard that if the "Empire" will only speak with one voice (through the United Kingdom, of course) England will again be restored to her old pre-eminent position. The strength of this desire is shown by the way in which the New Zealand Government have more than once reversed their decisions on important matters of external policy to come into line with the United Kingdom views. Two outstanding examples are the decision by the New Zealand Cabinet to recognize Israel which was reversed under pressure from the British High Commissioner and their position on Italian colonies which was reversed, I understand, as a result of a Prime Minister to Prime Minister appeal.

7. A further misunderstanding which resulted in some bitterness on the part of the New Zealanders occurred on the occasion of a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in 1948. Mr. Fraser was anxious that this should be entirely a meeting of Prime Ministers and made several strong approaches direct to Ottawa and through the Canadian High Commissioner to get Mr. St. Laurent to attend. The New Zealand Ministers were pleased when they heard that the meeting had agreed to regular meetings of Commonwealth Ministers at six months intervals and greatly disappointed that Canada emphatically refused to agree. The only time Mr. [Walter] Nash allowed his feelings to affect his manner to the Canadian High Commissioner occurred when the High Commissioner, on instructions from Ottawa, called on Mr. Nash who was then acting Prime Minister and Minister of External Affairs to explain the Canadian view. It was interpreted by Mr. Nash and I think not incorrectly as denying an obligation to develop a unified foreign policy among Commonwealth countries and implying that no obligation existed on the part of any one Commonwealth country to go to war if any other Commonwealth country went to war. It is the basis of New Zealand thinking that if part of the "Empire" is at war the whole "Empire" is at war. They want to feel assured that if New Zealand is attacked by an enemy all countries of the Commonwealth will regard themselves as immediately and automatically at war with the aggressor.

8. The New Zealand attitude to the Atlantic Pact is a result of this line of thought. Public statements by the Prime Minister, Mr. Frazer, and others welcome the Pact but in private conversation many doubts were expressed. Mr. Frazer said that he feared that the nations who had formed this defence alliance would feel that they had thereby taken care of all their security obligations and that he hoped also it was not thought that world security could be assured by a series of regional pacts. "There are no countries in the South Pacific which have surplus security to offer New Zealand".

9. During the past two years New Zealand's fear of communist Russia has gradually slipped into second place. The fear of resurgence of Japanese militarism has become or is rapidly becoming first in their minds. They feel that the potential menace of Japan has been greatly increased by the policies of the United States and here again I fear they blame Canada (and to some slight extent the United Kingdom) that no concentrated pressure by Commonwealth countries has been put on the United States to curb General [Douglas] MacArthur.

10. In November, 1948, Canada joined the South Pacific Air Transport Council. This was the occasion for mild rejoicing by New Zealand but during the session of the Council it was abundantly evident that the New Zealand Government felt that Canada was not living up to the obligations she had accepted at the Wellington meeting in 1946. The statement by Canada in 1946 that she would not enter as a partner in the B[ritish] C[ommonwealth] P[acific] A[irlines] had never really been accepted by New Zealand and the decision of the Canadian Government to designate Canadian Pacific in place of Trans-Canada for the Pacific Service was a keen disappointment which provoked many outspoken attacks on Canadian policy during the meeting. Most of these attacks were by Australian delegates. The New Zealanders considered them in bad form and apologized for them but their own feelings, although mildly expressed, were not so very different.

11. The decline of trade with Canada and shortage of Canadian dollars is sometimes a cause of hard feeling against Canada. The members of the Government and the permanent officials understand fully the need of economizing on dollar expenditures both Canadian and the United States, but from time to time expressed regret that Canada is not a member of the sterling bloc. It is not easy to convince them that it would not have been good policy for Canada even if she could have done it to have linked her dollar with the pound sterling and to have thrown their United States dollars into a common sterling bloc pool. Even if convinced that such action would have been damaging to the Canadian economy they might still feel that it should have been done. New Zealand herself has not hesitated to subordinate her economy to the United Kingdom economy in many ways.

12. The New Zealand authorities have from time to time given evidence that they would be glad to accept financial help from Canada and on one occasion the Minister of Finance made it clear to the Canadian High Commissioner and the Canadian Commercial Secretary that if Canada were to offer a Canadian dollar loan, there were many essential exports New Zealand would be glad to take from Canada.

13. Sometimes it seems to me that in addition to the desire to maintain a united "Empire" front, the New Zealanders would like to maintain closer contacts with Canada in order to play off Canada against Australia. Australia from time to time endeavours to dominate New Zealand's external policy. There have been several unfortunate episodes between the past two years where Dr. Evatt has spoken for New Zealand without consulting New Zealand and these incidents have stuck in New Zealanders' memories.

14. The lack of contact with Canada is keenly felt. As already stated, at the end of the war Canadian prestige was very high. The New Zealand boys who trained in Canada seem to have been very happy there and retained a great affection for Canada. Many of them have returned to Canada since the war. Many others would like to go either as emigrants or as visitors. If the dollar exchange was available, there would be a great many students, mechanics and professional men who would come to Canada to get experience and many others would come simply for a visit. At the present time they go to the United Kingdom or other sterling area countries or to the United States under the Fulbright scheme. Although the refusal to provide them with Canadian dollars to enable them to do so is made by the New Zealand authorities many of them feel that Canada is also to blame.

15. It is not easy to suggest ways in which the New Zealand attitude to Canada could be improved. Perhaps if we were able to put our statements of policy more frequently in the affirmative rather than in the negative it would help. It must seem to the New Zealand Prime Minister and his colleagues that the Canadian Government is constantly saying no to proposals for closer cooperation between Commonwealth countries but I feel that the New Zealand attitude goes deeper than this and is a result of the refusal of New Zealanders to recognize a changed world situation. To understand their attitude one must remember that they are still colonial at heart, even the Prime Minister speaks of England as "Home" and I have heard him refer publicly to the "Home Government", meaning the United Kingdom Government. They have a small population isolated in the South Pacific. They are not subjected to any other influences as strong and deep as the influence of the British Isles. They still think and feel themselves part of the "Empire". It was, I believe, with regret that the New Zealand Government felt called upon to pass their own Nationality Act. In presenting it to the New Zealand House of Assembly the Minister said that it was necessitated by action taken by Canada. I have heard many New Zealanders who have said that they would refuse to carry New Zealand passports.

16. This feeling about the "Empire" results, I think, in the deep resentment against the United States which seems to them to be usurping the position they would prefer to accord to the United Kingdom as leader of the democratic grouping of countries. They feel that Canada has allowed herself to be drawn into the orbit of the United States and that in doing so has strengthened the position of the United States against the United Kingdom in the rivalry between the two countries. I don't believe that members of the Government would admit this even if challenged. They are perhaps not aware of it themselves but this feeling has been expressed before me on many occasions by a variety of people in New Zealand.

17. I think that this attitude on the part of the New Zealanders cannot last forever. The realities of the external world must sooner or later be realized. I think, however, that we might do something to accelerate their realization and to increase understanding of Canada, if we can restore contacts between Canadians and New Zealanders. I have not explored all the possibilities but the following are some suggestions which might be considered and on which I would like to have the Minister's views:

(a) I would like to have some member of the Canadian Government pay an official visit to New Zealand. If the Prime Minister could be in New Zealand long enough to meet members of the Government and public officials in Wellington and New Zealand in all the bigger cities—a visit of two weeks and not less than ten days would be desirable—I am sure that better understanding would result. A visit by Mr. Pearson would be a great success. If neither Mr. St. Laurent nor Mr. Pearson could come any Cabinet Minister would be welcomed and could do a useful piece of work.

(b) Periodic visits by senior Canadian Civil Servants to New Zealand might be considered or officers of Departments other than External Affairs might for a time be attached to the High Commissioner's Office. I have in mind particularly the Department of National Health and Welfare which is interested in social welfare in New Zealand and the Department of Agriculture, New Zealand being entirely a farming country. In this latter connection it should be said that the year spent by Dr. Hopper as Commercial Secretary (Agriculture) in New Zealand has been well worth while, if only from the point of view of relations between New Zealand and Canada. I feel that there should always be at the High Commissioner's Office an agricultural officer who could talk to New Zealand stock raisers and farmers in their own language. Dr. Hopper has travelled throughout New Zealand and I have heard enthusiastic reports of his visits from New Zealand farmers in all parts. I think that the usefulness of the High Commissioner's Office could be increased if, instead of maintaining two Trade Commissioners there, we had one Trade Commissioner and one agricultural officer. My own feeling would be that the agricultural officer might well be the senior.

(c) Exchange of defence representatives with New Zealand. I understand it is not possible to appoint a defence liaison or advisor at the High Commissioner's Office in Wellington at this time. I hope this will be done before long. In the meantime, I should like to see a visit to New Zealand by a senior military officer from Canada, an army man would probably be most useful who would be of sufficient rank to hob nob with the Chiefs of Staff and to be well received at military establishments throughout New Zealand. A Major-General, if possible one who had contact with the New Zealanders during the war, would make an excellent impression; would be well received and would be useful to the New Zealand military authorities who are always seeking information from us about Canadian army organizations, training method and so on.

(d) The New Zealand military authorities sometimes seem to feel that Canada has turned her back on them. They feel, however, that New Zealanders and Canadians are very much alike and that military methods and practices in Canada are likely to be more acceptable to New Zealand than methods and practices of other countries. At the present time the United Kingdom has a defence liaison mission of four. There are three Military Attachés in the United States Embassy and the Australians have a Defence Adviser to the High Commissioner and they are expecting an assistant for him.

(e) There are many functions at which the military representatives only are present and therefore Canada is not represented. The New Zealanders would like to see a Canadian defence officer along with the American, British and Australian.

(f) A great many New Zealand professional men got all or part of their academic and professional training in Canada, in particular agriculturalists and engineers and a fair number of New Zealand students have gone to Canada for graduate work. A considerable number of technical men such as motor mechanics, radio technicians, plumbing engineers and so on have worked in Canada. The number of those people now going to Canada has shrunk to a trickle. I think it would be possible to restore this movement at no great cost to Canada. It has been undoubtedly a great benefit to have had men in New Zealand who learned their trades and professions in Canada and who are familiar with Canadian technique and Canadian machinery. The contacts also make not only for good-will but are likely, in the long run, to be profitable from the point of view of the Canadian export trade. Some scholarships might, of course, be made available to New Zealanders.

(g) I would like to suggest that the New Zealand authorities be approached with a view to making reciprocal arrangements whereby Canada would provide dollars to finance students, professional men and technicians in Canada against the equivalent amount of New Zealand pounds provided by the New Zealand Government to finance Canadian students and professional men in New Zealand. No expenditure need be necessary as the student going from New Zealand to Canada would pay into the New Zealand fund the equivalent of dollars he would require in Canada and the Canadians going to New Zealand would pay into the Canadian fund the equivalent of the pounds required in New Zealand. I am assured by Dr. Hopper, who has been the agricultural man at the Canadian High Commissioner's Office during the past year, that there is much in New Zealand's agriculture and animal husbandry which should be studied by Canadian experts. I also understand that there is an immense field, only slightly explored, in botany, entomology and biology in which Canadians seeking advanced degrees could do profitable work.

(h) The tourist traffic from New Zealand to Canada has been completely shut off by the New Zealand reserve bank in their efforts to conserve Canadian dollars but the New Zealand travel authorities are anxious to get as many visitors from Canada as possible. The Canadian Pacific Air Lines hope to be able to increase their traffic by encouraging tourists to visit Australia and New Zealand. There is at present in New Zealand a good number of parents and relatives of New Zealanders who have settled in Canada who have been prevented from visiting them by the exchange restrictions. I suggest that the New Zealand Government might be approached with a view to ear-marking some of the Canadian dollars derived from Canadian visitors to New Zealand for New Zealand visitors to Canada.

(i) There has continued to be some exchanges of visits between Canada and New Zealand of theatrical and other organizations, for example, a visit by a grouping of Canadian politicians, New Zealand Sea Cadets and ex-servicemen to Canada, but the New Zealand Government has kept to a minimum a number of them home [sic]. Consideration might be given to the financing of such visits in both countries on a reciprocal basis.

18. Another approach to the problem of developing good relations between Canada and New Zealand might be considered along the lines being worked by the British Council in New Zealand which is bringing to New Zealand a variety of musicians, theatrical companies and prominent men and women. The latter mostly to make lecture tours, to work in adult education or to visit the universities. I don't know if funds would be available for similar Canadian activity but at least some prominent Canadian speakers might be persuaded to visit New Zealand from time to time.

19. In addition to Mr. Pearson's views on the proposals which I have met in this memorandum, I would like to discuss with him some of the basic problems which I have described in the first part of this memorandum. Admittedly some parts of it are speculative and may be wrong in interpretation but I am convinced that during the past two years despite the best efforts of Canadians in New Zealand there has been a deterioration in the general position of Canada there. This deterioration has come about despite the fact that Canadians generally seem to be liked by New Zealanders and are always well received by them.

20. Before returning to New Zealand, I should like to have a discussion with Mr. Pearson (and with any other people you think should be present) of the whole problem. I think that a full evening could be profitably devoted, at least from my point of view, and out of the discussion might arise some suggestions which would help me on my return to New Zealand. I also need some further clarification of Canadian policy with regard to the United States, the Commonwealth, South Pacific security, dollar loans, export and import policy and so on. Despatches from Headquarters are always useful and are the only guidance possible, but an opportunity for questions and discussion before my return would greatly help me to express the Canadian point of view when an occasion arises.

Ottawa, November 5, 1949

SECRET

Sir,

Sir Mohammed Zafrulla Khan, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Commonwealth Relations of Pakistan, arrived in Ottawa on the evening of October 13. He had indicated to the High Commissioner for Pakistan that he wished to obtain a short respite from his responsibilities at the General Assembly of the United Nations, where he is leader of his country's delegation. His visit to Canada was, therefore, brief and informal.

2. On the morning of October 14 the Foreign Minister had an hour's conversation with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. I attach a copy of a memorandum summarizing this conversation. Later in the morning he gave an interview to the press at the Press Gallery Lounge in the House of Commons.

3. At midday on October 14 he was the guest of the Canadian Government at a luncheon in his honour at the Country Club. The Honourable Brooke Claxton, Minister of National Defence and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, presided because of the absence from Ottawa of the Prime Minister and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. During the late afternoon the High Commissioner for Pakistan gave a reception in honour of the Foreign Minister and that evening Sir Zafrulla Khan addressed a meeting of the Ottawa Branch, Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

4. During his contacts with the Department Sir Zafrulla Khan made no mention of the controversies now existing between Pakistan and India but spoke in very vigorous terms on this subject at his press conference and, I understand, confidentially, also in his address to the Institute. According to an article in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of October 15, which was based on the press conference, he accused India of obstructing the holding of a plebiscite in Kashmir because of the Indian Government's conviction that a vote in a fair and impartial plebiscite would be favourable to Pakistan.

5. It is open to speculation as to whether these remarks had any direct connection with the outspoken criticism which was levelled ten days later by the Prime Minister of India against Pakistan in his press conference in Ottawa. This criticism produced a public rejoinder from the High Commissioner for Pakistan, who indicated that Pandit Nehru was uttering a falsehood in asserting that non-Moslems do not occupy important posts in the Pakistan Government.

6. Sir Zafrulla Khan spoke of the pleasant recollections which he had of earlier visits to this country and, I believe, he thoroughly enjoyed renewing his contacts with Canada. He was very pleased to learn from the Under-Secretary of the decision to appoint a Canadian High Commissioner to Pakistan in the near future.

Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

VISIT OF SIR ZAFRULLA KHAN TO UNDER-SECRETARY

At 10:30 a.m. on Friday, October 14, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Commonwealth Relations of Pakistan, accompanied by the Pakistan High Commissioner to Canada and Mr. A.A. Khan, Pakistan Vice-Consul in New York, called on Mr. Heeney. Mr. Reid, Mr. Holmes and Mr. Feaver were also present. During an hour of friendly, frank and at times humorous conversation, Sir Zafrulla Khan covered a wide range of subjects but carefully avoided any reference to matters of present controversy such as the Kashmir issue and the election of India to the Security Council. In no respect, either directly or indirectly, did he attempt to put forward the Pakistan side of any outstanding problem.

2. The only really significant statement was his categorical assertion that the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan will undoubtedly eventually decide upon creating a Republic with a status in the Commonwealth identical with that of India. He felt that Pakistan would have been very happy to continue allegiance to the King were it not for the decision taken at the Conference of Prime Ministers in London last April to permit India, by recognizing the King as the symbolic head of the Commonwealth, to remain a member of it following the adoption of a republican form of government. Incidentally, Sir Zafrulla Khan felt that a mistake had been made in indicating to India in advance of the Prime Ministers' conference that every effort would be made to work out such a formula. He believes that Pandit Nehru's own attitude has changed considerably and that Nehru would in fact not have been unhappy to have returned and told the Indian Constituent Assembly that the other members of the Commonwealth had not found it possible to accept such a formula and that, therefore, India must continue allegiance to the Crown or leave the Commonwealth. Sir Zafrulla Khan felt that the Constituent Assembly would not have chosen the second alternative, though the matter is purely academic and no one will ever know, as history never offers a second opportunity for such a decision.

3. The most striking impression left by Sir Zafrulla Khan was that, despite his use of Western clothes and his air of cosmopolitanism, he is above all a great Muslim leader. Without in any way adopting the approach of a missionary or the attitude of an apostle, he constantly referred in a most felicitous and easy manner to the life and philosophy of the prophet in support of his own ideas and the actions of the Pakistan Government. He felt that the Muslim teachings, which recognize the responsibility of the state for the provision of the necessities for all citizens, provided a strong barrier against the acceptance of Communism. He recognized, however, that the very heavily populated area of East Pakistan maintained so low a standard of living for large sections of the people that, unless economic conditions could be alleviated, the ground was fertile for the seeds of Communist philosophy. The Pakistan Government felt it was, therefore, necessary to take remedial measures because in the words of the prophet, "Destitution is the mother of infidelity."

4. Sir Zafrulla Khan spoke of his visit to China in 1942 when he went there as the first diplomatic representative of India with the title of Agent-General. On his return to India he spoke of the great danger of the spread of Communism because of the feebleness and corruption of the Kuomintang. Indeed he had believed that the collapse of the Nationalist régime would take place before it actually did. Nevertheless, even though the Communists had overrun most of the thickly-populated industrial and richer parts of China, he thought it might still be possible for the Nationalist Government to maintain itself in the south and west in an area which would be almost half of the entire country. (Sir Zafrulla was a little out in his arithmetic; according to the New York Times for October 16, the Communists now control two-thirds of the area of China and three-quarters of its population.) He rather indicated that he hoped that this would eventuate as it would provide a buffer state between the Communists and South East Asia. There has been no supplying of small arms to the Chiang Kai-shek régime from the sub-continent of India as neither India nor Pakistan have any available for export. However, to date there has been no infiltration of Chinese Communists into India or Pakistan. Sir Zafrulla Khan indicated that his government had not as yet made any decision concerning the recognition of the Chinese Communist régime.

5. It is noteworthy that Sir Zafrulla Khan revealed no semblance of animosity against India. He spoke with satisfaction and obvious pleasure of the occasions when he had represented India abroad and of the responsibilities which he exercised in India prior to the establishment of Pakistan.

ATTENDANCE OF U.K. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS

1. The Prime Minister welcomed Mr. Bevin and on behalf of the Canadian government expressed pleasure that he had found it possible to visit Canada.

2. The U.K. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs thanked the Prime Minister for his welcome and mentioned how much the U.K. government appreciated the cooperation extended to them by the Canadian government in financial and other matters both during and since the war. In the critical days of 1940, this assistance had meant much. In the postwar years, Canada's support of UNRRA had contributed substantially to its success.

The crowning event in recent days had been the coming into effect of the North Atlantic Treaty. Earlier efforts to bring this into being had met with difficulties, but the timely speech by the Canadian Prime Minister in support of such an agreement had given a much needed stimulus to the cause.

In reviewing the events of the past few years, it seemed to him that the Berlin crisis of 1948 and the decision of the Allies to remain there had marked the turning point in the relationships between the democracies and the U.S.S.R. While it had been a big gamble at the time, in retrospect the decision was a wise one.

He now considered that the preservation of peace was a ten year task. If the countries of the North Atlantic Treaty continued to work closely together and remained strong, then a firm and just policy could be followed in dealings with the U.S.S.R. The achievement of this aim would ensure peace for long years to come.

3. Mr. St. Laurent observed that U.S. support of the North Atlantic Treaty had made Canadians realize to a greater extent than heretofore that the threat of war could only be met by joint action. Canada's support of the Treaty was based upon growing awareness of our own self-interest. It was pleasant to hear that Mr. Bevin viewed the future with confidence. This feeling was shared by the Canadian government.

(At this point Mr. Bevin left the meeting)

Ottawa, November 7, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the visit recently paid to Canada by the Rt. Hon. Ernest Bevin. Accompanied by Mrs. Bevin, Sir Roger Makins, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and Mr. R.E. Barclay, Private Secretary, he arrived in Ottawa on Sunday, October 2, and remained until Wednesday, October 5, when he departed for Montreal where he spent one day prior to returning to New York.

2. On Monday morning Mr. Bevin paid a courtesy visit to the Prime Minister and later attended a meeting of the Cabinet. The discussions were of a general nature as Mr. Bevin dealt with some of the broader aspects of the problems facing the United Kingdom Government without raising specific issues or making any appeal for Canadian support in any particular connection.

3. That evening the Prime Minister and Mme. St. Laurent, on behalf of the Government of Canada, gave a dinner in honour of Mr. and Mrs. Bevin. In his after-dinner speech the Prime Minister referred in felicitous terms to the many achievements of Mr. Bevin's career. The latter replied in a typically forceful and humorous manner. He dwelt at some length on his appointment as Minister of Labour in the Churchill Government and of the difficulties encountered by the United Kingdom during and after the war.

4. Mr. Bevin spoke with considerable confidence concerning the future and based his optimism upon the accomplishments of post-war years. While he recognized the importance of the contribution of the United States and of Canada to the economic rehabilitation of the United Kingdom and of continental Europe, he felt that there was not a full awareness of what the United Kingdom had done in restoring its own domestic position and in stabilizing the whole sterling area, particularly by meeting the immediate and urgent requirements of India.

5. The keynote of his speech was that the United Kingdom is not an old worn-out mother country but is a young and vigorous nation. It has been reorganized on a foundation of new social values and is today strong, healthy, inventive and ready to continue contributing its full share to the betterment of living standards throughout the world.

6. On Tuesday morning Mr. Bevin gave a press conference. I attach a summary of the views he expressed there.†

7. At noon he was guest of honour at a luncheon given by the Canadian Club. I attach excerpts from his speech as reported in the Canadian Weekly Bulletin, Volume 4, No. 49, October 14.†

8. That evening, at six o'clock, Sir Alexander Clutterbuck gave a large reception at Earncliffe for Mr. and Mrs. Bevin.

9. The following morning Mr. Bevin left by car for Montreal where he addressed a luncheon in his honour, which was given by the Canadian Club of that city. I attach the full text of his speech.†

10. The entire visit was, I believe, most successful, both from the standpoint of Mr. Bevin and of the Canadian Government and people. Mr. Bevin's friendly, informal and cheerful attitude created a most favourable reaction. The knowledge that he had not come to request, either in private conversations with the Government or from a public forum, any particular assistance from Canada but merely wished to pay a friendly visit and explain some of what he described as temporary difficulties of the United Kingdom, evoked a warm response from all quarters.

I have, etc.

VISITE DU PREMIER MINISTRE À WASHINGTON
VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO WASHINGTON

I. St. Lawrence Waterway

After the President's lunch for the Prime Minister at Blair House the President invited Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Acheson, Mr. Steinhardt and Mr. Wrong to remain for a discussion. He began by saying that the Prime Minister had mentioned the St. Lawrence project to him at luncheon and had said that unless the joint projects for power and navigation were approved this year the Canadian Government would, because of a need for power in Canada, have to back the separate power proposal on the lines put forward by Ontario and New York. The Prime Minister emphasized the need for power in Ontario and referred to the possible development in the Lachine section of 1¼ million horsepower provided the waterway went through. The whole project, he thought, would have a very beneficial effect on the future relations of the two countries, because there was no serious question of anybody giving up anything and it constituted a great addition to the productive resources of them both.

The President remarked that he had gone into the matter very fully when he was first elected to the Senate and had never wavered from his conclusion that the whole project should be completed. He could not understand the attitude of a number of mid-western Senators who had opposed its approval, although he could see why Senators from the Atlantic seaboard took a different line. He indicated that he hoped that the present Congress would act favourably, but did not commit himself as to the action which he proposed to take to encourage its approval or whether he would support the separate power project if Congress failed to approve the 1941 agreement. He remarked on this that the separate project could only be constructed with the consent of the Federal Government.

Mr. St. Laurent commented on the diminution of opposition in the Province of Quebec. The President said that the chances in Congress looked better than hitherto, although the railway companies and unions continued to be strongly opposed.

II. Commercial Questions

The President cordially agreed with the remark by the Prime Minister that it would be in the interests of the two countries that trade should be as free from restriction as possible. He emphasized, however, the need for proceeding by stages so that the public would be satisfied that no serious damage was inflicted on the economy of either country by successive advances. There was no discussion of the way in which tariff barriers could be reduced in the near future. Mr. St. Laurent mentioned the great prospects of development of national resources in Canada, with particular reference to oil production and increased use of domestic coal, which would go a long way towards rectifying the normal Canadian adverse balance of payments with the United States. The President said that he had recently received information on the prospects of oil development between the Canadian border and the Arctic Ocean, including an optimistic account of the possibilities of finding a large new pool in Alaska.

The Prime Minister brought up the problems of Canadian military procurement in the United States. He emphasized the economy, and indeed necessity, of the purchase by Canada in the United States of substantial quantities of equipment which it would be uneconomic to seek to manufacture in small quantities in Canada. He pointed out, however, that this would necessitate from the financial point of view an increase in U.S. military procurement in Canada of a restricted number of manufactured articles for the use of the forces, in addition to raw materials for munitions production.

The President expressed interest in this idea, and indicated that he would be glad to have it further examined. He and the Secretary of State agreed that they would have difficulty with their own Services, who liked to keep equipment production directly under their thumb, but he remarked that the decision in the final analysis would be his and that he would see to it that the Canadian situation was borne in mind.

The Prime Minister observed that people feel in Canada that they could manufacture almost everything, but that they only wished to manufacture what could be justified on economic grounds. He mentioned our desire to have certain Canadian requirements placed on U.S. Service contracts, a procedure permissible under an act of 1941, and the hope that further legislation would be adopted which would permit Canadian purchases from stock. The Secretary of State, presumably referring to the Inter-American Military Assistance Act which failed of passage in the last Congress, remarked that a major source of difficulty was that a good deal of the equipment under it would be given away to Latin American countries whereas the Canadian Government proposed to pay for whatever they secured. He thought that this would make a substantial difference in the attitude of Congress towards Canadian procurement.

III. North Atlantic Treaty

The North Atlantic Treaty was briefly discussed. The Prime Minister emphasized his view that its major value was as a deterrent to war, and that he believed that the Canadian people would support the commitment of Canada on these grounds, although the machinery of the treaty would have to be employed to increase the combined power of the parties to it.

He went on to say that it was most important to him that the treaty should not be a military alliance only, but should hold out the prospect of close economic and social collaboration between the parties. An article to this effect would be of the greatest value to him politically in securing the full acceptance of the treaty by the Canadian people.

Not very much was said by the President or Mr. Acheson on the subject of the treaty, and other pending questions in connection with it were not alluded to.

IV. Communication with Alaska

The President brought up the question of improving land communications with Alaska, saying that he had not yet had an opportunity of discussing this with the Secretary of State, but that he was familiar with proposals which were strongly supported in the Pacific Northwest. They desired both the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway to connect with the Alaska railway system and the construction of a road along the Rocky Mountain Trench. He mentioned that the cost of this road had been estimated as $18 million, and that one proposal was that it should be shared evenly between the governments of the U.S., Canada and British Columbia.

On the railway Mr. St. Laurent remarked on the desire of the Premier of British Columbia to dispose of the railway to one of the two great Canadian railway companies and his intention to improve it and increase traffic on it as a means of making this proposal attractive.

On the road the Prime Minister referred to the political difficulties in the way of federal contributions to highway construction in the provinces, but mentioned the Trans-Canada Highway as an exception to the previous Canadian practice. He remarked that the Premier of B.C. would like to have the road built, but did not like the prospect of a third of its cost being paid by the province.

In general defence of improved land communications the President observed that Alaska was the crossroads of the air between Europe and Asia and that its development was currently seriously cramped by paucity of communications.

V. Wheat

The Prime Minister mentioned his concern at the possibility that the movement of wheat from Canada to the United Kingdom under the contract might be disrupted through the inability of E.C.A. to provide the U.K. with the necessary dollars on account of the large stocks of wheat in the United States. He pointed out that this would have a very serious effect, both economic and political, in Canada, and that it would also cause difficulties between Canada and the United Kingdom. He mentioned that he understood that there was a prospect of this development with respect to shipments in the second quarter of 1949.

The President apparently was unaware that the matter was a very live one. He remarked that the wheat position in the United States was not one of such great over-supply, adding that they contemplated a carry-over of between 300 and 400 million bushels. Both he and Mr. Acheson appeared to agree that it would be most unfortunate if the U.K. were refused the dollars to carry on the Canadian wheat contract, and that some means must be found to avoid such a development. They indicated that he or Mr. Acheson would discuss the matter with the Secretary of Agriculture.

The President then said that the Canadian Government might help them in overcoming the difficulties raised by the United Kingdom to the conclusion of the International Wheat Agreement, a matter which had been considered by the United States Cabinet within the last day or two. He was very anxious that the wheat agreement should be signed and ratified in the near future, and the major obstacle to agreement was the position taken by the United Kingdom delegation in seeking to force the ceiling price down to a point well below what the United States could accept.

The Prime Minister said that he would go into this question and see what could profitably be done by Canada, remarking on the great Canadian interest in securing an agreement that would stabilize the price of wheat at a range between fixed points.

VI. Newfoundland Bases

The Prime Minister raised the question of the rights granted to the United States in the three Newfoundland bases by the Agreement of 1941 with the United Kingdom. He said that after the union of Newfoundland with Canada it was the desire of the Canadian Government that the non-military rights should be brought into accord with the principles laid down in the statement of February 12th, 1947, to govern defence co-operation between the two countries. He pointed to the prospect of difficulties over smuggling customs free goods imported by post exchanges in the bases into neighbouring Canadian territory, and also mentioned possible difficulties over the extent of the jurisdiction over offenders which the U.S. could exercise under the Agreement.

The President remarked that he was familiar with the problems caused by smuggling from post exchanges, and Mr. Acheson said that they were currently involved in a controversy over this in Trinidad. He expressed himself as desiring a mutually agreeable solution, and suggested, with Mr. Acheson's concurrence, that a detailed statement of Canadian desiderata should be submitted as the next stage. He recognized that there would be difficulty with the U.S. Services over the relinquishment of rights now enjoyed, but thought that he and the Secretary of State could cope with this so as to give Canada some satisfaction.

Mr. St. Laurent made it clear that there was no disposition on our part to challenge the validity of the leases or of the rights accorded by the 1941 Agreement. What he hoped for was that an understanding would be reached between the two governments, perhaps in an exchange of notes, controlling the exercise of certain of the rights without impairing in any way the defence value of the bases. It would not be possible to reach a definite agreement until after the union of Newfoundland and Canada had become effective, since Canada has as yet no legal rights in the matter.

It was left that the issue would be pursued in due course with the Department of State.

VII. General Political Situation

In the course of the conversation Mr. St. Laurent told the President about the prospect that an election would be held in Canada during 1949. He said that the Canadian Government was happy to be able to continue to do business with a Democratic Administration in Washington, and he hoped that this sentiment was reciprocated so that the President would be sorry to see a change in Canada as a result of the election. Mr. Truman indicated his cordial assent. The Prime Minister remarked that one of his purposes in accepting the President's invitation to visit Washington had been to explain in general terms some of the current matters touching on the interests of the United States in which the action of the U.S. Government might have an effect on the outcome of the election.

In general the discussion could scarcely have been conducted in a more cordial atmosphere, and one left with the feeling that it certainly should make easier the conduct of relations between the two countries in the future. The President displayed every manifestation of good will towards Canada, and repeatedly referred to his earnest belief that the closest harmony between the United States and "its best neighbour" was an important object of his policy. He also showed his respect for Canadian political independence as being in the interests of both the countries.

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON

1. The Prime Minister reported on his visit to Washington (over the weekend) during which he had had conversations with the President, the Secretary of State and the Administrator of ECA.

The topics discussed included the St. Lawrence development, North Atlantic security, U.S. bases in Newfoundland, purchase of U.S. equipment for Canadian forces, Canada's relationship to ECA (particularly in connection with the U.K.-Canada wheat contract), and Canada-U.S. trade.

The attitudes of Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson and Mr. Hoffman on the matters discussed with them had been wholly co-operative. There had been evident throughout a desire to work out mutually satisfactory solutions of common problems.

Certain of the topics of discussion would require to be followed up promptly through the U.S. State Department, notably our desires in respect of the Newfoundland bases, U.S. equipment for Canadian forces and the position of Canadian representatives in the current Washington conference on a world wheat agreement.

(Memorandum, Canadian Ambassador to the United States, Feb. 12, 1949).

2. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with satisfaction the Prime Minister's report.

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

Yesterday afternoon I was given on a strictly personal basis a copy of a memorandum made by Dean Acheson of the conversation between the President and Mr. St. Laurent. Dean did not have a chance to dictate this until several days after the conversation took place. I am enclosing a copy of it. I mentioned to you on the telephone that the Prime Minister thought my record was very restrained. You will find that Dean's at one or two important points is still more restrained and is certainly more sketchy. I dictated my memorandum immediately on getting back from Blair House, but of course was not able to take notes of what was said during the conversation and had to rely on my memory.

As my record is fuller and, I think, more accurate than Dean's, I have given a copy of it to Hickerson, and this morning I went over it and Dean's report with him and Snow at the State Department. There is nothing that could be called a complete discrepancy between the two papers. In the matter of the Newfoundland bases Dean's report is vague and does not indicate at all clearly what the Prime Minister proposed, but I have seen to it that this is understood in the State Department. In the matter of the E.C.A. financing of Canadian wheat Dean's record does not go far enough, but I sent a message yesterday (WA-431 of February 17th)† saying that the State Department thought my record went too far and giving the reasons why.

I am, however, disturbed, as I told you on the telephone, that the Prime Minister may expect too concrete results from the very friendly way in which the President received his remarks. There follows a very brief summary of the position in which I think the various matters discussed were left. I put this in the order in which they were taken up.

1. The St. Lawrence Waterway. General agreement on the desirability of approval of the project, but no special action indicated. The question of how and when to proceed with Congress is still before the President for decision.

2. Trade Questions. General agreement on the desirability of increasing trade. Specific methods were not discussed.

3. Procurement of Military Supplies. Action to permit Canadian purchase of needed new equipment is under way and broader legislation is expected later in this session of Congress. The State Department is to investigate the possibility of U.S. procurement in Canada and is preparing a study on this.

4. North Atlantic Treaty. While no commitment was made by the President on the inclusion of an article on economic collaboration, I think that the Administration is now prepared to accept this.

5. Communications with Alaska. The President was prompted to bring this up by Senator Magnuson and Mr. Wallgren.¹ It is quite likely that a joint resolution will pass Congress authorizing an economic survey of the traffic possibilities of a railway connecting the P[acific] G[reat] E[astern] with Alaska. I learn at the State Department that the cost of building a road through the Rocky Mountain Trench might be as much as $150 million instead of the $18 million mentioned by the President.

6. Wheat. On E.C.A. financing efforts are being made to find some way out of the difficulty caused by the abundance of U.S. supplies and by congressional interest in the subject, but it is still open to serious question that these efforts will succeed. Indeed, the Secretary of Agriculture (in whose hands the decision lies) has publicly indicated pretty clearly that he will refuse to agree to the financing of Canadian wheat in the second quarter of 1949. With regard to influencing the position of the U.K. on the International Wheat Agreement, our delegation here is taking the leading part in the negotiations for a compromise. I do not know whether we have said anything in London, but we told both Franks and Clutterbuck about the President's request shortly after the discussion took place.

7. Newfoundland Bases. I shall try to send a message tomorrow on this difficult question. We still have a long way to go before we can find a mutually satisfactory solution, and I am puzzled about how to proceed.

Yours sincerely,

HUME [WRONG]

Memorandum by Secretary of State of United States

SECRET

After luncheon at the Blair House on Saturday, February 12, the President and the Prime Minister retired for a general discussion. Secretary Acheson was present.

The Prime Minister reviewed briefly the situation confronting his Administration. He said that in the economic field Canada's former position, of selling largely in Europe and buying largely in the United States, probably could not be recovered.

The Prime Minister said Canada must hope to balance its payments with the United States by producing more of the goods which it could sell to us. If Canada would, as seemed hopeful, develop petroleum resources and its own coal supplies, he thought it would relieve a burden on U.S. resources and free dollars for other purchases. He said Canada hoped for closer trade relations with the United States.

On the political side, the Prime Minister stated that his Administration faced a general election within eighteen months and he expected that the election would not be postponed to the end of this Parliament's life.

The Prime Minister made specific suggestions on U.S. orders for some military items in Canada. He stressed the importance of furthering adoption of common equipment by the two forces. This meant, he said, the purchase of many items by Canada in the United States with the help of our forces—but this took dollars badly needed. He said Canada herself could concentrate on a few items which it could produce economically if orders were in volume. He asked if the United States would be willing to place orders for such items in Canada, thus utilizing natural and manufacturing resources and providing dollars to balance military payments.

The President said that the Prime Minister's suggestion deserved most careful examination and directed Secretary Acheson to institute a study.

The Prime Minister said he was greatly disturbed over the possibility that ECA might end the financing of British wheat purchases in Canada. He said this would have a disastrous effect on the Western provinces and on the whole Canadian-British and Canadian-U.S. trade. It was explained to the Prime Minister that the problem centred on whether the present law was continued which made financing impossible of wheat declared surplus in the United States and on whether wheat became surplus here. It was also pointed out that the wheat agreement had a direct bearing and that Canada could be very helpful by assisting in getting British cooperation for an agreement. If no agreement occurred and the world prices fell, the United States Government would be in a difficult position in acquiring wheat under price support procedures and still financing sales in Canada instead of supplying its own wheat. The Prime Minister said he understood and would try to be helpful.

The St. Lawrence project was briefly mentioned and the Prime Minister stressed Canada's great interest in it. The President assured the Prime Minister that his demonstrated desire for the project continued.

The Prime Minister said he recognized the legal commitments in the Newfoundland base agreements and did not propose to change them. He suggested the possibility of an exchange of notes by which the parties might express the intention, for the present, to exercise undoubted legal rights in certain ways which would not push the rights to the limit. He referred to some management of imports for post exchange, duty free, which would control bootlegging. He also mentioned some treatment of military personnel who violated the law when not discharging duties compatible with regard to Canadian sovereignty. The President expressed a desire to facilitate examination of this proposal in a sympathetic way and directed Secretary Acheson to see that discussions were had.

In response to a general suggestion for reduction of trade barriers, it was agreed that we had to proceed slowly to avoid raising fears on both sides of the border. We should always be glad to discuss any points raised.

The meeting ended with mutual expressions of esteem.

I am enclosing herewith a very interesting letter which I have received from Hume Wrong concerning your recent talks in Washington with the President. Attached to this letter is a memorandum which Mr. Acheson made of those talks. This is, of course, a highly confidential document and is one which we were not supposed to see, and it was given to Wrong on a strictly personal basis.

You will note that Dean Acheson's account of your conversations is somewhat more restricted even than that of Mr. Wrong. I think that we will find that Mr. Truman's amiable offers of assistance and cooperation may be somewhat difficult to implement. I am also wondering whether we should not begin to follow up one or two of them. As a first step in this process I am hoping to see Steinhardt Saturday morning and talk to him about Newfoundland.

RE-CANADIANIZATION OF NORTHERN CANADA

Introduction

1. The object of this paper is to show briefly how, and to what extent, the various departments are succeeding in the government's policy of keeping the Canadian Arctic Canadian.

Weather Stations

2. This section of the report deals with two categories of Arctic weather stations: those in the Northeastern Arctic which were continued in operation by the United States following World War II (now in the process of being taken over by the Department of Transport); and those which have been established and operated as joint Canada-U.S. projects. These two classes are discussed below under separate headings.

(a) Northeastern Weather Stations

3. The continued operation of a number of weather stations in Northeastern Canada by the United States was approved by Cabinet Defence Committee in September, 1946. In January, 1947, however, the Cabinet approved the taking over of these stations by the Meteorological Division, Department of Transport, over a period of three years, ending in 1950.

4. During 1948, two of these stations (Mecatina, Que. and Clyde River, Baffin Island) were taken over from the United States and are now operated by Canadian personnel. The United States are still operating the remaining stations in this group, which are located at Padloping, Cape Harrison, Indianhouse Lake, Mingan, Frobiisher and Chimo.

5. The Department of Transport intend to take over Indianhouse Lake during 1949-50, but plans for Padloping and Cape Harrison are indefinite. The remaining three stations (Frobisher, Chimo and Mingan) are airfields as well as weather stations and are dealt with in Para. 12 below.

6. The operation of the weather station at Goose Bay is under the control of the Canadian Meteorological Division, although the United States are responsible for upper air observations.

(b) Joint Canada-U.S. Arctic Weather Stations

7. In January, 1947, the Cabinet approved a Canada-U.S. Arctic weather station programme which called for the establishment of a number of joint weather stations over a three-year period, ending in 1950. Under this arrangement, the officer in charge, half the personnel (together with their pay and subsistence) and, generally speaking, all permanent installations are provided by Canada. The Canadian operating agency is the Meteorological Division, Department of Transport. The United States provides transport and other equipment and supplies.

8. Four of the nine stations approved by the Cabinet in 1947 have now been established, with a main station at Resolute on Cornwallis Island and satellite stations at Eureka, Ellesmere Island; Isachsen on Isachsen Peninsula and Mould Bay on Prince Patrick Island. It was planned to establish two further stations in the network during 1949-50, one on North Ellesmere Island in the vicinity of Dumbell Lakes and the second on Melville Island near Bridport Inlet. It was later agreed, however, at a meeting of officials of the two countries in January, 1949, that the establishment of the latter station (Melville Island) would be deferred one or two years because of the limitations imposed on the U.S. Weather Bureau appropriation for 1949-50.

9. An additional station in this group which was originally planned for Cambridge Bay, Victoria Island, has been established at Coppermine, Mackenzie District, and is operated by the Meteorological Division as a purely Canadian project.

Air Fields and Air Strips

(a) Air Strips

10. When the Arctic weather station programme was approved by Cabinet, it was recognized that adjacent air strips would be required for supply purposes. Accordingly, air strips were constructed at each of the joint weather stations as they were established. Improvement in the air strip at Resolute Bay was undertaken during the summer of 1948, by agreement between Canada and the United States, to render it suitable for winter operations. With respect to division of responsibility between Canada and the United States in this regard, the guiding principle is similar to that accepted generally for the joint weather station programme.

(b) Air Fields

11. In October, 1945, the Cabinet directed that, as an interim measure, the R.C.A.F. take over U.S. facilities on the airfields of the Northwest Staging Route, and this decision was confirmed in February, 1946. Accordingly, the RCAF is operating the airfields and their associated facilities on the Northwest Staging Route. However, the USAF are still maintaining establishments at Edmonton, Alta., and Fort Nelson, B.C. for the purpose of assisting in the support of their air transport operations between Alaska and the United States.

12. The wartime airfields at Frobisher Bay, Baffin Island; Fort Chimo and Mingan, Que., are still operated by the United States, though the costs of construction and all permanent installations have been paid for by the Canadian government. It is understood that the RCAF will take over operation of these airfields by the end of 1950 and that when this is accomplished the Department of Transport will assume responsibility for the associated weather stations. RCAF liaison officers are now attached to these stations.

13. At certain of these aerodromes permission has been given by Cabinet for the United States to construct a limited number of married quarters on the understanding that all permanent installations would become the property of the Canadian government.

Low-Frequency Loran Stations

14. On February 25th, 1947, Cabinet approved Canadian participation in the establishment of a chain of six low-frequency Loran stations, to be operated by Canada and the United States. Three of these were to be in Canada, one in Alaska and two in Greenland. Canadian participation is confined to the stations established in Canada. Canada assumed responsibility for construction and supply, and the United States provided Loran towers and sets and some mechanical transport. The Canadian stations are now manned entirely by RCAF personnel.

15. Previously, in May, 1946, Cabinet authorized the establishment of experimental transmitting stations at Hamlin, Sask., Gimli, Man., and Dawson Creek, B.C. This chain was to be maintained until the Northern chain became operational, but circumstances necessitated that its operation be continued for training purposes. Although the station at Dawson Creek has been closed down, the other two units will continue in operation until September, 1949. US participation consists of technical supervision, including the provision of a majority of technical personnel at the transmitting stations.

16. The United States also provides a detachment of B-29 aircraft which have been based at Edmonton for Loran experimental and test flights. RCAF liaison officers are attached to this operation.

17. Results of tests of the Northern Loran chain have been unsatisfactory and it appears that additional engineering and development work must be undertaken before the chain can be considered a successful aid to navigation.

Air Photography and Mapping

18. Cabinet Defence Committee, on April 15, 1948, approved a United States programme of aerial photographic surveys in certain areas of the Arctic, Newfoundland, Labrador and Eastern Quebec, for mapping purposes.

19. Under this authority, a considerable amount of aerial photographic work was carried out in these areas by the United States during the summer of 1948. Duplicate negatives of all photographs taken are being forwarded to the Department of National Defence. RCAF liaison officers are attached to the US photographic units based at Ladd Field, Alaska, in connection with US photographic operations in the Arctic Islands area.

Transportation and Communications

(a) Air Supply

20. The USAF provides air transport to the three airfields in Northeastern Canada (Frobisher, Chimo and Mingan) which they still operate. It is assumed that the air supply of these stations will become a Canadian responsibility by 1950 when they are taken over by the RCAF and Department of Transport, as previously mentioned.

21. The USAF is also responsible for the air supply of the joint Canada-US weather stations. The RCAF, in consultation with other interested departments, is at present studying the implications of taking over this responsibility from the USAF.

22. The scheduled flight from Andover Field, Massachusetts to Churchill by the USAF has recently been discontinued owing to the need for aircraft in the Berlin Airlift. U.S. personnel travelling to Churchill now proceed by Canadian means of transportation.

23. Scheduled flights are maintained by the USAF to Alaska along the Northwest Staging Route, on a daily basis. These, of course, are transit flights, with the bulk of passengers and freight being destined for Alaska.

24. On February 1st, 1949, the RCAF assumed responsibility for the air supply of the Northern Loran stations. Prior to that date the United States had provided substantial assistance.

(b) Sea Supply

25. With Cabinet approval (January, 1947) the United States provides transportation, both by air and sea, to the joint Canada-US weather stations. The sea supply mission in the past has consisted of two icebreakers and one or more cargo vessels. The Transportation Sub-Committee had prepared recommendations which, if implemented, would provide Canada with the means of taking over the sea supply of these stations in 1952.

(c) Communications

26. Direct communication channels between the US and Canadian territory exist at the US-operated weather stations and airfields, and at Churchill. When, as mentioned above, the weather stations and associated airfields are taken over by Canadian agencies, the need for these channels will disappear. The channel to Churchill is an experimental one and is not used for routine and administrative communications.

27. At the joint weather stations, the radio operators are Canadian, and weather information is disseminated over a Canadian network.

Scientific Investigations

28. Well defined channels exist for the clearance of United States scientists wishing to visit Northern Canada for the purpose of carrying out scientific investigations. These procedures are becoming more widely known and were recently reaffirmed at the Joint Canada-US meeting in January, 1949, when a procedure suitable to Canada for the clearance of scientists visiting the joint weather stations was agreed to by the United States.

29. US activities in the scientific field, apart from experimental work at Churchill and that carried out in connection with service operations, such as the sea supply mission, are largely sponsored by the Arctic Institute of North America, which had about twelve scientific parties in Northern Canada during the summer of 1948.

I. REPORT OF THE TRANSPORTATION SUB-COMMITTEE ON SURFACE TRANSPORTATION IN NORTHERN CANADA

1. The Committee had for consideration the final report of the Transportation Sub-Committee on surface transportation in Northern Canada. This report contained a number of recommendations, the implementation of which, in the view of the Sub-Committee, would enable Canada to meet the surface transportation requirements as now visualized in the Canadian Arctic over a ten-year period without outside assistance.

An explanatory document had been circulated. (Secretaries' memorandum ND 16, dated Feb. 21, 1949)†

Surplus French Icebreaker

2. Air Vice Marshal James informed the Committee that consideration had been given to the desirability of obtaining the icebreaker which was being disposed of by the French government. The Royal Canadian Navy and the Department of Transport, however, had indicated that this vessel was not suited to their purposes and that to refit her to the required standards would be very nearly as costly and time-consuming as to build a new vessel.

3. The Committee agreed that the French icebreaker was unsuitable for Canadian use.

Second Canadian Icebreaker

4. Air Vice Marshal James stated that the Transportation Sub-Committee, after considerable study, had arrived at the conclusion that two icebreakers were necessary to ensure the safe and timely annual supply of the northern weather stations by sea. While, under very favourable conditions, one icebreaker might be able to accomplish this task, a second icebreaker should be available in case of accident. This had been well demonstrated in the summer of 1948 when one United States icebreaker had been nearly lost north of Ellesmere Island, only being saved by assistance from the second icebreaker.

The Transportation Sub-Committee, in arriving at the conclusion that two icebreakers were necessary, had considered only the transportation aspect of the problem. There might be additional implications from the defence point of view which would strengthen this conclusion.

It should, however, be noted that the N.B. McLEAN could be used for the supply of the northern weather stations if she could be spared from her normal duties by the Department of Transport.

5. Mr. Lessard pointed out that the need for the McLEAN in the St. Lawrence during the spring for icebreaking operations, and in Hudson Bay and Hudson Strait during the summer for the servicing and supply of radio-marine stations, precluded her use in more northern operations.

Because of this, a request from United States authorities that the McLEAN take part in the sea supply mission to the joint weather stations had been refused.

6. Rear-Admiral Houghton informed the Committee that the expected date of completion for the RCN icebreaker was 1952. The Navy view on the proposed second icebreaker was that such a ship was necessary but could be more effectively employed under the control of a civilian department, especially since the RCN would have difficulty in manning such a vessel.

7. General Foulkes stated that the Chiefs of Staff concurred in the view expressed by Admiral Houghton.

8. Air Vice Marshall Cowley pointed out that the weather stations constituted a permanent requirement for supply operations, and that the only alternative to sea supply was air supply, which would be infinitely more costly.

9. Mr. Watson said that the Department of Transport had plans for an icebreaker drawn up and, if government approval were obtained, it was to be expected that the ship could be built in two years.

10. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that a second Canadian icebreaker was essential if Canada were to undertake the supply of the northern weather stations; and

(b) the Department of Transport should seek the authority of the Government for the construction and operation of this vessel.

Department of Transport Vessel for the Eastern Arctic Patrol

11. Air Vice Marshal James informed the Committee that the present arrangement whereby the supply of northern posts and stations was undertaken by a number of chartered vessels was unsatisfactory, from the point of view of both efficiency and cost. In addition, certain much needed navigational information would be obtained by the Eastern Arctic Patrol vessel when she was in use.

12. Mr. Lessard stated that the vessel for the Eastern Arctic Patrol had been promised for delivery in the fall of 1949, in which case she would be available in the summer of 1950.

13. The Committee noted that the Eastern Arctic Patrol vessel would be available for use in the summer of 1950 and agreed that every effort be made to ensure that this date be met.

Charting and Aids to Navigation

14. Air Vice Marshall James reported that the Transportation Sub-Committee considered the adequate charting and placing of suitable aids to navigation was a matter of urgency at Chesterfield Inlet, Frobisher, Chimo and along the Mackenzie River System.

15. The Committee agreed to recommend to the departments concerned that a high priority be given to the adequate charting and marking of channels at Chesterfield Inlet and along the Mackenzie River System, and, depending on RCAF plans, at Frobisher and Chimo.

Co-ordinating Agency

16. Air Vice Marshal James drew the attention of the Committee to the need for having one agency with executive authority in a position to co-ordinate shipping requirements, in order to avoid overlapping and duplication of effort. The Department of Transport was at present performing this function for the Eastern Arctic and it was suggested that they extend their activities to cover the Western Arctic coast as well.

17. Mr. Lessard said there would be no objection from the Department of Transport to this proposal.

18. The Committee noted with approval that the Department of Transport would act as the co-ordinating agency for shipping requirements in the Canadian Arctic.

Air Supply

19. Air Vice Marshal James reported that, on the assumption that Canada would ultimately be required to take over full responsibility for the operation and supply of weather stations, the Air Force, in consultation with the other Services and the Department of Transport, had undertaken a preliminary study of the air supply problems involved.

These studies had shown that although the supply of the weather stations was of major concern to the Departments of National Defence and Transport other departments and agencies were concerned. For example, the provision of periodic air service (supply of mail, emergency supplies, fresh fruit, etc.) to the personnel of one government agency raised the question of the desirability of providing like treatment to similarly situated personnel of other government departments, such as Mines and Resources and Justice.

It had become evident, therefore, that before an air supply plan could be formulated, policy decisions were required on such questions as division of responsibility between departments concerned, the standard of air service to be provided (frequency of flights, quantity of supplies per man, etc.) and the basis of sharing costs, manpower requirements and other facilities.

In these circumstances, it was recommended that a Sub-Committee be formed under the Advisory Committee on Northern Development with representatives from the planning sections of the interested departments to make recommendations on matters of policy which might be referred to it for study.

20. The Committee, after some discussion, agreed that the Secretaries convene a Sub-Committee of representatives from the interested government departments, to study the question of air supply policy and to make a recommendation thereon to the next meeting of the Committee.

II. PROVISION OF A HELICOPTER FOR EASTERN ARCTIC PATROL VESSEL

21. The Chairman reported that the new eastern Arctic Patrol vessel, now under construction for the Department of Transport, was designed to carry a helicopter to assist in navigation through packed ice in the high latitudes. This raised a question as to which department should be responsible for supplying, operating and maintaining the aircraft.

(Secretaries' memorandum dated February 21, 1949, Document ND 17)†

22. The Committee, after discussion, agreed that the Department of Transport supply, operate and maintain the helicopter to be provided for the Eastern Arctic Patrol vessel.

III. NORTHERN CONSTRUCTION PROGRESS REPORT

23. Mr. Goodspeed informed the Committee that the Construction Sub-Committee had given consideration to a number of problems since the last meeting of the Advisory Committee on Northern Development. The report which was circulated with the agenda was in the nature of a progress report.

(Secretary, Construction Sub-Committee memorandum, Document ND 18, dated February 21, 1949)†

Consideration had been given to provision of electricity from a central power plant at a number of locations in the Mackenzie District. Yellowknife, of course, was supplied with power from the Snare River development; a proposition was now before interested departments regarding the supply of power from a central plant operated by the Northwest Territories Power Commission to all users in the Fort Smith area; at Hay River, a study by the Northwest Territories Power Commission had indicated that it would be uneconomical to operate a central plant until the consumption of electricity increased and a study of power requirements and generating facilities at Fort Resolution was now under way.

Through the appointment of liaison officers to work between interested departments, the co-ordination of purchasing and of construction was being attempted. The Department of Public Works district engineer at Edmonton was in touch with other departments there regarding the bulk purchasing of materials and the Sub-Committee in Ottawa had prepared a programme for construction in 1949 on the basis of only one department doing building operations in one area.

It had not yet been possible to make any recommendations concerning a standard type of Arctic construction, since there was disagreement concerning the advantages of prefabricated buildings. However, tests were now under way at Churchill on a prefabricated building developed by the Army and it was expected that when the results of these tests were known a recommendation would be made.

24. The Chairman informed the Committee that the Northwest Territories administration had noticed an improvement in cooperation and co-ordination of effort between departments undertaking construction in the north in the last year.

25. The Committee noted with approval the progress report of the Construction Sub-Committee.

VI. RE-CANADIANIZATION OF NORTHERN CANADA

37. The Committee had for consideration a memorandum prepared by the Secretaries the object of which was to show how, and to what extent, the various departments were succeeding in the government's policy of keeping the Canadian Arctic Canadian.

(Secretaries' memorandum dated March 2, 1949, Document ND 21)

38. Air Vice Marshal James reported that although the RCAF expected to be able to take over the airfields at Frobisher, Chimo and Mingan by the end of 1950, responsibility for the air supply of these and the Northern weather stations could not be assumed, at least, until the following year. In these circumstances, some US personnel would still be stationed at these airfields after 1950 in support of their air supply operations.

39. Air Vice Marshal Cowley pointed out that Cape Harrison, being in Labrador, had not been considered as one of the weather stations to which the Cabinet's decision of 1947 applied. The Indianhouse Lake station had been destroyed by fire but the United States had expressed their willingness to rebuild it. In the view of the Department of Transport, there was some doubt as to the necessity for maintaining Padloping as a continuing weather station, otherwise no difficulty was anticipated in meeting the 1950 target date.

With respect to the joint weather stations, the Department of Transport were now of the opinion that it was not necessary to establish a station on North Ellesmere Island (Alert) for at least one or two years.

40. The Chairman suggested that if the provisions of the Cabinet directive of 1947 in respect of the taking over of airfields and weather stations from the U.S. by 1950 were not going to be met, this should be reported to the government.

41. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) noted the Secretaries' report; and

(b) agreed that the circumstances regarding the taking over of Frobisher, Chimo and Mingan, as outlined by Air Vice Marshal James and any changes in plan regarding Indianhouse Lake and Padloping weather stations be reported to the government.

CONTROL AND OPERATION OF REMOTE AIR BASES

1. The duplication of the functions of government departments in the operation of northern or remote air bases, as well as the burden of commitments extraneous to the normally accepted responsibilities of some departments, requires as clear a definition of policy as may be possible, in order to economize in manpower and resources and to maintain a high administrative efficiency.

2. The requirements that make these bases necessary are varied and far reaching, so that a clear division of responsibility in this respect is difficult. The demand arises in one or more of the following sources:

- (a) the defence of Canada;
- (b) the defence of North America;
- (c) civil air transport;
- (d) military air transport;
- (e) domestic and international meteorological information;
- (f) settlement of undeveloped areas;
- (g) the development of natural resources;
- (h) scientific investigation and research.

3. The government departments most directly concerned in these air bases are:

- (a) National Defence;

- (b) Mines and Resources;
- (c) Transport.

4. The bases under consideration may be conveniently grouped as follows:

- (a) the Northwest Staging Route;
- (b) the Yukon and the Northwest Territories excluding the Arctic Islands;
- (c) the Arctic Archipelago;
- (d) the Eastern Arctic.

5. The aerodromes on the Northwest Staging Route are maintained and operated by the R.C.A.F. while the radio aids to navigation, the meteorological services, traffic control and a large part of the signals communication system are operated by the Department of Transport. The civil air traffic amounts to approximately 60 trips a day flown by the U.S.A.F. and the R.C.A.F.

6. The primary importance of this airway and its bases is in the defence of North America and the military line of communication to Alaska. It has, however, a very considerable importance to civil air transport as a vital part of the Northern route to the Orient and also in the development of Northwestern Canada. The Northwest Staging Route links with the whole North American system of airways through Edmonton and it is similar to all those airways in the services and facilities which it provides for aircraft.

7. With the exception of maintaining any strictly military establishment, the Department of Transport might add the aerodromes to its other operations and thereby relieve the R.C.A.F. very considerably in the problem of allocating resources. While increasing the responsibilities of the Department of Transport, it would be a logical extension of that Department's normal functions.

8. In the Yukon and the mainland Territories, the main air bases, excluding the Northwest Staging Route, are controlled and operated by the Department of Transport although there are a number of small aerodromes privately controlled and one or two which are under the authority of other government departments or agencies. The demands for these bases arise principally in the need for air transportation in the development of the area and its resources. There are the defence and other requirements already mentioned but in the majority of cases, they are secondary and generally can be satisfied when the first requirement is met.

9. Past policy has encouraged private enterprise in the construction and maintenance of air bases in this area, occasionally assisted by grants in aid. In other cases, the Department of Mines and Resources have made financial contributions as a part of the policy to assist in the development of natural resources. The results achieved have been reasonably satisfactory and these policies might well be continued.

10. The air bases in the Arctic Archipelago are required to supply and maintain meteorological stations and to some extent air navigation facilities. The weather information obtained is a part of a world wide pattern and is not limited to any specific service whether national or international, civil or military. In this area, there are also requirements to satisfy the needs of scientific investigation and research as well as defence. The demand for the settlement and development in any part of the region is small; for the foreseeable future it will remain small. At some future date, there will possibly be a need for air routes and associated aids over the Polar area but these requirements cannot be anticipated now.

11. Canada should not let her sovereignty over the Arctic Islands suffer by any suggestion of default and she must fulfil her international obligations in that area with regard to scientific investigation and defence. Civil air transport could maintain and supply the bases but the investment in capital equipment would be so large the costs would very probably prove to be prohibitive. The R.C.A.F. with their organization and equipment are the most suited to efficiently operate, maintain and supply these bases. In so doing, the Air Force can show the flag continuously, and, equally important, acquire the Arctic experience and knowledge necessary to defence. The R.C.A.F. are also in a better position to maintain security measures.

12. Coral Harbour, Frobisher, Chimo and Goose are the main bases in the Eastern Arctic. Chimo may soon have increasing importance in the development of the Ungava district and Goose is a vital part of the North Atlantic air route. All these bases were constructed for joint defence purposes under the war emergency. Their defence role still overrides all other considerations. With the exception of Goose, they could be closed immediately without significantly affecting any civil air requirements.

13. As long as Goose continues to play such an important part in joint defence, it should remain under R.C.A.F. control. Coral Harbour, Chimo and Frobisher along with all their facilities might properly be controlled and operated by the R.C.A.F. whether their purpose is defence or backing up more remote Arctic bases.

14. The following general principles in determining a division of responsibility might be applied:

(a) the Air Services Branch of the Department of Transport to maintain and operate all air bases where the public convenience and necessity in air transport is clearly demonstrated unless such bases can be provided by local authorities or private enterprises;

(b) the costs of these bases in the Yukon and the Territories, established essentially for the development of unsettled areas and natural resources, to be borne by the Department of Mines and Resources; the Air Services Branch because of technical knowledge and experience to maintain and operate them;

(c) air bases intended for strictly military purposes to be operated by the R.C.A.F.;

(d) the control of these bases that fill both a military and a civil role to be determined by the overriding requirement for their existence and where this is not clearly evident the control and operation should be decided by the most logical and efficient extension of existing departmental functions;

(e) in the case of remote Arctic bases required for defence and scientific investigation, the R.C.A.F. to be responsible for full control and operation because of the organization, the technical facilities and the resources available to them, as well as their ability to maintain the necessary security measures.

15. In the light of these considerations it is recommended that:

(a) the Department of Transport take over the complete control and operation of the Northwest Staging Route;

(b) the Department of Transport assume the responsibility for control and operation of all Dominion Government air bases in the Yukon and the mainland Territories excluding any strictly military bases;

(c) the R.C.A.F. control and operate all air bases in the Arctic Archipelago;

(d) the R.C.A.F. control and operate all bases and their facilities in the Eastern Arctic including Coral Harbour, Frobisher and Chimo;

(e) the R.C.A.F. continue their present control and operation of Goose and the Department of Transport continue the maintenance and operation of meteorological and radio aid facilities.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 9, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney:

This letter refers to the discussions held in your office yesterday afternoon at which we reviewed recent incidents which appear to indicate a strong and growing United States interest in the northwestern sector of this continent. Participating in and contributing to the discussion in addition to you and myself were Mr. Escott Reid, Mr. C.C. Eberts, Mr. Arthur Menzies of the Department of External Affairs, and Mr. R.K. Odell of Mines and Resources.

In the course of our conversation we reviewed the following developments:

1—The North Pacific Planning Project, initiated in 1942 and completed insofar as the Canadian part of the work was concerned with the publication of "Canada's New Northwest" in 1947.

2—Various United States proposals for the construction of railway and road communications through British Columbia or the Yukon to Alaska, including recent suggestions regarding the year-round maintenance of the Haines Cut-off.

3—The emphatic attitude of Governor Gruening of Alaska, in conversations with me in 1948, in regard to the necessity for joint or co-operative plans for the development of the Northwest (Alaska, Yukon, Mackenzie Valley, Northern British Columbia).

4—Recent reports from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce with reference to proposals being pressed by the United States Chamber for a joint study of north-western development.

5—Proposals made during the last two years by the Aluminum Company of America for the use of Canadian waters in the production of electric power on the United States side of the Alaska-Yukon boundary.

6—Subsequent proposals from the United States Government suggesting the submission to the International Joint Commission of a reference covering the joint development of hydro-electric power along the Alaska-Yukon boundary.

7—A report received from our Embassy in Washington to the effect that the United States Army Engineers were pressing the State Department to arrange for a joint study by the two Governments of the whole problem of boundary waters in the Alaska-Yukon area.

8—Repeated reference to our “common problems” in the Northwest and to the desirability of joint study and development programmes, by United States officials (including J.A. Krug, the then Secretary of the Interior) attending the recent United Nations Scientific Conference at Lake Success.

9—The publication in Washington last week of a report compiled by the Department of the Interior and dealing with the development of “A sub-Arctic empire of 11,000,000 people in the area covered by northern British Columbia, the Yukon and Alaska”. (This is presumably the long delayed United States contribution to the material published in connection with the North Pacific Planning Project referred to in 1 above.)

It was felt that these events indicate a degree of active interest in Government circles in Washington that should not be ignored. While it may peter out in the press of other affairs, there is at least a possibility that it reflects a serious determination to initiate a major programme of northern development. Canada has, proportionately, very much more at stake in the Northwest than has the United States. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that we should keep closely in touch with United States thought and not allow Canada to be caught off guard by a sudden and formidable programme announced in Washington.

I referred to the fact that several United States officials, including Mr. Secretary Krug, had suggested at Lake Success that I should visit the Department of the Interior at Washington to discuss mutual interests with the officers of that Department. I had accepted these suggestions as examples of American courtesy but had made no plans to act on them. In the light of the other events noted above, however, I had come to the conclusion that there might be some value in such a visit. Alternatively, we might ask our Embassy to undertake an exploratory programme in the Department of the Interior.

Following our discussion of these matters it was the unanimous view that it would be useful—as insurance if nothing else—for Mr. Odell (who with Dr. Camsell² was the author of “Canada’s New Northwest”) and me to spend a few days in Washington for the purpose of obtaining whatever information can be gathered about United States intentions in the Northwest. You promised that the Embassy would assist insofar as this might prove practicable.

Subject, therefore, to the approval of my Minister and of the Minister of External Affairs, I propose to proceed to Washington with Mr. Odell some time before Christmas for the purposes herein indicated.

The kind of questions to which we shall endeavour to obtain answers are such as these:

A—Is the United States Government planning or about to start planning any major development programme in Alaska?

B—If so, to what extent and in what ways will this affect the Yukon and British Columbia?

C—Is the Department of the Interior serious in its intention of negotiating an agreement for the development of power on the Alaska-Yukon border as a public project?

D—If so, how does this fit in with the programme of the United States Army Engineers?

E—If not, is the United States Government prepared to assist the Aluminum Company of America to carry out its announced programme?

F—Is there any serious intention of acting on the recommendation of the Department of the Interior's report on the freeing of United States-Canada-Alaska trade from the shackles of the Jones Act?

G—Is the basic idea of the North Pacific Planning Project (the regional development of Alaska-Yukon-Mackenzie Valley-British Columbia, and possibly Washington and Oregon) being revived and, if so, under what auspices?

This list could be extended indefinitely but these indicate the kind of inquiries that we will have in mind.

I shall seek an early opportunity to discuss this matter with my Minister. If he approves the programme thus outlined we shall then arrange to visit Washington at which time you will wish to inform the Embassy of our projected visit and its purpose.

Yours sincerely,

H.L. KEENLEYSIDE

Item No. 1 on Northern Development Committee Agenda for December 19

CONTROL AND OPERATION OF REMOTE AIR BASES

The papers on this item,† which are now partly out-of-date, could be dealt with more realistically after item 4 which reports recent steps to transfer air facilities from the U.S.A.F.

2. The attached D.O.T. and R.C.A.F. papers are of little direct interest to this Department since they are primarily concerned with a debate between these two Canadian agencies as to which of them should operate the following airfields:

- (a) Northwest Staging Route.
- (b) Other fields in the Yukon and Mainland Territories.
- (c) Fields in the Arctic Archipelago excluding the southeastern area.
- (d) Fields in the Eastern Arctic and Labrador.

3. The papers are confusing on the future status of the N.W.S.R. D.O.T. suggests that it take it over from the R.C.A.F. and, while the R.C.A.F. comment on paragraph 7 of the D.O.T. paper suggests that this transfer should not take place "for the present at least", the R.C.A.F. comment on D.O.T.'s paragraph 15(a) seems to indicate that the R.C.A.F. agrees to transfer of the Route to D.O.T.

4. If D.O.T. is to take over the Route, the only point of interest to us is whether the matter should go before the P.J.B.D. before a final decision is made in Ottawa. It will be seen from the R.C.A.F. comment on D.O.T.'s paragraph 7, that the P.J.B.D. went on record some time ago as considering it "distinctly advantageous to have the Route operated by a military agency". If D.O.T. and the R.C.A.F. agree on transfer of the Route to D.O.T., I should think it would be quite sufficient if the R.C.A.F. member, P.J.B.D., merely consulted his opposite number in Washington. (I understand that the recent R.C.A.F. member mentioned the plan to the U.S.A.F. member early in the autumn). The final decision could then be reported to the Board at a subsequent meeting.

5. External only has an interest in the remaining points in the attached papers that relate to airfields at present operated by the U.S.A.F. My note on Item 4 of the agenda shows that the R.C.A.F. will have taken over Frobisher Bay, the one remaining U.S.A.F. airfield in the Northeast, by September 1950, and that it will have taken over from the U.S.A.F., by the summer of 1951, the whole of the airlift to the joint Arctic weather stations. The attached papers indicate that, while D.O.T. favours the R.C.A.F. taking over operation of all the "air bases" at the joint weather stations in the remote Arctic—the only other bases that the U.S.A.F. still operates in Canada—the R.C.A.F. only expresses a clear readiness to take over the main airstrip in this group at Resolute Bay where it put in some buildings last summer (see D.O.T. paras. 10, 11, and 15(c) and R.C.A.F. comments on them).

6. This leaves under debate the future status of the "air bases" at the satellite joint weather stations at Prince Patrick Island, the Isachsen Peninsula, Eureka Sound and such further joint Met[eorological] stations as may be established, (it is planned to set up stations at Alert and Bridport Inlet next summer). I believe D.O.T. uses the term "bases" because landings at the satellite stations are usually on sea, ice or water and only the Eureka station has a short airstrip on land. The U.S.A.F. has been operating the airlift to the satellite stations and has, I think, done some of the work on the Eureka airstrip which was started by the Met. personnel who have also done most of the work of laying out airstrips on the ice at the other satellite stations.

7. While, under the Joint Weather Stations Programme approved by Cabinet, Canada owns any associated airstrips, the U.S. is made responsible for air transportation. I therefore, assume that the debate between D.O.T. and the R.C.A.F. as to which of these Canadian agencies should operate the air bases at the satellite stations has arisen in view of the Government's general policy of Canadianizing Northern activities. The U.S. will, of course, be delighted if a Canadian agency takes on the responsibility of maintaining proper landing facilities at the joint weather stations. There would be security, training and other advantages (see D.O.T. paras. 10 and 11) in the R.C.A.F. rather than D.O.T. operating the very limited landing facilities provided at the joint weather stations. Also, as the R.C.A.F. will be almost the sole user of these facilities after it takes over the airlift in 1951, there would seem to be some logic in its operating the landing facilities. However, a choice between these two Canadian agencies would not seem to be a matter for External.

Dr. Keenleyside paid a visit to Washington a week ago to make some enquiries about United States plans for development in the Pacific Northwest and relations between Canada and the United States in that area. He had talks with Mr. Norman L. Smith, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, Mr. Oscar L. Chapman, Secretary of the Interior, Major-General Lewis A. Pick, Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, Mr. William E. Warne, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and several other officials.

2. Dr. Keenleyside's report on his visit is attached.† The following are some of the highlights of this report:

(a) Press reports about United States plans for Alaskan development, which spoke of a northern "empire of eleven million people" were greatly exaggerated. Moreover, the proposed billion-dollar Alaska Development Corporation has not yet received official approval, much less Congressional endorsement.

(b) There is a strong feeling in the Department of the Interior that the Yukon-Taiya River power project should be undertaken as a public responsibility in order to make power available "to stabilize the economy of the whole area of southern Alaska."

(c) The United States Corps of Engineers has been making a series of useful factual surveys of the river valleys of Alaska. In conjunction with their work on these surveys, the Corps of Engineers has proposed to the Department of the Interior that a basic international study of the boundary waters in the Alaska-Yukon region be undertaken. (Although the United States Embassy had told us of this idea in an informal way, we have as yet had no official request that such a study be initiated.)

(d) United States officials visited were most anxious to see year-round maintenance of the Haines Cut-off Highway. Mr. Warne felt that a highway should also be developed between the Prince Rupert road in the south and the Haines Cut-off in the north.

(e) Mr. Warne is strongly in favour of a modification of the Jones Act to permit United States traffic to be carried through Prince Rupert to Alaska, and believes there is some prospect of this modification being made if it is "persistently pushed".

(f) It is by no means certain that the coal and oil resources of Alaska can be developed on an economic basis.

(g) Mr. Chapman and Major-General Pick are strongly in favour of the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power project and will give it their full support.

3. Dr. Keenleyside concludes that there is no immediate prospect of an all-out campaign for the development of the north. However, there is in Washington an awareness of, and an interest in, Alaska which was not characteristic even of the Department of the Interior before the war or as late as eighteen months ago. There is a speeding-up of Alaskan activities which might easily be translated into a major development campaign. Canada, he suggests, must be prepared to take advantage of every favourable element in Alaskan policy, and will have to adopt a more positive attitude. This would involve abandoning our recalcitrance on the year-round maintenance of the Haines Cut-off, reconsidering our attitude towards the Edmonton-Dawson Creek Highway, and greatly extending our studies of the water resources of the Yukon. He stresses the need for officers of the Departments of External Affairs and Mines and Resources to establish and maintain a close and friendly contact with the interested United States officials.

I. CONTROL AND OPERATION OF REMOTE AIR BASES

1. The Committee had for consideration a memorandum from the Department of Transport (Air Services Branch) suggesting certain principles which might be applied in determining responsibility for the control and operation of remote air bases.

(Secretary's memorandum—Document ND 23)†

This memorandum represented a broad statement of policy which if recommended by the Committee might serve to govern future relationship between the Department of Transport, the R.C.A.F. and other government departments with regard to control and operation of these airfields.

2. During the general discussion which followed, the following points emerged:

(i) the principle outlined in para 14(a) was generally acceptable;

(ii) para 14(b) was acceptable to the Department of Mines and Resources;

(iii) para 14(c) was generally acceptable if amended to read as follows:

“Air bases intended for military purposes, or in which security is an overriding consideration, to be controlled or controlled and operated by the R.C.A.F. (R.C.N. where applicable).”

(iv) para 14(d) was acceptable as a broad statement of policy. However, in the case of the Northwest Staging Route the R.C.A.F. would prefer to discuss with the U.S.A.F. any major change which was proposed;

(v) In para 14(e), the reference was to the airfields in connection with the Joint Arctic Weather Stations. The R.C.A.F. was preparing plans for supplying these stations and until these were completed no firm statement of its policy could be made.

(vi) The air strip at Baker Lake was being closed and in future landings could only be made by aircraft equipped with skis or floats.

3. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) agreed that the principles outlined in para 14 of the Department of Transport's memorandum as amended in the light of the above discussion were acceptable; and

(b) noted that before any major changes were undertaken regarding the operation and control of the Northwest Staging route or Coral Harbour, the R.C.A.F. would consult with the U.S.A.F. in the former and the Department of Transport in the latter case.

III. TRANSPORTATION

(a) Transportation Sub-Committee

9. The Chairman recalled that the Transportation Sub-Committee had been set up to report on transportation requirements in the summer of 1948, and again in 1949, and to review the long-range transportation arrangements in the North. Reports had been submitted on the 1949 requirements and on long-term surface requirements. The more recently formed Air Supply Policy Sub-Committee was reviewing the long-term air requirements. It was now to be decided whether the sub-committee should be continued—with altered terms of reference and, possibly, membership—or disbanded.

10. An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum dated November 30, 1949 Document ND-25)

11. Air Marshal Curtis pointed out that in this period of rapid expansion of government activities in the North, it would seem advisable to keep the Transportation Sub-Committee together. It might be that they could be joined with the Air Supply Policy Sub-Committee to avoid having two committees in the same field.

12. Mr. Baldwin suggested that Trans-Canada Air Lines, in view of the changed policy governing their activities, had little interest in the work of the sub-committee, and might be dropped from membership.

13. Group-Captain [C.L.] Annis said that National Health and Welfare had, through its nursing stations, a fairly large transportation requirement and consideration might be given to including them in the committee.

14. Mr. Robertson pointed out that, when set up, the successor departments to Mines and Resources should presumably be represented.

15. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed—

(a) that the Transportation Sub-Committee should continue in existence to consider and make recommendation on such problems as might from time to time be referred to it; and

(b) that its composition should be altered by the dropping of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the addition of National Health and Welfare and representatives of the successor departments to Mines and Resources.

(b) Commercial Flying and Strategic Interests in the Canadian North

16. The Committee had before them a memorandum to the Cabinet from the Minister of Transport which was subsequently referred to them for consideration and report.

The Air Supply Policy Sub-Committee had commented on the three points of policy raised by Mr. Chevrier.

(Secretary's memorandum dated December 9, 1949—Document ND-28)†

17. Mr. Baldwin informed the Committee that the Air Transport Board lacked an overall directive on Government policy with respect to commercial flying in the North.

18. During the general discussion on the three queries³ raised in Mr. Chevrier's memorandum, the following points emerged:

(i) It was generally agreed that government policy should be deliberately aimed at maintaining the maximum degree of control over air lines of communication and supply in the Canadian north whether for Canadian or U.S. bases.

(ii) Cases of the U.S. Services contracting with U.S. commercial firms for work in Canada were few and the situation could not be considered as serious. It was pointed out that the existing regulations prohibited American commercial operators from undertaking such activities as air photography, etc., in Canada and it was suggested that the regulations should be strictly enforced.

(iii) The R.C.A.F., while anxious to maintain jurisdiction over Department of National Defence air operations, only undertakes flying for other government departments and agencies when they are unable to obtain the services of commercial operators, and balances its own requirements for northern flying with the resources of its Air Transport Command. Thus, the general policy suggested in point (3) is in effect and is implemented from time to time as the occasion arises.

19. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that a memorandum for Cabinet reporting on Mr. Chevrier's memorandum of the 28th of September, 1949, be prepared by the Air Transport Board in consultation with the Department of Transport (Air Services Branch) in the light of the above discussions.

(c) Transportation—Canadian Government Ice-Breakers

20. The Committee had for consideration memoranda from Transport and from the Chief of the Naval Staff concerning the progress made to date on the Canadian government ice-breakers.

(Secretary's memorandum, Document ND-27)†

21. Mr. Lessard stated that the Department of Transport ice-breaker would be completed in 1951.

22. Lieutenant-Commander [W.D.F.] Johnston stated that the R.C.N. ice-breaker would be completed in the summer of 1952.

23. The Committee noted the reports from the R.C.N. and the Department of Transport with regard to the progress being made on construction of these ships.

IV. NORTHEASTERN AIR FIELDS AND WEATHER STATIONS

24. The Committee had for consideration memoranda from the Air Force and Transport outlining the present position and future plans for the Northeastern

³ Lionel Chevrier, le ministre des Transports, posa les questions suivantes:

The queries by the Minister of Transport, Lionel Chevrier, were:

(a) Should government policy be deliberately aimed at maintaining the maximum degree of control over airlines of communication and supply in the Canadian North, whether for Canadian or U.S. posts?

(b) Should the U.S. military services be permitted if possible to utilize Canadian operators rather than give their contract work to U.S. operators?

(c) While the RCAF must obviously maintain a considerable amount of northern flying, would it be in the general interest if some plan could be worked out under which greater use could be made of the private operators?

weather stations and associated air fields. It was proposed that all of the Northeastern weather stations should be taken over from the United States and operated by Transport by the late summer of 1950, with the possible exception of the station at Padloping. The airfields at Chimo and Mingan were to be taken over by the R.C.A.F. in 1949 and reduced to caretaker status. That at Frobisher is to be taken over on September 1, 1950 and will continue to serve as a main staging point between Goose Bay and Resolute Bay until such time as other arrangements are made for the re-supply of the far northern weather stations.

(Secretary's memorandum, dated Nov. 30—Document ND-28)†

25. Air Vice Marshal Cowley raised the question of the likelihood of reopening the bases at Mingan and Chimo once they were closed down.

26. Air Marshal Curtis said that the Air Force was now studying this subject and would consult with Transport on the standard of maintenance required and related topics.

27. Dr. Solandt inquired regarding the future organization at Chimo, pointing out that the ionosphere station had been located at some distance from the airfield, in order to avoid interference with the operation of the radio range. If the air station was to be permanently closed down, it might prove possible to move the ionosphere station to a more accessible location.

28. The Committee, after further discussion—

(a) noted with approval the plans of Transport and the R.C.A.F. for taking over from United States authorities the Northeastern weather stations and associated airfields; and

(b) noted that Transport would consult with the Air Force regarding the maintenance of Chimo and Mingan.

V. PROPOSED ITINERARY; "C.D. HOWE"

29. The Chairman informed the Committee that the "C.D. HOWE", the Department of Transport vessel which was to replace the "NASCOPIE" and carry out the Eastern Arctic patrol would sail on her maiden voyage to the Arctic in the summer of 1950.

The question now arose as to whether or not Resolute Bay should be included in her itinerary.

The Northwest Territories Administration were of the opinion that in the interests of Canadian sovereignty, a token visit to Resolute Bay should be included in the proposed itinerary. Transport, however, considered that this would be impractical in that only a small amount of cargo could be carried which the Americans, as in the past, were prepared to handle. Transport went on to point out that there were serious difficulties which might be encountered in attempting to land this small cargo.

30. Air Marshal Curtis said that it would seem to be preferable to wait until the Transport ice-breaker would be able to accompany the "C.D. HOWE" before attempting to visit Resolute.

31. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that in 1950 no attempt should be made to have the "C.D. HOWE" visit Resolute Bay but that, in view of the national importance of maintaining all evidences and acts of Canadian sovereignty, the question should again be considered as soon as the Transport ice-breaker is available to accompany the "C.D. HOWE".

Ottawa, May 7, 1949⁴U.S. NAVY SEA SUPPLY MISSION TO THE CANADA-U.S. JOINT WEATHER STATIONS IN
THE CANADIAN ARCTIC, SUMMER 1949

1. In accordance with the minutes of the Canada-U.S. technical meeting of Jan. 6, 1949, held in Ottawa to plan the 1949 programme for the Joint Arctic Weather Stations and the related U.S. Navy summer Supply Mission to the Weather Stations, the State Department has now requested approval of this summer's Supply Mission and conveyed the U.S. Navy's invitation to the Canadian Government to send representatives on the Mission.

2. As in the past, authorization for the Supply Mission is being sought by this Department in consultation with the Department of Transport. All Departments will, however, be interested in the information given in memoranda attached to the State Department's letter.† These memoranda, which we have consolidated and amended in the light of other recent messages from the U.S. Navy and the State Department, are quoted below.

3. The code name "Nanook II" has been assigned to the Supply Mission, and the ships participating in it have been designated as "Task Group 86.1". Captain Basil N. Rittenhouse, U.S.N., has been designated Task Group Commander. The ships taking part in the Mission are:

Vessel	Commanding Officer	Complement
		Officers	Men
U.S.S. EDISTO (Icebreaker)	Commander E.H. Maher USN	26	190
U.S.S. WYANDOT (Transport)	Commander T.S. Webb, USN	20	170
U.S.S. LST-533	Lieutenant J.E. Vautrot	8	70

⁴ Transmise aux ministères intéressés le 10 mai 1949.

Circulated to interested departments on May 10, 1949.

4. Following is the text of the memoranda referred to as consolidated and amended:

“(1) The primary purpose of this operation is the resupply of the established Arctic Weather Stations, which are as follows:

(a) At Thule, Greenland.

(b) At Resolute Bay, Cornwallis Island.

(c) At Eureka and North Ellesmere as may be practicable and upon completion of (a) and (b) above.

“(2) The ships will depart from Boston and Davisville, R.I., about 15 July, proceeding to Halifax to load the balance of the Royal Canadian Air Force cargo. After departing Halifax, the WYANDOT and LST-533 will proceed to Thule, Greenland, and, upon arrival, commence unloading operations. The EDISTO will proceed to the various ports in southern Greenland to deliver mail and supplies as requested by Commander Service Force, U.S. Atlantic Fleet. Enroute to Thule she will enter Dundas Harbor, Devon Island, to comply with a request received from the Arctic Institute of North America to land two geologists. When unloading at Thule has been completed, the LST-533 will sail for the United States, and the EDISTO and WYANDOT will proceed to Resolute Bay, Cornwallis Island, to deliver the weather station and Royal Canadian Air Force supplies. After these supplies have been landed, the WYANDOT will sail for the United States and, weather and ice conditions permitting, the EDISTO will endeavor to increase the cache of supplies at Alert, carry supplies to Eureka, and conduct reconnaissance in the area, particularly Radstock Bay on the west coast of Devon Island, for future sites for satellite weather stations. Prior to the EDISTO's departure from the Arctic, the two geologists at Dundas Harbor will be recovered and, if it is practical to do so, the return trip will be made through Fury and Hecla Strait. Because of the large resupply commitments and variable weather and ice conditions which may be encountered, it is not practicable at this time to set forth a hard and fast itinerary of operations.

“(3) Services of two RB-17 aircraft will be furnished by the U.S. Air Force for aerial ice reconnaissance in the general area, and there will be helicopters which will conduct similar flights in the immediate vicinity of the icebreaker. The RB-17 aircraft will operate from the airstrips at Thule and Resolute, while the helicopters will operate from the EDISTO.

“(4) In conducting the operation, every effort will be made to protect all forms of wildlife. Also, the life and customs of the Eskimos will be interfered with as little as possible.

“(5) The secondary purposes of this operation are:

(a) Transporting R.C.A.F. cargo to Resolute Bay. The Royal Canadian Air Force has requested that approximately 2300 tons of supplies and equipment be transported to Resolute Bay. The Navy will undertake this delivery with the understanding that loading, transportation, and unloading of supplies required by the weather stations must be given first priority. It should be presented to the Canadian Government that this acceptance is not to be considered as a commitment upon which to establish a precedent for succeeding years. The Royal Canadian Air Force has requested that part of the cargo be loaded in Halifax, Nova Scotia. For this reason, clearance, if required for the ships to enter to complete the loading, will be arranged by "local notification".

(b) Training personnel, testing ships and materiel in summer Arctic conditions. Personnel training and testing of ships and materials will not involve any military operations. Any firing of the armament will be for test only and will not take place in close proximity to land. It is anticipated that landings will be made at other than the established stations to permit observers to collect information as well as to investigate possible sites for future satellite stations.

(c) Observations of geographical, navigational and aviation interest; recording detailed hydrographical, meteorological and electromagnetic propagation data; and other scientific investigations desired. The nature and scope of the minor hydrographic, meteorologic, and other scientific investigations to be carried out will be similar to and a continuation of last summer's operation, full details of which were included in Task Force 80's report. The names, when known, of the U.S. civilian scientists who are selected to conduct these investigations will be submitted, together with a brief notation of the nature and scope of their intended activities. At the same time, a request will be made for proper licensing and clearance.

"(6) Only one icebreaker is participating in this summer's operation; therefore it will not be possible to extend an invitation to as many Canadian observers as was done last year. The EDISTO will be able to accommodate (7), and the WYANDOT ten (10), a total of seventeen (17) observers.

"(7) Due to the limited scope of this operation, technical and scientific projects will be kept to a minimum. The staff of the Task Group Commander and complement of ships participating will be limited to those required for operational functions and therefore will not be able materially to assist in the collection and compilation of data for special projects. Limited assistance will be provided when practicable, but those planning technical and scientific projects will be required to furnish the personnel necessary to carry them out. Observers (and commands) are requested to submit by 15 May 1949 a list of technical and scientific projects desired to be undertaken, giving the following:

- (a) Character and scope of the project.
- (b) Personnel to be accommodated on board ship or ashore.
- (c) Weight and space requirements for special equipment to be installed on board ship.
- (d) Weight and space requirements of material to be transported to base.
- (e) Priority.

If any Canadian agencies have in mind projects which would require the assistance of the ships or the crews, or part of them, they should submit outlines of their projects as requested above. If individual Canadian scientists on the expedition have in mind projects which will not require anybody's assistance or require the ships to go out of their course, outlines need not be submitted. The date of 15th May is very important in relation to submissions for projects requiring assistance.

“(8) A detailed operation plan and projects folder for this summer’s operation will be prepared and will be promulgated when completed.”

5. With reference to para 4, sub para (6) above, the U.S. Navy has informed the Embassy in Washington that it is just possible that it will be able to accommodate additional Canadian personnel. Lieutenant MacLean, R.C.N., who is at present working in U.S. Navy Headquarters in connection with the planning of the Supply Mission, will not be counted as a Canadian representative and will be considered as accompanying the Supply Mission as a member of the group of U.S. Navy officers.

PLANS FOR THE EXPEDITION OF THE U.S.N. ICEBREAKER U.S.S. “EDISTO” TO CANADIAN ARCTIC WATERS, WINTER 1949

In November, 1948, the U.S. Navy applied, through diplomatic channels, for permission for “Edisto” to carry out certain activities in the Canadian Arctic in the winter of 1949. On December 7, the Chiefs of Staff Committee gave its approval to the plans for this expedition subject to certain conditions since agreed to by the U.S.N. There follows a statement of the plans for the expedition drafted in the light of the U.S.N.’s acceptance of our conditions.

1. During February and March, 1949, “Edisto” will operate, as practicable, along the eastern coasts of Baffin, Bylot and Devon Islands, N.W.T. (and the west and east coasts of Greenland) with the primary purpose of studying ice conditions and the practicability of operations in the area under winter conditions. The State Department lists the following secondary purposes of the expedition:

- (a) to determine the limits of operation by “Arctic”-type vessels;
- (b) to test the unloading of cargo over the ice;
- (c) to train personnel and test equipment and material (the expedition will “not involve military operations in any respect”—i.e. use of munitions, overland tactical exercises, etc.);
- (d) to record ice conditions;
- (e) to observe geographical, navigational and aviation conditions (there will be no aircraft operations other than helicopter reconnaissance from “Edisto”);

(f) to record hydrographic, meteorological and electromagnetic propagation data;

(g) to conduct such other scientific investigations and services as may be desired by other Government agencies.

2. The detailed Operation Plan and Projects Folder for the expedition will be supplied through the State Department when completed so that the Canadian authorities concerned may have advance information on the scientific and other investigations planned by the U.S. agencies—which will be similar to those carried out on the recent U.S.N. summer supply missions to the joint Arctic weather stations.

3. Requests for N.W.T. licenses, with appropriate information, will be forwarded to Ottawa if any U.S. civilian scientists are to accompany “Edisto”.

4. If any landings are made, there is to be no taking of game or interference with the Eskimos.

5. Copies of the expedition’s report will, as usual, be made available to the Canadian Government.

6. The U.S.N. has agreed to accommodate on “Edisto” one Canadian representative from each of the following:

1. R.C.N. (to be selected)
2. R.C.A.F. (to be selected)

3. Mines and Resources (Geographical Bureau)—Mr. W.A. Black already selected.

4. Transport (Marine)—Capt. F.A. Germain, Master of the D.O.T. tender, “Lady Laurier”, already selected.

7. We understand that “Edisto” will sail early in February. Washington has been asked for the latest information regarding the place and date of the sailing and it will be passed on to the interested Departments as soon as it is received.

8. We assume that the Canadians participating in the expedition will have with them all necessary Arctic clothing on joining the ship.

9. The following action has still to be taken in Ottawa:

1. Final approval of the expedition by Cabinet Defence Committee or the Ministers of National Defence and External Affairs (the Department of Mines and Resources having already given its approval) and communication of that approval to Washington by External. Approval by the Ministers is being arranged by External with the Secretary, Cabinet Defence Committee.

2. Approval of a brief press statement regarding the expedition for simultaneous release in Ottawa and Washington. In accordance with the joint defence publicity directive, External will take up with National Defence Public Relations the attached draft release† and also obtain approval by the U.S. authorities. Since several Canadian agencies are involved in the expedition, and so that the military character of the operation may be minimized, the joint release should, perhaps, be issued by External and the State Department.

3. Selection, from among the 4 Canadians, of a "group leader" who can deal with the "Edisto's" senior officers on behalf of the Canadian party—selection to be accomplished by consultation between the 3 Departments sending representatives on the ship.

4. Communication to External by the R.C.N. and the R.C.A.F. of the names of the representatives they have selected for the expedition and assurances regarding their security standing.

5. Communication to External by Mines and Resources and D.O.T. of assurances regarding the security standing of their representatives.

6. Communication to External by Mines and Resources, D.O.T., the R.C.N. and the R.C.A.F. of information as to the types of activities, if any, that their representatives will want to carry out, if permitted to go ashore in Greenland—so that the matter may be cleared with the Danish Legation. It is assumed that the R.C.N., R.C.A.F. and D.O.T. representatives would not be interested in carrying out scientific work at places visited in Greenland, although, possibly, the geographer would want to collect geographical and other scientific data. Washington has been asked by External to indicate whether the U.S. authorities are arranging with Denmark for their personnel to go ashore or carry out any activities ashore (a) at ports, towns or communities and (b) at uninhabited points on the Greenland coast. If authorization is not being sought for U.S. personnel, we presumably cannot risk embarrassing the U.S. by approaching the Danes on behalf of our own group.

10. It will be desirable to give Washington the names of the Canadian participants and to indicate the name of the leader of the Canadian party by the end of this week and it will, of course, help our position in connection with similar expeditions in the future if no changes of personnel are made before "Edisto" sails. We should be in a position to give Washington assurances regarding the security standing of the Canadian party by January 25 at the latest.

PROPOSED WINTER ARCTIC EXPEDITION OF U.S.S. "EDISTO"

1. Early this week it was reported from Washington that the U.S. authorities had accepted the conditions under which Chiefs of Staff Committee had given its approval to the U.S. Navy's plans for sending its icebreaker, "Edisto", to the Eastern Canadian Arctic (and the west and east coasts of Greenland) this winter. "Edisto's" mission is to carry out various scientific activities as part of an investigation of winter operating conditions in the north. She is due to sail in the first week of February⁵ and to carry 4 Canadian Service and civilian representatives. The plans and conditions for the trip are outlined briefly in paras. 1 to 7 of the attached memorandum of January 11.

2. On January 13, on behalf of the Government, Mr. Claxton, in his temporary dual capacity, gave final approval to the expedition's plans. When the Embassy in Washington was about to transmit this approval to the State Department, the latter suddenly indicated that the U.S. Navy was planning to take on the trip photographers from the "National Geographic" and "Life" and Mr. Thomas Henry of the Washington "Evening Star" and that, therefore, stories and pictures would doubtless appear when the ship returns.

3. When the Embassy pointed out that this changed the whole complexion of the project, the State Department replied by letter that the 3 newsmen will only join the ship after it has left the Canadian Arctic (presumably at Thule, Greenland); that, in the circumstances, it does not consider that the joint defence publicity directives are applicable to their participation; and that the Commander of "Edisto" will clear for publication all copy and photographs prepared by the journalists on the non-Canadian portion of the expedition.

4. The Embassy has commented that, on joining the ship, the journalists will inevitably obtain information about the Canadian portion of the trip and is, therefore, withholding final approval of the expedition until its new aspects have been considered here.

5. As only a short time remains to work out with the U.S. authorities certain details of Canadian participation, the new situation was taken up yesterday afternoon with Mr. Claxton's Private Secretary who later reported that Mr. Claxton wanted further time to consider the matter and that he had suggested that you might be willing to telephone him in Montreal on Monday about it.

6. The publicity directives call for inter-governmental consultation before arrangements are made with journalists for them to go into the north and as, after they join the ship, the three men in question will undoubtedly obtain and wish to publish material about the Canadian portion of the expedition, it would seem that the U.S. Navy has adopted a narrow interpretation of the directives in agreeing to take the men without prior consultation with Ottawa. At the same time, if it were not for the well-known efforts at publicity of U.S. Government agencies, one would wonder why a Service expedition collecting data for confidential use would take along newsmen. In this connection, under existing arrangements, Canadian and U.S. civilian scientists on the similar summer expeditions to the Canadian Arctic are cleared up to "SECRET".

7. The only way to make quite sure that there would be no leakages about the Canadian portion of the winter expedition would presumably be to simply refuse final approval of that portion. While such a solution should make quite clear to the U.S. authorities the importance that we attach to publicity matters, it might, of course, invite the criticism that we are jeopardizing defence preparations by preventing Arctic research. There is also the difficulty that after Chiefs considered the proposals for the expedition it was made fairly clear to the U.S. authorities that final approval would be forthcoming if they complied with certain conditions that they have now accepted.

on January 24

8. If we were to adopt the alternative of approving the expedition provided the journalists were not taken on in Greenland, they might well stir up trouble for us in the press and, technically, it would be awkward to suggest that a U.S. ship cannot take on journalists in a foreign port.

9. The best of various unsatisfactory alternatives might be to give final approval to the expedition subject to the following conditions:

(a) the U.S. journalists will not be taken aboard until the "Edisto" has left the Canadian Arctic;

(b) any stories and photographs that the journalists may wish to publish will not refer to the Canadian portion of the voyage unless they are cleared by the Canadian Government;

(c) any material regarding the Canadian portion of the expedition that the U.S. authorities may desire to release prior to the "Edisto's" departure for the north or subsequently will not be given out without the approval of both Governments.

At the same time it could be pointed out to the State Department that, in a case of this kind, it is obviously important to consult us before any understandings are reached with newsmen.

10. We had prepared the attached brief press announcement[†] for release by External and the State Department after approval by both Governments. It has now been approved by all concerned in National Defence except Mr. Claxton, whose office it has just reached. In raising the question of journalists, the State Department indicated that a release is not contemplated in Washington, but unless something is put out before the sailing, I expect that we will be faced with numerous enquiries from about that time.

11. If, therefore, you telephone Mr. Claxton (who will be at the Windsor Hotel until Tuesday evening) and you decide that approval should be given to the mission, perhaps you would also discuss with him the draft release so that we can transmit it to Washington without delay.⁶

WINTER ARCTIC CRUISE OF THE U.S.S. "EDISTO"

Attached are copies of Note No. 307 of December 19, from the United States Embassy,† requesting permission for the U.S. Navy icebreaker, U.S.S. "Edisto", to enter Canadian waters in Hudson Strait, Davis Strait and Baffin Bay in the course of a winter cruise in the Arctic regions for the purpose of developing naval information on northern conditions and the practicability of winter operations in the Arctic regions.

It will be noted that "Edisto" is due to sail from a United States port on January 18, 1950.

We are informed that the ship will also sail to Denmark Strait (between Greenland and Iceland) and gather that this training cruise will be similar to the one made last winter when "Edisto" sailed to Davis Strait, Baffin Island (without managing to enter Canadian waters in the Strait or the Bay), the East and West coasts of Greenland and Iceland. In this connection, please see the letter of November 15, 1948, from Mr. Snow of the State Department to Mr. Magann of the Embassy in Washington and subsequent correspondence on your file CSC 5-1-7.†

"Edisto"'s 1949 cruise was approved by the Canadian Government, insofar as Canadian Arctic waters were concerned, on the understanding that:

(1) as usual in the case of a U.S. Service project in Canada, the U.S. Navy would invite representatives of Canadian Departments to participate. (A total of four representatives from the R.C.N., R.C.A.F., Mines and Resources and Transport accompanied the ship);

(2) copies of all reports resulting from the expedition's activities in the Canadian Arctic would be made available to the Canadian Government;

(3) if landings in the Canadian Arctic were effected, there would be no taking of game or disturbance of the Eskimos;

(4) the U.S. Navy would provide in advance of the expedition half a dozen copies of its Operation Plan and its Projects Folder for the voyage (or similar material), so that the competent Canadian authorities would have details of the activities likely to be carried out in the Canadian Arctic;

(5) the U.S. Navy would apply for N.W.T. licenses for any scientists accompanying the ship to the Canadian Arctic who were not regular members of the U.S. Armed Forces—the applications to indicate the names and addresses of those concerned, the nature and scope of the work they desired to carry out in the Canadian Arctic and the scientific organizations that they would be representing on the cruise. Under the recent Security Panel Recommendations, regarding security on Arctic matters, such applications would now presumably have to be accompanied by assurances from the U.S. authorities that their observers had been cleared.

As last winter Washington informed us at the last minute that the U.S. Navy had arranged to take journalists on the cruise, it would seem advisable to inform the U.S. authorities that publicity on the Canadian portion of the cruise and on any Canadian participation in it should be subject to the publicity directives on Canada-U.S. defence activities and that it is assumed that Ottawa will be consulted in advance if the U.S. Navy has any thought of inviting press representatives.

As the U.S. Navy is anxious to complete arrangements for the cruise at the earliest possible opportunity, I should appreciate it if you would let me know at your earliest convenience whether the Chiefs of Staff and the Minister of National Defence have any objection to "Edisto" entering the Canadian Arctic waters mentioned—if practicable—in the course of its Arctic cruise and, if not, whether they wish to attach any conditions to such entry.⁷ On the basis of last winter's experience, I suppose it is debatable whether Canada could properly insist on sending observers when it is by no means certain that ice conditions will permit "Edisto" to enter Canadian waters in the areas mentioned by the U.S. Embassy.

Should the cruise be approved and it is decided to ask that representatives of Canadian Departments be taken on it, there will, of course, be very little time to settle the questions that will arise in connection with the Canadian party and it will be very difficult to settle them rapidly if they are not handled through Service channels. I would, therefore, suggest, provided you are agreeable, that approval of the cruise, and any conditions attached to such approval, be communicated to the State Department and that all remaining matters—apart from publicity—be co-ordinated in your office and, insofar as contact with the U.S. Navy is concerned, dealt with through Service channels. In view of this suggestion, I am attaching a copy of a memorandum of today's date† outlining, on the basis of last winter's experience, the action that will have to be taken if the State Department is informed that it is desired to send Canadian representatives on the cruise.

Copies of this letter and its enclosures are being sent to the Deputy Ministers of Mines and Resources and Transport with the request that they be good enough to send to you any comments or suggestions that they might wish to make with regard to the 1950 cruise. I am also sending copies of this correspondence to the Commissioner, R.C.M.P., for his information.

Dear Mr. Magann,

With reference to WA-549 of today's date† I am enclosing, for your information, two copies of the Minutes of the recent annual Canadian-United States meeting on the joint Arctic weather stations.† Sufficient copies have already been given to the U.S. Embassy to meet the needs of the various Departments concerned in Washington.

It will be seen that it was found possible at the meeting to incorporate in the plans for 1949 several of the useful suggestions made by your office last autumn. As all of the points made to the U.S. officials inside and outside the meeting are not included in the Minutes, I shall send you within the next few days an outline of the various steps taken in connection with your suggestions.

As you will see, it was agreed that the Prince Patrick, Isachsen and Eureka stations would be resupplied by air this spring and that the station at the northern end of Ellesmere Island—which the Geographical Board has already named "Alert"—would also be established by air in the course of the spring airlift. Further, it was agreed that the supply operations of the 1949 Sea Supply Mission would be directed to the Resolute, Eureka and Alert stations. While, prior to the meeting, the two weather services had tentative plans for establishing a station on Melville Island in 1949, it was decided that nothing would be done about this project for a year of two as the U.S. Weather Bureau found that it would not be in a position to finance its share of a station at Melville Island for the present.

In these circumstances, as Eberts said to Rogers this afternoon, it looks from here as though what the U.S. authorities have in mind—besides wanting the assistance of a Canadian icebreaker in the establishment of Alert this summer—is that the U.S.A.F. will carry out the resupply of Prince Patrick, Isachsen and Eureka this spring, as planned, although aircraft will not be available to handle the much larger tonnages required to establish Alert this spring.

The State Department's reference to a "commitment" with respect to Melville Island may possibly mean that, on some occasion since the recent annual meeting, the U.S.W.B. told the Meteorological Division in Toronto that it had found funds for the establishment of a station on Melville Island in 1949. For the present at least those concerned in the Department of Transport here have no knowledge of any commitment with respect to Melville for 1949 and assume that the State Department's reference to "abandoning" the Melville project means only that they wish to postpone establishment of a station in the general area of Melville Island for the time being.

I understand that Rogers is endeavouring to find out whether our assumptions, as outlined in the two immediately preceding paragraphs, are accurate.

Yours sincerely,

G.G. CREAN

[Ottawa], March 7, 1949

Attached is a copy of teletype WA-569 of March 3 from Washington† suggesting the immediate change, if possible, of the name "Alert" which has been given to the site on the north coast of Ellesmere Island where equipment for a joint weather station was landed last summer and the establishment of the station is to be completed by icebreaker this year.

2. This name has been chosen by the Geographic Board—a body that has full power in the selection of place names—as a result of a recommendation from the Interdepartmental Meteorological Committee, agreed upon at that Committee's meeting in December.

3. The matter is a little involved. At the December meeting mentioned, the Transport representatives explained that they were suggesting the name "Alert" to the Met. Committee because it was that of the flagship of Admiral Sir George Nares, R.N., which, in 1875, penetrated to a point very near to the present site for the weather station. Incidentally, as there was considerable U.S. exploration of the northern part of Ellesmere after Nares' voyage, our claim to the area is based principally on his expedition in which he surveyed most of the north coast of Ellesmere on foot.

4. No ship had ever sailed as far north as HMS "Alert" until last summer when two U.S. icebreakers reached the weather station site which is 4–5 miles further north than the point reached by Nares' ship. Apparently the U.S. authorities suggested the name to Transport as a gesture as they knew that there had been some annoyance over suggestions from a Canadian member of the 1948 expedition that the station site and a nearby point be named after two U.S. leaders of the supply mission.

5. The External representatives at the December meeting of the Met. Committee made the point that is now raised by the Embassy. The Committee, however, did not feel it was an important one since those particularly interested in the north would understand the historical significance of the name which would, in any case, be explained in a release to be given out this year when the station is put into operation. Also a release had been issued in the autumn that drew attention to HMS "Alert"'s voyage. In these circumstances and, especially, as it was suggested that it might be just as well, at a time when there are U.S. activities in the area, to choose a name that would serve to emphasize that Americans were not the first to explore northern Ellesmere, the criticism of the name was not pressed.

6. I agree that the name is far from ideal and we could probably arrange without too much difficulty for the Met. Committee to make a new recommendation to the Geographic Board. On the other hand, as the matter has now gone so far, there is some merit in the idea of having a name that will serve as a reminder to the U.S. Navy, and it is difficult to feel that the U.S.S.R. could seriously feel provoked, I would not see any strong objection to the name being retained provided the press release on next summer's sea supply mission explains the origin of the name in referring to the plans for completing the establishment of the new station.

7. I should appreciate your letting me know whether you share this view.⁸

ANNUAL U.S. NAVY SEA SUPPLY MISSION TO THE JOINT ARCTIC WEATHER STATIONS

1. You will recall that in January 1947, Cabinet approved a programme of nine joint stations; that at the beginning of each year the Canadian and U.S. officials concerned have met in Ottawa to plan the details of the annual programmes, which always include a U.S. Navy summer Supply Mission; and that each spring my predecessor has reported to Cabinet Defence Committee on the plans for the year, submitting at the same time the State Department's request for authorization of the annual Sea Mission.

2. The 1949 programme, together with the proposals that have now been received from the State Department for the 1949 Supply Mission, are dealt with below. As the Supply Mission has become a normal feature of the annual programmes (pending availability of Canadian icebreakers) and as there may be some difficulty in calling a meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee at the present time, it occurs to me that you may be agreeable to approving this summer's Mission now and possibly reporting on the matter at a later date to Cabinet Defence Committee. This would, incidentally, be helpful as the State Department has asked us to let it have, before May 14, for planning purposes, the names and projects of the Canadians who will be accompanying the Mission. It might be awkward to do this without indicating that the Mission has been authorized.

⁸ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

3. Owing to U.S.A.F. commitments in Europe⁹ and recent damage to a U.S. icebreaker,¹⁰ the 1949 programme for the stations involves principally the consolidation of the stations already established at: Resolute Bay (Cornwallis Island), Eureka Sound (Ellesmere Island), Deer Bay (Ellef Ringnes Island), Mould Bay (Prince Patrick Island), and the laying down of further supplies at Alert (Northern Ellesmere Island) where it is hoped to establish a station in 1950.

4. This year's spring air lift to the stations that are inaccessible by water has already been completed by the U.S.A.F. I attach the details of the U.S. proposals for this summer's Supply Mission which are similar to, although of narrower scope than, those of previous years. While there will only be one icebreaker this year, the U.S. Navy has invited Canada to send seven representatives on the icebreaker and ten on the transport (and is expected to offer additional space), and there will be no accommodation problem as Ottawa only plans to send ten representatives—including two R.C.N. and three R.C.A.F. officers. In addition to transporting both countries' annual stock of supplies to the weather stations, the ships will carry some 2,300 tons for the R.C.A.F. and cosmic ray equipment for N.R.C. to Resolute Bay.

5. The U.S. Navy has, of course, undertaken to furnish copies of all data that it collects during the voyage and has assured us that it will take special pains to ensure that no publicity will be given to the Mission beyond what may be agreed upon by the two Governments. I should appreciate your letting me know whether, provided I find that Mr. Pearson is also agreeable on his return tomorrow, you are agreeable to our informing the State Department that the proposals for the Mission are approved subject to the understandings that I have outlined.¹¹

NEWFOUNDLAND BASES

I attach a memorandum concerning the United States Bases in Newfoundland for your guidance when you discuss this matter with President Truman on the occasion of your visit to Washington.¹²

It would, I feel, be desirable to stress in your discussions that in the view of the Canadian Government the defence of Newfoundland is vital to Canada and the United States and that Bases are required there to guard the North Atlantic sea and air approaches. The Canadian Services are not sufficiently large to man the required Bases in Newfoundland and at the same time to carry out other existing defence responsibilities; nor are present funds adequate for the maintenance and development of these defence projects. As these Bases are of strategic importance, it is highly desirable that United States Forces continue to maintain them for the present.

The Department of Justice has recently expressed the opinion that existing Newfoundland legislation implementing the Bases Agreement—which legislation, by the Terms of Union, will continue in effect until amended or repealed by competent authority—is sufficient to cover the situation after Union without any need for additional Canadian legislation.

As enabling legislation to maintain in force the terms of the Bases Agreement is unnecessary, it may be that there will be little discussion in the House, at least during the debate on Union. On the other hand, when it is realized that Term 18 of the Terms of Union not only provides for the continuance in force of domestic Newfoundland laws but also for the terms of the Bases Agreement, it is more than likely that discussion will take place in the House, particularly with respect to the more repugnant extraterritorial clauses. When Mr. Wrong recently informed the State Department that enabling legislation might be required, Mr. Hickerson expressed alarm at the possibility of detailed debate in the House. It would, I think, be safe to assume that President Truman too will be greatly exercised at the prospect of a detailed and possibly acrimonious discussion on the Bases Agreement in the House of Commons, and for this reason alone he might be impressed with the desirability of the United States waiving their extraterritorial rights under the Bases Agreement.

Mr. Wrong has suggested in his teletype WA 336 of February 9 (a copy of which is attached for your convenience)† that the following points might arise in your discussions in Washington:

(a) Possible readiness of the United States to evacuate Fort Pepperell and cancel the lease, in return for some concession by us;

(b) The method of continuing the negotiations from this point, such as at a conference for the review of the 1941 Agreement convened under Article 28; and

(c) The nature and extent of the privileges which we are prepared to accord to United States forces in the leased areas on the same basis as elsewhere in Canada.

With respect to (a), I feel we might be willing to consider any United States proposals to evacuate Fort Pepperrell and cancel the lease. I do not feel, however, that this point is immediately relevant to the problem at hand which is to seek on political grounds, for a unilateral relinquishment by the United States of their present extraterritorial rights at the bases in Newfoundland. While it is true that a quid pro quo may have to be offered to the United States, I feel that any alternative solution should be advanced in detail by the United States.

With respect to (b), Article 28 of the Bases Agreement provides for modification of the Agreement in the light of experience after it has been in force for a reasonable length of time. Should this question arise, the President might be informed that we may be willing to negotiate a modification of the Agreement under Article 28 at some later date but that for political reasons and because such negotiations would not resolve the problem for some length of time, we consider it highly desirable that the United States agree to unilaterally relinquish their extraterritorial rights before a conference for the review of the 1941 Agreement was convened.

With respect to (c), we would be prepared to grant the United States forces in Newfoundland all the rights and privileges that they now enjoy there with the exception of those extraterritorial rights set out in the attached memorandum.

While I feel the United States Government would be most reluctant to agree to any reduction in the length of the terms of the Bases Agreement, you may consider it desirable to mention to the President that we may in the future wish to raise this point.

Note du ministère des Affaires extérieures

[Ottawa], February 9, 1949

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING U.S. BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

The United States Government, by an agreement made in 1941 with the United Kingdom, obtained on a 99-year lease the following three bases in Newfoundland:

Fort Pepperrell—an army garrison base adjacent to St. John's, G.H.Q. for the northwestern Atlantic region;

Argentia—a naval and naval air base on the west side of the Avalon peninsula; and Harmon (or Stephenville)—an air base on the west coast.

It would appear that although ultimate sovereignty over the base areas leased to the United States would pass to Canada, the union of Canada and Newfoundland would not per se under international law legally impair United States rights and privileges granted by the Bases Agreement of 1941. The terms of the Bases Agreement give to the United States, in addition to what might be described as normal military rights, certain extra-territorial or non-military rights which, if continued after union, might prove extremely embarrassing to both Governments and would prejudice present joint defence arrangements.

In accordance with a Cabinet decision of November 3, the Canadian Ambassador to the United States on November 19 presented a note to the State Department requesting urgent consideration of the Bases Agreement with respect to Newfoundland. The note stressed that while Canada had no desire to restrict the effective use by the United States of the leased areas for military purposes, it was felt that the broad extra-territorial rights presently exercised by the United States in Newfoundland would not be in harmony with existing United States defence rights in respect of joint United States-Canada defence projects in Canadian territory, and might well be objected to by the Canadian public. No formal reply to this note has been received from the State Department.

State Department representatives were informed orally by Mr. Wrong that in the opinion of the Canadian Government, when Newfoundland joins Canada, the United States should relinquish the following extra-territorial rights exercised by United States forces in Newfoundland, none of which are essential for the military operation of the Bases:

(a) the right of United States civil and criminal jurisdiction within the base areas over United States service personnel and United States nationals, and criminal jurisdiction over foreign nationals and British subjects (Article IV); except as provided for by the Canadian Act governing the discipline of United States forces in Canada;

(b) customs free privileges for goods consigned to service personnel and to employed nationals, and for goods consigned to United States institutions (e.g. the Post Exchange) for sale to service personnel or employed nationals and their dependents (Article XIV);

(c) the right to establish United States postal facilities in the base areas (Article XVI);

(d) the right to operate outside the base areas in the event of war or other emergency (troops and service personnel operating or established outside the base areas by agreement with the territorial authorities enjoy the same privileges as those in the base areas) (Article XIX);

(e) exemption from taxation (Article XVII) other than any such exemption now in effect in respect of the present defence cooperation projects in Canada.

Mr. Wrong stated that, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, the complete change in the political status of Newfoundland justifies a modification of the 1941 Agreement in order to bring it more closely into accord with the existing joint defence arrangements between the two countries in so far as this is compatible with Canadian recognition of the continuing rights of the United States to occupy the leased areas for defence purposes. He pointed out that the United States Government has at present no long term or automatic rights at any defence site in Canada, nor does it enjoy any extraterritorial rights except for purposes of discipline as defined by the Visiting Forces Act. Moreover, the Joint Statement issued by Prime Minister King and President Truman on February 12, 1947, which sets forth the principles that govern Canadian post-war defence relationships with the United States, calls for cooperative arrangements to be "without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory."

While officials of the United States' State Department were in the main sympathetic, they felt that the Canadian request did not include the elements of a bargain which they could justify to the National Military Establishment, Congress, and the public. In this respect, it could be pointed out that a decision by the United States to give up some of its tangible rights in the leased areas, in return for the intangible benefits of harmonious mutual cooperation would not be out of line with United States foreign policy. The United States Government has already recognized under the European Recovery Programme and under the negotiations for the North Atlantic Pact that benefits which are less tangible are not always less important. It may be assumed that a decision by the United States to relinquish its present extraterritorial rights in Newfoundland would be a forceful demonstration to foreign countries in which military bases may in the future be sought by the United States of its desire to respect the sovereignty and independence of those countries. On the other hand, reference to special arrangements existing between Canada and the United States would enable the United States, if it so desired, to answer satisfactorily any requests from other countries for similar modification of the status of other areas leased to the United States at present or in the future.

It has been suggested by United States officials that an entirely new agreement, under which the more objectionable sections of the 1941 Agreement would presumably be eliminated, might be negotiated. Such a procedure, it is felt, would not solve the immediate problem. The United States would presumably request in return for a renunciation of extraterritorial and non-military rights under a new agreement some definite quid pro quo such as continuing defence rights at some other point in Canada. While the defence rights enjoyed by the United States in Newfoundland might be accepted in Canada as one of the obligations which we were obliged to assume as a result of Newfoundland's decision to join Canada, an agreement, informal or otherwise, to which Canada was a party and which gave to the United States permanent or continuing rights in Canada would probably be most unacceptable to the Canadian public.

It may be that both quasi-legal arguments based on the Joint Statement and the important political arguments will convince the United States Government of the expediency and, indeed, necessity of relinquishing its extraterritorial and non-military rights without securing some definite quid pro quo in return. There is evidence that the United States authorities desire to install additional facilities at Goose Bay and that, while the R.C.A.F. will be taking over the airfields at Mingan, Chimo (P.Q.) and Frobisher Bay (N.W.T.), the U.S.A.F. will still wish to make use of these fields and possibly put in additional facilities. While it might be undesirable to suggest that we would be unable to cooperate in supplying these particular additional facilities, it might be useful to point out that continued cooperation in projects of this kind might be seriously prejudiced if the United States is not prepared to relinquish their extraterritorial rights in the Newfoundland Bases.

RE: NEWFOUNDLAND BASES; REPRESENTATION TO U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT

In reporting yesterday to the Cabinet¹³ on his conversations with President Truman and the U.S. Secretary of State, the Prime Minister indicated that the President's attitude toward our desire to have some modifications made in the status of the U.S. bases in Newfoundland was most cooperative. Mr. Truman had indicated that while he anticipated resistance from the U.S. Services, he himself and the State Department were agreed that the U.S. government should do everything possible to meet our desires. Mr. Truman had requested a statement of what modifications the Canadian government would desire in the present situation.

Mr. St. Laurent said that this matter should be followed up first verbally with the U.S. Ambassador here, and then through the State Department channel. (Care will have to be taken not to get our lines crossed—the reason for bringing Steinhardt in is that he travelled back to Ottawa with the Prime Minister and was present in Washington for at least some of the discussions there.)

It was agreed yesterday that a memorandum of our desiderata should be prepared jointly by External Affairs and National Defence [for] consideration in the first instance by Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton (and possibly subsequent clearance with the Cabinet—this might not be necessary as the Cabinet's attitude is pretty well known.) I undertook to see that the two departments cooperated in the production of a draft for the two Ministers.

I would be grateful if you would set this work on foot at once. I think you will find that the material has already been brought together in an External Affairs

In the opinion of the Canadian Government the prospective change in the status of Newfoundland justifies a modification of the 1941 Bases Agreement in respect of the Newfoundland Bases in order to bring that agreement into accord with the principles which, for many years, have governed the defence relations between Canada and the United States.

Thus the joint statement issued by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States on February 12, 1947, refers to the "underlying principle" that "all cooperative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory," and the recommendation of November 20, 1946, of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, which has been accepted by both governments, states that defence co-operation projects in either country should be agreed to by both governments, should confer no permanent rights or status upon either country, and should be without prejudice to the sovereignty of either country.

Therefore, when Newfoundland joins Canada, the Canadian Government desires that the United States should relinquish the following extra-territorial rights exercised by United States forces in Newfoundland, these rights not being essential for the military operation of the bases:

(a) the right of United States civil and criminal jurisdiction within the base areas over United States service personnel and United States nationals, and criminal jurisdiction over foreign nationals and British subjects (see Article IV), except as provided for by the Canadian Act governing the discipline of United States forces in Canada which was enacted at the request of the United States authorities;

(b) customs free privileges (other than those now allowed) for goods consigned to service personnel and to employed nationals, and for goods consigned to United States institutions (e.g., the Post Exchange) for sale to service personnel or employed nationals and their dependents (see Article XIV);

This message was handed to the U.S. Ambassador by Claxton and Pearson on March 17, 1949. The date on the document refers to its circulation in Ottawa.

(c) the right to establish United States postal facilities in the base areas (see Article XVI);

(d) exemption from taxation (see Article XVII) other than any such exemption now in effect in respect of the present defence cooperation projects in Canada.

UNITED STATES BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

I attach, for your information, a memorandum prepared by General McNaughton on the conversation which he had with Major-General Guy V. Henry, Acting Chairman, U.S. Section of the P.J.B.D., on Wednesday, June 22, 1949, during the course of the meeting of the P.J.B.D. in Edmonton.†

You will note from the attached memorandum that in the personal view of General Henry, the United States military authorities would be prepared to relinquish in peacetime most of their present rights to civil and criminal jurisdiction at the base areas. They would, however, demand a firm assurance from Canada that at the outbreak of war, the U.S. Services would have the same privileges as were given under the Visiting Forces Act. According to General Henry, the U.S. Services appear to be unwilling to relinquish their present customs privileges and exemptions from taxation on the grounds that the effect would be an increase in the cost of living of the U.S. personnel stationed in the base areas. General Henry seemed to feel that the problem of U.S. postal facilities in the base areas could be solved in some mutually satisfactory manner.

I am at present preparing, for submission on an informal basis to Mr. Steinhardt, a comprehensive memorandum outlining just what the modifications we have suggested would involve for the U.S. Services. The presentation of this memorandum has been delayed as it has been necessary to consult other Canadian Government Departments with respect to detail. I hope that shortly after this memorandum has been handed to Mr. Steinhardt, it will be possible to resume discussions with United States officials.

While I think it unlikely that the United States will grant in full all of the requests which we have made for a modification of the existing agreement, I think it would be desirable to continue to press our desiderata and leave it to United States authorities to suggest possible alternatives.¹⁵

1. I wonder if we should not reconsider policy with respect to United States bases in Newfoundland before further negotiations on the Bases Agreement are undertaken—I understand that Mr. Claxton expects to discuss the matter with Mr. Johnson, the United States Secretary for Defence, in Washington early in August.

2. Heretofore we have undertaken the line that the Bases Agreement ought to be revised to bring United States rights into line with those enjoyed by the United States elsewhere in Canada. We are obviously on a poor “wicket” in this respect, since the United States rights in Newfoundland rest on a definite treaty, which can scarcely be held to have been modified by union except that Canada becomes a Principal in place of the United Kingdom. There has been no indication so far that the United States is prepared to make any substantial revision of the Bases Agreement or to forego any rights they consider worthwhile.

3. Mr. Wrong's opinion when the issue was first raised was that the United States was not entirely satisfied with the location of its present bases and especially with Fort Pepperrell, which is purely a garrison base and has no air facilities of its own and only minor naval wharfage facilities for the purpose of supply.

4. From our standpoint the location of Fort Pepperrell is particularly objectionable, since it is adjacent to the City of St. John's and since communications with other bases must be over Newfoundland territory—about 80 miles by road or rail and about 60 miles by air with Agentia, and about 300 miles by rail or about 225 miles by air with Harmon. Fort Pepperrell is the headquarters for the United States North-West Atlantic Command and as such entails the constant use of Torbay by United States military authorities. (Last summer U.S. landings at Torbay were reported as about 125 to 150 per month.)

5. Mr. Wrong thought that the United States might be prepared to give up Fort Pepperrell in exchange for something else, possibly assured rights of use to Goose, which their defence authorities are said to regard as the most important base in the north-west region of the continent. At present the United States forces use Goose merely on sufferance. The large area of Goose Air Base would permit of extensive United States facilities there without prejudice to our use of the base. The United States defence authorities are however likely to press for continuance of customs-free privileges at Goose which they now enjoy by reason of an exchange of correspondence with the Newfoundland authorities permitting such privileges until signature of a Peace Treaty with Germany, and by reason of the fact that we have not taken any steps since union to abrogate these privileges. Customs-free privileges for United States forces at Goose undoubtedly raise a serious problem of morale with Canadian forces there who do not enjoy similar privileges.

6. I wonder therefore if we should not be prepared to consider extending assured rights to use of Goose to the United States in return for their withdrawal from Fort Pepperrell. It should not be difficult administratively to permit the United States privileges at Goose such as they enjoy in other Newfoundland bases and to extend these privileges to Canadian forces established at Goose, since Goose is isolated and does not serve substantially as a base of supply for any other settlements in Labrador. The upkeep of Fort Pepperrell would no doubt be substantially greater than expenditures which our armed services presently contemplate making in Newfoundland. At the same time, the facilities are so much better than they can expect to have in St. John's and the advantages in having the United States forces out of the area so considerable that the additional expenditure might be very worthwhile from a national standpoint. A further consideration is that it may in the long run be in the national interest to display the flag more in St. John's than we presently contemplate doing.

7. I am not sure that we should suggest to the United States that we are prepared to bargain along these lines. It might rather be preferable to clear our own minds as to whether we would be prepared to make a bargain of this sort if the United States authorities suggest that a quid pro quo is essential for any revision of the Bases Agreement.

8. If these suggestions seem worth pursuing it would no doubt be desirable to refer the matter for consideration to the Chiefs of Staff at an early date.¹⁶

7. The Minister of National Defence and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs reported upon his recent trip to Newfoundland which had included a visit to the U.S. bases there.¹⁷

While they were substantial purchasers of Canadian goods and services, both for general purposes and for their PX stores, they were creating local labour problems by paying twice the prevailing rate with no provision for workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance. Local Canadian authorities suspected that there was considerable smuggling from the bases, particularly of cigarettes. There was a good deal of dissatisfaction too among the local people that the United States were permitted to exercise the many non-military rights which they possessed by virtue of the bases agreement. This was regarded as an interference with sovereignty and was resented. Incidents might occur which would aggravate this situation.

(It would be recalled that the objective of the government was to secure U.S. agreement for surrender of all or part of their non-military rights and representations to this end had already been made to U.S. authorities. So far, these had not been fruitful and it was planned to take the matter up with Mr. Johnson, the U.S. Secretary of Defence, on his forthcoming visit to Canada in the hope that he would become personally interested in the problem.)

In general, the impression gained on the visit was that people throughout the province accepted confederation and were well satisfied with the smooth manner in which the administration of their affairs had been turned over. Some objections were heard about freight rates and quite serious complaints about the enforcement of customs regulations at Gander.

The Department of Transport seemed anxious to make use of Harmon Field at Stephenville as an alternate airport (as already arranged by agreement with the United States) but this was being resisted by National Revenue (Customs) because of staffing difficulties.

8. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister said that, in his opinion, the status of U.S. bases in Newfoundland was a matter which the Prime Minister might have to take up direct with the President if results were to be expected.

On the question of customs procedure at Gander, there appeared to be cause for criticism. If customs formalities were to be carried out there, it would appear desirable to clear T.C.A. passengers for entry into Canada. At present, however, passengers destined for Canada were subjected to examination and restrictions at Gander but these did not obviate the need for further formalities on arrival at Montreal.

9. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) noted the report of the Minister of National Defence and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that the question of status of U.S. bases in Newfoundland and of further representations to the United States for some modification of their non-military rights be reviewed at an early meeting; and,

(b) agreed that the question of customs procedures at Gander and of arrangements for using Harmon Field as an alternate airport be referred for further consideration to the Minister of National Revenue.

In reply I had said Canada would welcome reference earliest practical date and that we wished soonest decision and would be willing consider special meeting of Board for this purpose.

2. Following my conversation with you I spoke again to Henry and afterwards to Snow, Secretary, United States Section, confirming our desire earliest action possible and special meeting P.J.B.D. I advised Snow I would ask you to send confirming message to State Department through Wrong.

3. In speaking to Snow I intimated informally our great anxiety to clear questions in controversy, particularly question of jurisdiction in order to remove obstacles to effective and friendly collaboration in defence of North America and to prevent disputes between personnel of respective forces which jeopardized good relations.

4. I expressed my personal satisfaction that Board had available for its guidance the well thought out doctrine of the 12th February [1947] declaration which the Board itself had in large part evolved.

5. Neither Snow nor Henry made any direct reply to this suggestion from me as to the line the Board might usefully follow. Henry said that it was most important to clear the difficulties up promptly and Snow remarked that the United States Section would undoubtedly join the Canadian Section in an approach which would yield a just, repeat just, solution.

6. Henry has informed members United States Section and I have informed members Canadian Section of pending reference and to expect early meeting.

Ottawa, October 19, 1949

Dear Mr. Secretary,

When you were here in August, I supported representations previously made with regard to the extra-military right conferred under the lease of the Newfoundland bases.

This had been the subject of representation made at every level ever since union between Newfoundland and Canada had become an active possibility. It was a matter which our Government regarded as of most urgent importance, the speedy settlement of which was as much in the interest of the United States as of Canada. After all this, the question was raised last week in connection with the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence as to whether the Board should consider the matter at its next meeting.

When I brought this up last August I remember pointing out the danger of an incident arising which might stir up feeling on one or both sides of the Boundary so as to affect the existing excellent relations between the countries.

I am afraid that this has happened. Maclean's magazine is a fortnightly publication having a circulation of about 340,000, the largest in Canada. For more than a year past, its editors have intended to do a story on the situation on the bases. Over this period they collected a good deal of material and recently sent their Ottawa editor, Blair Fraser, to Washington and Newfoundland to follow up the story.

Fraser has dug up a lot of incidents which we had never heard of and has put these together in a story which he has shown to two other people as well as myself. None of us has copies. I was astonished at the incidents Fraser had gathered together. Fraser assured me that he verified all he says from sources both in Washington and Newfoundland. Nevertheless I at once raised with him a number of points on specific statements in the article which were likely to give rise to misunderstanding and also drew to his attention circumstances which in my view made it undesirable that the story should be published.

These views were communicated to his principals and yesterday Fraser told me that most of the specific points would be met but it was intended to print the story in the issue of November 15.

We regret that this should have happened but of course have no authority to get the story suppressed.

Naturally I am reluctant to bother you with this when there are so many matters of great importance occupying your attention. However, as we had discussed the situation and your reaction had been so similar to my own, I felt that I should let you know what the position was.

Following from Heeney, Begins: Newfoundland Bases.

1. Following our telephone conversation yesterday I discussed the situation with the Minister. He feels very strongly that we should not delay reopening the question personally with Mr. Acheson along the lines of my telegram No. 15 of October 21 from New York† and he wishes you to do so just as soon as possible.

2. Mr. Pearson expects to make his statement on foreign affairs in the House shortly. This will probably be done on introduction of the Departmental estimates. Even under ordinary circumstances we could anticipate that the Minister might be questioned regarding the progress of negotiations over the bases, especially since the Prime Minister intimated at the time of Union that the question had been raised with the United States and we had reason to expect that some modifications would be possible. The probability of questions in the House will be enhanced if, as is quite likely, Blair Fraser's article appears in Maclean's at about the time that our estimates are before Parliament. This article may well stir up public interest and criticism and, in any case, is not likely to pass unnoticed by Members of Parliament. It would certainly be prejudicial to good relations with the United States if the Government had to confess to the House that no progress whatever had been made in negotiations despite the fact that the matter was first raised with the U.S. authorities a year ago. In general, the impression is growing that we have been given the well-known "run-around" over the whole matter. Public opinion is not likely to be satisfied merely by assurances that the U.S. authorities have given us a sympathetic hearing.

3. With reference to Snow's suggestion that we ourselves are in default and that the State Department are awaiting answers to enquiries for "positive" details of the regime we desire, we have made a careful check of our files. We find that a long memorandum setting out our desiderata in detail was given Harrington¹⁸ by Crean under cover of a letter on July 21. It does not seem to me that much weight can be attached to the suggestion that we have been purely negative.

4. In any event, this criticism cannot apply to the principal question, namely that of jurisdiction. In the immediate future it is this that is likely to prove the most embarrassing feature of the Bases Agreement. We have repeatedly told the U.S. authorities, both at the official and Cabinet level, that we desire in principle the application of the Visiting Forces (U.S.) Act to United States forces in Newfoundland. The State Department and the Pentagon should know or be able to find out quite readily precisely what that implies.

5. It may be observed that Article 3 of the Bases Agreement, which deals with jurisdiction, is not mandatory in the sense that the United States must exercise jurisdiction over the types of offences there listed. The Article simply states that the United States "shall have the absolute right in the first instance to assume and exercise jurisdiction with respect to such offence." There would appear to be nothing in the Article to preclude the United States from waiving jurisdiction in any particular case, or undertaking in advance to waive jurisdiction generally in any particular types of offences or under specific conditions. In short, we feel that the United States could take the necessary action by administrative measures to bring the application of the clauses of the Bases Agreement relating to jurisdiction generally into line with the Visiting Forces Act. We feel further that this could be done by exchange of correspondence without any change in the letter of the Agreement. Agreement in principle to take actions along these lines, leaving the details to be discussed later, would at least be an important step forward.

6. It is for the above reasons that the Minister wishes you to take the matter up with Mr. Acheson immediately, stressing again the importance which the Government attaches to maintaining amicable relations with the United States in the matter of defence relations, and pointing out the danger to good relations which may result from further delay in dealing with the Bases Agreement. In discussing the matter with him you should make it clear that if we are stressing at the moment the matter of jurisdiction, it is because this question is especially urgent and not because we are dropping other points in our desiderata.

7. It is my intention to see Steinhardt within the next few days and speak to him also along the lines indicated in this message. The fact that I am doing so, however, should not delay your approach to the Secretary of State. Ends.

1. I have had this morning a short talk with the Secretary of State and another talk with Rusk at his request. Rusk had already spoken to Acheson about my representations of yesterday. Steinhardt has also reported your discussion with him, and Rusk spent a good deal of time yesterday afternoon in going into the problem more fully with Snow and others.

2. In speaking to Acheson I touched on the high spots only, but made clear the urgency of making early progress and our dissatisfaction with the way the matter was being handled. I emphasized that it would certainly not meet our position if we were confronted as a proposed solution on jurisdiction over offenses with a revision of Article 3 identical with that which they are working out with the British for application in the West Indian bases. I said that in my judgement the Newfoundland issue should be handled separately and that we believed that a satisfactory arrangement could be reached, on this point at any rate, through an exchange of notes, which would make the application of Article 3 in the Newfoundland bases conform very closely to the Visiting Forces Act.

3. I also reminded Acheson that, when the Prime Minister had taken up the matter with the President last February, in his and my presence, the President had observed that, while he expected difficulties from the national military establishment, he and Acheson ought to be able to cope with these so as to give us at any rate some satisfaction. (See my memorandum of this conversation dated February 12th).¹⁹ I added that I thought the time had come when it would be desirable for him to intervene in accordance with this statement. Jessup was present during this conversation. Acheson expressed concern and indicated that he would take a personal interest in the matter.

4. I saw Rusk immediately afterwards. He remarked that an examination of the record satisfied him that the State Department had been remiss in not giving us some written statement in reply to our representations, and he implied that an interim answer might be forthcoming. He also said that the question had recently been handled at too low a level and that this had increased the difficulties in securing the concurrence of the armed services. (This has been due, I think, to the removal of Hickerson to other activities, since his transfer left Snow as the senior officer actively pursuing the matter.) Rusk added that he proposed from now on to keep consideration on a high level, and said that he was himself going to take the matter up with the "top people in the Pentagon".

5. He went on to comment on the real nature of the difficulties which they are encountering here. For one thing the services were being asked to relinquish privileges in the bases which they thought they had secured for ninety-nine years in return for value received. (I queried the value received, and found that what he had in mind was not so much the old destroyers as the fact that the deal in 1941 deliberately brought the United States a great deal closer to active belligerence.) He also dwelt on the complications caused by their other negotiations for base rights and their anxiety to avoid establishing a precedent which might make it hard for them to secure the position they really needed in bases "in much less civilized countries". He believed that it would take some time to reach a settlement.

6. I then read him most of your message EX-2610 of October 25th, which had reached me after I had seen him yesterday, placing particular emphasis on the proposals in paragraphs 4 and 5 on jurisdiction. I pointed out that, if our wishes were met by administrative action and without amendment of the 1941 Agreement, the dangers of an awkward precedent which might be used against them in other connections would be much diminished.

7. I emphasized the importance of preliminary negotiations before the matter came before the P.J.B.D., saying that the role of the Board perhaps ought only to be to recommend to the Governments the approval of arrangements already known to be acceptable as a result of earlier discussions. He asked me how I thought we should proceed and suggested that Perkins, who is conducting the negotiations for the bilateral agreements with North Atlantic countries might deal with me on the issue. I said that I should certainly require expert legal assistance, particularly with the problems of jurisdiction. I should be glad to hear your views on this fairly promptly. By negotiating with Perkins we could possibly stop the discussions from becoming lost in the Pentagon mazes. On the other hand hosting a meeting at which some experts from both sides could be brought together to discuss the problems as a whole presents certain advantages, provided that the United States leadership is authoritative. This might possibly bring speedier results. Ends.

Newfoundland Bases. Following from Heeney.

Steinhardt and Harrington saw me again yesterday regarding the Newfoundland Bases. Harrington, who is just back from a meeting in Washington with U.S. members of the P.J.B.D. and interested officers in the State Department, reports that they are now really concerned about the question and are putting pressure on the Pentagon for early action on our requests. He referred to the proposals regarding jurisdiction in the West Indies Bases made to the United Kingdom. He said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were being asked this week to approve extension of the same arrangements to the Newfoundland Bases; we might expect their decision shortly on this suggestion and probably an informal meeting of the P.J.B.D. to discuss the question would then be proposed. I saw no point not admitting that we had seen them even though you had got them confidentially from the U.K. Embassy. In any event he said copies were coming up by bag for him and he would let us have a copy shortly.

2. I said that my impression was that the proposals made to the United Kingdom would not meet our requirements and did not go as far as the Visiting Forces (United States) Act which in principle represented the regime which we wanted to apply to the Newfoundland Bases. I said, however, that we were having these proposals examined by our Legal Division and I expected that we could give them our comments on them in two or three days; if, as I suspected, these proposals would not meet our minimum desiderata, they should know at once and why; they should as soon as possible have some idea whether the proposals they had in mind would provide an acceptable basis for negotiation.

3. I said further that I thought that it would be important that adequate legal and political officers should participate with members of the P.J.B.D. in preliminary discussions.

4. We emphasized the importance of our being able to show some progress before the debate on external affairs, which is now set to begin about the 15th on introduction of our estimates; questions on this subject would almost certainly arise in the House at that time.

5. We will let you have the comments of our lawyers as soon as they are received. Meantime you need not approach the State Department further. The formal position is that we are awaiting their proposals following the representations you made in Washington and those made to the U.S. Embassy here.

[Washington], November 3, 1949

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

In our conversation of September 9, 1949 we discussed the desire of the Canadian Government that the United States agree to modifications in the application of certain provisions of the 1941 Leased Bases Agreement as applied to Newfoundland. Hume Wrong has also called at the Department within the last few days and has taken the matter up with both Dean Rusk and me.

Since the Canadian proposals were made known to us in general terms last November and later discussed by the Prime Minister with the President in February of 1949, they have been the subject of considerable study here, as well as of conversations between officials of our two Governments both in Ottawa and Washington. The base rights involved, however, are complex in nature and have a bearing on similar arrangements we are concerned with elsewhere. Consequently, the search for an acceptable formula for their modification has not proven to be an easy task.

My suggestion to you in September was that the question be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defense. The United States members of this Board are probably more familiar with the Canadian-United States defense relationship than any other officials of equivalent rank and the Board, as a whole, is a going concern, organized to deal with such problems and with a past record of accomplishment in so doing.

Upon receiving word on October 12, 1949, through General McNaughton, that the Canadian Government had agreed to have the Joint Board deal with this problem, the United States Acting Chairman called a meeting of the United States Section for October 28th, which was the earliest date on which he could be in Washington. That meeting has now been held and the United States Section of the Board expects to be prepared for a special meeting of the full Board within a short time. I feel confident that the Board will be able to work out a solution satisfactory to both countries.

With warm regards.

Sincerely yours,
[DEAN ACHESON]

PJBD MEETING ON NEWFOUNDLAND BASES²⁰

The oral message to the United States Ambassador of March 19, 1949, urged that the United States bases in Newfoundland should be brought as near as possible into line with the general underlying principle of the joint statement of the Prime Minister and President of February 12, 1941, that all co-operative arrangements should be "without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory." More specifically, the message requested that the United States should relinquish:

- (a) Jurisdictional rights except as provided by the Visiting Forces (U.S.) Act;
- (b) customs-free privileges other than those allowed U.S. personnel elsewhere in Canada;
- (c) the right to establish U.S. postal facilities;
- (d) exemption from taxation other than that applicable in the case of other joint defence projects.

²⁰ La Commission permanente canado-américaine de défense s'est réunie à Terre-Neuve du 3 au 8 janvier 1950.

The Permanent Joint Board on Defence met in Newfoundland on January 3-8, 1950.

We have received no statement from the U.S. as to replies it will make to these requests, but it would seem unlikely that they will agree to relinquish in full all rights as requested. It is therefore suggested that:

(a) To the extent that the U.S. is not prepared to meet the Canadian Government's request in full, the Board should take the line that the discussions at the forthcoming meeting are exploratory and not binding on either party, and that any proposals made by either side should be reported back to the two Governments.

(b) The Canadian Section of the Board should be authorized to discuss with their U.S. colleagues whatever counter-proposals they may bring forward, but the Canadian Section should be given for their confidential information some indication as to the policy which might find acceptance with the Government should the U.S. Section be unwilling to go the full distance requested in the oral message. In this respect the following suggestions are made after consultation with the departments concerned:

1. Jurisdiction

(i) It should be recognized that the position of the U.S. services in Newfoundland is somewhat different from that in the rest of Canada in that they are located on bases to which the U.S. has long-term leases, over which it has administrative control, and on which a substantial number of dependents of the armed forces reside.

(ii) In view of the above, the U.S. might be permitted to retain prior right of jurisdiction over U.S. service personnel whether on (or off) the base areas when only service personnel are involved, i.e., if no other resident of Canada is aggrieved.

(iii) The U.S. should agree not to exercise jurisdiction over Canadian citizens or U.S. citizens (other than U.S. service personnel)—The U.S. agreed to this by correspondence with the Newfoundland Government in 1941, but the agreement might be re-affirmed in correspondence between the Canadian and U.S. Governments.

(iv) In order to take care of U.S. security problems (presumably the reason for including rights of jurisdiction over British subjects), Canada might agree to enact the necessary legislation, enforceable in Canadian courts, to protect the special security interests of the U.S. in Canada. This legislation might in effect extend The Official Secrets Act to cover U.S. official secrets, and might give protection for United States Government property situated in Canada on the same terms as that given to Canadian Government property.

(v) Suitable arrangements for the surrender of prisoners, the right to lay complaints, and so forth, might also be negotiated.

2. Customs Exemption

To a considerable extent the customs exemptions provided in Article 4 of the Bases Agreement already extend to U.S. projects and personnel elsewhere in Canada, although this is largely provided by Order in Council under the Consolidated Audit and Revenue Act. The main extra provisions enjoyed in Newfoundland are:

(a) customs-free entry for PX's, service clubs, etc.

(b) customs-free privileges for dependents of service personnel, and employed U.S. civilians (of which there now appear to be none on the U.S. bases).

In general, it is suggested that the Canadian Section might put forth as general principles:

(a) That it is undesirable for U.S. troops in Newfoundland to be on a specially privileged basis as compared with either Canadian troops or U.S. troops elsewhere in Canada.

(b) That U.S. troops should not be entitled to more privileges with respect to liquor and tobacco on the Newfoundland bases than on bases in the U.S. (in the U.S. they pay ordinary taxes on both).

Formerly the PX's handled very largely supplies purchased in the U.S., but it is understood that since Union (and probably since the devaluation of the Canadian dollar) there has been an increasing tendency to purchase in Canada. There would appear to be no objection to the PX's as such; the objection is to the resale of duty-free goods. It is thought that the U.S. will resist giving up these privileges. It is suggested, however, that the situation might be largely met in substance if the PX's and service clubs would agree to a policy of purchasing supplies in Canada, paying the duties and taxes ordinarily paid by commercial dealers or private persons. If the U.S. authorities are unwilling to go this far we might retreat to requiring strict administrative provisions to prevent abuses, and in particular to requiring that no non-entitled persons be permitted to purchase in duty-free PX's.

Resistance may of course be anticipated in the case of cigarettes and liquor. Special arrangements, such as rationing, might be possible.

3. Income Taxes

After a careful review of the existing situation elsewhere in Canada and of the draft revised Double Taxation Convention between Canada and the U.S., it appears that the only income tax exemption privileges enjoyed by the U.S. on the Newfoundland bases that are not enjoyed by the U.S. elsewhere in Canada are:

(a) Profits of U.S. contractors on U.S. bases;

(b) employees (of such contractors) who are U.S. citizens, and their wives and minor children.

At present there appear to be no U.S. contractors' employees who are U.S. citizens in the base areas; nor does it appear that at any time the number in this category has been large.

With respect to contractors resident in the U.S. but operating in the base areas on behalf of the U.S. Government, it is possible that the U.S. authorities might be unwilling to give Canadian tax authorities the necessary information for estimating taxes. In any case, taxation officials think that the loss of revenue involved is not great. They would be prepared to suggest incorporating in the Draft Tax Convention exemption on a reciprocal basis of the categories above (U.S. contractors' profits, their U.S. citizen employees and wives and minor children of the latter).

The U.S. might also be requested to provide Canadian income tax authorities with statements of salaries or wages paid Canadian employees on the bases, and require contractors to do likewise. It would, of course, be preferable if income tax deductions at the source would be followed by the U.S., but there may be administrative difficulties in the way.

It might be suggested to the U.S. authorities that if the draft Tax Convention now before the two Governments is amended in this way and subsequently adopted, our request in the oral message with respect to income taxes will be entirely met.

4. Post Office

It is anticipated that the U.S. authorities will oppose any change in the present arrangements if it would interfere with the speedy transmission of mails now possible because of the direct carriage of mails by service aircraft between the U.S. bases and bases in the U.S. It would therefore seem undesirable for the Canadian Section to press for the establishment of Canadian postal facilities on the base unless the U.S. authorities can be assured of services as good as those at present available.

The Postal authorities therefore propose:

(a) That Canadian Post Offices be substituted for U.S. Post Offices on the bases, but that an arrangement might be entered into for the continued carriage of mail to and from the bases by U.S. service aircraft; and

(b) that for official mail to and from U.S. Government departments U.S. "penalty envelopes" be permitted (as at present in the case of U.S. posts elsewhere in Canada).

Copies of relevant departmental papers are attached.†

BRIEF SUMMARY OF A THREAT TO THE NORTH AMERICAN CONTINENT²²

1. It is considered that the Soviet Union and satellites are the only combination of powers which constitute a threat to the security of this continent at the present time. It is assumed that there will be no significant change in the economic or political systems of the Soviets which would tend to minimize this threat. It is further considered that there will be no expansion of Soviet controlled territory in the immediate future that will materially affect the Soviet capabilities for making war.

2. On the basis of current intelligence it would appear that Soviet aggression, if it occurs, will be planned well in advance of the event. We do not regard war as inevitable but there is still a possibility of an outbreak occurring through a combination of incidents. While the ultimate object of Soviet military strategy would include the defeat of Canada and the United States, it is a reasonable assumption that the Soviet Union would first attempt to consolidate its position in Eurasia and then establish advance bases which could be used for air strikes against the North American continent prior to any attempted invasion. Of immediate concern would be inevitable attempts by subversive organizations to disrupt the economy and war potential of this country, and of the United States, with the object of reducing available manpower and retarding the flow of necessary supplies.

3. It is considered that any war developing in the immediate future would be fought with improved designs of weapons used in the Second World War, and such novel weapons as may have passed through the initial experimental stages at the time of attack, or subsequent to it.

4. We have taken into account the possibilities of sabotage, subversion, infiltration and penetration of the armed forces, government, and our economic life as the obvious instruments by which the potential enemy would seek to harass us in the early stages of conflict. In brief, any war started by the Soviet Union would have the consolidation of the Soviet position in Eurasia as its initial object and any attacks against this continent, in the early stages at least, would be diversionary in character.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INDUSTRIAL COOPERATION

1. It is well known that Canada is a vital source of supply of raw materials—nickel, copper, asbestos, lead, zinc, aluminum, uranium and others. So much so that Canada's wartime role is sometimes thought of as merely that of feeding raw materials into the hopper of the United States industrial machine.

2. The fact is that in the last war Canada was in her own right an important arsenal, the fourth greatest producer of munitions among the United Nations.

3. Relative to United States production, our effort looked small, but in absolute terms it was of the highest importance. We produced close to a million vehicles—and even a world war can be lost for want of a million vehicles or won because of them; about 16 million tires; over 16,000 airframes; about 4,500 vessels and craft; over 2 million tons of chemicals and explosives; over 4½ billion rounds of small arms ammunition; over 1,800,000 machine guns and small arms; and instruments, signals, radar, ammunition, guns, pyrotechnics and military stores; to a value of about $11 billion.

4. Yet against this tremendous capacity the needs of our own Services are insignificant. In the last war, we used only 30 per cent of our munitions production for ourselves. The balance of 70 per cent went to meet the needs largely of the United States and the United Kingdom and to a much lesser extent of other Allies. In some of the main lines of production, our Services took only 5 to 10 per cent.

5. This characteristic—a great capacity and a small requirement—makes it impossible for us to be self-contained in our planning. We cannot base our planning, as most countries do, on the requirements of the Services, because our Services need so little in most lines in relation to our capacity that we would not be justified in setting up production.

6. For this reason, we attach the highest importance to close collaboration now particularly with the United States. If good use is to be made of our resources, it is essential that the United States authorities plan with a full knowledge of our capabilities and with a determination to make the most effective use of the joint resources of the two countries.

7. The stage is set. We both adhere to the general principles of the Hyde Park Agreement of April 19, 1941, which reads “...in mobilizing the resources of this continent, each country should provide the other with the defence articles which it is best able to produce, and above all, produce quickly, and that production programs should be coordinated to this end.”

8. We have a fine history of sensible and effective cooperation in the last war. We are cooperating actively on the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. We have created the necessary machinery for industrial collaboration in the Joint United States-Canada Industrial Mobilization Planning Committee. It has met and established sub-committees in the fields of non-ferrous metals, chemicals and explosives, forest products, mechanical transport and administrative controls.

9. On our side in Canada we are ready to get down to cases. We have our internal planning well in hand; that is, the paper work of drafting “shadow” departments and emergency legislation.

10. We have undertaken some stockpiling of tin and antimony and are giving consideration to other materials. However, here too we run up against the planning difficulty caused by the smallness of our own requirements. We haven't much of a stockpile problem if we think only of what we may need for ourselves. It is obviously difficult to stockpile for the unknown needs of others.

11. We have the closest cooperation with industry, both through the Industrial Defence Board, an advisory body consisting of government officials and industrialists; and through the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association, an autonomous association established by industry.

12. The general principles are there and the machinery is there, but it will take a great deal of determination on the part of those in both countries who are interested in planning for defence to give effect to the principles and to make the machinery work. We saw the last time that we lost anything from six months' to two years' production in Canada by reason of the lack of knowledge of requirements, the lack of advance technical information and the lack of production experience. We all agree that the entire resources of North America will be needed next time, and it seems likely that we will not be able to afford the loss of six months' to two years' production. The time to avoid that loss is now.

POWER AND NAVIGATION DEVELOPMENTS IN THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE
BASIN²³

1. The All Canadian Waterway Project

Because of the delay in arriving at an arrangement on the power and navigation developments in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin, the Inter-Departmental Committee has given consideration to an all Canadian waterway project. Although no decision has yet been taken by the Canadian authorities, an outline of this project is submitted to you for your personal information.

The completion of a separate power scheme would make it possible for Canada to construct an all Canadian deep waterway as far as Lake Erie. This would require the approval, in the case of certain works, of the International Joint Commission, but would not involve any treaty or agreement requiring the approval of the United States Congress. Apart from assured early construction, the all Canadian waterway would be of advantage to Canada in the field of tolls. It is now almost certain that Congress will approve a joint waterway only if Canada agrees to make the new works self-liquidating by the imposition of tolls on shipping. Canadian economic experts believe that tolls will be so high that the economic value of the waterway to Canada would be largely nullified. The completion of an all Canadian waterway, however, would give Canada exclusive discretion as to whether tolls should or should not be collected.

The major question, at the moment, is whether the strategic and economic value of a deep waterway to Canada for the special advantages of an all Canadian waterway, would justify an initial expenditure of 275 million dollars, as compared with 65 million dollars under the 1941 Agreement or 130 million dollars under a future navigation-alone agreement with the U.S., if separate power development had been allowed to proceed.

The U.S. authorities are not yet informed of this all Canadian project, and what will be their reaction is still an unknown factor.

2. Advantages of the Navigation Project

Canada's economic life would benefit enormously by the provision of a deep waterway from Montreal to the Head of the Lakes. Canada has been committed to this in principle since the construction of the Welland Canal, but it has been impossible up to now to obtain United States concurrence.

From the standpoint of defence, the project means a short protected route from the heart of the Continent to overseas ports, greater industrial developments in the less vulnerable inland areas, greater dispersal facilities vital to the industrial defence potential and enlarged facilities for the construction of naval and merchant shipping. In this connection, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence has on more than one occasion recommended the early completion of the waterway and power project.

A new and important factor in current consideration of the St. Lawrence project is the discovery of very larger reserves of high grade iron ore in the Quebec-Labrador region. It is claimed that the most economic route for this ore would be via a deepened waterway to Cleveland and other Great Lakes ports.

BASIN

1. A number of proposals have already been under consideration by United States and Canadian authorities, which would provide for large power and navigation developments in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin. Some provide for the development of power alone, others for joint and concurrent developments of navigation and power facilities.

The 1941 Agreement

2. In a letter of May 27, 1949, addressed to the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Canada expressed his fear that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941 would not come into force this year. Although Mr. Truman has urged Congress to pass the necessary legislation as promptly as possible (his reply of June 8, 1949, to Mr. St. Laurent), and Bills have been introduced in both the Senate and the House of Representatives at their present Sessions, little hope remains that the joint United States-Canadian navigation and Power project embodied in the 1941 Canada-United States Agreement will be approved this year.

3. The 1941 Agreement provided:

(a) For the construction of the remaining links of a 27-foot waterway from the head of the Great Lakes to Montreal;

(b) for a combined power-navigation scheme in the International Rapids Section;

(c) for stabilizing the situation regarding diversions of water from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system;

(d) for the use for power purposes of waters which may be diverted into the Great Lakes system from other watersheds.

The New York-Ontario Power Priority Plan

4. Because of the delay in obtaining Congressional approval for the 1941 Agreement, an alternative scheme was put forward in 1948 by the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission and the New York State Power Authority. It involves obtaining approval for power developments in the International Rapids Section from the International Joint Commission, under Article III of the Boundary Waters Treaty. Applications are in the hands of the United States and Canadian Governments but have not yet been transmitted to the Commission. Under this plan, it is expected that the United States Congress approval would not be necessary. However, Mr. Truman has always refused to consider this scheme and has preferred the approval by Congress of the combined navigation and power project.

5. If Congress does not act in 1949 on the 1941 Agreement, Canada may be inclined to favour the separate power arrangement. The reasons are obvious. Ontario's need for new power is acute. Unless the 1941 Agreement is authorized, the Ontario Hydro Commission will have to take action in initiating large scale steam developments in order not to risk acute power shortages by 1953–54. It has indicated that its present construction programme will provide adequate supplies of power only until the end of 1952. After that date, large new sources of energy would have to be available. As power resources available to Ontario are, unlike those of the Province of Quebec, in boundary waters, they can only be developed by agreement or in co-operation with the United States. This separate power development, as outlined in the New York-Ontario Power Priority Plan, would probably be more expensive for the Hydro than power development under the combined scheme.

New Niagara Treaty

6. Ontario might be prepared to accept a brief delay in the acceptance of the 1941 Agreement if the projected Niagara development could be authorized immediately. Power development at Niagara depends on diversions of water on both sides of the boundary, authorized by the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, and additional temporary emergency diversions authorized by Exchanges of Notes during and since the war. The Ontario Hydro would like the temporary diversions made permanent and equalized between Canada and the United States by the cancellation of certain power export contracts which were taken into account by the Boundary Waters Treaty.

7. The difficulties in achieving an arrangement of this sort are the need to satisfy private power interests on the United States side and the necessity of reconciling the strongly opposed views of State and Federal Power authorities.

CANADA-UNITED STATES JOINT DEFENCE PROJECTS

1. The following is a summary showing the present position of the various joint defence projects in Canadian territory—both those in operation and those planned.

I. Canadian Army

2.(a) Exchange of Officers

The original arrangements provided for an equal number of officers from each army to be on interchange with the other army. The interchanges are not, however, between "opposite numbers" in all cases. Each country determines the establishments in the other country at which it desires to place officers. The actual posting is, of course, subject to the approval of the receiving country.

Originally fourteen Canadian Army officers and fourteen U.S. Army officers were interchanged. The plan has since been expanded until at the present time there are twenty-one Canadian officers posted to the U.S. Army and nineteen U.S. officers posted to the Canadian Army.

The Canadian Army has submitted to the United States Department of the Army a proposal for the interchange, on a one-for-one, rank-for-rank basis, of nine additional officers to act as instructors at Army Corps schools. The decision of the U.S. Department of the Army in this matter is presently awaited.

2.(b) Training

In addition to the interchange of officers between the two countries, officers and other ranks of each country are attending the other's service schools and colleges. For example, during the fiscal year 1948-49 there were 94 Canadian officers and 128 other ranks who attended courses in the United States.

U.S. Officers have attended all post-war courses at the Canadian Army Staff College and a U.S. army officer has been a member of the instructional staff for all three courses. Commencing in October, 1949, there will also be a U.S. Marine Corps officer on the instructional staff.

The current course at the National Defence College has one U.S. officer in attendance. At the next course it is hoped that there will also be an official from a U.S. civilian department in attendance. A large number of the visiting lecturers who speak at the National Defence College are high-ranking officers of the U.S. Armed Forces and senior officials of the government.

Vacancies are offered to the Canadian Army at the following high level U.S. service schools:

- (i) National War College

- (ii) Industrial College of the Armed Forces
- (iii) Armed Forces Staff College
- (iv) Command and General Staff College.

To provide additional co-operation in training, a policy of exchanging officers as observers on special exercises has been introduced and has proven to be very useful.

A copy of all applicable training films and strips produced in each country is forwarded to the other country and facilities are available for the purchase of additional copies.

2.(c) Equipment

Exchange of equipment between the Canadian Army and the U.S. Army is effected for purposes of joint testing and experimentation. These tests may be carried out in the presence of representatives of both countries or independently by one or the other. In either case, both progress reports and final reports are exchanged.

2.(d) Fort Churchill

Fort Churchill continues to operate as a joint experimental station. At present there is a permanent U.S. administrative detachment at Churchill. In addition, U.S. trial teams are engaged in testing clothing, engineer stores and signal stores. A U.S. Engineer Construction Company is also at Churchill and is assisting in the summer construction programme.

2.(e) Northwest Highway System

Maintenance of the Northwest Highway, which is the responsibility of the Canadian Army, is being carried out satisfactorily and the Highway is in good condition.

II. Royal Canadian Navy

3.(a) Hydrographic and Aerial Survey

A Hydrographic Survey, Group II, which consists of four U.S. survey vessels, will be operating in the Hamilton Inlet area until approximately 1st October. The purpose of this operation is to correct existing Canadian and U.S. charts of this area.

A U.S. Aerial Photographic Squadron, V.P.-62, will be operating in the same area this summer for the purpose of completing the aerial survey which was begun last year.

3.(b) Weather Station Supply Mission

The ships U.S.S. "Edisto", an icebreaker, the U.S.S. "Wyandot", a transport, and the U.S.S. "LST-533", serving as a cargo vessel, sailed from Boston in July of this year.

The object of this mission will be to supply joint Canadian and U.S. weather stations in the Arctic. The expedition will be under the command of Captain Basil N. Rittenhouse, U.S.N., and will embark Canadian observers from all interested Government Departments.

3.(c) Joint Exercises

(i) West Coast

On the West Coast there have been a number of joint exercises participated in by the R.C.N. and the U.S.N. These operations are sponsored by the U.S. Naval Electronics Laboratory with U.S.N. ships; the Canadian contribution has been scientists from the Joint Oceanographic Committee and the Defence Research Board, Pacific Naval Laboratory.

During November and December, 1948, H.M.C.S. "Cedarwood" and H.M.C.S. "Ehkoli" collaborated with two U.S.N. ships in conducting fundamental studies of sound transmissions and oceanography in the area near Nodales channel.

During July, August and September, 1949, H.M.C.S. "Cedarwood" is engaged in a joint Aleutian scientific expedition. The force will conduct a cruise to carry out tests under the scientific direction of U.S. Naval Electronics Laboratory, the Defence Research Naval Laboratory (Canada) and Pacific Oceanographic Group (Canada). The cruise is in waters adjacent to the Aleutian Islands and Bering Strait. H.M.C.S. "Cedarwood" is concentrating on sound transmission studies and oceanographic work.

(ii) Amphibious Exercises

It is proposed that joint amphibious exercises of the U.S.N. and R.C.N. will take place in Hamilton Inlet commencing approximately 1st October. These exercises are intended to test existing equipment under Arctic conditions.

(iii) Anti-Submarine Training

During the past two years U.S.N. submarines have co-operated with the R.C.N. in anti-submarine training. This co-operation consists of quarterly A/S exercises with R.C.N. ships on the East and West Coasts where intensive A/S searches are carried out. United States Navy submarines are supplied from the New London and Seattle Naval Bases. The close co-operation given by the United States Navy has greatly increased the value of these exercises and has created an atmosphere of friendly rivalry between the Naval-personnel of the two nations.

III. Royal Canadian Air Force

4.(a) "Beetle" (Northwest LF Loran Chain)

In accordance with decision of the LF Loran Committee, Kittigazuit is operating as a master station with Skull Cliff as a slave station. Test flying is in progress on this pair. Arrangements are being made to establish a master station at Aklavik NWT.

The USAF plans the establishment of a master transmitting station at Barter Island to be completed this fall. At that time Barter Island will operate as a master station with Kittigazuit and Skull Cliff operating as slave stations.

4.(b) "Muscaif" (Loran Training)

In connection with "Muskox" an LF Loran system was established in Dawson Creek, Hamlin and Gimli to be operated as a long range navigation aid. The system was established and equipped by the USAF; subsequently all USAF personnel were replaced by the RCAF. Subsequently the chain was used to train operators for Beetle Stations.

The Regina Monitor was closed down on 10 March 1949, and the transmitters at Hamlin and Gimli are scheduled to close 1 September 1949. Future training of LF Loran operator personnel will take place on the U.S. Gulf Coast or West Coast Standard Loran Chain.

4.(c) Interchange of Officers

The R.A.F., U.S.A.F., and R.C.A.F. are co-operating in a project to assign officers to duty on an interchange basis whereby R.C.A.F. officers are being assigned to and employed with R.A.F. and U.S.A.F. units. At the same time officers of the R.A.F. and U.S.A.F. are being assigned and employed at R.C.A.F. units in Canada. At present there are 19 R.C.A.F. officers assigned to units of the R.A.F. and 11 R.C.A.F. officers assigned to units of the U.S.A.F. There are also 13 U.S.A.F. and 19 R.A.F. officers assigned to duties with units of the R.C.A.F. All the officers involved are assigned to duties with operating units of the "host" air arm in much the same capacity as any other member officer of that air arm might be employed. In addition there are several officers of all three air forces who have been assigned to regular training schools in a student capacity.

4.(d) "Eureka"

"Eureka" is a joint U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F. project to survey a series of sites for future installation of Loran and radar equipments. Members of the survey teams consist of R.C.A.F. and U.S.A.F. officers and specialist civilians.

4.(e) Exercise "Blackjack"

During the month of July, 1949, the R.C.A.F. (by invitation from the U.S.A.F.) participated in exercise "Blackjack". This exercise was planned and executed to employ bomber aircraft of the U.S.A.F. on mock raids against certain targets in the United States. It was intended that the bomber raids should exercise the fighter defence organization of the Air Defence Command, U.S.A.F. The R.C.A.F. participated to the extent of permitting bomber aircraft of the U.S.A.F. to operate over Canada in these simulated attacks on U.S. targets and by actual interception by Vampire aircraft of the Air Defence Group in the Montreal area. The complete results of "Blackjack" are not yet available; however two successful interceptions were achieved by the R.C.A.F. Vampires against the U.S. bomber forces. Similar exercises are planned in the future.

4.(f) Exercise "Route"

The Military Air Transport Service of the U.S.A.F. has furnished a photo B-17 for the purpose of photographing (motion pictures) the approaches to landing at certain air bases in Canada. The B-17 has completed photographing approaches under winter conditions and is presently completing the photographing of approaches to the same bases under summer conditions. Copies of the prints made are being forwarded to the R.C.A.F.

4.(g) Celestial Fix Orientation

This project was initiated on 22 October, 1948. The U.S.A.F. proposed to establish control points in the Canadian Archipelago by means of simultaneous celestial observations and radar scope photography by which the large amount of photography completed by the U.S.A.F. in this area could be accurately orientated for mapping purposes.

Three Canadian observers have been taking part in this operation and a recommendation has been made that the R.C.A.F. continue to participate in any future phases.

4.(h) "Stratiform"

This project grew out of an earlier U.S.A.F. proposal that two B-29 aircraft be assigned over a period of five years to make a survey of the declination of the magnetic field in the North American Arctic regions from aircraft in flight. The amended proposal was approved on a yearly basis. The Department of Mines and Resources provides the Canadian representation.

4.(i) Search and Rescue

Under an exchange of notes issued simultaneously in Ottawa and Washington on February 4th, 1949, the two Governments have agreed to give special customs and immigration clearance to planes and crews of either country when entering the other's territory on Search and Rescue Operations.

Under the agreement, it has now become the responsibility of the Rescue Coordination Centre in charge of the operation to obtain customs and immigration clearance for the aircraft involved. Aircraft of either country involved in a search in the other's territory will thus not be held up at the border to clear customs and immigration.

In several searches, notably those for the U.S. civilian aircraft missing enroute Buffalo-Montreal, the missing R.C.A.F. Beechcraft in New Brunswick and the Canadian civil Fleet Canuck in British Columbia, aircraft of the R.C.A.F., U.S.A.F. and the U.S. C[oast] G[uard] worked together to a common end.

4.(j) Air Re-Supply of Joint Operated Arctic Weather Stations

The U.S.-Canada agreement infers that the R.C.A.F. will assume the responsibility for the subject air re-supply in July, 1952. The R.C.A.F. proposed plan is to commence annual re-supply in April 1951, and periodic re-supply in July, 1952.

IV. Combined U.S.-Canadian Joint Arctic Exercises "North Star"

5.(a) "North Star" is an exercise in which Canadian Air and Army forces will co-operate with U.S. Air and Army Forces in the Whitehorse Burwash Landing Northway area, during the period January-February, 1950.

5.(b) The objectives of the exercise are:

(i) To develop procedures, doctrine and technique for the employment of combined U.S.-Canadian Forces in the Arctic.

(ii) To develop combined-joint doctrine and technique for the employment of combined U.S. Air Force-R.C.A.F. units in conjunction with the participating units in the following roles:

- a. Providing air transport
- b. Providing close air support
- c. Providing air supply

- d. Providing air evacuation
- e. Providing visual and photographic reconnaissance
- f. Protecting motor movements on the Northwest Highway System from Aggressor attack.

(iii) To provide Arctic training for a battalion combat team and a service support unit.

(iv) To develop doctrine and technique for moving troop units from the Zone of Interior to Alaska via the Northwest Highway System and air transport.

(v) To provide data for developing appropriate organization and equipment establishments for Arctic operations.

(vi) To determine the adequacy of standard items of clothing and equipment for Arctic operations.

(vii) To determine additional requirements of clothing and equipment necessary for Arctic operations.

(viii) To develop doctrine and technique for establishing a base camp in the Arctic.

(ix) To provide a detailed operational report of exercise "North Star" for study by appropriate agencies for use in planning future operations and instruction in Service Schools.

(x) To provide aerial photographs of all phases of employment of Army units in the Arctic for study by appropriate agencies to determine what changes in technique will best prevent aerial observation and attack.

(xi) To provide various research agencies with a means of furthering Arctic research.

(xii) To develop standards for logistical support for sub-Arctic operations.

5.(c) The setting of this exercise is that aggressor forces have secured the Fairbanks-Anchorage area and are attacking by the Alaska highway against the Canadian Army at Burwash Landing. The R.C.A.F. will engage the aggressors west of Burwash Landing. One U.S. battalion combat team will reinforce defending forces in the Whitehorse area. This combat team will be air-lifted to Whitehorse by the U.S.A.F. Upon arrival of the combat team, combined Canadian and U.S.A. Ground forces will be supported by the U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F. A drive against Northway will be initiated to secure that base for future operation.

5.(d) The following forces will participate:

(i) Canadian:

P[rincess] P[atricia's] C[anadian] L[ight] I[infantry]

One troop towed field artillery (or one troop light artillery if training has been completed)

Air contact teams as required

Necessary services to support Canadian Forces

R.C.A.F.

(ii) United States:

One Battalion combat team

One service support company

U.S. Air Force

5.(e) R.C.A.F. responsibilities will be:

(i) to air move approximately 650 Canadian Army troops from Edmonton to Whitehorse and return

(ii) air support of the Canadian Army ground troops in the area

(iii) transport support of an airborne assault to company strength and aerial re-supply missions as required.

V. *Defence Research*6.(a) Exchange of Personnel

There is at present an exchange of personnel between the Defence Research establishments of both countries. The individuals concerned form part of the staff to which they are posted.

6.(b) Integrated Programmes

In order to make the fullest utilization of the defence research facilities of both countries, the programmes of U.S. and Canadian organizations are integrated so far as it is practicable.

6.(c) Suffield

The United States Army has been granted and has accepted facilities at the Suffield Experimental Station for the purpose of trying out trials on toxic agents.

6.(d) Churchill

The research organizations of both Canada and the United States are presently carrying out Arctic medical trials. While these trials are not being conducted jointly, there is, however, the greatest possible coordination between the two agencies.

6.(e) Naval Research

Research concerning anti-submarine warfare is currently being carried out on both Coasts on a joint basis by the United States Navy and the Royal Canadian Navy.

VI. Standardization

7.(a) Although Canada-U.S.-U.K. standardization extends beyond the scope of Canada-U.S. joint defence projects, it is an essential part of North American defence planning. To date, good progress has been made in certain fields such as staff procedures, operating methods and training techniques. In addition, agreements have been reached as regards the military characteristics of many equipments required by the three Services. Similarly, in the field of research and development, duplication of effort has been greatly reduced and specific developments are being carried out by one country on behalf of the other two.

7.(b) However, until agreement can be reached concerning the types of military equipment required and the utilization of industrial capacity in the three countries to produce the agreed types, practical results in the field of standardization of equipment cannot be expected.

[Ottawa], August 10, 1949

UNITED STATES BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On November 3, 1948, the Canadian Government, recognizing that the broad extraterritorial and non-military rights exercised by the United States forces in Newfoundland might prejudice future harmonious Canada-United States defence collaboration after Confederation, instructed the Canadian Ambassador to the United States to begin discussions with the United States State Department with a view to modification of the Bases Agreement.

2. On November 19, 1948 the Canadian Ambassador to the United States in a letter addressed to the Acting Secretary of State (copy of which is attached)† stressed that the Canadian Government considered it of great importance that there should be early discussions between Canada and the United States for the purpose of considering certain problems which would affect the Newfoundland bases after Confederation. The Acting Secretary of State was informed in that letter that the Canadian Government did not wish to restrict the effective use by the United States of the leased areas for military purposes. The Canadian Government, however, was of the opinion that the prospective complete change in the political status of Newfoundland justified some modification of the 1941 Agreement in order to bring it more closely into accord with the spirit governing the existing joint defence arrangements between the two countries. No formal reply has been received from the United States State Department.

3. Following the delivery of the Note referred to in the preceding paragraph, informal discussions were held between the Canadian Ambassador and senior officials of the United States State Department. The Canadian Ambassador pointed out that the United States Government had no long-term or automatic rights at any defence site in Canada nor did it enjoy any extraterritorial rights except for purposes of discipline as defined by the Visiting Forces Act. Moreover, the Joint Statement issued by Prime Minister King and President Truman on February 12, 1947 (a copy of which is attached)† which sets forth the principles governing Canadian post-war defence relationships with the United States, calls for co-operative arrangements to be "without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory". State Department officials for their part implied that the initial reaction of the United States Defence authorities was that they had firm rights under the Bases Agreement and would not be prepared to surrender these rights unless it could be shown that they would secure definite advantages by so doing.

4. On February 12 the Prime Minister of Canada on the occasion of his visit to Washington, raised the question of the status of the United States bases in Newfoundland with President Truman. Mr. Truman expressed himself as desiring a mutually agreeable solution and suggested, with the concurrence of the United States Secretary of State, that a detailed statement of the Canadian desiderata should be submitted as the next stage.

5. Accordingly, on March 19, 1949, an Oral Message was handed to the United States Ambassador to Canada jointly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence (a copy of the oral message is attached.)²⁴ In broad terms the Canadian Government requested the United States to relinquish certain rights to civil and criminal jurisdiction in the base areas, the right to establish a United States postal facilities in the base area, and certain customs free privileges and exemptions from taxation. None of the privileges which the Canadian Government requested the United States Government to relinquish are essential for the military operation of the bases.

6. On May 25, 1949, in the course of the Canada-United States discussions for a revision of the Bilateral Civil Aviation Agreement, the United States proposed a revision of Article II, Section (5) of the Bases Agreement, relating to the use of the bases by commercial aircraft. In a Note dated June 2, 1949 (a copy of which is attached)†, the Canadian Ambassador to the United States expressed the Canadian Government's willingness to meet the United States position in this respect. The Note stated in part "in view of this important concession in relation to these bases, the Canadian Government expects that the United States Government will give favourable consideration to the Canadian desiderata with respect to the Bases Agreement and that the Canadian Government's willingness to meet the United States position in this respect will be taken into account in discussions concerning the Bases Agreement which should take place at an early date".

7. The Canadian Position

The bases in Newfoundland were leased to the United States by the United Kingdom in 1941 when the war had reached its most critical stage. The base areas are leased to the United States for 99 years from 1941 for certain specified purposes, military co-operation and defence. Since that time, Newfoundland has become a Province of Canada and the extraterritorial privileges, particularly those relating to non-military activities, have become incompatible with the defence relationships of the two countries.

8. Article 28 of the Bases Agreement (copy attached)† states that the signatories "agree to give sympathetic consideration to any representations which either may make after this Agreement has been in force a reasonable time, proposing a review of any of the provisions of this Agreement to determine whether modifications in the light of experience are necessary or desirable." The recommendation of November 20, 1946, of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, which has been accepted by both Governments, states, inter alia, "that defence co-operation projects in either country should be agreed to by both Governments, should confer no permanent rights or status upon either country and should be without prejudice to the sovereignty of either country". It is the view of the Canadian Government that "modifications in the light of experience" are now both desirable and necessary.

9. It is believed that defence co-operation between Canada and the United States has developed as successfully as it has because each country has respected the sovereignty of the other. The Canadian position is not, however, based solely on sovereignty. The exercise of these extraterritorial rights, despite all possible care, might well lead to local incidents which would jeopardize present harmonious Canada-United States defence collaboration. It is almost inevitable that there should be, at some time, acts committed which would lead to civil or criminal proceedings affecting civilians. Freedom from customs duties and exemptions from taxation, in the form now enjoyed by United States forces in Newfoundland bases, may lead to unavoidable abuses which will be resented by the Canadian population. Indeed, such incidents have already occurred and such resentment has already been expressed in the Canadian Press.

10. In this respect, an excerpt from the judgement of Dunfield J. in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland (copy attached)† in two actions brought by Newfoundland customs officials against a United States Officer and (in one action) the Base Commander, is worth citing. The actions were brought for assault and false imprisonment. The defendants maintained that they were not subject to the jurisdiction of the civil courts in Newfoundland under the Bases Agreements.

The judgement in part reads as follows:

"This is not a case of a passing army or a transient occupation, such as is contemplated in the older books, where the parties were accustomed to treat each other with the apprehensive courtesy of two cats on a fence or two gentlemen of quality in the days of the duel. These armed forces have to live side by side with the people of the countries where the Bases are for three generations at least. Thus we find it laid down almost of necessity in Clause 4 of the Preamble to the Agreement that 'The Agreement shall be fulfilled in a spirit of good neighbourliness and that details of its practical application shall be arranged by friendly co-operation'. We find the spirit of these provisions appearing again passim, as in Article I (3) and (4), Article II, Article V (which provides for mutual adjustments), Article XXVII, Article XXIX (which provides for mutual adjustments). On the basis of all this one cannot but feel that the application of common sense to any situation not within the four corners of the Base Agreement is not merely permissible but indicated; and that any question arising should be approached not in a spirit of strict technicality but in the spirit of Clause 4 of the Preamble."

11. In the opinion of the Canadian Government, the privileges which the United States has been asked to relinquish and which are set out below are matter for urgent consideration by the United States Government. The Canadian Government considers that the rights of the United States forces at the Newfoundland bases should be brought as nearly into accord with present Canada-United States defence co-operation projects as is consistent with Canadian recognition of the United States rights to occupy the base areas for defence purposes. It is therefore emphasized that privileges which the Canadian Government has requested the United States Government to relinquish are not essential for the military operation of the bases.

12.(a) The United States Government has been asked to relinquish the right of United States civil and criminal jurisdiction within the base areas over United States service personnel and United States nationals, and criminal jurisdiction over foreign nationals and British subjects (see Article IV), except as provided for by the Canadian Act governing the discipline of United States forces in Canada which was enacted at the request of the United States authorities. (A copy of the "Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act" of 1947 is attached.)†

(b) Customs free privileges (other than those now allowed for United States forces located in Canada) for goods consigned to service personnel and to employed United States nationals, and for goods consigned to United States institutions (e.g. the Post Exchange) for sale to service personnel or employed U.S. nationals and their dependents (see Article XIV). The relinquishment by the United States of the privileges provided for by Article XIV of the Agreement would, in fact, only limit the privileges set out in that Article as follows:

(i) no benefits in respect of consignments to contractors under sub-paragraph 1 (a) would be allowed;

(ii) treatment provided by the provisions of sub-paragraph 1 (c) and the latter part of 1 (d) beginning with the words "and of contractors" would not be permitted.

(c) The right to establish United States postal facilities in the base areas (see Article XVI). When the present extraterritorial extensions of United States Postal services cease, the Canadian Post Office Department will establish such services as the local conditions justify. Canadian postage would, of course, be used. There would be no objection to the use of a United States diplomatic bag for the carrying of official United States correspondence.

(d) Exemption from taxation (see Article XVII) other than any such exemption now in effect in respect of the present defence co-operation projects in Canada. Present tax exemptions are set out in the Canada-United States Income Tax Convention.

13. The Canadian Government, therefore, desires the United States Government to agree to relinquish those extraterritorial rights set out in the preceding paragraph.

NATIONAL DEFENCE; DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENCE

5. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 3rd,† said that Mr. Johnson, the U.S. Secretary of Defence, would attend a special meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee the following day at 11.30 a.m. Among the topics of mutual interest to be discussed were the following:

- (a) General review of strategic situation.
- (b) Canada-U.S. joint defence projects.
- (c) U.S. bases in Newfoundland.
- (d) Canada-U.S. industrial co-operation
- (e) Power and navigation developments in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence basin.

It was felt that this might be an excellent opportunity to put forward again the Canadian position with respect to the rights enjoyed by the United States in their Newfoundland bases. There was no doubt that a considerable amount of smuggling was carried on from these bases. It was feared that the present situation might lead to serious incidents. The problem could probably be solved only if the United States were prepared to relinquish certain of the extraordinary rights presently enjoyed.

A further problem that was giving some concern with respect to the U.S. bases in Newfoundland was the fact that American technicians were employed at double the prevailing rates for Newfoundland whereas Newfoundland labour was often employed by the U.S. authorities at something less than the current prevailing rates. It would be suggested that Newfoundland technicians and labour be paid by U.S. military authorities at the local prevailing rates.

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Minister of National Defence on discussions to be held with the U.S. Secretary of Defence the following day.

1. The Prime Minister welcomed Mr. Johnson on behalf of the Canadian Government. While informal visits between Ottawa and Washington such as Mr. Johnson's were certain to arouse speculation by the press, they were of the greatest value in that they provided an opportunity for members and officials of both Governments to meet and discuss in a true spirit of friendship, the mutual problems confronting these two countries.

2. The United States Secretary of Defense delivered to the Prime Minister and the people of Canada the greetings of President Truman. It was in a real spirit of friendship that this visit was being made to Canada. There were no major problems which the United States Government wished him to discuss at this meeting. All problems concerning North American defence were being handled very satisfactorily by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence where a spirit of common purpose and mutual understanding prevailed. The facilities of the United States Department of Defense were available to Canada. The Military Assistance Act which was presently before Congress would permit the United States Department of Defense to purchase equipment for the Canadian Armed Forces.

I. General Situation

3. The Minister of National Defence, referring to the general situation as it affected the North American continent, stated that the Canadian authorities believed that the only combination of powers which could constitute a threat to the security of this continent at the present time was the Soviet Union and her satellites. It was not believed that there would be any significant change in the economic and political system of the Soviet Union which would tend to minimize this threat. Similarly it was considered that there would be no expansion of Soviet controlled territories in the immediate future that might materially affect the Soviet capabilities for making war.

On the basis of current Intelligence it was felt that Soviet aggression if it occurred would be planned well in advance of the event. Although at this time war was not regarded as inevitable, there remained the possibility of an outbreak occurring through a combination of incidents. In the event of war the Soviet Union would probably first attempt to consolidate its position in Eurasia and then establish advance bases from which air strikes would be made against the North American continent prior to any attempted invasion. This undoubtedly would be accompanied by subversive action aimed at the disruption of the economy and war potential of both Canada and the United States with the object of reducing the available manpower and retarding the flow of necessary supplies.

A war in the immediate future would be fought with improved-design weapons used in the Second World War and such other new weapons as may have passed through the initial experimental stages at the time of attack.

While sabotage, subversion and attempts to infiltrate and penetrate the Government and the economic structure of the country would probably take place in the early stages of a conflict, the Canadian authorities were of the opinion that during this phase any open attacks against the North American continent would be diversionary in character while the main Soviet objective continued to be the consolidation of its position in Eurasia.

On this analysis, the roles of the Armed Forces were similar to those in the Second World War. The Canadian Navy would be primarily concerned with convoy work in the North Atlantic; the Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force while maintaining sufficient forces in Canada to deal with diversionary attacks, would be employed to assist the allied powers in the carrying out of the strategic plan. As opposed to maintaining large forces in being, the Canadian services were organized so as to provide a nucleus which could be rapidly expanded in time of war.

The organization for overall defence planning was similar to that of the United States, the major difference existing in the matter of procurement which in Canada was carried out by the Department of Trade and Commerce through a Crown agency known as the Canadian Commercial Corporation. This latter organization in war would probably be expanded to form a Department of Munitions and Supply similar to the organization which existed in World War II.

The organization for Canada-U.S. defence coordination had proved very satisfactory and like the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was sufficiently flexible to meet any requirements that might be made of it.

4. The United States Secretary of Defense, referring with express approval to Mr. Claxton's appreciation of the situation, stated that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff considered the outlook for peace considerably improved. While a year ago the threat of war appeared imminent, the situation was now much brighter. Probably the stand taken by Marshal Tito was the first indication of a break in Soviet solidarity. In various ways the United States Government were endeavouring to strengthen Tito with a view to widening the schism between Russia and Yugoslavia. It was now believed that the accepted estimate concerning the time when the Russians could produce their first atomic bomb was one year too early. Even when Russia had the ability to produce the bomb, the rate of production would be limited because of the shortage of uranium. The supply of uranium available to the Russians was now considered to be less than that previously estimated; in addition, her reserves were considerably smaller. The first Russian bombs would probably be only the equivalent of the original U.S. bomb, the effectiveness of which had been greatly increased. All stocks of U.S. bombs have been remodelled and were now of the new improved design.

While Russia had the will to fight, it was felt that they knew they lacked the necessary capacity. So long as the Western Hemisphere maintained its economic and military strength, the threat of Russian aggression would continue to be checked.

To maintain the economic strength of the United States and at the same time cause no decrease in her military strength, the greatest economies were being made to ensure that the appropriations voted for the Armed Forces were utilized most efficiently. To this end, duplication of certain facilities of the three Armed Forces was being eliminated without impairing the standards of efficiency or strength and so far as it was practicable certain services were being combined in order to obtain the maximum effort for each dollar of defence expenditure.

Referring to the Basic Security Plan, the Minister of National Defence observed that the planning agencies of both countries, working under the direction of their respective Chiefs of Staff who were responsible for the Canada-U.S. Basic Security Plan, were engaged in developing a closely integrated defence plan for the northern half of the North American continent. On the subject of standardization, the present Military Assistance Bill would provide for the rebuilding of certain European munitions industries. It was considered to be more economical and practical at this time to rebuild partially destroyed munitions plants in European countries than to attempt to re-equip European forces with equipments of accepted Canada-U.S.-U.K. design.

Referring to the Basic Security Plan and the threat to the North American continent, Mr. Johnson stated that the United States had fairly accurate intelligence concerning Russian supplies and reserves. The destruction of these would not in itself bring Russia to settlement and, in the U.S. view, it was felt that settlement with the U.S.S.R. could not be obtained until Russia was completely defeated. In developing the forces required to achieve Russia's defeat, it was essential to give all possible assistance to the United Kingdom and the countries of Western Europe. It was President Truman's hope, however, that in providing this assistance to Western Europe, there would be no diminution in the strength of the defence forces of Canada and the United States.

II. Canada-United States Joint Defence Projects

5. The Minister of National Defence reviewed the status of the present Canada-U.S. Joint Defence Projects. As between the Canadian Army and the U.S. Army, there was a continuous exchange of officers. The great advantage of this arrangement was that the officers of one Army were integrated into the establishment of the other and actually filled vacancies which would normally be filled by the country's own Service personnel. In the matter of training, there was an exchange of officers on many courses in Canada and in the United States. In some instances, U.S. officers served as members of the instructional staff of Canadian courses. Both Canadian Army and U.S. Army equipment was tested under joint arrangements or certain projects were carried out independently by one country for the other. In either case, both progress reports and final reports were exchanged. At Fort Churchill, joint experiments were being carried out on transport, weapons, clothing, engineer stores and signal stores. The Northwest Highway System, the maintenance of which is the responsibility of the Canadian Army, was now in good condition.

Cooperation between the Royal Canadian Navy and the United States Navy covered a wide field,—hydrographic and aerial survey, weather station supply mission and joint exercises on the West Coast, where certain naval research, particularly in the field of anti-submarine warfare, was being carried out.

The Royal Canadian Air Force, working in close collaboration with the United States Air Force, continued to exchange officers on a basis similar to that in the Canadian Army. In addition, the Air Forces of the two countries were cooperating in exercises to test the air defence command and were engaged in celestial fix orientation and in the declination of the magnetic pole survey, in addition to the well-established search and rescue operations.

A combined U.S.-Canadian joint Arctic exercise known as "North Star" was being planned by the Armies and Air Forces of both countries. This would take place in the Whitehorse-Burwash Landing-Northway area during January and February of 1950. This exercise would be of great value, particularly in the field of development of common procedures, doctrines and techniques for combined U.S.-Canadian ground forces in the Arctic. Similarly, in the case of the Air Forces, the exercise would provide an opportunity to develop further the combined joint doctrine and technique for the employment of Air Forces operating in the north country.

In the field of Defence Research, there was a continuing exchange of personnel between the research establishments of both countries. The research programmes of both the U.S. and Canadian organizations were being integrated with a view to avoiding as far as it was practicable, any duplication of effort and to making the fullest utilization of the Defence Research facilities of both countries. Facilities had been granted to the U.S. Army to carry out trials on toxic agents at the Canadian Defence Research Experimental Station at Suffield.

In the field of standardization, progress had been made in connection with staff procedures, operating methods and training techniques. In the broader field, standardization of screw threads had been agreed to during the last year. The major problem as far as the Armed Forces were concerned was still that of equipment. Until agreement could be reached concerning the types of equipment required and utilization of the industrial capacity in the three countries to produce the agreed types, practical results in the field of equipment standardization could not be expected. At present Canada was in an awkward position vis-à-vis the United States and the United Kingdom, in that it was essential to utilize the equipments of both countries and to carry out training on both U.S. and U.K. equipments. Economically and financially this was unsound. The Canadian authorities desired to get rid of the present old equipments and obtain the new standard equipment at the earliest possible date.

6. The U.S. Secretary of Defense observed that the previous day the title of the department controlling the U.S. Armed Forces had been changed to the United States Department of Defense. He outlined in brief the overall organization of this Department. In addition to the Secretary, there is a Deputy Secretary, who is now Mr. Stephen Earley, who deputizes in every sense of the word as Defense Secretary. In addition there are four Assistant Secretaries who shared the various tasks of the overall direction of the Department. In this group, and answerable to the Secretary of Defense through the Deputy Secretary are the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Air Force and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Johnson then went on to describe a new Committee which he termed as an economy committee, the purpose of which was to investigate the business side of all three Services and to make recommendations by which sound business practices could be extended in the operations of the Department of Defense.

III. U.S. Bases in Newfoundland

7. The Minister of National Defence stated that Canada welcomed the arrangements which the United States had made concerning the development of the U.S. bases in Newfoundland as a part of the overall defence plan for the North American continent.

However, the United States held under the Bases Agreement of 1941, certain non-military rights which had never been asked for by the United States in any other part of Canada where the U.S. forces were collaborating with Canadian forces in the development of North American defence projects. Mr. Claxton then went on to point out that the four non-military rights which the Canadian authorities considered to be not essential for the efficient military operation of the bases concerned the matter of civil and criminal jurisdiction over the U.S. service personnel and U.S. nationals, customs-free privileges, postal facilities, and exemption from taxation.

The Minister of National Defence then described an incident which had taken place in Newfoundland on the 9th of July, 1948.

Under the existing laws of Newfoundland, civilians were not permitted to receive or possess goods which were purchased within the base areas. It was well known, however, that a great many articles which were purchased within the base areas were finding their way into the hands of civilians. This was particularly so in the case of cigarettes which sold within the base areas for approximately one-sixth of the current price outside. As part of their normal duties the Customs officials were in the habit of stopping and searching vehicles as a precaution against smuggling by both Newfoundland and U.S. base personnel. In the particular case in question, two Newfoundland officials (the Chief Preventive Officer, Mr. Evans, and the District Inspector of Criminal Investigation) who were unarmed, stopped a U.S. military vehicle coming from the direction of Argentia. The vehicle was driven by a civilian Newfoundland employee. In the car was a U.S. mail bag concerning which the Newfoundland officials took no action. However, a search of the vehicle disclosed certain contraband articles. As the Newfoundland officials were taking the vehicle into custody, one of the three U.S. personnel who were in the vehicle asked if it would be possible to phone and report that he would be late at his appointment because of the action of the Newfoundland police. Apparently, however, General Haynes' headquarters was phoned and within a matter of minutes a U.S. vehicle with two military police and a Captain Prevoneau arrived. The officer at pistol point demanded the release of the U.S. personnel. In the evidence which was given in the subsequent litigation for damages on the grounds of assault which was brought by Mr. Evans against Captain Prevoneau, it appeared that Captain Prevoneau was in a highly excited state and that his pistol had the safety catch off.

Mr. Claxton observed that had the R.C.M.P. been involved in this incident it is unlikely that they would have submitted to the request of Captain Prevoneau and that with pistols drawn a most unfortunate incident might have resulted. The Canadian authorities were most anxious to avoid incidents such as this and it was hoped that the existing non-military rights could be modified in such a way as to remove any grounds for unfortunate incidents which could militate against the friendly relationship and cordiality which had existed between Canada and the U.S. on all matters of defence projects.

8. The United States Ambassador observed that the interpretation by the United States military authorities of the Bases Agreement gave personnel of the U.S. Armed Forces stationed in the U.S. Bases in Newfoundland extraordinary privileges concerning liability to Canadian civil and criminal jurisdiction.

9. The U.S. Secretary of Defense stated that this matter had not previously been brought to his attention and suggested that it be discussed further subsequent to the meeting.

IV. St. Lawrence Waterway—Power and Navigation Development

10. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that the industrial development in the Province of Ontario produced a continuing demand for a greater supply of hydro-electric power. The interests of the Province of Ontario in the St. Lawrence project were primarily those of power development and the situation was reaching the point where it might be necessary to proceed with the power development at an early date. If this took place, it would be very difficult subsequently to undertake the navigation project. It was realized that there were various interests impeding progress on the overall project.

11. The Prime Minister stated that the delay in the construction of the St. Lawrence waterways power navigation project would be construed in certain quarters as an attempt to impede the industrial development of the Province of Ontario and that the Federal authorities who were anxious to see the power and navigation project begin at the same time, were desirous of avoiding the situation whereby the Province of Ontario and the State of New York might try to take unilateral action to complete the power project on their own.

12. The U.S. Secretary of Defense stated that although there was complete understanding as between the Governments of Canada and the United States, it was considered unlikely that the project would come up for discussion during the present session of the U.S. Congress. Time was quickly running out and as priority had been given to the Military Assistance Act there was little likelihood that the St. Lawrence power and navigation project would be discussed by Congress before January. However, President Truman had indicated his desire to see this project authorized and Mr. Johnson felt hopeful that eventually, if not at this Session, authorization for the project would be forthcoming.

V. Canada-U.S. Industrial Cooperation

13. The Minister of National Defence stated that Canada attached great importance to developing industrial collaboration with the United States. The Canada-U.S. Joint Industrial Mobilization Committee was now in existence and provided the necessary machinery for industrial collaboration between the two countries. It had met and had established sub-committees in the fields of non-ferrous metals, chemicals and explosives, forest products, mechanical transport and administrative controls.

14. The U.S. Secretary of Defense stated that the United States authorities agreed with the Canadian point of view and had in fact utilized the services of the best trained industrialists in developing United States plans for industrial mobilization. It was essential that the plans for the utilization of the industrial capacity of both countries be coordinated in order to ensure the maximum and most efficient use of North American war making potential.

15. The Prime Minister, referring to the problem of purchasing equipment from the United States, pointed out that trade in military equipments had to be done outside the present satisfactory domestic trade arrangements which existed between the two countries. To offset purchases in military equipment by utilizing Canadian surpluses in normal trade would in the long run weaken the present domestic trade arrangements. This of course would have a cumulative effect which would eventually reduce purchases of American equipment by the Canadian Armed Forces. It was hoped that under the Military Assistance Act it would be possible for the United States Armed Forces to purchase certain articles of military equipment from Canada so that these purchases could offset Canadian requirements in U.S. equipment; in fact, in the military field an exchange of "goods-for-goods" was the best possible basis at this time.

16. The U.S. Secretary of Defense observed that he would be happy to carry on further discussion on this matter following the meeting.

TELEGRAM EX-1973

Ottawa, August 12, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

The following for Honourable Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defense from Honourable Brooke Claxton, Begins:

1. I cannot tell you how much we appreciate your making a visit to us, particularly at this time, as well as the understanding and sympathetic attitude you showed us on all points discussed.

2. In accordance with your suggestion I am forwarding to you the list of the tank spares urgently needed to keep the tanks we have in operation. If there is any way in which these might be made available on arrangements other than purchase at regular prices I would be only too glad to hear further from you in this connection.

3. Since our talk last night we have given further consideration to the Bill HR-5895 and this has further been discussed, I understand, by some of our officers with yours. Apparently they agree with the view I expressed to you last night that, in its present form, the Bill does not expressly permit purchase by United States government or services for their own use of military equipment manufactured in Canada. I am advised the "buy-American" legislation would continue to prevent such purchases unless that legislation were effectively repealed. For the reasons discussed by us this would handicap, if not prevent, standardization and intelligent integration of the industrial capacity of both countries to meet any emergency, as well as make it difficult, if not impossible, for us financially to apply United States funds for extensive purchases of military equipment particularly as we are now buying from you far more than you are buying from us of ordinary civilian goods.

4. A further point is the provision made in Section 408(e) of the Bill under which, to purchase military equipment in the United States, we would have to pay, in advance, "the full cost, actual or estimated, of such equipment, materials or service". This provision is, we understand, not in accordance with your own purchasing practice and it would not be in accordance with ours under which payment is either made on delivery or in certain cases upon progress. Indeed, under our treasury laws, payment can only now be made in this way. Further, as you know, production of major items of equipment takes a number of years and our practice is to budget and to secure advance committal authority for several years to be met by annual appropriations in accordance with delivery and progress. I understand that this is your practice too. To have to pay in advance the whole cost of equipment to be delivered some years ahead would make budgeting, appropriating and financing so difficult as to discourage such purchases and defeat the objects of the Bill.

5. It would seem to us also that, since we are one of the few countries which has always paid the United States for everything it got, and will presumably continue to do so, it would be discriminating against us to make this condition when we are going to pay you anyway, as we always have, while other countries are going to get the goods for nothing. Perhaps we have misunderstood the meaning of the law or the way in which it would work under your system of government financing. What we understand you are aiming at is partnership in which both our countries and others would work together in closest cooperation. Under this, as I suggested last night, it would seem to make sense for us to buy certain items of equipment from you, and you to buy from us items of equipment which are within our capacity to manufacture as well and as cheaply as you could do.

6. I appreciate that, in the case of completed military equipment the difficulty regarding advance payment to which I have referred might not be so serious as we would be making payment virtually at the moment of delivery. In connection with a contract for procurement, my understanding is that, even if it were possible legally for your Department to order a sufficient quantity of any item of equipment to cover your needs as well as our own, this would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for you to finance out of your appropriation—as it would be for us.

7. These views are of course intended for your own information. In view of the entirely satisfactory talks we had, to, I believe, the lasting benefit of our two countries, I hesitate to bring these points forward, but you were good enough to express the same concern I felt about them during our talk last night and, in view of their great importance in the work of joint defence, I thought I should bring them to your attention without delay.

8. I should add that from all sides today I heard nothing but praise for everything you did during the course of your visit. It was immensely satisfactory to all of us. Once again thank you. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, August 17, 1949

My dear Mr. Claxton:

I wish to tell you again of my deep appreciation for the opportunity to visit Ottawa and talk with you on our mutual problems. You may be assured of my strong feeling of friendship toward our Canadian neighbor and of our effort to remedy those conditions that give concern to both of us.

I will certainly make every effort to secure the transfer of the tank spares and, as you probably know, General Bolte and Brigadier Taber are already in the process of making arrangements to accomplish some transfers of corresponding equipment. I have, accordingly, sent the list that you forwarded to General Bolte so that he may be sure that it is included with the other items of equipment that we are attempting to arrange to transfer to the Canadian Army.

Your conclusions with respect to H.R. 5895 as expressed in your message are substantially correct. In the original legislation we proposed to Congress, such difficulties as you outline did exist, but the Congress has made changes which, if adopted, will not facilitate our standardization program.

I would assume from your message that of most concern to you now, is the matter of advance payment. Certainly I would presume, as you do, that this might not be so difficult, as it may be possible to adjust deliveries to harmonize with your deposits and contracts.

The Military Assistance legislation now before the Congress does not prohibit purchases in Canada, since Sec. 401 of H.R. 5895 authorizes procurement of items to be transferred under the bill "from any source". However in so far as purchases of equipment for our own armed forces, payable out of our Department of Defense budget are concerned, the "buy American" legislation is still applicable.

It is always of great benefit to me to talk to those in other countries who have corresponding responsibilities and I would like again to assure you of my deep appreciation of your kindness and hospitality and the pleasant visit to Ottawa which we hope soon to be able to reciprocate.]

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON

NATIONAL DEFENCE; VISIT OF THE U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENSE;
CANADA-U.S. CO-OPERATION

25. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 10th, reported upon the recent visit of the U.S. Secretary of Defence.

There had been a meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee with Mr. Johnson, at which matters of mutual interest to Canada and the United States had been discussed. When Canadian views had been expressed, they had reflected the Cabinet's decisions prior to the meeting.

The strategic situation had been reviewed and it was thought that there was general betterment. Mr. Johnson had indicated that the date by which Russia was expected to have the atomic bomb was now somewhat later than earlier estimates. On Canada-U.S. defence collaboration, Mr. Johnson had expressed himself as being well satisfied with arrangements. On the question of U.S. bases in Newfoundland, strong representations had been made to Mr. Johnson for some curtailment of the present extra-military rights which the U.S. enjoyed under the terms of the Bases Agreement. It had been made clear to Mr. Johnson that this was not merely a question of safeguarding Canadian sovereignty but that the continued exercise by the U.S. of their non-military rights might provoke incidents which would have an adverse effect on Canada-U.S. relations. With regard to industrial co-operation, Mr. Johnson had been under the impression that the Military Assistance Bill now before Congress fully met Canadian requirements. From the Canadian point of view, however, this Bill had two serious defects in that the United States were not authorized to buy arms in Canada for their own use, and Canada was required to pay cash in advance on purchases of U.S. military equipment.

Although Mr. Johnson was himself sympathetic to the Canadian position regarding U.S. bases in Newfoundland and had expressed himself as favouring a restoration of Hyde Park arrangements in the field of military purchasing, it seemed doubtful whether these two problems would be resolved to the satisfaction of the Canadian government.

It was suggested, therefore, that renewed representations be made to the U.S. State Department indicating the importance that the Canadian government attached to an early solution of these outstanding issues. If, after some further delay, it was felt that no real results had been achieved, consideration might then be given to the policy that should be followed. Possibly these unsatisfactory aspects of Canadian-U.S. defence relations should be publicized.

26. The Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned that formal communications had already been sent to the U.S. State Department on the matters referred to by Mr. Claxton. In those circumstances it might be best if the Canadian Ambassador in Washington were to follow these up by a personal call supported by an informal communication.

It seemed unlikely that both the objectionable features of the Military Assistance Bill could be eliminated. While U.S. government officials were sympathetic, they had been preoccupied with other aspects of the Bill and the Canadian position had not been supported in the manner it might otherwise have been.

27. Mr. Pearson was planning an early trip to Washington to discuss other problems that had arisen such as the implementation of the new air agreement. These important defence problems might also be discussed at that time.

28. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence and agreed that the Canadian position with respect to U.S. military bases in Newfoundland and industrial defence co-operation be again brought to the attention of the U.S. government, the means for so doing to be a matter for decision by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Minister of National Defence.

SHORT RANGE EMERGENCY PLAN (ABC 105)

Summary

1. The plan provides for the employment of the Armed Forces of the Allies in the event of a war with Russia during the US fiscal year 1949.

Basic UndertakingsDefence of the Western Hemisphere

2. This is in conformity with the Canada-US basic security plan and US agreements with South American countries.

3. Minimum necessary forces are allocated to this task.

4. Canadian commitments are within present service plans and resources.

Withdrawal—Europe

5. The plan contemplates the initial withdrawal of Allied forces in Europe to the Rhine. Further withdrawal will be under direction of the Allied C[ommander] in C[hief] Western Europe.

6. Occupation forces during the withdrawal can expect no reinforcement.

Secure the United Kingdom

7. To be performed initially by British forces. It is considered that during the first six months the British forces will have the capability of defending the UK to the extent that it can be used initially as an operating base area. Thereafter some reinforcement in fighter aircraft and A[nti] A[ircraft] defences will be required unless the Allied air offensive has reduced the scale of Soviet attack.

Secure the Cairo-Suez Base Area

8. This area is to be secured and supported initially through the Mediterranean. Forces allocated to secure the base area consist of UK and US Army and Air Forces.

9. The L[ines] O[f] C[ommunication] through the Mediterranean will be operated as long as possible. The following weaknesses are accepted:

(a) Defence of Spain will be left to Spanish Forces;

(b) Defence of Sicily will be left to Italian Forces;

(c) Air Defence and security of bases on the North African coast will be provided by the local friendly forces augmented by some USAF units.

10. British and US light carrier forces will be used on defensive missions in protection of shipping through the Mediterranean. The US carrier task force in the Mediterranean will be engaged primarily in securing and controlling the sea area and secondarily in conducting other offensive operations. US Navy or Royal Navy transport will be provided for movement of Air Force fighters, carrier replacement aircraft and crews from the US.

Secure the Bering Sea-Japan Sea-Yellow Sea Line

11. This is essentially a US task. Forces are those now assigned to the area.

12. The security of the Australasian area will be provided by Australian, New Zealand, Dutch and other Allies.

Air Offensive

13. In conjunction with the atomic campaign, strategic air forces as available will conduct conventional bombing operations.

14. US Strategic Air Command will carry out Atomic Bomb operations from bases in UK (alternatively Iceland), the Cairo-Suez-Aden area, and Okinawa.

15. Carrier task groups will supplement and support the air offensive to the extent practical.

Neutralization of Oil Installations

16. Plans will be prepared by US and UK as appropriate to neutralize Middle East Oil installations should the Allies be forced to abandon them.

Control of Sea Areas

17. Naval forces will be deployed to control sea areas necessary to the execution of the plan.

Re-evaluation

18. It is considered necessary to make an evaluation of the situation at approximately D + 3 months in order to determine major courses of action from that time forward.

19. At that time the following factors not now firmly evaluated should be more readily predictable:

- (a) Results of the Strategic Air Offensive;
- (b) Soviet initial strategy and its success;
- (c) Importance of Middle East oil to the Allied war effort;
- (d) Exploitation of Soviet weaknesses;
- (e) Whether the balance of forces allocated for control the Mediterranean and Security of the UK are adequate.

20. Dependent on these factors, together with various political and psychological considerations, it will be necessary to determine whether the line of action of the plan should be departed from. Likely alternative courses are:

- (a) Shifting the emphasis of the Allied effort to the UK at the expense of the Middle East area.
- (b) Shifting the focal point of strength from the Eastern end of the Mediterranean to the Western.

Second Period

21. Provided no major change in the line of strategy to be followed results from the re-evaluation it is considered that the second period (D plus 6 months forward) will involve the continuation of the tasks previously outlined and in addition:

- (a) Possible strengthening of air and naval defence of the UK. The forces for this task would in the main be diverted from the Middle East.
- (b) Possible additional naval forces for security of LOC in the Mediterranean and possibly the longer sea route around the Cape of Good Hope.
- (c) Expansion of the Cairo-Suez-Aden Base area.

Further Operations

22. By D plus 12 months the Allies will have available over and above forces already committed approximately 20 divisions together with air groups totalling approximately 710 aircraft. (Note—Canadian commitment is two divisions).

3. Possible tasks for this “package force” might include:

- (a) Re-opening of the Mediterranean;
- (b) Regaining of Middle East Oil.

Ottawa, February 2, 1949

We discussed at the Chiefs of Staff Committee meeting this morning the revision of the Short Range Emergency Plan (ABC 105) dated January 10th. General Foulkes pointed out that the main change was to be found in paragraphs 5 and 6 which refer to the withdrawal of Allied forces in Europe to the Rhine. He said that this had been put in afterwards to bring the plan into line with Field Marshal [B.L.] Montgomery's planning. He noted that the plan would be revised in May in London, and that we had been invited to send our planners.

In revising the plan in May, he suggested the possibility of adding a paragraph concerning the reinforcement of the Continent so that the paper would be brought further into line with Western Union planning. It was generally agreed that Western Union countries were aware that some sort of secret planning was going on, and it was thought to be in our interest to bring the plans into line as much as possible.

A brief discussion took place on the possible Atlantic defence organization. General Foulkes thought it would be essential to create at an early stage a military committee, if for no other reason than to prevent the European members making direct application to the United States for military equipment without regard for any over-all planning. He felt that only the creation of a military committee could avoid this sort of request. I pointed out that there was some indication that American thinking at the moment was to go very slowly on creating a military committee or other subsidiary organs which, in the American view, could only lead to complications in planning. I also pointed out that the Americans seemed to be tending to the idea of building up Western Union with equipment before creating any effective Atlantic organization. Once this had been done, there was certainly an argument that it would then be easier to have effective Atlantic agencies.

It was stressed at the meeting that, during the discussions in Washington, it was undesirable to raise the question of detailed organization under the Atlantic Pact, as the main point was to ensure that the Americans signed the Pact, and we could argue the question of organization under it later.

Item No. 3 on C.S.C. Agenda for April 12

CANADA-U.S. EMERGENCY DEFENCE PLAN

1. You will recall that the M[military] C[o-operation] C[ommittee] prepared in 1946, a Basic Security Plan and that, since that time, several Appendices have been given qualified approval by the Chiefs; also, that in 1948 it was decided to prepare a Canada-U.S. Emergency Defence Plan (a) based on the current capabilities of Canada and the U.S. and (b) consistent with broader planning and, (c) which would be put into effect in the event of an emergency arising at the present time.

2. On March 25, the M.C.C. agreed on such a plan (copy attached)† designed for the defence of North America (excluding Mexico) and its vital sea and air communications at this time.²⁵ It will be followed in the near future by a revised Basic Security Plan and Basic Security Programme of which the latter will suggest the defence measures that should be taken (e.g. construction of installations) over a period of several years.

3. The Emergency Plan will obviously have to be revised from time to time to take into account the improving capabilities of the Canadian and U.S. forces, including measures completed in implementation of the long-term Basic Security Programme. As the Emergency Plan points out, periodic revision will also be necessary to keep it in line with broader planning.

4. While the rest of the Emergency Plan appears to call only for the initiation of the detailed operational planning necessary to permit, in the event of war at this time, execution of the operations envisaged in the plan, it would seem worthwhile to draw the attention of C.S.C. to para 8 (pages 4 and 5), parts of which are phrased in such a way as to suggest the possibility of increased U.S. activities in Canada prior to emergency—e.g. “(c) Establishment and coordination of emergency air defence system”.

5. The plan envisages the following main forms of probable Soviet attack on this continent in the event of war in 1949:

Approved generally by the Chiefs of Staff on April 26, 1949, subject to clarification of the principles of command. At that time the Chiefs of Staff were unaware that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved the Canada-U.S. Emergency Defence plan without qualification.

(a) one-way B-29 attacks on important industrial targets in Canada and the U.S.; two-way B-29 attacks on Alaska and Northwestern Canada; light bomber and fighter attacks on Alaska;

(b) submarine attacks in both oceans; mining of sea approaches; attacks on ports and coastal targets;

(c) small-scale amphibious and airborne landings of short duration;

(d) use of chemical and biological but not atomic weapons.

6. The strategic concept is to employ the minimum of forces for defence and the maximum for offence. Under the plan of operations, the area of primary responsibility of the Canadian forces would be Canada, including Newfoundland and Labrador, and that of the U.S. forces would be the U.S., Alaska and Greenland, although this division is not intended to exclude U.S. forces from Canada. The basic operational tasks in an emergency, in order of priority, are considered to be (1) defence of vital areas against air attack; (2) protection of coastal sea routes; and (3) reduction of enemy lodgements.

7. On page 51 the formula for command, that appears satisfactory, is given. It is, in essence, that any forces in Canada, Labrador and Newfoundland—except those at U.S. leased bases in Newfoundland—employed in the execution of the tasks envisaged by the Plan, would operate under a Canadian Commander, although a U.S. force in Canada would be under the immediate command of a U.S. Commander for administration. Similar principles are suggested in connection with Canadian forces operating in the U.S., Alaska and Greenland.

8. Incidentally, para 2 on page 51 mistakenly refers to “leased bases in...Labrador”.

X. CANADA-U.S. BASIC SECURITY PLAN—PROTECTION OF SEA LINES OF COMMUNICATIONS

29. The Chief of the Naval Staff pointed out that the Canada-U.S. Basic Security Plan was presently being revised on a basis which would provide for both an emergency and a long term plan. All the appendices of the original Basic Security Plan had been approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries except that dealing with the protection of sea lines of communications.† The concept and the force requirements had been a matter of considerable discussion. This appendix had now been reviewed by the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff and their modifications had been embodied in the recommendations of the Canada-U.S. Military Co-operation Committee.²⁶

30. The Chief of the Air Staff questioned the value of approving the estimate of force requirements for the "Protection of Sea Lines of Communications" when this appendix was out of date in view of the present revision.

31. The Committee, after further discussion, and in view of the fact that the other appendices of the Canada-U.S. Basic Security Plan had been approved in their entirety, approved the modified estimate of force requirements as recommended by the Joint Planning Committee, it being understood that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee realize that this list of force requirements is out of date and that the whole plan is under revision.

CANADA-U.S. DEFENCE COLLABORATION: APPROVAL OF JOINT DOCUMENTS

1. You will recall that at the 451st meeting of the Chiefs of Staff, held 23rd August, the Committee approved for planning purposes the "Canada-U.S. Agreed Estimate of the Probable Soviet Course of Action against Canada and the U.S.", ACAI 5/2. Prior to this meeting, there had been some concern on the part of the Joint Planning Committee as to the delay in final agreement as between the intelligence organizations of both countries regarding certain aspects of the paper. This concern, I am led to believe, was in part caused by the fact that the U.S. Joint Planners, as was the case with the Canadian Planners, were anxious to proceed with the development of the Long-Range Canada-U.S. Basic Security Plan and that the lack of agreed intelligence and its approval by the Chiefs of Staff was preventing such action.

2. I have now been advised by the Secretary of the Joint Planning Committee (who communicated to his opposite number in Washington the Canadian Chiefs of Staff approval of the Intelligence Appreciation) that, in the United States, final approval of the paper was given by the U.S. Joint Intelligence Group and not by the ²⁶ Bien que ce plan serait bientôt remplacé, les autorités américaines «wish to have the approval of their Chiefs in order to keep the book-keeping portion of the plan up to date», selon le secrétaire du Comité des chefs d'état-major, lequel fit circuler ledit appendice le 15 juin 1949.

Though this plan would be superseded in the near future, the United States authorities "wish to have the approval of their Chiefs in order to keep the book-keeping portion of the plan up to date", according to the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, who circulated the appendix on June 15, 1949.

U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. This appears somewhat incongruous in that, if the Chiefs of Staff of both countries are eventually to approve a joint Canada-U.S. long-term plan for the defence of the northern part of the Western Hemisphere, the intelligence basis on which these plans are developed should logically be approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries.

3. The Chief of the General Staff, in his report on his visit to Washington, indicated that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff did not appear to be too familiar with Canada-U.S. defence arrangements. If the Canadian Services are to devote considerable effort in endeavouring to produce sound plans for North American defence, it would seem that these plans should be developed on the basis of intelligence which has in fact been approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries.

4. It may well be that some of the difficulties lie in the various diagrammatic charts which have been produced for Canada-U.S. defence co-operation. None of these charts has included a line indicating the liaison between the Chiefs of Staff of the two countries.

5. To bring the subject of Canada-U.S. defence plans to the notice of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, it is suggested that, when the Canadian Chiefs of Staff approve any document which has been prepared jointly by Canada-U.S. intelligence or planning organizations, notification to the U.S. authorities of such approval should be made by the Chiefs of Staff Committee directly to the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. In this way it could be ensured that Canada-U.S. documents were brought to their notice and at the same time they would be put in a position where it would be necessary for them to comment on or give their approval to these documents.

6. This matter will be included as an item on the Agenda of the next meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, date to be notified later.

II. REPORT ON ABC INTELLIGENCE DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON

3. Group Captain [W.W.] Bean reported that the Joint Intelligence Staff, of which he was Acting Chairman, had participated with the United States and United Kingdom joint intelligence teams at Washington in the production of an intelligence appreciation (ABCI 15 dated September 27, 1949.)†

Part I of the paper dealt with Soviet intentions and capabilities from now to the end of 1950 and Part II projected these estimates to 1956-57.

It was of interest to note that the President's announcement of an atomic explosion in the Soviet Union had resulted in a substantial upward revision in the estimate of Soviet capabilities with respect to the production of atomic bombs.

Part I—1950

The following were the main points of interest at the Washington discussions:

(a) In the Summary, Part I, the Canadian view was that it was inadequate in that it stopped at "strategic intentions" and omitted any reference to the campaigns and to the modification of Soviet capabilities therefrom. They had felt that the strategic intentions should be re-examined in the light of the campaign studies.

(b) The Canadian representatives had suggested, and obtained agreement, that the use of the expressions "Soviet Union and its allies" and "the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and their allies" be accepted in the statement of the problem. Later, however, the United States and the United Kingdom exerted strong pressure to revert to the earlier term "Anglo-American" and the Canadians were unable to get agreement as to an explanatory note defining the latter term.

(c) The present "outbreak of war" paragraph was a result of numerous discussions and was the best that could be achieved. Despite the divergence of views, agreement had been reached in that the estimate had been produced on the basis of virtually maximum capabilities for the Soviet Union. The Canadian view was that these capabilities would not be reached without prior build up. In other respects the statement faithfully recorded the views put forward except for the implications that only the United States side felt that M-Day and D-Day should be taken as the same for planning purposes. So long as there was any possibility that the Soviet Union might be drawn into war without preparation, it was expected that the Planners would assume that M-Day and D-Day might be the same. In any case, there was no means of forecasting the period of warning which might be available to the allies and it was probable that the whole period between M-Day and D-Day would be taken up in evaluating such intelligence as became available and that the period of warning was effectively nil.

(d) With regard to "strategic intentions", the Canadian representatives had been successful in obtaining agreement that the phrase "attacks with limited objectives against the United States and Canada" be substituted for the phrase "limited attacks against the United States and Canada". The former, of course, limited the objectives only, whereas the latter limited only the scale.

(e) The section under "Campaigns" covering strategic air operations was written at the request of the Canadian group to enable an estimate to be made of the forms and scales of attack against North America in relation to attacks elsewhere. Though the object was only partially achieved, it was felt that this was the best that could be accomplished.

(f) The Turkey Campaign represented a major change from the previous United Kingdom-United States views. It was now estimated that approximately six months would be required for this campaign and that the Suez area could not be reached until approximately D plus 12 months. This presented a problem of such magnitude to the Soviet Union that it might well result in a change of Soviet intentions, particularly if Turkey could be relied upon to remain neutral.

(g) The section dealing with the Iberian Peninsula campaign contained somewhat divergent views as between the United Kingdom on the one hand and the United States and Canada on the other. The United States and Canadian view was that this campaign would probably be undertaken immediately following successful conclusion of the Eastern European Campaign. This view was strengthened by the conclusions with respect to the Middle East Campaign. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, was willing to assign this probability to the campaign against Spain.

Part II—1956–57

With regard to estimates in Part II, these were first prepared before the revised estimate of the 1957 Soviet atomic stock pile was available. The agreed capabilities, however, still represented the best estimate at present. The estimate of the strategic intentions and campaigns, though somewhat modified in the light of this recent information, required complete re-examination and further study. This study would require prior examination of the vulnerability of atomic bombing of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. In addition, the validity of 1956–57 as a planning date required re-examination. In these circumstances, the United States had first adopted the attitude that they would not present the paper for approval but, alternatively, would use their own strategic intelligence as a basis for planning. The Canadian group were successful, however, in obtaining the agreement of both the United States and the United Kingdom to allow the paper to go forward, subject to the above reservations.

Although General Todd had stated early in the proceedings that this was the first and last intelligence appreciation which would be a combined United Kingdom-United States-Canadian effort, the United States had agreed that this additional study would be regarded merely as a continuation of the present one. It was suggested that this matter be pursued at the Chiefs of Staff level. Meanwhile, it would be necessary to complete the strategic vulnerability study of Canada. Tentative arrangements had been made with General Todd to have the United States and Canadian vulnerability studies combined as soon as possible, then exchanged with the United Kingdom. It had been suggested that at that time, arrangements could be made for completing the re-examination of the whole of Part II of the paper.

V. CANADIAN ARMED FORCES; DEFENCE PROGRAMME

12. The Chief of the General Staff read an appreciation of the Soviet intentions and capabilities, based on sources of intelligence available to the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada.

Because of the superior Allied production of the atom bomb and other strategic factors, it was not expected that the U.S.S.R. would precipitate a war in the immediate future. However, there was nothing to indicate any change in the Soviet objective of a Communist world order under their own domination.

The Soviet Armed Forces were at present being maintained at considerable strength and were positioned in such a way that they could readily overrun Western Europe. Significant developments had taken place in their long range aircraft production and also in Schnorchel-equipped submarines.

It was considered that in the event of an immediate war they would be able to carry out simultaneously a campaign against Western Europe including aerial bombardment of the British Isles, a campaign against the Near and Middle East, limited campaigns in the Far East, sea and air offensives against Western Democracy sea communications and attacks with limited objectives against Canada and the United States, at the same time initiating subversive activities and sabotage in all parts of the Western Democracies.

Western Canada and Northwestern United States could be attacked on a two-way mission basis from Russia; on a one-way mission any target in the United States and Canada could be reached. While the scale of attack against Canada and the United States might be limited by logistic, climatic and navigational difficulties, the possession of the atom bomb by the Russians might mean that targets of strategic importance in these countries would be considered of such value by the Russians as to warrant direct attack. It was not possible, however, as yet to suggest what changes in Russian strategy might be brought about because of her possession of the atom bomb and the capability of delivering it at long ranges.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Memorandum from the Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee—Cabinet Document D236.)†

13. The Minister of National Defence, referring to the strategic appreciation, pointed out that while the immediate future appeared somewhat brighter than last year, the Western Democracies were one year closer to the time at which it had been considered Russia would be ready to launch a major war. Whereas before it had been considered that any attacks on Canada and the United States would be of a diversionary nature, the possession of the atom bomb by the U.S.S.R. and her capability of delivering the atom bomb against Canada and the United States could mean that these countries might be subject to raids by aircraft carrying atom bombs. While Canada might not be the main target, an attack by even one or two atom bombs would be important. It was evident that long range aircraft were not required by the U.S.S.R. to bomb enemy countries in Europe. The possession of these aircraft might imply that the Russians were contemplating long range attacks.

Techniques and technical developments had considerably altered the relationship between manpower and equipment. If Canada were to be prepared to meet an attack it was necessary to have equipment available at the outset. To do this it would be necessary to build up deficiencies in equipment and to plan for its maintenance and replacement.

The Chiefs of Staff had been asked to produce a plan which would provide for the minimum forces necessary for the defence of Canada and at the same time for the maximum development potential. The plan as originally prepared had later been modified in order to achieve a better balance between manpower and equipment.

To assist the Chiefs of Staff in the development of a plan, it would be of great advantage if an indication of what could be provided by way of defence funds over a consecutive period of years could be given. Modern defence equipment required considerable future maintenance and provision and it was essential therefore to plan over a period of years in order that a gradual and steady development could take place. Australia was working on a five-year defence programme which had been initiated in 1947. The United States and the United Kingdom were at present developing a basis on which consecutive planning could be maintained.

To this end an estimate had been prepared indicating the annual costs of the years 1949–50 to 1954–55. These costs were based on the desired programme of the three Armed Forces which had been developed within the manpower ceilings as previously approved by the Government. It was noted that the percentage of personnel costs over the period would be reduced appreciably but that there would be a considerable increase in equipment and spares for maintenance. While the force envisaged could only be considered a modest one, the cost of equipping this force was considerable.

Without providing for an increase in equipment, the projection of the present commitments over the same time period showed expenditures approaching those indicated for the desired programme.

(Statements showing the summary cost of the five-year plan and summary costs of projection of the present authorities were circulated—Cabinet Document D234 dated 23rd November, 1949)†

14. The Minister of Finance observed that defence costs had reached what appeared to be a high figure for peacetime. The amount available for defence purposes in the coming year could not be determined until more was known of total government expenses. At present it appeared as though total estimates might reach 2.4 billion, and while there were some small diminishing items of expenditure, it was not anticipated that there would be any substantial reductions. At the same time the national revenue was not expected to increase. It seemed desirable to provide for all defence expenditures in one vote.

15. The Prime Minister pointed out that the cost involved in developing present plans and carrying out the agreed commitments approached the annual costs shown in the desired programme. It would be desirable to develop the defence plan over a period of years rather than to accept annual commitments not related to a comprehensive plan. While the situation for the immediate future might be considered slightly brighter, a year had passed since the last assessment of the strategic situation and we were one year nearer to the danger period which, because of the Russian atom bomb, might now be advanced by a matter of years.

16. The Committee, after further discussion, were in general agreement as to the desirability of initiating a five-year defence programme and agreed that the programme as submitted by the Minister of National Defence be examined by officials of that Department and finance officials.

I. NATIONAL DEFENCE; ARMED FORCES LONG-TERM PROGRAMME

1. The Minister of National Defence recalled that at the last meeting the Chiefs of Staff had submitted their Strategic Appreciation and a brief outline of their long-term plans. These had been given preliminary consideration at that time and it was suggested that they be now presented to form a basis for discussion of next year's estimates.

Review of Strategic Situation

2. The Chief of the General Staff, as Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, reviewed the main conclusions of the Strategic Appreciation.

While the strategic balance was expected to remain in favour of the Western Democracies in the immediate future and the U.S.S.R. was unlikely to precipitate an immediate war, there was no change in what was believed to be the ultimate objective of the Soviet Union and they would not hesitate to go to war to achieve their objective if they believed that success was certain. The Soviet Armed Forces were at present in such a state of preparation that they could go to war without any appreciable indication of their preparations because of their great numerical superiority. While it could be said that the situation had improved in Western Europe as a result of the developments of the North Atlantic Treaty, the actual forces available to support Western Union in the event of an immediate attack were most inadequate. U.S. and U.K. troops in the Far East, which it had been hoped would be available for Western Europe, would now be required in Japan and Asia because of the situation in the Far East.

Western Europe was approaching a critical period; to date much work had been done; unless improvement continued with greater momentum, a backslide would take place.

The defence policy as postulated in the "Strategic Guidance" paper of the North Atlantic Defence Organization had as its objective the development of sufficient military strength to convince the U.S.S.R. that a war would not pay and, should war occur, to ensure the successful defence of the North Atlantic Treaty area. To this end it was necessary to develop balanced North Atlantic military forces and to maintain these forces continuously at maximum efficiency. In the event of war the North Atlantic countries would be required to develop and mobilize their combined strength with the object of achieving the earliest defeat of the U.S.S.R.

While each regional group had the common task of defending its own group territories, special tasks were allocated to certain groups because of their geographical location and their initial capabilities. The special task of the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group was the development of a plan for the expeditious reinforcement of regions which might be attacked and also a plan for the immediate initiation of counter-offensive strategic air operations, assisted by other nations as practicable. This requirement necessitated planning with the United States for the preparation of military formations to reinforce any region. To this end Canada would be involved with the United States within the next three or four months in planning the use of uncommitted reserves of land and air forces in support of the other Atlantic Pact countries.

To carry out this task it would be necessary to devote to the territorial defence of North America only the absolute minimum of Canadian resources so that the greatest possible contribution could be made in the shortest time and with the least expense for the support of other members of the Atlantic Pact. This contribution of men and resources must be such that it could be used for offensive operations as soon as required. Accordingly this must be the basis of the Canadian defence effort.

One of the principles of Atlantic planning was the development of balanced military forces within the whole of the North Atlantic Pact Organization. Canada was therefore not required to produce her own completely balanced and integrated force.

As a result of the above, the Canadian policy for the development of Canada's defence forces should be to concentrate on those fields of military endeavour for which Canada was best suited and in which the greatest possible contribution could be made with the least cost in the shortest possible time.

PURCHASE OF DEFENCE EQUIPMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

During your forthcoming talks with Mr. Truman²⁷ you may wish to mention that, as a result of the decision of Cabinet Defence Committee, the State Department is being asked to arrange implementation by the President of Section 421, Title 22, of the U.S. Code so as to enable Canada to purchase military equipment through the U.S. Defence authorities. A copy of the Note that Mr. Wrong has been asked to present to the State Department is attached as Appendix No. I. You might also care to emphasize how much importance is attached to recourse to this provision until such time as broader legislation (which would permit purchases from existing stocks held by the U.S. Services) is enacted.

For purposes of convenience, the full text of Section 421 is attached as Appendix No. II.† Under this Section, “when he deems it in the interest of national defence”, the President may authorize any government agency “to enter into contracts for the procurement of defence articles, information or services for the government of any country whose defence he deems vital to the defence of the United States” and may subsequently dispose of the equipment, etc. to the foreign government. The latter must pay the “full cost” in advance. At no time must contracts not covered by advance payments exceed $600,000,000.

The U.S. Air Force brought this provision to light after recent discussions with the R.C.A.F. about the purchase by Canada of F86A jet fighters and the manufacture in Canada of this aircraft and of the C119 troop carrier transport. As a number of items included in these aircraft are obtained by the U.S. Air Force for the airframe manufacturers from a wide variety of producers, the Air Force officers concerned had concluded that it was desirable to find a means of enabling the R.C.A.F. to purchase all the components from the U.S.A.F.

When the U.S.A.F. referred Section 421 to its General Counsel, the latter expressed the following opinion on it:

“The President of the United States may authorize the Department of the Air Force to act as agents for procurement of aeroplanes and Government furnished equipment for the Canadian Government, and furthermore, in the event that Presidential authorization is obtained, the Canadian Government may open a special account in the U.S. Treasury from which payment may be made for such equipment.”

The legal authorities of the U.S. Army have since given a similar opinion and the U.S. Navy is expected to follow suit shortly. Moreover, the Legal Division of the U.S. State Department has given the opinion that, if authorized, the U.S. Defence authorities in general could procure defence articles, etc., for the Canadian government under Section 421.

The Note forwarded to Mr. Wrong was drawn up on lines suggested by the State Department.

In case you should wish to mention some of the reasons why procurement from the U.S. Defence authorities (rather than private U.S. sources) is vital, there is attached, as Appendix No. III, a copy of a paper tabled at the December meeting of the P.J.B.D. Paragraphs 5 to 10 explain the problem fully.†

NOTE FROM CANADIAN EMBASSY, WASHINGTON TO U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT

1. I have the honour to refer to the discussions on the question of procurement by the Canadian Armed Forces in the United States, that have taken place from time to time during the past several months between officials of our two Governments.

2. It will be recalled that, at its June meeting, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence recorded its unanimous and strong conviction that the difficulties confronting Canada in procuring weapons, munitions and material from the United States constitute the greatest single obstacle to satisfactory progress in the implementation of United States-Canadian defence arrangements and “recommended that no effort should be spared to ensure, with the minimum delay, that the barriers to the procurement by the Canadian Services of weapons, munitions and material from the United States are removed.”

3. As you are aware, at the December meeting of the Board, there was tabled a full explanation (Appendix #11 of the Board's Journal) of the great importance to our joint defence arrangements of steps being taken to place the Canadian Services in a position to obtain from or through the U.S. Defence authorities, such defence articles as they require from U.S. sources, and, on that occasion, the Board made a Recommendation in that sense. A good illustration of the need for a procurement procedure of the type mentioned is provided by the difficulty that the Royal Canadian Air Force would encounter in procuring two types of current United States aircraft in which it is interested, in view of the fact that a variety of items included in these aircraft are “government-furnished”, that is, obtained by the U.S. Air Force authorities for the airframe manufacturers from a great number of different producers.

4. It has recently come to the attention of my Government that, under Section 421, Title 22 of the United States Code, the President of the United States may, in certain circumstances, authorize departments and agencies of the United States Government to procure, for another government, "defence articles, information or services".

5. It would appear that recourse to this Section of the United States Code, if agreeable to the United States authorities, would give the Canadian Armed Forces a way out of some of their current difficulties in procuring defence articles, etc. from the United States sources until such time as the United States authorities are able to make arrangements of a wider scope. My Government would, therefore, appreciate it if, in view of the recognized importance to the progress of the defence arrangements of our two countries of the Canadian authorities being able to procure from the United States Defence sources, the United States authorities would enable use to be made of the provisions of the Section of the United States Code to which I have referred.

DEFENCE PROGRAMME; PURCHASE OF U.S. FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

5. The Minister of National Defence requested consideration of an urgent matter relating to the purchase of fighter aircraft for the R.C.A.F.

On July 29th, 1948, the Cabinet Defence Committee had approved purchase of 27 Vampires from the United Kingdom to meet R.C.A.F. requirements. Subsequently, however, it had been ascertained that delivery of a great number of these aircraft would be delayed for a long period.

In October, 1948, the Cabinet Defence Committee had approved purchase of 56 of the more modern F.86A jet fighters from North American Aviation Corporation, through the U.S.A.F., in substitution for the Vampires authorized previously. The U.S. government had indicated that 36 of these aircraft could be supplied at an early date.

Plans were presently under way for the manufacture in Canada of two types of fighter planes, the F.86A and the A.V. Roe All-weather Fighter. The Canadian manufacturers, however, would not be in a position to make deliveries for a period of at least two years.

It was considered that the 36 F.86A planes from the United States would meet R.C.A.F. requirements during this two-year period.

6. Mr. Claxton pointed out that, under existing U.S. laws, these 36 planes would have to be paid for very largely in advance.

The total amount involved was approximately $10.5 million, and this amount would have to be provided through a further supplementary estimate prior to March 31st of this year.

7. The Minister of Finance observed that, although the 36 planes in question would be purchased with monies provided in the current fiscal year, the amount would actually constitute an addition to the $375 million defence programme approved by Cabinet for 1949-50.

8. The Prime Minister drew attention to the relationship of such purchases to the Canadian balance of payments with both the United States and the United Kingdom.

Substitution of American F.86A's for British Vampires would have the immediate effect of disposing of a considerable amount of our U.S. dollar reserve. At the same time, the United Kingdom would be deprived of a possible source of Canadian dollars with which to buy our products.

Following his conversations with the President, however, he was hopeful that some arrangement could be made whereby purchases of Canadian produced defence equipment by U.S. forces would offset Canadian defence purchases in the United States. Such an arrangement would avoid the necessity of using U.S. dollars for military rather than for normal civilian purposes.

9. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, deferred decision on the proposal of the Minister of National Defence for the purchase of U.S. jet fighters for the R.C.A.F., pending consideration with U.S. authorities of means whereby the exchange difficulties involved in such transactions could be met; the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to confer with the U.S. Ambassador on the subject at an early date with a view to the working out of a mutually satisfactory arrangement.

PURCHASE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT AND SUPPLIES: UNITED STATES-CANADA²⁸

1. There are two main reasons why the United States would want to place orders for military equipment and supplies in Canada:

(a) because it will maximize the wartime industrial capacity of the two countries; and

(b) because it will provide the basis for an "exchange" of military equipment and supplies which is needed if the Armed Services of the two countries are to be equipped to best advantage.

2. Canada's physical capacity to produce military equipment and supplies is far in excess of the wartime requirements of the Canadian Services. In the last war 70% of Canadian war production was for the use of the United States, the United Kingdom and other allies. Should another war come, the full industrial potential of both countries will be urgently required.

3. It is impossible for Canada to plan war production without knowing what other countries will need. If the best use is to be made of North American resources, Canada should know now what items are likely to be called for. And if items are needed now for which Canada is the logical wartime producer, Canada ought to be in a position to produce them for use when needed.

4. In order to get the benefits of mass-production in certain fields, Canada must make purchases in the United States. In many lines, United States production is cheaper and deliveries are quicker; in many lines, the Canadian need is so small that it does not justify going into production, particularly in peace-time. However, large purchases by Canada of military equipment and supplies from the United States produce financial problems between the two countries unless there are counterbalancing purchases in the opposite direction.

5. This was evident during World War II. In 1940-41, Canada was making heavy defence purchases in the United States and Canadian reserves of U.S. dollars began to fall. In order to conserve United States dollars for war needs, Canada imposed severe restrictions on many lines of civilian imports from the United States and on pleasure travel in the United States. Nevertheless, Canadian reserves of U.S. dollars continued to fall.

6. To deal with this situation, President Roosevelt met with Mr. Mackenzie King in April 1941 and as a result of their discussions they issued the "Hyde Park Declaration". Under this Declaration, the United States Government bought about $1¼ billions worth of war equipment and supplies in Canada. These purchases just about balanced the purchases of equipment and supplies that Canada made in the United States. In other words, there was an approximately equal balance of trade in these items during the war period.

7. In May 1945 at the request of the United States Government, the principles of the Hyde Park Declaration were extended into the postwar transition period. This agreement, embodied in an exchange of notes, has not been terminated.

8. Canada's ordinary peacetime trade with the United States may be distinguished from trade in military equipment and supplies. During the past year or two Canada has had difficulty in paying for its ordinary peacetime imports from the United States. Restrictions on imports from the United States and restrictions on pleasure travel in the United States have had to be imposed once again. Despite this, Canada still buys more from the United States than the United States buys from Canada. A further accentuation of this out-of-balance position brought about by the purchase of equipment would not be in the economic, financial, or strategic interest of either country.

9. Further restrictions might have to be imposed if Canada now bought more military equipment and supplies in the United States and if the United States did not reciprocate by making similar purchases in Canada. Restrictions on United States imports into Canada are damaging both to United States producers and exporters and to Canadian importers and consumers.

10. If the principles of the Hyde Park Declaration can again be extended, with a view to preventing the outbreak of another war, it should be possible to arrange for reciprocal purchases. These purchases should cover military stores, components and parts. The aim should be to achieve an approximate balance in purchases of these items between the two countries.

11. As a preliminary guide to the purchases that might now be made in Canada, a list is attached in Appendix A. This covers, in general terms, finished items of military stores and equipment which Canada can supply to the United States without substantial changes in present plant facilities. Generally speaking, given orders of economic size, Canadian industry compares well with United States industry in efficiency and cost.

12. Two final points deserve emphasis. First, Canada is one of the few Allies of the United States that is willing and able to pay its own way. Subject to the possible desirability of loans of certain equipment, Canada does not look and has never looked to the United States for gifts of equipment and supplies, nor does Canada look to the United States to finance Canadian production. What Canada wants is an arrangement whereby purchases of military stores and equipment will be kept in balance, based on the special capacities of Canadian industry and the limited but specialized needs of the Canadian Services. Experience shows that, by such an

DEFENCE PURCHASES IN THE UNITED STATES

16. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 26th, reported that the United States authorities wished to have available a list of military equipment which the Canadian government would wish to buy during the coming U.S. fiscal year. The list would be for use at the time of consideration of the draft Military Assistance Bill. It would probably not be made public but this was not certain.

17. Mr. Claxton proposed that he concert with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in preparation of a despatch to Washington setting forth such a list on the basis of a statement of intention by the Canadian government but without any commitment.

DEFENCE PURCHASES; CANADA-UNITED STATES

18. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of May 4th, submitted a draft communication for transmission to U.S. authorities, indicating the importance that Canada attached to provision in the proposed Foreign Military Assistance Bill for:

- (a) Canadian military purchases from the U.S. defence authorities;
- (b) U.S. defence purchases in Canada; and
- (c) "off-shore" defence purchases in Canada.

This had been prepared in answer to an urgent request from the U.S. State Department. It emphasized Canada's intention to pay for military requirements from the United States and explained why it was desirable to purchase from U.S. defence departments rather than from manufacturers. The U.S. State Department has also asked for a list of Canadian requirements from U.S. sources in the U.S. fiscal year ending June 30th, 1950. The need for such a list had originally been suggested in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. A brief list showing the estimated value of purchases by major categories of equipment had now been prepared and was submitted for approval.†

Both the statement and the list would likely be made public in the United States and they had been prepared with that in mind.

An explanatory document was circulated.

(Letter, Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister of National Defence, May 16, 1949—Cabinet Document 970).†

19. Mr. Pearson reported further that the matter had been considered at that afternoon's meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee, who had agreed to recommend that the statement and list be sent to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington for transmission to U.S. authorities.

20. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and:

(a) approved the draft communication in support of the U.S. Foreign Military Assistance Bill for communication by the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to the U.S. State Department;

(b) agreed that a list of military equipment required from U.S. Service departments during the coming U.S. fiscal year be compiled along the lines of the draft submitted and communicated informally to the U.S. State Department by the Canadian Ambassador in Washington.

AIDE MEMOIRE²⁹

Reference is made to recent discussions between officials of the Governments of the United States and Canada about matters of military procurement which are of mutual interest. Pursuant to these discussions, the Canadian Government hopes that the United States Government will take certain aspects of procurement into consideration in connection with the foreign military aid programme that is now under study in Washington.

At the present time, there is no United States legislation in operation under which the Canadian Government can purchase either military equipment in stock or new military equipment from or through the United States defence authorities; it is only open to Canada to buy ordinary military stores of United States origin from private manufacturers.

Very considerable progress has been made by Canada and the United States in the planning of measures for full co-operation in the defence of the North American continent. These arrangements are based on the need that the armed forces of the two countries should work closely together and should have maximum interchangeability of equipment. The inability of Canada to procure military equipment of types used by the armed forces of the United States is, however, proving to be a serious obstacle to satisfactory implementation of joint defence plans, and progress toward standardization of equipment is hampered.

In the light of this situation, at its meeting on June 3–4, 1948, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence (Canada-United States) recorded “its unanimous and strong conviction that the difficulties preventing Canada from procuring weapons, munitions and materials from the United States constitute the greatest single obstacle to satisfactory progress in the implementation of U.S.-Canada defence arrangements”. The Board “recommended that no effort should be spared to ensure, with the minimum delay, that the barriers to the procurement by the Canadian Services of weapons, munitions and material from the United States are removed”.

At its meeting on December 16–17, 1948, the Board considered a statement of the reasons why it is important to both countries for Canada to be able to purchase military equipment of United States origin from and through the United States defence authorities rather than by negotiation with commercial firms. The principal portion of the statement that was considered at that time is attached.³⁰ As a result of its discussions at the December meeting, the Board made a formal Recommendation to the two Governments that long-term arrangements be effected which would “permit the military services of Canada to purchase military supplies, arms, equipment and weapons of war direct from or through the United States Armed Services at cost price if the item is new and at an agreed depreciated value if used”.

It remains the policy of the Canadian Government to pay for the military equipment and supplies that it obtains from the United States. In present circumstances of international exchange, however, larger Canadian military purchases in the United States would create difficulties in the balance of payments between the two countries unless such purchases were counter-balanced by similar United States purchases in Canada. It was a similar exchange situation in 1941 which led President Roosevelt and Mr. Mackenzie King to join in the so-called “Hyde Park Declaration”, as a result of which the resources of the two countries were, in large measure, “pooled” for the purposes of war. War equipment and supplies were subsequently purchased in whichever country was in the best position to produce them. In May, 1945, at the request of the Government of the United States, the principles of this Declaration were extended into the post-war transition period. This arrangement, embodied in an Exchange of Notes, has not been terminated.

Canada has had difficulty, in the past year or two, in paying for ordinary peacetime imports from the United States. Despite emergency import and travel restrictions which have had to be imposed, Canada still buys much more from the United States than the United States buys from Canada. An accentuation of this position by increased Canadian purchases of military equipment in the United States would obviously not be in the economic, financial or strategic interests of either country.

There have already been made available to the United States Government details of the military equipment and supplies that Canada is in a position to produce at this time and in the event of an emergency. As is well known, Canada's physical capacity to produce military equipment is far in excess of its requirements in peacetime or even under war or emergency conditions. During the war, for instance, about 70% of Canadian war production was for the use of the United States, the United Kingdom and other allies.

The events of the war and post-war periods have led, in both countries, to the recognition of the fact that increased United States defence purchases in Canada in accordance with the principles of the Hyde Park Declaration would have several advantages for both countries. By enabling the Canadian Armed Forces to obtain the equipment that they require, increased United States defence purchases in Canada would assist materially in strengthening continental security. Furthermore, such a programme would enable more rapid progress to be made in the implementation of Canada-United States defence arrangements including, of course, both the standardization and the use of equipment. It would also assist in developing to the greatest possible extent the industrial capacity available to both countries in an emergency and ensure the most advantageous use of the resources of the continent.

In view of the various factors outlined above, the Canadian Government earnestly hopes that any measure that may be considered by the United States authorities with a view to carrying out the foreign military aid programme will include provisions enabling the Canadian Government to purchase military equipment and supplies from and through the United States defence authorities and the United States defence authorities to make reciprocal purchases in Canada. Such provisions would be of very decided advantage to both the United States and Canada and without them it will not be possible to realize, within any reasonable period of time, the common defence aims and plans of the two countries.

3. Procurement. With reference to Para. No. 3 of the Journal of March 17-18, 1949, the Canadian Chairman again emphasized the situation faced by the Canadian Services in regard to the procurement of military supplies and equipment in the United States. He mentioned the Canadian decision of several years ago to work toward the standardization of arms and military procedures with the United States, and drew attention to the virtual impossibility of implementing this decision as long as Canada could not obtain equipment and spare parts from and through the U.S. National Military Establishment.

Regarding the purchase of F86 aircraft by the RCAF, the U.S. Air Force Member explained that efforts were still being made by the U.S. Section of the Board to bring this matter to a decision and it was thought possible that a favourable decision might be obtained within the next few weeks.

The U.S. Army Member referred to a provision of U.S. law which he had discussed with the Canadian Army Member as authorization for the transfer of items of military equipments to Canada under an Exchange Contract. For example, this might be utilized to solve the question of Canadian tank spares. He stated that the Canadian Government had accepted in principle the procedure suggested by the U.S. Army and negotiations could be begun at any time under this exchange program. It was pointed out that the transfer of any items of equipment under an exchange contract would require the approval of the Canadian authorities and the Department of the Army.

The U.S. Chairman referred to a memorandum on procurement, which had been prepared by Canadian officials and handed to the American Ambassador in Ottawa during March, 1949. This memorandum had been brought to the attention of both the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the U.S. Munitions Board by the U.S. Section. Its contents had been fully discussed with the Chairman of the Munitions Board and its text had likewise been referred to the Foreign Assistance Correlation Committee (FACC). The latter Committee will be involved in the planning for any U.S. purchase of military equipment abroad for provision to third countries under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Security Pact.

The Canadian Chairman expressed his confidence that the U.S. Section of the Board fully and sympathetically understood the Canadian procurement and supply position and, in certain cases such as the R.C.N. rearmament programme, the importance of an early favourable decision.

AIR FORCE; PROCUREMENT OF FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

1. The Minister of Trade and Commerce submitted a recommendation to Council to authorize entry into a contract with Canadair Limited, Montreal, P.Q., for the production of 100 U.S. type fighter aircraft together with certain specified accessories.

The procurement of these aircraft was part of the approved Air Force programme. Canadair Limited has been selected as the firm in Canada best in a position to complete the contract to the satisfaction of the Department of National Defence. Under the terms of the proposed contract, special tools and capital equipment (including engines) would be provided by the government and these would have to be purchased by the United States.

The expenditure involved was at present estimated to amount to about $24 million, excluding "government-furnished property"

To meet the progress payments under the proposed contract, an additional sum of about $4,778,000 must be provided in supplementary estimates for the current year. This had been discussed with the Minister of Finance who concurred.

In addition, a further sum might be required this year to deposit with the U.S. Treasury and pay customs duty and sales tax on purchases there.

2. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) approved the letting of a contract with Canadair Limited, Montreal, for the production, with certain government-supplied components and accessories, of 100 F-86A fighter aircraft at an estimated cost of about $24 million and upon terms and conditions to be settled by the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and Order in Council to be passed accordingly;

(Order in Council P.C. 3230 of July 26, 1949)†

(b) agreed that provision for an expenditure of about $4,778,000 (and for other possible expenditures subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance) be included in the supplementary estimates of the Department of National Defence for 1949–50.

TELEGRAM EX-2119

Ottawa, August 29, 1949

U.S. Military Assistance legislation.

1. Cabinet decided August 24 that I should ask you to take up, as a matter of urgency, at the highest possible level in the State Department—preferably with Acheson—the omissions of the present Bills. It would be appreciated if you would make strong oral representations covering outstanding points.

2. You will recall that our desiderata are:

(a) Authority for Canada to purchase stocks of defence equipment from the U.S. defence authorities and to place orders for new equipment through these authorities—payment to be made on delivery or progress;

(b) Authority for the U.S. Government to make defence purchases in Canada for other countries;

(c) Authority for the U.S. Services to make defence purchases in Canada for their own use;

(d) Authority for these three types of purchases to continue indefinitely.

3. The main omissions of the Bill, passed by the House on August 18 and the Bill at present before the Senate Committee, appear to be the absence of authority for U.S. defence purchases in Canada for U.S. account and the stipulation that Canada pay full cost in advance.

4. You might remind Acheson that the first question has been discussed with the U.S. authorities on a number of occasions and at the highest levels (the Prime Minister's talk with Mr. Truman and him on February 12, discussions between Cabinet Ministers and Mr. Steinhardt, the lengthy memorandum given to Mr. Steinhardt, at his request, on March 31 (our despatch No. 951 of April 1),[†] the comprehensive aide memoire delivered to the State Department on June 3 and, most recently, the meeting of Secretary Johnson with Cabinet Defence Committee on August 12, when he gave us to understand that he intended to press the matter vigorously on his return to Washington.)

5. Whenever the matter has been discussed on such occasions there appears to have been full recognition, on both sides, that it is important to make the most effective use for defence of our combined resources; that unless the two Governments are free to make defence purchases in both countries their resources can never be put to their most effective use; and that the current legislation would provide the only foreseeable opportunity for putting industrial co-operation for defence on a working basis. As a result of these discussions and the attitude displayed by Johnson recently, we had reason to believe that energetic steps would be taken in Washington to settle the matter satisfactorily and, judging from press reports, some Congressmen at least have expressed themselves in favour of the idea of mutually supporting defence purchases. On this question, however, Johnson's reply to Mr. Claxton's teletype EX-1973 of August 12³¹ merely recognizes this omission in the Bill, states that the "buy American" Act therefore remains operative (as we know), and does not suggest that he is making any attempt to get into the current Bills authority for U.S. defence purchases in Canada.

6. As regards the full-cost-in-advance provision, we hoped that the legislation would permit us to pay on delivery in the normal manner—which, of course, would be satisfactory to all concerned in Ottawa. Trade and Commerce believes that the solution suggested by Berkner (paragraph 4 of WA-2231 of August 20)[†] is workable from this side and would like the U.S. authorities to confirm that it is entirely workable from their point of view. National Defence, on the other hand, have no confidence in anything short of statutory authority that would ensure our obtaining our needs from U.S. sources in the event of the U.S. Defence Budget being so reduced as to make it impossible for the U.S. Government to carry the progress payments that would be payable on orders for delivery under long-term contracts.

³¹ Voir/See: Documents 909-910.

7. Points (b) and (d) in paragraph 1 above appear to be met by the legislation at present before Congress, but it would be well to remind Acheson that we attach considerable importance to their not being deleted before the enactment stage.

8. It would also be appreciated if you would leave with Acheson an aide memoire outlining the points that you make to him. I assume that you will let me have a full report of the action taken.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I should like to refer to Mr. Pearson's teletype EX-2119 of August 29 asking you to make renewed representations regarding the proposed U.S. Military Assistance legislation; to his teletype EX-2120 of this morning† quoting Secretary Johnson's reply of August 17³² to Mr. Claxton's teletype of August 12;³³ and the conversations that we have had today on the question of the form of the representations that you are making.

Mr. Pearson's EX-2119 was prepared yesterday after we had had Mr. Claxton's oral comments on a draft of August 25 of that message, as well as the comments of Mr. Pierce, who had discussed the matter with Mr. Howe. Mr. Pearson sent out EX-2119 without awaiting the final views of the Department of Finance on the full-cost-in-advance provision because Mr. Claxton expressed a desire yesterday to have a message go forward to you immediately and as our message in any case covered the two main points of view held in Ottawa on the advance payments provision.

I learned today that, after giving us his comments yesterday morning, Mr. Claxton had decided to incorporate them in a redraft of the draft teletype circulated in Ottawa on August 25. A copy of his re-draft reached me this afternoon, and I think that you will find it useful to have the main points made in it that were not included in EX-2119. They are as follows:

U. S. Defence Purchases in Canada

“The Government feels strongly that co-operation in industrial preparedness involving co-ordination and standardization can only mean anything as between Canada and the United States if it is done on a fair basis, that means, a two-way basis. Canada is the only country which has paid for everything she has got and which is likely to pay for everything she may obtain from the United States.

³³ Document 909.

Politically as well as financially, it would be impossible for us to make large purchases of equipment from the U.S. unless the U.S. was willing to buy Canadian-made equipment for use either in other countries or in the U.S. It seems to us to be running against the object of the U.S. entering in the North Atlantic Security Pact to continue the prohibition on such purchases imposed by American legislation.”

Full-Cost-in-Advance Provision

“This would not present a serious obstacle in the case of purchases of equipment which has already been manufactured. Our law and practice is to pay against delivery. The difficulty would arise however in connection with our coming in with the U.S. Services in the procurement of new equipment so as to secure equipment to American standards with the advantage of the lower price for a larger quantity. Obviously the lowest possible price for any given equipment cannot be obtained unless the manufacturer knows in advance the quantity that has to be made. The manufacturer will not undertake to make equipment like tanks or guns unless a firm order is placed. It is certainly to be doubted if the U.S. Services could give such commitment in a way to include part of the order for Canadian account. In the first place that would earmark funds which it would need for other purposes. In the second place, it would run counter to the legislation. We on our side could not pay cash in advance because this would be counter to our law and our practice and we would not be able to find the money in any given year’s appropriation.

“For these reasons we appreciate that the proposal made by Mr. Berkner would be of course better than nothing but we doubt very much if it would permit us to enter into the kind of arrangement which would be necessary in connection with any program of any considerable size. However, in this connection, it would be desirable to examine with the State Department officials how far it would be in accord with service and treasury laws, practices and intentions.

“Secretary Johnson when he was here felt that the two points I have mentioned should be covered by one means or another. He agreed that without that it would be difficult to make much progress in the way of co-ordination or standardization and indeed at the time (of his arrival) he felt that the bill dealt with the situation adequately. Mr. Steinhardt shares the same view. We appreciate the difficulties of the administration but feel strongly that it is only fair to point out that the adoption of the bill in the present form will almost certainly have the consequence outlined here and in our previous communications.”

Dr. Clark’s comments on the August 25 draft also reached me this afternoon. He is seriously worried about the practicability of Mr. Berkner’s proposal. As it is an almost direct negation of the terms of the proposed legislation, he is hesitant to rely on the suggestion of one U.S. official that such a device can be worked out and doubts the wisdom of the Canadian Government’s conniving in so obvious an evasion of the terms and intent of the current Bills. He therefore hoped that you would not be too reassuring about the possibility of the Berkner proposal proving workable from the Canadian point of view.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

TELEGRAM WA-2351

Your EX-2119 of August 29th, military assistance legislation.

1. I saw the Secretary of State this afternoon and left with him an aide memoire, the text of which is contained in my immediately following message.† Mr. Acheson asked Mr. Berkner to join us for the latter part of the conversation.

2. I emphasized the two respects in which the legislation in its present form appears to be unsatisfactory—the requirement that the full cost must be paid in advance when an order is placed through the United States Defense authorities, and the omission of authority for United States procurement in other countries for the use of their own forces. I said that the legislation appeared to meet our needs with respect to Canadian purchases of equipment from United States stocks and with respect to United States procurement in Canada for delivery to other countries.

3. With regard to our first difficulty, Acheson said that the Secretary of Defense had raised this matter after his return from Canada and he understood that an amendment had been worked out between him and Senator [J.C.] Gurney, the ranking Republican member of the Military Affairs Committee. Berkner, however, said that this amendment had been dropped. Berkner went on to express complete confidence that the present provision would not embarrass Canadian procurement and that arrangements could readily be made whereby the equipment manufactured on contract would only have to be paid shortly before delivery. He said that if, for example, Canada wished to secure United States-type service aircraft, arrangements might be made through service channels whereby it would be agreed that Canada would get a specified number of planes from production a couple of months later, the cost to be deposited perhaps a month before delivery. I said I was not at all sure that this would work in practice and asked for a reply in writing to my aide memoire which would spell out the procedure that could be followed.

4. With regard to procurement in Canada for the United States forces, Acheson said that authority for such procurement abroad had been deliberately omitted from the Bill on the ground that it would make the Bill take in too much territory and prejudice its adoption. He agreed with the long-term importance of such a provision, but thought it would have to be included in a separate package. I spoke emphatically not only of its importance as an aid to standardization and continental defence, but as a means of doing something to ameliorate the dollar problem of the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty and of building up collective defence under that Treaty. In reply to a question from him, I said that I understood that the "Buy American" Act in effect restricted United States procurement abroad for the United States forces to the purchase of raw materials and semi-processed goods.

5. When Berkner joined us, however, he said that his understanding was that the Bill would permit the United States to procure abroad for its own use. I told him that this was not the view of Secretary of Defense, mentioning Mr. Johnson's reply to Mr. Claxton on this point (your EX-2120 of August 30th).† Neither Acheson nor Berkner was familiar with the effect of the "Buy American" Act in this field, and Berkner undertook to go into the question immediately.

6. I asked that I should be given reply in writing to my aide memoire so that we might have an official interpretation of the legislation on these two points. Berkner said that he would prefer to wait until the Bill had passed the Senate before giving written interpretation. I then asked him to consider the matters further and to have another conversation with me as soon as possible. There is little or no chance of any amendment to the Bill to meet our wishes during the committee stage in the Senate.

7. As to the status of the measure, an attempt was made this morning to report it from committee, but this failed of adoption and the two committees which are considering it jointly will meet again next Wednesday. The Senate is expected to take a week's adjournment from this evening, provided that action has been finished on the minimum wage measure, which now has the floor. Acheson was very disappointed to learn from Berkner that the measure was still stuck in committee.

Following for Heeney, Begins: Re Military Assistance Programme.

1. Matthews discussed with Berkner and Snow the points raised by Mr. Claxton which were set out in Mr. Heeney's letter to Mr. Wrong of August 30th.

2. Since my discussion with Acheson on August 31st, Berkner has had a further study made of the procedures that would be possible under Military Assistance Act in its present form. Berkner is now in agreement with our interpretation as to what may be possible under the Bill and, while he will have a further study made, he is not hopeful that it will be possible for the United States to purchase for its own use in Canada.

3. Berkner stated that there is an informal agreement with Congressional leaders not to suggest further amendments this year as amendments put forward by the Administration at this time might result in serious delays.

4. He stated that the Administration considered amendments would be easier to obtain after the Defence Organization and plans of the Atlantic Treaty Powers had been established. He did not anticipate difficulty in obtaining amendments that experience showed to be necessary for the operation of that Organization and those plans.

5. Berkner clarified his earlier suggestion of the procedure that could be adopted when making Canadian purchases from current United States production. He stated that orders were normally placed to establish a production rate for any given item of supply and that this rate would be maintained over a period of years. An order for the long term needs of the United States forces would not be placed at one time since this would tie up too large a proportion of authorizations granted to the Defence Department. Orders would be placed from time to time as was needed to maintain the production rate.

6. Berkner did not believe that Canadian requirements would normally be large enough to increase the production rate that would be set to fill United States requirements. The result would be that Canada could normally buy finished products as they were available for delivery to the United States armed forces. While arrangements might be made in advance between the armed forces of the two countries as to the Canadian requirements the actual orders placed by the United States forces would not normally be increased on account of Canadian requirements and, therefore, the practice would not violate Treasury laws and practices as mentioned by Mr. Claxton. Canada could place orders and pay shortly before delivery.

7. Financial difficulties would not be experienced by the United States Department of Defence since the Military Aid Bill authorizes that Department to retain and to spend money received by it for sales to other countries.

8. Mr. Snow advised Matthews after they had left Berkner's office that the Munitions Board is not yet convinced that United States purchases in Canada are possible quite apart from the terms of the Bill. While their reluctance to consider such purchases is based largely on political considerations, Snow left the impression that quite apart from these considerations the Munitions Board at least lacked enthusiasm. This lack of enthusiasm apparently arises from the fact that the list of those items which Canada has stated can be provided is made up largely of the very things for which there is surplus capacity in the United States.

9. Snow stated that he and Berkner are again trying to change the point of view of the Munitions Board but that they are having difficulty owing to the departure of senior officers who have not yet been replaced. Ends.

Today when a member of my staff was seeing Mr. Snow of the State Department on another matter, Mr. Snow advised him that in preparation for the meeting of the PJBD he had been reviewing all developments concerning military procurement. He stated he had had discussions with representatives of the Munitions Board.

2. Mr. Snow followed on by saying that the further examination and discussions convinced him procurement from current production in the manner suggested by Mr. Berkner, as reported in my WA-2428, was quite feasible.

3. He also said that under the MAP legislation, as it at present stands, there would appear to be no legal difficulty to off-shore purchases, provided policy decisions went as far as the legal authority.

4. He then said that the regulations under which the Buy-American Act was administered authorized purchases abroad for use in the United States if there was a price advantage from foreign purchase of 25 percent or more. However, the Defence Department would probably not buy outside of the United States even though the saving were greater than 25 percent. He stated that this was the attitude of the Munitions Board and of the operating levels in the Defence Department because of the great pressures that would be placed upon them by management and by labour unions in addition to the desire of the Defence Department to keep American productive capacity of military equipment as fully tuned up as possible. He stated that this attitude on the operating levels could only be changed if real pressure was exerted by the President, the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Defence.

5. When it was pointed out that this attitude differed from the impression created in Ottawa during the visit of the Secretary of Defence, Mr. Snow said that there was a big gap between the acceptance of a matter as a general principle and its actual implementation in the placing of orders.

6. Mr. Snow was then questioned as to whether his distinction between the legal possibility and the policy decision regarding off-shore purchases implied that the same considerations would limit such purchases under MAP. He stated that with the present attitude prevailing in the Defence Department and the Munitions Board, it was probable that this would be the case. 7. Mr. Snow then went on to say that personally he was thinking about the possibility of maintaining offsetting accounts for all military expenditures by Canada in the United States and the United States in Canada. If his thinking is adopted by the United States authorities, it is quite possible the argument will be used that the very large expenses on present military installations, etc., in Canada by the United States should be considered as items offsetting any Canadian purchases of military equipment for United States dollars.

MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

You will recall that, in teletype No. EX-1318 of May 20,† we sent to Washington a list of military equipment, valued at $20 million, that Canada appeared likely to want to purchase in the United States during the United States fiscal year July 1, 1949–June 30, 1950.

2. When discussing the question of military procurement at the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence on October 11–12, General Henry, Chairman of the United States Section of the Board, tabled a paper which, insofar as the fiscal year list is concerned, read as follows:

“In response to a request from the U.S. National Military Establishment, transmitted through the Secretary of the U.S. Section of the Defense Board, the Canadian Government in May 1949 made available a schedule of the military equipment which it intended or expected to procure from the United States during the fiscal year 1950 (July 1, 1949 to June 30, 1950). This schedule was broken down into four major categories, and showed a total estimated cost of twenty million dollars (presumably U.S. dollars). Officials responsible for the administration of the new Mutual Defense Assistance Act have drawn to the attention of the U.S. Section the desirability of Canada's providing a detailed breakdown of this schedule at an early date. The productive capacity of the U.S., as well as existing military stocks, have certain limits which will make it necessary for equipment and materials to be programmed and allocated as between the various countries eligible to receive grant or cash procurement aid. An early amplification of the Canadian schedule of last May, or any amended schedule Canada may wish to submit, will go far to insure that Canadian requirements are adequately considered in the process of completing the allocation program for the current fiscal year. I cannot too strongly emphasize the importance of this last statement.”

3. The U.S. Section recognized that Canada's requirements might have undergone changes since the May list was submitted. They, therefore, strongly urged:

(1) Immediate provision of a detailed revised list of Canada's requirements (during the fiscal year mentioned) as presently foreseen.

(2) If the revised, up to date list mentioned in (1) is not at present available, immediate provision of the latest available list, and provision as soon as possible thereafter of a list of the type mentioned in (1).

4. It will be seen that the attached teletype, No. WA-2883 of October 17† from Washington, which also deals with other aspects of the procurement question, requests that a list be made available by the end of this week, adding that the U.S. authorities would like the list to show the priorities attached to delivery of the various items desired and, wherever possible, that provision of the equipment will assist the U.S. as well as Canada. Information is also desired as to the status of negotiations for the procurement of individual items and as to specific difficulties that have arisen in each case. I should appreciate it if you would be good enough to let me know at your earliest convenience what reply I should send to Washington. I think you will agree that it is very much to our advantage to endeavour to meet the U.S. authorities' requests in this connection as soon as possible.

5. I am attaching a copy of Minute No. 11, from the P.J.B.D. Journal of October 11–12,† from which it will be seen that the Board made a formal Recommendation calling for adequate off-shore purchases under M.A.P. as an interim measure to balance Canadian defence purchases in the United States and ultimate amendment of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act to permit military purchases in Canada for the use of the U.S. Forces. As this Recommendation still has to go forward to the President through the U.S. Defense and State Departments, it is, I think, too early for it to be relevant to the proposed revised fiscal year list.

6. I should add that, as the general question of procurement was being handled through diplomatic channels, the Canadian Section, P.J.B.D., had not planned to press the U.S. Section on the general question of procurement at the Board's meeting last week. The U.S. Chairman, however, raised the desirability of action being taken at an early date to permit a balancing of defence purchases between the two countries. There, therefore, ensued a lengthy discussion of the matter. While the Canadian Section naturally contributed a number of points to the discussion, the major responsibility for drafting the attached Minute and Recommendation was left to the U.S. Section with a view to producing a text of a type most likely to result in action in Washington.

7. I am sending copies of this letter and of its enclosures to the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 1, 1949

REF: PC 3230-26 JULY, 1949†

Dear Mr. Heeney,

The contents of your letter dated 18th October, 1949, on "Military Procurement in the United States", and of teletypes WA-2883 dated 17th October† and WA-2901 dated 19th October, 1949,† have been noted. The detailed list of current requirements of military equipment from the U.S. will be forwarded as soon as it can be completed.

This Department, in some degree, is aware of the problems requiring solution prior to procurement of military equipment from the U.S. Armed Services. As a result of preliminary discussions with the USAF, CJS and the Washington representatives of CCC, some of the problems of Canadian procurement of United States military equipment have been brought into focus. The gist of these discussions and the problems encountered are here summarised.

Under the terms of the contract with Canadair Limited, the R.C.A.F. is responsible for supplying to Canadair, for installation in the F.86A aircraft being produced by that firm, certain items of equipment known as "Government Furnished Property". This class of equipment includes armament, radar and jet engines which are normally under government control, and in the interests of standardization must be identical with similar equipment supplied to the U.S.A.F.

There is no present source in Canada for these items of equipment and procurement must be undertaken from American sources.

Recent legislation in the U.S. (the Mutual Defence Assistance Act) enables us to purchase directly from the U.S. Air Force. It is desired to take immediate advantage of this legislation to expedite Canadair production of the F.86A.

It is considered advisable to do so because:

- (a) The USAF control the production of the majority of the items involved.
- (b) By procurement from the USAF it will be possible to achieve and maintain standardization of the Government Furnished Property.
- (c) The heavy administrative burden of attempting to co-ordinate purchases from numerous manufacturers and the problem of getting appropriate US Government releases is avoided.

An officer of the RCAF recently visited the USAF authorities to investigate the procedure for purchasing Canadian requirements of Government Furnished Property from the USAF. RCAF requirements of Government Furnished Property for the F.86A program were communicated to the USAF Air Materiel Command HQ (Procurement and Industrial Planning Division).

The USAF are willing to undertake the procurement and/or supply of Canadian requirements to Government Furnished Property. However, the USAF have advised that prior to any action on behalf of Canada, certain authorities and procedural directives are required.

In the first place, implementing instructions under the authority of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act have not been disseminated. No action toward supply of Canadian requirements can be undertaken until an appropriate directive is issued by the U.S. Department of Defence. Presumably the Defence Department cannot act until the State Department has laid down the action to be taken in accordance with the Mutual Defence Assistance Act.

In the second place, there is the question of Canada's "priority" position in the supply of requirements relative to other countries. While Canada and the Latin-American countries are not recipients of grant aid under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act, their requirements may in some degree compete with each other and with those of the countries receiving free military assistance.

It is understood that the U.S. is establishing appropriate "screening" agencies to approve the supply of the requirements of the various countries involved. Action in this regard is liable to take some period of time and in the interim Canadian production of the F.86A will be delayed unless Canadian requirements can be treated separate from those of grant aid countries.

There would seem to be grounds for special treatment in that Canada is paying cash for purchases and a program of standardization of equipment has been agreed by Canadian and U.S. authorities.

In the third place, there is the problem of "terms of payment". It is understood that the Mutual Defence Assistance Act provides for "cash in advance" in respect to supply of equipment to Canada and the Latin-American countries. The cash requirement for the F.86A Government Furnished Property, in itself, is estimated to be approximately eleven million ($11,000,000.00) dollars (American) and there will be other Defence Department expenditures. The program on the F.86A production covers a period of over two years and it would be desirable to arrange payment on the basis of "cash on delivery". In any event, the USAF advise that the terms of payment must be established with the U.S. Government and appropriate instructions issued by the U.S. Treasury Department and/or the Bureau of the Budget to the U.S. Department of Defence before the USAF can undertake any procurement and supply action regarding Canadian requirements. As regards this question of payment, I would draw to your attention the assurances given by Mr. Berkner as reported in teletype WA-2428 of September 7, 1949.

A further problem is the question of the "channel of communication" between the RCAF and USAF in respect to the procurement of equipment by the RCAF from the USAF. Granting that formal procurement contracts will be the subject of action between the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the U.S. Department of Defence there will still arise numerous problems of detail in respect to variations of items, modifications of equipment, specifications and technical data. To attempt to discuss these details through the formal channels would invite delays in the production program. Since the USAF is the sole source of supply, and they are supplying at cost, and since financial limitations will be imposed by the formal procurement contract, it would seem advisable, in the interest of efficiency, to establish a direct channel of communication between the RCAF and the USAF. To this end it is considered that the appropriate communication channel would be one which permitted RCAF Headquarters and RCAF Air Materiel Command Headquarters to communicate directly with USAF Air Materiel Command Headquarters, Dayton, Ohio. I understand that USAF is agreeable to this.

The foregoing sets forth in some detail the problems in respect of purchase of one type of equipment. Similar problems will arise in respect of other RCAF requirements as well as those of the Army and R.C.N. A solution such as that sought for the F.86A Government Furnished Property would be helpful as a general method of operation.

I should be grateful, therefore, if you could arrange to have these points raised with the U.S. authorities. It would be most desirable, however, in view of the fact that production of the F.86A is already underway in Canada, if this could be treated as a separate problem and consideration given to it in advance of obtaining a general solution.

Yours sincerely,
C.M. DRURY

PROCUREMENT OF F.86A ITEMS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Snow, Head of the Canadian Section of the State Department, has suggested to Mr. Ignatieff of the Embassy in Washington that perhaps the best way to expedite special treatment for the F.86A items would be to have the Ambassador send a diplomatic note to the United States Secretary of State, setting out Canadian requirements in terms of items and quantities required and the special considerations which, in the opinion of your Department, would justify priority being given to your F.86A requirements under Article 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.

Mr. Snow said that the State Department and the M.D.A.A. authorities would be glad to co-operate in the drafting of such a note in a manner which might be calculated to obtain the results you desire. He suggested that it might state in effect that the Canadian Government wishes to procure, through the U.S. Military Establishment, under Article 408(e) of the M.D.A.A. of 1949, certain items in specified quantities required for the equipment of F.86A aircraft. It might then go on to give supporting arguments for having these items handled separately from the general requirements for Canadian military procurement in the United States under the M.D.A.A.

The Embassy feels that Mr. Snow's suggestion provides a sensible way of bringing the F.86A items to the stage of more definite negotiations and of making some real progress in the matter. Moreover, the M.D.A.A. officials are in agreement with the suggestion.

The Embassy would like to know whether you would be agreeable to an approach to the State Department along the lines suggested. If so, it would like to have a rough draft of what you would like to have included in the communication. It would then be in a position to discuss the text of the draft informally with the State Department and M.D.A.A. officials so that the communication to the Secretary of State would have the form and content best calculated to serve our interests and to obtain action on the matter.

If Mr. Snow's suggestion is satisfactory to you, I should be grateful if you would be good enough to let me have at your earliest convenience the material justifying priority treatment under the M.D.A.A., for F.86A items that you would like to have included in the note. You will recall that the complete list of your F.86A requirements, attached to Mr. Ross' letter of November 24,† has already gone forward to Washington.

I should add that Mr. Snow also stated that the United States authorities had not yet given up hope of having the F.86A items dealt with outside of the M.D.A.A. machinery. Should this prove impossible, it will, of course, not be necessary to make use of the proposed note.

Washington, December 9, 1949

Dear Mr. Snow,

With reference to our previous conversations concerning Canadian requirements for procurement of military equipment under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act, I attach herewith three copies of a letter from the Deputy Minister, Department of National Defence dated November 22, 1949, to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs,† which covers the lists of our requirements for the current fiscal year. You will find that Mr. Drury's covering letter explains the scope and nature of the lists submitted and their arrangement in various categories.

Attached also is a letter dated November 24, 1949,† from the Deputy Minister of National Defence to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs covering a list itemizing the F.86A equipment which is required by Canada. You will recall that in our talk in your office on November 14th last, at which Mr. Galbraith was present, I spoke of the special urgency which attaches to the procurement of F.86A equipment on order to meet the Canadair production schedule for these aircraft. To expedite consideration of this matter, therefore, a detailed breakdown of our requests of F.86A equipment has been prepared in addition to a summary of our requirements of this equipment which is included as list "B" in our overall statement.

I should be glad to furnish any further explanations of the material enclosed, as may be required. In this connection, it is my understanding that you have been kind enough to suggest that a preliminary discussion should take place next Monday, at which time Mr. Galbraith might wish to comment on these enclosures and I should therefore be grateful if you would have a copy passed to him for his study.

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM WA-3488

Washington, December 23, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Military Procurement in the United States.

1. Discussions which have been proceeding on the working level to enable Canadian procurement of military equipment through the United States Military Establishment to proceed under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act have, as I reported in my message No. 3398 of December 13th,† revealed that there are still two obstacles to overcome before the contracts are placed. These are:—

(a) the nature of the instrument, if any, which may be required to initiate procurement under the M.D.A.A., and

(b) the method of payment which would satisfy the provision that the full cost shall be made available before the execution of contracts in Article 408(E) of the M.D.A.A.

2. We are informed by the State Department that there is a disagreement between Perkins, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, and [James] Bruce, the Administrator of the M.D.A.A., on the necessity for a bilateral agreement to initiate Canadian military procurement. The State Department political officers, reporting to Perkins, have expressed the opinion that no bilateral agreement or any other formal instrument is required to initiate our procurement of military equipment in the United States on the grounds that such arrangements flow naturally from existing mutual defence arrangements of long standing, which predate the North Atlantic Treaty as well as the M.D.A.A., and that no new inter-governmental obligations should arise under the M.D.A.A. On the other hand, the legal experts put the case that Congress had envisaged that any form of "assistance" extended by the United States Government under the M.D.A.A. should be subject to a bilateral agreement, according to the provisions of Section 402 of the Act. It is argued in this connection that the extension of the facilities of the United States military establishment for our procurement is a form of "assistance". We are informed that the kind of instrument proposed by the lawyers would refer to the provisions of Section 402 but would be a much briefer document than the draft of a bilateral agreement offered to the grant beneficiaries under the Act. This domestic disagreement is being settled, I understand, by appeal to the Under Secretary or Secretary of State.

3. With regard to the question of payment, we have been following up the suggestion made by the Department of Finance about using a letter of credit. At the informal discussion with representatives of the Department of State and M.D.A.A. officials, reported in my teletype 3398 of December 13th, the suggestion was put forward on our side in the terms which were reported in my despatch No. 3100 of December 13th.† It was stated at that time that the proposal to use a letter of credit seems to us to satisfy the requirements of Section 408(E) of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act which requires that the "full cost" shall have been made available before the execution of any contract.

4. The informal discussion at the State Department on December 13th, which was mainly directed to the examination of our list of requirements, led to the suggestion from the State Department that a further discussion should take place on the technical level to consider our proposal to use a letter of credit as the method of payment.

5. This discussion took place on Thursday, December 22nd. Ignatieff, Keith and Towe attending the meeting from our side. On the United States side, there were Snow and Wight from the State Department; Galbraith and Murphy, the Controller, from the M.D.A.A.; Vigderman, the Legal Counsellor from the M.D.A.A.; Green, the Legal representative from the Pentagon, and an officer from the U.S.A.F.

6. At the outset of the meeting, Ignatieff set out the views on the letter of credit which had been communicated to me by Dr. Clark in a telephone conversation on December 20th, pointing out that a letter of credit which related payments only to deliveries and progress under the contract would, in fact, in our view, make available the whole cost as specified in Section 408(E) of the M.D.A.A.

7. On the United States side, it was explained, in the first place, that the officials in the Executive Branch of the United States Government responsible for administering the M.D.A.A. were required to be guided not only by the wording of the Act, but by the record of its legislative history. In this connection, they recalled that in the Senate Report of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Armed Services (forwarded to you under cover of my despatch No. 2269 of September 27th†) the following statement occurs,—begins: "Provisions to this effect (military assistance for cash) are included in the bill as sub-Section 408(E), and make it possible for Canada, which is joined with the United States in the North Atlantic Treaty, to strengthen her defences by purchasing equipment, materials or services from the United States...the effect of this particular provision of the bill is to enable these countries to procure on a cash basis military equipment and materials through the department of defence or, in certain cases, from other Government stocks. Technical advice and assistance in the application of the more advanced techniques and procedures can also be made available". Ends. There is a further sentence which occurs on page 23, which reads as follows:—begins: "The Committee anticipates that in the implementing of this 'cash-on-the-barrel-head' programme, the requirements of the participating countries for equipment and materials will be integrated with the requirements of the countries receiving aid on a grant basis". Ends. The United States officials said that this indication of the intent of Congress should be read in conjunction with the section by section analysis of the bill which, as it relates to Section 408(E), is found on page 37 of this report. The relevant portion of this analysis reads as follows:—begins "Advance payments will be required in amounts sufficient to cover the actual cost of items already in stock or the estimated cost of items for which contracts must be let, or for which actual cost may not be known. The recipient nation will also be required to agree to make an immediate deposit, on demand, of additional cost that may be incurred in the procurement". Ends.

8. The United States officials explained that this statement of intent and analysis which was contained in the Senate report on the bill cannot be overlooked by administering officials as it forms an essential part of the legislative history of the Act, although the interpretations given above of Section 408(E) do not appear in the report of the committee of conference between the two houses (Report No. 1346 of September 27th), which we had thought would be the governing document for purposes of interpretation.

9. In the light of this record of Congressional intent, the United States officials said that they were bound to approach our proposal for a letter of credit with due caution, particularly having in mind that no precedent exists for financing of procurement through United States Government channels without the full provision of cash in advance.

10. They indicated, however, that there was a full appreciation of the mutual interest which would be served by trying to go as far as the United States law permits in developing a method of payment which would be acceptable to us. There were certain points, however, that they felt they must advance on their side to protect their position under the law as follows:—

(a) The unqualified form of a letter of credit, in itself, would be stretching their concept of the legal intent;

(b) They could not entertain a provision in the letter of credit which would relate drawings to either deliveries or progress payments;

(c) They would, however, anticipate that drawings would, in fact, be directly related to deliveries and progress payments but could only give assurance on this point through a letter of understanding or intent which would not have legal status.

11. On our side, it was made quite clear that our proposal for a letter of credit would include the provision that drawings would be related to deliveries and progress payments and that it was intended that a note would be addressed to the Secretary of State requesting consideration of this proposal.

12. On the United States side, the view was expressed that such a note would give the United States Government authorities concerned in the matter an opportunity to study their position within the terms of the M.D.A.A. The reply to our note, it was indicated, would probably suggest:—

(a) that an irrevocable letter of credit be drawn up covering the full amount of the contract and containing the right of the United States Government to draw under the letter of credit for the full amount of the contract; and

(b) that this letter of credit would be supplemented by a letter of intent on the authority of the Secretary of State, setting out the drawing arrangements which would be followed in the execution of the contract and implying, but not undertaking, that drawings would follow the arrangements set out in the letter, and

(c) that the letter of credit instrument would provide that authorization for drawings would have to come from the Secretary of State or his designated authority the Administrator of the M.D.A.A.

13. The United States officials, in concluding the discussion, said that this was as far as they thought they could go in meeting our position. They pointed out that the end result of such an arrangement would be to meet our position in substance namely, that drawings on the letter of credit would be based on deliveries and progress rates which would have to be determined throughout the life of the contract.

14. I have set out in my immediately followed teletype† the text of a note which I propose to address to the Secretary of State, if you agree. Your comments and guidance would be appreciated as soon as possible so that the matter might be expedited.

II. NORTHEAST COMMAND

2. The Committee had for consideration a memorandum from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, concerning a draft proposal put forward by the United States military authorities for the establishment of a unified U.S. Command over U.S. forces located in Newfoundland, Labrador and Greenland. This Command, to be known as the "Northeast Command", would be responsible insofar as the U.S. responsibilities and interests were concerned, for maintaining the security of the Northeast Command and for participating in the defence of Canada and the United States against attack through the Arctic region. The Commander of the U.S. Northeast Command would be the single U.S. representative, with whom Canadian civil and military officials would carry out day-to-day discussions concerning problems affecting the U.S. military services now operating in the area.

(Memorandum of 14th May, 1949, from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs—CSC 5-1-22 of 17th May)†

3. The Chief of the General Staff stated that, while there could be no Canadian objection to the U.S. authorities providing a unified command for the administration and control of the U.S. troops stationed in Newfoundland, Labrador and Greenland, the designation "Northeast Command" could only be interpreted as a regional command. Some other designation, which clearly limited the role of the organization to that of administration and control of U.S. troops, would be necessary.

4. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that the senior officials of the U.S. State Department probably were not aware of this proposal as the State Department did not usually permit references to the U.S. activities in Greenland. The establishment of the suggested organization under its present designation would undoubtedly give rise to publicity which would create the impression that the U.S. forces were responsible for the whole of the defence of Newfoundland.

5. The Acting Chief of the Air Staff suggested that, in the development of any U.S. forces' command organization, every effort should be made to have the area of U.S. administrative responsibility coincide with the boundaries of Canadian operational commands.

6. It was agreed, after further discussion:

(a) that the item should not be included in the Agenda of the next meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence; and

(b) that a report on the U.S. proposal be prepared by the Joint Planning Committee in co-operation with the Department of External Affairs.

III. PROPOSED UNITED STATES NORTHEAST COMMAND

5. The Committee had for consideration a memorandum from the Secretary, Canadian Section, Permanent Joint Board on Defence, on the proposed United States Northeast Command, together with a copy of a communication from the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Acting Chairman, U.S. Section, Permanent Joint Board on Defence, on the same subject. The latter was in response to a request that the U.S. authorities further clarify the functions proposed for the Command in question.

On the suggestion of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, the U.S. Section were raising this matter for discussion at the forthcoming meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and the Canadian members of the Board wished to have some direction as to what line they should follow in the matter.

(Teletype WA-2770 of October 4, 1949, from the Canadian Ambassador, Washington†—Memorandum 17-K(s) of October 5th from the Secretary, Canadian Section, Permanent Joint Board on Defence—CSC 5-1-22 of 5th October)†

6. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the previous meeting of the Committee, reported that General McNaughton was being pressed by General Walsh³⁴ for an early decision on this question.

There was some doubt in his mind as to whether the U.S. proposal implied that they would have military control over the northeast area in wartime, or whether it was intended only as an administrative arrangement by which the United States would control their own forces in time of peace. If the latter were the case, presumably there would be no objection to the proposal.

7. The Chief of the Naval Staff expressed some apprehension that the U.S. proposal might be an effort on their part to establish operational control of the area in question. In this event it would, of course, be unacceptable. It was his view that the question as to who should control the area in time of war was a matter to be decided by the appropriate Regional Planning Group under the North Atlantic Treaty.

8. The Chairman, Defence Research Board, said that he felt that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum made it quite clear that the proposed arrangements applied only to the control of the U.S. forces in the area.

9. The Deputy Minister [of National Defence] shared the view expressed by the Chairman, Defence Research Board, and suggested that the use of the designation "U.S. Forces, Northeast" instead of "Northeast Command" might remove the area connotation and hence any Canadian objection to the proposal.³⁵

Major General R.L. Walsh, United States Air and Steering Member, Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

³⁵ Ceci fut discuté de façon officieuse par les membres de la Commission permanente mixte de défense Canada-États-Unis. La section américaine donna son aval aux modifications et aux clarifications proposées, y compris la désignation «United States Forces, Northeast».

This was discussed informally at the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. The American Section agreed to the changes and clarification proposed, including the designation "United States Forces, Northeast".

10. It was agreed, after further discussion, that there were no objections to the arrangements set forth in the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum for a command over the U.S. Forces in northeastern Canada on the understanding:

(a) that it was a peacetime arrangement which had no relation to the overall control of forces in the area in time of war;

(b) that it applied only to the administration and control of the United States Forces; and

(c) that the Command be designated "U.S. Forces, Northeast".

III. PROPOSED COMBINED CANADA-U.S. WINTER EXERCISE—1950

7. The Minister of National Defence reported that the United States Army authorities had proposed informally that two winter exercises involving Canadian and U.S. troops be conducted early in 1950 in Alaska and the Canadian Arctic. The Chiefs of Staff had considered the proposals and had recommended approval for an infantry exercise of battalion strength and air co-operation in Alaska-Yukon. They had, however, reserved decision regarding the value of Canadian participation in an engineering exercise in the Canadian Arctic until further information was available.

It was understood that, if the Canadian reaction to the proposals were favourable, a formal request would be submitted through the State Department to External Affairs.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(The Military Secretary's memorandum of March 12, 1949—Cabinet Document D220).†

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke of the desirability of keeping the exercise to the scale now contemplated and of avoiding undesirable publicity. All details concerning American participation should be known well in advance in order to ensure co-ordinated press releases.

9. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that there was no objection to the conduct of the military exercises in the Kluane Lake-Whitehorse area on the scale proposed and that, if a formal request were received from the United States, it be considered in the normal manner by External Affairs and National Defence.³⁶

IV. "NORTH STAR"³⁷—PROPOSED COMBINED CANADA-U.S. WINTER EXERCISE—1949–50

13. The Committee had for consideration the formal request of the United States authorities concerning the proposed exercise.

(Memorandum of 14th April from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs (and attachments)—CSC 5-1-21 of 21st April, 1949)†

14. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs observed that the United States participation in the exercise now appeared to be somewhat larger than that contemplated when the matter was first discussed at Cabinet Defence Committee, and that the plan of the exercise had changed considerably.

15. The Chief of the General Staff pointed out that the scope of the exercise had not been altered and that the numbers involved were, if anything, slightly smaller. It was possible that when the matter had been discussed at Cabinet Defence Committee, administrative units which would be necessary to maintain the forces had not been considered. This had probably given rise to what appeared to be now an increase in the strength of the U.S. Forces participating. It would be preferable to obtain approval for the contemplated exercise in order that planning could proceed. If, in the course of planning, it appeared that the U.S. Forces were being increased or the scope of the exercise was being modified to any considerable extent, the matter could be referred to the U.S. authorities through the Department of External Affairs.

16. The Chief of the Air Staff felt that approval for the exercise should be given at this time so that the necessary Air Force and Army authorities could be advised and commence planning arrangements.

17. The Deputy Minister pointed out that the Minister of National Defence had agreed that formal approval could now be given as long as the substance of the exercise and the size of the forces conformed to those previously discussed at Cabinet Defence Committee.

18. It was agreed, after further discussion:

³⁶ Confirmé par le Cabinet le 24 mars 1949.

³⁷ Rebaptisé «Cross-Index» et, plus tard, «Sweet Briar».

Later renamed "Cross-Index" and then "Sweet Briar".

(a) to recommend for approval the exercise as presently outlined by the U.S. authorities;

(b) that a joint Army-Air directive be issued to the command and planning agencies concerned; and

(c) that the Canadian representatives on the combined planning organization be instructed to report any modifications suggested by the United States which would alter the scope of the exercise or the size of the forces.

ARMED FORCES; U.S. PROPOSAL FOR AMPHIBIOUS TRAINING EXERCISES IN LABRADOR

3. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister reported that the United States sought permission to make immediate reconnaissance and to conduct training exercises in the Hamilton Inlet area for about a ten-day period in the autumn involving amphibious landings of one regimental combat team having a strength of 3,000–4,000 men and the use of live ammunition.

The proposal had been considered by the Chiefs of Staff in association with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and they had recommended that, subject to certain conditions, permission be granted.

Canadian participation would include an R.C.N. frigate, observers and possibly a small detachment of infantry.

(Memorandum, Secretary, Cabinet Defence Committee, to Acting Minister of National Defence, July 25; memorandum, Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee, to Cabinet Defence Committee, July 21, 1949, and attached report from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs—Cabinet Document D222).†

4. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that, subject to the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, U.S. authorities be permitted to conduct amphibious training exercises on the coast of Labrador, it being understood that:

(a) the Newfoundland Provincial government and the interested departments of the Federal government be informed of the exercises;

(b) the selection of the site be approved by the Chiefs of Staff;

(c) any publicity on the exercise be cleared in the normal manner with the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs; and

(d) hydrographic charts produced as a result of the surveys be made available to the Canadian government.

Ottawa, April 13, 1949

Dear Mr. Claxton,

At the March meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the Canadian Chairman undertook to have U.S.A.F. proposals for the use this summer of some of its coloured engineer troops at the Ft. Chimo, P.Q., and Frobisher Bay, N.W.T., airfields brought to the attention of the appropriate authorities in Ottawa.

These proposals are to use, at each of these fields, during the period July 15–November 1, 1949, 4 white officers and 140 coloured troops, for the following work;

Ft. Chimo, Ungava Bay

(a) Repair and maintenance of utilities and runway and rehabilitation of hangar and hospital;

(b) Extension of dock.

Frobisher Bay, Baffin Island

(a) Repair and maintenance of utilities, runway and hangar.

Since the war the Government has, I think, recognized that the U.S.A.F. may carry out repair and maintenance work on the northeastern fields—until they are taken over by the R.C.A.F.—without Ministerial approval except in cases in which new construction or use of negro troops is involved. As you will see, the present proposals include not only use of negro troops but extension of the Chimo dock for supply purposes.

As regards the question of negro troops, the U.S.A.F. indicated at the December and March meetings of the P.J.D.B. that it had made a serious effort to find white troops for this work but had been unsuccessful as the great majority of its engineer troops are coloured and its small number of white engineer troops is already committed. It also indicated that it has very little money for the hiring of contract labour; that the engineer troops can perform the work far more efficiently and expeditiously; that the work is urgent if the facilities are not to deteriorate seriously; and that it will be unable to carry out the work if coloured troops may not be used.

At the meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee on January 20 (when it was known that the U.S.A.F. would be submitting these proposals formally) the discussion of the matter was on the following lines;

(1) You indicated that a similar U.S.A.F. plan for use of negroes at Chimo had been rejected in the spring of 1948, owing to possible misunderstanding in Quebec;

(2) The C[hief of the] A[ir] S[taff] then pointed out that, if permission for the use of negroes were withheld in the case of Chimo, the R.C.A.F. would probably have to carry out extensive work there on taking over the field in 1950-51;

(3) The Prime Minister stated that approval in the case of Chimo might prove awkward in view of the then uncertain position of the Federal Government in regard to title to the use of the provincial lands; and

(4) The Committee agreed that coloured troops could be used at Frobisher this summer, but that the question of their employment at Chimo should be considered again when the position at to title had been settled satisfactorily.

We understand from the R.C.A.F. that it has now established the Federal Government's title to the lands at Chimo. We are informed that the Northwest Territories Administration and the National Health authorities are agreeable to the U.S.A.F. proposals, provided the troops are found free of contagious diseases before being embarked.

This morning the C.A.S. told me that the U.S.A.F. was anxious to have a decision so that it may complete its plans and that the R.C.A.F. attaches importance to the U.S.A.F. carrying out the proposed work this summer. In the circumstances, this afternoon I gave Mr. Pearson a draft letter to you† enquiring whether you would be agreeable to our informing the State Department that the proposals are acceptable subject to the condition desired by the Health authorities and to the understanding that extension of the Chimo dock will not give rise to any permanent rights for the U.S.A.F.

Mr. Pearson was, however, very reluctant to give his approval to use of negro troops at Chimo, feeling that there is considerable danger of their employment there being misconstrued in Quebec. He felt that the U.S. authorities should be able to find 140 white engineer troops of some kind to do this work if it is important and that, if not, final decision regarding Chimo should be postponed until the next meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee—about May 1st—when the Prime Minister will have returned.

I passed on his views to the C.A.S. who, I believe, is going to urge the U.S.A.F. to find other troops for Chimo and explain that, in any case, no decision about use of negroes there would be obtainable until about May 1st.

Attached is a copy of a teletype that I have sent to Washington† so that the State Department may know where the matter rests. I hope it will be satisfactory to you. I am sending a copy of it and of this letter to the C.A.S. for his information.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, April 23, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney,

A few days ago, Mr. C. Eberts reported by telephone that the United States had requested permission to send 140 coloured construction troops to the Fort Chimo, Quebec, Air Base, and a similar number to the Frobisher Bay, N.W.T., Air Base. Last year, a similar request was made and some coloured troops did, in fact, reach Frobisher Bay. With the control exercised by the United States Army authorities and arrangements made with the local Royal Canadian Mounted Police, undesirable contact between the troops and the native Eskimo population was prevented.

We reminded Mr. Eberts that there are Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachments at both Fort Chimo and Frobisher Bay, and also that we had already consented to the use of coloured troops at Frobisher Bay in the Northwest Territories because of the arrangements made to protect the native population from undesirable contacts, and especially from the spread of contagious or communicable diseases. We also said that the Eskimos at Fort Chimo are wards of the Dominion Government and that arrangements similar to those at Frobisher Bay would protect the Eskimo population at Chimo.

In expressing this opinion, we are guided by the feeling that it would be very difficult to justify a refusal to permit coloured troops to do labour work for the United States Army at Fort Chimo which is in the Province of Quebec when we are granting such permission at Frobisher Bay which is in the Northwest Territories because practically identical conditions prevail at the two places. We cannot say that any settled part of the Province of Quebec might be affected by coloured troops at Fort Chimo. The only people there are the Eskimos who are wards of the Dominion Government—at least so they were proved by a Supreme Court action initiated by the Quebec Government. The only question, then, is whether some interest unfriendly to the Administration might endeavour to cause embarrassment by alleging that the Administration is not being sufficiently careful in protecting the welfare of the natives.

I have since read your letter of the 13th instant addressed to the Minister of National Defence.

Will you please advise me of any decision reached. I presume that you will also advise the Commissioner, Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Yours very truly,

USE OF U.S. NEGRO TROOPS IN CANADA

You may recall that, during the winters of 1948 and 1949, proposals were received from the United States Air Force for the use of negro troops for maintenance work at the airfields and weather stations that the U.S. Air Force has been operating in Northeastern Canada.

At the October 11-12 meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the U.S. Air Force member of the Board reported that, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Government, negro engineer troops were being used this year only at the airfield at Frobisher Bay, Baffin Island.

The Canadian Section took advantage of the U.S. Air Force member's remarks to emphasize the following two points:

(1) That it is not desired to continue including references to the use of negro troops in the Board's Journal

(2) That there is nothing to be gained in making proposals to the Canadian Government for the use of such troops in Canada, at least in peacetime, owing to the political and health questions to which such proposals give rise.

You may wish to bring to the attention of the Chiefs of Staff this "off-the-record" discussion of the matter.

I am sending copies of this letter to the Deputy Ministers of Mines and Resources and National Health and to the Commissioner, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, for their information.

Yours sincerely,

DEA/5134-A-40

Note du ministre des Pêcheries

Memorandum by Department of Fisheries

[Ottawa], January 17, 1949

CANADIAN POSITION ON NORTHWEST ATLANTIC CONVENTION

1. At a meeting of Cabinet on January 13, it was decided that Canada should be represented at the conference convened by the United States Government on January 26 at Washington to "discuss the development of means for formal international cooperation in the investigation and, where necessary, the conservation of the fishery resources" of the Northwest Atlantic. The Cabinet decision was based on the proposal that Canada would not at present support or enter an international body to regulate the fisheries off her Atlantic coast, but would support a body to promote international cooperation in investigating the problems of obtaining the maximum long term yield. The Minister of Fisheries believes the Canadian delegation should have powers only of discussion and recommendation back to Government, making possible a statement of Canada's position without the appearance of having determined that position before discussion with the other interested nations. The position is outlined here for discussion before the conference.

2. Regulation. It is in Canada's interest to avoid the establishment now of an international body with regulatory powers over fisheries in the areas off her Atlantic coast for the following reasons:

(i) It is undesirable in itself to impair the control of Canada over its fisheries by delegation of the regulatory powers of the Canadian Government.

(ii) The principle of delegating regulatory powers to an International Commission is further questioned on the basis of experience with such Commissions, which shows their tendency to extend their regulatory powers, with the support of the United States, not only in the conservation but even into the economic field.

(iii) Although the possibility of future over-fishing in areas off our Atlantic coast is recognized, investigations by Canada and Newfoundland show that over-fishing has not yet occurred, and that, in fact, the fishery resources are sufficient to support a considerably greater fishery. There is therefore no urgent need for a regulatory body.

(iv) Canada with the entrance of Newfoundland, will have the greatest present catch and potential interest in the area. The establishment of an international regulatory body would involve danger of restrictions which would be against our interests while designed to make profitable fishing from a greater distance possible.

(v) More investigation is needed before sound conclusions can be reached not only the need for regulation, but also on the form necessary regulation should take. It is not possible now to plan the framework of possible future regulation intelligently.

(vi) Agreement by Canada to an international convention establishing regulatory control might prejudice Canada's claims to territoriality of waters described as coming under the convention. There has not yet been opportunity to explore the effects of the entrance of Newfoundland on Canada's position in this matter.

3. Regulation in Area IV. It is recognized that the fishing in Area IV has been particularly intensive because of proximity to the great New England fishing ports and that, consequently, some over-fishing may already have occurred and regulation be needed now. There is now little fishing in this area by Canadian fishermen who turn to more productive grounds to the east and north. There appears to be no objection to immediate provision for regulation in the area, which is urgently desired by the United States.

Canada has an historical interest in the area and a potential interest in its regulation, which might, on the one hand, divert fishing effort to grounds now used by Canadian fishermen and, on the other, so improve fishing as to make it profitable again for Canadians to fish there. European interest in the area is relatively slight because there are more productive areas much closer. It therefore is desirable to provide for joint regulation of the fishery in this area by Canada and the United States. This is embodied in their present proposal but the provision should be made in a separate instrument because it is undesirable to infer, through provision for this local regulation in agreements applying to the whole region, that the same system should eventually be extended.

4. Investigation. International cooperation in investigation of the fisheries of the Northwest Atlantic is needed for the following reasons:

(i) Over-fishing may occur in future as a result of increased demand for fish, diversion of effort from other grounds which are becoming over-fished, and improvement of vessels and equipment, bringing the waters off our Atlantic coast within easier reach of distant countries. More investigational work is needed to recognize the incidence of over-fishing, should it occur.

(ii) Sound conclusions regarding over-fishing, the resultant need for restriction, and the type of restriction which would be desirable can be reached only if full information is available on the fishing conducted by all countries in the area.

(iii) Canada and the United States are now spending more effort on investigation than the other nations fishing in the area, with Canada making the greatest effort, except in waters off New England. These investigations (involving the operation of sea-going vessels) are expensive, and it seems desirable for the effort to be shared by all nations with considerable interests in the fishery. Canada and Newfoundland have recently been spending close to $200,000 annually on investigation of the bottom-living species alone, and with increased effort on the part of other nations this expenditure will not have to be increased as much as it otherwise would.

5. Type of investigatory body. The U.S. proposals provide for the establishment of a commission which would carry out investigations with its own scientific staff and equipment. It is in Canada's interest to have instead a commission which would provide for common planning of investigations and analysis of their results, with the actual investigational work carried out by the agencies of the individual governments. The reasons in favour of this alternative include:

(i) Better assurance that information will be obtained and analyzed from the Canadian point of view as well as from the general point of view in which Canada plays a minority part.

(ii) Better control of expenditure by the Canadian government.

(iii) Less interference with and the duplication of the investigations which Canada must continue in the related field of assisting Canadians to use the resource more efficiently. Experience with international commissions of the type proposed by the U.S. has shown that they interfere with national programs through loss of personnel and the discontent and jealousy engendered by the existence of an independent organization often with more generous salaries. Canada would be the best source of personnel in the present case and would suffer most in this way.

(iv) The European countries interested in the area, which outnumber Canada and the United States, have cooperated effectively through a body (ICES) which coordinates plans and analyses results but apportions the work to national agencies.

RE: INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR THE NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

The above-noted Convention was signed by Canada, February 8, 1949, at Washington, D.C.; other signatories were the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Iceland and Newfoundland.

The Convention agreed upon by the high contracting countries provides for the investigation, protection and conservation of the fisheries of the Northwest Atlantic ocean, in order to maintain those stocks which support international fisheries. Following ratification of the Treaty (which is to be brought into force upon the deposit of instruments of ratification by four signatory governments) there shall be established a Commission to be known as the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries. The headquarters for this Commission are to be in North America, at a place yet to be decided.

The area of the Northwest Atlantic ocean falling within the scope of the international agreement is noted specifically in the annex of the attached Convention† (Page 19); roughly, it is as follows: Area 1—The waters off the west coast of Greenland; Area 2—Waters off Labrador; Area 3—Waters off Newfoundland; Area 4—Waters off Nova Scotia; and Area 5—Waters off New England. Provision is made in the Treaty to safeguard any claims to territorial waters or jurisdiction over the fisheries of the contracting parties.

The Convention provides for the setting up of panels for each of the above areas on which countries contiguous to such areas or having substantial fishing interests therein are entitled to membership. These panels, under the direction of the Commission, shall be responsible for keeping under review the fisheries of its sub-area and scientific and other information relating thereto. Each panel may make recommendations to the Commission on studies and investigations which it deems necessary.

The Commission, to which each of the contracting governments may appoint not more than three commissioners, plus experts or advisers, shall be responsible in the field of scientific investigation for obtaining and collating the information necessary for maintaining those stocks of fish in the convention area. The Commission will have no powers of regulation but may, on the recommendations of one or more panels, transmit to the depository government (Government of the United States) proposals for joint action of a regulatory nature. Such recommendations might concern establishing open and closed seasons, closing to fishing operations of a sub-area, establishing size limits, prescribing gear and appliances and prescribing catch limits.

These proposals shall be transmitted by the depository government to the other contracting governments for consideration and acceptance. If such proposals are accepted by all the governments represented on the panel concerned they shall become effective and binding on all contracting governments.

The expenses of the Commissioners, experts and advisers appointed to the Commission by each government shall be paid by that government. The joint administrative expenses of the Commission shall be paid as follows: $500 by each contracting government, plus an amount equal to the number of panels in which that government participates. Expenditures for special studies and investigations to be undertaken by the Commission are to be determined by agreement among the contracting governments. Any contracting government may withdraw from the Convention at any time after the expiration of ten years from the date of entry into force of the Treaty.

Direction of the Cabinet is sought as to the time most suitable for presentation of the International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries to Parliament for ratification.³⁸

SUMMARY OF QUESTIONS DISCUSSED AT AN INTERDEPARTMENTAL MEETING
CONCERNING THE INTERNATIONAL SALMON AND HALIBUT COMMISSIONS

An interdepartmental meeting between officials of the Departments of External Affairs and Fisheries was held in the West Block on Friday, April 1, 1949, at 2:30 p.m. for the purpose of discussing questions of principle affecting the constitutions of the two International Fisheries Commissions, with a view to holding similar discussions with United States officials at a later date.

The following were present at the meeting:

Fisheries

Mr. Stewart Bates, Deputy Minister

Mr. S.V. Ozere, Legal Adviser

Mr. G.R. Clark, Director, Western and Inland Fisheries

Finance

Mr. E.K. Turner, Chief Treasury Officer, Fisheries Branch

External Affairs

Mr. A.R. Menzies, American and Far Eastern Division

Mr. F.M. Tovell, American and Far Eastern Division

Mr. K.D. McIlwraith, American and Far Eastern Division

Mr. R.H. Jay, Legal Division

During the course of the discussions, the following points emerged:

1. As a result of lack of close supervision from Ottawa during the early years of the Commissions' operations, both Commissions have acquired a degree of independence of action in their respective fields which was not visualized by the Canadian Government at the time the Conventions were drawn up.

2. The combined United States and Canadian staffs now consider themselves international agencies serving the interests of the west coast fishing industries and

³⁸ Le Cabinet en reporta la soumission au Parlement le 31 mars 1949:

On March 31, 1949 Cabinet deferred submission to Parliament:

pending consideration by the legal advisers of the Departments of External Affairs and Fisheries of the definition of area set forth in Article 1, and its implications with regard to Canadian territorial waters.

directed by professional secretariats, which only pay lip service to Government authority.

3. The Commissions have, over a period of time, “educated” the fishermen to accept the regulatory principle to the point where the fishermen are now strongly in favour of a large number of regulations which it would be difficult to cancel without causing widespread resentment. The fishermen’s unions, in which communist influence is said to be strong (particularly in Alaskan ports), naturally favour this policy of close regulation and centralized control by the Commissions, which they—the unions—can influence.

4. The United States sections of the Commissions have historically been much stronger than their Canadian counterparts. This is partly due to the differences in personality of the respective Commissioners, partly to the preponderance of United States personnel on the staffs and advisory bodies, and partly to the dominating influence of the United States fishing interests.

5. The United States have separate halibut and salmon fleets, whereas Canadian vessels are dual purpose. If the fishing seasons are so regulated that they overlap or alternate at comparatively short intervals, as proposed by the Halibut Commission in its draft amendments to the Halibut Convention, Canadian vessels are at a disadvantage, since they have to spend precious time modifying their fittings for the different types of catch.

6. The United States Federal Government has no research organization comparable to our Fisheries Research Board and is, therefore, more ready to advance the money to pay for such scientific experts as the Commissions may deem necessary. The Canadian Government does have a research organization and the Department of Fisheries would like to use its members as a complementary investigatory body to the Commissions. However, the Commissions offer their technical advisers a salary so far above that paid by the Canadian Government (or the universities) that Canadian experts tend to be drawn to working under the aegis of the Commissions rather than as employees of the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government, nevertheless, has to pay for half of these higher salaries.

7. The Halibut Commission has its headquarters in the University of Washington in Seattle and much of the scientific “advice” emanates from experts on the university staff.

8. Ostensibly the regulations under the Sockeye Salmon Treaty aim at dividing the catches on a fifty-fifty basis between the United States and Canadian industries. In practice, the regulations operate in favour of the United States industry for various technical reasons.

9. The United States already play a dominant part in the conservation activities on the Fraser River (their experts virtually control the complete Hell’s Gate project) and they will almost certainly continue to extend their influence wherever possible (see also para 15 below). At a later date, they may be in a position to lay down terms for the inclusion of Japanese interests on the same basis as Canadian interests, which by that time may have become merely subsidiary.

10. From the Canadian Government’s point of view, the weakening of our west coast fishing industry would have serious economic—and therefore political—repercussions. At the moment one of the more important means the Government has for controlling the activities of the Commissions is through its very close scrutiny of the Commission's expenditures. If this supervision were removed, the Government would lose a valuable method of control.

11. The Commissions are obliged to make annual reports to the two Governments, but this is insufficient for effective supervision. Hitherto the Canadian Commissioners have not been asked to submit their own interim reports to the Department in Ottawa. In the case of the Halibut Commission, the terms of the Convention make it easier to demand reports from our own Commissioners, whereas there is nothing in the Salmon Convention to suggest that such a procedure was contemplated by the signatories, or that the Government would be justified in asking for such reports.

12. If the Canadian Government decided to withdraw any of its present Commissioners (which it is entitled to do under the terms of the Convention) and to appoint new ones, the retiring Commissioners, who have gained the confidence and support of the fishermen (and in particular the unions), could appeal to the industry on the basis that they were being removed by Government officials in Ottawa who did not understand the fishermen's "best interests."

13. The International Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Commission is unlikely to cause the same difficulties experienced with the Pacific Commissions because the Commission has no regulatory powers, only powers of recommendation to the Governments.

14. The attitude of the United States Federal authorities to international fisheries commissions of all kinds is fundamentally different from that of the Canadian Government. In the United States, where fishery regulation is under the individual States once a commission of this kind is established by negotiations between national governments, the Federal Government acquires and the individual States correspondingly give up some responsibility in fisheries. In Canada, the Federal Government occupies the field of fisheries jurisdiction completely, that is, it has, under the British North America Act, the sole legislative responsibility in fisheries. For that reason, the setting up of an international commission for fisheries is not needed to give the Federal authorities any jurisdiction in fisheries which they did not have before. On the contrary, every time an international Commission in fisheries is set up some power of the Federal Government is delegated to such commission. This explains the greater interest taken by the Canadian Government in retaining some degree of control over the activities of these commissions.

15. The existing Salmon Convention relates only to the catching of "sockeye" salmon, and it is thought that the United States may be contemplating the extension of the Salmon Commission's jurisdiction to include other types such as chum, spring, coho and pinks.

16. It is the opinion of the Department of Fisheries that the Halibut and Salmon Commissions' activities are weighted in favour of United States interests by virtue of the greater influence wielded by the United States sections of the Commissions. The following are possible methods of achieving "a redress in the balance of power";

(a) The Conventions might be amended to give the Governments a greater degree of control over the Commissions. As now worded, the Conventions clearly permit a considerable degree of autonomy to the Commissions and the Governments have, strictly speaking, no legal right to control directly any of the powers or functions now exercised by the Commissions, particularly in the case of the Salmon Commission.

(b) Owing to differences in the terms of the two Conventions the Salmon Commission has a greater degree of autonomy than the Halibut Commission. By amending the Salmon Convention, the two Commissions might be brought more in line with one another.

(c) The Commissions' staffs might be reorganized to secure larger Canadian representation, and new Canadian commissioners might be appointed who would be willing to take a firmer stand during the Commissions' discussions.

(d) The Canadian Commissioners might be asked to submit interim reports to their Government to bridge the gap between the Commissions' normal annual reports.

(e) The Canadian Government might arrange for its own experts or advisers to attend the Commissions' meetings, in addition to the Canadian Commissioners.

(f) The Canadian Government might insist on a continued close supervision of the Commissions' expenditures. (This would not prevent improvements being made in the existing fiscal procedures.)

17. It was agreed that officials of the State Department (in particular Mr. Chapman)³⁹ should be invited to Ottawa for discussions as soon as possible, and that Mr. Ozere and a representative of the Department of External Affairs—to be nominated later—should work out jointly the questions which we wished to put to the United States authorities in anticipation of these discussions.

DESPATCH 1100

Ottawa, April 20, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to various questions currently outstanding between the United States and Canadian Governments, concerning the International (Halibut) Fisheries Commission and the International Pacific Salmon Commission.

2. These questions may be summarized as follows:

(a) Amendment of the Halibut Convention. Amendment of this Convention was first proposed in 1946 with the object of giving additional (regulatory) powers to the Halibut Commission. Some clarification of the question was achieved at joint meetings of the representatives of the two Governments with the Commissions in Ottawa last fall. Further progress has been held up, since certain of the proposed regulatory powers are considered questionable from a legal and policy point of view.

(b) Revision of Fiscal Procedures. Proposals for the revision of the fiscal procedures of the two Commissions were made by the United States Government in its note of March 2, 1948.† The Department of Fisheries did not favour the changes proposed by the United States Government and certain counter proposals were made in a despatch to you (No. 3871 of December 9, 1948)† for transmission to the State Department. These counter proposals have not yet been delivered to the State Department, pending clarification of the reasons "why the United States proposals of March 2 are not acceptable to the Canadian Government". (Your despatch No. 105 of January 13 refers.)†

(c) Appropriation of Funds for Divisible and Other Expenses. Proposals for separate appropriation of funds for divisible expenses of the Commissions and for the personal expenses of the Commissioners were made by us last May (our teletype EX-1193 of May 3 and despatch 3890 of December 9 refers).† No answer has yet been received.

(d) United States Share of Divisible Expenses. No payment has been received from the United States Government for its share of the divisible expenses of the two Commissions covering the months of November, December, 1948, and January, February, 1949. We asked you to enquire into this situation (our teletype EX-745 of March 19 refers),† but we have not yet received an answer.

3. Although it has been evident for some time that negotiations between the two Governments regarding the Pacific Fisheries Commissions have not been making much progress, the foregoing summary would indicate the need for immediate joint consideration of the problems by officials of the two Governments.

4. During the past few weeks, the main problems concerning the two Commissions have been jointly considered by this Department and the Department of Fisheries. We have come to the conclusion that, before any progress can be made towards a settlement of the specific problems mentioned above, we must reach a clearer understanding with the United States authorities on the basic principles underlying the status and functions of the two Commissions.

5. In this connection, I enclose a confidential memorandum⁴⁰, for your own information, summarizing the points discussed at an interdepartmental meeting held recently, which will give you the background to the present situation regarding the Commissions' activities. There is undoubtedly a marked divergence of views between the two Governments regarding the degree of autonomy to be granted to the Commissions in the various spheres of conservation, financing, and general administration. It is hoped that these notes will give you a fuller understanding of the reasons why we have found it difficult to accept the United States theory of "international autonomous entities."

6. A further problem which is causing concern to the Department of Fisheries is the protection of the salmon canning industry of British Columbia. The Canadian salmon fishing industry is potentially a thriving one with its well-equipped fishing vessels and its modern and very efficient canneries. The drastic reduction of the United Kingdom market for canned salmon leaves the Canadian industry faced at present with the discouraging alternatives of trying to sell the canned fish in the United States over a prohibitive tariff wall or selling the raw product to United States canneries at "knock-down" prices. This matter has no direct connection with the functions or administration of the Commissions but it is of interest as a related problem in the Pacific fisheries industry.

7. The Deputy Minister of Fisheries and his assistants are convinced that if we can reach a closer understanding with the State Department on the basic issues, it will be very much easier to find mutually agreeable solutions to all other outstanding problems. It has, therefore, been decided to invite the State Department to send representatives to Ottawa for joint discussions, preferably during the third week in May. (We are particularly anxious to have Mr. Chapman, who has himself worked with the Halibut Commission).

8. We are not submitting a fixed agenda for the discussions, since we shall be prepared to discuss all outstanding questions mentioned in para. 2 above, as well as broad questions of principle which would include the following:

(a) The degree of control and direction to be exercised by the Governments over policies of the two Commissions.

(b) The extent to which the Commissions should report to the Governments regarding their work.

⁴⁰ Document 949.

(c) The extent to which the Commissions should cooperate with existing Government agencies, and the possible attachment of Government advisers to the Commissions.

(d) The procedure whereby the Commissions may hold public hearings.

9. If you agree, the most desirable procedure might be for an officer of the Embassy to call informally on Mr. Chapman and leave with him our invitation together with an outline of the questions we would like to discuss. It would be helpful if we could have an early indication of the State Department's reaction to our proposal.

I have, etc.

CANADA U.S. FISHERIES DISCUSSIONS IN OTTAWA, JULY 7-8

The meeting was originally called to provide an opportunity for one or two Government officials from each country to work out some of the administrative problems which have developed in the operation of the Pacific Fisheries Commissions. By the time the discussions took place, the U.S. delegation had been increased to seven members and the scope of the U.S. proposed agenda has been enlarged to cover, in addition to the Commissions' problems, the negotiation and signature of one convention and the preliminary discussion of four others.

2. The first subject to be discussed was a U.S. proposal that general fisheries conventions covering the North Pacific area should be negotiated separately with the U.S.S.R. and Japan. Dr. Chapman of the State Department who headed the U.S. delegation, had prepared draft texts and these were reviewed at the meeting.

3. The general ideal of the proposed convention with the U.S.S.R. is that the Pacific Ocean north of 47° latitude, to 67°30' including Bering Strait, should be divided for fishing purposes at the International Dateline. Canadian and U.S. fishermen would be prohibited from fishing west of the Dateline, while Russian fishermen would not be permitted to engage in fishing east of the Dateline.

4. Under the proposed convention with Japan, Canadian and U.S. fishermen would be prohibited from fishing within 150 miles of the land territory of Japan, while Japanese fishermen would be prohibited from fishing within 150 miles of the land territory of the U.S. or Canada.

5. The advantages of these two conventions for us would be the elimination, or at least substantial reduction, of disputes between fishermen of different nationalities and the protection for our own fishermen of the fishery resources of the Eastern

Pacific, which have been developed by a joint Canadian-U.S. conservation program and which are now being exploited to the limit.

6. The Canadian side agreed in principle that such treaties, if they could be negotiated, would be desirable and it was decided to let the matter rest until the State Department was able to secure the necessary concurrence of the various Departments and agencies concerned and let us have a further draft for detailed study and comment.

7. The U.S. hope to put up the proposed convention to the U.S.S.R. in the Fall of this year. The timing of the Japanese convention is now under discussion with SCAP but no reply has yet been received. The U.S. view is that, unless such a convention were tied in with the Peace Treaty or concluded before the Peace Treaty, the Japanese would probably refuse to accept it.

8. After disposing of the subject of the two Pacific Fisheries Conventions, on which there was general agreement, the meeting turned to the consideration of a draft fur seal convention prepared by the State Department. This proposed convention, which would include the U.S.S.R., would replace the present provisional agreement between Canada and the U.S.A. When the U.S. Embassy in Moscow notified the U.S.S.R. Government of the prolongation of the Canada-U.S. provisional agreement, the Soviet Government indicated their interest and their willingness to enter into similar arrangements. The U.S. would like to submit the proposed fur seal convention to the U.S.S.R. at the same time as the general fisheries convention described above.

9. The main idea of the convention is to prohibit pelagic sealing. The U.S. draft also contained one article relating to bilateral arrangements between Canada and the U.S. for a 20% cut of seal skins to be paid to Canada and guaranteeing continuous consultation between the Governments on the proper maximum at which the seal herds should be maintained.

10. We suggested that it might be unwise to include in a multilateral convention one clause relating to particular arrangements between two of the parties. It seemed preferable to us to negotiate a general treaty prohibiting the nationals of the high contracting parties from engaging in pelagic sealing and then to conclude a separate agreement between Canada and the U.S. covering our cut of the seal kill and any other points of mutual concern. The U.S. delegation saw no objection to this and agreed that it would probably be a better procedure.

11. We also made it clear that we would want to give serious thought to the status of Japan in such a convention. Omitting them from the treaty would leave them free in the future to engage in pelagic sealing and this might kill the chances of acceptance of the convention by the U.S.S.R. who could be expected to insist upon protection from the pelagic sealing operations of the Japanese.

12. Our Fisheries representatives were most insistent that scientific investigations on an adequate scale should be undertaken in order to prove to what extent the seals, during their migrations along our coast, were preying upon our fishery resources. The U.S. delegation was, on the whole, pessimistic as to the chances of carrying out successful investigations at sea, but our Fisheries people were not convinced and this subject will be given further study.

13. The U.S. draft called for the convention to be in force for an initial period of 15 years. It could be terminated on 12 months notice, but only by a majority of the high contracting parties. It is almost certain that the Soviet Government will refuse to accept the convention in this form and the U.S. is quite prepared to alter it so that any party could withdraw after proper notice. Our Fisheries officials would not consider 15 years and urged an initial period of 5 years. The U.S. were willing to come down to 10. No agreement was reached on this point.

14. Although the Department of Fisheries was prepared to oppose any fur seal convention, the exchange of views resulted in a change of heart and there is little doubt that we will be able to meet the U.S. in this matter. We will receive a new draft which will take into account the views expressed by us at the meeting and more detailed study will then be given to the text.

15. The next item on the agenda was a proposed convention for the extension of port privileges to fishing vessels. At the present time, privileges are extended on a reciprocal basis in British Columbian and Alaskan ports but these arrangements are made annually by Order-in-Council and Presidential decree and the U.S. is anxious to put them on a more permanent basis.

16. Our Fisheries Department was very much opposed to this convention as they consider the arrangement to be too one-sided. They realized that privileges extended for years could not, in practice, be withdrawn but they did not feel inclined to write them into a treaty. The main point here, as far as the discussion was concerned, was that the latest draft was distributed at the meeting and the State Department had hoped that this particular convention could be formally completed during the discussions. We made it clear to the U.S. Embassy before the meeting began that this was not feasible, as we had not had time to give adequate study to the legal and constitutional implications or to consult with other interested parties. The U.S. delegation asked if we could let them have our final views within two weeks, as otherwise the necessary legislation would not reach the Senate until too late for next year's fishing season. As the present arrangements expire on December 31st, this would, in fact, create considerable inconvenience. We promised to give the question immediate attention, but in view of the necessity for Fisheries to consult the fishing industry and the Department of National Revenue, it is not at all sure that we shall be in the position to give a definitive reply within two weeks. The responsibility for this situation lies with the State Department who should have submitted their draft sufficiently early to allow of adequate study and consultation.

17. The U.S. delegation next produced a new variation of a revised halibut convention. We could not give very definite views on this draft as we had not had the opportunity to study it beforehand. However, the principal changes from the present treaty were included in a previous draft and we could express our views on these proposals. The Fisheries officials handled this discussion almost entirely since the points at issue were strictly of interest to Fisheries. All the major amendments in the U.S. draft were unacceptable (the increase from 4 to 6 in the Commission membership—the licensing of dealers—the control of departure of vessels—the inclusion of sablefish) and it was quite clear that agreement on this convention would not be reached. After considerable discussion, it was decided to drop the matter, at least for the present, on the understanding that it would be taken up by the two Governments with the Commissions, beginning with the scheduled talks, next September.

18. The final item on the agenda dealt with the financial procedure of the Commissions. The State Department had proposed certain changes in the fiscal procedure which would simplify administration and leave the Commissions a freer hand in operating their finances. We had found these suggestions unacceptable but had made certain minor changes in our system which had proved helpful. The U.S. delegation explained that this situation no longer posed any problem as their Treasury Officer had been able to secure authority to put the U.S. proposals into operation regardless of Canadian procedure. This presented a happy solution and there are at present no outstanding financial problems.

A Fisheries officer attended all meetings as Secretary and he is preparing a complete summary of the discussions, the decisions reached, and the action to be taken on each subject. Copies of this official summary† will be obtained from the Fisheries Department and will be placed on the appropriate files.

Note du secrétaire du Cabinet pour le Cabinet
Memorandum from Secretary to the Cabinet to Cabinet

[Ottawa], September 21, 1949

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR THE NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

1. On March 31, Cabinet gave consideration to the ratification of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention, signed in Washington on February 8, for the investigation, protection and conservation of the fisheries of the Northwest Atlantic ocean. It was decided that the Legal Advisers of the Departments of External Affairs and Fisheries should consider the definition of the "Convention Area" in the agreement and its implications with regard to Canadian territorial waters.

2. The Legal Advisers have pointed out that in the discussions leading to the convention, the U.S. representative advocated the inclusion of language which would make it clear that no effect on claims as to territorial waters was intended. He said:

"This would be an absolute disclaimer that the Convention we are signing has any effect whatsoever on past, present or future policies or actions on the subject of the extent of territorial waters, the extent of jurisdiction or of areas on the high seas".

The Canadian delegate supported this, saying:

"There is nothing in this document that prejudices the claims of any country—past, present, or future claims".

Accordingly, the "Convention area" was defined to "except territorial waters" and Article I(2) reads:

“Nothing in this Convention shall be deemed to affect adversely (prejudice) the claims of any contracting government in regard to the limit of territorial waters or to the jurisdiction of a coastal state over fisheries”.

3. In view of the recorded statements of intention and of the terms of the Convention referred to the Legal Advisers are of the view that the definition of the Convention area does not prejudice the Canadian position on territorial waters generally or with regard particularly to waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence following the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation.

The Legal Advisers are agreed that:

(a) there is no need for haste in ratifying the convention, the ratification of which could and should be deferred;

(b) the problem of ratification, by Canada, with or without reservation concerning the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, forms part of the larger problem of what Canada can or should do with reference to the contention that, following union with Newfoundland, these waters are to be regarded as part of the national waters of Canada;

(c) the whole problem ought to be studied and reported on by an interdepartmental committee, on which all interested departments would be represented, before the convention is ratified.

5. It is to be noted that the Convention was signed “For His Majesty’s Government in the U.K and the Government of Newfoundland in respect of Newfoundland”. When and if ratification is deposited on behalf of Canada, it will presumably be desirable to deposit with it an observation to the effect that the ratification covers also the Newfoundland signature. That would provide an opportunity for a further observation, perhaps in very general terms, covering the effects of union upon the extent of Canadian territorial waters which are presumably excepted from the Convention area.

6. Cabinet might wish to direct that an interdepartmental committee should look into and report upon the points referred to by the Legal Advisers in paragraph 4.⁴¹

Ottawa, November 17, 1949

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR THE NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES; CANADIAN TERRITORIAL WATERS

7. The Prime Minister said that he had received a report on a meeting of the interdepartmental committee on Territorial Waters called in accordance with the direction of Cabinet to consider matters arising out of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention.

The committee were of the view that the definition of the Convention area was inexact and recommended that the Departments of External Affairs and Fisheries consider the drafting and advise whether Canadian representatives abroad should ask other signatory countries to agree to a restatement of the delimiting clause, or whether Canada should attach a reservation to the instrument of ratification.

The committee were also of the view that an unreserved ratification of the Convention now might prejudice [the] claim that the Gulf of St. Lawrence was a Canadian territorial water. Departments had been asked to consider the extent and character of the interest of each in establishing such a claim. The committee felt that a successful claim in respect of the Gulf might be helpful to the Canadian position in the Arctic if it established a further precedent for the headland-to-headland theory as already applied to Hudson Strait. If, however, the case with regard to the Gulf seemed weak, any link with the headland theory might weaken the application of that theory in support of Canadian claims in the Arctic.

8. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Prime Minister and agreed that the interdepartmental committee give further consideration to Canadian interest in and prospect of establishing a claim that the Gulf of St. Lawrence was a part of Canadian territorial waters.

SECTION B

PROPOSITION D'ETENTE AU SUJET DES PHOQUES
PROPOSED AGREEMENT ON FUR SEALS

DEA/4431-A-40

[Ottawa], May 6, 1949

The United States Embassy has handed to the Department of External Affairs a memorandum dated December 21, 1948 in which the Department is informally advised that the Department of State is studying the possibility of a permanent agreement relating to the fur seal herds of the North Pacific Ocean with a view to inviting the Canadian and Soviet Governments to participate in negotiations on the subject. The United States Embassy has expressed its desire to receive any comments and suggestions which the Canadian Government may care to offer in this connection.

2. The competent Canadian authorities are of the opinion that a permanent fur seal agreement, to which the Government of the U.S.S.R. would be a party, to replace the present Provisional Agreement between the United States and Canada would be in the best interests of all concerned and that negotiations to this end would therefore be desirable.

3. The Department of External Affairs recalls that at the discussions which took place in Ottawa on September 20, 1945, it was agreed that Canada and the United States should keep in close informal touch throughout the period leading to any agreement which would include the U.S.S.R. With this in view the Department believes it would be most useful if preliminary discussions could be arranged between United States and Canadian representatives so that the views of the United States and Canadian Governments could be exchanged and general agreement reached before any approach is made to the Soviet Government to enter into negotiations.

4. Without suggesting an exhaustive agenda for the proposed discussions, some of the items which might profitably be considered are the following:

(1) Japan's place in a permanent agreement. It seems clear that as a matter of protection to the other countries concerned, some steps will have to be taken to prevent Japanese fishermen from engaging in pelagic sealing in the future. Whether the solution lies in the insertion of a relevant clause in the Peace Treaty or in having SCAP participate in the Fur Seal negotiations and agreement on behalf of Japan or in some other alternative, the basic question is one which calls for serious consideration and if possible prior agreement between Canada and the United States before this thorny problem is presented to the Soviet Government.

(2) Possible points of divergences with the Soviet Government. It is noted that the Department of State believes that any new agreement should be based in part on the principles contained in the 1911 Agreement. It seems likely to the Department of External Affairs that certain of the provisions of the 1911 Agreement, particularly those relating to inspection and the handing over of sealskins to representatives of other countries may be open to objection by the Soviet Government for reasons of security. It might be advisable for the United States and Canadian representatives to take into account all such potentially controversial questions and to attempt to work out satisfactory solutions to them so as to be in a better position to cope with them if raised by the Soviet Government at a later stage.

(3) Percentage of returns. Presumably the whole question of distribution of shares of the fur seal take among the interested countries will be reviewed and a fair rate fixed in the proposed agreement. The Canadian authorities consider it desirable to have this matter discussed between the United States and Canadian Governments in the preliminary conversations.

(4) Maximum numbers fixed for seal herds. The Canadian authorities suggest that there might be something to be said in favour of fixing a maximum for the seal herds rather than permitting an annual increase to the point where there may be excessive numbers. The Canadian authorities have in mind, in this connection, the heavy toll of herring and pilchards taken by the seals and to a lesser extent the depredations on the salmon. It is suggested, therefore, that consideration be given to this question during the proposed discussions.

(5) Scientific investigation of habits of seals. The Canadian authorities would be interested in a full scale scientific investigation to determine the habits of seals, with particular reference to such habits while at sea; the kind of food used and a careful estimate of the quantities of fish taken by the seals.

5. The Department reiterates that the comments and suggestions outlined above are meant solely as a guide to a possible agenda for United States-Canadian preliminary discussions: they represent no more than an indication of the line of approach which commends itself to the Canadian authorities.

6. If convenient to the United States authorities the Canadian Government would be pleased to have the discussions take place in Ottawa.⁴² It might be mentioned in this regard that an invitation has gone forward through the Canadian Embassy in Washington to the United States Government to send representatives to Ottawa, preferably during the third week of May, to discuss outstanding questions relating to the Pacific Salmon and Halibut Commissions. If these arrangements are concluded, the United States Government might consider it desirable to have their representatives devote one extra day to discussing with the Canadian representatives the proposed fur seal agreement with a view to reaching common ground before the initial approach is made to the Soviet Government.⁴³

St. Lawrence Project.

1. The President, in his budget message yesterday, again sought Congressional approval, as follows:

“I again urge the Congress to give early approval to the St. Lawrence waterway and power project. The navigational aspects of this project have recently assumed an increased importance as a result of the prospects for developing high-grade iron ore deposits in Labrador. As our domestic deposits become depleted, the proposed seaway will become an important link between our steel industry and this new potential source of ore. Furthermore, this dual purpose project is needed as a source of low-cost power.”

2. I have had a further talk with Mr. Hickerson about the prospects of approval. He said that a memorandum from the State Department had been sent to the President expressing the view that “an all-out effort” on the part of the Administration was necessary. The memorandum, I gathered, stated that if the project was defeated in Congress at this session, there would not be likely to be another chance of securing the combined development for navigation and power. It pointed out that most of the country was apathetic towards the project and that the President would have to exert strong pressure on members of Congress from States not directly interested for or against it in order to secure their votes in favour.

3. The memorandum also mentioned as still in effect the understanding with Canada reached when the treaty of 1932 was signed that no action would be taken by Canada until the United States had completed Congressional approval. It said that if the Canadian Government were asked to put the agreement through Parliament before its passage by Congress, the Administration would have to do everything it could to further the adoption of the agreement here. Mr. Hickerson commented that we might desire for our own reasons to secure Parliamentary approval fairly early in the forthcoming session, without any request from the United States, and added that prior Canadian approval would be of some value in persuading Congress to act.

4. Mr. Hickerson thought that if approval was not given at this session of Congress, the President would be constrained to agree to the separate power development in view of the urgent need for additional power on both sides of the boundary. He remarked that the President would be bound to consider his tactics in light of the general political situation, since the use of strong pressures, in the field of patronage and so on, to further the adoption of the St. Lawrence project might diminish his influence towards securing approval for other important items of his programme. You will note from the extract from the budget message that particular emphasis was laid on navigation by the President.

TELEGRAM EX-227

Your teletype WA-68 of 11th January. St. Lawrence Waterways.

Your suggestion that prior approval of the Agreement of 1941 by the Canadian Parliament might be of assistance in persuading the United States Congress to approve the Agreement has been considered carefully here. It is felt, however, that there are strong arguments against this course.

2. In the first place, the Canadian Government would almost inevitably have to seek approval for most, if not the whole, of the 1941 Agreement, as originally signed. The United States Congress, on the other hand, will probably attach reservations to any approval it may give. It would be inappropriate for the Canadian Government to introduce reservations which could only be explained as clauses designed to appeal to the United States Congress. It would be difficult, moreover, to predict exactly what form the Agreement will take when Congress is finished with it.

3. In the second place, the arguments which the Government would have to use in asking Parliament to approve the Agreement might well be used by the opponents of the Agreement in Congress. The Government would have to argue, for example, that the implementation of the 1941 Agreement would be financially advantageous to Canada. Such an argument would be unlikely to appeal to legislators, as a reason for expediting Congressional approval of the project.

4. I must confess that I am greatly impressed by the foregoing arguments. I do not suggest that you convey them to the State Department. You might wish, however, to inform the State Department that it is unlikely that the prior approval of the Canadian Parliament will be sought.

5. At the same time, you might ask the United States authorities, in confidence, whether any other action could be taken by Canada which would facilitate Congressional approval. It might be pointed out, in this connection, that recent public statements by the Ministers of National Defence and of Transport, have stressed the importance of the waterway and power project. Similar statements in the future might, for instance, be prepared in the manner best calculated to impress Congress favourably. You might also state that the Canadian Government would be pleased to endeavour to supply statistics or other information which would be useful to the Administration in seeking approval for the Agreement.

6. I should appreciate being informed of the reaction of the United States authorities to these observations.

Memorandum from Legal Division to Legal Adviser

CONFIDENTIAL

STATUS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT⁴⁴

In its present form, the St. Lawrence waterway and Power Project is a scheme for providing a 27-foot navigational channel from the Great Lakes to the sea, and for developing more than two million horsepower of hydro-electric energy in boundary waters. The St. Lawrence Project has been a subject of more or less active consideration by Canada and the United States since the turn of the century. Parts of the eventual waterway have been constructed by the Canadian and United States Governments, on their own initiative, but no over-all treaty or agreement, providing for the completion of the entire project, has ever been concluded between the two countries and brought into effect.

Supporters of the St. Lawrence Project are saying that it has a better chance of approval in 1949 than it has ever had. The statement is probably true. The importance of the Quebec-Labrador iron ore discoveries to the Great Lakes steel industry, and the emphasis which can be placed on the importance of the project to national defence, are providing strong arguments to counter the traditional opposition of U.S. East Coast port and railroad interests. But "a better chance than ever" does not necessarily mean an exceptionally good chance. The odds are probably no better than 50-50, even in 1949.

It is virtually certain, however, that some action on the St. Lawrence will be taken this year. This is because of the urgent need for power in Ontario and New York State, and the announced determination of the province and state to build a separate power development at the Long Sault, near Cornwall, Ontario, if the combined power and navigation scheme cannot be implemented. The Prime Minister has said that the Canadian Government will not stand in the way of the separate power scheme, if Congress does not approve the larger project this year, and although President Truman has so far refused to commit himself he may well come to the same conclusion. If separate power development is permitted, completion of the waterway will recede into the indefinite future.

To a large extent, the fate of the waterway rests in President Truman's hands. There is no doubt that he favours the project. The question is what degree of priority he will assign to it, and how far will he be prepared to go in applying pressure on Congressmen from the West and South who have no strong feelings one way or the other. The U.S. Senate killed a St. Lawrence treaty in 1934 and both Houses of Congress have stalled on the present St. Lawrence agreement ever since 1941. Strong measures will be necessary to win an early and favourable decision. The Embassy in Washington hopes to learn soon how much ammunition the Administration will expend for this particular objective. When this is known, it may be possible to estimate the chances of the 1941 St. Lawrence Agreement with some degree of accuracy.

Meanwhile, the Canadian Government must be prepared for any eventuality, and the St. Lawrence Interdepartmental Committee, whose chairman and secretary are supplied by this Department, is concerned with both the combined power and navigation scheme and the smaller separate power plan. At the moment, the former is claiming most of the Committee's attention, and a great deal of work has been undertaken. There is little danger of Parliament failing to approve the project, but it will still need to be explained and justified in detail. The Interdepartmental Committee is preparing exhaustive studies covering all phases of the subject—engineering, financial, economic, defence, legal. External Affairs, Transport, Trade and Commerce and Defence have had personnel working full-time on these studies. The Interdepartmental Committee is also drafting an agreement for turning over to Ontario the power facilities to be constructed in connection with the combined scheme.

Work on the separate power plan is at present at a standstill, as far as this Department is concerned, pending clarification by Justice of some difficult legal questions of federal and provincial rights to water powers in navigable streams. The work on the separate power plan will shift into high gear, however, at the first intimation from Washington that hope for the combined scheme is waning.

RE: ST. LAWRENCE RIVER; NEW YORK-ONTARIO SEPARATE POWER PLAN

Annexed hereto, for your signature if you concur, is a letter to your colleague the Minister of Justice⁴⁵, asking that priority be given to certain questions submitted to his Department in August, 1948, in connection with the New York-Ontario separate power plan for the St. Lawrence River.

2. While it is regrettable that hastening action of this type appears necessary, further delay might result in exposing the Government to serious criticism.

3. Preliminary discussions between officers of this Department and of the Department of Justice, last July, brought to light the possibility that the Ontario Hydro application to the International Joint Commission might be found to be legally invalid and beyond the powers of the Ontario Government to authorize. It was urgently necessary to know the legal status of the application, therefore, and this was confirmed in a letter of August 3, 1948, a copy of which is attached as an enclosure to the letter to the Minister of Justice.† On at least one occasion during the fall of 1948, Mr. D.M. Johnson of this Department, then chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project, spoke to Mr. Varcoe⁴⁶ and emphasized that a reply was urgently required. In January, 1949, the Legal Adviser of the Department assumed the chairmanship of the Interdepartmental Committee, and on January 27 he wrote Mr. Varcoe stressing the dangers inherent in further delay. He spoke to him a few days later, and was assured that the matter would be dealt with at once. Neither written communication has, however, been answered.

4. If the Hydro application is found to be valid, the Government will have to decide whether to deal with it under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, or under special legislation as in the case of the Beauharnois development. Either procedure could involve lengthy delays. If the application is not valid, it might be necessary to proceed by concurrent federal and provincial legislation, which could also prove time-consuming.

5. If Congress rejects the combined power and navigation project, there will inevitably be strong pressure on both sides of the border for immediate action on separate power. Early action could be taken in Washington, since the New York application has been approved by all agencies concerned except the Federal Power Commission, which has completed its hearings and need only issue a license. Early action here would be virtually impossible as matters now stand.

6. The Canadian Prime Minister has taken a lead in favouring separate power development, if the combined project is rejected. You will no doubt agree that it would be most undesirable for Canada to be responsible in any way for delay in respect of the power development.

RE: ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY AND POWER PROJECT

The attached Associated Press item, † bearing today's date, says "the impression is wide-spread" in Washington that the St. Lawrence project has no hope of Congressional approval this session, or in fact before 1951. While the story is probably no more than speculation, its publication is likely to bring to a head the problem of the New York-Ontario separate power plan.⁴⁷

2. I attach a copy of a teletype message I have sent to the Embassy in Washington, † stressing the importance, from the Canadian point of view, of knowing what the United States Administration intends to do, and whether there is any chance of the waterway being approved this year.

3. My own guess is that the story is substantially true, but that the United States Administration will be loath to admit that it has virtually abandoned hope of winning the waterway this year. If the Embassy's reply confirms no more than this, however, I think it will be essential for us to proceed immediately on the assumption that the Canadian Government will have to admit that the waterway is a lost cause, and lend full support to separate power. Once the public becomes convinced that Congress will not act in 1949, whatever the United States Administration says, no other course will be open; the Prime Minister's statements on the subject make this clear.

4. The first step would probably be high-level discussions with Ontario to settle problems raised by Hydro's application to the International Joint Commission. Our complete unpreparedness for any such discussions, in view of Justice's failure to

RE: ONTARIO HYDRO APPLICATION TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—ST. LAWRENCE POWER DEVELOPMENT

Dear Sir:

I acknowledge your letter of August 3 and the material therein mentioned which I return herewith.⁴⁹

You forwarded a letter by the Chairman of Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario to the Minister of External Affairs enclosing an application which the Chairman requested be submitted to the International Joint Commission. The application is addressed to the International Joint Commission and requests that the Commission approve the joint construction by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the Power Authority of the State of New York of the works defined in paragraph eight of the application and the use by each of these authorities for the development of hydro-electric power, of one-half of the natural flow of the St. Lawrence River less that required for domestic purposes and navigation. The works set out in the application include the construction of a main power dam across the international boundary, the installation of power houses, the enlargement of the channels in the river, the construction of dykes, the re-location of canals and railways and contemplate the flooding of a considerable area of land in Ontario and New York.

The application is accompanied by a copy of an order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council making certain regulations authorizing the Hydro-Electric Power

⁴⁸ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Mr. Hopkins: I spoke to Varcoe this morning. He was working on the problem last night but “can’t make his mind up”. Will press on and get his opinion to us as soon as possible. Ap. 7. A. H[eeney]

⁴⁹ Voir/See: Volume 14, Documents 1018–1020.

Commission of Ontario, amongst other things, to acquire by purchase or expropriation a considerable area of land, the southern border of which is the international boundary in the St. Lawrence River and which extends inland and along the St. Lawrence River for a considerable distance. I understand that this is the area that will be flooded as a result of the proposed project or that will otherwise be necessary for it. The area includes the present canals in or alongside the St. Lawrence River which are on property owned by the Crown in right of Canada. The area also includes railways and other works within the exclusive legislative authority of Canada. I understand that in some cases it is probable that the lands owned by the Crown in right of Canada extend to the international boundary and may include portions of the bed of the St. Lawrence River upon which part of the proposed works are to be constructed.

You request my opinion on a number of questions. The first two of these questions are:

- (a) Whether the Hydro has valid authority to submit the application;
- (b) Whether the Hydro has valid authority from the Ontario Government to undertake the development envisaged by the application.

I am of opinion that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario has not authority to undertake the proposed works.

By the British North America Act, legislative authority in relation to "Works and Undertakings...extending beyond the Limits of the Province", is expressly excluded from the classes of subjects upon which the legislature of a province is authorized to legislate. The work or undertaking covered by the application would according to my reading thereof, appear to fall within this category of works extending beyond the limits of the province and it follows that the Legislature of Ontario has no authority to legislate in relation to the proposed work or in relation to its operation. The judgment of Mr. Justice Duff⁵⁰ in the Water Power Reference of 1929, particularly at p. 225, would appear to support this view.

The Power Commission Act of Ontario incorporates the Hydro-Electric Power Commission and contains extensive provisions regulating its business as operator of hydro-electric power works. It also confers many special powers and privileges such as the power of expropriation on the Power Commission as the operator of such works. In my opinion, it is beyond the legislative authority of Ontario to enact many of these provisions in relation to a work or undertaking, or the operation of a work or undertaking extending beyond the limits of the province. Therefore, the Power Commission Act should be interpreted as not being intended to apply in respect of such works or undertakings. It follows that the Power Commission has no authority under this Act to undertake the proposed works.

Moreover, it is well established that it is beyond the authority of the provincial legislature to authorize the expropriation or taking of any public property of the Crown in right of Canada or of any property forming part of a work, such as a railway, that is within the legislative authority of Parliament. The public property of Canada and such works are also excluded by express provisions of the British ⁵⁰ Lyman P. Duff, Cour suprême du Canada/Supreme Court of Canada.

North America Act from the classes of subjects upon which the legislature of a province may legislate. Even if the proposed works or undertakings were within the authority of the Power Commission, the order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council authorizing the expropriation of these properties would be invalid. Since the whole area to be expropriated is treated as a unit and is to be flooded, I do not think it can be presumed that the Lieutenant-Governor would have authorized the expropriation of only part of the area unless it is clear that some provision is being made as to the expropriation of the balance of the area. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Order in Council, as a whole, must be considered to be ultra vires on this ground apart altogether from the matters mentioned above.

In my opinion, therefore, the answers to the first two questions, submitted by you, are that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario is not authorized to undertake the proposed development and, therefore, has not authority to submit the application.⁵¹

It is, therefore, unnecessary to deal with the remaining questions.

Yours truly,

F.P. VARCOE

RE: ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY AND POWER PROJECT

The somewhat pessimistic view I expressed in my memorandum of April 5, 1949, regarding the chances of early Congressional approval for the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project, is I fear supported by information contained in a recent despatch and teletype message from the Embassy in Washington.†

2. Mr. Wrong emphasizes that there has been no change in Administration policy. The Administration remains committed to the project and to determined efforts to secure its approval by Congress. Nor is there any apparent increase in the opposition of Congressmen to the project itself. Nevertheless, the prospects of approval in 1949 have been steadily waning in recent weeks.

⁵¹ Les membres du Comité interministériel sur la voie maritime du Saint-Laurent et du projet hydro-électrique considèrent l'effet que pourrait avoir cette opinion, lors d'une réunion tenue le 12 avril 1949. On décida de rechercher l'emploi de procédures alternatives visant à faire acheminer le considération du développement d'un pouvoir hydro-électrique séparé.

The Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project considered the effect of this opinion at its meeting on April 12, 1949. It was decided to explore alternative procedures to advance consideration of separate power development.

3. The facts are these:

(a) A move was instituted by the State Department early in the present session to have an individual of national prestige selected to act as coordinator of Administration efforts to obtain Congressional approval. To date, no suitable person has been found.

(b) The desultory pace of proceedings in the United States Senate, and the mass of essential legislation which has still to be considered, make it extremely doubtful whether the St. Lawrence project could reach the floor of the Senate, or even be reported upon by the Foreign Relations Committee, before the adjournment of the present session.

4. The difficulty is understood to lie in the Senate rather than in the House of Representatives. The latter House is fairly well advanced in its consideration of the essential legislation. However, no move is being made to proceed with committee action on the St. Lawrence, apparently because it is considered that prior action by the Senate would have a favourable effect in the House where the representatives of areas cool to the project are proportionately more numerous than in the Senate.

5. It is still too early to abandon all hope of Congressional action this year. I feel, however, that some thought should be given to a possible deadline, beyond which the Canadian Government may decide to act on the assumption that the project will not come to a vote in Congress in 1949. We could hardly rely on the United States Administration to tell us when the case becomes hopeless; the President has taken a strong stand on the subject, and he will probably be loath to admit defeat.

6. In these circumstances, the Government might wish, in the not too distant future, to consider the desirability of addressing a direct appeal to President Truman, asking him to modify his firm opposition to the New York-Ontario separate power plan, and to agree to allow the New York and Ontario applications to go to the International Joint Commission if Congress has not acted by a stipulated date, or if at an earlier date it becomes apparent that Congress cannot or will not act in time.

7. I will seek the views of the St. Lawrence Interdepartmental Committee on these matters at a meeting to be held on Tuesday, April 12, and will let you know the Committee's conclusions.

8. I have marked copies of this memorandum for the information of the Prime Minister and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and have referred it to all members of the Interdepartmental Committee.

Dear Mr. Hopkins:

With reference to your letter 1268-H-40 of 17th February,† I am directed to advise you that, at the 444th meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, held April 5, 1949,† the various defence considerations which would result from the construction of the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project were discussed.

The Chiefs of Staff consider that the construction of the St. Lawrence Waterway would constitute an additional important target for attack but point out that any industrial development of considerable size could be similarly classified. The application of this factor as a criterion in assessing the value of undertaking industrial development or expansion could result in the nation's war potential falling behind the increasing Armed Forces requirements.

The present accepted forms and scale of attack to which Canada might be subjected in the event of war in the immediate future are such that the defence requirements for the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project would be comparatively small. The Chiefs of Staff are of the opinion, therefore, that, from the point of view of immediate local defence, there would be no military objection to the construction of the St. Lawrence Waterway.

When, however, the overall defence problem is considered in conjunction with the economic and industrial advantages which would result from the development of the St. Lawrence Waterway, the Chiefs of Staff feel that the Waterway would be of great military value and that the cost of defence of the Waterway in terms of manpower and equipment would be negligible when compared with the great addition to the nation's war capacity which would result from the construction of the project.

Accordingly, I am directed to advise you that the Chiefs of Staff recommend, from a military point of view, the construction of the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project.

Yours sincerely,

RE: ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY AND POWER PROJECT

Several private measures have been introduced in the United States House of Representatives, this session, calling for approval of the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project. No action has yet been taken on them. No measure sponsored by the Administration has been introduced in either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

2. President Truman remains committed to an all-out effort to win Congressional approval for the waterway and it is expected that an Administration measure will be introduced in both the Senate and the House of Representatives in the very near future. The slow pace of proceedings in the Senate, however, and the large volume of essential legislation which remains to be dealt with, make it extremely unlikely that Congress will reach a decision on the St. Lawrence question at the present session.

3. Support for the project continues to be quite strong, compared with that shown in previous years, and there is good reason to believe that Congress would approve the waterway in 1950 or 1951, if pressure for separate power could be resisted until then.

4. The Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project is continuing its work in connection with the combined navigation and power scheme, in preparation for the unlikely event of heroic Administration efforts bringing early Congressional approval and consequent submission of the matter to Parliament.

5. At the same time, the Committee is giving increasing attention to problems connected with the New York-Ontario separate power plan for the International Rapids Section, bearing in mind the possibility that the Government may wish to allow separate power to proceed if Congress rejects the waterway or continues to delay reaching any decision.

Chairman, Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario to Prime Minister

Toronto, April 29, 1949

Honourable and Dear Sir:

Further to my letter of December 3rd last† and our conversation at Port Arthur Friday last.

Current press releases have caused deep anxiety to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. Such publicity has reflected a growing feeling of doubt related to the ratification of the St. Lawrence Development by the United States Senate at the present sittings of that august body. May I, sir, with respect, urge your Government to make forceful representations to the United States Government to the end and that this vitally important matter will be given deserved priority and consideration and that it be finalized at the present sittings. I assure you that an early decision is of the greatest importance to the future welfare of all people of Ontario.

Our Commission is hopeful that our present construction program will protect our consumers up to and, we hope, including the year 1952. Beyond that date we must look to resources which are not now under construction. Beyond the present program there are two main sources of energy to consider.

Firstly—The greater and more efficient use of the waters of the Niagara River. This will give us another 400,000 to 500,000 horsepower of energy.

Secondly, and of much greater importance—The development of the power resources of the St. Lawrence River with its available 2,200,000 horsepower, one-half of which would be available to Ontario.

We, as a Commission, are of course interested both in the navigation and power features, but are, of course, directly interested in the power section. If therefore the combined project is not proceeded with, then we urge that this Commission in co-operation with the Power Authority of the State of New York be allowed to proceed with the Power Development, in such a way that it will not in the future interfere with the development for navigation.

An early decision is of importance because of the fact that even after ratification it will take some five years before power can be generated and transmitted to our consumers. The alternative to the St. Lawrence is, of course, the construction of additional steam units, a step which would, we believe, be economically unsound and not in the best interests of the people of this Province or of the Dominion as a whole.

Our share of the St. Lawrence will give an average of some six billion kilowatt-hours per year. It is estimated that about one pound of coal will be required for each kilowatt-hour: or a total of six billion pounds—three million tons annually, (one of the largest private electrical companies on the continent today uses 1.1 pounds per kilowatthour). Under existing conditions, this coal would be imported from the United States at a cost of say, six dollars per ton in the United States or eighteen million dollars annually—a very heavy drain on our national economy. If the St. Lawrence waterway is completed it may of course be economically possible to use Nova Scotia coal. On present estimates, the cost of power delivered at the power site on the St. Lawrence would be 2.6 mills per kilowatthour at 80 percent load factor. On the other hand, the cost of generating steam power based on present prices and at 80 percent load factor is estimated to be 7.7 mills at the plant. In other words, the St. Lawrence River Project would, if completed, give us power at some 5.1 mills less per kilowatthour than steam units—or at about one third the price of steam.

In closing may I repeat that, in the opinion of our Commission, the early development of the power resources of the St. Lawrence River is of vital importance to the welfare of all our people. With the greatest respect we urge that action be taken immediately along the lines suggested in the second paragraph of this letter.

Yours sincerely,

ROBERT H. SAUNDERS

TELEGRAM WA-1269

Washington, May 6, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

My WA-987 of April 7th, St. Lawrence Project.†

1. I have almost entirely given up hope that Congress will act on the St. Lawrence Project at this session and I think that, henceforth, we should base our calculations on this assumption. The jam in the legislative timetable in the Senate is in the main responsible, but I understand that there has been some weakening of support from interests which have come to favour the project. The United States Steel Company, for instance, is said to be turning towards a scheme for bringing iron ore into ocean ports and transporting it by rail to the mills. It is also suggested that the Hanna interests which had come out strongly in support of the project, have weakened for a similar reason.

2. Criticism is being stimulated in maritime circles over the depth of the proposed waterway on the ground that 28 feet is too little to benefit the United States merchant marine. This criticism has won some support inside the United States navy.

3. It was agreed two or three weeks ago at a White House conference that Senator [Scott] Lucas, the Majority Leader, would introduce legislation similar to that before the last Congress. Shortly after, Senator Lucas was taken ill and is still in hospital, and no legislation has yet been introduced. I have been told in strict confidence that the Secretary of Commerce has been delegated to undertake the task of co-ordinating the efforts of the Administration to secure approval by Congress. He was selected partly because of his Department's interest in the project and also because the legislative programme of the Department of Commerce is very light, whereas that of the State Department includes over sixty separate items. This is too recent a decision to have produced any results as yet, but I have doubts whether Mr. Sawyer has sufficient prestige in the Administration and with Congress to make much headway.

4. Mr. Danielian⁵² recently told the State Department that the project could count only on 38 or 40 favourable votes in the Senate, so that 10 or 12 more votes would be needed to ensure passage. Unless more Senators can be lined up in advance, it seems unlikely that the Administration would press the Foreign Relations Committee to give time for it. It might have some chance at an autumn session, if one is held.

[Ottawa], May 12, 1949

Dear Jack [Pickersgill],

At the end of Cabinet on Monday, the Prime Minister gave his preliminary and tentative blessing to a draft letter to President Truman on the St. Lawrence waterway and power development, which Russell Hopkins had drafted (copy enclosed), † subject to any observations which Mr. Howe might have to make.

I went over the draft with Mr. Howe later that evening. He felt, quite strongly, that it would be premature and impolitic for the Prime Minister to commit himself, at this time, to the development of international section power. It would be wiser to impress again on the President the importance and urgency we attach to early power development as part of the combined power and navigation project, perhaps supplementing this representation by an enquiry as to whether the United States would be ready, pending a definite decision on the combined project, to go forward with a supplementary scheme which would develop an additional 400,000 or 500,000 horsepower at Niagara.

This morning Mr. Howe and I saw Mr. Saunders, the Hydro Chairman. He was forthcoming and cooperative, and not disposed to make difficulties. He recognized that it might embarrass President Truman if Canada were to press publicly, at this time, for the power development of the international section if the combined project did not get through this Congress. He hoped the Government would do everything it could to help get early action from the United States, and insisted that the Hydro had to make definite plans, within the twelve-month, to meet the power shortage anticipated in 1954.

⁵² N.R. Danielian, membre éminent d'un groupe de pression relatif à la composante américaine de la voie maritime du Saint-Laurent.

N.R. Danielian, a prominent American St. Lawrence Seaway lobbyist.

He said they were anxious to get ahead with their Niagara plans, which were not, however in any sense a substitute for the development of the power in the international section, and thought it might be helpful if, in any communications with the President on the general power situation, reference was made to our interest in confirming the present Niagara power allocations, so that long-run developments could be based upon them. He is returning to Toronto tonight, and wishes to check his impression of the Niagara position with Bethune Smith of the Canadian Niagara Power Company, and will confirm what he said in a letter to me tomorrow.

When I hear from Saunders, we will have a shot at preparing another draft for the Prime Minister's consideration, which will be sent forward to you.

Yours sincerely,

Extract from Cabinet Conclusions

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY; NIAGARA POWER; RECENT DEVELOPMENT

13. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister reported that the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission had visited Ottawa on May 12th for discussions with himself and the Secretary to the Cabinet.

Mr. Saunders wanted the Canadian government to approach U.S. authorities to urge development of hydro electric power in the International Rapids section as a separate project if the joint power and navigation project were not approved at an early date. It had been indicated to him that the government did not wish to take any action which might unnecessarily prejudice prospects of the joint project. However, the government would be prepared to emphasize to U.S. authorities their hope that progress might be made on the joint project during the present session of Congress.

Further power development at Niagara Falls was possible if confirmation by treaty could be secured for diversions now taking place under the present temporary agreements. Indication had been given to Mr. Saunders that the Federal government would be prepared to approach U.S. authorities on such a treaty if, after further investigation by the Commission, confirmation of their desire for the treaty and full details with regard to the proposal could be provided.

14. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Acting Prime Minister concerning representations to U.S. authorities with regard to power development on the St. Lawrence and at Niagara.

Dear Sir:

RE THE ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT AND THE NIAGARA RIVER DIVERSIONS

At the conference held in the office of and with the Rt. Hon. Mr. C. D. Howe, it was suggested that I should set forth this Commission's opinion regarding the Niagara River Diversions.

Our present construction program will be completed in the year 1952 and will add to our present resources some 1,500,000 Horsepower of electric energy. This additional power will take care of our needs up to and, we hope, including 1952. It takes at least a three year period to plan and construct a new project. It will therefore be seen that if our people are to be protected beyond 1952 we must start immediately to plan projects that will give them the protection to which they are entitled. The St. Lawrence is of course our greatest need but with the passing of each day it, unfortunately, seems more and more unlikely that this important matter will be finally dealt with at the present sessions of the United States Senate.

In view of the foregoing, and keeping in mind our urgent need to proceed immediately with a development which can be finished in 1953, we urge that a concentrated effort be made to have the present Niagara River Diversions formalized by treaty and thus made permanent. It is expected that one of the prime requisites demanded by the Federal authorities of both Canada and the United States will be that the greatest benefit possible be secured from the water diverted from the river, both in regard to the head utilized and the efficiency of the plants themselves. Our Commission is willing and indeed anxious to conform to these requirements. Immediately upon the present diversions being made permanent, steps would be taken to construct an additional plant at Queenston to use some 15,000 to 25,000 cubic feet per second. This new plant would increase our resources from the Niagara River by some 450,000 to 500,000 Horsepower and, if authorization is given before the end of 1949, could be completed by 1953.

I might add that some months ago I was authorized by the Department of External Affairs to contact the Niagara Power Corporation—the organization using the diverted water in the United States. I believe that I am safe in saying that that company is in agreement with the opinions expressed in this letter regarding Niagara River Diversions.

Another point of information that I should add is that some months ago a detailed brief of this Commission on the subject of the Niagara was handed to Mr. Johnson of the External Affairs Department, which I am sure he would be only too happy to hand over to you. I also appreciate very much the permission given to me this afternoon to contact directly His Excellency Mr. Hume Wrong at Washington.

Yours sincerely,

ROBERT H. SAUNDERS

RE: ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT AND NIAGARA RIVER DIVERSIONS

At the interview which Mr. Saunders, the Chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, had with Mr. Howe and myself, he undertook to determine whether the conclusion of an agreement with the United States that would enable the development of additional power at Niagara Falls would allow further delay before pressing the United States to consider separate St. Lawrence power. Mr. Saunders' letter of May 20th on this matter is attached.

While Mr. Saunders does not state specifically in his letter that the Niagara development would remove the necessity of pressing immediately for St. Lawrence power, this is the implication and it was the understanding on which he was looking into the matter. What is wanted at Niagara is confirmation as a permanent arrangement of the diversions that are now allowed under temporary agreements. With such confirmation a new plant at Queenston would be developed which Mr. Saunders claims would develop an additional 450,000 to 500,000 horsepower by 1953.

The Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence are doubtful whether there is any possibility of getting present diversions confirmed as they are now heavily in favour of Canada. There are also contracts for the export of power from Canada to the United States at Niagara which would have to be considered in connection with any agreement on diversions. The engineers are, moreover, doubtful whether it would be possible to develop more than 320,000 horsepower rather than the 450,000 to 500,000 which Mr. Saunders mentions.

Mr. Saunders has apparently been in touch with Mr. Pearson direct about the possibility of his (Mr. Saunders) going to Washington to begin discussions on the Niagara diversions. Mr. Pearson was apparently in favour of his doing so and there would seem to be no objection, if it is understood that Mr. Saunders is representing the Ontario Hydro and not negotiating on behalf of or expressing the views of the Canadian government.⁵³

In view of Mr. Saunders' anxiety to further negotiations as quickly as possible, it might be desirable for you to write to the President as originally planned but with a greater emphasis in the letter on the Niagara project.⁵⁴ If Mr. Saunders were not pressing, it might be desirable to get from him further clarification on the particular technical points that are involved at Niagara. However, in the circumstances, perhaps this should be dispensed with.

Latest word from Mr. Wrong after a conversation with the Secretary of Commerce is that there is no prospect for consideration of the joint St. Lawrence agreement by Congress at this session. The administration is aiming at securing Congressional consideration in January or February 1950. This information would not seem, however, to reduce the desirability of having your letter on the record as urging action as quickly as possible at this stage.⁵⁵

A draft letter from you to President Truman is attached.⁵⁶

Ottawa, May 27, 1949

My dear Mr. President,

During our recent conversations in Washington, reference was made to the desire of our governments that power development in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River, as part of the St. Lawrence Deep Waterway project, should proceed at the earliest possible date. Since then my colleagues and I have been concerned over indications that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941 may not come into force this year.

We feel, as I know you do, that the development of navigation in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin is, in the long term, at least as important to the economies of our two countries as the development of power. There is, however, a particular urgency to the power aspect of the project which the Canadian Government cannot overlook. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario has indicated that its present construction program will provide adequate supplies of power only until the end of 1952. After that date, large new sources of energy will have to be available. The resources of the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River would be by far the most economical source of power on a large scale. The only apparent alternative, the construction of steam units, would be very costly. Since St. Lawrence power production will take a number of years to achieve, an early start on the project is imperative if the industrial and other requirements of central Canada are to be adequately protected.

The first session of the new Parliament, which is to be elected on June 25th in Canada, will have to meet in the early autumn—most probably in September as financial supply has been voted only until then. If it were possible for Congress to act on the Agreement during its present session, the Canadian Parliament would be in a position to give consideration to the Agreement well before the end of this calendar year. I hope it may be possible to take advantage of these circumstances in order to achieve early action for the completion of the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project.

In our view, it would be unfortunate if a piece-meal program had to be authorized under which power development in the St. Lawrence system would take place independently of navigation development. Nevertheless, the special urgency of the power situation compels the Canadian Government to give serious consideration to the alternative courses of action which may have to be taken if approval of the combined project cannot be expected in the very near future.

In the meantime, the Canadian Government hopes that negotiations may be entered into for a new agreement, based on present diversions of water for power purposes at Niagara, which would permit the development of additional power for Canadian consumers. If such an arrangement could be confirmed, the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario would be prepared to proceed immediately with the construction of an additional plant which would substantially increase power production in that area, though it could not, of course, be regarded as a substitute for St. Lawrence power. It is our hope that both projects may go forward with as little delay as possible.

With kind personal regards,

Yours sincerely,

L.S. ST. LAURENT

TELEGRAM WA-1555

Washington, June 3, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for Heenev from Wrong, Begins: My WA-1516 of June 1st,† Niagara diversions.

1. Saunders called on me this morning and I offered him whatever assistance we could give.⁵⁷ I said that I hoped they would be able to work out technical agreements with their opposite numbers in the United States to as advanced a point as possible, before the problem of the diversions became a matter for negotiation between the two Federal Governments. He said that it would suit their purpose best to have the present diversions, temporary and permanent, confirmed by treaty on a permanent basis. If this could be done immediately he could proceed forthwith to the development of additional facilities at Queenston, the urgency of the St. Lawrence development would be lessened, and there would be in fact a breathing space of two or three years. I said that I doubted whether the United States would be willing to agree to a treaty confirmation of the present diversions at this time.

2. I took Saunders to lunch with Commissioner Leland Olds of the F[ederal] P[ower] C[ommission]. Saunders suggested to him that the immediate confirmation of the present diversions would allow him to proceed with the Queenston project in time to prevent foreseeable shortages in the Niagara area. (Incidentally, he later remarked that if the Hydro could get the additional power at Queenston by 1954 they would not need St. Lawrence power until 1957 or 1958.) Olds said that even if agreement could be reached by the various United States interests concerned to recommend to the Senate a treaty confirming the present diversions, it was his firm opinion that the Senate would not pass such a treaty. He believed that the only treaty which would have a chance of success would be one embodying the following points:

- (a) Technical agreement of engineers on both sides of the line;
- (b) Agreement on the United States side between the Federal Power Commission, the Niagara Hudson Power Company, and the Power Authority of the State of New York;
- (c) An agreement which would embody not only present diversions, but all feasible future diversions;
- (d) An agreement which would take account of related factors such as scenic preservation, ice conditions, lake and port levels, etc., and ⁵⁷ Cette offre suivit la tenue d'une réunion présidée par Heenev le 30 mai.

This offer resulted from a meeting chaired by Heenev on May 30.

(e) An agreement for equal division of the water except of the Ogoki diversion, and ensuring efficient utilization of water.

3. Olds went on to say that a paper had been in course of preparation for some time in the F.P.C. which would take account of all these matters. He was aware that the first draft of this paper had already been seen by the engineers of Ontario Hydro. He was hopeful that it would be sufficiently advanced so that it could be discussed before the end of June on the technical level with the Canadians concerned, and that by that time it would have the agreement of both the Niagara Hudson Power Company and the Power Authority of the State of New York. If the plan could be accepted during the summer on a technical level it might be possible to have it submitted to both Federal Governments for discussion and to have it ready in treaty form for Senate action early in the next session. He was sure that the only hope for Senate approval would be to deal in this manner with all of the Niagara problems at once and on a permanent basis.

4. Saunders appeared to be fairly well satisfied with this progress report and the suggested course of action. He said that it would take slightly over three years to construct the planned new installations at Queenston, so that they ought to be started early in 1950 if possible. He agreed that it would be unwise to make any public reference at present to the study now under way. He expressed the hope that his engineers could see the report in the very near future.

5. Saunders is to see Snow of the State Department later this afternoon before returning to Toronto. If the meeting is anything other than an exchange of amenities, I will report separately on it. So far as I know, Olds and Snow are the only United States officials he is seeing. He is leaving for Canada this afternoon.

6. I hope and believe that Saunders was reasonably satisfied with his visit. Indeed, I think that he did not expect to accomplish more than he did. Ends.

Le président des États-Unis au premier ministre

President of United States to Prime Minister

Washington, June 8, 1949

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of May twenty-seventh expressing the strong desire of the Canadian Government for early action by the United States on the agreement for the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project. I appreciate fully the reasons why such action is urgent to the Canadian Government.

I have urged the Congress to pass the necessary legislation as promptly as possible. Bills have been introduced in both the Senate and the House of Representatives for this purpose. The Senate bill introduced last week by Senator Scott Lucas of Illinois, for himself and nineteen other Senators, has been referred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The next step will be hearings by the Committee or a sub-committee. It is my hope that the action of both houses will be prompt.

It is my view that the project should be handled legislatively as a single undertaking at this time. The urgent reasons for action on both the power and navigation phases of the program reinforce each other, and make the arguments for action now doubly strong. The Administration bills in Congress do not, therefore, contemplate separate action on either power or navigation.

You expressed the hope that negotiations might be entered into for a new agreement affecting the diversion of water for power purposes at Niagara Falls. This Government will be happy to reopen this general subject upon the submission of the preliminary engineering study now nearing completion. This study, as you perhaps know, has been conducted for more than a year jointly by the Federal Power Commission, the New York State Power Authority, and the Niagara Falls Power Company. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission. I understand, has been informally advised of its progress.

Very sincerely yours,
HARRY TRUMAN

RE: NEW YORK-ONTARIO POWER PROJECT

In the debate on the subject of the St. Lawrence Waterway, at the last session of Parliament (January 28, 1949), Mr. St. Laurent said:

"I think it is only fair for us to say that if we cannot at this time get implementation of this agreement for the doublebarreled purpose of navigation and power, the value of the power is so great that we shall have to give serious consideration to going ahead and developing it on the power side alone."

The Prime Minister, thus, publicly indicated that the Government would wish to see separate power development proceed if Congressional approval for the Waterway and Power Project is not forthcoming at an early date. (This has been understood to mean before the end of 1949).

2. The latest information from our Embassy in Washington is that there is no hope of action by the United States Congress on the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project this year.

3. Certain parts of Ontario will probably be facing serious power shortages again this year. It is doubtful whether the Ontario authorities will be willing, in these circumstances, to shoulder alone all the criticism which might ensue, and it should be recalled that the present Leader of the Opposition,⁵⁸ when Premier of Ontario, always took a particular interest in the projected New York-Ontario Power Development. Criticism of the Government, for failure to deal decisively with the Ontario separate power application submitted in 1948, might seem to Ontario and to the Opposition to offer a convenient means of diverting public attention from the power shortages.

⁵⁸ George A. Drew.

4. Consequently, it seems to me that the Government should at least offer to press the United States authorities for early action on separate power. Quick action could be taken in Washington, since the New York application has been approved by all agencies concerned except the Federal Power Commission, which has completed its hearings and need only issue a license. Early action here would be virtually impossible as matters now stand.

5. In a memorandum dated August 11, 1949† to Mr. Escott Reid, on the subject of "Speech from the Throne—St. Lawrence Waterway", the Acting Legal Adviser said in part that the St. Lawrence Interdepartmental Committee "may recommend to Cabinet that the Ontario authorities be approached to determine whether they now wish the Government to press for separate power, in fulfilment of the implied commitment in the Prime Minister's statement above".

6. This situation leaves little doubt as to the actual urgency of some action along the lines of the above recommendation; it is felt that such action should begin with the reorganization of the Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project.

7. It would be necessary to appoint a new Chairman of the Committee to succeed Mr. Hopkins. I suggest his successor should be Mr. Guy A. Lindsay, Engineer-in-Charge, General Engineering Branch, Department of Transport of Canada, who has so far been one of the hardest-working members of the Committee. I do not consider it necessary for this Department to supply the Chairman. Since I think it would be desirable, however, to have this Department supply the Secretary, I am having an officer from either the American and Far Eastern Division or from the Economic Division named to replace Mr. Stansfield, who has been posted. If this suggestion is agreeable to you, you may wish to take this matter up with the Prime Minister or with the Cabinet so that steps may be taken to implement the appointment of a new Chairman to the Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Waterway and Power Project.

8. I feel that, once reorganized, the Committee should consider a report to the Cabinet Committee on Economic Policy, along the lines of this memorandum, with possibly a recommendation that a meeting should be arranged as soon as possible between the Prime Minister and Premier [Leslie] Frost of Ontario, in order to:

- (1) Discuss the whole subject, in the light of the recent developments;
- (2) Obtain the wishes of the Ontario Government with regard to having the Federal Government press for separate power;

(3) Settle the problems raised by the Ontario Hydro's application to the International Joint Commission, and especially the procedural aspects of it.⁵⁹

Note du ministère des Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

[Ottawa], October 7, 1949

MEMORANDUM ON THE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS ASPECT OF THE JOINT
ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT⁶⁰

Although hopes for early ratification have diminished, the policy of the present United States administration remains unchanged. The President, on three different occasions, the Secretary for Defence, the Secretary of the Interior, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, and the State Department have all come out in favour of the combined seaway and power project.

The House of Representatives which is fairly well advanced in its consideration of the essential legislation of the present session, could consider the St. Lawrence Seaway project almost immediately. It is felt, however, that prior Senate ratification would help to win votes in the House in which the representatives of large eastern cities opposed to the project have a larger proportion of the membership.

In the Senate, although there is a strong and possibly increasing undercurrent of opposition to the project, the main difficulty at the present seems to be the desultory pace of legislative proceedings. A Sub-Committee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has been appointed to consider the St. Lawrence Seaway bill. This Committee consists of Senator [M.E.] Tydings, (D., Md.), Chairman; and Senators [W.F.] George (D., Ga.), [J.W.] Fulbright (D., Ark.), [Alexander] Wiley (R., Wis.), [Alexander] Smith (R., N.J.). This Sub-Committee was appointed by Senator Connolly, Chairman of the Committee at the insistence of the administration, and it is therefore puzzling to note that all its members except Senator Wiley have previously voted against the project. Senator Tydings has even said both publicly and privately that there will not be time for the Sub-Committee to even consider the Seaway bill this year. In fact the President has recently told Mr. Pearson that he doubted whether this Committee would ever hold any hearings but that he intended to put an end to this sort of stalling at the next session. He was not, however, optimistic about the outcome.

The procedure which the administration has adopted to present the bill to Congress had increased doubts about its legislative prospects. It had been previously decided to nominate a man with national prestige to act as co-ordinator, much like the appointment of Paul Hoffman for ERP. No such man could be found and Secretary for Commerce, Sawyer, was finally given the task of presenting the legislation. It was felt that the Department of Commerce whose appropriation requirements were light was in a better position to handle the task than the State Department whose appropriation requirements were both numerous and heavy. Our Ambassador in Washington, however, feels that Secretary Sawyer has insufficient prestige with Congress to carry through such a difficult task.

Even the completion of the Committee stage before Congress reassembles in January is improbable due to the congestion of business in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and to the lack of enthusiasm for the project of its Chairman, Senator Connolly. A fresh start may be made by Congress in January, but it is impossible to predict what order of priority will then prevail in taking up important legislative measures.

Outside of Congress informed opinion is divided and shifting. John Foster Dulles in a campaign speech for a Senatorship in New York State stated that the need for a waterway project was "highlighted by the startling flash of an atomic blast in Russia". "We need the St. Lawrence Waterway," he asserted, "as a defence against the possibility of an atomic war". His Democratic opponent, Herbert Lehman, also favoured the development. This is encouraging in view of the past opposition of New York interests to the project and because of the personal stature of these two men. On the other hand, there has been a weakening of support from the interests which were previously supporting the project. The United States Steel Corporation, for instance, is now arranging with the railway companies to bring iron ore from ocean ports by rail to its steel mills in the Pittsburg and Great Lakes area. The Hanna interests in Cleveland, which formerly strongly supported the project, have similarly weakened. There has been a certain amount of dissatisfaction in maritime circles over the depth of the proposed seaway which was felt to be insufficient to benefit the U.S. Merchant Marine. This feeling has now won the support of certain United States Navy circles.

In spite of these mostly adverse developments, the President has remained a steadfast supporter of the Seaway and power project. In his answer to the Prime Minister's letter of May 27, 1949, on the subject he wrote on June 15, 1949, "It is my view that the project should be handled legislatively as a single undertaking at this time. The urgent reasons for action on both the power and navigation phases of the programme reinforce each other and make the arguments for action now doubly strong. The Administration bills in Congress do not, therefore, contemplate separate action on either power or navigation". More recently the President assured Mr. Pearson of his continued and keen interest in the St. Lawrence development and he deprecated the short-sightedness of those who continued to oppose it. Later conversations between our Ambassador in Washington and State Department officials showed that the Administration, while now recognizing that nothing can be expected from the present Session of Congress, is nevertheless pressing us to wait until the January Session before making any move in support of a separate power project.

The power shortage in Ontario renders any delay in pressing with a separate power project both difficult and politically dangerous. Fortunately there seems to be a possibility to grant the delay asked for by United States authorities without prejudicing Ontario's power needs. During his last visit to Washington in June, the Ontario Hydro Chairman, Mr. Saunders, remarked that if the Hydro could get additional power at Queenston by 1954, there would be no need of St. Lawrence power until 1957 or 1958. In order to achieve this, it would be necessary to have the present diversions, temporary and permanent, confirmed by treaty on a permanent basis. The United States Federal Power Commission feels, however, that, in order to get through Congress, the new Niagara Treaty would have to be much larger in scope and would therefore entail negotiations of considerable complexity. Such a treaty would be conditional upon agreement on the following issues:

- (a) technical agreement of engineers on both sides of the lines;
- (b) agreement on the United States side between the Federal Power Commission, the Niagara Hudson Power Co. and the power authority of the State of New York;
- (c) an agreement which would embody not only present diversions but all feasible future diversions;
- (d) an agreement which would take account of related factors such [as] scenic preservation, ice conditions, lake and port levels, etc.;
- (e) an agreement for equal division of the water except for the Ogoki diversion, and ensuring efficient utilization of water.

If such a plan could be accepted before the winter on the technical level it might be possible to have it submitted to both federal governments for discussion and to have it ready in treaty form for Senate action early in the next Session. In any event, the only hope for Senate approval would be to deal with all the Niagara problems at once, and on a permanent basis. The Ontario Hydro Chairman seemed to be fairly well satisfied with this suggested course of action, but he hoped that the new installations at Queenston could be started early in 1950 if possible.

In short, support for the joint seaway and power project in Canada is firm and increasing, whereas in the United States, outside of the Administration, it is wavering and somewhat lessening. Furthermore, the jam in the legislative timetable of the Senate and the Congressional elections in 1950 make any ratification by Congress before 1951 unlikely. It appears therefore that the Canadian Government might have to back a separate power project, or even an all-Canadian seaway unless a new Niagara Treaty enables it to delay its decision.

DIVERSION OF WATERS FROM NIAGARA FALLS

Mr. Richard Byrd of the United States Embassy left with me this afternoon Note No. 236 dated October 12[†] informing us that the President of the United States desires negotiations to be initiated with the Canadian Government for the drafting of a treaty between United States and Canada supplementary to the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909 and amending Article 5 of that treaty with respect to the diversion of water from Niagara Falls and the division of diverted water between the two governments.

2. In handing me this Note, Mr. Byrd said that he had been asked to make orally the following four points:

(a) U.S. Federal Power Commission has been studying possibilities for redevelopment of power at Niagara Falls. A report on the studies is now under consideration by the Commission, and it is expected that upon approval by the Commission a copy will be made available to the Department of External Affairs.

(b) The President would like to report on the negotiations in his State of the Union message at the opening of the next session of Congress early in January.

(c) At the present time it is thought likely that the U.S. delegation would consist of one representative of the Department of State, one of the Federal Power Commission, one of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, one of the Department of Commerce, and possibly one of the Department of the Interior. There probably would be technical advisers attached to the delegation.

(d) Washington has been suggested as the site of negotiations so that the records of the Federal Power Commission may be readily available as a source of factual information.

3. In respect to point (a), Mr. Byrd said that he understood that in the preparation of the report now before the Federal Power Commission for consideration and approval, the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, the New York State Power Authority and the Niagara and Hudson Power Company had been consulted. This consultation had been in respect to the studies on which the report had been based but it was Mr. Byrd's understanding that none of these concerns had seen the completed report. Mr. Byrd said that he understood from Mr. Vallance, who is now in Ottawa for meetings of the International Joint Commission, that the report was to have been approved yesterday afternoon and that they hoped that copies would be available in Ottawa early next week. At my request, Mr. Byrd said that he would ask that a copy of the report should be sent directly to the Canadian Embassy in Washington. They would make six copies available to the Department here in Ottawa.

4. In respect to point (b), Mr. Byrd said that while he was only asked to say that the President would like to report on the negotiations in his State of the Union message to Congress in January, he understood, from his conversation with the responsible State Department officials, that the President would be greatly pleased if he could report completion of the negotiations. He said that the White House was taking a direct interest in this whole matter and illustrated this by saying that he was required to report the date and time of his handing this Note in to the Department.

5. In respect to point (c), questioned, Mr. Byrd said that the membership of the United States delegation suggested was only tentative. He thought it likely that the United States delegation would be headed by Mr. W.R. Vallance of the Legal Adviser's Office of the State Department because he was a member of the International Joint Commission and had a good deal of knowledge of the 1909 treaty and was familiar with many of the people dealing with this subject. I asked Mr. Byrd if he thought it likely that the New York State Power Authority or the Niagara and Hudson Power Company would be represented on the U.S. delegation or attend the meetings in an advisory capacity. Mr. Byrd said that from his conversation with Mr. Vallance and Mr. de Luccia, Chief of the Bureau of Power of the Federal Power Commission, yesterday he understood that the Federal Power Commission thought that the New York State Power Authority and the Niagara and Hudson Power Company had been satisfied for the present by the consultation which had taken place in the preparation of the report. They now thought that the argument as to who would assume responsibility for the distribution of any additional power made available by any amendment of Article 5 agreed to as a result of the proposed negotiations would not arise until after agreement had been reached.

6. In respect to point (d), Mr. Byrd had no additional comment to offer. He thought that the merits of Washington as locus of the negotiations were self-evident. Naturally, the State Department would be glad to consider any arguments we might wish to develop regarding the merits of Ottawa as a site for the negotiations.

7. In our general conversation, Mr. Byrd made two additional points that are probably worth recording. He said that in his conversation with Mr. de Luccia, Chief of the Bureau of Power of the Federal Power Commission, he had learned that the survey that had been made showed that through a more efficient use of waters Canada could obtain from Niagara Falls an amount approximately equal to the amount which it was expected might be obtained from the proposed hydro-electric development on the St. Lawrence. He said that this additional amount of power could be obtained without any additional diversion from the waters from the Falls. He remarked that possibly this information might tend to alleviate the present pressure being brought to bear on the Federal Government by the Province of Ontario to push ahead with the St. Lawrence hydro-electric power development plan. Mr. Byrd, at a later stage in our conversation, said that he understood that the report recommended that more water should be diverted from the Falls at night and in the non-tourist season. It would still leave 100,000 cubic feet a second during the daytime during the tourist season. Mr. Byrd had asked Mr. de Luccia how nighttime diversion would help with meeting power requirements of industry which placed the heaviest load on the systems during the daytime. Mr. de Luccia said that the excess power developed at night would be used to pump water back up to reservoirs above the falls so that the flow over the falls would be evened up during the day and night. Mr. Byrd said that he understood that some such scheme as this was employed on the Rhine.

8. Mr. Byrd said that while he had not yet seen even a draft of the report being considered by the Federal Power Commission, he was not entirely satisfied, from his conversations with Mr. Vallance and Mr. de Luccia, that sufficient attention had been given to the scenery side of the Niagara Falls water diversion proposals.

9. I told Mr. Byrd that I assumed that the United States Government would wish to commence negotiations on the basis of the recommendations contained in the report which was now before the Federal Power Commission. Until we had received and had an opportunity to study the report it would be difficult for us to make a reply to the United States enquiry. I said that I thought it possible that before agreeing to enter negotiations on the basis of this report the Canadian authorities might wish to make some additional studies on their side of certain aspects of the problems raised. Mr. Byrd said he quite understood that and he thought that the State Department would understand that position too. In proposing the negotiations on the basis of the report, the United States Government would have done what it could to further the matter and the rest would be up to Canada.

Le premier ministre au premier ministre de l'Ontario

Prime Minister to Premier of Ontario

Ottawa, October 31, 1949⁶¹

My dear Premier [Frost],

The United States Government has inquired whether the Government of Canada would be disposed to enter into negotiations for the drafting of a treaty supplementary to the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, and amending Article V of that treaty, with respect to the diversion of water from Niagara Falls and the diversion of diverted water between the two Governments. A copy of the Note, No. 236, dated October 12, 1949,† from the United States Embassy is attached.

When this Note was submitted to the Department of External Affairs we were informed that the United States Federal Power Commission had been studying the possibilities for re-development of power at Niagara Falls and that a report by the Federal Power Commission would shortly be made available for our study. Copies of this report were not received in Ottawa until October 24. The Department of External Affairs immediately sent two copies to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. On Saturday, October 29, officials of the interested federal Departments had the benefit of informal exploratory discussions with Mr. Robert H. Saunders, Chairman of the Hydro Electric Power Commission, and two officials of the Commission. I understand that good progress was made at this meeting and that another has been arranged for November 5.

It is our hope that the negotiations proposed by the United States Government may begin as soon as possible. If you concur, I should like to be able to inform the United States Government that we would be disposed to enter into negotiations at an early date.

Yours sincerely,

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY; AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO AS TO DIVISION OF COSTS

7. The Minister of Transport reported that the agreement, which had been entered into between the Federal government and the Ontario government as to division of costs in connection with the St. Lawrence Waterway development, had expired. If the St. Lawrence Agreement were ratified by the United States, a new agreement with Ontario would be necessary. It was desirable to consider whether negotiations for such an agreement should be undertaken at the present time.

8. The Prime Minister suggested that, while it seemed undesirable at present to open negotiation for a new agreement, it might be helpful to approach the Ontario government at the official level. It might be stated that, in pressing for ratification of the St. Lawrence Agreement, the Federal government was doing so on the basis that the previous agreement with Ontario as to sharing of costs would apply, subject to correction to present day prices. Confirmation of that assumption might be sought. If such confirmation were forthcoming, enquiry might then be made as to the character and scope of adjustment the Ontario government felt to be necessary to bring the agreement into line with current prices.

9. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that an enquiry be made at the official level, on the basis suggested by the Prime Minister, as to the continued application of the agreement with Ontario on division of costs in implementing the St. Lawrence Agreement, subject to adjustment to bring it into accord with current prices.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 24, 1949

My dear Premier,

In my letter of October 31, 1949, I informed you of the United States inquiry as to whether the Canadian Government would be disposed to enter into negotiations with respect to the diversion of water from Niagara Falls and the division of diverted water between the United States and Canada.

2. In the two informal meetings held in Ottawa on October 29th and November 4th, officials of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario and of the interested Federal Departments reached unofficial agreement on the main Canadian desiderata in such negotiations. A memorandum setting out these conclusions is attached. I should be grateful to learn whether you agree with these conclusions and whether you think they represent a satisfactory basis for discussion with the United States Government.

3. If you concur, I should like to propose to the United States Government that informal exploratory discussions be held in Washington, beginning on December 8th. These discussions would presumably result in the preparation of a draft treaty. Formal negotiations leading to signature could take place after the interested governments, including the Government of Ontario, had had an opportunity to consider the draft treaty. For the discussions it would be our intention to appoint as members of the Canadian delegation, in addition to Federal officials, Mr. Robert N. Saunders, Mr. R. L. Hearn and Dr. Holden, all of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. I should be grateful if you could let me know whether you concur in these appointments.⁶²

4. In the fourth paragraph of the attached memorandum you will see a suggested provision that the flow over Niagara Falls must be not less than 100,000 cubic feet per second in the day-time in the tourist season. This is in line with what is suggested in the report prepared by the United States Federal Power Commission to which I referred in my letter of October 31st. That report goes on to define "day-time" for this purpose as the period between sunrise and sunset and implies that at sunset it would be in order to reduce the flow over the Falls to 50,000 cubic feet per second. As you know, however, the illuminated Falls at night attract many spectators, and it may be that a reduction in flow before midnight would be detrimental to the spectacle. On the other hand, it may be unnecessary to increase the flow to 100,000 cubic feet per second as early as sunrise. We have been considering a suggestion that "day-time" might be defined for the purposes of this provision in some other way—perhaps as the period from nine a.m. to midnight. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941 between Canada and the United States recognized that the preservation and enhancement of the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River is the primary obligation on the governments concerned. In the light of that principle, you will, no doubt, wish to consult with the Niagara Parks Commission on this particular point as well as on any other questions relating to the possible effects on the scenic spectacle of the provisions suggested for the proposed treaty.

5. The Niagara Treaty will in effect supplant Article IX of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941. You will remember that when that Agreement was negotiated it was found necessary to negotiate a supplementary agreement between the Governments of Canada and Ontario. In our opinion a separate agreement between Canada and Ontario will similarly be needed when the proposed Niagara Treaty with the United States is concluded. Such an agreement might allocate financial responsibility for such undertakings as are envisaged in paragraphs 9 and 10 of the attached memorandum, and responsibility in the event of claims for damages; and might contain provisions analogous to those contained in Articles VII (c) and VIII of the 1941 Agreement between Canada and Ontario. A tentative draft agreement along these lines is now being prepared and will be sent to you for your consideration at a later date.

6. May I take this opportunity to express my appreciation for the very helpful way in which the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario has cooperated in the recent informal discussions in Ottawa.

Yours sincerely,

L.S. ST. LAURENT

PROVISIONS TO BE SOUGHT IN THE PROPOSED NEW NIAGARA TREATY

1. The Governments should recognize “their primary obligation to preserve and enhance the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River, and consistent with that obligation, their common interest in providing for the most beneficial use of the waters of that River.” This is the language used in Article IX of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941.

2. The existing diversion at DeCew Falls of 1430 cubic feet per second for power and 370 c.f.s. for sanitation which was in effect before the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, should not be mentioned in the treaty, but the treaty should be so worded as not to interfere with the continuation of these diversions.

3. Canada should continue to have sole use of 5,000 cubic feet per second at Niagara in consideration of the diversion of a similar volume of water into Lake Superior by the Ogoki and Long Lac development.

4. (a) The flow over Niagara Falls must be not less than 100,000 c.f.s. in the day-time in the tourist season, nor less than 50,000 c.f.s. at all other times. These minima may be increased by, and at the discretion of, the Niagara Board of Control when in the opinion of that Board additional water is required for flushing ice above the Falls.

(b) The flow through the lower rapids must be not less than 100,000 c.f.s. in the day-time in the tourist season, nor less than 50,000 c.f.s. at all other times, provided that when, in the opinion of the Niagara Board of Control, additional water is needed for flushing ice in the lower rapids the total flow through the rapids must be not less than 80,000 c.f.s.

5. Subject to the overriding provisions in paragraph 4 above, diversion of water from the Niagara River for power generation, in addition to that specified in paragraphs 2 and 3 above, should be authorized as follows:

(a) The present diversion of 81,500 c.f.s. should be continued on a permanent basis.

(b) Diversion of water remaining after the provisions of paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5(a) have been satisfied should be authorized on an experimental basis for a trial period of ten years. It should be provided that, at the end of the trial period, the two Governments may, by exchange of notes, provide for the use, for power generation, of all water other than that required to satisfy the provisions of paragraph 4 above.

6. Water diverted in accordance with paragraph 5 above should be divided equally between the United States and Canada, provided that water equivalent to the amount used to produce power for export to the United States shall be considered to be part of the United States allocation although used in Canada, for a transition period until such time as it is possible for this water to be used in the United States.

7. There should be no restriction on the location of intakes on the Canadian side.

8. There should be no provision for an international body to study the advisability of control works at the outlet of Lake Erie. There is provision for such a study in Article VIII (d) of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941. Should that agreement not be ratified, the matter could be referred at a later date to the International Joint Commission.

9. It should be provided in the Treaty that the two Governments proceed with the completion of the Remedial Works at the Falls proposed by the Special International Niagara Board in 1929, the cost of such works to be divided equally between the two Governments.

10. The Niagara Board of Control, which was responsible for ensuring that the diversion of water does not exceed the total amount authorized, should continue to fulfil that function. The same Board, with appropriate alterations in composition and powers, or an additional international board, should be given the tasks of watching the effects of the additional experimental diversion and of designing and supervising the construction of the additional remedial works to be built above the Falls as envisaged in paragraph 9 above. The Niagara Board of Control should be given authority to order temporary reductions in the amount of water diverted when, in the opinion of the Board, such reductions are necessary. These reductions would have to be applied equally to both countries.

11. Provision should be made for an equitable distribution between the Governments of the United States and Canada of the financial responsibility for any claims for damages that might arise as a result of action taken by, or negligence on the part of, the International Board or Boards concerned.

12. It should be made clear that this proposed treaty will supplant Article IX of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941.

NOTE 401

Ottawa, December 3, 1949

Excellency,

I have the honour to acknowledge your Note No. 236 of October 12th† in which you informed me that the President of the United States desires negotiations to be initiated with the Canadian Government for the drafting of a treaty between the United States and Canada, supplementary to the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, and amending Article V of that treaty with respect to the division of diverted water between the two Governments. You enquired whether the Canadian Government would be disposed to proceed with such negotiations in the near future, and, if so, whether Canadian representatives might be designated to commence the negotiations in Washington at an early date.

The Canadian Government welcomes the proposals of the President of the United States and will be glad to participate in negotiations for the drafting of the proposed treaty. It is the understanding of the Canadian Government that the proposed treaty will include provisions for the preservation and enhancement of the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River.

Before entering into negotiations the Canadian Government considers that it would be desirable for experts from our two countries to discuss a number of questions of detail in a purely informal and exploratory way. If this proposal meets with the approval of the Government of the United States, I should like to suggest that such a meeting be held in Washington, beginning on December 8, 1949.

I would be grateful to learn whether this proposal would be acceptable to the Government of the United States.⁶³

Accept, Excellency, etc.

DIVERSION OF NIAGARA WATERS

15. Mr. Burbridge reported on the informal and exploratory talks held last week in Washington between United States and Canadian officials concerning the diversion of Niagara waters. The purpose of the meetings was to consider the possibility of a new treaty which would amend Article V of the Boundary Water Treaty of 1909, by allowing a greater amount of water to be diverted from the Niagara River for power purposes. The two groups agreed on a tentative draft treaty the main provisions of which are:

(a) The International Joint Commission will determine the nature and design and will supervise the construction of the remedial work necessary to preserve and enhance the beauty of the Falls. The main object of these works is to distribute the flow so as to produce an unbroken crest-line on the Falls.

(b) In order to preserve the scenic spectacle of the Falls and the rapids the flow is not to be reduced below:

(1) 100,000 c.f.s. between 8 a.m. and 10 p.m. e.s.t. from April 1 to September 15 of each year;

(2) 100,000 c.f.s. between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. from September 16 to October 31 of each year and

(3) 50,000 c.f.s. at all other times.

(c) All water in excess of that required for scenic purposes may be diverted for power purposes. Such water would be divided equally between the two countries with the exception that until there are facilities in either country to use its full share of water, one country may use that portion for which facilities are not available in the other country; (this provision was inserted to cover the need for extra water in Canada to provide for the export of power to the United States under existing contracts).

(d) The provisions above govern all water flowing from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario except the quantity of water which is diverted by Ontario from the Hudson's

⁶³ Le Gouvernement des États-Unis donna son aval à cette proposition le 6 décembre 1949 (Note no. 295).†

Bay watershed into the Great Lakes Systems through Long Lac and Ogoki. The latter will continue to be available exclusively to Canada.

(e) Each government will appoint a representative to act jointly in the supervision of the diversions.

16. (a) The United States' group would not accept the Canadian proposal that water now being diverted through the Welland Canal for power purposes should be excluded from Canada's share. The Canadian argument was that diversions existing before the 1909 Treaty should not be interfered with in any future treaties between the two countries. The United States' group disagreed with this view and argues that it would be very difficult to obtain Senate approval of a treaty that would not give the United States half of the natural flow between the two Lakes.

(b) The Ontario Hydro representatives were not entirely satisfied with the provision (in Para. 15(c) above) designed to give Canada extra water until United States plants are in a position to supply power to the area now dependent on imports from Canada. They would have preferred a provision that would give Canada extra water as long as existing export contracts remain in force. The United States' group, on the other hand, argued that the two federal governments could not recognize private arrangements or contracts in the terms of a formal treaty between the two governments. A compromise was agreed upon by inserting in the preamble of the draft treaty a clause which provides that an opportunity should be given to each country to develop for power purposes its share of the diversions agreed upon in the proposed treaty. It was felt that this clause might provide a reason for the Canadian Government to refuse export permits for power once United States facilities were constructed for the use of the country's full share of the Niagara waters.

Washington, December 12, 1949

Dear Ken [Burbridge]:

Since you left yesterday afternoon I have given further thought to the possible reasons for Saunders raising on Saturday morning two fundamental problems concerning the Niagara diversions which we understood to have been settled in the earlier discussions in Ottawa, and which certainly had been regarded as settled in all of our previous discussions amongst the Canadian group, including the Hydro representatives, while they were in Washington last week. I refer, of course, to his worries concerning the fluctuating amount of water left for power purposes after a set amount was allocated for scenic purposes, and to his statement that the Province of Ontario could not accept an agreement providing for equal diversion if the agreement did not make some provision concerning the export of the power developed by eight thousand cubic feet per second of the Canadian share.

Now I am inclined to think that, once Saunders saw we were able to reach agreement with the United States group on a draft treaty that was somewhat more favourable than the compromise to which we agreed at our meeting late Friday afternoon, his actions were not related to the discussions in Washington at all, but were related to the discussions you will shortly be having in Ottawa concerning an agreement between the Province and the Federal authorities.

On Saturday afternoon I showed to Saunders the new paragraph proposed to be added to the Preamble referring to the development of equal shares of the water for the benefit of the peoples of the two countries. While he agreed that this paragraph would be a useful addition to the draft, he still said that he was not satisfied without something more definite, preferably in the treaty, concerning the cancellation of export after the United States had had an opportunity to develop facilities to use their share of the water. I reminded him that at our first meeting the United States group had pointed out they could not accept a division of waters in the treaty that was tied into power contracts not within the control of the United States Government, and that the Canadian group, in a private talk, subsequently had decided we had to accept that position. I also reminded him at that time it had been agreed I should advise Fisher, outside of the formal meetings, that, in my personal opinion, it was probable export permits would not be renewed after the United States had had an opportunity to develop their facilities, and had reported to the Canadian group that Fisher's only comment was that if he had been in my shoes he would have taken the same position. You will recall that this matter was again discussed when you and I met Fisher, de Luccia, W. P. Snow and Colonel Potter before the formal Saturday meeting and all the United States group pointed out that since any export of power, or source of power from the United States was subject to permit that could be cancelled at any time there could not be objection by the State Department if Canadian permits were not granted.

I told Saunders I would take up with Ottawa the question of my exchanging personal letters with Fisher, in which I would point out that after the United States had had an opportunity to develop their share of the water it was probable export permits would not be renewed. I said that in any letter written we would be careful to show we did not consider there was an obligation to renew the permits, even at the present time, but that there was no present intention to cancel the permits until the United States had had time to develop their facilities.

Saunders suggested such a letter should make a statement that the unequal division of water in 1909 was based solely upon the contracts existing at that time to export power, but I pointed out to him that such comment in the letter would raise an irrelevant matter that might make it impossible to obtain an satisfactory reply.

I think it is very probable Saunders will ask that the agreement between the Ontario and the Federal authorities should provide that, upon request by Hydro, the Government will refuse to renew the permits after there has been time to develop United States facilities to use their share of the water.

While he is somewhat mixed up in his own mind as to the relationship between the export permits, the power contracts between the Hydro Electric Power Commission and the Niagara Lockport Company, and the lease to use the water granted by the Niagara Falls Park Commission and the Canadian Niagara Power Company, I think he realizes the contract and the lease are matters that must be overcome by Provincial action alone. I did my best to point out to him that in my opinion the Canadian Government could not contribute towards the solution of these problems.⁶⁴

Yours sincerely,
W.D. MATTHEWS

Washington, December 13, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney:

Yesterday I presented Mr. Keenleyside and Mr. Odell to the new Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Oscar Chapman. During our talk I turned the subject from the proposed Lewes River power project on the Alaska-Yukon boundary to the prospect of early action on "the St. Lawrence project." Mr. Chapman, who talks freely and frankly and has been for many years a strong supporter of the full St. Lawrence development, said that in his judgment the aim should be to secure the approval of the 1941 Agreement by the Congress at the first session after the next elections in November, 1950. He believes that it will take as long as this for public support for the project to grow to a point at which the opposition in Congress can be defeated. He is satisfied that public support is increasing considerably and that the approach of a serious power shortage in the New England area is beginning to convert some opponents. The New England states, except Vermont, and most of the Atlantic seaboard states constitute the region of solid opposition to the development.

Mr. Chapman went on to say that at the forthcoming session he hoped that there would be active discussion of the project, but that an attempt to bring it to a vote would be premature. He added that he was strongly opposed to a separate power development on the river, both on the ground that a large area interested in the seaway would be completely unconcerned about a development confined to power and because he is a firm believer in the necessity of building the seaway. I said to Mr. Chapman that from the point of view of power supply the Province of Ontario would urgently need St. Lawrence power by 1957 or 1958, adding that if the approval of the whole project seemed unattainable in the fairly near future the Canadian Government would be inclined to support a power development alone. (If the Niagara Convention which we are now negotiating does not come into effect in 1950, Ontario will be very short of power before 1957 and 1958, but if the Convention is signed and ratified, these will be the next critical years according to Mr. Saunders and other officers of Ontario Hydro.)

I am doubtful whether we should try to influence the Administration to endeavour to secure a vote at the forthcoming session. Mr. Chapman's estimate of the political chances is in general accord with other opinions which we have heard here. If, however, it is strongly felt in Ottawa that we should do all we can to bring the Agreement into effect in 1950, I think that it would be a good idea for the Prime Minister or Mr. Pearson to have a talk with Mr. Steinhardt before Christmas, and also for me to be asked to go the rounds of the Cabinet members principally concerned in Washington.

NIAGARA DIVERSION

Draft Treaty

1. Attached is a copy of the draft treaty† which resulted from the informal discussions in Washington. You may wish to examine this draft before the meeting on Friday with Mr. Saunders.

Exports of Power

2. It seems probable that Mr. Saunders will bring up in that meeting the question of terminating exports of power. He was not entirely satisfied with the way this matter was left, although Mr. Matthews felt that our group had done everything practicable to meet the Ontario point of view.

3. The first Canadian draft contained a transitional provision to the effect that while exports of power under contract continued, the water used for that power would be regarded as water diverted by the United States. The United States group refused to recognize in a treaty the existence of these private contracts. They also objected to any wording which would mean that a private United States company could, by entering into a contract to import power from Canada, reduce the allocation of water on the United States side.

4. Consequently, the formula in Article VIII of the present draft was devised. Mr. Saunders, although apparently satisfied with this at first, later decided that it was inadequate since it did not provide for termination of the exports when the United States facilities are constructed and the extra water reverts to the United States. The exports could continue, using Canadian water. Mr. Matthews then suggested that a letter might be sent from the Embassy to the State Department pointing out that when the United States has facilities to supply the power now being imported, the Canadian Government might decide to refuse further permits for the export of firm power at Niagara. I believe he is now preparing a draft letter along this line which he will ask Ottawa to approve. To strengthen the hand of the Canadian Government, should it wish to refuse export permits at some future time, the fourth "paragraph" of the Preamble was inserted. That seemed to be all the two federal governments could do to help Ontario solve an essentially domestic problem. There is still a private contract between the Canadian Niagara Company and its United States parent, the Niagara Hudson Company; there is also a long lease on the use of water, granted by the Niagara Parks Commission to the Canadian Niagara Company.

5. You will remember that there was some discussion on this question with the Ontario Hydro representatives in our preliminary meetings in Ottawa. At that time Mr. Saunders apparently thought that the Ontario Government would, if necessary, take legislative action to terminate the lease. Our files show, too, that in an informal meeting in Ottawa on November 18, 1947, at which this same subject came up, Mr. Hogg⁶⁵ pointed out that the Ontario Hydro must arrange to purchase the Canadian Niagara plant and added that this is not a governmental concern but purely a transaction to be arranged between the Ontario Hydro and the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation. This was also recognized in the report on proposed redevelopment at Niagara which the Ontario Hydro issued in 1948.

6. You will see hereunder a letter from Mr. Matthews to Mr. Burbridge setting out Mr. Matthews' views on this problem.

Procedure for Arranging Canada-Ontario Agreement

7. This meeting may be a good opportunity to discuss how we may best proceed with negotiations for an agreement between Canada and Ontario. In our letter to Mr. Frost we mentioned the need for such an agreement and said we were preparing a draft which would be sent to him. However, Mr. Marr⁶⁶ feels that it may be rather high-handed to send a draft agreement to Ontario without some preliminary discussion with representatives of the Ontario Government. It might be desirable to ask Mr. Saunders whether he thinks a meeting should be arranged between representatives of the Ontario Government and Federal officials to prepare a draft agreement.

RE: CANADA-ONTARIO AGREEMENT ON THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY PROJECT

Due to the increased costs of construction since 1941 and changes now proposed in the 1941 Canada-United States St. Lawrence Agreement, a new agreement with the Province of Ontario providing for the improvement of the International Rapids Section for navigation and power will have to be negotiated to replace that signed in 1941. The Interdepartmental Committee on Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Development have been considering if it would be desirable to open such negotiations with the Province at the present time.

With the object of assisting in the reaching of a decision, the Committee have defined the arguments for and against such action, and they are cited hereunder:

1. Main arguments in favour of negotiating a new agreement at the present time—

(a) The net first cost to Canada and the annual charges resulting therefrom cannot be estimated until it is known definitely how much Ontario will pay on account of the works to be constructed in the International Rapids Section.

(b) At the present time Ontario can estimate what the development of the International Section for "Power Alone" would cost. The saving in the cost of power to the Province resulting from the improvement of the Section by a joint navigation and power project cannot be determined until a new Canada-Ontario Agreement is completed. The extent of this saving might influence the Province to defer its application for development for "Power Alone" until they are assured there is no further hope for a joint development.

(c) The present agreement provides that Canada shall acquire the lands necessary for the carrying out of the Project. It has been suggested that, in order to prevent speculation in these lands, plans for expropriation be filed immediately the Canada-United States Agreement is ratified. If it is decided that Ontario will assume responsibility for acquiring these lands, then a new Agreement should be negotiated prior to the ratification of the Canada-United States agreement so that the Province will be in a position to fulfil this part of their obligation.

2. Main arguments against negotiating a new agreement at the present time—

(a) The international commitments and financial arrangements cannot be clearly defined nor the overall national position known until Canada has a confirmed agreement with the United States. The situation has altered completely from that in 1941, when the international project required the support of a simultaneous agreement with Ontario in order to ensure satisfactory disposal of the Canadian share of the power development. Today there is no doubt about the marketability of either the power or the installations; on the contrary Ontario expects to have urgent need of power from the St. Lawrence almost as soon as it can be developed, and will have no alternative sources other than more costly steam generation. Thus assured of satisfactory disposal of Canada's share of the power from the joint project, it would be imprudent to open such negotiations until all the conditions of the complete project are known.

(b) If an agreement should be arrived at with the Province providing for the division of cost of the project as between navigation and power and the International Agreement should fail of ratification or be radically changed in any respect, then Canada might be committed to certain principles that might be inapplicable to the new situation.

It might be added that should it be considered desirable to complete an agreement with the Province at the present time, the Committee will submit a memorandum outlining the changes that might be made in the previous Agreement.

APPLICATION MADE BY THE ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA LIMITED FOR LICENCE TO DIVERT WATERS FROM SOURCES IN THE FRASER RIVER WATERSHED

Following the receipt of Note No. 204 of August 18, 1949, from the United States Embassy† and its reference to the Department of Fisheries, a meeting was held at 11 o'clock, August 30, in the office of the Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries, West Block, which the following persons attended:

Dr. Stewart Bates—Deputy Minister of Fisheries

Dr. A.W.H. Needler—Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries

Mr. G.R. Clark—Director of Western and Inland Fisheries

Mr. A.R. Menzies—Chief of American and Far Eastern Division, Department of External Affairs

Mr. C. Hardy—American and Far Eastern Division, Department of External Affairs.

2. For background information, it was said that the Aluminum Company of Canada, Limited, had, over the last four years, conducted surveys in the Fraser River watershed in connection with the use of water from Chilko Lake and other sources for eventual aluminum and hydro-electric plants to be established in that region. The company has now applied formally with the Government of British Columbia for licences to divert and use water from Chilko Lake and two other sources in the Fraser River watershed.

3. The International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission has expressed its grave concern with this matter since the granting of such licences would result in the destruction of a great part of the sockeye salmon runs in the Fraser River system and would, consequently, nullify the work of restoration undertaken by the Commission over a period of years.

4. It was mentioned at this meeting that, in the end, decision to grant the licences requested by the Aluminum Company might rest with the Government of British Columbia. However, it was pointed out that, according to the Legal Counsel of the Department of Fisheries, the Federal Government had at present the necessary authority to intervene and prevent the granting of the licences even if it might well prefer to refrain from using this authority.

5. The interest of the Fisheries Department in this matter stems from its concern, which is shared (as mentioned above) by the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries

Commission, the fishing industry on the Pacific Coast and provincial fisheries authorities in British Columbia, over the consequences on the runs of the sockeye salmon of the diversion and use by the Aluminum Company of the waters in the Chilko River watershed. It is understood that under the project of the Aluminum Company the present bed of the Chilko River would become quite dry, thus depriving the sockeye salmon of its spawning ground.

6. Dr. Bates wished to emphasize that, in his opinion, the matter was not one of weighing the value of the sockeye salmon fishing industry to the Province of British Columbia against the value which would result from the realization of the plans now being put forward by the Aluminum Company of Canada. The matter was whether or not a well-established fishing industry would be left to be destroyed by the establishment in the Chilko watershed of a new industry which might easily be located elsewhere in the same province. There was no doubt that there was place for both industries in the Province of British Columbia.

7. It was felt by the persons attending this meeting that, discounting for the present the possible use by the Federal Government of its authority as mentioned in paragraph 4 above, there were two possible ways for the Federal authorities to intervene in this matter:

(a) Have the matter studied by the Cabinet, following which the official views of the Government could be sent to the Government in British Columbia.

(b) Have the question taken up directly by the Department of Fisheries with the provincial authorities.

8. The representatives of the Department of Fisheries were afraid that, should the matter be studied by the Cabinet, where a complete picture would have to be presented, the crux of the question might easily be lost sight of, and it might be felt (wrongly, in the opinion of Dr. Bates) that it was a question of balancing the advantages of one industry against the other. It is for this reason that the second course of action had more appeal since it would enable the Department of Fisheries to take up the matter with the provincial authorities, purely from the fisheries point of view, and to emphasize the wastefulness of having the salmon industry in British Columbia handicapped by the establishment of a new industry which might very well be established elsewhere in the same province, which would thus get the benefits of both industries.

9. Public hearings will take place in October, presumably, in British Columbia, on the applications for licences submitted by the Aluminum Company of Canada, Limited, and it is understood that the Federal Department of Fisheries will present its views, together with the fishing industry of British Columbia and other interested persons and groups.

10. For the moment, it was agreed that, inasmuch as this Department was concerned, the matter would rest entirely in the hands of the Department of Fisheries, which would endeavour to let us know of all official and unofficial information that might come to their attention.⁶⁸

RAILWAY—PRINCE GEORGE, B.C., TO FAIRBANKS, ALASKA; U.S. LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING NEGOTIATION

4. The Minister of National Defence and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that both Houses of Congress in the United States had passed a measure which would authorize the President to enter into negotiations with Canada for a survey with a view to construction of a railway from Prince George, B.C. to Fairbanks, Alaska. The U.S. Embassy had enquired whether the Canadian government would wish to express any views on the measure before its presentation to the President for signature.

It had been indicated in estimates that the railway, 1,400 miles in length, would cost $180,000 a mile. It was thought there was no prospect whatever that it could operate without heavy loss. The Canadian government had previously indicated that it felt the proposal for such a railway was premature and this had been mentioned in the proceedings of the Senate committee in Washington.

5. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the U.S. Embassy be informed that, while the Canadian government did not feel it would be appropriate to express any view with regard to the desirability of the measure which had been passed by Congress, it was of the opinion that any negotiations or survey with a view to a railway from Prince George, B.C., to Fairbanks, Alaska, would at present be premature.

PROPOSALS FOR B.C.-YUKON-ALASKA RAILWAY

Wartime Developments

In 1942, the Canadian Government permitted the U.S. Army Engineers to conduct a survey of the Rocky Mountain Trench route (north from Prince George, along the valleys of the Parsnip, Finlay, Kechika, Frances and Pelly Rivers to Fairbanks). When the survey was completed in October, 1942, the U.S. made no request for permission to construct owing to shortages of manpower and materials. The Trench route is one that would probably be chosen should it ever be decided to proceed with the railway project. It traverses 530 miles in B.C. and 650 miles in the Yukon. The Survey Report was made public in 1943.

Post-War Developments

In November 1947, Mr. Willis T. Batcheller, head of a Seattle firm of consulting engineers, discussed the railway project with Mr. Howe and the V[ice] C[hief of the] G[eneral] S[taff], who apparently expressed polite interest, but no more than that.

At the February 1948 meeting of the P.J.B.D., at the request of the U.S. Section and with the approval of Cabinet Defence Committee, the Canadian Section reported that the interested Canadian civilian departments did not see any present need for a railway, which, it was estimated, would have an annual deficit of 25 to 50 million dollars. It was reported that the views of the Chiefs of Staff were that while, from a long term strategic point of view the proposed railway could be useful, Canadian peacetime military requirements can be met by existing systems and there is not likely to be sufficient military traffic in the near future to permit economic operation. The U.S. Section reported that the U.S. joint chiefs had reached very similar conclusions.

On October 1, 1948, Mr. Howe, replying to a letter he had received from Mr. Batcheller, stated that the Federal Government was not planning to put any funds into the proposed railway to Alaska.

In November, 1948, the U.S. State Department proposed a meeting in Ottawa with representatives of the Transportation Sub-Committee of the Inter-Agency Committee on Alaskan Development to discuss (i) the hard-surfacing and year-round maintenance of a road from the U.S. to Alaska, as well as the Haines Cut-off and (ii) the initiation of a comprehensive study of the railway project.

These discussions were urged in the interests of the defence and development of the Canadian and U.S. Northwest. The State Department's proposal was considered very carefully by an inter-departmental group which included high ranking officials, and later, by Cabinet and, on the decision of the latter, a reply was sent to the U.S. authorities on December 9, 1948. Its principal section read as follows:

“The Canadian authorities, of course, are keenly interested in the development of the Canadian Northwest, and appreciate the relationship between conditions in that area and those in Alaska. At the same time, it is felt that existing surface transportation facilities in Northwestern Canada are not being used to anything approaching the capacity that their present condition permits, and that they are unlikely to be so used in the near future. In this connection there might be mentioned, among other facilities, the rail-sea route through the Prince Rupert, B. C. railhead, and the rail-highway route through the Dawson Creek railhead. Moreover, as you know, the Alaska Highway System and the roads to the south of it are, with other routes in the Northwestern Canada, being steadily improved. Under the circumstances, it is felt here that it would probably be somewhat premature to discuss at this stage construction projects of the types referred to in your letter.”

When the State Department's proposal was considered in Ottawa, those concerned were chiefly impressed by the fact that the existing surface facilities in the Northwest are only being used to a fraction of the capacity that their present condition permits and that construction on roads other than those connecting the U.S. with Alaska therefore deserve the priority that is being given to them. It was also realized that, were the U.S. to be permitted to perform or pay for a significant portion of the proposed communications, it might well have a serious psychological effect on the “new” Canadians in the Northwest, who were greatly impressed by U.S. activities in that area during the war. It was also noted that it was U.S. shipping legislation that has prevented effective use of the railway route through Prince Rupert and also that it is open to the U.S. to develop the sea ports in Alaska and internal road and rail communications there. Also, it was estimated that if standard construction were used, the cost would be about $180,000 per mile.

We learnt at the time that the Department of the Interior was the main proponent of the State Department's proposal that a meeting be held to discuss the projects referred to and that the U.S. Service departments had not played an important role in the development of the proposal. They have, incidentally, never suggested a railway at meetings of the P.J.B.D. during the post-war period. We also understood at the time that Mr. Batcheller and other private interests in the U.S. Northwest were chiefly responsible for the interest taken by the Department of the Interior.

During his talks with Mr. St. Laurent on February 12, 1949, Mr. Truman referred to the strong support of western U.S. interests for the railway project. He apparently did this as a favour to his old friend, ex-Governor Wallgren of Washington.

Developments during 1949

At the beginning of the year, a series of Bills and Resolutions were introduced in Congress authorizing the President to negotiate an agreement with Canada for a location survey and/or construction of a Prince George-Fairbanks railway. Generally speaking, there has been a revival of interest in the United States for improved communications across the Canadian Northwest, and a good number of Americans, particularly from the Western and Northwestern States, find the proposal for the railway attractive. The following is a report on a conversation between Mr. Snow of the State Department and an officer of the Embassy which sheds some light on the United States attitude towards the proposal:

“He (Snow) strongly urged that there should at least be conversations to discuss the matter in principle and possibly to arrange for a survey to be made. He could not agree that such discussions seemed in themselves to constitute a commitment of any sort on the part of the Canadian Government.

He explained that position of the western Senators and Congressmen as being that of men who represented an area which was used to public projects of this nature, where the idea of progress being achieved through the building of railroads amounted to religious enthusiasm. He explained that there was nothing in any way sinister in their urging the construction of a railway: the western part of the United States owed its development largely to railway construction, and westerners, therefore, were inclined to believe that Alaska was capable of similar expansion if suitably encouraged.

Mr. Snow said that the western representatives were inclined to draw attention to the Canadian railways running through Maine as an example of a similar development in reverse. He said that he believed most of the western representatives were favourable to the St. Lawrence project but that they had not yet linked their support of it with the road and railway to Alaska. In conclusion, Mr. Snow begged that the Canadian Government would not allow its judgment in the present matter to be influenced by the rather questionable approaches made by Mr. Batcheller last year. If Mr. Batcheller's scheme was unacceptable, he hoped that its existence would not be confused with the principle of some plan to expand communications to Alaska.”

One of the Bills introduced in Congress early this year H.R. 2186 (Rep. [Henry] Jackson and Senator [Warren] Magnuson of Washington), was passed on October 17 and signed by the President on October 26. It has now become Public Law 391 and authorizes the President to negotiate an agreement with Canada for a standard-gauge railway.

There is still some doubt as to when Washington will approach us for this agreement. For some time it was felt, since no Appropriation Bill had been passed by Congress to complement Public Law 391, that the United States Government would not be able to make an early approach to us on the matter. You will recall that the Minister, in replying to a question in the House regarding the railway proposal referred to this difficulty but concluded with the following remarks; “if and when...the United States Government approaches the Canadian Government about this survey, the Government will naturally be glad to discuss the matter”. A similar statement has been made in the House by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Snow of the State Department is, however, of the opinion that an approach will be made to us through diplomatic channels as soon as interdepartmental thinking in Washington has developed to the point where there are concrete proposals to put before the Canadian Government. He feels that such proposals will be ready by the end of this year. It is his view that the formulation of an agreement between the two countries need not await the passage of an Appropriation Bill, because, if an agreement for a survey were reached the actual work might be carried out by the staff of the United States Geological Service or the United States Army Engineers within existing departmental appropriations.

It was with the possibility in mind of an early approach from Washington that we recently suggested to the Deputy Ministers of the interested Government Departments that it might be wise to initiate a study of the railway question by an interdepartmental group so that appropriate material would be available for a decision on the matter. All the departments concerned have agreed in principle to this suggestion and we have, therefore, proposed that a meeting be held on Friday, December 9. It is felt that the meeting could usefully consider the following topics among others:

(A) The feasibility of and the need for such a survey as Washington is likely to propose.

(B) What studies of an economic, financial, military or other nature might usefully be undertaken so that appropriate material might be available for a decision on any proposals that are received from Washington for a survey and for the construction of a railway.

(C) What Canadian agencies, if any, might need to be established in connection with a survey. Section 11 of P.L. 391 provides that the U.S. agencies designated by the President to carry on the survey are authorized and directed "to co-operate directly with like agencies or officials to be designated by the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of co-ordinating and expediting the work of such a location survey".

(D) Whether, from the defence or other points of view, road improvements in the Northwest would be preferable to construction of a railway and, in general, whether the railway proposal should be studied in conjunction with the over-all surface communications picture in the Northwest.

I am attaching for your information a copy of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee report on H.R. 2186† and a copy of Public Law 391.†

I. Introduction

1. The Chairman said that, as a result of the passage by the United States Congress at its last Session of a Bill (H.R. 2186) authorizing the President to negotiate and conclude an agreement with Canada providing for a location survey for a railway from Prince George, B.C. to Fairbanks, Alaska, a meeting had been considered desirable to study the implications of this legislation. He suggested that the meeting might usefully consider generally the problems raised by the railway proposal and give some consideration to the nature and extent of the studies that might have to be undertaken to enable the Government to consider, in due course, the expected United States request for an agreement on a location survey.

II. Defence Aspects of the Railway Proposal

2. Wing Commander Weiser stated that there were two schools of thought on the need for a railway for purely defence purposes. From the point of view of the current national requirements of the Canadian Armed Forces, the existing road and air communication systems in the Northwest were ample. There did not, therefore appear to be any logistical requirement for a railway at present. On the other hand, continental defence undertaken in co-operation with the United States might easily comprehend the need for a railroad as an alternative to existing means of communication. He pointed out that, from a defence standpoint, all types of communications—sea, rail, road and air—are looked upon as complementary and no one of them could be considered as essential or vital, nor could one type be abandoned just because another had been built. The choice between them turned upon such points as susceptibility to sabotage, ease of maintenance, whether the use of one might release manpower and material resources that were occupied in maintaining another, etc., and these questions could not be resolved without more study than has as yet been given to them. Air transport is, at present, the chief military means of communication in the northwestern part of the continent.

3. Mr. Eberts pointed out that a similar opinion, referring to the probable long-term strategic value of a railway while discounting the present need for one, had been expressed by the Chiefs of Staff at the beginning of 1948.

4. The Meeting also noted that no approach for a railroad had been made to the Canadian Government through the Canada-U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the organization through which important requirements of the United States Defence authorities are frequently communicated to the Canadian Government. Also, the U.S. Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence indicated early in 1948 that the views of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff were substantially the same as those expressed at the time by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff.

III. Economic Development Aspects of the Railway Proposal

5. Mr. Gibson said that there was not enough information available at the present time on the economic potentialities of the areas through which the proposed railway would pass to judge whether or not a railway is essential, although it would undoubtedly be useful. A need was indicated for a thorough-going study of this aspect before negotiations with the United States authorities are allowed to progress very far. In his view, one of the main purposes of the United States authorities in proposing a railway was to develop Alaskan status with a view to eventual formation of a 49th state. A railway to Alaska would undoubtedly be a good talking point in making statehood as attractive to Alaska as possible. This, however, from a Canadian point of view would not be a strong argument for a railway.

6. He also suggested that such economic studies as might be undertaken by the Canadian authorities might very well be undertaken concurrently and in co-operation with the United States authorities. He thought that unless an economic study showed that there would be appreciable advantages in a railway from a developmental point of view, the defence considerations would necessarily be the more important ones.

7. The Meeting generally agreed that considerable further study of an economic and military nature would have to be undertaken before a final appraisal could be made.

IV. Railway vs Highway

8. Mr. Murchison reminded the meeting that it had been established at the inter-departmental meeting a year ago that the Alaska Highway was only being used to 20% capacity and that, therefore, traffic on it could still be greatly increased. In view of this, perhaps it would be better to spend money on development of the highway rather than on a railroad.

9. Mr. Gibson said that the real difficulty in connection with the Alaska Highway did not result from the condition of the Highway itself, which, for purposes of Yukon administration, was being adequately maintained. The Alberta Government, however, was extremely loath to improve the connecting roads running north from Edmonton to the highway and was concentrating instead on improving the roads leading south to the International boundary.

10. Mr. Wardle suggested that, since the United States proposal is obviously directed to a railway through B.C., perhaps a study of the advantages of a highway in that area should be undertaken. A highway might have all the advantages of a railway without the disadvantage of a large annual deficit. It was, however, generally felt by the meeting that the estimate of an annual $50 million deficit for a railway was much too high.

11. Wing Commander Weiser said that from a military point of view the advantages of a highway would depend on its logistical capacities.

12. The Meeting generally agreed that, in strict terms of value received for money expended, a railway would be preferable to an improved or new U.S.-Alaska Highway.

V. Nature of Expected United States Proposals

13. It was felt that the proposals that the United States were likely to make to Canada would probably include the following points:

(a) Initially, a request for a location survey—possibly to be undertaken concurrently with comprehensive joint studies of an economic and strategic nature;

(b) The United States might well be willing to bear the whole cost of the location survey, and also that of construction of a railway, if Canada agreed;

(c) As the United States is chiefly interested in Alaska, a location survey that it carried out alone would not likely take into account Canadian development needs.

VI. Method of Handling Expected United States Request for a Location Survey

14. The Chairman then suggested that the meeting attempt to assess, insofar as possible, the advantages of a railway, with a view to arriving at a general formula for dealing with the United States request when it arrives.

15. Mr. Bryce pointed out that the basic reason for considering the railway proposal seemed to be that the United States wants a railway and is perhaps prepared to pay for it. He thought that it would take strong arguments to justify turning down such a proposal. The matter at issue, at the present time, was not acceptance or non-acceptance of the United States proposal but rather the need for a comprehensive study so that appropriate material would be on hand for a decision by the Canadian Government. It was vital that Canada be able to influence the route of the survey in the interests of Canadian development. Extensive study would, therefore, be necessary even before the survey could be agreed to. Obviously Canada could not refuse to discuss the survey proposal with the United States authorities, but final discussions should be reserved until more information is available.

16. Mr. Wardle said that the survey in 1942 had proven the Rocky Mountain Trench route quite feasible and that it would, therefore, be difficult on engineering grounds to refuse to permit a survey of that route.

17. Mr. Eberts thought that the publicity which had recently been given to this matter pointed to the need for quick action on the United States request when received, and that some definite statement on the Canadian position would have to be made within, say, a month after the United States proposal reached the Canadian Government. This would entail prompt preparation of material for Cabinet upon which it could base its decision.

18. Wing Commander Weiser suggested that the repercussions which would follow a refusal to permit the location survey, provided the United States defence authorities considered a railway vital, would not seem to be in Canada's best interests.

19. Mr. Gibson suggested that the formula for the survey might be patterned after the arrangements for the joint Arctic Weather Stations, where half the personnel is provided by each country and the officers in charge are Canadian.

20. Mr. Murchison said that it would be essential at the outset to ensure that the wage rates paid to United States labour on either the survey or on actual construction of a railway would not disturb existing Canadian wage rates in the area.

21. Mr. Wardle pointed out in this connection that, while Canada could provide all of the ordinary labour for projects of this kind, the technical and engineering staff would largely have to be brought from the United States due to a shortage of Canadians in these categories.

22. Mr. Labarge thought that the studies to be undertaken should estimate the maximum advantage to Canada of a railway over the best possible route, and then estimate the loss to Canada of a railway placed over a less favourable route.

23. Mr. Bryce said that Canada would clearly have to bargain with the United States after cost estimates had been made of the alternative routes since the least expensive route would not necessarily be the most advantageous to the Canadian Northwest.

VII. Conclusion

24. The Chairman said that it was evident from the views expressed at the meeting that the expected United States request would have to be given a sympathetic hearing. The main emphasis of the meeting had been on the need for a comprehensive study for the whole question. It was generally felt that a decision on even a United States request for a location survey would have to wait until these studies were fairly well advanced. When the United States proposals are received it might be desirable to suggest to the United States authorities that Canadian and United States studies be undertaken concurrently and on a co-operative basis.

25. It was possible, however, at this time to foresee some of the factors that would have to be considered in connection with any agreement permitting the survey to go forward. Some of these would be:

(a) Provision should undoubtedly be made to enable Canada to influence the route of the survey;

(b) Canada was obviously not prevented, if she so desired, from making surveys herself;

(c) Canadian participation at some level in United States-sponsored surveys would probably have to be provided for;

(d) The Province of British Columbia would have to be consulted;

(e) Canadian wage structures could not be disturbed by the importation of highly paid labour from the United States.

VIII. Recommendations

26. It was suggested that it might prove useful to have a further meeting of the committee after Dr. Keenleyside returned from the United States, at which time he would be able to give an account of any discussions he might have had with United States authorities on the railway proposal. On the other hand, Dr. Keenleyside might prefer to circulate a report on his discussions.

27. The Meeting recommended, after further discussion:

(a) that immediate further study be given to the following topics:

(i) the advantages and disadvantages from an economic and military point of view to both Canada and the United States of a railroad over different possible routes.

(ii) whether, from a military or economic point of view, a new or improved road from the United States to Alaska would be preferable to a railway.

(iii) a suitable formula for the carrying out of a location survey and/or construction of a railway, including the administrative and corporate arrangements that might be made for managing and financing either of these projects.

(b) that a sub-committee be set up immediately consisting of representatives from the Departments of Transport, Mines and Resources, National Defence, Reconstruction and Supply and Finance to undertake these studies and to prepare a paper for the use of Cabinet in considering the expected United States request for a location survey.

(c) that the Department of Transport be asked to take the lead in setting up the sub-committee and in initiating and co-ordinating the studies.⁶⁹

VI. TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

16. The Committee had for consideration a report from the Joint Planning Committee on the strategic implications of the proposed Trans-Canada Highway.

The report recommended that National Defence endorse the proposed construction of the trans-Canada highway and suggested that, to be of the greatest military value, such a highway should follow the most northerly route practical and, in any event, should connect with the Northwest Highway System.

(Memorandum JPC 19-20 of 31st August, 1949, from Secretary, Joint Planning Committee—CSC 9-20 of 3rd October)†

17. The Secretary to the Cabinet questioned the advisability of injecting military considerations of this kind into the trans-Canada highway negotiations at this late date.

The general basis of the agreement between the federal and provincial governments was that the former would provide fifty per cent of the cost and the selection of the route would be left to the latter. Any suggestion on the part of the federal government that the route be altered for strategic reasons would re-open immediately the difficult question of financial contribution between the governments concerned. The agreement related specifically to the trans-Canada highway and the federal government had made it clear that connecting roads were solely a provincial responsibility.

18. The Chief of the Air Staff said that the most northerly of the alternative routes through Ontario and Quebec would be of most value since it would serve to reduce the cost of supplying any northern bases which might be established in that area. As the final route through Ontario and Quebec had not yet been determined, there might be no objection to indicating that, from the military standpoint, it would be desirable to select the most northerly route.

19. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the United States had been pressing for adequate connecting roads between the United States and the Alaska Highway. At the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, at which this subject had been discussed, the U.S. members stated that they were particularly interested in the early completion of the Hart Highway (Vancouver to Dawson Creek) and the improvement of the Athabaska-Dawson Creek section of the road running from Montana to Dawson Creek.

The question of connecting roads, however, seemed to be a matter which would have to be taken up separately with the provinces.

20. The Chairman, Defence Research Board, suggested that, if there were objections to the federal government approaching the provinces on the matter of selection of routes, there might be a case for asking the Minister to make informal representations directly to the provincial governments concerned.

21. The Chief of the Naval Staff expressed the view that, although the most northerly route would be of the greatest military value, on balance, the strategic considerations did not seem to be of sufficient importance to justify the recommendation of any change in the proposed routes.

22. *The Acting Chief of the General Staff*⁷⁰ supported the views expressed by the Chief of the Naval Staff.

23. It was agreed, after further discussion, that although the most northerly of the routes under consideration was, from a military standpoint, the most preferable, the strategic considerations did not seem to be of sufficient importance to warrant a formal recommendation that the proposed route be altered.

REFERENCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

In a letter dated July 30, 1948, the City Clerk brought to the attention of this Department a resolution of the City of Windsor Council requesting the Canadian Government to refer to the International Joint Commission a serious air pollution problem in that area caused by shipping traffic plying the waters of the Detroit River. A similar resolution and request was addressed to the State Department in Washington by the City of Detroit. The original resolution was subsequently enlarged so that the terms of reference to the Commission would authorize it to determine to what extent industries and other factors on both sides of the international boundary were contributing to the air pollution in that vicinity.

2. An Interdepartmental Committee was established to study this matter and the advisability of the government referring it to the International Joint Commission. This Committee was composed of the following:

⁷⁰ Le major-général/Major-General Howard Graham.

Victor Meek, Controller of Dominion Water and Power Bureau, Department of Mines and Resources;

Norman Marr, Dominion Water and Power Bureau, Department of Mines and Resources;

J.R. Menzies, Chief, Public Health Engineering Division, Department National Health and Welfare;

Lt. Col. C.C. Stibbard, Director of Operation, Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada;

Dr. M. Katz, National Research Council;

A.K. Laing, Department of Transport;

D. Stansfield, Department of External Affairs;

E.M. Sutherland, International Joint Commission

K.J. Burbridge, Department of External Affairs.

3. In an exchange of notes, the United States and Canadian Governments agreed upon the terms of reference to be submitted. The Canadian Government also referred these draft terms of reference to the Premier of Ontario and to the City of Windsor. Both the Premier of Ontario and the City of Windsor agreed to the draft terms of reference as agreed upon by the United States and Canadian Governments.

4. The Minister and Deputy Minister of the Department of National Health and Welfare have been kept fully advised of this matter and approve of the problem being referred to the International Joint Commission.

5. In a further exchange of notes it has been agreed between the State Department and the Department of External Affairs, that the two governments transmit this reference to their respective sections of the International Joint Commission on January 12, 1949. It has also been agreed that a Press Release on this subject will be issued by these Departments on the same date. (This Press Release is not to be issued before noon on January 12th.)

6. The reference to the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, as approved by the United States Government, the Government of the Province of Ontario and the City of Windsor, is attached† for your signature, if you agree.⁷¹

CONVERSATION WITH MR. BYRD OF THE U.S. EMBASSY REGARDING POTENTIAL
HYDRO ELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT IN ALASKA

On July 22 Mr. Byrd, First Secretary of the U.S. Embassy, called on Mr. Burbridge to discuss informally instructions received by the Embassy from the State Department in connection with proposed investigations of water resources in the Yukon territory as a possible source of hydro electric power in Alaska. Mr. Norman Marr of the Department of Mines and Resources and Miss Meagher were also present at the discussions.

2. The State Department note to the Embassy enclosed a letter from the Department of the Interior explaining the project in general terms. The gist of the proposal was that hydro electric power to the extent of approximately one million kilowatt hours could probably be developed in Alaska near Skagway if a sufficient volume of water (five thousand second feet) could be diverted from the Lewes River (a tributary of the Yukon on the Canadian side) and carried through two tunnels to Alaska. The letter made several vague references to the mutual profit to both countries to be derived from such a project and to the strategic value of hydro electric power in this area during time of war. It did not specify either the primary use to which the power would be put nor the particular advantages to Canada.

3. The Department of the Interior made two requests (1) that a reference be sent to the International Joint Commission under Article 9 of the Treaty for their views on the desirability of undertaking a joint U.S.-Canadian investigation of the areas concerned and (2) that, pending the reference to and ruling from the International Joint Commission, temporary permission be granted by the Canadian Government immediately for a group of engineers and technicians from the Bureau of Reclamation to undertake a preliminary exploratory study of the Lewes River area. In explaining the urgency of the second request, the letter pointed out that investigation in this part of the country is only possible from May to October and if a beginning were not made immediately, nothing could be done until next year.

4. Mr. Marr explained that the Aluminium Company of America had asked permission of the Canadian authorities for similar facilities some time ago, which was granted. A team is already on the spot carrying out investigations to determine the feasibility of undertaking an almost identical project. Most of the personnel engaged in these investigations are Canadian and the permission is for exploration and study only and does not commit the Canadian Government in any way. The Aluminium Company's plan is to build an aluminium plant near Skagway if the necessary hydro electric power can be secured.

5. Mr. Byrd professed to have no knowledge of the Aluminium Company's plans and it was impossible to form any opinion as to the tie in, if any, between the U.S. Government project and the Aluminium Company's proposed plant.

6. The preliminary and informal views of the Departments of External Affairs and Mines and Resources, as expressed by Mr. Burbridge and Mr. Marr, were:—

(a) that we were not convinced that reference to the International Joint Commission was necessary or desirable;

(b) that we would like to consider the alternative procedure of discussing the matter directly between the two Governments;

(c) that the Canadian Government would probably frown upon the suggestion that a party of U.S. Government engineers should carry out investigations on Canadian soil; and

(d) that the entire question would have to be carefully considered and that immediate action could not be expected.

7. It was then agreed that the U.S. Embassy should make a formal approach to the Canadian Government when Mr. Byrd would deliver the note personally to Mr. Burbridge and that he would then report to the State Department the preliminary impressions he received as outlined in the preceding paragraph. Mr. Byrd thought it quite likely that the discouraging nature of the preliminary Canadian reaction would result in the U.S. Government dropping the matter.

8. In addition to the Department of Mines and Resources, the Department of Public Works must also be consulted as the Navigable Waters Protection Act is administered by that Department. The Lewes River is used to a considerable extent for navigation purposes and the Department of Public Works would therefore be concerned with any project which would affect navigation in that river.

Le premier ministre de l'Ontario au premier ministre

Premier of Ontario to Prime Minister

Toronto, October 13, 1949

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

We have been concerned for some time past with the pollution of Lake Ontario with oil and industrial waste of that nature. The sources of pollution are, in main, uncertain. They may arise from industries located on the Ontario shores, or from shipping, or from industries on the American side. This type of pollution is very injurious to fish and wild life and is a nuisance of major proportions to residents along the lake shore, and those using the beaches and waters. While the trouble has been largely confined to Lake Ontario what I have to suggest applies to Lake Erie, Lake Huron and Lake Superior.

The problem is complicated by very definitely divided jurisdiction and authority, the Dominion having control and regulation of shipping, the Province the industries on the Ontario side and matters relating to health, and then, the international aspect, which would involve a division of authority on the American side.

I may say that for some months past the Province has been conducting an intensive investigation of conditions along the Ontario shore, and steps have been taken to remedy situations which may cause this type of pollution in this area. The problem, however, is one which requires joint and unified action, the direction of which, I think, must be with the Department of Transport, which could also obtain international action. I suggest a joint study of the matter by the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government, the latter represented by the Departments of the Attorney-General and Health, with resulting action. The Province will extend its fullest co-operation in this matter and make available in whatever way would assist, our services, including officials of any of the Departments and the Provincial Police. We are prepared to extend the fullest co-operation and to integrate our services with whatever unified direction may be decided upon. The Department of Transport would appear to be the Department of the Dominion Government which would be principally concerned.

If studies were commenced at once, action could be agreed upon which would prevent a repetition next year of the nuisances which we have had this year and which were serious indeed.

This matter involves a case of very clearly divided authority. I should like to assure you that we shall not let this stand in the way of effecting the best and most efficient safeguards possible, and we are prepared to co-operate in every way.

Yours very truly,

LESLIE M. FROST

*Le ministre des Transports
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures*
Minister of Transport to Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, October 19, 1949

My dear Colleague:

On August 8, 1945, the Secretary of State of Canada wrote to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs asking that, in accordance with the suggestions in a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a submission be made to the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission with a view to "undertaking a comprehensive study of the sanitary condition" of the waters of the St. Clair and Detroit rivers and the Great Lakes and connecting streams; "the nature and extent of harmful pollution being discharged into them, and the type and cost of remedial works".

An Interdepartmental Committee was set up to study the matter and met on September 5th to consider whether the reference should be limited to the St. Clair and Detroit rivers, concerning which the question originally arose, or extended to include the Great Lakes system and the International Section of the St. Lawrence river. It was decided to recommend the latter alternative to Council and a memorandum was prepared. Before this memorandum was presented to the Cabinet the United States Embassy left with your department a draft reference on the subject which narrowed the scope of the investigation to the waters of the St. Clair and Detroit rivers, and Lake St. Clair.

On September 27th the Interdepartmental Committee met to consider both drafts, and it was agreed that it would be more expedient to use the American draft as a basis for discussion and to ascertain the views of the State Department and the International Joint Commission, keeping in mind that the proposed approach had the advantage that investigations could get under way quickly and that the terms of reference could be broadened at a later date if desired.

In letter of October 2nd, 1946, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the International Joint Commission, the terms of reference included the waters of the St. Clair river, Lake St. Clair, the Detroit River, the waters of the St. Mary River from Lake Superior to Lake Huron, and covered pollution by sewage and industrial waste. By a further letter of April 2, 1948, the terms of reference were broadened to include the Niagara River from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario.

As you are aware, there have been a number of instances during the past summer wherein Great Lakes waters have been polluted by the discharge of oil therein, by accident or otherwise, and public resentment has been very marked. That resentment has in a sense culminated in Private Bill No. 6, which was tabled in the House of Commons.

There would appear to me to be no purpose in the limiting of the terms of reference to the International Joint Commission to only part or parts of the boundary waters of the Great Lakes system or to the consideration of pollution resulting from the discharge of sewage and industrial waste, and it would seem desirable that the terms of reference under which the International Joint Commission is now dealing with the matter of pollution, should be further broadened.

I suggest for your consideration that such terms be extended so as to include the Great Lakes system and the International Section of the St. Lawrence river, as was recommended by the Interdepartmental Committee at their meeting of September 5, 1945, and further that the terms be enlarged to include pollution by ships through discharge of sewage, bilge water or oil.

Yours faithfully,

LIONEL CHEVRIER

Le premier ministre au premier ministre de l'Ontario
Prime Minister to Premier of Ontario

Ottawa, October 31, 1949

My dear Premier:

I discussed your letter of October 13 regarding the pollution of Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron and Superior with the Minister of Transport immediately on its receipt, and the matter has today been considered by the government as a whole.

It is apparent, as you say, that the problem is complicated by divided jurisdiction, the province having jurisdiction over the industries in Ontario which discharge effluent into these waters and the federal government having control of shipping. There is also the international aspect of the matter covered by Article 4 of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 which provides that boundary waters shall not be polluted on either side of the boundary to the injury of health or property on the other.

It is noted from your letter that the Ontario government has been conducting an extensive investigation of conditions along the Ontario shore and that steps have been taken to remedy situations which may cause this type of pollution. The federal government has given particular consideration to the view expressed in your letter that the problem is one "which requires joint and unified action" and to your suggestion that the direction of such action should be with the federal Department of Transport which could also obtain international action.

It seems to us that in a matter which is primarily one concerning health and welfare the responsibility for measures of control which may be required to prevent pollution originating on the Canadian side would be primarily provincial, and that the main responsibility of the federal government should be to discover whether and to what extent the pollution originates in the United States and therefore calls for international action. The appropriate way to take such action would seem to be to ask the International Joint Commission to enquire into and to report to the governments of Canada and the United States upon the nature and extent of harmful pollution of the boundary waters of the Great Lakes System and the International Section of the St. Lawrence River, the measures required to remedy the situation, the nature, location and extent of such remedial works, the probable cost thereof, and by whom and in what proportions the cost should be borne.

On April 1, 1946, a joint reference was made to the International Joint Commission by the United States and Canadian governments concerning the pollution of the international boundary waters of the St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair, and the Detroit River. This reference was later extended to include the waters of the St. Mary's River from Lake Superior to Lake Huron and the waters of the Niagara River from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario. In this reference both governments required the Commission to ascertain whether these waters were being polluted and if so the causes and sources of pollution. The Commission was also requested to determine “what measures for remedying the situation would, in its judgment, be most practical from an economic, sanitary and other points of view”. If the construction of preventive or remedial works was necessary, the Commission was asked to indicate the nature and probable cost of such works. It is understood that the present reference includes investigation into pollution by ships through discharge of oil, sewage and bilge water.

I understand that the International Engineering Boards have completed their investigations and that the Commission has held public hearings in connection with the pollution of the waters of the Detroit River, Lake St. Clair, St. Clair River and also the St. Mary’s River. I am informed that engineering investigations are now under way and that hearings are to be conducted shortly by the International Joint Commission in connection with the pollution of the Niagara River.

Before, however, making a request to the United States government for enlarging the present terms of reference to the International Joint Commission, we feel that, as you suggest, the technical officers of the federal government and the Ontario government might examine the problem further. As I have already indicated, this seems to be primarily a matter of health and welfare and I would suggest that you ask the appropriate technical officers of the Ontario government to communicate with the Deputy Minister of National Health at Ottawa who is prepared to arrange for appropriate consultation without delay.

Yours sincerely,

LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister of Transport

Ottawa, November 4, 1949

Dear Mr. Chevrier,

In my Minister’s absence at the United Nations, I am replying on his behalf to your letter of October 19. In your letter you suggest, for my Minister’s consideration, that the present reference to the International Joint Commission concerning the pollution of boundary waters in specific locations in the Great Lakes be extended so as to include the whole of the Great Lakes system and the international section of the St. Lawrence River, as was recommended by the Inter-departmental Committee on September 5, 1945, and further that the terms of reference be enlarged to include pollution by ships through discharge of sewage, bilge water or oil.

As you are aware, on October 13, the Premier of Ontario wrote to the Prime Minister concerning the pollution of Lake Ontario and in his letter he stated that “the problem, however, is one which requires joint and unified action...”. In his reply of October 31, the Prime Minister stated that "before, however, making a request to the United States government for enlarging the present terms of reference to the International Joint Commission, we feel that, as you suggest, the technical officers of the federal government and the Ontario government might examine the problem further. As I have already indicated, this seems to be primarily a matter of health and welfare and I would suggest that you ask the appropriate technical officers of the Ontario government to communicate with the Deputy Minister of National Health at Ottawa who is prepared to arrange for appropriate consultation without delay".

In view of the foregoing, it might be considered wise to await the outcome of the proposed investigation by the technical officers of the federal government and of the Ontario government rather than take steps at the present time to extend the reference. In the meantime, I shall refer the matter to the appropriate officers of this Department with instructions that they study the question of extending the reference so that, in the event that the investigation of the federal and Ontario governments referred to above, discloses that the matter is definitely one which should go before the International Joint Commission, we shall be able to proceed without delay.

Yours sincerely,

PROPOSED DIVERSION OF WATER FROM THE YUKON RIVER BASIN FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO ELECTRIC POWER ON THE CANADA-ALASKA BOUNDARY

You may wish to make a progress report to Cabinet on this subject. A Note dated July 25, 1949,† was received by the Department from the United States Embassy, enquiring whether the Canadian Government would consider referring the above question to the International Joint Commission. This reference would have been made under Article IX of the Treaty of January 11, 1909, and would have provided for the study of the feasibility of such a project. The project would be carried out by the United States Department of the Interior.

2. An informal meeting of officials of interested United States and Canadian Government Departments to discuss this proposal was held in Ottawa on November 21 and 22. In this meeting it was pointed out that the public hearings that would have to be held by the International Joint Commission would be embarrassing to the Government of British Columbia. That Government is engaged in discussions with the Aluminium Company of Canada, looking towards the development of a somewhat similar power and aluminium project based on the Nechako River. It was then decided that the United States officials would recommend to their Government that a proposal for a joint investigation of the feasibility and economic implications of this project by officials of Canadian and United States Government Departments be substituted for the previous proposal of a reference to the International Joint Commission.

3. A proposal from the United States Government along these lines is now anticipated. When it is received, a full report will be submitted to Cabinet recommending Canadian participation in a cooperative investigation of the Yukon River project. It might be desirable at that time for the Cabinet Committee on Economic Policy to examine the proposal, with the Minister of Mines and Resources sitting in for that occasion.

The Film Liaison Officer of the Department of Trade and Commerce recently called on the United States Ambassador to Canada in connection with the Canadian Co-operation Project. During the interview Mr. Steinhardt is said to have displayed a keen interest in the success of the project. I attach a copy of the Film Officer's report of their meeting.†

In view of Mr. Steinhardt's intention to review the question with Mr. Howe, you might consider it opportune to take part in any discussion they may have so as to inject some new life into the C.C.P. As you know, the Department has a very real interest in this project, since any substantial development brought to it would make American films an important vehicle of Canadian information abroad. Security and economic aspects of the project, among others, are also of interest to the Department.

I attach for your information a copy of the recent annual report on the progress of the film project. On the surface, the progress is encouraging. At the same time, I think it is still true that although results have been achieved they fall considerably short of balancing the dollar withdrawals which, in 1948, amounted to about ten million dollars.

Continued efforts are therefore necessary to ensure that the United States film industry carries out its part of the understanding. If the matter comes up in discussions with Mr. Howe, you might think it worthwhile to suggest that this Department is prepared to co-operate closely with Trade and Commerce in the practical aspects of this project which is so directly related to the purpose of Canadian information abroad.⁷²

Rapport par l'officier de liaison en cinéma, ministère du Commerce et de l'Industrie

Report by Film Liaison Officer, Department of Trade and Commerce

[Ottawa, 1950]

CANADIAN CO-OPERATION PROJECT

Annual report for calendar year 1949 from Archibald H. Newman, Film Liaison Officer, Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa

Activities of the Canadian Co-operation Project in its second year greatly surpassed those of the first year in every aspect: newsreel clips, theatrical shorts, theatrical features, and ancillary publicity for Canada in the United States.

During the calendar year 1949, U.S. movie theatre audiences totalling approximately 1,180,000,000 were shown a total of 156 items concerning Canada. This conservatively estimated total is about 437,000,000 greater than the corresponding total for 1948, an increase of about 58 per cent.

The 1,180,000,000 total of U.S. audience impressions for last year compares with approximately 743,000,000 in 1948. The 1949 total comprises 800,000,000 for newsclips about Canada, 263,000,000 for shorts about this country, and 117,000,000 for U.S. features containing Canadian scenery, characters or other references.

In addition to U.S. screening, the items for which the Project has been largely responsible have received wide distribution elsewhere. The world total of audience impressions for C.C.P. subjects last year was approximately 1,400,000,000.

One yardstick to measure the success of the Project is provided in the following table showing the number of items about Canada released in U.S. theatres before and after the Project began:

	1947 (Before C.C.P.)	1948 (1st C.C.P. Year)	1949
Newsclips	61	111	125
Shorts	2	12	18
Features	1	8	13

⁷² Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Yes LB P[earson]

Newsclips: In the first two years of Project activities, the five newsreel companies carried in their U.S. releases a total of 236 sequences about Canada. This is at a rate double that of the year before the Project began.

Short subjects: To the end of 1949 the Project was responsible for releasing 30 theatrical shorts about Canada in U.S. theatres. Of the 18 released last year, 15 dealt with Canada exclusively and the remaining three carried sequences highlighting Canadian themes. Six dealt with sports, six with tourism, two with economics and industry, two with social themes, and one each with military and scientific subjects. Canadian producers made six of the C.C.P. shorts so far used in the United States.

Features: Of the 13 full-length theatrical features listed as Project items in 1949, seven employed Canadian backgrounds and the remaining six provided oblique publicity for Canada. Major portions of two of the features were photographed in Canada giving this country a direct and known gain of several hundred thousand dollars in U.S. funds.

16 mm. Productions: Late in 1949, the Film Liaison Officer extended the Project into the 16 mm. field in the United States. The officer arranged with Coronet Films and Encyclopaedia Films, two of the largest producers, that Canadian subjects would be worked into U.S. educational films and that Canadian producers would be employed and their films purchased whenever possible. This is in addition to the 16 mm. exploitation of C.C.P. shorts and features normally undertaken by the U.S. industry. Because of these activities, Canadian film items will be seen by many millions of 16 mm. fans throughout the world.

Canadian Production: In addition to work with the Canadian Co-operation Project, the Film Liaison Officer has encouraged and assisted the privately owned film industry in Canada. In 1949, Quebec Productions, Montreal, turned out two features and began work on another. Renaissance Films, also of Montreal, produced one feature, and Selkirk Productions began work on one. The two Quebec Productions features are being distributed in the United States. The commercial 16 mm. producers also were encouraged to go after U.S. sales and at least 20 shorts were marketed. Among the major sales was "The Loon's Necklace", a prizewinning Crawley short.

Late in 1949, the Film Liaison Officer began a campaign to induce Canadian affiliates of U.S. companies to arrange for the employment of Canadian producers in making their advertising films and filmstrips for use in the United States and Canada.

Ancillary Publicity: In addition to dramatizing Canada in U.S. theatrical films, the Project has promoted Canada in other ways. For example, it has helped Canadian government officials in the United States to arrange screenings of shorts about Canada. It has promoted Canadian scripts and books as prospective film subjects. It has assisted in entertaining and publicizing important Canadians visiting the United States. It has helped in obtaining Hollywood stars for three series of 13 radio broadcast about Canada used by an average of about 400 U.S. radio stations. It has distributed Canadian booklets, pamphlets and travel material in the United States.

The Canadian Co-operation Project was begun early in 1948, shortly after Canada imposed import controls, and is an undertaking of the U.S. theatrical film industry sponsored by the Motion Picture Association of America. It is the unique endeavor of an industry in one country to maintain its exports to another country by providing a quid pro quo. The project's aim is to help Canada obtain U.S. dollars so that the U.S. industry may continue to withdraw its earnings on motion pictures shown in Canada.

Although the Project is directly responsible for substantial expenditures in Canada by U.S. film producers, its real value to Canada is in the publicity it provides. In its publicity efforts, the Project promotes U.S. tourist travel in Canada, encourages U.S. capital investment in this country, and attempts to stimulate two-way trade. Partly as a result of the Project, the Canadian Government Travel Bureau handled 321,751 written requests for travel information last year, an increase of nearly 17 per cent over last year and an all-time record.

An organized staff, working on the Project in Hollywood and New York, as well as in Canada, enlists the support of the U.S. producers, distributors and exhibitors. This staff works closely with the Film Liaison Officer, Department of Trade and Commerce, and through this officer obtains active assistance from the National Film Board, the Canadian Government Travel Bureau, and almost every other department and agency of the government. It also receives invaluable help from the provincial tourist bureaux and from Canadian film producers and other segments of private industry.

VISIT OF THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF BELGIUM

Dr. Paul Van Zeeland became Minister of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade of Belgium when The Parti Social Chrétien (P.S.C.) and the Liberal Party finally succeeded in forming a government under M. Eyskens, after a governmental interregnum of nearly six weeks, following the elections in June of this year. The government represents an uneasy combination of these two right-centre parties, and our Embassy in Brussels predicts that it is not likely to be very long-lasting. The Socialists under M. Spaak, have gone into opposition.

Dr. Van Zeeland, who is a member of the P.S.C., is 56 years of age and has held many posts in pre-war Belgian cabinets. He was Prime Minister and Foreign Minister in 1935, and Prime Minister in 1936, when M. Spaak became Foreign Minister for the first time. A doctor of political science, former professor at Louvain, vice-governor of the Banque Nationale de Belgique and deputy director of the Bank for International Settlements, he is particularly interested in, and qualified to deal with, questions of international trade, and before the war he attended most of the important international conferences dealing with this subject, including the Conference of Stresa in 1932. He is the author of a number of books, including: "La Réforme bancaire aux États-Unis de 1913-21"; "Regards sur le plan quinquennal, 1931"; "Report to the Governments of England and France on the possibility of obtaining a general reduction of obstacles to international trade", 1938.

While Dr. Van Zeeland will probably wish to confine the conversation to a general discussion of the international situation, you may wish to consider the following points in talks with him:

1. Benelux Customs Union.

For a number of reasons the progress towards complete economic union has been slowed down recently, and pre-union, which was to start on July 1, has been delayed. Mr. Dupuy has reported that the Netherlands Foreign Minister was of the opinion that the presence of Dr. Van Zeeland in the Belgian Foreign Ministry might make the problem that much more difficult. He considered that Benelux was a political problem, as did M. Spaak. The latter always encountered serious opposition from the Banque de Bruxelles, with which Van Zeeland has had close relations. He thought it possible Van Zeeland might share their view that Benelux was a technical problem, and proceed with caution on that basis.

It might be useful to ask Dr. Van Zeeland for his estimate of the chances of success of the Benelux Economic Union, and in particular his views on the manner of approach required.

2. European Political and Economic Co-operation.

Dr. Van Zeeland has played a prominent role in the right-wing of the European unity movement, and his past record indicates that he is a good "European". It would be useful to have his impressions of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg, and in particular his views as to whether it is moving too fast in directions not too clearly thought out; whether a European spirit does seem to be emerging; and whether the superficial progress achieved may not blind us to the essential fact that Europe as a unity still does not exist, politically or economically.

In view of the leading part taken by Belgium in the evolution of the Council of Europe, and of Western Union, Dr. Van Zeeland might be asked how he envisages the integration of the non-military aspects of the latter with the larger European organization. I do not believe any of the economic, financial or social and cultural committees of Western Union have met for some time, while the Council of Europe has indicated its intention of entering these fields. Is there, in Dr. Van Zeeland's view any danger of the Council of Europe duplicating cultural and economic organizations already put in hand by the United Nations or its specialized agencies?

While Dr. Van Zeeland has not participated actively in the negotiations leading up to O.E.E.C., or in its administration, his views on recent developments should be particularly valuable because of his reputation as an economist, and of course in view of the key role Belgium has in European recovery.

3. Belgium and Germany.

It would be very valuable to have Dr. Van Zeeland's views on recent developments in Western Germany, and in particular on the manifestations of the rebirth of nationalism shown in the recent elections; and on the probability of increasing German competition in manufacturing and industry. You might also wish to ask for his views on the International Ruhr Authority, and whether he would be opposed under any circumstances to Soviet participation. Finally, he might be asked for his opinion on Germany's joining the Council of Europe, and German participation in other international conferences.

4. Negotiations for Reciprocal Modifications in Visa Requirements.

Canada has proposed an agreement of this nature with Belgium and negotiations are now proceeding. We have suggested that we would issue visas free to Belgian citizens for visits of up to twelve months in duration, these visas to be issued only in Brussels. In return we would wish the Belgians to permit Canadian visitors to enter Belgium without a visa for a period of up to two months. The reason for the delay in negotiating the agreement is the Belgian insistence that Canadian visas should be issued anywhere, not only in Brussels.

It is not considered worth-while raising this question with Dr. Van Zeeland, but this note is included in case he should take up the matter with you. The reason for our desire to have Canadian visas issued only in Brussels is to permit at least a minimum of security check to be made on the applicants.¹

Prague, March 14, 1949

Sir,

The attached report on freedom of religion in Bulgaria† was written at the conclusion of a visit which I made to Sofia from March 9th–12th. It is based on talks which I had with foreign diplomats in Sofia and with Bulgarian officials.

2. The United Kingdom Minister, Mr. Paul Mason, and members of the Legation staff went to a great deal of trouble to make information available and to enable me to meet diplomatic representatives of other countries. I had discussions with the chiefs of mission and other members of the staffs of the missions of the United Kingdom, United States, France, Italy, and Turkey, and all of these were helpful and informative.

3. As regards my interviews with Bulgarian officials I am afraid that only a rather long and detailed account can convey a picture of the most remarkable performance that I have ever witnessed in a Foreign Ministry. It was my view, and the United Kingdom Minister agreed, that I should not hide the reason for my visit from the Bulgarian authorities—in applying for a visa I had neither given nor been asked for a reason—and should ask them whether anyone would care to discuss the question of religious freedom with me and explain the policy of the government. I wanted to avoid the charge that I had sneaked into Sofia and picked up my information only from foreigners whose minds were already poisoned. The British Legation therefore tried to make an appointment for me at the earliest possible time with the Chief of Protocol. An appointment was arranged for the afternoon of March 10 but when I reached the Foreign Ministry I was told that the official in question had been called away by something very urgent. This was no great surprise for I had thought it more than possible that the Bulgarians would prefer to ignore me altogether and this might simply be a characteristic Bulgarian way of doing so. However, to give the Bulgarians every opportunity to state their case, I returned to the charge and got to see the Chief of Protocol at 12.30 the next day. I had to tell him that I would be leaving Sofia the following day, and rather to my surprise he made no difficulties and promised to see what he could do. During the afternoon I received a message that M. Ganovsky, one of the two Deputy Foreign Ministers, would receive me at 6.20, and he did.

The report to missions on Van Zeeland's visit consisted of press clippings and copies of a letter from Van Zeeland to the Canadian Prime Minister.

4. After a very brief and trite exposition of the glories of religious freedom in Bulgaria M. Ganovsky cut short my questions (saying that he would return to them later) in order to parade before me representatives of the principal religious denominations in Bulgaria. I doubt whether there is a cult, creed or congregation in Bulgaria numbering more than a thousand members which was not represented. An ante-room was packed with religious leaders in every variety of clerical and unclerical costume, and these unfortunate people were brought in in ones and twos to testify, under the far from benevolent gaze of M. Ganovsky, to the perfect freedom which their churches enjoyed. After the first hour I began to wonder if the procession would ever end. The roster was as follows:

(a) Orthodox Church—a member of the Holy Synod and the dean of the Orthodox Theological faculty at the university.

(b) Union of Priests (a trade union of all Orthodox priests which does not include the higher clergy and which is government-dominated)—one of its leaders.

(c) Armenian Church (with headquarters in Soviet Armenia)—its senior bishop and a colleague.

(d) Catholic Church—two senior members of a religious order.

(e) Evangelical Churches—a Congregationalist pastor.

(f) Jews—the Chief Rabbi.

(g) Moslems—the Chief Mufti.

5. When it is realized that these dignitaries were rounded up and the performance staged on five and a half hours' notice one must pay tribute to the organizing ability of the Bulgarian authorities. The unanimity with which the religious leaders expressed their love for the government, and their gratitude for a freedom of religion that had never before existed in Bulgaria, was offered to me as unchallengeable proof of the government's case. Actually what impressed me most was the cruelty of the proceedings. Under the baleful glare of M. Ganovsky, and given the methods of a totalitarian state, these clergymen had no alternative but to parrot the official government line. Most of them gave the impression of being frightened and subduced, for which they cannot be blamed. I was urged to ask any and every question that occurred to me, and in addition to the obvious answers I was treated in several cases to voluntary statements that had clearly been prepared beforehand. It was a depressing experience.

6. The only slightly sour note in this symphony of unanimity was provided by the Catholic representatives. They alone were not prepared to say that they approved of everything that had been done, and with regard to the future they hoped for the best but would have to wait and see how government policy was administered. This refusal to give whole-hearted approval led to a fairly long and brisk conversation between the Catholics, M. Ganovsky, and the Chief of Protocol who was acting as interpreter. None of this conversation was translated for me and I can only assume that it was judged unsuitable for my ears. Foreign observers believe that the Catholic church is undecided whether to toe the government line for the time being or to announce its disapproval of certain government policies. If it follows the latter course it will be next on the list for persecution. The incident just mentioned provides some ground for believing that the Catholic Church is prepared to run this risk.

7. When the last of the clergy had been ushered out M. Ganovsky said that he had an urgent appointment with the Foreign Minister and would have to terminate the interview. As it had lasted for an hour and three quarters and the time was well past 8 p.m. I could hardly object even though certain questions which I had put remained unanswered. M. Ganovsky's concluding gambit was to ask my reaction to the drama that had been staged for me and I could only reply that I was impressed by the truly remarkable unanimity of the speakers. I do not think I was misunderstood.

I have, etc.

[Ottawa], March 11, 1949

Mr. H.S. Wingate, Secretary of the International Nickel Company, and Dr. J.O. Söderhjelm, the Company's Counsel in Finland, saw me on March 3rd in connection with the recovery by the International Nickel Company of its remaining assets in Finland.

2. There were two claims which the International Nickel Company wished to submit to the Finnish Government for settlement by direct negotiation.

(a) The International Nickel Company's claim to compensation, out of the remaining assets (123 million Finn marks) of its subsidiary, Petsamon Nikkeli, in Finland, for the debt owed it (319 million Fmks.) by the latter Company. (International Nickel maintain that its claim should have precedence over the claim of the Finnish Government to compensation from Petsamon Nikkeli assets for the latter Company's debt to I.G. Farben incurred during the war (138 million Fmks.—about $1 million) which the Finnish Government had paid to the Soviet Government as the inheritor of all German assets in Finland by the Peace Treaty.)

(b) International Nickel's claim to refund of excess profits taxes (48 million Fmks.) paid by Petsamon Nikkeli for the year 1944; and possible repayment of all taxes (excess profits and income tax) (79 million Fmks.).

3. Mr. Wingate asked if the Canadian Government would agree to instruct its Minister-designate to Finland to express to the Finnish Government his government's interest in a satisfactory settlement. Mr. Wingate stated that Dr. Söderhjelm would first raise the whole matter, and that the Canadian Minister (if he could be present at the first meeting) might then indicate the Canadian Government's interest, without, of course, giving any cause for the Finnish Government to assume that diplomatic pressure was being brought to bear, or that the Canadian Government was recommending any particular settlement.

4. If you agree² that this request may be met, I think that Mr. Stone, if he will be accredited to Finland,³ might find a suitable opportunity to tell the Finnish Government that, so far as he is aware, this is the only interest affecting Canadian nationals and that the Canadian Government hopes that it will be possible for the Finnish Government and the International Nickel Company to clear the matter up. The Minister, of course, would not take part in the negotiations themselves. I do not think it is advisable for him to be present at any meeting of representatives of the Finnish Government and Dr. Söderhjelm.

5. I attach the minutes of the meeting of March 3rd.†

DESPATCH Finland 17

Stockholm, December 12, 1949

Sir,

You will recall the visit to Ottawa last March of Dr. J.O. Söderhjelm, Counsel in Finland for the International Nickel Company of Canada, at which time he discussed with officials of the Department certain still unsettled questions between the Company and the Government of Finland. As a result of these discussions I was instructed not to take these matters up in detail with the Finnish authorities but simply to express the hope of the Canadian Government that satisfactory solutions would be found in the not distant future.

During my first visit to Finland in September I was fortunate enough to have informal conversations with both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister in the course of which in each case an opening occurred which made it possible for me to mention this matter without in any way indicating that my Government wished to press the Finnish Government in it. This seems to have done some good. During my recent visit (last week) Dr. Söderhjelm informed me that there had been somewhat more activity and rather more evidence of a disposition on the part of the Finnish authorities to reach a settlement. A meeting was to have taken place on Friday last, which however had to be postponed until this week, and Dr. Söderhjelm therefore asked me if I would have another word with the Foreign Office. This I did with the Secretary General and Mr. Voionmaa assured me that he would look into the matter. I think it may reasonably be assumed that faster progress toward a solution will now be made.

Dr. Söderhjelm informed me that the International Nickel Company was not pressing hard for a settlement. In fact the thorniest problem, that of transfers, is yet to be faced. Settlement, when it is made, will be, of course, in Finnmarks and on the authority of the Ministry of Finance. Whether or not these marks will be wholly or partly convertible is a question which only the Bank of Finland can answer and one which Dr. Söderhjelm does not propose to discuss with the Bank until after a settlement has been agreed upon.

[Ottawa], September 29, 1949

VISIT OF MR. SCHUMAN

The French Charge d'Affaires believes Mr. Schuman does not intend to raise any specific points during his talk with you, but would like simply to discuss the international situation in general terms. The following notes may be of use, however, as a basis for discussion:

1. Visa-free entry for Canadian Visitors to France

An Order-in-Council of October 5, 1948, unilaterally abolished Canadian visas for those French citizens who were born in France. However, from the point of view of our security and the visitors' personal convenience, it is still desirable for French citizens to obtain Canadian visas before travelling to Canada.

On September 6, Mr. Schuman said on the radio that he hoped Canadians would very soon be able to visit France without visas. The French Government may have delayed because they wish complete reciprocity in abolishing visas. It might be possible, therefore, to mention to Mr. Schuman your pleasure in learning that the French Government is on the point of taking the desired action and to express the hope of the Government of Canada that an announcement from Paris will be forthcoming at the earliest possible date.

2. Settlement of accounts and the use of funds arising from emergency relief in France by the Canadian Army

The Canadian Government has presented an account to the amount of some 12 million United States dollars as the Canadian share of military relief. We are prepared to defer payment without interest until after 1951 and to accept French francs for a fairly large portion of the claim to be used for the purchase of premises in Paris, for current expenditures in France of the Canadian Government, and for educational and cultural activities. You might find the opportunity to explain this to Mr. Schuman and to express the hope that shortly we may be able to commence the final negotiations for the settlement of this account.

3. The appellation of origin used for wines and liqueurs

The French feel strongly about the use of such time-honoured appellations as "Bordeaux" and "Burgundy" by such non-French wine producers as those in the Niagara District. It is of some importance to France commercially to try and retain the "copyright" on such appellations, as the United Kingdom is trying to do with regard to "Scotch". Mr. Schuman might mention the subject.

4. Germany

It would be useful to have Mr. Schuman's views on the question of German participation in the Council of Europe. Gen. Vanier has reported that Mr. Schuman told him he was not particularly worried about manifestations of German nationalism during the recent elections.

There have been a number of rumours recently that the Russians might be thinking of some sort of deal in Germany, the Russian aim being primarily a voice in the International Ruhr Authority. While this would obviously depend on the quid pro quo offered by the Russians, Mr. Schuman may be able to say in principle, whether France was opposed to Soviet participation.

5. The Saar

In February, Canada extended M.F.N. treatment to products of the Saar on the basis of the Customs and Financial Union with France, while reserving its position as regards the political separation of the Territory from Germany. Our position, as of last February, was that recognition of the economic union did not prejudice in any way our stand on the delimitation of the frontiers of Germany in the eventual peace settlement.

6. French Indo-China

It is possible that Mr. Schuman may raise the question of the recognition by Canada of the Bao Dai Government. Both the United States and the United Kingdom may recognize Bao Dai, since in their view a refusal to do so would probably strengthen the Communist position in South-East Asia. To prevent their recognition being represented as an imperialistic move, they hope that some Far Eastern states such as India and the Philippines may take the initiative.

It would be useful to have Mr. Schuman's estimate of the task which the French forces would face in Indo-China if the Chinese Communists should penetrate to the Indo-China frontier and gave military assistance to the Communists in the latter country. Mr. Schuman might be able to give us his opinion of the success of Bao Dai in convincing the peoples of Indo-China that he represents an indigenous nationalist movement.

7. Italian Colonies

We should be interested in learning more about what France desires for Libya, and more particularly for the Fezzan which has been under French military administration for the past 6 years.

8. The Future of O.E.E.C.

There have been a number of conflicting reports recently concerning the French attitude towards O.E.E.C. Mr. Stone has reported that the Swedes believe the French regard the organization primarily as a distributing agency for U.S. goods. The French were foremost at Strasbourg in calling for European economic co-operation, and demanding what would amount to political control by the Council of Europe over O.E.E.C., or a comparable organ. Mr. Ritchie has reported from Paris that U.K. officials are not too happy about this development.

In the long run it is of interest to Canada to know what direction O.E.E.C., and Western European economic co-operation, are going to take after the period when it is primarily dependent on extra European aid. It might be useful to ask Mr. Schuman about his views.

Ottawa, October 18, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to transmit for your information a report on the recent visits to Canada of Mr. Robert Schuman, Minister of Foreign Affairs of France.

2. You will recall that Mr. Schuman had made on September 16 an unofficial visit to Midland, Ontario, on the occasion of the Marquette Committee's pilgrimage to the Canadian Martyrs Shrine. Mr. Schuman had at that time flown from Washington to Camp Borden Airport accompanied by Mr. Bernard Clappier, Directeur de Cabinet, Mr. Allary, Chief of the Diplomatic Services of the Agence France-Presse, and Inspector of Police Perus. He was met at the airport by Mr. Jean Basdevant, Counsellor and Charge d'Affaires ad interim, Baron Michel de Warengien, Attache, as well as a representative of this Department. Mr. Schuman and his party had travelled by automobile to Midland, Ontario from the airport where they had attended Mass at the Christian Martyrs Shrine in the presence of Cardinal McGuigan, Archbishop of Toronto, Monseigneur Charbonneau, Archbishop of Montreal, Monseigneur Roy, Archbishop of Quebec, and members of the Marquette Committee. Mr. Schuman and party had returned to Washington that afternoon via the same route.

3. Having accepted the invitation of the Prime Minister to come to Canada for an official visit on the week-end of October 1-3, Mr. Schuman flew from New York in company with Mr. Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare.

4. On arrival in Ottawa on October 1 he was met at the Rockcliffe Airport by Mr. Brooke Claxton, Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, the French Ambassador, Mr. Hubert Guérin, and members of his Embassy and the Chief of Protocol.

5. Mr. Schuman's party consisted of Mr. Bernard Clappier and Mme. Clappier, Mr. André Rabache, Director of the New York Office of the Agence France-Presse and Mr. Pierre Crenesse of the French Radio Broadcasting. Mr. Schuman's programme for the next few days included visits to four Canadian cities and five universities. (I enclose a copy of the programme.)†

6. After laying a wreath at the National War Memorial on Saturday morning, October 1, Mr. Schuman called on the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Deputy Governor-General of Canada, His Excellency the Governor-General being in residence in Quebec. Thence Mr. Schuman proceeded to the East Block for an interview with Mr. St. Laurent. Mr. Schuman then went to Laurier House to call on Mr. Mackenzie King⁵ and to introduce to him the newly-appointed French Ambassador, Mr. Guérin.

7. A luncheon was given on Saturday in honour of Mr. Schuman by the Prime Minister at the Ottawa Country Club. (Attached is a copy of the table seating plan of the luncheon.)† After the luncheon Mr. King took Mr. Schuman to Laurier House and they drove by way of the Federal District Commission Driveway, the Experimental Farm and the Arboretum.

8. Later on Saturday afternoon Mr. Schuman and the French Ambassador called on Mr. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, at his office where they discussed certain economic problems resulting from the devaluation of the pound sterling. Mr. Schuman mentioned the benefits obtained through the Anglo-France Economic Committee which meets periodically in London and in Paris. Mr. Howe recalled that Canada and the United Kingdom have a similar committee and he suggested to Mr. Schuman the possibility of the establishment of a similar committee by France and Canada. After having paid a formal call on Monseigneur Vachon, Archbishop of Ottawa, Mr. Schuman received from the University of Ottawa a honorary LL.D. degree in the presence of members of the teaching staff and representatives of the Diplomatic Corps. In thanking the University authorities for the honour conferred upon him, Mr. Schuman remarked that it was the first time that he had been offered a honorary degree. (Mr. Schuman is a Doctor of Laws of the Université de Strasbourg.)

9. A dinner was given on Saturday evening in Mr. Schuman's honour by the French Ambassador at the French Embassy. This was followed by a reception, in the course of which Mr. King was invested by Mr. Schuman with the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour in recognition of service during the war. Some 200 guests attended the reception.

10. On Sunday morning, October 2, Mr. Schuman left Ottawa in a Royal Canadian Air Force aircraft for Quebec. In addition to the members of his party already mentioned, Mr. Schuman was accompanied on this tour of Canadian cities by the Ambassador of France, M. Jean Basdevant, Counsellor of the French Embassy, Colonel Gilbert Andrier, Military, Naval and Air Attache, M. Pierre Queuille, Commercial Counsellor and Financial Attache, and Mr. Jean Langlois, Protocol Officer of the Department. The party was met at the Quebec Airport by Mr. Marcel Duranthon, Consul General of France at Quebec, and Mme. Duranthon, Mr. P. del Perugia, French Vice Consul, and Mme. del Perugia and several others of the French colony in Quebec City. Mr. Schuman and his group attended High Mass at the Basilica, where Monseigneur E.C. Laflamme extended from the pulpit a very warm welcome to the distinguished visitor.

11. After Mass, Mr. Schuman and the French Ambassador paid a visit to Mr. Onesime Gagnon, Acting Premier of the Province of Quebec. Mr. Schuman then proceeded to the Citadel to pay his respects to the Governor-General and Lady Alexander. His Excellency and Mr. Schuman conversed for some time in French about the events which had taken place on this historic site during the war.

12. Mr. Schuman was the guest of Laval University at a luncheon given at the Cercle Universitaire which was presided over by Monseigneur Roy, Archbishop of Quebec and Chancellor of the University, and Monseigneur Parent, the Vice Rector. Also present were Mr. Onesime Gagnon, Dr. Charles Vezina and Mme. Vezina, Mr. Justice J.A. Gagné and Mme. Gagné, other members of the Faculty and Brigadier J.C. Allard, C.B.E., D.S.O., Commander, Eastern Quebec Area.

13. Before leaving for Montreal on Sunday afternoon, Mr. Schuman and party were taken on a tour of Quebec City including a visit to Notre Dame des Victoires and the Plains of Abraham. A large crowd had gathered at the Quebec Airport to say goodbye.

14. At the Dorval Airport, Montreal, Mr. Schuman and party were met by the French Consul General, Mr. Ernest Triat, and Mme. Triat and by Mr. Pierre Gabard, French Consul, and Mme. Gabard. Immediately after his arrival, Mr. Schuman called upon Monseigneur Charbonneau, Archbishop of Montreal, at the Archbishop's Palace.

15. From the Archbishop's Palace, Mr. Schuman and party proceeded to the University of Montreal. Canon Deniger, Vice Rector of the University, and Mr. Édouard Montpetit, Secretary, greeted the Foreign Minister and members of his group and conducted them through the spacious building. Mr. Schuman congratulated the Vice Rector on the magnificence of the University quarters. There followed two short visits to the College Marie de France and the College Stanislas.

16. Mr. Schuman was entertained Sunday afternoon at a buffet supper given in his honour at the home of Dr. F. Cyril James, Principal of McGill University. There were present among others Mr. Justice Tyndale, Professor Fieldhouse, Mr. Henry Morgan, Senator Thomas Vien and several members of the McGill Faculty. Mr. Schuman stated later that he had welcomed this opportunity to discuss informally conditions in France and Canada.

17. The principal public engagement during Mr. Schuman's visit to Montreal on Sunday, October 2 was an address he delivered at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel under the auspices of the United Nations Association in Canada before a capacity crowd. Mr. Schuman gave an expose of French foreign policy; then he made a plea for a Western Union based on a common spiritual and cultural heritage and urged that such a Union should be supplemented by economic and defence measures. Speaking of French Colonial policy, he stated that his country believed in the political emancipation of dependent peoples.

18. His speech, a copy of which is enclosed,† was broadcast by the C.B.C. and was followed by a question period lasting over an hour. Questioned about French reaction to devaluation, Mr. Schuman said that if it were carried out efficiently, it would result in freer trade and a more stable economic situation. In response to a suggestion that he had been opposed to German devaluation, Mr. Schuman said that he was only opposed to an exaggerated rate of devaluation which he described as being a form of "dumping". Mr. Schuman said that the Tito-Stalin quarrel was a hopeful sign, for he felt that the Yugoslav stand would sooner or later be imitated by other satellite countries. He ascribed the improved situation in Greece to the change of policy in Yugoslavia. Referring to Germany, he expressed his opposition to a centralized form of government. He believed that the internationalization of the Ruhr as a great economic and military arsenal was a necessity for the maintenance of peace. Questioned concerning France's position on Palestine, he answered that the Holy Places must be safeguarded and kept accessible to the adherents of all faiths.

19. The last day of Mr. Schuman's stay in Canada, Monday, October 3 was spent in Toronto. It included calls on the Honourable Ray Lawson, O.B.E., LL.D. Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Ontario, and the Honourable Leslie Frost, Premier of the Province of Ontario, as well as on Cardinal McGuigan, Archbishop of Toronto, and the Right Reverend A.R. Beverly, Anglican Bishop of Toronto.

20. The highlight of the day was an extended visit to the University of Toronto where Dr. S.E. Smith, President of the University, welcomed the distinguished visitors, who were then taken on a tour of the University buildings by the President and by Mr. N. Ignatieff, Warden of Hart House. A luncheon was given in honour of Mr. Schuman at Saint Michael's College, where he had an opportunity of chatting with an old friend, Professor Etienne Gilson of the Institute of Medieval Studies.

21. On his arrival in New York from Toronto on the evening of October 3 Mr. Schuman stated to the representatives of the New York press that his sojourn in Canada had been a very gratifying and enlightening experience. He had been particularly interested in observing Canadian political institutions which, under a federal constitution, had been able to fuse peoples of diverse racial origins and religious beliefs into one united nation.

CANADIAN POLICY TOWARD GERMANY

From May, 1945, until the failure of the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in December, 1947, the Canadian attitude toward Germany was rather like that of a hunter toward a dead duck—a little worried that it might come back to life, a little interested in what should be done with the carcass, and, most of all, concerned that his part in disposing of the carcass should reflect his part in shooting the bird down.

2. To take leave of the metaphor, we in Canada began by thinking of a German settlement in terms of a formal peace treaty in which we should take an adequate part. Early in 1948, however, other events began to change our thinking. It was clear that this moribund area was capable of producing badly needed goods and the Marshall formula pointed the way in which this potential capacity could be put to good use. Furthermore, the internal conditions in Germany were unhealthy and if left in that condition could result in communist domination of the entire area. In short, we realized that regardless of whether a treaty settlement of Germany was achieved or not some degree of industrial revival was essential to European recovery and world trade on which Canada largely subsists. It was also obvious that if Germany was to be denied to communism its internal economic and political stability must be secured.

3. The Soviet Union, however, had shown every indication that it did not intend to permit a settlement of these problems either in the short run by a four-power agreement or in the long run by a formal peace settlement. Enormous difficulties confronted the Western Powers if they were to attempt to solve these problems for their zones of occupation without a peace settlement. The U.S.S.R. could not be permanently excluded by any arrangements they made. The French and other European neighbours of Germany were justifiably afraid of a German industrial revival which would include an increase in its war-making capability. These limitations had to be reconciled with the necessity of the United States and United Kingdom to get rid of their heavy financial burdens resulting from German industrial paralysis. Moreover, if Western Germany was to be saved from communism their desperately low standards of living had to be raised. To meet this situation the Western Powers had to reconcile wide differences of opinion among themselves and produce a solution which would not provoke the U.S.S.R. unduly. Considering the complexity of the problem we felt that to insist on a full part in the negotiations for Canada would invite similar requests from other countries and make agreement even more difficult.

4. Western talks on these problems began in London in February, 1948. From a list of these agreements you will note that they cover all the important provisions that would appear in a formal peace treaty.

(a) Report of the London Conference of June 7, 1948, which sketched the general intentions of the Western Powers, the details of which follow.

(b) International Statute for the Establishment of an International Authority for the Ruhr, announced December 28, 1948. The member states of the Authority are the United Kingdom, United States, France, Benelux States and eventually Germany.

(c) Directive establishing a Military Security Board, announced January 17, 1949, now organized as a subordinate agency of the Military Governors. It will presumably continue to function after the High Commission has been established.

(d) Frontier Revisions, announced March 26, 1949. These were minor; not all were accepted by the receiving states.

(e) Occupation Statute, announced April 8, 1949. This imposed some legal restrictions on the competence of the West German government.

(f) Agreement on German Reparations Programme (dismantling), announced April 13, 1949.

(g) Agreement concerning prohibited and limited industries (level of industry), announced April 13, 1949.

(h) Tripartite Controls Agreement, announced April 25, 1949. This set out the manner in which the powers reserved under the Occupation Statute would be exercised.

(i) Interpretative memorandum on the principles governing the exercise of occupation power, not made public.

(j) Agreed minute on the settlement of financial claims against Germany, not made public.

(k) Agreed minute on Wurttemberg-Baden Plebiscite, announced April 25, 1949. This provides for a re-examination of Land boundaries.

(l) Agreement regarding Port of Kehl, announced April 25, 1949. This gave the French a special status in the port, across the Rhine from Strasbourg.

In addition to the above, the United Kingdom and United States on November 10, 1948, promulgated Law No. 75 which provided for the re-organization of Ruhr steel and coal resources, the ownership of which was vested in German trustees pending decision by a German government on ultimate ownership.

5. As things stand now, Western Germany is about to be constituted as a state and, subject to some initial limitations on their sovereignty, the Germans are about to assume increasing responsibility for their own affairs. This process has already begun. We are informed that responsibility for the purchase of imports has been handed over from the tripartite Joint Export Import Agency to a German organization. This means that Canadian interests in Western Germany will, to an increasing extent, become the subject of direct negotiation and discussion with the new political regime.

6. We can see now that the recent meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers had only a slim chance of preparing a peace settlement or even of re-uniting Germany. The main results have been so far as Germany is concerned, first, an arrangement whereby trade between Eastern and Western Germany may become possible and, second, a written guarantee by the U.S.S.R. of communication between the Western zones and Berlin. While we would applaud both of these accomplishments for what they may contribute to the stability of Europe, they do not materially affect the London programme. There will be a democratic West German state and Eastern Germany will remain under Soviet domination, for all practical purposes a separate, unknown, and inaccessible country. An East-West modus vivendi is now possible; German unity remains to come. The chances of another Council of Foreign Ministers meeting are slight. The United States State Department's idea seems to be to consign future dealings to a permanent or semi-permanent Committee of Deputies.

7. We must now consider Canada's relations with the new West German state. Our basic policy toward Western Germany will, of course, contain features of our original policy toward all of Germany. We shall continue to oppose German rearmament and exert such influence as we can to discourage a revival of aggressive nationalism or the advent to power of the communists. In all other respects we must think in terms of normal relations with a normal country. That is to say, we want Western Germany to be friendly to ourselves and to our friends.

8. The special features of our relations with Germany, the vanquished enemy, need not be emphasized. They include occupation policy, the disposition of military forces, and measures to ensure continued demilitarization and disarmament. These matters have been covered by the London programme and we would expect to be consulted on any change contemplated for them, both as a former belligerent and as a signatory of the Atlantic Pact which extends its protection to German territory so long as the occupation lasts.

9. We are now faced with the task of establishing normal relations with the new German state. These involve for us the problem of export and import arrangements, commercial and financial relationships, diplomatic exchanges, immigration, cultural exchanges including exchange of students, radio programmes etc. and the exchange of technical information. Within the limitations of our basic policy on disarmament and demilitarization, we must also examine what arrangements can be made with Western Germany for collective self-defence.

10. You will see that the "German problem" had radically changed in character during the last four years. Western Germany, at any rate, is no longer an object on which we express opinions for its future—that has largely been decided. Instead it is rapidly becoming a state with which we must deal directly. This removes our policy on Germany from the field of velleities⁶ and aspirations to one of negotiation and practice.

[Ottawa], July 22, 1949

POLICY REGARDING THE WEST GERMAN STATE

On August 14, elections will be held in the Western zones of Germany to bring into existence a German government for the Federal Republic of Germany. Having in mind the declared intention of the western occupying powers to endow German governmental organs with increasing responsibility for German affairs, it might be useful to consider what course the Government may wish to follow in the light of the new situation.

2. The new German government will be composed of two elements; the occupation powers speaking through the Allied High Commission, and the German bicameral parliament to be elected.

3. The High Commission will be concerned with ensuring the peaceful and, so far as it can, democratic nature of the German Federation. Although almost every aspect of Western Germany's foreign relations is made the responsibility of the High Commission, it can be assumed that the High Commission will exercise this power only so far as "the purposes of the occupation" may be affected. For these "purposes" we shall have to deal with the High Commission. But the very existence of a German government, even if the three powers did not intend to confer increasing authority upon it, would suggest that we must take German influence into account. In the normal conduct of business the German voice will increasingly predominate and we shall have to deal with it in much the same way as we would deal with the responsible authorities of any other country of similar size and importance. It may be relevant to note here that German industrial production is already over 90 percent of its 1936 rate and its monthly foreign trade is about $235,000,000 in value.

Economic Interests

4. Our exports to Germany in the first quarter of 1949 were appreciable ($7,045,764) and greatly exceeded our imports ($1,311,970). Although we have a Most-Favoured-Nation Trade Agreement with Western Germany, our exporters have had some difficulty selling there because the Joint Export-Import Agency, which controls Western Germany's foreign trade, restricts imports from countries which have not entered into bilateral trade agreements with the Agency. We have also been unable to obtain certain desirable imports from Germany because they were committed by the Agency in bilateral agreements with other countries. A memorandum, setting forth the difficulties we have encountered in our trade relations with Western Germany, has been transmitted to the State Department in Washington, since the United States has the predominant voice in the policies of the Joint Export-Import Agency.⁷ The Agency shows a preference for bilateral balancing of trade with individual countries, and has tried to induce Canada to enter into a bilateral trade agreement. In the absence of such an agreement it will not be easy to maintain our present rate of exports to Western Germany, particularly after the end of E.R.P., unless we can increase our imports from Germany. The Germans want to send a trade representative to Canada and to have their businessmen come here to survey the Canadian market. The need for early development of Canadian markets for German goods is becoming increasingly important.

Footnote in original document:

"A low degree of volition, not prompting to action".

Cultural Relations

5. We have generally approved the idea of the integration of Western Germany with Western Europe and it would seem sensible for us to foster cultural relations which might assist in giving the Germans a pro-Western outlook. The virtual exclusion from Canada of German students, observers and speakers conflicts with our desire to encourage this pro-Western outlook. Both the United Kingdom and the United States have relaxed their legal barriers against the entry of German visitors and have been encouraging and sponsoring cultural exchanges.

6. The exclusion of German nationals wishing to migrate to Canada has dampened German interest in this country and has given rise to protests by some German elements in this country. The objection to our present policy is not that Canada is failing to do its share to relieve the present over-population of the Western zones, but that the Germans are now the only people who are excluded because they were enemies in the last war. The prohibition against their entry into Canada has the incidental result that it restricts the distribution of information about Canada to the Germans, many of whom enquire about this country because they are interested in coming here.⁸ To prevent Germans from being encouraged to hope for something we know to be legally impossible, it has been necessary for us to observe extreme caution in C.B.C.I.S. programmes and in the use of other informational media (films, publications, etc.).

Political and Strategic Interests

7. Politically and militarily, Germany will continue to be of great interest to us. As long as the occupation lasts, the North Atlantic Treaty extends its protection to Western Germany. As long as the division of Germany lasts, Germany will be an important area for the observation of East-West relations and communist tactics.

Any degree of recognition given by non-occupying Western Powers would tend to enhance the prestige of the West German state and perhaps increase its attraction for Eastern Germans. The question of German unity is bound for some time to be a sore one and it is clearly in our interest that a Western Germany with a pro-Western outlook should be a rallying point for the German people, not only because of its economic strength, but because of its moral leadership and the fact that its reasonable aspirations are recognized. Our formal attitude toward Germany as an enemy state is beginning to place us in an anomalous position. From the point of view of daily intercourse this can do us no good. From a political point of view it runs counter to our desire to see Germany take its proper place among democratic countries.

Recommendations

8. Establishment of Political and Economic Relations—Under Article VIII of the Charter of the Allied High Commission, governments of “especially interested” non-occupying powers “will be invited to appoint missions to the Council of the High Commission having access, by procedures to be determined, to its subordinate bodies and to the German government”. When a German government assumes office, it is submitted that we should accord some form of recognition to the new regime. While it would, of course, be premature to recognize the West German State as a sovereign state, or its government as a fully independent government, either de facto or de jure, Canada’s recognition of the new situation might take the form of appointing political and commercial representatives to the Allied High Commission in Western Germany and receiving in Canada German political or commercial representatives appointed by the High Commission⁹.

9. Functions of a Mission in Western Germany—Apart from the strictly commercial functions of which it would be the centre, a Canadian mission at the seat of the West German government would be required to keep closely in touch with the many economic and political developments in Western Germany which can be anticipated. Particularly in the early stages there will almost certainly be a number of radical changes which will affect both political and economic relations with Germany’s Eastern and Western neighbours. The nature of these changes will affect many of our commercial, political and strategic interests in Europe. This mission should therefore be in a position to report on new German policies as they appear and to keep us informed of their bearing upon Canadian interests in Europe.¹⁰

10. Future of our Existing Missions in Germany—Political and psychological considerations might oblige us to keep the Berlin Military Mission open.¹¹ Even with a drastically reduced staff, however, it could still produce useful reports of political, economic and military interest. This Berlin office as well as the present consulate at Frankfurt would, of course, be responsible to the Head of the Mission accredited to the High Commission.

11. Entry of German Nationals to Canada—A necessary part of establishing more normal relations with Western Germany would be to restore freedom of movement between Germany and Canada. It is therefore recommended that as a concomitant to establishing relations with the new regime the government might consider removing or modifying the present bars which prevent Germans from entering Canada as immigrants or non-immigrants. This could be done by the revocation or modification of Order-in-Council P.C. 1373 of April 9, 1946 insofar as German nationals are concerned. This would do no more than put German nationals in the same position as the nationals of ex-enemy states with which peace treaties have been concluded.¹²

[Ottawa], December 13, 1949

In a letter dated November 30,† the United Kingdom High Commissioner enclosed telegram Y.No.461 dated November 29, 1949† from the Commonwealth Relations Office outlining the proposals being considered by the Western Occupying Powers to terminate the state of war with Germany, and asking for our views. A copy of that communication has been sent to you.

2. As early as April 1948 we made our views known to the three Occupying Powers that we regarded the measures then being taken in Western Germany as something close to a peace settlement, but the Western Powers have consistently resisted this inference. Accordingly they now propose as another ad hoc arrangement, to "terminate the state of war" which they attempt to differentiate from the conclusion of a peace.

3. In accordance with our position, we do not regard this step as a isolated action but as the concluding part of a peace settlement. If it is taken we shall no longer be in a position to offer any views or to influence subsequent developments in Germany in line with the policy announced by the Canadian Government in January 1947.

4. In the attached memorandum we have recognized, what I think, are the realities of the situation. If war is terminated it is difficult to imagine under what circumstances a peace conference would be called unless the Soviet Union accepted this settlement.

¹² Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree LB P[earson]

5. Secondly, we suggest that we are justified in ending the state of war in this way because Soviet obstruction leaves no alternative. Finally, we suggest that the independent termination of the state of war should be described as interim and subject to Four Power approval should a formal peace treaty become possible. This is the line usually taken in other announcements of Western decisions on Germany.

If you agree I propose that we inform the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, the Netherlands and Belgium of our views.

[Ottawa], December 13, 1949

TERMINATION OF THE STATE OF WAR WITH GERMANY

1. Between December 1947 and February 1948 the Occupying Powers decided they could not afford to let the U.S.S.R. obstruct a German settlement any longer. Between February 1948 and November 1949 they decided upon and brought into effect in the three Western Zones a number of measures which, taken together, have all the essentials normally found in a peace treaty. These decisions were based on the general survey made in the London Report of June 1948 but they were taken at different times and reached through different procedures by bodies differently composed.

2. With the establishment of a German Government on September 21, 1949, the objectives set by the London Report had all been achieved. The tripartite meetings in Paris in November 1949 and the subsequent protocol of November 24 began a phase in which for the first time the Three Powers negotiated with the Germans. This was the first document on which allied and enemy signatures had appeared together since the surrender. In signing it the Germans took cognizance of arrangements on which they were not otherwise consulted and which they had not hitherto acknowledged viz., the International Ruhr Authority and the Military Security Board. On this occasion too the Germans obtained a modification of the terms imposed earlier by the Allied Powers, such as dismantling. Provision was also made for German consular representation abroad and for membership in international bodies. The clear analogy between the signing of the protocol and the signing of the final instrument of a peace treaty was inescapable.

3. Although the various points of the settlement are closely related it is as a whole more flexible than the traditional peace treaty would be. Indeed the conclusion by the Occupying Powers of agreements which are interdependent and yet capable of standing by themselves is, in effect, remarkably like the International Statute proposed by Canada in its submission of January 30, 1947.

4. It should also be noted that the settlement is susceptible of change and there will almost certainly be further modifications in it. In fact modifications are specifically provided for in the Occupation Statute, which establishes the relations between the German State and the Occupying Authority.

5. There remains only one outstanding question: the termination of the state of war. We have been asked by the United Kingdom to submit our views on whether or not we think this step should be taken and, if so, how.

Canadian Policy

6. The Government was kept generally well informed both of the broad policy as discussed in London and of each detailed agreement as it was reached. We were not happy about the arrangements which did not permit other interested belligerents to express their views. Mr. St. Laurent on May 5, 1948 told the House of Commons that the Government recognized the difficulties of the situation and did not wish to create more by insisting on participation. At the same time it would continue to seek an adequate part in the negotiation of a formal treaty. We communicated our views unofficially to the participating powers on the following subjects: the future political organization of Germany; the role of Germany in European and world economies; property claims in Germany; and the Ruhr Authority.

7. In August 1949 the Government agreed that Canada should extend some form of recognition to the new régime in the Federal Republic of Germany and that we should take steps to bring relations with the Federal Republic to something like normal. It was agreed that we should accept an unofficial trade agent in Canada and that the interpretation of our exclusive immigration regulations should be modified to admit certain categories of Germans.

8. In general, the Government has supported efforts to bring the Federal Republic into the democratic community and has encouraged relations which would further our commercial interests in Germany.

Termination of the State of War

9. The next logical step in the western programme would appear to be to end the legal state of war.

10. In effect, Canada is being asked to adhere to the de facto German settlement and we should consider how this bears on our policy.

11. As a signatory of United Nations Declaration of January 1, 1942, Canada obliged itself "to co-operate with the Governments signatory hereto and not to make a separate armistice or peace with the enemies".

12. In an effort to be legally correct, the United Kingdom argues that a declaration terminating the state of war is not the same as a formal treaty of peace. But the difficulty cannot be overcome by a change of phrase. A legal argument for making peace or terminating war is that signatories of United Nations Declaration were only bound not to sue for peace while others were still fighting. Otherwise El Salvador, a signatory to the Declaration could, on the strength of that document, continue the state of war indefinitely by refusing to agree to an armistice or a peace.

13. It has also been pointed out that if we distinguish between terminating war and making peace we must suppose that there is an intermediate legal status between war and peace.

14. In our view the decisive argument is not primarily legal. Independent termination of war with Germany is justified by Russian intransigence, just as the previous steps in the total settlement were justified.

15. The United Kingdom has proposed that the termination of the state of war should apply to all of Germany and not only to the Federal Republic. For political and administrative reasons this would be most suitable and it would avoid the necessity of distinguishing between the enemy and non-enemy Germans.

16. It has further been suggested that the procedure followed in ending the state of war with Austria might be applied to Germany. The stand taken by Canada in that instance was that this country was never at war with an entity called Austria, whereas we were at war with Germany.

17. To end the state of war by executive action might raise a serious constitutional problem for Canada. The declaration of war was proclaimed in Canada by the King after Parliament had been consulted. In the past the termination of a state of war has always been debated in Parliament before ratification and while the royal prerogative could be used it would have no precedent and might prove particularly controversial where the country concerned is Germany. It would therefore seem preferable to follow the same procedure used for the declaration of war against Germany and have a proclamation issued after Parliament had debated the question. Moreover Parliament might expect an explanation for an action which will prevent the Government from implementing the policy toward the German settlement which it announced to Parliament on January 30, 1947 and in May 1948.

18. (The constitutional obligations of the United States Government would probably be more rigid. Unless it is able to defend in court the distinction between terminating a war and concluding a peace it will have to obtain a two-thirds vote of the Senate. A debate in the United States Senate preceding the termination of war by the United States might provoke a demand for a similar procedure in Canada.)

In summary, it is our view that:

(a) We should accept the expression and the idea of a "termination of the state of war" without attempting to distinguish it from the conclusion of a peace.

(b) We should make it clear that the arrangement is interim in character but that it will last until a final settlement with Soviet participation becomes possible.

19. Throughout this paper it has been a fundamental assumption that a virtual peace settlement has been in train since the spring of 1948 and that the termination of the state of war will give effect to one of the legal consequences of a normal peace settlement.

20. The individual Acts of the settlement up to date appear in the aggregate strikingly similar to the International Statute described in the Canadian submission of January 30, 1947. Arranged below in the form of a Statute are the items of the settlement on the left and the gist of each article on the right.

Preamble

The London Report June 7, 1948 — Statement of Principles, Purposes and Procedures.

Article I

International Statute for the Establishment of an International Ruhr Authority announced December 28, 1948. — Control of the Ruhr Coal, Coke and Steel resources.

Article II

Directive Establishing the Military Security Board announced January 17, 1949. — Controlling and supervising German armament and militarization.

Article III

Frontier Revisions announced March 26, 1949. — Making minor and interim adjustments to Germany's Western frontiers.

Article IV

Occupation Statute announced April 8, 1949 — Defining the relative fields of governmental activity as between the occupying powers and German Governments in the three Western Zones.
Basic Law, approved by Occupying Powers—May 12, 1949

Article V

Agreement on German Reparations Programme (dismantling) announced April 13, 1949 (Revised at Petersburg) November 24, 1949) — Reducing dismantling plans previously agreed upon.

Article VI

Agreement concerning prohibited and limited industries announced April 13, 1949 (amended at Petersburg November 24, 1949) — Laying down the level of industry and the types of industrial scientific activity to be permitted.

Article VII

Tripartite Controls Agreement announced April 25, 1949 — Setting out the manner in which Occupation Powers (see Article IV) will be exercised.
also a secret interpretive memorandum — giving the principles governing the exercise of Occupation authority.

Article VIII

- Agreed secret minute on the settlement of financial claims against Germany — This was implemented in co-ordinated military government laws dealing with claims. Also under this article there should be mentioned numerous laws, — now co-ordinated dealing with restitution of property and war damage claims.

Article IX

- Agreement regarding the Port of Kehl announced April 25, 1949 — Giving France a special status in this city, across the Rhine from Strasbourg.

Article X

- Charter of the Allied High Commission agreed June 16, 1949 — Giving the organization and responsibilities of various occupation bodies.

Article XI

- Law 75—U.K. and U.S. Zones — Providing for decentralization and reorganization of German heavy industry under coal and steel boards.

Article XII

- Various four, three and two-power decisions from Potsdam to the present which have been continued in force. — Decartellization, denazification, war criminals, democratization

Article XIII

- Current Legislation by High Commission—September 21, 1949 to present. — Control of the Press, handing over of powers to German Government.

Article XIV

- Petersburg Protocol November 24, 1949 — 1. Amending previous reparations agreements.
 2. Permitting an increase of shipping.
 3. Providing for German membership in international organization.
 4. Providing for German membership in the Ruhr Authority and co-operation with the Military Security Board.
 5. Enabling German consular and commercial representatives to travel abroad.

6. Affirming the German Government's acceptance of democratic principles and binding it to take measures to combat authoritarianism.
7. Affirming the German Government's acceptance of responsibility for legislation on cartels and monopolies agreed by the four powers.

VISIT OF COUNT SFORZA

While the Italian Foreign Minister will probably wish to confine the conversation to a general discussion of the international situation, it is possible that he may raise one or two specific points, and there are also a few questions which it might be useful for you to take up with him.¹³

1. Italian Immigration to Canada:

Count Sforza may very well raise this question to which, of course, the Italians attach a great deal of importance. The Italians originally suggested that we might be willing to take skilled agriculturists and their families if they could be provided with $2,000 per family from E.C.A. This was turned down by the latter organiza-

¹³ Le ministère des Affaires extérieures a tenté de déconseiller la visite de Sforza, tout particulièrement parce que St-Laurent et Pearson seraient préoccupés avec le Parlement et la visite d'autres dignitaires étrangers. De fait, Pearson fut élu président du Comité politique de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies, et était absent à Lake Success pendant la visite. Le comte Sforza fut à Ottawa les 23-24 septembre 1949. Le rapport subséquent consiste en des coupures de journaux, une copie de cette note et une copie de la lettre du ministre en Italie à St-Laurent (en date du 26 septembre 1949) à propos d'une visite privée avec Désy à Boucherville (Québec).

The Department of External Affairs had tried to discourage Count Sforza's visit, particularly because St. Laurent and Pearson would be preoccupied with Parliament and with visits of other foreign ministers. In fact, Pearson was elected Chairman of the Political Committee of the United Nations General Assembly, and was away at Lake Success during the visit. Count Sforza was in Ottawa on September 23-24, 1949. The subsequent report consisted of clippings, a copy of this memorandum and a copy of a letter from the Minister in Italy to St. Laurent (dated September 26, 1949) about a private visit with Désy to Boucherville, Québec.

tion and the point was then raised whether we would accept agricultural families on some other basis. Unfortunately the record of Italian farmers in the past in Canada has not been particularly good. Immigration has now offered to take some of these families on an experimental basis if they can produce $5,000. This is likely to prevent any families coming. The Italians regard emigration from Italy as one of the primary economic problems of the country and regard Canada as one of the natural outlets for their surplus population.

2. Visa Agreement with Italy:

The Canadian Charge d'Affaires in Rome has just been instructed to propose to the Italian Government that an agreement for the modification of visa requirements between the two countries be arranged. Visas for Canadian tourists and business men would be abolished, and we would grant visas gratis to Italian business men and tourists wishing to visit Canada for a period of up to a year. This is important in view of the number of Canadian visitors to Rome next year.

3. Trieste and Relations with Yugoslavia:

While Italy is not likely to adopt a line very different from that of the United States and the United Kingdom towards Tito, the Italians have a special interest in the maintenance of Yugoslav independence, and Count Sforza may be able to add to our information on the subject of the Tito-Cominform dispute. In particular it would be useful to have his views on developments in Albania and the danger of a general Balkan conflict arising if the Greeks should decide to chastise the Albanians.

Italian relations with Yugoslavia have recently been exacerbated by the persecution and eviction of Italians by the Yugoslav authorities in their zone of Trieste. The Italians were even contemplating protesting to the United Nations, but were dissuaded by the United Kingdom and the United States. Sforza might be asked if he thinks Italo-Yugoslav relations can become amicable in spite of such pin-pricks. He could also be asked if he thinks the incorporation of the Western portions of Trieste into Italy as anticipated in the Tripartite Declaration of March 20, 1948, would now be accepted by Tito.

4. Council of Europe:

The Italian delegates to the Council of Europe at Strasbourg played a very inconspicuous role, but there is no reason to believe the Italian Government is not a warm supporter of European co-operation. Count Sforza might be asked how he foresees this development in the political sphere; in particular what attitude he would take in connection with the admission of the Federal Republic of Germany to the Council.

Italy has occasionally been accused of regarding O.E.E.C. as primarily a source of United States aid, and of not pulling her weight in inter-European economic co-operation. Count Sforza might be sounded out on the Italian attitude towards this question, and the related problem of the Italo-French Customs Union.

5. Relations with Greece:

The conversation might begin by a reference to the agreement signed on August 31, between the two countries concerning war damage and compensation, and an indication of the pleasure felt here that Greece and Italy had decided to forget old grievances and co-operate for the common good. He might then be asked if he has any views on the question of associating Greece and/or Turkey with the Western Powers for the purpose of resisting Communist pressure. In particular he could be questioned about the "Mediterranean Pact" and asked if he has any recent information on this subject.

6. United Nations:

Any information concerning the Italian feeling at their continued exclusion from the United Nations would be useful. In particular, Count Sforza might be asked for his views on the Soviet proposal to accept en bloc all applicants for membership in the United Nations.

7. Settlement of War Claims and Release of Assets between Canada and Italy:

Attached is a brief note¹⁴ indicating that the negotiations are proceeding amicably and have reached an advanced stage at the official level. It is not considered necessary to raise this question with Count Sforza. This note is submitted in case Sforza should himself raise this subject.

8. Former Italian Colonies:

We were interested to read the text of Count Sforza's recent speech in the Senate, and particularly to note the emphasis he placed on the importance of co-operation between Italy and the United Kingdom in Africa. We have watched with gratification the growth of a greater degree of agreement between the two countries, and are sensible of the extent to which Count Sforza's own efforts have made this possible. We have been grateful to Italy's representatives in Ottawa for the promptness with which they have kept us informed of developments.

Since the position of Italy, France, the United States and the United Kingdom have now been stated, and since it will take a good deal of difficult negotiation to compose their remaining differences, it might perhaps be wise not to enter into any detailed discussion of the issues at stake during Count Sforza's visit to Ottawa, but to leave these for discussion at Lake Success where these issues will shortly come to a head. To ask Count Sforza to reiterate his statement of policy in Ottawa may only make it a little harder for him to adjust his policy to United Nations' requirements when the conferring in New York begins.

9. Canadian Representation in Italy:

The Canadian Government approved the establishment of Italian political representation in Ottawa in January 1946, and the first Italian political representative, Count di Cossato, arrived shortly afterwards.

Note for File

The Polish Minister, Mr. E.J. Milnikiel, accompanied by his Legal Adviser, called on the Department today by arrangement at 11:30 and was met by Mr. Hopkins and Mr. MacDermot in the office of the latter.

The Minister began by assuming that we were aware of the long and disagreeable difference between Canada and Poland over the Polish art treasures which were brought to Canada for safekeeping in 1940. He said that his Government regarded this question as one between two sovereign governments and in their view it was the responsibility of the Canadian Government to find a solution to it. The Polish Government did not intend to nor could it take cognizance of the internal constitutional system of this country. It was not possible, he said, for Canada to plead constitutional difficulties as an explanation of their failure to meet their international responsibilities. He knew that the bulk of the treasures were now in the hands of Premier Duplessis of Quebec but he felt that it was the duty of the Canadian Government to explain to M. Duplessis that the restoration of the treasures to Poland was a question of international law.

Mr. Hopkins asked the Minister if he had any way to suggest in which the Canadian Government could take action to this end. The Government had never accepted responsibility for the treasures and as the Minister knew had no jurisdiction over provincial matters of property and civil rights.

The Minister insisted that it was a matter for the Canadian Government to solve and then handed to me a note† for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in which he said that the whole position of the Polish Government was set out and which we would no doubt wish to study. Later on he hoped he would be able to call upon the Department again to discuss the note and on this basis the interview ended.

Ottawa, April 26, 1949

RE: POLISH TREASURES

I refer to my memorandum of April 21† in which I made some preliminary observations with respect to the Polish Note which was on that day handed to the Department. This memorandum deals with the problem more fully.¹⁵

2. The Polish authorities have renewed their demands that the treasures be handed over intact by the Canadian Government. They repeat their assertion that Canada is under an international legal obligation to do so, and reserve the right, if such action is not forthcoming, "to take all further steps in order to safeguard their rights and obtain a complete moral and material satisfaction". Mr. Katz-Suchy, of Poland, during the debate yesterday in the General Assembly on "international cooperation" reiterated the Polish charges.

3. The history of this matter, and a concise statement of the Canadian position to date, was given by Mr. St. Laurent, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the House of Commons on March 4, 1948. The extract from Hansard is annexed.†

4. The present position is that a portion of the treasure, consisting of 23 trunks and 1 box, has been received into the custody of the Government of Quebec and is being held at the Provincial Museum in Quebec City. They had been handed over to Mr. Duplessis by the Sisters of the Hôtel Dieu at the instance and request of the depositor, Mr. Babinski (one of the "former" Poles). According to a statement sworn by the Sisters, Mr. Duplessis accepted the treasures on condition that these articles would not be delivered up except with the consent of Babinski or in compliance with the order of a competent court.

5. A few boxes of the treasures, which had not been removed from the Experimental Farm, were taken to Poland by Dr. Bielski, former Polish Chargé d'affaires, on his return to that country in September last. Two boxes remain on deposit at the Bank of Montreal in Ottawa. Eight of the boxes, removed before May, 1946, from the Experimental Farm remain unaccounted for. The boxes now held by the Government of Quebec are the principal subject of the present Polish complaint.

[6]. There is no legal procedure whereby the Government of Canada could recover from the Government of Quebec the portion of the treasure now held in the Provincial Museum. The Government of Canada has, needless to say, no claim to the treasures in its own right, or on behalf of Poland, which it could assert in courts

¹⁵ Note marginale/Marginal note:

Mr. Claxton You may find this long—but the situation is complicated. My feeling is that there is no "great urgency"—that we sh[oul]d maintain our former position A H[eeney] of law. Moreover, the subject matter of the dispute appears to fall under the general heading of "property and civil rights within the province".

[7]. In these circumstances, the Government of Canada could hardly accept the position taken by the Polish Government; namely, that Canada is under an international legal obligation to restore the treasure. Canada has consistently denied, in Notes to the Polish Legation, that it has any legal responsibility in this regard. Although the Canadian authorities agreed in 1940 that the treasures might be stored in the Records Storage Building at the Experimental Farm, it was made perfectly clear that no responsibility would be accepted by the Government of Canada; and, in fact, access to the room in which the treasures were stored was given only to the two Polish representatives who had brought them to Canada, until May, 1946, by which time a large majority of the treasures had disappeared. The Legal Adviser has expressed the view that there is no authority in international law for the proposition that State A is under a "blanket" obligation to restore property claimed by State B which may be in the hands of third parties on the national territory of State A. Such a claim might arise if responsibility for the safekeeping of such property has been assumed expressly or impliedly by State A. However, Canada having expressly disclaimed any responsibility of the treasure is under no such legal obligation.

[8]. It remains to decide if the Note in reply to the Polish Note should simply reiterate the position thus far taken by Canada; namely, that, while we are sympathetic, we have done all we can, and that the Poles are free to avail themselves of the machinery of the appropriate Canadian courts. (The Department of Justice considers that, while in such a matter the Poles would of course have to procure their own legal advice, a legal remedy would be available to them in the Quebec courts if they can prove their title). A second alternative would appear to be to approach Mr. Duplessis, asking for the return of the treasures. A possible third alternative would be to use our good offices on behalf of the Poles and to forward to Mr. Duplessis a copy of the Polish Note explaining the international implications and inviting his suggestions as to what might be done to afford the Poles an opportunity of asserting their claim.

[9]. The following observations suggest that the Government should stand by its present position and not intervene further with Quebec.

(a) it seems probable that Mr. Duplessis would maintain the position that the courts must decide this matter and that, moreover, he would advertise an approach by the Government as a pro-Communist and anti-Church move;

(b) the Government's position would remain consistent;

(c) the Poles might seek to avail themselves of the courts (though they have had legal advice from Quebec lawyers and have been thus far unwilling to go to the courts).

[10]. The following observations suggest that an approach to the Government of Quebec would be useful.

(a) it would "quieten" the Poles for a period. They would almost certainly await the results of our enquiries before proceeding to take positive action, though their propaganda may be expected to continue.

(b) under the comity of nations, there is at least a moral obligation on Canada to do what is possible to assist the Poles to recover the treasures. It might indeed be difficult to explain, on any formal basis, why we refused to approach Quebec.

[11]. On balance, it is suggested that the Government might delay in replying to the Polish Note until the Polish insistence on a reply becomes irresistible, and that the reply might simply restate our present position.

[12]. You may wish to discuss this with your Cabinet colleagues. Should you wish an expansion or clarification of any of the points raised, I will arrange for the necessary supplementary memoranda to be sent forward.¹⁶

POLISH ART COLLECTION IN CANADA

The latest Polish note on the subject of the Polish Art Collection in Canada† was presented to the Department of External Affairs on April 20, 1949. An interim acknowledgement of this note was sent to the Polish Legation on April 23,† but no substantive reply has as yet been made.

2. The Polish Minister called on the Department of External Affairs on August 23, 1949, when he pressed for an early reply to his note of April 20. He was assured that a reply would be sent to him at the earliest possible opportunity.

3. A reply is now being prepared for my consideration. It will maintain the position that the Canadian Government has no responsibility for the Art Collection in any way, but will endeavour to reply to the juridical points raised in the Polish note. It is not expected, of course, that this will satisfy the Polish authorities, but it would be advisable to have the reply reach them, if possible, before the opening of the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations where they may make efforts to precipitate a debate on this question.

4. Meanwhile, as you know, the whole issue continues to be an unpleasant and embarrassing bone of contention between this country and Poland where every opportunity is seized to vilify and misrepresent Canada as negligent about its international obligations. I, therefore, suggest that consideration might be given to taking up the matter of the major portion of the collection, now held by the Province of Quebec, with Mr. Duplessis, and I attach a draft letter to him† for your consideration. You will note that while the main purpose of the letter is to invite Mr.

Should we not simply draw this to attention of Quebec and tell the Poles that? As Mr Pearson will be back Monday keep for him B[rooke] C[laxton]

Duplessis to give his views on what might be done to settle the dispute and dispose of the collection, it is also suggested that the whole matter might first of all be talked over on an official and confidential level so that we might explore the possibility of reaching a satisfactory conclusion.

5. If you are disposed to approve of this step, you may consider it preferable to omit the reference in the penultimate paragraph to the preservation of the collection and leave these points to be taken up in the preliminary conversations if these take place. The items in Quebec, however, have been stored there for nearly 18 months and unless they have been given proper attention may well be deteriorating.

6. I also attach for your consideration a summary of the record of the Polish Art Collection in Canada.†

TELEGRAM 6

Ottawa, September 21, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

My telegram No. 5 of September 21, Polish Art Collection in Canada.† Herewith the text of our note of September 20 to the Polish Legation. Begins: Excellency,

I have the honour to convey to you the views of the Canadian Government on the questions raised in your notes of April 20, 1949† and June 27, 1949† concerning the art collection brought to Canada from Poland in July 1940.

2. When the Polish art collection was brought to Canada in 1940, the Government of Canada, in response to a request from the Polish authorities, consented to make available to the Government of Poland facilities for the storage of this collection. In his letter of August 1, 1940, to Dr. Gustave Lanctôt, Dominion Archivist, Mr. Victor Podoski, then Consul-General for Poland in Canada, stated:

“It is understood that the articles in question will in no way involve the responsibility of the Canadian Government, since they have not been placed in its hands.

“On the contrary, it is the undersigned who, as the representative of the Polish Government, accepts full responsibility for the space which was placed at his entire disposal for the period during which the articles will be stored.

“I hope that this arrangement, which leaves a free hand to both parties concerned, will be agreeable to your Government....”

In his reply dated August 2, 1940, Dr. Lanctôt placed special emphasis on the responsibility assumed by the Polish Consul-General on behalf of his Government and stated:

"I take note of your declaration to the effect that the Polish Government assumes full responsibility for the period during which these articles will be in safekeeping. The Canadian Government agrees to this arrangement...."

3. This exchange of letters between the Polish Consul-General, who stated that he was acting "as the representative of the Polish Government", and the Dominion Archivist, constituted an intergovernmental arrangement which cannot be unilaterally repudiated.

4. The Government of Canada has at all times considered the terms of the above arrangement as governing its responsibility and liability in the matter of the Polish art collection. Any connection of the Canadian Government with the art collection was exclusively limited to making available, as a matter of courtesy, certain facilities, such as storage accommodation, to the Government of Poland. The Polish Government, on its part, insisted from the outset that the custody and control of the collection would at all times remain the responsibility of the Polish officials representing it in Canada. This responsibility was not at any subsequent stage denied by the Polish authorities, nor assumed by the Government of Canada. At no time, moreover, did the Polish Government suggest that the original arrangements should be altered, and at no time did it see fit to entrust the custody or control of these articles to the Canadian Government, which was neither given access to the collection nor provided with an itemized inventory at the time of the original deposit.

5. A comprehensive statement by Dr. Stanislaw Swierz-Zaleski, one of the original custodians of the collection, was submitted under cover of a Note from your Legation on November 20, 1946. According to this statement portions of the collection were removed from storage in the space provided by the Canadian Government, between March 2 and May 27, 1945, upon instructions of the representative of the former Polish Government. This was the Government which was recognized by Canada at that time. (The present Polish Government was, as you know, given unconditional recognition by Canada on July 6, 1945.) These items were removed, therefore, without the knowledge of or reference to the Government of Canada by representatives of the Polish Government who were acting in accordance with the arrangement reached between the two Governments.

6. In the light of these circumstances the Canadian Government cannot regard the juridical contentions set forth in your Note as applicable to this case. Under the terms of the arrangement agreed to in 1940 the Government of Canada did not assume, and was not considered by the Polish Government to have assumed, any responsibility for the custody, control or safekeeping of the art collection, and such responsibility cannot now be attributed to it.

7. At the same time the Government of Canada would remind the Polish authorities once again that they are at perfect liberty to institute legal proceedings in the courts of Canada for the purpose of effecting the recovery of the property in question. In the event that the Polish authorities should institute such proceedings I wish to assure you again that they may rely on the sympathetic attitude of the Canadian Government in respect of the restoration to Poland of any property which may belong to the Polish State.

8. Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

RE: POLISH ART COLLECTION IN CANADA

The Prime Minister has given consideration to your memorandum of September 16, and has asked me to let you know that his first reaction to the suggestion is that, before reaching any conclusion, we should have a careful memorandum from the appropriate officers in the Department, setting out their opinion as to the exact legal position in international law, to enable us to reach a conclusion as to whether there are any unfulfilled legal or moral obligations upon the Canadian Government; and also an opinion as to the political advantages, if any, which would accrue to Canada from taking any additional steps in this matter beyond reiterating the position that the Canadian courts are open to the Polish authorities who are free to institute their own proceedings for recovery at any time.

Mr. St. Laurent feels that, without such memoranda, it is difficult to reach a conclusion as to whether or not it would be advisable to take the risk of stirring up a political row in Canada.

He is also inclined to feel that, if the matter is to be raised, it would be preferable for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to raise it direct so as to minimize the risk of reviving what was at one time a personal controversy between the Premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister would, however, like to be kept informed of all developments in this matter.

Ottawa, Boston, October 17, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney:

I am indeed sorry that I was not able to report before now on the results of my "mission" to the Honourable Duplessis. I came back from leave only a few days ago and you certainly know through experience what this entails. As you are aware, Mr. Pearson paid us a visit in Boston on October 11 and 12 and, while he was here, I reported verbally to him.

The Premier of Quebec granted me an interview on Thursday, October 6 around 6.30 p.m., and I had a conversation of approximately 45 minutes with him. Although it was quite late, and notwithstanding the fact that several visitors had called on him during that afternoon, he was in good spirits and received me very cordially. After exchanging views on various subjects, I raised the question of the Polish treasures. As expected, Mr. Duplessis was not prepared to discuss the matter, but he listened attentively to my exposé. I explained to him that I had always been interested in Poland, in fact I visited that country several years ago, and one of his ministers, Dr. Marc Trudel, had intended to accompany me. Hence, the question of the Polish treasures was of great personal interest to me. I expressed the view that, as the whole affair was very annoying for obvious reasons, and might do more harm than expected, it might be possible to find a solution satisfactory to all concerned. Mr. Duplessis replied that, as he did not recognize the present Polish Government ("Je ne veux rien avoir à faire avec ces Communistes"), he saw no reason why he should "rendre compte" to the Polish State. Moreover, he had made his position clear in a recent public statement. The Court should decide as to the "bien-fondé" of the Polish Government's claim on these treasures. He added that, being faced with the question of deciding who is the real owner of these treasures, he is, personally, more inclined to accept the word of the Church than that of the Polish State. He added that, in doing so, he had in mind the future, and was not only concerned with the present situation in Poland. I then said that, in a way, the Canadian people as a whole were suffering from bad publicity as a consequence of statements published in the press in Poland and declarations made by the Polish delegates at Lake Success. Mr. Duplessis replied that he did not attach great importance to such propaganda and that he was aware that the Soviet embassies were already publishing, in their bulletins, derogatory articles on the policies of the Premier of Quebec. He seemed quite pleased that even Stalin attached some importance to the political activities of the Premier of Quebec. In view of the attitude taken by Mr. Duplessis, I did not think it would serve a useful purpose to continue the conversation on that subject.

I then told Mr. Duplessis that several people in Canada were concerned about the present condition of the Polish treasures because they require great care, and I enquired whether he would not be prepared to authorize an expert to investigate the matter and make a public report. Such a report would no doubt help to dissipate the bad publicity against Canadians. Mr. Duplessis stated that he could not accept such a suggestion because it would mean that he recognized some responsibility for damage which these treasures might suffer. He claimed that when he took the decision to have these treasures stored in the Museum of the Province of Quebec, he did so only to help the Nuns who had been given custody of these treasures by Polish officials. He said, for my personal information only, that experts acting on behalf of persons who are interested in the safekeeping of these treasures were taking adequate measures for their conservation. He added that he did not wish to be quoted on this. I gather from my conversation that the "persons interested" are former Polish diplomats.

To summarize, I am inclined to think that my visit to Mr. Duplessis was not useless. It established a contact which might prove useful in future, and it brought light on one important point: the conservation of the Polish treasures, even if the Department cannot use this information for a public statement. I do not think that it would be advisable to pursue the question, at the moment, of the ownership of the Polish treasures, with Mr. Duplessis, although I am convinced that further conversations might serve a useful purpose at a later date. No doubt, Mr. Duplessis is very much annoyed at the present policy of the Federal Government, with respect to the Amendments to the Constitution, and I would not be surprised that, if he could obtain some satisfaction, he would be prepared to modify his attitude on the question of Federal-Provincial relations, and then the time would be ripe to discuss the release of the Polish treasures. I have also good reason to believe that the question of responsibility for the care of the Polish treasures was never carefully studied by Mr. Duplessis and, after consultation with his legal advisers, he might be forced to admit that, in accordance with the Province of Quebec Civil Code, he has contracted a legal responsibility, being to a certain extent an administrator. If I hear anything on that development, I shall write you again.

Yours sincerely,

PAUL A. BEAULIEU

POLISH ART COLLECTION—CANADA

As requested by Mr. Pickersgill in his memorandum of September 22nd, I attach for your consideration a memorandum on Canada's position in international law with regard to the Polish art treasures.†

2. This opinion was written after an exhaustive review of the recognized authorities on international law and decisions of tribunals both national and international, none of which could be said to constitute a precedent for the extraordinary and quite unusual facts attending the bringing of the collection into Canada and its subsequent deposit in private and public hands.

3. The substance of our Legal Adviser's¹⁷ opinion is that at the present time:

(a) There is no unfulfilled obligation in international law resting upon the Canadian Government with respect to that portion of the collection which has not been impounded by the Premier of Quebec. It, therefore, follows that the Canadian Government has no obligation to recover and return to the Polish State this part of the collection;

(b) Canada has assumed an obligation in international law and is responsible to Poland with respect to that part of the collection which has been impounded in the Quebec Provincial Museum by the Premier of that province.

4. I also attach a shorter memorandum on the political considerations affecting the return of this collection.

POLISH ART COLLECTION—POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS

The failure of the Polish Government to obtain possession of the Art collection brought to this country in 1940 has led to many diplomatic exchanges between Canada and Poland. In addition, the Government of Poland, through the Polish press and by statements at various international conferences, have used this as a steady basis for violent propaganda against Canada. Their latest attempt to discredit

¹⁷ K.J. Burbridge, conseiller juridique par intérim/Acting Legal Adviser.

Canada at the Fourth Session of the United Nations General Assembly was answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a letter of November 14th† to the other Heads of Delegations to the United Nations, wherein he again denied that Canada had assumed any responsibility for the safekeeping of this collection. The Chairman of the Polish Delegation, on December 1st, replied in a letter† also circulated to other delegations to the United Nations, denying that the previous Canadian letter had satisfactorily answered the Polish charges, and stating that the proposal to resort to Canadian courts was “an actual refusal to solve the matter on the only possible basis of relations between the two Governments concerned”.

2. The Poles continue to profess to misunderstand our juridical system and to accuse Canada of not fulfilling its international obligations to Poland. They say that if a similar collection had been stored by another country, France for instance, it would have been returned long ago.

3. The Canadian Charge d’Affaires a.i. in Warsaw has stated “I am led to believe that friendly diplomatic relations (between Canada and Poland) almost stand on a satisfactory outcome of this problem which, if not of fundamental importance, is a natural psychological obsession here”.

4. There is a danger of controversy arising over the preservation of this collection. The Poles assert that it has not been given proper care. In a letter of October 17th to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Paul Beaulieu, Canadian Consul in Boston, reported an informal interview with Mr. Duplessis who said, inter alia, that experts acting on behalf of persons interested in the safe-keeping of the treasures were taking adequate care of them. This provides us with some assurance as to the care of the objects but it may involve other difficulties. Presumably the “interested persons” are the former Polish representatives. If this information reaches the present Polish Government we may be accused of giving tacit support to the former Polish officials and to the Premier of Quebec.

5. I realize that the matter involves serious difficulties from the point of view of public opinion here. But if some means could be found of bringing about the restoration of this collection to Poland, there is no doubt that a point of mischievous friction between our country and Poland would be removed.

FOR IMMEDIATE DESTRUCTION

Sir,

I refer to my despatches No. 851 of October 29¹⁸ and 911 of December 18[†] and to your despatches No. 485 of November 26,¹⁹ 593 of December 16,[†] and 16 of January 7[†] concerning the exchange of information with the Soviet Union.

2. In replying to my circular note of December 16 (a copy of which was attached to my despatch No. 911), a number of government departments asked whether the procedure which we suggested regarding the withholding of Canadian material until the Soviet authorities reciprocate, should also apply to requests for publicly available governmental material. We re-examined the problem in the light of that difficulty and suggested to government departments in notes dated February 26[†] that the following policy might be adopted.

3. All documents destined for the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa, for Soviet government departments, or for Soviet non-governmental organizations would be channelled through the Department of External Affairs, since it is desirable that we should keep under observation the various request which the Soviet authorities might make for government material so as to learn their interests and to keep track of the amount and type of material which they are receiving.

4. Documents which are not actually on any list of publicly available material (even though their subject-matter may be publicly available in other documents) would be withheld, pending reciprocation by the Soviet authorities.

¹⁹ Voir/See: Volume 14, Document 1094.

5. Documents which are publicly available would be transmitted by this Department to the Soviet authorities without any conditions being imposed, but would be accompanied by a request, whenever possible, for something in return. Thus, without "bargaining", we would at least make it clear to the Soviet authorities that we expected similar treatment.

6. This plan would not be effective if satellites of the Soviet Union were excluded. We suggested, therefore, that requests for material from Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and any other Communist states should be treated in the same way as requests from the U.S.S.R.

7. In line with this policy, we sent most government departments, under cover of a note, dated February 28, the list of Soviet periodicals which you forwarded to us with your despatch No. 593 of December 16, and requested the departments to inform us if there were any periodicals which they would like the Embassy to try to obtain.

8. I attach for your information a copy of my letters of February 26[†] and 28[†] to the President of the National Research Council, together with a copy of his letter of December 29 replying to our letter of December 16.²⁰ The notes to other government departments are, generally, on similar lines. Since it was agreed that the Department of National Defence would continue to deal directly with the Soviet Service Attachés (see our despatch No. 2 of January 5)[†], we notified that department of our revised policy for their information only. You will remember that we had decided (see paragraph 7 of our despatch No. 851) that the supply of "cultural" material (films, art exhibits, etc.) would be discontinued. We have left this policy open to amendment so far as cultural publications are concerned in view of our general policy of continuing to exchange information if we can ensure reciprocity. I do not think that we will at any time be able to organize satisfactorily an exchange of films or exhibits. Our policy in that field, therefore, will remain unchanged. I attach for your information a copy of our note of February 9 to the National Film Board.[†] I have also informed the Departments of Mines and Resources, Agriculture, Fisheries, and the National Research Council that the Soviet publications listed in your despatch No. 16 have been bought on their behalf and that the remaining publications ordered (listed in your despatch No. 593) have not yet been accepted. As usual, the expenses for these publications should be quoted in your account to 313-294 and shown as a charge against the department concerned.

9. We also requested the government departments concerned to give us a list of the publications which they are sending regularly to governmental or non-governmental organizations of the Soviet Union and its satellites. The list for the Soviet Union will be sent to you as soon as all replies have been received.

10. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics had sent us previously a list of the publications which were being transmitted to various Soviet agencies. I attach a copy of this list.[†] The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has been requested to transmit these publications through the Department of External Affairs in accordance with our note of February 26.

11. I also attach a list of the Soviet organizations† which are on the mailing list for the Canadian Geographical Journal. We do not intend to suggest to the Canadian Geographical Society that we should assist in the transmission of their journal but we will propose that they might wish to ask the Soviet agencies for some similar material in return in accordance with the policy dealt with in paragraph 9 of our despatch No. 851.

12. In your despatch No. 485 you raise a number of questions. The Information Division has noted your request (paragraph 5) for more contributions for the Britanski Soyuznik. The question in your paragraph 6 has been dealt with in our despatch No. 69 of February 11.† Sections (i), (ii) and (iii) of paragraph 8 are being dealt with in separate despatches.† No action should be taken with regard to the Canadian Weekly Bulletin (Section (iv) until the Soviet Government answers your note. With reference to Section (v), I refer you to circular document B.111 of June 18, 1948,† in which the allotment for books for the Embassy in Moscow is set at $200. Any purchases which you may make for the Embassy will be recovered, I trust, by this authorization. Any purchases made at the request of other government departments should be charged to suspense as mentioned in paragraph 8 above. For the present, at any rate, no publication should be bought for other government departments without their prior consent, with the exception of material for the Department of Mines and Resources (Mr. Matthews' letter of December 30th, 1948, refers).†

13. The subscriptions for Soviet periodicals which you have placed for the Embassy are approved.

14. I should be grateful for your comments on the policy dealt with in this despatch.

to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and Others*

[Ottawa], May 19, 1949

At a meeting held on April 7 to review the possibility of achieving reciprocity of publicity privileges between the Soviet Union and its satellites and Canada by circulating a Canadian Information Bulletin in the Communist States of Eastern Europe or by banning the use of the mails in Canada to publications of these States, it was decided to recommend that:

(a) it would not be administratively possible at the present time to circulate a Bulletin prepared especially for Eastern Europe and in the languages of the various East European States;

(b) it would not be desirable to ban foreign Communist publications from Canada at the present time;

(c) instead of circulating a Canadian foreign language bulletin, we should examine with the C.B.C. the possibility of starting broadcasts, possibly to the Ukraine or Yugoslavia to begin with.

2. It has been suggested that since we cannot prepare special bulletins for Eastern Europe in the appropriate foreign languages, we might circulate to individuals in the Communist States copies of our Departmental Monthly Bulletin in either English or French. Before this Division asks our Missions to comment on this proposal, it would seem desirable for the interested Divisions to come to some agreement on the course of action which the Department might follow. The following are some of the problems involved.

3. Is our aim to give publicity to the Canadian viewpoint on international affairs or is it to precipitate objections from the Communist governments to a Canadian bulletin and then ban their publications in Canada? If permission to circulate the Monthly Bulletin is refused, will we alter the position decided upon in paragraph 1 (b) above and ban the Communist publications here? If we are not prepared to do this and permission to circulate is not granted, we shall be in an embarrassing position with those Canadians who have urged us to ban foreign Communist publications.

4. If our aim is to do publicity work in Eastern Europe and permission to circulate the Monthly Bulletin is granted, the following factors arise.

(1) How many people in Eastern Europe will be able to read the Bulletin in English or French? Will it reach those groups who will be receptive to it or will it only be read by the Communist hierarchy?

(2) Will the Bulletin be circulated without hindrance or censorship? According to information from our Missions in Eastern Europe, a Canadian Bulletin will have to be submitted for censorship in the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and Poland and possibly also in Yugoslavia. Will we be prepared to submit if the Soviets censor, say, the following phrase from the Prime Minister's speech on the North Atlantic Treaty (Monthly Bulletin, April, 1949, Page 10): "This fateful march of events has made it unmistakably clear that the Soviet Union was a threat to peace and security..."? Obviously, we shall not be able to reprint the whole Monthly Bulletin because a sentence or phrase is censored. Will we then be prepared to see only certain issues of the Bulletin put on the market and others confiscated?

(3) Will the Bulletin be delivered to the recipients in time for the Bulletin to retain news value? The cost of sending the Bulletins by air would be prohibitive. The Bulletins containing, say, the May news (the June issue) are printed by approximately June 20. The copies are sent out to Missions by the first week of July. If sent by sea, they will arrive in Eastern Europe by the middle half of August. The May news will, therefore, reach the subscribers by or shortly before September 1.

(4) Is the subject matter of the Monthly Bulletins suitable in all cases for distribution in Eastern Europe? The Monthly Bulletins are not prepared with "psychological warfare" in mind. A Bulletin which will be read in Communist States must be prepared with a view to influencing the average man who is subject to Communist propaganda and it must contain nothing which may be used by the Communist governments in their own propaganda war. How, for example, will the common Soviet citizen interpret the following sentence (Monthly Bulletin, November, 1948, Page 5): "On June 19, in the House of Commons, Mr. St. Laurent said that the attitude of the Canadian Government on this matter (the North Atlantic Treaty) might justly be described as a 'crusade' "? Will he picture it, with the aid of Soviet propaganda, as an encirclement of the Soviet Union and as preparation for a crusade against it, or as a defensive alliance against the possibility of Soviet aggression? The same words may mean different things to minds conditioned by a different ideological climate. Furthermore, what action will we take if the following passage (April issue) is taken from its context and used against us: " 'We are prepared to work with all our might for the ostensible motives of the Pact', Mr. Low²¹ said, 'and we pray God that the ostensible motives are the real ones, but we are not prepared to work for any hidden designs of international plotters who may be concealed behind a smoke screen...' "? Will we be able to reply in the next issue of the Bulletin and will we be able to keep it up indefinitely? Will the Bulletin then be suitable for circulation in other countries?

5. The Department alone can decide what attitude to adopt towards all the above factors except item (1) paragraph 4 above on which the Missions may be able to express some views. If you agree, therefore, a meeting might be held to discuss this problem before the proposal is submitted to our Missions.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, June 1, 1949

Dear Mr. [N.A.] Robertson,

During the past year we have been concerned by the volume of official information which is going from Canada to countries dominated by the U.S.S.R. and to the Soviet Union itself.

There are, it seems to me, two aspects to this problem:

(a) The possible dangers from the point of view of security, and ²¹ Solon Low, M.P., chef du parti Crédit social/leader of the Social Credit Party.

(b) The fact that no attempt is being made to withhold information that we could give as a quid pro quo in exchange for information from the Soviet Union and her satellites.

In a series of circular documents to all Deputy Ministers, copies of which are attached,† my predecessors have requested other departments to send all exchanges of information with the Soviet Union and satellite countries through External Affairs. By acting as a post office, we hope to be able to form a more comprehensive estimate of the volume and nature of official information being sent to Communist countries and to be able, so to speak, to keep a box score on exchanges in both directions. This summary will undoubtedly show clearly that in some cases, our exchanges with these countries are very one-sided. Our next step would be to try to place these exchanges on a basis that would be more nearly reciprocal by making specific requests to Communist countries on behalf of Canadian departments and withholding until our requests were satisfied information which was not publicly available.

While I think our Department can cope with the problem of making exchanges more reciprocal, I question our competence in dealing with the security aspects of all these exchanges. I realize that the Soviet Embassy and other satellite missions are free to send whatever material they choose by means of the diplomatic bag, and I also appreciate the very limited control which can be exercised over publicly available official documents in a country where we do not censor the mails, but I do believe that it would be worth while giving more attention than the Department have been able to give to this problem. As you know, different departments have different interests and, to some extent, a different approach to problems of security. Thus, what might seem harmless enough to one department might, to another department, appear undesirable to send to the Soviet Union or its satellites.

I do not think that External Affairs should be placed in the position, as we are at present, of frequently being asked for advice on the desirability from a security point of view, of sending certain information to Communist countries. I am, therefore, wondering if we should not refer requests of this nature to the Secretary of the Security Panel whenever we are in any doubt. The Secretary of the Security Panel could then consult those members of the Panel who might be particularly interested, or, if the importance of the request warranted it, you could bring it before a meeting of the Panel. If this procedure were adopted, External Affairs would not find itself in the position of trying to express an opinion on the desirability of supplying large-scale maps to Poland or a new type of seed to Roumania—subjects on which, I think you will agree, we are hardly qualified to pass judgment.

I also believe that we should periodically bring to the attention of the Security Panel a compilation of material going forward from Government departments to Communist countries, and information received in return, so that all members of the Security Panel will be in a position to appreciate the extent of our current exchanges, and be able to question the desirability of continuing any particular category that may appear to be dangerous.

I should be grateful for your comments on these very tentative suggestions which, I realize, would place an additional burden on the Security Panel, although the greater part of the work would continue to be done by External Affairs.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], June 17, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeneey:

I have your letter of June 1st in which you have made certain suggestions for the more efficient control of information going via official channels from Canada to the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries. As this matter is of immediate interest to the Security Panel, I am glad to have this opportunity of discussing with you some of the more important aspects of the administrative problem.

I agree that any exchange of official information with the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries involves possible dangers from the point of view of security, and I certainly agree that every effort should be made to ensure that certain classes of information are only exchanged with these countries on a quid pro quo basis. This is indeed good policy.

The present practice whereby other departments route exchanges of information with the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries through External Affairs should make it possible for you to assess the volume and nature of such exchanges with reasonable accuracy, and certainly all departments should be encouraged to adhere to this practice. I feel also that it might be wise to authorise External Affairs to withhold information in certain cases, in the manner you suggest, in an endeavour to achieve a greater measure of reciprocity in exchanges of this kind.

Regarding the security aspect of the problem, the Security Panel might well act as an advisory body. This might involve some liaison arrangements between the Secretary of the Panel and the appropriate officials of External Affairs and other interested departments, and while requests of a more or less routine nature might be handled administratively with a minimum of delay, all cases considered to be of major importance might be brought before a meeting of the Panel.

If a compilation of material despatched to and received from the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries were supplied to the Security Panel at regular intervals, say monthly or quarterly as you suggest, it would be possible to keep all members informed as to the extent of such exchanges and also to determine the desirability of continuing to pass any particular category of information.

I foresee no great difficulty in implementing the proposed procedure insofar as the Security Panel is concerned, but as the question concerns other departments and as some procedural questions are apt to arise, I think it might be well to place this on the agenda for discussion at the next meeting of the Panel. As you will undoubtedly wish to be present when this matter is discussed, the Secretary will arrange the time and date to suit your convenience.

Yours sincerely,

EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES; U.S.S.S. AND SATELLITES

1. *Mr. Gill*²² referred to a letter received from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs stating that it was now desirable to consider an arrangement whereby the exchange of official information with the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries might result in a greater degree of reciprocity, and also to consider the necessity for more careful vetting of certain categories of information passed through official channels.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Panel document SP 44, dated July 25, 1949).†

2. Mr. Crean observed that at the present time the exchange of information with the U.S.S.R. and her satellites indicated that these countries were receiving a very one-sided proportion of the total exchange, and informed the Panel that much of the material involved was being sent forward automatically by the departments concerned. In External Affairs' view, a serious effort should now be made to restrict the flow of information that we might give as a quid pro quo in exchange for similar information from the Soviet Union and her satellites. Such a measure of control could be exercised by the Department of External Affairs, but it seemed desirable that his Department should not be placed in the position of judging the security value of specific items.

3. Colonel Anderson,²³ in discussing the quid pro quo aspect of the situation, suggested that interested departments be consulted in assessing the reciprocal value of information going forward to satellite countries.

4. Mr. Heeney commented on the compilation of items of official information passed to and received from the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries during the month of June, as prepared by his Department, and observed that this tabulation showed a most adverse balance insofar as Canada was concerned. Canada had sent official publications to ninety-seven addressees in satellite countries during the month of June, while material had been received from only two addressees in the same period.

5. The Panel noted that External Affairs was continuing the arrangement whereby official information despatched to the Soviet Union and her satellites by Canadian government departments is channelled through External Affairs, and also that the necessary steps would be taken to regulate this flow of information on a quid pro quo basis. It was also noted that External Affairs had undertaken to furnish the Panel with a monthly compilation of official information despatched to and received from the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries, which might be used as a guide to future action in the matter.

6. It was agreed, after discussion, that it would be appropriate for External Affairs to refer any items, the security value of which might be open to question, to the Secretary of the Panel who would then, in consultation with the Chairman, any other interested members, and the departments or agencies concerned, determine whether or not the information in question should be passed to European countries other than on a quid pro quo basis.

PUBLICATION OF MATERIAL REGARDING CONDITIONS IN COMMUNIST-DOMINATED COUNTRIES

It was decided in October that the Department should make available to the daily and periodical press, and to interested individuals, information regarding conditions in the U.S.S.R. and other communist-dominated countries. No decision was taken as to the means whereby such information might be made available to the press.

2. There is already in the Department a certain amount of material that can be utilized directly. This includes some articles and reference papers that have already been written; some despatches from our missions abroad that can be easily adapted to a form in which they can be utilized; articles that have been and are being prepared by the Research Division of the United Kingdom Foreign Office; usable translations of articles on Canada that appear in the Soviet press which the Embassy in Moscow has been requested to send to us; a Digest of Soviet news prepared in the United Kingdom Foreign Office, which might be distributed in its present form or easily adapted; and a Digest of the Soviet Press publication of which is to be begun, very soon, by the American Council of Learned Societies. Mr. [E.B.] Rogers is collecting and adapting material that might be utilized.

3. The Information Division has received a number of enquiries, apparently independent of one another, for information on the Soviet press and on conditions behind the "iron curtain", from members of the Press Gallery. The people concerned have been told of various sources, e.g., the British and American monitors' reports, the Tass hand-outs, certain English-language Soviet publications such as New Times, and the forthcoming Digest of the Soviet Press which is to be published by the American Council of Learned Societies.

4. Although the enquiries that have been received indicate that the press would be willing to accept some kinds of material, especially translations of articles on Canada that have been published in the Soviet press, the problem of obtaining publication of other material remains unsolved. There is a strong possibility that journalists might resent and resist any attempt by the Department to use them for the "planting" of propaganda articles in the press. It is therefore suggested that the whole problem be discussed frankly at a convenient time in the near future with a group of trusted journalists such as Gil Purcell, Grant Dexter, George Ferguson, Blair Fraser, Norman Smith, and others.

5. We could let them know the kind of material which we get on the Soviet Union, much of which, for censorship or for other reasons, is not available to the press in Canada. We could say that we feel that in times like this it is very important that the Canadian people be given as much reliable information as possible about what is actually going on in the Soviet Union. While some of the material which we receive could be used in speeches by Cabinet Ministers and in articles appearing in the Monthly Bulletin of the Department, much of it is not susceptible to this kind of treatment. We could then ask the newspapermen for advice on how they think the problem could best be dealt with.

6. Before the meeting takes place we will have available samples of various kinds of material which we have in our possession.

7. This is a matter not only of some importance but also of some delicacy and if you could possibly spare an evening for an informal discussion with the group of newspapermen I think it would be most useful.²⁴ Mr. Rae, Mr. Rogers, Mr. [B.A.] Wallis and Mr. Holmes might also be asked to come.

RE: PUBLICATION IN CANADA OF INFORMATION REGARDING CONDITIONS IN THE
U.S.S.R. AND SATELLITE COUNTRIES

Mr. Rogers recently discussed the question of the publication of information regarding the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries with Mr. Arthur Ford, of the London Free Press. Mr. Ford promised to raise the matter at a meeting of the executive of the Directors of the Canadian Press which was held in Toronto about the middle of February. As a result of Mr. Ford's discussion with his colleagues, the Canadian Press representative in Ottawa, Mr. Clyde Blackburn, has discussed the matter further with Mr. Rogers. The latter showed Mr. Blackburn the kind of material that could be made available, and Mr. Blackburn said that he would be glad to use some of it. He suggested that the material be sent to him in small quantities and that he be left free to use it as he thought fit. He undertook to keep the source of the information secret.

Mr. Blackburn said that he thought that the Canadian Press and the British United Press should be treated on an equal footing. The two agencies between them cover the entire field, and the correspondents of individual newspapers would have no case for objection if their papers were being supplied by one or both of the agencies.

May we discuss the matter with Mr. Norman McLeod of the British United Press and, if the outcome is satisfactory, proceed with the distribution of material to the two agencies?²⁵

The Montreal Standard has asked for and received copies of translations of articles on Canada that have appeared in the Soviet press in recent months. The Standard understands that no reference should be made to the source of the translations. The translations are in fact supplied by the Embassy in Moscow which has been instructed to forward translations of all significant references to Canada in the Soviet press. J[oint] P[ublications] R[esearch] S[ervice] translations are not compromised for the Embassy uses them only as a guide in preparing its own translations.

We have asked the Clerk of the House of Commons if he would be interested in participating in a subscription to The Current Digest of the Soviet Press for the Reading Room of the House of Commons. If he objects to the cost ($25.00) I think that the Department would be justified in paying for a subscription. If the cost is not prohibitive, I think that we might also arrange to have placed in the House of

In my memorandum of March 10, I told you of the discussions that Mr. Rogers had had with Mr. Arthur Ford, of the London Free Press, and Mr. Clyde Blackburn, of the Canadian Press. You will recall that Mr. Blackburn said that he thought that the Canadian Press and the British United Press should be treated on an equal footing. You authorized us to discuss the matter with Mr. Norman Macleod, of the BUP, and, if the outcome were satisfactory, to proceed with the distribution of material to the two agencies. We have not yet approached Mr. Macleod.

Mr. Blackburn's suggestion that the CP and the BUP be treated on an equal footing has been disavowed by his superiors in the Canadian Press. Mr. Blackburn has told Mr. Rogers that he has been instructed to say that the Canadian Press could not undertake to protect the secrecy of the source of the material if the British United Press were included in the scheme.

In the circumstances, may we start giving material to the Canadian Press on an experimental basis?²⁷

RE: PUBLICATION IN CANADA OF INFORMATION REGARDING CONDITIONS IN THE
U.S.S.R. AND SATELLITE COUNTRIES

You will recall that Mr. Rogers discussed this matter with the Canadian Press. The C.P. agreed to accept the material that you might give them, and to use it as they thought fit, but said that they could not undertake to protect the secrecy of the source of the material if the British United Press were included in the scheme.

Mr. Norman Macleod, Ottawa correspondent of the British United Press, has been approached and has said that he would be glad to receive the material on the understanding that:

- (a) he would not be under any obligation to use it;
- (b) he might use it in any way that he thought fit;
- (c) he would not indicate the source of the information, or allow it to be made known that the Department was making it available to him.

It was made plain to Mr. Macleod that any information given to him would be given to the Canadian Press simultaneously and subject to the same conditions.

Mr. Macleod pointed out that his agency would be very greatly embarrassed if the Department were ever to publicize the fact—for instance, in a Parliamentary Committee—that the British United Press was co-operating with it in the dissemination of information from behind the Iron Curtain.

Can we give Mr. Macleod an undertaking that the Department will never divulge the fact that it has been using the B.U.P. as a propaganda medium?

It is more to our interest to have the co-operation of the Canadian Press than that of the British United Press, since the C.P. has a wider coverage. Mr. Pearson has ruled, however, that we are not to give a monopoly to the Canadian Press. If you approve, we shall tell the Canadian Press that we are unable to give them the material exclusively, but that we shall nevertheless send them the material subject to the understanding that they will not divulge the source. The point made by the C.P. was that they could not be responsible for maintaining the secrecy of the source if the material were made available also to the B.U.P. I think that we should tell them that we shall give them the stuff simply on the understanding that they will not make known the source. In other words, we shall trust them.²⁸

U.S.S.R. AND SATELLITE COUNTRIES

You asked me to let you have further details of the types of information we have in mind to disseminate.

It is proposed to make the following kind of information available to the press:

(1) Translations of articles and news items on Canada appearing in the Soviet and satellite press. For nearly six months we have been receiving translations of everything on Canada appearing in the Soviet Press, and have made it available to the Montreal Standard, which asked for it. The Standard used some of this material some months ago. It has recently been given a new batch of material which it will doubtless use in the near future.

(2) Memoranda based on reports from our missions. An example is a memorandum on the Soviet Electoral System based on reports from our Embassy in Moscow.²⁹

(3) Memoranda prepared by the Information Research Department of the United Kingdom Foreign Office. These are carefully edited in order to conceal the fact that they were originally produced in the United Kingdom.

(4) Items from Digest. Digest is issued from time to time by the Information Research Department of the United Kingdom Foreign Office. For the most part it comprises small notes based on significant items gleaned from the press of the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries. We would abstract certain items and edit them if necessary.

(5) Memoranda which could easily be prepared in the Department drawing attention to inconsistencies in communist preaching and practice. It would have

RE: PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE

I attach a copy of the revised memorandum on psychological warfare, dated May 25,† which is to be considered by the Government War Book Committee, of which you are a member, on June 13.

The original memorandum on psychological warfare which I prepared was approved by Mr. Reid, then Acting Under-Secretary. The present revised memorandum was prepared after consultation with representatives of the Department of National Defence (Colonel W.A.B. Anderson, D.M.I.), the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (Mr. Dunton³³ and Mr. Dilworth), and the Privy Council Office (Mr. Gill).

The memorandum sets forth what is essentially a War Book plan, that is, a plan for the conduct of psychological warfare in the event of war. If an organization is established in time of peace to engage in psychological defence, it might take a form similar to that of the proposed wartime organization. Its very existence might require some alteration of the War Book plan, for it would be absurd to scrap a peacetime organization on the outbreak of war, if it were capable of adapting itself to war conditions.

The essentials of the plan are contained in paragraphs 9 to 14, inclusive. The main points are as follows:

(a) The Secretary of State for External Affairs would be the Minister responsible for the conduct of psychological warfare;

(b) There would be, in the Department of External Affairs, a Psychological Warfare Section headed by a senior officer who might be known as the Director of Psychological Warfare;

(c) There would be an Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Psychological Warfare whose functions would be to advise the Minister on general policy for psychological warfare, and on such other related matters as he might refer to it;

(d) The Minister might on occasion seek the advice of the Chiefs of Staff Committee on questions of military policy, and the latter might on its own initiative make recommendations.

Your attention is drawn to paragraph 12 which lists the members of the proposed Interdepartmental Advisory Committee. You will note that it is suggested that the membership include: the Directors of Intelligence of the three Armed Services, the Director of the Operational Research of the Defence Research Board, and the Director of the Joint Intelligence Bureau. This brings the total membership up to twelve.³⁴ The inclusion of five representatives of the Department of National Defence was at the insistence of the D.M.I., who, as spokesman for his Department, presumably had to protect his own position vis-à-vis his colleagues. You might consider endeavouring to obtain the assent of the War Book Committee to a reduction of the number of National Defence representatives to two, who might be designated by the Chiefs of Staff Committee. In the Psychological Warfare Committee of 1943-47, it was generally found that the Directors of Intelligence of the three Armed Services almost invariably had to seek higher authority for decisions. It would be desirable to have on the Committee one or two high-ranking officers who would be able to speak with a good deal of authority for their Department.

You will note in paragraph 15 that it is proposed to have officers designated by the Chiefs of Staff Committee seconded to External Affairs to work in the Psychological Warfare Section.

Canada House, London, and the Embassy in Washington have established relations with the people who are planning psychological warfare in the U.K. and the U.S. respectively. When our policy is finally approved, consideration might be given to my going to London and Washington to establish closer liaison.

If the Committee should wish to know what is being done now in the psychological warfare field, you might mention:

- (a) the CBC International Service;
- (b) the actions of our delegates to international conferences in exposing Soviet policies;
- (c) speeches in Canada by the Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson and others.

(As you are aware, we are precluded from making the best possible use of the CBC(IS) by the existence of a personnel problem which, we hope, will be overcome soon).

I shall be away from June 7 to June 12 attending the meetings of the Canadian Political Science Association in Halifax. I shall be back on the morning of the 13th, however, and shall send you a last minute memorandum if there should be any communications from other Departments bearing on the subject matter of this memorandum.

NOTES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE³⁵

Broadly speaking, there are three governmental elements directly interested: (1) Information. Here is the main contact with, and the point of view of, broadcasting organizations and press. This element represents the object of giving out news, as quickly and fully as is permitted. It may reasonably be concerned with morale, at home and abroad, but not with policy or security except as an agent; (2) Military has no direct interest in straight news. It is deeply involved in security. It may wish to use psychological war mechanism to: sap the morale of troops, create misleading impressions of movements, influence resistance forces in occupied territory; (3) Foreign policy side is concerned with war objectives and peace terms and in general with attitude toward allies, occupied countries and enemy.

2. At least in a democratic country no two of the above elements will be found completely within one department of government. Before considering the best administrative organization embracing all three elements, it is necessary to examine further their necessary concern with P.W. P.W. is a weapon of state that can be employed with or without armed conflict. In either connection it has a long history; and it is safe to say that it will never be wholly disused whenever one state wishes, by whatever means, to impose its will on the government or people of another. Canadians have been exposed to P.W. over a long period. Indians were accustomed to practice on the French, as they did on rival tribes, various forms of terrorism. The whole conception of hoo-doo could be, and was, directed toward lowering the morale of the white invaders. In the early part of the revolutionary war the insurgents attempted to sway the allegiance of the Canadians by pamphlets describing the advantage of American liberty as contrasted with the tyranny of British rule. To jump to a later example, during the controversy over the Oregon boundary the American cry of "54°40' or fight" was an attempt to frighten British North America into Acceptance of the American claim. A more recent instance of P.W. is the use of descriptive tactics as in the case of the C.S.U.

3. It may be taken, then, that P.W. is not new, not ephemeral, and not confined (unless it be in name) to periods of organized warfare. Its very diversity of method and application, however, complicates any identification of administrative responsibility. What is clear is that it can be permitted to operate only within the range of existing foreign policy. In peace or in war, therefore, it is the foreign office that must always be concerned, for P.W. is an instrument of national policy. In time of war, as has been suggested, the armed services have various essential interests in P.W. They must have a voice in decisions relating to propaganda that might help or hinder operations (friendly or foreign). They control the prisoners of war, who are a target for P.W., a source of intelligence and, under favourable conditions, a medium. They control other sources of intelligence that are necessary for P.W. They have major security interests. In peacetime the interest of the Services is minor in so far as the actual work of P.W. is concerned; but on the other hand they must even then be fully involved, partly because of the intelligence they can provide, and partly to take a hand in the planning of P.W. for war purposes.

The official information agencies stand in a somewhat different position. They have no responsibility for foreign policy and none for the planning or conduct of military operations. Under an authoritarian regime the situation is simple: the press and the radio voice official propaganda and that only. In a democratic country the radio may or may not be government-owned, but it will be severely criticized if it comes to be suspected of being partisan in domestic broadcasts. It can, however, be used (as in the Voice of America) for propaganda abroad. The press is in no case a medium of P.W., or at least only to a very minor extent. The information agencies could be regarded as no more than a mechanism for P.W. That, however, would assume that the foreign office and services between them could provide alternative experts on the art practised by the professional broadcaster and the professional journalist: for the link with the fourth estate is the information agency.

How to tie together these three necessary actors (any one of which is capable of behaving as a prima donna)? Experience in U.K. during the war illustrates the difficulties even better than the solutions. The foreign secretary and the minister of information were the responsible ministers, but no easy way was found of dividing or uniting their authority. The C[hiefs] O[f] S[taff] have been consulted at times and on a few occasions the Director appeared before the cabinet. In the U.S. the major jurisdictional battle took another form, i.e., between O[ffice of] W[ar] I[nformation] and O[ffice of] S[trategic] S[ervices], both of which claimed P.W. as their field.

A further complication is created by inter-allied P.W.

The details of the jurisdictional battles and the varied administrative changes are of little interest now. Certain lessons, however, stand out:

(1) Quick action is quite often necessary. This means that competent officials must be available for drafting, etc. It also means that authority for statements has to be secured rapidly.

(2) That authority will not always come from the same source, but will vary according to the subject.

(3) The staff of a P.W. organization may be civil or, better, part civil and part military. For work in a theatre of operations it must have a quasi-military character.

Canadian Psychological Warfare

It is unlikely that Canada will ever play a major part in P.W. Major political and military policy is likely to be decided by the U.K. and the U.S. and therefore the high-level decisions in P.W. will ordinarily not fall to Ottawa.

In the last war Canada was able to contribute to P.W. chiefly because of the prisoners of war held here. Organization was late in coming and defective in character; and no separate staff was created. Individuals in External Affairs and National Defence spent part of their time on P.W. Experiments in getting writing done by contract have been unsatisfactory. For these reasons the maximum value was not obtained from the use of the CBC short-wave when that was completed (and in spite of the technical efficiency of the mechanism).

Assuming the desirability of Canada taking some part in P.W., the following requirements, amongst others, appear to be necessary for wartime operations:

(1) A permanent staff. This may well be very small. It should be within the Department of External Affairs, but should include seconded Service personnel and possibly one or more journalists or other writers temporarily attached to the department. A total personnel of 8–12 should be sufficient.

(2) A committee to guide the above group. This has already been worked out in draft.

(3) Definite arrangements for policy decisions on such matters as require them. They should not be numerous.

(4) Arrangements for co-operation with U.K., U.S. and possibly other commonwealth or allied states. This would be best achieved by appointment of liaison officers.

Planning

The modern emphasis on propaganda in peacetime has changed in degree the distinction between its use under the two conditions. The concept of "cold war" is not a new one. Bismarck, for example, used it consciously and extensively toward France, particularly in the early seventies. It has now, however, markedly increased, partly because of its affinity to ideological differences, and partly because of the new means at its disposal. Unlike armed conflicts (but like economic warfare) P.W. is constantly being waged. The radio is its slave.

Planning for this type of warfare is, therefore, conducted while the battle is on. That should make it easier, since there is opportunity for experiments as well as for blue prints. It is not, it must be admitted, a battle which is being vigorously conducted by the Canadian authorities at the present time. Part of the planning should, therefore, be an examination of what is being done and what additional steps could be taken. With such analysis in mind, consideration of administrative machinery will be given immediate reality.

Attention may here be drawn to some of the principles of P.W. that are usually considered to be valid:

(1) White propaganda must not be factually inaccurate. Probably the most successful P.W. in the last war consisted of the BBC broadcasts to France, and they were largely made up of straight news.

(2) It is not wise to refute enemy propaganda, since this serves to draw attention to it.

(3) As far as possible the names or voices of emigres should not be used.

(4) A broadcast or pamphlet should be made in the light of the fullest and most up-to-date knowledge of the conditions of the listeners, e.g., it is useless to dangle the prospect of cheap food before an audience that already has it, or to distribute surrender leaflets to troops whose morale is unimpaired.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; CO-ORDINATION OF PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE

The other day the Minister said to me that he thought that early consideration should be given to means of co-ordinating the efforts of the North Atlantic Powers in the field of propaganda particularly in relation to shortwave broadcasts to the Iron Curtain countries.

2. Mr. Pearson feels that there is a great deal to be done in concerting allied activities in this sphere. We should consult upon the policies and programs which can be most effective in the cold war. We should examine tactics being followed by our representatives in the United Nations, possibly arrange for consultation between our delegations at United Nations Assemblies with a view to presenting a common front to the pressure of the Soviet bloc. Some of the procedures which have been worked out between Commonwealth countries, between Canada and the United States in such matters might be broadened so as to include the other North Atlantic countries.

3. The Minister would like to have this matter explored with representatives of other signatories to the Treaty with the object of having established some kind of planning machinery the object of which would be a concentration of effort.

4. Perhaps the best way to get this started would be to ask Wrong to seek in Washington the reaction of his diplomatic colleagues.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION AT THE VATICAN

Recently Mr. Pearson requested the Canadian Ambassador in Washington and the High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom for any observations they might have to make on the special value to the United States and to the United Kingdom of their representation at the Vatican. Their replies were contained in telegrams No. 610 of March 23 from London† and WA-35 of March 24 from Washington.†

2. Mr. Stone, the Canadian Minister in Washington, had confidential talks on this subject with members of the State Department who informed him that there is not very much useful information resulting from the present arrangement, under which Mr. Myron Taylor is the President's personal representative. Mr. Taylor spends little time at the Vatican and the diplomatic officer who now assists him is not too useful.

3. The State Department officials said, however, that the situation was much better during the war when Mr. Titman was Charge d'Affaires at the Vatican and Mr. Parsons his assistant. These men were both good in getting information not only from the Vatican sources but also from the other 41 missions there, and they were both good at explaining United States policy in various fields to the Vatican.

4. Last August Mr. Parsons prepared a memorandum making a very strong case for full United States representation at the Vatican based principally on the following points:

(a) The advantage of having access to information which is available from Vatican sources;

(b) Being in a position to have United States policy interpreted and explained to the Vatican. (The State Department says that explanations of policy which have been given to the Vatican authorities on such matters as Spain, E.R.P. and Germany have served useful purposes and borne fruit there.);

(c) The desirability of having Vatican representation because of its good effect on United States-Latin American relations;

(d) The fact that the Church has still much strength and is the principal if not indeed the only Western social organization still able to operate behind the "Iron Curtain";

(e) The advantages to be derived by continual contact with the representatives of 41 other countries at the Vatican who are not over-worked there, have time to talk and who, in many cases at present as in the past, have been men of high calibre with some influence in their own countries.

5. The State Department think that as long as they can continue the present arrangement of personal representation without criticism it is wise to do so. While the President has assured the representatives of the Protestant churches that the permanent maintenance of a diplomatic representative was not contemplated, there has been a noticeable decrease in the strength of the opposition in the United States to representation at the Vatican. Indeed, Mr. Hicker[son] of the State Department expressed the view that Mr. Dulles and some of the other lay leaders of the Protestant churches might even be coming around to the opinion that full diplomatic representation at the Vatican may be both desirable and necessary. While the President, for political reasons would not consider putting up to Congress any proposal for permanent diplomatic representation at the Vatican, it may be possible that the United States is moving slowly toward this and that this trend might be affected by whatever action is taken by Canada. An exchange of diplomatic representatives between the Vatican and the United States would not involve the nomination of a Papal Nuncio in Washington.

6. The State Department is interested in the Canadian views on this matter.

7. The Canadian High Commissioner in London reports that the Foreign Office found it rather difficult to give a satisfactory answer to his query. It considered the greatest value of United Kingdom representation at the Vatican was its ability to remain in Rome during the war. They find that much depends on the quality of the man they send there. Until now, they have sent older men who tended to vegetate there until retirement, but the present Minister, who is 51, has proved active and has been able to secure a good deal of information which they ordinarily might not have secured from their mission to the Quirinal. In particular, they find this representation useful in giving an insight into Catholic tactics vis-à-vis Communism.

8. The United Kingdom Legation has proved useful in arranging audiences with the Pope for prominent United Kingdom visitors and the Foreign Office are pleased with the answer to their request that the Pope use his influence to stay the execution of a Spanish Socialist condemned by Franco. The Pope agreed to the request and a reprieve was granted. The Foreign Office are pleased because they were under considerable pressure from the Labour Party to interfere but they realized a direct intervention in Madrid would be useless.

9. The High Commissioner concludes that while the practical value of representation at the Vatican is doubtful, a case should be made for such representation on prestige grounds. In fact, he thinks that, apart from any domestic considerations involved, we are rapidly acquiring a position in international affairs where we cannot afford to be without representation at the Vatican. If the Canadian representative is a man of culture, and young enough to possess initiative and energy, he should be able from time to time to send reports which would be valuable as representing another but well-informed view of developments in international affairs.

CHINA SITUATION

The military position of the National Government of China continues to deteriorate rapidly. The large North China industrial centre of Tientsin fell on January 15 and Peiping is expected to be surrendered in a matter of days. This will permit Communist troops from the Manchuria and the North China front to move South to reinforce those attacking in the Nanking-Shanghai area. Already the Nationalists have lost a large number of troops surrounded, captured, or killed in the pockets South of Hsuechow. The last major Government bastion at Pengpu on the Hwai river line one hundred miles North of Nanking was given up two days ago. The remaining Nationalist troops are being drawn back for a defence of the Yangtze river line supported by the Chinese Navy. It is difficult to say how long the Yangtze river line could be held. Chinese, whose morale is one of the key factors, are not optimistic.

2. In the face of these disheartening military set-backs, the National Government is both preparing to withdraw from Nanking to the South and concurrently putting out peace feelers. In his New Year's broadcast the Generalissimo made his first public peace overture. Since that date, these have been echoed by numerous public bodies in Nationalist territory. On January 8, the Chinese Government presented an aide-mémoire in identical terms to the United States, French, Soviet and United Kingdom Ambassadors in Nanking, indicating that the Chinese Government would welcome any suggestions leading to an early restoration of peace. After consultation the three Western Powers have returned replies informing the Chinese in effect that they see nothing that they could constructively do at this time by intervening. The Soviet Government has also replied negatively. The question of peace negotiations is, therefore, left entirely to the Chinese. The Communists have broadcast terms for a truce and the resumption of political negotiations which provide for the removal of Chiang Kai-shek, and many of his immediate associates, the rescinding of the new constitution and acknowledgment of a dominant role for the Communists in any future coalition Government. While these terms are disappointing to the Nationalists, there is evidence that continued efforts are being made to enter into peace negotiations.

3. In preparation for the contingency that satisfactory truce terms could not be arrived at, the National Government is preparing to withdraw to the South. Already parts of the Chinese Airforce and Navy have moved to Formosa. A close friend of the Generalissimo has been named Governor of that Island. Rumours are reported that all gold and foreign exchange reserves in Nationalist banks have been removed to Formosa. Government administrative services are being dispersed.

4. On January 14, the Chinese Ambassador called to request the Canadian Government to instruct the Canadian Ambassador to accompany the National Government to Canton, if it is compelled to evacuate Nanking. The Government places great store by the Ambassadors of friendly Governments accompanying it, should it be compelled to leave Nanking. In November, instructions were sent to Ambassador Davis informing him that if the National Government should evacuate Nanking accompanied by the British and American Ambassadors he (Mr. Davis) and the Military Attaché should accompany the Government, leaving Mr. Ronning and Mr. Maybee (External Affairs Secretaries) in Nanking. We have been endeavouring to learn what attitude the United Kingdom and United States Governments propose to adopt. Neither Government is sanguine about the possibility of the National Government being able to hold together for many weeks if it is compelled to evacuate Nanking. They are, therefore, inclined to await developments before sending last minute instructions to their Ambassadors. In the meantime, in order to ensure that there will be Canadian officials to look after the interests of approximately 500 Canadians, missionaries and business people, who plan to remain on under the Communists, we are issuing concurrent Consular Commissions to our diplomatic Secretaries in Nanking. Two will remain there and one in Shanghai for the change over.¹

CHINA; EVACUATION OF CANADIANS

45. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the situation of the Nationalist government continued to deteriorate. Chiang Kai-shek had resigned and it was likely that the Nanking area would be overrun in the near future by the Communist armies.

Enquiry had been made of the Chief of the Naval Staff concerning the possibility of arranging for a Canadian ship to go to Chinese waters in case the situation developed in such a way as to endanger the lives of the 200 Canadians in the area. British and U.S. vessels were standing by for similar purposes.

It had been ascertained that an R.C.N. destroyer² could be diverted for this purpose from a cruise to Mexico.

(External Affairs memorandum to the Minister, Jan. 24, 1949).†

46. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that, subject to concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, a Canadian destroyer be diverted to Far Eastern waters to be available in case it were required for evacuation or protection of Canadians in the Nanking area.³

Military Situation

The Government refused to accede to a Communist ultimatum calling for unconditional surrender and, on April 21, Communist troops began crossing the Yangtze River in force, encountering very weak opposition. Nanking was not defended and was entered by the Communists sometime during April 23-24. There was some looting and disorder in the city when the garrison withdrew. Communist forces are reported to be advancing eastward towards the coast at Hangchow Bay, threatening to cut off the 300,000 Nationalist forces covering Shanghai from escape overland to the South. This may result in a delaying defence being attempted at Shanghai, to permit evacuation of Government armies by sea. Nationalist forces may regroup to make a stand in South China. The Island of Formosa is being transformed into a Nationalist stronghold.

Political Situation and Instructions to Ambassadors

2. Acting President Li Tsung-jen and members of the Government have fled from Nanking. The intentions of the Government as to a new centre of operations have not yet become clear but it is probable that Canton will be declared provisional capital.

3. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs advised the Diplomatic Corps to withdraw to Shanghai but this suggestion was not acted upon, the majority of the Ambassadors feeling that they should await events in Nanking.

4. After the United Kingdom and United States Governments had been consulted, Mr. Davis was instructed to remain in Nanking for the change-over in authority. He may, at his discretion, withdraw from Nanking to some other point, in order to communicate with us with regard to the question of returning to Canada for consultation.

5. The United States Ambassador has also been instructed by the State Department to stay at his post, until it is clear that local authority has been firmly established. The United Kingdom Ambassador similarly recommended to his Government that he should be left in Nanking.

Relations with Communists

6. The Ambassadors of the Atlantic Pact countries in Nanking decided that, following the fall of Nanking, each Mission should notify the head official of the new authorities of the presence of the Mission and the names and addresses of all persons connected with it; this notification to be made without further comment.

7. The matter of possible recognition of a Communist regime in China has not yet, of course, been considered. Mr. Davis has been instructed, however, that, if he considers it necessary, our consular officers in Nanking and Shanghai might make an oral communication to Communist officials, expressing the expectation that, in accordance with accepted international practice, they would be able to continue to perform their normal functions, which consist of looking after the interests of Canadian citizens. The instructions to Mr. Davis in this regard are similar to those given to United Kingdom and United States Ambassadors by their Governments.

Welfare of Canadians

8. 189 persons are now registered as Canadians at the Canadian Vice-Consulate in Shanghai. On April 25 the Canadian Vice-Consul published a notice in the Shanghai newspapers, repeating and emphasizing a warning given to Canadians last November, that all those who could do so should leave. There is danger of rioting in Shanghai, even if a defence of the city is made. If general evacuation of Shanghai by foreigners should become necessary under emergency conditions, a coordinated plan for assembling and feeding has been completed by an Emergency Planners Committee, participated in by representatives of several countries, including Canada. The President of Canadian Pacific Air Lines, Mr. G.W. McConachie, has informed the Department that the North Star aircraft, which was made available to his company by the Royal Canadian Air Force, for survey and familiarization purposes in the Far East, has been placed at the disposal of the Canadian Ambassador, in case it should be required to assist in evacuating Canadians. The aircraft is now in Hong Kong.

H.M.C.S. "Crescent"

9. H.M.C.S. "Crescent" has visited both Shanghai and Nanking, her movements being made according to a rotation scheme for Commonwealth vessels in Chinese waters. "Crescent" was in Hong Kong at the time of the "Amethyst" incident on the Yangtze River. The Commander-in-Chief, Far East Station, of the Royal Navy at Hong Kong has been informed that the vessel, which is under his operational direction, should be used in conformity with the wishes of the Canadian Ambassador. We hope the Ambassador can maintain wireless communication with the Commander-in-Chief, Far East Station, Hong Kong, through the British Embassy with regard to use of H.M.C.S. "Crescent". It is understood that the Royal Canadian Navy does not intend to have the "Crescent" return to Canada at the present time.

Canadian Embassy Staff

10. Nanking has been cut off from rail and telephone communication with Shanghai but word has been received by radio that all members of the staff of the Canadian Embassy in Nanking are well. Their next-of-kin have been notified. The staff consists of Honourable T.C. Davis, Ambassador; C.A. Ronning, First Secretary; J.R. Maybee, Second Secretary; H. Staines, Administrative Clerk; Corporal Smith, Military Clerk. Mrs. Davis has left Shanghai for North America by plane.

11. The Canadian personnel at our office in Shanghai are: F.C. Ballachey, Vice-Consul; B.I. Rankin, Assistant Commercial Secretary and Vice-Consul; Miss J. MacLeod, Stenographer and Miss M.C. Fournier, Stenographer. The Ambassador has been authorized to order the Shanghai staff to leave, if he considers that danger to life is such as to warrant this.

CRESCENT

I am concerned lest the Crescent should become involved in action against the Chinese Communists in any further attempt to extricate the "Amethyst" from its present position 100 miles up the Yangtze or in other operations. I think that the signal which was sent to the Commander-in-Chief of the Far East Station, Royal Navy, Hong Kong, on April 21 should be reviewed in the light of present developments. The signal read as follows:

- “1. HMCS Crescent should be used as requested by the Canadian Ambassador, or at your discretion according to the requirements of the situation.
2. Would appreciate if you would keep CANAVHED [Canadian Naval Headquarters] fully informed of movements of “Crescent” and when possible your intentions regarding her.
3. Please confirm that you are in communication with the Canadian Ambassador in Nanking”.⁴
2. You have already seen a copy of telegram No. 835 of April 22 from Canada House† giving Mr. Pearson’s view that “this ship should not become involved in any incidents if that can be avoided, and for that purpose it should not be ordered to the Yangtze”. Mr. Pearson goes on to say that “This is not a question of us evading any responsibility but merely exercising ordinary caution by not participating in what appear to be useless gestures”.
3. We have been unable to get Mr. Pearson’s comments through to Mr. Davis as you suggested because of the suspension of telegraphic services. In view of the fall of Nanking to the Communists I think we must assume that Mr. Davis will have difficulty in keeping in close touch with the Commander of the Crescent and C.-in-C., Far East Station. Under the circumstances, the Commander of the Crescent will be the more dependent on the C.-in-C., Far East Station, for guidance unless further instructions are sent.
4. As the Communists have now crossed the Yangtze at a number of points I doubt if it would be wise to continue to proceed on the assumption that permission given by the Nationalist Government for Royal Navy and Royal Canadian Navy vessels to visit Nanking has any further real validity.
5. The debate yesterday in the United Kingdom House and the discussion in the British press of the “Amethyst Incident” indicate pretty clearly the dangers in the present situation. Apart from the operational difficulties encountered by naval vessels duelling with shore batteries in narrow waters, there is the broader question of future relations with the Chinese Communists. They have been quick to seize upon this incident for propaganda purposes to exploit the latent anti-foreignism of the Chinese. As the Government decided to leave Mr. Davis in Nanking for the Communist take-over, he and his staff are dependent on the Communists for protection and permission to carry on their duties.
6. The Canadian Vice-Consul in Shanghai has informed us that all Canadians in Shanghai have been warned again and given further opportunities to evacuate by Canadian Pacific Air Lines plane or by a Dutch passenger vessel. The 200 who plan to stay on have decided to take their chances with the Communists. The foreign community in Shanghai have taken all the precautions they can to protect themselves in the period between the withdrawal of Nationalist control and the Communist take-over. In these circumstances the only justification for the Crescent going up to Shanghai would be if the interval between Nationalist departure and Communist take-over was so prolonged and disturbed that the local safety arrangements proved inadequate and the lives of Canadians became seriously endangered, or if the Communists on entering the city began to mistreat Canadians in such a way as to transgress customary international practice. I doubt if either of these contingencies will arise.

The quoted signal was approved by the Minister of National Defence and sent by the Vice-Chief of the Naval Staff. The Chief of the Naval Staff, Admiral Grant, was also in the United Kingdom at the time.

7. The C.-in-C., Far East Station, Royal Navy, Hong Kong, is authorized to use the Crescent at his discretion, particularly if he is unable to communicate with Ambassador Davis in Communist-held Nanking. I think the lessons of the "Amethyst Incident" will have sunk in now and that the C.-in-C. will be very cautious about sending further vessels up the Yangtze. However, I have seen no report on how he intends to use the Crescent. There is the possibility that he might send the Crescent up the Yangtze to assist in extricating the Amethyst, or he might send her to Shanghai. I think it would be fairer to him if we were to send him and the Commander of the Crescent a further signal giving a more detailed statement of how we think the Crescent should be used. I think something along the following lines might be considered:

"1. In view of anti-foreign propaganda use which Communists have made of recent Yangtze River incident involving Royal Navy vessels every effort should be made to avoid becoming involved in incidents with the Communists.

2. As Communists now dominate the lower Yangtze River it appears to us that permission obtained by Canadian Ambassador from Nationalist Government for Crescent to visit Nanking is now insufficient to assure recognition of the peaceful intention of such visits.

3. Accordingly, Crescent should not enter or remain in Chinese Communist dominated waters except under one of the following conditions:

(a) if requested by the Canadian Ambassador or Canadian Consular officers in China to assist in the evacuation of Canadian citizens and other British subjects whose lives are endangered,

(b) if permission for such visits has been obtained from the Communists,

(c) if authorized by Canadian Naval Headquarters."⁵

8. If you agree that a further signal along these lines might usefully be sent, we would communicate the text to the Ambassador in Nanking and the Vice Consul in Shanghai with the following caution:

⁵ Une version corrigée de ce message fut transmise au capitaine du Crescent le 28 avril 1949. Comme les compagnies de câble n'acceptaient pas de messages dirigés vers Nankin, le texte fut envoyé à Davis via le lien radiophonique de l'ambassade du Royaume-Uni avec le Foreign Office, le 29 avril 1949.

A revised version of this message was transmitted to the Captain of the Crescent on April 28, 1949. As cable companies were not accepting messages for Nanking, the text was sent to Davis via the British Embassy's radio link with the Foreign Office on April 29, 1949.

“As Canadians remaining in areas threatened by Communists are doing so by choice, you should request assistance from Crescent in evacuating them and other British subjects only if local peace preservation arrangements prove entirely inadequate and lives of Canadians are in serious peril, or if Communists after the take-over show themselves unwilling or unable to afford normal protection to Canadians. If at all possible you should consult Ottawa before making such request.”

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRCRAFT IN THE FAR EAST

You will recall that Mr. McConachie, President of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines, was good enough to place an aircraft at the disposal of the Canadian Embassy in China, in case it might be of assistance in evacuating Canadian citizens. This was one of two North Star aircraft which had been released from the Royal Canadian Air Force to Canadian Pacific Air Lines, in order that survey and familiarization flights might be undertaken, prior to the establishment of a regular schedule to the Far East by Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

2. About ten days have elapsed since the North Star was taken off its survey schedule and made available to the Canadian Embassy. The aircraft is still standing by in Hong Kong.

3. Reports from our office in Shanghai indicate that there is no present need for the North Star. Most of the two hundred Canadians now in Shanghai plan to stay on in the city. The few wishing to leave are able to do so on passenger vessels or by commercial aircraft. Our Vice-Consul states that, under the circumstances, he does not feel that we should hold up the Canadian Pacific Air Lines aircraft in Hong Kong and he suggests that it be permitted to proceed on its survey.

4. The crisis has not yet occurred, so far as Shanghai is concerned, and the city will continue to be in a state of emergency until the Communists have taken over and established their authority. This may take place very soon or it may be a matter of weeks. Meanwhile, of course, the mere knowledge that a Canadian plane was available would have a good psychological effect upon Canadians remaining in Shanghai, particularly if H.M.C.S. “Crescent” sails for home on May 12th.

5. I feel, however, that, if we wished the North Star to remain at the Embassy's disposal for a longer period, it would be incumbent upon us to offer to reimburse Canadian Pacific Air Lines for the cost of having the aircraft stand by, whether in Hong Kong or in Tokyo.

6. The British communities in Shanghai have cooperated in drawing up an emergency plan of action, in case a general evacuation of the city by foreigners should become necessary. In that event I think it is probable that commercial aircraft would be available for taking out all British subjects.

7. Under the circumstances I would recommend that we authorize the release of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines North Star aircraft, which is now in Hong Kong at the disposal of the Canadian Embassy.⁶

RELATIONS WITH THE CHINESE COMMUNISTS

In our despatch No. 72 of April 22 to the Ambassador to China, † we expressed the hope that our Consular Officers would be permitted by the Communist authorities to carry out their normal functions. This despatch was not concerned with diplomatic recognition.

2. With the overrunning of Central China, including the cities of Nanking and Shanghai, by Chinese Communist forces, it has become necessary to consider the position of our Embassy in Nanking from three points of view:

(I) The present conduct and attitude of the Ambassador in his relations with Communist authorities;

(II) The future movements of the Ambassador;

(III) The question of possible recognition of a Communist government, when that has been established.

The attached telegram, † with instructions to Mr. Davis dealing with these matters is submitted for your approval.

(I) Present Conduct of the Ambassador

3. The Canadian Ambassador was ordered to remain in Nanking, rather than follow the Chinese Nationalist government to Canton because it was doubted that the government could hold together in the South and it was, therefore, considered that the welfare and interests of Canadians in China would in this way best be safeguarded. The retention of our Ambassador in Nanking, a national capital which has been captured by insurgent forces, does not, by the tenets of international law, constitute recognition of the new authorities as being the proper government of China,

⁶ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Could we ask for its retention for one more week? LB P[earson] so long as there is no formal presentation of credentials and communications with such authorities bear only an unofficial character.

(II) Future Movements of the Ambassador

4. It is considered that the Ambassador should be withdrawn from Nanking as soon as practicable. He is in the anomalous position of being accredited to the Nationalist government, while residing in territory controlled by insurgents, and is, therefore, subject to the embarrassment of being unable to fulfil his proper functions. The mere presence of the foreign Ambassadors in Nanking, however, gives prestige to the Communists while emphasizing the lack of confidence felt in the Nationalist government. If the Ambassador should be withdrawn and succeeded by a Charge d'Affaires, the anomaly would remain in essence but much less in degree.

5. Telegram No. 685 of May 21 (attached)† from the British Ambassador in Nanking to the Foreign Office, gives it as the agreed upon view of the Commonwealth Ambassadors in China that the Powers should now reconsider the position of their representatives in Nanking, who should be given discretion to withdraw, when they judge that the best possible arrangements have been made for protecting their nationals and national interests. The United States Ambassador, Dr. Stuart, has already been instructed in this matter.

6. The Canadian Ambassador, in his telegram No. 110 of May 15 (attached)†, concurs in the recommendation that he be given instructions similar to those issued to Dr. Stuart. I should advise, however, that we make the decision when to recall Mr. Davis for consultation, after receiving his recommendations and in the light of the views of other governments, rather than place the onus upon him, by requiring him to decide the appropriate time for his withdrawal. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of our telegram instruct Mr. Davis accordingly. We should notify the United Kingdom, United States, French, Australian and Indian governments that we are considering the possible recall of Mr. Davis, since these governments have kept in consultation with us concerning China and emphasis has been given to the desirability of taking common action.

7. After the return of the Ambassador, it is envisaged that Mr. C.A. Ronning, First Secretary, would become Charge d'Affaires, of the Embassy. In this capacity Mr. Ronning would have no official relations with the Communist authorities.

(III) Question of Recognition

8. The question of recognition of a new regime in China will presumably not arise until the Communists have established some form of central government. Recent reports from Nanking indicate that this may not be for some time, possibly not until autumn, since the Communists are faced with a very great task of organization. After forming a central government, the Communists may either demand international recognition or they may merely announce the establishment of their government and wait for the Powers to make the first move towards recognition.

9. It is very doubtful whether the Nationalist government can maintain itself as an entity in South China. The Communist advance already threatens the provisional capital of Canton. The United States and British diplomatic officers at Canton probably would not follow the government immediately to a further place of withdrawal but would wait to see whether the Nationalists could in fact continue to maintain a government at all in South China.

10. It is considered that it would be impractical and illogical, from the point of view of protecting our own interests in China, to resolve to have no dealings with a Communist regime which already controls a large part of the country, which appears to enjoy at the moment a fair measure of popular support and which, in all probability, will extend its power. There is general agreement amongst the Ambassadors of the Atlantic Pact countries and of the Commonwealth countries in Nanking that their governments should give consideration to the manner in which recognition might be extended to a Communist government, when that has come into being.

De Facto Recognition

11. The Powers might recognize the Communists as having established a de facto government for that part of China which they control while continuing to recognize the Nationalist government as being de jure government of the whole of China. The time and method of granting de facto recognition would, of course, be a matter for consultation with other governments. The importance of mutual consultation in this regard has been stressed by the United States and United Kingdom Governments and has been urged by our own Ambassador. The governments concerned, with the possible exception of India, are generally agreed that they should not be precipitate in recognizing a Communist regime. At the present time the United States appears inclined to proceed more slowly in the matter of recognition than the United Kingdom but both governments seem to accept the principle that recognition, probably on a de facto basis at the outset, will have to be extended in due course to a Communist government in China. It is possible, of course, that the Communists might refuse to discuss anything but de jure recognition.

12. Paragraph 6 of our telegram to Mr. Davis informs him that we are considering the possibility, if and when it is decided to grant de facto recognition, of Mr. Ronning remaining in Nanking as Diplomatic Agent to conduct relations with the Communist government. Attachment of a diplomatic agent to a government neither constitutes nor implies de jure recognition of the government concerned, since the diplomatic agent is not formally and officially accredited. He is merely named by one government as its agent for carrying on business with another government. The United Kingdom Government has similarly been considering the possibility of naming a diplomatic agent to deal with the Communists in Nanking, after de facto recognition has been accorded, while maintaining a Charge d'Affaires of Embassy with the fugitive Nationalist government. The United Kingdom holds the view that it would be undesirable to hasten the disintegration of the Nationalist government by prematurely withdrawing from diplomatic relations with it. We might also find it necessary, if the Nationalists succeed in establishing themselves in the South or in Formosa, to appoint an officer as Charge d'Affaires to the Nationalist Government. The possibility must not be overlooked that the Communists, if willing to accept recognition on a de facto basis, will expect to send diplomatic agents to the recognizing powers. We should have to consider the implications of this very carefully having regard to possible espionage and propaganda activities amongst our considerable Chinese population.

13. It is a matter for consideration whether we should seek to attach conditions, from the point of view of our own particular interests, to the granting of de facto recognition. The basic standards for recognition, according to the principles of international law, are effectiveness of power, accompanied by a sufficient degree of stability and a reasonable prospect of permanence. These are requirements which could probably be met by a Chinese Communist government. The United States Department view in this instance is that de facto recognition should be based upon the above considerations, together with ability and willingness to observe international obligations and that recognition should not be used as a political weapon. A certain amount of bargaining, however, by the Powers with major interests in China would seem to be inevitable. The United Kingdom, for instance, cannot but be concerned about the very large British vested interests in China.

14. Particular Canadian interests in China about which we should wish to determine the attitude of the Communist government are:

(1) Repayment of the Sino-Canadian of which the non-military portion ($35,000,000) might be renegotiated;

(2) Repayment of the credits extended by Canadian banks to the Ming Sung Industrial Company for the construction of ships in Canada. This loan was guaranteed by the Canadian government;

(3) The treatment of Canadian missionaries and missionary properties;

(4) Canadian trade and commercial interests in general.

15. It would appear premature to consider de jure recognition at this stage of developments.

OUR FUTURE RELATIONS WITH CHINA

Since I will unfortunately not be able to attend the meeting to discuss China on Monday, the 20th, I thought it might be useful if I gave you a short note on some of my views.

2. My feeling is that our chief efforts over the next few months should be to refrain from committing ourselves on our policy towards Communist China until we have had time to give the matter extremely careful consideration, in consultation with the United Kingdom, the United States and other countries.

3. The coming into power of a Communist Government in China will undoubtedly represent one of the great revolutionary changes in modern history. When one is faced with a revolutionary change such as this, it is, I think, a mistake to try to make policy on the basis of the direct national interest in isolated questions such as loans, or credits, or air rights. The over-riding consideration will have to be the paramount necessity of the Western world arriving at an agreed policy on China which will protect the general interests of the whole Western world.

4. My own feeling is, at the moment, that, in order to hold the Communist advance in South East Asia, it is essential that as great economic assistance as possible be given as quickly as possible to South East Asia in an effort to raise the standard of living there so that it may become apparent to the peoples in China and South East Asia that the interests of the individual are served if his country keeps out or gets out of the Russian orbit. Since there is a limited amount of goods to go around, this means that no supplies should be sent to Communist China if they can be of use in non-Communist South East Asia.

5. This means that the Western world would have to cut its losses in Communist China and concentrate on holding the line against further Communist penetration in South East Asia.

Ottawa, June 20, 1949

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Everything now indicates that before the end of this year we can expect a Communist government to control the most important areas of China. The Communist armies are already on the verge of the Canton area (Kwangtung Province) from which I understand come some 95 per cent of the Chinese in Canada. Regardless of the nature of our future diplomatic relations with any such government, I think you may wish to have the Security Panel consider some of the repercussions which the Communist accession to power may have among the people of Chinese origin in Canada.

I think it would be a mistake to suppose that the great majority of the Chinese in Canada will not continue to be law-abiding citizens. On the other hand we cannot ignore the numerous ways in which a Communist government in China in control of the Canton area will be able to influence their nationals in this country. Indeed, considering the importance of the Chinese element on the west coast, the Chinese Communists may, I believe, be expected to make every effort to improve their organization in Canada. A Communist government of China would be able to exert pressure among the families of Chinese Canadians remaining in China and, still more important, they will control, through the New China News Agency, the news from home. Communist political organization, which is at present comparatively unimportant among the Chinese in Canada, may spread from the Chinese Communists in the United States as well as from those who manage to come to this country from China.

If we give any sort of recognition to a Chinese Communist government, we may expect them to lose no time in sending diplomatic and, if we permit it, consular agents to Canada. It remains to be seen what brand of Communism will emerge in China but, until the contrary is proved by experience, I think we must assume that the Chinese will be good Communists from the Soviet point of view. This means that their official representatives abroad will be concerned not only with propaganda and political work among their own people but, almost certainly, that they will be available for subversive activities and for espionage in the Soviet interest. The importance of the problem, it seems to me, cannot be judged solely on the basis of the present state of Communist organization among the Chinese in Canada nor upon the behaviour of former Chinese government representatives in this country.

Aside from any counter-espionage problem which may arise if we admit representatives of a Communist-dominated government, there are other spheres of activity in which Communist representatives may be expected to work no less assiduously among their people than the officials of the Chinese Nationalist Government. Like their predecessors, we may take it that the agents of Communist China will try to organize political clubs; they will take an interest in swinging the Chinese language press to their point of view; they may even (although this is more questionable) encourage their nationals in Canada to participate in Chinese elections. In our dealings with the representatives of the Nationalist Government, we have precedents for refusing to permit each of these forms of political activity. The most important example which we can cite is our aide memoire to the Chinese Embassy objecting to the participation of their officials in organizing among the Chinese in Canada the elections of December 1947–January 1948 for the Chinese Assembly. We have also refused to extend the visa of a Chinese Nationalist editor who came to Victoria to manage the Kuomintang newspaper there, and we have required the Chinese Ambassador in Ottawa to report the movements in Canada of an official of the Chinese Overseas Affairs Commission, so that the R.C.M.P. could keep him under surveillance.

It is difficult to foresee the extent to which a Communist government in China will be able to inherit the Kuomintang political apparatus abroad or to set up their own among those elements which formerly have derived their chief strength from their opposition to the KMT. In Canada there are four Chinese-language newspapers, two of which have supported the K[uo]M[in]T[ang] and two opposed. The only Communist paper in the Chinese language circulated in Canada is published in New York. Even among the KMT organization, which is by far the strongest in Canada, we understand that there have been many who have been moving into opposition to the leadership of Chiang Kai-Shek, impelled by his increasingly reactionary policies and corrupt administration. It is possible that a Chinese Communist Government will be able to control at least part of the KMT organization abroad through the Revolutionary Committee of the KMT, which is likely to be included in a Communist Government. So far as Canada is concerned, the Revolutionary Committee assumes additional importance because its leader Lichai-Sun is a Cantonese. However, the most fertile fields for the Communists among the Chinese political organizations in Canada are the anti-KMT organizations of which only a fraction have so far been supporting the Chinese Communist leadership.

I think we can conclude that there is no immediate risk of Communist subversive activities being organized among the Chinese in Canada on a large scale, but in the long run the problem will require a great deal more attention than it has had in the past. I expect that even now we should begin to consider such measures as the following:

- (i) adding Chinese-language papers, including the Communist paper published in New York, to those reviewed by the Citizenship Branch of the Department of State;
- (ii) asking the R.C.M.P. to review the measures which they should take in order to counter any subversive activities among the Chinese in Canada;
- (iii) tightening our control of immigration from China; and,
- (iv) reviewing the need for a peacetime registration of aliens in Canada.

I have only one or two comments to add concerning the way in which these recommendations might be implemented. Now that we can expect a complete breakdown in our security screening arrangements in China, we should adhere more closely than ever to the restriction of Asiatic immigration as defined in P.C. 2119 (1931), and control more closely visits to Canada of such semi-official agents as editors, lecturers, and the like, who have in the past been allowed temporary entry for extended periods. The same consideration will apply to Chinese wishing to come to Canada from the United States.

One of our most immediate problems will be what attitude we should adopt towards the former officials of the Nationalist Government. There will be some temptation to find employment in the service of the Canadian Government for those who can offer us long experience among the Chinese community in Canada, determined opposition to Communism, and in some cases, Nationalist Government records of their organization and registration of the Chinese community in Canada. One might question the desirability of employing such people. Their loyalty will be to a dying regime in China rather than to Canada. It is for that reason that I have suggested in my second recommendation above that we should employ, wherever possible, Chinese born in Canada rather than officials left stranded by the ebbing tide of Nationalist China.

This letter has been prepared without the benefit of full discussion with other interested Departments but it may possibly serve as a starting point for a discussion which I think might be useful.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE AMBASSADOR IN CHINA

You will recall that we had indicated to Mr. Davis in general terms that it was our intention to recall him for consultation, when he was satisfied that the best possible arrangements had been made for the welfare of Canadian citizens and interests.

2. With the overrunning of central China including the cities of Nanking and Shanghai by Communist forces, it became an urgent matter to consider the position of our Embassy in Nanking from various points of view and to send our Ambassador more specific instructions.

3. Mr. Heeney discussed the situation in a series of conferences with those Heads of Division and senior officers in the Department who were concerned. The attached memorandum on "Relations with the Chinese Communists", which gives the background to the problems involved, formed the basis of these talks.⁷ It was decided that a "Heeney to Davis" telegram should be sent at once, instructing the Ambassador as to his present relations with the Communist authorities; acquainting him with our thinking about his future movements; and advising him that we would not be able to have a policy recommendation considered by Ministers until later. We informed Mr. Davis that we considered the final responsibility for determining the date of his return should not be placed upon him but that the decision should be taken here, on the basis of his recommendation and in the light of the views of other Governments concerned. Attached for your information is a copy of our telegram No. 100 of June 15 to the Ambassador.†

4. Mr. Davis replied (in telegrams No. 116 of June 28† and 120 of July 8†) expressing the following opinions with regard to his recall:

(i) He should not return before his British and American colleagues;

(ii) The American Ambassador intends to leave as soon as he can conclude arrangements to do so (a teletype received from our Embassy in Washington suggests this may be quite soon);

(iii) Commonwealth Ambassadors feel they should be out of China long before a Communist Central Government is set up and possibly even before the Political Consultative Council meets towards the end of August;

(iv) With restricted means of travel, the Ambassador would like to have our decision as soon as possible, since it may take some weeks to make the necessary arrangements with the Communist authorities and with travel companies.

⁷ Document 1037.

5. The Ambassador has reported that he has taken the best possible measures for the protection of Canadian nationals and interests. In view of this and in the light of his recommendations, I submit for your consideration a telegram to Mr. Davis† authorizing him to proceed with arrangements for his return. The telegram requests him to advise us of the progress of his arrangements, so that we may confirm our approval of his withdrawal and may notify other Governments concerned.

TELEGRAM 130

Nanking, August 15, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference British Ambassador's telegram No. 1234 of August 13th to the Foreign Office.†

2. I go along in principle with contents of telegram under reference, remembering that we have virtually no financial interest out here but knowing we will best be served by a united, prosperous China with whom we can trade.

3. American policy, now in the course of development, seems based on a belief in complete subservience of Communist China to Russia. Personally, I do not agree with this. China may evolve as a Communist State, which I gravely doubt, due to its agrarian economy, but, if it does, I do not believe that it will be dominated or controlled by Russia.

4. On the assumption contained in preceding paragraph, United States seemingly intends to pursue hands-off policy, but suggests support for any move which may arise to bankrupt the Communists. This suggestion itself infers interference in the internal affairs of this nation and indicates policy of hostility towards the new regime, only certain results of which will be greater hardship for the Chinese people and rapid extinction of foreign interests and influences.

5. American policy is their own business but if it involves pressure on Britain and other democratic nations to follow the same line, then I doubt the wisdom of such nations so doing. Americans should recognize the importance to the United Kingdom of British interests in China and, in shaping their policy, allow for moral aid to the United Kingdom to maintain those interests as far possible. Our policy should be hands-off but not unfriendly so that we can do business, letting the Chinese solve their own problems in their own way.

6. It is better for all that we have a seat inside the bamboo curtain rather than trying to peer in from outside, and that we should not lose the advantages of having a foot in the door.

7. You may find it appropriate to convey the substance of these views to the State Department.

TELEGRAM 130

Ottawa, August 26, 1949

Your telegram No. 130 of August 15. I am somewhat concerned to note in British Ambassador's telegram No. 1234 of August 13† a reference to the "fundamental differences between the nature of the Commonwealth interests in China and that of American interests".

2. As stated in Paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 130, the fact is that direct Canadian interests in China differ markedly from United Kingdom interests and resemble more closely the direct interests of the United States. This does not imply, of course, that we would necessarily agree with United States policy with regard to China but the British Ambassador's reference to "Commonwealth interests" in China is misleading.

3. Similarly, paragraph 5 of Foreign Office telegram No. 7925 of August 19 to Washington†, repeated to Nanking, re Air Venture Company, contains the following statement "You should stress our responsibilities to a community of 3,000 British subjects including 150 Canadians and 50 Australians and we hope that State Department will understand that we should persevere with the project. We are, of course, responsible for the welfare of Canadian citizens in Shanghai and I feel that this may be another indication that the British Ambassador in China may not fully appreciate the position and responsibilities of Canada in international affairs.

4. We have no repeat no desire or intention to raise issues of status at this time. But we felt that the unnecessary anomalies referred to above should be drawn to your attention.

5. With regard to the general question of relations of the Western powers with Communist China, we do not, repeat not, consider that it would be wise at present for us to make suggestions to London or Washington on the policy to be adopted. We are, of course, perturbed by the possibility that the present United Kingdom-United States differences may intensify so as to make it impossible for the Western powers to reach a large measure of agreement in this matter. We are therefore trying to get further light from Washington on present State Department thinking.

Nanking, August 27, 1949

Anticipating my departure, at my request, I had long interview yesterday with Huang Hua, Head of Foreign Nationals Bureau and generally accepted as the leading Communist authority here. Talk was unofficial, personal and most friendly.

2. After lengthy general discussion I asked when we might expect the establishment of new Government and what they had in mind concerning recognition procedure.

3. He anticipated creation of Government in reasonable future and that China would welcome recognition on basis of friendship, equality and withdrawal of recognition from Nationalists. I pointed out that no nation could recognize two Governments simultaneously and that recognition of new Government involved withdrawal from other. I was referring of course to de jure recognition.

4. He then turned to Canada and recognition. He said hitherto we had been unfriendly and had intervened in civil war and Chinese internal affairs and were supplying arms and planes to the Nationalists. He suggested we would in some manner have to indicate change of attitude from hostile to friendly and I noted slight trace of suggestion that we would have to acknowledge our wrongs and seek forgiveness and recognition.

5. I explained furnishing of war supplies as merely continuation of mutual aid and that plane transaction was an ordinary commercial one. I stressed that I was speaking from memory and was not sure of these facts.

6. This can be discussed more fully in future but, meantime, I believe that they will refuse payment of military portion of loan, although they may acknowledge 35 millions spent on civilian supplies. I would not be too hopeful about either.

7. I indicated that our attitude was expressed by our remaining here and sending no representative to Canton, and in any negotiations for recognition this would be best evidence of friendship and equality.

8. I pressed him to indicate recognition procedure after formation of Government. He replied Mao Tse Tung had already covered this topic in public statements. I pointed out that when making these statements Mao was acting as leader of Communist party only. He stated he spoke not only for party but also for groups which will join new coalition Government and Chinese people. I replied when Government is formed Mao, as Head of State, would be in a different position and in proclaiming new Government would have to extend invitation for recognition on basis of equality and friendship.

9. I fear new Government when formed will merely proclaim itself and then sit back waiting for requests for permission to recognize. If this attitude is taken I foresee trouble and I tried to indicate that initiative must come from them and that thereafter negotiations for recognition would be up to individual Governments.

10. He raised the question of blockade and charged that it is supported by United States and United Kingdom with intent to weaken this country and endanger new movement. In the same breath he said Communists were not concerned therewith and could get along despite it. I could tell, however, that the blockade is worrying them.

11. I said I could speak for neither United States nor United Kingdom, but that United Kingdom's actions spoke for themselves. One of her ships was bombed in Shanghai harbour by Nationalists while running blockade. One has since successfully entered and left and British ships are going to Tientsin every week from Hong Kong.

12. He stated that impending capture of Islands at mouth of Yangtse River and the fall of Canton would in any case reduce the effectiveness of the blockade. I pointed out shipping insurance rates and high cost of Chinese exports of ordered goods due increased wages will keep out shipping more than blockade.

13. He said that they wanted to industrialize China and need foreign trade in order to make China strong, independent and prosperous nation.

14. I told him that what China did in matter of her internal affairs was her business and of no concern to us and what best suited us was a unified prosperous China with which we could do business.

15. I explained the Ming Sung deal⁸ to him and the more I think of it the more convinced I am that this is the brightest spot of all Canada's dealings with this country.

⁸ Les arrangements de crédits commerciaux passés avec la société limitée Ming Sung Industrial sont expliqués dans le volume 14, document 1113.

TELEGRAM 137

SECRET

Following for Pearson from Davis, Begins: On the eve of your departure for Washington meeting at which Chinese policy will likely arise,⁹ I think fitting that even at expense of repetition I should express my views.

2. I feel that the United States is (pursuing?) a most unwise policy out here.

3. Such policy seems to be based on (idea?) that Chinese Communists are stooges of Russia and when (2 groups corrupt) subservient thereto. If this is correct then they must have known a good four months ago, and if so why did they leave their Ambassador here?

4. Has this decision been reached since and if so on what evidence? I have been here for this period and nothing has happened during that time which in my opinion justifies that conclusion. Lip service to Marxist theories and friendship for Russia does not warrant conclusion. Treatment of Consular agents, wage disputes and other incidents are trivial and policy should not be based thereon.

5. United States actively intervened in civil war and now that the side they supported has been decisively licked they seem to encourage continuance of civil war. Their interventionist policy seems confirmed and only change is throwing aside old instrument and hoping that a new one will arise.

6. Americans here complain they are accorded different treatment than British. Why should they not be? They are engaged in a cold war with Communists while British have been neutral.

7. All of this adds up to fact that so long as United States pursues this policy of (hostility?) they cannot offer recognition nor would it be accepted.

8. United States (group corrupt) think by pulling out of China and having nothing to do with her in field of trade or otherwise that this economic pressure will wreck Communist movement. Bunch in control here are completely ruthless and rather than buckle under to American pressure they will let millions starve if needs be. This group has the military to control this country and will have same for a long time so that policy of economic pressure is just wishful thinking.

⁹ Une réponse indique que «Pearson did not seek participation» à l'entretien entre le secrétaire aux Affaires étrangères britannique et le secrétaire d'État américain. Mais A.R. Menzies, chef par intérim de la direction des États-Unis et de l'Extrême-Orient, discuta de la question de façon officielle à Washington.

A reply indicated that "Pearson did not seek participation" in talks between the British Foreign Secretary and the U.S. Secretary of State, but A.R. Menzies, Acting Head of the American and Far Eastern Division, discussed the question at the official level in Washington.

9. United States is building up a (lot?) of bitterness and hatred which will take (years?) to eradicate. Even up to publication of White Paper¹⁰ I believe that they still had a reasonable amount of good-will and I think with a reasonable policy of hands off they could regain some. Pursuit of present policy is driving China into arms of Russia.

10. American policy is her business, but when she tries to jam it down throat of other nations it is a different thing.

11. I note that Indian Ambassador here is becoming more anti-American. He takes stand that United States seems to think that all nations can be forced to toe the line by economic pressure of this rich nation. He (group corrupt) India will not accept any aid or even credits from United States and that they do not propose to become economic vassal thereof. I sense this feeling growing and United States had better see where they are drifting. Ends.

CHINA

The Chinese Ambassador called on me this afternoon to discuss Sino-Canadian diplomatic relations and the raising of the Chinese problem at the General Assembly. Mr. Menzies was present.

2. I told the Ambassador that you had asked me to see him and to tell him that you were very sorry to be unable to see him yourself as you were completely tied up with preparations for your departure on Monday.

3. The Ambassador said that he had received instructions some weeks ago to approach us again on the subject of our representation in China. He had not done so at the time as there was no possibility of Mr. Davis leaving Nanking. However, now that it had been announced that Mr. Davis was leaving Nanking, he thought it appropriate to raise this matter again. When Mr. Davis left, Dr. Liu [Chieh] pointed out that we would have two senior men in Communist China, Dr. [G.S.] Patterson as Consul General in Shanghai and Mr. Ronning as Charge d'Affaires of the Embassy in Nanking, but no representation at the seat of the National Government. Dr. Liu thought that Canadian interests in Communist China could be adequately cared for by the Consulate General in Shanghai. The National Government had no particular objection to someone being left in Nanking to look after the property but they would like to see someone accredited to the National Government in Canton and accompany it to Chunking if it should move there.

4. I told Dr. Liu that we fully appreciated the point he was making and I would report it to you. Mr. Davis would avail himself of the first opportunity to leave Nanking to return to Canada for consultation. By present information we expected he would leave from Shanghai on the "General Gordon" about September 24, reaching Ottawa about a month later. The Government felt that, in view of the unsettled situation in China and the complexity of the problem, they would wish to consult Mr. Davis before they determined what their future course of action would be in regard to representation in China. In the meantime we were leaving a minimum number of officers in Nanking and Shanghai to man the two offices there.

5. I pointed out that the fact that we had no representation in Canton should not necessarily be regarded in itself as evidence that we were on unfriendly terms with the National Government. The U.S.S.R. had been very correct in sending its Ambassador to Canton, yet no one was fooled by this stratagem into thinking that the Soviet Government confided its friendship to the National Government only.

6. Dr. Liu also alluded briefly to the intention of the Chinese delegation to raise in the General Assembly the question of the violation of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of 1945 by the Soviet Union. He said that he hoped that friendly governments would look at this matter in the way that they had looked at the Greek question and perhaps ways and means could be found to contain Communist expansion in China. He mentioned as one of the principal evidences of Soviet violation of her treaty the recent commercial agreement signed between the Soviet Union and the local government of Manchuria.

7. I told Dr. Liu we had already had a report on this matter from General McNaughton, who had been talking to Dr. T.F. Tsiang.¹¹ I said that we were grateful for this advance notice of the Chinese intention to introduce a resolution on this subject as it gave us an opportunity to consider the position which we would adopt. I assured him that I would report to you fully on what he had communicated to me.¹²

POLICY TOWARDS COMMUNIST CHINA

I have been thinking over the questions which I discussed with you over the telephone this morning and it seems to me that it might be useful if I tried to clear my own mind by putting something down on paper for you.

2. I suggest that the time has come when we should prepare in this Department a very carefully considered and comprehensive paper for the Minister on the problems which have been created for Canada and its Western allies by the emergence of a Communist regime in China. At this particular stage I do not think that it would be wise in such a paper to attempt to set forth firm recommendations to the Minister. What is now needed is an appreciation of the problem and a discussion of alternative objectives, strategies and tactics.

3. Perhaps the most important point to make in any such memorandum is that the problem is extremely complex, that there are no easy, simple generalizations which can be made, that any policy which is adopted must be one based on a calculation of risks and that in such a calculation it will be necessary to weigh a whole series of inponderables and probabilities.

4. I would suggest for your consideration that the memorandum might begin with an assessment of the importance of the change which has taken place in China—the importance to China itself, to South Eastern Asia, and to the political, economic and defence problems of the North Atlantic Community.

5. The memorandum might then go on to discuss the alternative objectives of North Atlantic policy in China. Should the principal aim of policy be to promote by negative and positive actions increasing discontent and disorder in Communist China in order to make the task of the Chinese Communist Government as difficult as possible (this is, in general, it seems to me, the aim now of Western policy in relation to the satellite states), or should the main objective of policy be to attempt to assist the more moderate elements in the Chinese Communist Government and to attempt to maintain as many as possible of the links between China and the Western world (that was, in general, I think, the aim of our policy in countries such as Poland in 1945 and 1946).

6. It seems to me that only if we have some fairly clear idea of the objective we are trying to pursue can we think reasonably clearly about how we are to use the various instruments at our disposal, such as diplomatic recognition, Western economic interests in China, export control policy, policy in the United Nations, and so on.

7. It is also, of course, essential that we see the Chinese problem not in isolation from other important aspects of our foreign relations but only as one aspect of our general foreign policy. This means, for example, that the demands of a China policy on the resources of the Western world must be balanced against the competing demands of policy in, say, Western Europe and the Middle East. Thus I suppose it would be clearly desirable that the United States should pour resources into India, Pakistan and South East Asia in order to strengthen the economies of those countries and make them less susceptible to Soviet penetration. But the resources which the United States is able and willing to make available for economic assistance are limited and the demands of South East Asia, India and Pakistan have to be weighed against the demands of the Middle East and Western Europe.

8. The memorandum should, of course, contain the best information which we have available on the trends in United Kingdom and United States policies and in the policies of other interested governments, such as India.

9. I would suggest that the first draft of the memorandum should be ready next week and that the second draft of the memorandum should be ready by Tuesday, October 18, for a discussion in Mr. Heeney's office at 2:30 p.m. This ought to make it possible for us to have an agreed analysis ready for the Prime Minister and the Minister before Mr. Nehru arrives.

10. While the main responsibility for preparing the memorandum will naturally rest on your Division, you will, of course, be seeking the assistance of the European Division, which will be particularly concerned with the possible development of Soviet relations with China. The Defence Division should be responsible for securing from the proper agencies the necessary defence studies.

11. Please let me know if there is any assistance which I could give you in securing the full cooperation of other divisions. You might perhaps wish to prepare memoranda to those divisions which I could sign.

E[SCOTT] R[EID]

[Postscript:]

Mr. Heeney, to whom I have shown this note, says that is a good idea but that the resulting memoranda should not be too long.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CHINESE COMMUNIST REGIME

I refer to my memorandum of October 5th,† in which I stated that the Officer in Charge of our Embassy in Nanking had received word from the Foreign Affairs Bureau that he would soon have an official communication from the Foreign Minister of the Communist Central Government on the subject of recognition. Mr. Ronning has now cabled us the text of this communication, which reads as follows:

“Peking, October 1st, 1949, to Mr. T.C. Davis, I am sending you herewith the announcement that has been made today by the Chairman, Mao Tse-tung, of Central People’s Government of People’s Republic of China and hope you will transmit it to your Government. I am of opinion that it is necessary for the People’s Republic of China to establish normal diplomatic relations with various nations of the world. Yours faithfully (signed and sealed) Chou En-lai, Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs of Central People’s Government, the People’s Republic of China.”

2. Mr. Ronning’s cable also contained the text of a broadcast statement by Mao Tse-tung, Chairman of the Communist Central Government, announcing the formation of the new Government. Mao said “also decided to legally announce to foreign governments that this government is only legal government to represent people of whole country of People’s Republic of China and that this government is prepared to enter into diplomatic relations with all those foreign governments which will abide by principles of equality, mutual benefit and mutual respect to territorial sovereignty.”

3. Similar communications to that received by Mr. Ronning were sent to representatives of other foreign governments. You will recall that the United Kingdom Consul General in Peking was authorized to reply to the Communist authorities that the matter is being studied and to suggest that in the meantime, if informal relations were established between the Communist authorities and the United Kingdom Consular officers, it would be to the advantage of both countries.

4. We learn from our Embassy in Washington that the United States Consular Representative in Peking has been instructed to reply, in a personal capacity, merely that the communication has been transmitted to the United States Government. The State Department considers that this will leave the door open for further communication without committing the United States Government in any way.

5. Mr. Ronning, in order to take receipt of the communication, had to assure the Foreign Nationals Bureau in Nanking that he is the “Tai Pan” (i.e. Officer in Charge) of the Canadian Embassy.

6. In previous instructions to the Ambassador in Nanking on the subject of relations with the Communists, we have maintained the view that, in accordance with the principles of international law, our Consular officers in China should be permitted to fulfil their functions, without prejudice to the question of recognition of a new regime. It might be as well for Mr. Ronning to make this point when he acknowledges the communication from the Chinese Communist Government. Attached for your consideration is a telegram to Mr. Ronning instructing him to make such acknowledgement orally.†

SOME NOTES ON MR. DAVIS' TALK ON CHINA

1. Mr. Davis said that "if the Communist regime in China is to be stable, it must have an industrial base; they must industrialize if they are to get anywhere". It is hard to see that there is any Western national interest served by assisting the Communist regime in China to become stable or to get anywhere. Nevertheless, the conclusion Mr. Davis draws from his statement is that we should assist the Chinese Communist regime to become industrialized.

2. Mr. Davis said that "if the Communists do not deliver the goods to the people of China and give the people of China the kind of government they want" they will run into the expert passive resistance of the Chinese population. Presumably it is in the Western interest to assist in creating a situation in which the Chinese peasants refuse to cooperate with the Chinese Communist regime. Nevertheless, the conclusion Mr. Davis appeared to draw is the opposite.

3. Mr. Davis said that our policy towards Communist China should be "based on the realistic consideration that the Chinese Communists are there to stay". Presumably the policy of the Western world towards the Soviet Union is based on the realistic consideration that the Communist Government of Russia is there to stay. Mr. Davis' statement does not, therefore, constitute an argument for treating Communist China in any way different from the way we treat Communist Russia.

4. Mr. Davis appeared to make no distinction between long run and short run considerations. He argued that in the long run the Russians could not dominate China. However, the greater the possibility of a general world war with Russia during the course of the next ten years, the more important it is for the Western powers to base their policy not on such long run considerations but on considerations which are valid over the next ten years.

5. One of Mr. Davis' grounds for holding Chiang responsible for the Communist victory is that he could have made a settlement with the Communists several years ago or even six months ago. It is hard to believe that Moscow-trained Chinese Communists¹³ would not have followed the same policy in a coalition government as Moscow-trained Eastern European Communists and that a coalition government would have very quickly become a straight Communist Government. There are so many grounds for attacking Chiang that it seems unfortunate to attack him for what was probably one of the few times he acted sensibly when he rejected United States advice—advice which Mr. Acheson would, I am sure, now regret that the United States ever gave China.

6. Mr. Davis emphasized the incorruptibility and efficiency of the Chinese Communists as contrasted with the Chinese Nationalists. I imagine that many of the very expressions which he used were used frequently by foreign observers in Italy following the coming into power of Mussolini.

7. Mr. Davis emphasized the importance of recognition of the fact that the way to combat the advance of Communism was to raise the standard of living of the people of Asia. He apparently concluded from this that it was in the Western interest to assist in raising the standard of living of Communist China. However, there is only a limited amount of assistance which the West can give to raise the standards of living of the Asiatic peoples; therefore, anything which goes to Communist China will be taken away from what might have gone to South East Asia, India, Pakistan and the Middle East. The logical deduction from Mr. Davis' argument is, therefore, that we should give nothing to China since this would diminish the assistance which we can give to non-Communist Asian states.¹⁴

MEMORANDUM FOR THE MINISTER ON THE RECOGNITION OF THE NEW COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT OF CHINA

Present Position in China

1. The Chinese Communists are in control of the greater part of the mainland of China and will at their timing be in control of the rest. Some time may elapse before they secure control of Formosa but unless there is foreign intervention they will in time secure control thereof.
2. The Communists have set up a government and have solicited recognition from the nations of the world.
3. Russia and her satellites have granted recognition.

¹⁴ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Mr. Reid. I recognize the inconsistencies of T.D.; nevertheless with his most important conclusion viz. that we must recognize the facts of Nationalist bankruptcy & Communist strength I am in complete agreement. Oct. 28 A H[eney]

Should the Western Powers Grant Recognition in Light of these Facts?

4. This involves the question of unconditional recognition or an attempt to recognize on certain conditions. To recognize conditionally means bargaining with the Communists for concessions and agreements in exchange for recognition.

5. I believe that if the new Government is such as to be entitled to recognition in accordance with international usage that unconditional recognition should be granted. I feel that the Communists will accept nothing less than unconditional recognition and to attempt to bargain will be futile and only earn greater enmity from them. In any event, what value would any such conditions have after recognition even if agreed to?

Conclusion

If there is to be recognition, then it should be unconditional.

What Is to Be Gained by Refusing Recognition?

6. Is anything to be gained by non-recognition? What is to be gained by delay in recognition? Will the failure to recognize result in an economic blockade of China or in other words imposition of economic sanctions? Will such blockade have such a serious effect on China as to contribute to the eradication of Communist control of China? Will it force the Communists to accept conditional recognition?

Conclusion

I believe that Communist control of China through their military forces is so secure and will continue to be such that China will continue to be under Communist domination regardless of what transpires in the economic or political field. Communists have control of China not because of approval or consent of the masses but because of defaults of the Nationalists and military power of Communists. To break this control is a long term project and will only result through the failures and defaults of the Communists—internal hardship due to blockade or otherwise will have virtually no effect.

Are the Communists of China Real Communists or a Chinese Special Brand thereof?

7. At this stage there is no use arguing whether Chinese Communists are real Communists or a different brand altogether or whether Russia will dominate and control China as she does her Eastern satellites.

The fact is that a group calling themselves Chinese Communists with a leadership professing a belief in Marxist Communism and recognizing leadership of Russia in this field, controls China.

8. It may be that in the years which lie ahead this group may deviate from Orthodox Communism and refuse to follow the spiritual or actual leadership of Russia. Time alone will answer this question. Personally, I think that China will be China long after Communism ceases to be a factor in the world.

Conclusion

Our policy should be based on the assumption that the Chinese Communists are real Marxian Communists carrying out in China the policies which Russia has adopted within the confines of that country. We should also go on the basis that China will be a complete satellite of Russia in the international and domestic field.

Where Does this Conclusion Lead Us?

10. Can we serve our interests better by sitting on the outside looking in or on the inside looking out with a foot in the door?

Conclusion

(a) By refusing recognition or so long delaying the same as to have same effect, we will drive China into greater dependence on Russia and make China increasingly hostile to Western world,

(b) By recognizing the new regime and thereby regularizing relations and enabling contacts to be made, we will make possible the influencing of future trends in China by the Western Powers.

Final Conclusion on Recognition

Canada should grant the early unconditional recognition of Communist regime in China.

Timing of Recognition

11. The actual matter for consideration is one of timing. No one knows what the United States will do and it is doubtful if they know themselves. They are sure to procrastinate for months and I think we may assume non-recognition by the United States for at least a year. This conclusion may be wrong.

12. Every attempt should be made to secure common action by Western Nations but if United States cannot make up her mind within a reasonable time, then rest of the Nations should attempt to coordinate theirs.

13. The United Kingdom will want to recognize at once as will India.

14. There should not be too much haste but no undue delay. Action should be taken in a month or so, preferably after the conclusion of present sitting of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

15. If the United Kingdom decides to act, perhaps other Western Nations should recognize one at a time with some space between instead of all acting at once and emphasizing American position. Successive recognition may give United States time to formulate policy and not put United States on spot as only nation withholding recognition. We must not forget that trade opportunities will open up on recognition and you can rest assured that the British will make hay while the sun shines. We had better get in soon enough to prevent our finding ourselves in an unfavourable position. Remember "too little and too late."

Conclusion

That United Kingdom use her own judgment as to when she grants recognition. If she decides to do so that other Powers act successively and that Canada move in behind India and perhaps some Western European Powers.

POLICY TOWARDS COMMUNIST CHINA¹⁵

I. SIGNIFICANCE OF COMMUNIST ACCESSION TO POWER IN CHINA

A. For China

The Chinese Communist Party now controls all of continental China except a sizeable pocket in the Southwest (Kwangsi, Kweichow, Yunnan, Szechwan and Sikang) and fragmented areas in the Northwest. Although remaining National Government forces in these areas are still substantial (350,000), morale is low and the areas can be expected to fall under Communist control inside the next year. Formosa, with 400,000 troops, naval units, airforce and $300 million gold reserves under the control of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, is more defensible. However, reports indicate that morale is low on the island also and present expectations are that the Communists may not have too great difficulty in picking off this island.

2. The "Central Government of the People's Republic of China" was proclaimed in Peking on October 1, 1949, with Mao Tse-tung as President and Chou En-lai as Premier and Foreign Minister. Other cooperating parties and individuals are represented, but effective control is held by the Chinese Communist Party.

3. The new regime has invited recognition from foreign governments on a basis of equality, friendship, respect for territorial integrity and withdrawal of recognition from the National Government. The Soviet Union and its satellites, including Yugoslavia, promptly accorded recognition on this basis. No other state has yet done so.

4. The significance of these developments for the Chinese people is probably more profound than most of them realize. A small revolutionary party, espousing an alien philosophy and looking to the Soviet Union as the laboratory of that philosophy and as a guide in international relations, has seized military and governmental power. They have done so by riding in on the crest of a wave of peasant revolt begun 100 years ago during the great Tai-ping Rebellion, by building a tough peasant army during the war of resistance to Japan, by exploiting the failures of the National Government, and by shrewd political manoeuvring in the Chinese manner. They have absorbed some non-Communist "liberal" elements within the structure of their government, but power rests firmly in Communist hands through control of the key posts. Having secured the upper hand they must now use it to govern 450 million individualistic, tradition-steeped Chinese spread over a relatively poor and underdeveloped country.

5. In the fields of economics, land redistribution will probably be carried out to the extent that large landowners will be eliminated. Considerable constraint must be applied to the farmers, however, to ensure that the rural areas contribute towards the promotion of industry. Industrialization of the country will be a prime objective of the regime. To attain this end, farmers, capital and labour will be expected to cooperate. An end will be put to the operation of "bureaucratic" capitalists, such as the Soong family, but at the present stage "patriotic" or "right-minded" capitalists will be permitted to function.

6. China will probably not be a significant military power for some years to come, but her military efficiency will be improved under the Communists. China must now be regarded as a potential enemy state and would probably side with Russia in the event of a general war breaking out at this time.

B. For South-East Asia

7. Throughout the territories of South East Asia, Communist parties of varying degrees of strength and energy are causing disturbances. There are, of course, indigenous factors which encourage the spread of communism in South East Asia. In some areas, such as Indo-China, Indonesia and Malaya, the native urge for self-government is strong. In these countries the Communists identify themselves with the call for national self-expression. Where this has been achieved, as in Burma, the Communists become ultra-nationalistic, so that they may attack the established governments. They are aided by the economic difficulties which beset these governments. Communist agitation has fertile ground to work upon, for the war has left the territories of South East Asia in a sorry economic state, wherein dissatisfaction is easily bred and the people still harbour deep anti-colonial feelings.

8. The Chinese Communists, as a result of their victory must inevitably exert a powerful influence upon the other Communist groups in Asia. That there is cooperation and exchange of information between Communists in the various territories of South East Asia has been confirmed by intelligence reports. The Chinese Communists are the most experienced and strongest party and their leader, Mao Tse-tung, speaks with authority on doctrine and tactics. They are able to maintain contact with Communists in territories of South East Asia through the large Chinese populations in these areas. It has long been the policy of the Chinese to exert influence in other countries through overseas Chinese populations. Then too the Communists in China have grappled with the problem of adapting the theories of Communism to a primarily agricultural state and are conversant therefore with conditions which would be encountered by a Communist regime gaining power in South East Asia. It is true that throughout South East Asia there is considerable fear of Chinese expansion. In foreign policy, however, the Chinese Communists have adhered closely to the orthodox Cominform line and they can therefore present themselves to co-workers in other countries as an international party.

9. When the Communists have established themselves in a South and West China, they will be in position to bring direct pressure to bear upon Hong Kong, Indo-China, Burma and Tibet, not only by means of propaganda, but also by such activities as the supplying of arms to Communist dissidents, or even by aggressive military action.

C. For Western Powers

10. Accession to power of the Communists in China has confronted Atlantic Pact powers with considerable strategic and political problems. The American position in Japan has been threatened by the establishment of a potentially hostile power on the Chinese mainland, undermining the usefulness of Korea and Formosa, as military bases. In South East Asia, the source of vital raw materials, the strategic position of the Western Powers is threatened by the menace of the spread of communism, given impetus by successes scored in China.

11. As regards China itself, the powers are confronted with the emergence of another Communist state which may succeed in gaining international recognition, resulting in the Soviet Bloc obtaining another seat on the Security Council of the United Nations. It cannot be judged at this time, however, whether China would be a servile follower of Russia in all United Nations deliberations. Communism would gain a stronger role in the direction of Asian affairs through Chinese membership on the Far Eastern Commission, the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, and the Allied Council for Japan. A further consequence would be the dissemination of Communist propaganda abroad through diplomatic missions and overseas Chinese communities.

D. For the Soviet Union

12. Soviet Russia will replace the United States as the most influential foreign country in China. Russian political prestige and influence will increase not only in China, but also in South East Asia and in fact throughout the whole of the Far East. Russia will thus be provided with an opportunity to attempt to distract the Western powers from their work for the political and economic restoration of Western Europe and to try to divide them from one another by endeavouring to exploit any differences in their counter-measures in the Far East.

13. As regards China, it is thought possible that, because of the strongly ingrained Chinese dislike and suspicion of foreign meddling and in view of the independent growth of the Chinese Communist Party, the degree of influence exercised upon China by Soviet Russia may be in inverse ratio to the extent of direct Soviet interference in Chinese affairs. It may be that the rulers of Soviet Russia, mindful of the lesson taught in Eastern Europe, will be willing to permit Chinese Communism to develop along nationalistic lines.

14. Assuming that, in the event of war, China would be aligned with Russia, the Soviet Armed Forces would stand to obtain military bases in China which would afford depth protection to the Eastern territories of the Soviet Union, and would increase the range of possible Russian offensive action in the Far East. The immense resources of China's manpower would also probably be made available to the Soviet Union for military or labour service. In any event, Russia will, in all likelihood, have free access to such strategic materials, which are produced in China, as tungsten, tin and antimony (China is the only country in the world having antimony in supplies adequate for export).

II. WESTERN POLICY TOWARDS COMMUNIST CHINA—ALTERNATIVES

15. It is necessary to consider the tactical objectives of Western policy towards Communist China, granted that the main strategical aim should be directed towards attempts to prevent the Chinese Communists from

- (i) Tipping the scales in other parts of the Far East in favour of Communism.
- (ii) Imposing upon China a thoroughgoing totalitarian Communist system.
- (iii) Making China a satellite or an effective ally of the Soviet Union.

These admittedly are negative objectives, but probably easier, on that account, to secure agreement upon at this stage. To attain these objectives there would seem to be two alternative approaches. The Western Powers might either attempt to promote by negative and positive actions increasing discontent and disorder in Communist China, with the intent of making the task of the Chinese Communist Government as difficult as possible; or they might attempt to prevent China from falling completely within the Soviet orbit by seeking to maintain as many as possible of the links between China and the Western world, and endeavouring to strengthen and assist the more moderate elements in the Chinese Government.

16. An appraisal of these alternatives requires an analysis of two major aspects of the problem: A. the likelihood of the Communist regime getting a firm grip upon China, and B. the likelihood of the Chinese Communists permitting their country to become closely integrated with the Soviet system. Since cogent arguments may be advanced both for and against each of these suppositions, they will be considered separately.

A. Likelihood of the Communist Regime Getting a Firm Grip upon China

17. Arguments for:

(i) Organized military resistance in China has all but collapsed and there seems nothing to prevent the comparatively efficient Communist armies from establishing control over most of China proper.

(ii) The Communist leaders, capable and resolute, are at the head of a strong, coherent central government, organized on the principle of state control both of thought (through propaganda methods and control of news dissemination and of education) and activity (by control of trade, banking and communications).

(iii) The notorious political inertia of the Chinese masses may well cause them to fall easily under the domination of a determined few who possess the sources of power and who know how to use it.

(iv) In contrast to the cynical behaviour of the Kuomintang regime, the Communists have so far been able to give at least the illusion that they are governing for the benefit of the country and of the people.

18. Arguments against:

(i) Geographically China is and always has been most difficult to rule as a unit, not only because of its size, but also because formidable natural barriers divide it up into sections. Lack of communication facilities renders the task of centralized control more difficult, hence some of the distant outlying regions have frequently been able to maintain themselves in a state of semi-autonomy.

(ii) The task of administering all China is at the present time beyond the capacity of the Communists by themselves. They have had to enlist the aid of many who, while not adherents of Communism, are nevertheless ready to support the Communists, either for reasons of practical expediency or because this was the only way by which they could express opposition to what they regarded as a corrupt and inefficient Kuomintang regime; these include many civil servants, technicians, bankers and business men, liberal politicians, non-party intellectuals and even former Nationalist generals. Together with the inert mass of the peasantry, they will provide stubborn opposition to the thorough-going communisation of China.

B. Likelihood of the Chinese Communists Permitting Their Country to Become Closely Integrated with the Soviet System

19. Arguments for:

(i) Alliance with the Soviet Union would have much to offer the Chinese Communists at the moment:—great moral and some material support for the carrying out of the revolutionary programme, military security, and a bargaining position from which to deal with other nations.

(ii) There exists a tradition of intimate relationship between Soviet Russia and the Chinese Communist Party, which was founded under the auspices of the Third International and the guidance of Russian advisers.

(iii) Mao Tse-tung, who was a member of the Executive Committee of the (Soviet) Comintern until its "dissolution" in 1943, has guided his party along a fairly orthodox Marxist-Leninist course.

(iv) In foreign affairs, the Chinese Communist Party has so far followed the Moscow line, including the passing of censure on Tito of Yugoslavia.

(v) The Chinese Communist Government has already been recognized by the Soviet Bloc.

20. Arguments against:

(i) There are natural points of conflict between Soviet Russia and Communist China. Chinese national interests are presently or potentially threatened by Soviet imperialism. In Manchuria the terms of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of 1945 gave Russia a military and naval base in Dairen and joint control of the former Chinese Eastern Railways. A considerable part of Northwestern Manchuria has already come under Soviet domination, and Soviet pressure upon Manchuria, China's richest area, is increased by Russian control of North Korea. Russian seizure of Manchuria's industry in 1945-6 wrought great devastation on territory which would be the first to come under the control of the Chinese Communists. Soviet pressure is, in fact, felt all along the extensive Sino-Soviet border. A section of the far western province of Sinkiang has already passed under Soviet control and Soviet agents are active in Inner Mongolia and amongst the Mongols and Moslems of the North West.

(ii) The Chinese are strongly xenophobic and Mao and his colleagues will probably resent encroachments by Russia as much as those perpetrated by other powers.

(iii) The Chinese Communist Party fought a long drawn-out war for its existence apparently without direct aid from Soviet Russia.

(iv) Mao Tse-tung has given evidence that he regards himself as the absolute authority for the Chinese Communist Party and that he may not be willing to subordinate what he considers to be the interests of China to any other interests.

(v) China is not dominated by Russia, as the European satellites are, because of size and proximity.

(vi) The Chinese are the natural leaders of Communism in Asia; this may not be to the Soviet liking.

(vii) The Chinese Communists need capital goods for the carrying out of their industrial programme. The Atlantic Pact Powers can more easily supply these goods than can Russia.

(viii) The Chinese have for long been enthusiastic foreign traders. They have a vast maritime seaboard from which the main channels of commercial traffic have naturally been across the Pacific and towards the Indian Ocean.

21. To sum up, one might conclude that the Chinese Communists will probably be able to establish soon a fairly firm grip over most of China, but, for a considerable period, they will be compelled to rely on the cooperation (obtained by whatever means) of large non-Communist elements. It is impossible at this stage to estimate the degree of relationship which will exist between Communist China and Soviet Russia.

III. TRENDS OF POLICY—OTHER COUNTRIES

22. It is still too early to perceive a clearly defined policy on the part of any North Atlantic country towards the Chinese Communists but in some cases there are discernible trends.

A. United Kingdom Policy

23. The British line in general is to face the fact of Communist control of China and make the best of it. It seems likely that the British would be in favour of recognizing the Communist Central Government, when it has given evidence that it could effectively control most of the country, on the principle that recognition is one of fait accompli and does not constitute moral approbation. The British incline towards the view that commercial relations with China (other than traffic in materials of definite strategic value) would not greatly strengthen the country from a military point of view, but, by enabling the democracies to "keep a foot in the door", might combat the tightening of relations between Communist China and Russia. Withholding of goods needed by China might cause hardship, but the British doubt that it would undermine the Communist regime.

24. The British attitude is naturally coloured by the fact that they have extensive vested commercial interests in China and by their desire to keep Hong Kong functioning as a wealthy entrepôt.

25. The United Kingdom Government has not appointed a Chargé d'Affaires to accompany the fugitive Nationalist Government; after the withdrawal of Sir Ralph Stevenson, the Minister (Commercial) assumed charge of the British Embassy in Nanking. British Consulates within Communist territory are remaining open and the British are making efforts to establish "informal consular relations" with the Communist authorities.

26. The United Kingdom Government has instructed its Delegation in New York to abstain from all discussions and voting during the debate in the United Nations on the Chinese complaint against Soviet Russia's alleged violations of the Sino-Soviet Treaty and of the Charter of the United Nations.

B. United States Policy

27. The United States attitude has so far been less positive than the British. Issue of the "White Paper" on China by the State Department has left no doubt about the fact that the United States Government considers the Nationalist Government of China to be totally bankrupt and unworthy of further support. On the other hand, the effect upon public opinion of the realization of failure of American policy in China makes it inevitable that the United States Government will be very cautious over reaching conclusions about a new China policy. The President has appointed a Panel of Special Advisers on China.

28. For the United States it is probable that the strategic considerations weigh heavier than economic, in the matter of relationship with the Chinese Communists. The extent of the United States commercial stake in China does not approximate the British. The United States Government has so far evinced a disposition to regard Communist China as within a hostile camp and therefore as a country which should not be assisted. Isolation might cause distress and disaffection within China, possibly imposing so severe a strain upon the Communist Government as to cause its marked weakening or collapse. The State Department has already intervened to prevent deals being concluded by American commercial concerns with the Communists. There is no doubt, however, that strong opposition to this line will be felt from American business interests.

29. It is not likely that the United States Government will be willing to extend early recognition to the Chinese Communist Government. An undertaking has been given to Congress that the Government will not accord recognition without consulting that body. The United States may possibly attempt to dissuade the British from hasty action in recognizing the Communist regime. In any event, the United States Government has reiterated the desirability of close consultation with other friendly powers, in order to maintain a common front in the matter.

30. The United States still maintains liaison with the Nationalist Government. With the recall of Ambassador Stuart from Nanking, the United States Government appointed a Chargé d'Affaires to conduct relations with the Nationalist Government at Canton. Subsequent to the fall of Canton, an officer was sent to the New provisional capital at Chungking in the capacity of Chargé d'Affaires. Many of the United States Consulates in Communist-held China have been closed down and others greatly reduced in strength, the State Department regarding its officials in Communist China in the light of hostages (where United States Consulates have been closed, United Kingdom Consulates have assumed protection of American interests, so far as that is possible).

31. The United States Delegation at the United Nations is apparently prepared to discuss the Chinese complaint against Russia.

C. Indian Policy

32. India has given signs that she would be disposed to accord early recognition to the Chinese Communist Government, once that Government became effectively established. It is possible that India might even anticipate the United Kingdom in this regard. The Indian attitude appears to be based on the idea that the establishment of relations with the Peking Government would afford the best chance of Communist China developing along nationalist rather than satellite lines. It is not unnatural for India, the most important country in Asia, to give the lead in this matter. As an Asiatic power and former subject territory, India is not likely to be greatly apprehensive of the economic and social aspect of the revolution in China; India does, however, dislike the autocratic characteristics of the Communist Government and is suspicious of Chinese expansionism (infiltration into Tibet would bring the Chinese Communists upon India's border).

IV. PRECAUTIONS TO BE TAKEN

33. On the assumption that the Chinese People's Government is a regular Communist regime, it is incumbent upon the Western Powers to take thought as to what precautionary steps should be taken or encouraged immediately.

A. Counter-measures in China

34. It appears that China must now be written off from a military point of view and that no purpose would be served by actively supporting groups still opposing the Communists in the field. There is, in fact, considerable danger that materials sent to such groups would ultimately find their way into Communist hands.

35. It is open to question whether either of the alternative policies discussed in paragraph 12 above would effectively lessen Communist pressure upon South East Asia.

B. Counter-Measures Outside China

36. (i) Supervision, from the security point of view, of Overseas Chinese communities and of Chinese immigration.

(ii) Prohibition of the export of strategic materials to China.

(iii) Monitoring and countering of Chinese Communist propaganda, particularly in South East Asia.

(iv) Guarding against "gun-running" from China into neighbouring states, for the arming of insurgent elements, and against the despatch from China of agents.

(v) A review of the overall strategic position in the Far East.

37. There is danger of the East collapsing before the Communist tide, while the democratic nations devote most of their strength and resources towards bolstering their position in other areas. The fall of the East to Communism would entail the loss to the democratic powers of a store of vital strategic materials.

38. It would clearly not be in the interests of the Western powers to conclude a peace treaty with Japan without making adequate security arrangements to protect their strategic position in the Pacific. The United States might deem it necessary to postpone further the convening of a Peace Conference for Japan.

39. The most effective antidote to the spread of Communism throughout South East Asia would be the promotion of economic prosperity and social stability, the encouragement of legitimate nationalistic aspirations (e.g. Indonesia, Indo-China) and the strengthening of existing moderate native governments (e.g. Burma). Communism is taking advantage of post-war economic disintegration to cause trouble both to newly established native governments whose nationalistic instincts do not prompt them to look with favour upon Communism, and to colonial administration.

40. To achieve results it would probably be necessary for the interested Western powers to agree upon coordinated action (economic, political, military) to stem the tide of Communism in the East, as they have done in Europe. Perspective must be kept in view, however, since the strategic importance of the Far East to the Atlantic Pact powers is counted after that of Europe and the Middle East. Faced with the probability that Communist pressure can be exerted simultaneously in all these regions, it is a matter for fine calculation as to the resources which may be expended to bulwark the Far East, without doing fatal damage to the position of the democracies in Europe and the Middle East.

V. GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

41. It would seem premature at this time to attempt to evolve a decisive policy towards Communist China. On an assessment, however, of the factors mentioned in Section II above, it might seem worth while for the democratic powers to accept the risk of according recognition to the Chinese Communists before being confronted with the necessity of doing so (since recognition will probably have to be given ultimately) and even maintaining commercial relations with them, providing they gave evidence of according some quid pro quo (it should be remembered that trade could at any moment be shut off). Taking it that (1) the Communists are relying today on the assistance of considerable non-Communist elements and (2) natural points of conflict between Communist China and Soviet Russia exist, then the according of recognition and maintenance of commercial relations by the Western Powers might (a) strengthen the position of the non-Communist elements in China; (b) keep open channels for the infiltration of democratic propaganda through the activities of Western businessmen, missionaries, etc; (c) encourage conditions favourable to the exploitation of the natural points of conflict between China and Russia, by keeping China dependent upon imports from the West for her economic well-being and progress. So long as the Soviet and satellite ambassadors are left in Peking untroubled by Western rivals, they will be able to exert the maximum influence upon the Communists at a time when the latter may be at an impressionable stage, i.e., it is possible that the mind of the Chinese Communist Government is not yet closed as far as foreign relationships go.

42. Since the Western Powers are prepared to count China within the Communist Camp, they would apparently stand to gain more if this policy were successful and China were kept from full investigation with the Soviet, than they would lose if it failed. In the latter contingency impetus would have been given to the industrial capacity of a potential enemy but China has far to go before her industrial capacity can be significant in a military sense. It is doubtful whether refusal of the Western Powers to trade with China would bring down the Communist Government. In that event the Communist leaders, ruthless and with power in their hands, would probably forego for the time being their programme for industrial development, concentrating upon agriculture (for China is now primarily an agriculture state), building up small domestic industry and shopping for capital goods wherever they could obtain them (Russia and her satellites could probably ship a certain amount of these materials to China).

43. In short, the Western Powers should prepare against the worst results ensuing from the Communist victory in China but they might take positive steps to lessen the effects of this victory.

VI. CANADIAN INTERESTS

44. The above general conclusions may be related to Canadian policy with regard to the following matters: A. Domestic Security, B. Relations with Communist China.

A. Domestic Security

45. Canada has a large and highly organized Chinese population, which has characteristically remained closely attuned to the political situation "at home". To what extent this community is open to Communist infiltration is not known. It has, however, been suggested to the Security Panel that steps be taken to keep watch upon the activities of the Chinese in Canada from a security point of view, and to consider what, if any, further precautions should be taken with regard to Chinese immigration.

B. Relations with Communist China

46. Canadian interests in China are not extensive. It would not be appropriate, therefore, for Canada to take the initiative with regard to relations with Communist China, nor, from the point of view of public opinion, would it be politically wise to do so. The United Kingdom, United States, and other interested governments, including Canada, are consulting about these matters, endeavouring to reach agreement as to when or if recognition should be accorded and what type of export controls should be applied to trade with China.

47. In the matter of export controls, it is not practicable for Canada to be at great variance from the United States. It is recommended that, after controls on exports to China have been instituted by the United States, we should, if requested by the United States or the United Kingdom, agree to put China under "area control" and prohibit the export of "1 (a) list" goods, i.e. goods of definite strategic value. It is considered, however, that we should approve the export of other items, provided the amounts are consonant with normal Chinese requirements.

48. With regard to recognition, we have conveyed to the Communist regime that we are studying their communication to the effect that diplomatic relations should be entered into and have observed that in the meantime, and without prejudice to the question of recognition, our consular officers should be permitted to carry out their normal functions.

49. It is considered that we should make no move towards recognition before India and the United Kingdom, but we should be prepared to consider recognizing the Communist Government in China shortly after the United Kingdom and India have done so. Meanwhile, despite the fact that no official status is now accorded to our representatives in China, we should, in anticipation that recognition will ultimately be extended, maintain our Embassy Office in Nanking and our Consulate General in Shanghai, and should suggest to the Department of Trade and Commerce the advisability of retaining the Commercial Secretary in Shanghai. We should not send officers to the Communist capital, Peking, at this time.

50. Particular Canadian interests, which should be consulted, when considering the establishment of relations with the Chinese Communists, are:

(1) The non-military portion of the Sino-Canadian loan of 1945 (it would be useful, for the purposes of re-negotiation, to take steps to have an inventory prepared of the goods purchased under the loan and their disposition).

(2) The Ming Sung Loan of 1946 (guaranteed by the Canadian Government).

(3) Welfare of Canadian missionaries. (It should be remembered that there are still some 250 Canadian missionaries in areas remaining under Nationalist control.)

(4) Activities of Canadian commercial concerns, such as the Canadian Pacific Steamships, Canadian Pacific Airways, Aluminum Limited, etc.

(5) Canadian property rights (re-registration, etc.).

(6) Freedom of travel for Canadians.

You will recall that we recently sent to the High Commissioner in London, who was about to attend a meeting on China between the Commonwealth High Commissioners and Mr. Bevin,¹⁶ our preliminary views concerning recognition of the Chinese Communist Government. You wished Cabinet to be informed of the action taken. Mr. Wilgress was therefore told that the preliminary Canadian views were subject to confirmation by Cabinet. CHINA SITUATION—RECENT DEVELOPMENTS (RELATIONS WITH CHINESE COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT)

I. United Kingdom Aide Memoire

On October 31 our High Commissioner in London received from the United Kingdom Government an aide memoire, giving their views concerning recognition of the Chinese Communist Government. Before reaching a decision, they wished to consult other Commonwealth Governments and it was proposed that this should be done at a meeting between Mr. Bevin and Commonwealth High Commissioners in London on November 10. No report of the meeting has yet been received.

2. The United Kingdom conclusion is that on political, legal and practical grounds de jure recognition should be accorded the Chinese Communist Government, which now controls most of the Chinese mainland. Their view is that establishment of diplomatic and commercial relations with the Communist regime might help to prevent the cementing of relations between China and Russia. It is apparently their intention not to endeavour to extract firm guarantees from the Peking Government, but to assume that the Communists would inherit the obligations and treaties of the Nationalist Government with the according of recognition.

II. Views of Other Countries

3. India is apparently¹⁷ disposed to accord early recognition, as affording the best chance of Communist China developing along nationalist rather than satellite lines. Australia is likely to follow the United Kingdom lead. France and the Netherlands seemingly accept the principle of recognition, but would not wish it to be accorded ¹⁶ Un rapport de cette réunion fut divulguée à la presse, apparemment par le Foreign Office. La Gazette de Montréal en publia un compte rendu le 21 novembre 1949.

A report of this meeting was leaked to the press, apparently by the British Foreign Office. The Montreal Gazette published an account on November 21, 1949.

¹⁷ Un échange subséquent fournit au gouvernement canadien un exposé détaillé du point de vue indien, lequel était semblable au point de vue canadien.

A subsequent exchange provided the Canadian government with a detailed exposition of Indian views, which were similar to Canadian ones.

before the new year. The United States, influenced largely by strategic considerations, would not be in favour of early recognition.

III. Preliminary Canadian Views

4. The Canadian Ambassador to China, Mr. T.C. Davis, who has returned for consultation, advises that there is no prospect of the Nationalist Government maintaining resistance; that ultimate recognition will have to be accorded the Communist regime; and that, for the protection of our interests in China, we should be prepared to extend recognition at the appropriate time.

5. As a result of discussions held within the Department, the following preliminary conclusions have been reached:

6. The Chinese Communist Government has now pretty well fulfilled the usual requirements in international law for de jure recognition. It has effective control over most of China; governs with the apparent acquiescence of the majority of the population; and seems to be free from direct external control.

7. The political arguments in favour of recognition without too great delay appear to outweigh those against recognition. Since the Communists in China are relying today upon the assistance of considerable non-Communist elements and since natural points of conflict exist between China and Soviet Russia, the according of recognition and the maintaining of relations by the Western Powers might:

(1) Strengthen the position of the non-Communist elements in China;

(2) Keep open channels for the infiltration of democratic propaganda through the activities of Western business men, missionaries, etc.;

(3) Encourage conditions favourable to the exploitation of the natural points of conflict between China and Russia, by keeping China dependent upon imports from the West, for her economic well being and progress.

Inasmuch as the Western Powers are prepared to count China within the Communist camp, they would apparently stand to gain more if this policy were successful and if China were kept from full integration with the Soviet than they would lose if it failed.

8. Canadian interests in China are not great, hence it would clearly be inappropriate for Canada to take the initiative regarding recognition. It would seem desirable that no move should be made until after the present Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

IV. Instructions to the High Commissioner in London

9. As time was too short to refer the matter to Cabinet, the Canadian High Commissioner in London was instructed to present preliminary Canadian views, in accordance with these conclusions, and to observe that the views expressed were subject to confirmation by Cabinet. The High Commissioner was informed that we were inclined to consider granting de jure recognition to the Chinese Communist Government, but that we would not do this before the United Kingdom, or probably India (as the leading Asiatic nation). We emphasized the importance of continued close consultation between North Atlantic and Commonwealth powers on the matter of recognition of the Peking Government.

V. Future action

10. It was considered necessary to arrive at a preliminary view concerning relations with the Communist Government in China, not only in order to advise the Canadian High Commissioner in London as to what line he should take at the Conference with Mr. Bevin, but also to clarify our attitude regarding such topical questions as export control to China, the Chinese Government's complaint to the United Nations against Russia, etc. Reference will, of course, be made to Cabinet before any action towards recognition is taken.

CHINA; RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said it was anticipated that the U.K. government would extend de facto recognition to the Chinese Communist government before the end of the year. Similar action would probably be taken by other countries.

Recent developments indicated that the Chinese Communists would probably have gained effective control of most, if not all, continental China in a relatively short time. In the circumstances, it was suggested that Canada should, at some future date, extend recognition to the new Chinese government but that no action should be taken in this matter prior to the conclusion of the present session of the U.N. General Assembly.

(External Affairs memorandum, Nov. 16, 1949).

16. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved in principle extension of recognition to the Chinese Communist government but deferred decision as to when such action might be taken.

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade des États-Unis pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Aide-Mémoire from Embassy of United States to Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, November 21, 1949

AIDE-MEMOIRE

The Embassy of the United States of America at Ottawa has been instructed to transmit to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the following personal message from the Secretary of State of the United States:

"I would like to emphasize the importance of concerted action by those countries which respect international law to protest the treatment being accorded United States Consular personnel in Mukden, China. Since late November 1948 the entire United States Consular staff and their families have been detained under house arrest inside the Consular compounds. All communications between the staff and the United States Government have been strictly controlled by the local authorities, and there was one period of almost seven months when no communication of any kind was possible. At the present time communication is permitted only at the will of the local authorities, and it is not possible for the Consular staff to report their situation in an effective manner.

"Because of this kind of treatment it was impossible for the Consulate to perform any of its functions, and on May 19, 1949, the United States Consul General at Peiping, under instructions from the United States Government, notified the appropriate authorities there that the Consulate was being closed, and asked that arrangements be made for the safe exit of the Consular personnel and their families. On June 21, 1949, the Communist authorities at Mukden notified the Consul General that he and his staff would be permitted to depart and that transportation facilities would be made available.

"These assurances have not been honored. On October 25 the Chinese Communist press and radio announced that Consul General Angus Ward and four members of his staff had been arrested on October 24, 1949. So far as is known, they have been in prison since that time. The local authorities at Mukden have not permitted the Consular staff to make a report concerning the facts in the case. So far as the United States Government has been able to determine, the Consular staff has not been permitted to get in touch with Mr. Ward or the four members of his staff, and has not been informed of the date of any hearings which may be held or permitted to make arrangements to protect Mr. Ward's interest at such hearings. The United States Government has not been informed in any way, except by press and radio reports, of the reasons for the arrest of Mr. Ward and the four members of his staff. The efforts of the United States Consul General at Peiping to determine the facts in the case and secure the release of Mr. Ward and the others have been completely ignored.

"The international practice of civilized countries for many years has recognized that Consuls should be accorded all the privileges necessary for the proper conduct of their duties. Although Consuls do not have diplomatic immunity, it has been the universal practice, because of the public and official character of their duties, to permit them and their staff freedom of movement, and in the event that any criminal charge is made, to permit them to remain at liberty on proper arrangements for bail, with unlimited freedom to communicate with their governments with respect to official business.

"The treatment accorded to Mr. Ward and to the American Consular staff in Mukden is in direct violation of the basic concepts of international relations which have been developed throughout the centuries. As such, it is of direct and immediate concern to all countries interested in diplomatic intercourse, particularly to those with missions or Consulates in China. I ask you, as a matter of urgency, to express to the highest Chinese authorities in Peiping, through such channels as may be available to you, the concern which your Government undoubtedly feels over the treatment of the American Consular staff in Mukden who have been arbitrarily deprived of their freedom for one year. I am sending a similar communication to the Foreign Ministers of other countries which have representatives in China.”

The Embassy will be grateful if the Department of External Affairs will keep the Embassy informed of any action taken by the Canadian authorities.

It may be added that the Department of State does not consider that there is any implication of recognition in the proposed approach envisaged by this Aide Memoire.

TELEGRAM 419

New York, December 2, 1949

Following for Heeney from Pearson, Begins: Your telegram No. 368 attached of December 1st,† containing draft reply to personal message from Mr. Acheson concerning arrest of Angus Ward and members of his staff.

In view of the fact that Ward and the members of his staff have been released since Mr. Acheson's message was received, it occurs to me a brief reply is all that is required. I am also concerned with the possibility that we may in the future be put in a similar position and might wish to ask the United States and other nations for support. In the circumstances, I would suggest that the draft reply be shortened to read as follows:

Text begins:

The Department of External Affairs has been instructed to transmit to the Embassy of the United States of America the following personal message from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Secretary of State of the United States:

I wish to acknowledge your message of November 21st concerning the treatment accorded United States Consular personnel in Mukden, China.

I can assure you that I have been very much concerned about the arrest and detention of Mr. Ward and members of his staff. The authorities of the Peiping Regime have already been informed of the view of my Government that in accordance with international practice, Consular officers should be allowed to carry out their normal functions regardless of the administrative changes which might take place in the territory in which they reside and without prejudice to the question of diplomatic recognition.

Although Mr. Ward and the members of his staff have happily been released since I received your message, since this case calls into question a principle sanctioned by international practice, I have been glad to request the Canadian representative who is located in Nanking to bring our concern in this matter to the attention of the Peiping authorities. Text ends.

RECOGNITION OF THE CHINESE COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT

Attached is a copy of a letter dated December 17, 1949, from the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom to the Prime Minister,† enclosing a personal message from Mr. Attlee to Mr. St. Laurent† on the subject of recognition of the Peiping regime in China.

2. The United Kingdom Prime Minister's message states that his Government has reached a decision in principle to accord de jure recognition to the Chinese Communist Government and indicates that January 2, 1950, is being considered as a date for taking action in the matter. The United Kingdom message enquires whether the Canadian Government would be disposed to take parallel action on or about the time suggested.

3. I attach, for your consideration, a proposed message of reply from Mr. St. Laurent to Mr. Attlee,† which you might wish to discuss with the Prime Minister. The draft reply concurs in the principle of extending recognition to the Peiping regime but states that we should wish to review the situation in the light of the discussions at the Colombo Conference and would not be likely therefore to give further consideration to the matter until after your return in mid-February.¹⁸

4. With regard to repercussions in the United Nations, we had previously informed both the United Kingdom and Indian Governments that we did not think that any move should be made towards recognition of the Chinese Communist regime before the end of the Fourth Session of the General Assembly. Moreover, we specifically drew the attention of the United Kingdom Government, through Mr. Wilgress, to our concern about the course of events in the United Nations, after the granting of recognition by some countries to the Peiping regime. In view of these representations no further mention of the United Nations situation has been made in the proposed reply to Mr. Attlee. Since simultaneous action is not possible there must ensue a period of transition, when some members of the United Nations have recognized the Chinese Communists and others have not. From our point of view, since Canada ceases to be a member of the Security Council on January 1st, this transition period may as well be faced at the beginning of the year as a little later. It is noteworthy that Soviet Russia, which recognized the Peiping Government some time ago, has not yet made an issue over the credentials of the Chinese delegate and it is not likely that the British will be the first to do so.

This draft was approved by the Cabinet at its meeting on December 21-22.

5. You will recall that the Cabinet, on November 16th, approved recognition of the Chinese Communist regime in principle but deferred consideration of the question of timing. We informed the Indian Government on December 2nd that we wished to consider the whole question after the Colombo Conference (our High Commissioner in India has been informed officially that the Indian Government proposes to recognize the Chinese Communist regime on December 30th).

6. I do not think, therefore, that we should act before your return from the East. Canadian interests are not such as to demand precipitate action by us and it would not be wise for us to get too far ahead of public opinion. Certainly United States public opinion is not yet ready to accept the idea of recognition of the Chinese Communist regime and the United States Government is treading very warily in the matter. We cannot disregard the effect of the reporting of United States news agencies and of the radio upon Canadian public opinion. There is, moreover, the possibility that the Chinese Nationalist Government will meet the interest payment on the Sino-Canadian loan, which falls due on December 31st, through an arrangement involving the sale of antimony.

7. Extended delay in according recognition would be disadvantageous, however, because (1) representatives of non-recognizing powers might be expelled from China with consequent discrimination against the citizens of those countries resident in China; (2) once recognition had been accorded by other Commonwealth Powers, it would probably have unfavourable effect upon Canadian interests in China if we waited until confronted with the necessity of extending recognition.

8. It should be borne in mind that if we accord recognition to the Chinese Communists when the House of Commons is sitting, a general debate on the question may be necessary before action is taken. You will recall that on November 22nd the Prime Minister, in answer to questions by Mr. Drew,¹⁹ indicated the possibility of such a debate. In view, however, of the fact that Mr. Drew and Mr. Coldwell²⁰ have had an opportunity to study the departmental memorandum on Policy Towards Communist China, the Prime Minister might think it sufficient to hold a preliminary discussion with you and the leaders of the Opposition, before taking action to recognize the Chinese Communist Government.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN INDONESIA

I refer to your memorandum of December 23, attached,† regarding Canadian representation in Indonesia.

2. I agree that consideration should be given as soon as possible to the question of Canadian representation in Indonesia. I think General McNaughton has made a good point in saying that we should capitalize on the good will that our participation in the Security Council's solution of the Indonesian question²¹ has won for us. I think we should move quickly but not precipitately.

3. One of the first questions we shall have to consider is whether we should have a Consulate General or a diplomatic mission in Indonesia. This involves not only a question of relative costs, but one of which type of office will secure the best results for the money that will have to be laid out. As you know, Indonesia has a population of 75 million people. That means that in Asia it is the fourth most populous country, being exceeded only by China, India and Japan. In natural resources it is far wealthier than any of these. It is not as yet industrialized and because many of its products are complementary to Canadian ones, I anticipate the development of considerable trade between Canada and Indonesia. The Government there will be a highly centralized one, tending toward state control and socialism. It may well be, therefore, that a Consul General would find that he would have difficulty in promoting Canadian trade because of difficulty of access to senior government officials. This difficulty would naturally increase if Canada were to be represented there by a Consul General while other countries appointed Ministers or Ambassadors. I am not thinking so much of the great powers like the United States and the United Kingdom, but rather of some of the middle powers like ourselves. I think it would be well for us to consider pretty carefully what others are going to be doing in regard to representation in Indonesia before pressing ahead with our own arrangements.

4. A further problem has occurred to me in connection with the qualifications of our senior representative there. As you know, Colonel Moore Cosgrave is very anxious to go to Indonesia because his daughter is married to a Netherlands bank official there. If we were to write to the Department of Trade and Commerce and ask them to appoint someone for Indonesia, I think there is more than a fifty-fifty chance that they would appoint Colonel Cosgrave. Colonel Cosgrave does not have the political judgment which would make me feel easy about his representing Canada in Indonesia. I do not think that we can regard this post as a purely commercial and consular one, since our participation in the settlement of the Netherlands-Indonesian dispute and our continuing interest in seeing Indonesia maintain its contacts with the Western democracies are political.

²¹ Voir le chapitre III, partie 2, sous-section (e)(iii).

See Chapter III, Part 2, Subsection (e)(iii).

5. I understand that Mr. [Paul] Sykes, Canadian Government Trade Commissioner in Singapore, expects to visit Indonesia in February, before returning to Canada in the Spring on leave. I do not think Mr. Heasman is going to be able to get to Batavia, nor will our party. But I think that in the various contacts which we will make during our trip, we should have an opportunity to discuss the type of Canadian representation that would be appropriate in Indonesia. I therefore recommend that no decision be taken on this matter until the Minister's return.²²

6. To further the matter in his absence, I am attaching for your consideration a brief letter to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce,† asking him to give some thought to the commercial aspects of Canadian representation in Indonesia, in order that this matter may be more fully considered on the Minister's return.²³

[Ottawa], February 9, 1949

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

On December 12, 1948 the United Nations General Assembly adopted a resolution declaring that there had been established a lawful Government in Korea (the Government of the Republic of Korea) and recommending that member states take this resolution into consideration in establishing their relations with the Government of Korea. Full recognition was also given to the Republic by the United States, on January 1, 1949, and by the United Kingdom, on January 17, 1949.

2. Mr. Hopkins, Legal Adviser of the Department of External Affairs, has given the opinion that adoption of the December 12 resolution by the General Assembly gave rise to a duty of recognition by member states. The following political considerations would, in addition, indicate the desirability for Canadian recognition:

(a) Canada's interest in Korea was manifested by Canadian participation during 1948 on the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea and by Canadian support for the United Nations resolution of December 12, which was based on the report of the Commission;

(b) It is generally desirable to give moral support to the democratically-elected South Korean regime, especially so in view of its location on the fringe of Communist-dominated territory;

(c) Canadian recognition would facilitate the work of Canadian missionaries now in Korea and the establishment of trade relations for Canadians generally;

(d) Recognition would not give rise to any new obligation to establish a diplomatic mission in South Korea. Canada would continue to use the facilities of the United Kingdom Mission in Seoul.

3. It will be noted that the recognition given by Canada to Israel was only de facto, or provisional, because of the unstable conditions still prevailing in Israel and the undetermined status of that country's borders. In the case of South Korea, however, conditions are relatively stable and the borders are clearly defined; and unqualified or full recognition (which amounts to de jure recognition) may therefore be granted.

Recommendation

It is accordingly recommended as follows:—

that approval be given to a declaration that Canada grant full recognition to the Government of the Republic of Korea, the declaration to be made in the form of a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons during the present session.²⁵ A draft of this proposed statement is attached as Annex 1.†

Ottawa, July 13, 1949

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

The Government of the Republic of Korea (i.e. South Korea) is now making a drive to secure recognition from the 48 states which supported the December 12, 1948 Resolution on Korea of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

2. The new Republic feels itself in an isolated and dangerous position because of pressure from North Korea and the extension of Communist control in China. This feeling of insecurity has been heightened by the final withdrawal of all United States occupation forces, although a Military Advisory Group of some 500 officers and men remains. The Government of the Republic considers that by securing full recognition from friendly governments the morale of the people of South Korea will be strengthened and the Government will be better able to resist Communist pressure from whatever quarter it may come.

3. The following governments are now known to have accorded de jure recognition to the Republic of Korea: the United States, China, the United Kingdom, France, the Philippines, Chile, Brazil, the Dominican Republic and New Zealand. There are indications that a good many more may follow suit soon. Some governments qualified their statements by saying that they recognized the Republic of Korea as having jurisdiction over that part of the Korean peninsula in which free elections were held on May 10, 1948.

4. The Korean Ambassador to the United States, Mr. John M. Chang, has approached Mr. Wrong on the question of Canadian recognition. He handed him a letter dated May 28 addressed to the Governor General by Dr. Syngman Rhee, ²⁵ Le Cabinet donna son approbation le 17 février.

Approved by Cabinet on February 17.

President of the Republic (copy attached).† Mr. Chang said that similar communications were being addressed by Dr. Rhee to the Chiefs of State of all the countries which voted at the United Nations General Assembly in favour of the December 12, 1948 Resolution. He added that while the letter was not a direct request for the extension of de jure recognition it should be interpreted as constituting such a request.

5. A concurrent approach on the question of Canadian recognition was made to the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations by Dr. Chough Pyung Ok, personal representative of the President of the Republic and its chief Delegate to the United Nations. You will recall that Dr. Chough visited Ottawa last October on his way to the General Assembly in Paris. You were absent in Algoma at the time but wrote him a cordial letter which our Delegation delivered in Paris. Dr. Chough indicated he would like to come up and call on you this week to discuss this question of recognition.

6. The Korean Government has requested that American Consular officers in Canada be authorized to perform essential citizenship and passport services for Korean nationals. The United States Embassy has enquired whether the Canadian Government would have any objection to the performance of such services. It is anticipated that the volume of such services would be almost negligible. After the Philippines became independent we agreed to United States Consular officers performing such services for Philippine citizens in Canada.

7. You will recall that in a memorandum to the Cabinet, dated February 9, you recommended "that approval be given to a declaration that Canada grant full recognition to the Government of the Republic of Korea, the declaration to be made in the form of a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons during the present session". I am attaching a copy of the memorandum to Cabinet and the draft of the proposed statement to be made in the House.† This document was considered at a meeting of the Cabinet on February 17 where it was agreed that Canada recognize the Republic of Korea by approval of the Korean application for admission to the United Nations.

8. Korea's application for membership in the United Nations was considered in the Committee on the Admission of New Members on February 24. At that meeting, Mr. Ignatieff made a full statement of the facts taken into account by the Canadian Delegation in supporting the Korean application. A copy of his statement is attached.† The report of the Committee was considered in the Security Council on April 8. Following is an extract from the Official Records of the statement made on that occasion by General McNaughton:

"The question of the application of the Republic of Korea for admission to the United Nations has been given careful and comprehensive consideration in the Security Council's Committee on the Admission of New Members. As a result of that consideration, the Committee has made its recommendation by eight votes to two.

"The Canadian delegation considers that the Republic of Korea has accepted the obligations of the Charter. We are satisfied that it is a peace-loving State, able and willing to fulfil these obligations. We are, therefore, in full accord with the recommendations of the Committee. In consequence, in this Council, we shall vote in favour of recommending to the General Assembly that the Republic of Korea be admitted to the United Nations.

"I cannot refrain from expressing profound disappointment at the statement made to the Security Council today by the representative of the Soviet Union. For our part, I would say that we feel that the allegations and charges which he has reiterated have been fully and effectively disposed of and answered in the organs of the United Nations, and with particular authority by resolution 195 (III) adopted by the General Assembly on 12 December 1948 by an overwhelming majority.

"The Canadian delegation will vote in favour of the resolution which has been submitted by the representative of China."

The vote on the admission of the Republic of Korea was 9 in favour and 2 against (U.S.S.R. and the Ukraine).

9. Following our vote in the Security Council for the admission of Korea, consideration was given to requesting the British Minister in Seoul to inform the Korean Foreign Minister informally that he had learned that Canadian support of the Republic's application for membership in the United Nations is considered by the Canadian Government to constitute full recognition of the Republic. This proposal was not carried through.

10. The arguments in favour of according full recognition to the Republic of Korea, set out in the memorandum to Cabinet of February 9, appear to me to be still valid. Essentially they are: (a) Canada has consistently supported the position of the Korean Republic in the United Nations; (b) it is desirable to give moral support to the democratically elected South Korean regime; (c) it would facilitate the work of Canadian missionaries now in Korea and the establishment of trade relations; (d) recognition would not involve us in any new commitment except to support the Republic in the Security Council or the General Assembly if it should get into difficulty with its communist neighbours to the North. I think we should be obligated to do this much by the stands we have already taken on the Korean question in the United Nations.

11. I recommend, therefore, that we inform the Government of the Republic of Korea that our vote in the Security Council on April 9, in favour of its admission to membership in the United Nations, is to be regarded as according full recognition to the Republic as an independent sovereign State with jurisdiction over that part of the Korean peninsula in which free elections were held on May 10, 1948, under the observation of the United Nations Temporary Commission.²⁶

12. I attach for your consideration a draft press release† built around the letter of May 28 which President Rhee addressed to the Governor General, and a proposed reply which you would address to the Foreign Minister.²⁷ Your letter to the Foreign Minister, which is also attached for signature,† might be handed to the Korean Ambassador to the United States by Mr. Wrong. Copies of the exchange of correspondence would be referred to the Governor General. I think we might inform the Delegation in New York of the action taken, saying that this would obviate the necessity for Dr. Chough visiting Ottawa. Following the Philippine precedent, I think we might agree to United States Consular officers in Canada performing essential citizenship and passport services for Korean nationals here.

13. You indicated today that if Dr. Chough comes to Ottawa you will be unable to see him and asked me to do so on your behalf. If we could inform him in the sense recommended it would be helpful.

INTERVIEW OF DR. P.Y. CHOUGH WITH SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Dr. P.Y. Chough, Personal Representative of the President of the Korean Republic, called upon Mr. Pearson at 12 noon on August 4. Mr. P.G.R. Campbell was present during the interview.

The Korean Representative conveyed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the greeting of the President of Korea to the Canadian Government, stating that Korea is appreciative of the support which it has received from Canada in the United Nations and is grateful for the recognition of its government by Canada.

Mr. Pearson replied that Canada entertains very friendly feelings towards Korea as a member of the comity of democratic states and added that close relations between Canada and Korea would be to the advantage of both countries.

Dr. Chough urged that diplomatic or consular missions should be exchanged. He stressed the importance to Korea, as a democratic outpost threatened by the upsurge of Communism in adjacent countries, of having official ties with the democratic powers. Mr. Pearson said that he sympathized with the point of view expressed by Dr. Chough, but the strain of the rapid expansion of our foreign service and the number of our present commitments rendered it unlikely that we should be in a position to consider establishing a diplomatic mission in Korea at this time. He told the Korean representative that the matter of consular relations would be taken under consideration.

²⁷ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Don't issue any press release. But this can be used later if we have to give publicity to this matter LB P[earson]

In answer to Dr. Chough's suggestion that it would be desirable for Canada and Korea to sign a Treaty of Commerce and Amity, Mr. Pearson pointed out that Canada's constitutional make-up is such that treaties of this nature cannot be negotiated by the Federal Government, without causing complications in Dominion-Provincial relations. Mr. Pearson thought that the actual setting in motion of machinery to facilitate commerce was the important thing, to which Dr. Chough agreed.

Dr. Chough intimated that Korea might wish to purchase arms from Canada. Mr. Pearson said he felt that requests by the Korean Government for military supplies would be sympathetically received.

There was some discussion on the subject of a Pacific Pact against Communism. Dr. Chough stated that Korea would like to gain support for the anti-Communist agreement which has recently been made between Nationalist China, The Philippines and Korea. Mr. Pearson said that while traditionally and from political and economic necessity Canada's attention has been largely focussed upon the West, Canada nevertheless cannot be disinterested in the outcome of events in the Pacific area. Canada also has been concerned with the principle of collective security and the regional application of that principle. Mr. Pearson was of the opinion that important factors in any plan to contain the spread of Communism through Asia were the question of the ability of the Chinese Nationalist Government to hold out and the attitude of the United States. It would not be logical for Canada to adopt a positive attitude with regard to a Pacific Pact, when the United States had not done so. Dr. Chough agreed with the force of this reasoning but thought it unfortunate that the United States had not taken a position in support of the Chiang Kai-shek-Quirino-Rhee agreement.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN DR. P.Y. CHOUGH AND THE RIGHT HONOURABLE C.D. HOWE

At 11:30 A.M. on August 4, Dr. P.Y. Chough, Personal Representative of the President of the Republic of Korea, had an interview with the Right Honourable C.D. Howe, Minister of (the Department of) Trade and Commerce. Mr. W.K. Wardrop of this Department was present.

After a few generalities Dr. Chough referred to the fact that Canada had been among those countries which had recognized the Government of Korea. He said that since Korea is among the countries opposed to the expansion of Communism, and at the present time is threatened by the Soviet Union and Communist China, his Government was seeking to strengthen their ties with the democratic nations, and for this reason felt that closer ties should be established between Korea and Canada. It was hoped that Canada would be able to establish diplomatic relations with Korea. If this was not found possible, however, then the question of exchanging Consular representatives might be considered. Mr. Howe said that he appreciated the position of Southern Korea and said that Dr. Chough's proposal would be studied.

Dr. Chough then went on to explain the present economic situation of Southern Korea. He stated that through E.C.A., the United States had allocated $385,000,000 to Korea for the rehabilitation of the country which would do much to alleviate Korea's great need of industrial equipment. It was the hope of the Korean Government that while Canada could not be expected to import agricultural and other products from Korea, it would be possible to obtain industrial equipment from Canada. He anticipated that Korea would find markets for her agricultural and other products in Japan and China. At the moment Korea's foreign trade balance is not favourable, but it is hoped that this situation will improve in the future, especially as a result of the E.C.A. allocation. Some of the funds acquired from this source could be spent in Canada.

Dr. Chough then referred to the conversations he had had the previous day with officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and said that his Government would welcome a mission of several trade officials to Korea. Mr. Howe replied that he thought such a mission might be able to go to Korea.

Dr. Chough took leave of Mr. Howe at 11:50, in order to keep an appointment with Mr. Pearson.

VIETNAM

The French Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa presented a Note on August 31,† a copy of which is enclosed, informing us officially of the formation of the Government of Viet Nam in Indo-China.

2. This Note has been interpreted in the Department as a request for recognition of the new state of Viet Nam.

3. We have been informed that Notes similar in substance have been handed to the United Kingdom and United States Governments. In both cases, their reaction was similar to our own and neither have interpreted the Note as a request for recognition. In discussions which Mr. Menzies had in Washington recently with officials of both the State Department and the Foreign Office on the subject of Viet Nam, it was intimated that in their view the only alternative to supporting Bao Dai appears to be the acceptance of Communist domination of the whole country. Both governments, however, are reluctant to take the initiative in recognizing the Bao Dai regime until the March agreements, referred to in the French Note, have been ratified and until after recognition has been extended to the new government by some of the Asian States. Nor do they favour an application by Viet Nam for membership in the United Nations being put forward at this time.

4. Consequently, bearing in mind our interpretation of the Note, I consider that a simple non-committal acknowledgement would be sufficient to fulfil the requirements of diplomatic courtesy. I think, however, that in conjunction with the presentation of a Note of acknowledgement some indication, of a less formal nature, should be given, pointing out our interest in the establishment of the new state and expressing our hope that stable conditions will return to Indo-China. This might usefully and properly take the form of an oral statement. Accordingly, the outline of a proposed oral communication has been drafted. This draft has been brought to the attention of our Ambassador in Paris, who has informed us that it appears to cover the situation very well and that he had no comments or suggestions to make.

5. I am, therefore, submitting for your consideration a Note to the French Ambassador† and the text of a proposed oral statement to accompany the presentation of the Note. If this course of action meets with your approval, would you sign the Note and signify your concurrence in the text of the proposed oral communication, and return both to us.²⁸

PROPOSED ORAL STATEMENT TO BE DELIVERED IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE NOTE TO BE HANDED TO THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR

Canada, as a Pacific power, is interested in the re-establishment of peaceful conditions in the whole Pacific Basin. We have been concerned about the long continuation of the disturbances in Indo-China. We regard the settlement of these differences as important to the restoration of stability in the whole area. A settlement would

- (a) help prevent possible Communist domination of all East Asia,
- (b) ultimately promote conditions in which mutually beneficial commercial intercourse could be resumed,
- (c) facilitate the activities of Canadian missionaries in Indo-China, and
- (d) lessen the present drain on the resources of metropolitan France.

²⁸ La note marginale suivante est inscrite sur la pièce jointe:

There is a marginal note on the enclosure as follows:

OK LB P[earson]

We are conscious of the contribution which France can make toward the reconstruction and development of Indo-China. We also have sympathy for the legitimate aspirations of the Annamese Nationalists for self-government. For these reasons we approve the efforts made by the French Government to achieve a settlement of the difficulties in the March 8th agreement. We have insufficient information to permit us to comment on the details of the agreement and realize that its implementation will require continuing understanding statesmanship on both sides. We hope, however, that the conclusion of this agreement will result in the progressive resolution of the difficulties in Indo-China so that Viet Nam and the other states of Indo-China, in cooperation with France, may play their full part in the development of the Pacific area.

Memorandum for File

The French Ambassador Monsieur Hubert Guérin called on the Under-Secretary on the afternoon of October 17 to receive our Note No. 124 dated October 10 regarding Indo-China.† Mr. Menzies was in attendance.

After handing Monsieur Guérin the Note, Mr. Heeney spoke along the lines of the oral communication that had been approved by the Minister. He emphasized that we had insufficient direct information concerning the existing situation in Indo-China to permit us to reach any conclusions as to the suitability of the details of the agreements to meet the requirements of the situation. He also emphasized that the situation in Indo-China seemed to us to be a developing one which would require continuing statesmanship on both sides to see to its full implementation.

Mr. Heeney drew attention to a paragraph in Section 2 of President Auriol's letter of March 8 in which the Government of the French Republic pledged itself to present and to support the candidacy of Viet Nam when the latter fulfils the general conditions defined by the Charter of the United Nations for admission to that organization. Mr. Heeney said that if we were to apply the normal criteria which we had been applying in other cases concerning the fulfilment of conditions defined in the Charter for admission of new members, he doubted if we could give support at this time to an application by Viet Nam for United Nations membership. Mr. Heeney said that he thought it would be advisable for the French to consult very fully with other friendly governments before advancing such an application in the United Nations, as a rebuff there by friendly powers would do a great deal of harm. Monsieur Guérin recognized the validity of Mr. Heeney's observations and said that it was for this reason that the paragraph regarding French support for Viet Nam's membership in the United Nations had been worded loosely.

In concluding the conversation, M. Guérin thanked Mr. Heeney for this expression of understanding on the part of the Canadian Government of what the French Government was trying to do in Indo-China and said that he was certain it would be appreciated by his Government.

Indo-China

Mr. Menzies reported that on August 31 the Charge D'Affaires of the French Embassy had left a Note giving us the text of an exchange of letters between Monsieur Vincent Auriol, President of the French Republic and of the French Union and Emperor Bao Dai, providing for the establishment of Viet Nam (Tonkin, Annam and Cochin-China) as an associate state in the French Union. Mr. Menzies recalled that when he was in Washington a month ago, he had had an opportunity to discuss Indo-China with officers in the State Department and Mr. [Osler] Dening, Under-Secretary in the United Kingdom Foreign Office in charge of the Far Eastern Departments. While they felt that the French had shown themselves inept in their handling of the problem, were not too confident about Bao Dai and his associates and recognized that Ho Chi-Minh had about him many genuine Nationalists, they considered that the alternative to support for Bao Dai was Communist domination of Indo-China. After consultation with our Embassy in Paris, the Minister had approved an oral statement being made to the French Ambassador at the time our non-committal written reply was handed him. The Under-Secretary had told the Ambassador that we had been concerned about the long continuation of the disturbances in Indo-China and regarded a settlement there as important as it would help to prevent possible Communist domination of all East Asia, would ultimately promote conditions in which mutually beneficial trade could be resumed, would facilitate the activities of Canadian missionaries in Indo-China and lessen the present drain on the resources of metropolitan France. Mr. Heeney had indicated that we were sympathetic to the legitimate aspirations of the Annamese for self-government. We also recognized that France might still make a considerable contribution for the reconstruction and development of Indo-China. We hoped that the relationship described in the exchange of notes would be adequate to present day circumstances in East Asia. We ourselves have insufficient information to permit us to comment on the details of the Agreement. Mr. Heeney emphasized that the implementation of the Agreement would require continuing understanding statesmanship on both sides. The Ambassador had also been informed that we doubted whether under this new arrangement, the new state of Viet Nam would have a sufficient degree of independence to warrant Canadian support for any application it might make for membership in the United Nations. It was suggested that the French might be wise to consult informally with friends on this matter before raising it openly in the United Nations.²⁹

I attach a copy of a letter† received from Mr. Elliott¹ in Santiago wherein he reports that during the course of a recent conversation with the Chilean Foreign Minister the latter expressed the wish that in some early speech you include a statement to the effect that Canada hopes that democracy will be maintained and supported whenever and wherever possible within the Western Hemisphere.

2. The motives for the Minister's request stem from Chile's concern over the supposed activities of Argentine agents in fomenting internal troubles in countries bordering on Chile and in Chile itself. You will recall that last fall Chile openly accused Argentina of being responsible for organizing a plot to overthrow the President of Chile. A short time later, the Chilean Foreign Minister asked Mr. Elliott to ascertain whether Canada would be willing to withhold recognition of the Odría Government in Peru until China had done so. On this occasion, the Foreign Minister stated to Mr. Elliott in confidence that his Government had proof of Argentina's intervention in this instance as well. The Foreign Minister considers that the recent serious troubles in the Bolivian tin mines are attributable to the same source.

3. There can be no doubt of our sympathies being with the Chilean Government in its present difficult position, particularly since it has adopted a firm anti-totalitarian policy. I would, however, be reluctant to recommend that you make a public statement which would follow too closely the lines suggested by the Chilean Foreign Minister. As an alternative suggestion, it might be possible to include in your opening speech to the General Assembly a statement to the effect that Canada, as a signatory of the North Atlantic Treaty, believes that the principles set forth in the preamble and Article II of this Treaty are principles which are shared by all free nations of the world, including the Western Hemisphere. To be more specific would, I think, invite criticism of interfering in the affairs of other nations of the hemisphere; moreover, I do not think that we would wish to identify ourselves too closely with those differences which arise from time to time between Latin American nations, except in those instances where Canadian interests might be directly involved.

4. If you agree,² I attach for your consideration a letter to Mr. Elliott along the above lines.†

ESTABLISHMENT OF A CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC MISSION IN COLOMBIA

When Dr. Zuleta, the Foreign Minister of Colombia, called on the Minister on Monday afternoon, July 18, he raised with him the question of the establishment of direct diplomatic relations between Colombia and Canada. Colombia has raised this previously in 1942, 1946 and 1948. Mr. Menzies, who was present at the interview, is preparing a note for you on the subject. The Minister informed Dr. Zuleta that, if he wished to pursue the matter further, he might take it up with me. As a result, Dr. Zuleta called on me this morning at 10:00 o'clock. He first of all expressed his very great gratitude to the Canadian Government for the assistance which had been given him in arranging for a group of Canadian officials to visit Colombia to assist the Colombian Government in its efforts to improve their electoral system. I replied that the Canadian Government had been happy to assist in putting him in touch with the Canadian officials concerned and that we appreciated very greatly this demonstration of esteem for Canada which Colombia had shown in turning to Canadians for this purpose.

2. Dr. Zuleta then went on to raise the question of diplomatic relations. He referred to his conversation with the Minister. He recalled that previously we had been unable to agree to Colombia's proposal because of the shortage of personnel and budgetary difficulties. He had understood from the Minister that shortage of personnel was no longer so great an obstacle. He stressed how important he considered the establishment of closer relations and particularly closer diplomatic relations was to both countries. During the past few years, the United Nations and a very large number of international organizations have been established. In view of the sympathy between Canada and Colombia and of Canada's importance, Colombia wished to make even more effective in future the exchange of views between our two countries on the problems which arise in the organizations. He mentioned in particular, questions of elections to the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council and the governing bodies of other international organizations. Colombia had found that the establishment of direct diplomatic relations facilitated greatly these useful exchanges of views with other countries. Dr. Zuleta hoped that it might be possible for Canada within the next year to open a mission in Colombia. He suggested that further discussions on this matter might be pursued through our Embassies in Washington.

3. I said that as both the Minister and Mr. Claxton had already assured him we in Canada are very conscious of the great importance to Canada of closer relations of all kinds with Colombia. We regretted, for the reasons which he had mentioned, that it had not been possible for us hitherto to establish a diplomatic mission in Colombia. I said that I could assure him that the Minister hoped very much that it might be possible for us to make arrangements for the establishment of a diplomatic mission in Colombia in the near future. The Minister had mentioned to me his conversation with Dr. Zuleta on the subject; since he was about to leave Ottawa for two weeks it had not been possible for him to discuss the matter at length with me before his departure. We would, however, raise the matter with him immediately upon his return to Ottawa and he would, no doubt, wish to discuss it with his colleagues in Cabinet. I expressed my great regret that, in the absence of the Minister, it was not possible to be more specific than this, but I reiterated the hope of the Department that in the near future we could establish direct diplomatic relations with Colombia. Speaking personally, I said that I thought that his suggestion that this might be done during the year 1950 might well prove to be practicable.³

4. During the discussion, I commented on his remarks on the desirability of exchanges of views between our two countries on matters coming before international organizations. I said that he, like us, must have been impressed by the fact that the democratic group of countries had, in the past, suffered in the United Nations from the fact that there had not been effective enough preliminary discussion of questions among them. We felt it was important that efforts should be made in future by the democratic countries to work out between them general agreement on common policy on important issues. We have been very happy in the past with the excellent relations between our Delegations and I shared his hope that these relations will be even more intimate in the future.

³ Note marginale/Marginal note:

Mr. Reid. My feeling is that the government will not be enthusiastic about a recommendation to open a Mission in Colombia in the near future—nor indeed any new Missions anywhere with[out] pretty specific reasons based on pretty evident, tangible and immediate Canadian interest shown. They are already committed to Pakistan which is a special case, but any other proposals will be very sceptically received. The memo to the Minister sh[oul]d state the case for C[olombia] in concrete terms with special reference to any commercial aspects A. H[ene]y]

5. Dr. Zuleta, who had been President of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations and Chairman of the Headquarters Committee spoke in glowing terms of his colleague on these two bodies, Mr. Wilgress. I said that I knew that Mr. Wilgress reciprocated his feelings and that I would be most happy to inform Mr. Wilgress of Dr. Zuleta's kind remarks.

Memorandum by Acting Head, American and Far Eastern Division

Ottawa, July 21, 1949

INTERVIEW OF COLOMBIAN FOREIGN MINISTER WITH THE HONOURABLE L.B. PEARSON

Dr. Eduardo Zuleta Angel, Minister of Foreign Affairs for Colombia, accompanied by Mr. Jose Camacho, Counsellor of the Colombian Embassy in Washington, called on Mr. Pearson at 4.15 on July 18. Mr. A.R. Menzies was present. Dr. Zuleta said that he knew that Mr. Pearson's time was short before starting out on a trip but that he appreciated the opportunity to come and have a few words with him.

2. Dr. Zuleta recalled that, when he was President of the United Nations Preparatory Commission in London, in 1946, Mr. St. Laurent, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, had had some very kind words to say about his services which he had always treasured. He had worked very closely during the Preparatory Commission with Mr. Wilgress and with Mr. Escott Reid. Indeed, at all meetings of the United Nations, Colombian Delegations had been greatly impressed with the idealistic but sensible approach of the Canadian Delegations. While there were no direct diplomatic relations between Colombia and Canada, Colombians regarded Canadians with the friendliest of feelings. He asked Mr. Pearson to convey to the Prime Minister these sentiments.

3. Mr. Pearson said that the sentiments which Dr. Zuleta had expressed were very cordially reciprocated. He recalled meeting Dr. Zuleta himself in the Delegates' Lounge of the United Nations. Canadians regarded Colombia as one of the most democratic and enlightened of the South American Republics.

4. Dr. Zuleta said that he had made this trip to Ottawa on very short notice, to try to complete arrangements to obtain the assistance of Canadian experts to assist in revising the Colombian electoral and identity card system. He looked forward to having conversations with the experts and officials directly interested in these arrangements. Mr. Pearson said that we were only too glad to give the Colombians any help of this kind that we could.

5. Dr. Zuleta then turned to the question of the establishment of diplomatic relations between Colombia and Canada. He recalled that, on earlier occasions when this matter had been discussed between our two Governments, we had pointed out that personnel shortages impaired our programme of expansion of diplomatic relations. The Minister said that commerce and other relations between Colombia and Canada were growing year by year and that he would like very much to be able to have an exchange of diplomatic missions as soon as it could be conveniently arranged.

6. Mr. Pearson said that he had had an opportunity to review the correspondence on this subject. He wished the Minister would not regard our failure to establish diplomatic relations as an indication of coolness on our part toward the Colombians or take it that we regarded as more important our relations with those countries with which we had already established diplomatic relations. Looking back on the pattern, it appeared that the expansion of our relations in Latin America had been somewhat haphazard. Mr. Pearson said that he hoped that it would be possible for us to make arrangements to establish a diplomatic mission in Colombia in the not too direct future.

7. Mr. Zuleta asked if there was some official in the Department with whom he might speak on this subject. Mr. Pearson said that he might speak to Mr. Claxton about the matter and also to the Deputy Under-Secretary, Mr. Reid.

8. In concluding the interview, Mr. Pearson expressed his regrets at being unable to attend the dinner which was being given the Minister at the Country Club that evening. He wished the Minister all success in his negotiations for securing a group of Canadian experts to go down to Colombia.

RECOGNITION OF THE PRESENT DE FACTO GOVERNMENT OF PANAMA

On November 19th, a governmental crisis arose with the attempt of the President of Panama, Dr. Manuel Chanis, to remove from office the Chief of Police, Colonel José Remon, on charges of involvement with illegal monopolies. Col. Remon refused to be deposed and issued an ultimatum to the President, demanding his resignation and threatening to occupy the Presidency if he did not agree. When the President refused, Col. Remon ordered the Police to surround the Palace, and the President eventually agreed to resign. The Chief of Police then installed his cousin Roberto Chiari, First Vice-President, as President.

2. On November 22, in accordance with the Constitution of Panama, the National Assembly debated President Chanis' resignation and at first the majority were in favour of accepting it. Dr. Chanis then came to the Assembly and announced that he still regarded himself as President as his resignation had been obtained under duress, and he now withdrew it. The Assembly accepted his statement and invited him to accompany them to the Presidential Palace, which he did, followed by a large crowd. The Police opened fire and dispersed the crowd before it reached the Palace.

3. When both Drs. Chanis and Chiari issued statements to the effect that they regarded themselves as President of the Republic, the question was referred to the Supreme Court. However, on November 24, when the Court was deciding the matter, Col. Remon announced that, if it should favour Dr. Chanis, he would put Dr. Arnulfo Arias in power. This was generally regarded as a bluff, but when the Court, by four votes to one, decided that Dr. Chanis was the legal President, Col. Remon carried out his threat and, at a special meeting of the National Assembly the same day, Dr. Arias was unanimously confirmed in office.

4. One of Dr. Arias' first acts was to review the result of the 1948 elections in which he had been a candidate, and then announced that the recount of the ballots showed that he had been elected by a large majority. Dr. Arias is a former President of Panama, having held that office in the years 1940 and 1941. At that time he was considered pro-Axis in his sympathies and was deposed by the same Chief of Police who now has placed him in power. He is also known to be anti-American, a reactionary nationalist and a rabble-rouser.

5. On November 25, Mr. Edward Miller, United States Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, announced that Dr. Arias' accession to the Presidency came as a "profound shock" to his Government and that the United States did not recognize him as President. The United Kingdom Government informed us that they were reserving their position with regard to recognition until the situation had become somewhat clarified. We ourselves have to date taken no action which would constitute recognition of Dr. Arias' Government.

6. We have now been informed that the United States has completed its consultations with most of the Latin-American republics and has reached the conclusion that the Arias regime seems fairly well established, is in effective control of the administrative machinery of the state, and has promised to live up to its international obligations and agreements. Accordingly it will recognize Dr. Arias as President as of today and the United Kingdom has taken similar action.

7. In view of the foregoing, I would therefore recommend that we agree to recognize the Arias Government and that, in the absence of direct diplomatic relations between our two countries, this recognition be in the form of implied recognition by acknowledgment of a telegram from the Panamian Foreign Minister and certain correspondence with the Panamian Consul General in Montreal.⁴

Your WA-9, January 4.† Venezuela. Since our interests in Latin America are not so great as those of either the United Kingdom or the United States, we would, as a general rule, be prepared to follow their lead in extending recognition to new governments in that area, as in the recent cases of Nicaragua and Peru.

2. On the basis of our present information, the Military Junta now in power in Venezuela appears to have substantial control of the country, is maintaining order, and is prepared to honour international obligations.

3. Although in the present instance the United Kingdom has already extended recognition, we intend to await a lead from the United States. If, however, it appears that the State Department will delay much longer, we will re-examine the question in about a week's time.⁵ As we do not have diplomatic relations with Venezuela, it is expected that, in line with previous practice, recognition will be extended on an informal basis.⁶

4. We have no information on the possible attitude of Brazil.

⁵ On apprit subséquemment que les États-Unis reconnaîtraient le gouvernement du Venezuela le 21 janvier.

Later it was learned that the United States would recognize the Venezuelan government on January 21.

⁶ Ceci devait être accompli par la validation d'un exequatur alors en suspens, pour le vice-consul du Venezuela, à Montréal, mais ce dernier quitta le Canada pour un autre poste. On procéda alors avec son successeur en juillet 1949.

This was supposed to be accomplished by granting an Exequatur which was pending for the Venezuelan Vice Consul in Montreal, but the Vice Consul left Canada for another post. Instead, the procedure was followed with his successor in July 1949.

DEA/2755-40

Note de la direction de l'information
Memorandum by Information Division

[Ottawa], June 17, 1949

ANNEX¹

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND THE NATIONAL FILM BOARD

1. In 1922, the Canadian Government Motion Pictures Bureau was organized as a division of the Department of Trade and Commerce to handle the production and distribution of motion picture films (and later, still pictures), on behalf of the Canadian Government.

2. In 1938, Mr. John Grierson came to Canada, at the invitation of the Government, to make a survey of government film activities. As a result of his survey, the National Film Act was passed on May 2, 1939. On September 2, 1939, the National Film Board was created. The Board consisted of two Cabinet Ministers, three senior civil servants, and three members of the public noted for their interest in and knowledge of films. The Government Film Commissioner, as senior executive officer, is responsible to the Board. The National Film Board itself reports through the Chairman of the Board to Parliament, but is not directly attached to any one department of Government.

3. The relevant sections of the Act concerning the advising of Government departments on the production and distribution of films, both at home and abroad, read as follows:

Section 9. The Commissioner...shall (a) advise upon the making and distribution of national films designed to help Canadians in other parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and problems of Canadians in other parts; (b) co-ordinate national and departmental film activities...; (c) advise as to methods of securing...co-operation in the production, distribution and exhibition of Government films; (d) advise upon and approve production, distribution and exhibition contracts...; (e) advise as to the distribution of Government films in other countries.

It may be doubted whether those who drafted the Act can have foreseen the problem which might arise ten years later; and whether it was their intention that paragraph (e) should be interpreted as conferring on the Film Board the privileged position which it has since assumed.

¹ Cette note fut rattachée à une note au sous-secrétaire, en date du 17 juin 1949.

This memorandum was annexed to a memorandum to the Under-Secretary dated June 17, 1949.

4. In August 1941, the National Film Board absorbed the Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau.

5. In the original absence of any effective co-ordination of all Government information activities abroad, and because of the energetic personality of the first Film Commissioner, Mr. John Grierson, the National Film Board early assumed an independent line in the matter of film distribution abroad. There was, in fact, at this time, a very real need to state Canada's case firmly and dramatically abroad, and the production and distribution activities of the Board, though set up on an ad hoc basis, were undoubtedly created in response to a genuine demand.

6. One of the Board's outstanding productions was the "World in Action" series. These were, in effect, dramatic visual editorials on international affairs. They achieved a marked degree of success, but it may be stated that, in general, the Film Board hewed its own political line and consulted the Department infrequently.

7. Late in 1941, an event occurred which had a distinct bearing on the atmosphere in which relations between the Department and the Board have since been conducted. In November of that year, the Board completed a timely and prophetic film entitled "War Clouds in the Pacific". The Department was shown the completed film and expressed the view that the attitude which the film took toward the Japanese, with whom we were still at peace, was extremely strong. However, the Board decided to release the film, and within three weeks, the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor.

These events created a lasting impression among officials of the Board that their thinking on international matters was both timely and accurate, and the Department was thereafter consulted infrequently in respect of productions dealing with international affairs. The Department was in general apt to be faced with a completed film, rather than to be consulted at the script stage.

8. In April 1945, the Board produced a film entitled "Balkan Powder Keg". This completed film was shown to Mr. Pearson, in Washington. He took strong exception to certain statements contained in it, and the film was withdrawn and re-edited under the title "Spotlight on the Balkans".

9. Late in 1947, the Board produced a film entitled "The People Between". Much of the footage was shot at the headquarters of the communist leader Mao-Tse-Tung. The Department objected to certain passages in the completed film, and the Board agreed that the film would be sold commercially to a United States distributor and would not bear the imprimatur of the National Film Board.

10. At the same time, it must be generally conceded that these vivid, dramatic motion pictures did much to gain for Canada a reputation as an outspoken producer of vital documentary films commenting upon the international scene. The extent to which the Board's foreign distribution network later became so successful, was in large measure due to the impact of these films.

11. During 1942 to 1947, the National Film Board opened offices abroad in London, New York, Washington, Chicago, Mexico City, and Sydney, Australia. In certain of these offices, such as Washington and Mexico City, N.F.B. officers were responsible to the Head of Mission for local discipline, but communicated direct with the Board at Ottawa. In others, such as London and New York, contact with the Canadian Post concerned was intermittent. In Sydney, the operation was almost entirely independent.

12. As a result of these activities, a world-wide distribution network, commercial and non-commercial, theatrical and non-theatrical, was developed. This distribution network enjoyed a considerable measure of success and was later supplemented by the establishment of film libraries at diplomatic and trade posts abroad. It was thus that the Board came to regard the Department's posts abroad as, in some degree, outlets for its own distribution system.

13. Beginning in 1947, however, a series of drastic budget restrictions made it impossible for the Board to carry on these operations in their entirety. The Washington Office was closed; and the Department was asked if it would assume responsibility for the operation of the Sydney Office. This was done, and in the summer of 1948, the Department became responsible for the distribution of all Canadian Government non-commercial films abroad, save in the offices which remained open (i.e. London, New York, Chicago, and Mexico City), and in certain Trade Commissioner posts.

14. This new relationship has in practice involved certain disadvantages. These may be summarized as follows:

(a) The Department has no effective control over the production of films dealing with international matters. Though the Department is consulted from time to time, such consultation is apt to occur late in the day. The Department has frequently been faced with faits accomplis. A recent case in point was the shooting script of the proposed "Human Rights Film".

This state of affairs is, to a certain extent, the result of the Board's peculiar financial structure. Approximately two-thirds of its expenditure is budgeted for in the estimates. The remaining one-third is secured by arranging for departments of governments to sponsor (i.e. pay for) films, in the production and distribution of which they may have a special interest. The Department has never entered this sponsorship field. When, in the fall of 1948, the Department suggested the possibility of a film of the North Atlantic Treaty, the Film Board took the position that it had no funds, but that if the Department would put up the money, it would be prepared to produce such a film. (Correspondence attached III.)†

This situation has, of course, no real bearing on the Department's over-riding responsibility to advise on the content of all films dealing with external matters, and indeed, of all films planned for distribution abroad. The practice of sponsorship may, however, serve to explain in part the reason for the stand taken by the Film Board.

(b) Though the Department distributes films through all its posts abroad, it has, up to the present, exercised no control over the type of film offered for distribution. When the distribution takes place through the National Film Board's own offices abroad, the Department is not normally consulted.

There is again a financial aspect to this lack of control. Under the present arrangements, funds for the supply of prints to missions come from the National Film Board's budget. The amount involved this year was $28,000.

(c) Despite continued efforts on the part of the Department, channels of communication between the National Film Board and posts abroad still remain irregular. Film Board officers have frequently been requested to channel all communications through the Department. They have however continued to write direct, not only to Canadian posts abroad, but to officials of foreign governments both in Ottawa and abroad.

A recent case in point concerns an invitation received through our ambassador in Brussels for the Canadian Government to participate in the second World Festival of Films and Fine Arts, in Brussels. This invitation was communicated to Mr. McLean² who replied direct to the Belgian Government, stating in part: "I can assure you, on behalf of the Canadian Government, that Canada appreciates the contribution to international goodwill which Belgium is making in holding this World Festival of Films and Fine Arts." In this case, the Department received a copy of the letter, but this courtesy has not always been extended. (Correspondence attached IV).†

(d) In Paris and in southern Europe generally, a considerable distribution network had been built up prior to 1948 through the joint efforts of the Department and the Board. Following a visit to France by the Film Board's Director of Distribution, Mr. McLean suggested to the Department in the fall of 1948, that the Film Board should appoint a full-time officer to Paris, to be attached to the embassy. This request was refused by the Under-Secretary on the grounds that it was not desirable to have attached to missions officers who are not responsible to the Department. (Correspondence attached V.)†

The Department seconded a female clerk to do this work. She soon resigned, and her place was taken by an equally junior female clerk. It is impossible for an employee of this grade to maintain, much less to expand the distribution of Canadian films to France, Belgium, Luxembourg, Switzerland, Italy, and the French territory in North Africa.

15. Proposals for the solution of these problems are contained in the attached memorandum.†

Note pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], August 2, 1949

The Department's relations with the National Film Board, which have been difficult ever since we began to take a direct interest in the distribution of Government films abroad, have now reached a state bordering on that of conflict, characterized by a lack of essential co-operation. Over the past three months, a number of disagreeable incidents have illustrated this.

2. In the recent matter of European film festivals, for example, no advice was sought from us on the film entries to be submitted, despite the Department's requests of March 3 and June 18 for consultation. Once the films had been shipped, we learned through a routine notice that among the Canadian Government entries were two very doubtful productions: DRUG ADDICT, a film which has created serious difficulties with the United States, and THE PEOPLE BETWEEN which the Department has never approved. Enquiries by the Information Division into the matter led to a violent and threatening telephone call received by one of our officers from Mr. McLean, in which these enquiries were termed "intolerable interference in National Film Board affairs." Moreover, in connection with the festivals, the Film Board took upon itself to reply "on behalf of the Canadian Government" to invitations properly addressed through the Department.

3. You may recall also Mr. McLean's letter to you, in reply to our objections concerning the proposed "Human Rights Film", the tone and text of which clearly show that the Film Board does not regard itself as subject to direction in respect of Canadian information.

4. The Film Board's rejection of the Department's primary responsibility in this field, is based on Section 9 (g) of the National Film Act, which states the Commissioner "shall advise as to the distribution of Government films abroad". This attitude is strengthened by several years of unquestioned operations in the foreign field, and facilitated by the fact that all film handling is done at the Board and all films are supplied from the Film Board's budget.

5. It might be noted here that the National Film Act is not explicit on the subject of foreign distribution. This is understandable since neither the author, nor the legislator, could have intended to regulate in detail, in 1939, conditions which they could not foresee. These conditions, as you know, are an outgrowth of information activities undertaken by the Allies in World War II, and pursued thereafter with peace time objectives under the direction of their respective foreign affairs departments.

6. The Department's position is based, generally, on Order in Council P.C. 472 of February 5, 1947, authorizing the Department of External Affairs to "do such actions and things as may be considered necessary for distributing abroad information concerning Canada...". Specifically, it is also based on the following policy statements:

(1) Statement by Mr. Wrong in a memorandum to Mr. MacDermot, dated March 22, 1946: "The primary responsibility for publicity abroad rests with External Affairs and is not shared with Trade and Commerce, since it is a part of the foreign policy of the Government. Responsibility for action in particular countries derives from the Secretary of State for External Affairs...". This memorandum bears, in Mr. N. Robertson's handwriting, the marginal comment: "I agree entirely".

(2) Statement by Mr. Pearson in his letter of August 4th, 1948, to General Vanier: "General agreement has been reached that non-theatrical distribution is the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs..., while theatrical distribution will continue to be the responsibility of the National Film Board."

(3) Marginal comment made by yourself on a memorandum from Information Division, dated March 29th: "It will be as well for us to accept battle soon on the main front, and ram it home that External Affairs, and not the National Film Board, is in charge of policy, i.e. what films are to be given non-theatrical distribution (and perhaps commercial as well) abroad, and where."

7. It is evident by now that the sense of conflict which exists between the Board and the Department derives, not from a disagreement on material organization that a meeting of officers must discuss and eliminate, but from a basic policy disagreement on the subject of responsibility for Canadian information abroad.

8. Under the circumstances, there appears to be no possibility for the Department to discharge its responsibility for Canadian information abroad in respect of films, until the Film Commissioner fully recognizes this responsibility in practice, or until the Department's over-riding control is confirmed at higher level.

9. In order to bring to an end this unsatisfactory situation, I suggest that a meeting be arranged between yourself and Mr. McLean, for the purpose of acquainting him with the Department's views on information abroad, including film distribution.³

10. Should the Film Commissioner agree to recognize in practice the Department's over-riding authority in the foreign film field, he might then be acquainted with the steps which we think it desirable for the Department to take in order to ensure, in future, its control of information through the medium of films. I am attaching a draft agenda† in which these steps are defined. A subsequent meeting of officers of the Department and the Board might iron out details in respect of staff requirements, disposition of material and planning of distribution which are involved.

11. Should the Film Commissioner withhold his agreement, I believe that further discussion of this problem with him would be useless, and I suggest that the Minister might be requested to take up the matter with Mr. Winters⁴ and place the Department's views before him.

[Ottawa], October 4, 1949

REPORT OF A MEETING BETWEEN REPRESENTATIVES OF THE NATIONAL FILM BOARD AND THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

After an exchange of courtesies, Mr. Anderson opened the meeting by stating that the Department had read with the greatest interest and care the brief submitted by the National Film Board (attached with comments by Mr. Bellemare).† He felt that the document made a friendly and intelligent appraisal of the situation and opened the way for progress at the working level. At the same time, since he was representing the Under-Secretary at this meeting, he thought it proper at the outset to restate Mr. Heeney's basic position.⁵ This could be defined as follows: the conduct of Canada's external relations is the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs; Canadian information abroad in all its aspects is an integral part of the conduct of Canada's external relations; therefore the Department must exercise control over the distribution of Canadian films abroad.

2. Mr. McLean in reply stated that, while he was prepared to accept collaboration and co-ordination, he was not prepared to accept direction or control. He stated that he had a definite obligation under the National Film Act of 1939, which he must discharge. He read out the relevant section of the Act, which runs as follows:

14. "(1) There shall be a Central Government Film Distribution Service.

(2) The Director of the Bureau shall be the Director of the Central Government Film Distribution Service and he shall, subject to the other provisions of this Act governing distribution, take all possible steps to secure quality, economy and efficiency in the operation and development of such service.

(3) All Government films shall be distributed by the Central Government Film Distribution Service, except in cases of commercial or specialized departmental distribution approved by the Commissioner, and the Bureau shall serve as repository for the storage and preservation of all Government film negatives and shall be responsible for the disposition of all Government films other than those for which specialized departmental distribution has been authorized.”

⁵ Heeney avait déclaré son point de vue lors d'une réunion dans son bureau avec les officiers de l'Office national du film, le 7 septembre 1949.

Heeney had stated this position at a meeting in his office with officers of the National Film Board on September 7, 1949.

3. After reading this excerpt from the Act, Mr. McLean stated that if the Department wished to control the distribution of films abroad, the Act would have to be amended and his only course would be to take the matter up with his Minister.

4. Since it was evident that nothing could be gained by pursuing the discussion along these lines, it was agreed by both parties to put aside the question of control and to confine the discussion to a consideration of ways in which collaboration might perhaps be more closely effected. The discussion was to some extent irrelevant, since in the absence of a decision on control, it was conducted in a vacuum. However, one proposal emerged which seemed to suggest a partial solution of the problem, viz: that an Advisory Committee be established.

5. It was suggested that this Advisory Committee be composed of representatives of the Department and the Film Board, with the Department ensured of “an adequate voice”. It was suggested that the Department should name two members to the Committee and the Film Board from two to four as might seem appropriate, having regard to the fact that voting on disputed issues would not be by numbers but by Departments.

6. Mr. Anderson asked whether, in that event, the Department would have the determining voice as to whether a certain film should be distributed abroad. To this Mr. McLean replied that he could not permit himself to be directed by such a committee, but that should a dispute arise, it would be “referred upward”; the views of the Department would be taken into consideration and, if Mr. McLean felt that the Department’s view was mistaken, it would be a matter for discussion between himself and the Under-Secretary. He did not think, however, that such disputes would be likely to occur very often.

7. It was then suggested that the Advisory Committee might discharge the following functions:

(a) to screen completed films and, if desirable, recommend the withholding or altering of a film before international distribution took place.

(b) in the light of information on forthcoming productions for the domestic field, to make suggestions which might improve films for international distribution.

(c) to advise on the distribution of films to the various post libraries of the Department.

(d) to make recommendations for the production of foreign versions of NFB films.

(e) to contribute suggestions in conformity with policies of the Department.

8. In respect of distribution abroad, Mr. McLean felt that the Film Board should appoint its own international distribution officers to Paris, Bombay and Sydney (including Indonesia and Malaya), as well as maintain its present officers in London, New York, Chicago and Mexico City. Such officers would be directly responsible in matters of local discipline to the Head of Post but would be paid by NFB and would communicate direct with NFB on all film matters, sending copies to the Department. Some doubt was expressed by Mr. [G.C.] McInnes as to whether such an arrangement would be workable. In reply Mr. McLean stated that it had worked effectively in London and Mexico City and that he felt it could work in the other countries mentioned. The alternative would be for the Department to appoint its own film officers, a proposal which Mr. McLean seemed to regard as unnecessary and perhaps wasteful.

9. Mr. McLean welcomed the proposal that the Department should set up a prints budget to add to that of NFB, but felt it would be more appropriate for the Department to support a request by the Film Board for additional monies. In any case he felt that the budget should be administered by NFB.

10. At the conclusion of the meeting Mr. Anderson again recapitulated the Department's basic position, pointing out that while the discussion had been friendly, informative and, he thought, helpful, the question of control still remained unresolved.

Observations

1. While the atmosphere of the discussion was friendly, it was quite evident that Mr. McLean would resist any attempt at control in the sense discussed in para 1 above. It is perhaps worth noting that sections 14 (1, 2, 3) of the National Film Act read by Mr. McLean refer, by implication, to domestic distribution, since section 9 (g) deals specifically with distribution abroad, and since the general intent of the Act, as stated in section 9 (a), is to enable the Film Board to produce and distribute "national films designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and problems of Canadians in other parts." Under section 15 the Governor in Council is empowered to "make such regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the intent of this act". It may be doubted if in 1939 international distribution was regarded as more than a remote contingency.

2. The proposed Advisory Committee, while it would establish closer day-to-day working relations than now exist, would not, it seems to us, meet the Department's requirements unless the Department had a controlling voice. The proposal that disputes should be referred to the Under-Secretary on the one hand and the Film Commissioner on the other seems to us to equate the Department's responsibility for the conduct of Canada's foreign relations with the Film Board's responsibility to produce and distribute films, whereas in fact, the latter should be regarded as a segment of the former.

3. If the Department wishes to control the distribution of films abroad, such a Committee could fill a useful function at the working level, provided such control were secured by amending the National Film Act.

4. The proposal that the Film Board establish international distribution officers in the various cities mentioned above, seems to us merely to perpetuate a situation which has already caused a good deal of confusion by reason of divided authority. On the other hand, if the Department wishes to control film distribution abroad, the necessity for the appointment of such officers by the Department must be faced.

5. The proposed prints budget could only be effectively administered by the Film Board, if the Department had control of policy.

6. The general position may be summed as follows: If the Department regards the distribution of films abroad as its responsibility and subject to its control, this can only be achieved by a discussion at the highest level with regard to an amendment of the National Film Act and the implementation of the programme suggested in the attached "Draft Agenda".†

7. An alternative proposal, which was not discussed at the meeting, but which is perhaps worth consideration, would be an amendment to the National Film Act transferring to the Department, the international distribution section of the National Film Board together with its staff and appropriation. This latter plan has definite advantages:

(i) It would bring international distribution under the control of the Department beyond all peradventure;

(ii) It would provide the Department with personnel who, after suitable training within the Department, could go abroad as films officers.

(iii) It would centralize, under one Department, personnel, budget, equipment, administration and policy.

(iv) It would enable Canada to conform to a pattern of international distribution already practised by the United Kingdom, the United States and France, and, which in their case, has proved to be the most effective.

8. This plan would involve the Department (though not the Government as a whole) in an additional expenditure of approximately $150,000 per annum: $90,000 for prints and $60,000 for salaries, equipment, repairs, replacements and services.

9. In our estimation the adoption of one or other of these plans is the only way in which real control of film distribution abroad can be obtained for the Department.

10. It is perhaps worth noting that the present situation in the main libraries in Paris and Sydney—our two largest operations abroad—is such as to threaten the success of our entire film programme; and that, in our opinion, it can be resolved only by the adoption of one or other of these plans.

Note de la direction d'information pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Information Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], October 24, 1949

I attach for your information a report of a meeting between representatives of the National Film Board and of the Department of External Affairs, held in the Film Commissioner's office, on October 4, together with observations on the discussion which took place.

2. I also attach (a) a brief submitted by the National Film Board to the Department in reply to our "Draft Agenda" for a meeting;† (b) our "Draft Agenda" which, as you may recall, was handed to the Film Commissioner by Mr. Mayrand on the occasion of the meeting in your office on September 12;† (c) a copy of the National Film Act.†

I have not attempted to make any short summary of these observations since I think you are likely to wish to read them in full. Paragraphs 2 and 3 will give you the essential fact that Mr. McLean has formally stated that he is not prepared to accept direction or control. Again, on page 5, in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the observations, we state our opinion that it looks as though we shall have to consider discussing an amendment to the National Film Act.

At our meeting, after Mr. McLean had stated his position, and I had reserved ours, we went into a general discussion which produced some interesting points covered in the attached observations. It was made clear, however, beyond any possibility of doubt, that these discussions were pure theory, since we had not retreated in any way from the position which you took at the first meeting.⁶

ALLAN ANDERSON

⁶ Note marginale/Marginal note:

Mr. Anderson. Thank you. Interesting as further evidence of NFB's determination to destroy itself. I sh[oul]d like to meet with you & Mr. McInnes & if possible Mayrand to discuss our next move. We must decide whether to try half measures or ask for Cabinet direction or even amend[ments] of NFB Act. Pl[ease] call me or phone. Oct. 29 A. H[eeney]
