Some concern had been felt in the Defence Committee about security arrangements. This problem had been referred to the Military Committee which had set up a special sub-committee to study and report on a suitable system. Pending such report the U.S. Government was to make interim security arrangements. In the early stages, the United States would provide secretarial services until the Defence Committee had determined more permanent arrangements at their next meeting. This was scheduled for early December.

(External Affairs memorandum, Oct. 8, 1949).

7. Mr. Claxton said he was impressed with the serious way in which the U.S. regarded the North Atlantic Pact. They looked upon it as a major instrument for defence and were planning to give it full support.

An opportunity had been taken to discuss informally with the U.K. Minister of Defence and the U.S. Secretary of Defence the extent to which they would accept commitments in Western Europe. Mr. Alexander had indicated that U.K. forces were stretched to the limit and his government would be reluctant to make any commitment in Western Europe unless the U.S. were prepared to make a balancing commitment for defence of the U.K. Mr. Johnson indicated that the U.S. would be unlikely to make commitments of a formal character as this was a matter for decision by Congress. They would, however, probably continue to have forces in Europe.

It appeared from these conversations that Canada would probably not be expected to have any considerable number of forces in Europe, though possibly small groups of officers and men would be wanted for short periods of duty.

The question of military and civilian representation on North Atlantic planning bodies was one upon which an early decision should be made. This would probably involve the appointment of more senior officers to London and Washington and some reorganization of the staffs there. Proposals would shortly be submitted.

18. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on North Atlantic organizational developments.

Note de la direction de la liaison de la Défense

Memorandum by Defence Liaison Division

Ottawa, October 18, 1949

The North Atlantic Council, at its first session, directed a Working Group in the following terms to prepare for the Council recommendations on the establishment of economic and financial machinery—

“The Council recognizes the importance of economic and financial factors in the development and implementation of military plans for the defense of the North Atlantic area. Consequently, there shall be established as soon as possible appropriate machinery to consider these matters. The details of organization of this machinery, terms of reference, etc., shall be studied forthwith by a Working Group which shall submit recommendations to the Council.”

Although the Working Group has not as yet been convened, both the United Kingdom and the United States have prepared draft proposals for the financial and economic machinery to be established under the Treaty.

2. The U.K. draft envisages the establishment of a Committee of Finance Ministers (under the Council). The Finance Ministers will, in turn, establish a Finance and Economic Committee consisting of one representative from each Party (normally meeting in London) with the following terms of reference:

“The Finance and Economic Committee shall consider such financial and economic questions as may be referred to them by the Committee of Finance Ministers or by the Military Committee or by the Military Production and Supply Board and shall report as necessary to the Committee of Finance Ministers.

Such questions may include matters affecting the distribution of available financial and economic resources; the allocation of defence costs; advice to the Military Production and Supply Board on the financial and economic implications of North Atlantic production programmes; and payment questions arising out of North Atlantic production."

3. The U.S. draft has not been made available to us, but indications are that the United States (as might be expected) would favour terms of reference even more detailed than those set out in the U.K. draft. The United States have, however, apparently agreed to drop a former proposal for explicit reference to the concept of "equality of sacrifice" in the terms of reference of the financial and economic machinery. It has, however, been indicated that the United States would strongly favour implicit reference to such a concept.

4. The U.K. draft has been studied by Mr. Deutsch who agrees that it would be most inappropriate to anticipate the work which might have to be done by the Finance and Economic Committee and thus to spell out in advance and in too great detail the proposed Committee's terms of reference. We have commented to our Embassy in Washington on the U.K. draft in part as follows:

"I am, however, convinced that Deutsch's approach to the problem is a realistic one. It could be argued that wider terms of reference such as contained in the U.K. draft would tend to increase commitments beyond those undertaken through ratification of the Treaty itself. The phrase 'allocation of defence cost' is, I think, an implicit recognition of the principle of 'equality of sacrifice' to which we should take strong exception. The support which our position, in this respect, might be expected to receive from some of the European signatories (and particularly Belgium) might be somewhat lessened in view of the fact that they will be recipients under the U.S. Mutual Defence Assistance Act. We should, however, continue to oppose drafting terms of reference for the Finance and Economic Committee designed solely to lessen United States difficulties arising from the M.D.A.A. Such difficulties might be better resolved through the bilateral agreements which the United States intends to negotiate with the prospective recipients of U.S. military assistance."

5. Both the U.K. and the U.S. proposals have been based in part on past experience in Western Union. The Western Union Military Supply Board and the Western Union Finance and Economic Committee have (in addition to even more academic studies) surveyed the equipment deficiencies in the existing forces of the Five Powers and estimated the approximate cost to them of meeting these deficiencies. The Western Union Powers have agreed on specific additional production programmes to help meet existing deficiencies and the Finance and Economic Committee have been endeavouring to arrive at some acceptable formula for sharing the costs of the agreed common defence programmes. The United Kingdom have proposed that each of the Five Powers should devote approximately the same percentage of its national income to defence purposes. Thus, in financing additional Western Union military production, the first call would be on those countries whose defence expenditure was below average. It has, however, been found impossible to agree after almost a year's study on an automatic formula for the distribution of defence costs. The Western Union Finance and Economic Committee have, however, performed a useful function in recommending to governments measures for financing transfers of certain items of military equipment among the Five Powers.

6. The United States have strongly (and wisely) urged that military rehabilitation in Europe should take second place to economic recovery. For this reason, they have suggested (in our discussions with them) that the North Atlantic Finance and Economic Committee should at the outset place a financial ceiling on European defence production programmes, (an approach probably inspired by E.C.A. who feel that Western Europe will do too much rather than too little in the field of defence). In addition, as mentioned above, the U.S. authorities are convinced that some formula for the distribution of defence costs among North Atlantic nations should be reached. (Such a formula, if adopted, would probably increase pressure on Canada to contribute further to the mutual defence of the North Atlantic area; it would also be of great assistance to the U.S. administration in their appeals to Congress for additional military assistance appropriation.)

7. In general, the Canadian approach to the problem of financial and economic machinery might be that its terms of reference should be as general as possible. In particular, we should strongly resist drafting terms of reference for financial machinery which would in any way tend to commit in advance the Canadian Government to budgetary expenditure, normally voted on an annual basis.³⁰ The Committee should not be directed by the Council to study specific problems, but rather to study such economic and financial problems as may be referred to it by the North Atlantic Production and Supply Board and the Military Committee.³¹ The Western Union countries, having additional commitments under the Brussels Treaty, might resolve their additional financial problems through their existing Finance and Economic Committee (some of the functions of which might be taken over by the broader North Atlantic Finance and Economic Committee). The U.S. administration might satisfy Congressional requirements through bilateral (or if desirable multilateral) agreements which will be concluded with the prospective recipients of the U.S. military aid under the terms of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act.

8. It should be emphasized, however, that the problem of finding some equitable formula for allocating defence costs among Western Union (and North Atlantic) powers, is a real one. The United States proposals for North Atlantic finance and economic machinery have, of course, been drafted largely with an eye to the Western European recipients of U.S. military assistance. Nevertheless, it could be argued with justification that the common pledge under the Treaty to provide assistance calls for an equal effort on the part of all the North Atlantic signatories (taking into account other relevant economic factors). The final decision as to the type and the amount of assistance which a signatory may contribute to the common pool rests, of course, with the government of that signatory. It might be successfully argued by our representatives that the terms of reference for the financial and economic machinery need not contain explicit reference to the need for reaching an agreed formula for "equality of sacrifice". However, if the Finance and Economic Committee is to be an effective mechanism, it may be assumed that it will recommend to governments some formula for the distribution of defence costs. It is doubtful whether the Western Union Finance and Economic Committee could perform this task effectively and U.S. bilateral agreements may not be suitable instruments to carry out the obligations of a multilateral Treaty.

VIII. NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION—MINISTER'S REQUEST

20. The Committee had for consideration a request from the Minister of National Defence on the manner of setting up and working the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Group and the Western European Regional Planning Group insofar as Canada was concerned.

(CSC 5-27 of 20th October, 1949, refers)†

21. The Chief of the General Staff pointed out that at this time it would be difficult to provide a factual report for the Minister as the plans of organization for the various groups, with the exception of the Western European Regional Planning Group, had not as yet been developed.

22. It was agreed, after further discussion, that the Minister be advised:

(a) that the terms of reference for the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, and the Canadian Joint Staff, London, had been approved by the Chiefs of Staff and were ready for submission to the Cabinet Defence Committee;

(b) that the Chiefs of Staff proposals for the organization of the North American Regional Group and the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Group were being developed; and

(c) that in the matter of North Atlantic Defence Planning, the channels of communication were being established between the representatives of the Chiefs of Staff in Washington and London and the Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

I attach for your information copy of WA-2955 of October 25† concerning the initial request made by the United States to certain North Atlantic countries for military facilities.

2. You will note from the attached teletype† that the United States has requested military facilities from France, Italy and Denmark. It is not clear, however, under what authority these agreements are to be negotiated. Under the U.S. Mutual Defence Assistance Act, the President is directed to conclude agreements (bilateral or multilateral) with the proposed recipients of U.S. military assistance. These agreements will, among other things, make appropriate provision for "furnishing equipment and materials, services or other assistance consistent with the Charter of the United Nations to the United States or to and among other eligible nations to further the policies and purposes of this Act". On the other hand, separate agreements could be made under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty. It would seem that if the latter is to be the case, the U.S. proposals are somewhat premature in that they are not based on the joint recommendations of any of the military agencies established under the Treaty.

3. The State Department has suggested that standard multilateral agreements might be negotiated among all the signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty on the mutual exchange of mapping information, air transit and technical stop-rights and visits of naval vessels. The Canadian Ambassador, in addition, gathers that Canada may be approached by the United States with proposals for a bilateral agreement dealing with their existing facilities in Newfoundland, which might include a request for additional rights at Goose Bay. It can be expected that the European nations will raise no objection to the United States proposal both because they will be recipients of United States military aid and because in general they welcome increased United States commitments in Europe. Canada is, of course, in a distinctly different position for we will not receive U.S. military aid under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act nor do we welcome increased U.S. military activities in Canada.

4. In general, I feel that the United States proposals for bilateral and multilateral agreements with the North Atlantic countries, particularly at this time, are most inappropriate in that they are not based on the recommendations of any of the North Atlantic agencies. The pattern which U.S. military authorities may establish might have unfortunate results on the success of multilateral co-operation under the Treaty. From our standpoint, a precedent may be established for a U.S. bilateral agreement with Canada and suggestions may be made that our desiderata with respect to Newfoundland Bases should be discussed within the North Atlantic Treaty arrangements. I feel, therefore, that we should instruct our Embassy in Washington to seek from the United States authorities further details as to the nature and extent of the United States proposed agreements. I attach for your signature, if you approve, a teletype to Washington for this purpose.³²

Washington, November 3, 1949

I had a talk with George Perkins, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs at the State Department today, Thursday, November 3rd, at my request, to discuss with him our mutual aid problems under the North Atlantic Treaty, with particular reference to military facilities and procurement of military supplies. Perkins had Snow with him and Ignatieff accompanied me.

2. The main purpose of my visit was to engage Perkins' personal interest in our military procurement problems as well as to elicit further information on the thinking of the State Department regarding military facilities which you requested in your message EX-2634 of October 29th.† Since his appointment as assistant Secretary of State, the negotiations relating to the organization of the North Atlantic Treaty have almost exclusively absorbed his time and I thought it would be a good idea to direct his attention to the specific problems on which we are looking for urgent action.

3. At the outset of my conversation, I recalled the obligations which both Canada and the United States undertook under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty with regard to mutual aid. The principle of mutual aid under the Treaty arises both in connection with the problem of military facilities which the United States are now seeking from their co-signatories of the Treaty on which I said I wished to have further information and also in relation to procurement of military supplies. Taking the latter aspect of the problem first, I summarized the previous approaches made to the State Department before the M.A.P. legislation had been adopted by Congress, and subsequently, in an endeavour to obtain from them a statement of how it might be possible to operate under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act in order to facilitate procurement of equipment for Canadian forces. I pointed out that such a statement had not yet been forthcoming, despite repeated requests.

4. Snow, who was asked to comment, said that the mechanism for operating under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act was only now being established and that the officials concerned were still not quite ready to determine what procedures might be applied to Canadian procurement. They were working on the problem and hoped to be in a position shortly to supply some further information. In the meantime, he emphasized the need for a statement of a specific list of equipment which we will be requiring in the current fiscal year, as previously requested.

³² Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree A H[eeney] Oct 28

5. I then turned to the related problem of procurement in Canada of equipment by the United States services, recalling in this connection the conversation between the Prime Minister and the President last February 12th, and the Prime Minister's speech at Troy on October 14th. I pointed out that, without the kind of arrangements for reciprocal procurement suggested by the Prime Minister, there would be difficulty in achieving effective arrangements for integrated defence under the North Atlantic Treaty, especially in the production field. It would certainly also hamper the achievement of the policy of standardization to which both countries had subscribed. Perkins, in reply to this point, said that what was blocking progress in this matter was not any lack of sympathy or action by administrative officials but the legislation of the Buy America Act. He said the question was constantly in the mind of the State Department and it seemed that some kind of new legislative action would be necessary before the objectives which were pretty generally accepted, both in the United States and Canada, could be realized.

6. The conversation then turned to the question of military facilities. Perkins said that he was not fully familiar with the details of the preliminary talks which had taken place in the State Department with representatives of France, Italy and Denmark during his absence in Europe and he only offered general comment. He emphasized the preliminary nature of the talks which have taken place to date. It was his understanding that, generally speaking, the agreements covering military facilities would be negotiated under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty and that such agreements might be bi-lateral or multi-lateral as the circumstances seemed to dictate. As regards the multi-lateral agreements, there would be certain standard agreements covering such matters as exchange of mapping information, air transit rights and arrangements with regard to naval visits. Multi-lateral Agreements regarding military facilities would be required also for the implementation of specific defence plans as recommended by respective regional planning groups. In addition, bi-lateral agreements might be negotiated between any two parties to the North Atlantic Treaty under Article 3 in order to facilitate the implementation of the purposes of the Treaty. Such bi-lateral agreements would not be directly connected with the bi-lateral agreements contemplated under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act. The bi-lateral agreements under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act, would, he said, make reference to mutual aid, including a general reference to military facilities but would not specify any particular arrangements. The State Department did not consider it appropriate that mutual defence assistance grants should be tied in with any specific quid pro quo from beneficiaries under this legislation.

7. I realize that what Perkins had to say does not add very much to the information already given you on the question of military facilities but the United States proposals in this regard are still in their formative stages. There is still no indication of what military facilities, if any, will be requested from Canada. I did say that

I hoped that the negotiations with regard to bases with other parties of the North Atlantic Treaty would not in any way delay the conclusion of an agreement between Canada and the United States over the question of the United States base rights in Newfoundland as the latter question preceded the negotiation of the North Atlantic Treaty and should be considered on its merits. I had in mind the hints thrown out by Rusk that they would not wish arrangements made with Canada in regard to United States bases in Newfoundland to establish unsatisfactory precedents from their point of view as regards base rights they may be seeking from other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty.

8. Summarizing the objects of my visit, I said that I hoped that everything possible would be done to speed up progress on:—

- (a) Procurement for Canadian forces;
- (b) Newfoundland bases;
- (c) The question of reciprocal procurement for United States forces in Canada.

Bearing in mind that all three objectives are governed by mutually accepted policies which have been confirmed as being to the mutual interest of both countries at the highest level.

9. I cannot say that Perkins did more than listen sympathetically to what I had to say. He is disposed to be cautious in committing himself to any course of action but I believe that our talk may do some good in directing his attention to the specific interests which we have in connection with the implementation of Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty and our concern at the slow progress to date.

10. Incidentally, Snow told me privately after the meeting that as regards progress on the procurement problem, he thought that the procurement of the tank spares, with the exception of the two or three items not in stock, would be made available under procedures followed before the passing of the M.D.A.A. However, as regards the F.86 equipment, the Pentagon seemed reluctant to take action until authorized under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act. This makes it all the more urgent for us to put in a formal and specific list of our requirements for the current fiscal year. I would then propose to take the matter up personally with Bruce, the Administrator of the M.D.A.A.

NORTH ATLANTIC MILITARY PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY BOARD
PROGRESS REPORT

1. The North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board held its first sessions in London on November 1 and 2. As was expected, the meeting dealt in the main with organizational matters pertaining to the setting up of a permanent working staff and secretariat and with preliminary plans for the future activities of the Board. The principal decisions taken were:—

(a) Mr. West-Burnham, Head of Secretariat, Western Union Military Supply Board, was appointed as interim Secretary pending the appointment of a permanent Secretary.

(b) It was agreed that the Liaison Group in Washington would deal primarily with technical matters and would be more in the nature of a secretariat than a working staff. Decision on its composition was deferred until the nature and extent of its duties are determined more accurately in the light of experience.

(c) With respect to the question of regional supply boards, it was agreed that the North Atlantic Supply Board was not yet in a position to delegate any of its functions to regional supply boards. At the meeting, the representatives of Norway-Denmark and Italy indicated that they felt that special supply problems would necessitate regional supply boards being set up for the Northern European region and the Southern European-Western Mediterranean region, respectively.

(d) Decided to make an initial report to the Defence Committee along the lines of the attached paper entitled "A Statement of Objectives of the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board". This report is based on two papers which the United States delegation placed before the meeting for consideration. One of these set forth a statement of integration or production planning; the other outlined a number of projects which the permanent working staff might be expected to undertake in the near future. It was indicated that this report will be presented to the Defence Committee at the same time as the military side of the Treaty Organization submits its initial statements on military plans.

(e) Decided that for the present the Western Union Supply Board is not to be regarded as a regional board under the NAT, although the five countries concerned will have the same representation on the Western Union Board and its executive committee as on the North Atlantic Supply Board and its permanent working staff, respectively. The meeting did not attempt to define the formal relationship which may exist in the future between the two bodies. It was generally agreed, however, that the details of the production programmes of the Western Union countries should not be regarded as fixed, but should be considered as open to revision if further study indicated that such a revision was necessary.

(f) It was agreed that the next full meeting of the Board would be held on or before February 1, 1950 at the call of the Chairman.

A STATEMENT OF OBJECTIVES OF THE
NORTH ATLANTIC MILITARY PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY BOARD

1. The parties of the North Atlantic Treaty have agreed in Article 3:

“In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.”

The Military Production and Supply Board in carrying out the directive of the NAT Defense Committee 5th October, 1949, establishing the Board, dedicates itself to work for the fulfillment of the objectives of Article 3. The parties recognize that recommendation of measures for the employment of effective mutual aid and the development of their collective capacity for coordinated production and supply to implement agreed military plans is the essential task of the Military Production and Supply Board. The completion of the task rests on the important principle that each nation must do its part, as determined by its position and its resources, in relation to the common security of all. In the production and supply of military equipment advantage will be taken of all possible benefits from individual national specialization in the development of the combined industrial and national assets of the NAT countries. It is also recognized that military production and supply programs must be undertaken in full recognition of economic and financial factors since the economic recovery and strength of the NAT nations must not be jeopardized.

2. A coordinated program of military production and supply within the availabilities and capabilities of the twelve nations will be formulated in connection with the development of the military requirements of integrated military plans for the defence of the North Atlantic area. The Board recognizes that planning for military production and supply must be dynamic as well as flexible, and that in order to accomplish its mission its plans must be concurrent with and correlated to the military planning of the NATO. Meanwhile the Military Production and Supply Board has undertaken the plans and actions that can be accomplished at present utilizing the experience and accomplishments of the Western Union Military Supply Board.

3. Specifically, the following programs and studies have been approved and undertaken by the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board. From these programs and studies an integrated plan for meeting the production and supply requirements of the military plans will be evolved:—

(A) A review of currently planned programmes of European signatory countries for the production of military equipment and spare parts for the use in the common defence of the North Atlantic area with the object of ensuring that, wherever practicable, the principle of integrated military production is adopted.

(B) An inventory of military equipment and spare parts in the European countries signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty that are of United States origin and are surplus to the needs of the possessor country.

(C) The undertaking of immediate studies to indicate the composition and volume of military equipment and spare parts currently surplus to the needs of the possessors for the purpose of laying the foundation for transfers to other signatory countries as their needs are determined.

(D) Development of short and long-range plans for promotion of standardization of military end-products and production methods.

(E) Study of the adjustment of location of production facilities taking into account strategic factors, the physical capabilities of individual countries to produce military material, the importance of securing maximum efficiency and integration of production, and the guidance furnished by the finance and economic machinery with respect to financial and economic considerations.

(F) The Working staff has discretion to undertake other projects which they consider to be essential referring when necessary to the Board for approval.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC COMMITTEE
PROGRESS REPORT

As you know, the North Atlantic Council decided at its first session to establish an Economic and Financial Organization under the Treaty, and accordingly directed the Working Group in Washington to prepare recommendations and propose terms of reference for submission to the Council at a later date. The Working Group have now concluded their meetings and its proposed terms of reference for the Defence Financial and Economic Committee are embodied in a report to the North Atlantic Council, a copy of which is attached.†

The suggested terms of reference as drawn up by the Working Group provide:

(a) that the Committee shall be composed of a representative at a ministerial or similarly high level of responsibility from each signatory country, and that it shall report directly to the North Atlantic Council;

(b) the Committee shall establish and maintain close working relations with the North Atlantic Military Organization and particularly the Military Production and Supply Board. It shall be prepared to give advice on all relevant financial and economic factors to the other bodies set up under the Treaty;

(c) the principle of self-help and mutual aid in the field of military production and supply, and the primary importance of economic recovery and continued economic stability in the member countries shall be taken into account by the Committee when exercising its functions.

It is expected that this report will be submitted for approval to a meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Washington on November 15.

The Working Group did not reach a decision on the matter of the location of the permanent working staff of the Committee. The French have insisted that Paris be the site for this organization in view of the necessity for a close liaison between the Committee and the O.E.E.C. organization in Paris. Great Britain, on the other hand, has maintained that London would be more appropriate inasmuch as close liaison will also be necessary between the Defence Financial and Economic Committee and the Military Production and Supply Board. It is understood that this matter will be discussed by Mr. Acheson, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Schuman at the forthcoming meeting in Paris.

Ottawa, November 10, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for Pierce from Heeney, Begins: I have called a meeting of the Deputy Ministers of Finance, Trade and Commerce, National Defence, the Secretary to the Cabinet, and the Chief of the General Staff for Monday, November 14, at 12:00 noon to discuss the desirability of setting up an inter-departmental committee to deal with Atlantic Treaty matters. The text of this letter follows in my immediately succeeding telegram.†

I am becoming more convinced that it would be wise to consider working out some sort of programme whereby we could contribute under the Atlantic Treaty effectively and at the same time with the least embarrassment to ourselves. This programme might well include economic as well as military aid. In any event I think we should seek to anticipate proposals which might be made to us for contributions.

It may be also that we should seek to use Article 2 of the Treaty as a means of strengthening our economic position and that of the Atlantic Treaty community generally. Some officials of the State Department seem to be coming around to this view.

I have not set out the above considerations very clearly in the letter to other departments since some of them might be alarmed. I am suggesting them to you, since I feel that you are more familiar with the background and development of the Atlantic Treaty, and also to indicate to you the importance of the forthcoming meeting.

Would it be possible for you to come up for the meeting and have further discussions with me regarding the Atlantic Treaty and other matters? Ends.

Note de la direction de la liaison de la DéfenseMemorandum by Defence Liaison Division

Ottawa, November 14, 1949

The North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board has concluded its first organizational meeting. At its first meeting the Board established a permanent working staff. In a directive to the working staff, the initial tasks in the field of military production and supply were set forth. These are contained on the last page of the document before you. I do not think that any further explanation of the working staff's directive is required.

2. The U.S. delegation have played a leading part in the first meeting of the Board. It became increasingly evident as the discussions proceeded that the United States regarded the Board and its working staff as bodies established in the first instance to implement the U.S. Mutual Defence Assistance Act. The United States, it appeared, attached primary importance to the "integration" of production in the North Atlantic area and particularly among European recipients of U.S. mutual assistance. The Western Union additional production programme, which has already had the approval of the Ministers of the Five Powers and the details of which were given to the United States last spring, is no longer regarded by the United States as a fixed programme. "Congress", said the U.S. Chairman, "is not prepared to accept a Five Power programme—we want a Ten Power programme." He pointed out that the United States would be unwilling to finance the production of trucks in one of the Western Union powers if trucks could be more economically produced by one of the other North Atlantic signatories. The U.S. representative indicated that before the President would be willing to release the $900,000,000 under the M.D.A.A., he would have to approve not only an integrated military plan for the North Atlantic area, but also an integrated military production plan.

3. With regard to the permanent working staff, the Board agreed that the national representatives should be on a high level and should be available, if necessary, for full time duty. Office space for the national representatives on the working staff would be provided by the U.K. Government at 36 Whitehall. It would appear desirable, therefore, that a fairly senior Canadian representative should be appointed in the very near future, both because Canada will have a direct interest in the work of the Board and because of the important physiological [sic] effects on the European nations.

4. The first session of the Board ended in an atmosphere of relative harmony and co-operation. The European signatories appeared to be convinced of the necessity for integrating and maximizing their military production. The United States has its Mutual Defence Assistance Act. Canada, surprisingly enough, was not asked what part it was prepared to play.

II. CANADA-UNITED STATES REGIONAL PLANNING GROUP

2. The Chief of the General Staff stated that there was considerable controversy concerning the composition of regional planning groups. The North Atlantic Council Directive had indicated clearly that regional planning groups consisted of countries. However, when the organization of regional planning groups was being discussed by the Defence Committee, the statement by the U.S. Secretary of Defense, that United States representation on ministerial committees of regional groups would probably be military, had no doubt given rise to the idea that regional planning groups did not include ministerial committees and were limited only to military personnel. The European planning groups were all patterned on the organization of Western Union and it was understood that each group would be required to do its own planning, which would include supply and economic considerations as well as military.

General Bradley had indicated that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff would be prepared to meet with the Canadian Chiefs of Staff as the Canada-U.S. Chiefs of Staff Committee. However, it was apparent that this view was not held by the more junior United States officers concerned with the plan for the organization of the Canada-U.S. Regional Planning Group. The U.S. authorities should be advised that the proposed arrangement which provided for a Chiefs of Staff Committee was acceptable to Canada but that this organization should be developed to include a Ministers' Committee and provision for any required Supply Committee and Financial and Economic Committee.

(CSC 5-27-7, CSC 5-27-10 of 10th November, 1949†)

3. The Chief of the Naval Staff, referring to the discussions of the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group, pointed out that the U.S. representatives had deprecated the idea of a Ministers' Committee in this group because of the difficulty of getting ten ministers together to discuss the development of the various plans of the group. An organization which provided for a ministerial committee and supply and economic committees parallel to the Chiefs of Staff Committee was theoretically sound; in practice, however, the value of all these committees was still undetermined.

4. The Chief of the Air Staff said that it would be of great advantage to have both supply and economic committees set up within the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group organization, particularly in regard to the problem of obtaining United States equipment. Unless there were a supply committee, Canada's position concerning procurement of U.S. supplies would be comparable to that of the South American countries.

5. The Secretary to the Cabinet indicated that, while there was a good case for the inclusion of a Supply Committee within the Canada-U.S. Regional Planning Group organization, there did not appear to be at this time a requirement for a Financial and Economic Committee. It might be possible to incorporate the supply and economic considerations into any military plans on a purely domestic basis.

6. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that it would be appropriate at this time to indicate to the United States Government through the Ambassador in Washington that, insofar as the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group organization was concerned, the Canadian authorities preferred to follow the pattern of Western Union, which would provide for a Ministerial Committee and in addition Supply and Financial and Economic Committees on the same status as that of the Chiefs of Staff.

7. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed to recommend to the Minister of National Defence that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be requested to advise the U.S. authorities informally that Canada desired to have within the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group a Ministerial Committee, together with provision for a Supply Board and a Financial and Economic Committee.

III. North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group

8. The Chief of the Naval Staff stated that the report of the ad hoc committee to the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group was not yet available. However, it was understood that the only major amendment to the original report was the inclusion of an additional sub-group in the organization responsible for the "the Defence of Areas not covered by other Regional Planning Groups". This additional sub-group, which was required to co-ordinate the defence plans for Greenland, was composed of Canada, the United States and Denmark.

(CSC 5-27-7, CSC 5-27-10 of 10th November, 1949†)

9. The Committee noted the remarks of the Chief of the Naval Staff.

Le ministre des Finances au ministre de la Défense nationale

Minister of Finance to Minister of National Defence

Ottawa, November 16, 1949

My dear Colleague:—

I have your letter of November 3 about estimates for the fiscal year 1950–51.†

I am in agreement with your suggestion that the preparation of your estimates for the fiscal year 1950–51 be deferred until the Cabinet has made a decision as to our defence plans which will provide a firm basis for your appropriation next year, and subject to the limitations that I think we both recognize as being necessary in planning beyond this, I would hope will provide a reasonably firm basis over the next five years. It is important that our defence plans be on a realistic basis and that we take what precautions we can to avoid the implementation of plans which it may not be possible to fulfill. I am advised by my officials that you will endeavour to have the plans and estimates which will form the basis of discussion in the Cabinet Defence Committee available by about November 15 for our study, and that discussions in the Cabinet Defence Committee will commence about the end of this month. I think we should try to meet this timetable because any delays may make it difficult for us to get the material required for the 1950-51 estimates in proper shape by the time we need it.

It will be in order to discontinue the classification of that part of your appropriation which is still under "Demobilization and Reconversion".

I should like to add that I feel the Cabinet Defence Committee should consider at the same time as your program the additional expenditures, if any, which we can expect as a direct result of our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty. I realize that it may be difficult at this stage to estimate these with any precision, but I think it is most important that the Committee, and later the Cabinet, have before it the best forecasts that can be made by your officers as well as the Department of External Affairs of our prospective requirements under the Treaty, whether for military services and facilities (e.g., reciprocal training arrangements), or the provision of equipment or supplies, either from stocks or production. It seems to me that our policy should be, so far as possible, to determine our defence program and budget as a whole. Perhaps it would be as well for the Chiefs of Staff to give some consideration in advance of our meetings to the relationship between their own programs proper and other defence programs and expenditures arising out of the Treaty, so that we can discuss this at the same time as the Service programs.

I assume that you or the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be furnishing us with the usual Intelligence appreciation of the general security situation as a necessary background to the consideration of the programs.

In view of its bearing upon any program arising out of the North Atlantic Treaty, I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Pearson with a note saying that I hope he will be prepared to discuss this aspect of the matter at the Committee meetings.

Yours very truly,
D.C. ABBOTT

My dear Colleague:—

I enclose a copy of a letter I have written the Minister of National Defence regarding consideration of the defence program and estimates for the next year.

You will note I have suggested that the Cabinet Defence Committee should consider at the same time as the Service programs the additional expenditures, if any, which we can expect as a direct result of our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty. I quite realize that it is difficult at this stage to know what these will be, but I think it is important that the Committee and the Cabinet have the best opinions that they can obtain from the Defence authorities, as well as from yourself and your Department, of our requirements under the Treaty, both for military services and facilities for the provision of equipment or supplies.

I understand that Mr. Claxton is likely to be going to the meeting of the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty powers in Paris at the end of the month and that it will be difficult to have full consideration of these matters in our Cabinet Defence Committee before he leaves, but I would hope that we could have one meeting on this general problem and perhaps hear the views of the Chiefs of Staff in regard to their own programs, as well as their preliminary views and the other preliminary views that can be put forward at this stage regarding the effect of the Treaty upon our Defence program.

Yours very truly,

Following from Heeney. Begins: North Atlantic Council Meeting.

The Minister in his general statement to the House of Commons yesterday said, with respect to the importance of implementing Article 2 of the Treaty, that the first thing was for the North Atlantic Council "at its next meeting" to consider what machinery should be set up for study and discussion and negotiation on this whole question and how best to implement the obligations of all members of the North Atlantic community "to promote conditions of stability and well-being, to seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and to encourage economic collaboration between them". By now you should have received the full text of the statement on this question.

2. What the Minister had in mind in referring to "the next meeting" was the next meeting of the North Atlantic Foreign Ministers. He was not thinking of tomorrow's meeting when the Ministers will be presented by the heads of their countries' diplomatic missions.

3. You will recall that at the first meeting of the Council the Norwegian Foreign Minister referred to the desirability of having consideration given to the implementing of Article 2. Mr. Pearson had, of course, mentioned the importance which we attach to that provision and M. Schuman also expressed his concurrence quite emphatically.

4. In view of what the Minister said in the House it is desirable that mention be made of the advisability of having the Working Group consider at an early date the machinery that might be set up for discussion of this question, with the object of having proposals worked out for submission to the Council when next the Foreign Ministers meet.

5. It may be that your Norwegian colleague would mention this question. If not, the Minister would like you to do so unless you see some serious objection.

6. I realize that this matter is not on the agenda for tomorrow's meeting but we would hope that something could be said, nevertheless, which would appear in the record of proceedings. You will notice when you see the Hansard that a considerable degree of attention was given by various speakers to the importance of the economic provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty.

7. You might let me know in due course what is done in this connection. Ends.

Second meeting of the North Atlantic Council.

1. The Council meeting this afternoon formally approved the summary minutes of the first session on September 17th (see our despatch No. 2701 of November 5th)†; adopted the report of the working group on the Defense Financial and Economic Committee; and approved a communique, to be issued immediately after the meeting, giving the texts of the report on the Defense Financial and Economic Committee and of the Defense Committee's directive to the Military Production and Supply Board.

2. Mr. Acheson opened the meeting with a brief statement to the effect that satisfactory progress had been made in establishing the defense organization, noting that there had been meetings of the Defense Committee, Military Committee, standing group and the five regional planning groups. He also referred to the forthcoming meetings of the Military Committee on November 29th and of the Defense Committee on December 1st, pointing out that it would probably be necessary for the Council to meet again some time in December to receive the report of the Defense Committee.

3. During the discussion of the working group's report on the Defense Financial and Economic Committee I took the opportunity of making a statement regarding the implementation of Article II along the lines indicated in your EX-2774 of November 17th. The text of my statement will be given in a separate teletype.† I was supported by the representatives of France and Norway, and Mr. Acheson said that he assumed we should be presenting a concrete suggestion at a further meeting of the Council as a basis for a directive to the working group. I replied that we should certainly be willing to give some thought to this.

4. At the conclusion of the meeting the Belgian Ambassador said that he wished to point out that his Foreign Minister, while not objecting to this particular meeting, would not like to see it establish a precedent for the handling of Council business through meetings of Ambassadors in Washington. This was noted, but the point of view expressed did not receive any support from other representatives, who seemed to feel that special meetings of the Ambassadors were fully justified if the nature of the business to be transacted would not warrant the attendance of Foreign Ministers. I also pointed out that such meetings had the advantage of keeping the Council alive from the standpoint of the public and that it was probably desirable to have special sessions of this sort between the relatively infrequent meetings of the full Council.

Meeting of the North Atlantic Council—U.S. reactions to my statement regarding Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

1. Ignatieff had an opportunity of speaking with Perkins, Achilles and Galloway separately after the meeting. Each of them indicated that they would have liked to have been consulted before the issue was raised in the Council. As to the manner of proceeding with this question in the future, each of them said that it was their understanding that the Chairman (Mr. Acheson) had not committed the Council to taking the matter up at the next meeting of the Council (which may take place about the middle of December to consider the report of the Defence Committee) as he had specifically referred to "a further meeting". It was also their understanding that the Chairman had suggested that we should submit a specific proposal of a procedural character upon which the Council might base its instructions to the Working Group to commence a study of the substance of the matters involved. Perkins said that we could, of course, ask for a meeting of the Working Committee before the Council meets and submit a draft of a paper setting out the procedure which might be followed in initiating the studies we had in mind, leading to the implementation of Article 2. He hoped that we would consult both the British and the United States before submitting such proposals.

2. Achilles, referring to the talks that he had had with myself and Ignatieff previously, regarding the question of working out methods of collaboration in the economic and financial field which might serve the interests of a wider integration of the North Atlantic countries, said that the State Department thinking was in an elementary status in this regard, and suggested that the best means of clarifying the issues was to discuss the matter through the tripartite consultation machinery now established in Washington.

3. Referring to the prolonged nature of the study which would be necessary before any new North Atlantic machinery for implementing Article 2 could be put into effect, Galloway remarked that he thought that there would be difficulties on the U.S. side of taking any action in this regard until after the next session of Congress.

Washington, November 18, 1949

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-2774 of November 17th, North Atlantic Council meeting.

1. We are reporting separately on the proceedings at the meeting. This message deals with your instructions to raise the question of machinery to give effect to Article 2. While I had doubts about raising this matter, my doubts did not amount to a "serious objection" (your paragraph 5). I was readily supported by the French and Norwegian Ambassadors and no one expressed opposition. Acheson, however, neatly returned the ball to me by asking me to propose at an early meeting of the Council the terms of an instruction to the working group. All I could do was to say that we would have a shot at this.

2. We have learned privately, however, that my intervention caused some irritation in the State Department. (See my separate report). I have already reported that the State Department is now more receptive than it used to be towards the creation of machinery to give effect to Article 2. Rusk and Achilles, and also Bissell of E.C.A., have all spoken to me recently in this sense. They are sure, however, that a good deal has to be done before the subject is ripe for consideration by the working groups and the Council. They are thinking of taking up the matter first in the forum of the tripartite economic discussions.

3. What might be done under Article 2 is an extremely difficult matter to determine. I set forth some of the difficulties which occurred to me in my message to you WA-1547 of June 3rd, but so far as I know the thinking in Ottawa has not advanced since then, while the creation of the tripartite economic arrangements has added to the complexity of the problem.

4. I have puzzled my head about the duties which could be appropriately given to a general North Atlantic economic agency, paying due regard to the activities of Gatt, the Bank and Fund, O.E.E.C., the Economic Council for Europe, and other international bodies, and also to the tripartite arrangements here. I have not come up with any answer, except the somewhat negative one that there may be useful scope for a North Atlantic Economic Council when the European Recovery Program is wound up in 1952. If that is correct, those concerned should, of course, begin to consider the matter long before the end of E.R.P., but hardly with a view to securing a decision of the North Atlantic Council at its next meeting attended by the Foreign Ministers.

5. We are, however, more or less committed to propose something to the Council at one of its next routine meetings here. I trust, therefore, that as a result of interdepartmental consideration in Ottawa, some definite and practical proposal may be developed, indicating how the study of the problems can profitably be undertaken by the working group, so that we do not incur the suspicion that we are advocating the creation of a new international agency as an end in itself and not as a means to an end. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

We should decide soon how we intend to give effect to Article 3 of the Treaty: "In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the Parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack".

(1) Self-help

A nation's expenditure on defence is an indication of what it is doing to help itself but it is no indication of the adequacy of its defences. A country in a perfect state of defence might need to spend less in maintaining its defences in any year than another country would have to spend in the course of building up its defences. Nevertheless the first country would be discharging in full its obligation to help itself. The real test is whether a country is doing all that it needs to do or all that it can do.

This might be our answer to any attempt to establish the principle of equality of sacrifice in the course of which our expenditures might be compared unfavourably to the expenditures of other signatories to the Treaty. In any such comparison use would probably be made of the following table showing (a) Percentage of military expenditure to total national income; and (b) Percentage of military expenditure to total Government expenditure of the Western Union countries and the United States for calendar year 1949 or fiscal year 1950.

Country	Percent of Military Expenditure to National Income	Percent of Military Expenditure to Total Government Expenditure
	Western Union Countries:
United Kingdom	7.6	20
France	4.9	17
Belgium	3.2	12
Luxemburg	1.0	3
Netherlands	7.7	23
United States	6.4	34

This table is taken from a Congressional Committee report. I do not know the bases used, so that it is hard to give a comparable Canadian figure. Our own calculations would probably produce a percentage of defence expenditure to total national income of a shade better than 2 per cent for 1948; and percentage of defence expenditure to current federal budget of about 16 per cent.

(2) Mutual Aid

The amount of Mutual Aid which a country should extend should not be related to the amount the country is spending on its own defence, but related directly to its physical and financial capacity to help others.

The United States has provided under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act $1,314,000,000, of which $1,000,000,000 is for Western Europe. The Western European nations have undertaken an additional munitions programme over two years amounting to $460,700,000, of which the United Kingdom is making roughly one-half and France just under 30 per cent. There have been a number of intra-European transfers arranged. The United Kingdom will supply France with $25,000,000 of aircraft equipment without payment and a number of barter transfers are contemplated.

There are several choices open to us if we extend mutual aid. We can provide a lump sum and impose conditions as the United States is doing through its bilateral agreements. We could make a lump sum available without imposing conditions, relying on the undertakings in the treaty itself.

However, the course which appeals to me is for us to announce our willingness to consider meeting deficiencies once they are established by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It is expected that the Military Production and Supply Board will establish deficiencies by taking the military concept and breaking it down into terms of munitions and supplies. We could declare our willingness to consider whether we could meet such established deficiencies physically and financially. We would make it clear that supplying deficiencies will in almost all cases entail American dollar expenditure and that we do not expect to be able to meet such expenditure. I think that the question of the American dollar component will arise in nearly all cases, because I understand that what surplus equipment we have is not likely to be much help in meeting deficiencies; and the British have surpluses of the same items.

I think it advisable that we be prepared to announce our position at the meeting of the Defence Committee, which the Minister of National Defence will attend on December 1st, if anything like an appropriate occasion presents itself. There is nothing to be gained by waiting until we are asked and much to be gained by announcing our position on our own initiative. One of the less obvious advantages is that it will permit us to deal with the type of enquiry that is already reaching us.

For example, North American Cyanamid Limited has a plant in standby position at Welland capable of producing picrite. We had hoped that the British would place an order with us; but they have decided—they say for financial reasons—to create capacity in England. Even with this capacity it is anticipated that there will be a serious shortage of picrite and it is generally felt that picrite should be stockpiled now that all available production lines should be maintained; and the British hope we would do so on our own. Our answer to the British would be that we would consider supplying picrite once the deficiency had been established by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We would thus not have to deal with deficiencies foreseen by individual countries, nor even with deficiencies established by Western Union. Further, we could make our contribution dependent upon our obtaining an order the United States. We have been hoping for an order from the United States for about one-half the plant capacity. We might ensure it if we could contribute an order ourselves.

We could deal in similar fashion with the type of enquiry that may come to us as a result of the visit of the Canadair officials to the United Kingdom and the Netherlands. Canadair officials, in their own commercial interests, are looking for business in Europe. When the European countries learn of capacity available in Canada they at once think of the possibility of obtaining aircraft from Canada under the mutual aid provision of the North Atlantic Treaty. We would reply to any request by saying that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would first have to establish the deficiency and we would have to investigate the possibility of obtaining the substantial United States dollar component from the United States.

In addition to announcing our general position, I think we should also make at the Defence Committee any offer of special facilities which we are prepared to put forward. The one I have in mind is an offer of air training facilities in Canada. In view of our glorious record during the war in this field, I am sure that such an offer will be regarded as extremely helpful. We could thus make an immediate substantial and welcome contribution to the "collective capacity to resist armed attack".

VI. NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; MUTUAL AID

17. The Minister of National Defence stated that, although the total deficiencies of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would not be known until the overall plans had been further developed, preliminary consideration had been given to the sort of aid which Canada might appropriately provide. At the meeting of the Defence Committee, in Paris on 1st December, it was not expected that the scale of Canadian assistance would come up. It would be helpful, however, if the Canadian representatives might have an indication of the government's general attitude to guide them in the informal talks that might be expected to take place.

There appeared to be four ways in which aid might be made available to the Western European countries. The first was the provision of troops in Europe. From a Canadian point of view, this did not appear practical because any contribution of this sort which Canada might make would be relatively very small. There was, however, a requirement for additional air fighter strength in Europe. It might be feasible at a later date for R.C.A.F. squadrons to carry out a tour of duty in the United Kingdom. If this could be done without having to provide airfields and ground maintenance, no great expense would be involved.

The second method was the provision of finished military equipment. Unfortunately the European countries appeared to be only short of the same types of equipment as Canada. The equipment which was required and which Canada could produce would have a large U.S. dollar content and this complicated this form of assistance.

The third method was the provision of Army and Air Force training facilities in Canada for Service personnel of the North Atlantic Treaty countries. Canadian training facilities were good and it was a traditional role insofar as Canada was concerned. Student strengths at existing schools could be increased without much additional cost. It was estimated that Canada could offer approximately three or four hundred officer vacancies at Canadian Service establishments.

The fourth method was the provision of raw materials.

18. The Minister of Trade and Commerce submitted a departmental memorandum which set forth some of the principal considerations in giving effect to Article 3 of the Treaty. There might be some advantages in taking the initiative in this matter rather than waiting to be asked.

The best procedure seemed to be to determine deficiencies within the North Atlantic Organization and then consider, in the light of physical and financial capabilities, how these deficiencies could be met. For Canada the U.S. dollar content in finished equipment and supplies constituted a problem and this would have to be taken into consideration.

An explanatory note was circulated.

19. The Chief of the General Staff, referring to the possibility of Canada offering training facilities, stated that training establishments in the United Kingdom were overcrowded. It was understood that the offer of Canadian facilities would be most welcome. The value to the European countries would be much greater than the actual cost to Canada in making available the vacancies at Service training schools.

20. The Prime Minister suggested that it would be advisable to enquire, without becoming involved in a commitment, as to whether or not this sort of offer would be of value to the European countries.

21. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) authorized the Minister of National Defence to explore, informally and without commitment, at the forthcoming meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee in Paris, whether an offer by Canada to provide training facilities on a limited scale for Service personnel of other signatory countries would be a useful contribution to overall defence; and

(b) agreed that, if the Minister considered it necessary to make any statement at the forthcoming meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee in Paris regarding the implementation of Article 3 of the Treaty, he might say that, while the Canadian Government had not settled their approach to this problem, consideration had, however, been given to the method for determining policy and in their view the procedure should be to determine deficiencies of military equipment and supplies within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and thus permit consideration to be given to the problem of meeting these deficiencies in the light of physical and financial capabilities to do so; it being pointed out that any contribution of equipment and supplies by Canada would inevitably raise the problem of U.S. dollar content.

ORGANIZATION UNDER ARTICLE 2, NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I had a brief talk with Mike in New York yesterday morning on a number of matters, of which there are two about which I should let you know.

The first one is the question of organization under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. When I raised this, he at once said that the first thing to be done was to give the whole matter a great deal more thought in Ottawa. I ran over the difficulties of pushing the issue into the Working Group here and emphasized that I was sure that the project would get a good deal further if discussion of it was limited as far as possible to informal exchanges, including the tripartite arrangements in Washington. I pointed out that a number of fairly important people here, such as Rusk and Bissell, were interesting themselves in the possibilities, but had as yet nothing at all definite to propose. I also told him that I could myself see no place for a general North Atlantic economic and financial agency until E.R.P. came to an end, although if such an agency were to begin to operate when E.C.A. folded up, a lot of preliminary work would be needed which ought to start pretty soon.

Mike agreed with all this and also, I think, with my observation that now that we had raised the matter in the Council, we ought to stall along for a while and not try to get the Working Group on to it. This may present some tactical difficulties, especially if the French or the Norwegians pursue the matter strongly.

This part of this letter will be of interest to Plumtre and [Douglas] LePan, with whom I had a longer conversation than I had with you, and I should be glad if you would pass it on to them.

TOP SECRET

Ottawa, November 29, 1949

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Three items of importance were discussed by Cabinet Defence Committee at its meeting on November 23 about which I think you would wish to be informed.

2. Mr. Claxton presented two statements projecting defence expenditures to 1954-55. The first statement did not provide for an increase of equipment, but was a projection to 1954-55 of our present commitments. This statement indicated that, based on the expenditure, in millions, in 1949-50 of $382.9, expenditures would reach approximately $567.8 in 1950-51, $494.1 in 1951-52, $466.7 in 1952-53, $427.0 in 1953-54 and $416.1 in 1954-55. The second statement was based on a desired programme developed within the manpower ceilings as previously approved by the Government and provided for a considerable increase in equipment and spares for maintenance. This five-year programme envisaged expenditures, in millions, in 1950-51 of approximately $633.2, in 1951-52 of $586.0, in 1952-53 of $619.4, in 1953-54 of $589.3 and in 1954-55 of $584.9. Mr. Claxton stressed that it would be of great advantage in the development by the Chiefs of Staff of a long-term plan if some indication could be given of the defence funds which might be provided over a consecutive period of years. Although no firm decision was taken, it was agreed by the Committee that it would be desirable to initiate a five-year defence plan and that the programme as submitted by Mr. Claxton should be examined by officials of the Department of National Defence and of Finance.

3. Mr. Claxton also raised the question of extending training facilities to other members of the North Atlantic Treaty. After some discussion, the Committee authorized Mr. Claxton to explore informally and without commitment at the forthcoming meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee in Paris whether an offer by Canada to provide training facilities on a limited scale for Service personnel of other signatory countries would be a useful contribution to overall North Atlantic Defence plans.

4. Mr. Howe presented a paper prepared by Mr. Pierce, a copy of which is enclosed,³³ discussing possible Canadian contributions under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty. After some discussion, the Committee agreed that Mr. Claxton could, if he considered it desirable or necessary, make a statement at the meeting of the Defence Committee to the effect that, while the Canadian Government had reached no decision as to her part in implementing Article 3 of the Treaty, Canada was prepared to consider the problem of meeting North Atlantic deficiencies once they had been established by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. At the same time, Mr. Claxton would point out that any contribution of equipment and supplies by Canada would inevitably raise the problem of U.S. dollar content.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

Paris, November 30, 1949

TOP SECRET

Following for MacKay from Smith, Begins: Military Committee met yesterday at 1000 hours. General atmosphere one of harmony and co-operation. The following representatives were present:

Belgium—Lieutenant-General Etienne Baele
Canada—Lieutenant-General Charles Foulkes
Denmark—Major-General Eric C.V. Moeller
France—General Charles Lycheres
Italy—Lieutenant-General Effisio Marras
Netherlands—Vice Admiral Jonkheer E.J. Van Holthe
Norway—Lieutenant-General Bjarne Oen
Portugal—General Anibal Valdez Passos Souza
United Kingdom—Admiral Lord Fraser
United States—General Omar N. Bradley

A summary of the discussions by item follows:

(1) Strategic concept for the defence of the North Atlantic area—The Danish representative suggested that reference to the atomic bomb should be deleted from the list of basic undertakings. This however was not agreed and this proposal was withdrawn. The Portuguese representative indicated that Portugal could not accept the wording used to describe the co-operation in the matter of military operating rights. As a result the Committee agreed to reword sub paragraph 8 (j) to indicate military operating rights would only be provided as mutually agreed between countries. The Netherlands representative suggested a rewording concerning the development of military strength consistent with economic recovery which would not be restrictive. There was also discussion concerning the conduct of psychological and cold war operations and as a result of Danish representations reference to the cold war was deleted.

The above plus minor amendments were incorporated and the strategic concept was approved for transmission to the Defence Committee.

(2) Progress report by the Standing Group—This is namely an outline of work to date and was accepted by the Military Committee. Discussion took place on the relationship of the accredited representatives with the Standing Group and it was agreed that in preparation of the strategic guidance suitable arrangements would be made which would enable accredited representatives to obtain early information on the work of the Standing Group.

(3) Meetings of Regional Planning Groups—All Regional Planning Groups have held initial meetings and internal organization has been completed for the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group and the Northern European Regional Planning Group.

(4) Summary of activities by the Standing Group—This report covered the work which has been completed to date by the Standing Group.

(5) Organization of the Standing Group—Rear Admiral James H. Foskatt USN has been designated as initial Director of the Standing Group. Under him the organization consists of three international working teams and three secretaries equally provided by France, the United Kingdom and the United States together with necessary clerical and administrative staff.

(6) Standing Group budget—A proposal has been made that the administrative costs of the Standing Group should be borne by the three members for the present fiscal year without prejudice to any subsequent arrangement. Although accepted by the Military Committee it is understood that the United Kingdom at the Defence Committee may suggest that the policy of host Government bearing expenses should be accepted.

(7) NATO security system—The accepted security system is based on Western Union practices and parallels it in almost all aspects.

(8) Military Production Supply Board—The Military Committee noted without comment the report of the Military Production Supply Board which will be tabled tomorrow at the Defence Committee meeting.

(9) Allocation of merchant shipping—In view of our current meetings in Washington no action is recommended by the Military Committee. From the discussions it would appear that merchant shipping (tonnage) will not be considered by any North Atlantic Organization.

(10) Communique—It has been accepted that the Military Committee will not issue communiques. This being the prerogative of the Defence Committee.

(11) Location of the next meeting of the Military Committee—It was felt that as the time and place of the next meeting depended on progress of work by the Standing Group recommendation should be left to that group. Separate informal conversations indicate possibility of Rome as location of next meeting.

In addition to above Committee considered two proposals by Italian and Portuguese delegates which had been referred by the Standing Group. Italian proposal concerned better liaison between groups: existing machinery considered adequate and no action taken on this proposal. Portuguese proposal for representation on a sub-group of North Atlantic Ocean Regional Group had already been covered by organization of that group and no action was required by Military Committee. Ends. (This message was released December 1st.)

Rapport du ministère de la Défense nationale
Report by Department of National Defence

Paris, December 1, 1949

NOTES ON THE SECOND MEETING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE COMMITTEE
 HELD IN PARIS, THURSDAY, 1ST DECEMBER, 1949³⁴

I. Review of Progress of Defence Planning in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization

1. This item consisted of a brief report, indicating that the Standing Group had completed the strategic concept and that it was now in the process of issuing a paper entitled "Strategic Guidance to Regional Planning Groups".

2. At the meeting of the Military Committee, Lieutenant-General Charles Foulkes had pointed out that, in the preparation of the strategic guidance paper, it was essential that the first draft as prepared by the Standing Group be submitted to the Chiefs of Staff of all signatory countries through the accredited representatives in Washington in order that the comments and recommendations of the various Chiefs of Staff could be incorporated in the final draft of the paper. This was necessary because of the fact that the Chiefs of Staff of each country were held responsible by their respective governments for the defence planning; therefore it would be incompatible for a signatory country to accept a report on strategic guidance, including forms and scales of attack, if the views of the respective Chiefs of Staff had not been first sought.

3. At the Defence Committee meeting, the Ministers of Defence for Norway and Denmark referred to the stand taken by General Foulkes and suggested that, so long as it was clearly understood that the procedure outlined above would be followed in the preparation of the report on strategic guidance, they were prepared to accept the Review of Progress paper.

4. After a short explanation by General Bradley, in which he gave assurance that the procedure as outlined by General Foulkes would be followed in the preparation of the strategic guidance paper, the Defence Ministers accepted the Review of Progress.

II. Summary of Standing Group Activities

5. This item was a report by the Military Committee, which indicated that the Standing Group had now been organized, with Rear-Admiral James K. Foskett, USN, as the initial Director, under whom there were three international working teams and three secretaries, equally provided by France, the United Kingdom and the United States, with a clerical and administrative staff; the whole totalling approximately forty-five. It also included reference to the work of the Standing Group in the preparation of the proposed security system, the broad concept, the planning guidance to the regional groups, and the action taken by the Standing Group concerning Portuguese and Italian proposals in regard to their respective status in the planning groups concerned. The summary made reference to the concept for the production and supply of munitions, allocation of merchant shipping, and the appointment of accredited military representatives to the Standing Group.

 Circulated by the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee on December 9, 1949.

6. As this item was merely an informative report, there was no discussion and approval was given to it by the Defence Committee.

III. Proposal by the Italian Delegate to the Defence Committee to Amend the Directive from the Defence Committee to the Military Committee

7. This item referred to a proposal by which the Italians hoped to obtain what they considered to be better intra-regional defence co-ordination.

8. The Military Committee had considered this matter and were of the opinion that there were ample arrangements for liaison between the regional planning groups and that it was not necessary to amend the present directive.

9. Upon assurance from Secretary Johnson, Chairman of the Defence Committee, that the spirit of the North Atlantic Treaty was one of co-operation between nations and groups of nations and that, while an amendment might improve the wording of the directive, it could not improve the relationship between countries and groups, the Italian delegate agreed to accept the views of the Military Committee.

10. The report of the Military Committee was accepted without further comment.

IV. Proposal by the Portuguese Delegate to the Defence Committee to Establish a Separate Sub-Group in the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group

11. This item had been discussed at the first meeting of the Defence Committee and the proposal had been considered by the Standing Group, who had in turn referred it to the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group, with a recommendation that it be given sympathetic consideration. As the Portuguese proposal had already been incorporated in the organization plan for the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group, the Committee approved this item, no further action being required.

V. The Standing Group Budget

12. This item consisted of a recommendation from the Standing Group that its budget should be met through direct negotiations between the appropriate representatives of the three nations concerned, this being without prejudice to subsequent discussions at a later date. However, until these financial arrangements had been arrived at, expenses incurred in establishing the Standing Group would be met by the host government without prejudice to future re-adjustments.

13. There was no comment on this item and the Defence Committee accepted the recommendation of the Standing Group.

VI. Security System for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization

14. The Standing Group had produced a security system, which in the main parallels that used by Western Union. As this is a long, detailed document and as copies will be forwarded at a later date, no attempt to explain the system will be included here.

15. One point of interest, however, concerns transmission by cypher. In this regard the United Kingdom has offered to supply all member nations with Typex Mark II machines for this purpose, and the approval of the paper by the Defence Committee constituted an acceptance of this offer.

16. There was no particular comment on the system and the report as produced by the Standing Group and previously passed by the Military Committee was accepted by the Defence Ministers.

VII. A Concept for Providing the Production and Supply of Munitions under the North Atlantic Treaty

17. This report was tabled by the Military Production and Supply Board and indicated that the Board would undertake the following:

(a) a study of the physical capacity of the European signatory countries for producing military end products;

(b) a review of currently planned programmes of European signatory countries for the production of military equipment and spare parts for use in the common defence of the North Atlantic area, with the object of ensuring that, wherever practicable, the principle of integrated military production would be adopted;

(c) an inventory of military equipment and spare parts in the European signatory countries which are of U.S. origin and are surplus to the needs of the possessor country;

(d) an immediate study to indicate the composition and volume of military equipment and spare parts currently surplus to the needs of the possessor countries, for the purpose of laying the foundation for transfers to other signatory countries as their needs are determined;

(e) the development of short and long range plans for the promotion of standardization of military end products and production methods; and

(f) a study of the adjustment of location of production facilities.

18. The Defence Committee approved this report.

VIII. Strategic Concept for the Defence of the North Atlantic Area

19. The first discussion of interest centred on the wording of one of the basic undertakings, which read as follows: "ensure the ability to carry out strategic bombing, including prompt delivery of the atom bomb. This is primarily a United States responsibility, assisted as practicable by other nations".

20. The Danish Defence Minister stated that he was concerned regarding the position of the signatory countries in the event that there should be a leak regarding the fact that there had been a discussion as to whether or not specific mention should be made in the Strategic Concept in regard to the prompt delivery of the atomic bomb. While it was hoped that observance of security measures would preclude such a leak, the Defence Ministers had to face up to the fact that already in Paris there had been considerable discussion in the press in connection with certain matters which had been discussed at the Military Committee. As the question had unfortunately been raised, the Danish Minister suggested that the only alternative left to the Defence Committee was to remove from the Concept any reference to the delivery of the atom bomb. He went on to point out that in certain European countries opposition to participation in the North Atlantic Treaty had not been fostered solely by the Communist Party. If it became known in these countries that the North Atlantic countries were planning to use the atomic bomb, there might be a lessening in support for the Treaty. In addition, the U.S.S.R. and her satellites could make excellent propaganda of the fact that the North Atlantic countries were preparing to use the atomic bomb when at the same time these countries were endeavouring at Lake Success to indicate their willingness to outlaw the atom bomb. He advocated strongly the removal of the reference to the delivery of the atom bomb, pointing out at the same time that such action would not in any way affect the United States in her endeavours to ensure the prompt delivery of the bomb.

21. The Belgian Minister of Defence was opposed to any change in the wording of the Concept in that deletion of the clause concerning the delivery of the atomic bomb would weaken considerably the strength of the North Atlantic Defence Organization. The ability of the United States to deliver promptly the atomic bomb was one of the main factors on which Belgium was basing her defence.

22. The United Kingdom Minister of Defence endeavoured, without success, to compare the present situation regarding the atom bomb with that surrounding the use of gas in World War II. His main point appeared to be that the United States should, by every means possible, ensure her ability to deliver the atom bomb to the end that, in the event of war, the United States would be able to announce her intention to use the atomic bomb if the Russians initiated this form of warfare.

23. The French Minister of Defence pointed out that, because of the disproportionate strengths of the Armed Forces as between the Western European countries and the U.S.S.R. and her satellites, it was necessary for the European countries to have a guarantee that, in the event of war, the atomic bomb would be used immediately.

24. After considerable discussion, the Defence Ministers agreed to recommend that the basic undertaking as quoted above read as follows: "ensure the ability to carry out strategic bombing promptly by all means possible and with all types of weapons. This is primarily a United States responsibility, assisted as practicable by other nations".

25. The Portuguese Defence Minister, referring to the co-operative measures which were included in the Strategic Concept and in particular to that concerning the construction, maintenance and operation of military installations (which involves the use of bases in various signatory countries) made it clear (painfully to certain countries) that Portugal would not accept any measure which indicated that any one power, because of the agreed Concept, could construct military bases and installations in another country without the consent of that particular country.

26. Although the construction and operation of military installations might be of mutual concern, it would be necessary that such construction could only be done with the full agreement of the countries concerned. To this end, the following revised clause was substituted: "co-operation in the construction, maintenance and operation of military installations of mutual concern, as agreed to mutually by the countries concerned”.

IX. Relations between the North Atlantic Defence Organization and the Brussels Treaty Defence Organization

27. This item was tabled without notice and with considerable apology by the U.K. Minister of Defence, and justifiably so, in that the explanatory diagram which was referred to in the paper was not available. Similarly an amendment which was distributed at the beginning of the meeting was further revised by another amendment which was distributed as the item was discussed. There was considerable confusion in endeavouring to ascertain just which piece of paper was to be considered. Further dilemma was created because of the fact that the distribution of the various papers was not the same and holders of certain papers found themselves talking on those papers when, in fact, they had been amended by a revision which they had not received.

28. The Canadian Defence Minister suggested that there was certain incongruity in the fact that it appeared that the North Atlantic Defence Committee was acting as the Brussels Treaty Defence Committee and was in fact making amendments to proposals which had been put forward by the latter organization.

29. The final outcome of the discussion concerning the relationship between these two organizations was briefly as follows:

(a) the Western European Regional Planning Group will consist of the Chiefs of Staff Committee of the Brussels Treaty and its working staff, the Permanent Military Committee, with the addition of the United States and Canadian representatives as appropriate;

(b) the Defence Committee, the Commander-in-Chiefs Committee, and the Supply Board organs of the Brussels Treaty, will retain their functions and powers which they have derived from that Treaty;

(c) the information on the Brussels Treaty Defence Organization and the work already done or being carried out be forwarded to the Atlantic Pact Defence Organization Standing Group; and

(d) no instructions shall be binding on the Western Union Chiefs of Staff which are at variance with the provisions of the Brussels Treaty without the consent of the Brussels Treaty Powers.

X. Preparation of Communique

30. A communique was prepared by the representatives of all signatory countries, which indicated the work that had been completed by the Military Committee and the Defence Committee. A point of interest in this regard arose out of the difficulty in expressing certain terms in the French and English languages. An unfortunate suggestion was made by the Chairman to the effect that the English version should be accepted and that a French translation should be made from it. As there are two official languages for the North Atlantic Treaty, the French Minister of Defence commented immediately on this suggestion and reminded the Committee that there were in fact two official languages and that the question of translating from one language into the other was inappropriate.

XI. The Next Meeting

31. It was suggested that consideration concerning the location and time of the next meeting be deferred until such time as the Standing Group had completed the next phase of the work. This would probably be some time in March of 1950. Informally the Italian delegation were sounded out on the possibility of convening the next meetings of the Defence Committee and the Military Committee in Rome. Politically, this would be of the greatest possible assistance to the present Italian Government. However, no official discussion took place concerning location.

Following for Ritchie, Begins: Meeting Permanent Working Staff North Atlantic Defence and Economic Committee. Your telegram No. 2360 of December 6, † our telegram No. 2132 of December. †

With regard to the United States proposal of a study by the Permanent Working Staff on "an estimate of the fiscal resources for defence purposes of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty for the fiscal years 1950-51," we are very doubtful about the desirability of a study by the Working Staff along these lines, since the decision as to how much a country can spend on defence must be taken by its own government, and even a study along these lines might well prove politically objectionable. It is of course possible that the United States has in mind covering European members only, since they are recipients under ECA and Military Aid. If the study could be confined to European members we should have less objection, but once a study of this sort got under way it might be very difficult to restrict its scope in this way.

With respect to the United States proposal of "a study of the exchange problems resulting from the transfer of goods and services in implementation of the agreed strategic concept of the North Atlantic Treaty," if a discussion of this topic arises you should take occasion to point out that Canada's exchange problem is quite different from that of European members in that we are not recipients of military aid from the United States but are cash customers. The methods for solving exchange problems of European members vis-a-vis each other or vis-a-vis the United States would therefore appear to be quite inapplicable to Canada's exchange problem vis-a-vis the United States or vis-a-vis European members. We therefore doubt very much whether a study by the Permanent Staff of our exchange problems would be appropriate. Ends.

London, December 8, 1949

Referring to my telegram No. 2360 of December 6th† giving the United Kingdom draft of the agenda of the first meeting of the Permanent Working Staff of the North Atlantic Financial and Economic Committee which is meeting in London today.

1. The United States delegation has not yet suggested any additional items for the agenda but has submitted several papers relating to items (1) and (4) in the United Kingdom draft.

2. Under item (1)³⁵ the United States has submitted proposals for the organization of the Permanent Working Staff and its Secretariat which are generally similar to those adopted for the Permanent Working Staff and Secretariat of the Supply Board.

3. Under Item (4)³⁶ the United States delegation has suggested that the full Defence Financial and Economic Committee should be asked to approve the following projects to be undertaken by the Permanent Working Staff:

(a) First priority projects on which recommendations should be prepared by the Permanent Working Staff as rapidly as possible and in any case prior to February 15th, 1950.

(I) On the basis of a survey of the additional financial and economic efforts which can be made to implement Article III of the North Atlantic Treaty and which would be consistent with the maintenance of internal financial stability and support of continued economic recovery, to ascertain the total approximate budgetary resources available in each North Atlantic Treaty country for the defense of the North Atlantic area during the fiscal year 1951 (or the calendar year 1950).

(II) In order to promote effective utilization of resources in implementing Article III of the North Atlantic Treaty, to devise and recommend financial arrangements for transfer among NAT countries of needed military equipment materials and services and of equipment to be used in protecting military equipment. Such arrangements should be designed to minimize interference with the normal pattern of trade and payments transactions.

(b) Second priority project to be undertaken by the Permanent Working Staff:

³⁵ "Review of the terms of reference of the North Atlantic Treaty Defence Financial and Economic Committee and working staff, and purpose of the meeting".

³⁶ "Matters for immediate consideration and decision by the N.A.T. Financial and Economic Committee".

(I) To assess the budgetary and economic impact of military activities, including projected military programs, upon the economies of the producing countries, to adopt formulae and criteria designed to indicate the burdens of defense arrangements in relation to the capacity of the respective NAT countries to support such arrangements; to formulate recommendations designed to promote an equitable distribution of the burden of defense arrangements among the NAT countries.

(II) To assess and study the financial and economic problems involved in military production and supply projects being considered or recommended by the NAT Military Production and Supply Board for the European signatory countries. The Permanent Working Group shall conduct studies to determine the extent to which the financial and economic resources of the NAT countries permit the filling of deficiencies in military equipment requirements.

(III) To measure and to recommend steps to meet the foreign exchange costs of imports from non-member countries of materials and equipment required by defense programmes under NAT.

(IV) To undertake other studies which the Permanent Working Group considers to be essential, referring when necessary to the Financial and Economic Committee for approval.

4. Concerning Item (5)³⁷ on the agenda, Breithut, the United States representative and Chairman, has indicated to Ritchie that he has been thinking in terms of a first meeting of the full Financial and Economic Committee around December 19th in Paris. His reason for thinking of this particular date and location is that the Finance Ministers of the Western Union countries are already scheduled to meet in Paris on December 19th. He thinks it would be generally convenient to have the North Atlantic Committee meet there at about the same time. He remarked that since Hariman will be the United States representative, such a date and place for the first meeting would be satisfactory to the United States. He appreciated that it might well be impracticable for the Canadian Finance Minister, or a senior official from the Department of Finance, to attend a meeting in Paris on such short notice. If, however, the meeting were to be a fairly formal one, merely to approve the programme of work proposed by the Permanent Working Staff, Breithut thought the Canadian Government might not consider it necessary to be represented by the Minister of Finance but might be prepared to be represented at this particular meeting by the Ambassador in Paris. The practicability of such a procedure would seem to depend in part on whether the Permanent Working Staff can agree on a non-controversial programme of work, the approval of which by the full Committee would be largely a formality. The projects already suggested by the United States for inclusion in such a programme (see paragraph 3 above) would seem to be sufficiently substantial, and even controversial, to require more than a merely formal meeting of the full Committee for their consideration and approval.

Reference my telegrams No. 2360 of December 6th† and No. 2384 of December 8th, Permanent Working Staff of the North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee.

1. The discussion at yesterday's meeting was concentrated primarily on the time, place, and agenda for the first meeting of the Full Committee. The United States representative emphasized the importance which his Government attached to an early meeting of the Committee and pressed the members of the Working Staff to recommend that such a meeting be held in Paris on December 19th. He thought it essential that the Financial and Economic Permanent Working Staff should be formally established by the Committee as soon as possible in order that it might be in a position to advise the Permanent Working Staff of the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board on any current problems and in order that it might be able to commence work immediately on the projects implied in the directive from the North Atlantic Council. He made it fairly clear that in stressing the urgency of the early establishment of the Financial and Economic Permanent Working Staff he was not unmindful of the desirability of providing evidence to Congress that in this field, as well as in the military and supply fields, the North Atlantic agencies are getting down to work.

2. The United States representative not only felt that the Committee should meet at an early date but considered also that it should be asked to give precise directions to the Permanent Working staff along the lines indicated in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 2384.

3. Concerning the time and place for a meeting of the Full Committee the Western Union representatives agreed that December 19th in Paris would probably be convenient for their Ministers since they would be there on that date in any case for a meeting of the Western Union Finance Ministers. Similarly, the Ministers of some of the other North Atlantic countries would be in Paris around that time for a meeting of the Consultative Council of the OEEC. Only the Danish, Italian and Canadian representatives indicated that their Ministers would probably find difficulty in attending such a meeting, and that if their countries were to be represented it would probably have to be by the Ambassadors in Paris.

4. Even those European representatives on the Permanent Working Staff who saw no serious obstacle to the holding of a meeting of some sort in the place and at the time suggested, did not think that there was sufficient time between now and then for Ministers to prepare themselves for a substantive discussion on the lines proposed by the United States (particularly since the projects suggested by the United States implied acceptance of certain new principles not already explicitly included in the directive from the Council to the Committee), and, furthermore, they doubted that their Ministers would have sufficient time while in Paris to discuss such matters thoroughly in view of the fact that they would also be involved in Western Union and OEEC meetings.

5. Ritchie suggested that a choice would probably have to be made between (I) the desirability of having a meeting of the Full Committee as early as December 19th in order formally to constitute the Working Staff, and (II) the desirability of securing detailed instructions from the Committee to the Working Staff. In the light of the discussion it did not seem possible to achieve both objectives. If a meeting had to be held by December 19th, such a meeting, in his judgment, could not reasonably be asked to approve detailed instructions of the sort suggested by the United States, or to determine whether the projects envisaged in the United States draft were in fact within the terms of reference laid down by the Council, or even to determine the order in which the functions already described by the Council in paragraph 3 of the directive of November 17th (your telegram No. 1976 of November 8th)† should be undertaken by the Permanent Working Staff. He felt that if the Committee were to meet by the date suggested the meeting would have to be a purely formal one intended merely to establish the Permanent Working Staff and its Secretariat, and to transmit to the Permanent Working Staff the directive already approved by the Council. He thought that this course should be acceptable even to those who might have preferred the Committee to provide detailed guidance to the Permanent Working Staff since, once the Permanent Working Staff is formally established, it will be open to any representative to submit a paper to the Permanent Working Staff suggesting projects which might be undertaken in the carrying out of the functions prescribed "for the Committee and any subordinate bodies" in the original directive. The Permanent Working Staff could then consider more carefully than was possible in the short time available between now and December 19th whether it would be appropriate to undertake (or to recommend the undertaking of) such projects. This procedure might also make it possible for the Financial and Economic Working Staff to secure the advice of the supply side of the organization on the order in which various projects might best be undertaken with a view to facilitating, or not impeding, essential supply activities.

6. After a fairly extended discussion (which was largely confined to the procedural question and which did not go to any length into the substance or constitutionality of the projects suggested by the United States) it was agreed to recommend to Governments that:

(a) A meeting of the full Defence Financial and Economic Committee should be held in Paris on December 19th, probably at 3:00 p.m.

(b) That the agenda for the meeting should be:

(I) Approval of the organization and terms of reference of the Permanent Working Staff (the paper prepared by the Permanent Working Staff for consideration under this heading is reported in my telegram No. 2390)†

(II) Approval of the organization and terms of reference of the Secretariat, (the paper prepared under this heading is being transmitted in my telegram No. 2391)†

(c) So far as practicable countries should be represented by Ministers of Finance as envisaged when the Committee was set up, but on this particular occasion it would be appropriate for countries to be represented by their Ambassadors in Paris if necessary.

7. Although the proposed meeting is intended to be primarily a formality, it was stressed during yesterday's meeting that its psychological importance should be fully recognized since it will be formally initiating financial and economic activities on which the success of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization may very largely depend.

8. I should be grateful for an early indication of your reaction to these recommendations.

9. The Permanent Working Staff is having a further meeting this afternoon to discuss in a preliminary manner the substance of the United States proposals. This discussion is intended to get the informal comments of the various representatives on the Permanent Working Staff even though those proposals are not to be considered by the full meeting of the Committee on December 19th. In that connection, your telegram No. 2143 of December 7th will be helpful. In connection with paragraph one of your telegram it might merely be noted at this stage that the proposed estimate of fiscal resources for defence for 1950–51 is apparently not intended by the United States to be limited to the European members. At lunch yesterday, in advance of the receipt of your telegram, Ritchie in fact had asked the United States group whether this particular project was intended to apply not only to the European members but also to Canada and the United States. They replied that according to their understanding the project was intended to be applicable to all signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty including the United States and Canada. It would seem that the United States might have the same difficulties in participating in this project as you have mentioned in the case of Canada, and accordingly it is hard to believe that they can really have intended that the proposed project, if it were to be approved, should apply to them.

10. Copies of this telegram and my two following telegrams and of your telegram No. 1976 are being sent by airmail to the Embassy in Paris for their information.

London, December 12, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney,

I was very much interested in your letter of November 30th[†] enclosing a copy of Mr. Pierce's memorandum regarding possible Canadian contributions under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty.³⁸

I have discussed this memorandum with General Clark, [A.E.] Ritchie and [J.H.] Warren, since I thought you might like to have their reactions in the light of their experience with the Western Union and North Atlantic bodies here.

They agree with me that the memorandum gives an excellent description of the situation as it appears from here. In particular, all of the evidence available to us would tend to confirm Mr. Pierce's observation that "there is nothing to be gained by waiting until we are asked and much to be gained by announcing our position on our own initiative". Apart from other political and commercial disadvantages (some of which are touched on in the enclosed memorandum), a "wait-and-see" policy would probably result in our being pressed eventually to contribute in a form less satisfactory to us. If we delay, we shall almost certainly find ourselves later being called upon to make our contribution entirely in the form of those goods which the United States and the European countries themselves are unable or unwilling to make available to one another. By thus narrowing the range of our contribution (but probably not reducing its size), such a delaying policy could quite well have a much more disturbing effect on our economy and on the pattern of our munitions production than would have been the case if we had made our contribution earlier and had made it in the lines which were most convenient for us. It would clearly seem desirable, from the Canadian point of view, for us to begin contributing as soon as possible. Even now we may find that our contribution will have to take a less economic form (both from our own point of view and from the point of view of the best use of resources in the North Atlantic area as a whole) than would have been the case if it could have been started earlier before the Western Union additional production programmes were put in motion and before the initial programmes for the supply of United States end products were prepared.

If the desirability of an early announcement concerning a Canadian contribution were to be accepted, the question remaining open would seem to be whether that contribution (and the announcement of it) should initially be in terms of a definite amount or whether each case should be dealt with on an ad hoc basis as and when deficiencies are determined by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. There would seem to be a suggestion in Mr. Pierce's memorandum that the latter course might be recommended. From our discussion of the question here, we see several serious disadvantages in this course and we should be inclined to prefer the earmarking, and early announcement, of a definite sum for the Canadian contribution in 1950 (with conditions attached regarding compensation for any U.S.-dollar content and with final discretion regarding the use or composition of that contribution retained by the Canadian authorities). Some of our reasons for this preference are set out in the attached memorandum.

I apologize for the length of this memorandum and I recognize that some of the views expressed in it probably take inadequate account of the situation in Ottawa. Briefly, what we are saying in the memorandum is that, in our opinion, a decision to contribute a definite amount, and to make an announcement to that effect immediately, is probably what is required for most effective Canadian participation in the North Atlantic Treaty. In our view such a procedure will probably secure the maximum political and commercial advantage for Canada and probably will, in the end, cost Canada less than any alternative course. I would only add that, in view of our interest in the strengthening of the whole North Atlantic area, we should presumably be not unmindful of the effect of any action by us on the willingness of the United States to contribute further to the strengthening of the defences of the European countries. From that point of view also an offer by Canada to contribute a respectable sum would seem to be the most effective course.

Yours sincerely,

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION UNDER ARTICLE 3 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

1. We can see that an ad hoc arrangement might appear to have certain attractions for Canada, but we wonder how real such attractions would turn out to be.

2. We suppose one of the principal apparent attractions of such an ad hoc arrangement is that it would more readily permit our contribution to be curtailed or expanded in accordance with our changing internal financial position. Yet, even on that score, we wonder whether that would in fact be the result since, in the absence of fairly precise (and publicly announced) limits to our contribution, the various pressures might well result in a greater expenditure of local resources than we could afford or than would have been the case if a definite limit had been set.

3. Another possible reason for preferring to contribute on an ad hoc basis, rather than to announce now a definite figure for our contribution, might be the difficulty of judging, at this time, what size our contribution should be in the absence of agreed statements of deficiencies based on common military plans. Three comments on this argument occur to us:

In the first place, it would seem that the over-all size of our contribution should be determined not only by estimates of deficiencies in the North Atlantic area but primarily by an estimate of what we might reasonably be able to afford.

In the second place, it might be observed that other countries (including all five Western Union countries and the United States) have already determined the amounts which they will contribute in 1950, even though no firm deficiency lists are yet available (other than the very tentative estimates of Western Union deficiencies).

In the third place, it is already known that certain items will be scarce, whatever military or production plans may be recommended eventually by the N.A.T.O. Our impression is that if some indication could be given of the lines in which Canada would wish to contribute, the N.A.T.O. is in a position to indicate with reasonable certainty which of these items are likely to be deficient throughout the area this year. Our guess is that enough Canadian items could be selected on this basis to absorb the bulk of any Canadian contribution in 1950. The remainder, if any, of the Canadian contribution could be reserved for meeting specific deficiencies as and when they are determined later by the N.A.T.O. in the light of progress in developing agreed military plans. Admittedly this procedure might result in the bulk of our contribution for 1950 being devoted to meeting apparent deficiencies which later military planning might show to have been of lower priority than some others which we might have met if we had waited. However, we should at least have contributed something towards the immediate strengthening of those countries in the North Atlantic area which are most readily accessible to the Russians. In later years, after the detailed defence plans have been formulated, the size of any subsequent Canadian contributions could take account of more precise scales of priority.

4. A third reason which it occurs to us might be regarded as favouring an ad hoc arrangement rather than the contribution of a definite amount is that the appropriation of a lump sum at this stage by Parliament might be politically difficult. However, would resort to ad hoc arrangements really avoid the necessity of securing a definite amount from Parliament for the year? It would seem to us that even for the purpose of implementing ad hoc arrangements it would be necessary to ensure in advance that adequate means of financing would be available.

5. Not only are we doubtful of the possible merits of the ad hoc policy, but we see at least the following disadvantages in that policy compared with the policy of fixing, and announcing, a definite sum for the Canadian contribution:

(a) An ad hoc policy would not provide as satisfactory a basis for supporting the retention of any European nominations of Canada as a source for United States off-shore purchases of raw materials (e.g., non-ferrous metals, ferro-alloys and synthetic rubber) required in the additional production programme.

(b) It would not provide as satisfactory a basis for bargaining with the United States in an attempt to ensure that, directly or indirectly, we would be compensated for any U.S.-dollar element in our contribution.

(c) The announcement of such an ad hoc policy would not have the same effect on the morale of the European countries as would an announcement of a lump sum contribution (even though the lump sum might be less than the eventual aggregate of such ad hoc contributions).

(d) Similarly, the announcement of an intention to contribute on an ad hoc basis would not have the same effect on the status of Canada in the various political, military and supply agencies of the N.A.T.O. (since, even though in the end the total of ad hoc contributions might turn out to be larger than our contribution under a lump sum arrangement, we would get credit in respect of such ad hoc contributions only gradually or by instalments, whereas under the lump sum arrangement we would probably receive the benefit of the full contribution from the time of its announcement).

(e) Ad hoc contributions would not seem to provide as satisfactory a basis for resisting pressure (which is already appearing in the Financial and Economic discussions) to accept some formula or criterion for the "equitable distribution of the defence burden". If we announce our intention to contribute a fairly respectable sum, there will be less likelihood of our being pressed to make our defence expenditure (both on home defence and on mutual aid) subject to some sort of automatic formula.

6. The alternative to an ad hoc arrangement might be worked out in the following stages:

(1) We might inform the United States that Canada has determined that, in terms of its budget limitations and economic prospects, the maximum which can reasonably be contributed in the coming fiscal year is X-million Canadian dollars.

(2) We might demonstrate to the United States that (even though our own normal defence expenditures may be low on some bases of comparison) this is a respectable amount of mutual aid and compares not unfavourably with the net contribution of the United States or other participants (on a per capita basis, or on the basis of budget or national income). In that connection it might be pointed out that in return for its contribution of 1.4 billion dollars the United States will be extracting substantial counter concessions which will probably reduce its net contribution substantially; against the United Kingdom contribution of 25 million dollars to assist other European countries, the United Kingdom will be receiving United States aid (although the latter may be largely offset by United Kingdom concessions to the United States); France will be a net recipient; Belgium and the Netherlands will be operating primarily on a barter basis; Italy will be largely compensated for any contribution either by receipts from other European countries or from the United States; Norway, Denmark and Iceland will be making negligible contributions to other European countries; Portugal's contribution is unknown.

(3) We might point out to the United States Administration that the Canadian contribution of such an amount will be useful to them in any future approach which they may be making to Congress, or even in any defence before Congress of their present Military Assistance Program.

(4) We might then indicate that expenditure on this scale must be dependent on direct or indirect compensation for any U.S.-dollar element. We might enquire whether under the present legislation (or under any future legislation which may be planned) they will be in a position to compensate us directly for such U.S.-dollar costs (either with or without a bilateral agreement) and, if they are not able to compensate us directly, whether they can guarantee that:

(a) Canada will be recognized (not only in discussions in the North Atlantic or Western Union bodies, but also in discussions which will be taking place with United States representatives in each of the European recipient countries within the next few weeks when the project forms are being filled out) as an off-shore source for the purchase of raw materials if prices and conditions of sale generally are competitive, thus enabling Canada to earn United States dollars under the Military Assistance Program;

(b) Arrangements for reciprocal procurement of military supplies will be worked out between the United States and Canada in order to relieve Canada of the U.S.-dollar costs now involved in such Canadian procurement in the United States.

If the indirect compensation by those two means appears likely to be inadequate, we might press them, if it is feasible, to include in any subsequent Military Assistance legislation a provision which would allow procurement in Canada in later years of finished munitions required by other N.A.T. countries in excess of the definite Canadian contribution if Congress is satisfied that Canada's own contribution is adequate in relation to its resources. In that case, somewhat as in the case of our lump sum contributions to UNRRA and UNICEF, there would be the possibility of earning some U.S. dollars after our own contribution was exhausted.

(5) We might explain to the United States that, subject to some assurance of these conditions being met, we intend to seek the concurrence of the N.A.T.O. immediately that such projects as the following (to be financed out of a Canadian contribution if Parliament makes funds available) are of a sufficiently high priority to warrant proceeding with them at once:

(i) An air and army training scheme in Canada and the early despatch of a Canadian fighter squadron to the United Kingdom for advance training with the Western European Air Forces;

(ii) The transfer to the European countries of equipment on hand which is determined to be surplus to the requirements of the Canadian forces;

(iii) The production of picrite at the Welland plant on a scale sufficient for maintenance purposes and to permit of necessary stockpiling (this project being subject to the specific proviso that the United States purchases half of the volume of production required to maintain the plant in operating condition; leaving the other half available largely for transfer to European countries in accordance with recommendations of the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board);

(iv) The provision of military radar equipment by Canadian Arsenals;

(v) The preparation of "shadow" facilities in various Canadian aircraft plants (including Canadair) for the eventual (or current?) production of aircraft (bearing in mind the need for standardization on U.S. types);

(vi) Anti-Submarine Escort vessels and minesweepers;

(vii) Other projects appropriate to the Canadian economy which may be suggested by the N.A.T.O., within the limits of the proposed Canadian financial contribution.

(This list is a hypothetical one. It should be possible to construct a more realistic list within a fortnight or so, possibly in consultation with U.S. officials who are informed on the materiel which the U.S. proposes to deliver to Europe).

(6) Immediately following such advance discussions with the United States, we might give the Permanent Working Staffs of the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board and of the North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee some indication of the scale of our proposed contribution, in order to protect any nominations of Canadian sources for off-shore purchases in the project statements requesting United States assistance which will shortly be under consideration in the North Atlantic and Western Union bodies.

(7) At the proposed February meeting of the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board, the Canadian representative might submit for the Board's comments the proposal which the Canadian Government is considering, along the lines of (1) and (5) above, indicating that the proposal is subject to:

(a) Concurrence in the projects by the North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board;

(b) assurance by the United States that any U.S.-dollar costs will be compensated directly or indirectly;

(c) approval by the Canadian Parliament.

7. In all of the above discussion we have not touched on the question of whether any such contribution by Canada should be made available to the European countries free of charge or whether some counter concessions should be requested. Our own judgment is that if counter benefits were to be sought, our contribution would have to be substantially larger than if no strings were attached in order to get the same political results. It may nevertheless be desirable, for other than political reasons, to exact some counter concessions. A possible arrangement might be to offer to make a certain contribution gratis and to provide that this contribution might be increased during the year by an amount corresponding to the value of any supplies which the European countries themselves could produce economically for Canadian forces and which would otherwise have had to be procured by the Canadian Government elsewhere with funds appropriated for the Canadian Services. Such an arrangement would require some working out in detail, with particular reference to the position of, for instance, those supplies which the Canadian Services are already procuring in the United Kingdom with dollars.

TELEGRAM EX-2174

Your telegram Nos. 2389, 2390†, 2391† of December 9, North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee.

1. The date of December 19 for the meeting of the Committee in Paris is acceptable to us. The Minister of Finance, however, will be unable to attend and will probably ask the Canadian Ambassador in Paris to represent him. It would, however, be most desirable to have Ritchie go over for the meeting to assist the Ambassador. Generally speaking, the proposed organization and terms of reference of the permanent working staff and of the secretariat set forth in your Nos. 2390 and 2391 would appear to be satisfactory.

2. We feel very strongly, however, that there is not adequate time to prepare for a discussion on matters of substance proposed by the United States, particularly since these proposals appear to go beyond the directive from the Council to the Economic and Financial Committee. Under these circumstances, you should take a firm line to the effect that the Committee meeting in Paris should be restricted to the formal establishment of the permanent working staff and secretariat in accordance with the directive already approved by the Council. It may be impossible to avoid matters of substance being raised by other Governments, but it is suggested that Ritchie should endeavour to meet such developments by taking advantage of any opportunities to discuss the Paris meeting with his colleagues on the working staff in advance giving them our views on this point.

3. Instructions will be sent to General Vanier, but in the meantime, please send direct to Paris back copies of your telegrams to us reporting on the developments in London.

TELEGRAM EX-598

Our Telegram No. 597 of December 13,† North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee meeting on December 19.

1. Although the meeting is expected to be formal, I think you should stress its importance as a milestone on the road to the full implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty which must necessarily hinge in large measure on the work which the Defence Financial and Economic Committee and its working staff is going to do.

2. It would, however, be unfortunate in our view if specific projects of work were discussed at the forthcoming meeting of the Committee. There has not been adequate time to prepare for discussion on matters of substance, such as those which the United States representatives in London have proposed should be given second priority (London telegram No. 2384). Any discussion of the U.S. proposal that the permanent working staff should study "an estimate of the fiscal resources for defence purposes" of NAT countries for the next fiscal year would raise questions which might prove politically objectionable not only to us but to the United States if the study were not confined to European members, and the proposal of a "study of exchange problems resulting from the transfer of goods and services in implementation of the agreed strategic concept" would require an exposition of our peculiar exchange problem as a cash customer of the United States and not a recipient of military aid.

3. We therefore believe that the function of the Committee meeting should be:

(a) to establish formally the permanent working staff and secretariat;

(b) to approve their draft terms of reference (London telegrams Nos. 2390-2391);†

(c) to transmit to the permanent working staff the directive approved by the Council; and,

(d) to authorize the permanent working staff to discuss specific projects of work submitted by any member and proceed with those studies on which agreement is reached, correlating studies with those of the Military Production and Supply Board.

Paris, December 20, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

North Atlantic Defense Financial and Economic Committee (DFEC).

1. The inaugural meeting was held at 6:00 p.m. yesterday and lasted slightly over one hour. It had been postponed from three to four and then to six o'clock in order to ensure that Sir Stafford Cripps would be there since apparently it was felt that his absence might be misinterpreted in view of the reported differences between

United States and United Kingdom over the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement. Sir Stafford arrived directly from airport shortly after meeting had begun.

2. The United States was represented by Mr. Harriman who was also Chairman. Seven of countries were represented by Finance Ministers or Ministers of Economic Affairs (most of whom were in Paris for meeting of OEEC on following day). The others were represented by the Heads of their Diplomatic Missions in Paris. In accordance with your telegram No. 597† I attended for Canada with Mr. E. Ritchie as adviser.

3. As anticipated the meeting was purely formal and the conclusions were in line with those suggested in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 598. The following notes summarize the agenda and the action taken thereon:

(a) Note was taken of the directive from the Council of the Committee.

(b) Approval was given formally to the establishment of a Permanent Working Staff (P.W.S.) in accordance with paragraph 5 of the Council's directive.

(c) Approval was given to the terms of reference for the P.W.S. in the form in which they were submitted. These terms were identical with those reported to you in London's telegram No. 2390† except that paragraph 8 had been redrafted to read: "the P.W.S. shall carry on the day to day work of the DFEC., and shall perform such functions as the DFEC may deem appropriate to delegate. It shall also be prepared etc.". The insertion of the reference to the need for explicit delegation of function by the DFEC, which was apparently inserted by the Secretariat, would seem to be proper and to represent an improvement in drafting.

(d) Approval was given to the Secretariat's terms of reference in the form reported in London's telegram No. 2391.† Mr. Harriman indicated his desire to have informal nominations for the post of Secretary.

(e) Approval was given to the following directive to the P.W.S.: "The DFEC hereby directs the P.W.S. to examine its terms of reference and the terms of reference of this Committee and, on the basis of this review, determine those work projects which it considers to be most urgent and promptly initiate work thereon.

In determining the relative urgency of projects the P.W.S. is requested to give appropriate recognition to the need for guidance for the current work of other North Atlantic Treaty bodies.

(f) It was decided not to fix a definite date or place for the next meeting but, instead, to instruct the P.W.S. to recommend a date in the light of progress made in preparing the way for such a meeting and in the light of Mr. Harriman's expressed desire to have a meeting as early as mid-February in order to meet the United States Legislative time-table. It was noted that a meeting should probably not be held until at least a fortnight after the agenda and papers for discussion have been circulated to Governments by the P.W.S.

(g) Approval was given to a brief press release merely reporting that the meeting had taken place (naming the representatives attending), and that the P.W.S. had been established.

4. There was little discussion on any item, all of which were non-controversial. None of the remarks made was particularly significant, with the possible exceptions of M. Petsche's emphasizing his opening remarks on the need to protect economic recovery (with which Mr. Harriman indicated his agreement) and of Mr. Harriman's concluding remarks off the record regarding the possibility that some "redirection of resources" (presumably within the various military programmes and not necessarily between military and civilian programmes) might be found desirable as a result of the review of existing programmes which he hoped the military supply and financial sides of the organization would undertake jointly in the near future.

5. The P.W.S. is to have preliminary discussion here this afternoon on the various projects proposed by the United States which were reported in London's telegram No. 2384.

6. The minutes and various documents relating to yesterday's meeting will be sent to you by Ritchie as soon as they become available in London.

Ottawa, December 21, 1949

I am rather doubtful as to the desirability of coming to any firm decision on policy at the present time, if it can be avoided, as to the appropriate defence programme for Canada over the next five years. The following points occur to me:

1. The international situation is still very fluid.
2. The Atlantic Pact Organization is only beginning to estimate deficiencies in production and supply and planning has not yet begun in earnest. We have not yet much information as to our actual role, whether in the military field or in production and supply.
3. Revised estimates of atomic weapons which the USSR may have four or five years hence may well mean that we shall have to concentrate more on the direct defence of North America than we had anticipated. If so, this might substantially alter the distribution of our defence expenditures.
4. I am not very sure how seriously the U.K. and the U.S. are taking the North Atlantic Treaty as a basis for defence policy. There are indications that the emergency plan developed some months ago is by no means dead. Our role in the event of war might be affected accordingly. In this connection, I might draw your attention to two extremely suggestive reports dated December 16, 1949, from Major General Clark, which are attached.³⁹

DEFENCE MEETINGS NOVEMBER 26 TO DECEMBER 14, 1949

1. Notes follow on our visit to Europe, the United Kingdom and Ireland.

3. On this visit, I was accompanied by Lieutenant-General Charles Foulkes, Chief of the General Staff and Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, our representative on the Military Committee; Air Vice Marshal Hugh Campbell, our accredited representative to the Standing Group and Chairman of the Joint Service Mission in Washington; Major-General S.F. Clark, our representative in our capacity as observer to Western Union and Chairman of our Joint Staff Mission in London; Commodore Bidwell, Vice Chief of Naval Operations at Ottawa and Brigadier Desmond Smith, Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee.

Purposes

4. The purposes of the visit were:

(a) to attend the meetings of the Military and Defence Committees under the North Atlantic Treaty;

(b) to familiarize ourselves with defence problems, possibilities and programmes in the Western Union countries;

(c) to get to know the defence ministers and ranking officers with whom we would have to continue to work in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty;

(d) to secure information about experience and practices of other countries with which to examine our own defence plans and improve the efficiency of our own defence forces; and

(e) to examine the work and inspect the establishments of our Military Attaches and the Joint Staff Mission in London.

5. The resulting conclusions are stated in the report below. They may be summarized under two heads:

³⁹ Les rapports du major-général S.F. Clark sont intitulés «United Kingdom View on Command Organization—Peace and War» et «Division of Responsibility for Regional Planning between Atlantic Treaty Regions» (DEA/50266-40).

The reports by Major-General S.F. Clark are entitled "United Kingdom View on Command Organization—Peace and War" and "Division of Responsibility for Regional Planning between Atlantic Treaty Regions" (DEA/50266-40).

- (1) Defence Abroad
- (2) Implications regarding Canada's defence.

6. Conclusions re Defence Abroad

(a) Within the space of four months, the organs necessary to implement the North Atlantic Treaty have been brought into existence and established on a satisfactory basis. This fact, taken with the attitude of the United States, has already strengthened the faith of the Western European nations in the possibility of preventing aggression by action together.

(b) This, combined with Western Union, has led them to examine their own defence problems much more realistically. Meetings and interviews such as I have had led to all of us securing bases for comparison which should lead to increased co-operation and efficiency.

(c) It should also lead to the adoption of standard equipment, so that the nations concerned can fight together as a team. Steps should be taken now to dissuade nations from developing and producing equipment which is not likely to be adopted as standard.

(d) All countries are spending too great a proportion of the money appropriated on personnel and too little on equipment. Unless either this trend is reversed or more money is provided for defence, the position is likely to deteriorate rather than improve.

(e) None of the countries concerned has nearly adequate facilities for training officers, N.C.O.s and tradesmen.

(f) All countries would be interested in a plan whereby restricted numbers of officers could receive training as aircrew or technical specialists in Canada.

(g) We were right in taking the initiative in raising this possibility at this time. Meetings of the Supply Board in the next few days will likely produce lists of requirements resulting in specific enquiries as to what we are prepared to do. It would help to meet or offset this if we took the lead by offering to provide raw materials which are in short supply without payment and if we offered to furnish finished military supplies with payment.

7. Implications regarding Canada's defence

Canada has made greater progress than any of the countries concerned with regard to:—

- (i) organization, leading towards co-ordination and unification;
- (ii) officer training both in quantity and quality;
- (iii) defence procurement machinery;
- (iv) integration of defence research with the forces, industry and the universities;
- (v) emphasis on the importance of the Air Force;
- (vi) Reserve organization, equipment, training and recruitment;
- (vii) conditions of service as regards pay, allowances, pensions, food, clothing and single and married quarters.

8. While we can see nothing to change fundamentally in our plans or programme, there can be little doubt but that because of our defence associations with the U.K. and U.S. and the wide extent of the country, our overhead in general staffs, command and area headquarters is necessarily high and prevents our being as operational as we would like. Although the proportion spent on personnel in Canada is very much lower than in any of the other countries, it is in our view still high and as in the case of the European countries, we should increase this proportion by either curtailing expenditures on manpower or preferably increasing overall expenditures.

9. While greatly increased since before the war, Canada's defence appropriations in proportion to national income or national budget are about one-third of the U.S. or U.K. and considerably less than practically all of the countries under the Treaty. Our obligations under the Treaty include those "to maintain and develop individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack" (Article 3).

Military Committee—Paris, November 29, 1949

13. The Military Committee of Chiefs of Staff met under the chairmanship of General Bradley and had a good discussion of a long agenda resulting in unanimous approval of the strategic plan with minor amendments made at the meeting.

14. General Bradley has impressed the other Chiefs with his capacity as well as the sincerity of his conviction that the North Atlantic Treaty must be backed up by the United States as the first line of its defence against Communism. A year ago the Western European countries somewhat naturally felt that a plan of defence was not good enough if it merely envisaged their ultimate liberation after they had been overrun by the Russians and bombed by the Americans. Today that feeling still exists, but it is far less strong than it was and whatever their present estimate about the possibility of their defence being successful, they all agree that the North Atlantic Treaty is the best means to make any defence at all.

15. Accordingly, they are making plans with greater confidence and while in no country will they be able to get the appropriations they feel essential for defence, in all countries I believe that the appropriations will be larger and the effort greater because the Treaty has at least created the possibility that by strengthening their defence they may maintain peace or achieve victory.

Defence Committee—Paris, December 1, 1949

16. The Defence Committee of Defence Ministers met under the chairmanship of Honourable Louis Johnson following a luncheon given by Monsieur Pleven, Minister of Defence of France. The agenda of the Committee largely consisted of considering and approving the reports on the completion of the organization of the regional groups and strategic planning, resulting from the meeting of the Military Committee two days before.

17. Mr. Johnson's rather unorthodox method of presiding at a meeting created some resentment, but not nearly as much as might have been anticipated. Indeed, several of those present were glad that he was applying himself with such drive to the task of getting the organization going.

18. The primary reason for this speed was to meet the requirement of the Military Assistance Programme legislation that Mr. Johnson must certify to the President the existence of an approved strategical plan as a condition precedent to the release of the first one hundred million dollars of assistance provided for in this year's appropriations.

19. The Western Union countries have clearly shown their desire to maintain its organs in existence. In their quality as members of NATO, they joined in approving an arrangement whereby the various organs of Western Union would to all intents and purposes act as the Western European Regional Group. Express provision was made that instructions by the Standing Group contrary to the provisions of the Brussels Treaty would not be acted upon by Western Union authorities without reference to their governments. This proposal was only brought before the Defence Committee at this meeting. While I did not object to it, I felt it necessary to point to some of its implications. It was a matter of some surprise to me and others that the United States should have agreed to this condition.

20. At the close of the meeting a communique was agreed to. The meeting had also agreed to provisions regarding security and reference was made to the fact that so far there have been no leaks.

21. Outside the meeting, Mr. Johnson raised with me the place of the next meeting which might take place in March, 1950. He suggested Rome as holding it there he said would strengthen the Italians. He asked if I had any objection to this and I said no. Subsequently I found that he had discussed [it] with Mr. Plevin who agreed to Rome and Mr. Alexander, who after consultation with his Government thought that it was still too early to hold it in Rome but that it should be held in The Hague. Mr. Alexander felt that it would be desirable at present to hold about three meetings in Europe to one in North America. London was available at any time but he did not think that any particular advantage would be gained in holding a meeting in London. The original idea had been that the Council and Defence Committee should meet about once or twice a year. Apparently, it was working out that we might hold more meetings than that, at least at the start. He saw no objection to this and there was a good deal to be said for it. He was a bit critical of Mr. Johnson's method of handling the meeting. I felt that everyone might be better pleased if without prolonging them, there was less impression of an almost indecent haste which resulted in the curtailment of some discussion which might be useful to clear the air. Later I found that the representatives of Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands had not been consulted about the place of the meeting. Of course I did not indicate that I had. It seems to me that the Canadian representatives should be in a position to offer to have the meeting held in Canada at some date. The Americans obviously want to have it rotate so as to avoid the impression of complete centralization in Washington.

22. Mr. Johnson was in Paris for about thirty hours. Privately, he expressed to me a good deal of satisfaction with the way things were going. He indicated to me and General Bradley indicated to General Foulkes that while the United States would not make any specific commitments to furnish divisions in Europe, it was their intention to get as many troops into action in Europe as soon as they could and wherever they would be most effective. Undoubtedly, there is a division between the United States and United Kingdom authorities on the importance of the Mediterranean and the Middle East. French and U.K. authorities have attached the greatest importance to this, the United States much less so.

Further NATO Problems

23. Questions still undecided concern the roles of the various organs and their relationship to each other.

24. First in importance of these is whether or not regional groups will have committees of ministers. There is such a committee in Western Union and the five signatories of the Brussels Treaty have no intention of giving that up. Consequently what is in effect the Western European group of NATO will have a committee of ministers but so far the U.S. has shown its opposition to extending this to the other groups. The U.S. does not want to have policy decisions made in the regional groups which it regards as purely military planning agencies definitely subordinate to the Standing Group. It wants to have immediate authority exercised through the Standing Group, final power resting with the U.S. government as the sole important source of outside assistance.

25. To me it seems illogical that we should have one type of organization and centre of authority for Western Europe and other types for the other regional groups. It is still too early to say how either type of organization will affect Canada. Before leaving for Paris, my view was that it would be preferable to have committees of ministers for all regional groups and that view still holds.

26. A second difficulty concerns the role of the Munitions and Supply Board. This is now examining schedules of requirements which will result in enormous lists of deficiencies. Having arrived at these they will then look around for means of meeting part of the list and it is at this stage that Canada undoubtedly will be asked what she intends to contribute. My own view before leaving for Paris was that we should take the initiative in one or two respects. Experience in raising the question of training in Canada confirms this view. I think we should follow this up by my speaking to Mr. Johnson and General Foulkes speaking to General Bradley and if they have no objection we should send letters to all the countries offering to discuss inter-changes of training facilities and indicating in general terms what we have in mind which would be along the lines of the Cabinet Defence Committee conclusion. In the case of countries giving favourable replies, we could work out arrangements within the authorized limits. I feel reasonably certain that the countries concerned will for some time to come find it difficult to avail themselves of the offer even to the limited extent authorized.

27. Another offer which I believe should be made immediately would be in connection with the supply of metals, minerals or chemicals such as for example picrite. This is a question for Mr. Howe but I believe he shares this view and his representative in London feels strongly that taking the initiative would create a favourable impression and reduce pressure which would otherwise develop in other directions.

28. Whether or not in addition we could supply any finished military equipment would be a matter for Government consideration in the light of the overall economic and financial position.

29. The only remaining kind of assistance would be personnel and there I think we should soon indicate to the U.K. our desire to make arrangements to send a limited number of officers and men, say a squadron at a time, for a limited period of four to eight months for operational training in the U.K. Following the Defence Committee authorization, I raised this with Mr. Alexander and have A/V/M Campbell discuss it with Lord Tedder [Royal Air Force]. They were definitely interested though I believe it would be found difficult to work out satisfactory arrangements. There would be little likelihood of our being in a position to take advantage of this for some time to come.

59. On the four occasions that I saw Mr. Alexander, he discussed defence developments with extreme frankness, on several occasions evidently giving me information about their problems and plans which had not yet been communicated to the whole cabinet. They are appallingly concerned over the same problem of how to meet commitments involving large numbers of men and at the same time stretch the defence pound to maintain equipment as well as to push forward development. As in the case of the other countries (and Canada) we have been living in part on the fat of equipment left over from the war. As in the case of the other European countries, despite low pay and poor living conditions, conscription represented an enormous drain on money and regular personnel without commensurate results. He told me that it had been arranged between the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and himself that they would have a moderate increase in the total appropriation for defence but that higher costs would not enable them to carry on their present activities and spend anything like what they needed on the development or production of new equipment. Consequently, they would have to curtail or cut out whole operations including the Bermuda base.

60. Stringent provisions in the draft bi-lateral agreements with the United States for MAP assistance, including one prohibiting transfer of MAP assisted equipment without U.S. consent were giving U.K. authorities the most serious concern to the point where unless they could secure modifications, they were considering rejecting MAP assistance. I thought that this would not likely result. The only assistance planned at present is a gift of 70 B-29 planes. Moreover, the U.S. wanted to move one of the three existing U.S. air bases in the U.K. and construct another, both behind the radar screen, at a total cost of twenty-four million dollars, to which the United States would contribute eight. Mr. Alexander was also concerned about extra-military rights in U.S. bases, but compared with the other two questions this was relatively unimportant. He gave me facts and figures on manpower, air development, naval activities and the like.

61. In his general attitude towards the North Atlantic Treaty, he felt that this was going very well indeed, praised Johnson and Bradley for their drive and seriousness, thought that the conditions in the western European countries had shown considerable improvement, but expressed continuing uncertainty about France. He referred to difficulties that had arisen between Field Marshal Montgomery and General Delattre. In Paris, M. Pleven had also referred to this which is indeed the common talk around Europe. M. Pleven had said to me that the fault lay more at the door of Montgomery. In this connection, a revealing incident had occurred about arrangements made for the reception of the members of our National Defence College at Fontainebleau. Before leaving for the United States, Montgomery had told his assistant, Major-General Belcher to look after this and entertain our people. Belcher had made all arrangements without reference to Delattre who was furious about it and told General Foulkes what he thought about this slight. General Foulkes straightened this out with the U.K. authorities so that General Delattre was brought into the picture in connection with our people's visit. M. Pleven said that General Delattre was due to retire in February and he felt that Montgomery should go then too. He felt that there was no reason why the Commander-in-Chief should be an Englishman. After all, France was expected to supply about 12 divisions while Britain might have two or three. Mr. Alexander gave me the opposite side of the picture and while he did not say that Montgomery is going, that appears to be the general understanding.

62. Lieutenant-General Whiteley, Vice Chief of the General Staff, had already raised with me the difficulties they were having with the United States in securing consent to the use with Western Union of information resulting from Canada—U.K.—U.S. discussions on standardization. He thought our agreement should be modified. I raised with him the propriety of our continuing secret planning on a tri-partite basis which, it seemed to me, would be resented by the other countries. I suggested that all formal tri-partite planning should be replaced by informal staff talks at the highest level. General Whiteley agreed with this view but the question did not seem to have occurred to Mr. Alexander. The U.K. and the U.S. did not show the same sensitivity to the opinions of other countries as we do.

63. Mr. Alexander referred again to the importance of the Middle East in their defence plans and gave this as an illustration of the apparent inability of the United States to keep a concept already agreed to. Like Mr. Attlee at the lunch following, he referred to the difficulty of making arrangements with the United States due to the Congressional committee system.

64. General Foulkes had already spoken to Field Marshal Slim about the possibility of training in Canada and having Canadian squadrons visit England. When I raised this with Mr. Alexander and Mr. Henderson,⁴⁰ they welcomed the idea but I gathered that it might prove difficult to make arrangements which would be satisfactory to both sides.

65. Mr. Alexander referred to the possibility of tooling up in Canada to permit the production of aircraft for the U.K. without delay. This resulted from approaches by representatives of Canadair Limited to U.K. and other European governments. One proposal had been that Canadair Limited would now set up the tools and jigs to produce a U.K. type of plane like the Canberra and produce a single aircraft to make sure that they could do it, after which the plant should stand by as a shadow factory to be used in an emergency. This, it was estimated, would cost about fifteen million dollars. Mr. Alexander said that the U.K. government would be very interested in this and thought it a very desirable step. They had approached the Americans to see if any MAP funds would be available for the purpose, and had been told that funds would not be available. The U.K. government could not see their way clear to provide the funds. Mr. Alexander spoke as if the matter might be further explored. I gave no indication that we would provide funds.

66. It seemed to me that the United Kingdom had a thoroughly realistic view of modern defence problems and needs. Its forces are better trained, better led and better fed than those of the other countries. However, as in their case, overseas commitments, the man and money consuming cost of conscription and the high cost of modern equipment were leading them to spend much too high a proportion of the defence pound on personnel rather than on equipment.

Defence in Europe Generally, December 1949

80. Few people expect Communist aggression at present. All countries report a decrease in internal Communist strength. In the event of an emergency all obviously fear internal sabotage almost as much as external attack. But generally speaking, the situation vis-a-vis the Communists has improved immensely since our last visit in 1946.

81. This was also the case in connection with the work of the Armed Forces. In 1946, secrecy in our sense was almost unknown. This was particularly so in the French Air Force. Good progress is now being made in overcoming that situation but the Armed Forces of France like those of the other countries undoubtedly suffered from the uncertainties of the period when Communists were members of their governments, as well as from the other difficulties inherent in their position.

82. An important fact is that for a large part of the war all the Western European countries were occupied by Hitler. This produced important deficiencies from which they have not yet recovered—in experienced and war-proven officers of all ranks, in equipment of every kind, in design teams, in industrial know-how.

83. Moreover, in consequence of commitments abroad, France, Belgium and the Netherlands have had to call up and maintain considerable armies, resulting in a high proportionate expense on manpower at the expense of the equipment which they lack but need for modern defence. Studies of our own position have led us to think that our spending 57 per cent of the defence appropriations on personnel leaves too little for equipment at present levels. However, in France and the other countries they are spending a much higher proportion. Without verifying the figures exactly, Mr. Plevin told me that in France it was as high as 75 per cent. In Belgium and Holland it would be much the same proportion. I found both Ministers and staffs fully alive to this situation and hopeful that the United States would help them to meet it.

84. None of the Ministers nor officers consulted made any suggestion to me of specific Canadian assistance. Following our discussions at the Cabinet Defence Committee, I asked them if they would be interested in having a relatively small number of officers receive training with the Canadian Army and Air Force in Canada. I said that if they were interested I would try to secure the approval of my colleagues following which we could work on a definite plan. They at once saw the important psychological advantages in this. They appeared to be aware that our training staffs, facilities, equipment and experience, as well as the magnificent record of the BCATP [British Commonwealth Air Training Plan] gave Canada excellent qualifications to do a good job. The Ministers of Defence of France, Belgium, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom all expressed themselves as very interested in such a proposal. This does not come as a new thing to them because all these countries had officers training with the R.C.A.F. in Canada during the war and all of them now have officers training with one or more of the others. Everything I heard and saw pointed to this being an important provision which we could make without great expense and without additional commitment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE; REPORT OF MINISTER ON NORTH ATLANTIC MEETINGS

67. The Minister of National Defence reported on the recent Paris meetings of the Defence and Military Committees under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

General agreement had been reached on the strategical concept and the method of operations of the military supply organization. Participating countries appeared to have increasing faith in the ability of North Atlantic signatories to withstand successfully communist attempts at world domination. The defence of the European countries against an immediate attack, however, appeared to be low. Few officers and men were currently being trained by countries of Western Union. This was explained largely by a severe lack of necessary equipment.

Although the question had not been brought up directly, it appeared that members of Western Union would shortly submit to the United States and to Canada a list of deficiencies with a suggestion that they be met largely by the latter two countries. There might be some advantage in anticipating such a request by submission of Canadian proposals which would set forth in some detail the contributions this country was prepared to make.

Four ways in which Canada might contribute to the requirements of the North Atlantic Organization were suggested:

(a) provision of training facilities for a limited number of officers and men from the armed forces of Western European countries;

(b) establishment of a procedure whereby Canada would send certain units of her armed forces to Western European countries from time to time for training purposes;

(c) supply of raw materials;

(d) supply of certain finished military equipment. In view of the U.S. dollar content in Canadian manufactured military equipment, only the first three methods appeared to be practicable at this time.

68. The Prime Minister observed that it was difficult at this time to estimate what would constitute a reasonable Canadian contribution. It should be kept in mind that the North Atlantic Pact had been conceived primarily as a deterrent to communist attack. If the North Atlantic organization was to achieve the objective for which it had been designed, it was essential that the deterrent be sufficiently impressive. The size and nature of any Canadian contribution to North Atlantic requirements should be determined in the light of these considerations and of the burden that our economy could be expected to support.

69. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence and the remarks by the Prime Minister on recent Paris meetings of the Defence and Military Committees under the North Atlantic Organization.

Permanent Working Staff of North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee.

1. After its formal establishment by the main Committee on December 19th, the Permanent Working Staff (P.W.S.) met in Paris on December 20th to consider the following principal items:

(a) Any action taken by the Permanent Working Staff of the Military Production and Supply Board which might be relevant.

(b) The proposals submitted by the United States regarding the general work programme of the Financial and Economic PWS (see paragraph 3 of my telegram 2384 of December 8th.)

2. In connection with the first item, Breithut, the Chairman, reported that, according to his conversations with the Chairman of the Supply Working Staff, it would be of great convenience to the latter body if some guidance could be given at an early stage regarding financial assumptions which should be made in any supply plans. Breithut intimated that supply planning might already be encountering difficulties as a result of the absence of necessary financial guidance. Some representatives questioned whether the activities of the Supply Working Staff could have yet progressed sufficiently far to have encountered financial difficulties or to have raised urgent financial questions. Some representatives also enquired whether the preparation of a financial plan should precede or come after the development of Production and Supply plans. It was noted that while the Supply people might consider it convenient to have financial guidance in advance of the preparation of their plans, it would probably be feasible in practice to work out financial arrangements only after (or possibly simultaneously with) the preparation of Production and Supply plans which would give some indication of the nature and size of the financial problems requiring solution.

3. At the conclusion of this discussion, it was decided that the Supply Working Staff should be asked to indicate by what dates their programmes (for new production and for transfers of existing surpluses) are likely to be in preliminary or final form. It was also suggested that a regular exchange of documents between the supply and financial sides of the organization might be desirable in order that the work of the two sides might be more closely synchronized.

4. The discussion on the various projects suggested by the United States was confined to the one identified as (a)(I) in my earlier telegram. In connection with this suggested project, it was generally observed that some clarification was necessary before the PWS could judge its propriety, its feasibility, or the priority which should be assigned to it.

5. Ritchie enquired particularly concerning the interpretation of "total approximate budgetary resources available in each NAT country for the defence of the North Atlantic area during the fiscal year 1951 (or the calendar year 1950)". He asked whether this language was intended to refer to each country's intentions, or to its capabilities, or to its defence needs. He remarked that if the purpose of this project was merely to analyse present budgetary "intentions" in respect of defence (an interpretation which seemed unlikely in view of some of the other language in the description of the project), it should be practicable, since presumably countries could table their defence estimates with the PWS at some stage (when their various legislative timetables would permit). However, even on this interpretation, the project probably could not be completed by February 15th. If the project was intended to produce an estimate of the amount of budgetary resources which each country was "capable" (in some sense) of devoting to defence, it seemed doubtful that the project was practicable (quite apart from questions of propriety), and it seemed clear that in any case it could not be completed for a considerable time (since presumably it would be necessary to estimate taxable capacities, and to examine critically all items in the various budgets and not merely those relating to defence). Finally, if the project was intended to take account of "needs" for North Atlantic defence (and not merely of present intentions, or of capabilities) it was difficult to see how the project could be carried very far until the military plans on a North Atlantic basis had made further progress and had been translated into physically practicable production and supply programmes. (In making this last observation Ritchie was, of course, aware that the Western Union Military and Supply plans—which will probably become the plans for the Western European Regional Group—are possibly already sufficiently advanced to provide a basis for action by the Western Union countries and even to provide guidance for other countries which might assist them. He doubted, however, that these plans provided an adequate basis for estimating the budgetary resources which would be required for all the countries in the North Atlantic area, if that was the purpose of the project suggested by the United States).

6. In reply to Ritchie's question, Breithut indicated that in suggesting this project the United States had been thinking primarily in terms of capabilities, rather than intentions or needs. He thought that all participants in the North Atlantic Organization would wish to be satisfied that each member was doing as much as it could without jeopardizing its economic recovery. (Breithut told Ritchie after the meeting that he was thinking primarily of the European members but he thought it necessary, at least for the sake of appearance, to include all North Atlantic countries in the project).

7. The French representative questioned whether it was practicable to contemplate still further defence expenditures by those countries whose fiscal year begins on January 1st and whose budgets are already in the hands of their Parliaments.

8. The United Kingdom representative pointed out that the section of the directive from the North Atlantic Council (Section 3(1)) which appeared to correspond to the project suggested by the United States, seemed to be somewhat more moderate. That section of the directive appeared to imply that the development of "financial and economic guides to, and limits of, future defence programmes" would be a rather longer term process involving close cooperation among the military, supply and financial organs of the NATO. The United Kingdom representative also thought that the United States project implied that all countries should be capable of "additional...efforts", when in fact some countries (particularly some of those which had undertaken additional supply obligations through Western Union) might already be doing as much as (or even more than) they could afford. Finally, the United Kingdom representative found some difficulty in accepting the restriction of any such project to those resources available "for the defence of the North Atlantic area" since, in his judgement, it might not be practicable or desirable to attempt to segregate expenditures in respect of the North Atlantic area from other defence expenditures (especially since some expenditures earmarked for discharging other defence commitments might, in practice, be diverted to the defence of the North Atlantic area if the situation so warranted).

9. In the light of these preliminary questions and comments, Breithut suggested (and the PWS agreed) that each representative should attempt to submit his detailed comments on the various projects proposed by the United States before the time of the next meeting in order that discussion might be facilitated and decisions reached at that meeting regarding the future programme of work for the PWS. In addition, each representative should submit by that time any suggestions for alternative, or additional, projects. It was also agreed that each representative should endeavour to supply for the information of the PWS (without implying commitments of any kind) details regarding the budgetary practices of his Government, with particular reference to:

(a) The dates on which the estimates and budget for 1950 are likely to be prepared by the Government, and submitted to Parliament;

(b) The facilities normally available to the Government for seeking supplementary votes or appropriations when necessary.

10. At the conclusion of the meeting there was some discussion on the need which would shortly arise for Secretariat staff (particularly bilingual stenographers). Each representative was asked to enquire of his Government whether any such staff could be made available (it being understood that the Government supplying the personnel would pay the salaries). It was noted that so far the United Kingdom had supplied much more than its reasonable share of the personnel for staffing the Secretariats of the various North Atlantic bodies in London.

11. It was decided that the next meeting of the PWS should be held in London on January 10th. In preparation for that meeting it would be most helpful to have guidance from the Canadian authorities on the following points already mentioned above:

(a) Any detailed comments on the various projects suggested by the United States.

(b) Suggestions for alternative, or additional, projects for the PWS.

(c) Information on the lines indicated in paragraph 9 above regarding Canadian budgetary practices.

(d) Indications concerning the likely availability of Canadian personnel for the Secretariat.

Washington, December 30, 1949

Dear Mr. Heenev,

I have read with great interest Mr. Pierce's memorandum regarding possible Canadian contributions under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty and Mr. Wilgress' comments thereon, which were forwarded to me under cover of despatch 3121 of December 19th.

I think Mr. Pierce and Mr. Wilgress have set out the problems very clearly and no doubt thinking has subsequently advanced in the Department in the light of this correspondence. I would, however, like to add some comments on the problems as they appear to me from here, although I expect that some of my points may already have been taken into consideration.

I take it that we are agreed that some form of contribution by Canada to our North Atlantic partners under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty is both necessary and desirable in furtherance of the principal objective of the Treaty, which is to build up the collective strength of the signatories and thus to deter aggression.

I understand from Air Vice Marshal Campbell that Mr. Claxton, following the recent meeting of the Defence Committee in Paris, canvassed in some of the European countries the possibility of extending military training facilities in Canada to selected military personnel. I assume that Mr. Claxton will soon be in a position to indicate what facilities of this kind Canada may be in a position to offer to the other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty. Our geography as well as the special military skills developed in the war will undoubtedly place us in a position of making a special, even if limited, contribution in this field.

As Mr. Pierce and Mr. Wilgress point out, special problems arise in connection with any contribution we may make in the form of military equipment or goods which may be required for defence purposes. Mr. Pierce has put his finger on the crux of the problem when he states in his memorandum that "the question of the American dollar component will arise in nearly all cases". It would seem that, with a few possible exceptions, any products of Canadian industry which we may be able and willing to offer to our North Atlantic partners will not only be affected by Canadian industrial capacity, but also by the arrangements which we are able to make with the United States Government to provide for the U.S. dollar costs which may be involved.

I understand that deficiencies in the various types of military equipment have already been established by the European signatories. If this is so, it would seem advantageous for us to consider as soon as possible which items we could most economically provide. Delaying consideration might result in our being confronted with a list of items which none of the other signatories could or would wish to produce. If we are to make any contribution, I think that we should, at the same time, determine the Canadian dollar limits of such a contribution for the fiscal year 1950. We would then be in a position to indicate to the United States authorities the Canadian dollar limits to our contribution and we could also place before them a list of the items which we might be prepared to supply under Mutual Aid to our North Atlantic partners, indicating at the same time those items which, because of their U.S. dollar component, would require special arrangements to be made with the U.S. government before obligations can be entered into on our part.

The kind of arrangements I have in mind might be considered under three main categories; offshore purchases (already authorized under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act), purchases in Canada for United States forces (at present barred by the "Buy American" Act), and the delivery to Canada of parts of equipment to be manufactured or assembled in Canada for shipment to European countries under our own Mutual Aid Programme, these parts to be included in the Mutual Defence Assistance Act contribution from the United States to the European country concerned.

I would suggest that the sooner we make known our intentions to the U.S. Government, at least on the official level, the better. The Mutual Aid Programme will be coming up for consideration by the Congress early in the session and I hope that, if we make our views known early enough to the Administration, we might be able to influence changes in the existing U.S. laws governing military procurement in the direction of easing our own position. As you know, one of the most objectionable features under the present Mutual Defence Assistance legislation is the omission of any authority for the United States to purchase in Canada equipment for their military forces. I think that if we show a willingness to make a direct contribution ourselves to the strengthening of the defences of Western Europe, we would assist those in the Administration who recognize the importance of helping us, either through amendment of the present Mutual Defence Assistance Act or at least through administrative relaxation of the "Buy American" Act.

It is, of course, important as Mr. Wilgress points out, to consider the timing as well as the form of any statement of our intention to contribute to mutual aid under Article 3. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Wilgress that we should not adopt a "wait and see" policy and that we should ourselves take the initiative in declaring our position, having assessed the contribution which we may be able and willing to make in terms of our industrial capacity, the state of our dollar reserves, and our fiscal resources. In this connection, I am inclined to favour the approach suggested in Mr. Wilgress' memorandum rather than the idea of dealing with established deficiencies on an ad hoc basis as implied in Mr. Pierce's memorandum.

In conclusion, I would hope that no time will be lost in letting me have, even in a tentative form, a statement of what we might be in a position to contribute under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty in 1950, specifying, as I have suggested, those things which we could only supply on the basis of reciprocal purchases between the United States and Canada. I might then discuss with the State Department those aspects of our proposals which will require the co-operation of the United States.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

BERLIN BLOCKADE

Currency Discussions

As a member of the Security Council Canada has been taking an active part in the attempts to find a solution to the Berlin dispute which have been made in Paris and more recently by the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade in Geneva.¹ The Canadian representatives have been governed, first of all, by the view that the Berlin situation constitutes a threat to the peace. On the substance of the dispute, Canada has been intent on a solution which is acceptable to the Western Powers. Bearing these considerations in mind, our representatives have used every effort to seek an agreement which would serve the best interests of the Western Powers. The Canadian delegates have constantly taken the view that the Western Powers themselves should be the ultimate judges of what is acceptable and have striven to see that nothing emerged from the negotiations which would embarrass them.

2. It appears, however, that the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade has, in fact, produced a document (its preliminary draft report) which promises to be a source of considerable embarrassment. This was not the result of any lack of diligence on the part of the Committee.

3. The four powers involved in the dispute have recently offered their comments on the Committee's preliminary draft report. The United Kingdom, France and the U.S.S.R. have confined their comments to suggesting amendments which would make the draft a satisfactory basis for the settlement of the Berlin dispute so far as currency and trade are concerned. The United States alone has rejected the draft for these purposes, although its reasons for doing so seem to differ in no major respect from those which prompted the United Kingdom and France to offer amendments within the framework of the draft.

4. From the Canadian point of view it was a matter of some concern that Western solidarity had not been achieved on this important problem. Considering the advantages which accrue to the U.S.S.R. by the United States attitude, it would be reasonable to suppose that some compelling reasons must have governed the United

Norman Robertson was chairman of the Technical Committee.

States authorities in their outright rejection of the draft. The Soviet Government is now able to claim that it participated fully in the work of the Committee and that it accepted the general framework of the report as a satisfactory approach to the problem even though this report was drawn up by representatives of countries which would scarcely be called friends of the Soviet Union. The U.S.S.R. could go on to argue that, as the United Kingdom and French Governments had accepted the framework of the report, the United States rejection of it sprang from more than purely technical considerations. From here Soviet propagandists could insist, as some already have done, that the United States Government did not really want a settlement at all.

5. This conclusion is, of course, hardly justified when one considers the expense and difficulties involved in maintaining the airlift but it is the sort of argument which is difficult to dispose of.

6. More recently, the United States Government has suggested another approach to the problem. This envisaged an "interim solution" whereby the United States counter-proposals to the Committee's draft would be put into effect for the control of Berlin currency and trade at the same time as the blockade was lifted. This "interim solution" would remain in force until the four powers, by direct negotiation, could reunite the administration of all of Berlin. The United States would then accept the Committee's draft as a basis for the control of Berlin currency and trade in the re-united city.

7. While this fresh proposal was a considerable advance over the previous United States position, it would require the Soviet acceptance of the United States counter-proposals which the Soviet Government have already rejected as being outside the terms of reference of the Technical Committee. Furthermore, it involved the acceptance of the United States counter-proposals by the United Kingdom and France with which they had previously been unable to identify themselves. If these two countries were now to accept a United States view they had previously rejected, Soviet propagandists would not be slow to claim that they had yielded to American pressure.

8. The present states of affairs is such that one can hope for very little by way of settlement from the Technical Committee. However, it seems important to us that the Soviet Union should not be permitted to make expansive gestures of conciliation based on the Committee's report without being challenged and that the apparent difference of opinion between the United Kingdom and France on the one hand and the United States on the other should be narrowed. We should accordingly be interested to know what compelling reasons the United States authorities had for not making their comments within the framework of the Committee's report. We should also be interested to hear if the United States authorities have any plans for counteracting the effective use the Soviet Government might make of the Committee's report and what the United States Government considers to be the best future course of action.

Reference your telegram No. 360 of February 19th[†] concerning publication of the report of the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade.

In suggesting earlier that it might be desirable to refrain from publishing this report, my principal concern was to avoid prejudicing any discussions which might be in process or in prospect for a settlement of the Berlin question (see paragraph 8 of my telegram No. 347[†] and the last part of paragraph 2 in my telegram No. 374)[†]. I believe that your opposition to publication of the report, as stated in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 327,[†] was also based on the assumption that further negotiations might be envisaged, the atmosphere for which would not be improved by the report's publication. There is, however, some indication in the telegram from New York that our people in Lake Success may be interpreting your instructions and my observations as representing opposition to the publication of the report in any circumstances. In my view, as suggested in my earlier messages referred to above, there may be circumstances in which we should not oppose publication of the report but rather might even take the initiative in urging that it be released. In view of the fact that the possibility of renewed discussions on Berlin is so remote that it could hardly be affected by any release of the report in the near future, I think it might be desirable for us to consider the circumstances in which we would not oppose, but might even favour, publication. I am mentioning below some factors which might be taken into account in determining our attitude towards publication:

(a) Any request from the western occupying Powers for publication of the report. In that case, unless there was disagreement among the western occupying Powers themselves on the desirability of publication, I presume that we should support such a request.

(b) Any indication that the Russians desire to have the report published. In such a case I think we should definitely favour publication in order to protect the west (and the President of the Security Council) against charges later of suppressing a report which presented the Western Powers in what might be regarded (and which would certainly be so interpreted if it had been suppressed for some time) as a bad light. I believe that in this situation the United Kingdom also would not be strongly opposed to publication.

(c) The likelihood of the western "b" mark or the straight western mark being made the sole currency of western Berlin in the near future. When this action is taken by the western Powers, the Russians will almost certainly let loose a propaganda barrage against the West and, even if the Russians themselves had not pressed for earlier publication of the Committee's report, they could probably make good use of the fact that such action by the West in Berlin was taken before the report was made public. They could misrepresent the western position in the Committee's discussions quite freely and any rebuttal which might be supplied by the subsequent release of the report would probably be ineffective. If the report were to be published before such a move by the western Powers in Berlin, the western public at least would be prepared for such a move and would regard it as a fairly natural outcome of the failure of the Committee's project and would be at least somewhat immunized against any Russian propaganda that might accompany the bringing in of the western mark. The timing of any publication in relation to the introduction of the western mark should probably be a matter for consultation with the three western Powers or perhaps it might even be left to them to make the request for publication in the light of their own timetable. From conversations which Ritchie had yesterday with Dean and Gifford in the Foreign Office it appears that, while the United Kingdom would probably agree with my reasoning, they would be opposed to publication (unless other reasons require such publication) much in advance of the actual currency changeover since they feel that any vigorous comments by the press or by the Russians following on such publication might discourage their partners from going along with the western currency reform in Berlin at the last moment.

(d) Any request from one of the countries represented on the Committee, particularly if it is claimed that the position of that country's member on the Committee or the position of the Committee as a whole was being misrepresented in the press. In that case I feel that we should probably agree to publication.

(e) Any pressure from the Secretary-General for publication of the Committee's report, particularly if the press misrepresents the position of his representative on the Committee. The United Kingdom apparently do not feel that a mere request from the Secretary-General should be regarded as sufficient justification for the release of the report. If, however, speculation in the newspapers created an embarrassing position for the Secretary-General (as some items by "Pertinax" in the French press may have done already) I think that we are not justified in opposing any request from him for publication in view of the political risk which he took in assigning a representative to a Committee which was not formally a Committee of the United Nations.

(f) Any request from members of the United Nations not represented on the Security Council but nevertheless interested in the Berlin question. I think serious consideration would have to be given to any such request for publication. For instance, the Australians (both by virtue of their membership in the United Nations and of the fact that Evatt is still President of the Assembly) might ask for publication in connection with the resolution of the General Assembly regarding the need for the Great Powers to reconcile their differences. In that particular case the Western Occupying Powers might hesitate to agree to publication if they felt that it would lead to a new initiative by Evatt to intervene in the Berlin question.

2. In listing these factors I have not attempted to suggest what priorities should be assigned to them in case some of them should turn out to be in conflict at any particular time. All that I am suggesting is that our opposition to publication should be qualified and should be subject to reconsideration if any of these factors develops. My own general view is that it probably is more dangerous to suppress the report if there is any interest in having it released than to make it public at this time.

I attach a copy of London despatch No. 336 of February 15th, 1949,† and its enclosure, embodying the report of the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade. This enclosure does not include the numerous supporting documents which you have seen as we received them over the past three months.

2. The report confines itself to a chronicle of the Committee's activities with a conclusion to the effect that the positions of the experts of the four occupying powers were so far apart that further work by the Committee did not appear useful. As you know, failing an agreement, the Committee had no power to produce a recommendation of its own.

3. The most important feature of the report is that it mentions the preliminary draft recommendations produced by the Committee after consultation with the experts of the four powers and the reactions of the four powers to them. The preliminary draft recommendations were carefully defined in advance as a working paper, for, from the Committee's terms of reference, it could be nothing else. However, it must be conceded that in putting them forward the Committee must have considered them at least as a basis upon which agreement could be reached.

4. This at any rate appears to have been the case until other events, including the success of the airlift, indications of Soviet anxiety, and the situation in Berlin itself, changed the attitude of the United States in particular toward the Committee's work. I think it is fair to say that there is ample evidence that the United States hostility to these recommendations was born of political, not technical, considerations.

5. One questions the sincerity of the United States counter-proposal (though it won over the United Kingdom and France) because there are virtually no conditions on which the Berlin currency could be unified on the basis of the Soviet mark which the United States would accept until the blockade was lifted.

6. The problem now is what should be done with the report. Presumably the President of the Security Council will consult his colleagues in the group of six. They appear to have two courses open to them:

(a) To publish the report, announce that no agreement is possible, and hand the matter back to the Security Council where the initiative would return to the United Kingdom, United States and France.

(b) To assume that the United States counter-proposal or "interim solution", now supported by the United Kingdom and France, offers a solution to the Berlin deadlock and to attempt to draft a resolution for the Security Council based on it.

7. While the first course would probably be the most realistic, it seems to me that the Western Powers might prefer to adopt the second and to have a resolution put forward under the joint sponsorship of the group of six. This would give the Soviet Union an opportunity to veto it and there the matter would rest until the anticipated softening of Soviet tactics in Germany began.

8. The difficulty with either course is that it would place the Soviet Union in a position from which it would be extremely difficult to retreat. If the Soviet Union is anticipating a change of tactics in Germany however, they might encourage the group of six in the belief that a solution based on the "interim" plan is possible and endeavour to influence the drafting of the resolution so as to obtain as many concessions as possible. They could then present the final recommendation as the fruit of Soviet peace-making.

9. I doubt if we should take part in negotiations based on the "interim" plan unless we are assured that the United Kingdom, United States and France are willing to accept it with reasonable modifications. Our delegation might otherwise become involved in a situation comparable to that from which we have just emerged in Geneva. Without a clear understanding on this point we might suggest that the group of six publish the Technical Committee's report, and resign the matter to the Western Powers in the Security Council.²

10. I attach a copy of London telegram No 374 of February 16th† which, I think, gives colour to the interpretation of the Western Powers' intentions given here.

1. We agree in general with your suggestions as we were not in fact unqualifiedly against publication. We were anxious, however, that the report should not be released prematurely and without consultation.

2. We do not entirely share your view that the possibility of renewed discussions on Berlin is remote. It seems to us that although the Committee's work is probably ended, there will be further discussions either in the group of six or in the Security Council itself and these might be adversely affected by the publication of the report. Nevertheless, we agree that there may well be circumstances such as those envisaged by you in which it would be much worse to suppress the report than to publish it. In that case publication should be by common consent and not by independent decision. As the report is the property of the President of the Security Council all queries concerning it and decisions about its release should be referred to him. He has already agreed that he should consult the six delegations before taking action. Our attitude in any consultations will take into consideration the views offered by you.

3. I am sending similar comments to New York and Washington.

(b) To assume that the United States counter-proposal or "interim solution", now supported by the United Kingdom and France, offers a solution to the Berlin deadlock and to attempt to draft a resolution for the Security Council based on it. This course might be followed whether the report was published or not.

3. In your telegram No. 453 of February 28th† it is noted that the United States and France are in favour of having the report published and that it may not be long before the United Kingdom is won over. Should a demand for publication result we certainly ought not oppose it, for reasons given in your telegram No. 438 of February 24th, even though publication might complicate matters should negotiations be resumed. I think that, considering our experiences on the Technical Committee, we should welcome any decision which might release the group of six from this undertaking which may prove to be even more embarrassing in the future than it has been up to the present.

4. For these reasons, it is my view that we should support any move by the United Kingdom, United States and France for publication and at the same time leave any further initiative entirely to those countries.

As you know, it has been the Government's attitude that Canadian participation in the Berlin airlift was not compatible with our activities on the Security Council of the United Nations while it was endeavouring to resolve the dispute over Berlin.

2. According to word received from New York and from the Commonwealth Relations Office, the report of the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade will be made public in the near future. The United Kingdom, United States and France are requesting that its publication be accompanied by a statement from the President of the Security Council that there is nothing further which the Security Council can do at present to solve the Berlin problem. The question therefore arises:

Does the Government intend to reconsider its policy on the airlift. It is difficult to see how they could avoid doing so. Our recommendation could be either:

(a) To participate on clearly understood terms, or

(b) To claim that disabling circumstances still exist which would prevent our participation. It appears that the Government has never publicly dismissed the idea of participation as a matter of principle.

3. If we are to offer help it should be in a form which is acceptable to the occupying powers. For example, it would seem that the use of Canadian aircraft would have many technical complications. Such at any rate is the view of a spokesman of the United States airforce (New York telegram No. 90 of February 28th).† Our share therefore might well be limited to the contribution of personnel.

4. You will recall that this possibility was considered earlier and rejected as unsuitable. However, might we not argue that when the Atlantic Pact is signed we might properly join the airlift and demonstrate the principle of coordination embodied in the Pact. We might also note the training value to the R.C.A.F. of participation.

5. As I understand it, a more subconscious reason for not participating in the first place was that it might thus have appeared to be part of a concerted Commonwealth act. On the analogy of our declaration of war in 1939, perhaps enough time has now elapsed to justify our independent action in this matter.

6. If we hold that conditions still exist that make Canadian participation undesirable, this could only be defended if a reasonable offer were made by Canada and turned down by the occupying powers.

7. In either case would it not be wise to take preliminary soundings both in the United Kingdom and the United States as we would have to know the form and conditions of participation in order to decide on a defensible course of action.⁵

It was proposed to instruct the Air Force Liaison Officer to make informal representations to the U.K. authorities that any request of this nature be delayed until the North Atlantic Pact were signed. The matter might then be considered as a measure of co-operation between countries signatory to the Pact.

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 22nd, reported that the U.K. High Commissioner had intimated that the U.K. would shortly be approaching the Canadian government officially seeking assistance in the Berlin airlift.

Circumstances had changed somewhat since this matter was first discussed. In the interval, negotiations to settle the Berlin problem had failed and plans were being made to operate the airlift for an extended period.

While the U.K. High Commissioner had been given no indication of the attitude of the Canadian government to this question, it had been suggested that any requests of this kind should be made on behalf of the occupying powers and be directed to all other countries participating in the North Atlantic Pact.

With regard to the nature of the request, it would likely be for participation with R.A.F. It was believed, however, that R.C.A.F. would prefer to work with the U.S. Air Forces.

11. The Prime Minister observed that it would facilitate consideration of this matter by the government if the request were made along the lines that Mr. Pearson had suggested to the U.K. High Commissioner. If an international authority were in charge of the whole airlift, contributions by other participating countries could be used in such a manner as to achieve the best overall results.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that the question of Canadian participation in the Berlin airlift be referred to the Minister of National Defence for consideration (possibly in the first instance by the Chiefs of Staff Committee in consultation with the Secretary to the Cabinet and the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs).

BERLIN AIRLIFT: CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

At the March 29th meeting of the Cabinet, the Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the U.K. High Commissioner had intimated that the United Kingdom would shortly be approaching the Canadian government officially seeking assistance in the Berlin airlift.

The request would likely be for both aircraft and personnel to participate with the R.A.F. in their effort.

Mr. Pearson, in making his report, observed that circumstances had changed somewhat since this matter was first discussed. In the interval, negotiations to settle the Berlin problem had failed and plans were now being made to operate the airlift for an extended period.

While the U.K. High Commissioner was given no indication of the attitude of the Canadian government to this question, it was suggested to him that a request of this kind would receive more favourable consideration if it were to be made on behalf of the occupying powers and were to be directed to all other countries participating in the North Atlantic Pact.

The Cabinet agreed that some thought should be given to the practical problems that will arise if the government should decide to participate in the Berlin airlift, and the matter was referred to the Minister of National Defence with this in view. Mr. Claxton asks that the Chiefs of Staff, in consultation with the Secretary to the Cabinet and the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, consider these questions and let him have their views.

BERLIN AIRLIFT

I refer to the minute of the Cabinet meeting of March 22 dealing with an anticipated request by the United Kingdom and United States Governments for Canada's participation in the Berlin airlift after the North Atlantic Pact is signed. Should you wish to discuss this question further with your colleagues, you may find the following of some use.

2. As you know, one of the objections to our participation earlier was that it was not compatible with our activities on the "neutral" Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade. These activities were, in effect, ended by the publication of the Committee's report by the President of the Security Council. This disability, therefore, no longer exists.

3. In accordance with the Cabinet decision, it is assumed that our cooperation in the airlift would be considered as a measure of cooperation between countries signatory to the Pact. There seem to be two possible approaches that might be made under the treaty, the first under the general provisions of Article 3 calling for "continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid"; the second under Article 4 which calls for consultation in the event of a threat to any of the parties.

4. Under Article 4, it is relevant to recall that early last October the Canadian delegate to the Security Council voted in favour of a resolution to place the Berlin dispute on the agenda as a threat to international peace and security. This attitude was further expressed in General McNaughton's statement of October 15 when he said:

"...the situation is that we are carrying on this debate under the shadow of violence."

5. It could therefore be argued that the Berlin dispute comes within the provisions of Article 4 of the Atlantic Treaty as threatening the security of the parties. If this interpretation of Article 4 were accepted, we would be committed to consult with the other signatories preliminary to taking concerted action. An appeal for Canada's participation would presumably follow consultation and take effect only in concert with the other signatories. This would transfer the responsibility of what is now a United Kingdom-United States project to the Atlantic group.

This memorandum was prepared by the European Division for Heeney's signature. It was returned unsigned with the following note attached:

Mr. MacDermot: I w[oul]d hold this, at any rate, until Chiefs of Staff C[ommi]ttee have dealt with current reference (See Crean—D[efence] L[iaison] D[ivision]). A. H[eeney].

6. There are indications that the U.S.S.R. are coming to the point where it may be possible to negotiate a general German settlement. The Government has expressed considerable interest in taking a part in this settlement commensurate with our contributions to allied victory and to European recovery. Participation in the Berlin airlift would strengthen our position should the Government wish once again to press for an adequate share in the negotiations to this end.

VI. BERLIN AIRLIFT—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

17. The Secretary to the Cabinet, in referring to the memorandum which had been circulated, pointed out that the Government required a report on the military problems which would arise if Canada participated in the Berlin Airlift, together with a recommendation as to the most suitable form of contribution.

(Memorandum of 31st March, 1949, from the Secretary, Cabinet Defence Committee—CSC 7-7 of 1st April)

18. The Chief of the Air Staff stated that the United Kingdom authorities were hopeful that Canada would volunteer to provide aircrews, which could be integrated with the Royal Air Force component of the airlift scheme. This arrangement was not acceptable to the Royal Canadian Air Force. It would be preferable to provide a small unit of approximately seven North Star aircraft, together with the necessary maintenance staff, and, because of certain maintenance and repair factors, to attach this unit to the United States Air Force component. Such a contribution would result in the closing down of considerable R.C.A.F. northern traffic. It might be necessary for the Canadian Pacific Air Lines to take over certain R.C.A.F. commitments for Churchill and Baker Lake. Participation in the Berlin Airlift would not, however, affect present commitments to the Army concerning paratroop training, but might limit to some extent mapping and survey work. A full report covering all details of the force was now being prepared and would be forwarded direct to the Minister of National Defence.

19. The Committee noted the remarks of the Chief of the Air Staff and agreed that the report be forwarded direct to the Minister of National Defence.

BERLIN AIRLIFT; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

22. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 29th, reported that some further consideration had been given to the nature of Canadian participation in the Berlin airlift should this question be raised again.

It was felt that an appropriate contribution might be fourteen North Star aircraft and a force of 75 officers and 400 men. A contribution of these proportions would permit a minimum of three aircraft to be in operation at one time. The cost was estimated at about $11 million for the first year.

An alternative scheme would be to provide only personnel, but this was regarded as less desirable than a balanced contribution of aircraft and men. The estimated cost in this case would be $1½ million.

From a practical standpoint, there would seem to be advantages in integrating any Canadian force with the U.S.A.A.F.

23. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the preliminary remarks of the Minister of National Defence on the question of Canadian participation in the Berlin airlift, it being understood that the study would be continued and a report made in due course.

Berlin blockade. Following from Ignatieff, Begins:

You will have seen the communique issued by the State Department and published in the New York Times today, Wednesday, April 27th, describing the negotiations between Jessup and Malik to lift the Berlin blockade. This communique concludes with the statement that, if the present position of the Soviet Government is as stated in the Tass Agency release published April 26th "the way appears clear for lifting of the blockade and meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. No final conclusion upon this can be reached until further exchanges of view with Mr. Malik."

2. At a dinner given by the Secretary General for the President of the Assembly last night, Trygve Lie told me that, according to information he had received about the Jessup-Malik talks, agreement was virtually complete for the lifting of the blockade, except for the fixing of dates for the reciprocal and simultaneous lifting of restrictions imposed by the Soviet Union since March, 1948, and restrictions imposed by the three Powers on communications and trade between the Western and Eastern zones of Germany, together with the fixing of a date for the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. Mr. Lie, who was in a very optimistic frame of mind about these talks, said that he felt sure that agreement this time would be reached on the fixing of dates. He said that he thought that the Soviet Union this time was anxious to reach an agreement. He was happy that the Jessup-Malik talks had been initiated at Lake Success as it indicated the importance of the United Nations as a bridge in present times between East and West. Hector McNeil, Gromyko and Dean Rusk, who were also at the dinner, spent most of the evening apart from the other guests in conclave. Ends.

United States-Soviet negotiations for lifting of blockade of Berlin.

[R.A.] Ford has discussed the situation with Hankey, Head of the Northern Department of the Foreign Office. Latter are by no means so optimistic as State Department seems to be of prospects of an end of blockade and meeting of Council of Foreign Ministers. Hankey admits Russians must be trying hard to find a way out of the impasse they have got into. There is no doubt of their economic and political failure in the Soviet zone of Germany and he continues to think it would be well-high impossible for them to establish a successful Government in Eastern Germany as a riposte to a Government in Frankfurt. At the same time the air lift is a continuous reminder to the Eastern Germans that the Western Powers have successfully withstood the Soviet siege. As long as it keeps up it will give intangible but powerful encouragement to the anti-Soviet elements in Eastern Germany. On the other hand the Russians must be aware how costly it is proving and that it is a cheap way of seriously embarrassing the Western Powers.

2. Hankey is certain, however, that the Russians are going to demand a pretty steep quid pro quo before ending the blockade. He cannot believe they will ask for anything less than

- (a) Postponement of the setting-up of a Western German Government,
- (b) A share in control of the Ruhr and

(c) The establishment of a United German Government in Berlin with possibly the withdrawal of all occupation troops.

3. Any such offer is going to be examined with the greatest care in the Foreign Office. The Russians may dress it up to look extremely attractive not only to the Germans but to the outside world as well. They may accompany it by some camouflage such as real concessions in Austria. In any case Hankey thinks that the Russians are not likely to want to lift the blockade unless they can get an assurance that such questions will be discussed at a C.F.M. meeting. He stressed that so far as they know no precise proposals had yet been made by the Russians.

4. Foreign Office objections to the above mentioned Soviet aims are roughly as follows:

(a) A postponement now of the setting up of a West German Government would destroy all the patient work of the last eight months as well as German confidence in the intentions of the Western Powers. It would also mean a return to Governmental chaos and put the Western Zones in a disadvantageous position vis-a-vis the Eastern Zone with its Communist Government and well-armed police;

(b) Soviet participation in control of the Ruhr remains one of their principal aims in Germany. Through it they could stir up labour troubles in an area essential to the economic recovery of Western Europe. They could also play on the French fears, which are only just below the surface, that the Ruhr was being reconstructed at their expense, and menace that Anglo-French co-operation and confidence which had been only built up with great trouble;

(c) The Russians would never in the end accept a United German Government which they were not certain in Communists could control. At the present time, with or without the withdrawal of occupation troops, a United German Government sitting in Berlin would be at the mercy of the Communists. The Germans have never been good at resisting Governmental force, and Czechoslovakia and Poland would be repeated all over again.

5. Hankey thinks, therefore, that such Soviet proposals, if made, should be rejected, though it would have to be done with the greatest tact in order not to give the Russians a propaganda field-day. This does not necessarily mean, however, that they would refuse to call a new meeting of the C.F.M. to discuss these questions if the blockade were lifted. Once the West German Government was created and showed signs of resilience, however, it might be another story. The principal Soviet aim in Europe is the communisation of Western Germany; just as the principal allied goal is to prevent that. Therefore every Soviet proposal concerning Western Germany is likely to be made with a view to furthering the Soviet aim, and must so be examined by the Western Powers.

6. Asked what, then, can be the outcome, Hankey thought the most we can hope for is a continuation of the division of Germany along the present lines. With the growing economic and political recovery in Western Germany exercising continued pressure on Eastern Germany, he believes the Russians will have in time to settle the blockade in order to relieve at least the economic situation in the east; though he admits the unpredictable might happen and the Russians decide to cut their losses and lift the blockade within the near future.

Following for Prime Minister from Pearson.

I had lunch and a very interesting talk yesterday with Mr. Bevin. He was in good spirits and seemed to be in good health. He was enthusiastic about the results of our Commonwealth meeting.

2. We had quite a long discussion about the Berlin blockade negotiations with the Russians, and afterwards he let me see all the telegrams that have been exchanged between here, New York and Washington. The British are being very cautious about these developments as they feel that the Russian moves may be designed not so much to secure an agreement which will permit the lifting of the blockade, as a situation which they could exploit tactically to delay the establishment of a Western German Government on the grounds that such an establishment would be made more difficult once the Foreign Ministers had begun a conference which could be prolonged indefinitely. The Americans seem to be more inclined to view the Russian overtures as an indication of a genuine desire to lift the Berlin blockade and even Bevin admits that the developments of the last few days have strengthened the view that this optimistic view may be the correct one. In any event there seems now to be a fairly good chance of successful results of the current conversation which would presumably make the airlift unnecessary. However even if the blockade is lifted the Anglo-American airlift organization will be maintained for a time and supplies flown into Berlin though a diminishing rate. In other words, there is not likely to be any sudden stoppage of the airlift.

3. I do not know to what extent you are getting information on this matter from New York or the Embassy in Washington but I thought you might be interested in yesterday's conversation. Message ends.

GERMANY—RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

As reported in the press on May 5, representatives of the four occupying powers of Germany have agreed at Lake Success:

(1) to remove on May 12, all the restrictions imposed since March 1, 1948, on communications, transportation and trade between Berlin and the Western zone of Germany and between the Eastern and Western zones, and

(2) to convene a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris on May 23, to discuss outstanding problems relating to Germany. (The Soviet Government has agreed that during the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers preparations for the establishment of a West German Government may continue.)

As this decision involves a distinct departure from the tactics followed by the Soviet Government for more than a year, the question arises as to whether it was based upon a genuine desire to reach a quadripartite accord on all of Germany, or whether it was designed to secure for the U.S.S.R. the initiative in directing political developments in Germany. It has become apparent that the Soviet attempt, through the imposition of the Berlin blockade, to diminish the influence of the Western Powers in Germany has not only failed, but has had the opposite effect, as it has provided the opportunity for the closer association of Berlin and Western Germany with the Western democracies.

As indicated in the declaration issued on June 24, 1948 at Warsaw following the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the U.S.S.R. and the satellite countries, the Soviet attempt to seize the initiative would probably include a proposal for the establishment of a United Germany from which all occupation forces would be withdrawn. Whatever may be the nature of the Soviet proposals, the Western Powers will undoubtedly insist that a United Germany must be an independent democratic state free to co-operate with O.E.E.C. and the Council of Europe.

Berlin Blockade.

On Thursday May 5th, Cadogan spoke to me and offered to give me an account of the conversations concerning Berlin that had taken place here amongst the representatives of the occupying forces. I saw Cadogan on this subject yesterday (May 6).

2. Cadogan said that the meeting of Council of Foreign Ministers had been set for 23rd May, in order to end during the second week of June. The Western Powers had been apprehensive that the Russians might suggest a later date, and then attempt to spin out the meeting as much as possible in view of the 15th July elections; Malik, however, had readily agreed to having the Council of Foreign Ministers meet on 23rd May, and had added that it might conclude even earlier than mid-June.

3. In regard to the lifting of restrictions, Cadogan said that full account had been taken of the existence of two separate currencies. It was specifically agreed by Malik that the new currency in the western section of Berlin would not, repeat not, be regarded by the U.S.S.R. as one of the restrictions in trade which are to be withdrawn. It might in fact be the case that trade between the eastern and western zones would be slow in developing because of the separate currencies, but Malik had undertaken not to make difficulties on this account.

4. Cadogan said that the understanding in regard to the agenda was flexible. Any Minister could ask for the inclusion of any subject to the agenda. The United Kingdom had suggested that it might perhaps wish to have Austria discussed, and Malik had agreed that this would be possible. The order in which subjects were to be discussed had also been left for the Ministers themselves to decide. There would be no need for the four military authorities to come together prior to the meeting of the Council.

5. In regard to the Security Council, Cadogan said that when the three Western Powers were satisfied that the blockade had virtually been lifted, they would formally write to the Secretary-General asking that the Berlin item be taken off the agenda. This letter would be sent to the Secretary-General rather than to the President, in order that the French representative would not have to write to himself.

6. Cadogan added that the three Western Powers have given no commitments in regard to western Germany. On the contrary, they had specifically informed the Soviet authorities that they intended to press forward with their plans for the establishment of a Government in the western zones.

7. According to Cadogan, the Soviet authorities had shown themselves eager to reach an agreement, and he expected that this attitude would be maintained in the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting. The United Kingdom, however, had no illusions in regard to Soviet motives. Agreement to the lifting of the blockade represented a change of tactics and not a change of purpose.

8. I have suggested to Ross of the United States delegation that I would be grateful for some clarification from United States sources of the Berlin situation. Jessup has left New York and is not expected to return before the end of the Assembly. Rusk will be here next week, however, and Ross tells us that in response to my suggestion he has agreed to give us a full account of the negotiations and of their expectations for the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting. He has said that Kennan as well as Rusk will talk to me and that he will probably indicate his views as to the specific motives the U.S.S.R. has in mind in agreeing to the raising of the Berlin blockade.

Berlin, May 12, 1949

Sir,

As you are well aware, the blockade was lifted just after midnight today. This important event, Berlin's Allied community took rather calmly. It is with considerable relief that we now feel we can get out to the West at pleasure without having to scramble for indifferent air accommodation. But, or so it seems to me, our interest was aroused when the announcement was made, for this was a clear indication of a change in Russian policy.

The reason for our calmness is that, although the outer world will never believe it, our lot here this last year has not been unpleasant. We lacked nothing except freedom of movement. The British ration it is true, has been austere, but so it is in England, and it will continue meagre now that we have been de-blockaded.

It was, therefore, with some interest that I listened last night to the local radio, and again to the BBC news broadcast this morning, and learned that the news agencies were making a tremendous fuss about it all. There seemed to be special broadcasters on the autobahn, on the trains and in Berlin, apparently trying to convey a feeling of intense excitement. I may be insensitive but to me the simple fact was that we were merely resuming the conditions under which we lived a little more than a year ago.

As I see it, the point for inquiry and speculation is the attitude M. Vyshinsky will assume at Paris in ten days' time.

[Ottawa], May 16, 1949

Attached are copies of six U.S. Department of State memoranda† dated March 15th, March 21st, April 5th, April 11th, April 27th and April 29th, respectively, reporting Jessup's conversations with Malik regarding the lifting of the Berlin blockade and the convening of the Council of Foreign Ministers.

These documents I received yesterday, by hand, from McNaughton. They were given to McNaughton and Ignatieff by Rusk with the definite understanding that this arrangement was entirely personal and not on the record. It was further understood that the papers would be transmitted for your information but Rusk particularly asked that they should not be alluded to in any way, since the State Department wished to reserve the right to deny that copies had been given to the Canadian government. In particular, Rusk asked that knowledge of our possessing these documents should not reach the United Kingdom and French governments; he said that no other Delegation had been given these notes nor the information contained in them. I have assured McNaughton in my acknowledgement that we will see that his understanding with Rusk is complied with in every particular.

The memoranda are very interesting. I read them yesterday. In general they confirm the reports which we have received. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the accounts is the degree of care which Malik obviously felt bound to take before reaching agreement with Jessup, even on the least detail. It seems to me too that this record of the conversations is good evidence of a new strength of the Western position, in dealing with Soviet representatives. Jessup apparently held the line in every particular and the Soviet negotiator had to meet him eventually on all Jessup's main points.

The account emphasizes too the difficulties arising purely from the problem of translation, particularly when coupled with ingrained suspicion on both sides.

If you will return these documents when you have read them I propose to show them to Reid and one or two others and then put them away in the safe.

Ottawa, October 7, 1949

Sir,

On September 29 we received from the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office here a memorandum commenting on some views expressed by the Australian Government on the United Kingdom's proposal to leave the Berlin question on the Security Council Agenda. I attach a copy of this memorandum.†

2. Commonwealth Relations Office telegram Q. No. 9 of August 27, which was forwarded to you as telegram No. 672 of September 2, 1949,† refers to this.

3. The recent breakdown of four power talks in Berlin made public on September 28, offers sufficient justification for taking the attitude that "the serious situation which has arisen as the result of the unilateral imposition by the Government of the U.S.S.R. of restrictions on transportation and communications between the Western Zones of occupation in Germany and Berlin", as it was described in the original complaint lodged with the Secretary General last year, still exists to a considerable extent.

4. It is our tentative opinion that from the point of view of East-West relations there is little to choose between the two courses being canvassed. The decisive consideration would seem to be that the removal of the Berlin item from the Agenda would have a bad psychological effect on the people of Berlin and very little mollifying effect on the Soviet delegations in New York.

5. On balance therefore, we would favour the retention of the Berlin item on the Security Council Agenda.

6. Before informing the United Kingdom authorities of our attitude, I should be grateful for your comments on the tentative opinion expressed above.

New York, October 21, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 861 of 7 October concerning the Berlin question on the Security Council agenda.

2. It would seem to me that no useful purpose would be achieved by removing the Berlin question from the agenda of the Security Council at this time. Such initiative by the Western Powers would not do much, if anything, to improve East-West relations or the atmosphere of this session of the General Assembly. As I am unable to see any other reason why we should, at this time, decide to take such action, I would think that it would be advisable not to do so.

3. There would appear to be sufficient justification for keeping the Security Council seized of this matter, as you have pointed out in your despatch, in view of the current situation in Berlin arising from the uncooperative attitude of the Soviet authorities. Though removing the item from the Council's agenda would not prevent the three Western Powers referring to the United Nations any fresh restrictions which may be imposed by the Soviet Government, it is, I think, tactically better to keep the Security Council seized of this matter now by taking no action to remove the item from the agenda, than to have to refer this subject afresh to the Security Council at a later time. The latter course might heighten tension undesirably throughout the world, and the Western Powers would have to explain their case in some detail before the Security Council decided to become seized of the subject once again. In other words, there is greater flexibility to be gained in taking no action on this matter.

4. The mere fact that the Council is still seized of the Berlin question may exercise a certain degree of restraint on the actions of the Soviet authorities. More important is the almost certain bad psychological effect which the removal of the Berlin question from the agenda of the Council would have on the people in the western zones of Berlin. Particularly at this stage in the political development of Germany, it would seem wise to avoid this. Inhabitants of western Berlin would, I think, interpret any such Security Council action as meaning that the Western Powers were satisfied that the Soviet Government had abandoned its plans to control the whole of Berlin and was at present cooperating fully there with the Western Powers. This, of course, is not true and I should think that the inhabitants of the western zones of Berlin are probably the first to realize this.

5. Finally, I would think that action taken at this time to remove the Berlin question from the Council agenda would be interpreted by the public as meaning that the Berlin question had been fully settled and that all the necessary administrative measures had already been taken by the four Powers concerned to return the city of Berlin to agreed normalcy. This is not so. The recent breakdown of the Four Power Talks in Berlin on 28 September was made public. Thus the public might be confused if the Western Powers chose this particular time to remove the Berlin question from the Council's agenda.

6. This matter has been discussed with the United States and United Kingdom delegations recently. The United States had felt under some obligation to remove the Berlin item from the Council's agenda at some stage, if things there went well. However, the United States has recently reconsidered their view, and decided, in conjunction with the French and United Kingdom Governments, not to raise at this time the question of dropping the Berlin item from the Council's agenda.

7. The present course is to let sleeping dogs lie.

I have, etc.

Atomic Energy.

On the morning of Tuesday, 8th February, I had a private and informal talk with the United Kingdom delegation on plans for a meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission as well as for the Six-Power talks. Shone,¹ Lawford,² Falla³ and Cole⁴ were present on the United Kingdom side. Ignatieff and Starnes were with me. It appeared that the United Kingdom delegation are still trying to clarify the views of the various delegations here before requesting specific instructions from London. They stressed that they wish to regard the question of the meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission and its programme of work in the context of the over-all position which now exists between the Western Powers and the Soviet Union. Their thought is to maintain the unity of approach on the part of the Western Powers which, in their opinion, might be impaired if debates took place before views had been inter-changed and correlated between the Western Powers.

2. For my part, I indicated that I was indeed glad to have an opportunity of inter-changing views and fully appreciated the importance of maintaining unity among the Western Powers. I took the occasion to point out that the Assembly resolution required that the Commission should meet and that, at the next Assembly, we would be in a most unfortunate position if we had not used our best endeavours to carry out what was clearly the intent of the great majority of the members of the United Nations. I pointed out that we were only required to undertake work which we deem to be "practicable" and "useful" and, in this connection, I said that I thought that at this time it would be useful and practicable to undertake a consolidation and clarification of the majority proposals contained in the three reports of the Atomic Energy Commission. I said that I thought some "principles" as devised by Derosé might well evolve from this process of clarification (see my savingsgram No. 1 of 28th January, 1949).† Further, as the Soviet delegates had repeatedly raised the possibilities of approaching closer to agreement with the majority view in the consideration of the question of quotas, I thought it was essential that we should not deny the Soviet representative an opportunity to explain fully what they had in mind. I said that I fully shared the views expressed by Derosé that it would not be useful to proceed with the consideration of "staffing or organization" at this time. I emphasized that we were anxious to have further private meetings to try to harmonize our views, but I did feel that the calling of the Atomic Energy Commission should not be unduly delayed.

Atomic Energy Commission.

1. We have been considering the plan of work for the Commission's forthcoming sessions outlined in your Savingsgram No. 1 of January 28.† I fully agree with your comments in your telegram No. 152 of February 10.

2. In these sessions of the Commission we must try to clear the ground for the six-power talks that will follow and I think this is the only justification for postponing the six-power talks, as the Assembly resolution of November 4 clearly implies that these talks should have priority and that the Commission as a whole should meet while the talks are proceeding. I suppose the Commission's first task will be the consolidation of its three previous reports, largely for the education of the new members of the Commission but also to provide an opportunity for the U.S.S.R. to make more specific proposals than they have been prepared to do in the past. I should think it might also be useful, if you agree, for the Commission to make a well-documented comparison, point by point, of the area of agreement and disagreement between the Soviet proposals and the majority recommendations, in preparation for the six-power talks.

3. After rewriting the Commission's reports and documenting the area of disagreement, the Commission would logically turn to a discussion of its future agenda under the heading of items which it would be "practicable and useful" to discuss. Again, I think the choice should be made from items which might give the six-power talks as clear a start as possible. In view of the definite conclusions of the third report, I doubt the usefulness of any further discussion in the Commission on the organization of an international control agency. To break new ground, there are a number of important questions mentioned at the end of the second report which have hardly been touched and could be developed by the Commission. I would hope that the U.S. delegate would be prepared to state his position not only on "quotas" but also on "stages" and possibly "strategic locations". I agree with the point made by de Rose as reported in your Savingsgram No. 1, paragraph 3.⁵ If you agree that a discussion of "stages" would help the western position in the eyes of the world, and test the sincerity of the Soviet delegate to say what sort of international control he thinks should be brought into effect with the signing of a convention prohibiting atomic weapons, you might suggest it to Osborn.

4. As you know from Mr. Heeney's letter of January 10,[†] asking for your comments on a draft letter to our Chiefs of Staff Committee, we attach great importance to the six-power talks and are reviewing our whole position in regard to the international control of atomic energy. We may reach no fresh conclusion but in the meantime we do not want to prejudice our position in the talks by categorical statements of principle in the Commission. I agree with your view that the Commission should if possible confine its discussions to specific proposals in the hope that the six-power talks may later be able to bridge the gap of principle.

5. The Soviet Union will undoubtedly take every opportunity we give them to use a negative attitude on the part of the Western Powers in the Commission as an important argument in their current "peace offensive". As discussion in the Assembly at Paris showed, our stand has been misrepresented not only by the Soviet Union but by others who should have known better. The U.S.S.R. draft Resolution

De Rose was of the opinion that for tactical reasons it would be a mistake to continue discussion of the organization of an international control agency after it had been so clearly stated in the Commission's Third Report that this matter could only [be] studied in light of agreement on a plan of control. He argued that the only subjects that could be usefully discussed at the Commission at this stage were clearly political in character. While aware of the difficulties which could arise from discussion of political matters, nevertheless de Rose thought that two particularly important matters should be discussed: (a) the question of the quotas of material and installations to be assigned under the treaty to signatory states; (b) the various stages at which the control arrangements called for under an international treaty would be put into operation. De Rose thought the initiative to develop the discussion of quotas should be left to the U.S.S.R. on the grounds that this was one of the matters which the Soviet Government's representatives had indicated on a number of occasions that they were prepared to discuss.

submitted to the Security Council on February 8 is a reiteration of their propaganda theme. There is no reason why we must be put in the defensive position of seeming to be opposed to reaching any form of agreement with the Russians that will provide for genuine international security. As you pointed out in your telegram No. 153 of February 9,† atomic weapons cannot simply be prohibited; they must be controlled for peaceful uses according to an agreed plan which only the Soviet Union and her satellites refuse to accept. We must be able to fence with olive branches as well as they.

6. In the sessions of the Commission, you will, I know, continue your moderate and patient approach that will give the Soviet delegate no propaganda openings, that will intimate to the other members that we regard agreement as still a possibility, and that we are leaving no stone unturned to reach it.

7. During the past three years you have played a distinguished part in the Commission's discussions which have for the most part been technical. I feel that the work of the Commission has now reached the stage when we should be thinking at least as much about the propaganda effect of our proposals as of the technical aspects. When the six-power talks begin, I should like the Western Powers to take the offensive by holding up to the world not only the possible price of failure but the enormous potentialities in all fields of human welfare for all peoples if the Soviet Union had not stood in the way of successful international control. We could show in concrete terms what atomic energy could reasonably be expected to do for the peoples of the world toward raising their standards of living. This carrot might be more effective in overcoming Soviet resistance to our scheme of control than the stick which we have been using. You might see what your colleagues from the Western Powers think of such an approach and of developing it during the six-power talks if the ground has been suitably prepared at the sessions of the Commission during the next few weeks.

8. I should be glad to have your comments.

New York, March 1, 1949

Reference your teletype No. 169 of 16th February 1949. Atomic Energy Commission.

I have been considering your very useful views on the plan of work of the Atomic Energy Commission and should like to submit the following preliminary comments in accordance with your request in paragraph 8.

2. We appear to be of the same mind as to the Commission's first task and you will have noted from my report on the first of the resumed meetings of the Commission, contained in teletype No. 190 of 19th February,† that in fact our idea as to the preparatory work of consolidating the Commission's previous reports and of preparing a well-documented comparison between the Soviet and majority proposals, together with an index to all existing United Nations atomic energy documents, has been put in train through the Secretariat being asked to prepare preliminary working papers. The first drafts of these papers have now been sent to you for your consideration.

3. I have likewise agreed with the view contained in your companion teletype No. 170 of 16th February,† that the Soviet proposals on "simultaneous" prohibition and control conventions should be further examined in the Commission, despite their previous rejection. I have spoken in this sense at the second of the resumed series on Atomic Energy Commission meetings reported in my teletype No. 217 of 26th February.†

4. As to the choice of subjects for discussion on the future agenda of the Commission, the present situation is that the Western Powers have so far been unable in their private consultations to come to a definite agreement as to what should be done in accordance with the Assembly resolution of 4th November as to what it would be "practicable and useful" to discuss. The difficulties which have been encountered are not, of course, so much a question of the selection of topics, but of agreement as to the principal objectives of the present stage of the Commission's work and their relation to the Six-Power consultations which are to take place this year. It is with an appreciation of these difficulties that I have stressed the necessity of a consolidation and clarification of the Commission's majority and minority reports as a step which must be regarded as preliminary to evolving a programme of future work, and particularly of reaching agreement as to the objectives which should be sought in the Six-Power talks.

5. In paragraph 4 of your teletype No. 169, you suggest that discussion in the Commission should be confined to specific proposals "in the hope that the Six-Power talks may later be able to bridge the gap of principle". My opinion, which is certainly shared by the representatives of France, China, the United Kingdom, the United States and Norway, is that the basic approach to the problem of the international control of atomic energy of the Soviet Union as compared with that of the majority is not capable of being bridged in principle. On the one hand, we have a system which starts from the inescapable technical fact that there is no difference in fissionable materials for war or for peaceful use, and which therefore prescribes that the "dangerous" activities in atomic energy should be taken out of national and placed under effective international control. On the other hand, the Soviet proposes a scheme based upon national operation of all atomic facilities, subject only to "periodic" or "special" international inspection and to international agreement not to use atomic energy for war. Between these two basic positions it is not in my opinion possible to find a basis of compromise.

6. Moreover, it is evident that the Soviet objective at the present time remains to disarm the United States of the atomic weapon and thus decrease the potential industrial and technological superiority of the western nations and proportionately to increase the effectiveness in war of the Soviet armed masses. In pursuit of this objective, the Soviet Union is trying to merge the problems of atomic energy control with those of disarmament generally and also to place the onus of the responsibility for failure in reaching agreement on atomic energy control upon the United States, on the grounds that the majority proposals for the control of atomic energy were put forward in bad faith and with the expectation of their being rejected by the Soviet Union.

7. In the present circumstances, it seems to me that it is important to carry to our public a real knowledge of the situation and, to this end, it is necessary that the Western Powers should concentrate upon restating and clarifying their position, especially in regard to their proposals for control to show conclusively that they represent means through which it will be possible to share atomic energy development among all nations while safeguarding nations effectively against secret preparations for atomic war.

8. In consequence, in my opinion, the discussions in the Atomic Energy Commission, conducted in the open, after appropriate preparation with our friends, should be mainly directed to (a) clarifying and restating the majority position, and (b) examining and revealing the defects in the alternative scheme which the Soviet Union is advocating. In this approach I do not think it would be useful, at this time, to take up such questions as stages and strategic locations. To discuss the stages of transition from national to international control is to discuss the timing of the process whereby the United States is divested of its atomic secrets and the Soviet Union is penetrated by international inspectors. No progress is likely to be made towards agreement on these difficult and contentious questions in the absence of acceptance by the Soviet of the fundamental features of the controls which would make it safe for the United States to relinquish its present monopoly.

9. I do not think that discussion of "stages" at this time would have the effect of testing the sincerity of the Soviet. On the contrary, it would put the Soviet at a decided advantage from a propaganda standpoint as they would be able to argue, as they have argued, that no stages are required but that all atomic energy activities should be subject to controls established "simultaneously" with the ratification and coming into effect of international agreements for prohibition and control. Stages, and also arrangements about strategic locations, have been assumed all along by the United States to be regarded as a test of the good faith and goodwill of all nations participating in an international agreement. The Soviet Union no doubt would continue to assure in advance that their faith could be so counted upon that "stages" were unnecessary and to argue that United States insistence on "stages" was merely a device to prolong its monopoly.

10. Further private consultations are planned between delegations and will probably be held on the initiative of the United Kingdom delegation which assumed the chairmanship of the Commission today, 1st March. The Secretariat draft papers, referred to in paragraph 2, will also be discussed in these private meetings preliminary to their consideration in one of the Commission committees. In the Commission itself it seems probable that discussion will continue on the Soviet proposals. It seems to me that the first point to establish is whether this latest proposal envisages any acceptance of those elements of control endorsed by the General Assembly in Paris.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The Atomic Energy Commission met on March 15, after two postponements because of the illness of the U.S.S.R. representative, Jacob Malik. As this was the first meeting of the Commission since the replacement of Molotov by Vishinsky, we were interested to see whether the Russians would in any way modify their stand. They did not. Malik's statement made it clear that we cannot expect the U.S.S.R. to budge from the position they have taken on the international control of atomic energy.

Malik then went on to attack General McNaughton for the "hostile attitude" he showed to the Soviet proposals when he spoke about them at the Commission's meeting on February 25. "The Canadian delegate discounted in advance," Malik said, "any possibility of reaching agreement on this important problem."

What General McNaughton had actually said, after reminding the Commission that the General Assembly had overwhelmingly defeated a similar Soviet proposal in Paris, was that he would nevertheless "be happy to see this U.S.S.R. proposal referred to one of our committees for more detailed examination, so that we may again have the opportunity of marshalling the arguments which have been adduced against it and make it clear to the nations of the world." (The complete text of General McNaughton's statement on the Soviet proposals is attached.†)

Atomic Energy Commission.

1. You will have noted from paragraph 3 of our teletype No. 312 of 18th March,† the opinion (which I share) expressed by de Rose (France) that the main arguments made by Malik (U.S.S.R.) at the last meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission should, from the point of view of public opinion, be answered, and in the Commission itself. I am proposing, therefore, when the Commission next meets 22nd March, to take the opportunity to refute the main arguments advanced by Malik in the following sense:

(a) To demonstrate the inconsistency of his argument, which ran through his whole statement, that the United States, in putting forward its proposals for the international control of atomic energy, had done so in the knowledge and hope that they would be rejected, and the argument that the United States was at the same time attempting to establish a super-national monopolistic control over atomic energy.

(b) To show the fallacy of the Soviet representative's contention that his proposals which are now before the Commission have been submitted by his Government in order to meet the views of a majority of the members of the General Assembly. In fact, this is the fourth time in five months that these self-same proposals have been placed before various bodies in the United Nations and on all previous occasions have been rejected decisively.

(c) To compare the proposals advanced by the majority, which have been developed in the course of detailed examination over a period of three years, with the proposals of the Soviet representative for conventions on prohibition and control, which are a mere repetition without change in the proposals first advanced by the Soviet Union in June 1946 and 1947, respectively.

(d) To show, contrary to the Soviet representative's contention, that my proposal to refer his draft resolution to the Working Committee was made for the very purpose of determining if there is any substance to the Soviet Government's proposal, and not for some ulterior motive as he suggested. At the same time, I propose to repeat the suggestion again.⁶

Atomic Energy Commission.

1. The arguments which you indicate in your telegram No. 326 you propose to use today when replying to Malik's charges are very similar to those which we had discussed here. Our chief regret, and I think we should say so before the Commission, is that Malik's statement gave us no encouragement whatsoever for hoping that the U.S.S.R. might be prepared to put forward fresh proposals rather than repeating in more extreme language the old worn-out arguments which have been rejected by the great majority of the United Nations.

⁶ Une dépêche subséquente (no. 119 du 23 mars 1949) indique l'occasion de présenter cette déclaration n'a pas eu lieu.

A later despatch (No. 119 of March 23, 1949) indicates that an opportunity did not present itself to make this statement.

2. Malik's particular charge against you, that you were prejudging his proposals and condemning them before they were discussed, should be countered by repeating that the Soviet resolution introduced to the Commission on February 25 contains nothing new and that Malik's statement in support of it on March 15 did not add to the statements made by the Soviet representative since June 1947. In addition to the points mentioned in your telegram No. 326, I think, if you agree, that you should ask Malik how he proposes to define the rights of the International Commission or Authority in relation to "special" inspection on suspicion. Surely one of the most vulnerable points in the armour of the Soviet argument is that they are prepared to accept international inspection only "periodically" or "in cases where suspicions of violations" are reported by governments or by the International Control Commission. The answers given by the Soviet representative in his letter of September 5, 1947, to the United Kingdom representative and the further statement of the Soviet representative on April 5, 1948, together with Malik's statement last week, leave so many questions unanswered that it should not be difficult to show that we have not been acting in bad faith in proposing international control.

3. I do not think we should be made to appear reluctant to debate the substance of the Soviet proposals formally in the Commission itself, nor should we, on the other hand, allow the Soviet representative to delay the reference of his resolution to the Working Committee, as you proposed.

4. I know your views on "stages", but after Malik's gross misrepresentation of U.S. intentions, I wonder if you might not encourage General Osborn to refute the Soviet charges of U.S. delaying tactics even though this will mean that the United States will have to indicate in more precise terms than heretofore what they mean by stages. To the uninitiated, it seems to me, one of the most serious Soviet charges is that the majority proposals in their present form could mean that the United States would give up nothing during the first stage while demanding control and inspection rights within the Soviet Union and that this first stage could be prolonged indefinitely. In any case, there will be no need for you to mention stages in your statement today and I leave it to your discretion as to whether you should make any suggestions to General Osborn.

New York, April 4, 1949

Sir,

1. I should like to report further on one or two matters which were discussed at the private and informal meeting held on 2 April between the representatives of Canada, China, France, the United Kingdom and the United States, the main points of which were reported to you in my teletype No. 391 of 2 April.†

2. In the discussion which led to agreement that the representatives of the United States and France would, during the next three or four weeks, draft a few simple and essential principles to be used as the basis for the six-power consultations, de Rose again stressed the importance, from the point of view of informing the public, of approaching the problem from a new angle. De Rose argued it was essential that the six-power talks should be devoted to an attempt to reach agreement from a different angle, and in such a way that if agreement were not reached, the reasons for this could be clearly explained to the public and to the General Assembly. He suggested that the proposal he originally made in January 1949 of reducing the majority proposals to a few simple and essential principles was the best method to achieve this end. In his opinion if, as it was expected, the six-power talks are not able to break the present impasse, the account of those negotiations should be so clear that the General Assembly could have no alternative but to approve the manner in which the discussions were conducted and to recommend suspension of the Commission. The substance of the debates on atomic energy in the next regular session of the General Assembly, de Rose contended, should be not on the merits of the majority proposals, which have already received the approval of the General Assembly, but should be on the merits of the efforts of the majority to reach agreement with the Soviet Union during 1949.

3. In discussing de Rose's proposals a number of interesting comments were made by the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom in relation to the question of ownership. The United Kingdom representative said that his Government had been giving consideration to the idea of making a concession to the Soviet Union in the six-power talks. They had in mind making concessions on the question of "ownership". It would be the thought of the United Kingdom Government in making such a concession that it would only be put forward in the belief that it would be denied by the U.S.S.R. and that the Soviet Government's refusal would then be a valuable weapon to use in the atomic energy debates at the next regular session of the General Assembly. De Rose was of the opinion it would be unfortunate to attempt to approach the question of ownership directly. He thought “ownership” could be developed into one of the principles which he proposed should form the basis of discussion in the six-power talks. De Rose pointed out that management normally was considered an attribute of ownership. It would be possible therefore, he contended, to raise the question of ownership in the six-power talks developing the idea into a simple principle. Although there was general agreement with de Rose’s opinion there seemed to be little support for the United Kingdom suggestion.

4. The United States representative said his Government, and in particular the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, with whom he had recently discussed this question, felt very strongly that no concessions should be made at this time. For tactical reasons the United States Government considers it would be unwise to give the appearance of making any concessions to the U.S.S.R. at this time. The United States representative said that at a recent meeting which had been held in New York of the various United States Government advisers on atomic energy, at which were present Oppenheimer, Tolman, Conant, Groves, Farrell, Nichols and Arneson, there was general agreement that a continuation of negotiations in the Atomic Energy Commission in the present circumstances was not only dangerous but dishonest. They were of one mind that the Soviet Union was actively engaged in making war against the countries of the free world, and this therefore was not a time for concessions.

5. Quite apart, however, from political considerations, Osborn pointed out that there were certain new technical developments which changed the situation. The stockpiles of nuclear fuel had in 1946 been relatively small. Today however these stockpiles were very large and could not be easily disposed of. The practical problem of disposing of large quantities of nuclear fuel made the position of the United States on the question of international control different from what it was two years ago. The United States Government, therefore, would prefer to suspend the activities of the Commission until the Soviet Government give some convincing evidence of wishing to reach genuine agreement. If and when that were to take place, it would be the intention to begin negotiations afresh. This is not to say Osborn said that they would not take into account the work which has been done by the Acheson-Lilienthal Commission⁷ and by the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission, but any agreement would, they feel, in the circumstances have to be negotiated on a different basis. It is the view of the United States Government, Osborn said, that if we were to drop ownership now, or even to suggest that ownership might be dropped, it would enormously weaken their bargaining position. This did not mean, he added, that the United States at the proper time would not be prepared to work out the terms of a treaty which would take into account whatever reservations which some of the countries who would be party to that treaty might have in relation to ownership. It was, he explained, a matter of simply not wishing to have any further emphasis placed on the question at this time.

New York, May 25, 1949

The Atomic Energy Commission, at its 22nd meeting, Wednesday, 25th May, decided to refer the Soviet proposal for the conclusion and implementation of two draft conventions on prohibition of atomic weapons and for international control respectively to the Working Committee, together with the Assembly resolution of 4th November, for further detailed study.

2. The referral of the Soviet proposal was agreed upon without objection but both Malik and Tarasenko objected to the transmitting of the Assembly's resolution of 4th November to the Working Committee as the Soviets had opposed that resolution in the Assembly.

3. At the outset of the meeting Malik made a statement along familiar lines quoting liberally from Blackett, charging the majority of the Commission with delaying tactics mainly aimed at preventing the prohibition of atomic weapons. Tarasenko also made a statement in which he tried to explain away the misrepresentations of my remarks at Mount Holyoke College which he had made at a previous meeting of the Commission and to which I had taken objection. In the circumstances, in view of these two statements, I made a brief intervention, the text of which is contained in my immediately following message en clair.†

4. I also give the text of Malik's comment on my statement made with the evident intention, as always, of getting in the last word.

Your telegrams 685 and 686.†

I think your remarks to the Atomic Energy Commission were very well taken. Although, as you say, Malik managed to have the last word, his remarks were less offensive than usual. His statement fits the current Soviet mood of conciliation which may even be carried into the Six Powers Talks.

Unfortunately the United Nations' press release AC/201† reported you as saying that the Canadian Delegation would give more careful consideration to Soviet proposals, rather than most careful consideration, as reported in your telegram No. 686, and this misquotation has been reflected in a number of press releases.

Early next week I shall let you have my comments on the French and United States drafts for the Six Powers Talks forwarded under cover of your despatch No. 208 of May 24.† My preliminary reaction is, like yours, to favour the more moderate tone of the joint United States-French draft, although it appears somewhat loose in form and wording, perhaps intentionally.

1. As I stated in my telegram No. 498 of May 31, I prefer the DeRose-Osborn joint draft but have a number of comments to make on both the U.S. and the joint drafts. We had begun work on our own version of the joint draft but as you say it has been considerably revised and is to be discussed at a meeting this afternoon, I thought you would prefer to have my comments now.

2. Speaking generally, I am not yet convinced that we should subscribe to the U.S. Government's opinion, as reported in your telegram No. 565 of May 4,† that the primary objective of the Six Power Talks would be to prove the futility of continuing the work of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission. No doubt I shall be convinced by the course of the discussions during the Six Power Talks, and I fully expect, as you do, that they will fail; but there is still widespread hope throughout the world that they will not, as was demonstrated last November in Paris by the unwillingness of the smaller nations to allow the Atomic Energy Commission to be discontinued. The UN Assembly wanted the six sponsoring powers to make a genuine effort to start again from, so far as possible, a fresh point of view in our efforts to reach agreement on the international control of atomic energy. I therefore welcome DeRose's initiative in proposing that the discussions should be on "principles" rather than on the technical level, although we must obviously base our principles squarely on the technical conclusions reached after so much study and discussion in the Commission. For this reason the use of language taken from the Commission's three reports to express the principles which are to form a basis of discussion seems to me wise, as it keeps our principles closely tethered to facts, but I do not think we need invariably stick to the literal text of the Commission's reports where an alternative wording would be clearer or smoother.

3. Osborn's draft seems to be rather too obvious an attempt to force the Soviet Union from the outset of the Six Power Talks into a purely negative position. From the propaganda point of view alone, I think this attempt might well backfire.

4. If our statement of principles is to carry conviction, it must be an eminently reasonable expression in the clearest language, shorn of all technicalities and references to the text of the Commission's previous reports, of the minimum requirements we regard as essential for the international control of atomic energy. The references which appear throughout the text in both the U.S. and joint drafts are useful while we are discussing the paper among ourselves, but should, I think, be deleted before our statement of principles is presented to the public.

5. I am not quite sure whether it is desirable to omit from the joint draft the most contentious questions—such as ownership, locations, quotas and stages. These questions would have to be worked out during any subsequent discussion of a treaty. It might conceivably accord with current Soviet tactics for them to agree to our principles only to return to their former intransigence when discussing the working of a possible draft treaty, having reaped most of the credit for an agreement on principles which would be bound to break down during treaty negotiations. For example, the Soviet Government could accept the first principle of the joint draft as it stands without having the least intention of accepting what they know perfectly well to be our definition of inspection. I think we must make clear in the draft what we mean by inspection to test the true intentions of the Soviet Government. Even in its present form, I think the chances of the joint draft being acceptable to the Soviet Union are remote. The more reasonable a document they have to refuse, the greater our propaganda victory.

6. I would be prepared to approve the joint draft in its present form, in spite of these weaknesses, if that is the wish of the French, U.S. and U.K. delegations, and I hope you will express our thanks to DeRose and Osborn for the excellent work already done.

Atomic Energy.

1. Yesterday following the 48th meeting of the Working Committee the delegations of Canada, China, France, the United Kingdom and the United States had an opportunity to discuss informally the future work of the Working Committee and the arrangements concerning the Six-Power consultations.

2. From the account of the 48th meeting of the Working Committee contained in United Nations press release No. AC/206 of 9th June,† and from the copy of the verbatim record† which I am sending you by diplomatic bag, you will see that the Committee is continuing discussion of Items 3 and 4 on the agenda (the Soviet proposal and the Assembly resolution of November 4th, 1948) and that no vote was taken at yesterday's meeting on the draft resolution submitted by the representative of China on the Soviet proposal (document AEC/C.1/82).† It was agreed that before coming to a decision on the draft resolution submitted by the representative of China the Committee would hear the statement which the representative of Ukrainian S.S.R. wishes to make at the next meeting of the Committee, which is scheduled to meet at 10.30 a.m., 15th June. During the course of the discussion the representative of Cuba made the suggestion that as the Working Committee appeared to have exhausted any further useful discussion, it might be well if the Committee were to adopt a resolution suspending its work until the six sponsoring Powers had consulted to determine if there exists a basis for agreement. The Cuban representative's suggestion commended itself to the five delegations and it was agreed that the United States representative might encourage the Cuban representative to present a resolution along the lines which he had indicated. It would be the intention, therefore, after hearing whatever further comments the representative of the Ukrainian S.S.R. may have to make on Item 3 of the agenda to put the Chinese draft resolution to a vote and after that to consider the suggestion that the Working Committee should suspend its work until the six sponsoring Powers have met. If the suggestion to suspend the work of the Working Committee was agreed to, presumably this and any other matters on which the Working Committee has reached a decision would then be reported to the Atomic Energy Commission.

3. Concerning the arrangements which the five delegations suggested might govern the Six-Power consultations reported to you in my despatch No. 231 of 4th June,† the United States representative advised us that the State Department had made two preliminary comments. The first comment related to the manner in which the meeting of the sponsoring Powers might be convened. The State Department have suggested that rather than having one or more members of the majority of the sponsoring Powers invite a meeting of the six sponsoring Powers, it might be more appropriate to have this done by the Secretary-General. It was suggested that the Secretary-General might be asked to circulate a letter to the six sponsoring Powers referring to his previous letter of 9th January, 1949.† As to the suggestion that the statement of principles might be presented at the opening meeting of the sponsoring Powers, some members of the State Department have expressed the view that such procedure would be interpreted by the Soviet Union as facing them with a "diktat" and would be so represented by their propaganda. As an alternative they have suggested that the opening meetings might be given over to a preliminary discussion of certain main topics such as stages, quotas and ownership, and that the statement of principles would only be presented to the Soviet Union after some of these principal issues of disagreement had been discussed between the majority and minority.

4. The representative of France reported that he had received indications from the representative of Norway that the Norwegians have been unwilling to intervene in the discussions since they had become members of the Atomic Energy Commission because they were uncertain as to the course which the five sponsoring Powers proposed to follow in these consultations with the Soviet Union. The Norwegian representative indicated that he had been unable to take any active part in the discussion as he did not know what would be the basis of their consultations. For this reason De Rose suggested it might be wise to inform the representatives of Cuba, Egypt and Norway, without going into detail, of the approach which the five sponsoring Powers propose to make to the Soviet Union in the Six-Power talks. It was decided to hold a meeting of all the members of the Atomic Energy Commission except the Ukrainian S.S.R. and the U.S.S.R. to discuss the future work of the Working Committee next Tuesday. It was agreed therefore that this meeting would provide an appropriate opportunity to give an indication of our intentions to these delegations. It was also agreed that it might be appropriate to explain to them the difficulties of holding the Six-Power consultations before early July owing to the meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers. It was also agreed that this information should be made only to these delegations orally.

Ottawa, July 1, 1949

Your telegrams Nos. 771,† 772,† and 773† of June 24, and No. 784† of June 29: Atomic Energy Six Power Talks.

1. Date of next AEC meeting. From your telegram No. 772 I infer that it has been decided that the AEC should meet on July 7. This would be a suitable date for General McNaughton who suggests a preliminary informal meeting of the five delegations on the afternoon of July 6. A meeting on July 5 would be possible for General McNaughton but would make it necessary for him to drive through holiday traffic.

2. U.S. draft resolution. We are not entirely in agreement with the wording of Osborn's draft. a) The number of times the Commission has met this year might be omitted as the total is not impressive. (b) If ownership must be mentioned, it might be better to do so indirectly as was done in paragraph 6(a) of the statement of principles forwarded under cover of your despatch No. 231 of June 4. (c) Perhaps the statement that the differences among members of the Commission are "irreconcilable at the Commission level" should come as a conclusion of the resolution. (d) The resolution should, we think, be self-contained and self-explanatory. The reference to the third report of the Commission might therefore be deleted, as also the emphasis placed upon the unfinished sections of the Commission's plan of work by using the word "particularly".

3. We have given very serious consideration to Osborn's suggestion of joint sponsorship. Apart from our reservations as to the wording of the resolution in its present form, I think it might be more appropriate if (a) the Commission passed a resolution simply combining the resolutions of the Working Committee meeting of June 15 and (b) the resolution were either introduced by one delegation or by all five of the Western delegations jointly. I am afraid that the resolution in the terms of Osborn's draft might produce another unfavourable statement from the Norwegian delegate and possibly from others who were somewhat reluctant to approve the Chinese resolution in the Working Committee.

4. Procedure for Six Powers Talks. I am in general agreement with the procedure Osborn suggested for the Secretary General to issue invitations to a meeting of the six sponsoring powers to be held as soon as possible after July 15. Although this matter might conveniently be discussed at the informal meeting on July 6, I think each of the 5 delegations should write separately to the Secretary General referring to his letter of January 9, 1949, and indicating that we think the time has come for a meeting to be called, in view of the decision of the Working Committee on June 15.

5. Statement of Principles. The suggestions put forward by Shone and de Rose are, I think, useful. In detail I have the following comments, referring to paragraphs on statement of principles.

(a) I agree with both Shone's and de Rose's amendments of paragraph 5a;

(b) We have no objection to deletion of second sentence in paragraph 6a, provided the United States delegate agrees with our view that the first sentence is comprehensive. However, United States cannot be pressed too far in eliminating the concept of ownership from our essential principles.

(c) We agree with de Rose's suggestion to use "should" throughout the paper.

(d) We would be reluctant to see the heading of section D changed by deleting references to Commission's studies. Although I am in favour of emphasizing the "new approach" as far as we can, we must not forget the United States delegation will have to justify its stand largely on the basis of there being no essential changes in their position as recorded in the Commission's reports. If this can be implied in our draft of principles we shall be able to give greater emphasis to the "new approach" in the discussion without disquieting American opinion.

(e) Similarly, I would prefer to leave the word "national" in paragraph 4a but I agree that "this international system" is an improvement.

(f) We should rather omit from paragraph 4b only the words "parties to the treaty".

(g) We agree to omit the words "to be held in trust" from the title of section 6.

(h) In view of our position as a uranium source, we regard the retention of paragraph 6c as highly important and do not think it need give rise to detailed discussion in the Six Powers Talks which, we agree, would be inappropriate and confusing.

6. I am still uncertain as to whether the statement of principles should be introduced early or late in the course of the Six Powers talks. Probably we should wait to see how the first meeting of the six develops but I am at present inclined to favour the use of the principles at an early stage, as suggested by Shone, as I fear we should be more open to the criticism of presenting a diktat if we used them only at a later stage and the Soviet delegate would have little time to comment on them or to put up an alternative draft.

7. The statement of principles would also serve, I believe, as a useful programme of work for the Six Powers talks which, without it, would be bound to start from the impasse reached in the Atomic Energy Commission. I think the other points in favour of using the statement of principles mentioned in my telegram No. 501 of June 3 remain valid.

Atomic Energy.

The private meeting mentioned in paragraph 8 of my teletype No. 808 of 7th July, † was held on 11th July in the offices of the United States Mission, between Austin, Osborn, Ross and Russell of the United States delegation, and Ignatieff, Starnes and myself.

2. I made it clear at the outset that our views did not represent any final position and that, in my opinion, the meeting afforded an opportunity for an informal exchange of ideas on the question of a meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission and the six power consultations. Austin and Osborn made it plain they were strongly in favour of a meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission being held before the six power consultations, with a view to adopting a resolution along the lines of the draft resolution referred to you under cover of my teletype No. 772 of 24th June. † It was not clear, however, whether the position taken by Austin and by Osborn was upon instructions from the State Department, although it was stated during the discussion that Acheson was interested in having some clear and unambiguous statement of the present position of the majority placed on the records of the Atomic Energy Commission.

3. I took the opportunity, without taking any final position, to put the following considerations before Austin concerning the draft resolution proposed by the United States delegation:

(1) Although the United States resolution represents a factual statement with which we could probably agree, it nonetheless proposes to give a judgement on the whole position of the USSR. This judgement, if given, would no doubt be used by the USSR to argue that the five delegations had entered into the six power consultations after pre-judging the whole situation. We would thus provide them with a ready excuse for failure.

(2) It is clear from the text of the General Assembly resolution of 4th November 1948 that the Atomic Energy Commission is called upon to "survey its program of work, and to proceed to the further study of such of the subjects remaining in the program of work as it considers to be practicable and useful". The six sponsoring powers, on the other hand, are requested "to meet together and consult in order to determine if there exists a basis for agreement on the international control of atomic energy...and to report to the General Assembly the results of their consultations not later than the next regular session". Since the Atomic Energy Commission was merely asked to review its program of work it is, therefore, doubtful if it would be either appropriate or useful for the Commission once more to pass judgement on the situation. The request made to the six sponsoring powers, however, certainly gives them an opportunity to pass judgement and to report their conclusions to the General Assembly.

(3) The introduction of a resolution into the Atomic Energy Commission along the lines proposed by the United States delegation might have the effect of causing the discussions to proceed in two forums at the same time, as it is unlikely that a substantive resolution of the kind proposed by the United States delegation could be voted without prolonged debate.

4. As a consequence of our discussion, the United States delegation said that they would wish to take another look at their proposal. Osborn is having discussions with members of the State Department including an interview with Acheson on the 11th and 12th of July. In this connection, as a possible alternative, the United States delegation suggested (assuming the USSR does not agree to the statement of principles) that the five delegations might agree to report to the General Assembly on the six power consultations along the lines of the draft resolution which the United States delegation had proposed for submission to the Atomic Energy Commission. The steps in this alternative course of action, envisaged by the United States delegation, is as follows:

(1) No further meetings of the Atomic Energy Commission should be held before the commencement of the six power consultations. (4th November resolution of General Assembly is authority for these consultations).

(2) That the six power consultations should be held as soon as practicable. If as is expected, the consultations result in failure, the United States would hope that the five delegations would agree to submit a concise report to the General Assembly at its 4th regular session, in the terms of the United States draft resolution.

(3) That the Atomic Energy Commission might meet early in September merely to endorse the conclusions of the Working Committee and to enable the Commission to submit its report.

5. The United States delegation consider it essential that before the six power consultations begin the discrepancies in the position of the United States and French and United Kingdom delegations on the question of "ownership" should be clarified. I expressed myself as in agreement with this position.

6. As to the means by which the six powers might be called into consultation, we put forward the suggestion contained in paragraph 4 of your teletype No. 543 of 1st July, that the five delegations should write separately to the Secretary General referring to his letter of 9th January 1949, indicating we think the time has come for a meeting of the six sponsoring powers. I hope to be able to submit a draft text of such a letter for your consideration after discussion with the other four delegations.

7. It is now arranged that the United Kingdom, Chinese, United States and ourselves will meet in the United States office, Wednesday, 13th July, when presumably Osborn will report on his Washington talks.

Atomic Energy.

The meeting referred to in paragraph 7 of my message No. 821 of July 12th was held this morning between the delegations of Canada, China, the United Kingdom and the United States.

2. Osborn gave an outline of his talks in Washington, quoting from what he described to be a memorandum of these talks prepared in Washington, including his interview of an hour and a half with the Secretary of State. Apparently Acheson gave as his opinion in these talks that the United States delegation should press for an early meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission in order to adopt a resolution along the lines proposed by Osborn. Osborn said that it was Acheson's view that the United States delegation should take this action in order to clarify the position of the Atomic Energy Commission before the consultations begin, even if some doubts existed as to the amount of support which the resolution might have in the Commission. It is evidently Acheson's view that it is important that the Commission should be on record with an explanation as to why it should not continue, in order that the Assembly should be so informed. In this way it is hoped that the Assembly may refrain from opening a general debate on atomic energy until the Six Powers have reported. Osborn said that he had put before Acheson the considerations stated in my teletype under reference in favour of concentrating at this time upon the meeting of the sponsoring Powers and postponing an attempt to reach conclusions in the Atomic Energy Commission until such time as the results of the consultations were known. I am bound to note that Osborn's account of my position as he quoted it in the memorandum did not fully agree with my recollection of our discussions here. In particular, he seemed to have ascribed to me a change of position following my return to New York which, as you know from our talks in Ottawa, was not the case. On the contrary, my understanding of Osborn's intentions, when I left New York and as I described them to you in Ottawa, was to concentrate on the consultations and not (repeat not) bring the Atomic Energy Commission into the picture at this stage, save perhaps for the purely formal action of approving the work of the Working Committee. (In this connection, I would refer you to my teletype No. 747 of June 15th† and Ignatieff's teletype No. 771 of June 24th†).

3. Moreover, the views which I have expressed to Osborn have been substantially shared by Shone, as well as by the French. The Chinese representative has also, though perhaps less forcefully, shared my views. The other delegations were not consulted.

4. However, as it was evident that Osborn is now under instruction to press for a meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission at the earliest possible date (in fact, he suggests a meeting next Wednesday, July 20th), we proceeded to a discussion of amendments to his text, bearing in mind the views expressed in paragraph 2 of your teletype No. 543 of July 1st. Shone and Wei also had amendments to suggest. My immediately following teletype† contains the revised text of the United States draft resolution which Osborn proposes to put forward at the next meeting of the Atomic Energy Commission.

5. You will notice that the text, as amended, is a substantial improvement over the previous version to which our objections were stated in your teletype No. 543. It more closely follows the substance of the Chinese and joint Cuban-Argentine proposals adopted in the Working Committee, and could be regarded as an alternative draft resolution incorporating the substance of those resolutions. The present text is also more closely related to the General Assembly resolutions. I must confess that I am not entirely persuaded that the United States delegation, in pressing for a meeting of the Commission before the Six Power consultations in order to present this resolution, will not run into the kind of tactical disadvantages to which I referred in my teletype No. 821. However, assuming that a resolution of this sort is to be introduced, the text as amended does, I think, meet our objections, and I see at present no alternative but to indicate that if it is introduced, we will give it our general support. I have not (repeat not) been requested to associate myself with sponsorship of this proposal and I do not think that it would be appropriate for me to do so if I were asked.

6. I should be grateful if you could give me your comments as soon as possible and indicate whether I may support the United States draft resolution.

7. At the conclusion of the meeting there was a brief discussion about procedures concerning the consultations of the sponsoring Powers, particularly as to how these might be initiated through an approach to the Secretary General. In this connection I offered a draft of a text on the basis of your suggestion for preliminary consideration by the other three delegations. I will report further on this as soon as I have their reaction.

8. Further progress with regard to the preparations for the meeting of the sponsoring Powers now awaits the clarification of differences with the United Kingdom and French delegations on the question of "ownership". De Rose is due back tomorrow, July 14th, and I expect conversations on this matter will then proceed.

9. As regards the matter of timing, it appears that the United States view now is that the consultations should not take place until the Commission has taken its decision. Provided that decision takes the form of their resolution, it appears that they will not press for an early conclusion of the consultations; in fact Osborn indicated that they might be prepared to have the consultations continue periodically to meet a view expressed by the French (see my teletype No. 827† giving the text of de la Tournelle's letter to Osborn dated July 11th 1949).

10. In any event it seems that the United States will base their position in the General Assembly on their draft resolution which when passed by the Atomic Energy Commission they hope will be noted without discussion by the Security Council and the General Assembly. Thus the objective of the United States tactics as it appears to me is to find a way to end discussion of atomic energy in the United Nations.

Atomic Energy. Your teletypes Nos. 825 and 826† of July 13, revised U.S. draft resolution.

I share the reservations expressed in your No. 821 of July 12 concerning the efficacy of introducing such a resolution into the Atomic Energy Commission. Moreover, I do not share the U.S. view that such a resolution would be noted without discussion in the Assembly. The resolution, even in its present form, expresses a strong vote of censure on the Soviet Union and the Ukraine and, as a consequence, I think we should be prepared for at least some debate on it in the Assembly.

I am glad to note that there is no question of your having to be associated with the presentation of this resolution in the Commission. However, I am prepared to accept your judgment that, under the circumstances, we have no alternative but to indicate to the United States that if it is introduced, we shall give it our general support.

Atomic energy six Power talks.

1. At 11:30 yesterday morning the representatives of Canada, China, France, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States of America met pursuant to the General Assembly resolution of 4th November, 1948. My immediately preceding teletype† reports the prior informal meeting of the five major Powers. The Lake Success meeting was opened by Byron Price, Acting Secretary-General. The meeting went very satisfactorily, as foreseen in the informal consultations.

2. China proposed that the Chairmanship of the meeting should be rotated alphabetically and there being no objections I took my seat as Chairman of the meeting. I then made an opening statement, a copy of which is contained in immediately following teletype No. 909.†

3. In this statement I pointed out that the agenda might well be paragraph 3 of the General Assembly Resolution 191 (III) of 4th November, 1948. Tsarapkin said that he was of the opinion that if the agenda was based on the Assembly resolution which in paragraph one approved the majority plan, then the agenda should also include the U.S.S.R. resolutions of 19th June 1946, 11th June 1947 and 24th February 1949. I stressed that the agenda would not, according to my proposal consist of the whole Assembly resolution, but only of paragraph 3, and that, under this, if any delegation wished to introduce any points which would contribute to the purpose of seeking to reach agreement, they were free to do so. Tsarapkin then agreed that initially paragraph 3 of the General Assembly resolution would be the only item on the agenda.

4. With regard to interpretations, consecutive interpretation was proposed for English and French and the U.S.S.R. delegate stated that it would help him if the proceedings could be interpreted consecutively into the Russian language as well as into French and English. The Acting Secretary-General offered private "whisperer" interpretation for Russian, or simultaneous interpretation for Russian on the ear-phone system. There appeared for a while to be some danger of creating a precedent to support later claims for Russian as a working language in the United Nations but Tsarapkin finally accepted the Secretariat's proposal.

5. It was further agreed that summary records were preferable to verbatim records.

6. Although the Soviet representative suggested open meetings he agreed to the majority preference for closed sessions, at least for the time being, in order that the representatives could exchange views on a confidential basis. There was agreement that a communique be issued at the conclusion of each meeting and that the Secretariat would provide a press officer to do this. It was agreed that there be no further comment to the press by any delegation without prior consultation with the others.

7. I then requested the United States representative to give his views, which he did and which were similar to those reported in paragraph 3 of my preceding teletype No. 907. The next speaker, Cadogan, stated that he supported the United States point of view and that we should now try a new approach to the problem, avoiding wherever possible the repetitious arguments and discussions of the last three years. He then went on to state that in his opinion it would be desirable to point out the essential principles on which the majority plan depends. He suggested that the Soviet might do likewise with their proposals and that such a procedure would give a better perspective of the differences which existed. Cadogan stated that he would try to produce a list of these points, which he would distribute as soon as possible. I then stated that this offer would be very helpful. The Chinese delegate, in supporting the United Kingdom proposal suggested that the United Kingdom points would provide a basis for discussion at the next meeting, which was agreed.

8. It is expected that Cadogan will circulate a paper containing the agreed "headings" within the next two or three days.

9. I then presented to the meeting the text of today's communique which had been drafted by the Secretariat and which was accepted by all representatives and which you will have received by the United Nations teleprinter service.

10. It was agreed that the next meeting would be held at 10:30 on Tuesday, 16th August, with China in the Chair and Cadogan's list as the agenda.

Atomic energy.

1. The Security Council held both morning and afternoon meetings on 16th September to continue its consideration of the two resolutions adopted by the Atomic Energy Commission (Documents AEC 42 and 43),† as well as the Canadian draft resolution (Document S/1386)† to transmit these two resolutions to the General Assembly. I had introduced the Canadian resolution towards the end of the Council meeting the previous day.

2. The two main speakers at the meetings were [D.Z.] Manuilsky (Ukraine) and [S.K.] Tsarapkin (U.S.S.R.) both of whom criticised the two resolutions adopted by the Commission. The U.S.S.R. and Ukrainian S.S.R. insisted that the Commission continue its work in accordance with the Assembly resolutions of 24th January and 14th December 1946, and accused the United States of trying to disband the Atomic Energy Commission or to keep it from meeting. Both the Ukrainian and Soviet representatives levelled the usual familiar charges against the United States as a warmonger and against the majority plan as a device, intentionally unacceptable, designed to preclude any international control. The Ukrainian representative termed the majority plan a "world super trust" in the service of the United States.

3. The Ukrainian and Soviet attacks were very unrestrained and bitter, and may be an indication of the Soviet line at the General Assembly. Both statements, which were obviously prepared from the same detailed directive, made much of purported quotations (without context) from United States Interior Secretary Krug at the recent UNSCCUR Conference that it will take twenty years to get international atomic control, and from United States Chief of Staff Omar Bradley that atomic target lists in the U.S.S.R. have been prepared and are constantly revised by the American Military Establishment.

4. At the conclusion of the Soviet statement Tsarapkin introduced a draft resolution (Document S/1391/REV.1)† requesting the Atomic Energy Commission "to continue its work with a view to fulfilling the tasks entrusted it by the General Assembly resolutions of 24th January and 14th December 1946."

5. In order that the proceedings of the Council would not be unduly prolonged, it was agreed informally between the United Kingdom, United States, China, France, and ourselves that Chauvel (France) would make a short statement in favour of the Canadian resolution and that the other delegations would make no reply to the Soviet and Ukraine statements. In his statement Chauvel said that the Security Council was not entitled to refuse to transmit to the Assembly the two resolutions of the Commission, as this would mean that the Council was setting itself up as a "screen" between the Commission and the Assembly. The Canadian resolution was therefore the only possible method of dealing with the matter.

6. After a short recess to attend a Bernadotte memorial ceremony, the Council resumed its discussions when Tsarapkin asked that the Soviet resolution be put to the vote first. I pointed out that under Rule 32 the Canadian resolution must be voted upon first and was supported in this contention by the Chair, who ruled that the Soviet resolution would be voted on after the Canadian resolution. The Ukrainian representative then introduced an amendment to the Canadian resolution to insert after the word "resolutions" in paragraph 2, the words "together with the records of the discussions on this question in the Atomic Energy Commission". This was circulated as Document S/1392.‡ I immediately accepted this Ukrainian amendment, as it seemed desirable to avoid any appearance of unreasonableness on the part of the majority.

7. The Canadian resolution with this amendment was then adopted by the Council by a vote of nine in favour, none against, with two abstentions (Ukraine and U.S.S.R.). Before the vote Tsarapkin said that the Canadian resolution was procedural. The Soviet resolution failed of adoption, the vote being two in favour, none against, with nine abstentions (including Canada).

Security Council voting procedures.

1. Before the meeting of the Security Council on Friday, 16th September, which was to deal with the Canadian draft resolution to transmit the resolutions of the Atomic Energy Commission to the General Assembly (my immediately preceding teletype), Cadogan told me in strict confidence that he had been considering what course he, as President, would adopt if the U.S.S.R. should vote against my resolution. He had finally obtained Foreign Office authority that in the event of a negative Soviet vote but the expected seven or more affirmative votes, he could give a ruling that my resolution, being procedural, was carried. If the U.S.S.R. challenged this ruling, Cadogan was determined to stand firm on it unless it were overridden by seven votes. As you will appreciate, this courageous action on Cadogan's part would have become an important precedent in tending to bring the veto within more reasonable bounds.

2. In the event, as you know, the Soviet Union and the Ukraine abstained on my resolution which was carried by nine votes to none.

3. We were therefore particularly interested in how the voting on my resolution would go on Friday afternoon, after the violent Soviet and Ukraine speeches earlier that day against the Atomic Energy Commission's resolutions. Immediately before the vote was taken, Manuisky (Ukraine) proposed an amendment to my resolution that the report of the Commission's discussion of these resolutions be transmitted with the resolutions themselves. The thought passed through my mind of refusing to accept this amendment with a view to encouraging a negative Soviet vote and thus preparing the way for an important procedural rule from Cadogan as President. However, on consideration, I decided to accept Manuisky's amendment as a gracious gesture for the following reasons:

(a) It was a reasonable request and it is, I believe, good policy, and in line with explicit directions in my original letter of instructions, to accept a reasonable Soviet proposal.

(b) Our first interest was to get the Atomic Energy Commission's resolutions transmitted to the General Assembly, and no subsidiary matter should, we felt, jeopardize this.

(c) In the event of a Soviet negative vote on my resolution and Cadogan's anticipated ruling, there would presumably be a first class constitutional dispute which might go on for a long period. It would be important in this case to have our own record absolutely clear so as to strengthen Cadogan's courageous position which we promised to support if he took it.

4. I think you will agree that in the circumstances our course was wise. Personally I cannot help regretting somewhat that the Russians on this occasion were reasonable and that Cadogan did not have the opportunity to make his important ruling.

1. I had separate discussions with Acheson and Bevin about this matter yesterday, and have telephoned the results to you. Last night the three of us met in Mr. Bevin's room, along with Hickerson, Cockroft, Franks and Makins. The whole question of a Presidential statement on Vermont was carefully canvassed. The scientific evidence is now conclusive, and the certainty of a leak in Washington almost equally so, in view of the fact that the McMahon Committee has been called to meet this morning. As a result, the President will be issuing a statement some time today, the text of which is in my immediately following telegram.† We will be informed as soon as possible of the exact hour so that statements can be synchronized in London and Washington and Ottawa if desired. The hour depends to some extent on Vishinsky's speech here, but this is not a governing consideration. Bevin is now satisfied that in the circumstances the above course is wise, and a statement will be made by Attlee in London. I am now also satisfied that there is no other alternative, and I think it would be useful if the Prime Minister could make or issue a similar statement in Ottawa. I understand that the British statement will be practically the same as that of the President, with a few consequential changes. ATOMIC ENERGY DEBATE IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The announcement of the atomic explosion in the U.S.S.R. has focused so much attention upon the international control of atomic energy that I think everyone is now agreed that it will be impossible to maintain our policy, as set forth in the Commentary prepared for the Canadian delegation, of saying as little as possible in the Assembly debate and simply asking the Six Powers to go on with their discussions.

2. I had the impression in Washington and New York that the United States officials had been so preoccupied with the CPC meetings that they had not had time to give much thought to the tactics to be adopted in the United Nations, but, when I returned to Ottawa yesterday, I had a telephone call from General McNaughton who said that Mr. Hickerson has produced a draft report to the Assembly which he proposes to introduce at the next meeting on October 6 of the Six Powers; a minority report would presumably be presented by the Soviet delegate at the following meeting on October 13 and both majority and minority reports would then go to the Assembly through the Ad Hoc Committee.

3. In the meantime, the Soviet Union may try to precipitate a debate on atomic energy in Committee 1 where they intend to introduce a resolution in favour of peace. Mr. Pearson feels quite strongly that we should somehow arrange to have a Western resolution on atomic energy put to the Assembly before a Soviet resolution on the same subject is discussed so that the Soviet delegate will have to amend our resolution—as it would be quite specific concerning inspection and control. If we do not do so, we shall certainly be at a distinct propaganda disadvantage at a time when any mention of atomic energy in the United Nations will receive the fullest publicity throughout the world.

4. A further reason for initiating a full-dress debate on atomic energy in the Assembly is that our officials in New York are agreed that the Six Powers cannot maintain the secrecy of their discussions much longer because of the urgency of the press demands for information since the announcement of the Soviet bomb. That is why, at the last meeting of the Six Powers, the press communique included a promise, suggested by the Canadian delegation, that the Six would shortly be reporting to the Assembly.

5. I had some indication of the point of view of the smaller nations, not only from our delegation in New York but from the Greek Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Pipinelis, who said that President Truman's announcement had redoubled the anxieties of the smaller countries in Europe and that it constituted the most important psychological problem for European stability. Our delegation fear that the smaller nations may well decide that something drastic must be done about the problem of atomic energy control if the Six Powers announce that they are still deadlocked. The Indian delegation have already indicated that they may refer the problem to the International Law Commission to draft an appropriate treaty.

6. Our delegation have asked for our views as to the timing and nature of the Six Powers' report to the Assembly. As they will be discussing this in New York this afternoon and tomorrow, they would like our views as soon as possible. I am therefore attaching a telegram for your approval or revision.⁹ It has already been cleared with Mr. MacKay and the United Nations Division.

7. I am also attaching a copy† of a draft resolution prepared by Mr. Arnold Smith and myself while I was in New York after we had had a long discussion with General McNaughton and Mr. Riddell. Now that the United States delegation have come forward with a resolution, there will probably be no need to put forward something along the lines of the attached draft, but if there are any objectionable features in this draft, we should tell our delegation immediately as they are using the draft as a basis for their suggestions for amendments to the U.S. draft report, a copy of which we have not yet received. I should therefore be grateful for any comments you may wish to make on the resolution.

8. As I think you will wish Mr. Robertson to see this memorandum with the draft resolution and telegram, I am sending him copies directly to save time so that if he wishes to comment he will be able to do so this afternoon.

Atomic Energy. Following from Heeney. Begins:

1. In your teletype 1079 of October 2† you asked for our comments on the nature and timing of the Six Powers' report to the Assembly. The following paragraphs describe how we have been thinking here and may be of some use.

2. We understand that the United States Delegate intends to submit to the Six Powers at their next meeting on October 6 a draft report which would constitute the report of the majority, and that it would include the statement of principles which has served as the basis of our discussions in the Six Power Talks, together with a brief description of the areas of agreement and disagreement between the Soviet

Revised and sent as the immediately following document.

Union and ourselves. Although we do not have the text of the U.S. draft, we think it is wise for the U.S. Delegate to take the lead in this matter both in the Six Power Talks and during the Assembly debate. No doubt the Russians will try to have a vague resolution in favour of peace and prohibition discussed in Committee 1 and in the Assembly before any resolution on atomic energy is introduced by one of the Western countries. The advantages of turning the tables on them are obvious if we can avoid an atomic energy debate until the Six Powers report through the Ad Hoc Committee to the Assembly, then our majority report will, we assume, take precedence. Presumably this would put the Soviet Delegate at the disadvantage of having to introduce amendments weakening our proposals for control and inspection.

3. In the phrasing of the report of the Six Powers and of any resolution to be introduced either jointly or by the U.S. Delegate in the Assembly, I think it is important to reflect the new sense of urgency which the Soviet atomic explosion has brought to these discussions. You will be in a better position than we to judge the mood of the Assembly, but we would expect that the smaller countries would be less concerned with the technical aspects of our disagreement with the Soviet Union than with the immediate fear of the bomb. If we are not careful to keep them fully briefed on our point of view, they may be inclined to rush into some ill-considered proposal for prohibition pending agreement on control, or for the establishment of some neutral commission to try to break the deadlock (as was done in the Berlin currency dispute). For these reasons, the report of the Six Powers and the debate in the Assembly will have to be treated as our opportunity for a major exercise in political education to which the world is now ready to give full attention. For this purpose, we have at hand the excellent statement of principles.

4. We have been giving some thought to the form and timing of the Assembly debate which will presumably take place when the reports of the Six Power Talks have been dealt with by the Ad Hoc Committee. As we see it, there is a danger that, if we ask the Assembly to approve the majority report of the Six Powers, we may not get as many votes as we did last year in Paris on the November 4 resolution. Some delegations may not be prepared to take our word for it that the technical requirements will be ratified by nothing less strict than the plan of control we have worked out. We would like your views on the possibility and desirability of trying to get [a] short non-technical resolution debated in the Assembly before either the Six Powers' report or a Russian resolution is considered. Might this be done by arranging for the report of the Atomic Energy Commission (transmitted through the Security Council) to be debated before the Six Powers' report. If so, what we have in mind very tentatively at present is a resolution sponsored jointly or put forward by the U.S. highlighting, for public consumption, those points on which the Russians do not agree with us. Put in the simplest terms these features are—the right to “unrestricted” inspection by the international control agency and the surrender of sovereignty to the extent necessary to achieve effective control. In such a brief, simple resolution it seems to us we should not use the text of the statement of principles which would be made public as part of the majority report of the Six Powers. The object would be to achieve at this stage the simplest possible statement of our case in contradistinction to that of the Soviet Union, to point up the conflict of attitude and to reveal nakedly the hypocrisy of the Soviet position. We are not satisfied that this can be done merely by the statement of principles and its exposition. Something very brief and hard hitting is essential if we are to seize and hold the psychological initiative.

5. In general, we expect that you will wish to encourage the U.S. Delegate to play the leading part in the debates on atomic energy and that your role will be to assist in carrying conviction to the doubters. There is, perhaps, only one thing to fear more than no international control, and that is a world in which we are given a false sense of security by an agreement based on little more than good faith which, if it existed, would make any agreement unnecessary.

Atomic Energy Six-Power Talks.

1. The 9th meeting of the sponsoring Powers was held at Lake Success at 3.00 p.m. October 6th, under the Chairmanship of Chauvel (France). Except for the U.S.S.R., which is now represented by Malik, attendance was unchanged. I represented Canada, with Paul Martin and Arnold Smith also present.

2. I took the floor first and presented the point by comparison of the Baruch proposals and the majority plan, copies of which were forwarded under cover of my despatch No. 410 of October 6th.† I was followed by Hickerson (United States), who made a short statement on "stages", and who was followed in turn by Malik (U.S.S.R.), with a lengthy and distorted reply to both Hickerson and myself.

3. In his statement, Hickerson branded as untrue a Soviet charge, made at the last meeting, to the effect that the United States favoured the indefinite prolonging of stages with the purpose of postponing to the distant future control over the ultimate stages of production. Hickerson noted that his Government was in agreement with the third report of the Commission on "stages" and that the order of these stages has not been spelt out either in the third report or in the majority plan. He noted also that only when agreement had been reached on an effective system of control could the timing and sequence of stages be set out, and these would be laid down in a treaty.

4. At the conclusion of Hickerson's remarks, Malik (U.S.S.R.) asked me whether I considered the points made in my statement as the essential and fundamental features of the majority plan. I replied that my statement was intended to point out how the majority plan had been developed from the original Baruch proposals and for no other purpose.

5. At this point Chauvel made reference to the reported atomic explosion in the Soviet Union and asked whether any delegates had views to express on the effect of this for our discussions. Cadogan (United Kingdom) said it would be unrealistic not to make some reference to the reported explosion, and remarked that as some delegations had previously maintained that they had to take on trust such information as was given them on atomic energy, it might now be that the situation was rather different. He added that it might now be possible for those who had asserted the effectiveness of control by mere "inspection" to explain why they held that view and we might then get onto a more practical basis which might lead to more substantial results.

6. The remainder of the meeting was taken up by a lengthy, confusing statement by Malik (U.S.S.R.), directed mainly to Hickerson and myself. With regard to my statement, he noted first, that I had said that the Soviet representative lacked an understanding of the majority plan. The Soviet, he said, understood perfectly well the majority plan, and that the sense of my remarks meant that Canada viewed Soviet statements in open meetings as propaganda. He charged among other things that my remarks were not aimed at clarifying various points but instead made them more complex, and were designed to lead discussion away from the fundamental issues. According to Malik, none of the points made in my speech had any significance or substance, were inconsistent and secondary, and the answer given by me to his earlier question proved this. He also said that my attempt to show that the agency was not a monopoly was wrong, as both the Baruch and United Nations plans called for "ownership". Malik then continued with an attack on the United States, reiterating the often used argument that the United States is afraid of control over ultimate nuclear fuel installations and that the United States is trying to extend control over raw materials but not over nuclear fuel installations. This meant, said Malik, that control would be outside the United States where the raw materials existed and not in the United States where the production plants were located.

7. In view of the hour, I decide to forego a reply to the Soviet until the next meeting to allow Hickerson to comment on Malik's statement. Hickerson in his reply stated that the Soviet comments on what he allegedly said, were based on either misunderstanding, misinterpretation or distortion and that he wished to have the United States statement quoted verbatim in the summary record. He noted that if the Soviet understood the majority plan then it was difficult to see how he could say that raw materials were to be controlled and nuclear plants not.

8. There followed a lengthy argument as to whether Hickerson's statement should be quoted verbatim in the summary record. Malik would not accept this, stating that he was speaking extemporarily and that no text of his statement had been kept. After some argument a compromise was reached on this point, and Malik was given verbatim texts of both Hickerson's and my statements, at his request.

9. Toward the end of the meeting, Chauvel (France) said that we must bear in mind the need to submit a report, or interim report, to the Assembly. At my request it was agreed that discussion of this matter be first item on the agenda of the next meeting, set for Thursday, October 13th, with points 2, 3, 5 and 8 of the United Kingdom paper also on the agenda.

Ottawa, October 14, 1949

Following for the Minister from Heenev, begins: Atomic Energy.

1. Riddell will have told you of our meeting yesterday morning with Norman Robertson and those in the Department principally concerned. We discussed tactics for the atomic energy debate or debates in the Assembly.

2. Riddell showed us a draft resolution, which I understand you had seen, proposing prohibition of atomic weapons except in cases of aggression as determined by a majority of the Security Council. We agreed that something better than the negative reports of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Six Powers was required to satisfy our Western public opinion and especially the Delegations of the smaller countries who might be tempted to play a neutral role. We also agreed that the more urgent re-assurance required by such "neutrals" was that the bomb would not be used to start a war, but only to defend free nations in case of aggression.

3. However, we could not help questioning whether the membership of the Security Council in the immediate or more distant future would, by a majority of seven (including three permanent members) "recognize" aggression if it should occur. In such a vote, the position of France would, of course, be crucial; Ecuador and India, depending on the circumstances, might abstain or even vote against; so might Yugoslavia, whether or not it had been re-absorbed by then in the Soviet orbit.

4. We were also worried by the probable reactions of the U.S. Government, and, indeed, of all North Atlantic countries who feel that their security today rests (at least to a large extent) upon the only potent strategic weapon on our side. For the moment, the bomb is undoubtedly a major deterrent to aggression and it seems likely to remain such for some years at least. I feel sure that you have yourself considered this difficult phase of the problem.

5. As possible alternative courses of action for your consideration, we have thought of:

(a) a unilateral U.S. re-affirmation that it would never wage aggressive war;

(b) a resolution or convention of the Assembly prohibiting atomic weapons except in cases of aggression.

6. In my immediately following teletype† we have tried our hand at a draft resolution to be submitted jointly to the General Assembly, (or to Committee One or the Ad Hoc Committee) by the representatives of Canada, China, France, the United Kingdom and the United States. We are none too happy with the wording nor are we yet clear precisely how it could be employed if it is thought to have merit. It embodies our suggestion (mentioned in my teletype No. 743 of October

5†) of trying to avoid another vote in the Assembly on the majority proposals as a whole, and, instead, presenting a simplified proposition which would single out the one or two points obviously essential in the majority plan. The purpose would be to employ the majority plan scheme for inspection as the touchstone of Russian insincerity. The resolution as drafted therefore proposes a draft convention for the prohibition of atomic weapons to which is tied acceptance of international inspection of nuclear fuels and facilities for their manufacture anywhere, any time. It might be preferable to separate the inspection clause from the draft convention and include it in the main body of the resolution. Otherwise, it could be argued that by implication the U.S. was prepared to wage aggressive war unless the Soviet Union accepted the inspection clause. However, if the draft convention were to come into effect when five of the Six Permanent Members had adhered to it, this would amount to a U.S. declaration that it would not use the bomb aggressively and would not make such a declaration conditional on Soviet acceptance of our inspection proposals. It also would not suffer from the disadvantage of being simply a unilateral U.S. declaration which the U.S. Government might be loath to make on the ground that this has always been the obvious policy of the U.S. and needs no re-affirmation.

7. Norman Robertson made the general point that we might all stand to gain more than we would lose by joining issue with the Russians on their own ground in Committee One. He felt that the development of the bomb in the Soviet Union brings us a long step closer to the day when the border line between atomic weapons and conventional armaments will have broken down and a general settlement of our major political difficulties with the Russians will have to be attempted, including the whole field of disarmament in all categories of weapons and forces. He is inclined to believe, as I think we all do, that agreement with the Russians on atomic energy alone is next to impossible and that until a more general settlement is achieved, we should proceed very cautiously in initiating any proposal which could conceivably have the effect of divesting the North Atlantic community of its major strategic asset which so far has held the balance against vastly superior Soviet forces in being.

8. A further consideration is, of course, that the Government is now actively considering including the British and ourselves in a full partnership on atomic weapons. This is clearly of the utmost importance in relation to anything which may be initiated in the Assembly along the lines indicated.

9. I might add that our Legal Division have not yet had an opportunity to examine our draft convention in detail. I am only sending it to you in its present rough form because Riddell particularly wanted you to have an indication of our thinking as soon as possible.

10. You may wish to discuss some of these problems with Mr. Claxton when you see him this weekend: I have not done so, Ends.

ATOMIC ENERGY RESOLUTION

The possibilities which have emerged so far in our discussions and which we reviewed at our meeting this morning, seem to me to be the following.

(1) A simple resolution taking note of the principles of the majority plan and urging the six sponsoring powers to continue their efforts to secure agreement.

A resolution in these terms would have the effect of admitting flatly that in present circumstances nothing can be done to limit the use of the atomic weapon. The question is whether the Assembly will be satisfied with such a resolution only. We understand that supplementary or alternative resolutions are being considered by Australia, India, The Philippines, Argentina, and Yugoslavia.

(2) A resolution prohibiting the use of the atomic bomb except in cases of aggression as defined by a majority of members of the Security Council (possibly including three permanent members).

The objections to this proposal, which have been fully examined both here and in Ottawa, arise from doubt over the absolute dependability of all the "western" members of the Security Council. The formula would place two states in the Security Council in a position where they could determine whether or not the United States could use the atomic bomb.

(3) Unilateral declarations by member states that they would not use the bomb for aggressive purposes.

This course is open to the following objections.

(a) The United States has already made such a declaration, and might understandably be unwilling to repeat it.

(b) It does not adequately meet the Soviet offer to prohibit the bomb for all purposes.

(c) It does nothing to consolidate support for the majority plan.

(4) A resolution embodying a draft convention which would both re-affirm the principles of the majority report and prohibit the use of the bomb for aggressive purposes.

The draft resolution contained in the Department's telegram No. 127 of October 14† contains the following points:

- (a) An armament race is under way
- (b) prohibition is effective only with effective control
- (c) effective control requires pooling of sovereignty
- (d) A.E.C. and six powers are deadlocked therefore

(e) A.E.C. should resume sessions after six powers report agreement in principle.

(f) if six powers do not agree in six months, convention is to be opened for signature which would

- (i) reaffirm principles of majority report
- (ii) pledge signatories not to use atomic weapon for aggressive purposes
- (iii) enter into force on signature of 5 members of A.E.C.

The purpose of this resolution is designed to take the initiative away from the USSR or from the states which wish to mediate. In its present form, it is not likely to have this effect, because it is too complicated, and because its operative clause concedes far less towards prohibition than the Russians are prepared to grant in their simpler language.

(5) The only other alternative that occurs to me at the moment is the following:

(a) We should assume that the issue over atomic energy will be joined when the Soviet items on the atomic energy question are debated together in Committee I;

(b) The draft UK-US resolution might then be amended to include a much stronger paragraph on atomic energy, possibly along the following lines:

The General Assembly calls upon Member States to co-operate in working out plans for the control and prohibition of all armaments, including atomic weapons and other means of mass destruction on a basis which will create genuine security through the establishment of an international system of inspection and control providing for adequate safeguards against clandestine activity, including international inspection anywhere in the territory of any Member of the United Nations at any time.

(c) When this is rejected by the USSR we can then fall back on a special resolution concerning atomic energy which takes note of the general principle and calls on the six powers to do their best to reach agreement.¹⁰

Why should rejection of this by the USSR mean that we have to fall back on anything? If we can get a 2/3 vote for course 5(b) that is all we need E[scott] R[eid] Oct. 28/49.

1. A few days ago the French permanent representative, Chauvel, mentioned to Mr. Pearson that his delegation would like to discuss with the Canadian delegation the question of an Assembly resolution on Atomic Energy. Mr. Pearson said that we would be glad to do so. Recently, M. De Rose of the French delegation called on General McNaughton and myself, and gave us a draft, of which a rough English translation is transmitted in my immediately following teletype.

2. De Rose said that French public opinion was becoming concerned about the inaction on international atomic control, particularly since the announced explosion in Russia. The French delegation felt that a very short, simple resolution, focusing on only one issue, was desirable in this Assembly; and he recommended that that issue be the question of national sovereignty.

3. He stressed that what he envisaged was a joint Canadian-French resolution, which would be cleared in advance with our United States, United Kingdom and Chinese colleagues, but should be put forward by only two delegations. In the meantime, he had not shown this draft to any other delegation, and did not wish to do so at this stage.

4. De Rose was told that we welcomed their initiative, and were inclined to agree that a short simple resolution might be desirable. We had not yet settled on any particular draft, but were actively considering the matter and hoped to have our views more crystallized within the next few days. De Rose was told that we would keep in touch with him. We also stressed that we would probably wish to consult our United Kingdom and United States colleagues before tabling any resolution. Ends.

Atomic Energy Six Power Talks.

1. The 11th meeting of the Six Powers took place this afternoon, and was devoted entirely to the question of an interim report to the General Assembly. It was unanimously agreed that the draft interim report proposed by France, transmitted to you with the records of the 10th meeting in my despatch No. 418† on October 19th, be approved with minor verbal modifications, and that the summary records of the first 10 meetings be transmitted with it.

2. Statements of several representatives made it clear that each Government was free to submit any further observations on the consultations which it desired; and that these could be sent to the Secretary-General for transmission to the General Assembly but would not, repeat not, be considered annexes or parts of the interim report.

3. The interim report is to be transmitted tomorrow, Tuesday October 25th, around noon. At the same time the Secretariat will give copies to the press. The Secretariat have told us that the correspondents are contemplating imposing on themselves a 48 hour embargo to give them time to digest the report before publishing it. This is the business of the press itself, but it is not yet certain whether they will in fact impose this embargo on themselves.

4. After the meeting representatives of the five "friendly" Governments met privately to discuss the separate statement. It was agreed that this will be handed to the Secretary-General Tuesday morning, with a letter to be signed by representatives of Canada, China, France, United Kingdom and the United States, the text of which is transmitted in my immediately following teletype.† At the same time copies of this Five Powers' statement will be given by delegations to the press, to be held for release until the interim report of the Six Powers is released.

Following for Riddell from Heeney. Begins: Atomic Energy.

1. Norman Robertson, Escott Reid, George and I met Wednesday morning with the Minister to discuss the various alternatives proposed in your memorandum for the Minister of October 19, copies of which he gave to us. He will no doubt be telling you of our discussion but I think it may be desirable in order to assure a complete meeting of minds, for me to give you a summary of the sense of the meeting, and for us to have any comments on this telegram that the Minister may wish to make.

2. We first considered briefly the French resolution which had been sent to us with Arnold Smith's comments (his teletypes 1101† and 1102† of October 24). We did not think the final paragraph went sufficiently far; there is nothing in the text to which Russians could not agree, even though they would not mean anything like the same thing as we when we speak of "adequate control and effective prohibition" or in referring to the extent to which sovereignty should be renounced for the organization of peace.

3. We then considered the alternatives listed in your memorandum of October 19 and agreed that your first alternative would cause us the least difficulty but would probably not command the necessary two-thirds majority without a great deal of U.S. pressure on the Latin American states and others who would almost certainly, if left to themselves, support a simple resolution calling on all states to agree to prohibiting the use of atomic weapons in any circumstances. Although your first alternative was probably the most desirable objective, we felt it was not likely to prove practicable at present.

4. The Minister then said that he was no longer considering the sort of resolution which you listed as the second possibility, for the reasons mentioned in our telegram No. 126 of October 14.

5. We therefore agreed that we should be prepared, as our second choice, to support a resolution simply agreeing to the prohibition of the use of atomic weapons except in cases of aggression—leaving aggression undefined.

6. If neither of these first two courses should appear likely to carry a two-thirds majority, our third choice would be either a simplified version of the sort of resolution cum convention spelt out in our teletype No. 127 of October 14† (which, by the way, does not ask anyone to reaffirm the Majority Report as a whole but only a simplified version of its inspection proposals), or an amendment to the U.K. resolution such as that proposed in paragraph 5 (b) of your memorandum. Either one would require considerable polishing and our convention resolution would need to be pruned a good deal to make it less confusing. Both these alternatives would of course suffer from the handicap that they go only part way towards unconditional prohibition, whereas the Soviet delegation would probably be prepared to go the whole way. I like your idea of bringing the subject of atomic energy back into the context of a peace resolution such as the U.K. are considering, which has the virtues of being comprehensive and simple, without falling into meaningless generalities that anyone could accept.

7. In considering tactics we are at a disadvantage until we know how the voting would probably go on any of the above alternative resolutions. We should know what we are going to do well before the subject is to be discussed in the First Committee. If we do not make up our minds in advance as to what course of action to follow, we may find ourselves in the position of having to amend a Soviet resolution instead of having our resolution on the agenda first.

8. A still more urgent reason for early discussion and lobbying with other delegations is that there appears to be a real danger that a considerable number of non-Soviet countries do not yet realize their dependence on the deterrent effect of the U.S. holding a preponderance of power based on atomic weapons. We therefore believe that we should begin now to put this point of view to other likeminded nations, first of all to our North Atlantic partners. It would probably be more effective for one of the smaller North Atlantic countries such as Norway to carry our arguments to countries such as India and Egypt which may be tempted to play a neutral role. Freitas-Valle might well argue our case with the Latin American Delegates who must face the fact that, in present circumstances, their security too depends in the final analysis on the balance of power now maintained by U.S. possession of the bomb and ability to use it to defend any free nation from aggression; this is still the most important deterrent to any would-be aggressor and will remain so for some years at least, or until there is international agreement on effective control and inspection. Until then, prohibition is not enough and, of itself, would merely have the effect of encouraging an aggressor, while giving the world an illusion of security.

9. Other arguments will no doubt occur to you and to those in other delegations with whom you may be discussing these suggestions.

10. I do not think we can usefully comment in any greater detail as everything depends on the delegations's appreciation on the spot, and especially your collective judgment as to how the voting would go on the various possible alternatives. In any case, as a result of the comments which the press has widely attributed to the Canadian delegation, there will, I imagine, be a fairly widespread expectation among the smaller nations that Canada will play a leading role in the development of a positive approach to this subject when it comes before the First Committee and the Assembly. Ends.

Mr. Arnold Smith phoned me from New York late yesterday afternoon to explain the background of a Canadian-French resolution on atomic energy. He then sent us by teletype† (copies attached) a confirmatory message with the text of the resolution which, it is proposed, should be tabled at the beginning of the debate on atomic energy in the Ad Hoc Committee, probably Friday morning, November 4, but possibly on Thursday.

2. The resolution has been considerably revised from the original French draft sent to us on October 24 (teletype No. 1102 attached)† and improved by the addition of "teeth": it now condemns national ownership of large atomic plants and favours necessary limitations of sovereignty, without asking for Assembly approval of the majority plan as a whole. According to Mr. Smith, the United States delegation was not prepared to regard inspection alone as the touchstone of Soviet sincerity and insisted on coming closer to the idea of ownership. It has been discussed, modified and now agreed by the United States, United Kingdom and Chinese delegations; it has the tentative approval of Mr. Pearson and the more enthusiastic support of General McNaughton.

3. All the western delegations now agree that it would be desirable to have a resolution put forward by States not themselves the chief protagonists and the French have been particularly keen on joining with Canada in sponsoring a resolution on a subject of such great concern to the peoples of Western Europe. In addition, the French are still somewhat aggrieved by their exclusion from the tripartite economic and atomic talks which took place in Washington during September and they want to play, with Canada, a leading role in the United Nations debate on atomic energy.

4. This is the first time during the present session of the Assembly that the five Western Permanent Members of the Atomic Energy Commission have been able to agree on the text of a resolution. I think the resolution is a good one, and in any case I would be reluctant to suggest any changes, the more so as the resolution might have to be used the day after tomorrow and changes would have to be cleared with the other delegations principally concerned. If you approve, I shall simply phone Mr. Smith and tell him that we think the resolution is as good as we can hope to get.¹¹

5. The resolution does not contain any clause concerning the prohibition of atomic weapons. If it should appear necessary during the debate in the Ad Hoc Committee or the Assembly to head off a majority vote in favour of unconditional prohibition, a supplementary resolution has been agreed (teletype No. 205 attached)† which would reaffirm the obligation of Member States not to resort to force or the threat of force. I can see why the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom are questioning the desirability of such a resolution even as a counter-proposal to avoid a worse one. In the event of an attack upon either a State not a member of the United Nations or upon a Member State with whom the United States had no treaty of mutual assistance, it would be open to argument whether Article 51, referring to “collective self-defence” would apply and in that case the resort to arms in defence of the victim of aggression could be held to rest with the Security Council. However, the same objections apply to any literal consideration of the Charter of the United Nations as it stands today, and the proposed resolution goes no further than the Charter. Only some such draft Convention as had been proposed in your teletype No. 127 of October 14† to the Minister would carry us a degree further towards satisfying an Assembly demand for a significant gesture towards the prohibition of atomic weapons. However, this part of the debate may not arise until the item reaches the Assembly and in the meantime we might confine our suggestions to rewording the second paragraph of the draft resolution so that it would read:

“Calls upon all members to reaffirm their solemn obligation under the Charter to refrain from the use or threatened use of armed force, including atomic weapons, against any other country, except on orders of the Security Council or under Article 51 of the Charter.”

6. Mr. Smith agreed that it was unfortunate that there appeared to be no chance of getting the general Soviet resolution on peace debated in the First Committee before the Ad Hoc Committee came to the report of the Atomic Energy Commission and its six Permanent Members. The Soviet resolution will probably not be debated in Committee One for ten days to two weeks. The draft counter-resolutions prepared by Mr. Riddell and Mr. Smith have so far only been shown to the Belgians, Brazilians, Americans and British. They are now to be shown to the French and one or two others. The Minister’s preference is for the shorter resolution prepared by Mr. Riddell, principally on the grounds that the debate on the shorter resolution will probably be less prolonged than that on the longer version.¹² However, the delegation will be glad to have our comments on the two resolutions and I propose to prepare a teletype on this subject for your consideration. The texts of the resolutions prepared by Mr. Riddell and Mr. Smith were sent to us in teletypes Nos. 184† and 185† respectively.

¹¹ Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree but would teletype [A. Heeney]

7. I have made extra copies of this memorandum to send to Mr. Claxton, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Holmes with any comments you may wish to make.

ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. Pearson was the second speaker in the atomic energy debate which commenced in the Special Political Committee of the United Nations on November 7th. Together with Mr. Chauvel of France, he sponsored a Canadian-French resolution intended to highlight one or two points of our disagreement with the Russians without asking the Assembly to vote again in support of the Majority proposals as a whole. The resolution focused attention on the necessity for a limited pooling of sovereignty in order to achieve effective international control of atomic energy.

2. Before the atomic energy debate began, the President of the Assembly, General Romulo, had sent an appeal to the Delegation Heads of the six permanent Members of the Atomic Energy Commission. In this appeal, which has since been made public, General Romulo suggested four possible lines of compromise between the Soviet and Majority positions on international control. One of his suggestions was that we should limit research for peaceful purposes to low-power piles which might safely be left under national management if there were an adequate system of inspection. In his statement on November 7, Mr. Pearson commented indirectly on this proposal by saying that we should be prepared to consider a system of control based on 100% inspection alone if we found, upon technical examination, that we could safely rely upon it, but that so far the whole weight of our scientific evidence suggested that we could not avoid a system including management and control. We are, however, pursuing every possible suggestion that could conceivably lead out of the present dangerous impasse.

3. On November 12 Mr. Vishinsky made a statement which was interpreted in some news reports and broadcasts as meaning that the Soviet Union had accepted international inspection and control. The statement, in fact, went no further than the

¹² Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree [A. Heeney]

Russian delegate has gone before, simply reaffirming that they believe that "periodic" inspection is an adequate means of control.

4. Resolutions on atomic energy have also been submitted to the Special Political Committee by the U.S.S.R., India, Egypt, Haiti and the Argentine. The resolutions submitted by the last three countries have one common feature: they propose that the use of atomic weapons should be prohibited in one way or another even if we cannot get agreement on inspection and control as defined by the Majority Plan. No doubt this rather woolly desire for prohibition of any kind is still widespread among the delegations of the smaller countries, but is generally expected that when the various resolutions are voted on, either today or tomorrow, the Canadian-French resolution will get the necessary two-thirds majority and that the others will be defeated, including the Indian suggestion that the whole question be referred to the International Law Commission.

New York, November 26, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to report on the debate in the United Nations General Assembly this year concerning the international control of atomic energy. As you know, this debate was completed in committee stage, in the Ad Hoc Committee, on November 14, and in Plenary Session on November 23. The resolution which we sponsored jointly with the French Delegation was adopted by the overwhelming vote of 49 in favour, 5 against, with 3 abstentions: a substantially larger majority than was obtained at the Paris Assembly last year, and a weighty indication that most of the nations of the world are prepared to endorse the general position of the main Western nations in this matter. On the other hand, any agreement with the Soviet Union for the international control of atomic energy seems as remote as ever, and certainly no progress was made in this Assembly toward agreement.

2. You will have already received day-to-day accounts of the proceedings in Committee and Plenary through the United Nations Press Service, and copies of all relevant draft resolutions and Summary Records have already been transmitted to you. I am, however, enclosing with this despatch a copy of the Report of the Rapporteur of the Ad Hoc Committee on this matter (Document A/1119),† and a copy of the text of the Canadian statement given by General McNaughton,‡ in the Plenary Session on November 23, shortly before the vote was taken and the item concluded. The purpose of this despatch, therefore, is to supplement the particular reports and documents in your possession with comments on some aspects of the debate.

3. The atmosphere of the debate, which aroused great public interest here, was to a considerable extent conditioned by the announcement shortly after this session of the Assembly opened, that an atomic explosion had occurred in the Soviet Union. This background lent emphasis to widespread demands from many quarters that somehow the deadlock between the USSR and the rest of the world regarding atomic energy must be resolved. Throughout the debate a number of suggestions, some patently absurd but others meriting serious study, were advanced from various quarters. While the Assembly did not pronounce on any of these suggestions, there is no doubt that the inclusion in the Canadian-French draft resolution shortly before its tabling of a clause calling upon the six Permanent Members of the Atomic Energy Commission to "consider all concrete suggestions" played an important part in securing the large vote which this resolution eventually commanded, and forestalling, or facilitating the defeat of, a number of hasty and confused proposals. With our despatch No. 58 of November 17,† we forwarded to you a list of the suggestions, made during the debate, which will have to be considered at forth-coming meetings of the Six.

4. Another modification of the Canadian-French draft resolution on this item, however, made after the first draft was tabled, concerned the reference in paragraph 8 to the renunciation of sovereignty. The wording of this paragraph, as originally submitted, was intentionally designed to follow certain words in the Preamble of the current French Constitution, which provides that France may renounce sovereignty for the organization of security and peace. The French Delegation felt, perhaps with reason, that this allusion might be valuable from the point of view of French domestic politics, and attached great importance to it. We had had some difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory form of words to meet this French desire, and at times wondered what the result would look like if we for our part insisted on writing in sections of the British North America Act. However, we restrained ourselves on this point, but were amused when during the debate it transpired that several delegations, and in particular that of Mexico, had constitutional and political difficulties regarding any form of words which called for the renunciation of any aspect of sovereignty. In order to minimize this difficulty, and attain as wide support as possible, we agreed with the French to revise this final paragraph, so that the word "renounce" is removed, and the emphasis is on using rather than losing sovereignty. The meaning is of course unchanged.

5. I should also mention certain off-stage developments which affected the atmosphere in which the Assembly debate took place. One was the report in the New York Herald Tribune on November 22 stating that a major re-examination of the full question of international control was being carried out for the United States Government by Mr. George Kennan, Director of the Policy Planning Staff. This report was followed a few hours later by the issuance of a very strong and almost intransigent press release from the State Department, stating that United States policy was that enunciated by President Truman at the corner-stone-laying ceremonies and by Mr. John Hickerson, Assistant-Secretary of State at the United Nations. The press release went on to state that the United States would continue to support the majority plan until "a more effective, not a less effective" plan could be devised. Another flurry which occurred during the final afternoon of the debate in Plenary Session on November 23, was the announcement from the White House that Lilienthal had resigned as Chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission. There were also suggestions for a compromise put forward by unofficial American bodies such as the Friends. Jack Hickerson commented wryly just before the final vote was taken in Plenary, that the United States liked to do things the hard way.

6. The Canadian-French resolution was the only one adopted by the General Assembly on atomic energy. Four additional proposals were tabled during the debate, by India, the Soviet Union, the Argentine and Haiti respectively.

7. The Indian resolution, which called for the International Law Commission to prepare a draft declaration on the rights and duties of states and individuals insofar as atomic energy is concerned, was defeated by 15 in favour, 24 against (including Canada), and 18 abstentions. The most interesting feature was the sincere though somewhat confused personal campaign carried out by Sir Benegal Rau, the chief Indian delegate, for this proposal. Sir Benegal worked very hard for this proposal, despite the fact that his Government, according to our information, did not like it. Rau had been told by Bajpai that he should not press it, though since it had become a matter of personal prestige, he need not withdraw it: however, on the last day in Committee, Rau made a rather moving and effective speech pleading for his resolution, and stressing the powerful influence which small nations could, if they persevered, have on the policy of Great Powers.

8. A further interesting light on Sir Benegal Rau's attitude, which we have not previously reported, is that on the morning before the Committee vote was taken, Rau produced an omnibus draft resolution, relating together all the operative portions of the Indian and Argentine proposals, part of the Canadian-French resolution, and a verbal suggestion made by the Venezuelan delegate that mediation might help to break the deadlock. Rau showed this draft informally to us and also to the French, United Kingdom and United States Delegations, and when we all made it clear that we did not approve, he decided not to submit it. I am, however, attaching a copy of this unsubmitted draft for your record.†

9. The Soviet resolution, which was resoundingly defeated, speaks for itself. You will notice from the report of the Committee Rapporteur that the Soviet Delegation made a last-minute effort to write the operative parts of their resolution into the Canadian-French resolution in the form of amendments. These tactics merely succeeded in wasting time and irritating most of the delegates: most of the Soviet amendments were ruled out-of-order by a large vote, and the rest were defeated.

10. My only comment on the Argentine draft resolution, which was defeated by a vote of 15 in favour, 20 against (including Canada), and 23 abstentions, relates to the proposed "renunciation of the use of atomic weapons for purposes of aggression". For some strange psychological reason, many delegates seemed to think that such a renunciation would be a forward step. Since the Charter forbids the use of force, which presumably would include any weapons for purposes of aggression, it is difficult to understand what could be gained by such a new undertaking, the implications of which would at best merely be confusing. The desire to single out a part when the whole is already covered, recalls to mind the name of a hotel in Tours, "l'Hotel de l'Univers de Portugal".

11. The delegate of Haiti, who is I understand a professor of Latin, made a long, florid and rhetorical statement on the first day of the Committee debate. The most significant statement in the flood of rounded periods was his regret that he did not feel competent to submit a resolution to the Committee. However, the next day he did submit a resolution (A/AC.31/L.29).† This resolution, if it meant anything, would appear to be an effort to resolve the Gordian knot of Soviet disagreement by a process of international legislation, stating categorically that international inspection is to be established. The Yugoslav Delegation seized on this resolution as a respectable third position between the Soviet and Western resolutions. However, the Haiti delegate later withdrew his resolution, explaining that paragraph 7 of the joint Canadian-French resolution adequately covered what he had in mind, and the Yugoslavs, finding their limb lopped off, abstained both on the Soviet proposals and the Canadian-French proposals.

12. In conclusion, we can sum up the debate on atomic energy by saying that despite the radio-active and fissionable quality of this topic, another Assembly has been got through without spectacular advance or defeat for the Western position. It is a melancholy fact that for the time being the Assembly debates on atomic energy have been essentially battles in the propaganda war between East and West. Propaganda-wise, nothing has been lost, and doubtless something has been gained. In particular, the joint statement submitted to the Assembly by five of the six Permanent Members explaining the differences between the majority and minority positions on control, seems to have had a noticeable effect in the education at least of other delegates, and probably of public opinion.

13. However, the Soviet Delegation again, and most categorically, rejected the majority proposals. Moreover, Mr. Vishinsky appeared also to reject any suggestion that the Soviet Union might agree to limit the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. By implication at least, the Soviet Government, through Mr. Vishinsky's statements, appears to have made it difficult to accept any compromise, assuming that one could ever be devised, for control based on a self-denying agreement to eliminate all large-scale peaceful atomic development. You will recall that exploration of the possibility of agreement along these lines was one of the suggestions put forward by President Romulo and others and referred to the Six Sponsoring Powers for examination.

14. Indeed, so glowing was Mr. Vishinsky's rhetorical hyperbole on the peaceful benefits of atomic energy to the USSR that it called forth the following advertisement found pinned on the notice-board of the U.N. Correspondent's Hall:

"Does a mountain mar the view from your beautiful summer home? Call the Kremlin mountain moving service. We specialize in making mole hills out of mountains and vice versa. Telephone Caviar 235U."

I have, etc.

Atomic energy—Six-Power talks.

1. After consultation with my colleagues, it has been decided to call the next Six-Power meeting, of which I am Chairman, for 10:45 on Tuesday, December 20th.

2. As you know, on my instructions the Secretariat has prepared a list of the various suggestions put forward during the course of the Assembly debates, and the recent Assembly resolution now obliges the six Powers to consider these suggestions. I propose not to circulate this list in advance but to state at the meeting that as Chairman I had the list prepared and that I assume representatives will refer it to their Governments for study, so that the representatives may discuss the suggestions at a later date.

3. I also feel that the time is appropriate for giving the Soviet representative a written list of carefully prepared questions, requesting that the latter give us detailed written replies. You will recall that during the Assembly debate the Canadian delegation virtually committed itself to pressing for a clarification of the Soviet attitude: I feel, therefore, that we have a moral obligation to present questions on any points in the Soviet attitude which, in the light of Soviet statements in the Assembly, are obscure.

4. If you agree with the course I suggest, I would be grateful if you could have a study made of the records of Soviet statements in the Assembly debate and provide me with formulations of requests which you consider could usefully be asked.

5. It will probably be useful to have a preliminary meeting of the five friendly delegations, perhaps on Thursday, December 15th. I would be grateful therefore to have your comments and suggestions before that date.

Your telegram No. 1144 of December 8, Six-Power Talks on Atomic Energy.

1. As you suggested, we have made a study of the records of Soviet statements in the Assembly debate on atomic energy with a view to formulating questions which you might put to the Soviet representative in writing at the next Six-Power meeting on December 20. We have, of course, been handicapped by the lack of verbatim reports of the proceedings of the First and Ad Hoc Committees, but from our study of the Provisional Summary Records and from the verbatim records of the Plenary meetings, it would seem likely that any formal questions on the Soviet proposals would be very similar to those asked by Sir Alexander Cadogan on August 11, 1947, and that the replies would also in all probability correspond closely to those given by Gromyko on September 5, 1947. On rereading the records, we have been impressed not so much by the apparent shifts in the Soviet position as by the rigidity with which it has been maintained since their proposals of June 11, 1947. We therefore suggest that instead of putting written questions to the Soviet representative, which he is bound to call tendentious, you might consider raising certain points informally at the next meeting of the Six-Powers with a request for elucidation. No doubt, you will wish to consult your western colleagues as to the tactics and the questions to be asked.

2. Throughout the course of our discussions on atomic energy with the Russians in the United Nations, we have been placed, from one point of view, at a disadvantage by not having succeeded in pinning down the Soviet representative to a detailed and comprehensive exposition of his suggestions for effective international inspection and control. While we of the majority have elaborated our plan in the greatest detail, the Soviet representatives have consistently evaded questions and have chosen to devote almost the whole of their time to tirades of criticism, denunciations and distortions of the majority plan instead of an exposition of their own alternative. This point was strikingly illustrated during the recent Assembly debates: the only time Vishinsky attempted to explain or defend the Soviet proposals was in Plenary on November 23 when he did little more than comment on a condensation of the Soviet proposals of June 11, 1947, before turning with greater relish to the "sinister" motivations of the majority plan.

3. The most interesting part of Vishinsky's restatement of the Soviet position was, we thought, his comments on inspection. In his fourth point he said that "periodic and special investigation" should apply to "the activities of enterprises extracting atomic raw materials." Does this mean that periodic and special investigation should not apply to other processes in the production of nuclear fuels after the mining and refining stage? I think we are also entitled to ask for a definition of such vague terms as "atomic materials" (points 2 and 5) by which Vishinsky seems to mean anything from uranium oxide to fissile materials.

4. We should also like to know what the Soviet representative had in mind when he spoke of "recommendations to the Security Council on measures for preventing any violations" (point 6). Does this mean that the International Commission, in the Soviet view, will be unable to take decisions in such matters without reference to the Security Council, even where sanctions are not involved? On several other occasions, Vishinsky repeated that the Soviet Union agrees that there should be no veto in the International Control Commission. We might therefore ask what categories of disputes the Soviet representative would foresee being referred for settlement to the Security Council where the veto would remain in effect.

5. We are also completely at a loss to understand the meaning of point 3 of Vishinsky's statement which seems to be an attempt to condense several points originally made separately in the Soviet proposals of June 11, 1947.

6. To return to the core of the Soviet proposal, there are several further questions that could be asked about the Soviet inspection plan. In plenary on November 23 and in the Ad Hoc Committee on November 12, Vishinsky confirmed that the International Control Commission would be within its rights in deciding by majority vote when and where both periodic and special inspections should be carried out. We were told that we should not interpret the word "periodic" to mean "at regular intervals", but rather it should be understood to mean "whenever necessary". On the basis of what the Soviet Union has learned about atomic energy during the past few years, is their representative prepared to explain why they believe that inspection visits would only be necessary "on Thursday and Monday and again on Thursday, if they want to", as Mr. Vishinsky is reported in the press to have said? Why should the Soviet Union be prepared to accept inspection every four days, and not every four minutes? The latter is, in our view, essential for sound technical reasons and our difference with the Soviet Union would, therefore, appear to be not one of principle so much as a difference of opinion as to what is technically necessary. We might, therefore, put a further question as to whether the Soviet Union would be prepared to accept inspection every four minutes (i.e., continuous) if a majority of the International Commission found that continuous inspection was necessary.

7. Vishinsky did not argue against the technical necessity of continuous inspection, but merely said in the Ad Hoc Committee on November 12 (paragraph 96 of the Summary Record) that such a proposal implied distrust and such distrust was surprising, as the Control Commission could always send a special commission of enquiry to check on suspected abuses or violations. Mr. Pearson had already dealt with this point by quoting Vishinsky's own statement on the futility of anything less than continuous inspection of Greek guerillas interned in Albania. In what respect is the problem of atomic inspection different?

8. On November 10, Vishinsky told the Ad Hoc Committee (paragraph 21 of the Summary Record) that "references to selection (of international inspection staff) on an international basis were pointless since the leading role in the agency would be played by Powers most of which were parties to aggressive military alliances hostile to the Soviet Union.... the Soviet Union would not submit to such a form of international control." Does this mean that the Soviet Union now rejects the principle of international recruitment of the Control Commission which it accepted in paragraph 5 (c) of the Soviet proposals of June 11, 1947 and confirmed in Gromyko's reply to Cadogan on September 5, 1947?

9. In the same debate on November 10, Vishinsky is quoted as saying in paragraph 25 of the Summary Record, dealing with the majority plan, that "no one believes that the plan could successfully avert the horrors of war". The Soviet representatives have objected to the majority plan from the first because it went too far, and because it was a more effective plan than the Soviet were prepared, for political reasons, to accept. Does the U.S.S.R. representative think that the Soviet plan for more limited inspection and control could avert war?

10. Finally, we should like to hear what reply the Soviet representative would be prepared to make to a request for his counter-proposals to meet the problem we have attempted to solve by means of (a) the principle of strategic locations and (b) a quota system negotiated by treaty before the establishment of the International Control Commission. How would they propose to assess the true needs of any given area for fissile materials for peaceful purposes alone? What safeguards do they propose against a country padding its peaceful requirements in order to build up a stockpile for war? What is their objection to negotiating such matters beforehand and writing the agreed quotas into a treaty, setting precise limits to the authority of the International Control Commission?

11. We understand that you have also been undertaking a similar study of the documents on atomic energy and we hope that you will feel free to amend, delete or add to any of the questions which we have tentatively formulated. We do, however, think that it might be inappropriate for us to put questions in a formal letter to the Soviet representative and would suggest that, if your Western colleagues agree, these and other similar questions which they may have in mind, should be divided up among the five of you so that the questions would not appear to the Russians as a direct attack from the Canadian Delegate alone.

Atomic Energy six Power talks.

1. The 13th meeting of the six Powers took place at Lake Success at 10:45 a.m. December 20th, 1949, under my Chairmanship.

2. The procedure described in my teletype No. 1191 of 17th December, 1949,† was followed, it being unanimously agreed that:-

(a) The list of suggestions prepared by the Secretariat, my letters to Rau and Romulo, and their replies thereto (see paragraph 9 below) should be referred to Governments for study and comment, and that these suggestions be added to the existing agenda.

(b) The meetings should remain closed, but that periodic reports, including the issue of summary records would be made whenever deemed appropriate and that representatives might, either individually or collectively, issue their own commentary or commentaries to supplement such summary records.

(c) The next meeting would be held at 10:30 a.m., 19th January, 1950, thus allowing Secretariat members to take holidays.

3. After the foregoing procedure had been agreed, I suggested that a useful means of furthering our progress might be by an exchange of questions based on various statements made during the Assembly debates. There were no objections and this procedure was adopted.

4. I first called on Hickerson (USA) who stated that he had several questions, but would like to make them at a later meeting. He indicated to Tsarapkin (USSR) that one of these would be based on Vishinsky's statement that "quotas" were designed to shackle the economic development of States.

5. Cadogan (United Kingdom) then put an informal question to Tsarapkin based on Soviet statements in the General Assembly regarding the composition of the international agency, enquiring in particular as to what method of selection the Soviet had in mind for recruiting personnel for the agency. (Cadogan's enquiry had the same purpose as the question contained in paragraph 8 of your teletype No. 817 of 15th December). The reply to Cadogan was not only evasive but baffling. Tsarapkin stated in his reply that when the Soviet representative had touched on the composition of the international agency it was linked directly with the wide powers of ownership envisaged in the "United States plan", and should be considered in this light. He added that the Soviet statement on this point could not be taken by itself and that his remarks did not, of course, refer to the Soviet proposals of the 11th January, 1947, which made clear the membership, etc., of the international control organ.

6. After this "answer" Cadogan obviously decided not to press the point, though the question may, of course, be posed later.

7. There then ensued a short exchange between Hickerson and Tsarapkin regarding the latter's reference to the "United States plan of control". Tsarapkin stated that he would persist in referring to it as such in spite of Hickerson's objections. I made a short interjection pointing out that there were fundamental differences between the Baruch proposals and the majority plan. Tsarapkin reiterated his previous position that these modifications were of no importance, and that the basic features of the Baruch proposals were still contained in the majority plan.

8. The meeting concluded with a statement by Wei (China), the incoming Chairman, who made it clear that our agenda would now be considered in three phases with priority of consideration as follows:

(a) Questions based on statements made in the General Assembly;

(b) Suggestions advanced by various delegations and persons during the General Assembly which would be discussed when comments of Governments were received, and

(c) Consideration of the remaining topics not yet discussed on the United Kingdom paper.

9. As you will have seen from paragraph 2 (a) above, I have now received a reply from Romulo submitting an "additional memorandum" on his suggestions. I am forwarding this memorandum by bag. It does not differ from the original proposal submitted by him, though he now goes somewhat further "overboard" in suggesting that first priority be given "to the possibility of reaching some agreement on interim prohibition or control." When you have read Romulo's memorandum I think you will agree that such a suggestion is not only dangerous, but completely frivolous. My personal opinion is similar to that contained in an editorial in the New York Times or 21st December which deals comprehensively with Romulo's suggestions.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Reference your EX-427†—atomic energy.

We had a talk with Gordon Munro this afternoon in the course of which he gave us the following account of recent developments. Munro returned from England about ten days ago where he attended a meeting of the Chiefs of Staff and one or more meetings of the Committee on atomic energy over which Makins now presides. Before he left for London Munro had had a purely private talk with Carroll Wilson, who had expressed as his personal opinion the view that it would be desirable, and he thought feasible, to have a general review of collaboration between the three countries in the near future.

While he was in London Munro was authorized to tell Carroll Wilson informally that the United Kingdom Government would be prepared to accept an invitation to discuss collaboration, assuming:

- (a) That the C.P.C. would be the forum,
- (b) That the talks would be on a wide field, and
- (c) That they would be held without prejudice to United Kingdom domestic problems and without prejudice to the existing modus vivendi.

Munro has suggested further to Carroll Wilson that when the project has proceeded further

(1) The Secretary of State take up the matter of an invitation informally with the United Kingdom Ambassador so as to get it on the highest official level,

(2) There should be preliminary talks to discuss agenda and procedure for which Makins and Cockcroft would come from London, and

(3) The talks should take place fairly soon. To this Wilson agreed and said that it might be possible to arrange them within the next ten days.

With reference to (3) above, Munro learned today from Arneson that because of the large amount of preliminary work which must be done here it now looks as if the week of March 14th would be the earliest possible date for the preliminary talks. (Incidentally, this is the reason for the postponement of the sub-group meeting in which [W.B.] Lewis was to represent Canada. Dean [C.J.] Mackenzie I believe knows of this postponement.)

In the course of his conversation with Carroll Wilson, Munro was given the following account of recent developments within the United States.

About six weeks ago a self-appointed (with the informal blessing of their Chiefs) working group met in Princeton. The group consisted of Carroll Wilson, George Kennan, George Butler, Gordon Arneson (These three of the State Department) Oppenheimer, Conant, General Nicholls (Director of Military Application of Atomic Energy), and Webster (Chairman of the Military Liaison Committee).

In so far as the international field is concerned this Committee came to the conclusions:

(1) That it was useless to hope that anything would be accomplished in the United Nations in the matter of international control,

(2) That it was essential in view of recent developments that atomic energy policy in the United States should be brought into line with general United States foreign policy.

In the United States domestic field they concluded:

(1) That machinery must be organized by means of which clearer directives for various Departments as to the future of atomic energy could be formulated,

(2) That the military, the scientists and the directors of foreign policy must be brought closer together,

(3) That to achieve objective (1) and (2) a Committee of three, Acheson, Forrestal, and Lilienthal, should be set up of which the Secretary of State should be the Chairman, in order to control over-all atomic energy policy, and

(4) That the ultimate and final authority should be the National Security Council.

This self-appointed working group also came to the conclusion that the time had come for the whole question of United States, United Kingdom and Canadian cooperation in the atomic energy field to be re-examined in the light of the above findings and in the light of events and developments since the present modus vivendi was agreed to. They decided that the C.P.C. would be the best forum for this re-examination. From their point of view it would have the advantage that the United States members of the C.P.C. are the members of the proposed top level Committee.

This working group informed the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defence, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission of what they had done "out of school” and the three Chiefs informally agreed with their findings. The Secretary of State reported these findings to the President who in turn gave them his informal blessing. The working group (less Oppenheimer and Conant) has therefore been instructed to proceed with its task and to draw up plans which will include plans for a re-examination of tripartite cooperation. The fact that at the same time this group will be drawing up plans for a general reorganization of atomic energy policy control domestically explains the delay in holding preliminary tripartite meetings to prepare the way for a full-dress C.P.C. meeting.

Munro and I agreed this afternoon that it would probably be better if I were to make no approach at the present time to the Americans. All of his conversations have been private and most informal and no papers on the matter have been exchanged between him and Carroll Wilson. I think, therefore, that we should keep in the background for the present time and Munro has undertaken to keep me informed of anything that develops. I shall undoubtedly have an opportunity of discussing these questions myself when plans for the preliminary meeting become firmer. Ends.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Reference my WA-470 of February 23rd.

At Arneson's request Stone had lunch with him yesterday and reports as follows.

2. The task of getting the legs of the domestic centipede to march in step has been a difficult one. The situation now is that informal Working Group to which I referred in my teletype under reference has completed its studies and recommendations in respect both of a general reorganization of atomic energy policy control here, and a re-examination of tri-partite cooperation. The results of this work are in the President's hands and it is hoped that by the time he returns from Key West he will have decided what the next step is to be. Arneson thinks that the problems raised by the recommendations of the Working Group will have to be discussed either in executive session of the Joint Congressional Committee or privately by the President with Congressional leaders. He is a little worried that the President's present and increasing difficulties with Congress may make it hard for Mr. Truman to go as far with Congressional leaders as he would like to, and as the recommendations which he has before him call for.

3. It seems that in the field of tri-partite cooperation, the recommendations, facing both the scientific and political realities of the present situation, call for complete exchanges of information over the whole field of atomic energy. We gather from Arneson that the task of getting acceptance of this idea among the various officials and Departments concerned has been a very difficult one and one which had to be approached gradually. It seems to have been successful and Arneson gives full credit to Webster who, as you know, succeeded Carpenter as Chairman of the Military Liaison Committee. This success, however, must be qualified by the observation that the views of the new Secretary of Defence, Mr. Johnson, are not completely known yet, but it is expected that he will be in general agreement with the recommendations made.

4. Arneson also gave credit to the attitude of the British who, last September, withdrew pressure which they had started to bring to bear to expand the field of cooperation and exchange of information. Arneson said that they had been helpful during these critical months by sitting on the sidelines so as to give the people here complete freedom in solving their own problems in their own way. He added that he knew that Munro would pass on to us any information which he had from Wilson or the State Department, and in the light of this knowledge and in view of the pressure which has been on everybody, he had not undertaken to keep us informed until now.

5. The timetable is not definite yet. Arneson hopes, however, that preliminary talks might begin by the end of this month (which would be the earliest date) or early in April. For these talks presumably Makins and Cockcroft would come out from England. Until they have been held and the situation reviewed it is not possible to say when the C.P.C. would meet formally.

6. In the course of his conversation Arneson made one or two observations which will be of interest to you. He said that the role of the State Department in the field of tri-partite cooperation would become more important than hitherto. The reason behind this is that the State Department is not so tightly tied down by certain provisions of the McMahon Act as is the Atomic Energy Commission.

7. One point on which the United States will insist is the maintenance of complete liberty of action in the use of weapons.

8. The policy of the United Kingdom in respect of its own programme of development in the British Isles will be important. From what Arneson said it may be that as a quid for the quo of complete exchange, the people here might request the British to limit their operations in the United Kingdom and to participate closely, if they so desire, in developments in the United States. Arneson added that the Americans would be quite happy if the British were to operate in Canada. They would, however, not be happy with any extensive development programme in the United Kingdom which would involve vast plant and large stockpiles of raw material there.

9. In the matter of raw material there have as yet been no withdrawals from the United Kingdom stockpile under the present modus vivendi. Arneson said, however, that some withdrawals may be necessary this year.

10. The question of other countries will have to come up again and be reviewed in the light of any decisions which may be taken as to extending the field of cooperation and exchange between the three of us. The people here will be tougher than ever on the retransmission of information.

11. Arneson has undertaken to keep us informed of developments and I shall perhaps be in a position in a week or so to report further. Ends.

We have no further information on the details of the proposals which the United States may put forward at the forthcoming C.P.C. meeting. While I have not been able to see Munro or Hoyer Millar today, we have had a word with Henderson on the telephone, and it seems that the British have nothing more than what is given in my WA-741 of March 17th and my WA-470 of February 23rd.

2. It is clear now, however, that the meeting of the C.P.C. will be considerably delayed as it looks as if the earliest possible date for the informal discussions for which Makins and Cockcroft would come from London is now April 20th. The British here, in fact, think that it may be well after this date before these discussions get under way.

3. Arneson is talking to Osborn and McNaughton in New York today. He merely told Stone that he wished to consult them in the matter of timing as between activities in the United Nations Commission and meetings here. Neither we nor the British understand clearly what he is thinking about as Commission activities in New York will presumably be in a glare of publicity, whereas any meetings and discussions here will be behind the thickest kind of a veil. The British are a little worried about Arneson's preoccupation that some relationship, even if it is only a "timing" one, should exist between the United Nations Commission and the C.P.C. They believe that this preoccupation derives from Arneson having previously worked in Osborn's group before taking over his present job in the State Department.

4. We shall enquire more deeply into this when Arneson returns next week and after the pressure of this weekend is over. We shall also then have some more detailed discussions with Hoyer Millar. In the meantime, I should be glad to have

New York, March 30, 1949

Following for Heeney, Begins: Reference your message No. 296 of 29 March,† 3 Power discussions on atomic energy.

I had a talk with Arneson, New York, in the afternoon of Wednesday, 30 March, at which Ignatieff was also present. The following are the main points of the conversation.

Reasons for the proposed talks:

(a) The "modus vivendi" agreed in meetings of the C.P.C. on December 1947 and January 1948 will run out at the end of this year. It is, therefore, necessary in the opinion of the United States that the representatives of the three Governments meet again and try to reach a common view on atomic energy activities for a further period with particular reference to exchange of information and allocation of materials.

(b) In the almost certain absence of agreement on the international control of atomic energy in the UNAEC, it is necessary for the 3 Powers to consider their own special position in relation to atomic energy and also to consider what disclosure of that position should be made to the public.

2. Procedure.

The British in Washington, through their Ambassador as well as Munro, have stressed the need for preliminary agenda talks, in order to clarify in advance of any meeting of the C.P.C. the exact scope of the discussions and to specify the kind of decisions which the three Governments would be called upon to take. The U.K. wish to have their representatives in Washington strengthened by the presence of Makins and Cockcroft for the purpose of these talks. The U.S., Arneson said, are quite willing to follow this procedure. On their side they have been making preparations for some time past for these talks, of which you have, no doubt, been informed by our Embassy in Washington and the President now has the results of these preliminary studies, with which in the later stages Acheson, Forrestal and Lilienthal have been directly concerned. Arneson indicated that Acheson would himself wish to be available to take part in the preliminary talks and this would, of necessity, affect the time-table. The Secretary has to take an active part in connection with the submission of the North Atlantic Treaty as well as the Military Assistance Act to Congress. It is, therefore, thought that he would not be available until some time after Easter. Moreover, it is now learned that Cockcroft will not be able to come to the United States until after Easter.

3. Agenda.

The main items for discussion in the preliminary talks, Arneson indicated, would be the questions relating to (A) exchange of information between the three Governments (B) exchange of information with non-CPC, but friendly countries (C) the allocation of materials. As regards (A) Arneson said that the U.K. in September last, had asked the U.S. Government to make available to them information regarding atomic weapons. It was recognized that this was an issue of first importance, but no reply has yet been given to the U.K. Government by the U.S. As regards (B) the U.K. Government has received a request for assistance in developing an atomic energy program from Norway, which is now known to have discovered and developed a limited quantity of uranium from pitchblende ores located in Norway. U.K. on advice for the U.S. has apparently declined such assistance. Regarding (C) the existing agreement on allocations will have expired at the end of the year. Arneson said that the arrangement has worked well so far. However, as Congo output has declined in 1949, it will be necessary to make a withdrawal from U.K. stockpiles within this year. Arneson said that the thinking among U.S. officials on this question is to have a free and frank discussion between the Three Powers in order to arrive at a mutually acceptable formula which would allocate supplies in relation to actual need as between the three countries.

4. Arneson said that he expected that the greatest difficulties in the discussions of this agenda would arise in relation to the exchange of information. He said it would be necessary to get clearance from Congressional leaders on the interpretation in this connection of the McMahon Act. They are now operating on a rather inflexible interpretation, but in view of the new circumstances particularly arising from the failure to reach a broader international agreement on the control of atomic energy, it might be necessary to consider a more flexible interpretation of the term, "common defence and security". This question would particularly arise if there were pressure to extend the exchange of information beyond classified material to friendly countries, other than the Three Powers.

5. North Atlantic Pact.

Arneson indicated that the present U.S. thinking was that the tripartite arrangements on atomic energy should not (not) be linked with the North Atlantic Treaty, nor with the Military Assistance Bill. He said that the tripartite arrangements arose from different origins and were based on special security arrangements which were not applicable in the same way to other countries signatories of the Treaty. However, certain special arrangements might be considered in the case of specified countries like Norway or South Africa, where considerations of reciprocity of benefit might apply.

6. Relations between 3 Powers Discussions and UNAEC.

Arneson thought that the preliminary talks in Washington would give an opportunity to the 3 Powers to exchange views in regard to the 6 Power consultations which are required by the Assembly Resolution adopted in Paris. He said that the U.S. on their part were under no illusion that any agreement is likely to result from these consultations in view of the present Soviet attitude. However, it was essential that these consultations should take place, preferably on a high official level. As to the time, he thought that it might be desirable that the consultations might take place in June; the field having been previously cleared by the discussions in the UNAEC as well as the private consultations on a tripartite basis. If, as expected, no agreement resulted, the U.S. authorities were thinking that it would be necessary to make a public disclosure in the form of agreed declarations. For their part, the U.S. Government were thinking in terms of stating U.S. Government now had no alternative but to continue its weapons program and to make arrangements with the two other Powers with whom it was associated in special atomic arrangements, while declaring that the ultimate goal of the U.S. still remained a general agreement on the banning of atomic weapons and international control. This, however, would only be possible if a sufficient degree of openness and cooperation were forthcoming from the Soviet Union to enable a plan of the kind contemplated in the reports of the Atomic Energy Commission to come into effect. Arneson said that it was thought that the 6 Power consultations should be concluded before the CPC meets to take formal decisions following up the work done in the preliminary discussions contemplated in April. In this way, the public would have been informed as a result of the break-down of the 6 Power consultations of the failure to reach agreement in the UNAEC before any public statement is made regarding the continuation of 3 Power cooperation in the field of atomic energy.

7. The Form of 3 Power Agreement.

Arneson said that no firm view had been developed in the U.S. on this point, but it was generally felt that whatever agreement was negotiated, it should not (repeat not) take the form of a treaty. It might take the form again of identic[al] declarations of intent. On the other hand, there were some in Washington who thought that a more formal executive agreement might be necessary to cover principles, leaving the details to be worked out in the CPC. In support of this view, it was argued that if the exchange of information were to be broadened, it might be necessary to have Congressional sanction and, therefore, a more formal agreement would be desirable.

8. In conclusion, Arneson stressed that the U.S. thinking was still in a preliminary and tentative stage and that they would continue to keep in close touch with our Embassy in Washington, as well as the U.K. Embassy. Ends.

1. COMBINED POLICY COMMITTEE AGENDA

The Panel took note of the recent reports from Mr. Wrong and General McNaughton (telegrams Nos. WA-741, WA-912, and 378) concerning the proposed agenda for the forthcoming meeting of the Combined Policy Committee and the views of the State Department as to the timing of the meeting in relation to the Six Power consultations which are to take place under the auspices of the United Nations.

Mr. Heeney thought that what was worrying the U.S. authorities was once again the location of production reactors in the United Kingdom rather than on the North American continent; they did not want production in an area which might be exposed to attack and where operations would very probably have to shut down in the event of hostilities. Dr. Mackenzie agreed that this was probably the case, as the United Kingdom had completed plans for the construction of two production reactors; he added that he had always found it difficult to understand the insistence of the United Kingdom authorities on having production piles located in Great Britain; apart from the considerations of prestige, he saw no valid economic reason, as present production reactors are not important power units and reactors producing on the North American continent could supply the United Kingdom with fissionable materials that might be required for any future power or military development programme. Dr. Solandt pointed out that the United Kingdom was naturally most interested in the possibilities of power development from atomic energy, as the cost of her domestic power was continuing to rise with the price of coal.

Mr. Robertson thought that the United Kingdom Government's previous objection to locating their production reactors anywhere else than in the United Kingdom might be more easily overcome after the signing of the North Atlantic Pact. It would be easier, he thought, for the United Kingdom Government to satisfy public opinion when they had entered upon a formal alliance.

Dr. Mackenzie then suggested that the Canadian Government might offer a possible compromise if we were prepared to go into production in Canada; he had been surprised at the great interest which the United Kingdom authorities had shown in this idea when he had put it forward informally during his last visit to England. Mr. Robertson pointed out that for our balance of payments it would be better to produce for the U.S. market, and it was possible that United States capital might assist in our development, as they had in the construction of the Shipshaw project. Dr. Mackenzie agreed that the U.S. was the only market at present, and went on to say that he was at present considering the feasibility of a plan which, in its present tentative stage, appeared sound, although all estimates of cost are only preliminary. He believed it might be possible to build in Canada a reactor for the production of about ten times the quantity of plutonium now being made annually at Chalk River. The costs for construction of the plant would be about thirty million dollars, the operating costs including amortization of the capital cost over five years might be as high as perhaps twenty million dollars. Nevertheless, if we could count on selling the United States sixty kilograms of plutonium annually at the estimated present cost to them the investment might be a very attractive one. He had discussed the prospect with Mr. Howe and wanted to consult Mr. Lilienthal quite frankly and informally as to the technical aspects. At any rate, it was certain that we could at present manufacture plutonium more economically than either the United States or the United Kingdom and could probably count on a continuing market in the United States, as the plutonium would always be inherently valuable, whether it was to be used for war or peace. Dr. Mackenzie pointed out that the above studies were undertaken because we recognize that the present pile at Chalk River has a finite life which although at present indeterminate will probably be not more than five more years and unless we start planning for future piles we will find ourselves in a most embarrassing and untenable position in the not too distant future. Dr. Mackenzie also observed that the construction of a new major project would probably add impetus to the search for new sources of raw material. The recent discoveries of uranium bearing ore in the Sault area and in northern Saskatchewan added substance to the belief that more important sources of uranium will be found in the Canadian Shield. Possibly the greatest advantage of all in the construction of a new plant would be that, instead of selling our raw material to the United States, we would be selling her the manufactured product and retaining a stockpile of raw material which we might expect to be able to re-work when methods of extraction and recycling far more efficient than our present techniques are developed.

The Panel agreed that, with Mr. Howe's knowledge and consent, Dr. Mackenzie should speak to Mr. Lilienthal.

Mr. Heeney suggested that a paper should be prepared for the Prime Minister and Mr. Howe on the importance of the forthcoming CPC meeting, as it might affect major policy questions between Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Another item which Mr. Heeney thought would probably be discussed during the CPC meeting was the question of supply. The Congo production is falling off, and the present modus vivendi terminates at the end of this year. In order to keep U.S. reactors operating at close to capacity, the United States authorities were undoubtedly anxious to ensure a continuing supply of uranium, and this might create difficulties both for United Kingdom and Canadian production plans.

1. Wright spoke to Arneson today respect latest position exploratory talks and review of Atomic Energy Three Power coordination.

2. It now appears unlikely that proposed talks will be held before end of June or early July.

3. Americans feel that congressional preoccupation with Atlantic Pact and military assistance bills would make it inadvisable to enter proposed discussions while such bills are being debated. International opinion would inevitably link Atomic discussions with military assistance which is not intention at present time and might cause embarrassment with Atlantic Pact signatories.

4. The political situation here suggests that the extra time could profitably be used to ensure adequate congressional backing for talks when they begin. Hickenlooper last week indicated that any change in the present interpretation of the McMahon Act would be closely scrutinized by Congress.¹⁴

5. Arneson also felt that the proposed talks should not be held before adjournment of the United Nations General Assembly with the likelihood that the future position of UNAEC would by then be clarified.

6. The British are pressing for discussions to begin as soon as possible as United Kingdom policy depends to a certain extent on the conclusions which may be reached at the meeting. It is not considered therefore that the meeting will be unduly delayed when above conditions have been satisfied. Ends.

¹⁴ Un mois plus tard Wrong fit l'observation suivante au sujet de l'examen rigoureux des membres du Congrès:

One month later Wrong made the following observation about Congressional scrutiny:

You will have noticed the fresh attacks which are being made here on the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission arising from the discovery that, in at least one case, a Communist was awarded a scholarship financed from the appropriation of the Commission. The disappearance by loss or theft of a small quantity of enriched material from one of the Commission's establishments has given additional cause for attack and is leading to a demand for the removal of Mr. Lilienthal as Chairman. Since the focus of criticism is the Joint Congressional Committee, these developments lead me to think that the tripartite talks will be still further delayed as they obviously will make it more difficult for the Commission to hold the advance discussion which they have in mind.

FROM MR. C.R. ATTLEE TO MR. L.S. ST. LAURENT

My colleagues and I have recently been reviewing the requirements of our atomic energy programme for military purposes, and the object of this message is to seek your help in a matter of particular concern to us.

2. Our programme requires that a substantial and continuous supply of polonium should be assured to make the weapons effective. From the nature of the substance supplies must continually be replenished. In the event of war our own sources of supply might be put out of action and we are therefore very anxious to have a reserve source on which we can fall back.

3. With my authority, Cockcroft, Director of our Atomic Research Establishment, recently discussed the matter informally with Dr. C.J. Mackenzie, and I understand that your Atomic Energy Control Board have been considering the question of the erection of a second pile in the interests of the continuance of your own programme. Development on these lines would be of very great value to our programme in the United Kingdom, particularly as a reserve source of polonium. I know that the erection of a second pile is a matter which you will wish to consider very seriously in all its bearings, but if you are able to co-operate with us in the matter of polonium supplies I am confident that very substantial benefit to our common interests will result.

4. We should of course be very ready to assist in any extension of your programme to the best of our ability, and we should be willing, if this were useful, to lend you the services of two or three of our scientists from Harwell.

Dear Mr. [G.E.B.] Shannon:

The Acting Prime Minister¹⁵ has directed me to request you to send the following message to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in reply to Mr. Attlee's message to Mr. St. Laurent, which you delivered to Mr. Howe on the 21st instant.

The message reads:

"In the absence of the Prime Minister from Ottawa, your top secret and personal message of July 21st was communicated to me as Acting Prime Minister.

Although I have advised the Prime Minister of its receipt he will not be in a position to consider its contents until after his return to Ottawa, but I felt meanwhile I should advise you that the government is at the moment considering the general question of future developments in our Canadian activities in the field of atomic energy and our Atomic Energy Control Board is having a general report on future systems prepared for me as the responsible Minister so that I may, in due course, make recommendations to the Cabinet.

We agree that it would be highly desirable for your government to have a reserve source of polonium as suggested and we will be happy to co-operate in that regard to the extent of our available facilities.

I am advised that at the moment, and we hope for the next few years, such reserve capacity could be quickly made available from our present pile and this we freely offer.

When our long term plans take more definite form I know the Prime Minister will advise you further."

Yours sincerely,

MESSAGE FROM MR. C.R. ATTLEE TO MR. L.S. ST. LAURENT¹⁶

I am obliged for the helpful answer which Mr. Howe sent me recently in your absence to my message to you of 21st July. I am grateful for the offer in paragraph 4. TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], August 12, 1949

You asked me to have a memorandum prepared explaining the exchange of telegrams between Prime Ministers in July, your copies of which I am returning herewith, concerning atomic energy.

The United Kingdom Government has apparently decided to manufacture atomic weapons in the United Kingdom. From what we know of the discussions in Washington last month between the United Kingdom and the United States, it appears that the United Kingdom are asking for more information on weapon development than the United States authorities are at present able to give under the terms of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946. Moreover, the United States authorities have consistently opposed on strategic grounds the location of large-scale production facilities in the United Kingdom. Until fairly recently we believed that the United Kingdom Government was primarily interested in large-scale production only for future power development. We have tended to agree with the United States that strategically it is desirable to keep all major production establishments on this side of the Atlantic.

Dr. Mackenzie has discussed with Mr. Lilienthal in May and with Sir John Cockcroft in June the possibility of a second, and much larger atomic pile being constructed in Canada, not only to replace Chalk River when it wears out but to enable Canada to process a much larger proportion of our uranium and sell it to the United States as plutonium. (This would enable us to keep for possible future use, by more efficient recycling processes not yet developed, the uranium from which only part of the plutonium can under present conditions be extracted.) Both Mr. Lilienthal and Sir John Cockcroft are very interested in the possibility of Canada building a second pile, and Dr. Mackenzie thinks that Mr. Attlee's telegram is primarily intended to encourage us to proceed with its construction.

It is also clear, from Mr. Attlee's telegram of July 21, that the United Kingdom Government intend to proceed on a programme of weapon development. The quantity of polonium which Mr. Attlee requests is small and could be produced as a by-product from the operation of our present pile at Chalk River.¹⁷ If we were to undertake this commitment for the United Kingdom Government, it would not need to interfere with our production of plutonium for sale to the United States. That is the gist of a technical memorandum which Dr. Mackenzie has sent to Mr. Howe at his request.

Before Mr. Howe, as Acting Prime Minister, sent his telegram of July 28 to Mr. Attlee, he had consulted only Mr. Pickersgill. It is clear from his correspondence with Mr. Attlee that Mr. Howe did not intend his reply to be taken as a commitment. However, as you anticipated, Mr. Attlee has expressed his gratitude for the "offer in paragraph 4". I am enclosing a copy of Mr. Attlee's telegram dated August 6 which was sent to us through the Prime Minister's Office.

Dr. Mackenzie does not expect Mr. Howe to take any further action until after the Combined Policy Committee (U.K., U.S., and Canada) meeting which will probably take place in Washington in the latter part of September. There are many technical problems to be considered before a concrete proposal for the construction of a second pile can be considered by Cabinet. Still more important in our long-term planning is to make sure that if we do construct a large pile we shall have an assured market in the United States for the plutonium which it will produce.

We may therefore expect that no definite reply to the United Kingdom Government's proposal will be given at least until October, and that in the meantime the matter will be discussed fully by the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy of which Mr. Robertson is Chairman and Mr. Heeney a member.

Washington, September 9, 1949

My message WA-2371 of September 1st,† tripartite talks on Atomic Energy.

Ignatieff saw Arneson again Wednesday, 7th September. Arneson said that as far as the United States were concerned September 20th could now be confirmed as the meeting date for the C.P.C. I understand this date is acceptable to the United Kingdom. I take it from your message EX-2023 of August 19th† that September 20th may be accepted for our part also. I shall speak to Mr. Howe on this point.

2. As regards the agenda, Arneson again said that it was proposed that the tripartite talks would cover the whole field of the relationship in the field of atomic energy between Canada, United States and United Kingdom. He said that the United States thinking was that the scope of the talks could be broken down under three main headings which would also represent the respective titles of three sub-committees which would have to be set up when the C.P.C. meets on September 20th.

(a) Strategic and military considerations. This would cover the re-examination and definition of the objectives of the atomic energy activities in the three countries;

(b) Allocations of raw materials (this would cover consideration of estimated production and of requirements);

(c) Exchange of scientific and technical information (this would involve consideration of whether or not defined areas might be extended and if so to what extent).

3. As regards (a) (strategic and military considerations) Arneson said that the United States Government would attach great importance on exchange of views in this field. These talks would be carried on on the assumption, he said, that industrial uses of atomic energy could not be considered practicable on any significant scale for another 20 years. When asked who would represent the United States in these talks Arneson said that the following would probably represent the United States in a Subcommittee on "strategic and military considerations":

General Burns, Chief Adviser on political and military matters to Mr. Johnson, Secretary of Defence;

General Webster and General Nichols from the Military Liaison Committee; and General Norstad, Chief of Staff to General Vandenberg.

From the personnel which the United States contemplate to use in these talks I think it may be assumed that they intend to go into the strategic implications of atomic energy rather thoroughly.

4. In addition to these three main headings into which it is contemplated the agenda would be divided, Arneson said that the question which would require consideration first in point of time was what kind of interim extension of the existing modus vivendi would be required primarily to take care of short run requirements of the existing atomic energy projects. Arneson thought that such an extension would have to provide for six months at least as it was almost certain that any new long-term tripartite arrangements would require Congressional approval.

5. On the question of publicity, Arneson said that the United States Government was trying to get as much information about the tripartite arrangements as possible into the public record in order to satisfy the Congress. Arneson said that the United States were contemplating the issue of a press release announcing the tripartite talks. Such an announcement would probably describe these talks as "exploratory discussions" and would refer to the recent statement by the President about the existence of a "modus vivendi". Arneson hoped to have a preliminary draft ready on the basis of which he might consult the Canadian and United States Joint Secretaries of the C.P.C. before the end of the week.

You asked Mr. George for a memorandum for tomorrow's meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, outlining the development of Canadian-United States-United Kingdom co-operation on atomic energy matters. The memorandum is attached.†

2. You will recall that at the special meeting of the Chief of Staff Committee on August 22 to consider the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff request for our Chiefs' assistance in guaranteeing the United Kingdom a supply of polonium, the Chiefs decided that Mr. Howe's reply of July 28 to Mr. Attlee's telegram would be a sufficiently definite commitment that the Canadian Government would be "happy to co-operate" with the United Kingdom Government in this regard.

3. In the attached memorandum, we have not attempted to set out what subjects might be discussed by the Strategic and Military Sub-committee of the C.P.C. (always provided that Congress agree to exchanging information with Canada and the United Kingdom on such matters). From our point of view, I suppose the most difficult question will be whether or not the United Kingdom Government's decision to produce plutonium in quantity and to manufacture weapons in the United Kingdom is justified on strategic grounds. I should think it would be more fruitful if the Sub-committee were able to reach agreement to add certain strategic and military subjects to the "areas of co-operation" under the new modus vivendi, so that we could exchange views on all the work that has been done in the United Kingdom and United States separately since the Bikini tests when co-operation on military aspects virtually ceased because of the United States Atomic Energy Act. There must be a great deal of Defence Research material, including training techniques and long term strategic concepts which could be discussed very profitably from our point of view. Mr. George's letter of August 17† to the Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee, which was circulated to the Chiefs as CSC Paper 6-1, discussed, among other things, the problem of strategic locations.

II. CANADA-U.S.-U.K. CO-OPERATION IN THE FIELD OF ATOMIC ENERGY

8. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs reviewed the general situation concerning co-operation and exchange of information in the field of atomic energy as between Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom. The Combined Policy Committee, which was established in 1943, had continued in time of peace and, in accordance with its terms of reference, was the formal instrument by which the three countries continue "full and effective" co-operation in accordance with the agreement announced by the Prime Ministers of Canada and the United Kingdom and the President of the United States in November of 1945. Co-operation had been severely limited by the U.S. Atomic Energy Act of 1946, which prescribed that "there shall be no exchange of information with other nations with respect to the use of atomic energy until Congress declares by joint resolution that effective and enforceable safeguards have been established". So long as the U.S. Congress had been quiescent, it had been possible to effect certain exchanges of information. When, however, Congressional committees on atomic energy commenced their inquiries into the security of the atomic project, practically all exchanges of information were eliminated in order to ensure unquestionable compliance with the relevant U.S. legislation.

At the next meeting of the Combined Policy Committee, to be held in Washington on September 20th, 1949, the United States proposed to set up a sub-committee to consider the strategic and military aspects of atomic energy. Apparently great importance was being attached to the work of this proposed sub-committee as evinced by the strength and character of the U.S. representation.

The Canadian Government would probably be represented by Mr. Howe, Mr. Robertson and Dr. Mackenzie. It was understood that Mr. Howe had requested Dr. Solandt to attend as the representative of the Chiefs of Staff Committee.

9. Dr. Mackenzie said that the military aspects which might be discussed by the sub-committee would probably be on broad strategic lines and that there was little likelihood that technical points would be discussed in this sub-committee.

10. The Committee agreed, after further discussion, that Dr. Solandt would represent the Chiefs of Staff at the meeting of the Combined Policy Committee to be held in Washington 20th September, 1949.

MR. HOWE'S REMARKS TO THE COMBINED POLICY COMMITTEE MEETING ON SEPTEMBER 20TH, 1949¹⁸

Canada's position in the field of atomic energy is well known to all here. We have no plans for military use of atomic energy. Our materials and facilities are employed for the purposes of research only and everything that we have accomplished in this field has been passed to our associates.

In addition, Canada is an important source of raw material. This material has never been subject to allocation by the Combined Development Agency, but has been supplied by Canada to the country that from time to time was in a position to use it most effectively. Canada has no desire to change this arrangement, unless, as an outcome of the present discussions, it would appear that some other disposition seems desirable in the common interest.

With regard to the information which we have received under the present modus vivendi, Canada has no complaint. We believe that we have put the information that came our way to good use. While we could have used more information to advantage, perhaps some benefit has been gained from the situation which has made it necessary for Canadian scientists to work out many problems for themselves.

I. REPORT ON ATOMIC ENERGY DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON

1. The Chairman, Defence Research Board, reported on the atomic energy discussions between Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom (Combined Policy Committee) which had been held in Washington commencing September 20th, 1949.

Background Information

A wartime agreement between the three countries concerned had been reached by which arrangements were made for the pooling of research and the free exchange of information in the field of atomic energy. The Combined Policy Committee, which was established in 1943, had continued in time of peace and, by its terms of reference, was the formal instrument through which the three countries would maintain a full exchange of information. A parallel arrangement provided for the distribution of raw materials, whereby the available supply from non N[orth] American sources would be shared equally by the United States and the United Kingdom.

Following the war, the United Kingdom had started her own independent development of atomic energy.

The McMahon Act of 1946 severely restricted co-operation among the three countries since it prescribed that there would be no exchange of information with other nations with respect to the use of atomic energy until Congress declared by joint resolution that effective and enforceable international safeguards had been established. Therefore the interchange of information between the United States and Canada and the United States and the United Kingdom temporarily ceased.

The United States now found that they would have to develop a formula for dealing with the United Kingdom and Canada within the terms of the McMahon Act. In January, 1948, therefore, a modus vivendi was developed with the object of continuing co-operation and collaboration with the United States and Canada and at the same time ensuring compliance with the relevant legislation. On the raw material side, this had worked out satisfactorily. With regard to the exchange of information, however, the machinery was cumbersome and the terms of the modus vivendi had never been fully implemented.

About a year ago a group of the U.S. authorities (including some leading scientists) had held a series of discussions with the object of taking steps to ensure that atomic energy development in the United States was not tending to get outside the main stream of scientific advancement in this field because of the restrictions imposed by the McMahon Act. The present modus vivendi was due to expire at the end of this year and the United States had instituted these tri-partite talks with the United Kingdom and Canada as a means of establishing a long-range programme of co-operation.

Conclusions

Material

The U.S. authorities had presented a paper outlining their views on the question of the supply of raw material, in which the following were the main points:

(a) the present atomic bomb manufacturing facilities could not utilize all the available raw material;

(b) if the western democracies were going to put forward the maximum combined effort in the atomic energy race, the soundest plan from the economic standpoint would be to expand the U.S. facilities rather than attempt to establish new manufacturing capacity in the United Kingdom;

(Note: U.K. and Canadian representatives supported the above principle)

(c) the British activity in the Atomic Energy field (in the United Kingdom) should, in general, be limited to her present scale of effort (two production piles).

The United Kingdom also proposed the construction of a low separation diffusion plant and it appeared that they intended to go ahead with this project although the proposal was not supported by the United States.

The United Kingdom felt that the industrial development of atomic energy from the standpoint of power production was of more benefit to them than to the United States. Their representatives had also stated that the U.K. Chiefs of Staff had indicated that there was a military requirement for the atomic bomb in the U.K. strategic plan.

To lend further support to the fact that the limiting factor of production was manufacturing facilities, and not raw material, was the development of a process known as "re-cycling" which permitted the use of uranium (theoretically at least) over and over again. Apparently it was intended that production would be undertaken against the available supply of raw material until 1953 and, at that time, "re-cycling" would be resorted to with the result that there would probably be a still greater surplus of raw material at that time. Meanwhile, the general supply arrangements would be as follows:

(a) the British would maintain the operation of their present production piles; and

(b) the United Kingdom would receive ten per cent of the uranium raw material available for the next five years, and the United States, the remaining ninety per cent. It was considered that this distribution of raw material would permit the United Kingdom to proceed with the development of atomic power and, at the same time, produce their own atomic bombs (in limited numbers) if they so desired.

Exchange of Information

The United States were in favour of the greatest possible freedom in the exchange of information on atomic energy. The United Kingdom were in agreement with this principle but wanted assurance that such an exchange should be complete and not limited to specific areas of knowledge as at present. The latter point was appreciated by the U.S. representatives and agreed to by them.

There was general agreement that the best possible means of achieving a free and complete exchange of information was to arrange for the exchange of personnel between the countries concerned.

The United States were in favour of "compartmentalization" of atomic energy development along functional lines which they felt would assist in maintaining the required degree of security.

There was a general agreement among the representatives that there should be a free exchange of intelligence information in the field of atomic energy, with Washington being the exchange centre for the three countries concerned.

Military Aspects

2. Air Vice-Marshal Miller reported that the United States were against the storage of atomic bombs or fissile material in the United Kingdom on the grounds that their safety might be jeopardized in the event of emergency.

The United States also had objection to the manufacture of atomic bombs outside the North American continent, although some of the reasons which they had advanced for reaching this conclusion might be open to question. As an alternative to the United Kingdom manufacturing atomic bombs in their own country, it had been suggested informally that the United States might make available to the U.K. (in the United States) a quantity of bombs equal to the proposed U.K. production, for storage on the North American continent.

Recently the U.S. Chiefs of Staff had been exploring the possibility of developing the atomic bomb as a tactical weapon. This had of course resulted in an upward revision of their requirements for bombs. It was of interest to note, in this connection, that the United States might wish to base some of their tactical air units in the United Kingdom but administrative difficulties had prevented them making this proposal to the United Kingdom up until this time.

The U.S. authorities had expressed a desire to achieve closer collaboration with Canada and the United States in connection with the development of launching sites, carriers and methods of delivery of the bombs. They also felt that it would be particularly useful to study the problem of target selection on a combined basis, to ensure that common doctrine was developed.

In discussing carriers (aircraft), the U.S. representative had pointed out that the production cost of an aircraft of a B-36 type was in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000. For this reason they urged the pooling of carrier development and production resources on the grounds that it would not be economically possible for more than one country of a coalition to be engaged in a project of this magnitude.

Referring to the strategic aspects of the discussions, Air Vice-Marshal Miller stated that the United States had indicated that it was not contemplated that Canadian bases would be used for launching atomic bomb attacks in the event of an emergency but they might be required as staging points or weather alternates.

The United Kingdom had expressed some concern as to whether the United States intended to use only the United Kingdom as the base for strategic air operations. The United States had given assurance, however, that it was their intention to use bases in the U.S. and the Middle East as well as in the U.K.

Storage

3. Dr. Solandt reported that the problem of storing fissile material had been discussed at the meeting. The U.S. method was to disperse the location of their storage establishments in the central part of the country (away from the coast), where they would be least vulnerable to attack. To ensure immunity to attack by atomic bombs, the installations were placed underground. The criteria used for selecting sites were most rigid. An aerodrome capable of taking large aircraft, adjacent to the storage facilities, was essential. Guarding arrangements expended large manpower resources. The initial cost of the installation was high and there was a continuous technical problem associated with the inspection, surveillance and modification of the stored bombs. Because of the latter factor, there were advantages in having the bomb manufactured and stored in the same country.

There had been some suggestion that it might be proposed that (as a means of overcoming the U.S. objection to having atomic bombs stored in Europe) a storage installation be constructed in Canada.

There was some doubt as to whether this proposal would be acceptable to the United Kingdom, however, as they had expressed the desire to have at least a limited number of bombs on hand in the United Kingdom and there were indications that some bombs might be made available to them, possibly within the next year.

When asked what the probable reaction of the Canadian Government would be to the proposal that U.K. bombs be stored in Canada, Dr. Solandt had replied that it was his opinion that the Canadian Government would not be prepared to be host to an entirely British project and would be unlikely to accept anything of this kind that could not be accomplished as a Canadian enterprise.

4. The Committee noted the reports of Dr. Solandt and Air Vice-Marshal Miller on the atomic energy discussions in Washington.

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

[Washington, October 19, 1949]

THE PROBLEM OF PUBLIC PRESENTATION OF ANY NEW TRI-PARTITE ARRANGEMENTS IN THE FIELD OF ATOMIC ENERGY, WITH PARTICULAR REGARD TO THE RELATIONSHIP OF SUCH ARRANGEMENTS TO THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Assuming that when the tri-partite consultations are resumed in November, it is possible to agree upon a plan for long-term co-operation between the United States, United Kingdom and Canada in the field of atomic energy, it is necessary to consider the manner in which these arrangements will be presented to the public and the extent to which publicity should be accorded to such an agreement. How best this might be done, taking into account the special relationship in matters of defence between the three countries and certain other countries of the North Atlantic Treaty, is the subject of this memorandum.

2. President Truman's statement of July 28th, 1949, following the Blair House Conference with Congressional leaders concerning the secret aspects of atomic energy, included a brief review of tri-partite co-operation to date. (The full text of President Truman's statement of July 28 is attached as Annex 1†). It will be noted that, in the second paragraph, under the heading of "Review of Wartime Co-operation", President Truman represents the process of consultation between the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian scientists as a continuous one beginning in 1939. Any lapses in co-operation between the three countries as a result of the passing of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 (Public Law 585, 79th Congress) are not referred to. The President's statement goes on to mention the modus vivendi of 1948 as providing arrangements for co-operation which were limited in scope and duration. The President concludes his statement by saying that the United States intends "to explore with the United Kingdom and Canada some of the basic questions underlying any determination of long-range policy in this field" and that this "will require further consultations with the Congress following the exploratory conversations".

3. President Truman's statement of July 28th, therefore, offers a basis for presenting any new tri-partite arrangements as a continuation of a process of co-operation which began between U.S., U.K. and Canadian scientists in 1939, which developed into a major effort for the purpose of producing an atomic weapon during the last war, and which has now led to the "determination of long-range policy" because of requirements of mutual defence.

4. It is recognized that, in presenting the tri-partite arrangements to the public, it is of special importance to make the presentation as acceptable as possible from the point of view of the other nine signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty.

5. The position of France, both as a leading participant in the North Atlantic Treaty and as a country engaged in important research activities in the field of atomic energy, requires special consideration. Moreover, the position of Belgium, as the largest producer of uranium, also raises a special problem. So far as the interests and accomplishments of these two countries in the development of atomic energy are known to the Embassy, these are principally related to its peaceful uses. The French facilities are on a research scale and are not capable of producing fissionable materials in quantities sufficient to be used in a weapon. Like Chalk River, the French pile is a research tool. The Belgians are not known to have any pile but are interested in the possible peaceful applications of atomic energy, particularly as a source of power having in mind the depletion of their coal reserves. Norway may also have a certain interest in atomic energy, because of the existence of uranium-bearing shales in the Scandinavian Peninsula.

6. In approaching these countries, and other friendly ones, including particularly some of the Commonwealth countries, it would be desirable not to exclude them from any possibility of sharing information which would be useful to them, such as information about strictly peaceful research facilities like low-powered reactors and information relating to the processing of raw materials. Providing it is possible to give the co-signatories of the Atlantic Treaty reasonable assurances in this regard, it would not seem necessary or desirable to associate any other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty with the effort involved in the military application of atomic energy. One may, indeed, be certain that for some time to come the United States will refuse to share information on the fabrication of atomic weapons, and also on the large-scale production of fissile material, with countries other than the United Kingdom and Canada. The production of bombs, however, requires such a heavy outlay in capital investment that it is doubtful whether any other countries would be able or willing to sustain an effective programme of atomic weapon production.

7. It may, therefore, be feasible to present tri-partite arrangements providing for a co-ordinated atomic-weapon programme as a collective contribution on the part of the United States, United Kingdom and ourselves to the common security of the North Atlantic nations and of the Western world. Indeed, such an interpretation of three-power co-operation in the field of atomic energy is implicit in the explanations of United States policy which accompanied the Mutual Defence Assistance Act of 1949. For instance, in the report of the Committee of Conference of the two Houses of Congress which accompanied the Mutual Defence Assistance Act (Report No. 1346) the principle of unity of defence arrangements in the North Atlantic area is stressed as basic. As a necessary corollary to this principle, the principle of differentiation of functions among the parties to the Treaty is also stressed. The following passage from Page 13 of the Conference Report seems particularly relevant:—

“Each nation must do its part, as determined by its position and its resources, in relation to the common security of all. No one nation in the group must aspire to perpetuate or expand its various military components for purely national considerations. Each must recognize its obligation to balance its forces in relation to the needs of the whole area in which common defense has been pledged. For some this may require submission to a secondary status in certain types of armament. For some it may require specialization in military activities that would not be preferred if a free choice were made on a purely national basis. All must be willing to give up those preferences which are characteristic of purely national defense but which are not in keeping with the common defense of the area. This principle of unity must be undertaken early and thenceforth rigorously applied.

As soon as possible, the essentials of the pattern of area defense based upon individual national specialization must be agreed to and the assignments thereunder made. This principle must be riveted into the base of the North Atlantic defense structure. Once this pattern has been developed and agreed to, it must be the governing formula for the assistance program here envisaged. That is the intent behind the language which makes the bulk of the authorized assistance contingent upon recommendations acceptable to the United States, for integrated defense of the North Atlantic area.”

In addition, there is the important statement by General Bradley before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives on Friday, July 29th, 1949 on a sound strategy from the U.S. point of view for collective defence. (An extract of the relevant portions of his statement is attached as Annex 2;† some of the points included in it are further developed in his article in the Saturday Evening Post of October 15th).

8. The signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty who are to receive arms under the Military Assistance programme are required to accept the principle of integrated defence of the North Atlantic area in concluding agreements with the United States. There should, therefore, be no difficulty in applying the principles of this Act also to tri-partite arrangements in the field of atomic energy as a special case, by which

U.S., U.K. and Canada would undertake "specialization in military activities" in the interests of the common defence of the North Atlantic area.

9. It is suggested, therefore, that if the tri-partite discussions are successfully concluded by acceptance of a new agreement, the central purpose of the agreement—the production with maximum efficiency and speed of atomic weapons—can be presented to the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty as an arrangement contributing greatly to the purposes of the treaty. Emphasis should be placed on the history of collaboration between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada; and the fact that the new agreement would constitute a great extension of the collaboration which has existed since the passage of the McMahon Act should be played down.

10. It remains to be seen how far it will be possible at this time for the United States to agree that information should be made available to friendly countries on methods of research into atomic energy. It was suggested during the September talks that declassification of certain information, such as the design of a standard low-power reactor, would go a long way towards meeting the requirements of countries wishing to pursue researches in this field. The McMahon Act may still be regarded as an obstacle to such a procedure. The fact that the technique has been mastered in the Soviet Union so as to enable the production of fissile material sufficient to bring about an atomic explosion may, when it has thoroughly soaked in, make some such arrangement possible. If difficulties are raised by United States representatives, we must consider, however, whether it would be wise to prejudice the conclusion of a tri-partite agreement on the lines proposed by pressing for a simultaneous agreement to furnish other countries, in order to aid their research, with information which is now highly classified.

Washington, October 21, 1949

TOP SECRET

Following for N.A. Robertson from Wrong, Begins: Main issues which may be expected to arise in Tripartite Consultations on Atomic Energy affecting Canada.

1. Assuming that the atomic talks, when they are resumed in the first half of November, will proceed from the point at which they were suspended at the end of September, I seek to set out below the main issues affecting Canada which, in my view, require at least preliminary consideration in advance.

2. Do we agree that the new arrangements for tripartite cooperation in the atomic field should accord the United States primary responsibility for weapons production, with the United Kingdom and Canada playing an agreed part in support of the United States weapons programme? The main criterion proposed by the United States to govern the tripartite relationship has been the requirement that the weapons production programme should be directed to the production of as large a stockpile of bombs and as great a production of fissionable material as practicable. I assume that we shall agree to the acceptance of this criterion as a necessary requirement of our combined defence in the present world situation, and also that urgent priority should be given in the atomic programmes of the three countries to the production of atomic weapons and fissionable material as quickly as possible. This implies that production facilities should be employed to their maximum in the United States and that new programmes should not at present be initiated by the United Kingdom. If the United Kingdom agrees, presumably we would agree also, provided that the arrangement would not interfere with the construction of a new Canadian reactor.

3. The allocation of materials would provide that the United States should receive during the next five years not less than 90 per cent of the raw material which under the agreed estimate is expected to be available. Presumably, again, we would agree to this as a consequential proposal.

4. Generally speaking, the principle of full tripartite cooperation in the development of atomic weapons should, I think, be acceptable to the United Kingdom and Canada. It must, of course, be understood as covering access to information not directly related to weapons production—indeed, access to all information useful for the execution of the Canadian and United Kingdom programmes, including basic research, engineering techniques, defence against attack with atomic weapons, and so on. It is proposed that interchange of personnel should be a principal means of giving effect to this pooling of skills and knowledge.

5. Are we prepared to permit storage in Canada of atomic weapons owned by the United Kingdom so that they would be immediately available in the event of war? The United States have insisted in their negotiations that the fabrication of weapons should be entirely located in North America. It is not yet known whether the United Kingdom will be satisfied with participation of their experts and the use of some of their materials in fabrication in the United States. In effect, the United States have in mind an arrangement whereby plutonium produced in the United Kingdom (with the three pile programme reduced to two piles) would be shipped to the United States and there combined with U-235 in the fabrication of atomic bombs which might then be earmarked for the United Kingdom and stored in Canada. The main reason given for storage in Canada rather than in the United States is the delay which might arise pending action by Congress in the event of a declaration of war, which might deprive the United Kingdom of the use of atomic bombs in the early stages of war. This, however, raises the question whether we would consent to allow the United Kingdom to withdraw bombs even though Canada were not at war.

6. Apart from this important political question, it would be necessary to consider the responsibility which would arise for safekeeping of the bombs, defence of the storage area, the upkeep of stored material and related questions. It should be noted that, if we agree to undertake this responsibility, some years would pass before the first atomic bombs on United Kingdom account could be delivered to Canada for safekeeping. It will be about two years before United Kingdom production of plutonium is sufficiently advanced to permit the fabrication of atomic bombs. The United Kingdom is almost certain to insist that a store of atomic weapons should be kept in Great Britain so as to be instantly available in the event of war. These would presumably be the bombs first produced from United Kingdom plutonium. I would guess that as many as four years might pass before it was desired to store bombs in Canada. MacKenzie and Solandt, however, have more complete information than I have and should be asked to check this estimate.

7. Is Canada prepared to cooperate in the provision, equipment and defence of bases for the launching of atomic weapons? An important aspect of the United States proposals is the consideration of methods for the improvement of deliverability of atomic weapons against probable targets in the event of war. This involves not only weapon development, improvement of bomb-carriers, and target intelligence, but also the provision of launching sites and the protection of such sites. It is unlikely that any such sites will, in fact, be requested from Canada at present, since sites more appropriate for launching weapons can be located in the United Kingdom, Alaska, the north eastern United States, and north Africa. Air Vice Marshal Miller can provide fuller information on United States intentions. However, the question of the use of bases in Canada for transit purposes cannot be excluded. The use of such military facilities in Canada might be fitted into arrangements under the North Atlantic Treaty.

8. What should be the form of new tripartite agreement? In order to ensure its effective application by the United States it is almost certain that legislation will be required to override or to amend the McMahon Act. We shall have to be guided chiefly by what the United States representatives consider feasible in view of their political difficulties. A general relaxation of the provisions of the McMahon Act which would give the President authority, in the interests of national security, to collaborate with countries of his choice is not likely to be acceptable to the Congress, which will probably insist that such collaboration be limited to the United Kingdom and Canada. The best solution may be that which was suggested by Kennan to Franks and myself—that Congress should adopt a joint resolution authorizing the President to enter into an executive agreement with the United Kingdom and Canada notwithstanding the provisions of the McMahon Act. This was put forward on a personal basis, and I shall make further enquiries to see if the thinking of the administration has advanced since their recent discussions with the Joint Congressional Committee.

9. The extent of the publicity given to any new arrangement depends in large part on the form of the agreement. If the President can be given authority to make an executive agreement, the intention would be that the contents of this agreement should remain secret, although it would be necessary and desirable to make an announcement in general terms. Such an announcement could make clear the continuity of tripartite collaboration since early in the war, and might relate the continuing arrangements to the North Atlantic Treaty as an example of specialization in the production of weapons by the parties able to carry it out most efficiently. With my letter to you of October 19th I enclosed a memorandum dealing with the question of public presentation of a new arrangement.¹⁹

10. I have not discussed with the State Department the problem of possible registration of a new agreement under Article 102 of the Charter. I mentioned this to Makins when he was here, and he said definitely that the Foreign Office would not wish an agreement of this character to be registered. I gathered that this expresses a policy which they have acted on in other connections. He pointed out that paragraph 2 of Article 102 contained the only sanction for omission of registration and that this sanction could not conceivably affect the execution of an agreement of the sort under discussion. Ends.

ADVISORY PANEL ON ATOMIC ENERGY—NOVEMBER 9, 1949 MEETING

A. Three-Power Partnership

Mr. Robertson wishes to confine the agenda largely to a discussion of the tripartite talks which are to resume in Washington about November 20—not November 14 as we thought last week.

2. Before we left Washington in September, it was agreed that we could not go further until we were sure that we had the approval in principle of our respective governments to the conclusion of what amounts to a partnership for the most efficient production of atomic weapons that the U.K., U.S. and Canada can achieve together. The U.S. officials are obviously as anxious to escape the restrictive clauses of the McMahon Act as the British and ourselves are to have a much greater flow of technical information. There was in Washington a general recognition, expressed quite bluntly by such American scientists as Dr. Bacher, that the U.S. atomic energy programme needed the cross-fertilization of ideas that it could only have by going back to the sort of intimate co-operation that existed during the war and was interrupted by the McMahon Act. Having once had the experience of such a sudden shift in U.S. policy as occurred in 1946, however, the British in particular are most anxious that an agreement for a renewal of the partnership should not take the form merely of a relaxation in the McMahon Act but should be spelt out in some form or other in considerable detail and specifically should give the British and Canadian scientists access to all phases of weapon development and related research in atomic energy in the broadest terms.

3. So far as Canada is concerned, our problem is a great deal simpler than that of the U.K. because we are not making bombs nor, as a matter of policy, do we feel the "need-to-know". We do want a great deal more information on basic research than we have been getting. We also want to expand our atomic energy project by the construction of a second pile. We want to be as sure as we can that the U.S. will buy, at an economic price, the plutonium that our second and larger pile would produce.

4. In more general terms, the proposed partnership on atomic energy weapon development would form an important part of our contribution to the North Atlantic alliance. We have the finest research pile in the world and our production of uranium ore is still second only to that of the Belgian Congo. In research and supply, therefore, we have played an important part during and since the war in the development of the most potent strategic weapon that the North Atlantic alliance now possesses. It is surely in the interests not only of Canada but of our North Atlantic partners that we should continue to contribute our brains, effort and materials to assure that we retain atomic superiority until some form of international control has been agreed upon. The urgency of the race and the secrecy of the weapon are the greatest arguments for integrating the U.S., U.K. and Canadian programmes, and excluding all others from anything to do with weapon development.

5. The partnership proposed will probably involve certain commitments on the part of the Canadian Government. These are discussed in Mr. Wrong's telegram WA-2937 of October 21, a copy of which is attached.²⁰

6. I should like to add a few foot-notes to Mr. Wrong's telegram, point by point, referring to the numbers of his paragraphs:

2. An agreement to employ existing production facilities to their maximum and to limit construction of new facilities in the U.K. will not interfere with the construction of a second Canadian pile. Our plans were frankly discussed in Washington with U.S. and U.K. officials who agreed that we should continue our experiments on a larger scale with heavy water reactors,—experiments which Canada had undertaken at the request of the Combined Policy Committee during the war at a time when the prospect of anything useful being discovered through heavy water piles was not particularly bright. Our second pile will not be regarded as a production pile, although it will be in fact of high power rating, and the U.S. will, we may be sure, continue to buy all the plutonium that we can make and very probably at a favourable price, as the efficiency of our projected pile is greater than the efficiency of any existing U.S. piles.

3. The allocation of raw materials produced in the U.S. and Canada has not been included in the discussion of Congo allocation as it has never come under the terms of the U.S. and U.K. Combined Development Agency Agreement dividing Congo production on a 50–50 basis. Therefor an agreement that the U.S. should receive not less than 90% of raw materials during the next five years refers to the production of materials from sources outside Canada and the U.S.

4. We have a major interest in seeing that the partnership does not give us only information on atomic energy weapon development in the narrow sense but that we shall have information on basic research and engineering techniques and civil defence against attack on the atomic weapons, as well as intelligence on Soviet progress. This is particularly important to us as we are not engaged in bomb production.

5. and 6. The question of storage in Canada of bombs made from U.K. plutonium production presents perhaps the most difficult constitutional problem. Presumably the Canadian Government would want to have storage facilities under its jurisdiction and provide the Armed Forces and at least some of the technicians for guard duties and maintenance. My impression in Washington was that the U.K. officials were less interested in this possibility than we might have expected, having in mind the inevitable lapse of time necessary between an act of aggression and a declaration of war by Congress. The idea of storing bombs in Canada was in fact put forward, in the first instance, by the U.S. side who, I suppose, felt that it would appeal to the U.K. officials. Not only is the problem somewhat remote as no facilities could possibly be needed in Canada for several years, but I should think that our existing commitments under the North Atlantic Treaty would make it less likely that the U.K. would be involved in a major war for more than a few days before the U.S. and Canada had also declared war, and in the interval the number of bombs stored in the U.K. for immediate use would probably have been sufficient.

7. The provision of base facilities is even less likely to be an immediate problem, although we might have to enlarge the airfield adjacent to our storage depot to enable U.K. atomic bombers to land, load and take off, if we do agree to provide storage facilities in Canada.

8. We have heard nothing further of the Kennan proposal that the President should be given authority by Joint Resolution of Congress to enter into an executive agreement with the U.K. and Canada which would in effect relax the provisions of the McMahon Act, but we would, presumably, agree to whatever procedure the U.S. found politically feasible.

9. and 10. I think we should give careful attention to the form in which our partnership is presented to the other countries of the North Atlantic alliance and to the United Nations. To our North Atlantic partners we can, I think, carry conviction when we say that the continuation of our wartime programme offers us the best chance of keeping our lead. To the United Nations we should, I believe, have some document setting forth in very general terms the character of the partnership, and this should be registered in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter. To say as the Foreign Office officials do that because the sanction provided in Article 102 is not severe surely does not mean that we would be acting in a manner quite contrary to the Charter if we failed to register our agreement. The secret sections of the agreement can, of course, be put in the form of an annex or any other way that would not need to be registered or made public. I suppose an analogy can be drawn between the registration of the North Atlantic Treaty with the United Nations and the secret military planning that is now going forward.

B. United Nations

7. It may not be necessary or appropriate to discuss at tomorrow's meeting the course of the atomic energy debate which began yesterday in the ad hoc committee of the United Nations. From a policy point of view, the Romulo proposals, of which a copy is attached,† will force a discussion of possible compromise solutions involving a relaxation of the control proposals of the majority plan but no less rigorous inspection. The sort of proposal that is suggested in point 4. of General Romulo's letter would make it impossible to carry on effective research on the power potentials of atomic energy, but it may be considered necessary to forego the benefits of atomic power for peaceful purposes for a number of years in the more immediate interest of securing some scheme on which international agreement could be reached, and the ownership features of the majority plan for control have certainly been the principal stumbling block for the Russians, although I think it is very questionable whether they will ever accept even the inspection clauses of the majority plan. The whole question will require considerably more study from a scientific point of view.

1. TRIPARTITE DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON

It was agreed that Mr. Wrong's telegram WA-2937 of October 21 should be taken as the agenda for the meeting, as it covered point by point the major questions of policy on which the Canadian delegation to the tripartite discussions (which began in Washington during the third and fourth week of September) would require at least the preliminary views of the Government before the discussions resume, probably towards the end of November.

The Prime Minister said that he assumed we were prepared to accept the principle that the United States should have primary responsibility for weapons' production and that as great a stockpile of bombs and fissionable material as possible should be achieved by the combined efforts of the three countries. This was agreed, after it had been noted that there were differences between the United States and the United Kingdom as to whether production facilities in the United Kingdom should be expanded but that neither the United States nor the United Kingdom would interpret the agreement as implying that the Canadian Government should not continue its experiments with heavy water reactors which had already proved such a valuable research instrument.

2. Raw Materials

The proposal that the United States should receive not less than 90 per cent of available raw materials during the next five years was then considered and it was noted that, under the present U.S.-U.K. agreement, Canadian raw materials were not subject to allocation by the Combined Development Agency. However, our production estimates had been tabled during the September discussions in Washington and had been taken into account in the general estimate made of the available supplies and in the production facilities in relation to military requirements. It was agreed that the United States proposal could be accepted, as sufficient raw materials would be available from Canadian production to supply the needs of our present or projected Chalk River piles, in addition to fulfilling our estimated contribution to United States stocks of raw materials.

3. Information

Dr. Mackenzie and Dr. Solandt explained that the proposed partnership would give the United Kingdom full information on weapon production and development. As we were not interested in these phases of atomic energy, we would not need to have our scientists integrated in those sections of the U.S. or U.K. projects, but we would want full co-operation in the field of basic research and intelligence, and we should be given access to information concerning the military characteristics of the latest bomb types for our military and civil defence planning. This was agreed.

4. Storage

The Prime Minister wondered whether the U.S. officials responsible for proposing that Canada should undertake to store bombs for the U.K. had not been labouring under a misconception as to Canada's constitutional position that we should be at pains to correct.

Mr. Robertson added that they might have thought of their proposal before they knew of the Soviet explosion and that there might be a fallacy also in their strategic approach; was there now any valid reason why some bombs should not be stored in the U.K.?

Dr. Solandt then said that he thought the U.S. approach had been motivated rather by an appreciation of the delays that might occur before the U.S. could declare war because of their constitutional process, and also, possibly, because the U.S. representatives were aware of the U.K. Government's fears of the unreliability of the U.S. and believed that the U.K. Government might feel more secure if their bombs were stored in Canada instead of the U.S., in spite of the North Atlantic Treaty. The U.S. military representatives, in addition, would not be displeased to see an arrangement made whereby the U.K. would be free to use some bombs in the interval before Congress had declared war.

Mr. Heeney suggested that it might be more acceptable to Canadian public opinion if we were in a position to explain that we should not be storing bombs only for the use of the U.K. but that such storage was in our own interest as well as part of the joint defence programme.

Mr. Howe then said that he could see no reason why, if the U.K. Government were to ask us to store bombs for them in Canada, we should not agree, as we had, for instance, to the storage of picrite.

Air Vice Marshal Miller explained that the U.S. Military representatives in Washington during the September discussions had seen no difficulty in agreeing to U.K. title to bombs which might be stored in Canada, and indeed they had indicated that the U.S. might consider sending some bombs to the U.K. before their production started.

The Prime Minister summed up the discussion by saying that we did not want to make bombs, nor to have title to them, nor to use them. The bombs will be owned by the U.S. and the U.K.; we should let them make the plans to use the bombs in accordance with strategic concepts agreed under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; if the U.S. and the U.K. Governments found it desirable to store some bombs in Canada, they could ask us to do so and an agreement might be worked out, but it would be better not to have Canada designated, in the agreement to be negotiated now between the three countries, as a custodian of bombs for the other two governments.

5. Bases

The Prime Minister observed that we should avoid the use of the expression "launching sites" as applied to airfields in Canada. He assumed that all that would be required of us in this connection would be the maintenance of certain airfields for possible use by our North Atlantic allies.

Air Vice Marshal Miller said that during the Washington talks the U.S. military representatives had specifically stated that they did not anticipate a requirement for any bases in Canada from which to mount atomic attacks; there might, however, be a need for airfields of sufficient size to serve for emergency landings on atomic bomber routes.

6. Relationship of Atomic Agreement to North Atlantic Treaty

Mr. Heeney stressed the desirability, in our foreign relations, of publicly setting our proposed partnership within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty and explaining to our Treaty partners that what we were undertaking was a specialized function for the most efficient production of the most potent strategic weapon of the allies. He thought we should be particularly careful to assuage French susceptibilities, as the French were constantly in fear of a strategic concept being agreed between the U.K. and the U.S. Governments which would not place sufficient emphasis upon the defence of the continental countries of Western Europe. It was agreed that insofar as possible this important consideration should be borne in mind not only in drawing up the terms of the agreement but in every public statement about the partnership.

7. Registration with the United Nations

The Prime Minister questioned whether the proposed partnership need take the form of a new agreement and he asked whether it would not be possible to consider the partnership as part of our North Atlantic arrangements which had already been registered with the United Nations in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter.

Mr. Robertson pointed out that this course of action might not be feasible, depending on the form in which the U.S. Administration felt it necessary to secure the approval of Congress. If, for this purpose, they had to refer publicly to an "agreement", we might very well have to register with the United Nations some general anodyne form of agreement to which the secret operative clauses could be related but not discussed publicly or registered with the United Nations, as they would form part of the ancillary planning.

8. Delegation

The Prime Minister said that it was not necessary to decide at present the composition of the Canadian delegation to the Washington discussions but that when we had the agenda and had agreed who should go, he would inform the Cabinet.

Washington, November 3, 1949

Dear Mr. Robertson:

In my message WA-2937 of October 21st I sought to list the issues on which instructions seem to be required when the tripartite atomic talks are resumed. Yesterday I had a general talk on the subject, at my request, with Mr. Adrian Fisher, Legal Adviser of the Department of State, who has taken over from Mr. Kennan a good deal of the responsibility in this field. He served for some time as General Counsel to the Atomic Energy Commission, so that he has a considerable background on the subject.

I began by saying that what I wanted to talk to him about was not so much the technical issues which were referred to governments for further consideration at the end of September as how we might proceed if, as seemed to me to be likely, these issues were resolved during the next stage of the discussions. I reminded him of my remarks at the last meeting of the C.P.C. about the importance of the publicity aspects of an agreement, its relationship to the North Atlantic Treaty, and the connection between the form and the substance of a new arrangement.

The plan which they favour in the State Department is that which Kennan outlined to the British Ambassador and myself during the September talks. They hope that Congress may be persuaded to adopt a joint resolution permitting the President in fairly general terms to enter into executive agreements for collaboration in the atomic field. To secure the passage of such a resolution, the Joint Congressional Committee would have to know in considerable detail what was contemplated. In debate on the floor Mr. Fisher thinks that they could fairly effectively control the amount of information that became public property. The prospects may be, therefore, that we will end with an executive agreement between the three governments, with the legal obstacles to its application removed by the adoption of a joint resolution. The executive agreement itself might also be in general terms setting forth the policies accepted by the three governments. Detailed arrangements could be put in the form of annexes to the executive agreement, or perhaps incorporated in the minutes of the C.P.C.

As to the timetable, the party now inspecting the installations in England is due back tomorrow, and Mr. Fisher thinks that they should be in a position to resume the negotiations by about November 15th. I urged that they set a definite date as soon as possible, so that those who will have to attend from outside Washington can receive appropriate warning. Any agreement reached at these talks will still be ad referendum. It may not indeed be possible to put it into final form without another meeting. Here they will first wish to sound out the Joint Congressional Committee, which they probably cannot do before January, and, if all went well, they might get a joint resolution through Congress some time in the second quarter of 1950.

Mr. Fisher fully agreed that it was essential to fit into the concept of the North Atlantic Treaty an arrangement between the three countries looking to the integration of their atomic programs. He thinks—and I am sure quite rightly—that it would be a mistake to try to fit the arrangement into the structure of the Treaty organizations. The language used in the directives issued by the Council, the Defence Committee and the Military Committee covers neatly specialization in weapons production by the three of the parties which are best equipped for the work.

I emphasized to Mr. Fisher the delicate political aspects of using Canadian territory to store atomic weapons for use by the British Government, and said that I considered it necessary that this should not figure in terms as part of an agreement which might eventually become public. I think that one could find without difficulty general language about the importance of strategic considerations in the location of stock piles for inclusion in the agreement.

He remarked that on one point the Joint Committee would probably require very definite assurance before they would contemplate the introduction of British or Canadian scientists into their most secret establishments. This, of course, relates to security clearance. Here, too, I think that there should be no great difficulty about allaying apprehension.

You will have seen Reston's article in the New York Times a few days ago. He did a great deal of shopping around before writing the article, and talked to Mr. Lilienthal, Mr. Fisher, Sir Derek Hoyer-Millar, Mr. Ignatieff and myself, among others. I think—and Mr. Fisher takes the same view—that, except on one point, the article on the whole is helpful. He goes wrong in saying that the British have already promised that there will be no interference in the supply of raw materials to the United States. The British position on this was reserved until they saw how far they were going to get in other connections. There will in fact, I am sure, be no interference even if the negotiations break down, but the British seem to attach more importance to the question of allocation as part of a bargain than I judge it to possess. There were some other inaccuracies in Reston's article, but none of them is damaging, and the British here are not perturbed about the error which I have just mentioned. I should be glad to learn what progress has been made in Ottawa in considering the issues that arose during the September talks.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

1. Referring to Mr. Wrong's letter to you of October 19th[†] enclosing a memorandum on the problem of public presentation of any new tripartite atomic arrangements, with particular regard to their relationship to the North Atlantic Treaty, Arneson has now asked whether we might submit a draft paper on this question which could be considered in one of the sub groups of the C.P.C. when the consultations are resumed next week.

2. I have prepared a draft which is contained in my immediately following teletype which endeavours to take into account the comments made at the panel meeting on November 9th, particularly as recorded in paragraph 6 of the minutes. I am sending this by teletype in case you may wish to consult Mr. Wrong on the draft while he is in Ottawa. Ends.

Reference my immediately preceding teletype message WA-3194. Draft of memorandum "relationship of tripartite co-operation in the field of atomic energy to the North Atlantic Treaty". Text begins.

1. At the C.P.C. meeting of 30th September, Mr. Wrong made the following remarks—"On the assumption that we succeed in achieving a meeting of minds when we are reassembled at Washington, we should then be prepared to settle the manner and the extent of the publicity to be accorded to our agreement. This is not a minor matter. We are now engaged with nine other countries in organizing the defences of the North Atlantic area, and we must, I think, be very careful to see that any arrangement on the production of atomic weapons between our three countries is publicly presented in as acceptable a form as possible, from the point of view of the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty.... I take it that we want to represent such an agreement as a very important contribution to the common security of the North Atlantic Powers and of the free world in general”.

2. The development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and of its working principles now permit a more complete consideration of the relationship between the tripartite arrangements in the field of atomic energy and the North Atlantic Treaty. In particular, (in accordance with the directive from the Military Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty to its Standing Group) an overall defensive concept for the North Atlantic Treaty area has been submitted for the approval of the Defence Committee at its meeting on December 1st. One of the principles included in this concept is the following: “A basic principle of North Atlantic Treaty planning should be that each nation should undertake the task, or tasks, for which it is best suited. Certain nations, because of their geographical location or because of their capabilities, will emphasize appropriate specific missions”. Moreover, among the military measures necessary to implement the defence concept is the following “basic undertaking”: “Over-all defence plans must provide in advance of war emergency, for the following basic undertakings in furtherance of the common objective to defend the North Atlantic areas:—(a) Ensure the ability to deliver the atomic bomb promptly. This is primarily a United States responsibility, assisted, as practicable, by other nations”.

3. Thus, any measures of tripartite co-operation agreed to between the United States, United Kingdom and Canada could be represented as one of the basic undertakings provided for under the agreed strategic concept for the defence of the North Atlantic area, taken in implementation of Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty which reads:—“In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack”. It is, therefore, appropriate to represent the tripartite arrangements in the field of atomic energy to the other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, and to the public generally, as a collective and specialized contribution on the part of the United States, United Kingdom and Canada to the common security of the North Atlantic nations and of the Western world.

4. However, in approaching other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, it would be desirable to represent the tripartite arrangements as:—

(a) Contributing to the “collective capacity” of the signatories to resist armed attack by achievement of maximum efficiency and speed in the production of atomic weapons, and

(b) Not excluding the possibility of sharing information related to strictly peaceful research in the field of atomic energy.

5. As regards (a), there would appear to be no difficulty to persuade the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty of the necessity of specialization in the field of atomic weapon production, both on the grounds set out in the agreed strategic concept governing the defence of the North Atlantic area, as well as on the grounds of economy. The production of weapons requires such a heavy outlay in capital investment that it is doubtful whether any other parties of the Treaty would be able or willing to sustain a programme of effective atomic weapon production. It would also, however, be desirable to give assurance to countries like France, Belgium (as well as possibly certain countries of the Commonwealth) that their research activities directed to purely peaceful purposes, would not be unduly prejudiced by the continuing partnership with the United States, United Kingdom and Canada in the field of atomic energy.

6. If the above approach to the question of relating tripartite atomic energy arrangements to the North Atlantic Treaty were acceptable to the three countries concerned, it would not be either necessary or desirable to try to fit the arrangements into the structure of the Treaty Organization. Article 3 provides for activity to be undertaken "separately or jointly". Moreover, the North Atlantic Council, at its initial meeting when deciding the Organization be established in implementation of Articles 3 and 5 of the Treaty, stated that "the establishment of this machinery does not preclude the use of other means for consultation and co-operation between any or all of the parties on matters relating to the Treaty". This does not preclude consulting the other parties to the Treaty and this might be done through the Working Party consisting of diplomatic representatives in Washington of the Signatories of the Pact. Such consultation should take place before any agreed statement is put out regarding any tripartite agreement in the field of atomic energy.

7. The terms of any agreement between the three Governments and any possible statement thereon, might state the principle that the continued co-operation between the three Governments in the field of atomic energy is in implementation of Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty, and in accordance with the strategic concept agreed to by all parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. If this procedure were followed, moreover, it would not be necessary to register such an agreement under Article 102 of the United Nations Charter, as it could be represented as a particular defensive arrangement under the terms of an international treaty already registered. Text ends.

Following for Ignatieff from Robertson. Begins: Your WA-3194 and WA-3195 of November 22, presentation of atomic partnership agreement to our North Atlantic partners.

1. I am in general agreement with your draft text and with the memorandum which Mr. Wrong forwarded with his letter of October 19. If the Defence Committee approves the basic concept of North Atlantic planning so that in the event of aggression the United States and those associated with her in atomic weapon development would retain a free hand for the prompt and most effective use of atomic weapons, whether for tactical or strategic purposes, our problem in relation to our North Atlantic partners will have been largely solved, although I think the question of industrial application may give us trouble.

2. The Belgian Government already has, as you know, an agreement with the U.S. and U.K. to receive the benefit of their industrial research when atomic power becomes a commercial proposition. Now the South Africans have approached the U.K. informally for a similar agreement, on the grounds of their position as potentially a major supplier of raw materials, and this question may be raised informally during your talks in Washington next week.

3. I think that the question of registering a partnership agreement with the United Nations under Article 102 cannot be decided until we see in what form the agreement is to be put to Congress, and exactly how it can be related to Articles 3 or 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty. I should imagine that there is bound to be a great deal of public discussion in Washington about an "agreement" and if this is the case I think we may have to consider having something registered with the United Nations. It might be awkward to contend in the United Nations that all we were doing was implementing the North Atlantic Treaty which has already been registered, when in Washington the Americans were having to request Congressional approval for the new "agreement" although Congress has ratified the Treaty. Ends.

1. TRIPARTITE DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON: THE SECOND ROUND

Dr. Solandt reported on the discussions which were held in Washington from November 28 to December 2. While the first round of these discussions in September had centred upon the ways in which the three countries could co-operate to the best advantage in the various processes of production from ore through reactors, the second round dealt with the production processes from plutonium to the finished bomb. The course of both discussions was similar; the United States representatives appeared to be reluctant to discuss the technical basis for their proposals except in the most select technical group and progress at the larger meetings had therefore been impeded by lack of information from the U.S. side which was amply corrected when the technical representatives met by themselves.

In the recent discussions, the U.K. had formulated their counter-proposals to those put forward by the U.S. representatives in September. Dealing first with the "ore through reactors" processes, the U.K. memorandum proposed the cancellation of their third production pile but the retention of their L.S.D. plant for the sake of completeness in their programme of production of fissile materials. This part of the memorandum, with the exception of the L.S.D. plant, was acceptable to the U.S. officials. What they could not accept was the second part of the U.K. memorandum proposing that the U.K. should continue, at least on a modest "pilot" scale, to develop bomb production facilities at all stages.

The U.S. objections to the second part of the U.K. proposals were emphatic and at first obscure, but were explained in the technical discussion. The U.S. Project had put a large proportion of its effort during the last three years, and spent $150,000,000, in developing facilities which were now adequate for the production of bombs at a rate capable of re-equipping the entire stockpile with improved models in a few months. United States strategic thinking was premised on the availability of the entire stockpile of bombs of the latest type to meet an emergency. If the U.K. were to proceed with their production programme, even on a pilot scale, they would be wasting effort in solving production problems that the United States had already solved and their scientists would have to begin by virtually making bombs by hand. It would be to the advantage of all three countries to pool their research efforts and their combined knowledge, for so many paths of research were opening up that no one country could pursue them all. The U.S. technical officials readily admitted that the essence of the proposed bargain, from their point of view, was to be able to borrow a number of the top U.K. and Canadian scientists because they were not making as much progress by themselves as they believed was essential in order to maintain their lead in atomic matters over the U.S.S.R. If facilities for bomb production were to be developed in the United Kingdom, it would obviously be impossible for the top U.K. scientists to work full time in the United States.

The bargain on which agreement had tentatively been reached by the small technical group was therefore essentially one that promised to give the United States better bombs. The U.K. would receive in return not only better types of bombs but more of them than could possibly be manufactured in the United Kingdom, if they relied on their own production alone. From the Canadian point of view, information on any aspect of atomic energy would be available to us and we would be contributing basic research data which could only be obtained by the use of the high neutron flux pile at Chalk River. The possibility of storing bombs in Canada might be discounted as an immediate problem, Air Vice Marshal Miller added, as the United States were prepared, in the event of an agreement, to store in the United Kingdom at least as many bombs as the U.K. Government considered essential for their security, but the problem will arise when the United Kingdom has title to more bombs than can be stored in the U.K. in accordance with agreed strategic concepts.

In answer to the Prime Minister's question, Dr. Solandt said that all three countries would have access to each other's research on industrial development and that the U.K. would keep sufficient quantities of its plutonium production for industrial research purposes and would also get from the United States adequate amounts of U.235.

Mr. Howe commented that the prospect was a very encouraging one for Canada. At comparatively small cost, we had developed a unique place in the atomic world by concentrating on our own line of research rather than trying to compete in production. The Prime Minister added that we were in the fortunate position of being able to contribute to the development of atomic energy to strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty, but our investment was calculated at the same time to bring us the greatest return in terms of the development of our industrial strength in time of peace.

2. Relationship to the North Atlantic Treaty

The Prime Minister asked whether any progress had been made in considering how the proposed tripartite partnership should be related to the North Atlantic Treaty. It was pointed out that, although there had been no further discussion on this particular question in Washington, the Defence Committee meeting in Paris had approved the Basic Strategic Concept of the North Atlantic Treaty countries, in accordance with which it was the responsibility of the United States to ensure the ability to deliver atomic weapons promptly in the event of war. Only the Danish representatives had raised any objection and then only on the grounds of reference to atomic weapons as such. Our partners in the North Atlantic Treaty were evidently prepared to accept U.S. primacy in this field and the U.S. was, of course, free to collaborate closely with the U.K. and Canada for the development of the greatest deterrent to aggression which the alliance possessed.

Dr. Solandt said that the State Department now seemed to be prepared to give more sympathetic consideration to the U.K. suggestion that more information on atomic matters should be given to such countries as France and Belgium in view of our North Atlantic partnership with them.

3. Third Round of Washington Talks

Mr. Robertson drew the attention of the Panel to a telegram which had just been received from Mr. Wrong stating that talks were expected to be resumed in Washington about December 20; they would again be regarded as exploratory and it was hoped that an agreed statement of considerations and principles which would govern the continuing tripartite relationship in the field of atomic energy would be drawn up for consideration by the three Governments. It was hoped that the forthcoming meetings in Washington would conclude with a formal meeting of the Combined Policy Committee at which agreement would be recorded (a) to allocate the entire production of the Belgian Congo for 1950 to the United States with the provision that the small estimated surplus over U.S. requirements would be shipped to the United Kingdom at the end of the year, and (b) as to the statement of principles which would govern a tripartite partnership for weapon development.

The Prime Minister stated that he saw no difficulty in resuming the discussions which he thought were developing on lines satisfactory to the Government.

4. The Desirability of a Second Canadian Pile

Dr. Mackenzie mentioned, as he had at the previous meeting of the Panel, the vulnerability of our atomic position, depending as it does on one pile at Chalk River which may continue in operation for some years to come, but which, on the other hand, might wear out unexpectedly or become unserviceable through accidents which it is not always possible to prevent or foresee. Our advantageous position in the present tripartite discussions and indeed our international prestige as one of the leading pioneers in the atomic age, were dependent on the continuation of our research and development programme. If we were not to plan for the construction of a second pile to supplement and eventually to take the place of our present pile at Chalk River, we would, he believed, be open to very legitimate criticism.

We were at present able to get three times more plutonium out of our rods at Chalk River than was possible in any pile in the United States. We had just concluded our first sale to the United States of ten rods at an economic price. There was every prospect that if we were to build a second heavy water pile, we should be able to amortize the capital in seven years and recover most of our operating expenses as well, all in U.S. dollars.

Mr. Howe added that we were also doing well financially from the operations of Eldorado which had shown a substantial profit last year, most of which had been reinvested in further development.

Mr. Howe and Dr. Mackenzie pointed out the weakness of our position also in respect to heavy water production. The only large scale plant is at Trail, B.C. It is operated by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, but owned by the U.S. Government; we are therefore buying the heavy water we need at Chalk River from the United States. There would be advantages in reaching an agreement with the Company to sell us direct, and possibly at a lower price, the comparatively small quantities which we need, but agreement was only likely to be reached on the basis of a long-term contract which would only be assured if we were going to build a second pile.

Mr. Howe noted that the Manhattan District Project during the war had made available to us twenty tons of heavy water (about two million dollars worth) to set our Chalk River pile in operation.

Ottawa, December 13, 1949

Mr. Robertson sent you yesterday a copy of the Minutes of last Thursday afternoon's meeting of the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy, which you were unable to attend as our estimates were coming up in the House.

Although the latest information we have received from Washington is that the State Department would like to call a meeting of the Combined Policy Committee in Washington before Christmas and have suggested tentatively December 20, I think that a date between Christmas and the New Year, or even as late as the first week of January, may be more likely. We have not yet received from the State Department the Minutes of the technical meeting in Washington held on December 2. These Minutes were to outline the basis of agreement which had been reached among the technical officials and, if provisionally approved by Governments, would be written into the record of the next formal meeting of the Combined Policy Committee. As you will have seen from the Advisory Panel Minutes, the Prime Minister is satisfied with the course of the Washington discussions. The bargaining between the United Kingdom and the United States has been hard; our position throughout has been one of interested neutrality, as we do not make bombs and do not need to know how they are made. Our major interest is to see that the negotiations do not break down, as we stand to gain a great deal from any sort of agreement within the framework of the discussions which have been proceeding.

Tripartite atomic negotiations.

1. During a discussion on December 14th with Mr. Acheson and Sir Oliver Franks we reviewed the present status of these negotiations and the prospect of a satisfactory agreement being reached. Mr. Acheson expressed his personal interest in the matter and his hope that an agreement would be concluded. He said that he would have a difficult time with Congress and that it was essential before he opened discussions with the Joint Congressional Committee that there should be a complete understanding between the three countries on the principles which they were prepared to apply. He considered it necessary that the McMahon Act should be amended if a satisfactory arrangement were to be concluded.

2. He referred to the need for settling the allocation of raw materials during 1950 before the session begins. The estimates are that production during 1950, if the Congo output goes to the United States, will more than maintain the American pipeline and reserve stocks, with a small surplus of 131 tons at the end of the year. We agreed that, in fact, the production was bound to go to the United States, and Franks undertook to urge on his Government that they should promptly agree to this. This would in effect continue the present modus vivendi, except that the British want the arrangements for possible earmarking and shipment of unallocated stocks in the United Kingdom to be dropped. Unless there is a breakdown in Congo production (in which case the situation would obviously have to be reviewed in any event), there would be no occasion to earmark or ship stocks in the United Kingdom during the year.

3. It was suggested that progress towards a new agreement might best be made if the position were reviewed, possibly between Christmas and the New Year, by a very small group, including Acheson, Franks, myself, and not more than two or three others. The purpose would be to decide whether an agreement could be reached and what its general nature would be, after Franks has received fresh instructions from London on the proposals developed by the experts at the last meetings. If technical questions arose, they could be referred to small expert groups.

4. Franks tells me today that he has heard from London that there are unresolved differences between the Ministers concerned on the acceptability of the latest proposals. He is urging that the proposals should be accepted, provided that they are regarded as ensuring full access to information in the United States, and provided that they would not preclude some experimental research in the United Kingdom on atomic weapons or their parts.

5. Acheson for the first time alluded on the 14th to the length of a new agreement, suggesting that a term of between five and ten years might turn out to be the most acceptable period. He added that it might help him if the whole agreement did not terminate at the same time. For instance, arrangements for allocation of raw materials might run for a different period from those covering exchange of scientists and of information.

6. I shall be glad to know whether you consider that the discussion on December 8th in the Atomic Advisory Panel covers the ground sufficiently to constitute instructions for me if the meeting with Acheson and Franks takes place before the end of the month.²¹ The date of the meeting, however, depends on what is decided in London.

Washington, December 31, 1949

Following for N.A. Robertson from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-3042 of December 24th.†

1. The British have now produced a lengthy working paper entitled "United Kingdom Draft Proposals for Future Tri-partite Co-operation". This was given preliminary consideration at an informal meeting yesterday afternoon attended only by Franks, Acheson, Fisher and myself. Ignatieff and I had previously gone over the paper with Franks, at his suggestion, to see whether we thought it might provide a basis for an agreement. It was given to Acheson only a day before the meeting and has not yet been seen by others except three or four people in the State Department.

2. The paper is a lengthy document, designed to cover the whole field and incorporating a good deal of material prepared in the technical groups during the talks in September and December. It was drafted by Makins and has received the approval of the United Kingdom Ministers. We shall forward copies by bag next week. The main change from the previous United Kingdom position is that it accepts the concept of an integrated weapons production programme, with the reservation mentioned below in paragraph 5. It appears to us to be acceptable to Canada, subject to one or two alterations and additions.

3. Yesterday's discussion was for the purpose of deciding whether this paper furnished a reasonable basis for further negotiations. Acheson began by rehearsing his discussions with the Joint Congressional Committee. He said he had found the Committee critical and unresponsive until he advanced the argument that a combined operation would produce better results more rapidly. Any agreement must, therefore, make it clear that its effect would be the production of a larger stockpile of better atomic weapons.

4. Franks said that the United Kingdom had now surrendered its original conception of two related but separate weapons programmes. This was a major change in attitude. It was essential that the United Kingdom, in giving up its plan to produce atomic weapons during the next five years, should be assured that the agreement would not be upset by Congress later on and that the United Kingdom would receive from the United States weapons approximately equal in number to those it might have been able to fabricate itself from its own production of fissile material, since an integrated programme made them dependent on the United States for a vital weapon. While the United Kingdom domestic political problems were less complex than those Acheson faced, there was nevertheless agreement among all political parties that national security must be protected in this manner.

5. Acheson then raised two or three questions arising from his first reading of the British paper. These centred around the definition of the United Kingdom programme. One paragraph, dealing with large-scale production of fissile material, suggests that each country should be free to vary its programme on due notice to the C.P.C., "within the raw materials available to it." In another section, dealing with weapons fabrication, which begins by accepting an integrated programme, provision is made for the United Kingdom to continue its atomic weapons research establishment for work on parts of the programme in the common interest, and also "to take up any particular development, provided that these developments did not prevent the secondment of an adequate staff of scientists to serve in the United States". Franks thought that the United Kingdom wished to be free to build a third pile, if this seemed desirable, and to vary its plans for the construction of an L.S.D. plant, without increasing its demands for raw materials. He thought also that the reference to development in the quoted extract meant that some projects might emerge from the British research establishment which they would wish to carry beyond the research stage, but that the proviso was not intended to make possible the fabrication of complete weapons. These points will have to be more exactly defined.

6. There was also some discussion of the proposal that the United Kingdom should receive, for its own use, weapons equal in number to those which could be fabricated from plutonium produced in the United Kingdom. There is a proposal that a stockpile in the United Kingdom, to reach a total of twenty bombs, should be started as soon as significant quantities of plutonium produced in the United Kingdom are delivered to the United States. Acheson suggested that the size and location of any such stockpile would have to be guided by combined strategic plans, but did not object to the idea.

7. The paper also proposed that "the remainder of the United Kingdom stock of weapons will be stored in Canada and held there at United Kingdom disposal". This would apply to weapons above twenty produced from United Kingdom plutonium. I said that this should be put in more general terms, explaining that such a scheme could not begin to operate for three or four years, and this was too far ahead to make a firm commitment desirable or necessary. We were not anxious to have any bombs stored in Canada, but I thought the Canadian Government would accept it as a possibility if later it seemed to be in the common interest. General language; however, should be used.

8. Acheson said that if he were able to sell the scheme to the Pentagon, the A.E.C., and particularly the Joint Committee, the main agreement would probably have to be expressed in clear and brief terms and approved by both Houses of Congress. Under it, detailed secret arrangements could be made. The central agreement would be a public document and probably would have to be registered with the United Nations. There would be enormous difficulties in drafting it and getting it through.

9. I mentioned the necessity of relating the arrangements to the North Atlantic Treaty in the agreement itself. This was accepted by the others with little discussion. I also mentioned the length of the agreement, which the British suggested should last until the end of 1955. This was accepted as a reasonable term, Franks making the point that the commitment to provide the United Kingdom with weapons made from its own plutonium had to be as binding as possible.

10. The discussion went well, and at the end of it Acheson said that they would proceed at once to consult the Department of Defense and the A.E.C. in the hope of having a further discussion of the same sort by the end of next week. The chief purpose of this method is to get the general outlines fixed between the three Governments before the experts are summoned again from London and Ottawa to study the details. Ends.

RE: EXPORT OF RADIO-ACTIVE ISOTOPES

Shortly after the United States Atomic Energy Commission had announced their plans for exporting isotopes, Mr. Howe and Dr. Mackenzie held a press conference at which, according to the Gazette report of September 5th, 1947, Mr. Howe was quoted as saying that Canada would have no objection to exporting isotopes at prevailing world prices.

At the next meeting of the Advisory Panel, on September 26th, 1947, it was agreed that the Atomic Energy Control Board should establish conditions for the export of isotopes from Canada similar to those laid down by the United States Atomic Energy Commission for export from the United States.

For various reasons connected with production at Chalk River, the Atomic Energy Control Board have had to postpone action on an isotope export programme, but they are now ready to go ahead and the Secretary, Mr. [G.M.] Jarvis, has written to me (letter attached)† asking whether we have any objection to their proposed plans.

The Board's proposals follow very closely the United States practice. There would be no discrimination against any nation prepared to comply with the conditions laid down, but these conditions include a clause declaring that the recipient country would undertake that institutions where the isotopes will be used may be visited by qualified scientists without regard to nationality. The United States Atomic Energy Commission have found that in administering their regulations, no Soviet or satellite country has been prepared to accept this inspection clause (2 (d) in the memorandum attached to Mr. Jarvis' letter).

Foreign countries making requests for our isotopes would have to appoint a representative in Ottawa (usually a member of their Mission here) to deal directly with Chalk River; External Affairs would not be involved in the administration of the export programme.

I have discussed with Mr. Jarvis the draft Note to the State Department which is attached to his letter, and he has agreed that it would be better, in view of the lapse of time, to omit reference to the procedure for obtaining isotopes for Chalk River from the United States, which is now well established. We agreed that External Affairs should simply send, to all our Missions abroad and to all foreign representatives in Ottawa, notification of the readiness of the Canadian Government to export isotopes and the procedure to be followed by foreign Governments wishing to applying for them. Do you agree?

I think we have sufficient authority, on the basis of the decision of September 26th, 1947, and Mr. Howe's statement to the press a few days earlier, to put the export programme into effect. If you approve, I shall inform Mr. Jarvis that his draft memorandum on export procedure is satisfactory.

Mr. Jarvis will let me have a draft Press Release for Mr. Heeneys and your approval, and I suggest we might use this as the basis of our circular to our Missions abroad and to foreign representatives in Ottawa.²²

Mr. Heeneys has seen this memorandum and approves.

J. GEORGE

²² Le 10 mai 1949, le Groupe de conseillers sur l'énergie atomique fut d'accord avec la recommandation du Dr. C.J. Mackenzie à l'effet de différer toute annonce. Enfin de compte le Comité de contrôle de l'énergie atomique publia un communiqué de presse le 9 décembre 1949 après en avoir remis copie au haut-commissaire britannique et à l'ambassadeur américain.

On May 10, 1949, the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy agreed with the recommendation of Dr. C.J. Mackenzie to defer any announcement. Eventually the Atomic Energy Control Board issued a press release on December 9, 1949, with advance copies given to the British High Commissioner and the American Ambassador.

Memorandum by Department of Finance

[Ottawa], September 15, 1949

1. If the pound goes down by 30% in relation to the U.S. dollar, and if other currencies around the world are adjusted to the new position, what should we do?

2. There are only two choices. First, we might try to stay at par with the U.S. dollar. Second, we might revalue our dollar at some level between the U.S. dollar and the pound.

3. If we choose the second course there is everything to be said for moving our dollar down 10% in terms of the U.S. dollar. This level is indicated both by economic and financial considerations and also by the provisions of the International Monetary Fund.

4. The problem can be discussed under the following heads:

- (a) Continuity of government policy;
- (b) The position under the International Monetary Fund;
- (c) Stability of exchange rates;
- (d) Competitive positions;
- (e) Gold mining;
- (f) What people expect.

Continuity of Government Policy

5. The present government has, in the past, resisted pressure to write the Canadian dollar down by 10%. This may be advanced as an argument for continuing to keep our dollar at parity with the U.S. dollar.

6. On the other hand, devaluation of sterling by 30% is such a big change that it surely releases us from any previous commitments. In fact, people who have agreed with government policy in the past might conclude that, if we did not change our dollar under these circumstances, we were clinging to our present dollar-parity out of sheer inertia or pure stubbornness.

7. Finally, the government argument in the past has been based on three factors, all of which will be completely changed by a 30% devaluation of sterling. These three factors are:

- (i) The position under the Fund;
- (ii) The stability of our dollar;
- (iii) The satisfactory competitive position of Canadian industry.

The way in which each of these will be changed by the fall of sterling is discussed in the following sections.

The Position under the International Monetary Fund

8. Under the Fund Agreement we cannot even propose a movement of our exchange rate unless our balance of payments is in "fundamental disequilibrium". This has not existed in the past; the Canadian dollar was one of the strongest currencies in the world. Other Member countries, therefore, would have regarded unilateral devaluation of our dollar as a most unreasonable proposal.

9. With sterling devalued by 30%, it is very reasonable to argue that we face "fundamental disequilibrium" if we stick to parity with the U.S. dollar. This point is elaborated below.

10. We are allowed by the Fund Agreement to proceed with a devaluation of 10% without discussing the matter with the Fund authorities; we simply tell them what we are doing. If we go beyond 10% (either at one jump or after a series of steps) we must get the Fund's agreement. It is, therefore, better and quicker to operate under (i). This is a telling argument for devaluing 10%, but not more than that.

Stability of Exchange Rates

11. It may be argued, in favour of sticking to parity with the U.S. dollar, that this gives continued "stability" to our dollar.

12. This stability is, however, largely an illusion. There can be no such thing as real stability for our dollar when the two major currencies shift in terms of each other. If we stick to one we move in terms of the other; it is unavoidable.

13. Historically, each major currency has been about equally important in our trading and financial relationships. It is no accident that, when exchange rates were free to fluctuate during the 1930's, the Canadian dollar generally moved "half-way between" the pound and the U.S. dollar. Nowadays our relations with the U.S. dollar are on balance more important. It is, therefore, reasonable to stay "closer" to the dollar than to the pound. This rather suggests a policy of moving (say) 10% down in terms of the U.S. dollar and 20% up in terms of the pound. For us this may be our best approach to "stability".

Competitive Positions

14. When a country writes down its currency its producers are normally put in a stronger competitive position. They can "undersell" foreign producers, both in their home market and abroad.

15. This competitive advantage, of course, is often merely a "temporary" one; it only lasts until the effects of depreciation have "worn off". The effects wear off when wages and other costs rise sufficiently to offset the initial advantage. This may take years. It depends in large measure on the behaviour of trade unions—especially in a highly industrialized country like the United Kingdom.

16. Depreciation of the pound in terms of the U.S. dollar improves the competitive position of U.K. producers vis-à-vis U.S. producers in all markets where their goods compete. Canada is one of those markets. Indeed the U.S. and the U.K. are the two biggest external suppliers of manufacturers to our market. Thus depreciation of the pound will let some British goods push some U.S. goods out of our market. This is doubly desirable; our dollar-imports from U.S. are cut down; our sterling imports from U.K. are increased.

17. All this happens irrespective of the level at which we decide to put the Canadian dollar. The position of our dollar affects, not the relative competitive position of U.S. and U.K. producers, but the competitive position of our own producers in relation to them. It affects the position of our producers both in our own home market and abroad.

18. Take first Canada-U.K. competition. This competition takes place chiefly in the Canadian market—not in the U.K. or in other markets abroad. It is chiefly, almost entirely, in the field of manufactured goods sold in Canada. To the extent that our dollar follows the depreciation of sterling it wipes out the competitive advantage of U.K. producers vis-à-vis our own producers. It does not, however, wipe out the competitive advantage of U.K. vis-à-vis U.S.

19. Next, take Canada-U.S. competition. Unlike the Canada-U.K. competition, it is not virtually restricted either to the Canadian market or to manufactured goods. There is competition of many types in many markets: in manufactures and in forest products and in base metals and in agricultural products; in Canada, in U.S.A., and in other parts of the world. Surely depreciation of our dollar by 10% would give us a competitive advantage in all these fields.

20. It is clear from the two preceding paragraphs that a 10% depreciation of our dollar is much more significant in relation to our dollar-trade than to our sterling-trade. The former trade is much larger, and depreciation directly affects a much larger proportion of it.

21. While we would like to give U.K. producers every advantage under present circumstances, we cannot afford to ignore the position of our own producers, especially those on whom we depend for our earnings of U.S. dollars. Our outlook for dollar earnings is not too bright; the U.K., from whom we always receive a large part of our dollar supplies, is cutting down her purchases from us because she is so short of dollars. In this position a 10% devaluation of our dollar should prove of very real value to us; it checks our imports from the south—makes them more expensive; it encourages our exports in that direction—makes them more profitable. Surely we should not refrain from this step merely because it will eliminate some of the advantages that the U.K. producers will be getting in our market. (It eliminates none of their new advantage vis-à-vis U.S. producers and only eliminates one-third of their new advantage vis-à-vis our own producers).

22. To sum up: if the pound goes down 30% and our dollar goes down 10% the following positions result:

(i) The U.K. manufacturer has a 30% advantage over the U.S. manufacturer in the Canadian market (and elsewhere);

(ii) The U.K. manufacturer has a 20% advantage over the Canadian manufacturer in the Canadian market (and elsewhere);

(iii) The Canadian producer (manufacturers and others) has a 10% advantage over the U.S. producer in the Canadian market (and elsewhere, including the U.S. market).

23. This appears to be a satisfactory trading position, from the point of view of ourselves and others concerned, and is probably as near to a position of "fundamental equilibrium" as we could get.

Gold Mining

24. Our gold mining industry would get a 10% advantage from a 10% write-down of our dollar. This would last until it wore off as a result of increasing costs of labour, materials, etc.

What People Expect (or: How Expectations can be the Chief Cause of their own Confirmation)

25. Almost everybody, surely, will expect the Canadian dollar to move when sterling moves.

The financial people will expect it; they will know that, historically, our dollar has hung half-way between the two major currencies.

The business people will expect it; it makes sense in terms of our trading position both with the U.S. and the U.K.

The gold miners will expect it; they want it.

These expectations cannot be ignored.

26. If sterling goes down and our dollar stays fixed temporarily, everyone will expect our dollar to go down soon. Everyone abroad who has to buy Canadian dollars—for any purpose—will delay, hoping to get them cheaper. Everyone in Canada who has to buy foreign currencies—U.S. dollars or sterling or anything else—will do it as quickly as he can, fearing that those currencies will soon be more expensive. Thus F.E.C.B. becomes a one-way street; all outlet and no inlet. And so our reserves start to fall.

27. This soon becomes known; our next public announcement of our reserve position has to be made at the beginning of October. Everyone is then confirmed in his conviction that the Canadian dollar will soon have to be written down. A new set of expectations is set up; the circle starts another turn.

28. And so it is likely to go—round and round—self aggravating—a downward spiral—until we, like the U.K., eventually slip over the brink into devaluation. Meanwhile, we lose precious reserves. We would do well to write them up (writing down the value of our dollar in terms of them) at the outset. When we do so we make a nice paper-profit.

29. "If it is done when 'tis done, then 't'were well it were done quickly".

Following for the Prime Minister and Mr. Abbott from Pearson, Begins:

1. On Saturday I had a few words with Mr. Acheson and Mr. Bevin on the Canadian exchange position, in the light of the Cabinet decision reached that morning. The latter was disappointed that we were not taking action at once to devalue, but he made it clear that he was thinking of the effect of our decision on the price of their wheat, rather than its effect on the general United Kingdom-Canadian position. Mr. Acheson, on the other hand, expressed pleasure and some surprise, hoped that we would be able to stick to our position, but indicated that any decision to devalue to a moderate extent would not be misunderstood here. Later on Saturday Mr. Acheson mentioned the Canadian position to Mr. Snyder, and subsequent developments indicated that the Secretary of the Treasury may have drawn rather unwarranted conclusions that we were not proposing to take any action of any kind for an indefinite period. Word from Ottawa on Sunday indicated that a decision would, in fact, require to be made very soon, possibly Monday, and this, when coupled with the change made in the statement to be issued by Mr. Abbott on Sunday and which was telephoned to me, made it desirable to correct any impression which may have been left in the minds of any Americans that we had made a decision to remain at par with the United States dollar.

2. Mr. Rasminsky took the necessary steps to this end with United States and fund officials with whom he had been discussing the Canadian position. (Mr. Gutt,¹ incidentally, had already told him that, in his opinion, we would soon be in a mess if we tried to stay at parity.) I then telephoned Mr. Acheson, who was in the country and asked if we could see him. He was good enough to invite Mr. Wrong, Mr. Robertson and me to his farm and we had a useful talk with him there last night. We discussed with him some of the implications, especially as they related to the Canadian United States position, of any decision in Ottawa to hold the dollar at parity. At the same time we emphasized that no decision had been taken. We added that some decision could not now be postponed for long, might have to be taken in fact on Monday and might in fact result in a ten percent devaluation. Mr. Acheson had not given much consideration to that position, or indeed to the effect generally of sterling devaluation on the whole United States economic picture. Our effort, therefore, to explore this aspect of the matter, to see what effect Canadian devaluation action would have on the position here, political and economic, was not very fruitful. However, we were all quite satisfied that if we decide to take devaluation action of the kind indicated, the Administration here would not be particularly disturbed by it, while, on the other hand, if we decide to hold the line there could be no assurance of action on the American side which would assist us in maintaining that course, however satisfactory such a course might be to them. Mr. Acheson was friendly, but quite non-committal as to the possibility of any United States co-operation which would ease our position if we remained at par. My own view is that, in this, he was reflecting the general feeling here; that little thought had been given to the Canadian situation and that we cannot expect any action from Washington which would make it easier for us to come to a decision now, one way or the other, or to hold the line later, if we decide to take that course.

3. Talks which Mr. Robertson and Mr. Rasminsky have had over the week-end with United States and United Kingdom officials reinforce the conclusions reached above. In particular, Mr. [Frank A.] Southard, the United States Executive Director on the Fund, told Mr. Rasminsky last night that in the Treasury they would quite understand it if we were forced to devalue by ten percent and would not be disturbed by it. This opinion was also expressed to me by Mr. Snyder this morning when I had a few words with him before leaving. He said, "if you should decide to devalue by 10 percent, we think that this would be entirely logical and we would not be disturbed by it". It is also fair to say, however, that both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Snyder would be happy if we decided to remain at parity, but we must not, I think, expect any assurances from them of United States action which would make it easier to maintain that position if pressures against it developed. Ends.

Following for the Minister of Finance from Rasminsky, Begins: The following is the text of the statement which I shall make to the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund if appropriate instructions are received from you, text begins:

The Minister of Finance of Canada has today advised the Fund in a communication transmitted by the Canadian Ambassador to the United States of the proposed change in the par value of the Canadian dollar and of his authorization to me to present the reasons for the action which the Government of Canada expects to take.

The Fund is well aware of the great part played by international trade in the economic life of Canada. Our situation is such that we are bound to be deeply affected by changes in the exchange rates of other countries which are important factors in world trade, as well as by the relationship of Canadian price levels to those prevailing in our most important markets and sources of supply.

The events of the past few years have clearly indicated how strongly the Canadian position is affected by changes in external circumstances. It will be recalled that Canada's current international transactions showed only a small surplus in the calendar year 1947, and that in the latter part of the year there was probably a deficit. A substantial surplus was achieved in 1948, as a result of import restrictions and the expansion in exports, the latter being helped by the buyers' market that continued to prevail during the greater part of the year.

At the beginning of 1949, it was clear that Canada's current account surplus would be sharply reduced from the 1948 level, and as events have unfolded, the prospective size of the surplus has progressively declined. It is now estimated that for the year as a whole there will be only a small surplus on current account.

The prospects for 1950, so far as they can now be appraised, do not indicate an improvement in this trend. Any further adverse development in our external trade, either in respect of prices or physical volume, would create a deficit in our current international accounts, even though import restrictions of considerable scope are still in force.

The substantial devaluation of sterling and other currencies which the Fund has already approved, and the further devaluations now in prospect, have implications in regard to our balance of payments position which cause my Government serious concern. It follows that such developments have major implications for Canadian exchange policy, whether this is analyzed with reference to historical precedent or to the prospective effect of the major exchange rate adjustments now taking place, in decreasing Canadian exports and increasing Canadian imports. In these circumstances, my Government is of the opinion that maintenance of the par value of the Canadian dollar at its present level would result in a fundamental disequilibrium.

The Canadian Government does not wish to reduce the par value of its currency to any greater extent that it believes to be essential to mitigate the effect on Canada's external and internal position of the much larger degree of depreciation which is taking place in a number of other countries, and to maintain fundamental equilibrium. While it is not yet possible to be precise in regard to the number of countries which are or shortly will be proposing a change in the par values of their currencies, nor regarding the exact scope of the changes which will take place, my Government feels that the realignment will extend over an area in which Canada conducts a very important part of her trade, and that it will be large enough in extent to have serious repercussions on Canada's position. The effects will be felt not only directly in Canada's trade with the countries which devalue, but also indirectly since many of these countries are important competitors with Canada in trade with third countries.

Taking all considerations into account, the Canadian Government has decided that the change in the par value of the Canadian dollar referred to in the communication made to the Fund today by the Minister of Finance is necessary in order to help to correct a fundamental disequilibrium. Text ends.

[Ottawa], January 3, 1949

LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE AND THE CHARTER OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION

The Canadian government has been applying the General Agreement provisionally since the 1st January, 1948. The Agreement was considered by Parliament at the last Session but not dealt with finally. The provisions of the I.T.O. Charter imply that the major trading nations which have indicated their willingness to submit the Charter to their national Legislature should do so before September 30th, 1949. The U.S. Administration has already made public its intention to present the Charter to Congress at its next Session. Prior approval of the Charter and of the General Agreement by Canada might facilitate approval by Congress.

Separate consideration of the Charter and the Agreement would involve unnecessary duplication of effort since the provisions of the Agreement are contained in the Charter in essentially the same terms. In addition the Agreement provides that the bulk of its provisions will be replaced by the corresponding provisions of the Charter when the latter enters into force.

Major amendments to existing Canadian legislation which would result from Canadian acceptance of the Agreement and the Charter are at present under detailed consideration by the Department of Justice and the other departments concerned. Some goods would have to be removed from Schedule C of the Customs Tariff (prohibited goods) to Schedule A where they would be subject to duty. Among the items involved are used automobiles, used aircraft and oleomargarine. The discount granted in respect of goods imported into Canada under the benefits of the British Preferential tariff would have to be discontinued where the B.P. rate is the same as the M.F.N. rate. On one item, tin plate, the B.P. rate would have to be increased from 3 to 15 per cent. This modification resulted from the tariff negotiations between Canada and the United States at Geneva; the United Kingdom raised no objection.

The Cabinet Committee on External Trade Policy recommends in view of the above consideration:

(a) That the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization be submitted to Parliament for approval at an early date at its next session;

(b) That both the Charter and the Agreement be presented in the form of a Bill to be introduced by the Prime Minister unless he wishes to designate another Minister for this purpose;

(c) That the text of the General Agreement should be the one as amended up to the time it is tabled; and

(d) That draft legislation be prepared accordingly.²

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO CONFERENCE ON TRADE AND TARIFFS

The Third Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (Geneva, October 1947) is scheduled to open in Annecy, France, on April 8th. Tariff negotiations will be held at the same time, with a view to the accession of an additional 13 countries to the General Agreement. The Cabinet Committee on External Trade Policy has already approved Canada's participation in these tariff negotiations.

I would recommend that the following officials should compose the Canadian Delegation:

Department of External Affairs

Chairman: Mr. L.D. Wilgress, Canadian Minister to Switzerland.

Mr. Louis Couillard, Economic Division.

Department of Finance

Mr. W.J. Callaghan, Commissioner of Tariffs.

Mr. S.S. Reisman, Int. Economic Relations Div.

One more official from the International Economic Relations Division.

Department of Trade and Commerce

Commercial Relations and Foreign Tariffs Division.

Mr. H.R. Kemp, Director.

Mr. A.L. Neal, Acting Chief, Treaty Research Section.

Secretary: Mr. B.G. Barrow.

Department of Agriculture

Dr. A.E. Richards, Economic Division.

At the invitation of the United Kingdom Government, the delegation will take part in preliminary discussions with other Commonwealth countries in London, prior to the Annecy meeting.³

INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE TRADE AND TARIFF MEETINGS
UNDER THE GENERAL AGREEMENT, ANNECY, APRIL 8, 1949.

A) Most-Favoured-Nation Treatment for Japan

The following instructions have been approved by the Cabinet Committee on External Trade Policy:

(1) The Canadian Government cannot consider entering into an unconditional type of most-favoured-nation agreement with Japan at the present time.

(2) The Canadian Delegation should try to persuade the United States representatives to drop or, at least, postpone the whole proposal.

(3) If the United States representatives will not agree, the Canadian Delegation to Anncy should explore the possibility of a conditional most-favoured-nation agreement. The agreement should provide reasonable protection to Canadian industry against the products of cheap labour, dumping, arbitrary currency valuations and similar practices, while promoting mutually advantageous trade between the two countries.

B) Tariff Negotiations: Preferences

The following instructions will apply both to the Commonwealth discussions in London and to the tariff negotiations at Anncy. The instructions are virtually the same as those which were given the Delegation to the 1947 Geneva tariff negotiations (Cabinet Conclusions, February 19, 1947, paras. 15 and 16).

(1) To attempt to secure at London general agreement among Commonwealth countries that they will not meet requests for reduction or elimination of preferential margins by the device of raising duties against one another.

(2) To attempt further to secure at London mutual agreement that Commonwealth countries might proceed at Anncy as if all "fixed margins" of preference, whether scheduled or otherwise, were, for the purpose of the negotiations, tentatively unbound and, hence, freely and unilaterally negotiable.

(3) To proceed at Anncy as per (2) above, even though unsuccessful in their effort to secure mutual understanding to that end (subject to resumed negotiations with each Commonwealth country concerned).

(4) To be prepared, therefore, to accede, if necessary, to the loss or impairment of preferential margins enjoyed by Canada if such action becomes essential to the maintenance of existing free entry (or low duties) in Canada's favour and to the conclusion of mutually advantageous arrangements.

(5) To explore with the delegations of Australia and South Africa, the possibilities of unbinding residual margins of preference, scheduled or otherwise. (This was done with the United Kingdom in 1947 and resulted in an Exchange of Notes giving effect to the arrangement.)⁴

RESULTS OF THE ANNECY TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

Cabinet approved on March 24 Canada's participation in the Annecy tariff negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. These negotiations were conducted at Annecy, France, between April and August, 1949.

2. The purpose of the Annecy negotiations was to permit a number of additional countries known as "acceding countries" to negotiate with the present Contracting Parties to the General Agreement and with each other, with a view to their accession to the Agreement.

3. A total of approximately 140 separate bilateral trade agreements were negotiated. The following "acceding countries" concluded their tariff negotiations. Canada concluded negotiations with all ten[:] Denmark, Dominion Republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Liberia, Nicaragua, Sweden, Uruguay.

4. There are annexed hereto the following statements on the results of the Canadian negotiations:

1. Concessions granted by Canada, showing the present and the proposed rate of duty and the country with which the concession was initially negotiated.†

2. Concessions of interest to Canada extended by each acceding country.†

3. Concessions to be received by Canada in the tariff of present Contracting Parties under the most-favoured-nation provisions of the Agreement as a result of their negotiations with the "acceding countries".†

4. Modifications in preferential tariff margins enjoyed by Canada.†

5. Each Contracting Party must now decide, in the light of the overall results of the tariff negotiations,

(a) what "acceding countries" are to be permitted actually to accede to the General Agreement. As explained below, this decision will be formalized by signature of the Protocol of Accession;

⁴ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 24 mars 1949.
Approved by Cabinet on March 24, 1949.

(b) whether and at what time it will put into force the individual tariff concessions which it provisionally agreed at Annecy to extend to each acceding country. This will be done by notification to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

6. These requirements are defined in the Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. This Protocol will be made public by the United Nations and in the capital of all countries concerned at various times corresponding to 8.30 P.M., EDT, on Sunday, October 9. A Press Release will be issued in Ottawa on the morning of Saturday, October 8, with an embargo on publication before the agreed time.

7. The Protocol is a long document. It serves three main purposes:

(a) It incorporates in the form of Annexes the Schedules of tariff concessions exchanged as a result of the Annecy negotiations. There will be one Schedule for each country which concluded tariff negotiations. Once the Schedules have entered into force, they will become supplements to the present Schedules (Geneva 1947) contained in the General Agreement.

(b) It provides for the accession of the acceding countries.

As indicated above, signature of the Protocol by an existing Contracting Party constitutes a vote in favour of the accession of each of the acceding countries in respect of which such Contracting Party signs the Protocol.

The Protocol will be open for signature on October 10 at Lake Success.

Each acceding country must obtain the signature of two-thirds of the Contracting Parties before it can itself become a Contracting Party by signing the Protocol.

(c) It sets forth the terms and procedures which will govern the entry into force of the tariff concessions by the Contracting Parties and by acceding countries.

It is expected that a Contracting Party which signs the Protocol in favour of the accession of an acceding country will also extend the tariff concessions which it initially negotiated directly with that acceding country.

The earliest date on which any concession need be applied is January 1, 1950.

8. I recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, that an Order-in-Council be passed to provide for:

1. The issuance of Full Powers authorizing the signature of the Protocol of Accession with respect to each of the ten acceding countries listed in paragraph 3.

2. Authority for the submission by Canada before November 30 of the required notification to the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the effect that Canada will put into force the tariff concessions negotiated initially with each acceding country on the day on which such acceding country becomes a Contracting Party and extends its tariff concessions to Canada.⁵

9. The recommendation in 8 (2) above provides for application of the results of the Annecy negotiations with respect to Canada at the earliest possible dates.

Approved by Cabinet on October 6, 1949.

10. Separate submissions to Council will be presented in due course in order to obtain authority to extend the Canadian tariff concessions to each acceding country.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENDA—INTRODUCTION OF GATT AND ITO AT THE PRESENT SESSION

On September 13th Cabinet asked you and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to consider and report whether the introduction of the Resolution to approve the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the International Trade Organization Charter should be deferred until the 1950 Session.

2. I suggest that you report to Cabinet tomorrow that GATT and ITO should not be introduced into the present Session. You have already agreed to this. (I sent you a memorandum to New York).† The Minister of Trade and Commerce concurs.

3. Officials are unanimous that GATT and ITO should not be introduced at the present Session. No purpose would be served by Canadian action in advance of United States action. The political climate in the United States is at present unfavourable to both Organizations, and particularly to ITO. Congress will not consider the question this year.

4. I suggest that your recommendation to Cabinet regarding action (or rather inaction) at the present Session should be without reference to action at the next Session.⁶ When Parliament meets again next year the outlook in the United States may be clearer. If ITO seems likely to be approved by Congress, then both ITO and GATT probably should be introduced into Parliament here. It is possible that Congress may approve GATT but not ITO. In this case we would probably want to do the same. I understand that Parliamentary approval would probably not be required for GATT alone; all that would be needed would be some minor amendments of the Customs Tariff Act, and these could accompany the Budget of 1950.

We have been invited to participate in a third set of tariff negotiations under the aegis of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. These negotiations are expected to begin on September 28th, 1950. Earlier negotiations were held at Geneva in 1947 and at Annecy in 1949.

2. The 1950 negotiations will serve three purposes:

A) Accession of New Countries

The following countries have been invited to participate in these proposed negotiations with a view to acceding to the General Agreement:

American Republics	Europe	Middle and Far East
Argentina	Austria	Afghanistan
Bolivia	Federal Republic of Germany	Egypt
Costa Rica	Iceland	Hashemite Jordan Kingdom
Ecuador	Ireland	Iran
El Salvador	Poland	Iraq
Guatemala	Portugal	Israel
Mexico	Switzerland	Nepal
Panama		Philippines
Paraguay		Republic of Korea
Peru		Turkey
Venezuela

The accession of Western Germany to the General Agreement, if it decides to participate, will be particularly important. It will make possible a broad attack on a part of the United States tariff which has hitherto remained untouched because of the rule that countries negotiate only with "principal supplier" of any item. Western Germany has been the principal supplier to the United States of a large number of items, especially manufactures, on which Canadians would welcome reductions in the United States tariff.

B) New Negotiations between Present Members

New negotiations will be held between pairs of contracting parties which concluded tariff negotiations at Geneva or Annecy and desire to negotiate new or additional reciprocal tariff concessions. This will give Canada a new opportunity to negotiate with the United States and with other members.

C) Completion of Unfinished Negotiations between Present Members

Negotiations will be held between contracting parties which participated in the Geneva or Annecy Conferences but did not conclude negotiations with each other on those occasions.

3. The contracting parties have been asked to notify the Executive Secretary not later than October 30th, 1949, whether they are in favour of a third set of negotiations on this basis.

4. I recommend that Cabinet agree to this proposal. The Interdepartmental Subcommittee on External Trade Policy concurs in this recommendation.⁷

5. If the contracting parties decide to conduct this set of negotiations, and if we agree to participate, it will be necessary to make a public announcement of our intention to do so, and to invite interested parties in Canada to submit any representations they may wish to make. This announcement should be made as soon as we learn which countries have accepted the invitation of the contracting parties. We expect to have this information not later than November 15th.

Dear Mr. Reid,

I wish to refer to confidential circular No. B 2, enclosing copy of despatch No. 2815 of December 21, 1948, from Washington. Enclosed with the Washington despatch was a very interesting memorandum prepared by Mr. J.R. Murray of the Embassy staff on the question of trade relations between the United States and Canada.⁸

I agree with the conclusions summarized by Mr. Wrong in paragraph 2 of his despatch, and also agree that these conclusions point to the advisability of seeking to negotiate a new trade agreement with the United States on a broad basis. I was particularly interested in the dangers, to which Mr. Murray calls attention, of the possible application of special import restrictions by the United States to Canadian agricultural products.

There is one factor to which Mr. Murray refers but which may possibly not be sufficiently appreciated either in Ottawa or in our Embassy at Washington. This factor is the importance of having the United States more and more committed to the principles of the Havana Charter, but more especially to those of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. I have always felt that by supporting wholeheartedly the United States in their desire to strengthen the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, we have been serving greatly to assist the State Department in their struggle with the Department of Agriculture and the powerful United States agricultural lobby. I found great encouragement in the economic message of President Truman, in which reference was made to the need for reconciling domestic agricultural policy with United States international trade policy.

It is for these reasons that I would add one more conclusion to those derived by Mr. Wrong in submitting Mr. Murray's memorandum, and that is that Canada should wholeheartedly give support to the effort of the United States to broaden and strengthen the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, because by this means we commit the United States more and more to an international policy with which special import restrictions are inconsistent in spirit, although perhaps not inconsistent with the letter of the Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

I am returning herewith your note of topics† which might be raised with the President. It seems to me to cover the specific topics, though we will have a memorandum prepared on other matters which may arise.

I should think that it might be desirable in general conversation to point out to the President the developing dangers of the Canadian economic situation which can be made almost impossible for any government here to cope with if they are intensified by United States action. Those dangers arise to some extent out of the great contribution we have made in recent years to European recovery, and it would arouse very considerable irritation in this country if the United States added to them now. That that is not unlikely is shown in recent debates in Congress on off-shore purchases and demands being made by certain agricultural Congressmen to declare wheat surplus and stop E.C.A. purchasing in Canada. This, of course, would be a very grave blow to our economy at this time and would bring to an end at once any credits which we are now giving to European countries.

At the same time, it might be pointed out to the President that partly on account of United States insistence, which is not unreasonable in the circumstances, the European countries are building up their own economies on a basis of the maximum amount of inter-European trade. This also will have an important long range effect on Canada, especially in view of the United Kingdom participation in this development. With the combined pressures of the United States on the one hand and the United Kingdom on the other against our export economy, we would certainly be in a bad way.

The gloomy predictions of long range developments in Europe to our disadvantage have been reinforced by the experience of our representatives last week in the Anglo-Canadian Trade Committee. They have returned with the feeling that the prospects of returning to the pre-war pattern of trade between Canada and the United Kingdom are growing dimmer and dimmer.

The moral of this is obvious. We should turn south; indeed, we may eventually have to. Therefore, it would seem to be the course of wisdom to take whatever preparatory action we can now. My own feeling is that it would be very useful to discuss with the President Canada-United States trade, but on a very general basis; to get his reaction to the general idea of removing all possible barriers to this trade.

¹⁰ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

My own view—and I have expressed it to you before—is that we should empower our officials to discuss in Washington fully reciprocal trade arrangements with the Department of Agriculture officials there. So far, as you know, discussions in this field have been confined to a small group in the State Department. I do not see what we have to lose by broadening the basis of this discussion. We do not commit ourselves by this broadening, even though we do run a risk of leakage that the discussions are under way. This, however, does not seem to me to be a very dangerous risk and, to my mind, is not so important as ascertaining the reaction of the United States agricultural people to freer trade. I suspect that that reaction will be unfavourable, in which case we cannot be blamed for not having made further progress.

At the same time, I think it would be desirable to explore all possibilities of a further trade arrangement under the existing Trade Agreements Act. Probably not much remains to be done here, but certainly something could be accomplished. For this purpose, we have not yet exhausted all the possibilities, nor indeed have we taken all the preparatory steps. I think that it would be very remiss on our part if we did not do everything possible in this direction.

It might also be desirable to point out discreetly to the President that genuine irritation is apt to be caused in Canada when United States authorities compare our present contribution to European economic recovery or our present defence expenditures in mathematical terms proportionate to their own.

As to the first, the Americans forget that in earlier years we were making a far greater proportionate contribution to European recovery than they were, and we did not complain to them that we were doing too much. We don't expect them to complain now that they are doing too much, and we don't like this tendency to exact mathematical comparisons now when it would have been to our advantage to make comparisons then.

Similarly, with defence expenditures, the United States is a great world power which makes the decisions; decisions which, to some extent, bind others. It would be folly, therefore, to expect that Canada's defence expenditures should be proportionately the same as those of the United States. The Americans should not complain if they have to pay the price of empire, nor should they expect us to pay that price with them. Furthermore, we contributed pretty heavily to the defence of the United States in 1914–17 and 1939–41, and we didn't raise this question of proportionate defence contribution then!

TRADE WITH UNITED STATES; NEGOTIATION OF NEW AGREEMENT

1. The Minister of Finance reported that a bill now pending in the United States would extend to June, 1951, the President's powers to negotiate tariff reductions under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Notwithstanding the concessions obtained at Geneva and others to be discussed at Annecy, there was scope for further reductions.

It was suggested that, provided the U.S. bill to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act were approved, the U.S. government be approached formally with a view to opening negotiation for a new trade agreement. Although any new agreement would have to provide that U.S. tariff reductions were reasonably well matched by Canadian reductions, it was hoped that the practical results of such an agreement would be to increase the flow of goods from north to south by a greater volume than the increase in the reverse direction, thus improving our balance of trade position with the United States.

2. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the proposal of the Minister of Finance and agreed that the U.S. government be approached formally with a view to negotiating a new trade agreement; U.S. consent to be obtained to an appropriate government announcement being made soon, if possible upon introduction of the budget.

NEW TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

This matter was discussed at a meeting in the Privy Council Office which you attended last week. It was agreed by the Ministers present that a new agreement would be desirable from the Canadian point of view and that Mr. Deutsch should explore informally the possibility that an announcement of new negotiations might be included in the Budget speech.

Mr. Deutsch now reports that the reaction in the United States is still favourable to a new agreement but there is no hope of getting the United States agreement to an announcement before Easter.

No announcement could be made before Congress has passed the new Trade Agreements Act and there is now no hope that this will happen before Easter. One of the chief factors making for delay is the need to have new United States legislation on rent control before March 31st.

United States officials had suggested that they would prefer an even longer delay. The Charter of I.T.O. will probably be before Congress next month and they would prefer to delay announcement of new Canada/United States trade negotiations until that legislation, too, is out of the way. However they have been told that we are anxious to press forward with an announcement.¹¹

I understand that Mr. Deutsch has, as in the past, worked through Mr. Wrong on this matter. Hence our Embassy is informed. Mr. Deutsch is informing the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Deutsch telephoned to me this afternoon to say that the Ministers in Ottawa had decided that they want to go ahead at once, if possible, to negotiate a further Trade Agreement with the United States under the Reciprocal Agreements Act. There have been discussions over the last six weeks or so between Deutsch and Willoughby, as a result of which it is apparent that although not a great deal can be accomplished to increase the tariff reductions secured by the Geneva Agreements, there is enough left over to make a further agreement worth while, especially from our point of view in securing concessions on a miscellaneous range of manufactured products. The Government would like to be in a position to announce in the Budget Speech, which is due to take place sometime next week, that negotiations with the United States had been arranged and will begin in the near future. They consider it politically of considerable importance that they should be able to say this.

Deutsch said that he had been in touch with Willoughby on the telephone before speaking to me. Willoughby had already started matters going inside the State Department, and there is no need for a formal approach to be made to the Secretary of State. One doubt, however, is whether the Senate can pass the Trade Agreements Act in time for the U.S. to consent to our referring to the negotiations in the Budget Speech. This depends on what happens in the present filibuster, as the Act is the first legislative order of business to be taken up after the filibuster ends.

I told Deutsch that I would speak to Willoughby in a couple of days to see what progress he was making in getting clearance on this side. What we want by next week is an indication that they concur here in a general reference to the opening of negotiations. There is little in the field of tariffs that the Government can say, and they naturally want to say something positive at this time, with growing concern in Canada over export markets under the impact of bi-lateral deals and the reduction by the O.E.E.C. countries of their dollar purchases.

BUDGET REFERENCE TO NEW TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

1. I called Deutsch this afternoon to get an explanation of the reference in Mr. Abbott's speech to Canada seeking a further Trade Agreement with the United States when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been passed by Congress. It appeared from Item G of today's news summary, based on the story in The Gazette, that Mr. Abbott's statement was in direct conflict with the wishes of the State Department as conveyed in your WA-708 of March 15th.†

2. Deutsch said that the Cabinet decided on Monday afternoon that it was most desirable to put a reference to this question in the Budget. By that time the Budget message was ready to go to the printers and, in view of the time factor, it was, according to Deutsch, feasible to communicate only by telephone directly with Willoughby's and Winthrop Brown's offices. Mr. Abbott's statement was cleared in the sense that the wording was given to Willoughby on the understanding that if Deutsch had not heard back by a certain time that the statement was objectionable, it would be included in the Budget. No United States objection was received before the deadline, hence Mr. Abbott's statement.

3. I told Deutsch that I was calling him since it was expected that you would be tied up most of today at a meeting, and I knew that you would be concerned about the inclusion of this reference to a Trade Agreement, in view of your conversation with the State Department last week. Deutsch said that he was very apologetic about not having telephoned you, and asked me to convey his apologies to you. He said that the rush on the Budget, which was a larger document this year than ever before, was the worst that he has known. Although he offered this as a partial explanation of his failure to telephone you, I think that he does not regard it as an adequate excuse.

4. Deutsch said that the wording in Mr. Abbott's statement (the full text of which is being obtained by the Information Division) is designed to minimize any embarrassment which this statement might cause the State Department. We are only saying that we will take an opportunity to "seek" a further Trade Agreement, and we "hope it may be possible" to conclude a further agreement. The State Department could therefore say that there has been no approach by the Canadians and that Mr. Abbott has an understandable right to remark on the general trade policy of his country with respect to any other country. It should not be too startling, therefore, to find the Minister of Finance of the present Government reiterating something that has been general Canadian Government policy for some time, i.e., seeking ever-broader trading relationships with the United States.

RE: U.S. RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT; INSTITUTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Following our conversation on this subject yesterday with Wrong, Mackenzie, Clark, Towers and Robertson, I spoke to the Minister saying that your Division was looking into the appropriate procedure for instituting negotiations under the R.T.A. Act, as and when approved by Congress.

Mr. Pearson (and other Ministers) is anxious to be able to show diligence in this matter. He wishes to be in a position to say publicly that as soon as the Act was passed, the Canadian government immediately took steps to have negotiations instituted between Canada and the United States. We should be quite sure, therefore, that our communication to the U.S. government is ready for signature and despatch immediately we have word that Congress has acted.

After our discussion yesterday I felt that the officials were not altogether appreciative of the urgency which Ministers attach to this matter. I trust that it may be found that the first step is a letter in general terms and that it will not have to be accompanied by a list of the items upon which we wish to have discussions; the latter would obviously offer some difficulty and, perhaps, considerable embarrassment.

May I count on you having this matter followed up so that I might be warned in good time. The Minister would like to sign the communication himself, if possible.

1. Deutsch had a long talk yesterday with Brown of the State Department on the possibility of negotiating a new Trade Agreement once the Trade Agreements Act has been renewed by Congress. Brown told him that they had been turning down all other applicants, but he thought that an exception might be made in the case of Canada. Deutsch will give a full report of this discussion on his return to Ottawa.

2. He and I wish to emphasize that it is important that no public reference should be made in Canada to the possibility of a new Agreement until the Senate has completed action on the Bill. While its passage is very likely, there is a prospect that amendments of a restrictive nature may be made. Any intimation from Canada that we were looking forward to the early negotiation of an Agreement would stiffen the opposition and increase the likelihood of amendment.

3. The present intention is to begin debate in the Senate on Tuesday, May 31st, with the probability of final action sometime in the following week.

4. The Secretary of Commerce has shown me a draft of a speech which he will deliver in Toronto at the opening of the International Trade Fair on May 30th. This contains at the end a statement of the desirability of expanding trade between Canada and the United States through the lowering of tariffs. There might be some temptation to follow this up on our side by a more specific reference to our hope that we may soon secure a further Trade Agreement with the United States. I should hope that any public reference to Mr. Sawyer's remarks which might be made would be put in more general terms.

5. Incidentally, Mr. Sawyer told me that he had had it in mind to mention a customs union between the two countries as a desirable objective. I have dissuaded him from so doing. Deutsch and I both read his draft, and we have suggested two or three minor changes. It will, I think, be a useful statement coming from the United States Secretary of Commerce and should contain nothing that will be embarrassing. Ends.

Following for Deutsch (copies to N.A. Robertson and Plumptre), Begins: Reference our telephone conversation this morning, I have just spoken to Brown.

1. First as to the legislative programme here. A battle is now going on over the priority to be accorded in the Senate to the North Atlantic Treaty, Reciprocal Agreements Act, and labour legislation. It is likely, but not certain, that they will be taken up in that order. Senator George is still away and the Senate is taking up other business today. Debate on the Treaty may begin next Monday. Brown considers that the Reciprocal Agreements Act should pass in June, but it is likely to be in the latter half of the month.¹²

2. I passed on to him what you told me, saying that it had been found that we needed more time to prepare the list that you had promised him and that the most that we now proposed to do during June (provided that the Act had passed) would be to send a note to the State Department expressing our hope to initiate negotiations for a new agreement at the appropriate time. Brown was pessimistic about their being ready to initiate negotiations for some time, or even soon to complete their studies so that they could determine whether an acceptable basis for negotiations existed. He said it would be unfortunate if we presented a note on the lines suggested and the State Department later determined that there was not enough leeway under the Act to justify a new agreement. He therefore hoped that we could make no move of this sort without further informal consultation. He was most anxious that nothing should be said publicly (or even in an unpublished note to the Secretary of State) that could not be satisfactorily followed up.

3. I asked him when he expected to be able to determine whether a new agreement was practicable. He referred to the absence of many of the experts at the Annecy Conference until mid-July and to the need for further information on our desiderata, but said nothing definite.

4. In substance, Brown's views are that no overt or formal step ought to be taken until both sides are satisfied that a useful result can be attained, which seems to involve our knowing in general outline what the result will probably be before putting the discussions on an official plane. Ends.

The announcement by Canada of the renewal of withdrawals on the United Kingdom credit has now become, from the ECA point of view, a rather more urgent question. The hearings on the European Recovery Programme are scheduled to start on January 24th, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

2. An immense amount of work remains to be done during the next three weeks; for example, Hall-Patch, Marjolin and others from the OEEC will be arriving in Washington on January 6th to consult with ECA officials on the country programmes. ECA officials estimate that the material which will be presented to Congress will have to be in their hands and ready for final editing by the 17th.

3. The information given to Congress will have to include the actual as well as the estimated assistance being extended by the other Western Hemisphere countries. Although in the words of one ECA official the "source contributions have not yet been statistically coordinated", as far as Canada is concerned the $60 million dollars from Canada to the United Kingdom in 1949 has been regarded by the ECA as firm. If there is any prospect that the announcement on the credit will not be made by January 17th, it will be necessary to inform the ECA that the 60 million dollar figure is an estimate only and cannot be regarded as a commitment by Canada.

4. I should be glad to know the present position on the credit announcement.

ECA off-shore purchases.

1. Strange told Deutsch and Murray, yesterday, in response to a direct question, that ECA would not finance any further purchases by European countries, including the United Kingdom, of Canadian wheat during the present crop year. Although from the recent Senate hearings (WA-258 of February 2nd† and subsequent messages) as well as from Anderson's report to Wilson¹³ and McNamara¹⁴ it had become more and more evident that the ECA would be facing great difficulties in continuing to finance Canadian wheat purchases, we had, until yesterday, not been told that this United States policy decision with such serious effects for Canada had been definitely made. ECA officials had hinted but had not previously been willing to tell us outright. Strange appeared to consider that Fitzgerald's statement to Anderson United Kingdom delegate to the Wheat Conference (WA-313 on February 7th)† amounted to a definite notice that the United Kingdom would have to finance second quarter Canadian wheat otherwise than through ECA.

2. When Deutsch explained to Strange in plain terms what this serious development would mean for Canada and for our future arrangements, Strange said that they were well aware of the possible repercussions and hinted that ECA was urgently examining a proposal which might ameliorate the effects upon Canada of the new policy. He said it was premature to explain what they had in mind. He said that they would try to work out something which would carry the agreement of ECA, State and Agriculture, which they could present to Congress. We should hear something about this in the near future.

3. This problem was discussed briefly with Christelow of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation this morning. Christelow and Sir Sidney Caine saw Bissell, yesterday, in order to follow-up on the "warning" which Anderson had previously received from Fitzgerald. Bissell took what Christelow described as a "gloomy line", and said that they must regard the problem as very serious indeed, since it appeared that the ECA would be unable to finance further Canadian wheat purchases—not that they are unwilling to do so, but that they will find themselves unable to do so owing to the very clear attitude of the Senators. Bissell, therefore, did not categorically close the door. However, in Christelow's view, he did the next thing to doing so.

4. The United Kingdom line in Washington at least is that the problem of collecting documents which would be created by having to switch 45 per cent of their programme is next to impossible. The United Kingdom officials in both London and Washington are working to see what can be accomplished in the way of switches from ECA financing to their own sources. Christelow concluded that the only feasible United Kingdom alternative might very well be to take up United States surpluses.

ECA off-shore purchases. Your WA-386.

1. Yesterday Deutsch reported in some detail to the Sub-Committee on External Trade Policy. This supplemented general reports we have had from you.

2. We understand that when the Prime Minister raised this question with the President in the afternoon¹⁵ he got a sympathetic hearing and that the President gave instructions to Acheson to find some way out of the difficulty. The President realized that Canada's most important single industry was at stake and that if it were damaged by US action the future relations between Canada and the US in trade and other matters might have to take a new turn.

3. We understand that the US is making some new plan to "ameliorate the effects upon Canada on the new policy" (WA-386 para 2). Deutsch agrees that this may possibly involve a suggestion from the US that Canada should increase the amount of "aid" it is giving to Britain. On the other hand Deutsch emphasizes that no suggestion of this sort was made either in his discussions or in the President's remarks to the Prime Minister.

4. We understand that you are now waiting for word of this new plan.

E.C.A. off-shore purchases.

1. In your EX-400 of February 16th you state that you understand that the Prime Minister informed the Cabinet that the President gave instructions to Acheson to find some way out of the difficulty over ECA financing of Canadian wheat for the United Kingdom. In my note of the conversation I say that both the President and Mr. Acheson "appeared to agree...that some means must be found to avoid such a development". I showed a copy of this note, however, to the State Department and they have now informed us, with some embarrassment, that both the Secretary of State and Mr. Steinhardt consider that the President did not commit himself as definitely as my record would imply. They would like the language I have quoted to be changed for some such phrase as "the possibility of finding means to avoid such a development must be explored".

2. In addition, they point out that neither the President nor the Secretary of State knew in advance that the Prime Minister intended to raise this subject and therefore they heard of the problem from him for the first time. This, I am sure, is correct, because it was impossible for me to give any advance indication that the matter would come up, since the Prime Minister only decided to mention it after receiving our latest information very shortly before he saw the President.

3. I had not intended the language used in my record to bear the interpretation that a definite commitment had been made, and hence I said that the President and Mr. Acheson "appeared to agree" that this development must be avoided. We know, of course, that ECA would like to continue to provide funds to the United Kingdom for their Canadian wheat purchases, but what they are afraid of is that they will be debarred from so doing either by the insertion by Congress of an amendment in the legislation or by being compelled to make a commitment to the Congressional Committees as the price of avoiding a restrictive amendment, or by the Secretary of Agriculture considering himself required to exercise his powers under Section 112.

4. This message is for the purpose of seeing that what passed between the President and Prime Minister is understood in the same sense by both Governments, and we shall continue to report separately on the problem itself. Ends.

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference your telegram No. 302 of February 15th† repeating the text of Washington teletype WA-386 concerning ECA refusal to finance purchases of Canadian wheat.

The United States position as reported in the message from Washington certainly raises most serious problems. I do not propose, however, to take up the question formally with the United Kingdom here until I receive Ottawa's comments on this disturbing development, particularly since I am not sure whether you are accepting Strange's declaration as an official statement of the United States position or whether you are making approaches in Washington in other quarters. You may even be inclined to regard this move by the United States as representing pressure to get a further contribution from Canada for European recovery. Moreover, I think it might be unprofitable for me to discuss formally the present position with the United Kingdom without having some indication of the thinking in Ottawa concerning the situation and concerning possible remedies. In any case, it is probably not undesirable to let the United Kingdom worry about the problem themselves for a while since, at least in the first instance, it is up to them to suggest some way of fulfilling their contract obligation towards us.

2. I do not myself see how it will be possible for United Kingdom, if this ECA ruling is adhered to, to finance wheat purchases merely by making switches among ECA-financed and non-ECA-financed items in their Canadian import programme. Even if the ECA could be persuaded to finance all other proposed United Kingdom purchases from Canada and if the non-ECA dollars originally intended for those purchases could be used for financing continued United Kingdom wheat imports, the maximum amount of dollars thus released would appear to be sufficient to finance no more than one-half or two-thirds of the contract. I should think that a shift of this sort might be more objectionable to Congress than the direct ECA financing of Canadian wheat since the effect would be to finance indirectly such purchases in a manner which Congress might well regard as somewhat disingenuous.

3. Even if some part of the United Kingdom's wheat imports from Canada under the contract were to be continued by means of such switches within the UK-Canada programme, a substantial portion of the contract for this crop year would remain uncovered. What can the United States expectations be regarding this remainder? Do they expect us to press the United Kingdom to continue purchases from Canada even at the expense of the minimum gold and dollar reserves of the United Kingdom (and the rest of the sterling area), the maintenance of which the United States has at other times regarded as essential? Or do they expect us to accept an abrogation of the wheat contract by the United Kingdom? Or do they expect us to offer to finance the balance ourselves?

4. As you will appreciate from these remarks, I am quite in the dark as to what Strange has in mind when he refers to "a proposal which might ameliorate the effects upon Canada". He may be thinking of something more substantial than I have allowed for above. If he is thinking of the possibility of swapping with Canada purchases which the United Kingdom had planned to make in the States, I can see that the transfer of some such purchases to Canada (in exchange for the transfer to the United States of some wheat purchases) might reduce the damage to our balance of payments position but could hardly ease our wheat disposal problem. In any case I should think that the range for such swaps must be extremely limited, since presumably if new Congressional criticism were not to be stimulated, this swapping would have to be confined to purchases which could be made at least as cheaply and satisfactorily in Canada as in the United States. So far as wheat itself is concerned, I assume that the same factors which make it impossible for the United States to tolerate United Kingdom purchases from Canada with United States dollars would probably also prevent the United States Government itself from buying the extra Canadian wheat for other purposes and under other appropriations. Finally, since I note that the ruling applies not only to United Kingdom purchases but also to those of other European countries, it would appear that the ECA cannot be thinking in terms of diverting to Canada wheat purchases which would have been made in the United States in return for the diversion of United Kingdom purchases to the United States.

5. A remote possibility which does occur to me is that the United States might be persuaded, in the interest of assisting the disposal of the wheat surplus of both countries, to urge, or require, the European countries (Italy, etc.) to buy their full requirements of imported wheat from the United States and Canada and not to acquire any from Eastern European countries. I recognize that this possibility is a remote one, since the present appropriation application is presumably based on the assumption that those countries will be satisfying part of their requirements from Eastern European sources and any provision for the diversion of such purchases from those sources would presumably entail an increase in the ERP appropriation to be requested.

6. You will recognize that my thoughts on this serious problem are very preliminary—and I am afraid unhelpful—at this stage. I should be grateful to receive an indication of the thinking in Ottawa on the problem.

7. Incidentally, I am wondering what effect the United States expect this attitude of theirs to have in the bargaining at the Wheat Conference concerning future prices. I should have thought that any reflection of this attitude in the Wheat Conference would support the pressure of the importing countries for lower maximum and minimum prices.

8. Finally, although this is not a point which could probably be mentioned to the United States, I think that the difficulties which this apparent attitude of the United States involves for us give added weight, from our point of view, to the need for including a strong economic clause in the North Atlantic Pact. Ends.

My WA-431 of February 17th, E.C.A. off-shore purchases.

1. We have secured this morning from Fitzgerald of E.C.A. further information on the problem of financing United Kingdom wheat requirements from Canada in the second quarter. Fitzgerald discussed this matter with the Secretary of Agriculture yesterday. Mr. Brannan said that if he had to decide today whether he could authorize the off-shore purchase of wheat in Canada for the next quarter, he would have to find that wheat is in surplus in the United States and that the United States could deliver the requirements of the United Kingdom during that quarter. Mr. Brannan told Fitzgerald that his determination would not necessarily be the same in three or four weeks, since it was always possible that there might be some changes in the domestic supply situation.

2. Unless this were to happen, however, Mr. Brannan, on the basis of the facts, would have to declare wheat surplus under Section 112(E) of the Act. Once the facts are clear, he has no discretion in the matter, and the legal obligation is placed on him alone by the Statute. He could even be impeached if he were to fail to take action.

3. It seems evident that there are ample stocks of wheat in the country to meet United Kingdom requirements, but the new development is that, contrary to previous information, sufficient supplies could actually be shipped from the United States. Although they have been falling behind in their huge export program for cereals during this crop year (18 million tons), importers' requirements have also fallen considerably below this total and are now estimated for the crop year at 16,500,000 to 17,000,000 tons. The result is that the Department of Agriculture has decided it would be technically feasible to look after the United Kingdom's needs in the second quarter.

4. There has not been the slightest suggestion from the Department of Agriculture or E.C.A. that the United States will in fact attempt to supply the United Kingdom's requirements. They are, however, caught by provisions of the Act, so that the prospects of their providing dollars to the United Kingdom for Canadian wheat next quarter are far from bright. This is not a deliberate policy of the administration, adopted for reasons such as those suggested in Mr. Robertson's telegram from London No. 387 of February 17th. Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Brannan well understand what serious difficulties the application to wheat of Section 112(E) of the Act would cause both to Canada and the United Kingdom. If the United States has another bumper crop of grains, including corn, these difficulties will probably continue through the next crop year.

5. There is next to no chance that the situation could be remedied by an amendment to Section 112. The political background is that the farm bloc is stronger than ever because of their substantial share in the Democratic victory last November. The domestic price of wheat has been falling, with large supplies available. The Commodity Credit Corporation will hold big stocks at the end of the crop year, bought with public funds. It would be a formidable undertaking to satisfy the farm bloc that more public funds should be used to pay for Canadian wheat.

6. Mr. Brannan discussed the situation with Stone after dinner last night. Stone found him to be well informed and concerned about our problems and ready to talk them over with me at any time. If Deutsch is in Washington next week, I shall try to arrange for him to lunch with Mr. Brannan and myself.

7. Since the Prime Minister raised this problem with the President on February 12th we have received information on it only from E.C.A. and not from the State Department. I have been considering whether I should bring the matter up again with the Secretary of State, but it seems to me that our position is that of a third party greatly interested in a transaction between the United Kingdom and E.C.A., who are the parties most directly concerned. Before we discuss it again on a high level, therefore, we should know more about what the United Kingdom intends to do. I may, of course, be approached by the State Department, since it would be appropriate for them to seek a further discussion because of the way in which the issue was left at the talk between Mr. Truman and Mr. St. Laurent.

Discussion of Canadian program with E.C.A.

1. I informed you yesterday by telephone that E.C.A. would appreciate early discussions with Canadian officials. Bissell has confirmed this to me this afternoon. He described the general topic as the position of E.C.A. with regard to the financing of Canadian exports in the balance of this fiscal year (i.e., to June 30th) and during the next fiscal year. He mentioned the legal necessities imposed on the administration by Section 112 once it is evident that United States supplies of wheat are sufficient and available to satisfy the E.C.A. programs of the European countries. He said that Mr. Hoffman had carefully considered the possibility of securing an amendment which would allow them to continue their program of off-shore purchases in Canada without substantial change; they had come regretfully to the conclusion that if they opened up this issue the result might well be worse from our point of view than the present situation. He added that Fitzgerald and he thought it might prove possible for E.C.A. to finance Canadian wheat exports in part during a portion of next year, but that could not be counted upon, as it depended on the crop here and related considerations.

2. They are giving attention in E.C.A. to what they can do in their next year with respect to the financing of all Canadian non-food items, and he indicated clearly that on their present thinking they could continue to finance Canadian bacon supplies for the United Kingdom.

3. What they would like to happen at a meeting of officials would be the production of factual estimates covering the entire W. Hemisphere program for the export of grains, and draw up a tentative program showing what E.C.A. could finance from Canada, excluding grain exports. He remarked that their guess in E.C.A. was that this program would reach a total of somewhere between $225 and $325 million in the next fiscal year.

4. He thought that the meeting should not be on a very senior level, and said that McCullough¹⁶ and Strange would do most of the talking on their side. They would welcome particularly the presence of Deutsch from Ottawa. The latter part of next week would suit them for the discussions if this is convenient to us.

5. If you desire further information on what E.C.A. has in mind, I should be glad if you would let me know.

Reference your No. 387 of February 17th (received February 19th) re E.C.A. refusal to finance purchases of Canadian wheat.

1. A discussion of this problem at the official level is at present along these lines. As far as Canada is concerned, the Canada-U.K. Wheat Contract must stand firm. The American action raises a number of undesirable political possibilities in this country, but a breach in the Wheat Contract would be by far the worst. Somehow or another Canadian wheat will move to the United Kingdom. If we take this as a starting point, then a number of the questions raised in your telegram need no answer. We entirely agree with your suggestion "to let the United Kingdom worry about the problem themselves." We are particularly anxious to avoid any approach, either in London or Washington, that would suggest doubt regarding the Wheat Contract.

2. It is a pity that our point of view on this matter, which was clearly stated by Deutsch to U.S. officials, cannot be brought home to the senators with full force. It means that no American wheat, or no appreciable volume of American wheat, will move from the United States to the United Kingdom; yet the movement of American wheat was the primary, if not the sole purpose, of their objections to the purchase of our wheat with E.C.A. funds.

3. Unfortunately, the matter has now been brought to a point where to the best of our belief the senators cannot be dissuaded from their objective. It may be, as you suggest in your first paragraph, that the way in which the news was broken to Canada did not constitute a very "official statement". However, subsequent discussions, both in the Senate Committee (where the Secretary of Agriculture virtually stated that wheat is in surplus supply) and between Canadian and American officials, make it clear that we have virtually no hope of selling wheat for E.C.A. funds in the second quarter of 1949.

4. When E.C.A. officials told the bad news to Deutsch and Murray, they did not intend to press for further "aid" from Canada. This matter has been quiescent in Washington for several months. The senators from whom all the trouble came were not interested in the size of Canada's contribution—only in selling American wheat. However, it seems pretty sure that, when the Americans put forward their proposal for "amelioration", this will involve some additional extension of aid from this country. The suggestion might be in the form of an absolute amount or in the form of a proportion of American aid.

5. The Department of Finance is making up to date estimates of our balance of payments for 1949–50 based on recent changes in world prices and other factors. We expect these new estimates to be complete within a few days. They will throw light on the extent to which Canada is likely to be able to provide additional aid (without resorting to more stringent controls against U.S. imports) and also on the extent to which switches of E.C.A. purchases are practicable within the Canadian balance with the sterling area. (The latter part of your second paragraph suggests that our balance with the United Kingdom alone is involved; actually, as you know, it is our balance with the sterling area.)

6. Up to the present both the United States and ourselves have been reviewing the situation both politically and statistically. We expect further discussions with them within a week or ten days. We will keep you informed of developments.

1. I have just read the Department's telegram No. 380 of today to Robertson (repeated to me as EX-496†) about the financing of Canadian wheat by E.C.A. It seems to me that this gives an incomplete picture of the causes of the difficulty here by blaming it, in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4, on "the Senators from whom all the trouble came". The trouble really stems from the language of section 112 of the Act, in conjunction with the very large supplies of wheat in this country, and the trouble would still be here if the Senators had not taken the issue up. Of course, there is plenty of politics behind it, but the implication in the telegram is misleading that E.C.A. is bowing to the will of some misguided members of Congress.

2. I hope you have repeated to Robertson my WA-485 of February 24th, in which I sought to put the issue in terms of the application of the law. E.C.A.

1. Sir Sidney Caine, who succeeded Munro a few weeks ago as head of the British Treasury delegation here, called on me yesterday to discuss the problems now looming up affecting the financing by E.C.A. of certain off-shore purchases in Canada. Most of our talk covered familiar ground. He told me; however, that in addition to the grave doubts about whether E.C.A. could finance Canadian wheat for the United Kingdom during the next quarter, authorizations for some shipments during the current quarter were being held up and would probably be refused. He also said that the British had not had a general discussion with E.C.A. of the present and future position with respect to the financing of Canadian wheat, adding that they had been holding off until the situation became rather clearer. I gathered that they had not received as clear an intimation as that which was given to us on this point.

2. I told Caine that I considered the problem was one which primarily concerned the United Kingdom and the United States although we were, of course, very deeply interested in the transaction. We had a contract lasting into 1950 with the United Kingdom for the purchase by them of Canadian wheat and that there was no question in our minds that this contract would be fulfilled, whether payment was made in E.C.A. dollars or in dollars from other sources. He in no way differed from this view.

3. He expressed concern lest Canada and the United Kingdom might unintentionally get at cross purposes with E.C.A. unless there were a full exchange of information. I told him of the approaching visit of Deutsch and Plumtre to discuss with E.C.A. the Canadian aspects of the programme and said that I would arrange for him to meet them while they were in Washington.

4. With reference to Caine's remark that some authorizations in the current quarter were being held up and might be refused, McNamara of the Wheat Board informed us this morning that a United Kingdom request for a new E.C.A. authorization for additional Canadian wheat and flour during the present quarter has definitely been turned down by the E.C.A. The clearances of wheat from Canada during this quarter have been better than anticipated, with the result that it became feasible for the United Kingdom to request additional authorizations for this quarter, i.e., authorizations over and above the $55.4 million dollars for wheat and $9.7 million dollars for flour which were announced in the middle of January. The British Supply Office official who gave McNamara this information said that he was not able to give him the dollar amounts of the requests which have been turned down. Strange's office secured this information for us this morning, but requested that the exact amounts involved not be divulged. The amount involved, including both wheat and flour, is approximately $18 million dollars.

5. The United Kingdom's request was referred, in the normal manner, to the Department of Agriculture, who said that the amounts in question could be supplied by the United States and that, therefore, the request, could not be approved. When the United Kingdom representatives appealed this decision to Fitzgerald he told them that his hands were tied and that the E.C.A. was, in fact, powerless to change the U.S.D.A.'s decision.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS; DEFENCE PURCHASES; NEWFOUNDLAND BASES; ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY; WHEAT PURCHASES AND E.C.A.

10. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 25th, reported that, with the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he had seen the U.S. Ambassador at the beginning of the week.

The Canadian position respecting defence purchases in the United States and the Newfoundland bases had been discussed. Mr. Claxton was to prepare a memorandum on the former for communication to Mr. Steinhardt; a statement of the government's desires respecting the Newfoundland bases was also being prepared. On each of these questions, the U.S. Ambassador had felt that satisfactory arrangements could be worked out.

The importance to Canada of early action by the United States on the St. Lawrence Waterway had been discussed. The importance of E.C.A. financing for U.K. purchases of wheat in Canada had also been examined with Mr. Steinhardt.

11. The Minister of Finance reported that he had just learned that U.K. authorities in Washington had now been informed that they could no longer purchase Canadian wheat with E.C.A. funds because of the surplus wheat position in the United States. This raised immediately a most difficult situation for Canada.

12. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted the reports of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

CONFIDENTIAL

E.C.A. and Canadian Wheat.

Through a misunderstanding in time, Secretary of Agriculture Brannan arrived half an hour early for a Wheat Conference meeting which had been arranged for Sunday afternoon in Wilson's room.

2. Brannan took the opportunity to discuss the wheat surplus question with Wilson and was anxious to have his views, which Wilson has reported to me this morning, conveyed to the Canadian Government.

3. Brannan had received a number of enquiries from the press last Thursday reporting that it had been stated in the House of Commons by one of our Ministers that the United States Secretary of Agriculture had declared wheat in surplus. Brannan wished to have any misunderstanding which might exist cleared up. The Secretary was referring to the fact that under section 112(E) of the Foreign Assistance Act, he had not "determined" and "advised" the E.C.A. that wheat was both surplus and available. Furthermore, from what he told Wilson it seems quite clear that he is anxious to avoid having to make any such declaration.

4. He suggested that the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments refrain from seeking to put forward any requisitions to E.C.A. for the purchase of Canadian wheat until the new E.C.A. legislation has been passed. Brannan, who must realize that it is the United Kingdom alone who put forward requisitions to the E.C.A., may have included our Government as well since he knows of our great interest in seeing the United Kingdom's Canadian requirements financed through E.C.A. In this connection, Sir Sydney Caine told me on Saturday that they had been asked to withdraw their request for roughly $18 million of additional Canadian wheat purchases during this quarter. In this way there would be nothing on the record which could embarrass or tie the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture if, at a later date, he wishes to authorize off-shore wheat purchases.

5. Brannan told Wilson that he expects to have very rough going during future E.C.A. hearings, particularly from Congressman Jesse Wolcott (Rep., Michigan), whose farm policies on behalf of the Republican party had helped to re-elect the Democrats. Brannan expects to have used against him in the forthcoming hearings every embarrassing weapon which Wolcott can find. Provided that there are no further requests for off-shore purchases, Brannan said he could not be forced into making a declaration that wheat was available as well as surplus which, at the moment, any Secretary of Agriculture would be forced to do on presentation of a requisition.

6. As a new member of the Cabinet (and as the one who was most active and effective in campaigning on behalf of the President) Brannan has frequent occasion to consult the President. He wanted to make clear to us that both the President and he were on the side of encouraging the world trade of other countries. With respect to wheat, the United States would like to compete with us for markets on an even basis. Brannan readily acknowledged that E.C.A. dollars were not a fair weapon to use in such competition. He admitted that there were a few Senators who would argue that E.C.A. dollars should be used to take over our markets. They, however, were in the minority, and, in his opinion, responsible elements in Congress would not go along on such a policy.

7. Regarding further E.C.A. authorizations for Canadian wheat, he expressed the hope that he would find himself in the same position next May as he was in last year, when with the new crop beginning to move and with exports increasing in volume his officials could then advise him that although the United States could take care of a considerable portion of the wheat requirements of the E.C.A. countries, they could not serve the whole E.C.A. market. In these circumstances, where wheat might be in statistical surplus (e.g., as during the last quarter of 1948), he could, nevertheless, approve E.C.A. requisitions for Canadian wheat.

8. Wilson told the Secretary that this information would be appreciated by our Government. Furthermore, it would be of immediate assistance in countering the argument advanced on two separate occasions by the British on Friday (by Anderson, United Kingdom delegate to the Wheat Conference, to Wilson, and by Christelow, United Kingdom Treasury Delegation, to Murray) that the United States Government's present policy of not approving authorizations for Canadian wheat would result in the United Kingdom Government's interest in the wheat agreement falling off very sharply, even to the point, in Christelow's words, of there being "no possible incentive" to the United Kingdom to enter into an agreement. Brannan said he would have to have a talk with Anderson about this. His own feeling was that a wheat agreement would give the administration a very useful means of dealing with the more predatory arguments of the Congressional minority that the United States take over other people's markets. He said that if it were to become known in Congress that the British Government had backed out of the wheat agreement, it would react to the United Kingdom's disadvantage in respect of further E.C.A. assistance. Ends.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH E.C.A.¹⁷

The United States administration is at present seeking to obtain from Congress the annual renewal of authority for the operation of E.C.A. The administration is also asking Congress to provide the necessary annual appropriation ($4.28 billion) to cover United States expenditures for European Recovery during the fiscal year July 1, 1949, and June 30, 1950. The Congressional hearings on this legislation have coincided with a pronounced fall in agricultural prices and the development of some agricultural surpluses in the United States. Consequently, the attention of certain elements in the Congress has centred upon the activities of E.C.A. relating to off-shore purchase of agriculture commodities, particularly purchases of wheat in Canada. During the 1948-49 E.C.A. fiscal year until the present, all of the Canadian wheat shipments to the United Kingdom and much of the Canadian wheat shipments to other Western European countries have been paid for by the E.C.A.

¹⁷ John Deutsch prépara un rapport pour le Comité du Cabinet sur la politique du commerce à l'étranger, à partir de ce texte.

John Deutsch made a report to the Cabinet Committee on External Trade Policy based on this text.

through off-shore purchases. A number of the United States Senators have demanded that the off-shore purchasing of wheat in Canada should be stopped, and that surplus United States wheat should be sent instead. These Senators have urged that the Secretary of Agriculture declare wheat a surplus commodity. If a formal declaration to this effect is made by the Secretary, a clause in the E.C.A. legislation would require the E.C.A. not to expend funds on the purchase of wheat outside the United States.

Total authorizations to date of E.C.A. off-shore purchases in Canada have reached about $670,000,000 which, if allowance is made for Canadian credit, is approximately sufficient to finance the exchange deficit of the United Kingdom, the rest of the sterling area and Western European countries with Canada during the period from April 1, 1948, to March 31, 1949. Wheat has accounted for almost one-half of the total off-shore purchase authorizations in Canada during this period. Consequently, the suggestions that off-shore purchasing of wheat should not be permitted any longer could be a very serious matter for Canada unless the E.C.A. is prepared to make adequate compensating adjustments. The serious nature of the repercussions upon Canada and the possible consequences thereof were made clear to the United States administration some three weeks ago at the time of the Prime Minister's visit to Washington. The E.C.A. and other United States authorities at that time indicated that they would give immediate consideration to the ways and means of "ameliorating" the situation.

Last weekend, Canadian officials were invited to go to Washington for a discussion with E.C.A. At the meeting held on Friday last, which included representatives also from the Department of State and the Treasury, the E.C.A. told us that they were not yet ready to discuss concrete programmes of off-shore purchasing in the fiscal year 1949-50. They would not be ready to do so until the final form of the legislation now before Congress was known. They said that in the meantime they wanted the Canadian Authorities to know that—

1) It was not the intention of the United States administration to displace the normal Canadian exports of wheat, or to interfere with the United Kingdom contract, through an insistence on the part of the United States that the European countries take only United States wheat.

2) While Canadian wheat would not be prevented from moving to its normal European export markets, Canada should not, owing to the surplus wheat situation in the United States, count upon E.C.A. financing of those shipments in the future. They emphasized, however, that wheat has not yet been formally declared surplus and they do not wish to do so in order that E.C.A.'s hands will be free to purchase off-shore wheat in Canada whenever a propitious opportunity arises. They said that while we should not necessarily count on it, they felt that, in fact, it is very likely that some off-shore purchases of wheat in Canada would take place in opportune circumstances.

3) It will be necessary for E.C.A. to go carefully during the next several weeks while the legislation is before Congress so as not to develop incidents which might cause members of Congress to put undesirable restrictions into the legislation. Consequently, there may be some delays in authorizing off-shore purchases, but that would not necessarily indicate future policy.

4) The E.C.A. is willing and anxious to cooperate with the United Kingdom and other European customers of Canada in arranging programmes so that the total value of off-shore purchases in Canada will reach a tolerable level even though Canadian wheat is no longer financed, should that be the case. E.C.A. was prepared to finance other things from either the United States or Canada which would enable Europeans to use their own earnings and other sources of exchange to pay for Canadian wheat. They pointed out, however, that total off-shore purchasing in Canada in 1949-50, would inevitably be smaller than in 1948-49 owing to the fact that the Western European deficit with North America was declining. E.C.A. felt that it was not profitable at this time to explore the actual magnitude of off-shore purchases in Canada in 1949-50 since the nature of the E.C.A. legislation for this period is not yet known. Consequently, the determination of whether or not the total value of off-shore purchasing would be adequate, and what gaps, if any, would emerge cannot be made until Congress has acted.

In brief, while the E.C.A. was not ready at the meeting last Friday to proceed with the examination of a concrete programme, the expression of their intention and understanding of the Canadian position was encouraging and reassuring. It was intended to dispel any immediate cause for alarm in Canada.

With respect to the immediate future, the United States representatives explained that it was unlikely that E.C.A. would finance off-shore wheat purchase from Canada during the second quarter of 1949. They went on to say, however, that Canada could be assured that the E.C.A. would do everything possible to co-operate with the British in arranging for the payment of other items so that the United Kingdom would have sufficient dollars to finance the second quarter shipments of wheat from Canada. At a meeting with Sir Sydney Caine, U.K. Treasury representative in Washington, the latter expressed the view that the adjustments in payments arrangements necessary to take care of wheat would be very difficult to work out from the British standpoint. It may, therefore, be desirable to follow up this matter with the United Kingdom at an early date to ensure that the British on their part will take the steps required for the fulfillment of the American assurances to us.

My dear Colleague:

Enclosed is a dispatch which we think might usefully be sent as a personal and confidential message from myself to Sir Stafford Cripps. We feel it most important that the United Kingdom meet the wishes of the E.R.P. administration in its attempt to work out a difficult situation.

You suggested that Norman Robertson might be consulted as to the advisability of sending this dispatch. I trust that he will be consulted and that the dispatch will be sent only if he considers that it will be helpful.

Yours very truly,

Draft Text*

The following personal and confidential message for Sir Stafford Cripps from C.D. Howe

A group of Canadian officials has just completed discussions with representatives of the Economic Co-operation Administration in Washington. Although the discussions were general in nature there was an opportunity to refer to the problems which would arise if ECA did not finance the Canada-United Kingdom wheat contract. Because of our mutual interest in this subject, I thought you might like to have a brief appreciation of the position as I now see it.

Our officials were received in a most cordial and co-operative way, and we were left with the firm impression that the U.S. Administration were fully seized of the U.K. and Canadian positions and were most anxious to be helpful. There was a clear acceptance of the Canadian position as a supplier of the U.K. and no suggestion that U.S. wheat should in fact replace Canadian wheat. They gave us assurances that in order to compensate for the suspension of wheat payments in the second quarter of 1949 they were prepared to consider the possibilities of financing other eligible items in the U.K. program of dollar expenditures, mentioning particularly ships' disbursements. They are prepared to consider similar arrangements for the period 1949-50 although that position is not quite as clear, due, of course, to the fact that new ERP legislation is not yet through Congress. It is obvious that the United States administration is seeking to avoid the necessity of declaring wheat surplus and for this reason are anxious to avoid having to deal with requests for authority to purchase other than United States wheat. Such requests might mean that they would have no alternative but to declare the commodity surplus and thus preclude any possibility there may be of some financing during the coming year. As you know when Mr. St. Laurent was in Washington he discussed with President Truman the seriousness of any disruption of the Canada-United Kingdom Wheat Agreement and was assured that the President was cognizant of the situation and satisfied that it could be resolved satisfactorily. No doubt you will be giving urgent attention to possible substitutions in your program for ECA financing, and I assume you will let us know if we can be of any help.

Ottawa, March 16, 1949

I am returning herewith Mr. Howe's draft message to Sir Strafford Cripps. I have told Mr. Howe that I was doubtful about the wisdom of sending this message at this time, for reasons which have been pretty well brought out in earlier telegrams from Canada House, viz., that there is some advantage in letting the United Kingdom take the initiative in raising the problem created by the United States' unwillingness to finance wheat shipments in the coming quarter. If we raise the question I fear we may be inviting a request for the release of further credits. We may have to come to this anyway, and I think it better that the United Kingdom should take the responsibility for opening this question. When I put this point to Mr. Howe, he, I thought, agreed with it, and did not press the suggestion that he despatch a special message to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.¹⁹

N.A. R[OBERTSON]

P.S. The second objection, which I did not put to Mr. Howe, is that I do not much like personal messages from Minister to Minister. In this case, Trade and Commerce is the Department which would be concerned with the possibility of the United Kingdom placing additional orders in Canada with United States dollars which otherwise would have been earmarked for wheat purchases. At the same time, should the Chancellor come back, as I fear, with a query about credits, then the problem is at once for the Minister of Finance and for the whole Government.

TELEGRAM WA-1076

Washington, April 15, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for Plumptre from Murray, Begins: Your EX-992 of April 13th.†

1. According to Christelow, United Kingdom Treasury delegation, the British are not getting along at all well with switches in their ECA programme. His reaction, at least as far as the remainder of the British first year programme is concerned, is that people should stop talking about switches since the possibility of making switches does not exist. Christelow, besides being generally uncommunicative, is like most of the British Treasury delegation and Supply officers since the departure of Frank Lee, both professionally and perpetually gloomy. Since the outlook of the British officials is invariably black, it is difficult to tell, from week to week, whether a particular problem like the one of switches in the programme is progressing fairly well or not.

2. As you know, we have not been anxious to discuss United Kingdom problems directly with the ECA since we should be able to assume that the British, whether in London, Ottawa or Washington, will keep our officials informed of their ERP problems which affect Canada. With Strange, however, it has been possible to take a much more informal approach to find out just about anything that is going on in ECA of direct or indirect concern to Canada. Unfortunately, as far as the present problem is concerned, he has been away from Washington for some two weeks and will not be back until the end of next week, at which time we should be able to get from ECA a fairly clear picture of what is happening.

3. In the meantime, ECA officials have acknowledged that the switching problem has turned out to be much more difficult than they had anticipated. Vessel disbursements in dollar ports which had appeared to be well on the road to eligibility and acceptability when you and Deutsch were in here early in March have since been blackballed by the Comptroller's office, to the very great annoyance of the British. The British had documentation for this item in the amount of approximately 18 million dollars all ready to run through. The ECA officials on the programming and policy side have been embarrassed at the long delays and final failure which marked the outcome of their efforts for this particular item. There is some chance that certain vessel disbursements such as bunkers may achieve the difficult status of eligibility. Hoguet, who is head of the United Kingdom Desk in the Programme Coordination Division, said that they are discovering difficulties in every major item which is brought forth as a candidate for switching. Petroleum equipment is a very important item which is hanging fire at the present time. Apparently there are very large political difficulties which make it difficult to get this item accepted for ECA financing.

4. One item which appears to involve a switch of undesirable kind was announced last week (ECA Release No. 510 of April 7th, page 11).† When I asked Christelow about the authorizations for the procurement in the United States of 19.27 million dollars of wheat and $6.13 million of wheat flour for purchase in the United States announced last week, he replied that the United Kingdom had needed the wheat and flour for certain purposes and since it could not be financed by ECA in Canada it had been purchased in the United States. I believe that there has been a good deal of correspondence on this question between the Wheat Board and the British officials.

5. Christelow said that it is quite possible that bacon and cheese will be out as far as ECA financing is concerned by the fourth quarter of this year. He said that they had been able to "squeeze in" a recent authorization for cheese from Canada only on the condition that the United Kingdom buys a considerable amount of cheese in the United States.

6. In reply to a query whether the United Kingdom representatives in Ottawa are fully informed of most of the details of the British ECA programme, Christelow said that Andrew Jones²⁰ and Hampshire²¹ came down from Ottawa last weekend to discuss the Canadian part of the British programme. I told Christelow that our people would undoubtedly wish to discuss this problem with Jones and Hampshire unless, of course, they got in touch with you on their return from Washington.

7. As you know, the story of the authorizations for the procurement of agricultural products in Canada has been a pretty dismal one ever since the Senators got agitated about off-shore purchases in Canada early in February. During February and March all Canadian authorizations totalled $38.3 million. Agricultural items plus fish, during these two months, suffered a net decrease of $3.1 million. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Senate appeared to consider that the Jenner amendment to restrict off-shore purchases was unnecessary in view of the way that the programme was being administered since the Agriculture Committee brought the Administration "to task" (my WA-978 of April 6th).† In the days when procurement authorizations were flowing freely to Canada the agricultural items amounted to 60 per cent of the Canadian authorizations. Admittedly, during February and March the ECA authorizations were at a reduced rate in comparison to the last quarter of 1948. However, during February and March the authorizations did total 486 million dollars.

8. Of the three apparent courses open to the British, effecting a switch in invoices or depleting reserves or being forced to switch the source of commodity supplies, it seems that the first choice from our point of view of switching invoices is not working out satisfactorily at the moment. There is no concrete evidence available as yet that either of the other two alternatives are being resorted to. Ends.

Reference your telegram No. 734 of April 20th[†] repeating teletype WA-1076 of April 15th from Washington regarding ECA off shore purchases in Canada.

This morning's newspapers also carry reports of an announcement made in Washington yesterday by ECA that no authorizations for British purchases of wheat with ECA funds in Canada had been made since March 1st and that none would be made so long as stocks in the United States were sufficient to take care of all export demands. The London Times' account also mentions the possibility that cheese might be declared surplus before the end of the year.

2. In view of the information contained in your telegram, and in today's press reports (on which a considerable amount of public discussion can be expected during the next few days), I should be grateful for guidance on the need for any formal discussions with United Kingdom officials here and on the line which might most advantageously be followed in answering press enquiries.

3. In the light of these recent developments, it may be your intention that Mr. Howe should include among the subjects to be discussed with United Kingdom officials during his visit to London the question of steps which might be taken by either the United Kingdom or Canada to make possible the continued procurement in Canada of those commodities which are now ineligible, or which are expected to become ineligible, for ECA financing. If Mr. Howe is to discuss this subject while in London, you may wish me to have some preliminary talks with the United Kingdom officials concerned in preparation for Mr. Howe's discussions. In that case I should particularly appreciate your guidance on the points, if any, which you feel might usefully be clarified before Mr. Howe's departure from Ottawa.

4. I should say that so far as I know at the moment the discussions with Mr. Howe are expected to be confined to the points raised in your telegram No. 616 of March 31st.[†] In view of your desire to have the problem of the financing of United Kingdom food contracts in Canada regarded at least for the time being as a United Kingdom problem, I have not, of course, intimated that the discussions at the end of this month might be broadened to include that question and I have not enquired specifically whether the United Kingdom propose to include that item. I expect, however, to hear from Wilson Smith within the next day or so concerning the discussions with Mr. Howe, at which time he will presumably indicate whether the United Kingdom desires to have the general question of ECA off shore purchases in Canada included on any agenda for those discussions.

Your telegram No. 819 regarding E.C.A. off-shore purchases in Canada.

1. This matter was extensively discussed at the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy at yesterday's meeting and your telegram was considered.

2. In the near future we shall probably be discussing with the United Kingdom and the United States (separately) the problems involved in "switching". However for the time being we do not want you to take any initiative in London. If the United Kingdom raises the question with Mr. Howe and Mr. Mackenzie when they are in London they will not try to avoid it. On the other hand they will not be equipped to discuss it fully.

3. Despite the flurry in the press there has been no basic change in conditions in the last few weeks. Since the matter first became active last February we have consistently taken the line that the problem was primarily one to be solved between the United Kingdom and the United States. The basic question is: how can the United Kingdom and other E.C.A. countries use to the full all the money appropriated by Congress for E.C.A. purposes? All along we have gone on the assumption that the British contracts with us will stand firm. We have been glad to see that this point of view has been confirmed in a number of discussions that you have had recently with Mr. Frank Lee²² and others.

4. Any enquiries from the press should be answered along the lines indicated in the preceding paragraph.

ECA Officials

Mr. Robert Strange
 Mr. Arthur Smithies
 Mr. E.P. Weeks, Privy Council Office (Secretary)

The Chairman introduced Mr. Strange and Mr. Smithies and asked if they would provide up-to-date information on ECA developments.

I. Commodity Position

(a) Wheat

Mr. Strange explained that the CCC took over 275 million bushels of wheat on May 1st, and there was sufficient transport to meet all ECA demands for the movement of grain during the second quarter. Wheat had been technically in surplus since last October, but the policy of making formal statements would be continued.

To the question as to whether ECA would be buying at $1.80 per bushel if the International Wheat Agreement went through, Mr. Strange replied that originally it had been suggested that the programme be cut by the extent of the saving on wheat. The Bureau of the Budget had now asked, however, that no allowance be made for this so as not to prejudice Congressional decision on the Agreement.

A new situation had developed in connection with France. The French had expected a wheat surplus but instead were faced with a deficit of some 500,000 tons before the new crop. French stocks were almost nil and since there were no recent imports it might be several months before the situation was straightened out.

(b) Coarse Grains

They were still in relatively free supply and crop prospects were quite good.

(c) Meat

Recently ECA financed 77 million pounds of pork products for the United Kingdom at a cost of $21 million out of first quarter funds. This was done primarily to help the United Kingdom in the present situation. Since the product was fresh pork and included no smoked products, the move affected Argentine beef rather than Canadian bacon.

Mr. Strange urged Canada to press the United Kingdom to seek second quarter authorizations for bacon. This bacon could be delivered up to the end of the third quarter.

(d) Cheese

Some 36 million pounds would be in the hands of CCC, while authorizations were being provided for 48 million pounds. Therefore, the Canadian contracts could still be financed.

(e) Pattern of U.K. agricultural imports

There had been reports over the week-end suggesting that the United Kingdom in its imports of agricultural products from the United States and from Canada should restore the relationship of 1939. Attention was drawn to the disparity in favour of Canada now as compared with the prewar portion. Mr. Strange emphasized, however, that effective steps were being taken by ECA to counter such arguments.

(f) Lumber

Canadian officials referred to a recent press report in which it was stated that OEEC purchases of lumber should be placed in the United States if they were to be subject to ECA financing. Mr. Strange emphasized that the report was incorrect. Nevertheless, it was true that lumber interests in the United States had actually gone so far as to maintain that OEEC countries use their free dollars to buy U.S. timber. ECA policy was that free dollar resources should be applied in the most economical way and not tied to any particular commodity. There was also a proposal that lumber be declared surplus like various agricultural products, but this contention, too, had been countered by ECA. Mr. Hoffman held the view that if increased costs were involved in efforts to support domestic products, ECA would go to Congress to ask for additional funds to cover such costs.

Canadian officials pointed out that lumber was one of the best items to which U.K. purchases might be switched from wheat. At present, about 40 million free dollars were being used for purchases of lumber in Canada while only about $20 million worth of the contracts was being financed by ECA.

II. United Kingdom Financing

Mr. Strange indicated that the United Kingdom had virtually overcome the problem of finding other items for ECA financing in the place of wheat for the second quarter of 1949. This had been achieved mainly by picking up various small items in both the United States and Canada. The proposal to finance vessel disbursements in dollar ports had been dropped in negotiations to block the Bland Bill on shipping. Efforts were being made to get authorizations for new oil-well equipment but the question had not yet been settled. Meanwhile, the much smaller items of repair and maintenance were being covered.

III. Off-Shore Purchasing in 1949-50

Mr. Strange estimated roughly that the volume of off-shore purchasing in Canada would be between $200 and $250 million. Of this amount, upward of $200 million would consist of industrial products with $50 million or less devoted to agricultural commodities.

By the end of the third quarter, it would be hard for ECA to finance any agricultural products in Canada. The CCC would be building up stocks and in such circumstances it was not easy to suggest off-shore purchases. Efforts would be made, however, to finance bacon in Canada, since it was unlikely that ECA would be called upon to purchase any smoked meat products in the United States.

Additional Canadian commodities which might be financed by ECA included nickel and nickel concentrates. But there were problems involved. The United Kingdom, for instance, re-exported products containing nickel. Furthermore, the nickel companies generally wanted payment in U.S. dollars for intra-European trade. It was believed, however, that these difficulties would be overcome. There was no objection to the financing of agricultural machinery and motor trucks. As previously pointed out, lumber offered considerable possibilities under existing legislation.

IV. Appropriations for 1949-50

It might be the middle of July before the Appropriations Bill passed Congress and it would be fortunate indeed if it were through by the end of June. Meanwhile procurement authorizations would be issued pending the provision of funds. The original estimate had been reduced by $158 million to allow for the effects of price reductions in the United States on costs of goods going to Europe and on European earnings. The total figure would probably be cut down to some $4 billion.

V. Intra-European Payments

Mr. Smithies stated that Washington held the view that some further step towards multilateral trade should be taken this year. The ideal position would be to provide dollars to European countries and allow them to spend the dollars wherever they wished, either in Europe or the Western Hemisphere. This could only be achieved, however, if there were full convertibility between European currencies. Meanwhile some measure should be worked out for the transfer of drawing rights so that European countries would be placed in competition with one another. Thus if A could not obtain goods from B it should be able to use B's currency to buy the goods in C but at present C was unwilling to take B's currency. It was suggested that an unallocated pool of dollars of possibly $200 million should be created to reward countries in the position of C. This proposal, of course, would not help the transfer problem between Europe and the United States. There was another suggestion to the effect that a country with large unused drawing rights at the end of the year might obtain say one quarter of the dollar equivalent for expenditures in the United States.

The present scheme left room for improvement. Some countries wanted drawing rights and could not obtain them. Mr. Smithies was not convinced that debtor countries should have unlimited drawing rights. Furthermore creditor countries were often in a very strong position. The system was doing nothing to break down the existing pattern of bilateral trade.

Most European countries have increased their dollar reserves during the past year. This was definitely a step in the right direction, since if progress toward multilateral trade was the aim of European recovery it would be unfortunate if at the end of the ECA period the various countries possessed inadequate reserves of dollar currencies.

Mr. Smithies did not agree with the plan being emphasized in Europe whereby each country should attempt to reach a bilateral balance with the Western Hemisphere. Such a situation would mean the creation of a trading bloc based on minimum rather than maximum trade with the dollar countries. There seemed no reason why one European country should not earn dollars from another European country even if Europe as a whole were in deficit with the United States. However, no harm would be done if each country tried to balance with the Western Hemisphere without applying discrimination. Canada should be as interested as the United States in opposing discriminatory bilateralism. The payments plans were a move in the direction of breaking down bilateral barriers. If OEEC does not come forward with an improvement on the present scheme ECA might have to consider taking unilateral action, e.g. determining European sources of supply in connection with authorizations. It would mean that if dollars were allocated to France to purchase in Belgium these dollars would become part of Belgium's aid in its purchases in the Western Hemisphere.

VI. Investment Plans of OECC Countries

Canadian officials referred to reports that the European countries were planning to increase agricultural production even beyond their original plans. This would involve the investment of a large amount of high cost resources. Some of these resources might be better employed in an attempt to earn dollars. A greater sales effort on the part of the Europeans might not in itself be enough. U.S. tariffs against commodities of European origin were traditionally high.

Mr. Strange and Mr. Smithies emphasized that U.S. tariffs were not so very high and that the average ad valorem rate on items coming from Europe probably did not exceed 15 per cent. The tariff picture was mixed and there appeared to be many openings of which the European countries could take advantage. Canadian officials pointed out that some tariffs were prohibitive and referred to administrative difficulties.

Canadian officials pointed out that the European colonies suffered from the difficulties of the high price system which characterizes the metropolitan countries. This makes the sale by colonies of raw materials in the United States more difficult although there were no tariff barriers against such categories of goods. It would seem that capital expansion in the colonies would be more profitable than a similar outlay on agriculture in Europe.

VII. Sterling Area Dollar Deficit

Canadian officials pointed out that the sterling area deficit roughly equals the deficit with Canada. Now that such items as wheat have disappeared from the list there might be some difficulties next year in financing this deficit. Other eligible commodities would have to be found in Canada and elsewhere.

Mr. Strange stated that ECA was working on the assumption that the dollar deficit of the whole sterling area would continue to be financed.

[Ottawa], May 5, 1949

OFFSHORE PURCHASES IN CANADA

Since the commencement of ECA the U.K. has consistently allocated a relatively large amount of ECA funds to Canadian purchases.

This was not necessary from the point of view of financing U.K. and sterling area purchases in Canada. It makes no difference financially to the U.K. or to Canada whether the U.K. spends ECA funds in Canada and its own currently earned dollars in the United States and Central America, or conversely spends ECA dollars in the U.S. and Central America, and its own dollars in Canada. For 1949-50 it would appear feasible for the U.K., if necessary, to spend all its ECA funds outside Canada, without reducing or jeopardizing any of its programmed purchases in Canada.

The course that was originally followed of making large "off-shore" purchases in Canada with ECA funds was, especially in the early days, a matter of administrative convenience for both the U.K. and ECA, since documentation difficulties were at a minimum in the case of the large bulk contracts with Canada.

This course also had the effect of strengthening the U.K.'s bargaining position vis-a-vis Canada, by exposing their purchases from Canada to pressure from U.S. producer groups. To give a specific example, if there had been no ECA funds allocated to U.K. purchases of Canadian wheat, U.S. wheat producers would have had no specific handle for pressuring ECA to substitute American for Canadian wheat, and the U.K. would have had no occasion to "do us a favour" by maintaining that she would fulfil her contract. A similar problem has arisen in the case of lumber and cheese and will no doubt come up in connection with bacon and other products in due course.

Newspaper discussion about these controversial off-shore purchases in Canada has put Canada in an unnecessarily bad light, and has probably caused unnecessary alarm in Canada. More important, the existence of these offshore purchases has given U.S. pressure groups a lever with which to force some U.S. commodities into European import programs at the expense of Canada. For example, it is said that U.K. offshore purchases of lumber in Canada have been approved on condition that the U.K. buy a certain amount of lumber from the United States.

It would seem to be good business for Canada to have the offshore purchase feature (i.e. the particular allocation of ECA funds) eliminated in the case of all our commodities which are likely to become controversial. This is the problem of "switching" which has been under discussion for several months. Perhaps because of a tacit assumption that the "switching" must be from one Canadian commodity to another Canadian commodity, the impression has been created that the problem of "switching" is one of great difficulty.

However, it is important to note that the "switching" of allocations of ECA funds may be from Canadian commodities to U.S. commodities or other Western Hemisphere dollar purchases. As suggested in the second paragraph of this memo, there is no reason why the allocation of ECA funds to Canada should have to be equal to, say, the U.K. (or sterling area) deficit with Canada, or any other pre-determined figure.

Insofar as "switching" to purchases in the United States puts controversial Canadian commodities out of reach of U.S. pressure groups, it is clearly in our interest, and there is no reason to believe that allocation of a greater proportion of ECA funds to U.S. exports would be unpopular in the United States.

The U.K. 1949-50 import program (dated October 1, 1948 and still largely valid) is as follows:

U.K. Import Program from Dollar Countries for 1949/50
(Millions of Dollars)

	U.S.A.	Canada	Other Dollar Countries in West. Hem.	Total
Food & Agriculture	83.9	367.5	60.8	512
Tobacco	102.2	6.9	—	109
Raw Materials	249.2	303.2	83.6	636
Machinery	116.1	6.0	—	122
Finished Goods	22.9	6.4	5.5	35
Oil	202.0	—	8.0	210
Total	776.3	690.0	157.9	1,624
Plus—Other U.K. Dollar Expenditures				+ 600
Plus—Net Capital Payments in Dollars				+ 17
Less—U.K. Dollar Earnings				-1,258
Less—Net Dollar Earnings of Associated Overseas Terrs.				- 43
Aggregate Dollar Deficit of Whole Sterling Area = Amount of Aid Requested from ECA				940

If the U.K. request for ECA assistance is granted in full, there will be $940 million of ECA funds to allocate among the dollar imports (totalling $1,624 million) which are shown in the first part of the table.

It will be seen that if ECA funds are allocated to all the programmed purchases in the U.S. this would take up $776 million out of the $940 million. On this basis, the remainder which would have to be allocated to Canadian or Latin American commodities would be $164 million. Since the Latin American total of $158 million consists largely of sugar, molasses, copper and other non-ferrous metals, all of which are likely to be non-controversial, it is theoretically possible that the U.K. would be able to take up its full allotment of ECA dollars without offshore purchases in Canada at all. In fact, there will be a number of Canadian products such as non-ferrous metals which would be non-controversial, and to which ECA funds could be allocated without risk to us. The U.K. will also be able to allocate some of its $940 million to non-commodity items (the Other U.K. Dollar Expenditures shown in the table), such as ocean freight. All in all, it would seem that the U.K. should have a considerable margin for excluding from ECA allocation those items in their U.S. purchases which would be the least convenient to document.

It is clear that the U.K. have been dragging their heels on the problem of "switching". Whether they have done so simply in order to avoid inconvenience of documenting, or whether it is part of the bargaining process, is immaterial for present purposes. The important point is that the present allocation of ECA funds is having a bad effect on the public mind in the U.S. and Canada and if continued is likely to assist American producers to invade our legitimate overseas markets. We urgently need to get to grips with the U.K. programming officials and insist that they work out a 1949/50 allocation program which will help to protect our vulnerable exports from the activities of U.S. pressure groups.

Part of the difficulty so far has no doubt arisen from confused thinking by all the parties concerned. For example, ECA still seems to feel that it is important for Canada to have as high a level of offshore purchases as possible, and we and perhaps the British have also tended to think in these terms. On the contrary, it is probably in our interest to have the lowest possible level of offshore purchases in Canada.

These notes have dealt mainly with offshore purchases by the U.K. In the case of other ERP countries the problem is not as large or as readily susceptible of treatment, but the same principles should clearly apply.

TELEGRAM WA-1273

Washington, May 7, 1949

Following for Robertson and Heeney from Wrong, Begins:

1. With reference to my telephone conversations with Messrs. Pearson and Robertson about a possible visit to Washington next week by Mr. Pearson to discuss questions arising from recent E.C.A. operations,²³ I think that the decision about such a visit at this time should rest on political considerations and that these in turn probably relate mainly to questions of publicity. It would be unwise to attempt to keep such a visit secret if Mr. Pearson were to see Messrs. Brannan, Acheson, and Hoffman, as the attempt would probably fail and might well be taken up critically in the Canadian press by Hadley and Nichols among the Canadian correspondents, both of whom are paying attention to the effect on Canadian exports of the decline in authorizations for Canadian purchases. Unless, therefore, publicity in Canada is desired, I am dubious about the proposal.²⁴

²³ Ceci avait été recommandé par le Cabinet le 3 mai 1949.

This had been recommended by the Cabinet on May 3, 1949.

2. Since I talked with Robertson on Thursday we have made some soundings in E.C.A., and we find apprehension there lest a high-level approach would complicate their relations with Congress as long as their appropriation is under consideration. They are now deeply involved in the hearings before the House Appropriations Committee. We might get some results by a re-statement of the Canadian situation at intermediate levels, where it could be made without attracting notice to people such as Nitze, Southard, Bissell or Wood²⁵ and perhaps the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations. I suggested to Robertson on Thursday that a fresh statement of the Canadian situation and policy would in any case be of use to us.

3. We have reported in a separate message on the current position here with respect to authorizations for Canadian lumber, bacon, and cheese. We have also mentioned at the operating level in E.C.A. and the State Department the advantages of withholding for the present any statements which might be interpreted as adversely affecting Canadian trade.

4. It is, of course important that we should continue to impress the facts of the Canadian position both on E.C.A. and on the other Departments concerned. The problem is whether a Ministerial visit at this time is the best method of doing so. We clearly cannot hope to persuade E.C.A. to resume the financing of Canadian wheat. The most that we can expect is that they will approve requests for authorizations from Canada for products not in technical surplus in this country under Section 112 of the Act, when we can provide them on a sound competitive basis. The pressure of domestic producers here is steadily growing and the policy-makers in E.C.A. have not nearly as free hands as they had even two or three months ago. Their hands should be a little freer once the appropriation has been adopted. Ends.

²⁴ Le Cabinet reconsidéra cette question le 12 mai 1949, alors qu'il décida que Pearson ne devrait pas se rendre à Washington afin de discuter des questions de l'A.C.E. à ce moment.

The Cabinet reconsidered this question on May 12, 1949, when it agreed that Pearson should not visit Washington to discuss E.C.A. questions at that time.

E.C.A.—RECENT DEVELOPMENT AND PRESENT POSITION

1. General Position

Congress has passed an extension of the Economic Cooperation Act for the year 1949/50. This includes an "authorization" to spend $4.28 billions.

Two points should be noted in relation to this figure:

(a) It establishes a ceiling for E.C.A. spending but does not actually provide the money to be spent. Congress has not yet "appropriated" any money for this purpose.

(b) If Congress appropriated the whole $4.28 billions it would provide for expenditures at a rate about 10% below 1948/49.

A Committee of the House of Representatives is now considering the question of appropriations. The procedure in Congress is likely to be a long one. Actual appropriations are not likely to be voted before July.

Meanwhile the Administration is rather nervous about the attitude of Congress. Senator Taft is urging a cut of 10% below the figure of $4.28 billions that has been authorized. The Administration hopes that the cut will not be that deep but expects a cut of a least 5%.

2. Off-Shore Purchases—General Provisions

The new legislation contains virtually the same provisions as the old regarding off-shore purchases. In general, E.C.A. funds can be used to buy goods in Canada and other Western Hemisphere countries. However, there are some restrictions. The most important of these relate to agricultural surpluses in the United States. If the Secretary of Agriculture declares a product to be in surplus supply in the United States E.C.A. dollars cannot be used for buying that commodity abroad.

These restrictions, in fact, come into effect when agricultural surpluses exist in the United States even though the Secretary of Agriculture has not made a formal declaration. This is what has happened in regard to Canadian wheat. The Secretary of Agriculture has made no formal declaration and this leaves the E.C.A. free to pay for Canadian wheat if a more favourable situation should arise (for instance, if transportation difficulties interfere with a possible movement of American wheat to seaboard). Meanwhile, however, the E.C.A. is asking the United Kingdom and other countries not to request E.C.A. dollars for wheat.

We have been warned by E.C.A. officials that what has happened to wheat is likely to happen to all other agricultural supplies by October 1949. Growing surpluses in the United States will make it impossible to use E.C.A. funds for off-shore purchases of agricultural commodities.

3. Off-Shore Purchases—Outlook for Canada

As a result of these developments we are told that off-shore purchases in Canada during the year 1949/50 are likely to fall to a level between $200 millions and $250 millions. During the twelve months ending March 31, 1949, E.C.A. authorized off-shore expenditures in Canada of $690 millions. The fall from about $690 millions down to $200 millions or $250 millions is, of course, serious. However, the fact that E.C.A. dollars are not available to the United Kingdom and other European countries to buy Canadian wheat, bacon, cheese etc. does not mean that these countries will stop buying these products from us. In the past year they have depended heavily on E.C.A. dollars for these purchases but they have other sources of dollars i.e., the dollars that they earn from their exports to North America and elsewhere.

In short, while the United Kingdom and other European countries will spend fewer E.C.A. dollars in Canada next year they can be expected to spend more of their earned dollars here. This development has at least one favourable side. It is better for us to have our staple exports to the United Kingdom and Europe paid for out of the current earnings of those countries in foreign markets rather than have them paid for out of dollars put up by Washington. The less directly dependent we are on E.C.A. dollars the more firm the future of our exports appears to be.

On the other hand, E.C.A. is beginning to bring pressure to bear on Britain and other countries in regard to their use of earned dollars as well as E.C.A. dollars. (This was evident in a statement made by E.C.A. last week in regard to purchases of lumber). This must be regarded as an additional threat to our staple exports. It is, for example, conceivable although not at all likely at present, that E.C.A. might try to force the British to use some of their earned dollars to buy wheat from the United States instead of from Canada.

To sum up: Off-shore purchases in Canada for the coming year are likely to be cut by two-thirds as compared with last year. The greater part of this fall may be offset if the United Kingdom and other countries use earned dollars instead of E.C.A. dollars to buy from Canada. This shift is quite likely to take place unless the United States tries to stop it—that is to say unless the United States deliberately uses E.C.A. as a means of forcing United States surpluses on unwilling buyers abroad.

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM OFFICIALS IN WASHINGTON REGARDING E.R.P.

1. Talks with officials of the United Kingdom Treasury and Supply delegation in Washington on the United Kingdom's programme of imports from Canada for 1949-50 were held in the office of Sir Sidney Caine on May 23rd and May 25th. The principal United Kingdom officials participating were: Sir Sidney Caine, Head of the Treasury and Supply delegation; Allan Christelow; Edgar Jones; Cyril Rawlings; Murray McDougall. Hampshire of the High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa was present as an observer. The Canadians participating were Deutsch, Plumpton, Beaupré and Murray.

2. Caine, who had recently returned from a ten day visit to London, during which he obtained information on the United Kingdom programme for 1949-50, opened the first meeting with some remarks concerning the United Kingdom's general balance of payments position. This position, he said, remains a cause of grave anxiety. The United Kingdom and possessions are close to being in balance with the United States. The United Kingdom, however, is in the difficult position of having to cover other countries' dollar deficits, such as Canada's. The United Kingdom must provide dollars to these "other countries". It is able to do so now because it gets them from ECA.

3. Deutsch waited until the end of the Monday meeting before commenting on Caine's contention that Canada is amongst the "other countries" which are creating the real balance of payments problem for the United Kingdom in 1949-50. The points made in reply to Caine were:

(i) Our understanding of the United Kingdom post-war problems and extensive efforts to assist the United Kingdom recovery;

(ii) United Kingdom purchases in Canada consisted largely of essential supplies;

(iii) Our willingness to receive United Kingdom goods.

This exchange of views was most amicable. The atmosphere of the two meetings was most cordial throughout. The United Kingdom had prepared statistical material specially for our use.

4. The information which was made available by the British included,

(i) The United Kingdom 1949-50 programme of imports from Canada and

(ii) Two tables showing in broad outline the United Kingdom's estimated gold and dollar position during 1949-50. United Kingdom officials emphasized the tentative nature of these figures; the programme had yet to be approved in Paris and E.C.A. funds had yet to be appropriated in Washington. For these reasons the tables must be treated with discretion and regarded as secret.

5. In October, when the United Kingdom drew up its original 1949–50 programme, it was estimated that the net gold and dollar deficit would be $940 millions. This is the figure which has since been accepted by the ECA in the sense that it has been used in various presentations to Congress, thereby gaining a considerable degree of firmness. The $940 figure, which represents a cut of 25 per cent from the previous year, was based on the expectation of a continued substantial improvement in the sterling area's dollar deficit. Unfortunately, the improvement which was counted upon in October has not occurred at the rate which was anticipated. The United Kingdom gold and dollar payments, both to non-dollar non-participating countries and to participating countries, are rising sharply. The United Kingdom's latest estimate, which has been or is about to be submitted to the OEEC in Paris, anticipates that the net gold and dollar deficit for 1949–50 will be a little over $1100 millions rather than the $940 millions estimated last October. The deficit position is therefore worsening at a time when the prospects of obtaining the full $940 millions ERP assistance are not bright. The United Kingdom has good reason to believe that if the ERP appropriation is cut by say 10 per cent the United Kingdom's allotment will not necessarily be cut by a full 10 per cent. Nevertheless, the United Kingdom must assume that the $940 will be reduced somewhat. (There will be a carry-over of some $95 millions of E.C.A. funds into 1949–50, but this will probably be equalled by a similar carry-over into 1950–51).

6. A summary of the United Kingdom's estimate of the sterling area's balance of payments with Canada for 1949–50 follows (figures in millions of dollars):

United Kingdom imports	$681
Invisibles	248
Total payments to Canada		929
United Kingdom exports	348
Invisibles	234
United Kingdom receipts from Canada		582
Net United Kingdom deficit		347
Rest of sterling area deficit		30
Total sterling area deficit on current account		377
Capital transactions ($120 credit—$14 payments to Canada)		-106
Net sterling area deficit		$271

7. Programme of Canadian Imports. Broad details of the United Kingdom's 1949–50 import programme from Canada are contained in the working paper given to us by the United Kingdom officials. This is attached. This paper gives two views of how the United Kingdom's Canadian imports would be financed. The first view, described as the "present London programme", calls for $680.6 millions of imports, $287.5 of which would be eligible for ERP financing and $393.1 not eligible. The second view, described as the "UKTSD pessimistic forecast", is clearly the one which the United Kingdom officials in Washington consider to be the more realistic one. This view foresees a reduction of $43 million dollars in Canadian imports, bringing the total to $637 millions. The $637 millions would be financed as follows: $181.4 millions ERP and $444.5 non-ERP.

8. London Programme Caine said that London had proceeded on the following assumptions in forecasting the division between ERP and non-ERP in the financing of all the United Kingdom's dollar imports. The items which are described as non-eligible for ERP financing are those which

- (1) E.C.A. will not finance
- (2) Are virtually impossible to document
- (3) Raise awkward questions (e.g. nickel)

The value of the items which after the most careful study in London are still regarded as "non-eligible", is so great that the United Kingdom cannot afford to leave out of ECA financing anything which they regard as eligible. The "London Programme" was drawn up about a month ago on the basis of prices prevailing at that time. Caine said that, for all intents and purposes, there is no room left to switch United Kingdom purchases in the United States from free dollars to ECA dollars; hence no further free dollars can be made available for purchases in Canada. He also made it plain that the U.K. anticipated no difficulty in finding sufficient eligible items (he referred to them as "erpable" items) to take up the whole of the $940 millions or whatever was available.

9. In the course of considering possible methods of finding additional eligible items for ERP financing Caine said that London has often debated the advisability of having a programme for the Dependent Overseas Territories. The decision, however, has always been that political and practical difficulties made such a programme not worthwhile. It would only be used as a last resort.

10. The United Kingdom programme provides for the continued purchase of Canadian bacon, cheese and eggs during the next fiscal year at approximately the same rate as during the present fiscal year, although the contracts for these commodities expire at the end of calendar '49. In reply to queries concerning the United Kingdom's intentions with respect to these commodities in 1950, Caine said that the United Kingdom list, which represents everything that is planned for delivery in 1949-50, is based on the assumption that acceptable arrangements can be made for the purchase of all these commodities.

11. A large part of the discussions concerned the prospects for various commodities; how they were now being treated by ECA and how they might be expected to be treated during the next year. The view of the United Kingdom officials in Washington, in brief form, is that, as far as ECA off-shore financing is concerned, agricultural commodities will all be out by the fourth quarter, forest products including wood pulp will be difficult, and some non-ferrous metals will be, to an extent which cannot be determined at the present time, troublesome. This forecast for agricultural products is based on the prospects as they appear at the present time and is not related to any further business recession. It assumes that most agricultural products will be "riding on the support floor" by the fall. Similarly, the assessment of the difficulties for forest products is based on the present situation without reference to further deflation. The troubles which it has been hinted might be in store in the non-ferrous metal field depend on how severe the present U.S. recession turns out to be. Following is a resume of the principal commodities discussed.

A. Agricultural Products and Other Foods

(i) Bacon

If the fall run of hogs approaches the U.S.D.A.'s estimates, the U.S.D.A. has told the British that it could not recommend spending ECA dollars outside the United States for pork products. The British say that Fitzgerald has told them that fourth quarter bacon almost certainly will not be eligible.

(ii) Cheese

The United Kingdom delegation believes that cheese is "definitely out". A procurement authorization has already been turned down. Certain dairy products are being supported, and this means that Canadian cheese cannot be eligible.

(iii) Salmon

The assurances which we received from the British and the ECA that the procurement authorization for Canadian salmon would be approved were confirmed by the announcement made in a press release on Wednesday afternoon. $650,000 has been authorized for canned salmon for delivery during the second quarter and $6,500,000 for third quarter delivery.

(iv) Wheat

The British volunteered the idea that, if wheat prices continue to hold above the $2 level, and if the International Wheat Agreement were ratified, they might, at an appropriate occasion later on, consider requesting ECA financing for some Canadian wheat. (After the meeting our side agreed that we should consider in Ottawa the question of asking the British not to proceed with a request for ECA financing for Canadian wheat without informing us beforehand.)

B. Forest Products

(i) Timber

This is a highly uncertain field. The United Kingdom programme of $59.5 million dollars, which was described as being far from a firm figure, is divided $45.5 ERP financing and $14 non-ERP. The UKTSD considers that the total Canadian programme might be as low as $40 million dollars with only $5 million East Coast softwood being eligible for ERP financing and the remaining $35 million West Coast lumber not eligible. The reduction in the Canadian timber programme assumes that $19.5 million dollars will have to be switched to the United States to satisfy the pressure groups. Agricultural products have legislative protection; in the definite opinion of the United Kingdom officials in Washington, timber has been and is going to be given administrative protection. What happens to the $10 million dollar purchase now being arranged in London should give some idea of the extent to which the ECA is prepared to let competition be the real test. The UKTSD officials who are continually dealing with ECA commodity officers discount pretty heavily the promises expressed by ECA policy officials that competition will be the deciding criterion.

In discussing with ECA officials exactly what they mean by competition the United Kingdom officials have had to counter the argument that the advantage given to the Canadians through the British preferential tariff should not be considered insofar as competitive costs are concerned. The opinion has been expressed that the f.o.b. costs rather than the landed cost should be the test. We were told that the United Kingdom officials, on policy grounds, have expressed their strong objections to this point of view.

(ii) Woodpulp

Craighead, an ECA commodity officer in the pulp and paper branch, who is described by the British as being very friendly and co-operative, came to the United Kingdom offices on Tuesday to say that he is under "enormous pressure" to do something to assist the United States woodpulp industry. Craighead said the position is such that the United Kingdom's request for a third quarter procurement authorization for Canadian woodpulp covered by "contracts" with the Canadian industry cannot be approved. The United Kingdom must call for competitive bids from United States suppliers. The views of the United Kingdom commodity officials in Washington is that the very heavy freight differential in favour of Canada would normally make it impossible for the United States to compete. Craighead, on the other hand, believes that with the collapse of the United States woodpulp market United States suppliers will definitely compete, if given an opportunity to do so. The question of what to do has been put to London.

C. Base Metals

(i) Nickel

The London programme places $11.7 million dollars of Canadian nickel under non-ERP financing. When asked if the United Kingdom would consider putting part of their nickel purchases under ERP financing a very definite reply was received that this was not contemplated. The United Kingdom was described as being "essentially averse" to putting nickel under ECA financing.

(ii) Copper, Lead and Zinc

The United Kingdom officials consider that there is very likely to be some difficulty in getting the full programme for these three metals financed by ECA. The pessimistic forecast suggests a reduction of $5 million dollars in ERP financing for zinc. This reduction, which the United Kingdom commodity officers acknowledge is purely guesswork, is ascribed to zinc without any knowledge that the cut would necessarily come on zinc. The pessimistic forecast for these commodities is based on the assumption of a further decline in United States business activity.

(iii) Aluminum

The London programme figure of $60 million dollars, which appeared to be somewhat high, was explained by the British on the basis of their hope to obtain 185 thousand tons of aluminum in Canada in the next fiscal year. This is 15 percent more than the amount being received during the current year. One half of this amount, which is to be obtained during the last half of this year, is being purchased at $304 a ton. The price for the first half of next year has not been determined. The U.K. officials stated that a surplus of aluminum may appear in the United States out of domestic production; if so, U.K. might have to take some of it at the expense of Canadian aluminum.

I. ECA OFF-SHORE PURCHASES IN CANADA

1. The Chairman referred to the memorandum of May 5th prepared by Mr. Beattie, and to the comments on that memorandum received from the Embassy in Washington† and from [A.E.] Ritchie in London,† which had previously been circulated.

Mr. Beattie had emphasized that it made no difference financially to the United Kingdom or to Canada whether the U.K. spent ECA funds in Canada and its free dollars in the United States or vice versa. Originally the practice of making large "off-shore" purchases in Canada was a matter of administrative convenience for both the U.K. and ECA. It would seem to be good business for Canada to have the off-shore purchase feature eliminated in the case of all commodities likely to become controversial. Such commodities would in this way be more out of reach of U.S. pressure groups. Although wholesale switching to U.S. sources for ECA purchases would create difficulties, nevertheless it would seem that the U.K. should still have a considerable margin for excluding from ECA allocation those items in which their U.S. purchases would be the least convenient to document. The present allocation of ECA funds was having a bad effect on public opinion in the U.S. and Canada, and, if continued, was likely to assist American producers to invade Canada's legitimate overseas markets. It was probably in our interest to have the lowest possible level of off-shore purchases in Canada, and we should insist at an early date that U.K. programing officials work out a 1949-50 allocation programme which would help to protect our vulnerable exports from the activities of U.S. pressure groups.

The comments from Washington generally approved the argument in the memorandum but with certain qualifications. Doubt was expressed whether under the statutes and procedures of ECA the dollar deficit of the sterling area could be covered without the financing of Canadian commodities which were competitive with U.S. commodities. There was, furthermore, the possibility that ECA would be under very strong pressure to undertake a greater interference in the employment of dollars earned by the receiving countries. This might influence the extent to which free dollars would be available for Canadian products. Stress was laid on the danger of U.S. surpluses to Canadian overseas markets.

In the opinion of Mr. Ritchie, we might be assuming the existence and continuation of a clearer distinction between ECA and non-ECA dollars than was likely to be the case. As the U.S. supply position became still easier and prices declined still further, it was going to be increasingly difficult to maintain any distinction. In the case of a potentially controversial commodity the U.S. suppliers or their pressure groups would scarcely be restrained from criticizing a U.K. purchase in Canada merely because it was financed with ECA dollars. As to the effect on public opinion in the U.S., presumably much of the public support for ECA was based on the assumption that it would ultimately enable the European countries to finance with their own dollars something like the current volume of purchases from the United States. If, however, it appeared that as ECA progressed a smaller rather than a larger proportion of purchases by those countries in the United States was met with non-ECA dollars, that support might weaken. Similarly public support for measures to facilitate entry of European goods into the United States might be adversely affected if it were felt that the bulk of the dollars earned would be spent initially not in the United States but in Canada. Regarding the effect on public opinion in Canada, the impression that Canadian exports were not dependent on ECA, merely because such exports were being financed with non-ECA dollars, might create a false sense of security on the part of the Canadian public. However, it might be necessary in 1949-50 to maximize non-ECA dollar purchases in Canada, not so much because such purchases necessarily had advantages over ECA purchases, but rather because only a minimum of ECA dollars was likely to be available for the purchase of Canadian commodities.

The Chairman stated that during discussions in Washington at the end of May, United Kingdom officials had indicated that they might request ECA dollars for Canadian wheat if the Wheat Agreement went through Congress and if the price remained above the U.S. floor level. He had the general impression that ECA would not welcome such an approach. Should we take any steps regarding the U.K. wheat proposal or let the matter rest for the present? The over-all question was, of course, whether we should try to minimize the use of ECA funds in Canada, especially where controversial commodities were concerned.

2. Mr. Beattie emphasized that the practical deduction from his memorandum was that we should try to persuade the United Kingdom to spend ECA funds in the United States and Latin America, and on our safe items, before touching controversial commodities. This could not harm us and might postpone difficulties. It appeared necessary that we should see the whole U.K. import program to ascertain the extent to which the U.K. was pushing items for ECA financing in the United States and Latin America.

3. During the general discussion, it was suggested that the whole U.K. program represented rather a tight fit with relatively little elasticity. The U.K. Colonial areas were not on an ECA basis and, consequently, U.S. and Canadian supplies going to those destinations were financed with non-ECA dollars. ECA had declared ship disbursements ineligible, and oil equipment was another big item turned down by ECA authorities. The U.K. expected a large increase in losses of dollars to third countries and hoped to cover such losses with dollars earned in the United States. If such were the case the dollars would clearly not be available for expenditures in Canada. The question was how many free dollars could be obtained for Canadian commodities before they were used for other purposes. Things would be brought to a head when new arrangements had to be made with the U.K. this coming fall in connection with food contracts for 1950.

Regarding the U.K. proposal to ask ECA to finance Canadian wheat, the real issue was clearly whether ECA would be willing to consider such a proposal. ECA could only agree if U.S. transport facilities were inadequate to move domestic wheat, and, therefore, any ECA purchases of Canadian wheat could only be on an "ad hoc" basis. It might be advisable to ask the U.K. to consult with Canada before putting forward a request so that an opinion could be expressed on probable ECA reaction.

4. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the U.K. authorities be asked to consult with Canada before putting in any application for the financing of Canadian wheat under ECA; and

(b) that Mr. Deutsch should endeavour to obtain an up-to-date picture of the U.K. 1949-50 program of imports from all countries.

Following for Wrong from Pearson. Your WA-1893.† ECA Appropriation Bill—U.S. agricultural surpluses.

1. I am of course most disturbed by your information regarding the action of the Senate Appropriation Committee in proposing to tie up $1½ billion of ECA funds for the sole purpose of financing the export of agricultural surpluses from the United States.

2. You will remember that when the Prime Minister visited the President earlier this year he made it clear in the case of wheat that Canada would be very seriously concerned if an alteration in the use of ECA funds were to render more difficult the movement of Canadian exports to the United Kingdom. In discussions with U.S. officials both at that time and subsequently it has been suggested that if the United States used ECA funds as a means of displacing Canadian exports by U.S. exports this would be regarded as a departure from the policy of free multilateral trade which both countries have been attempting to follow and might well precipitate a new policy in this country.

3. Will you please remind the United States authorities of our deep concern.

1. With reference to Mr. Pearson's EX-1782 of July 15th concerning the E.C.A. Appropriation Bill, the reports contained in our messages WA-1909 of July 15th† and WA-1932 of July 18th‡ show the influential opposition which has been marshalled against the amendment designed to earmark some $1.5 billions to finance exports of surplus agricultural products. Tyler Wood tells me today that he is quite confident that the Committee amendment will be defeated during the Senate debate. This will be due largely to Mr. Hoffman's skill in enlisting the heads of the three major farm organizations, the Secretary of Agriculture and Senator Anderson as opponents of the amendment.

2. Wood says that they hope that the Appropriation Bill will be debated on Friday and passed by the Senate at a Saturday session, but it may be put off until next week and another Appropriation Bill given precedence following Senate action on the Atlantic Treaty. The tactics which E.C.A. is following are to try to get unwelcome administrative provisions in the Bill defeated in the Senate while leaving the amount unchanged. When the Bill goes to conference they might then endeavour to substitute the House provision governing the amount (i.e. authorization to spend the House figure if necessary in ten and a half months) or to develop some compromise more satisfactory than the Senate's figure.

3. If the effort to eliminate the amendment concerning agricultural surpluses failed in the Senate, Wood is confident that it would not be adopted by the representatives of the House on the Conference Committee. The United States authorities involved are well aware of our concern over the possible effects of this amendment. If the effort to defeat it in the Senate should fail, we shall pursue the matter further in an effort to assist in securing its elimination during the conference stage.

1. I saw Mr. Paul Hoffman this afternoon at his suggestion. He began by saying that he was meeting the Secretary of State later today and wanted first to see whether I disagreed with the general conclusions reached in E.C.A. on the basic cause and cure of the British payments problems. He said that larger dollar earnings by the United Kingdom in particular and the sterling area in general were the only effective cure for the unbalance. If the present two worlds were not to become three worlds (with lower standards of living in both the dollar and the sterling worlds), this objective would have to be achieved. E.C.A. considered that United Kingdom exports to the United States should be raised from the 1948 annual level of around $250 millions to $700 millions. E.C.A. is preparing detailed studies of how this might be achieved. Hoffman was very critical of British salesmanship in the United States, which seemed to him defeatist in approach.

2. He went on to say that one of the worst features of the present situation was the lack of incentive for sterling area exporters to push into dollar markets. The job of salesmanship was easier in other markets, and very often higher prices could be secured. It was essential to provide adequate incentive in some way or other. He pointed out that in the sterling area outside the United Kingdom the existence of the dollar pool deprived both Governments and exporters of the incentive to earn dollars, which would be provided if they were able to retain the dollars they had earned.

3. I remarked that I agreed, and that I thought our people in Ottawa would agree, with his general diagnosis. I pointed out as a remarkable fact that in April and May of this year Canadian imports from the United Kingdom had more than doubled United States imports, and suggested that this indicated the extent of what might be accomplished in the United States market. He agreed, of course, that better salesmanship would not alone do the trick, that increased United Kingdom productivity was essential, and that this would involve some change in the standard of living in the United Kingdom.

4. I then said that this was a two-sided affair and that steps were necessary in this country to bring about an increase in imports. He cordially agreed, saying that a great campaign of public education was necessary and that he had it in mind to stimulate this campaign through the Junior Chamber of Commerce and other organizations. When I referred to the tariff, he said that in his judgement customs administration rather than tariff rates was the real difficulty, and that he hoped it would be possible to bring about a reform of administrative practices fairly soon. (E.C.A. is collecting data, and we have already suggested that the Department of Trade and Commerce might provide specific examples from their files of difficulties arising from existing regulations.) Mr. Hoffman added that he hoped soon to go to the President with definite proposals for legislation.

5. I told him that reform of customs administration would be extremely welcome in Canada, but that the problem of tariff rates remained serious for us. He held out no hope of action beyond the renewal of the Reciprocal Agreements Act, and he expects that the "peril point" provision will be reinserted in the measure by the Senate.

6. I asked him about the McLellan amendment to the E.C.A. Appropriation Bill about surplus agricultural products. He said that this had been sponsored by the Cotton Institute and that he was sure that he could get it withdrawn if he approached Senator McLellan. He preferred, however, to have it overwhelmingly beaten on the floor, and believed it would not secure more than twenty votes. He was also optimistic about the elimination from the Bill of other Senate amendments, including the loan to Spain.

7. We discussed briefly the emergency measures announced from London. He expressed doubt whether sterling area countries other than the United Kingdom would in fact cut their import programs to the extent indicated in the communique issued by the Commonwealth Finance Ministers. He is leaving for a fortnight in Europe as soon as the E.C.A. Appropriation Bill is in final shape, and plans to see Mr. Bevin in London.

8. I alluded in conclusion to the talks here in September between the United Kingdom, United States and Canada. He appeared to attach great importance to reaching definite conclusions at these talks. The situation could not be met by expedients and the fundamental facts must be faced promptly. He said that when he got back from Europe he would like to have a more thorough review with us of the whole situation, in advance of the September talks. When I mentioned the leading article in the Economist of July 2nd as taking a general position similar to his, he agreed and praised the Economist's analysis highly.

9. Mr. Hoffman did not make any suggestion of steps that might be taken by Canada over the short or the long term. He said that he had wished to talk to me because he considered that the interests of Canada and the United States were nearly identical and he wanted to give me an opportunity of contesting his central conclusions if I did not agree with them.

Tripartite economic discussions—offshore purchases of Canadian wheat.²⁶

1. Mackenzie reported on Tuesday to Mr. Howe on the rapid developments which are taking place in Washington, pointing to the distinct probability that the United States side expects to be able to announce at the Ministerial discussions that one of the main United States contributions to the solution of the United Kingdom's short-term difficulties will be some arrangement to allow ECA to finance a considerable portion of the United Kingdom's Canadian wheat purchases. (Deutsch has also reported to Dr. Clark on this question.) Martin, in telling us that the financing of Canadian wheat is one subject on which Snyder wished the discussion to be deferred to the Ministerial meeting, implied that Snyder may be ready to announce a solution to the difficulties which the United Kingdom insists that this question is causing them. Although Martin was unable to indicate what the United States solution might be, we have been able to gather some idea of what the United States has in mind from the State Department and from Bissell, McCullough and Strange of ECA. The two main parts of the United States "helpful" proposals, which ironically enough the United States are considering from the point of view of helping us as much as helping the United Kingdom, are:

(1) The United States will finance some part of the United Kingdom's Canadian wheat purchases if we will finance some part of these purchases.

The Canadian financing would be in addition to the present rate of drawings on the United Kingdom credit.

(2) Some participation by the United States in the United Kingdom's wheat import programme. It has been suggested that this participation might be brought about by arranging that India buy Australian wheat and the United Kingdom buy United States wheat. Last year India bought some $50 millions worth of United States wheat. If this type of switch could be arranged, it would serve the double purpose of easing the United Kingdom's documentation problem and allowing the United States to have some share of the United Kingdom market. There has been a suggestion that the United States might wish to obtain a share of the United Kingdom market through taking over a portion of the Canadian wheat contract. It is not, however, clear that the United States officials are envisaging replacing Canadian wheat with United States wheat in the United Kingdom market.

²⁶ Pour de la documentation additionnelle sur ces discussions, voir la partie 5 ci-après.
For other documentation on these discussions, see Part 5 below.

2. The delegation considers that the arguments which were made in the memorandum given to Clutterbuck last week are still valid. Our goal should be to aim at finding suitable commodities for E.C.A. financing other than wheat to cover the United Kingdom's deficit with Canada. We should only come to wheat as a last resort. The United Kingdom officials, however, are pressing hard for a decision on this question. It appears that the United States side are doing everything possible to meet the British on this point and indeed have already reached agreement on how to do so, although our present information suggests that Secretary of Agriculture Brannan has not been apprised of what is going on.

3. At the delegation meeting this morning it was decided,

(1) That we should try to slow down, if not stop, the United States side in the pursuit of their good intentions, and

(2) Let the British know that our position as communicated to Clutterbuck has not changed in any respect. There are obvious difficulties in accomplishing the first point since we are not supposed to know of the surprise package being prepared for the opening at the Ministerial discussions. Martin was quite explicit that he was under instructions from Snyder not to discuss wheat. There may be an opportunity today to bring our views to the attention of Thorp. United States officials seem quite unaware that there is any difference of opinion, or possibility of a difference of opinion, between the United Kingdom and ourselves on this point. For example, Robertson, and Mackenzie, when they discussed this question with Bissell at lunch on Tuesday, discovered that although he had read the memorandum given to Hoffman in London urging E.C.A. financing of Canadian wheat, he did not know that we would regard this problem in a different light. (The document given to Hoffman is similar to the one given by Clutterbuck to the Prime Minister.)

4. With respect to the British, Deutsch and Plumtre are to try to see Sir Sydney Caine and Goldman today to register with them our views on the undesirability of United States financing of Canadian wheat. It is not expected that the United Kingdom, having gone as far as they have in pressing the United States for a decision on this question, will be disposed at this stage to reverse their position. We should, however, be able to make the point that the United Kingdom should defer pressing for a decision on this question until the new United Kingdom dollar import programme has been prepared and all possibilities of E.C.A. financing have been carefully explored.

Following for Heeney from Plumptre, Begins: Tripartite talks—E.C.A. and wheat. There follows the memorandum that I have prepared for Mr. Pearson on his subject. Mr. Deutsch and Mr. Mackenzie saw earlier drafts. This is a corrected one, but I have not tried to get general agreement. Text begins:

September 6th, 1949

*Wheat and the Tripartite Talks
The United Kingdom suggestion*

It was the United Kingdom that raised the question of wheat in relation to the tripartite talks. Some three weeks ago, in a memorandum to the Prime Minister, they said had to get E.R.P. dollars to finance their wheat purchases in Canada. They asked us to back them up in their approach to E.C.A.

2. Their memorandum went in some detail into the position of their dollar earnings and outlays in 1949–1950. Unfortunately the statistics were presented in a very misleading way. To make matters worse, they used the same statistical presentation in an approach to E.C.A. (which they made without waiting for discussion with us). Thus we had to try to straighten matters out not only with the United Kingdom but with the United States also.

3. The essential point at which the United Kingdom presentation was misleading was in relation to their need for E.C.A. dollars. This need they greatly exaggerated. They stated that they only had $69 millions of “free” dollars and that, under present E.C.A. restrictions, there were $500 millions of ineligible but necessary imports to be financed—$400 million from Canada and $100 million from the United States. Hence, they implied, unless they got immediate and major relaxations in E.C.A. rulings, the greater part of Canadian sales to the United Kingdom were in jeopardy—including the Canadian wheat contract.

4. The fact is that the United Kingdom does not need anything like $400 millions of E.C.A. funds to finance their deficit with Canada. The balance, according to the latest estimates received last week from the United Kingdom, is roughly as follows:

1949-50

Millions of dollars

United Kingdom purchases in Canada	$602
Invisible item (net)	$ 47
Payments on account of other sterling area countries (net)	$ 53
Total United Kingdom outlays		$702
United Kingdom sales in Canada	$318
Canadian credit	$120
Total dollars available to United Kingdom	$438
Balance to be covered by E.R.P. or from United Kingdom reserves		$264

How difficult is it likely to be to cover $264 millions from E.C.A. sales? It should not be too difficult; the United Kingdom estimated that, on the basis of present eligibility restrictions they can buy $168 millions by means of offshore purchases in Canada. Thus there is less than $100 millions to cover by means of new E.C.A. arrangements.

5. There is no question that the United Kingdom are going to have difficulty in finding "eligible" items to cover the whole of their E.C.A. allocation this year ($962 millions if congress and O.E.E.C. act as expected). Their difficulty this year is greater than last for two reasons:

(I) The E.C.A. rules for eligibility are by now much stricter than last year, and

(II) The United Kingdom needs to use more of its available dollars this year to cover the dollar gaps of other countries. The United Kingdom is trying to act as an intermediary, transmitting to other sterling countries some of the benefits of E.R.P. and this raises technical problems in E.C.A.

6. The United Kingdom thus faces the danger that some of its precious E.R.P. dollars will not be usable, or at least not usable for imports of the highest priority. Anything that relaxes present E.C.A. restrictions will relieve the United Kingdom of a serious worry. There are many sorts of relaxation that would help. E.C.A. might, reversing certain decisions, decide to finance United Kingdom purchases of oil-machinery, or the expenditures of United Kingdom vessels in United States and Canadian ports, or a number of other items. But the biggest and best relaxation—the one that would remove all their worries about eligibility—would be a decision that all Canadian wheat was once again eligible for ECA financing—$309 millions of elbow-room gained at a single decision.

The United States Suggestion

7. When the Canadian official group arrived in Washington ten days ago they discovered:

(a) That there was a general misunderstanding of the Canadian need for "ECA assistance"; the basic United Kingdom misunderstanding had been transmitted to the United States;

(b) That it was difficult to straighten out this misunderstanding because Mr. Snyder had given instructions that the question of ECA finance of Canadian wheat

(and some other matters) be discussed only at the Ministerial level and not at all at the official level;

(c) That Mr. Snyder (presumably under the illusion that Canada was urgently in need of large off-shore purchases) was likely to invite Canada to make a number of "concessions" in exchange for his support in making some or all Canadian wheat once more eligible for ERP;

(d) That these "concessions" were likely to include (I) a substantial increase in the amount of Canadian credit extended to the United Kingdom and (II) some sacrifices, the nature of which is not known, of Canadian rights under the United Kingdom wheat contract. These sacrifices might take the form of lower prices $1.80 per bushel instead of $2.00 or diversion of a part of the contract to the United States. These Canadian sacrifices would placate the interests in Congress that have bitterly opposed the use of the United States taxpayer's money to buy any Canadian wheat.

8. During the past ten days Canadian officials have tried to indicate to the United States and the United Kingdom officials that, while Canada is quite willing to play its proper part in rebuilding the economic position of the United Kingdom, we are not willing to make all too real "concessions" in return for actions which, as a matter of actual fact, may not benefit us in any very direct way. Unfortunately, discussion of these matters has been difficult because of Mr. Snyder's instructions that they were to be reserved for the ministerial talks.

The Canadian Interest

9. Should we support the present United Kingdom request that Canadian wheat should be made eligible for ECA finance? Should we oppose it? Should we stand aside?

10. When problems of eligibility have arisen in the past we have stood aside. Specific questions of what should and should not be eligible seemed to be matters for discussion between ECA and the recipient countries. We have been anxious not to appear in any sense as a recipient and we have, for that reason, refused to join with the United Kingdom, or with groups of recipients, who wanted our support in their discussions and arguments with ECA officials. We must still keep these considerations in mind. On the other hand, it would seem impossible, even if it were desirable, to stand aside in the present situation. We are participating in the tripartite talks and the maintenance of the supplies of dollars available to the United Kingdom depends in part on the question of eligibility. Moreover, it seems most unlikely, perhaps impossible, that the problem of eligibility raised by the United Kingdom can be solved without extension—or reintroduction—of offshore purchases in Canada. This may affect delicate political situations (e.g. wheat) or delicate economic situations (e.g. a threat from United States interests to the position of Canadian lumber and pulp markets in the United Kingdom). An attitude of indifference is no longer possible.

11. The present situation has been confused by the approach that the United Kingdom have adopted. What is really needed is a general tripartite review of the rules of eligibility—an attempt to work out a program of ECA finance that, on the one hand, will allow the United Kingdom to make the best use of its ECA funds, and, on the other hand, will "sit" most comfortably in the economic and political situations of the United States and Canada. Instead of adopting this broad approach the United Kingdom, as outlined above, has singled out one commodity, wheat, and made a drive to get it freely and completely eligible. This goal is surely the most remote and unattainable they could have chosen. To begin with, the eligibility of wheat, along with other agricultural products, is the subject of very clear limitations under the ECA Act. When a "surplus" develops it cannot be eligible. No arrangement made by the administration can override this barrier; nor can it be easily circumvented if the technical conditions of a "surplus" appear to be present. This applies to all agricultural products, including wheat; in addition, wheat suffers from having been the focus of the battle in Congress regarding surpluses and eligibility. Hence—without regard to purely Canadian arguments for or against having our wheat financed by ECA—it is most important to get the discussion of eligibility onto the right tracks—the tracks leading to a general review of the subject instead of the tracks leading merely to ECA "taking over" the whole Canadian wheat contract. The latter tracks seem so likely to come to a dead end.

12. While it seems most unlikely that the ECA will accept the United Kingdom request to finance the whole of the Canadian contract (indeed they are not legally competent to give any such undertaking) nevertheless it is quite likely that ECA will finance some Canadian wheat during 1949–50. There will no doubt be times when, under the ECA Act, Canadian wheat becomes eligible; transportation difficulties will make the movement of United States wheat in the necessary quantities impossible. Provided that the whole range of eligibilities has been reviewed (as suggested in the previous paragraph), there is general agreement, among Canadian as well as United States and United Kingdom officials, that such opportunities should be used to the fullest extent.

13. Given this basic and all-important point of agreement, it is perhaps useful to set down the chief arguments which have been advanced over the past fortnight amongst our own officials for and against "getting Canadian wheat back into ECA". In retrospect, it is clear that the arguments have not always met on common ground. Nevertheless they have brought out a number of very important points.

14. The chief arguments for "getting Canadian wheat back into ECA" have been as follows:

(a) Anything that gives added firmness to Canadian wheat sales to United Kingdom should be welcomed. If United States can be persuaded to put up $300 millions for this purpose, we should do nothing to stop them; indeed we should do everything to encourage them. A year ago we were going all out to get Canadian goods financed by ECA; the sort of arguments that applied then still apply now. With Congress still in session, it may not be the best psychological moment at which to raise the question, but the United Kingdom have raised it and will not drop it. We should give them all the help we can.

(b) The International Wheat Agreement was largely sponsored by the United States. Its spirit and purpose are to provide for reasonable levels of imports and exports within reasonable price limits. Broadly speaking, it is designed to keep trade, in this basic commodity, in balance and within established patterns. Hence it is not at all unreasonable to press the United States administration to make ECA funds available to finance Canadian wheat.

(c) Even if the United States attaches certain "conditions" we should not hold back. The fact that we cannot accept some or all of the conditions must not lead us into opposing the basic suggestion itself. We should maintain our rights to exports under the wheat agreement; we may, however, if we use this agreement as a lever, have to forego our United Kingdom contract price of $2.00 and drop to the agreement maximum price of $1.80.

(d) To the extent that the United Kingdom solves its problem of eligibility by recourse to wheat (or anything else), the problem will be less in regard to other commodities. Some Canadian products on ECA, especially forest products, are being thrown open to United States competition of a cut-throat character. Their sales in United Kingdom would be substantially safer if they could be bought with "free dollars". We may get a rather larger share of the total United Kingdom and sterling area import programmes if the United Kingdom is relieved of some of its worries about eligibility. As long as the United Kingdom have free dollars to be fought for we have a chance of winning some of them.

15. The corresponding arguments against ECA financing are:

(a) There is no argument about the desirability of making our wheat sales to the United Kingdom firm. It is questionable, however, whether ECA should be regarded as firm finance as far as Canadian wheat is concerned. It is impossible to ignore the legal and political limitations under which ECA labours in respect to wheat.

(b) The International Wheat Agreement, while providing for total purchases and sales and for price limits, makes no provision whatever regarding who shall sell how much to whom. It gives us no guarantee of retaining the United Kingdom import market, as opposed to other less reliable and less desirable markets. Further, there is a release clause; an importing country does not have to import its full quota if it cannot pay for it. This might be taken as weakening further any claim we might make that United States was in duty bound to provide dollars to the United Kingdom to buy our wheat.

(c) The "conditions" which, we are told, are likely to attach to Mr. Snyder's "offer" are wholly unacceptable as conditions—because they are based on the false premise that Canada needs large offshore purchases to balance its accounts. This is not to say, however, that Canada will not look at any reasonable proposition, either from the United States or the United Kingdom, designed to promote a general solution of common problems.

(d) It is true that if United Kingdom can solve its problem of eligibility it may be possible for us to increase (or maintain) our share of the United Kingdom and sterling import programmes. However, the United Kingdom overall position is now so very tight that it would be unwise to make any major concessions in the hope of increasing our sales for "free dollars". Moreover, the solution of the eligibility problem can be, and should be, sought first in the field of other items that cause less commotion than wheat. All avenues should be fully explored; we should not jump for wheat until we have looked, and United States and United Kingdom have looked, at all other possibly eligible items.

16. Finally, the broad political considerations in Canada must be mentioned. Any alteration in the terms of the Canadian wheat contract would need to be considered most carefully. Moreover, there is no commodity closer to the heart of Canadian politics and Canadian economics than Canadian wheat; a strong argument can be made for keeping it as far as possible out of United States politics. Ends.

SECRET

Following for Plumptre from Murray, Begins: My draft notes on the meetings at which the E.C.A. eligibility question was discussed follow:

Notes on the meetings of the Working Group on E.C.A. eligibility, September 9th, 1949.

First meeting (11:30 a.m.—1:00 p.m.), State Department; Mr. Hoffman in the chair.

Those attending the meeting were:—

United States. Messrs. Hoffman, Bissell and Fitzgerald of E.C.A.; Brannan, Secretary of Agriculture, Stanley Andrews, Director of the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations, Department of Agriculture; Ben Moore, State Department.

United Kingdom. Sir Henry Wilson-Smith; Messrs. Christelow and Goldman.

Canada. Messrs. Howe, Mackenzie, Deutsch and Murray.

1. Hoffman got the meeting down to business immediately with his opening remark that the Secretary of Agriculture had the final word on what agricultural commodities E.C.A. could finance: "What he says we can finance is what we can finance". Hoffman then invited Brannan to lead off.

2. Wilson-Smith, who had not had an opportunity to state what the immediate United Kingdom problem was, intervened to outline briefly the reasons for the "jam" in which the United Kingdom found itself with respect to using its E.C.A. funds this year. Out of a revised United Kingdom import programme of $1200 millions only $680 millions would qualify for E.C.A. financing. In view of the great difficulties which will exist for the United Kingdom in getting along on a $1200 million programme, the United Kingdom obviously wishes to purchase only items which are (1) essential or (2) already contracted for. Eligibility rulings have eliminated from E.C.A. financing roughly $500 million dollars in the United Kingdom import programme. If the problem is not solved the United Kingdom will have a deficit in its free dollar accounts of $240 millions—(the $925 million probable E.C.A. allocation—$685 millions of eligible items—$240 millions).

3. Mr. Howe said that we would like to see Canadian agricultural products made eligible for E.C.A. financing. He said that in the Canadian view the International Wheat Agreement made it possible to look at the burdensome surplus provisions of the E.C.A. Act in a new perspective. In approving the Wheat Agreement, Congress and the Administration had accepted the principle of sharing markets. It followed, therefore, that there could be no intention on the United States part to use United States surpluses to displace Canada in the United Kingdom wheat market. Brannan and Hoffman acknowledged that the Wheat Agreement was a new factor. However, they were unable to assess how much weight it would carry with Congress. The Wheat Agreement does not cover the question of financing the sales of the exporting countries, and on the question of using E.C.A. funds for this purpose, Congress in section 112 of the E.C.A. Act had made its intent clear.

4. Bissell reviewed how wheat was treated during the first E.C.A. year 1948-'49. The Secretary of Agriculture had never actually formally declared wheat to be surplus and available. In fact, however, wheat has been surplus in the United States since late 1948; i.e., surplus to both the United States domestic requirements and the export programme which the United States could physically handle. The physical limitations ceased to apply roughly at the beginning of the second quarter of this year. At that time Canadian wheat became ineligible for E.C.A. financing.

5. Brannan then made his initial offer in the following terms: He said that if a genuine basis or one of reasonable logic could be found for the action which the United Kingdom was requesting he would be "willing to explore the possibility of financing Canadian wheat if physical conditions permit". To do so, however, would be very difficult. The Congressional drive to make the agricultural surplus provisions of the E.C.A. Act even more strict than they are at present had only been stopped by the able efforts of Hoffman. In exploring the possibility of finding a basis which would make Canadian wheat financing tolerable, Brannan said that the United States would have to look at the limitation on the importation of United States fruits and vegetables into Canada as well as seeing what arrangements could be worked out for limiting Canadian exports to the United States of agricultural commodities which are in "long supply in the United States". At this stage Brannan referred to last year's Potato Agreement. The fact that it had been cancelled without trouble to date, did not mean that the situation would remain that way indefinitely. The United Kingdom could also play an essential role in making the arrangement palatable. This the United Kingdom could do by taking some bothersome United States agricultural surpluses, in particular eggs. Brannan had stated what he wanted but not how much.

6. Hoffman remarked on the political courage which Brannan had shown to date in trying to make the E.C.A. programme workable and in holding back powerful sectional agriculture interests which were pressing to have their commodities taken care of. What had to be worked out, and this he would not attempt to put diplomatically, was a trade which would show a benefit to United States agriculture.

7. Hoffman agreed with Mr. Howe that the problem which they were trying to solve was only incidentally a Canadian one. In Hoffman's view, Canada and the United States both had to help solve a United Kingdom problem.

8. Indian Wheat Switch. Bissell raised the question of whether India, which had bought 15 million bushels of dollar wheat last year, could not get its supplies next year from Australia. The United Kingdom could then take the equivalent amount of United States wheat, which would be eligible for E.C.A. financing. Fitzgerald said that the United States estimated India would require 3 million tons of feed grain imports in '49-50, of which 15 million bushels would be required for the dollar area. Wilson-Smith said the question of India taking Australian wheat had been discussed in London during the meetings of the Commonwealth Finance Ministers. However, what was being looked for then was a net saving for the sterling area.

9. This "switch" has two advantages from the United States point of view:

- (i) It eases the United Kingdom's eligibility problem and
- (ii) It gives the United States a share in the United Kingdom market.

10. Hoffman acknowledged that the net United States wheat exports would not be increased. Psychologically, however,—and this he regarded as very important,—a token United States share in the United Kingdom market was an essential part of the "package" which had to be sold to Congress. Hoffman, who did a masterful job of leading Secretary Brannan into the troubled waters of Canadian wheat financing, said that he didn't like the word "explore" (which Brannan had used a few times) but preferred to get down to specifics to see what kind of package could be made.

11. Wilson-Smith said that the United Kingdom had tried to help out in difficulties of this sort in the past. This year, however, it would be terribly hard to do so. The revised austerity import program allowed for no imports of miscellaneous foods from the United States. If these had to be taken it would be at the expense either of other essential items in the United Kingdom import program or a further drain on the sterling reserves.

12. Mr. Howe pointed out that Canada can only cover its deficit with the United States with what we earn elsewhere. If these earnings drop below the amount needed to cover our deficit with the United States we are forced to take action through import restrictions to reduce that deficit. Since the United Kingdom earns $330 million dollars in Canada and we extend $120 million dollars in credits, the United Kingdom deficit with Canada is much less than the $309 million dollars needed to purchase the Canadian wheat portion of the United Kingdom's total Canadian expenditures of $702 million dollars.

13. Brannan emphasized that wheat in the United States, psychologically as well as actually, is a surplus commodity. Recently it had been necessary to store some wheat in liberty ships. Brannan then turned to the amount of eggs the United Kingdom would be prepared to take. The United States had something approaching 412 million dozen surplus eggs in powdered form, some part of which they were anxious to dispose of.

14. On the question of our import restrictions Mr. Howe said that we would continue in the future as we had in the past to conduct our economic relations with the United States in a spirit of avoiding friction wherever possible. From the outset, when it was necessary to impose restrictions we undertook to relax them as soon as and to the greatest extent we could. Considerable relaxations had already been made in the fresh fruit and vegetable category. We have also taken into account cases which were especially difficult from the United States point of view. Mr. Howe said that the United States could count upon Canada continuing along the road of progressive relaxation of restrictions whenever it is feasible.

15. When by 12:30 nothing very specific had been achieved, Hoffman produced his package, on which he thought that agreement could be reached:—

(1) The United States would agree to finance $175 million dollars of Canadian wheat.

(2) Canada would allow further additional drawings on the Canadian credit to the extent of $80 million dollars.

(3) The United Kingdom would take $30 million dollars of United States wheat as a result of the Indian shift.

(4) The United Kingdom would agree to take $8 to $10 million dollars of troublesome United States surpluses. (Eggs would be the chief commodity. Hoffman, however, included apples as well since the United Kingdom is already buying apples.)

16. The package, or at least parts of it, appeared to be as much of a surprise to Brannan as to the other members. Mr. Howe said that he could not discuss additional Canadian credit since this is a question for the Minister of Finance. He pointed out, however, that it looked as if Canada's current account surplus would be so small that the present drawings of $120 millions a year were more than our balance of payments would permit. There was a moment of misunderstanding on this question. Hoffman, at first, thought that it was the Canadian budget rather than the balance of payments which would be put in the "red" by granting additional credit. He pointed out that the foreign aid programme was at the present moment putting the United States into a deficit position. He was not arguing that this was a reason for reducing the aid programme—far from it. There was, however, a strong feeling in Congress and throughout the country that with the United States in a deficit position the dollars which could most readily be cut were those in the foreign aid programme.

17. Brannan agreed that he would try to clear at once Hoffman's proposals with the key Agricultural Senators. Hoffman said that, for his part, he would try to clear with the leaders of the principal farm organizations, particularly Kline of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Great haste was necessary since the problem had to be solved in time to report to the Ministerial group at 11:00 a.m. on Saturday.

18. Wilson-Smith felt that given the way the discussion had gone, he wished to put on record the real appreciation which was held by the United Kingdom Government and throughout the United Kingdom for the very great contributions which Canada had made in the way of assisting the United Kingdom. The present jam in which the United Kingdom found itself was unfortunately one which had wide repercussions that affected everyone.

19. The morning meeting had been confined to agricultural commodities since Brannan was present. Hoffman suggested that the afternoon meeting, which he could see no necessity for the Ministers attending, could consider the other candidates for E.C.A. eligibility, such as vessel disbursements, petroleum equipment, etc.

20. Other agricultural commodities which were briefly discussed during the morning were:—

Cheese. Brannan said that cheese is now being purchased under the price support programme. As a consequence, any financing of Canadian cheese is out of the question. The situation would be further complicated by the United Kingdom's request to cancel a substantial part of its present commitments to buy United States cheese.

Bacon. Bissell, at first, stated that financing of Canadian bacon beyond the end of the present quarter was out of the question. He subsequently modified his remarks and said that on present indications it should be possible to finance Canadian bacon until the end of the calendar year.

(Note: The notes on the second meeting are given in my immediately following teletype.) Ends.

Following for Plumtre from Murray, Begins: My WA-2512 of today's date—notes on the meetings of the Working Group on ECA eligibility, September 9th, 1949 (second meeting).

Second Meeting (3:00 to 4:00 p.m.), ECA Building, Mr. R.M. Bissell in the chair.

Those attending the meeting were:—

United States Messrs. Bissell, Fitzgerald, Van Hyning—ECA; Moore—State Department.

United Kingdom Sir Henry Wilson-Smith, Messrs. Christelow, Goldman and Daly.

Canada Messrs. Mackenzie, Deutsch and Murray.

1. At the afternoon meeting the following degrees of ECA eligibility were conferred upon the items listed below:—

(A) Wheat, Canada—$175 millions. The United Kingdom raised the question of the date they could start getting procurement authorizations for Canadian wheat.

Although this point was not settled it was suggested that it would almost certainly be impossible for ECA to pick up any shipments made before September 1st. The United Kingdom had no detailed information available on the $33 million dollars worth of cereals scheduled to be purchased by the colonies. Bissell wondered if special efforts could not be made to have procurement authorizations requested for some of these cereal purchases. Wilson-Smith said that, in London, they had often looked at the possibilities of putting colonial purchases under ECA financing. Careful examination had invariably produced the same conclusion. The difficulties were next to insuperable. It would be a "last fling of desperation" if an attempt had to be made to get the colonial purchases over all the hurdles and make them eligible for ECA financing.²⁷

Bissell did not seem to be entirely convinced that the United Kingdom could not do more in this direction. The point, however, was left open.

(B) Canadian cheese and eggs. Definitely not eligible.

(C) Bacon. Eligible for the rest of this year. Provided that hog prices in the United States remain firm, it is estimated that about $10 million dollars of Canadian bacon will be eligible.²⁸

(D) Canadian pulp and paper. Amount which may be eligible—$10.6 millions. Bissell said that where purchases are being paid for by dollars it is essential for United States suppliers to have an opportunity to compete on fair and equal terms. He emphasized that this is a point on which the ECA would insist in principle, quite apart from whatever pressure might arise in industry or Congress. Bissell said that provided the opportunity for competitive bidding exists ECA will finance dollar purchases in Canada if they have a perfectly clear case that the ECA requirements of competitive bidding have been observed in the spirit as well as in the letter. To have the bids of United States firms thrown out if they did not have adequate time or full specifications would not be an acceptable instance of proper competition. ECA, he said, is prepared to recognize better prices, materially better delivery dates and better quality as reasons for giving business to firms outside the United States. ECA would not attempt to watch free dollar purchases outside the United States with the same meticulousness with which they watch ECA purchases. If, however, it became clear that a deliberate policy was being followed of using

The British Ministry of Food subsequently raised this estimate to $13.7m (Cdn) or $12.2m (US). Canadian officials became anxious when this purchase was described as "pork" rather than bacon, at a time when pork prices were low in the United States. That anxiety was justified when ECA officials (on advice from the Department of Agriculture) declared that pork and pork products were surplus in the United States in December 1949, so that any purchases with ECA funds would have to be from American supplies.

free dollars to exclude United States firms from the possibility of making bids, ECA would, of course, be concerned.

(E) Canadian timber—Eligibility uncertain. There was considerable discussion whether the $23.4 million dollars of Canadian timber would be eligible for ECA financing. (This $23.4 million consists of $6.2 million B.C. timber, $8.2 million Eastern Canada spruce, $5 million pit props, and $4 million specialties.) In the end, this was regarded as an item requiring “further explanation before a definite conclusion can be reached”. (As of Wednesday, September 14th no conclusion had been reached.)

(F) Vessel disbursements. The United Kingdom had asked that $30 million dollars of vessel disbursements be put on ECA account. At the meeting Bissell said that ECA was prepared to finance ships bunkers to the value of roughly $10 million dollars. However, further clearance in ECA on Friday night resulted in the full $30 million dollar figure being included as eligible. This sum, as well as the one for miscellaneous manufactures was described as an “estimate and subject to further refinement”.

(G) Petroleum equipment. The United Kingdom requested that $85 to $90 million dollars of petroleum equipment be financed by ECA. Bissell said that this was one question on which he had been unable to get Mr. Hoffman’s decision. He must, therefore reserve judgment. Present estimates are that they should be able to finance some $30 million dollars of petroleum equipment. This would include equipment for refineries in the United Kingdom itself as well as for maintenance of existing refineries in the United Kingdom and outside territories.

(H) Tobacco (United States). An additional $19.6 million would be eligible.

2. United Kingdom’s Allocation of ECA Aid. On several occasions, Bissell referred to $923 millions as a tentative allocation to the United Kingdom. He never implied that there is any prospect of this figure being exceeded.

3. United Kingdom’s carry-over of $150 million dollars from the first ECA year. Bissell and the other ECA officials seemed rather surprised at the magnitude of the United Kingdom carry-over of $150 million dollars on July 1st of this year. The United Kingdom said that the principal reason for the amount being so large was the number of items which had been declared ineligible for ECA financing during the second quarter of this year. It was expected that this pipeline would be decreased probably by one-half during this year. This would mean that from July 1st, 1949, to July 1st, 1950, the United Kingdom would have to find roughly $998 million (923 plus 75) of eligible items.

4. The items which were declared eligible during the two meetings amounted to some $280 million, which, plus the $30 million dollars of wheat the United Kingdom would take from the United States as a result of the Indian switch, meant that it was possible to see $995 million of ECA financing (685 plus 280 plus 30) for the United Kingdom during the fiscal year. It was pointed out this allowed the United Kingdom no leeway whatever. The United Kingdom’s problem of using up ECA dollars appears certain to remain a constant headache throughout this fiscal year.

The mimeographing of the report of the Eligibility Committee (COM/TOP D-3)† was not completed in the State Department until today. Copies will be forwarded in Thursday's bag. Ends.

Ottawa, June 20, 1949

CANADA-U.K. TRADE AND FINANCIAL RELATIONS

1. The Prime Minister, referring to the discussion of June 16th,† read a top secret and personal message which he had received from the U.K. Prime Minister on June 18th. In view of the urgent character of the message, it had been discussed with the Minister of Finance on June 19th and a reply had been sent that night to Mr. Attlee.

Mr. Attlee's message stated that, in the last six weeks, the dollar deficit of the sterling area had been increasing to an extent which was causing grave concern. U.K. reserves were falling rapidly and the seriousness of the situation would be revealed with the publication of figures at the beginning of July. These developments were attributed to the impact, directly and indirectly, of the trade recession in the United States. As an interim step, all new commitments for dollar expenditure had been stopped and the U.K. government proposed a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in London early in July. The comments of the Canadian government were sought on this proposal.

In the reply which had been sent it was explained to Mr. Attlee that no immediate indication of the views of the Canadian government could be given. In the absence of most members of the Cabinet, it was at present impossible to have the full consultation which was necessary. In the circumstances, it was urged that no announcements be made at present.

2. Mr. St. Laurent stated that, to explain the Canadian viewpoint, and to represent the views of the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance, the Secretary to the Cabinet was proceeding to London immediately. Mr. Robertson would, of course, make no commitments involving the Canadian government. He would, however, urge the undesirability of the U.K. government or Commonwealth governments taking any step which might have an adverse effect on U.S. public opinion, particularly in relation to current consideration by Congress of measures of European assistance.

3. Mr. St. Laurent also read a message which had been sent to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations in reply to his message of May 27th concerning relaxations on imports from soft currency areas.

The message explained that the Canadian government fully understood the U.K. desire to exempt from quantitative restrictions imports from O.E.E.C. countries with which the United Kingdom enjoyed a favourable balance of trade; similar treatment for dependent overseas territories could be accepted. Canada would, however, be seriously worried about extension of relaxations to all soft currency areas or even to other overseas members of the sterling area. It was urged that the United Kingdom endeavour to separate the two aspects of their proposals. In any event, it was hoped that any public announcement could be deferred until there had been an opportunity for full Cabinet consultation.

(Top Secret and Personal message for Mr. St. Laurent from Mr. Attlee, June 17 and reply, June 19, 1949; Telegram No. 33, External Affairs to Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, June 19, 1949).²⁹

4. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Prime Minister concerning the reply sent to the message from Mr. Attlee concerning possible Commonwealth consultation on trade and financial problems; and

(c) noted with approval the reply sent to the message from the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations concerning proposed relaxation of U.K. import restrictions and the Canadian attitude thereto and agreed that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be directed to acquaint U.S. authorities informally and confidentially of the nature of the Canadian reply.

PCO/Vol. 108

Note du secrétaire du Cabinet pour le Cabinet
Memorandum by Secretary to the Cabinet to Cabinet

UNITED KINGDOM ECONOMIC POSITION

1. On June 17 Mr. Attlee sent a message to the Prime Minister³⁰ stating that a serious situation had developed owing to a sharply increased drain on U.K. gold and dollar reserves. There was no indication that this situation would right itself of its own accord. The position would be revealed publicly when quarterly figures were published on July 5. The U.K. attributed the development to the effects of the trade recession in the U.S. To consider measures to meet the situation they felt there should be a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in London early in July. The date of July 13 has since been suggested. The proposal, but not the exact date, has now become public, apparently through leaks in London.

²⁹ Documents 618-620.

2. On June 19 the Prime Minister replied³¹ saying that, as consultation with the full Cabinet was not possible, he could not give immediate indication of the views of the Canadian government. He added that the Secretary to the Cabinet was leaving for London at once to explain considerations important from the Canadian point of view.

3. In London I saw Mr. Attlee, and the Ministers and officials in the departments directly concerned. I stressed our desire to have no publicity whatever concerning the proposed meeting until our Cabinet had considered the matter. I explained our doubts as to whether a Commonwealth meeting was appropriate, rather than a sterling area meeting or a meeting that would include the U.S. as well as ourselves, and stressed the undesirability of any action that might appear to be directed against the U.S. It would be undesirable to concentrate attention upon the U.S. recession without considering other factors in the problem. I also mentioned our regret that, because of our particularly difficult position, we had not been asked whether we could participate before the invitations to a Commonwealth meeting had been sent out.

4. I was told that the U.S. had been informed, both of the serious turn in the U.K. position and of the proposal to hold a Commonwealth meeting. Mr. Bevin has also sent a message to Washington urging that the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Snyder), who had been planning to go to Europe later in July, go over at once to discuss the situation. It has now been learned that Mr. Snyder proposes to leave Washington on June 30, and be in London before July 5.

5. In Mr. Bevin's message to Washington he added that he proposed to invite the Canadian Minister of Finance and his advisers to come to London at the same time as Mr. Snyder. This was mentioned in such a way that the suggestion could be dropped if the U.S. objected. The invitation has not, thus far, been forthcoming but there is no indication that this is because of any U.S. objection. Information from London on June 27 was that the U.K. expected to send a message to us "within the next day or so". Attendance at a three-way meeting along with the U.S. would remove a great deal of the possible danger in our attendance at a Commonwealth meeting. It would not, however, make our position at such a meeting, as a dollar country among sterling area countries, less difficult.

6. As to the British financial problem, information from the U.K. is that their gold and dollar reserves are declining at the rate of $600 million per year after allowing for ECA aid and drawings on the Canadian loan. By December 31 they are expected to reach $1.6 billions if the trend continues. The U.K. attribute the loss mainly to a reduction in dollar earnings, visible and invisible, which, they feel, is due mainly to a falling off in demand resulting from the decline in economic activity in the U.S.—aggravated by the effects of speculation about the devaluation of the pound.

Information from Washington is that the preliminary view of U.S. authorities is to emphasize the following factors in the U.K. position:

³¹ Voir/See: Document 619.

(a) Loss of marginal dollar exports due to high British prices and to declines in market prices for colonial raw materials.

(b) Loss of dollar earnings through sales of sterling area goods, which should be paid for in dollars, for cheap sterling acquired on free markets.

(c) Too heavy drawings by the "Rest of the Sterling Area" on the dollar pool.

7. The U.K. have not stated what remedies they propose. Sir Stafford Cripps indicated that he felt the basic approach should not be toward reduction of dollar imports alone. However, the U.S. have apparently been informed that the U.K. feel that their own dollar imports will have to be cut by $400 million per year, and those of the Rest of the Sterling Area by $200 million per year. The preliminary U.S. feeling is that, in addition to cuts in dollar imports, more stringent U.K. export controls and tighter limitations on drawings by the rest of the sterling area will be needed, but that, in the end, devaluation of sterling will have to be resorted to. Whatever solutions are arrived at cannot fail to concern Canada very directly.

8. Matters for decision at present are:

(a) The reply to be sent to the latest message (June 25) from the British Government asking whether Canada can attend a Commonwealth meeting on July 13, and, if so, whether the Minister of Finance will attend and who will accompany him.

Sir Stafford Cripps indicated in London a strong desire that Canada attend, partly as a moderating influence on countries that would tend to blame the U.S. for the situation.

(b) Whether the invitation should be accepted, if it is forthcoming, for the Minister of Finance to attend the meetings in London along with the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury.

If no such invitation is forthcoming, it is for consideration whether action should be taken to press for one, or to urge a separate Canada-U.K. meeting between the date of the U.S-U.K. meeting and the Commonwealth meeting.

U.K. ECONOMIC POSITION; PROPOSAL FOR COMMONWEALTH MEETING

3. The Prime Minister, referring to the discussion of June 20th, reported on information received concerning the U.K. economic position. The Secretary to the Cabinet had explained to U.K. authorities considerations relating to the proposal for a Commonwealth meeting which were important to Canada. The U.K. had since proposed that the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the U.S. Treasury visit London early in July to discuss the U.K. economic situation and it was expected that Mr. Snyder would be going over immediately. The U.K. had also suggested to U.S.

authorities that Canadian representatives might be asked to be in London at the same time, but no invitation had as yet been received. Any tri-partite discussions would probably be informal.

A message was being sent to the U.K. to suggest that, if tri-partite discussions were not arranged, it would be desirable to have a meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs immediately. The Deputy Minister of Finance, the Secretary to the Cabinet and Mr. Louis Rasminsky of the Bank of Canada were going to London, to be available for tri-partite discussions or to represent Canada at the meeting of the Continuing Committee, as the case might be.

With regard to the Commonwealth meeting, a message from Mr. Attlee of June 25th suggested that it open on July 13th. Word was sought as to whether the Minister of Finance would be able to attend. In view of speculation in the press, Mr. Attlee expected to announce, on June 30th, that a meeting of Finance Ministers had been proposed.

It might be desirable to get further information as to whether conversations with U.S. representatives or tri-partite discussions would take place prior to the Commonwealth meeting before sending any definite reply as to Canadian representation at the latter.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, June 28, 1949—Cabinet Document 980; letter, Acting U.K. High Commissioner to Prime Minister, June 25;† top secret message, U.K. government to Canadian government, June 28, 1949†).

4. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted the report of the Prime Minister concerning the U.K. economic position and agreed:

(a) that an immediate meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs be suggested if tri-partite discussions to include the United States could not be arranged; Canadian representation to be as indicated;

(b) that the reply to Mr. Attlee request further information as to conversations with the United States before sending definite word as to Canadian representation at the proposed meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers; and,

(c) that it would be desirable for the Minister of Finance to attend the Commonwealth meeting on behalf of Canada.

Washington, June 29, 1949

Following for Heeneey from Wrong, Begins: Proposed discussions in London.

1. Confirming our telephone conversation, Martin has told me apologetically that they have not yet decided on their itinerary and it is not even quite certain whether they will go to London. He remarked that the original purpose of the trip had been primarily to talk to their own Treasury people in European capitals and that it was now being blown up into something quite different. They may not leave Washington until next week and plan then to go to Paris. After talking to their own people there they might go on to London around July 8th or 9th. He will give us the itinerary when it is settled.

2. They are not prepared for a full-dress discussion in London and have not much to offer themselves. Martin does not like the British proposals with respect to Article 9 of the Loan Agreement, on the ground that they do not make much sense taken by themselves and that if they wish to have Article 9 waived they should invoke Article 12, decide whether the Agreement is obsolete and, of course, go to Congress on the issues. As we know, they will not go to Congress at this session. He added that he was prepared to construe broadly the exception in favour of war-damaged economies but was puzzled about the position of Belgium and Switzerland in this connection.

3. On Canadian participation Snyder's view was that he was always pleased to talk with Mr. Abbott, for whom he had a great liking and respect, and that a prior discussion between them would be welcome if it were possible. He suggested that if Mr. Abbott wanted something more definite he might speak to Snyder on the telephone.

4. In general he remarked that he was at a loss to figure out what ought to be done and agreed with my observation that there seemed to be a good deal of frustration in Washington, London and Ottawa on how to proceed.

5. I have also had a word with Labouisse in the State Department. He tells me that he expects Douglas will take part in the London talks if they come off, but had little more to add. The British here heard this morning by telephone and telegram from London on the question of Canadian participation in the talks and took the matter up with both State and Treasury Departments. In view of the uncertainty of Snyder's plans I doubt that a very definite answer can be given, but I think that we have enough to justify our going ahead as we are doing.

6. There is some possibility that Hoffman and Bissell may soon visit Europe on a schedule which would overlap with that of Snyder. The general situation is being discussed today in the National Advisory Council, and I hear that Acheson is himself representing the State Department. Thorp usually goes in his place. Ends.

SUGGESTED CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE TALKS WITH SECRETARY-OF-THE-TREASURY-SNYDER

Mr. Heenev telephoned at 3.35 this afternoon on this subject, and I took the call. Heenev was somewhat disturbed that no invitation had yet been received from the United Kingdom to participate in the proposed talks with Snyder. I told him that I had been talking with the Foreign Office within the preceding half hour, and had been informed that the invitation was being withheld pending confirmation from Washington that Snyder was agreeable to Canada's participation. I added that when I spoke with Gore-Booth in the Foreign Office he was in the process of sending off a telegram to Washington pressing for some indication of the United States reaction.

2. Heenev then explained the situation in Ottawa which made this a matter of great urgency. He began by saying that what he was going to say was subject to confirmation at a meeting within an hour and a half of the principal Cabinet Ministers concerned. The following is the situation in Ottawa as outlined by Heenev:

(a) If Canada is to participate in the proposed trilateral talks, it will be essential for Dr. Clark to attend. In order for Dr. Clark to attend it would be necessary for him to leave Ottawa within a matter of hours, since (in view of the condition of his back) he cannot travel by air but would have to catch the Queen leaving New York tonight or tomorrow morning.

(b) Accordingly, it has become necessary for Ottawa to make some final assumption within the next few hours concerning Canadian participation in the talks with Snyder. They must either assume that they will be invited and make immediate travel plans accordingly. Or, they must assume that they will not be invited. If they make the former assumption and it proves to be incorrect, there will obviously be great embarrassment. If they make the latter assumption, they will find themselves in the position of being unable to participate even if an invitation does come through eventually. Heenev, Robertson and the others are recommending to Cabinet that they should assume that they will be invited and proceed accordingly. They feel that they are justified in recommending this assumption on the grounds (i) that the United Kingdom are believed still to favour Canadian participation, and (ii) Hume Wrong has had some indications from Sir Oliver Franks in Washington that at least Acheson is in favour of Canada's taking part. According to Heenev, Hume Wrong had a talk with Franks just before the latter's departure from Washington when Franks told him that in a conversation with Acheson over dinner on Monday night he had asked Acheson for his views on Canadian participation. According to Franks' report to Hume Wrong, Acheson was very much in favour of Canada's joining the talks. Acheson was reported to have added that he felt sure Snyder felt the same way about it.

(c) Heeney asked me to see the Foreign Office and pass this information on to them and then to report any reactions or additional information.

(d) The intention is that Dr. Clark, Mr. Robertson, and someone from the Bank of Canada will sail on the Queen. The trip over would provide an opportunity for them to discuss the line which might be taken in the light of the preparatory talks in Ottawa. Mr. Abbott would fly over a few days in advance of the date for the meeting. Heeney indicated that no one from the Department would be included in the party from Ottawa since it was assumed that you would participate with the Ottawa group in the talks (and that I would assist you).

(e) No conclusion has yet been reached in Ottawa on the question of participation in the Commonwealth talks. It is assumed however, that if, in the light of any talks with the United States and of other factors, it is decided to take part in the Commonwealth talks, the party from Ottawa would remain for those talks.

3. I immediately saw Paul Gore-Booth (who is dealing with this matter in the absence of Makins and Berthoud) at the Foreign Office. The results of my conversation with Gore-Booth are reported in the attached telegram (No. 1344).†

4. I have now had a telephone call from Gore-Booth (5.35) saying that he had talked with Hoyer-Millar in Washington. According to Hoyer-Millar the matter had not been settled at the time Franks left Washington. Hoyer-Millar added that Hume Wrong has been after him pretty persistently for some word. Hoyer-Millar asked Gore-Booth whether he thought the time had now come when they had to ask the United States straight out whether they were in favour of Canadian participation. Gore-Booth replied that the question should be put immediately. As soon as Hoyer-Millar has some answer from the United States he will inform Hume Wrong in Washington and, upon its receipt here, Gore-Booth will let us know. Meanwhile Gore-Booth is getting on to Don Bliss at the United States Embassy to find out whether the Embassy can do something to hasten a favourable reply from the United States.

I have not cabled this to Heeney as I think it adds nothing substantial to what I have already reported.

On the arrangements for the Commonwealth talks, the following is the latest information which I have been able to secure from Garnett in the C.R.O.:(a) An official announcement is expected to be made tomorrow morning concerning the Commonwealth talks. According to Garnett, the text of the proposed announcement has been telegraphed to Ottawa and the Canadian authorities have replied that they have no objection to it.

(b) It is proposed to hold a meeting of High Commissioners within the next few days to discuss arrangements for the accommodation of delegations and plans for the meeting.

(c) The Secretary of State will probably be sending a communication tomorrow on the progress so far in arranging the talks and on related matters.

Ottawa, June 29, 1949

The situation concerning our invitation to the proposed tripartite talks in London is very confused. The United Kingdom have not sent the invitation yet because they have not yet received U.S. reactions to the proposal that we be included. I have, however, told Canada House this morning that we are proceeding on the assumption that we will participate in a three cornered meeting before the Commonwealth meeting. (The assumption being based on Frank's report of Acheson's immediately favourable reaction). Robertson suggests that in any event there is a strong case for U.K.-Canada conversations before the Commonwealth meeting takes place. Such discussions could conveniently take place as a meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade. All of the proposed participants come from departments represented on the Committee and are directly interested. A meeting now would make it unnecessary to have the meeting proposed for later in the year and would provide an ideal forum for discussion of the present critical situation.

We have accommodation on a "Queen" from New York tomorrow for Clark, Robertson and (I hope) Rasminsky, whom the Bank have nominated.

If the suggestion for a meeting of the U.K.-Canada Trade Committee meets your approval, you may wish to propose it at this morning's meeting of Ministers so that a message could be sent at once to London putting the proposal to them.³²

If the Committee is to meet it might be that Trade and Commerce and Agricultural representatives should also attend.

Note du secrétaire du Cabinet pour le Cabinet
Memorandum by Secretary to the Cabinet to Cabinet

UNITED KINGDOM ECONOMIC POSITION; DEVELOPMENTS SINCE THE LAST MEETING OF CABINET

1. After the last meeting of Cabinet on June 29 word was received that the U.S. had accepted the invitation to discussions in London and were agreeable to having Canada included. The same day the Chancellor of the Exchequer invited the Canadian Government to send a minister to be present at talks between the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury and the U.K. authorities in advance of the Commonwealth meeting. The next day the Prime Minister sent a message to Mr. Attlee stating that Mr. Abbott would attend the Commonwealth meeting, and would be available for earlier talks with Mr. Snyder.

2. The same day, June 30, the Prime Minister announced:

(a) That Canada had been invited to the Commonwealth meeting and that Mr. Abbott would attend;

(b) That the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Secretary to the Cabinet had left for London;

(c) That preliminary informal talks would be held with the U.K. and U.S. authorities prior to the Commonwealth meeting; and

(d) That Mr. Abbott expected to have discussions with Mr. Snyder on "problems of mutual concern".

3. Mr. Snyder and Mr. Martin (Assistant Secretary to the U.S. Treasury) are now in Paris. It is thought that they will be in London about July 7 or 8 but Mr. Snyder has so far not made any definite arrangement. It is not entirely clear whether actual three-way discussions will take place, or whether there will simply be informal bilateral discussions between Mr. Snyder and U.K. representatives, Mr. Snyder and Mr. Abbott, and U.K. representatives and Mr. Abbott. It is thought that the U.S. indefiniteness arises mainly from uncertainty as to what the scope of the talks with the U.K. should be. It is understood that the U.S. are willing to examine any proposals the U.K. may make, but will not have any proposals to make of their own.

4. We have had no indication that the U.K. government have yet determined the line to be followed by their representatives in the talks with Mr. Snyder and Mr. Abbott or with the Commonwealth group. A press report this morning states, however, that the U.K. Cabinet yesterday approved "a drastic new plan" to save dollars.

5. Mr. Abbott left last night (July 5) for London and the attached statement† has been prepared for release to the press at 10:00 p.m. this evening.

As the U.K. members of the Continuing Committee will all be involved in the discussions with the U.S. and in the Commonwealth discussions, it is probable that there will be no opportunity for a formal meeting of the Committee. However, we have stressed the value of maintaining contacts between the members of the Committee, and using this occasion for informal discussions.

Relaxation of U.K. and O.E.E.C. Import Controls

It is reported in the press to-day that the O.E.E.C. countries yesterday (July 5) announced that they had agreed to "forthwith take the necessary steps for the progressive elimination of quantitative import restrictions between one another, in order to achieve as complete a liberalization of intra-European trade as possible by 1951".

Information just received from London (telegram 1373, attached)† is that Mr. [Harold] Wilson, President of the Board of Trade, will announce in Parliament tomorrow that the O.E.E.C. agreement is on the basis of the proposals submitted by the U.K. With regard to extension of the U.K. relaxations beyond O.E.E.C. countries, Mr. Wilson will add:

"While in present circumstances we clearly cannot contemplate the extension of our relaxations to countries with which our balance of payments would thereby involve us in gold or dollar payments, we should clearly need to apply these relaxations, wherever this could be done without creating new balance of payments difficulties to other Commonwealth countries in the sterling area, as also to foreign countries outside the O.E.E.C. with whom our commercial arrangements render this possible. This raises certain questions in respect of our international obligation".

The only indication we have had as to the U.S. position on extension of relaxations to non-O.E.E.C. soft currency countries is a confidential report from our Ambassador in Washington that the U.S. view is the same as our own, and that they would be most reluctant to approach Congress for the waiver of Article 9 of their loan agreement with the U.K.

Following from Wilgress, Begins: Reference my telegram No. 1356 of June 30th.†

1. I saw Mr. Douglas, the United States Ambassador, this morning, and he told me that he was leaving London for Paris by the night train on July 4th to meet Mr. Snyder, who is due in Paris on Monday. He expected that Snyder would be arriving in London on July 7th.

2. Douglas expressed gratification that satisfactory arrangements had been made for Canadian participation in the talks with the United Kingdom. He himself had urged this on Washington before he saw Mr. Norman Robertson. He considered that we had a key role to play, particularly as we could say things to the United Kingdom that the United States could not say.

3. Douglas did not look for anything specific to come out of these talks. He had strongly advised his Government not to make any specific proposals. In particular he had urged them to refrain from any suggestion such as devaluation or non-monetary measures such as abolition of the five-day week. He felt this was imperative because he was confident there would be an election in the United Kingdom before the end of the year, and the United States must at all costs be kept out of the domestic political scene. He believed there might be two elections, the second of which would be fought on the basis of the formation of a coalition Government, because he felt that only a coalition Government could bring the United Kingdom out of its present troubles.

4. Therefore, in his view, the coming talks will provide an opportunity for a full exchange of information and appreciation by all parties of the difficulties confronting the United Kingdom, but no specific measures will be forthcoming apart from short-run palliatives to relieve the immediate situation. He was urging on his people to make no suggestions themselves, and felt that any suggestions should come from the United Kingdom side. This did not, however, preclude the United States from putting forward some proposals for temporary easing of the situation until the more fundamental difficulties could be tackled by the United Kingdom itself.

5. Mr. Douglas repeated several times that while the United States could not suggest measures which the United Kingdom could take, Canada was in a different position and could do so. He believed we could play a useful role by, from time to time, making the United Kingdom realize that the remedies for the situation were in their own hands. Ends.

FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM, JULY, 1949

Informal Notes on Talks between United Kingdom and Canadian officials at dinner, Thursday, July 7, 1949

The following were present at the dinner arranged by Mr. Robertson at the Dorchester Hotel (listed in clockwise order around the table):

N.A. Robertson	Secretary to Canadian Cabinet
Sir Oliver Franks,	U.K. Ambassador, Washington
Dr. W.C. Clark,	Deputy Minister of Finance

T.L. Rowan,	U.K. Treasury (Overseas Negotiations)
L. Rasminsky,	Chairman (Alternate) of F.E.C.B.
Sir Alexander Clutterbuck,	U.K. High Commissioner, Ottawa
Sir Norman Brook,	Secretary to U.K. Cabinet
L.D. Wilgress,	Canadian High Commissioner, London
Sir Percivale Liesching,	Commonwealth Relations Office
A.E. Ritchie,	Canada House
Sir Edwin Plowden,	U.K. Central Economic Planning Staff
M.W. Mackenzie,	Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
Roger Makins,	Foreign Office (Economic)
Sir Henry Wilson Smith,	U.K. Treasury (External Finance)

The notes below are quite informal recollections which were recorded on the Sunday afternoon following the dinner, for whatever value they might have as an aide memoire to the other Canadians who were present.

In the "pre-prandial" conversation Makins remarked that Bevin had been much upset by the transmittal to Congress and publication the previous day of the observations by the National Advisory Council on the "reevaluation of some currencies". Bevin seemed to regard this action as further evidence of a lack of responsibility and consistency in the U.S. Administration. However, according to Makins, the press conference by Acheson had given some comfort to Bevin by playing down this routine report of the N.A.C. and by giving prominence to Cripps' diagnosis of the U.K. position.

The talk after dinner might be grouped somewhat arbitrarily under the following headings:

- I General approach to the tripartite talks.
- II Limitations of participants in the tripartite talks.
Questioning of distinction between "internal" and "external" aspects
- III of the problem.
- IV Relevance of U.S. "recession".
- V Trend of Canadian imports.
- VI Points which Canadians might consider making to U.S.
- VII Commonwealth talks.

I. General Approach to the Tripartite Talks

After dinner Mr. Robertson suggested that it might be useful to have an informal discussion on the forthcoming talks (particularly those with Mr. Snyder), the thinking so far on the problem, the attitudes which might be expected, and the results which might be aimed at. He thought it would be agreed around the table that it was essential, for political as well as economic reasons, to carry the U.S. and Canada along in any course which might be followed in the present situation. Officials and Ministers in Ottawa had been disturbed at the emphasis in the original message from Mr. Attlee (and later in some sections of the U.K. press) on the U.S. recession as the cause of the difficulties. Apart from his doubts on the validity of this diagnosis, he was concerned at the consequences which the adoption of this approach to the problem would have on cooperation with the United States. He had been encouraged to hear from Sir Oliver Franks of the understanding attitude which he had found in Acheson and Hoffman.

Franks reported that in their conversation with him both Acheson and Hoffman recognized that the Sterling Area would probably need to take emergency action which would be unpalatable to the United States. Apparently, however, they would be prepared to defend such action if it was clearly of a temporary character and was accompanied by more fundamental corrective measures. Franks reported (with confirmation from Wilson Smith) that Cripps was not proposing to begin the talks by attempting to attribute blame or to invite controversy on the relative merits of different types of economic systems. It was Cripps' intention to have the talks commence with a technical examination of the present situation and of its causes. Only after that, according to Cripps' plan, would there be discussion on remedial measures. If the discussion on remedies could be preceded by an examination of detailed causes, it was thought that the temptation to talk of remedies in terms of the usual shibboleths (e.g. "devaluation", the "welfare state", "bilateralism", the "instability of capitalism", etc) might be reduced.

Franks then outlined the objectives of the tripartite talks as he saw them. These objectives might be summarized (somewhat more badly than stated by Franks) in the following terms:

(a) To satisfy the U.S. and Canada that the repugnant measures which the Sterling Area was likely to adopt (and some of the practices already being employed) were matters of "necessity" and not of "policy". For that purpose really to be achieved something might have to be expected from the U.S. and Canada (presumably in the fields of international commercial policy and of domestic economic policy) which would warrant the continuation, or renewal, by the United Kingdom of the pursuit of freer trade with the dollar area, but the U.K. also might reasonably be expected to give some indication that the policies of the sterling area would tend in the same direction. In that connection the U.K. should be prepared to examine in the talks the trend which might be expected in bilateral trading practices, costs and prices, etc., and to demonstrate (as Franks, Wilson Smith and others were vigorous in asserting) that these trends were not likely (and not intended) to build up a bloc separated from the dollar area. But Franks was emphatic in stating that no useful purpose would be served by suggesting that the U.K. might depart from the policy of "full employment." (In conversation on the side Plowden remarked that in his view the present condition in the U.K. represented "over-full employment.") Franks declared that this objective of U.K. policy was no party political matter. "Full Employment" was a "national" objective. (This view appeared to be corroborated by Sir Norman Brook).

(b) To arrange for renewal of talks after an interval. Franks did not seem to think it necessary to press for such talks on Snyder's way back (on his present itinerary) from Europe. He seemed to feel that it might not be undesirable from the U.K. point of view to have a considerably longer interval (possibly of several months). He remarked that on the U.K. side as well as on the U.S. side there was need for some political and economic education which might take time—and which might be accelerated by harsh experience in the meantime (although such experience, presumably, might equally well be expected to retard or distort the process of education on both sides).

(c) To secure some agreed public statement at the end of the talks which would record the appreciation which each party had of the others' positions, affirm their agreement on general long-term objectives, and announce their intention to renew discussions at a later stage (indicating a definite time if possible). Franks felt that such a statement would be helpful in maintaining or restoring confidence and in restraining extremists on all sides. It was implied that it might have a good effect on some participants in the forthcoming Commonwealth discussions which begin next Wednesday, and on the debate in the House of Commons which is scheduled for Thursday, as well as in discouraging speculation about devaluation. Franks stressed however, that in his view such a statement should be sought only if in fact sufficient basic understanding had been achieved or was in prospect, to justify it.

II. Limitations of Participants in the Tripartite Talks

It was noted that:

(a) Snyder planned to be in London for only two or three days.

(b) He had made it clear that he would not be in a position to take decisions but wished merely to discuss the situation generally;

(c) After London he would be going on a fairly extensive tour before returning to Washington;

(d) He was being accompanied in London by Martin, [G.M.] Willis and [C. Dillon] Glendinning from the Treasury in Washington, Harriman from Paris, and Ambassador Douglas.

(e) None of these was likely to remain behind (except, of course, Ambassador Douglas) to continue discussions.

(f) The party was unlikely to call at London on the return journey.

There was some discussion (for part of which Makins absented himself) on the quality of the U.S. party, and on the officials in Washington who would be available to give consideration to any reporting from the group in London. Mr. Wilgress suggested that Ambassador Douglas appeared to be the one most likely to be reporting fully to Washington. It was not known to what extent Snyder or his party would be reporting to the Treasury or to the President pending their return to Washington. Franks indicated that Acheson would probably personally follow developments in the discussions insofar as they are reported to Washington (it was noted that Willar Thorp would be absent from Washington in Geneva during the talks and for some time thereafter). Makins remarked that Harriman would probably regard himself in these talks as the "trustee" for O.E.E.C.

Franks noted (with confirmation from Wilson Smith and Rowan) that on the U.K. side an important factor might be the fact that Cripps is a very tired man. His tiredness had been aggravated by an attack of dysentery while in Paris from which he had not yet recovered.

III. Questioning of Distinction between "internal" and "external" Aspects of the Problem

Mr. Rasminsky questioned whether the distinction between "internal" and "external" matters which appeared to be implied in some of the remarks during the evening could be maintained and whether all "internal" matters must be regarded as of no concern to other countries. If a country is consuming more than it is producing as indicated by the persistence of its balance of payments deficit it may be open to another country which is affected by that deficit to say that more has to be produced and exported or consumption has to be reduced. It might be quite improper to say which particular technique the country should adopt to live within its means (e.g. whether devaluation, direct reduction of imports, or internal deflation; any of which might secure the reduction) but it would seem to be legitimate in those circumstances to say that something should be done. Liesching appeared to regard this reasoning as representing advocacy of an otherwise avoidable cut in U.K. living standards (rather than as merely a statement of fact) and reacted rather warmly. Franks on the other hand appeared to regard Rasminsky's statement as reasonable.

IV. Relevance of U.S. "recession"

There was some discussion on the disappearance of the "colonial" surplus and on the extent to which it might be due to the "recession" or to other more directly controllable factors such as the suspension or reduction of U.S. Government stockpiling (in the case of most stockpiled materials, because of delay in the appropriation of funds for the undertaking of such purchases by the Bureau of Federal Supply—which has now been put in funds—and in the case of tin, because of the deliberate cessation of purchases by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—which has now resumed purchasing). It appeared that substantially less than 50% of the deterioration in Rest of Sterling Area earnings was due to difficulties in stockpiling.

There was little discussion on factors other than the "recession" which might have contributed to the decline in earnings from U.K. "manufactures", although there was some suggestion that the position might improve as inventories became more depleted and had to be replenished to some extent. In a casual conversation on the side Plowden indicated that he took a "serious" view of the probable course of the U.S. recession. He thought that unemployment would exceed 6,000,000 (presumably meaning fully unemployed since if partially unemployed are included in proportion to the degree of their unemployment the total is said to be near that figure already) and that recovery would not progress far before next spring at the earliest.

V. Trend of Canadian Imports

It was noted that Canadian imports from the U.K. were keeping up, at least so far.

There was some discussion of the possibility of increasing Canadian imports from the U.K. and Sterling Area, particularly of rubber. Mr. Mackenzie explained that in the case of rubber, Canadian synthetic production was not subsidized; nor was its consumption now encouraged by excessive tariffs or by any mixing regulations. The synthetic product was now making its way in free competition in Canada.

VI. Points Which Canadians Might Consider Making to U.S.

At Dr. Clark's suggestion there was some discussion on the subjects which the Canadian group might discuss with the U.S., either because they might be in a better position than the U.K. to raise some of them, or because they might have an interest in supporting the position of the U.K. on others. The following topics were mentioned in the course of the discussion:

(a) The possibility of an increased (or restored) E.C.A. appropriation. The U.K. officials were not hopeful that in the present economy mood of Congress anything could be done to influence the E.C.A. appropriation. They were hopeful however, that of the moneys which might be appropriated the U.K. would be able to claim a larger share in view of the deterioration in the U.K. dollar position in relation to other claimants. Earlier in the week Wilson Smith had mentioned some theoretical calculations which had been made of the effect which a decline of 20% in dollar export earnings and of 5% in dollar import costs would have on the dollar balance of payments of various O.E.E.C. countries. According to those calculations the net position of most O.E.E.C. countries would be virtually unaffected because their exports to dollar markets are still such a relatively small part of their dollar balance, whereas the net position of the U.K. would deteriorate by some $300 million in a year. In any case the U.K. has already applied to O.E.E.C. for an amount in excess of the $940 million originally requested.

(b) The possible resumption of E.C.A. financing of Canadian wheat. The U.K. officials were anxious that the financing of these wheat purchases be taken over by E.C.A. as soon as possible and suggested that Canada might press the U.S. on this point. The Canadian officials did not comment on the feasibility or desirability of this course.

(c) The delaying of devaluation rumours. The U.K. officials hoped that the Canadians would lend support to U.K. appeals to the U.S. to desist from devaluation talk.

(d) The possibility of a liberalization of the Fund's attitude. The U.K. officials thought Canadian support would be helpful in securing favourable reconsideration of India's application to exercise further drawing rights. Mr. Rasminsky expressed his agreement with criticisms of the restrictive character of the "southard Criteria", but regretted that India should be the test case. Wilson Smith was emphatic in declaring that the U.K. did not intend to use the Fund's resources itself even if the present embargo against E.R.P. recipients were to be withdrawn.

(e) U.S. budget policies. It was noted that although the earlier pressure to maintain or increase taxes had subsided, the U.S. Congress, and even the Administration, seemed to be now in favour of reducing expenditures—with similar deflationary potentialities. Dr. Clark thought something might be said on this subject to the U.S. in the light of Canadian policies.

(f) Resumption or acceleration of stockpiling. The U.K. would be taking up this point with the U.S. and would welcome Canadian support.

(g) More extensive use of U.K. shipping services. Mr. Robertson suggested that shipping was at least one field in which the U.K. might be regarded as able to offer competitive prices even in present circumstances. It might be worth finding out whether obstacles to the more extensive use of U.K. shipping could be removed.

(h) Possible change in the price of gold. This subject was mentioned but it did not seem that it could be discussed profitably in the tripartite talks.

(i) Liberalization of U.K. Tariffs and Customs Administration. It was considered that, although this subject might relate primarily to the longer term, it was a matter on which Canada and the U.K. had an interest in securing some action by the United States.

VII. Commonwealth Talks

The possible influence of the results of the tripartite talks on the atmosphere of the Commonwealth talks has been mentioned above (section I).

With reference to the Commonwealth talks, Liesching emphasized the difficulties expected by the U.K. in resisting the claims of India and Pakistan for larger dollar rations than could be afforded or for what might appear to be excessive releases from sterling balances (and corresponding unrequited U.K. exports). He felt there was considerable weight in their claims based on the contrast between conditions in those countries and in other countries of the Commonwealth and on the need for such imports to prevent serious political unrest. He hoped the Canadian group would have these considerations in mind during the Commonwealth talks. Mr. Robertson remarked that the economic discussions at the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers last autumn had given some indication of the real difficulties involved in dealing with the positions of India and Pakistan.

Note du secrétaire du Cabinet pour le Cabinet

[Ottawa], July 13, 1949

UNITED KINGDOM ECONOMIC POSITION; TRIPARTITE DISCUSSIONS IN LONDON

1. Discussions between Messrs. Cripps, Abbott, and Snyder concluded on July 9. The press release stated they had agreed:

(a) That the objectives of all three governments remained as set forth in the International Monetary Fund and the International Trade Organization; and that the aim must be "the achievement of a pattern of world trade in which the dollar and non-dollar countries can operate together within one single multilateral system".

(b) That present difficulties were the result of "deep-seated maladjustments" and could not be remedied "merely by loans or gifts".

(c) That "technical and fact finding discussions" among the three governments be held in Washington in September.

The release added that "no suggestion was made that sterling should be devalued".

2. Mr. Abbott has reported that in the discussions a "tentative outline" was given of a "programme for sharply reduced imports which are calculated to save about $400 million in 1949-50". A substantial part of the cuts relate to Canadian exports, "particularly base metals, wood products and foodstuffs."

3. The U.K. have indicated that they wish to discuss with Mr. Abbott measures they think Canada might take to ease the short term position of the U.K. They have suggested the following topics:

1. The most active encouragement of United Kingdom and sterling area imports.
2. Greater use of the Canadian credit.
3. Canadian stockpiling of certain strategic raw materials.
4. Direct Canadian Government encouragement for capital goods purchases from the United Kingdom.
5. Active cooperation in avoiding any liability on us to repay Newfoundland's interest free loan of approximately $8 million.
6. Easement of the arrangements for repayment of the 1942 interest free loan.
7. Some scheme designed to provide Canadian finance for the heavy drain of emigrant remittances to Canada.
8. An immediate decision (corresponding to that requested from the Americans on Section 9 of the Loan Agreement) so as to allow the United Kingdom to go forward, among other things, with the expansion of inter-European trade on the lines of that agreed in O.E.E.C.

With regard to topic No. 8, our reply to the original U.K. proposal (sent on June 19) said Canada could accept the relaxation of import restrictions on a discriminatory basis in favour of O.E.E.C. countries, but would be worried over extension of the discriminatory treatment to all soft currency countries with the exclusion of hard currency countries. Apparently the U.K. want us to agree to accept such further extension. Our information is that the U.S. position has thus far been the same as our own.

4. At a luncheon yesterday the U.S. Ambassador in London (Mr. Douglas) informed Mr. Abbott that he had urged the U.S. government to remove the duty on aluminum to offset "the effect on the Canadian economy of further reductions in U.K. imports from Canada". Mr. Douglas said he would have liked to have suggested the same for lumber, but realized that "as this was not politically possible, it might prejudice consideration of the suggestion regarding aluminum".

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, July 22, 1949

Dear John [Deutsch]:

I am enclosing one copy of a study prepared by the ECA on the U.K.'s exports to the United States.† This study, which is called, "A Preliminary Analysis of Pre-war and Post-war Volume of US Imports from the United Kingdom Alone as Related to Prices and Unit Values", was given to me by Bob Strange yesterday afternoon, with the request that it be forwarded to you. He also gave me a second copy, to forward to Bob Beattie.

This study, on which the ECA officials have been working for some time, was rushed to completion so that it would be available before Hoffman and Bissell left for Europe. (As it turned out, the antics of the Senate Appropriations Committee have so far made it impossible for Hoffman to leave Washington.) I am sorry that more than two copies of this study are not available for forwarding to Ottawa. In any event, if you think it worthwhile, this document, or at least sections of it, could be reprinted in Ottawa.

When Strange gave me the copies of the ECA study he asked if I knew how the study which is being made in Ottawa is coming along. I told him that I had no idea what the position is, but that he might enquire at Glendinning's office in the Treasury to see if they had received anything from you, since I understood that this particular question was being handled directly between the Department of Finance and the U.S. Treasury. If there is anything that I can tell Strange on this question, or any studies that I can pass on to him, I should be glad if you would let me know.

Phil Brown of the Fiscal and Trade Policy Division of ECA, whom you know, is busily preparing studies on various Sterling Area questions, including estimates on the decline in the U.K.'s standard of living which would result from a devaluation of 25 per cent. It is quite probable that we will be given copies of these studies as soon as they are finished in rough form some time next week.

The acceptance by us of confidential ECA price studies and devaluation studies, etc., raises some questions which I think it would be desirable to have cleared up as soon as possible. I think it is true that all the key ECA officials from Hoffman down regard our interests as being almost identical to those of the United States, in the finding of a short-term and long-run solution to the sterling-dollar problem. Hoffman mentioned this to Mr. Wrong yesterday. (See WA-1970 of July 21st.†) McCollough, head of the Fiscal and Trade Policy Division, and Strange, who is now a consultant to ECA and will spend a good deal of time in Washington until the September talks, and Jim Nelson, head of the U.K. Desk at ECA, have all recently mentioned their desire to "collaborate" with us in the preparation of factual material for the September talks. I think that we shall very shortly be receiving a more or less formal request from ECA for collaboration in the preparation of material for the September talks. ECA officials are frank to admit that they do not have the people to carry out, in the few weeks which remain, all the detailed studies which are required. For example, ECA officials would much prefer to have Canadian officials prepare the basic factual material on U.K. and Sterling Area trade problems with Canada, rather than attempt to do the studies in Washington, on the basis of material appearing in printed statistical form. No doubt consideration is now being given in Ottawa to the question of the manner and extent to which we should collaborate with the United States authorities between now and September. I thought, however, that you might wish to know in advance of the request which will in all probability be forthcoming from ECA.

I am sending copies of this letter to Wynne Plumptre and to Bob Beattie.

Yours sincerely,

J. R. MURRAY

Tripartite economic talks in Washington.

1. Christelow, Acting Head of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation, left with me, this afternoon, a copy of a telegram from London, giving the agenda proposed by the United Kingdom for the September talks. (In the event that it may not have reached you as yet, I am quoting the text on the United Kingdom telegram at the end of this message.)

2. Before coming to see me, Christelow had left a copy of the telegram with Martin at the Treasury. Christelow showed no reluctance in disclosing his own regard for the agenda, which he said, appeared to him to be much more suited for a seminar in a graduate school of economics than for the September meetings at which such important decisions would have to be taken urgently. He said that Martin was very unfavourably impressed by the agenda, which he regarded as much too academic in nature.

3. The following is the text of the United Kingdom telegram, Begins:

We should like you to approach the United States and Canadian authorities though Martin and Clark respectively as soon as they have returned with the following suggestions on the agenda for the talks at the official level. We are ready and indeed anxious to discuss fundamental questions on a broad basis but it is from our point of view essential that the talks move in such a way as to focus the subsequent Ministerial discussions on the main issues involved, and not dissipate the limited time available.

2. We suggest that the discussions between officials should start from a general survey of the pre-war and post-war situation with special reference to the working of the multilateral system before the war, and the reasons why it has not yet been restored. We, for our part, should relate this to a comparative survey of the balance of payments position of the United Kingdom and the sterling area both pre-war and post-war with, of course, a special analysis of what is happening at present.

3. We consider that certain broad heads ought also to be tabled under which the discussion on the general situation can lend to effective examination of present and future prospects. We suggest the following heads:

(1) The competitive position of United Kingdom manufacturing industry.

(2) Price differentials of dollar and sterling primary products.

(3) Internal financial position of the United Kingdom, United States and Canada in relation to inflation and claims on productive resources for investment and consumption.

(4) Study of the economic policies of the United States and Canada in their broad international context in particular in relation to import policy and overseas lending.

(5) Position of under-developed countries, particularly in the sterling area.

4. We would treat these as wide headings bringing out the fundamental issues of policy involved and covering also immediate and specific questions. Under head (1) we would consider the cost structure within the United Kingdom of certain finished products and examine the competitiveness of products of British industry in overseas markets especially Canada. Under (2) we would on our side cover important commodities like rubber, tin and cocoa and the general question of world commodity agreements for selected primary products. Under (3) we would concentrate on our own position. Under (5) we would examine the possibilities of agricultural and industrial development in order to increase levels of production and consumption. Clark suggested that we should investigate the external economic policies of the United Kingdom especially in its relations with other members of the sterling area, and we should cover this in our general appreciation.

5. Subject to any additions or amendments which United States or Canada might wish to also make we would suggest that officials in all three countries should be studying these questions and should come to the meetings briefed to deal with them. We have set on foot the necessary studies and Clark indicated that the Canadians would also do so. We should be glad to learn whether these suggestions commend themselves. Ends.

Tripartite talks in Washington. Your WA-1992 of July 25 and WA-1997† of July 26.

1. We have now received though Earncliffe the United Kingdom proposed Agenda which you had already communicated to us in paragraph 3 of your WA-1992. We expect to have some comments and suggestions to make when Robertson and Clark have come back and we have had time to go over the ground with them. Please inform the United States and the United Kingdom authorities of our position.

2. (a) In paragraph 7 of your WA-1997 you raise the suggestion of cooperation between Canada and the United States in preparation for the tripartite talks. You also raise the question whether Strange should visit Ottawa.

(b) Naturally we welcome the suggestion of cooperation as you know, we have thought of sending Plumpton to Washington in advance of the meeting.

(c) However, we doubt whether in the time available and with the staff available useful cooperation is really practicable. There is a great deal of material to be put together in a short time and we must put it together in the way that suits our immediate needs. Almost all our own material will have to be focused on Canadian problems. We think, therefore, that the best results will be achieved if both we and the United States work up our own material independently.

3. Anything which might have the appearance of joint preparations between Canada and the United States might well give the United Kingdom the impression that we were contemplating a joint case at the meetings. This would clearly be undesirable from every point of view.

4. As our preparations go forward in Ottawa we may feel that there are gaps which we would like to fill from the United States; conversely they may want special information from us. We shall be glad to supply whatever we can although we must emphasize that our resources of time and men are very limited indeed. If at a later date Strange would like to visit Ottawa to obtain such information he will be very welcome. Conversely we may feel the need to send someone to Washington.

Tri-partite economic discussions.

1. This message will supplement my WA-1997 of July 26th† concerning the preparations here for the economic talks. It is based on further discussions with Glendinning of the Treasury and Strange of the E.C.A.

2. As to the agenda, a United States proposal prepared through consultation between Treasury, State and E.C.A. will receive final approval very shortly. We gather that this is very different from the broad and brief agenda proposed by the British. We have been promised a copy when it has been endorsed by the National Advisory Council.

3. It has been agreed that at the official talks Treasury, State and E.C.A. would be the three agencies represented and that the representatives would be Martin, Thorp and Bissell. I hope that this decision sticks, since this is a good team.

4. On arrangements for liaison with Canada, Strange expressed the hope that Plumtre could visit Washington next week. In his consultations here it was suggested that he should not himself visit Ottawa for perhaps a fortnight. Glendinning enquired whether our representatives at the official talks would consider coming to Washington a day or two in advance of their opening. I must, however, enter a mild warning on the question of collaboration with Canada in preparing for the meetings. We have gathered that some of the officials concerned have a feeling that it is unprofitable to furnish us with classified information unless they receive more in exchange than we have been able to give them in recent months. This feeling may have influenced the decision that Strange should not visit Ottawa as soon as he had intended. I think that they will be willing here to disclose to us in advance their position on most of the points on the agenda and to provide us with classified data in support, provided that we are ready to reciprocate fully.

5. We have received no guidance from Ottawa on the sort of liaison which it is desired to maintain during preparation for these talks, and I appreciate the difficulties arising from the absence of Ministers and important officials. I mention the matter now, however, since it is likely that our representatives will enter the talks without clear knowledge of the position of the United States unless we collaborate fairly fully during the next four weeks. I understand, however, the delicacy of this problem and the importance of avoiding any appearance that Canada is "ganging up" with the United States.

6. The State Department has not yet formally accepted the British proposal for the dates of the official and Ministerial talks, but arrangements are proceeding here on the assumption that these dates will be met. The Ministerial talks, however, are unlikely to begin before Tuesday, September 6th, since the 5th is Labour Day and both Bevin and Cripps would appreciate a quiet weekend after their arrival, which is planned for the 3rd.

7. I have classified this message as secret although most previous messages have been marked top secret. We shall continue to use this classification unless you notify me to the contrary.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Preparations for Washington financial talks.

1. I told you on the telephone on Saturday that the suggestion from your end that Strange should visit Ottawa as soon as possible had changed when discussed with Treasury officials here into the suggestion that representatives of Treasury and State as well as E.C.A. should make the trip. This idea was welcomed by those in the three agencies with whom it was discussed. It was subject to final Treasury approval since the Treasury is in general charge of the preparations.

2. I spoke about it to Martin this morning, and he has just told me that he has discussed it with Snyder. Snyder is bothered about inter-departmental complications here. They are trying to keep the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture fully in the picture whenever their interests are concerned, and Martin says they have made a good beginning. He thinks, however, it would be very difficult to send a group including representatives of these Departments to Ottawa and that if the Departments were unrepresented it might prejudice their co-operation in other connections. He says that Snyder has not closed his mind to the suggestion but would prefer to have some people come here from Ottawa instead. I told Martin that I would get in touch with Ottawa and communicate with him again, probably tomorrow.

3. I think that this complication, in view of its source, makes it unwise for us to press for an Ottawa visit now by a group from Washington. It also makes it difficult to revert to the original idea that Strange alone should go. If the alternative of an early visit to Washington by some of our people is feasible, the party should include a representative of the Department of Finance (or possibly the Bank of Canada) as this would be desired by the Treasury here. You will infer correctly that the inter-departmental relationships in Washington are delicate. Ends.

Tripartite economic talks. My WA-2040 of July 30† and WA-2028 of July 29th†—United States agenda proposals.

1. We have now received mimeographed copies from the United States Treasury of their revised agenda proposals. This mimeographed version contains four amendments, in addition to those reported in my WA-2040. Rather than attempting to amend the copies of the agenda which you now have, I am quoting below the full text of the agenda received from the Treasury. Text begins:

United States Proposals on Agenda for Discussions with British and Canadians

We are inclined to believe that the topics for discussion at the forthcoming joint meeting at the official level should be more specific than those indicated in the tentative draft submitted from London. Our view is that the discussion of the British economic situation should cover the approach which Britain, in particular, and all of the OEEC countries may take to the decline and termination of extraordinary external financial assistance. The possible patterns of adjustment should be examined in the light of the long-term objectives of the restoration of multilateral trade and convertibility.

In general, there appear to be two broad lines of the adjustment:

(1) Adjustment through an expansion of dollar earnings either directly and/or through third country transactions; and

(2) Adjustment by contraction of imports from the dollar area with alternative sources of supply in soft currency areas developed to the maximum extent possible.

With the foregoing in mind, the following outline of topics is suggested:

1. Possibilities of expansion of sterling area (and continental) dollar earnings to offset declining extraordinary assistance.

A. Internal measures taken by the United Kingdom to improve competitive position.

(I) Domestic financial policy

(II) Productivity, marketing and cost structure of British industry.

B. Exchange rate policy of United Kingdom and continent relative to expansion of exports to dollar area.

(I) Effect of present pattern of exchange rates on direction of exports as between dollar and non-dollar areas.

(II) Effect of present exchange rate policies on pattern of investment and trade within non-dollar area.

C. Sales and marketing techniques in dollar area.

D. Relation of reduction of trade barriers within Europe to increasing competitive efficiency of United Kingdom and continent.

E. Possibility of United Kingdom (and continent) earning dollars through third country transactions as opposed to direct exports to dollar areas.

F. United States and Canadian measures to facilitate imports.

(I) Tariffs

(II) Customs procedures

2. Measures which might be taken to increase flow of dollar investment to United Kingdom, rest of the sterling area, and continent.

A. Private investment

B. Role of public lending agencies

3. Possibilities and consequences of curtailing dollar imports and seeking alternative sources of supply in non-dollar areas.

A. Possibility of substituting non-dollar for dollar sources for Western European imports.

(I) Specific development projects planned or underway.

(1) Ground nut scheme

(2) Australian meat

(3) Southern Rhodesian tobacco

(4) Petroleum

(5) Other(II) Domestic agricultural programme

(III) East-West trade

B. Levels of investment and consumption in United Kingdom (and continent) in event no substantial increase in dollar earnings is achieved.

4. Exchange and trade controls during ERP and post-ERP period.

A. Nature and duration of exchange and trade controls designed to limit dollar imports.

B. Nature and duration of exchange and trade controls designed to expand trade within soft currency areas.

C. State trading, includes bulk purchases

D. Relationship of continental trade and exchange controls to each other and to those of the United Kingdom.

E. Procedure for progressive relaxation of controls in light of long term objectives of convertibility and multilateral trade.

5. Sterling area arrangements relative to United Kingdom dollar problem.

A. Indirect dollar cost of United Kingdom surplus with rest of sterling area.

(I) Handling of sterling balances

(II) Capital outflow to the rest of the sterling area

B. Direct dollar cost of rest of sterling area to United Kingdom

(I) Under what conditions may rest of sterling area make net dollar contribution to United Kingdom.

6. Arrangements (including stockpiling) with respect to individual sterling area commodities. Ends.

2. Following, for your convenience, is a list of the changes in the agenda proposals, begins:

(1) Paragraph 1. A., first sentence: "Internal measures taken by the United Kingdom to increase productivity" changed to read "Internal measures taken by the United Kingdom to improve competitive position."

(2) Paragraph 2. B.: "Role of international lending agencies" changed to read, "Role of public lending agencies".

(3) Paragraph 4. A.: "Nature and duration of exchange and trade controls" subdivided into two sections and changed to read,

"A. Nature and duration of exchange and trade controls designed to limit dollar imports."

"B. Nature and duration of exchange and trade controls designed to expand trade within soft currency areas."

(4) Paragraph 6: "Individual commodity arrangements" changed to read, "Arrangements (including stockpiling) with respect to individual sterling area commodities." Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, August 2, 1949

My dear Mr. Ambassador:

As you know, before Mr. Snyder left London it was agreed that the economic talks between the Governments of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States would be resumed in Washington early in September and that these talks at ministerial level should be preceded by discussion between officials.

In response to an inquiry from Mr. Hoyer Millar, we have indicated that we would be prepared to begin the talks at the official level as soon as Sir Henry Wilson Smith and his party reach Washington, presumably about August 27. We have proposed that the talks at the ministerial level begin on Tuesday, September 6.

It is my understanding that your Government has indicated that the dates proposed by the Government of the United Kingdom are acceptable, but I assume that your Government would have no objection to the change in date for the talks at the ministerial level from September 3, as proposed, to September 6.

We are looking forward to participation by representatives of your Government in these discussions.

Sincerely yours,
DEAN ACHESON

Tripartite Talks in Washington.

1. Soon after the Tripartite Talks in London, we received a suggestion from Washington that we should work together with the United States in preparing for the Tripartite discussions in Washington later this month. At first we were hesitant, partly because we feared such co-operation would involve additional strains on a staff here that is both depleted and over-worked, and also because the United Kingdom might misconstrue our actions. However, when Robertson and Clark got back from London, we decided to co-operate as fully as possible, and at the same time to keep the United Kingdom officials in Ottawa and Washington fully informed. Accordingly, Robertson spent last Thursday in Washington. He was accompanied by Plumptre who was in a position to discuss the detailed preparatory work that is being done here.

2. Robertson had a meeting with Martin (Treasury) Bissell (E.C.A.) and Knapp (State Department) substituting for Thorpe. Subsequently, he talked separately to Mr. Acheson and also to Mr. Hoffman. Plumptre had discussions at a rather lower level with each agency involved. The following paragraphs cover the chief points discussed.

3. Proposed United States Agenda. We feel that this agenda is too heavily weighted towards the duties of debtors, with too little attention to the responsibility of creditors. United States officials said they had considered dividing their agenda in two sections, but that this had seemed rather invidious. As an alternative, we urged them to consider including such items as the following: the need for creditors to maintain high economic activity; the price support and import quota policies of the United States; United States regulations regarding use of synthetic rubber; etc. We also suggested that the agenda should not start off with items that United Kingdom officials would find it extremely difficult to discuss, such as the United Kingdom budget and exchange rate policy. United States officials showed considerable willingness to accept our suggestions. Subsequently, they have received the official United Kingdom comments on their agenda. These comments are relayed in our immediately following telegram. Both the United States officials and ourselves feel that there probably should be a brief agenda that can be disclosed to the press, and also an annotated agenda which would contain items that should not be disclosed.

4. Results of Commonwealth Discussions. United States officials showed considerable interest in what had gone on in London. Unfortunately, the United Kingdom has not yet been able to release to them the agreed recommendations of the conference. We have urged the United Kingdom officials both here and in Washington to get this paper to the United States as soon as possible. It emphasises the responsibilities of creditors and might, therefore, do something to redress the balance of thinking in Washington.

5. Devaluation. Different agencies place rather different emphasis on this matter. In E.C.A., views are expressed that unless this step was taken, all other discussions were useless. In the State Department, it is regarded as simply one of many measures that should be taken. Treasury seem to stand a little closer to E.C.A. than to State Department.

6. United States Custom Procedures. Mr. Hoffman has recently become concerned about this matter. We shall be supplying to all of the U.S. agencies interested in it instances of how their "invisible tariff" impedes imports.

7. Article 9 of Loan Agreement. In both State and Treasury Departments, this was described as the "most difficult" item for discussion in Washington as far as the United States administration was concerned. They have not yet made up their minds how to handle it. They are not greatly worried by the implications for United States trade, but they are greatly worried about the reception in Congress if the matter had to be raised there. U. S. Treasury hopes to get the United Kingdom to move in the desired direction in an unostentatious way which would not precipitate an approach to Congress.

8. Foreign Investment. E.C.A. and Treasury are canvassing further encouragement to private investment. Guarantees, at least against transfer risks, seem to be involved. In addition, United States investors place considerable emphasis on commercial treaties such as the United States has negotiated with Latin American countries and which guarantee United States investors against discrimination. Apparently, the United States had discussed with the United Kingdom in the past the possibility of such a treaty covering Colonial areas, but has not been encouraged.

9. United States Domestic Policy. Robertson emphasized very strongly throughout his discussions the primary need for maintaining "boom" conditions in the United States. This has a direct effect in obtaining imports. It also makes possible tariff reductions and other adjustments. United States officials pointed out their constitutional limitations. In addition, there has been a good deal of aversion in Washington recently to cyclical budgeting, pump priming, etc., and a great deal of lip service to balanced budgets. In any case, as Robertson himself emphasized, if the United States administration is to go forward on the desired path, it will have to be for domestic reasons and not merely to facilitate imports from the United Kingdom. Statements made in the President's mid-year message may, however, prove useful if, as we hope, some reference to this matter comes up in the Tripartite Talks.

10. Canadian Position. Most United States officials do not seem to have realized yet how the deterioration in the United Kingdom position will inevitably produce a deterioration in our own home position. Our officials did not stress this point in Washington at this time.

Agenda for Tripartite talks (Officials).

The revised United States proposals on agenda for discussions with British and Canadians is repeated below in full to avoid any confusion that might arise from making numerous amendments.

2. This agenda is still subject to changes that might be requested by the United Kingdom and Canada, and even on the United States side is not definitive. An effort is being made by the Treasury Department to limit changes suggested by United States agencies as it is felt that the agenda has become far too long and probably, in cases, too specific. It is thought that the exact wording of the agenda has now received too much attention from too many sources, and that the presentations which each country wishes to make will be made whether or not the context fits exactly an agenda heading.

3. It will be noted that the agenda is still in its original form, but this does not mean that United States opinion is against the adoption of one public and one secret agenda. This suggestion is associated with the approach to publicity which has not been considered as yet.

4. The wording of the agenda, marked secret, follows:

United States Proposals on Agenda for Discussions with British and Canadians

Secret.

1. General survey of pattern for multilateral trade and payments.

(a) How this pattern worked pre-war, and what it accomplished.

(b) Present obstructions exposition of recent history and present international position of United Kingdom and sterling area.

(c) Possibility and conditions of progress toward its recreation.

2. Possibilities of expansion of sterling area dollar earnings to offset declining extraordinary assistance.

(a) Internal measures taken by the United Kingdom to improve competitive position.

(I) Domestic financial policy.

(II) Specific measures to reduce cost structure of British industry (production techniques, industrial and marketing structure, labor productivity, etc.).

(b) Exchange rate policy of United Kingdom relative to expansion of exports to dollar area.

(I) Effect of present pattern of exchange rates on direction of exports as between dollar and non-dollar areas.

(II) Effect of present exchange rate policy on pattern of investment and trade within non-dollar area.

(c) United Kingdom sales and marketing techniques in dollar area.

(d) Relation of reduction of trade barriers within Europe to increasing competitive efficiency of United Kingdom.

(e) Possibility of United Kingdom earnings dollars through third country transactions as opposed to direct exports to dollar areas.

(f) Possibilities for action by other sterling area countries to expand dollar earnings.

(g) United States and Canadian measures to maintain a high level of business activity.

(h) United States and Canadian customs procedures.

(i) Action for the reduction of tariffs, preferences, and other trade barriers.

(j) Action in fields of shipping and aviation.

3. Measures which might be taken to increase flow of dollar investment to United Kingdom and rest of sterling area, especially undeveloped areas.

(a) Private investment.

(b) Role of public lending agencies.

4. Possibilities and consequences of curtailing dollar imports and seeking alternative sources of supply in non-dollar areas.

(a) Possibility of substituting non-dollar for dollar sources for Western European imports.

(I) Specific development projects planned or underway.

(II) Domestic agricultural programme.

(III) East-West trade.

(b) Levels of investment and consumption in United Kingdom in event no substantial increase in dollar earnings is achieved.

5. Exchange and trade controls during ERP and post ERP period.

(a) Nature and duration of exchange and trade controls designed to limit dollar imports.

(b) Nature and duration of controls designed to expand trade within soft-currency areas.

(c) State trading practices.

(d) Procedure for progressive relaxation of controls in the light of the long-term objective of convertibility and multilateral trade.

6. Sterling area arrangements relative to United Kingdom dollar problem.

(a) Indirect dollar cost of United Kingdom surplus with rest of sterling area.

(I) Handling of sterling balances.

(II) Capital outflow to rest of sterling area.

(b) Direct dollar cost of rest of sterling area to United Kingdom.

(I) Under what conditions may rest of sterling area make net dollar contributions to United Kingdom.

7. Arrangements (including possibility of stockpiling sterling area products) with respect to individual commodities (rubber, tin, petroleum, etc.)

8. Any other measures which might contribute to reduction of disequilibrium between sterling and dollar areas.

9. Formulation of agenda for ministerial meeting. Ends.

Note du haut-commissariat au Royaume-Uni

Memorandum by High Commission of United Kingdom

Ottawa, August 12, 1949

1. The dollar difficulties of the United Kingdom show no signs of easing: the standstill on new dollar imports which was, regrettably, forced on the United Kingdom and the other members of the sterling area is at best a form of emergency action and cannot take full effect for several months. In the meantime, as the following figures show, the position continues to be one of increasing gravity.

	April	May	June	July
			£m.
Gold and dollar deficit	37	56	63	57*
Decrease in gold and dollar holdings	11	31	23	37

*Provisional.

Thus, the United Kingdom gold and dollar holdings fell from £471 millions at the end of March to £369 millions at the end of July.

2. It was recognised in the meetings with Mr. Abbott and Mr. Snyder that the present difficulties could not be resolved by unilateral action by any one country alone, and that each of our three countries has a part to play in overcoming them. In the subsequent Commonwealth meetings recommendations were made to Governments outlining in broad terms the objectives at which debtor countries on the one hand, and creditor countries on the other, should aim. The United Kingdom Government for their part fully endorse these recommendations and are giving urgent consideration to the best means of implementing them. They are determined to play their full part in the solution of the present difficulties and they have no doubt that, in the same spirit, the Canadian Government will be considering, in preparation for the forthcoming discussions, what measures can be taken in Canada to relieve the present strain.

3. Meanwhile, this preparatory work, in conjunction with the continuing dollar drain outlined in paragraph 1 above, has demonstrated that quite apart from the fundamental question of the level of trade which can in the long run be sustained between the dollar and the sterling areas, the ineligibility for E.R.P. finance of certain major United Kingdom purchases from Canada presents a major obstacle to the maintenance of current United Kingdom/Canadian trade at a reasonable level, and is of crucial importance to the whole complex of United Kingdom/Canada trade relations.

4. Last March, on the urgent advice of the Economic Co-operation Administration (E.C.A.), the United Kingdom withdrew its request for the further use of E.R.P. funds for Canadian wheat. Had this step not been taken we were advised that the United States Secretary for Agriculture would have formally declared wheat a surplus commodity ineligible for off-shore purchases under E.R.P. It was then hoped that it would be possible for the United Kingdom to re-arrange its purchasing programme so that E.R.P. dollars could be expended on other essential commodities, while wheat could be bought from the free dollars thus released.

5. Since April E.C.A. have also refused to finance the United Kingdom/Canadian cheese contract and as from October there is a strong probability that Canadian bacon will be ineligible. In addition E.C.A. have felt unable to finance existing contracts for pulp, paper, and timber, unless they have been thrown open to competition with U.S.A. producers. During the last quarter of this year there may also be difficulty in financing off-shore purchases of non-ferrous metals.

6. In all, this means that some $500 millions may be ineligible for E.C.A. financing, of which Canadian purchases under existing commitments total $395 millions, made up as follows:

	$m.
Canadian wheat and flour	309
Canadian cheese	15
Canadian bacon	13
Canadian eggs	17
Canadian pulp and paper	10
Canadian timber	23
Canadian tobacco	8
Total	395

There is also expenditure of $101 millions on non-Canadian items which are either ineligible or which cannot be documented under existing procedures, making a grand total of $496 millions.

7. It is necessary to draw a distinction in these items between those on which a decision lies with E.C.A. and the agricultural commodities which are, or may be, declared surplus by the Secretary for Agriculture. The major item in the latter category is wheat. Here, if the Secretary for Agriculture declares wheat surplus, E.C.A. have no option under existing legislation: they must refuse it for E.C.A. financing.

Of the other items, cheese, bacon, eggs and tobacco (totalling $53 millions) are in the same category.

8. As stated in paragraph 4 above it had been hoped that it would be possible to re-arrange the United Kingdom purchasing programme so that E.R.P. dollars could be expended on other essential commodities while wheat could be bought from the free dollars so released. This, however, is not possible.

9. On the basis of present estimates there should be at best 69 million free dollars available for purchases by the United Kingdom made up as follows:—

	$m.
United Kingdom exports	+ 620
Net invisibles	- 197
Rest of Sterling area	- 188
Gold and dollar settlements	- 243
Capital transactions	+ 42
<hr/>
Imports that can be paid for from earned dollars	34
Invisible expenditure eligible for E.C.A. finance (say)	35
Total	69

But, as stated above (paragraph 6), Canadian items on the programme amount to $395 millions.

10. This position is, therefore, one of extreme gravity. Its gravity is increased by the fact that the United Kingdom cannot by any operation on its own import programme increase the number of free dollars available. All eligible items which can be documented are already financed from E.R.P.: even if we cut these to nothing there would be no more free dollars available. Relief can only come, therefore, by real savings on the items listed in paragraph 9 above. It is true that this figure of $69 millions is a provisional estimate. The true figure may be higher, for the other Commonwealth countries may make bigger net dollar savings than we have assumed. But it may be worse, for the present rate of deficit is very much larger than the forecast used for this calculation. It would be wrong, therefore, to base any hopes of a solution of the problem on these grounds.

11. The general position has been put to E.C.A. who have not been able to hold out any hope that they could take action to change the legislative position which binds them on all agricultural commodities if they are declared surplus. Of these by far the major item is wheat. On this the only solution which they can see is that wheat crops in the U.S.A. might be such that the Secretary for Agriculture can say that it is not a surplus commodity. This is doubtful. But unless it happens the United Kingdom will have E.R.P. funds which it cannot spend on essential needs. In a word, the whole purpose of the Foreign Assistance Act is defeated. For, if this state of affairs continues, it is evident that the volume of purchases from Canada which would require to be financed from free dollars would far exceed the amount of these dollars available to the United Kingdom and we would only be able to pay for our imports from Canada by using dollars from the reserves.

12. Having regard to the necessity for preserving these reserves at (and indeed rebuilding them to) a reasonable working level, the United Kingdom Government consider that this further drain on them must not be allowed to occur. As stated above, representations to the E.C.A. authorities about the urgency and importance of this problem have already been made, but it is clear that it is one which will have to be raised at high levels in Washington. It is hoped that the Canadian Government, appreciating its gravity and its crucial effect on the United Kingdom's purchasing power in Canada, will feel able to assist the United Kingdom Government in whatever ways would seem to be most effective to secure a solution satisfactory to both Governments.

Washington Tripartite Talks.

1. Yesterday we sent you a memorandum which Clutterbuck had left with the Prime Minister. Today, this memorandum was considered in a preliminary way at a Cabinet Committee meeting attended by senior officials.

2. It is accepted here that the purpose of the memorandum is to enlist our support at the Washington talks in an effort by the United Kingdom to reverse the constant narrowing of the uses of ECA funds. The United Kingdom are not, repeat not, pressing us to make further releases of the Canada-United Kingdom loan at this time.

3. The figures in the United Kingdom memorandum are open to considerable criticism. Paragraph 9 suggests that the United Kingdom only has $69,000,000 available to make purchases in Canada against $496,000,000 worth of Canadian commitments as outlined in paragraph 6. The figure of $69,000,000 is only reached on the assumption that the United Kingdom makes all its necessary purchases elsewhere and meets all its commitments elsewhere, leaving the Canadian market as the residuary legatee of their difficulties. It can be pointed out that the United Kingdom is currently earning well over $300,000,000 on exports to Canada, and on top of this, there is the use of the Canada-United Kingdom loan this year amounting to $120,000,000.

4. At present, the feeling here seems to be in favour of giving the United Kingdom some support in obtaining broader uses for ECA funds. The position of wheat was under discussion today and it was noted that this commodity had not been formally declared surplus, that the International Wheat Agreement was now in effect, and that Congress would have passed the ECA appropriation and adjourned before the Ministerial talks in Washington. However this view should not, repeat not, be passed on to the U.K at present.

TRIPARTITE ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON

25. Mr. Plumptre outlined the background of these discussions and the part the Canadian group might be playing in them. Official talks start on August 27; ministerial talks on September 6. Our delegation³³ consists of:

Ministers—Mr. Pearson and Mr. Abbott;

Officials—Norman A. Robertson

H.H. Wrong

M.W. Mackenzie

L. Rasminsky

J.J. Deutsch

A.F.W. Plumptre

In preparing for the discussions Ottawa officials are keeping in mind the fact that British difficulties are deep seated. They stem from the rise of the United States to industrial pre-eminence dating from the turn of the Century. The relative decline of Great Britain has, however, been clearly accelerated by two world wars which have disrupted her internal economic system and have resulted in loss or destruction of overseas assets—investments, colonial developments, shipping, etc.

26. It was clear, therefore, that Britain's troubles were not simply to be attributed to a Socialist Government. This Government has considerable economic achievements to its credit. Britain's production and total exports are now well ahead of pre-war levels; her record in this regard is better than almost any other European country.

27. On the other hand there appear to be certain items to be debited against the policy of the present government:

(i) Exports, while high, are not flowing in the right directions. More should be directed towards earning dollars.

(ii) Imports may be unduly high in the sense of being beyond the country's capacity to pay. These imports are in part a result of the "welfare state".

(iii) The economic system is perhaps unduly and unnecessarily rigid. Over-full employment, with everybody finding jobs easily, results in too little movement of ³³ Le Cabinet donna son aval à la composition de la délégation le 3 août 1949.

Cabinet approved the composition of the delegation on August 3, 1949.

labour in the directions that are economically desirable. Welfare measures are a contributing factor.

(iv) Britain's overseas trade and financial arrangements tend to intensify the rigidity. Heavy sales of goods to India and other soft currency countries, some of which are wartime creditors of the United Kingdom, keep British labour and materials from going into dollar exports.

It is clear that these four groups of measures lie close to the heart of the economic policies of the Labour Government; changes in them would involve fundamental political shifts.

28. Both in Ottawa and also in Washington there is, therefore, a feeling that "the next move is up to the British". In Ottawa, however, there seems to be a good deal more readiness at least to consider ways of helping the situation, for instance by maintaining high incomes and imports and also by adjusting tariffs. In Washington there are many people who seem to feel that they have "done their bit" by providing Marshall Plan aid and that it is their turn to sit back while other countries take action. This attitude is perhaps intensified amongst Administration officials because of the great difficulties they have had with the present Congress—including their difficulties in getting the E.C.A. Appropriation approved.

29. In London, in various quarters, there is evidence of a willingness, even a desire, to make important changes in economic policy. However, these changes involve the reversal of certain political policies. It is unfortunate that several of the senior British Ministers have been ill and absent during the past six weeks.

30. This fact, together with the acute difficulties that the United States Administration have had with Congress during the past three or four months, suggests that nothing of an epoch making nature is likely to come out of the Tripartite Talks. As it turns out, the timing of the meeting is perhaps premature. The United Kingdom may be forced to take certain actions on her own by the pressure of events rather than as a result of international collaboration. On the other hand it is very important that discussions of this sort should go forward even though the meetings are not always at the most opportune moments. The alternative would be for the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries to "go off in a corner" and try to work out a salvation by cutting themselves off to a considerable extent from all trade and intercourse with North America. This would damage standards of living both in sterling countries and also in North America—and particularly in Canada, which depends so heavily on three-cornered trade. It would also damage very severely the concept of North Atlantic military solidarity.

THE TRIPARTITE CONFERENCE: WASHINGTON, AUGUST-SEPTEMBER, 1949
 A BIRD'S-EYE PREVIEW³⁴

Causes and Cures

To begin with a good deal of time will be spent at the conference discussing the "causes" of the present crisis. The U.K. group will be at pains to show to Mr. Snyder and others that the Socialist Government is not to blame—at least not entirely. They will rightly point out that Britain's difficulties go back for half a century or more, reflecting world-wide changes in the industrial balance between continents and in the commercial balance between industrial products and raw materials. These changes, they will emphasize, have been hastened, and directed to the disadvantage of the United Kingdom and the advantage of the United States, by two world wars.

Much of the time spent in this exercise will be wasted. Everyone present, including Mr. Snyder, will have made up his mind in advance regarding causes. It is more profitable to concentrate on possible cures. Only if we can get a measure of agreement here can the conference serve a useful purpose.

There are two sorts of cure: one to be applied by the "creditor" countries—e.g. U.S.A., the other to be applied by "debtor" countries, e.g. U.K. Most of the cures are unpalatable, at any rate from a political standpoint; they involve changes which immediately hurt somebody. Naturally the debtors think the creditors should apply most of the cures and vice versa.

Canada is half-and-half—half creditor (vis-a-vis U.S.A.) and half debtor (vis-a-vis the U.K.). In this particular conference, however, Canada is regarded primarily as a creditor. That is because the conference arose out of the difficulties of U.K.—towards which we are creditors. But our debtor position—our own chronic shortage of U.S. dollars—is lurking in the background. We shall not talk about it, probably in Washington. But we shall not forget that our own problem will be greatly eased if the main debtor-creditor problem is eased. If Britain earns more dollars so will we.

Cures—on the Debtor Side

It is useful to list first the chief types of cure that can be initiated on the debtor side:—

³⁴ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Note: This memo was prepared as a rough guide to the Minister (a) in regard to what was likely to happen at this Conference and also (b) in reading the large volume of papers now being prepared for the use of officials at the Conference. A.F.W. P[lumtre]

(a) Restriction of imports from dollar sources. This is undesirable but it is quick and therefore, in emergency, inevitable. It can be achieved (i) by direct government controls (quota restrictions) and (ii) by making dollar imports more expensive and thus less attractive. They can be made more expensive either by discriminatory tariffs (not allowed by GATT) or by exchange depreciation.

(b) Expansion of exports to dollar markets. This takes time. It also involves some cooperation from the creditors—a willingness to accept imports—although they are not always glad to admit it. Expansion of exports can also be achieved (i) by direct government controls (export quota arrangements) and (ii) by making it more attractive for individual exporters to sell in dollar markets instead of at home or in soft currency markets. Dollar exports can be made more attractive by exchange depreciation.

Much has been said about the importance of “cutting costs and prices” in the U.K.—both industrial costs and government costs. The chief purpose is to make exports more competitive. Yet general cost-cutting makes all exports more competitive. It gives no special encouragement to dollar exports. We can conclude that the influence of changes in the U.K. budget upon the U.K.’s balance of trade with dollar areas is very remote and very slow to take effect. A renunciation of the Welfare State today will not cure the dollar deficit tomorrow.

In some directions the exports of the U.K. are already far too large—larger than the country can afford. A very large volume of U.K exports is going to “repay” the “advances” made by India and other countries during the war. The “sterling balances” built up by these countries, and now being spent on U.K. products, are an “Old Man of the Sea”; they drain off any excess economic energy the U.K. can build up. In addition, and less “excusable”, a large volume of U.K. exports are going to make new investments in some countries abroad, notably in South Africa.

Thus it came about that the U.K. had a deceptive “balance” in its external trade last year. Exports did indeed equal imports. But large quantities of exports went to India and South Africa and other countries where they earned nothing. Equally large quantities of imports had to be obtained for nothing, financed by E.R.P. and the Canadian credit.

What points should we be urging on the U.K. at the Conference? Most of them are not new:—

(a) To rely as much as possible on expanding dollar exports, rather than cutting dollar imports;

(b) To rely on normal business incentives (profits and losses) to a greater extent and on government controls to a lesser extent. A number of points are included here, including (i) depreciation of sterling against the U.S. dollar, and (ii) some relaxation of the government’s addiction to over-full employment. For instance, it is impossible to get a shift of exports away from India and towards U.S.A. and Canada if, at the slightest sign of unemployment, the government allows India to spend more “sterling balances” to take up the slack!

(c) To review more intensively than ever the types of product that can be sold for dollars, The “dollar export drive” has been useful, but it has largely been confined to the U.K. (where normal business incentives have been working hard against it!); it should be extended to colonial and dominion areas. Steps in this direction are resulting from the July Conference of Commonwealth Finance Ministers.

(d) To stop bailing out other people's boats when its own is threatening to sink. The amount of U.K. exports going to South Africa, deliberately financed from London, is quite unjustifiable at present.

Before leaving the subject of possible action by U.K. a special word must be said about the exchange rate. It is by now almost certain that devaluation will be forced on the U.K. within a matter of months—if not weeks—perhaps tomorrow! Therefore the time for discussion of the desirability of devaluation is over. (Most Canadians agree that it is desirable.) When it comes, and if it goes far enough, it will immediately remove much of the immediate pressure on U.K. reserves; much of that pressure arises from the expectation in U.K. and elsewhere that sterling is going to depreciate.

But that is not the end of the matter. The benefits of devaluation may be frittered away over a matter of months. This will happen if the British Government tries to protect the British worker from all its effects by increasing food subsidies, by allowing wage increases, and so forth. Under these circumstances, the restrictive effects on imports will be eliminated and the improved competitive position in dollar markets will quickly disappear. Thus it is most important that the British Government should seize on the act of devaluation as the moment to make a general effort, on a broad front, to improve their dollar position.

Cures—on the Creditor Side

What policies should we be urging on the U.S.A.? Some are familiar, others are not:

(a) Nothing is more important, both in the immediate future and also over the long pull, than that the U.S.A. should maintain a high level of prosperity, incomes—and imports. We can afford to “point with pride” to our own performance during the past six months; our imports have kept up well while U.S. imports have tailed away. No doubt this is partly due to our economic wisdom in having an “expansive” budget this year—but there are a lot of other factors too, including the fact that the Canadian dollar is a semi-soft currency and we have been keeping out cheap American goods (e.g. textiles) which would otherwise have undercut our imports from U.K.

(b) Gradual abolition of U.S. protection—protection of industry and protection of agriculture. In the world today there is no economic justification for such protection. The U.S. should be headed for free trade. Unfortunately the issue is confused because, since 1935, reductions in the U.S. tariff have all been made by reciprocal trade treaties; even liberal-minded people in the U.S. believe that other people's tariffs must be abolished, step by step with their own. This is clearly impossible. Yet it is likely to delay U.S. progress towards lower tariffs. Britain would never have achieved free trade, a hundred years ago, by a process of bilateral—or multilateral—bargaining.

(c) While gradual abolition of U.S. protection is desirable, some immediate move in this direction would be specially helpful in Europe and the U.K. There is great scepticism overseas whether the U.S. will ever be a great importer—which a great creditor must be willing to be. The attitude of Congress is anything but encouraging, but every avenue must be explored.

(d) New credits—or something like them. Some sorts of credit are undesirable and out of the question—e.g. direct loans to U.K. or larger E.R.P. appropriations. But this does not exhaust the list. In the International Monetary Fund the U.S. has been adopting a very strict line—e.g. countries receiving E.R.P. are not allowed to get Fund advances. It is important to remember that the U.K. is not the only country involved: the “central gold reserves” in London supply the whole sterling area. Other members of that area may be eligible, or become eligible, for advances from the Fund and for loans from the Export-Import Bank or the International Bank. In many of these countries there is real developmental work to be done. This leads into the problem of

(e) The sterling balances. Can the U.S. take over part or all of the weight of the Old Man of the Sea? Could some deal be worked out? India needs wheat (temporarily) and machinery (for a long time to come). Would the U.S. like to advance some money and get some of this business? Would the Indians write off some of their “sterling credits” in order to get dollars and cheap American goods, instead of sterling and expensive British goods? Now that U.S.A. has admitted failure in aiding the anti-communists in China, might it not like to have a new try in a more promising Eastern country—India?

(f) An increased price of gold. Nobody, of course, mentions this except in smoke-filled rooms, and not even there if Mr. Snyder is present. It would however be a very satisfactory means of supplying the sterling area with a good many more U.S. dollars. It would also fix South Africa up; she wouldn't need loans from the U.K. or anyone else. (It would also help Canada).

What Part Might We Play?

Most of the things that we would like the U.S. and the U.K. to do are very difficult for them politically. The present is particularly awkward in both countries: Congress is imminent and ugly in the U.S.A.; the Labour Government stands at the cross-roads in Britain with an election in the offing. Hence we must not expect much from this Conference.

Nevertheless, we should consider what we might do if circumstances seem favourable. As indicated above; we are at present concerned only with actions arising from Canada's position as a creditor vis-a-vis U.K. and the sterling area. Other actions, arising from our dollar shortage, will have to be considered at another time.

(a) Maintenance of incomes and imports. We should be ready to practice as well as preach this doctrine. If the U.S.A. does not practice it with equal success we shall run into dollar difficulties: we shall go on buying goods in the U.S.A. at times when their purchases up there fall off.

(b) Abolition of protection—except against the U.S.A. We should be moving towards free entry of goods from soft-currency sources; unfortunately we cannot afford free entry to U.S. goods. This will raise problems of "non-discrimination"; we shall have to do some re-thinking in this field. Meanwhile, perhaps we can give some leadership in the field of tariff reductions in directions where they will help most.

(c) Sterling balances. Could we take up some of these obligations if the U.S. were doing so? We, too, would be happy to sell wheat and machinery in India.

The three preceding paragraphs have outlined some of the things Canada might do. Whether or not we should take the lead in putting them forward at the Conference is another matter.

Our group will have to play by ear to a large extent. It may seem desirable to try to give a strong lead; on the other hand the inertia of the conference may prove too great in which case we shall be wise to save our ammunition for another engagement. And the inertia is likely to be great. The U.K. group are likely to arrive undecided as to their new course, tottering on the edge of involuntary devaluation, and unwilling to strike out on any bold course. The U.S. group, with Congress still hanging over them, are likely to feel that they have done their bit by providing E.R.P. and that all the main initiative at present must come from the U.K.

One thing is sure. Both the U.S. and the U.K. are largely preoccupied with their own troubles. They are a long way apart in their points of view. Seldom have Canadians had a better opportunity to play their "traditional role" of interpreting the one to the other.

Ottawa, August 24th, 1949

Dear Sir Alexander,

I am replying on the Prime Minister's behalf to the memorandum which you left with him last week regarding the current financial difficulties which are shortly to be discussed between the three Governments at Washington.

We are glad to have in advance of the Washington meeting the information given in the memorandum. We appreciate to the full the seriousness of the present rate of drain on the U.K.'s gold and dollar reserves. The overall problem is one of great complexity, and certain features of it have, as you know, been causing us anxiety for some time. We hope that the forthcoming discussions, approached from all sides in a constructive spirit, will prepare the way for action to revive trade and renew confidence. Please assure your Government that just as we share their anxieties, so we share also their determination to play a constructive part in the search for a solution.

Attention is drawn in your memorandum to the immediate difficulties caused by recent rulings on the part of E.C.A. which have had the effect of rendering a number of the U.K.'s commitments in Canada ineligible for E.C.A. financing. We are not sure that we follow all the figures used in the memorandum, since we naturally do not possess here the material to enable us to form a complete picture of the currently estimated overall balance of payments position between the sterling area and the dollar area.

The calculation given in paragraph 9 of the United Kingdom memorandum suggests that there would be a total of only 69 million free dollars available for imports from the dollar area, but this calculation seems to assume that United Kingdom earnings from the dollar area would first be applied in settlement of the United Kingdom's deficits with third countries. A purpose of the Canadian Loan to the United Kingdom and, indeed, of the whole Canadian effort to stimulate United Kingdom exports to Canada is to increase the United Kingdom's ability to buy Canadian products. But so far as the balance of payments between Canada and the sterling area is concerned, which is naturally the way in which we must approach the matter—our own estimates suggest that, after allowing for continued drawings on the Canadian credit, the gap which will require to be bridged will, even on present E.C.A. rulings, be very substantially less than the figure of $395 million quoted in your memorandum.

The precise extent of the gap will of course be a matter for discussion between our two Delegations in Washington, and the detailed calculations involved can no doubt be cleared up when they meet. But the point I would make here is that Canada's locus standi in urging upon the U.S. authorities an increase in off-shore purchases must necessarily depend on the extent to which it can be shown that the E.R.P. aid allotted to the U.K. could not otherwise be fully expended on the U.K.'s essential needs. Should additional E.C.A. financing of Canadian purchases over and above the amount considered eligible prove to be a more desirable pattern of allocating the total dollar funds available, we would, of course, be prepared to give any assistance we possibly could with the U.S. authorities.

I am arranging to give you a note explaining your calculations in greater detail.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Memorandum by Director, Economic Relations Division, Department of Finance

[Ottawa, August 24, 1949]

SOME NOTES ON U.K. MEMORANDUM RESPECTING E.C.A. PURCHASE IN CANADA.³⁵

The summary balance of payments figures and statement of U.K. dollar deficit shown in the memorandum are taken from the revised U.K. programme of dollar payments submitted to the OEEC on July 22nd, 1949. In this revised programme the U.K. overall dollar deficit is calculated as follows:

	1948-49 actual $mm	1949-50 revised estimate $mm
U.K. imports	-1,577	-1,552
Exports & re-exports	732	620
Net invisibles	-196	-197
Total U.K. deficit with $ area	-1,041	-1,129
Rest of Sterling area deficit with $ area	-80	-188
	-1,121	-1,317
Gold and dollar payments to other countries	-302	-243
	-1,423	-1,560
Capital transactions ¹	-70	+ 42
Net overall $ deficit	-1,493	-1,518
Requested ECA allocation		-1,518

¹Includes drawings on Canadian loan

The total of commodity imports from the U.S. and Canada of $1,552 in the revised programme is unchanged from earlier submissions and does not take account of the cuts already announced following the Commonwealth financial conference. The only change made is to convert values to July 15th prices. Similarly the deficit shown for the "rest of the sterling area" does not take account of the cuts in $ imports recommended at the Commonwealth conference although it is somewhat lower than the current rate of the deficit. The amount shown for capital transactions ($42) in 1949-50 includes the Canadian loan $120mm but does not include any drawings by India on the International Monetary Fund for which a figure of $100mm has been suggested earlier. Consequently, the overall deficit of $1,518mm would be reduced by the amount of the cuts in the import programme actually realised, assuming all other elements remain as forecast.

The list of commodity purchases by the U.K. in the $ area in the revised programme totals $1,552mm. It would appear to be obvious that the U.K. cannot ³⁵ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

This is the statistical memo referred to in Mr. Pearson's letter to Clutterbuck of August 24th in which he replies in general terms to the U.K. memo re E.C.A. and wheat. This memo had in fact been handed to Clutterbuck previously by Deutsch and had been transmitted to London. [A.F.W. Plumtre] obtain an ECA allocation sufficiently large to wholly cover this amount. In the submission to OEEC it is stated that the U.K. purchasing departments are temporarily proceeding on the "hypothetical assumption of a dollar import programme of $1,200mm." It would appear more likely that the ECA allocation to the U.K. will be in the neighbourhood of $850–$920mm. The import cuts proposed by the Chancellor were based on an assumed ECA allocation of $850mm.

The differing assumptions regarding the size of the ECA allocation result in an ambiguity in the U.K. Memorandum. Clearly, the problem raised in the Memorandum concerning the difficulty of finding a sufficient number of items eligible for ECA financing is much more troublesome if an ECA allocation of $1,518mm is assumed, than if one of $850mm is assumed. Indeed, on the latter more realistic assumption, there may not be any difficulty at all over this particular matter, although it leaves unanswered the major question of how the U.K. overall deficit is to be financed. This question, of course, cannot be dealt with by the shifting of Canadian items between free dollars and ECA financing once the total ECA allocation is fixed. The amount of additional Canadian items that need to be placed on ECA financing, from among the items declared or soon to be declared ineligible, would appear to be quite small on an assumed total ECA allocation of $850mm. Certainly it would not be anything as large as the $395mm suggested in the U.K. Memorandum. The confusion arises from the fact that the dollar deficit figures upon which the argument in the Memorandum is based are derived from a dollar import programme of $1,552mm and a request for an ECA allocation of $1,518mm.

Financing of the U.K. deficit with Canada

The Canadian forecast of the Sterling Area balance of payments with Canada made in June, prior to the Commonwealth Conference is as follows:

	Calendar Year 1949	Year ending June 1950
	$mm	$mm
Exports	690	661
Imports	-331	-334
Merchandise surplus	359	327
Net invisibles	46	44
Current Surplus with U.K.	405	371
Current Surplus with rest of Sterling Area	118	79
Current Surplus with Sterling Area	523	450
Canadian loan	120	120
Remainder of Surplus to be financed by ECA off shore purchases and/or dollars provided by U.K.	403	330

We have not available the U.K. forecast of the Sterling Area balance of payments with Canada which was included in the revised (July) programme submitted to the OEEC. However, the U.K. High Commissioner stated in explaining the U.K. Memorandum that the programme of purchases from Canada included in the submission to OEEC was unchanged from the earlier submissions and did not take account of the recently announced cuts. On that basis the programme of commodity purchases from Canada assumed in the figures of dollar outgo in the U.K. Memorandum for 1949-50 is $690mm. However, if we take the Canadian forecast of $661mm which is likely to be closer to the actual outturn, the amount of ECA offshore purchases required to cover the whole of the estimated U.K. dollar drain to Canada would be $330mm, as shown above. If we deduct $395mm stated in the U.K. Memorandum as being ineligible from $661mm of total purchases there is left $266mm which presumably would be eligible for ECA offshore purchases. If we deduct this amount from the $330mm required to cover the dollar drain to Canada there is left $64mm. Consequently the additional amount of ECA offshore purchases (over the amount of what the U.K. itself anticipates will take place) required to cover the whole dollar drain to Canada, is $64mm. If this amount cannot be provided by additional offshore purchases in Canada the U.K. would either have to cover it from reserves or from free dollars made available through ECA financed purchases in the U.S. With a likely ECA allocation of only $850mm it is difficult to conceive that not enough eligible items in the U.K. import programme can be found in the United States to a total of $584mm after $266mm has been provided for eligible items from Canada. If $584mm of eligible items can be found in the United States then there is no need to look for additional offshore purchases in Canada beyond what the U.K. itself anticipates will take place.

U.K. Memorandum states that there are only $69mm of free dollars available to pay for $395mm of imports from Canada which are expected to be ineligible for ECA financing. This can be so only if the proceeds from U.K. earnings in Canada are taken to make dollar payments to third countries and/or to meet the deficit of the Rest of the Sterling Area with the U.S. Of course, if dollar earnings in Canada are used for those purposes they are not available to pay for Canadian exports. In effect the U.K. Memorandum proposes that the Canadian exports which are left unprovided for in this way, should be financed by ECA through offshore purchases. It would not appear to be in our interest for us to try to persuade the U.S. to make politically difficult offshore purchases in Canada so that the U.K. can in effect take its earnings of dollars in Canada to make dollar payments to third countries (Iran, Switzerland, etc.) or to meet the Rest of Sterling Area (India, Australia, etc.) deficit with the U.S.

[However, if the U.K. is really having difficulty in finding enough items eligible for ECA financing in both Canada and the U.S. of the kind and amount of commodities which the U.K. wishes to have—sufficient to make up the whole of the likely allocation of the order of $850mm,—then certainly Canada should do what it can to assist. In the light of the amounts that are likely to be involved in this problem it is hard to see how it can be something of major importance, justifying a serious threat to the carrying out of U.K. purchase commitments in Canada. As pointed out above, the question of how the entire U.K. $ deficit is to be covered, and what has to give way, given a limited ECA allocation, is of course, another matter.]³⁶

TRIPARTITE ECONOMIC TALKS IN WASHINGTON
GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS TO OFFICIAL DELEGATION

I believe it would be of great help to our officials, who are leaving for Washington at the end of this week for preparatory talks with U.S. and U.K. officials, if they could be given some general instructions from the Canadian Government. My feeling was reinforced at yesterday's discussion in the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy.

These instructions might run as follows:

The Canadian Government regards very gravely the present deterioration in the international economic and financial situation, as reflected in the serious and continued decline in the dollar reserves of the United Kingdom. If the problems involved are not solved in a co-operative way, leading to greater trade between the dollar and sterling areas, individual countries will be forced into restrictive measures which will do serious economic damage to Canada, and which will raise political problems not only for this country but for the North Atlantic Area and the rest of the free world. This situation will be the subject of preparatory talks by officials of the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada beginning this week in Washington, and leading towards discussions between Ministers early in September. In these talks, Canadian officials should not make any commitments on behalf of the Government of Canada; nevertheless they should explore all avenues which seem to them likely to lead towards a revival of trade and a renewal of confidence.

A.D.P. H[EENEY]

[Postscript:]

The essence of the thing is that our officials should not feel "egg bound"—that they are to sit silent to wait for the U.K. & U.S. on all occasions for fear they may be taken to involve the gov[ernmen]t. They should feel it their right & their duty to examine & put forward any proposals which commend themselves to their judgment as being likely to help in averting catastrophe.

³⁶ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

I do hope you & the P.M. will be able to meet the delegation before they go.

WASHINGTON FINANCIAL DISCUSSIONS

7. The Secretary reported that the Canadian delegation would leave on August 25th for the official discussions in Washington, to open on August 27th. The Ministerial meetings would begin September 7th. It was not entirely clear on what basis the official discussions would be conducted and it was impossible at this stage even to put forward hypothetical questions of policy that might come up. It seemed probable that the meetings would be mainly concerned with going through the agenda as ground work for the ministerial discussions.

8. The Minister of National Revenue enquired as to the possibility that consideration might be given to tariff changes which would be of assistance to the United Kingdom. Canadian duties averaged only 3 to 9% on U.K. products and it might be desirable to consider the possibility of removing them entirely. This would raise questions as to "most-favoured-nation" obligations to other countries. Any removal would have to be regarded as short-term. Other possibilities were the waiver of dumping duties as applied to U.K. products but without extending such waiver, as was now necessary, to the same products from other sources. A third possibility was the acceptance of U.K. invoice prices as value for duty.

9. The Prime Minister suggested that there was both a political and an economic aspect to be kept in mind in the discussions. In the long term Canada had a vital interest in seeing that the United Kingdom achieved a balanced trading position and was able to take a substantial amount of Canadian production. Consideration of balanced trade in the future would involve an examination not only of tariff obstacles but also of costs of production and exchange rates. In general, our position was that we wished to see as complete a removal of trade barriers as possible and that we were prepared to go as far as the United States in that direction. It would be necessary to contemplate easier access of U.K. products into Canada and the United States in future. It would be desirable at the meetings to explore all possible avenues that offered hope of contributing to a solution of the U.K. problems.

10. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted the report of the Secretary and the comments of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Revenue concerning the forth-coming discussions in Washington.

Tripartite economic discussions. Daily report No. 1.

1. The tripartite economic discussions opened Saturday morning under the Chairmanship of James E. Webb, Under Secretary of State. Thorp, Martin, Bissell and some twenty-four United States officials were present. Sir Henry Wilson-Smith headed the United Kingdom group of fifteen officials. After the introductory remarks had been exchanged and the preliminary procedural arrangements agreed upon, the meeting was turned over to Wilson-Smith, who reviewed the course of events in the sterling area from 1947 to 1949. In commencing his remarks, Wilson-Smith noted that, from the United Kingdom point of view, a much greater degree of urgency attached to the present discussions than the earlier ones, which had been held in Washington and London. A breakdown in broad outline was given of the developments which showed the serious decline in sterling area reserves during the second quarter of 1949. A technical sub-committee to examine the sterling area balance of payments figures has been established. This committee, on which Deutsch is our representative, will meet on Sunday.

2. Wilson-Smith concluded his remarks on the deterioration which had taken place in the second quarter of 1949 by noting that the continuation of dollar deficit of $600,000,000 a quarter constituted an "obviously impossible state of affairs, in spite of the E.R.P. and Canadian credit".

3. In turning to deal with the current quarter, Wilson-Smith asked his 36-odd non-United Kingdom listeners to regard the information which he was about to give them as very confidential. His estimate was that the dollar deficit in the current quarter would probably not be substantially below that of the second quarter. On present estimates, there would be some decrease. Nevertheless, his guess was that the sterling area deficit would be approximately $600,000,000 in this quarter. The United Kingdom's dollar deficit would probably show a slight decrease, with the rest of the sterling area and the D[e]partment O[f] T[reasury]'s deficits remaining broadly the same. The independent sterling area would probably produce a slight plus in the third quarter in comparison to the £30,000,000 sterling loss to South Africa in the previous quarter. The position with respect to Belgium and Switzerland will not be clear until the details of the intra-European Payments Scheme are cleared up. Although the reserve figure as of September 30th cannot be forecast at the present time, it is clear that there will be another further substantial drop from the June 30th figure of $1,652,000,000 of dollars.

4. [Stephen L.] Holmes, Board of Trade, gave recent trade figures. The United Kingdom July exports to the United States were $15,000,000, still well below the first quarter of 1949 average of $21,000,000. July exports to Canada at $26,000,000 are equal to the first quarter monthly average.

5. Wilson-Smith devoted most of the two-hour afternoon meeting to a discussion of a United Kingdom paper on the "balance of payments of the sterling area, before and after the war". (Copies of this paper, which has 7 pages of text and 16 tables, will be forwarded by bag.)† In the short period which was given to questions, Thorp asked about the "institutional operation" of the sterling area and how its post-war operations differed from those of pre-war. The significant changes in the "institutional" arrangements were described as:

(1) The exchange control system which operates as a fence around the sterling area;

(2) The post-war situation had required certain identity of policies amongst the members of the sterling area. As a result, there were many policy discussions between Governments and officials on matters relating to the dollar problem. The attempt was to follow broad policies which were agreed upon by sovereign Governments.

6. Bissell introduced a lively topic when he asked if the United Kingdom had any estimate of the effect which speculation about sterling has had on the balance of payments. The United Kingdom replied that they had not been able to make any quantitative estimate of this point, except with respect to the drawing down of sterling balances held in American account. The full effect of this item had, however, been felt in the previous quarter. The best examination which the United Kingdom had been able to make has revealed no unusual disparity in payments lagging behind physical trade. Wilson-Smith acknowledged that the United Kingdom officials tend to minimize the extent of the drain caused by speculative effect, whereas others think it is significantly large. In any event, the United Kingdom doubt if figures on this point could be "quantified". Similarly, when Bissell raised the question of cheap sterling, he was told that the best evidence that the United Kingdom could turn up showed that the drain caused by cheap sterling was less in the second quarter than it had been in the first. Although it is always possible to find loopholes, the United Kingdom expressed confidence that these could and would be closed. Bolton, Bank of England, was emphatic that they have been able to produce no evidence at all that either cheap sterling or the "lags and leads of payments", had any effect on the sterling area's dollar income. The most damaging evidence which they had found was that actual purchases and sales of certain commodities had stopped entirely, owing to the fears caused by speculation about sterling.

7. Therefore, on two points which many United States officials regard as important elements in the increased drain on sterling reserves, the United Kingdom offered no ammunition whatever.

8. Press arrangements.

It was agreed by all sides that there should be no statements made to the press, except whatever joint statements might be decided upon toward the end of the official meeting. It was considered most unlikely that there would be many such statements. A brief release was given to the press stating that the official meetings were designed to prepare material for the Ministerial meetings and that there would, therefore, be no statements issued to the press on the progress of the official meetings.

9. Documents.

Eight copies of all documents will be forwarded to Ottawa by bag, for distribution to the Privy Council Office, Finance, Trade and Commerce, Bank of Canada, External Affairs and the High Commissioner's Office in London. A particularly interesting paper on the "general survey of multilateral trade and payments"† has been prepared by the United Kingdom delegation. Although Wilson-Smith described this as an unofficial paper, hastily prepared on the Queen Mary, it is a most thoughtful one, which merits a wide circulation in Ottawa. This paper, which will be forwarded by bag, will form the basis of Monday morning's discussions.

*Le sous-ministre du Commerce et de l'Industrie au ministre du Commerce et de l'Industrie
Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to Minister of Trade and Commerce*

Washington, August 29, 1949

Dear Mr. Howe,

I think you might be interested in a few personal observations despite the fact that the Conference has not got down to business as yet.

In the first place, Harry Wilson-Smith is here without much support on the United Kingdom side, and actually without benefit of any instructions from his Government. He literally did not see Cripps before he left London and is, I think, finding it rather embarrassing stalling for time until he gets word from the British Cabinet. Cripps, I gather, is not so well. At least, when he returned to London he immediately went off to his country place, and was not prepared to meet the Cabinet.

The American team consists of Martin of the Treasury, Bissell and Thorp, with Webb, the Under-Secretary of State in the chair. One of the great disadvantages to progress is the size of the meetings. The Americans find it difficult to meet in a small group, and yet Wilson-Smith is not prepared to open up in a meeting of 45 or 50. However, tonight Webb is having a small dinner, which will be attended from our side by Robertson, Towers and Wrong, and some progress may be made then.

From preliminary conversations with the Americans, it does seem to me that there is no chance whatsoever of spectacular action by the United States, at least until the next session of Congress, starting in January. It may be that something can be done this year through existing machinery, i.e., the International Bank, the Export Import Bank, etc., but this will be unlikely to affect our immediate situation. Needless to say, there has been no indication at all from the British, as yet, regarding their import programme for the coming year. We may get it in a few weeks, but probably not until towards the end of the meetings here. Under these circumstances, there are very serious problems for some of our exporters, such as the West Coast lumber people, pulp manufacturers and others. The best they can hope for is a possible opportunity to bid against American suppliers on ECA orders, but there seems to be little or no chance of the United Kingdom giving them the sort of firm contracts that they need in order to plan their winter's operations. I am thinking at the moment particularly of the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company, whose story was told to me the other day by Renault St. Laurent and R.H. Kennedy of Quebec. Their entire output has, in the past, been sold to the British. Their woods operations and manufacturing take place during the winter, and deliveries of their product—mechanical groundwood pulp—are made in the spring and summer. Consequently, they have to invest $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 during the winter, which naturally poses a problem for them in the absence of a firm contract—and yet the whole community of Clark City and some of the neighbouring communities are dependent for a livelihood on the operations of the mill. I think it would be well if some of our people started to have a look at situations like this, to see what action the Canadian Government would have to take if, indeed, no order from the British is forthcoming.

There may be a little more to report later on in the week. So far, there has been practically nothing in the form of meetings, except the presentation of a couple of papers by the British, which have no doubt been sent on to Ottawa.

Yours sincerely,

MAX [MACKENZIE]

Tripartite economic discussions. Daily report No. 2.

1. Two meetings were held yesterday (Monday), one at 11 a.m. lasting for two hours and a second at 3 p.m. for a period of an hour and a half.

2. Both occasions heightened the impression gained on Saturday that it would become increasingly difficult for the United Kingdom representatives to present their views on matters of intimate Government policy. The greater part of the day's discussion was devoted to considering some points raised in the United Kingdom's paper entitled "General Survey of Multilateral Trade and Payments", mentioned in paragraph 9 of daily report No. 1, and to Item No. 2 of the agenda proper. In both cases the obvious difficulty of getting to grips with the essence of the problem in the hearing of some 25 or 30 American officials was apparent, and only the more general and background phases were introduced by United Kingdom spokesmen.

3. On the whole, the day was most frustrating because organizational and procedural problems had not been solved. These were discussed at a small dinner party given last night by Mr. Webb and attended, on our side, by Robertson, Wrong, Towers and Deutsch. The United States have agreed to split the meeting up. Specialized and perhaps rather technical subjects will be assigned to sub-committees. These will serve a useful purpose in themselves and will also divert the attention of some of the United States hordes who have attended the meetings up to now. A special central group will devote itself to central questions of high political delicacy. The agenda for ministerial discussion would, of course, emerge from this group. The United States delegation is having a meeting this morning (Tuesday) to consider the new procedure, and a meeting of the central group will follow it. On the central group we expect to be represented regularly by Robertson and Towers, with other members of the delegation attending whenever it is appropriate.

4. The morning meeting opened with a report by Deutsch on behalf of the Statistical Sub-Committee that had been active over the week-end in an effort to shed light on certain features of the sterling area balance of payments, not currently too well illuminated. The Statistical Sub-Committee's preliminary report, dated August 29th will be forwarded by diplomatic bag. It indicates the need for additional information concerning each component of the sterling area, and the relationship of Belgium and Switzerland to the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area, as well as United Kingdom Government expenditures overseas during post-war years. Some reluctance towards tabling some of this information, if available, was expressed by Wilson-Smith on the grounds that it would put the United Kingdom in the position of providing information concerning other sovereign states, and more often than not prepared by the United Kingdom without consultation.

5. The attention of the meeting was then directed to Item 1 on the agenda and the paper presented earlier by the United Kingdom entitled "General Survey of Multilateral Trade and Payments". Wilson-Smith referred to paragraph 26 of this document entitled "Conditions of Progress—the recreation of a pattern for multilateral trade and payments" as being the nub of the subject matter covered by Item 1 of the agenda, and pointed to the need for obtaining equilibrium between the dollar and non-dollar areas. The general feeling of the meeting was that the paper was well balanced and served as a useful introduction.

6. The discussion was desultory. The most interesting contribution came from Bissell. He emphasized the need for permitting the price system to act as an equilibrating and pervasive mechanism to accomplish the rationing of dollars through self-equilibrium rather than through restrictive trade and monetary control.

7. Robertson suggested that, in the field of import regulation, consideration might be given to the use of fiscal measures (tariffs and taxes). These had been outlawed by GATT and ITO. Nevertheless, they might prove a useful "halfway house" between, on the one hand, "quantitative restrictions" which are permitted by GATT and ITO under certain circumstances and, on the other hand, complete non-discrimination. Fiscal measures had the great advantage of allowing the price system to work, although cushioning its effects. Robertson's suggestion appeared to gain tacit approval from leaders of the United States side such as Thorp and Bissell, but it seemed to give Stephen Holmes quite a fright.

8. The afternoon meeting turned to a consideration of Item 2(A) of the agenda concerning internal measures taken by the United Kingdom to improve its competitive position as an offset to declining extraordinary assistance. Hall of the United Kingdom Cabinet Office led the discussion which was even less satisfactory than in the morning. He discussed the United Kingdom Labour Government policy of full employment. He attempted to play down the effects of a full employment policy with respect to external dollar equilibrium and to portray the Government role in controlling the flow of capital goods between domestic investment and foreign export as being an unimportant one.

9. Holmes supplemented this by a discussion of United Kingdom prices as an element in dollar sales. He pointed out that not all United Kingdom goods were underpriced by dollar competition. Price comparisons made by the United Kingdom had not established marked differentials unfavourable to the United Kingdom. Quality differences made comparisons difficult. He then cited the agencies active in the United Kingdom seeking increased dollar exports through gains in productivity, and through research and standardization. He mentioned the hoped-for gains resulting from new equipment installations, a process interrupted by war, and other features such as improvement in skills and planned deployment of labour.

10. Deutsch questioned whether the interpretation presented by Holmes was justified in view of the Canadian experience where, although the absorption of United Kingdom exports had increased during the last 2½ years, it was still well below the pre-war relationship to total imports, and even lower in relationship to national income. There will be further consideration of these matters, possibly in a sub-committee.

Tripartite economic discussions. Daily report No. 3.

1. On Tuesday some progress was made in dividing up the work of the conference, although little progress was made in getting on with the real work of the conference.

2. The Central Group.

The Central Group managed to compress its numbers to twelve (United States five (Webb, Thorp, Nitze, Martin and Bissell), United Kingdom five, Canada two).

The agenda was gone through rapidly, some items being put off from it entirely. It was agreed that the Article 9 question was now essentially a political one and should be deferred until the Ministerial conference. Wednesday the Central Group will take up the relationship of the United Kingdom to the rest of the sterling area (Item 6). The nature and forthrightness of Wilson-Smith's contribution at this meeting should give indication whether the conference of officials will be able to make any real progress in preparation for the Ministerial discussions. The United Kingdom officials have so far held back from coming to grips with the central issues. It may be that when the results of the Cabinet discussions in London are available to them the United Kingdom officials will be able to use the remaining days of this week to good purpose. To date they have given the impression of talking to a rather tired brief. One United Kingdom official acknowledged that they feel "completely ineffective". It is the uncertainty as to the United Kingdom Cabinet policy and not any attitude of the Americans which has created this feeling. The tone of the discussion and the United States party line have been well maintained at the senior levels.

3. Sub-Committee on "Competitive Position of British Goods in Dollar Markets". (Canadian representatives, Mackenzie, Rasminsky and Plumpton).

The United States (E.C.A.) tabled a lengthy document containing an analysis of United Kingdom exports to the United States a copy of which has been made available to us some weeks ago. This document, which attributed whatever success the United Kingdom had in 1948 largely to the sales of scrap brass and automobiles, contained little material on competitive prices. We have, therefore, decided to put in some factual material on comparative prices based on the memorandum in the "Black Book."

The sub-committee then had a most unproductive and unhelpful dissertation on United Kingdom productivity by an expert from the United States Department of Labor, (Mr. Silberman, Chief of Productivity and Technological Development Branch, Bureau of Labor Statistics), who could only with difficulty be stopped from working his way painfully through a huge document which he seemed intent upon inflicting on the meeting. This expert's conclusion is that the United Kingdom is two generations behind the United States in industrial technique. To help overcome this technique gap, he said that the United States was prepared to send teams of experts to the United Kingdom in almost every field, including ship building.

(This sub-committee is considering items 2(A) (II), (C), (E) of the agenda.)

4. Sub-Committee on Customs Procedure. (Deutsch and Keith). Meets Wednesday morning.

5. Timetable.

The United Kingdom Ministers are expected to arrive Tuesday night (September 6th). The Ministerial talks are therefore now scheduled to begin Wednesday afternoon, continuing through Saturday. The United States side said that, if necessary, they might be able to squeeze in a Monday morning meeting (September 12th). Snyder, however has definitely excluded the possibility of having any tripartite talks take place while the Fund and Bank meetings are in progress. His reasons for this—number of Finance Ministers in Washington whom he will have to see, and undesirability of tripartite talks being carried on behind the backs of the other countries—appear quite correct to us.

If, as is the present aim, the official talks are wound up by Friday night (September 2nd), our officials may wish to return to Ottawa by air Saturday morning, returning to Washington with the Ministers on Tuesday.

TRIPARTITE ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS—DAILY REPORT NO. 4.

1. On Wednesday the work of the Conference proceeded somewhat unevenly, with some progress made by the sub-committees while the main group continued their discussion of more important aspects of the agenda.

2. The Central Group. Items 6 and 7 of the Agenda. (Canadian representatives: Robertson, Towers and Rasminsky on Item 6 and Robertson, Mackenzie and Deutsch for Item 7).

The Central Group in considering Item 6 of the agenda covering “sterling arrangements relative to the United Kingdom dollar problem”, discussed the downward movement of sterling balances held by India and Pakistan. The United Kingdom volunteered that the rate of release for these balances was heavily influenced by political as well as economic considerations.

When the United Kingdom pointed to the material deterioration of the overall balance of payments position for India, the United States side produced a guess that this deficit might reach $900 million dollars on the basis of the present annual rate and this was not contradicted by the United Kingdom.

We pointed out that the drain on the United Kingdom occasioned by reducing sterling balances plus the other difficulties of their own position made it unlikely that the United States objective of viability by 1952 could be achieved and that if the United Kingdom gap proved to be so great that “savage” internal measures were required to correct it then the only alternative open might be to permit exchange rates to move freely to achieve equilibrium by that means with the dollar area. Robertson emphasized the strategic and political importance of India to this continent.

Item 7 of the agenda, covering arrangements (including stockpiling) for individual commodities resulted in a discussion chiefly about rubber and tin.

The United Kingdom pressed for more elasticity in the use of natural rubber and while receptive to this thought, the United States side advanced strategic considerations underlying the required use of synthetic. To a similar plea for an increase in the rate of stockpiling rubber, the United States replied that the stockpiling programme should be based on closely related considerations rather than balance of payments aspects, which in turn might lead to domestic pressures that could combine to hazard an essential security programme.

On tin, the United Kingdom side hopes for United States assurance of a healthy purchasing programme and the possibility of a multilateral agreement between exporting and importing countries. The subject of tin is being pursued at the agency level (RFC).

The United Kingdom representatives intimated that even the small favour of stepped-up stockpiling of tin by Canada would be greatly received.

Today the central group will carry on with a discussion of items 2(g) and (i) of the agenda, concerned with the maintenance of a high level of business activity by creditor countries, and action with respect to trade barriers, respectively.

3. Sub-Committee on "Competitive Position of British Goods in Dollar Markets". Item 2 (a) (II) and 2 (C) and (E) of the Agenda. (Canadian representatives: MacKenzie and Plumpre.)

This is known as the "Productivity" Group, and their discussion was concerned principally with price considerations. As specific information was in short supply, we put forward a paper condensed from "Black Book" material, omitting the conclusions, which were given privately to United Kingdom representatives.

The United States side brought up the impact of cartels, trade associations, patents, etc., as considerations which tended to strait-jacket trade patterns when there was an obvious need for the development of new trade channels by the United Kingdom.

Today's meeting will discuss the problem of incentives for United Kingdom exports to the dollar area.

4. Sub-Committee on Customs Procedure. Item 2 (H) of the Agenda. (Canadian representatives: Deutsch and Keith).

An encouraging note was struck by the Bureau of Customs representative in reviewing the action being taken to streamline customs procedure and provide quicker and firmer classification action. The expressed intent of aiding imports through administrative reform and legal amendments consistent with GATT obligations was a welcome feature and of significance for the medium and long-term aspects. One project under active consideration is the adoption of a procedure enabling classification by previewing samples, which would be of particular assistance for a medley of European goods which ECA believes could be introduced advantageously to the United States market.

5. Sub-Committee on Alternative Sources of Supply from Non-Dollar Areas. Item 4 (A) of the Agenda. (Canadian representatives: Ritchie and Murray.)

It was too evident that specific United Kingdom proposals were lacking, and the discussion turned to an examination of sterling area development projects from the point of view of economic reality. In this field and on the question of east-west trade the exchange of opinions was of an introductory nature.

Tripartite Economic Discussions—Daily Report No. 5.

1. The sub-committees were kept busy Thursday completing their reports in time for presentation Friday to the main committee. The progress of the work was such that it became evident that the official discussions would be able to conclude Friday afternoon.

2. Central Group. (I) Ministerial Agenda.

The central group, in two meetings, made good progress in preparing an agenda for the Ministerial meetings. The Ministerial agenda, which is now in draft form, will receive consideration this morning. The agenda is very much shorter than the one for the official meetings. The aim has been to try to phrase the various topics in such a way that creditors and debtors can both talk to them. This should make it easier to have fruitful discussions at an early stage in the Ministerial talks and to avoid the situation which cramped the progress for the first two days of the present discussions, when it was not clear how the agenda items would be handled.

(II) Tariffs.

In the course of a discussion on the possibilities for tariff reductions by creditor countries, the United States acknowledged that there was really nothing that could be done on their side until the third round of negotiations gets underway at Geneva, probably some time in the summer of 1950. Any public indication that tariff reductions were being considered during the present meetings would only make more difficult the approaching Senate debate on the reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. When discussing the general problem of tariffs rather than the specific problem of what could be done now the Americans showed a clear appreciation that the present situation really calls for unilateral reductions by the United States. They have, however, to work within the instruments available to them, which results in reductions being negotiated on a reciprocal basis; whatever benefit the United States receives usually being negated by the imposition of quantitative restrictions.

(III) Levels of income and employment in the United States.

At the meeting of the central group on Thursday, September 1st Willard Thorp spoke for the United States on the subject of the maintenance of high levels of production and employment. He said that there was not much that could be added to the President's report: that some further reduction in commodity price levels was expected in the course of the twelve-month period commencing July 1st last—perhaps something of the order of 5 percent: that the reduction in G.N.P. was not expected to exceed this percentage; and therefore that they expected the volume of production to be maintained at more or less the levels of 1948–1949. They expected that the budget deficit would be between $2 and $3 billions. Thorp did not give any estimate of unemployment figures, but assumed that there would be no formidable increase. We raised the question as to whether unemployment might not be quite substantial by the end of next year if there is some tapering off of the capital investment programme, and having in mind that the natural increase in the working force, plus increased productivity would mean that there would have to be a distinct increase in volume of production to keep unemployment down to reasonable figures. Thorp did not have any definitive views to express on this subject. He agreed that if unemployment reached five millions Congress would be likely to consider all possible measures for dealing with the problem, and pointed out that the existence of the Council of Economic Advisers emphasized the concern of the United States in the question of high employment. The United Kingdom representatives stressed the deep interest which was felt in their country in United States policy in this field and the rather common assumption that the United States was likely to accept very broad swings in business and employment as an inevitable part of the free enterprise system. Anything which could be done by the United States to dispel this view would be useful. Largely for the benefit of the United Kingdom, we pointed out that United States figures of unemployment could be quite formidable while at the same time United States consumption was maintained at high levels.

Paul Nitze gave some estimates of the possible international current account position of the United States in 1950–1951. He stressed the fact that these estimates were ones which he had made up for his own benefit and were highly tentative. He guessed that imports of merchandise might be about $6,400,000,000. To arrive at a figure of dollars available for purchase of United States exports he added $3,000,000,000 of United States Government assistance—a figure which we think seemed optimistic to some of the other Americans—and added further amounts representing private capital movements, international bank loans, etc. His final figure of dollars available was $10,800,000,000 which he thought would represent approximately the same volume of exports as in 1948 after allowing for some decrease in prices. There was no extensive discussion of these estimates. It was obvious that everyone thought that they presented a happy picture which seemed too good to be true.

(IV) Stockpiling.

Nitze made the point which may have to be made again during the Ministerial meetings that it would be most unwise consciously to attempt to change the stockpiling programme into an instrument to provide some measure of dollar assistance to the sterling area. If it became evident that the stockpile programme was being used to assist the British the administration would immediately be open to heavy pressure to use the programme to assist depressed segments of the American economy.

3. Sub-committee on "competitive position of British Goods in dollar markets."

The United Kingdom reported on the incentives which are used to assist dollar exports. We pointed out, in reply, that many of the incentives really amounted to the removal of existing difficulties. In the afternoon the United Kingdom representatives agreed that the present incentives were not, in fact, sufficient, and that quite new incentives would be required. From the Canadian point of view the report as drafted yesterday is admirable. It is doubtful though that it will be acceptable to the United Kingdom delegation. The Committee's report is being presented Friday morning by Mackenzie to the central group.

4. Other sub-committees

The reports of the sub-committees on customs procedure and on the alternative sources of supply in the non-dollar areas are being presented to the full committee Friday afternoon. The delegation will bring copies of all the reports submitted when they return to Ottawa by air Saturday morning.

Tripartite Economic Discussions—Daily Report No. 6, covering Friday, September 2nd.

1. The Central Group.

Mackenzie, as chairman of the sub-committee on the competitive position of the United Kingdom, submitted its report. The report had only been completed the previous evening. Wilson-Smith had not seen it. As forecast in our previous report, he was obviously disturbed by its contents and asked that its circulation should be strictly limited. His worries focused on the following points:

(a) The report went a long way in accepting the thesis that United Kingdom prices are "out of line";

(b) Some suggestions for the improvement of the productivity of United Kingdom industry by means of technical assistance from the United States might prove disturbing to arrangements already made along these lines;

(c) The report concluded that existing incentives to United Kingdom businessmen to expand dollar exports were inadequate—with a not very thinly veiled implication regarding devaluation.

2. A brief discussion of devaluation followed. Wilson-Smith reminded the group that he had no instructions and that this matter, above all, was highly political. He gave assurance, however, that it had, in the past, been very fully discussed, both among officials and with the Ministers directly concerned. He added that its value might be quickly dissipated if it was not accompanied by renewed anti-inflationary measures to hold down costs. Webb said that his own delegation was also under political disabilities in discussing the question. Alluding to the fund, he pointed out that many interested countries were not at the present discussions. However, the United States side had failed to find any satisfactory alternative solution to the basic problems confronting the United Kingdom. Hall indicated that United Kingdom officials, in advising their Ministers, had used many of the arguments that United States officials would like to see advanced.

3. Discussion then moved forward to the draft Ministerial agenda (we have already sent by teletype the document as finally accepted). The only new point raised was in connection with the future of multilateralism and convertibility. Wilson-Smith enquired whether the United States was likely, in the coming discussions, to make new requests for reassurances on these subjects. He referred back to the general historical paper that he had presented on this subject, which questioned the wisdom of trying to achieve these objects before the necessary economic balance had been established throughout the world. Bissell began a discussion of the United Kingdom-Argentine Agreement which seemed to lead away from the desired objectives, but the time arrived to conclude the meeting before he could complete his point.

4. The earlier discussion of Mackenzie's report raised two basic questions to which thought will have to be given before and at the Ministerial Conference:

(a) Circulation of documents (at the beginning of the official conference both the United States and the United Kingdom asked for 60 copies each of all conference papers, and they now seem to be in a mood to impose much stricter limitations);

(b) Relations with the press.

5. On Friday afternoon the full group reconvened for the first time since Monday afternoon and received reports from the respective sub-committees, along the lines of the subject matter included in earlier daily reports.

6. Copies of each sub-committee report will be forwarded as soon as they are made available.

Washington, September 8th, 1949

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

It would take a bold man to attempt at this stage any prediction of the probable outcome of these talks or even to attempt any judgement of the progress made so far. I am not that bold. All that I hope to do in this note (and the enclosures) is to give you a general supplement to the daily cable reports on what is happening here.

As you will know, the preliminary official talks began on August 27th and ended last Friday, September 2. During those talks the detailed agenda (Document M-18 enclosed)† was examined at some length with a view to ascertaining the facts concerning the various topics and to determining which items might usefully be discussed by the Ministers.

The “fact-finding” on most of the topics was undertaken by four subcommittees, the reports of which I am enclosing.† These reports relate to:

- (1) Balance of Payments Statistics
- (2) Competitive Position of British Goods
- (3) U.S. Customs Procedures
- (4) Substitution of non-dollar for dollar Sources for U.K Imports
- (5) Problems with respect to tin, rubber, and general stockpiling policy.

Generally, these reports will be found to be rather inconclusive. In fact, the purpose of the several sub-committees was not so much to secure agreed conclusions which could be reported to Ministers collectively as to produce a discussion on the basis of which each Delegation could advise its own Minister separately on what the “facts” appeared to be. The reports themselves have no very definite status (in fact, one of them—the one on the U.K. competitive position—was, in effect, withdrawn on the suggestion of Wilson-Smith), and cannot be referred to as authoritative statements of the common views of all three Delegations. You may, nevertheless, find them of some interest for the indication which they give of the trend of discussions in the sub-committees—even though they may not provide much of a clue to the inner thoughts of individual officials or to the views which the various Ministers may eventually express. Some of the topics on the agenda (particularly items 2b, 2g, 2i, 2j, 3, 4b, 5 and certain aspects of 6) were reserved for discussion in the central group of senior officials and were not referred to sub-committees. The discussion of these items was also largely of a “fact-finding” character.

Of the material which was submitted during the official discussions, I am sending you by sea bag a collection of the papers which would seem to be of most interest, namely:

(a) The philosophical paper presented by the U.K. on “Multilateral Trade and Payments”.

(b) The U.K. paper on “The Balance of Payments on the Sterling Area before and after the War”.

(c) The E.C.A. paper on “The Prewar and Post-war volume of U.S. Imports from the U.K., as related to prices and unit values.”.

(d) The Canadian paper on “Price Factors Affecting the Sale of British Goods in Canada”.

(e) The U.S. Department of Commerce paper entitled “Data on Competitive Position of British Exports in Various Markets of the World”.

The atmosphere of the official discussions was friendly enough throughout. A great number of questions was directed at the U.K. but there was no tendency to treat U.K. officials as though they were the “prisoners in the dock”. Some of the statements by U.K. representatives were pretty vague and unimaginative, but the other participants seemed prepared to excuse many deficiencies in the U.K. presentation in view of the known absence of Ministerial decisions by the U.K. Government on the policy elements involved. U.S. representatives appeared generally prepared to be cooperative (as was apparent particularly in the discussion on Customs Administration), although the distance which Cabinet Members and Congressmen would be prepared to go along seemed open to some question. Wilson-Smith made a very good impression all round. Webb (the U.S. Under Secretary of State) who was Chairman, also did much to make the preliminary talks friendly and helpful rather than merely critical in tone. Bissell (of ECA) was particularly impressive in the discussions of substance.

The agenda prepared for Ministers was very general (see document D-14 enclosed)† and left room for policy discussion on almost any of the subsidiary items which had been included in the fact-finding excursion of the previous week. The expectation is, however, that most of the attention of Ministers will be given to those measures which might be immediately helpful and that further consideration of the more technical or longer term topics may be referred to some continuing body. In short, it looks as though it will work out very much as you expected, with immediate measures being dealt with, so far as possible, now and with many of the larger and longer-term issues being held over for more extended consideration through some channel or other.

The opening Ministerial meetings yesterday started off in reasonably good mood. I assume that the London papers will carry fairly full reports of the principal formal speeches and I shall not attempt to summarize them here. Bevin's remarks (which may not be reported in the press) were made with considerable emotion and were very well received, particularly by Snyder who described them rather glowingly as "beautiful expressions of a great soul". Bevin expressed the view that Marshall Aid had saved Western Europe from going under, politically as well as economically. He felt that the great question now was whether that part of the world which was still free could remain free and prosperous. Mr. Abbott's statement was more precise than most of the other speeches and put some specific issues in pretty direct terms. His speech is understood to have been welcomed by the State Department (and probably by ECA) but the reaction of the Treasury is not known.

How well Cripps is, and how well he will get along with Snyder, are difficult matters to judge. My own impression is that he doesn't look nearly as fit as he has appeared on other occasions when I have seen him. Bevin, on the other hand, is looking robust (which Makins says he really is) and is showing signs of getting on famously with Snyder.

I should probably mention that one of the concrete measures which the U.K. think might be of immediate assistance to them is the resumption of ECA financing of Canadian wheat. Our people are not all convinced that such a measure would necessarily be in our interest; particularly if other items can be found in the U.K. dollar expenditure programme which could absorb the full allocation of ECA aid, thus making it possible for the U.K. to go on buying Canadian wheat with "free" dollars. You will doubtless be hearing more on this subject from here in the daily reports within the next few days.

I hope that everything is going along well at Canada House.

Yours sincerely,
ED RITCHIE

WASHINGTON FINANCIAL DISCUSSIONS

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs felt that the discussions in Washington had been useful. The meetings had provided a very frank exchange of views between the United Kingdom and the United States. The U.K. representatives had indicated that they were not seeking a further aid programme and the final communique of the meeting had contained the explicit assumption "that extraordinary aid from the North American continent would have come to an end by the middle of 1952". A further point of particular importance in the communique was the recognition by the United States, as one of the participants, "that high tariffs were clearly inconsistent with the position of creditor countries".

There had been full discussion of each of the subjects specifically referred to in the communique and it had been agreed that it would be desirable to establish arrangements for continuing consultation. The U.K. and U.S. representatives were anxious that Canada should be a participant in continuing consultations, and it was probable that the guiding committee would consist of the U.S. Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury, together with the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom and Canada in Washington. Each member of the committee would have a deputy, and the deputies would be able to meet by themselves to carry on the purposes of the main committee.

10. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that there had been valuable discussion of eligibilities for E.C.A. financing. The communique stated that "it will be necessary for the United Kingdom to finance, with its share of E.C.A. funds, a wider range of dollar expenditures than has hitherto been eligible". Specifically, it had been agreed that $175 million should be available for the purchasing of Canadian wheat. There would also be $10 million for bacon, $10.6 million for pulp and paper, $30 million for shipping services, and smaller amounts for manufactured items, petroleum equipment and tobacco. In all, the new range of eligibilities totalled $307 million, which was some $50 million more than was necessary to close the gap between previously eligible requirements and the total of E.C.A. funds available to the United Kingdom.

11. Senator [W.M.] Robertson reported that he had been informed that, under contracts let by the Department of Public Works for erection of public buildings and possibly for other purposes, there were often provisions against use of other than Canadian products, even though there might be equally satisfactory U.K. products available at a lower price. In the present economic situation it seemed undesirable that the government should, in its contracts, be taking such a position when it was important, from our own point of view, to encourage British exports to Canada.

12. The Prime Minister said that, in view of the definite position taken with regard to termination of extraordinary aid by 1952, it would be important to keep in mind, in all aspects of policy, the desirability of achieving a position where as large a proportion as possible of Canadian exports to the United Kingdom could be covered by U.K. exports to Canada. It was desirable to consider what should be said in the House of Commons with regard to the Washington discussions, and a special meeting of the Cabinet might be held on Friday night or Saturday morning with the Minister of Finance to examine the question.

13. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted:

(a) the reports of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the Washington financial discussions; and,

(b) the comments of the Prime Minister as related to provisions of government contracts and other aspects of policy affecting the level of U.K. exports to Canada.

Washington, September 14th, 1949

Dear Mr. Abbott:

I am enclosing a Memorandum which records my personal recollections of the discussions between September 7th and 12th in the ministerial group. I found when I started dictating that I was able to get down on paper a rather longer account than I had expected, but I know that it still contains a lot of gaps.

I might supplement the Memorandum by including in this letter a few impressions on the atmosphere and personalities. I was afraid before the talks started that there would be difficulties with Mr. Snyder, but only on one occasion was there anything which could be called at all sharp exchanges between him and Sir Stafford Cripps. That was when the sterling balances were under discussion. The atmosphere soon cleared, and I am not sure whether Mr. Snyder's sharpness was caused by the discussion itself or by something that had put him rather out of temper before the meeting. He was not inclined to join in discussion of broad issues of policy, such as the means required in the long run to put the United States in a proper balance for a creditor nation, as were Mr. Acheson, Mr. Hoffman, and Mr. Douglas, but he at least did not in any way express dissent, and I think his reticence may have been caused more by the fact that he is less facile in a discussion of this sort than the others, than by disagreement or mental reservation.

On the British side, I thought that Sir Stafford was not quite as persuasive as I had expected him to be, probably because of the poor state of his health. He was, however, extremely frank and, I gather, inclined to discuss more clearly than he did in London in July the nature of the difficulties of the U.K. and the means to meet them. Mr. Bevin was a great success at this conference, and I am sure that he impressed all the Americans who came in contact with him. I should think that the scars left by previous controversies, notably those over policy towards Palestine, have now been healed. Mr. Acheson remarked privately to Mr. Pearson and myself when we were talking over the personalities at the meeting: "The British must take care of Ernie, for he is the hope of the world".

Undoubtedly all those present know each other better than they did when the meetings began and appreciate sympathetically each other's problems and difficulties.

I am sending a copy of my Memorandum, together with a copy of this letter, to Mr. Pearson and Mr. Robertson.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

MINISTERIAL TALKS ON ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL QUESTIONS

This memorandum is a personal record of the meetings between the British, American, and Canadian Ministers in Washington, held from September 7th to September 12th, 1949. It is based on my recollection of the discussion at these meetings, supported by some inadequate notes on some of the subjects discussed. No minutes were kept of these meetings, and so far as I could see, the only notes taken fairly regularly during the proceedings were made by Sir Stafford Cripps and by myself. Those present at the ministerial discussions included Snyder, Acheson, and Hoffman for the United States; Bevin, Cripps, and Franks for the United Kingdom, and Abbott, Pearson, and myself for Canada. (Titles are omitted throughout this memorandum for purposes of brevity.) These nine constituted a central group, which met once on September 7th, twice on September 8th, once on September 9th and 10th, and twice on September 12th. Harriman and Douglas were also present at most of the meetings and at some of them others were brought in for particular discussions, including Thorp, Nitze, and Blaisdell.³⁷ Sawyer (Secretary of Commerce) and Brannan (Secretary of Agriculture) each were present at part of one meeting.

These notes deal only with the meetings of the central group and do not cover the meetings of special groups and those of the drafting committee, which prepared the final communique. This communique contains the record of the understandings reached at the meetings in so far as these could be made public at the time.

Throughout, the discussions in the central group were very frank and there was a manifest desire on the part of all concerned to achieve substantial results. Except at one or two points, the atmosphere was cordial and, as a rule, statements of fact or policy were accepted without question by all present. Snyder presided and proved to be a better chairman than I for one had expected. There follows a brief account of each of the meetings of the central group. This is certainly very imperfect. I have made no attempt to summarize the discussions on questions not of direct concern to Canada, such as on petroleum.

First Meeting, Wednesday, September 7th, at 12 noon

This meeting was preceded by a lengthy and hot session with the photographers and newsreels, at the end of which brief recordings were made, with Snyder, Bevin, and Abbott as spokesmen. At the meeting the procedure for future meetings was settled and a statement on the United Kingdom position was made by Cripps. It was agreed to hold a larger meeting with officials present that afternoon, at which statements would be delivered by a spokesman for each delegation—Snyder, Cripps, and Abbott. These statements were subsequently released to the press.

Second Meeting, Thursday morning, September 8th

This meeting began by listing the topics of discussion and dividing them between those which should be given preliminary examination by special groups and those reserved for ministerial discussion. Four special groups were set up—one on rubber, tin, and stockpiling, with Sawyer as Chairman; one on E.C.A. eligibility, with Hoffman as Chairman; one on Customs procedures, with Foley (Under-Secretary of the U.S. Treasury) as Chairman, and one on overseas investment, with Thorp as Chairman. These groups were requested to present reports on the morning of September 10th. The subjects reserved for ministerial consideration are shown below as they came up for discussion at each meeting.

The meeting then proceeded to consider the question of the dollar earnings of the United Kingdom and sterling area. Hoffman was the spokesman for the U.S. and he made an effective plea for efforts to increase the dollar sales, especially by the U.K. He said that while there was some possibility, by good salesmanship, of expanding the consumption in the U.S. of a few raw materials, such as tea and cocoa, he was thinking primarily of manufactured products. No serious effort had yet been made throughout the sterling area, and particularly by manufacturers in the United Kingdom, to earn dollars outside the few established lines. The U.K. should take a good many actions to provide incentives and opportunities. Small manufacturers in particular should be given effective incentives. A pragmatic approach was necessary and exhortations would not do any good. It should also be made easier for tourists to spend dollars in the United Kingdom. He cited his own experience in trying to secure exemption from purchase tax on things he wished to buy in London for delivery to the ship. He thought the U.K. ought to be able to increase exports to the U.S. by $200 millions a year and to extract a further $100 millions from tourists.

With respect to tourist traffic, he urged that an effort should be made to appeal to factory workers and farmers, who, in present conditions of prosperity and with the growth of paid vacations for factory workers, could afford to spend their holiday abroad, if provided with transportation and accommodation at moderate rates. He said he was satisfied from his own experience in civil aviation that it was possible to provide a return rate to the U.K. for $350 and for the airlines to "make a killing".

He said that he was much more critical of other sterling area countries than of the U.K. in this respect. When in Dublin a few days before, he had exhorted Irish Ministers to get busy earning dollars, and he told them that they could earn $35 millions a year more from tourists if they only would take the trouble. In general, he mentioned the effect throughout the sterling area of their dependence on the United Kingdom for dollars, and argued forcibly that this deprived the other sterling area countries of a real incentive to expand dollar earnings. He demanded from the sterling area and O.E.E.C. countries "the greatest drive for dollars ever known".

He went on to say that if the public in the United States was satisfied that a great effort was being made, public opinion would overcome resistance from special interests fearing competition in the domestic market. A great educational campaign was needed in the U.S., together with some lowering of tariffs and a reform of customs administration. To help the campaign, dramatic evidence from Europe was needed, both on the effort to earn dollars and on the integration of European economies.

Bevin later replied briefly to Hoffman's remarks, emphasizing that a great deterrent in the United Kingdom was fear that if they did establish new markets in the U.S., they would be promptly deprived of these markets by tariff changes. Drawing on his great experience as a Trade Union official, he recalled meetings before and after the first war with American Unions in which the British were exhorted to leave the U.S. market alone and to sell their goods elsewhere in the world. The line taken was that vigorous British competition in the U.S. would interfere with the welfare of labour, delay unionization and affect wage rates. Bevin said that memories of this were still important in labour circles in the U.K. and urged that it was necessary to satisfy as far as possible both manufacturers and trade unionists that they would be able to hold in U.S. markets that which they might gain.

Sawyer was invited to come to this meeting briefly in his capacity as chairman of the special group on tin, rubber and stockpiling. Bevin gave a very effective talk on the importance, from the point of view of defence and resisting Communist infiltration, of maintaining export sales of tin and rubber from Southeast Asia. He remarked that Soviet agents were busy there and were seeking to buy tin and rubber with dollars. This was very appealing to sections of native opinion, particularly when exports for the West fell off, as they had now done sharply. Cripps urged that stockpiling purchases should be placed on a regular schedule so as to maintain an even market, especially for rubber. On the U.S. side, it was pointed out that stockpiling policy was by law controlled by strategic considerations and that the use of funds for stockpiling had to be guided in large part by the views of the Department of Defense.

Third Meeting, Thursday afternoon, September 8th

The first subject discussed was petroleum. Acheson began by mentioning the extreme complexities of the oil industry and the great difficulty in arriving at any generalizations. He said that through the conclusion of bi-lateral agreements and exchange restrictions, American companies had recently been driven out of their markets in four countries. I think that he had France and Argentina specially in mind. He mentioned the great strategic importance that was attached to the maintenance of the American concessions in the Middle East and the consequent necessity of maintaining production and sales from this area. The problem was to find some solution which would not add to the dollar burden of the sterling area.

There was a good deal of discussion of details, which I was too ignorant to follow fully, with Thorp and Hoffman as the principal U.S. contributors to the discussion. Cripps and Bevin were at pains to explain that Argentina was not required by the recent agreement with the U.S. to buy sterling oil, but this was not fully accepted on the American side, on the ground that Argentina would in practice have to spend on oil a substantial part of the sterling received for her meat. Both the U.S. and the U.K. spokesmen appeared to agree that there was on the average a fairly large dollar content in the so-called sterling oil. Cripps said that the net dollar drain for petroleum products in the sterling area would amount to $580 millions this year and that on current estimates it would be reduced only to $500 millions by 1953. He said that this was in large part due to the arrangements which require the U.K. to supply oil to a number of soft currency countries, including France.

It was agreed that the problems involved were too complex to be carried forward at this discussion and that a technical committee should be established, to meet as soon as possible, to go into the issues and to prepare a report for consideration by the Ministers. The British members of this technical committee, who come from the Ministry of Fuel and Power, are arriving in Washington this week.

The discussion then turned to shipping. In general, all the American representatives who spoke deplored the protectionist character of their present shipping policy, both with respect to the use of shipping services and to ship construction. (These two subjects were never very clearly separated during the discussion.)

Harriman began by expressing the hope that the North Atlantic Treaty might make politically possible a new look at U.S. shipping policy, on the ground of the necessity of pooling shipping among the parties for defence purposes. Hoffman agreed, and he and Douglas both spoke from personal experience of the strength of the U.S. shipping lobby and of its remarkable influence in Congress. There would have to be a new climate of opinion in the United States before much could be done. Hoffman remarked that tramp shipping was the centre of the problem and that the use of European tramps was a very good way for the European countries to earn dollars.

Bevin played up the strategic argument, with particular reference to the speed and range of modern submarines and the need for a large reserve of shipping in the event of war. He expressed doubt whether ships now being constructed were fast enough. He remarked that shipping was "one of the things in which sovereignty has really got to go" for the North Atlantic countries.

Acheson said that the Administration would request the U.S. Chiefs of Staff to re-survey the shipping position in the light of the defence aspects of the North Atlantic Treaty and the need for a shipping pool. He went on to say that what was needed in the United States was a vigorous programme for the education of public opinion on shipping and tariff questions in order to "bring home to everybody the absurd situation under which we have been living for thirty-five years". The Administration hoped "to dramatize the American balance-of-payments problem" so as to be able to resist protectionist forces and special interests on a broad front. At present, they were being beaten in Congress in a series of skirmishes on separate issues not of the first importance. (Acheson later said privately to Pearson and myself that he thought this would be made a major political issue by the Administration in next year's congressional elections. He enumerated the various improvisations whereby the U.S. had itself carried its export surplus, from the Morgan loans of 1914, the war debts and the lending spree of the middle 20's, down through Lease-Lend to E.R.P. He remarked that all the world shared their misery when they stopped covering their current surplus by making dollars available in one way or another during the early 30's.)

Fourth Meeting, Friday afternoon, September 9th

The first subject discussed was sterling balances. Cripps began by giving a review of the use of the blocked balances and the arrangements for approved releases. He said that the real problem now reduced itself to the balances held by India and Pakistan. Effective arrangements had been made to stop any serious drain from Egypt. South Africa was now borrowing sterling in London, and the Australian balances were now reduced to a point at which they could be regarded as normal currency reserves.

This led to a rather sharp exchange between Snyder and Cripps. Snyder argued that in fact the balances were not blocked. Cripps denied this and emphasized that releases from them were made only to equal available sterling goods. Such releases certainly did not amount to more than the capital urgently needed in India and Pakistan. The Indian Government had in fact gone some way to bring about a reduction, by agreement to the payment of £100 millions for various assets in India and the assumption of responsibility for pensions for the Indian Civil Service. Snyder returned to the charge by saying that the net result was that the sterling balances today were as large as they had been at the end of the war, since reductions on one account had been cancelled out by increases on another. Snyder did not appear to be convinced by the British defence of their policy and remained plaintive.

Acheson, admitting the need for capital investment in India and Pakistan, pointed out that there were only three sources available—the sterling balances, the sterling area dollar pool, and borrowing in the United States. He suggested that these three approaches should be considered together, in consultation with India and Pakistan. This should help to put the problem in better perspective in those countries and to permit a programme to be worked out.

Bevin then spoke of the great political and social importance of development in these countries and in Egypt because of the great pressure of growing populations and the very low standard of living. He also said that India had come into the war by decision of the British Government, and he and Cripps maintained that if the Congress government were to consent to the cancellation or substantial reduction of that part of the balances which represents war debts, it would be replaced very promptly by a Left Wing government. Bevin remarked that India got a bad deal out of the war.

Acheson said the central question seemed to reduce itself to "How are these areas to be financed in future"? The fallacy in the popular presentation of E.R.P. was that it was to assist the recovery of Europe alone, whereas it included all the sterling area. The Western countries must see India and Pakistan through. When they can find a means to do this, then it will be possible to consider the funding or the reduction of the sterling balances. Cripps had mentioned that it was his hope that in time funding might be arranged at a very low rate of interest.

This led Cripps to introduce the question of drawings on the International Monetary Fund, with special relation to the Indian application. This brought on a short discussion between him and Snyder of the purposes of the Fund, in which Cripps referred to the possibility of repaying drawings in the Fund by later long-term loans, and Snyder maintained that this would be contrary to sound policy. They finally agreed that the policy of the Fund in this respect should be taken up in the Fund itself by their representatives in the near future.

The meeting then turned to the question of tariffs. Acheson began by saying that there could be no prospect of any early uni-lateral U.S. reduction of tariffs and that the best that they could do would be to undertake a third round of negotiations under GATT. Thorp observed that this normally could not take place before next September, although the timetable might be hastened a little. They had to keep the temper of Congress in mind. There was fairly long and inconclusive discussion of the protective effect of the present U.S. rates. Hoffman pointed out that the average rate on dutiable imports was now as low as that under the Underwood tariff. On the British and Canadian side it was pointed out that this in fact concealed the continued existence of a large number of prohibitive rates. Hoffman said the E.C.A. was working on a detailed study designed to show goods which were now not moving to the United States but which might enter on a competitive basis at existing rates of duty if a strong effort were made to sell in this market. He observed that there was quite a list of items of manufactured goods which had entered the United States before the war but were not now being imported. The full E.C.A. study might take six months, but some data would be available within a few days.

The next item for discussion was the British proposal for the liberalization of trade in Europe through a relaxation of import restrictions. I have no notes of this discussion and my memory of it is sketchy. There was great emphasis by Cripps and Bevin, in replies to the question raised by Abbott, on the political necessity of extending to all Commonwealth countries in the sterling area any relaxations which were applied in Western Europe. They said that, if this were not done, Australia, for one, would leave the sterling area immediately. They also maintained that the eco-conomic effect of such an extension would be very small. They argued that the proposals as a whole would not reduce at all the amount of dollars spent in the U.S. and Canada, as they would continue to spend in the dollar area all the dollars they could get. There might be some diversion to different commodities, but the total would not be affected.

Franks intervened to point out the importance of these steps as a means toward the general aim of a multi-lateral system. The sterling area had to get back to multi-lateralism by degrees, and this was something which could be done now to increase international competition. Since the restrictions arose from balance-of-payments difficulties with the dollar area, why should they not be lifted in the case of countries with which these difficulties did not exist? On the U.S. side, there were references to their difficulties in dealing with Congress in order to secure consent to modifying Article 9 of the Loan Agreement. The discussion ended on the understanding that it would be briefly resumed, but it was not considered again in the central group, although there was talk of it on the side. In general, the U.S. attitude ranged from taking no serious objection to the U.K. proposals to definite approval of them. Abbott indicated that, in his judgement, the Canadian Government would go as far as the U.S. in giving consent.

Fifth Meeting, Saturday morning, September 10th

This meeting first considered the reports from the special groups.

Foley presented the report on Customs procedures. This was not a joint report, but a memorandum saying what the U.S. hoped to accomplish. He said that legislation to amend the Tariff Act was now in preparation and that instructions to Customs offices to bring in some administrative changes were being prepared. The whole matter had been studied intensively since last July. Snyder told Cripps that he could not say when it was likely that legislation would be adopted by Congress, but he assured him that the difficulties would be tackled aggressively. Thorp pointed out that domestic opposition to the I.T.O. Charter had not been directed towards this chapter of the Charter but had centred on the chapter dealing with the protection of foreign investments. The U.S. spokesmen said that problems of classification were mainly administrative and that progress had already been made towards greater flexibility, especially towards bringing about uniformity of classification at different ports of entry, permitting classification by sample, and arranging the rapid clearance of shipments directed to established importers. There was no objection to giving publicity in the communique to the intentions of the U.S. Government. On the Canadian side, it was indicated that legislation to give effect to the principles laid down in GATT and the I.T.O. Charter had already been adopted and that the Canadian Government was prepared to take another look at administrative procedures to see if they could be made more simple and flexible.

The next report was an inconclusive document on commodities and stockpiling, presented on Sawyer's behalf by Blaisdell (Assistant Secretary of Commerce). He said that it would be possible within a few hours to be more definite on what the U.S. could do, particularly with reference to the reduction of the requirements for domestic use of synthetic rubber. The U.S. also agreed that an international tin agreement was desirable. They were still in process of clearing matters with the Department of Defense.

When the communique was considered by Ministers on Monday morning it was reported that the U.S. could make a definite commitment to reduce the required proportion of synthetic rubber. An attempt was made to secure in the communique some statement indicating that purchases for stockpiling of tin and rubber would be promptly resumed on a regular basis, but the Department of Defense refused to give its agreement to any public statement to this effect. Cripps and Bevin emphasized the importance of spacing stockpiling purchases in an orderly way so as to keep as even a price as possible.

Thorp then presented the report on overseas investment. He remarked that the report was unanimous and that the special group had not been able to work up a good argument, since there was agreement on the objective.

Bevin mentioned at some length the need of development to look after population increases in Egypt and Asiatic countries, saying that the population question was one of the great and continuing problems in the political field. Health services had outrun economic development, particularly in India and Egypt.

Two concrete suggestions were proposed. The first was that the President's Advisory Committee on Foreign Investment, with Winthrop Aldrich as Chairman, should be invited to go into the whole subject and to consult unofficial financial groups in the United Kingdom and Canada. This was accepted and later inserted in the communique. The second suggestion was put forward by Hoffman. He proposed that the Export-Import Bank should remove its embargo on loans to O.E.E.C. countries, which had been imposed when E.C.A. was heavily involved in making loans during its first year of operation. He said that this was an important proposal, and Snyder agreed that it should be taken up promptly through raising it in the National Advisory Council.

Both Cripps and Thorp mentioned briefly that it might be desirable for the International Bank to loosen its policy so as to cover in some cases in its loans the financing of development projects which had already been undertaken. Railway equipment for India was cited as a case in point.

Douglas urged that Indonesia should not be passed over as a fertile investment field where economic development was urgently required and would be of great assistance in resisting Communist infiltration.

Finally, Snyder said that the issue was tied up with Point IV of the President's Inaugural Address last January. The Advisory Committee already mentioned had had under examination for some time the means to give effect to Point IV and was fully informed of the general principle. He could undertake that this Committee would take a broad view of the role of private investment abroad.

The next report dealt with E.C.A. eligibility problems. Hoffman said that he was awaiting final word from Brannan on the legality of the resumption by E.C.A. of the financing of Canadian wheat for the U.K. Brannan was trying to work it out with his legal advisers. He outlined the proposal that E.C.A. should finance Canadian wheat in the current fiscal year to the extent of $175 millions, provided that the United Kingdom bought U.S. wheat to the tune of $30 millions plus $10 millions of miscellaneous surplus agricultural products, and provided that Canada would undertake to increase its purchases of fresh fruits and vegetables from the U.S. through relaxing import restrictions.

Abbott denied emphatically that a commitment could be made by Canada to relax import restrictions as part of a bargain whereby E.C.A. resumed financing of Canadian wheat. He maintained that this was mainly a matter between the U.S. and U.K., pointing out that the U.K.'s expected over-all deficit with Canada this year would only run to about $200 millions. (This discussion involved repetition of some of the criticisms of the memorandum sent last month by Mr. Attlee to Mr. St. Laurent which purported to show that the U.K. only had $69 millions in free dollars to spend in Canada.)

Hoffman said that he was trying to make a tough deal with Congress, and appealed to Abbott not to "let a few vegetables interfere". Abbott made clear the policy of Canada to relax import restrictions as rapidly as possible and told of the extent to which the restrictions had in fact been relaxed on fresh fruits and vegetables. If any reference was made in the communique to this matter, it would have to indicate that this was a policy which the Canadian Government had been following ever since the restrictions were imposed. The important thing was that it must not be represented as part of a bargain over wheat.

Cripps then informed the group that he had received word that morning that India was not intending to buy any dollar wheat this year, which upset the deal whereby India was intended to switch to Australia an estimated requirement of U.S. wheat to the amount of $30 millions. The U.K., therefore, under the proposal would have to add to its stocks [of] wheat to this amount. Bevin then observed that he had been most apprehensive last year when the Berlin blockade began about the fact that there was only eight or nine weeks' supply of wheat in the U.K. From the point of view of defence, he would be very glad to see larger stocks, covering twelve to sixteen weeks, held in the country.

After an interval, Brannan joined the meeting. He said that his advisers agreed that there was a loophole in Section 112(d) of the Economic Cooperation Act which would permit financing of Canadian wheat on the responsibility of Hoffman. Wheat had already been declared surplus in the U.S. for various other purposes, but the statute gave Hoffman power to overlook the surplus provision of the Act if this was necessary to give effect to its basic purposes. He pledged himself to stand by Hoffman in defending the decision before Congress, the farm bloc, and the public.

Hoffman said that the loophole was the inclusion of the words "in so far as practicable" in Section 112(d). He had tried and failed to get a broad interpretation of this phrase with respect to shipping. He would, however, take full responsibility, but he must warn those present that the effort might fail through the adoption of more restrictive legislation. It was a serious risk and a very real gamble. He must check the position over the week-end with his lawyer and, if possible, with the representatives of the farm organizations in Washington, but he promised vigorous defence of the deal, provided that his lawyer agreed with Brannan's lawyers. On Monday he mentioned that his lawyer raised no objection and that he had been able to secure some support from the farm organizations, including the Farm Bureau, which was most likely to be opposed.

Acheson then raised the question of arrangements for continuing the discussions. This had been referred by Snyder on September 8th to Acheson, Bevin, Douglas, and Franks for consideration. Acheson said that they had agreed to propose the establishment of a body with three purposes: (1) to continue a full interchange of information between the three countries, (2) to keep the over-all situation constantly under examination, and (3) to act as an executive agency to see that work on special problems is accomplished. Existing channels should be used as much as possible. A steering committee ought to be established, and the suggestion was that this should consist of Acheson and Snyder for the U.S., with Hoffman if he so desired, together with the British and Canadian Ambassadors. Probably additional staff would be required at the two Embassies. The principals would need to have deputies for each of them and, while the steering committee would be the key point, the calibre of the deputies would be very important. They themselves should meet regularly, and, if they thought it desirable, they might meet in Ottawa and London on occasion as well as in Washington.

The general idea was to continue unostentatiously the procedure developed at this meeting. Such an organization could continue to handle problems like the financing of Indian capital needs, the removal of import restrictions (with reference to the British proposals for relaxation), and the problems of the oil industry. It should receive regular and full information on the reserve position of the countries concerned. Also, the initiation of bilateral negotiations, such as the U.K. Agreement with Argentina, should be notified to this group, which should be kept currently informed of their progress.

In any public announcement, it was very important for a number of reasons that the establishment of this method of consultation should be played down. Otherwise, too much attention would be concentrated on it, and in particular the suspicions of other countries would be aroused that the U.S., the U.K., and Canada were ganging up. It would certainly not be the intention to use the group as a means of establishing a common front on matters arising before various international organizations, such as the Bank, the Fund, O.E.E.C., and United Nations economic agencies. It was most important always to keep in mind and to prevent a feeling of exclusion growing up in other countries. This proposal was accepted by the central group.

Sixth Meeting, Monday morning, September 12th

This meeting was called to approve the final communique. A drafting committee of senior officials had been set up on September 10th, which had met that afternoon and on Sunday. Their draft had been reviewed early on Monday morning by the three Ministers of Finance. The central group went over the revised draft paragraph by paragraph and made a number of changes and additions, mostly of a minor character.

Seventh Meeting, Monday afternoon, September 12th

The communique was approved at a brief larger meeting, attended by many officials. It was immediately issued to the press and a press conference was held in the State Department, attended by all the Ministers. The central group then re-assembled for a short final discussion, which marked the termination of the conversations.

TELEGRAM WA-3146

Washington, November 17, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Matthews, accompanied by Murray, attended the first meeting of the continuing tripartite discussions with Rowan and Labouisse this afternoon.

2. Labouisse reported on the action which had been taken by the United States under each of the subjects listed under paragraph 7 of the communique issued at the close of the September discussions.

(1) Overseas investments. This matter had been referred to the Aldrich Committee for investigation but the Committee has not yet proceeded with its work. Will you please advise whether a Canadian group to consider this problem has been appointed as provided in paragraph 8 of the communique.

(2) Commodity arrangements and stock piling. Rubber. The specifications in the United States have been changed to permit a greater use of crude rubber and the situation is being reviewed to see if further relaxation may not be possible.

Tin. The Munitions Board is considering further purchases and while no final decision has been taken it is expected that the RFC will retain existing stocks.

Please advise whether Canadian specifications have been changed to match the existing United States ones, and also whether any progress has been made concerning Canadian stock piling as suggested in paragraph 9 of the communique.

Rowan wanted it to be a matter of record that with a return to the open market for tin it will not be possible to prevent indirect shipments reaching the U.S.S.R.

(3) ECA financing. No comment.

(4) Customs procedures. The Treasury Department is studying the administrative changes and the legislative requirements that have become apparent following the discussions with Canada and the United Kingdom last week and those which will arise during discussions with various European countries this week.

A meeting of collectors from all customs ports has been called for December 5th where talks on the overall policy will be given by Webb and Snyder in an effort to change the present point of view of collectors, which has been to exclude goods in any manner possible.

(5) Tariff policy. Labouisse stated that the United States administration was studying the possibilities of a complete change in the United States policy but realized that the formation of a new policy and its implementation would be a long-term project. It is realized that the scope under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is not adequate.

(6) Intra-European trade and payments. Rowan referred to the recent United Kingdom removal of quota restrictions on 50 percent of imports from OEEC countries other than Belgium and Switzerland. He also stated that the possibility of making all OEEC currencies convertible amongst themselves was being explored at the suggestion of the United Kingdom.

(7) Sterling balances. Rowan anticipates that a statement of the existing position will be available within two weeks, which will then be handed to the other representatives for study by their Governments.

(8) Petroleum. Labouisse handed out copies of a United States working paper headed "Petroleum Problems", which is being reported to you in my immediately following teletype.

(9) Shipping. The problem of pooling shipping in the event of an emergency and working out plans for its use within the framework on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has been referred to the N[ational] S[ecurity] R[esources] B[oard]. State Department feel that if a satisfactory pooling arrangement can be reached at least one of the strategic arguments for retaining the present shipping policy would be removed.

3. Labouisse reported that, in the recent discussions in Paris, Bevin had asked Acheson to inform him exactly what the duties would be of the "dynamic person" whom the United States suggested should be appointed to head up OEEC. State Department are endeavouring to draft a suitable reply.

4. At the same time, Bevin asked for a description of the meaning of "European integration". Labouisse stated that the State Department in this case also are trying to put down on paper the individual measures which they consider to be desirable, and pointed out that they did not expect these elements, when added up together, would be the equivalent of a dictionary definition of "integration".

5. Rowan mentioned the reports that had been circulating concerning a proposed exchange between the United States and India of wheat for manganese. He said that the negotiations appeared to have temporarily broken down. Rowan stated that he would like to discuss this matter further since any interruption in the flow of manganese from India to the United Kingdom would vitally affect their steel industry and might disrupt their whole economy. Labouisse pointed out that in discussions such as this with India the United States did not feel it would be appropriate for them to raise with the Indians any relationship between the transaction and sterling balances, but thought such problems could be considered in the tripartite discussions.

6. Rowan stated the United Kingdom were satisfied with the statistics that were now being received reporting on trade and asked whether the other Governments were satisfied with the statistics being provided by the United Kingdom. He stated that the United Kingdom would provide quarterly analyses of the sterling balance of payments similar to those provided during the Ministerial talks. He also stated that he felt each country should provide forecasts as to future balance of payments. He did not consider that these need go into the details such as those that are made available at the United Kingdom—Canadian continuing talks.

Minister, Embassy in United States to Head, Economic Division

Washington, November 18, 1949

Dear Wynn:

I know that during Hume's visit to Ottawa he will talk to you about the continuing tripartite discussions I am to have with Labouisse and Rowan. I think, however, that it might be worthwhile writing to you to give you some of my rather rambling thoughts on the problems which those in the group will face so that you can let me know how you and others in Ottawa are thinking.

So far as our internal procedure in the Embassy is concerned, Dick Murray is going to accompany me to the meetings. We propose to have a weekly meeting of all persons in the Embassy who are interested in financial or commercial matters to discuss what has taken place at the main meetings and to get suggestions as to matters that might be brought up there. I also intend to ask for comments on the reports of each meeting of the main body, which are sent to Ottawa, and where it seems worthwhile I will pass the comments I receive on to you. Will you please let me know if you find the flow of information too great or inadequate.

As I see the Canadian role in these talks I think one of our main jobs will be to keep prodding the United States to take the necessary steps within the fields outlined in the communique to increase the United States dollars available to the rest of the world. To fill this role I think it is most important that those steps which are expected of Canada should be taken as promptly as possible. Our only commitments to date appear to be the consideration of some increased stockpiling of tin and rubber, the appointment of a group from the financial field who can consult with the United States group concerning investment abroad, and a further review of our customs procedure. Will you let me know when any decision or action has been taken on these points.

I am also in some doubt as to the role Canada is meant to play when problems come up which are primarily of interest to the United States and the United Kingdom and only of interest to us insofar as their solution may improve the general world situation. It is obvious that the petroleum question will fall within this group and will become one of the first to receive consideration. I hope you will keep the Embassy advised as to Canadian thinking on problems of this type as they arise, and also will keep us advised as to how active we should be in our participation in the discussion of these problems.

I also find in the broader field of "European integration" that we have very little on hand concerning Canadian thinking. Even in the United States thinking does not seem to have progressed far beyond the stage of believing that integration is "a good thing". Our records do not disclose, however, whether Ottawa considers it "a good thing" or "a bad thing". I realize it is difficult to have an opinion of this subject until we know a little more clearly what "integration" means when used by United States officials, but I hope that Bevin's query, which was reported in our WA-3146, will clarify this point.

The first comments I have received in the Embassy on our report of last Wednesday's meeting are from Bob Keith. He has pointed out that our report on the rubber problem might be misinterpreted to imply that we were referring to Canadian Government specifications requiring use of synthetic rubber. This comment was meant to refer to the probability that Canadian companies would, on account of their close relationship with affiliated United States companies, adopt the same specifications as were being laid down in the United States. I am not sure whether any change has yet taken place in the practice of Canadian companies.

Bob has also pointed out that the statement that the general approach of United States Customs officers has been to exclude goods does not represent the thinking of the Treasury Department and that the statement would be resented by that Department. I think our message was a reasonable reporting of the statement which Labouisse made, but, as Bob points out, Treasury had been reviewing their regulations and legislation long before the recent tripartite discussions. You may be interested in Bob's comments on this point, which I am enclosing.†

I am afraid this letter has been even more rambling than I had thought it would be when I began dictating and undoubtedly that is the result of the thoughts which are in my mind still being rather vague. I hope that it will at least give you some idea of the kind of help which we would like to receive from Ottawa.

Yours sincerely,

W.D. MATTHEWS

Matthews and Murray attended a further meeting in Labouisse's office yesterday. At the request of Rowan rubber, tin and petroleum were discussed.

2. Rowan stated that the recent changes in United States specifications could only result in an increase in the use of crude rubber of 50,000 tons, of which 15,000 was doubtful. He pointed out that this was disappointing to the U.K. as they had hoped for an increased consumption of crude rubber amounting to 100,000 tons per annum. He hoped that the new legislation would not call for the mandatory use of any fixed portion of synthetic unless the voluntary use of synthetic declined below 200,000 tons per annum. The United States administration apparently also prefer more flexible regulations than those at present in force, and hope legislation will provide for discretionary regulations rather than legislative regulations. NSRB are in the process of thinking out their recommendations which must be submitted to Congress before January 15th. They hope the terms of their recommendation will be settled very soon.

3. Rowan urged that whatever purchases may be made for stockpiling could be made regularly throughout the year and not spasmodically as has been the practice in the past.

4. Tin. Rowan stated that owing to an over-estimate of world consumption there was now an excess of productive capacity. The U.K. considered this serious on account of its effect on the political situation in Malaya, the possibility of large surplus stocks becoming available for stockpiling in the U.S.S.R. as well as because of the effect on the sterling problem. The U.K. had purchased all surplus production until the market was freed on the 15th of this month and now has surplus stocks of approximately 31,000 tons. Rowan suggested that the U.S. should undertake to purchase all tin offered at a fixed price somewhat below that prevailing before devaluation of sterling until such time as a commodity agreement could be completed.

5. It was pointed out that politically it would be easier for the U.S. to agree to purchase a definite quantity each year, which quantity would exceed the estimated surplus world production. The U.S. and the U.K. figures differ widely as to what the surplus may be; the U.K. mentioning figures from 50,000 tons to 100,000 tons, the U.S. figures from 25,000 tons to 40,000 tons, as the possible surplus during 1950. Officials of both countries will study these figures and will endeavour to work out some agreement in bilateral discussions at present taking place in London.

6. Labouisse stated that a directive had been issued to the RFC to hold stocks of at least 20,000 tons. Their present holdings are somewhat in excess of that figure. He also said that all RFC offerings of tin since the establishment of the open market had been above offerings outside the United States.

7. We were asked to advise what, if any, action Canada should take to purchase more for its stockpiling of tin. If the quantity should be substantial purchases should be fitted into United States purchasing plan, since, in the case of tin also, Rowan complained of spasmodic rather than regular purchases being made.

8. Oil. Rowan submitted a memorandum concerning the estimated surplus production of British companies in 1950. Copies of the memorandum will be forwarded by bag.† Paragraphs six to eight of the memorandum, which sums up the proposals, read as follows:

“The method of operation will be to restrict dollar imports of oil by the U.S. oil companies into the sterling area countries in which substitution is operating, by the amount of the British companies’ surpluses but to leave the U.S. controlled companies free to meet their marketing requirements by purchasing the surpluses from the British companies.

The details of this plan will be discussed with the U.S. oil companies concerned and worked out with them in London so that they may adjust their programmes with the minimum amount of dislocation.

For the first quarter of 1950 the U.K. can absorb all the surplus motor spirit and it is planned to work on this basis. It is not proposed to introduce at this time substitution in minor products or in crude oil although, if considered essential, surplus crude oil could be made available at a later date."

It is estimated that this action will save $60,000,000 (U.S) in a full year less³⁸ an as yet undetermined sum that would represent the United States dollar cost of producing British oil.

9. Labouisse pointed out that there would probably be violent objection from many quarters in the United States to this action. Rowan made it quite clear, however, that the proposals were being discussed with United States companies in London and did not hold out any particular hope of a modification of the proposals.

10. Rowan hopes to have available statistics concerning sterling balances by the middle of next week and would like information as to the number of copies of papers that will be required. You will recall Mr. Wrong previously advised you that for certain of these papers Rowan would like to be advised of the names of the officers to whom they will be sent.

11. At next week's meeting there will probably be a discussion of the Committees being established in the United States and in the United Kingdom to consider the promotion of exports from the sterling area. If any material is available of the activities to date of the Duncan Committee it would be well to have this on hand.

TRIPARTITE ECONOMIC CONSULTATIONS

While in Ottawa on November 22nd and 23rd I had some discussion of the operation of the tripartite economic arrangements, particularly at a meeting arranged by Mr. Heeney on November 23rd which was attended by Messrs. Clark, Robertson, Towers, Mackenzie, Heeney, Deutsch and Plumptre. I also had some separate discussions with Messrs. Plumptre and Lapan, Mr. Heeney and briefly with Mr. Pearson in New York on November 24th.

A good deal of time was taken up with an explanation from me of how the arrangements seemed likely to work. I said that it was not possible yet to forecast the importance which they would assume, but the intention of the British and American representatives was to take the arrangements seriously. I explained the importance of avoiding any appearance that we had established a new international economic body; the arrangements had as their chief object the more effective use of existing methods for considering and determining government policy, with, as a special object, seeking to ensure that the overall objectives set forth in the ministerial communiqué issued in Washington in September were not lost sight of in dealing with the great range of matters which touched in one way or another on the problem of the sterling-dollar gap.

I also emphasized that, if the Canadian representative was to play an effective part in the arrangements, it would be necessary to increase the flow of information from Ottawa so that at the Embassy we should be more fully aware of what was going on during the formulation of policy on economic and financial issues, and should also receive copies of studies and reports prepared in the interested departments and the Bank of Canada even though these might be fairly early drafts still subject to correction and to interdepartmental consultation. I suggested that some regular system was required in Ottawa whereby more information would be furnished to the Embassy and prompt consideration could be given to matters coming up in the course of the talks here.

It was agreed at the meeting that Mr. Plumptre should be the point of contact in Ottawa and that there should be revived the informal group which prepared the material for the ministerial talks in September. This group would consist of Messrs. Plumptre, Deutsch, Gordon Robertson, [T.N.] Beaupré and a nominee of the Bank of Canada whose name is still to be notified but who is likely to be either Mr. [J.E.] Coyne or Mr. Beattie. Mr. Lapan will assist Mr. Plumptre.

In this connection I emphasized the need for a restricted circulation list for some of the documents which would be tabled in the tripartite talks. The initial list would be those whom I have just named, and they would pass papers when necessary to Messrs. Heeny, Clark, Robertson, Mackenzie and Towers.

I put forward the suggestion that Mr. Matthews should plan to visit Ottawa fairly frequently whenever there seemed to be sufficient material for useful discussion. On such visits he would meet with the informal committee organized by Mr. Plumptre and with others as seemed to be desirable. I also said that I hoped that the creation of this continuing consultation in Washington would not prevent fairly frequent visits to Washington, mentioning especially Messrs. Deutsch and Plumptre. There appeared to be general agreement with the suggestions which I put forward.

During these talks there was some discussion of specific subjects, particularly the sterling balances, petroleum problems, private foreign lending and proposals for closer economic union in Europe.

The Bank of Canada is just completing a lengthy memorandum on the sterling balances, the preparation of which was, I gather, prompted in part by our reports from Washington. It should be received here early next week. Mr. Towers said that, as a result of his talks in England and with Mr. Cobbold,³⁹ who was in Ottawa during my visit, he had formed the impression that Sir Leslie Rowan was likely to press for active consideration of the balances, with special reference to finding some means of reducing the burden on the United Kingdom of the Indian holdings. He had gathered that in London they were not gravely worried about their capacity to handle the balances held by other countries. He thought it likely that an effort would be made to secure through a new initiative in the United States a substantial easing of the drain of India on the United Kingdom's economy. I asked him what form such action might take within the limits of political possibility and expressed a good deal of apprehension over the attitude of Congress towards even existing foreign aid programs at the next session. He said that the sort of thing which would meet the case for a number of years would be an outright grant in aid to India of a billion dollars. If this were possible, it should be accompanied by a proportionate reduction of the Indian balances in London. I held out no hope that this was likely to be feasible, and we discussed a number of other suggestions, such as the granting of a loan to India with sterling to the equal value put up as security. This, however, was regarded as being politically even more impracticable than a direct grant in aid. As to the time factor, Mr. Towers repeated views which we had previously heard to the effect that the United Kingdom would probably require a considerable reduction of the load by the spring, at which time they might well be on the edge of another financial crisis so severe that they would have to tell India and perhaps others that they were no longer able to permit drawings against the balances. (Incidentally, I gathered that there was a prospect that the British elections may be held in late February instead of late March which I had assumed to be the most probable date.)

On the revival of private foreign lending Messrs. Clark and Towers inquired about the work of the Aldrich Committee. I said that my impression was that the committee had really not started doing anything since the ministerial talks and that information for its guidance was about to be furnished to it by the Administration. The immediate point here is a minor one. Proposals for a similar Canadian committee, including a list of names, are now on Mr. Abbott's desk. Mr. Towers and others said that they thought it would be inadvisable to set up a committee of prominent people in Canadian finance unless they were given a clear idea of what they were expected to do. I was asked, therefore, to seek for further information in Washington on the functions, terms of reference, etc., of the Aldrich Committee, and I said that I would ask Mr. Matthews to bring this up at next week's meeting with Sir Leslie Rowan and Mr. Labouisse.

On oil I raised the general question of the Canadian interest in the problems of sterling and dollar oil. Dr. Clark, who is very well informed on the Canadian oil developments, and others expressed the view that there was no-one in official Ottawa who had expert knowledge of this subject. Some work has been done on it by Mr. Coyne, and Mr. Deutsch had briefly studied the disappointing paper tabled by Mr. Labouisse on November 16th. The group in Ottawa appreciated the possibility that loss of sterling and other soft currency markets by American oil companies would bring strong demands for protection against imports of Canadian oil. I found there was no very great hope that Alberta oil would be sold in any significant quantities in the United States for several years, even though production is very severely restricted and the expectation is that the pipeline to Lake Superior will not when completed be able to operate at full capacity. It was thought that when the United States becomes a net importer of oil in five or more years this situation might change. In the meantime there seems to be some prospect that some sterling oil may replace some dollar oil in the Maritime Provinces, Quebec and Eastern Ontario.

On the question of closer economic union in Europe and the Canadian attitude thereto, all concerned said that thinking in Ottawa had only just begun. The first effort to secure interdepartmental consideration is starting with the circulation of a draft memorandum by Mr. LePan with a request for comment. This memorandum is more a outline of the issues than an attempt to reach any sort of conclusion. It deals with suggestions that there should be some application of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty through the establishment of one or more agencies under it.

In this last connection it is evident that we are in no position at present to put forward any specific proposals for further study. Mr. Pearson agreed with this view when I discussed it with him in New York. All I need say in this memorandum is that we should not press for further consideration for some time, and, if the question arises, should discuss it further informally, and preferably in the tripartite forum, rather than press for its reference to the Working Group of the North Atlantic Council. For the present this seems to me to be the line to take if the matter is raised by Mr. Labouisse or Sir Leslie Rowan.

Tripartite Discussions. The Third meeting of the group in Washington was held on Wednesday, November 30th.

1. Oil—Rowan referred to the $60 million saving anticipated as a result of prohibiting United States dollar imports into the United Kingdom (see paragraph 8 of our WA-3210 of November 24th). Rowan pointed out that the net saving would be approximately the same as the gross since all production came from existing capacity. However, Iran would accumulate additional sterling as the result of payments of royalties and taxes which might give rise to a demand on the dollar pool.

He also pointed out that to produce enough "white products", which includes gasoline, in the Near East would result in a surplus of "black products", which includes fuel oils, in that area.

2. Labouisse stated that there had been some heated discussion in a United States Inter-Departmental Committee, and suggested that this surplus oil could not be regarded as a short-term problem but must be considered as part of the whole problem, including the proposals put forward by the United States, which were reported in WA3147 of November 16th.† He admitted that to some extent a switch from United States dollar to sterling oil within the sterling area was essential, but said that the timing of the switch was of importance to permit the United States companies to make the necessary adjustments.

3. Technical experts representing the United States and the United Kingdom are going to explore the probable effects in detail and expect to have to consult with the companies on this problem.

4. Labouisse was informed that it was not likely that Canada would wish to be represented in these technical discussions. You may, however, wish to have some participation in these discussions if consideration is being given to switching from some United States dollar oil to some sterling oil. The possibility of such a switch was suggested at the meeting in Mr. Heeney's office on November 23rd.

5. Tin and Rubber—A technical sub-committee to discuss the problems of purchasing for stockpile is being set up by the United Kingdom and the United States. It was agreed that a member of the Embassy should attend these meetings whenever any point was going to be discussed which we felt would be of interest to us, and it was suggested that when we decide the amount of any stockpiling purchases Canada will make there should be consultation with this sub-committee as to the timing of the purchases so that the pattern of our purchases would fit in with those of the United States.

6. Dollar export drive—Labouisse reported that Clare Francis, (Chairman of the Board of General Foods Corporation) whose services Hoffman and Wayne Taylor of ECA have been hoping to obtain to head the United States counterpart of the Duncan Board in Canada, considers that a United States Board could not usefully begin operations unless and until the United Kingdom is in a position to provide information on the quantities of the different goods that might be available and as to the dates when those goods could be delivered.

7. We submitted a memorandum containing information about the Canadian Dollar Sterling Trade Board, which you forwarded in your EX-2870.† Labouisse commented that we appeared to have made far more progress along this line than had been made in the United States.

8. Studies of trends in reserves—Rowan has not yet received his statements on the sterling reserve position, but expects to receive these within a few days. Labouisse stated that as soon as these figures were received a study should be made of the trends in the reserve position, since even though the reserves were going up there might be some factors which were tending to reduce the reserves that are at present being hidden when only the overall position is examined. Rowan agreed heartily with this, and stated that it was not yet clear what was causing the upward trend in reserves and that it was possible this might be offset by increasing liabilities. He said he was particularly worried by the increase in the American account sterling.

9. Labouisse said he was hoping to have transferred to his staff within the next week or ten days a technical expert in these fields, and asked that persons with whom his expert could study this problem in detail be nominated by the others. Rowan said a member of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation would be made available for this purpose. We undertook to ask Ottawa whether an expert from Ottawa could be made available when required for the discussions here. I also propose to use Keith in this connection.

10. Rowan in particular stressed that he considered this aspect of the continuing discussions to be of the highest importance, as he anticipated that a group of experts studying the figures available from all three countries could lay information before the main Committee that might make constructive suggestions possible. If this works out, it will emphasize the importance of our receiving a larger and more steady flow of information from Ottawa, in accordance with the suggestions which I put forward during my visit last week.

Tripartite discussions.

1. At the fourth meeting held yesterday afternoon, Rowan distributed copies of a report on the sterling balances. This report, which is top secret, contains a seven-page memorandum discussing sterling balance under the following headings:

- a.—Factual description
- b.—The growth of the balances
- c.—Control of balances
- d.—Movements of balances since the war
- e.—Other factors increasing the supply of sterling in international trade and payments.
- f.—The effect of the running down of the balances on the economy of the United Kingdom

2. In addition to this memorandum, there are three appendices running in 23 pages. Appendix I lists the sterling assets of overseas countries; Appendix II, the main movements of the balances since the war; Appendix III discusses the "treatment of sterling balances since the war and future prospects".

3. Eleven copies of this report were handed to the Americans and seven to ourselves. Six copies (copies Nos. 12 to 17 inclusive) will be forwarded by bag on December 8th.† The covering note to the report, dealing with the security classification, reads as follows, begins:

“The attached report together with its appendices is top secret. It contains information about bank balances which both the holders of the balances and the banks regard as secret information. In view of the attitude of the holders, the United Kingdom Government has consistently refused to provide the figures to the United Kingdom Parliament. The report also contains views on the future prospects about individual sterling holdings. Disclosure of such information is therefore liable to have serious political consequences.

In view of the above, this document should be treated as a top secret informal working document.” Ends.

Labouisse is going to give to Rowan a list of all the people on the United States side who will see this document.

4. There was no detailed discussion of the report yesterday and there probably will be none in the informal tripartite forum. Rowan did say, however, that he would make a few general remarks on sterling balances at the next meeting (December 14th). It is assumed that after the United States officials have had a chance to digest the report it will be in order to establish a special group,

(1) To study the figures and get agreement on the facts, and

(2) To examine the policy questions which arise and put forward some of the “many solutions” which will present themselves.

5. Labouisse mentioned a remark which Snyder had made at a recent meeting between Snyder, Acheson, Hoffman, Martin, Webb and Labouisse. Snyder had been pleased to learn that the United Kingdom would shortly table a full report on the sterling balances and remarked that these were figures which he had been keen to get ever since the Anglo-United States loan was made.

6. On the question of keeping the figures up to date, Labouisse suggested that a quarterly basis would probably be quite acceptable on the United States side. Rowan welcomed this suggestion. Anything more frequent than this would be liable to point up seasonable fluctuations rather than the main trends.

7. Labouisse raised the question of what to do about press enquiries on the sterling balances. He said that Reston of the New York Times was after him December 6th and he was certain that Reston would keep up the pressure until he got a proper story on the sterling balances. Labouisse suggested and Rowan concurred that it might be useful to prepare a short paper which could be used as a guidance in answering press enquiries. This paper, which would not be a press release, is to be drafted by the British. None of the policy considerations involved will be mentioned. The general idea would be that the United Kingdom is tabling certain information in accordance with the statement made in the joint communique of September 12th, with a view to having an agreed factual presentation available.

Tripartite discussions-sterling balances. Your EX-2927 of December 7th.†

1. Labouisse explained this morning that the document presented by the United Kingdom on sterling balances would be examined during a period that would probably extend for two weeks by technicians and policy divisions of E.C.A., and the Treasury and State Departments.

2. He anticipated that by next Wednesday's meeting a few general questions may have emerged from this study which would be addressed to Sir Leslie Rowan, but he did not think that a sub-group to discuss technical aspects on a tripartite basis would be ready until the following week, which would bring the date up to about the 21st of December.

3. Labouisse thought that technicians interested in balance of payments and related questions might be present from all three agencies when the detailed discussions occurred.

4. In the absence from his office of Sir Leslie Rowan, his assistant said that they would be governed by the extent and difficulty of the questions raised by the United States and ourselves. They expected to draw on Treasury personnel in Washington, but if necessary would not hesitate to bring over one or more technicians from London to explain the difficult points.

5. It was stated that in other technical fields such as sterling oil discussions they certainly anticipated calling on London for personnel and regarded themselves more as members of a sterling organization than as experts on all subjects that might present themselves.

6. Under these circumstances, I consider that it would be advantageous to observe developments at next week's meeting on the 14th of December before deciding whether Matthews and Keith should proceed to Ottawa for briefing.

7. This would make it possible to see what kind of questions are shaping up on the United States side and also permit needed time to study the United Kingdom document, and would probably offer more advantages than an arrangement for a meeting in Ottawa before next Wednesday.

Tripartite discussions.

1. At the fifth meeting of the informal Tripartite Group held this afternoon the items which are listed below were discussed in a brief and general fashion. There has as yet been no detailed or conclusive discussion of any issue in the tripartite forum. It was perhaps the realization of this fact which led Labouisse to say at the end of the meeting that it was about time that serious discussions should begin on such important items as the sterling balances. However, no specific time-table has as yet been set for such discussions.

2. The following items were brought up by the United Kingdom:

(1) Liberalization of trade. Rowan tabled a list of additional items which the United Kingdom will shortly be placing on open general licencing. (We understand that the list which is dated 14th December has been made available in Ottawa). Labouisse said that he assumed that in accordance with the agreement reached after the conclusion of the Ministerial talks on the attitude which the United States would take under Article 9 of the Anglo-American loan agreement towards the British initiative in relaxing import restrictions against OEEC and sterling area countries, there was nothing for the United States Government to do other than to note the further relaxations made by the United Kingdom. Rowan said that was his interpretation of the position. By an OEEC resolution the United Kingdom had been requested to liberalize 50 per cent of their trade on private account and were proceeding to do so. It was noted that Canada had not given in such a formal way as the United States, its blessing to the British proposals to liberalize trade restrictions against soft-currency countries. While Canada had indicated its approval of the relaxations being made with respect to trade with the OEEC countries, we had reserved our position on the liberalization of trade with sterling area countries.

(2) Air Agreements. Rowan said that without wishing to discuss the multitude of technical arguments which have arisen in the course of interpreting the Bermuda Agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, he wished to make the request that this Agreement and the subsequent modus operandi be looked at in the broadest possible context, by which he meant that British carriers be licensed to operate between the United States and the Caribbean area. It has been the United Kingdom's experience that although you may lose some dollars on the actual operations of any air carrier any such losses were more than made good by the increased tourist revenue which followed the additional air service. Labouisse undertook to look into Rowan's point and see if it might not be worthwhile to have technical discussions take place on this question. We suggested that Canada would be very interested in any such discussions if they were to involve anything more than the discussion of a bilateral air agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom.

(3) Integration. Rowan tabled the aide memoire which had been sent by the United Kingdom to the Scandinavian countries, outlining the proposals for closer economic cooperation. (The substance of this aide memoire had previously been sent to you in Commonwealth Relations Office telegram Circular H. 507 of December 6th.)† Rowan referred to a working paper on the trade liberalization and payments scheme which he said he understood ECA had produced during Bissell's recent visit to Paris. The State Department officials were not in a position to give any enlightenment on the ECA's most recent proposals as they had only received cabled summaries of them from Paris. There will probably be some discussion of these proposals next Wednesday. Rowan took the occasion to mention two important convictions held by the United Kingdom: The first, which is rather well known, is that liberalizing European trade up to a certain point is an excellent thing. However, beyond a certain point, when you get intra-European trade increasing in commodities which should be directed towards the dollar area it is a bad thing.

Secondly, the United Kingdom considers that the payments scheme should be taken off a grant basis and put on a credit basis; possibly a clearing union could be established in which gold payments on an increasing scale, depending on the size of the deficit, would be the principal feature. Rowan mentioned that after the gold point had been reached one-third of a country's deficit up to a certain point should be payable in gold. Beyond a further point two-thirds would be payable in gold until the point was reached where 100 per cent would be payable in gold.

3. Points brought up by the United States:

(1) Sterling balances. Rowan did not make the general statement on sterling balances which he had said the week before he would probably make. Labouisse therefore raised the question of sterling balances by saying that the United States would at a later date wish to talk about this question in order to see what could be done "substantively". The United Kingdom memorandum (despatch No. 3043 of December 8th)† contained no suggested solutions. Labouisse wondered if Rowan had any specific ideas. Rowan merely replied that in his view the first question was to get the "groundwork cleared". This presumably would be done by a group of experts. At that point Rowan said, rather hopefully, he expected that "everybody will have ideas". On our side the question was raised regarding what portion of the sterling balances could be regarded as proper working balances. Rowan said that although it was not possible to give a specific figure on this question the amount of one-third of the present total of sterling balances was probably a good guide.

(2) Economic union. Labouisse invited Rowan's attention to an article by Imrie de Veigh entitled, "Alternative to Handouts", which appeared in the November Fortune. This article, which proposes that we should work towards an economic union of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada is apparently highly regarded by Labouisse and some other United States officials. Labouisse did mention that the integration of Germany into the Western European economy is a most difficult but nevertheless most important problem for which some solution remains to be found.

Tripartite economic consultations.

1. Mr. Acheson, Sir Oliver Franks, and I had a brief talk on December 14th about the purpose and direction of the tripartite consultations. We went into no details, but it was suggested that we should meet again, perhaps early in the new year, after expert examination had been given to the British paper on the sterling balances. The purpose of the meeting, which might be attended by the three of us with not more than two or three others present, would be to give direction for further studies and to indicate some possible partial solutions which could profitably be explored. We would not attempt ourselves to analyze the anatomy of the sterling area and its current problems, but rather to outline a programme for others to pursue. I should welcome suggestions as to any ideas which I might put into the pot in such a discussion.

2. Our talk then turned to the current situation in Southeast Asia, on which I am reporting separately.

Your WA-3429 of December 16th—Tripartite Economic Consultations. Matthews and Keith will have told you about the discussions here last Friday on the subject of sterling balances. We have sent by bag a list of questions. The most important is whether we can get additional information about the movement of capital out of the United Kingdom, and the over-all balances of payments of the individual sterling area countries. It is growing more and more clear that the burden borne by the United Kingdom is not adequately disclosed by an examination of the movements of sterling balances. This point is emphasized in the paper on sterling balances (in addition to the questions), which has also been sent by bag for transmission to Rowan and Labouisse.†

2. Matthews' report to us made it clear that there was a good deal of reticence both on the United States and the United Kingdom side in regard to making specific proposals. This reticence no doubt stems largely from the imminence of elections in the United Kingdom and also from the approach of mid-term elections in the United States. It is very difficult to judge from Ottawa whether these considerations are in fact the chief barrier to free and frank discussion. At any rate they involve considerations that can only be adequately discussed between yourself, Franks and Acheson.

3. There is, of course, a danger that reticence may lead to continued inaction at a time when action is really desirable—indeed necessary. Hence we are glad to hear that you plan another top level meeting early in the New Year. Your message implies that you might like someone to come from Ottawa at that time. If so, who would be most helpful?

4. We are still rather uncertain about the nature of "the possible partial solutions" which you mentioned and which Matthews also referred to.

Your EX-3030 of December 22nd. Tripartite Economic Consultations.

1. We have already reported that the controversy over United Kingdom restrictions on dollar oil is dominating the discussions at the moment. I think that the reticence to which you refer partly results from the difficulties of knowing where to begin. Certainly the United Kingdom is inhibited by the approaching elections from putting forward long-term proposals on the issues of the sterling balances. I doubt that the mid-term Congressional elections affect the American position much; their inhibitions arise more from anxiety about the budget and the treatment at the next session of the Foreign Aid Program. Acheson and Franks both realize that the search for profitable courses of action must at present be on an informal and non-committal basis, with the participants in the consultations acting as individuals rather than as Government representatives. It is in this atmosphere that it is proposed that the three of us should meet early in January.

2. With regard to your last two paragraphs, I am not yet sure whether it would be appropriate to introduce someone from Ottawa at the meeting in question. I have had it in mind that Towers would be a most useful addition to the group, but to preserve the very informal nature of the meeting it may be that the others would prefer to confine it only to the three of us. I shall try to explore this further next week. As to "the possible partial solutions", I am not myself at all clear. I think that we might get a better idea of the possibility of the United States developing an orderly program of financial assistance to India and other Asiatic countries, and might also bring up such questions as means of increasing British invisible dollar exports by greater use of British shipping and other services, although this is unlikely to be productive of results.

Washington, December 29, 1949

Dear Wynne [Plumptre]:

Following the tripartite meeting yesterday, at which the discussions were confined to oil, Labouisse, Rowan and myself adjourned to Labouisse's office to have an informal talk about sterling balances. Labouisse urged on several occasions that the talk be regarded as a personal one since the ideas which he put forward in the discussion had not been cleared with the other departments in the United States Government who are concerned, or with senior officials in the State Department. He pointed out that he could only feel free to exchange ideas if they were regarded as personal ones and if he could be sure any opinions expressed by him were not passed on to any other American officials as being his ideas. I believe he is having a talk with his inter-departmental group today or tomorrow and will try to develop further ideas which we will discuss next Monday.

On account of Labouisse's reticence I am reporting to you by private letter rather than by teletype, and hope you will pass on the necessary caveat if you think it worth circulating this letter to any others in Ottawa.

Rowan opened the discussion with a short review of the developments in sterling balances since the beginning of the war. He pointed out that until recently political and strategic considerations had made the U.K. liberal in releasing sterling balances but that they had now come to the point of view that it would be less dangerous to clamp down on releases of the balances accumulated during wartime than to continue with their past practice. He then pointed out that both the U.S. and the U.K. had joint interests in the countries lying in a crescent from the Near East to Singapore which might be adversely affected by such a change in policy, saying that the more serious situations would arise in Egypt, Pakistan and India. The only way of protecting these interests that he could see would be if an additional source of funds was made available from international organizations such as The Bank & Fund or by an "injection of dollars". Labouisse agreed that an alternative source of funds would be required and stated that, in his opinion, sources such as The Bank & Fund, or any money that might be available under the Point Four Programme, would not be adequate and that, therefore, it would probably be essential for the United States to make dollars available by direct appropriation. In his opinion, in countries such as those concerned a programme along the lines of ECA would not be suitable, and he felt there would be advantages if the dollars could be made available, as in the past, through the United Kingdom. He was worried, however, as to the best method by which to render aid from the point of view of obtaining approval of public opinion in the United States and of Congress. No very definite ideas were put forward yesterday on this point, or as to the nature of agreements that would have to be reached with the countries holding sterling balances under which any direct grants to them would be matched by the cancellation of an equivalent share of the balances. Both Rowan and I stressed the point that a grant of dollars, which the recipient country should be free to spend anywhere, would have far greater effect on the world-wide problem of shortage of dollars than any plan whereby the funds were tied to purchases within the United States. While Labouisse agreed with this he obviously felt the political difficulties of obtaining such authority would be great and at this point he asked what the Canadian reaction might be if at least a large part of any aid were tied in with the disposal of American surpluses.

I said that it would probably be difficult for Canada to object to a disposal of surpluses that would result in the "filling of bellies that would otherwise be empty", but we would regard very seriously a plan for the disposal of commodities that would otherwise be traded in normal commercial channels. I also asked whether such a plan would not be more in the nature of a relief programme, the continuation of which could not extend beyond the period during which there were American surpluses, and, therefore, would do little if anything to build up the productive capacities of the countries concerned.

Labouisse said he thought any plan approved by the United States for assisting those countries in which it had a strategic interest could only be adopted if the United Kingdom could enter into agreements with other holders of substantial sterling balances that would limit the rate upon which those balances could be drawn down. Rowan agreed that such a request might be reasonable, but pointed out that it might be very difficult to reach agreement with the other major holders of sterling balances since the benefits those holders would receive from the overall plan would be rather remote. These difficulties would be particularly great in the case of those countries such as Australia, whose balances had increased since the war, and even greater in the case of countries that were not members of the sterling area.

Rowan agreed to obtain as soon as possible some estimate of the minimum balances required by each of the major holders of sterling balances and detailed figures of the position of the countries lying in the crescent from the Near East to Singapore. It is planned that we should have another meeting on Monday when some additional information may be available and when some further ideas will be discussed.

Labouisse stressed the need of very speedy action if anything was to be achieved in the coming session of Congress, and pointed out that if nothing was achieved by then any progress within eighteen months was almost impossible. Rowan agreed that nothing very startling could be done before the British elections so that you can see the problem of timing will be a very difficult one.

While the discussions did not give rise to any particularly new thoughts, I think it was the first occasion when representatives of the U.K. and the U.S. have sat down together to exchange ideas such as these, and, therefore, I hope it may be the beginning of a serious consideration of these problems. As you no doubt know, it is possible that later on next week Mr. Wrong, Sir Oliver Franks and Mr. Acheson will have a further talk on these problems.

Yours sincerely,
W.D. MATTHEWS

REPORT OF LONDON MEETING OF THE UNITED KINGDOM-CANADA CONTINUING COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS⁴⁰

The nature of the problems considered in London by the Committee was such that it is difficult to report specifically on the outcome of the discussions. In many ways, the discussions followed the same course as the talks which were held in Ottawa in the Autumn of 1948 between members of the Canadian Government and the United Kingdom Chancellor of the Exchequer. The United Kingdom side reiterated the general policy being followed and the Canadian side expressed grave concern at the effect of that policy, if followed with rigour and without modification, on current Anglo-Canadian relations, and on the ultimate position of the United Kingdom, and the Sterling area, vis-a-vis the Western Hemisphere.

Little information in addition to that presented by the Chancellor was gained regarding the United Kingdom long-term programme. However, it was pointed out that France, under its long-term programme expected to become a significant exporter of wheat. While it was doubtful if the target of one million tons or more would be reached, it was possible that France would be able to export, say, half a million tons. The United Kingdom members indicated that unless French prices were very much out of line they would be obliged to take the French wheat rather than supplies from dollar sources. There was even some possibility of a long-term contract with France. It might, therefore, be necessary to revise, in a downward direction, the estimates of wheat imports from Canada in 1952 and 1953. Furthermore, the survey of long-term plans undertaken by the Organization for European Economic Co-operation had revealed a contemplated dollar gap for the participating countries in 1952, so great that some changes in the individual plans would clearly be necessary in order to reduce it. How far this cut would impinge upon United Kingdom imports from the Western Hemisphere was not yet clear.

There was a lengthy consideration of the implications of the United Kingdom overall commercial policy and the inevitable tendency of that policy to build a high cost trading area which would cause great difficulty in re-establishing, some years hence, satisfactory commercial relations with the Western Hemisphere. It was emphasized that the United Kingdom suspension of imports of certain commodities was having a most unfavourable impact on specific industries and regions of Canada. A continued pursuit of this policy without modification would lead to a deterioration of good will which the Canadian public has had for the United Kingdom with all that that involved.

The problems of the salmon canning industry were given special consideration, not only as a type case, but as one of the most troublesome ones. The United Kingdom had purchased a quantity of canned salmon and crab from the U.S.S.R. against payment in Sterling valid for the purchase of exports anywhere in the Sterling area. The Canadian reaction to this was one of bewilderment and would probably be aggravated when it was known that the United Kingdom did not want the crab and was now negotiating its sale in the United States. The fact that the United Kingdom was prepared to devote part of the dollar proceeds of this sale to the purchase of canned fish in Canada was helpful but was not adequate to satisfy the Canadian problem.

A review of the effects of United Kingdom bulk purchasing on Canadian procurement of primary materials from the Sterling area demonstrated the swing away from the Sterling area as a source of supply to Canada. This, coupled with the existence of an enlarged market in Canada for these products, suggested the desirability of a joint examination of the position as regards individual commodities, particularly sugar and petroleum and a number of foodstuffs. It was agreed that a review of these problems should take place between experts in Ottawa or in London. It is believed that this is a most profitable field of exploration for increased dollar earnings by the Sterling area.

The United Kingdom targets of exports to Canada for the year 1949 were reviewed, and it was the conclusion of the Canadian members that the United Kingdom was making a very determined effort in this direction, subject to the implications of overall policies which resulted in adverse price relationships.

The possibility of increased use of Canadian shipping in tramp trades has been examined by the appropriate United Kingdom authorities and they had now arranged that up to about 40–45,000 tons a month of hard currency shipping should be chartered provided the terms were competitive. As to Canadian participation in East Coast Shipping Conferences, it was considered that if Canadian ship owners were admitted to membership the necessary convertible sterling would be made available.

It was quite apparent that the United Kingdom was not going to make any sudden or radical change in overall policy, nor was this to be expected. It was felt, however, that the United Kingdom Members of the Committee were impressed with the necessity of exploring the possibility of dealing with the more aggravating difficulties of the Canadian situation. They were prepared to re-examine their policy as it affected individual problems and to propose to their Ministers methods of approaching those problems. It is to be hoped that one of the results of the meeting of this Committee may be a more favourable approach on the part of the United Kingdom to specific Canadian propositions in the future.

It was agreed that the next meeting of the Committee should be held in Ottawa in the Autumn of this year.

1. When I paid a courtesy call on Sir Stafford Cripps on March 17th, he stressed the importance which he attaches to the work of the Continuing Anglo-Canadian Committee on Trade. He said he was sorry the next meeting had been put off until August, and said he did not know whether the fault was on our side or on theirs. When I said that the reason was probably to give time to prepare the necessary material, he replied that he thought the month of August had been chosen because it happened to be a holiday month. He suggested that when Clutterbuck comes to the United Kingdom he and I should consult as the two Chairmen, with a view to assuring more frequent meetings of the Committee.

2. When I mentioned the desirability of enquiring into the possibility of more imports of primary products from the sterling area, he countered by stating that we should also take into account the possibility of increasing imports from the colonies of European countries. This was probably a reflection on his recent activity in the organization for European economic cooperation.

3. Sir Stafford also referred to the drive they are making for increased exports to Canada. He said that this was somewhat in the nature of a stunt in order to create the right atmosphere. When he had been addressing manufacturers, they had referred to our import prohibitions and said that what was the use of encouraging them to export to Canada when the Canadian Government prohibited the particular goods they produced. He had a secretary bring him a list of the goods in question which were:

Domestic electric appliances

Diaries

Costume jewellery

Medium quality silverware

He mentioned that high grade silverware had already been freed at the request of the United Kingdom. I believe his intention in mentioning these products to me was that I should pass word on to the Canadian Government.

Reference my telegram No. 584, March 19th—interview with Sir Stafford Cripps.

1. At luncheon given by United Kingdom Government for me on March 29th, Cripps again returned to the subject of the continuing Anglo-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs. He said that the Continuing Trade Committee should live up to its name and that even if there was a lot of material to be prepared between meetings, this should not prevent other meetings being held from time to time to deal with current matters arising in the interval.

2. He obviously had in mind the present strained relations over trade, because he mentioned that there were some things in the budget speech by the Minister of Finance about which he was not very happy. When [Frederic] Hudd asked him what particular passages he was referring to, he asked Hudd if he had seen the article in the Financial Times.

3. On returning to Canada House we consulted the Financial Times of March 28th and saw the article Cripps had been referring to was one entitled "Barter Trade", with the subheading "Canada's Strange Attitude". It was in effect a defence of the United Kingdom position against Canadian criticisms, and may have been inspired by the Treasury. The only reference to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance was the statement that he had referred in critical terms to the fact that some countries "had embarked on a course of barter deals, discrimination and the balancing of trade accounts with individual countries".

4. References were also made in the article to the report of the Foreign Exchange Control Board, and to statements made by the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce at a Board of Trade luncheon in Vancouver. The action taken to remove the duty concessions on British rayon and cotton piece goods as from July 1st was referred to as an "unhelpful move".

5. The article concluded by stating that London quarters take the view that the pronouncements by leading Canadian officials during the last few weeks show that the Dominion Government is still pinning its faith to the belief that the multilateral trade pattern of the pre-war period will be resumed at the close of the Marshall period. It is then stated that signs had been detected that some Canadians are beginning to think that it might not be such a bad idea for Canada herself to consider bilateral deals to safeguard her export markets. It is noted that "in the Annual Report of the Canadian Foreign Exchange Control Board, Mr. Graham Towers frankly states that Canada may yet have to consider the possibility of making special arrangements to take more goods from dollar-short countries even though these goods were higher priced than elsewhere."

6. I have been wondering if consideration might be given to holding a meeting of the Continuing Committee in Ottawa before Clutterbuck leaves in May. This might allay public criticism of official inaction in the face of a deteriorating situation, and would also satisfy Sir Stafford Cripps, who is desirous of making the Committee the channel for the more expeditious clearance of views on current trade problems arising between the two countries.

Reference your Telegram No. 584, March 19th. Your conversation with Sir Stafford Cripps concerning Anglo-Canadian trade relations.

1. At the meeting of the Continuing Anglo-Canadian Committee on Trade held in London, the Canadian side emphasized the difficulties being created in Canada by the abrupt cessation of United Kingdom purchasing of Canadian exports which for a long time have been dependent upon a traditional market in Great Britain. Particular reference was made to such items as canned salmon, SO2 berries, apples, flax seed, and shipping. In the light of the general apprehension expressed by the Canadian representatives, the United Kingdom officials undertook to give serious consideration to the possibility of working out some alleviation in the impact of U.K. policy upon particularly sensitive Canadian situations. The continued lack of any indication of the resumption of purchases by the United Kingdom of the items referred to is causing increasing difficulties in Canada. I should be grateful if you could take up this matter further with Sir Stafford Cripps in the light of the following considerations.

2. Our review of United Kingdom and sterling area balance of payments with Canada for the fiscal year ending Jun 30, 1949 indicates that the overall deficit with Canada will be some forty to fifty million dollars less than had been previously estimated. This is due very largely to smaller expenditures on bacon. It had been intimated earlier that should there be any savings in the planned import programme consideration would be given to the purchase of alternative food and other agricultural items. Furthermore, we understand that the United Kingdom is having difficulty in using up the full amount of the ECA appropriation before June 30th. Under these circumstances, it should be easier to purchase alternative food and agricultural items in Canada. We are anxious that arrangements should be made for the purchase of canned salmon from this year's catch, for the purchase of existing stocks of SO₂ berries, for the purchase of apples from next autumn's crop, which is expected to be large, for the purchase of flax seed and honey. We hope that it will be possible to work out such arrangements when Mr. Howe is in London during the first week in May.

3. During the meeting of the Continuing Committee in London, Sir Henry Wilson Smith of the United Kingdom Treasury discussed with Deutsch the position of the Newfoundland interest-free loan to the United Kingdom after the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation. The Terms of Union offer facilities to Newfoundland for the deposit of the Newfoundland surplus (which includes the interest-free loan to the United Kingdom of about $7.3 million) with Canada at interest. Sir Henry argued that these facilities provided an inducement to Newfoundland to make an immediate call on the United Kingdom for the repayment of this loan, which would involve a drain on dollar reserves which had not been envisioned at this time. Sir Henry asked whether the Canadian Government would agree to arrange that any call by Newfoundland upon the United Kingdom might be applied by it as an offset against any payments currently being made in amortization of the 1942 interest-free loan by Canada to the United Kingdom. This would mean that in the event of Newfoundland calling in the loan the United Kingdom would be permitted to divert corresponding amounts (arising from sales of Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom) currently payable to Canada in reduction of the 1942 loan. We find it very difficult to justify, under the terms of the 1942 loan, a transaction such as is proposed by Sir Henry. The Newfoundland interest-free loan is entirely a matter between it and the United Kingdom in respect of which Canada has no obligation whatsoever. The facilities provided in the Terms of Union were granted by Canada at the specific request of Newfoundland as a measure of assistance to the provincial finances. It would, of course, be possible for the United Kingdom to avoid the transfer of funds by being prepared to pay to Newfoundland an equivalent rate of interest.

4. A few days ago the Department of Finance received an urgent enquiry through U.K. High Commissioner here as to whether we would approve the sale by the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company (a Royal Dutch Shell subsidiary) to the Shell Caribbean Company (a U.S. company) of one-half of the common stock of Shell Oil of Canada to the value of $17.8 millions, and a note for $2.8 millions owed by the latter to Anglo-Saxon. Under the terms of the 1942 loan the U.S. dollar proceeds of such a transaction would ordinarily have to be applied in reduction of the loan. We are asked to waive this requirement in order to allow Anglo-Saxon to use the $20 millions of U.S. funds thus acquired for oil development outside the Western Hemisphere. They suggested that if this request were granted there would be some advantage from the Canadian standpoint in that it would facilitate the transfer of ownership of the Canadian subsidiary to Shell-Caribbean which is better able to provide U.S. dollars for financing oil development in Canada. It is clear that the terms of the 1942 loan agreement require that the proceeds of such a transaction be used for payment on the loan. If we were to agree to the request we would forego receipt of about $20 millions of U.S. exchange. On the other hand, we feel certain that the proposed oil development by Shell in Canada would in one way or another proceed in any case. Consequently it would not be possible for us to agree to this request unless there was some substantial justification.

5. In essence acceptance of the U.K. request in respect of Shell Oil means an extension of further credit, and this would only be possible if the United Kingdom could see its way clear to go to a considerable distance in helping to solve Canadian problems. We are concerned not only with the disposal of certain very troublesome surpluses, but also with the great importance of achieving an improvement in the atmosphere surrounding AngloCanadian trade, and its prospects for the future. If the United Kingdom were prepared to look with favour on this general approach, it should be possible, in our opinion, for Mr. Howe to work out a satisfactory arrangement when he is in London.

6. In your telegram under reference you mention that the Chancellor drew attention to our prohibition on imports of domestic electric appliances, diaries, costume jewellery, and medium quality silverware; items which the United Kingdom wishes to export to Canada. We are giving consideration to arrangements which would permit the import from the United Kingdom of diaries and perhaps medium quality silverware. The problem in the case of domestic electric appliances and costume jewellery is more troublesome since the imports come predominantly from the United States and the setting up of quotas for these items is particularly difficult. The removal of the prohibitions would cost us a good deal of exchange, while the benefits to the United Kingdom would be only incidental. However, we would be prepared to give serious consideration to any specific suggestions for relief where it is administratively feasible.

7. I think it would be useful if you would explain these matters to the Chancellor in preparation for Mr. Howe's visit. Naturally, we will be interested in the Chancellor's initial reactions.

London, April 2nd, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference your telegram No. 616 of March 31st concerning my earlier conversation with Sir Stafford Cripps regarding Anglo Canadian trade relations. As you will appreciate, this is a particularly difficult time for the Chancellor and the senior officials of the Treasury since they are all deeply absorbed in preparation for the debate on the budget and economic survey, which opens on Wednesday. In these circumstances I am sure you will agree that it is scarcely feasible for me to have a talk with the Chancellor on the various points raised by your message before my departure for Annecy on Thursday. I have, however, already seen Sir Henry Wilson Smith and have left with him an informal memorandum incorporating the substance of your telegram and I am to have a further discussion with him after he has had an opportunity to consult the Chancellor and other interested officials on the matters dealt with in your message. In the meantime I am reporting below the principal points which emerged from my conversation with Wilson Smith this morning.

2. Concerning your general suggestion that advantage might be taken of Mr. Howe's visit to the United Kingdom early in May to have a thorough discussion of these matters with the United Kingdom Government, Wilson Smith indicated that Cripps was being urged by his colleagues and senior advisors to secure a rest which he very badly needs and that the only time during which he might be able to leave London for such a rest appears to be around the first of May. Wilson Smith said (as I have heard from other quarters and as I have observed myself) that the Chancellor is showing signs of the strain under which he has been working for the past several years and that he is by no means as fit a man as he was last autumn. During the next month or so he will have his own responsibilities in connection with the budget and economic survey. He will also be carrying heavy responsibilities within the Cabinet (including a large part of the work on the United Kingdom side concerning the Prime Ministers' meetings in late April). He will be carrying the new burdens resulting from the formation of the Ministerial Committee in OEEC, and he will have to make most of the case for his economic policies at meeting of the various organs of the Labour Party. His programme for the rest of the year is equally tight. Wilson Smith observed that the Chancellor was so public spirited that if he were pressed to remain in London for discussions early in May he would probably feel bound to do so but that his colleagues regarded him as so valuable that they would probably feel equally bound to insist that he take some relaxation at the only time in the year when he is likely to have a chance. The present confidential plan is that Cripps should leave London on April 28th for Italy, where he would have several days of negotiation with the Italian Government, after which he would rest in Italy until May 17th. Wilson Smith recognized that discussions with other Ministers would hardly be satisfactory for Mr. Howe's purpose in view of the decisive role of the Chancellor in connection with financial (and consequently trade) matters. It occurred to Wilson Smith that if Mr. Howe would in any event be coming to the United Kingdom in early May talks could possibly be carried to a fairly advanced stage with other Ministers at that time (and might even be followed by more detailed discussions at an early meeting of the Continuing Committee) after which the necessary decisions could be taken when the Chancellor was available. Wilson Smith made it clear that his remarks were intended solely to give me background concerning the ability of the United Kingdom to negotiate in May and were not intended to prejudge the views of the Chancellor on how or when these questions might be handled. As I indicated above, Wilson Smith will be talking with me as soon as he has discussed the matter with the Chancellor. In the meantime, I am reporting this conversation in order that you may have this early notice of the real timetable difficulties on the United Kingdom side.

3. Concerning the specific points raised by your telegram the following is a summary of Wilson Smith's preliminary and tentative comments:

(a) It is true that the difficulty anticipated in using up the ECA allocation before June 30th may give the United Kingdom some latitude on purchases from Canada. However, this latitude is limited by the fact that most of the items of which we desire to dispose are also available from, and even "surplus" in the United States. Accordingly any purchases of those particular items from Canada, even if permitted, would probably be regarded in the United States as involving discrimination against them. Mr. Wilson Smith noted that the United Kingdom was being pressed increasingly by the United States to accept United States surplus or "sensitive commodities". In this atmosphere it was doubtful that much could be done in the way of additional purchases from Canada although the United Kingdom had been exploring the position and hoped to be able shortly to indicate the possibilities.

(b) There are already indications that Newfoundland may call in the interest-free loan made to the United Kingdom. While obviously the United Kingdom still hoped that something might be done on the Canadian side, Wilson Smith felt that the suggestion concerning the possible payment of interest by the United Kingdom (in order to avoid capital repayment) was worth considering.

(c) Regarding the Anglo-Saxon oil transaction, Wilson Smith was not inclined to agree with your view that the proposed oil development by Shell in Canada would proceed in any case. He explained that although Shell was owned jointly by United Kingdom and Dutch interests (with the United Kingdom controlling only 40 per cent) the arrangement is that for the next several years the United Kingdom alone will be responsible for any necessary dollar expenditures by Shell. The intention of the United Kingdom had been that the dollar loan secured by Shell in the United States together with certain capital reorganization within the Shell group (including the reorganization in your telegram) would yield enough dollars to permit of new development and of necessary current expenditures without too heavy a dollar burden on the United Kingdom. If some of the reorganization plans failed to yield the expected dollars, the Shell group would probably have to curtail certain new dollar expenditures (such as that involved in the expected developments in Canada) in view of the limitations on the availability of dollars for that purpose from the United Kingdom.

(d) Concerning shipping, Wilson Smith felt that the Canadian position had improved substantially. In particular he stated that, according to his information, some 85,000 tons of Canadian tramp shipping had been offered to the United Kingdom during March and April and that the British Ministry of Transport had taken up, or was about to take up, the offer. According to his calculations that would mean that Canadian shipping for those months represented about three quarters of the total hard currency tonnage employed by the United Kingdom. He noted, moreover, that arrangements had been made or were being made, whereby Belgian shipping would no longer have to come within the ceiling established for United Kingdom hard currency shipping with the result that Belgium at least would not then be competing with Canada for United Kingdom hard currency shipping expenditures. I indicated that I thought our concern was probably more with the future prospect than with the present position. Wilson Smith agreed that the future was complicated by the expected United States legislation on shipping costs financed by the United States Government and felt that it would be desirable to examine the possibilities for the future when the other matters mentioned in your message are being discussed.

(e) Wilson Smith made no comments on the prohibition of imports mentioned in the latter part of your message.

TRADE WITH RUSSIA AND EASTERN EUROPE

Last December there was a lot of criticism in the Canadian press about the trade arrangements that the United Kingdom was making with Russia and Eastern Europe. Mr. Pearson wrote a letter to Sir Alexander Clutterbuck inviting an explanation.⁴¹

Sir Alexander has now replied. His letter of April 11th and his two accompanying memoranda are attached.†

These two memoranda have been reviewed in the Sub-Committee on External Trade Policy. Members of the Sub-Committee have agreed:

(a) That the memorandum on "United Kingdom Trade Discussions with the U.S.S.R." is astonishingly unconvincing. It would almost appear as if the United

Volume 14, Document 696. Clutterbuck had sent an interim reply on January 14.†

Kingdom had not really tried to make a case. The memorandum is based on the assumption that the United Kingdom could not earn any more dollars by diverting exports from Russia to North America—and, of course, this is the very point that the memorandum ought to have proved (if possible). There are many other technical flaws in the memorandum.

(b) That the memorandum on “Considerations Affecting Economic Policy Towards Eastern Europe” is a far better piece of work. Its form shows that it was not originally intended for transmission to Canada—it was probably an internal document in the Foreign Office. It emphasizes the danger from a strategical point of view that the United Kingdom may become too dependent on Eastern European trade. In other words its main economic implication runs precisely counter to that of the preceding memorandum.

(c) That it is desirable to send back a reply to the United Kingdom. This would at least serve to keep the record straight as far as Canada was concerned. In addition it might help to persuade some of the United Kingdom officials towards our point of view—although members of our Sub-Committee are not too sanguine on this point.⁴²

(d) That two members of the Sub-Committee should be asked to prepare a reply. This will go before the Sub-Committee and later before the Inter-departmental Committee.

Mr. Howe's trade talks with United Kingdom Ministers. Mr. Howe met for about an hour yesterday afternoon with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor gave Mr. Howe a memorandum on the external financial position of the United Kingdom, of which I am sending you copies by tomorrow's bag under despatch No. 879. The general picture given by the Chancellor was not, of course, a particularly encouraging one from the point of view of future Canadian trade. On specific “sensitive” commodities the Chancellor indicated that the United Kingdom would be prepared to take an amount of Canadian canned salmon and that something might be done in timber, although to make possible the use of ECA funds for timber purchases the United Kingdom procurement from North America would probably have to be divided between Canada and the United States.

2. This morning Mr. Howe, Mr. Pearson and I, together with other Canadian officials, met with a group of the United Kingdom Ministers principally concerned together with their advisers; Mr. Noel-Baker the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, was Chairman of the meeting, in which other ministerial participants were Mr. Wilson, President of the Board of Trade, Mr. [John] Strachey, the Minister of Food and Wilson Smith from the Treasury (representing the Chancellor who had left London). This morning's discussion was of a very general character, intended primarily to sort out the points to be discussed later by Mr. Howe with individual Ministers. Of the subjects raised this morning the following may be of particular interest.

(a) Wilson Smith anticipates that there will be a carry-over of something like 100 million dollars of ECA funds in respect of the United Kingdom programme from 1948/49 to 1949/50, of which the greater part will represent amounts already committed by the United Kingdom in some degree but against which goods will not have been shipped by June 30th or for which reimbursement will not have been received by the United Kingdom from ECA by that date. He intimated that some part of the "unspent" ECA dollars for 1948/49 would be absorbed in advance [by] purchases from the United States of America of commodities in the 1949/50 programme.

(b) Strachey was surprised to learn that Canadian officials expected the short-fall in bacon shipment during 1949 to amount to only $22 million. He intimated that United Kingdom officials had been anticipating a short-fall of as much as $38 million. It was not apparent from this morning's discussion to what extent any reduction in the estimated short-fall in bacon shipments would affect the willingness or ability of the United Kingdom to finance the purchase of canned salmon and other sensitive commodities from Canada.

(c) Of the miscellaneous food stuffs which might be procured from Canada, Strachey stated that, next to salmon (with which the Chancellor had dealt earlier as indicated above), apples would be the commodity most attractive to the Ministry of Food. The Ministerial Group was not prepared to say, however, without further investigation, that apples would necessarily be bought and Strachey himself indicated that they were of a much lower priority than salmon.

(d) Although most of the information in the remarks by the President of the Board of Trade concerning measures being taken to stimulate exports to Canada was already known from his speech in the House of Commons last week, he gave the impression more clearly this morning than in the House of Commons that the exports credit guarantee department was prepared to discriminate quite definitely in favour of transactions involving exports to hard currency markets. He pointed out that under the new Export Credit Guarantee Act the Department would be less subject to the supervision of the Advisory Committee in using its discretion in favour of hard currency transactions, even the more risky types. He mentioned also the recent establishment of joint machinery between Government and industry under Sir Graham Cunningham, associated with Sir Clive Baillieu, for prompting exports to dollar markets, and stated that on Monday he would announce the establishment of a Committee by financial houses in the city (in cooperation with the Governor of the Bank of England) under the Chairmanship of Sir Charles Hambro to assist with financial problems involved in the promotion of such exports.

(e) Mr. Wilson also enquired concerning the possibility of larger participation by the United Kingdom suppliers in the equipment of defence projects in Canada. On this point Mr. Howe suggested that he and Mr. Claxton might discuss this subject with Mr. Wilson during the latter's forthcoming visit to Ottawa.

(f) In view of Canadian criticism of trade agreements which the United Kingdom had made with countries in Eastern Europe, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Strachey mentioned that the agreement with the U.S.S.R. which has been under discussion for many months is now likely to be concluded in the near future. The Russians have recently shown signs of increased willingness and even anxiety to complete the negotiations. Mr. Wilson stated that the Russians were asking for no commodities from the United Kingdom in which Canada would appear to have an interest (with the possible exception of a small order for 15,000 tons of thin steel rails) and were apparently primarily desirous of securing commodities from the outer sterling area, such as rubber and wool. The principal United Kingdom imports of interest to Canada are likely to be grain, timber and canned salmon. On grain the Russians are pressing the United Kingdom to accept wheat as well as feeding stuffs (in a 50:50 ratio). Although the United Kingdom would not mind having some part of the wheat, they are primarily interested in acquiring the feeding stuffs, and particularly out of regard to the Canadian attitude the United Kingdom will endeavour to resist Russian pressure to accept wheat (although both Strachey and Wilson intimated that to get the necessary feeding stuffs they might eventually have to accept a token quantity of wheat, possibly of the order of 100,000 to 150,000 tons. On timber the quantities involved are said to be small and to consist partly of hard woods. On canned fish the United Kingdom may take something like £1 million worth (of which the greater part would consist of canned crab), which they felt should not be too objectionable from the Canadian point of view if the United Kingdom undertakes the purchase of canned salmon from Canada as mentioned by the Chancellor. In connection with these fish purchases from the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom will probably have to supply some tinsplate, but they felt this action would not be criticized by Canada since Canadian importers appear unwilling to buy United Kingdom tinsplate at present prices. Moreover, United Kingdom suppliers of tinsplate are not much attracted by the Canadian market in view of the fact that domestic tinsplate production is being expanded in Canada. Both Wilson and Strachey emphasized that any canned salmon which they might take from Russia would have to be priced as low or lower than Canadian canned salmon.

3. Mr. Howe is seeing Mr. Strachey this afternoon and will be meeting with Mr. Wilson Monday.

Note du Trésor, Royaume-Uni
Memorandum by the United Kingdom Treasury

[London, April, 1949]

EXTERNAL FINANCIAL POSITION OF THE U.K.
 MEMORANDUM FOR MR. HOWE⁴³

1. The facts concerning the external position of the U.K. are starkly clear. Continued austerity and increased production have secured for the United Kingdom, at any rate for the moment, an overall balance on her international account in spite of the drastic consequences of six years of war. But this overall balance conceals a major disequilibrium. While the United Kingdom is actually in surplus with most of the rest of the world, the deficit of the U.K. with North America remains very large. This deficit is being covered thanks to assistance from the United States and from Canada. But we cannot forever continue receiving this assistance, and are hoping by 1952 to achieve a position in which we are once again standing on our own feet. Our efforts are primarily aimed at increasing our exports to North America, but we must regulate our imports from North America to what we can currently afford.

The war made us dependent abnormally on North America, on the basis of the free gift of supplies or virtually unlimited loans, and we now have to readjust that dependence on the basis of the altered economic facts. This we have done much more rapidly in the case of the United States than in the case of Canada where we have done our best to ease off the difficulties of readjustment. We are in fact proportionately buying more from Canada than before the war, while selling less to her. This process of readjustment is most unpleasant for us both, since it involves sharp restrictions on our consumption, and reduction of the Canadian markets in some important foodstuffs.

2. In so far as we can increase the trade with the non-dollar world we find very largely that increased purchases by us mean increased sales by us. This is not so in the case of our relations with North America. Increased purchases from Canada bring an increased demand on us for U.S. dollars since Canada cannot hold or use sterling, whereas increased purchases from most non-dollar countries are in terms of sterling with which these countries make increased purchases in return from the U.K. or are prepared to hold against future spending. The readjustments we have had to make have disagreeable consequences for both of our countries. Canada, like the U.K., has been benefitting to a considerable degree from American dollar assistance, though in the Canadian case the assistance has been in the form of the provision of an acceptable currency for "offshore purchases" under E.R.P. We are committed to the United States, which is currently meeting the larger part of our Western Hemisphere deficit, to secure "viability" by the end of the Marshall Period.

 Given to C.D. Howe by Sir Stafford Cripps on April 28, 1949.

This we can only do by adjustment of our trade with North America. It is against this background that the problem of Anglo-Canadian economic relations must be viewed.

The U.K. Post-War Problem

3. The United Kingdom set itself a three-fold task of readjustment after the war:

(a) the economic resources of the nation had to be redeployed so as to increase output and the efficiency of production to make up for the loss of sources of income destroyed by the war and for the dismantling of the export trade in the interests of the war effort;

(b) steps had to be taken to correct the very large disparity in trade with the Western Hemisphere arising from the war—a problem not only for the U.K. but for the whole of the non-dollar world;

(c) a pattern of trade had to be developed with the rest of the non-dollar world by which the U.K. might eventually regain the traditional advantages of trade conducted on a multilateral basis.

4. There was no short cut by which these ends could be achieved[;] there could be no question of a country in the position of the U.K. abandoning the war-time controls after the initial impact of demobilisation and taking steps to allow fluctuating prices and exchange rates to give a new direction to production and trade under the force of competition and where necessary the threat of unemployment. An effort had to be made to arrive at a new economic equilibrium without permitting price and exchange fluctuations to break up the social fabric, by adhering to a system of rationing and controls, coupled with high taxation and the planning of investment.

5. In the pursuit of these ends by the use of these methods certain external limiting factors have had to be accepted which largely condition the degree of success so far achieved:

(a) in the first place, the amount of external assistance, substantial though it has been, by way of loans or gifts from friendly nations disposing of greater economic resources immediately after the war, and also the length of time during which that assistance was to be made available, imposed very narrow limits upon the U.K. in planning the redeployment of her resources;

(b) secondly, the U.K., as a focal point of the whole sterling system, was bound to accept responsibilities in relation to the external financial difficulties in which other members of the area found themselves at the end of the war, largely for the same reasons as the U.K. This has meant that the difficulties experienced by countries such as India and Burma in recovering from the effects of the war upon their industry and foreign trade were necessarily reflected in the U.K. in so far as these countries hold their foreign exchange reserves in London, and contribute to or draw from the central reserve as a common pool;

(c) finally, the rate of economic recovery in other parts of the non-dollar world, and more especially in Western Europe and South-East Asia, has necessarily conditioned the extent to which the U.K. could hope to return to a stable multilateral system of trade.

6. In accepting the U.S. and Canadian loan agreements in 1945 and 1946 the U.K. took the risk that the drain on its resources resulting from the second and third of these factors might prove greater than was compatible with the amount of assistance received. The risk proved in the event to have been only too real. The rest of the world needed such enormous supplies from Canada and the United States that it was rapidly drained dry of dollars. The premature experiment in convertibility in 1947 failed because as had been foreseen by many people it was an attempt to bring about the end result before any of the necessary conditions for it had been realised.

7. This experience has demonstrated once again that it is useless to attempt convertibility until the basic condition has been securely established or until there is a firm prospect of its immediate establishment, viz., that world recovery has proceeded to a point at which there is a "natural" equilibrium between the dollar world and the non-dollar world—i.e. that the normal trade pattern does provide a balance without artificial measures having to be taken to secure one. This cannot happen until—

(a) the production in the rest of the world has developed to a point at which the world's dependence upon supplies from the dollar area has been greatly reduced;

(b) the non-dollar countries have been able to adjust their economies to build up exports to the dollar area—and the dollar area countries have adjusted their economies to take more imports.

8. To attempt convertibility before this condition is satisfied would only mean a repetition of the experiences of 1947. The main trading countries—particularly U.S., U.K., Canada and the rest of the Commonwealth—must be in reasonable balance before their currencies can become freely convertible. The need in the meantime is for stability and slow and steady progress toward equilibrium.

Anglo-Canadian Trade Relations

9. The apparent conflict of interests between the U.K. and Canada has led to some criticism of U.K. policy in Canada, where it has been asserted that, in view of all the help which Canada has given during and after the war, the U.K. shows a lack of gratitude in refusing to buy things from Canada and in getting them instead from foreign countries—and even in some cases from countries behind the Iron Curtain. No-one, I think, doubts that we are whole-heartedly appreciative of the extent of Canadian assistance during and since the war. But we are already buying all that we can afford from our own dollar earnings, and all that we can persuade the Americans to allow us to buy in Canada with the dollars with which they provide us under E.R.P. Anything further we spend must come out of our Gold Reserves which we cannot afford to diminish further. When we buy foodstuffs from Eastern Europe we do so in the knowledge that we shall not have to pay with United States dollars, or from our Gold Reserves. Even if a quantity of steel or some other equipment which might be used to earn dollars has to be exported to such countries, it is only a small—though essential—part of the bargain. In fact these small quantities of scarce materials enable us to buy with other goods which would not be exportable to the dollar area many times their value of foodstuffs and raw materials that we need. Every care, it may be added, is taken to ensure that particular agreements into which we may enter do not materially impair our capacity to export to Canada.

10. Apart from the difficulties caused by the cessation of particular purchases, there is we know a growing Canadian feeling that our whole policy is building up a high cost economy in the non-dollar world and is setting in motion forces which will limit severely, if not prohibit altogether, the possibility of any return to genuinely multilateral trade. While these misgivings are fully understood, they appear to us (a) to exaggerate the nature and long-term implications of the current situation; (b) to under-estimate the growing spread of resources in the non-dollar world and therefore the potential adjustment between supply and demand, with consequent effect on prices, in those parts of the world; and (c) to overlook the fundamental fact that there appears to be no known alternative policy which would offer the prospect of regaining that equilibrium which all countries regard as absolutely essential if we are to return to a single world in trade and currencies.

11. From the Canadian point of view this situation means, of course, that the number of U.S. dollars which Canadian exports can earn in the rest of the world will be limited. On the other hand, it must be remembered that, so far as the U.K. is concerned, Canada's surplus on current account is a relatively recent development. Before 1934 there was on the average no surplus of any size, and indeed in some years a substantial deficit. Immediately before the war Canada's surplus with the U.K. reached a high point in 1939 of $137 million. In contrast to this in 1946 the surplus was $500 million, in 1947 $633 million and in 1948 $488 million. A surplus of this magnitude obviously cannot continue to be financed either by gifts or loans.

12. The attack on this economic problem has been two-fold. Firstly, on the exports side, every effort has been made over the last 12 months to impress on U.K. industry the paramount importance of increasing our direct exports to Canada. This has met with considerable success and as a result exports from the U.K. to Canada have risen very sharply—in 1947 they averaged £3.6 million a month, and in 1948 this was up to £5.8 million a month and this increase will, it is to be hoped, go further. March 1949 has been a particularly good month. This policy is now being intensified by every means of incentive and assistance which the Government can properly and effectively apply as part of the renewed concentration on the North American market. The full success of this policy will of course require the co-operation both of the Canadian Government and of the Canadian importers. Secondly, while imports from Canada have had to be reduced, they are still substantially above the pre-war level and will have to be tapered further as contemplated in the U.K. long-term plan. Even so, we are still assuming a high level of imports from Canada (high that is by any standard except the artificial war-time one) and a sizeable deficit which can only be managed if we succeed in securing a corresponding surplus from other dollar countries. While we shall continue to make plans on this assumption, we are being increasingly subjected to pressure from the Americans to buy less from Canada and more from the U.S.A. on the grounds that U.S. supplies are cheaper, and it is becoming more and more difficult to get E.C.A. to agree to off-shore purchases in Canada.

13. We are all anxious to get back to a world of convertibility, a world in which the channels of trade have been readjusted in such a way as to make free convertibility possible. But by whatever way such a world is arrived at it will clearly be impossible for Canada to run surpluses of the present dimensions with the rest of the world for the purpose of meeting a U.S. dollar deficit. The rest of the world is impoverished, and this means that it will on the whole be able to afford to buy less and not more from North America than before the war.

14. The basic contention of the U.K., therefore, is that whatever the method adopted the result of the war is that an adjustment has to be made in Anglo-Canadian trade which is most unpleasant to both the exporting and importing country. The U.K. Government earnestly hope that the Canadian Government will do all they can to prevent their public opinion from forming an impression that what is in reality an inescapable economic choice for the non-dollar world (and the U.K. in particular) arises only because of doctrinaire attitudes, unwillingness to understand the Canadian point of view, or plain ingratitude for what Canada has done in the past. The U.K. Government are convinced that their policy is realistic and not doctrinaire. They are deeply grateful for the many instances of Canadian help which have been shown to this country and realise to the full how many difficulties the present situation must be causing in the Canadian economy. It is with reluctance that they have been forced to embark on their current economic policy, but with the best will in the world they can see no alternative, short of denying to their own people many supplies of food and raw materials available in the non-dollar world, for which they are able to pay by the raw materials or the manufactured goods that they can exchange for them.

London, May 3, 1949

My telegram No. 912 of April 29th, regarding Mr. Howe's trade talks with United Kingdom Ministers:

1. Mr. Howe had a long talk with Mr. Strachey, Minister of Food, on April 29th, and a talk with Mr. Harold Wilson, President of the Board of Trade, yesterday afternoon, May 2nd. These two talks were both still part of the exploratory state, but as a result it is now possible to give some indication of what we may expect to result from Mr. Howe's mission to London.

2. As regards timber, the United Kingdom Government proposes to authorize the Timber Control to place immediately an order for west coast woods to the amount of ten million dollars, which is to be competed for freely by exporters both in Canada and the United States, price being the determining factor as to who gets the order. It has now been confirmed that this immediate order is to be in addition to the arrangements for additional quantities to be contracted for by the Timber Control during the remainder of this year. The Timber Controller indicates that he has in mind additional orders for between 90,000 and 120,000 standards, but still awaits Treasury authorization. It has not yet been decided as to whether these additional quantities should be divided between Canada and the United States or left for free competition as in the case of the immediate order. Much will depend on how the immediate order works out, and the Treasury will also wish to have more experience of the financing of wheat purchases with earned dollars. The immediate order for timber is to be financed with ECA dollars, and ECA approval in principle already has been obtained.⁴⁴

3. As regards canned salmon, the amount mentioned has been $7,200,000, purchase to be made from 1949 production. This also it is hoped to finance with ECA dollars.

4. As regards apples, Strachey indicated that only a token amount could be allocated for the importation of apples, both from Canada and the United States.

5. Strachey held out little or no hope for purchases of other commodities mentioned by Mr. Howe, such as processed milks, beans, peas, berries, tomatoes and honey, although he expressed his interest in additional quantities of cheese.

6. The discussion so far has been on the basis of utilizing the shortfall of bacon shipments to cover the purchases of the additional quantity of timber, canned salmon, and apples, but Sir Henry Wilson Smith told Mr. Mackenzie that before the latter left London he would like to discuss with him the proposal regarding the financing of Shell Oil operations. It is possible that the United Kingdom Government has in mind our concurrence in the Shell Oil proposal as part of the general settlement, although no statement to this effect has been made.

7. The exploratory conversations with individual Ministers will continue, after which it is expected that a full meeting, attended by all the United Kingdom Ministers concerned, similar to the meeting held on the morning of April 29th, will be arranged to bring matters to a finality.

This tentative commitment later became a point of dispute between Howe and Wilson. See DEA/824-40 for exchanges later in the year.

TELEGRAM 968

London, May 7, 1949

Mr. Howe's trade talks with United Kingdom Ministers:

1. The Prime Minister will have received in telegram No. 965 the text of the statement which Mr. Howe proposes to release after his return to Ottawa.† As a supplement to that message and to my telegram No. 912 of April 29 and No. 932 of May 3rd, I am reporting below some additional background information on the talks.

2. I should emphasize particularly the cordial nature of all the conversations. On the United Kingdom side as well as on our own I think it is felt that these talks have dealt successfully with a number of troublesome questions affecting relations between Canada and the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom Ministers concerned were most appreciative of the Canadian attitude in the discussions, even though there was necessarily some hard bargaining. They felt also that Mr. Howe's public addresses, both in London and in Birmingham, were extremely helpful and would assist in stimulating interest in the United Kingdom export drive to dollar markets. Although the basic difficulties in economic relations between the United Kingdom and Canada may remain, the activities of Mr. Howe and Mr. Mackenzie have undoubtedly removed a number of the significant irritants, and have contributed to an improvement in the atmosphere surrounding commercial relations between the two countries.

3. Regarding the items which the United Kingdom now plan to purchase from Canada as a result of these talks, the following points may be of interest:

Canned Salmon

The amount which the United Kingdom are prepared to take to the end of 1949 is $7,200,000 as stated in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 932. The quantity mentioned in Mr. Howe's proposed press release represents the conversion of this figure into cases.

Timber

There is nothing to add to the information given in paragraph 2 of my telegram No. 932.

Apples

The United Kingdom are prepared to finance purchases amounting to $1,500,000. This represents a substantial increase on the $500,000 which Cripps had approved tentatively for such purchases before his departure from London. Although the salmon and timber are expected to be financed with E.C.A. dollars, the present intention of the United Kingdom is to finance the apple purchases with non-E.C.A. dollars.

Flour

The quantity of flour (400,000 tons) which the United Kingdom have undertaken to buy is substantially higher than they would have wished in view of the offers which they have had from Australia.

Fruit Pulp

(i.e. SO2 berries)

The United Kingdom are prepared to pay $100,000 (out of non-E.C.A. funds) for the quantity of this item held by the Canadian Government.

4. On the Canadian side Mr. Howe agreed that arrangements would be made promptly to make possible the Shell Oil transactions referred to in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 616. Mr. Howe also undertook to see what could be done about the import prohibitions affecting certain United Kingdom products mentioned in paragraph 6 of your telegram No. 616.

5. The United Kingdom side also took advantage of the opportunity afforded by these conversations to mention certain expected developments which they thought might lead to some misunderstanding if the Canadian authorities were not informed in advance. In particular, information was given concerning the revised United Kingdom forecast of wheat imports from Canada in 1952-53 and concerning the possible negotiation of a long-term contract with the Netherlands. In addition, Wilson Smith informed Mr. Mackenzie of the expected level of gold and dollar reserves at June 30, 1949, and of the latest United Kingdom balance of payments forecast for 1949-50. I shall not report on these matters in this message as Mr. Mackenzie has the information with him and will doubtless be informing you in detail of these aspects of the talks on his return.

6. The question of the treatment of the Newfoundland loan (paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 616) was not discussed at any length. Wilson Smith mentioned that the United Kingdom Treasury were still "unhappy" that an arrangement had been made which provided an incentive for Newfoundland to call on the United Kingdom for early repayment of the loan. Mr. Mackenzie repeated that the Canadian authorities were still unable to justify a transaction such as Wilson Smith had proposed earlier. Wilson Smith did not press the matter.

1. ERP; DISCUSSIONS WITH U.K. OFFICIALS IN WASHINGTON

1. The Chairman said that the principal subject for consideration by the meeting was the report by Messrs. Deutsch, Plumptre and Beaupre on discussions which they had had with Sir Sidney Caine and other U.K. officials in Washington on May 23 and May 25.

Copies of the report were circulated. (ICETP Document No. 52).⁴⁵

The U.K. officials had indicated that the original net gold and dollar deficit of the U.K. for 1949-50 had been set at $940 million. The latest estimate, however, set the deficit at a little over $1100 million, which meant that the deficit position was worsening at a time when prospects of obtaining the full $940 million ERP assistance were not bright.

A summary of the U.K. estimate of the sterling area's balance of payments with Canada for 1949-50 indicated an anticipated total sterling area deficit on current account of $379 million. With adjustment for a credit of $120 million less $14 million of payments to Canada on capital account, the net sterling area deficit amounted to $271 million. The present London programme called for $680.6 million of imports from Canada, $287.5 million of which would be eligible for ERP financing. U.K. officials in Washington, however, thought that a more realistic view would require a reduction of $43 million in the anticipated imports from Canada, bringing the total to $637 million. Of these $181.4 million would be eligible for financing by ERP.

The U.K. programme provides for the continued purchase of Canadian bacon, cheese and eggs during the next fiscal year at approximately the same rate as during the present fiscal year, although contracts for the commodities expire on December 31, 1949.

So far as ECA off-shore financing is concerned the view of U.K. officials in Washington was that agricultural commodities would all be out by the fourth quarter; that forest products, including wood pulp, would be difficult; and that some non-ferrous metals would be troublesome, the extent of difficulty depending on the severity of the present U.S. recession.

2. Mr. Deutsch supplemented the report orally.

In general, the U.K. officials in Washington and also U.S. officials thought that the ERP position in 1949-50 would not be too difficult. However, for 1950-51 it was feared the situation might be different. There might be a severe cut in appropriations, very little off-shore purchasing and the programme might become dominated by a desire to dispose of U.S. surpluses. Thus far the policy officials in ECA had emphasized the competitive approach as the basis in placing orders. Their attitude with regard to the U.K. purchase of salmon in Canada had been in line with this. However, there were increasing signs that there would be pressure to ignore or modify the competitive basis in order to increase procurement from the U.S.

One argument that had been put forward was that advantage given to Canadians through the British Preferential Tariff should not be considered in so far as competitive costs were concerned. The U.K. had objected to this point of view, but it might be pressed further.

Memorandum from Secretary to the Cabinet to Cabinet

ENQUIRY FROM THE U.K. RE WAIVER OF ARTICLE 5 OF THE ANGLO-CANADIAN LOAN AGREEMENT CONCERNING TRADE DISCRIMINATION

1. A message has been received from the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations stating that the U.K. have been considering possible relaxation of restrictions on imports from soft currency countries. The relaxation would apply to OEEC countries (i.e.—recipients of Marshall plan aid) and also to other soft currency countries. It would not apply to Canada and other hard currency countries. Canada and the U.S. are particularly concerned with the proposal to extend the relaxation beyond OEEC countries because it would contravene the terms of the Anglo-American Financial Agreement and the Anglo-Canadian Loan Agreement. The U.K. are asking that the U.S. waive its rights to object. If the U.S. agree, the U.K. authorities hope Canada will do the same.

2. Article 9 of the U.S.-U.K. agreement of December 6, 1945, is as follows:

“If either the Government of the United States or the Government of the United Kingdom imposes or maintains quantitative import restrictions, such restrictions shall be administered on a basis which does not discriminate against imports from the other country in respect of any product; provided that this undertaking shall not apply in cases in which—

(b) there may be special necessity for the country imposing such restrictions to assist, by measures not involving a substantial departure from the general rule of non-discrimination, a country whose economy has been disrupted by war;”

Article 5 of the agreement of March 6th, 1946, between ourselves and the U.K. gives us the same rights against discriminatory treatment as the U.S. has.

Discrimination in favour of OEEC countries can be justified as being in favour of countries whose "economy has been disrupted by war". More favourable treatment to other countries than to the U.S. or to Canada is barred by the agreements.

3. While it is the extension beyond OEEC countries that raises the problem of the U.K. commitments to the U.S. and ourselves, the U.K. appear to regard such extension as essential. This was made clear by Sir Stafford Cripps in putting the proposal forward in Paris on June 3rd and 4th, in the Intra-European Payments negotiations. In view of these negotiations at Paris, where the U.K. proposal has been stated to hinge on the reaction of the U.S. and Canada, the question could become one of urgency and the U.K. are so representing it to us at the present time.

4. Such information as we have received thus far as to the probable U.S. reaction is not conclusive. Treasury officials have indicated that Article 9 of their agreement could not be waived without going to Congress, and that the latter would be most unlikely to approve. On the other hand, there is apparently a feeling in the State Department that the U.K. proposal is a move toward reduction of trade barriers and should be seriously considered. They seem to think, however, that the change might be limited to OEEC countries.

5. So far as the substance of the problem is concerned as it affects Canada, it would appear that we have no legal ground for objection to relaxations applying to countries whose economies have been disrupted by war which, broadly speaking, includes the OEEC countries. (Although it could be claimed that not all have "war shattered" economies). Moreover, it is probable that such discriminatory treatment in their favour as against ourselves would not alter the realities of the present trading position. It is the U.K. proposal to extend the relaxations on a discriminatory basis to the rest of the sterling area and other soft currency countries which is contrary to the agreements and which causes concern. It is not possible to know to what extent broader relaxations might injure our position but any agreement to waive rights we now have under Article 5 would be a concession in principle and for that reason important, whatever the material result might be.

6. The U.K. have been told informally that no reply could be given to their enquiry pending ministerial consideration. No reply is strictly necessary until the U.S. has answered. However, Cabinet might wish to consider what position should be taken to Canada and whether it would be desirable to give indication of it without waiting for the U.S. reaction.⁴⁶

⁴⁶ Le 16 juin 1949 le Cabinet reporta sa décision jusqu'à ce que la réponse des É.-U. soit connue. On June 16, 1949 Cabinet deferred a decision until after the U.S. response became known.

TOP SECRET

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL MESSAGE DATED 17TH JUNE FOR MR. ST. LAURENT
FROM MR. ATTLEE

I must tell you of a serious development in our affairs. During the last few weeks the drain of our gold and dollar reserves has increased substantially. In the first quarter of this year the dollar deficit of the sterling area was about 25 million dollars a week, all of which was covered by E.R.P. aid. In the last six weeks it has been running at 50 million dollars a week, which is about double the amount of E.R.P. aid. The reserves are therefore falling fast and the figures which we shall have to publish in the first few days of July will reveal this very noticeable deterioration.

2. My colleagues and I are most disturbed by this development, which our advisors attribute primarily to the impact directly and indirectly of the trade recession in the United States.

3. We have no reason to believe that the situation is likely to right itself of its own accord and are therefore giving urgent consideration to the measures which are required to deal with it. As an interim step we in the United Kingdom have stopped all new commitments for dollar expenditure pending further consideration.

4. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will be telegraphing to your Finance Minister at the end of next week a personal and confidential appreciation outlining the situation and your interpretation of it, and I would be very grateful if you would bring the matter before your colleagues at the earliest possible moment.

5. This is a matter of most vital importance to the economic stability of the whole of the Commonwealth, and to the trade of the world, and I am most anxious that there should be a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in London at the beginning of July. I would suggest that we aim to begin not later than July 11th. I realize that the interval between now and then is all too short, but I am sure that we cannot afford any greater delay. We deliberately prefer a Commonwealth meeting, and not a sterling area meeting, because of the general reactions of current developments in the United States on the trade and prosperity of the Commonwealth, and because we regard it as essential that any solutions should be worked out in full cooperation with Canada.

6. The purpose of this meeting would be

(I) to consider in the light of this serious deterioration of our position what short term action can be taken to hold the position and

(II) to consider what additional and complementary measures each of us can take to prevent the development of the recession in the United States from setting up a general reaction which would lead to a reduction of world trade generally, and the impoverishment of all of us.

7. My colleagues and I are confident that we can find a way to ease the shock caused by the United States recession without unduly restricting the trade of the world provided that we act quickly and vigorously enough, and I would much appreciate your immediate reply to the suggestion in paragraph 5 of this message and also of course any comments on the situation.

8. I should be grateful if for the time being you would treat this message as top secret since if it became known that this meeting had been proposed it would undoubtedly give rise to renewed rumours of devaluation of sterling. If, as I hope, agreement on a meeting can be reached quickly, we will telegraph suggestions as to how and in what terms a preliminary announcement should be made.

9. I am sending a message in similar terms to the Prime Ministers of all Commonwealth countries.

10. You will I am sure appreciate the motives which have prompted the suggestion that we should approach this problem on a Commonwealth basis. There is no doubt that our discussions will be much more fruitful if Canada participates in them, and though I know that the date suggested will be particularly inconvenient to you in view of your General Election, I earnestly trust that you will be able to agree.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL MESSAGE DATED JUNE 19TH FOR MR. ATTLEE FROM MR. ST. LAURENT

I refer to your top secret and personal message to me of June 17th. In the absence of most of my colleagues, it is not possible for me to give any immediate indication of the views of the Canadian government regarding the proposals contained in your message. You will understand that with the election only a week away and with my colleagues scattered in all provinces of the country it is impossible to have the full consultation with the Cabinet which is necessary in an important matter of this kind.

My attention has also been drawn to the text of a suggested announcement to be made in your Parliament next Wednesday concerning proposed import relaxations by the United Kingdom. As you know certain of the proposals are of direct concern to the Canadian government. It is my understanding that it has not been definitely decided to proceed with this announcement and, in the circumstances which I have indicated, I would strongly urge that it be deferred.

In view of the urgent nature of your message I have arranged for Mr. Norman Robertson to proceed immediately to London by air. He will arrive there tomorrow evening, June 20th. Mr. Robertson will be in a position to represent the views of my colleague the Minister of Finance and my own, and to explain fully the various considerations which appear to us to be so important from the Canadian standpoint, including the deferment of any announcements at this time.

Ottawa, June 19th, 1949

I should like to refer to the message you gave to the High Commissioner in London dated May 27th respecting proposed relaxation of United Kingdom import restrictions and to the draft Parliamentary statement which I understand it is proposed to make on this subject on Wednesday next. In the unavoidable absence of the Prime Minister and most of his colleagues from Ottawa, it has been impossible, up to now, to submit any comments on United Kingdom proposals which, in their implications, are of great interest and concern to Canada.

There is much sympathy in Canada with your efforts to initiate the removal of quantitative import regulations on trade between O.E.E.C. countries, and a very general recognition that, under present conditions, you cannot risk any further loss of gold or dollars as a result of the removal or relaxation of United Kingdom import controls. In these circumstances, we would fully understand your deciding that you could and should exempt from quantitative restriction imports from O.E.E.C. countries with which you enjoy a favourable balance of trade. Nor would we find it difficult to accept the assimilation for this purpose of imports from dependent overseas territories to imports from O.E.E.C. countries to which you had granted drawing rights under the Intra-European Payments Agreement. We would, however, be seriously worried about both the short-run and long-run effects on Anglo-Canadian trade and financial relations of a decision on your part to extend to all soft currency countries, or even to other overseas members of the sterling area, a system of exemptions from which Canada would be excluded. The formal legitimation, at this particular moment, of the de facto discriminations, which we have been accepting and explaining away as aspects of a difficult and prolonged transitional period, would raise questions which go to the root of Canada's external economic policies.

We have not, at this stage, thought it helpful to discuss the question of policy in terms of the formal commitments of Article 5 of the United Kingdom-Canada Loan Agreement. The policy implications of such a statement as the United Kingdom Government have in mind making on Wednesday next go deeper than this matter of legal limitation of freedom of action. We greatly hope, therefore, that the United Kingdom can see their way to separate the question of relaxing quantitative restrictions on imports from the O.E.E.C. countries and overseas territories from the larger question of legitimizing all over the world import discriminations against Canada and the United States.

We would like to request most urgently that you defer any public announcement along the lines of your proposed Parliamentary statement until there has been an opportunity to consult with our full Cabinet. Ends.

RE: MR. N.A. ROBERTSON'S DISCUSSIONS IN LONDON

Attached are copies of telegrams Nos. 1288†, 1289† and 1296† which have been received from Mr. Robertson and Mr. Wilgress about the talks in London. Information has been received this morning that Mr. Robertson will arrive in Montreal tonight (June 24th). The substance of the telegrams is briefly as follows:

Proposed Commonwealth meeting

1. Mr. Robertson emphasized the desirability of having no publicity until the Canadian Cabinet has had a chance to consider the proposal. The U.K. agree and hope that no leakage will occur.

2. Our fears about U.S. reaction to a Commonwealth meeting to discuss the effects of the U.S. recession were expressed. Mr. Robertson suggested that a meeting of sterling area countries without Canada would be more appropriate.

3. The U.K. have indicated to U.S. authorities their concern over the balance of payments developments and the connection with the U.S. recession. They are now sending further details to Washington. Cripps stated that Douglas and Harriman had been told of the proposed Commonwealth meeting and "neither of them had expressed concern at the possible reaction in the U.S." Cripps is determined to keep the U.S. informed and do everything possible to retain U.S. cooperation.

4. Cripps argued strongly for Canadian participation in the Commonwealth talks, as a "restraining influence" on countries that might "pillory the U.S. and...urge reduction in dollar imports as the solution".

5. South Africa, Pakistan, India, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia are agreeable to the meeting. No definite word has been had from New Zealand or Australia. Cripps is anxious to stick to the date of July 11th. The gold and dollar drain will be revealed in the quarterly statement of July 5th and it is desired to show action immediately.

6. Bevin has sent a message to the U.S. suggesting a joint U.S.-U.K. committee (with Canadian participation) to keep the situation under review.

7. Mr. Robertson has talked with Attlee, [Herbert] Morrison, Lord Addison, and Noel-Baker as well as with Cripps and Bevin. Also with the senior officials and with U.S. Ambassador Douglas.

Statement on relaxation of import controls

8. The O.E.E.C. announcement (originally planned for June 20th) will not be made before June 25th, although there have been serious leaks.

The statement to Parliament will be not before June 27th, and the words "which are at present under discussion with other governments concerned" will be deleted (telegram 1282, June 21).†

9. The U.S. have indicated to the U.K. regret at the need for the parliamentary announcement but have not objected to it. No commitment was given on the substance of the proposals. There is extreme reluctance to approach the Senate to waive Article 9. (Teletype from Washington, WA-1686, June 20).†

10. Mr. Robertson reviewed to the U.K. our view (as set forth in our reply of June 19) that the O.E.E.C. discrimination could be accepted but that further extension was another question. The U.K. are, however, strongly of the view that extension to sterling area Commonwealth countries is necessary. They do not think the lists of goods to be affected will be of much interest to other soft currency countries (i.e. non-O.E.E.C. and non-Commonwealth).

11. Mr. Robertson does not feel that our arguments against extension of the arrangement to sterling area Commonwealth countries made much impression.

Public reports of discussions

12. Mr. Robertson's presence in London first became public yesterday with a story in the London "Daily Telegraph", word of which reached Ottawa in the afternoon. The Telegraph story states that Mr. Robertson was in London to discuss the British economic crisis; that he had the complete confidence of the Canadian government but no power to make an agreement; and that he left word that Canada would do all it could to aid the United Kingdom.

13. In Canada, one line of speculation (arising from London) has connected Mr. Robertson's visit with the C.S.U. strike.⁴⁷ Another line has followed the Telegraph approach and also drawn in official U.S. statements on the British crisis.

This international strike resulted from a breakdown in negotiations between Canadian shipowners and the Canadian Seamen's Union, which eventually rejected a recommendation of a government conciliation board. There had been reports of a sit-down strike by the crew of a Canadian ship in Cardiff in early January 1949. By mid-April it had spread to Canadian flag ships in other ports. The C.S.U. called a strike and the owners entered into an agreement with the rival Seafarers' International Union. Dockers and longshoremen in the United Kingdom and elsewhere refused to handle Canadian ships. Although the situation had eased elsewhere, it was still sufficiently serious in London by late June 1949 that intervention by a senior official of the Canadian government was a credible explanation for the visit of Norman Robertson.

14. No word of the proposal for a Commonwealth meeting has got out as yet.

London, June 27, 1949

Top Secret and personal message to Minister of Finance from Chancellor of Exchequer as promised in paragraph 4 of Mr. Attlee's message to Prime Minister of 17th June.

The Dollar Situation

In Prime Minister's message of 17th June he promised that I would be sending you an appreciation with my views on present dollar emergency and my interpretation of it. What I want to do is to give you some more facts about position as we see it and various developments which have brought it about, and prospects for coming year as they now appear to us.

2. We had already brought to notice of members of sterling area statistical committee increase in dollar deficit which had taken place up to end May. We can now make some estimate of probable outcome over second quarter as a whole, and, also present a more detailed picture of recent course of events. This picture is by no means complete and whole story will not be available for some weeks. Nevertheless main lines of development are clear enough.

3. Gold and dollar deficit of whole sterling area in April was $149 million. In May it increased to about dollars 230 million and in June it will probably fall not far short of $250 million. Over whole quarter therefore it will amount to about $630 million, or £156 million compared with $332 million or £82 million, in first quarter. In other words deficit will almost have doubled in three months. At the May/June rate annual deficit has been running at $2,900 million. Even allowing for all assistance under E.R.P. etc. that we can hope for, at this rate of loss all our reserves would be exhausted in less than a year.

4. Deterioration is not repeat not due to any significant increase in United Kingdom expenditure in the dollar area. Some increase in this was in fact expected over rate of purchases in first quarter for seasonal and other reasons but expenditure has actually fallen short of our expectations.

5. Worsening in position of United Kingdom as such is partly the result of a sharp fall in exports to the United States in April and May when they were little more than half the level of the closing months of 1948 and the first quarter of 1949. In addition sales of diamonds through United Kingdom which are an important element in our dollar receipts have been cut to a fraction of their previous volume.

From $61 million in 1948 they fell to $7 million in the first quarter of 1949 and to only $1 million in April/May. Superimposed on this there have been losses which can either directly or indirectly be attributed to rumours about devaluation which have been sedulously propagated recently particularly in United States. American holders of sterling have converted large amounts into dollars in addition there has no doubt been a certain amount of holding off in repatriation of funds belonging to sterling area residents though at moment we have no direct evidence of this. We have however a good deal of evidence of hesitancy on part of our American customers in placing further orders.

6. Another very serious development is big reduction in dollar receipts from sales of Colonial produce. This has affected rubber and tin particularly and other commodities such as cocoa to lesser extent. United States Government agencies responsible for stockpiling have greatly reduced their purchases for one reason or another. As a result Colonial surplus, which played such a big part in improving sterling area's dollar position in 1948, disappeared completely in April/May. In first quarter 1949 it amounted to no less than dollars 65 million with United States alone.

7. Countries in rest of sterling area have also drawn more heavily on central reserves. We cannot at this moment give any detailed explanation of this though we know that in some cases dollar income from sales of raw materials to United States has been reduced both through a falling off in demand and through a decline in prices.

8. As a result of all these developments we estimate that total sterling area deficit with United States nearly doubled in April compared with monthly average in first quarter of the year (dollars 89 million compared with dollars 46 million) and nearly trebled in May.

9. There has up to now been no significant increase in sterling area's total deficit with Canada and Central American countries in dollar area. In fact United Kingdom exports to Canada have kept up extremely well. In May they amounted to over dollars 30 million not far short of record figure for March. We hope that it will be possible to maintain this state of affairs and to carry expansion still further.

10. As you will know we have been suffering increasing losses of gold and dollars to Switzerland and Belgium with continuous increase in total sterling area deficit with these countries. During this quarter we shall have paid gold and dollars to the value of dollars 62 million to them compared with only dollars 31 million in the first quarter even though we were able to exercise drawing rights on Belgium under intra-European payments agreement to extent of dollar $7\frac{1}{2}$ million this quarter compared with nil, last quarter.

11. Taking situation as a whole therefore it can be summed up by saying that during last few months sterling area has felt first major impact of recession in business activity in United States which has resulted in sudden reduction in its dollar earnings. This has been exacerbated by consequences of exchange rate controversy and by increasing gravity of sterling area's balance of payments position with Switzerland and Belgium.

12. As result of these developments our gold and dollar reserves have been very heavily depleted since beginning of April. We have on several occasions laid it down as a basic principle of policy that during period of E.R.P. central reserves of sterling area shall not be allowed to fall and that expenditure will be adjusted so that it can be met from dollar receipts to sterling area supplemented by E.R.P. and any other forms of assistance that are available to us.

13. On the 1st April 1948 which may be taken as beginning of E.R.P. our holdings of gold United States and Canadian dollars amounted to dollars 2,241 million. Owing to delays in setting machinery of E.R.P. into action and consequent delay in reimbursing to us expenditure which we had already incurred our reserves fell heavily during first six months of its life. There was a certain recovery between 1st October 1948 and 1st April 1949 by which time reserves had risen to dollars 1,912 million. Since then they have gone down rapidly and we estimate that by 1st July they will not exceed dollars 1,600 million. This means loss of over dollars 300 million or little short of £80 million during the present quarter.

14. There is still of course pipeline of E.R.P. financed commodities which we can expect to receive in course of time and there are still certain sums which we have spent but which have not yet been reimbursed to us by E.C.A. These however are not monies that are immediately available to strengthen reserves since a pipeline and a backlog of reimbursement must be expected to continue throughout whole period of E.R.P.

15. By beginning of second year of E.R.P. our reserves will therefore stand at less than £400 million with prospect of a continuous and rapid reduction unless steps can be taken to stop present drain.

16. In submitting our 1949/50 programme to O.E.E.C., (copies of which have been circulated to all Commonwealth Governments) we estimated that on certain given assumptions gold and dollar deficit of sterling area could be put at dollars 1,114 million. In this calculation we allowed for a further big increase in United Kingdom exports to dollar area and in receipts from various invisibles such as shipping tourism and earnings of British Oil Companies. So far as rest of sterling area is concerned we expected that Colonial surplus would not be lower than in 1948 in spite of reduction in prices of Colonial products. In absence of definite information our estimates for countries in independent sterling area were not made in detail but are based on such indications as were available to us about trends of expenditure and receipts. We assumed that India would be able to draw up to full extent of her quota from I.M.F. in 1949/50. We also allowed for heavy dollar payments to certain non-participants such as Persia and Curacao primarily in connection with our extremely important oil interests in those areas.

17. Despite these heavy payments we expected that on given assumptions total sterling area dollar deficit with all non-participants would amount to dollars 924 million i.e. a little less than the figure of dollars 940 million which had been our previous estimate of deficit and was our previous bid for aid in 1949/50.

18. But in addition to deficit with non-participants we were faced with prospect of continuing losses to other participants particularly Belgium and Switzerland which we could not put at less than dollars 190 million. Added to deficit with non-participants this gives a total of dollars 1,114 million with all countries.

19. Thus even before latest worsening in our position prospect for 1949/50 was serious since our prospective deficit far exceeded our original bid for aid. In addition all indications from Washington were that total amount of aid appropriated by Congress was likely to be cut. This made it unlikely that we should be successful in getting even as much as dollars 940 million.

20. Basic assumption underlying all our estimates, an assumption which was laid down for all participants by O.E.E.C. itself was that there would be a continuing high level of activity in United States. This assumption has obviously been falsified already. There can be no doubt now that United States is undergoing a period of declining economic activity whose scale and duration it is impossible to estimate. This recession has already struck a severe blow at dollar income of sterling area which is now faced with prospect that unless remedial action can be quickly taken its reserves might disappear entirely within a short time.

21. This situation necessitates a re-casting of all our calculations for 1949/50. In table attached to this telegram I show a comparison between details of sterling area dollar deficit in 1948 figures which we submitted recently to Paris, and a new set of figures for 1949/50 which makes allowance for probable reduction in income of various parts of the sterling area in its trade with dollar area over coming year. I need hardly emphasize how hazardous and uncertain any such estimates are at this stage. But on whole it is my opinion that if anything they still underestimate the extent of losses which we must expect.

22. In general we do not think that we can budget for a reduction in sterling area's income from exports to dollar area of much less than dollars 400 million or a fall of some 20 per cent compared with our previous ideas.

23. On invisible account it is even more difficult to make any reliable forecast. Some factors are likely to prove favourable because costs incurred by us in the dollar area may fall e.g. shipping expenses in United States ports and operating costs of oil companies; others such as our own shipping and travel receipts, income from sales of diamonds, interest and dividends; and a wide range of miscellaneous remittances are likely to become less favourable as United States recession develops.

24. You will see that we have allowed for a deterioration in this whole complex of items of only dollars 100 million. But this assumes that steps are speedily taken to restore confidence and that present losses of a quasi-capital nature from which we have suffered in past few months can be brought to an end. Here too I feel that if anything we may not have allowed enough for possible worsening in position which may take place.

25. We assumed previously that India might be able to draw up to dollars 100 million on IMF. American representatives on Fund have raised strong objections to drawings of this kind and we can no longer rely on them. This means further probable loss of dollars 100 million.

26. We have not assumed any savings on our gold and dollar payments to other participants. This whole subject involves problems of greatest complexity. So far as Switzerland is concerned there is little scope for economy since we are committed under our present trade agreement which runs to March 1950. Drastic action against imports from Belgium might result in economies but would be incompatible with a renewed trade agreement with Belgium under which we should be permitted drawing rights as in 1948/1949 and might involve us in heavy temporary losses through conversion of Belgium's sterling balances into dollars. Nevertheless whole future of sterling area's trade relations with Belgium will require most careful reconsideration and I should hope that this will be one of important items for discussion at our forthcoming meeting.

26.(A) Assuming no reduction in value of sterling area imports from dollar area, changes outlined above face us with a deterioration in our dollar position of order of dollars 600 million compared with previous estimates for 1949/1950. And this, it must be emphasized is, on balance of probability, an underestimate.

27. It is impossible at this stage, even before total appropriation for 1949/1950 is known and before operation of dividing it among participants has begun, to say what are our prospects for Marshall aid in 1949/1950. Even on our original estimates aid of dollars 940 million would still have left dollars 173 million uncovered. On the basis of our revised figures for probable deficit, amount uncovered would be dollars 750 million.

28. This is situation as it appears to us at moment on basis of best possible estimates that we can make. Our reserves have already been reduced well below danger level. It is now easy to see how inadequate they are to support enormous volume of trade of sterling area with dollar area which cannot fall far short of £1,000 million on each side of the account. Obviously very prompt and decisive action will be necessary unless we are to see them swept away before action can become effective.

29. In United Kingdom we are considering the nature of urgent and drastic steps which we shall hope to take. Our present intention is to make an announcement in the House of Commons in early days of July (when we must in any event publish dollars deficit figures for second quarter of year.) That statement will both describe general situation and deal with any immediate steps which we consider it necessary to take so far as the United Kingdom is concerned. I will endeavour to send you an advance copy of any such announcement. Meanwhile I must again emphasize the great importance of treating contents of this memorandum and indeed the proposal to have a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers as top secret. Ends. Table begins.

Memorandum for File:

RE: MEETINGS TO DISCUSS U.K. FINANCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

Meeting of Friday, June 24th

The following were present:

The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Heeney), in the Chair,

The Deputy Minister of Finance (Dr. Clark),
 The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Mackenzie),
 The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada (Mr. [Donald] Gordon),
 Mr. C.M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce,
 Mr. J.R. Beattie, Bank of Canada,
 Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance,
 Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of External Affairs,
 Mr. R.G. Robertson, Privy Council Office.

1. The meeting discussed telegrams No. 1288† and No. 1289† from Mr. Robertson in London.

2. It was agreed that little could be done in the way of reaching conclusions until Mr. Robertson's return with further information as to the situation in the United Kingdom.

3. Mr. Beattie reported that he had received word from Washington that Messrs. Snyder, Martin, Glendinning and Willis planned to leave for the United Kingdom on July 2nd.

Meeting of Monday, June 27th

The following were present:

The Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Robertson) in the Chair,
 The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Heeney),
 The Deputy Minister of Finance (Dr. Clark),
 The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Mackenzie),
 The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada (Mr. Gordon),
 Mr. C.M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce,
 Mr. J.E. Coyne, Bank of Canada,
 Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance,
 Mr. L. Rasminsky, Bank of Canada,
 Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of External Affairs,
 Mr. R.G. Robertson, Privy Council Office.

1. Mr. Robertson enlarged on the information given in telegram No. 1288,† concerning the developments in the U.K. reserve position. He said that, before his departure, Mr. Bevin had shown him a telegram which was being sent to the U.K. Ambassador in Washington, containing a message for Mr. Acheson. The message urged that the Secretary to the Treasury, with E.C.A. and State Department advisers if possible, should put his trip to Europe forward and come to the U.K. for consultation immediately. The message added that the Foreign Secretary proposed to invite a Canadian Minister and his advisors to come to London at the same time. The suggestion had been so worded that if there were U.S. objection, the proposal could be dropped. Further word from London by telephone early in the day (June 27th) was to the effect that the U.K. hoped to send a message to us in the next day or so.

As to the magnitude of the U.K. problem, later information was that the reference by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to loss at the rate of 600,000,000 pounds per year should have referred to dollars, that is, the loss was at approximately $600,000,000 per year over and above E.C.A. assistance, the Canadian loan, etc. It was expected that by December 31st, if the trend continued, reserves of gold and dollars would reach $1.6 billion.

2. Mr. Deutsch reported that he had just received a telephone call from Washington as to preliminary U.S. conclusions with regard to the U.K. problem. They felt that the principal factors were:

(a) a loss in dollar earnings due to high U.K. prices and a drop in the market price of colonial products;

(b) loss of dollar earnings through goods which should be sold for dollars being sold for cheap sterling (together with other losses through cheap sterling);

(c) excess drafts by the rest of the sterling area on the dollar pool.

As to remedies, the U.S. felt that controls would have to be made much stronger with regard to the R.S.A. (Mr. Rasminsky suggested that this would mean placing exchange controls on a commodity basis, rather than on an area basis). Another move would have to be for dollar invoicing of sterling area exports, i.e. they would move only on payment of dollars. However, it was felt that all other measures would be inadequate and that devaluation would become essential.

The U.S. had apparently received word that the U.K. planned to cut their own dollar imports by $400,000,000 annually and R.S.A. imports by $200,000,000.

3. Mr. Robertson stated that so far as the meetings were concerned, the plan to hold a meeting early in July with the U.S. Secretary to the Treasury and other officials made our position less difficult with regard to the proposal for a Commonwealth meeting. On the other hand, it probably made Canadian attendance less essential. However, assuming that Canada were to attend, the question arose as to what role we should play. Possibly Canadian representatives should be present only as observers.

4. There was discussion at the meeting as to whether or not it was possible or desirable to make any study or draw any conclusions as to the position Canada should take with regard to substantive measures that might be suggested. No conclusion was reached.

RE: UNITED KINGDOM FINANCES; PROPOSED MEETINGS IN LONDON;
U.K.-U.S.-CANADA; COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS

This matter will be discussed at 12.15 this morning by the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, Mr. Abbott and yourself. Clark, Robertson and I will be present.

1. On Saturday, June 18th, Mr. St. Laurent received a personal message from Mr. Attlee. The United Kingdom Government was facing a rapid loss of reserves. It attributed this loss to the business recession in the United States. It proposed a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers to consider remedies. The same proposal was being sent to the other Commonwealth Governments. "We deliberately prefer a Commonwealth meeting, and not a sterling area meeting, because of the general reactions of current developments in the United States on the trade and prosperity of the Commonwealth, and because we regard it as essential that any solutions should be worked out in full cooperation with Canada." A copy of this message is attached.

2. The following day Mr. St. Laurent replied: it was impossible at that time to hold a Cabinet meeting to consider the United Kingdom proposal; Norman Robertson was going to London immediately "to explain fully the various considerations which appear to us to be so important from the Canadian standpoint"; particularly important from this standpoint was the deferment of any announcements either regarding the proposed Commonwealth Conference or in regard to a separate proposal of the United Kingdom, viz. to relax the United Kingdom import restrictions in a way which would discriminate against Canada and the United States and in favour of soft currency countries (O.E.E.C., Commonwealth, and others). Robertson left that night.

3. Robertson stayed in London for the inside of a week. He saw the U.K. Prime Minister and all the Cabinet Ministers concerned and a number of senior officials. A copy of his interim report cabled on Wednesday, June 22nd, is attached (No. 1288).† Robertson questioned the usefulness of a Commonwealth meeting. He feared that the emphasis in the discussions would be on the United States recession as a cause of present troubles; that some Commonwealth representatives would be all too eager to blame their troubles on the United States; that if the Commonwealth as a body decided to restrict imports from the United States the reaction in the United States would be deeply coloured with recollections of the Commonwealth Conference of 1932; that it was essential in the present emergency to retain the cooperation of the United States; and that if the proposed meeting was merely to discuss emergency import restrictions by the sterling area Canada should not be present.

4. During Robertson's discussions it emerged that both Sir Stafford Cripps and Mr. Bevin were already trying to open up discussions with the United States. These discussions should precede Commonwealth discussions. Canada should be invited to attend. (Mr. Bevin seemed to be thinking in terms of continuing United States-United Kingdom machinery along the lines of our United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee.)

5. The United States has accepted the United Kingdom's invitation. The Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Snyder) and the Under-Secretary (Mr. Martin), together with other officials, are leaving Washington this Thursday (June 30th). We understand that they are going to Paris first; Mr. Snyder and Mr. Martin had already planned to go there, although later in the Summer, and presumably are now going there with the idea that this may divert publicity from the United States-United Kingdom discussions. When they are in London they will be accompanied by officials of E.C.A. and State Department.

6. The United Kingdom has suggested to the United States that Canada should take a part in these discussions. We do not know whether they have received a reply from the United States on this point although we learn from Canada House that the United Kingdom is expecting to send us an invitation. We also know that Mr. Achson favours our attendance and thinks Mr. Snyder would feel the same.

7. There is general agreement amongst Canadian officials of all the departments concerned that we should accept an invitation to discuss the situation jointly with the United States and the United Kingdom. These discussions will presumably take place next week. If the Minister of Finance attends no doubt Dr. Clark will be with him and I very much hope that Norman Robertson will also go because of his special knowledge and experience. It will probably be thought advisable to have as well an adviser from the Bank of Canada; Gordon is discussing this morning with Towers who this should be. If Robertson goes there is no need for direct representation from this Department; Wilgress and Ritchie will no doubt work with the group.

8. The Commonwealth meetings are now fixed to begin on Wednesday, July 13th. (I attach a copy of a second message from Mr. Attlee to Mr. St. Laurent dated June 25th). † My own view is that we should attend, although if, by any chance, we are not invited to the previous United States-United Kingdom discussions the matter may be questioned. As Robertson pointed out in London, we would not want to appear to be "ganging up" with other members of the Commonwealth against the United States. However, we have now received a formal invitation to attend and the holding of the meeting is being formally announced in London tomorrow; we have always been willing to try to help the United Kingdom out of its economic difficulties; and if the Canadian Government failed to send a representative it would be open to charges by Canadian exporters that it failed to take steps to protect their interests.

9. I am trying to confirm by telephone to London this morning that there is no hitch in the U.K. government's intention to invite us to the proposed tripartite discussions next week. Tentative arrangements are being made for two or three officials to sail from New York tomorrow, on the assumption that the invitation will be forthcoming.⁴⁸

DISCUSSION UNDER THE AEGIS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM-CANADA CONTINUING COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS, JULY 11, 1949, 3.45 P.M., AT THE UNITED KINGDOM TREASURY

Yesterday afternoon the group of Canadian officials met with Wilson Smith and Shillito of the Treasury, Liesching of the C.R.O., and Lee⁴⁹ of the Ministry of Food. Holmes of the Board of Trade was unable to be present as he was attending a meeting of the Exports Committee which was discussing methods of expanding U.K. exports to Canada.

2. The discussion (which necessarily was of a preliminary character) related to the following subjects:

(a) Plans for the discussions among the U.K., U.S. and Canada, which are expected to be held in Washington early in September. It was considered desirable to have such preparatory talks as might be possible at this stage before the departure of the Canadian officials from London. Wilson Smith reported that Snyder had indicated that Hebbard, the Financial Attache at the U.S. Embassy would represent the U.S. in any such preparatory talks on the agenda and general arrangements for the September discussions. Wilson Smith suggested that U.K. and Canadian officials might have some preliminary talks, after which they might meet together with Hebbard. These preliminary talks will be arranged as soon as possible.

(b) Consultation with Canada on the revision of the U.K. dollar import programme. It appeared that except for a few commodities on which decisions would have to be taken almost immediately (e.g. tobacco and cotton), the revisions to be ⁴⁸ Le 30 juin 1949 St-Laurent informa Attlee que Abbott serait présent aux réunions tripartites ainsi qu'à la réunion des ministres des Finances du Commonwealth.

On June 30, 1949 St. Laurent informed Attlee that Abbott would attend both the tripartite meetings and the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers.

⁴⁹ F.G. Lee, secrétaire permanent, ministère de l'alimentation.

F.G. Lee, Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Food.

made in the import programme could not be known before the Canadian officials leave London. Wilson Smith and Lee thought that the revised programme would probably not really begin to take shape until late July or early August. Before the programme could be modified with any confidence it would be necessary to know at least what funds the U.S. Congress had appropriated and what share the O.E.E.C. was likely to recommend for the U.K. Wilson Smith and the other U.K. officials undertook to consult in advance with Ottawa, either through Earncliffe or Canada House, on changes proposed in the programme affecting Canada. In addition, Dr. Barton and Frank Lee intend to have an informal talk on the general food import programme within the next few days.

(c) West Indies token import scheme. Wilson Smith was not sure to what extent the arrangements for allowing token imports into the B.W.I. from Canada should be regarded as affected by the "standstill" decision of mid-June regarding "new" dollar purchases. According to Wilson Smith, the Treasury had been inclined to consider this token import arrangement as coming within "existing contracts and commitments" which were to remain in force. However, recent announcements from Jamaica suggested that the local authorities were prohibiting dollar expenditures on such imports. Quite apart from any interpretation of the standstill decision, Wilson Smith thought that U.K. and Canadian officials should discuss as soon as possible whether the sterling area could afford the continuation of such imports into the West Indies. He suggested that before the Canadian group leaves London frank discussions should take place on this question.

(d) Availability of sterling area supplies. It was noted that detailed discussions had recently taken place in London between Harvey of Trade and Commerce and the U.K. officials concerned on the possibility of increasing sales of a variety of sterling area commodities (e.g. petroleum, rubber, cocoa hops, etc.) to Canada, and that discussions had also recently taken place concerning sugar. It was felt that the Continuing Committee could not carry this subject further at the present time. It was noted that during the forthcoming Commonwealth talks much attention would probably be given to the possible expansion of sterling area exports to Canada and the U.S. (including not only the traditional exports but also possible diversions of meat, butter, etc.) The U.K. officials recognized the desirability of establishing some central mechanism for coordinating the promotion of such sterling area sales, but at the same time they emphasized the political difficulties involved in any such arrangement. Liesching undertook to look into the possibility of extending and improving the present sales promotion arrangements (which are now largely confined to products from the Dependent Territories).

(e) Tourism. Rasminsky reported on the steps which the Canadian authorities had taken in encouraging Canadian travel within the sterling area (e.g. clarification and liberalization of the currency allowance, and the inclusion of certain proposed Cunard cruises). Wilson Smith indicated that the personal export scheme in the U.K. was being reviewed and he was hopeful that some improvements could be introduced. There was some discussion of other steps which might be taken to stimulate tourist traffic to the U.K., including the possibility of shipping companies and airlines offering reduced "off season" rates. Liesching and Wilson Smith indicated that they would prod the Tourist Board to explore these and other methods of increasing earnings from tourism.

(f) Preliminary consideration of the topics listed in our telegram No. 1410 of July 9th:†

(i) It was agreed that the question of the encouragement of imports (particularly of capital goods) and of problems relating to article 5 of the loan agreement should be discussed later with the Board of Trade.

(ii) Wilson Smith indicated that he was not inclined to press at this stage for permission to increase drawings on the Canadian credit. He thought that this question might be reviewed in September in the light of the situation at that time. Dr. Clark explained that, even before allowing for the effects of import reductions which the U.K. might make, the present rate of drawings was likely to be more than could be financed without reducing Canadian reserves of U.S. dollars. He did not see how an increase in that rate could be justified. In any case the whole balance of the loan would not be sufficient to make much difference in the desperate circumstances in which the U.K. would be likely to press for increased drawings. If, in such circumstances, Canada were to allow increased drawings, the probable result would be that Canada would injure herself without really helping the U.K. Wilson Smith enquired whether any formal action was needed in order to permit the continuation of drawings at the present rate. Dr. Clark indicated that the decision last January had not implied any time limit on the continuation of drawings at the rate of $10 million a month, but had merely provided that the arrangement concerning the rate of drawings would be reviewed "from time to time". Accordingly he did not consider any formal action necessary at this stage.

(iii) Mr. Mackenzie described the present limitations on the Canadian stockpiling programme. He undertook to look into the possibility of increased stockpiling, but he was not hopeful that much could be done.

(iv) On the Newfoundland interest free loan, it was concluded that Wilson Smith should examine during the next few days the possibility of some arrangement whereby the U.K. would pay Newfoundland (or the Federal Government) the Canadian rate of interest (possibly accompanied by an undertaking that the repayment of the loan would not be called for within a specified period of time).

(v) Concerning the arrangements regarding the 1942 interest free loan, there was some discussion on the extent to which there would in practice be any considerable margin in the future between proceeds from the sales or redemptions of securities held by the U.K. and the volume of direct investment in Canada which the U.K. would wish to undertake. Wilson Smith undertook to assemble up-to-date information and forecasts as soon as possible in order that this subject might be discussed further before the departure of the Canadian group.

(vi) On the question of immigrants' remittances there was some discussion on the extent to which it was intended to include not only the initial withdrawals by persons emigrating to Canada, but also subsequent transfers of income from the U.K. after the immigrants secure non-resident status, and even the transfers of legacies. Wilson Smith indicated that his present concern was with the transfers accounting for the annual drain of some $36 million to U.S. and Canada (of which about $29 million went to Canada), but he was not sure exactly which types of transfers were included in this figure. Rasminsky undertook to get from Ottawa as soon as possible an analysis of the Canadian statistics on the various types of transfers. It was noted that the transfers of income after the acquisition of non-resident status might be expected to increase after the lapse of 4 years from the commencement of the immigration movement.

3. At the conclusion of the meeting, Dr. Clark emphasized the relationship between anything which Canada might be able to do on these various matters and the action which the U.K. might take to reduce costs and generally to provide evidence that there was some hope of the U.K. returning to multilateral trading.

U.K. ECONOMIC POSITION; DISCUSSIONS IN LONDON

1. The Minister of Finance reported on the inter-governmental discussions which had concluded in London on Monday, July 18th.

The tripartite discussions with the United Kingdom and the United States had been particularly useful in reducing the tendency on the part of the United Kingdom and other sterling area countries to regard the U.S. recession as the principal factor in producing the present situation.

In the Commonwealth discussions which followed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had indicated the loss of reserves by the sterling area and the expected dollar earnings for 1949-50. Reserves had fallen to £385 million and the drain was continuing. It was estimated that dollar imports for 1949-50 would have to be reduced by $700 million from those of 1948-49. The United Kingdom planned to absorb $400 million of the reduction. Similar cuts would be necessary by other sterling area countries.

For a long term programme, a series of recommendations to governments had been prepared in the Commonwealth discussions. The recommendations stated that to balance the sterling area's dollar account at a high level of trade, a large expansion in dollar earnings was required. To achieve this, it was recommended that sterling area countries:

(a) increase the supply of manufactured goods and primary products, competitive in price and quality;

(b) increase the supply of dollar earning services, including tourist services;

(c) promote adjustments in the pattern of production to achieve (a) and (b) above; and

(d) promote conditions designed to facilitate investment by surplus countries.

In order to sell at competitive prices, it was recommended that sterling area countries take measures to reduce their costs of production and:

- (a) bring any remaining inflationary elements under control;
- (b) bring investment and consumption into line with resources currently available, including external borrowing; and,
- (c) encourage action to increase efficiency in production.

To aid in creating the conditions necessary for a multilateral trading system, it was recommended that surplus countries contribute by:

- (a) maintaining a high level of employment, income and demand;
- (b) assisting and encouraging the purchase of goods and services from other countries;
- (c) encouraging international investment; and,
- (d) promoting the transfer of resources within their territories from forms of production in which their costs were relatively high compared with those of other countries.

If reserves continued to fall at the present rate, they would be completely exhausted within a year. It was accordingly agreed that the Ministers of the sterling area countries recommend to their governments reduction of payments in respect of dollar imports by a proportion equal to that already announced by the United Kingdom.

The Ministers agreed to inform one another within a month of the measures their governments were taking.

(Document E.M.M.(49)20, Meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers; Recommendations to Governments, July 18, 1949).†

2. Mr. Abbott had the impression that there was no general consciousness among the people of the United Kingdom as a whole of the real seriousness of the situation. Drastic measures by the United Kingdom were required, including budgetary action, but this involved political problems of a character difficult to contend with in the absence of a greater appreciation of the crisis.

There would undoubtedly be a curtailment in Canadian sales to the United Kingdom in the immediate future, although the exact extent and character could not yet be determined. It would probably affect lumber, paper and pulp, and non-ferrous metals most seriously.

In connection with specific measures proposed to Canada, he had indicated the difficulty in allowing faster drawings on the Canadian credit in view of the trade balance. One possibility for consideration seemed to be the financing of remittances of immigrants to Canada from the United Kingdom.

3. Mr. Abbott said that information from Washington suggested that the U.S. analysis of the situation and of measures necessary to meet it coincided with that in Canada.

(Teletype No.WA-1970, Canadian Ambassador, Washington, to External Affairs, July 21, 1949).†

Further tripartite discussions had been set for August 25th among officials, and September 6th, among Ministers. It was hoped that some definite conclusions might be reached.

4. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted the report of the Minister of Finance on the tripartite and Commonwealth discussions in London on the U.K. and sterling area economic position;

(b) endorsed the recommendations to governments by the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers;

(c) agreed that the Canadian High Commissioner in London be directed to inform the U.K. authorities of the endorsement by the Canadian government and that the government were of the view that the recommendations should be communicated confidentially to the U.S. authorities before the discussions in Washington; and,

(d) agreed that the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy undertake preparation of material for the meetings in Washington.

Canada-United Kingdom Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs.

2. Meetings have been held on Friday, Saturday, Monday and today; there will be a final meeting tomorrow (Wednesday) morning. Mimeographed minutes and other documents will be mailed as soon as available.† Ritchie attended all meetings.

3. Discussion has focused on the United Kingdom import programme for 1949-50. However, our side led off with a discussion of U.K. and sterling area export prospects. We maintained that Canadian imports were likely to increase quickly and substantially; we saw little likelihood of an initial loss of dollar earnings anticipated by the United Kingdom because of export contracts fixed in terms of sterling.

4. This analysis suggested that the U.K. should envisage an import programme from Canada of some 640 to 650 million dollars instead of the 602 million dollars that they put forward. Our argument was strengthened by the fact that the 602 million dollars was in terms of U.S. dollars. Some automatic increase in terms of Canadian dollars seemed justifiable.

5. Within the larger programme, we suggested some increase in forest products and possibly base metals; the degree of increase in these fields was uncertain because U.K. figures were rather broad and vague. In the field of forest products we strongly urged them to place immediate contracts. The main increase was to cover three agricultural products which the U.K. said they were planning to stop purchasing at the end of 1949. For these products our figures related in the calendar year 1950. We proposed a total expenditure of 55 million dollars; bacon (24 millions), eggs (16 millions), and cheese (15 millions). 25 million dollars out of the 55 would be expended in the first half of the year and hence would be in the 1949-50 programme.

6. The U.K. side resisted our proposals all along the line. They insisted that we were anticipating too early a rise in their earnings of Canadian dollars as a result of devaluation; they stressed that lag between the time of export and the time of payment; they said they did not regard bacon, eggs, and cheese as a "good buy" in Canada under present conditions; they said they had put us on notice on previous occasions that they were definitely intending to discontinue the purchase of eggs.

7. These questions will no doubt come up again at tomorrow morning's meeting and we shall tell you what happens.

8. At a special session of the Committee this morning the U.K. raised for discussion Canadian tariff rates, dumping duties and import restrictions. They urged unilateral action by Canada to reduce tariffs; they requested the continuance of present exemptions from dumping duties; they asked us to use our import restrictions to promote U.K. sales in Canada. We could give them no encouragement on any of these points. Devaluation of the pound sterling together with the lesser devaluation of the Canadian dollar had, in effect, substantially diminished our tariffs against the U.K., had increased our tariffs against the United States, and had eliminated the chief cause for which dumping duty exemptions were established. We said that the Canadian Government would have sufficient difficulty in holding the line against pressures in this country for government action to offset the new improved competitive position of U.K. exports; it was out of the question, politically, to expect the Government to lower tariffs unilaterally at this time. A list of tariff items which the U.K. put before the meeting only served to emphasize the difficulties. We warned them that the Canadian government might decide not to continue using its powers to exempt goods from dumping duties; we pointed out that from now on dumping from the U.K. was likely to be genuine dumping and not merely a device by British firms to circumvent an undervalued currency. Finally, we reemphasized that Canadian import restrictions could only be maintained on a basis of balance of payments difficulties; benefits to the U.K. exports must be regarded as incidental and not a main purpose of the regulations.

9. In this morning's meeting the U.K. urged that the Canadian government should go a good deal farther in "selling" the Canadian public on the need for imports from the United Kingdom. We agreed that some statements by Ministers would be desirable particularly in the light of the new competitive position resulting from devaluation. On the other hand, we pointed out that it was much easier for a government to conduct an export drive than an import drive because the latter involved a threat to established interests within the country.

Reference our telegram No. 1730 of September 27 re Canada-United Kingdom Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs.

1. The final meeting of this session of the Committee was held this morning (Wednesday). It was generally agreed that it would be impracticable and probably undesirable for the Continuing Committee to attempt at this session to reach precise conclusions or recommendations on the various matters which had been raised by the two sides. It was felt that the discussions at this session had served the purpose for which the Committee had been established by giving each side an understanding of the points regarded as important by the other side. On the basis of the discussions it would be possible for the two sides to pursue these matters further with their respective governments. It was generally felt that some of the value of the Committee as a forum for the frank exchange of views might be lost if the Committee were to be regarded as a negotiating body.

2. At the concluding meeting Wilson-Smith indicated that his side appreciated the effort which the Canadian side had made to forecast the probable effects of devaluation on United Kingdom exports to Canada. He could not say whether those forecasts were in accord with the calculations which were being made in London but he would ensure that account was taken of the Canadian forecasts in the estimates being prepared by United Kingdom. Although there might be differences of opinion as to the magnitude of the effects on U.K.-Canada trade of the devaluation of sterling and of the Canadian dollar (and although there might be greater uncertainty concerning the effects of devaluation on U.K. trade with other countries) he was inclined to agree that, to some extent at least, the effects on U.K.-Canada trade would be generally favourable. At Mr. Deutsch's request, he undertook to keep Canadian officials informed on United Kingdom balance of payments forecasts as they progress and as the situation becomes clearer.

3. Wilson-Smith also agreed that the $600 million import programme from Canada could now be financed with less strain on the gold and U.S. dollar resources of the sterling area than had appeared likely before devaluation. He thought that the lessening of the strain might be of the order of 20 million to 30 million Canadian dollars. In those circumstances the policy question was whether the United Kingdom should now attempt to purchase more from Canada or whether prudence required that this apparent saving should be held in reserve, particularly since the United Kingdom position in relation to some other countries might turn out to be less favourable than had been originally forecast. This was a question which could be considered only by Ministers. Wilson-Smith thought that Ministers would be giving consideration to this choice in connection with the review of the import programme for 1949–50 and for the second half of 1950, which might take place within two or three weeks. He undertook to consult in some manner with interested Canadian members of the Committee after that ministerial review and before final procurement instructions are issued.

4. Holmes expressed his disappointment that it had not been possible, either in the Tripartite Talks or in the Continuing Committee, to advance very far with the discussion of possible unilateral tariff reductions, but he hoped that something might still happen in that direction as a result of the consideration which Canadian officials would be giving to the individual items which he had mentioned as ones on which the United Kingdom would particularly welcome a reduction of the tariff. He hoped also that the Canadian side would keep in mind the emphasis which he and other members of the United Kingdom side had placed on the desirability of more publicity (through statements by Ministers etc.) in Canada on the importance of encouraging United Kingdom imports in the interest of the maintenance of Canadian exports.

5. Lee was unable to say anything further concerning the suggestions which had been made regarding United Kingdom food purchases. He did stress, however, that in any future negotiations on such purchases the United Kingdom would be even more determined than before to secure low prices in view of the desirability of keeping down food prices in the United Kingdom, and of enforcing the ceiling on subsidies despite devaluation.

6. Clutterbuck noted that no discussion had taken place on tourism. He thought that Holmes might have a preliminary word with Robertson on this subject before departing. Wilson-Smith also expressed the hope that Canada would participate actively in the Tourism Subcommittee of the Commonwealth Liaison Committee and regretted that previously Canada had not been prepared to accept the chairmanship of that Subcommittee.

7. There was a brief discussion on the form of the tripartite consultation proposed in the Washington talks and on the relationship of any such arrangement to the Continuing Committee. Both the United Kingdom and Canadian sides felt that the Continuing Committee would be required despite the establishment of any tripartite machinery. It was noted that the present session of the Continuing Committee had served a useful purpose despite the fact that there had been tripartite discussions only a short while before. Wilson-Smith indicated that the United Kingdom side did not yet know in what manner the Tripartite machinery would operate. He mentioned that the United Kingdom Government would shortly be appointing an Economic Minister to the Embassy in Washington to serve as Deputy to the Ambassador (he remarked that he was not clear what the relationship would be between this Minister and the existing United Kingdom Commercial Minister and the Head of the United Kingdom Treasury Delegation).

8. At the end of this morning's meeting it was decided not to issue a press communique since, as in the case of earlier meetings, it would not be possible to say much more than that the Committee had met and had discussed the whole range of

U.K.-Canadian economic problems. Since the press had evinced no great interest in the meetings, it seemed hardly necessary to issue such a statement.

9. It was decided that the next meeting of the Committee should be held within six months and that towards the end of the calendar year there might be consultation through the Chairman as to an appropriate date.

ANGLO-AMERICAN FINANCIAL AGREEMENT; SECTION 9

3. The Minister of Finance reported that, at the recent tripartite talks in Washington, the U.K. representatives in proposing certain measures for liberalizing trade with O.E.E.C. and other soft currency countries, had expressed their anxiety that Section 9 of the Anglo-American Financial agreement (dealing with non-discrimination in trade) and the corresponding clause in the Canada-United Kingdom Loan Agreement (Article 5) should not operate to prevent them taking these measures.

At the time, it had been explained that while Canada was opposed in principle to such an interpretation, no objection would be raised to actual measures that might be taken provided the U.S. government were not opposed.

Following the talks, the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury had consulted Congressional and other authorities and it had now been decided that they would not charge any breach of Section 9 if the United Kingdom interpreted it in the manner proposed.

The United Kingdom were expected to make an announcement on this matter shortly.

4. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the remarks of the Minister of Finance with regard to the relationship of Article 5 of the Canada-United Kingdom Financial Agreement and Section 9 of the Anglo-American Financial Agreement to the proposed relaxation of U.K. quantitative import controls in favour of O.E.E.C. and other soft currency countries.

IV. FOOD EXPORTS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM; EXPORT POLICY WITH REGARD [TO] FOOD PRODUCTS

13. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that the Deputy Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture would be proceeding to the United Kingdom at the end of the week to discuss the U.K. import programme for 1950 as it affected Canada. Particular attention would be necessary with regard to bacon, cheese and eggs. However, these would have to be considered against the background of the national economy as a whole. Attention would also have to be given to the position of lumber, newsprint, fish and certain manufactured products where British purchases were likely to be curtailed. Producers of these commodities would feel they had as great a claim to consideration as the farmers.

Because Canadian exports of bacon, cheese and eggs had been restricted until recently to the U.K. and B.W.I. there was no basis of experience on which to assess other markets. Interest had, however, been shown in some products by Alaska, Belgium, Cuba, Hawaii, Israel and Switzerland. In the U.S. the Commodity Credit Corporation was at present purchasing eggs and cheese in surplus areas and might have to buy pork before the end of the year. It was not possible to estimate probable price supports after March 31, 1950. There seemed to be prospects for some sale of bacon, cheese and eggs in the U.S.

There was definite evidence that the United Kingdom would not continue to be a lasting market for significant quantities of Canadian bacon, cheese and eggs. Studies of probable U.K. requirements, production and import commitments from sources other than Canada and the U.S. for 1952-53 indicated a net unfilled demand for 40,000 tons of pork products, a surplus over requirements of 23,000 tons of cheese and a surplus of 83,000 tons of eggs. The U.S. would probably have exportable surpluses of cheese, eggs and bacon in 1952-53, which it might endeavour to dispose of in the U.K. In the meetings of the United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee the British representatives had said they had not allowed for purchases of Canadian bacon, cheese or eggs in the calendar year 1950. In any purchases, cheese would have the highest priority but price would be important. They could maintain the 3 oz. ration of bacon without Canadian supplies. They would not want Canadian eggs in 1950.

In connection with the trade arrangements with the United Kingdom it seemed desirable to consider the effects of continuance of the type of arrangement that had been entered into thus far. The short term of contracts (one year) did not permit a stable programme for agriculture. The fixed prices tended to operate as a floor and to give rise to problems with regard to their relationship to U.S. prices. This resulted in problems of export and import control. The exclusive nature of the contracts tended to prevent the development of alternative markets.

Instead of continuing the policy of contracts on the same basis as in the past it might be desirable to consider the possibility of trying to get U.K. agreement to an allocation of a minimum supply of dollars and to establishment of a schedule of purchases of bacon and cheese acceptable to both parties. Presumably eggs could be handled in a like manner.

14. The Minister of Agriculture was of the view that it would be necessary to press strongly for renewed U.K. purchases of bacon, cheese and eggs. It was of great importance to Canadian agriculture to retain the position that had been established in the British market. In many cases if products could not be sold in the U.K. market there was much that could not be disposed of at all. It appeared that production of bacon in Canada was moving upward as farmers found it desirable to raise pigs in order to maintain their level of income. Cheese production was also increasing. Egg production had declined somewhat but the U.K. market was particularly important. So far as bacon and cheese were concerned, the increased quantities here and elsewhere might give rise to marketing difficulties but it would be extremely undesirable to have such difficulties aggravated by a loss of the U.K. contracts.

With regard to the proposal for a blanket allocation of dollars to cover the three products, rather than specific contracts for each individual commodity, Mr. Gardiner said that this had been proposed on a previous occasion. It was undesirable to have a situation, such as had developed with regard to bacon and cheese, where there was a deficit on bacon supplies but a surplus of cheese without any possibility of arranging a transfer of purchases from one to the other.

15. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought that one of the most undesirable features of the present situation was the closing of outlets to alternative markets. This was an action taken by ourselves and did not seem to be in accord with the present or probable developments in the U.K. market.

16. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that when the British representatives on the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs had been in Ottawa they had been told that the planning which included no further purchases of bacon, cheese and eggs after December 31, 1949, was "unsatisfactory" and "unrealistic". The Canadian representatives had asked that the U.K. government allocate $55 million for the calendar year, to be expended somewhat as follows:—bacon—$24 million; cheese—$15 million; eggs—$16 million. The United Kingdom had to secure pork products and cheese; and there seemed to be an excellent prospect for arrangements covering these two items. It might be possible to have agreement on reasonably satisfactory quantities. On the other hand the prospects for egg purchases did not appear to be good.

So far as the character of arrangements was concerned, the present contract plan with fixed quantities and prices raised very real difficulties in the domestic scene in terms of prices and export and import controls. It was with this in mind that it had been thought that it might be preferable to amend the basis of arrangement in favour of a general allocation of dollars.

17. The Minister of Agriculture thought that in all consideration of the question it was essential to keep in mind the necessity for agricultural producers of retaining and improving their position in the U.K. market. Ultimately this would have to be on a free market basis but that would not be possible this year. In the circumstances it was important to endeavour to secure U.K. contracts covering all three commodities for a small quantity at least.

18. The Committee, after discussion, agreed that the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture discuss further possible arrangements for sale of agricultural products to the United Kingdom prior to the departure of the Deputy Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture at the end of the week.

[London], October 22, 1949

MESSAGE FROM THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER,
DATED 22ND OCTOBER 1949

You will shortly receive the full text of the statement which Mr. Attlee proposes to make in Parliament this afternoon on the serious steps which we have felt obliged to take to adjust our economy to the new position which now confronts us. Those steps are designed to ensure that the benefits which should accrue to the sterling area as a whole from the alteration in the Sterling/Dollar rate should not be lost to us all through the increase of inflationary pressures.

2. We have been engaged in a most searching review of our Dollar Import Programme in the light of the new circumstances and I feel it right to acquaint you at once with the results of that review and with my appreciation of the various factors involved.

3. We all realised when we met last July that we were setting ourselves an immensely difficult task in aiming at a general reduction of our expenditure on dollar imports to a level of 75% of the 1948 expenditure. A detailed review of our programme which we have just completed has shown that we ourselves could not achieve the full cut within the twelve months ending July, 1950, in view of our existing commitments and the need to sustain and intensify the drive for dollar exports and meet the demands of the sterling area for our manufactures.

4. The target at which we aimed for the period 1949/50 was a dollar import programme for the United Kingdom of about $1,200 million. By the time that the drastic action taken last July began to show its full effect at the beginning of the current quarter it had become clear that even this would prove insufficient to keep us within a figure of $1,200 million unless we could cut our import programme during the first half of 1950 to an annual rate of about $800 million. This would have meant the complete reversal of the whole process of economic recovery and cancellation of contracts on a large scale, including the Canadian wheat contract. The contract, the export drive and the re-equipment of British industry would have come to a standstill.

5. We are, however, proceeding on the basis that it is imperative to keep expenditure down to $1,200 million over the whole calendar year 1950. We will be working at this rate from the beginning of the year. We now estimate that our expenditure on imports for the year 1949/50 will amount to about $1,390 million, which represents a cut of 14% on expenditure during the calendar year 1948. I should, however, explain that this figure is inflated to the extent of $40 million by the additional United States wheat and surplus agricultural commodities which we have undertaken to purchase as the price of securing greater flexibility in the use of E.R.P. funds, e.g., on Canadian wheat. It also takes account of the urgent need to provide the materials upon which our dollar earning and dollar saving export industries depend, especially cotton and non-ferrous metals.

6. We have made a review of the whole position in the light of the results of the Washington talks and of the exchange adjustment with the help of such interim figures as are available for the rest of the sterling area. The position is still most uncertain but the effect of the slower approach which we have had to make to $1,200 million annual rate of expenditure on dollar imports will be balanced or even somewhat more than balanced by some prospective increase in our dollar resources as compared with the estimates on which we worked last July. We are achieving substantial economies in dollar expenditure on invisible account. But the principal change here is that we have succeeded in securing an E.R.P. allocation for 1949/50 higher than we had expected and the opportunity to use E.R.P. funds allotted in 1948/49 owing to the loosening of E.C.A.'s administrative arrangements which we secured at Washington. We estimate the net effect of this and other changes is to increase our resources by rather more than $250 million. Most of the improvement to which I refer is essentially ephemeral. Indeed we can be certain that our E.R.P. receipts will fall very heavily during 1950/51.

7. Against this background, and in view of the imperative need to build up our reserves it seems to me essential that we should undertake a comprehensive review of the position of the dollar balance of payments of the sterling area as a whole in the light of all that has happened since our meeting last July. I should like to have this put in hand as soon as possible and I should be grateful if as a first step our other sterling area Commonwealth colleagues could let me have as soon as possible an up to date survey of their dollar balance of payments for 1949/50 and for the calendar year 1950. We can then consider together the most appropriate method of further consultation although it seems to me to be clear that there can be no question of a further Ministerial meeting in the near future owing to the imminence of general elections.

U.K. IMPORT PROGRAMME; 1949-1950

11. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported that his Deputy⁵⁰ and the Deputy Minister of Agriculture⁵¹ had recently completed discussions with U.K. officials in London on the U.K. import programme for the last six months of 1949 and the first six months of 1950.

The present U.K. programme varied from that presented to the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade at its September meetings in only one important respect. It indicated contemplated purchases of food in North America in the calendar year 1950 to the value of $25 million (U.S.) ($27.5 million Canadian), of which approximately $11 million (Canadian) would be expended in the first six months.

The $27.5 million was to be expended primarily on cheese. No eggs would be purchased and the amount available for bacon would be whatever was left after providing for 100 million pounds of cheese. However, U.K. planning at present was on the basis of 25¢ (U.S.) per lb. for cheese, which would leave no residual for bacon. No further purchases of pitprops or newsprint were contemplated in 1950 and provision was made for only 110,000 standards of soft-wood lumber from the whole of North America, to be purchased under E.C.A. on the basis of competitive bidding.

The Canadian officials had argued strongly that the programme be modified to meet a relatively few and relatively small Canadian problems and that an additional amount of $20-$30 million for the calendar year 1950 would probably accomplish the purpose. It had been agreed that the U.K. officials would advise their Ministers of these views and communicate the final decision at an early date.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

12. Mr. Howe suggested that one matter to which consideration should be given was the desirability of permitting the United Kingdom to carry over into the next crop year wheat which it was obliged to take this year under the current contract. The United Kingdom had inquired whether the carrying forward of 25 million bushels would be agreeable to the Canadian government. In view of the smaller crop, delivery of the full contract amount to the United Kingdom would mean a limitation on our capacity to sell to other markets. If we were to have wheat to offer, it would be desirable to be in a position to take action immediately.

⁵⁰ M.W. Mackenzie.

⁵¹ J.G. Taggart.

13. The Minister of Agriculture thought that it would not be desirable to recommend any such release from the amount under contract, although it might be desirable to have the question discussed with the United Kingdom at the Ministerial level along with other questions connected with the U.K. import programme. In each of the last two years, the original position taken in negotiations by the United Kingdom made no adequate provision for purchases of Canadian foodstuffs, but further discussion between Ministers had brought a more satisfactory basis of agreement when the contracts were entered into.

14. The Minister of Veterans Affairs said that termination of purchase of pitprops would seriously affect certain areas in New Brunswick. He had been asked to discuss the matter with Provincial authorities and it might be desirable to explore the possibility of a Dominion-Provincial plan under the Forest Conservation Act which would make use of labour that would otherwise be unemployed if no pitprops were to be cut. One possibility seemed to be the clearing and construction of roads for forest fire protection.

15. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce;

(b) agreed that the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture give further consideration to measures that should be taken in the light of the U.K. import programme; and,

(c) agreed that it would be desirable for the Minister of Veterans Affairs to discuss with representatives of the government of New Brunswick a possible arrangement for joint operations under the Forest Conservation Act to provide for possible unemployment resulting from the cessation of U.K. purchases of pitprops.

Dumping Duties; Future Policy

16. The Minister of National Revenue reported that recent devaluations of sterling and other European currencies had, to a large extent, removed the price difficulties of U.K. and European exporters which had necessitated the exemptions from dumping duties authorized by Order in Council in August, 1948. Dumping duty had for a long time been an integral part of the Canadian tariff and it seemed desirable to remove the exemptions now that they were no longer necessary. It was accordingly recommended that the Order in Council be amended to remove exemptions from dumping duty for the following items: linoleum, oilcloth, confectionery, sanitary earthenware, sporting goods, cocoa butter, lawnmowers, white portland cement and soda ash.

17. The Prime Minister referred to the plea recently made for protection for the Canadian woollen industry against the effects of sterling devaluation. This protection could only be given by an increase in tariff rates. Other industries were in a similar position. It would be difficult to refuse requests for such protection if the government gave increased protection, when this could be done by administrative action, to industries such as those affected by the present exemptions from dumping duties.

On grounds of general policy it seemed undesirable to take any action at the present time. We had urged the United Kingdom to improve its trading position by exporting more to dollar markets. Revocation of the exemptions would give the appearance of erecting obstacles as soon as the United Kingdom took measures in the direction we had urged. Such action might also discourage efforts in the United States to take measures to ease the flow of imports there.

18. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed that decision with regard to revocation of exemptions from dumping duties be deferred until after the end of the present session of Parliament.

[London], November 9, 1949

PERSONAL MESSAGE FROM SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS TO MR. ABBOTT, DATED 9TH
NOVEMBER, 1949

We have now received from United Kingdom officials an account of the conversations which they had in London at the end of October with Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Taggart on the subject of United Kingdom purchases in Canada in 1949/1950 and to some extent in the second half of 1950.

You in your turn will have had a full report from your officials, so there is I am sure no need for me to recapitulate the story in detail. You know our general position. We have decided and announced our intention to reduce our dollar import programme to $1,200 million (United States). This is a regrettable necessity, the reasons for which were fully accepted when explained to you, and to our American friends, in our July and September conversations. Paragraph four of our Washington communiqué provides an admirable summary of how the position was left between us.

It was against this background, and in the light of the useful exchange of views at the Ottawa meeting of the Anglo-Canadian Continuing Committee, that the Economic Policy Committee of our Cabinet examined in October a detailed import programme for 1949/1950, and in a more tentative way the possibilities for the second half of 1950. The conclusions which we then reached were described to your official representatives and will have been communicated to you together with the intimation that our decisions on imports from Canada were to be regarded as provisional pending the discussions with Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Taggart.

In the light of the discussions between officials we have now re-examined our programme, but in present circumstances it is extremely difficult for us to contemplate any addition to its total. We know that there are certain features in our programme which will cause you particular concern (notably on newsprint, lumber, bacon and the precise arrangements for any purchases of cheese). We realise fully that, to quote the Washington communiqué, "these measures are not pleasant ones; they will cause difficulties and sacrifices for everyone concerned". Given, however, the clear recognition that the necessity has to be faced, we are sure that we can look to you for understanding of our position and most of all for a realisation that we cannot be expected to buy in Canada more than in our considered judgment we can afford. The perils of this summer are too near and the problems ahead are too serious for us to take risks.

In the circumstances our present feeling is that the total of the import programmes outlined to your officials will have to stand unless you or we can devise some way of meeting our respective points of view. It looks, therefore, as if we should not be able to make further progress unless we can arrange for talks between Ministers. If you reach the same conclusion the question will arise of where and when we should meet. In present circumstances it would not be easy for me or my senior colleagues to leave this country and we should hope therefore that you and one or more of your colleagues, if you thought that right, would be willing to come to London. In that event we would suggest that we should meet at any time convenient to you from 28th November onwards.

You will be aware of the important question I raised with Mr. Mackenzie when he was over here and will no doubt be in a position to deal with this if, as I trust will be the case, you feel able to come.

Your telegram No. 2000 of November 11th,† United Kingdom import programme and accumulation of sterling balance.

Am relieved to learn that top officials share my view that the Minister of Finance should not, repeat not, accept the invitation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to London to discuss acceptance of sterling for Canadian products sold to the United Kingdom. Apart from the danger involved in discussing what might be equivalent to a mortgage of Canada's economic future, acceptance of the invitation would be encouragement to the United Kingdom to pursue policy of building up exclusive trading area. Sooner or later this will bring about a direct clash with the United States, and it is essential that we should not be involved in this clash through any direct participation in United Kingdom policies. A mild rebuff through our declining the invitation might be salutary at this stage. When the United Kingdom Government realizes that there is no, repeat no, chance of forcing Canada into discriminatory practices, they may become more prone to explore means of closer economic integration with other countries of Western Europe which is necessary to give reality to the North Atlantic Pact. If it is just a question of solving bacon problem, it would be safer to contemplate supplying surplus bacon as a gift until our production programme can be adjusted to the new situation.

Following for Wilgress from Heeney. Begins: Your telegram No. 2196 of 14th November: United Kingdom Import Programme and Accumulation of Sterling.

The Prime Minister has asked me to thank you warmly for your telegram under reference. Your message was most useful during the discussion in the Cabinet yesterday afternoon on the reply which should be returned to Sir Stafford Cripps' communication of the 9th November, and helped the Prime Minister and his colleagues to come to decisions which are very closely in line with your recommendations.

2. My immediately following telegram contains the text of a message from Mr. Abbott to Sir Stafford Cripps. Will you please deliver this message to the Chancellor as quickly as possible?

3. As soon as the Chancellor has received Mr. Abbott's reply, will you please also deliver, in person, to Mr. Attlee the message contained in the third of this series of telegrams. As you will see, it is a message from Mr. St. Laurent in which he recapitulates some of Mr. Abbott's arguments and expresses his concern over the false picture which has recently been presented to the public in the United Kingdom of the United Kingdom's financial relations with Canada.

4. Finally, I should like to let you know how much I personally appreciate the prompt and valuable advice which you have given us on this question. Ends.

Following for Wilgress from Heeney. Begins: My telegram No. 2020 of today's date: United Kingdom Import Programme and Accumulation of Sterling.

The Minister of Finance is today sending by air bag a personal letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to Sir Stafford Cripps' personal message to Mr. Abbott of November 9th concerning United Kingdom import programme from Canada for 1949/50. In order to save time Mr. Abbott would be grateful if you would communicate the text of his message immediately to Sir Stafford.

Text of the message follows. Text Begins:

I have received your personal message dated November 9th in which you convey the feeling of the United Kingdom Government that the total of the import programme from Canada for 1949/50 as outlined to Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Taggart when they were in London at the end of October, will have to stand unless some way can be found of meeting our respective points of view.

My colleagues and I appreciate fully the magnitude of the dollar exchange difficulties with which the United Kingdom Government have to deal, and the efforts which are being made to overcome them. It would appear to be your view that the differences that remain between us regarding purchases of newsprint, lumber, bacon and perhaps cheese can only be resolved on the basis of additional financial assistance from Canada. You will recall that, following the discussions which were held with ECA in the course of the Washington talks, it was understood that the sterling area dollar deficit with Canada was completely covered. The resources available from sterling area earnings in Canada, ECA offshore purchases, and the drawings on the Canadian loan will exceed by a very substantial margin the deficit arising with Canada from a minimum import programme such as we have in mind. The provision of any additional financial assistance from Canada would, therefore, go to assist the United Kingdom position in other respects. We realize that this would be helpful to the United Kingdom, but we must have regard to our own situation. The Canadian balance of payments for the coming year, in so far as it can be foreseen at this time, does not make it possible for us to grant further credit assistance beyond the $120 mm which has already been arranged.

Mr. Mackenzie has reported to me on the matter which you raised with him when he was in London. Obviously any arrangement under which Canada would in effect agree to hold sterling would, in the last analysis, mean a further extension of credit by Canada. Even if we were in a position to grant further assistance, we should not wish to do it in this way. The accumulation of sterling which clearly we cannot use effectively either now or in the foreseeable future, would not be in accord with the fundamental realities of our economic relationships. It would merely introduce new difficulties and strains in other directions. I am sure you will agree that these should be avoided and that we should face the problem in a straightforward manner as we have done in the various arrangements for financial assistance which have been in effect since the beginning of the war. The adoption of a currency device would only place the position in a false light in both our countries and thus interfere with the achievement of the real tasks that have to be accomplished.

My colleagues and I have carefully considered your view that we will not be able to make further progress unless we can arrange for talks between Ministers. While I would personally greatly welcome an opportunity of further discussions with you, I myself find it is not possible to go to London in the near future, owing to urgent matters that I must attend to here following prorogation of Parliament which is expected early in December. Moreover, I must say that I am doubtful, in view of the considerations to which I have referred, that any new element has arisen which would make it essential to have another talk between Ministers just now when it is so difficult for each of us to find the necessary time. Text ends. Message ends.

My telegram No. 2020 of today's date: United Kingdom Import Programme and Accumulation of Sterling. Following is the text of the message from Mr. St. Laurent to Mr. Attlee referred to in my telegram under reference.

Begins: In a period of financial strain such as at present, there is always a danger that the friendly basis of the relationship between our two countries may be weakened if forces tending to draw us apart are allowed to operate unchecked. It is because I know you share our anxiety that the discussion of our current financial problems should not be allowed to obscure our underlying community of interest that I am venturing to tell you of our concern over the false picture which has recently come before the public in the United Kingdom of the financial relations between our two countries. We have been disturbed by statements by some members of your Parliament⁵² and by the implications which may be drawn even from statements of some of your Ministers.⁵³ Such statements have suggested that the chief cause of the United Kingdom's exchange difficulties is the necessity of paying dollars for imports from Canada. You do not need to be reminded, I know, that this is a serious misinterpretation of the facts in respect of Canada's financial relations with the United Kingdom. But we are worried that these misrepresentations have not yet received any authoritative rebuttal. At a time when there are bound to be serious problems of trade and payments between the two countries, such misstatements as have been current during the past few weeks can only serve to aggravate the difficulty of finding mutually satisfactory solutions.

2. As you are aware, it was widely hoped in Canada that as a result of the financial aid extended to the United Kingdom, both during and after the war, including the credit advanced in 1946, a stable market would be assured in the United Kingdom for reasonable quantities of Canadian products and particularly of Canadian foodstuffs. In the event this hope is not being realized and you have felt it necessary to make successive cuts in your imports from Canada. Naturally this sequence of events has led to wide-spread disappointment here. If to that natural disappointment is added irritation at statements which are considered in Canada to be misinformed and misleading, the damage done to relations between our two countries may be serious.

Labour MPs R.H.S. Crossman and Woodrow Wyatt.

3. Mr. Abbott is sending to Sir Stafford Cripps today a message to which we attach great importance. I do not need to repeat all the considerations which are set down there for the information of your Government. But I would like to draw your attention to some facts presented in Mr. Abbott's message which seem to have been widely overlooked. It is well known to you that ever since the end of the war a substantial part of the United Kingdom's deficit with Canada has been covered by the Canadian loan and that ever since the beginning of the Marshall Plan that deficit has been much more than covered by the Canadian credit supplemented by ECA funds. In the light of these facts you will understand why suggestions that the United Kingdom is bearing the burden of a Canadian dollar deficit must inevitably cause irritation here.

4. We have watched with admiration the United Kingdom's success in increasing its productive output and its flow of exports, and we have examined with constant sympathy the serious economic problems which still confront you. During the Tripartite Conference in Washington last September between the United Kingdom, United States and Canada, it was agreed that those problems involve all three countries. Their solution will call for close and friendly co-operation, and in all likelihood for further action by all three Governments. It is because we are afraid that the current misrepresentations in the United Kingdom of Canada's position may jeopardize the readiness to continue such co-operation, that I am sending you this message. Ends.

RE: TRADE ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE U.K. AND FOOD EXPORT POLICY

I was somewhat concerned at some of the references by Mr. Gardiner in his account in Cabinet yesterday of his remarks to the meeting he recently attended of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. You will recall that he said that he had informed the delegates that he thought we ought to make contracts with the United Kingdom government for the sale of Canadian food products and that he did not know of any Minister who was of a contrary opinion. He also said that he had commented on the successful disposition of Canadian food products thus far and said there was no problem at present with regard to the sale of Canadian production. He had indicated that he felt that "for the good of agriculture" there should be an increased production of bacon, although the Canadian government was not urging Canadian farmers to make such an increase at the present time. He had also suggested to the meeting that, in urging increased sale of Canadian food products, it was the United Kingdom government on which pressure should be brought and that the difference between the U.K. programme and Canadian desires was very small. He apparently suggested to the meeting that the difference could be met quite easily apart altogether from an increase in U.K. sales to Canada, and he remarked in conclusion that it was a "dangerous doctrine" to have circulated that increased sales on the part of the U.K. were essential to sustain the purchases of Canadian foodstuffs.

The final statement, if made publicly and depending on its context, could be taken as a negation of the basic policy agreed on at Washington to make every effort toward an increase in United Kingdom exports to dollar markets. It could also weaken the efforts the government will be making to hold the line against demands for protection against U.K. imports. However the parts of Mr. Gardiner's remarks which, it seemed to me, could most readily lead to difficulty, were those concerning the unanimity in the government in favour of food contracts with the U.K. and concerning the desirability of an increase in bacon production.

Early in December the annual meeting will be held with provincial representatives to discuss the agricultural programme for 1950. It would be particularly undesirable if Mr. Gardiner were to indicate, on the basis of yesterday's discussion, that the government concurred in his suggestion that bacon production should be increased. It might similarly be embarrassing if the impression were given that the government were unanimously behind the policy of continuation of concentration on the U.K. market for Canadian food products and of carrying on our sales on the basis of contracts similar to those that have prevailed thus far. As there was no comment in Cabinet yesterday on his remarks, Mr. Gardiner might feel that he would be justified in taking a position along the above line.

I have felt for some time that there has been a serious need for a more complete discussion of Canadian trade policy in relation to the U.K., particularly in connection with food products, and of policy on food exports generally. The present weeks may be quite decisive in determining our position in the next year or more, both in our relation with the United Kingdom and in respect of our policy on agricultural production, subsidies and food exports. I do not think it would be possible to bring about useful discussion at the official level or through the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade. You might wish, however, to consider whether it would be desirable to propose in Cabinet that more complete discussions than there have been thus far should be held very shortly in the Cabinet Committee on Economic Policy.

Following for Heeny from Wilgress: My telegram No. 2223 of November 17th.†

1. I saw Sir Stafford Cripps at 2.45 this afternoon, and handed to him the message from Mr. Abbott. He read it through carefully, and then said smilingly that he was not surprised in view of the preliminary reaction of Canadian Government circles in Ottawa to his proposal. He then said rather more bitterly that it was the first time he had ever known a Commonwealth Minister to refuse to consult with another Commonwealth Minister about an important subject. He went on to say that there was bound to be public discussion of the question, and that he would probably be asked questions in the House of Commons. He would have preferred to have been able to say that he had consulted with Canadian Ministers, and that they had not been able to agree to the proposal. He then said that he had understood that when Mackenzie and Taggart were here, they had expressed the view that the proposed import programme would not be acceptable to Canada. I remarked that the total amount was about what had been expected, and that the chief difficulty for us was the distribution of the total amount among the various products, and particularly the sudden cessation of purchases of products which were already in production in anticipation of sale to the United Kingdom. He said that this was what he wanted to discuss with Ministers, to which I replied that it was my understanding that the financing of United Kingdom purchases had been agreed at the tripartite talks in Washington, and that the Canadian Ministers had understood that the proceeds from United Kingdom sales to Canada, plus the Canadian credit and the ECA financing of certain products, would permit the United Kingdom to purchase from Canada around $650,000,000 worth of goods, and still leave a balance over for augmenting the reserves or for purchases from other sources. He commented that there may be a misunderstanding, because the main purpose of ECA financing was to help the United Kingdom purchase essentials from the United States. He concluded by stating that they would have to give consideration to the whole position in the light of the reply from Mr. Abbott, and that they would probably have a discussion in Cabinet on this question tomorrow.

2. At 5.30 p.m. I called on Mr. Attlee in his room at the House of Commons, and delivered the message from the Prime Minister. He read it through rather cursorily, and then looked up and thanked me for having delivered it. He made no comment and obviously had not read the message very attentively, although no doubt he had got its purport.

REPLY BY CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER TO CANADIAN MINISTER OF FINANCE, 19TH NOVEMBER, 1949

Thank you for your letter of the 16th November. I note that you are doubtful, in view of the considerations to which you refer, that any new element has arisen which would make it essential to have another talk between Ministers just now, and that anyway it would not be possible for you to come over for the present. I quite appreciate how busy you must be and that any further meeting must therefore be postponed.

For the immediate future, given the extreme difficulty in contemplating any addition to the total of our import programme, would you care to propose through our High Commissioner any ideas you have as to possible switching of expenditure between the different items on our 1949/50 programme, including perhaps wheat, which would help you without hurting us. Your officials will know from their talks here those items on which we should find it exceptionally difficult or even impossible to modify our requirements. From our point of view the only obvious item under which reduction of expenditure could be made to provide for easements elsewhere seems to be wheat. We could contemplate taking up to $20 million less wheat in 1949/50 if this readjustment suited you.

Time is unfortunately short if any such readjustment is to be effective. We shall give the most careful consideration to any suggestions of this kind that you can make.

PERSONAL MESSAGE FOR MR. ST. LAURENT FROM MR. ATTLEE DATED 22ND
NOVEMBER, 1949

I am most grateful to you for your friendly message. It is hardly necessary for me to say that I share your anxiety that nothing, that it is within our power to do, should remain undone to maintain and strengthen the friendly relations between our two countries. My colleagues and I will do whatever we can do on our side to help in the situation you describe. We shall be taking steps at an early date to dissociate ourselves from the views (with which we have of course never been in sympathy) of those publicists who suggest that the chief cause of the United Kingdom's exchange difficulties is the necessity of paying dollars for imports from Canada. I am arranging that an authoritative Ministerial statement shall be made at an early date, in which it will be made clear that these suggestions have no authority behind them and that they do not in any way represent the opinion of the Government or the people of the United Kingdom. The occasion will be taken to refer in suitable terms to the value to us of the immense help which Canada has given us during and since the war. This action should make the United Kingdom Government's own position clear beyond a doubt.

So far as people outside the Government are concerned, you know as well as I that under our free systems we cannot control what they say. But in spite of this we shall certainly do anything we can to discourage them from making any further suggestions or writing further articles like these which have caused resentment in Canada.

Our Government pronouncements will I trust be helpful. May I also hope that these will receive widespread publicity in Canada and so help to remove any unfortunate impression that may have gained ground through the action of persons outside the Government here.

You also refer to implications which may be drawn even from statements of some United Kingdom Ministers. So far as I know, the only occasion upon which the matter has been dealt with by a United Kingdom Minister in a public speech was when the Minister of Health replied to an Opposition argument in his speech in reply in the devaluation debate in the House of Commons on 29th September. I append a copy of that part of his speech which mentioned the point.† From this you will see that he made it plain that the problem was one in which we were both concerned and that it was equally wrong to blame either of us for the inescapable events that arose out of the war. This statement was entirely in line with the communiqué issued after the Tripartite Conference in Washington last September to the effect that the solution of the economic problems which face us today calls for close and friendly co-operation between the United Kingdom, the United States of America and Canada.

I will not in this reply deal with the other matters touched upon in your message, except to say that we are and have always been most conscious and appreciative of the invaluable contribution that Canada has made during the war and subsequently in the attempt to solve the dollar-sterling difficulties. For this reason it has been all the more distressing to us that our difficulties—which are so well known to you that I need not enlarge on them—have compelled us to taper off our purchases of certain types of Canadian goods which we would very much like to have. These matters are, however, being dealt with between Mr. Abbott and Sir Stafford Cripps and I will not go further into them here. In wrestling with these problems, however, you and your Government can rest assured that I and my colleagues in the United Kingdom Government are as anxious as you are to avoid all misrepresentation of the attitude of either country and to carry forward our relationship in the frankest and most friendly atmosphere.

We shall of course find ourselves faced with difficult problems between our two countries from time to time, particularly so long as the dollar-sterling problem remains so acute, but I am sure that full and patient discussion of these matters will enable us to solve them and at the same time to increase the closeness of the understanding between our two countries.

Ottawa, November 24, 1949

Dear Sir Alexander,—

I refer to the personal message from the Chancellor of the Exchequer which you delivered to me on November 19th concerning the United Kingdom import programme from Canada.

My colleagues and I have now had an opportunity to consider the Chancellor's helpful suggestion regarding the possibility of switching expenditure between the different items on your 1949/50 programme, including perhaps wheat. In order to achieve a more satisfactory programme from our standpoint, within the limits of the total outlay which your Government feel they cannot exceed, we could contemplate a deferment in the shipment of some wheat from the quantity provided for in the wheat contract for 1949/50 into the subsequent crop year. We would be prepared to defer the shipment of up to 15 million bushels until the 1950/51 crop year under the terms and conditions which apply to the present contract.

The proposed arrangement regarding wheat would make available something over $30 millions for other items. From our point of view we would wish particularly to provide for the following: $2.5 millions for newsprint, $5 millions for Pacific Coast salmon from the 1950 catch, $22.5 millions for bacon and eggs.

We would wish to have as much as possible of the $27.5 millions, already in your programme for cheese and bacon, devoted to cheese from Canada. Whatever remains from this amount after the requirements for cheese have been met would supplement the $22.5 millions made available for bacon and eggs.

If these suggestions are generally acceptable to the United Kingdom Government we could proceed immediately with arrangements for the detailed discussion, through the appropriate channels, of prices, quantities, deliveries, etc.

I should be grateful if you would convey these proposals to the Chancellor. Please convey to him also my thanks for his message.

Yours sincerely,
D.C. ABBOTT

2. In the meantime I am sending you a personal message from Mr. St. Laurent for you to transmit to Mr. Attlee to express the Prime Minister's appreciation of the statement which Sir Stafford Cripps made on the 25th of November concerning the financial relations between Canada and the United Kingdom. I imagine that you will want to send this message to Mr. Attlee as early as possible on Monday morning in the hope that a copy of it will have reached the Chancellor in time for your meeting with him in the evening.

3. The text of Mr. St. Laurent's personal message for Mr. Attlee, which is dated the 2nd of December, is as follows, Begins:

"I should like to thank you for your personal message of the 22nd of November and to tell you how much we appreciate your efforts to set the record straight with respect to the financial relations between the United Kingdom and Canada. The public statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer made on the 25th of November was widely reported here, and I hope it received similar attention in your country. As you and the Chancellor indicated, the solution of the dollar-sterling problem will require a long, steady pull from Canada and the United Kingdom as well as from the United States. The statement made in London last week, I think, will make it easier for both our countries to put our backs into that joint effort, and I am therefore very grateful for it. By working closely together, I feel sure that in spite of all the problems we will be able to find solutions which will eventually overcome the difficulties which now beset our economic relations.

"I should be glad if you would convey my appreciation to Sir Stafford Cripps."

Re your telegram of December 3, No. 2354.† As a result of interdepartmental discussion the following notes may be useful for your own information in your discussion with the Chancellor on Monday.

1. The proposal in Mr. Abbott's telegram to the Chancellor was that 15 million bushels of wheat under the Agreement should be postponed, but not cancelled. It seems to us that cancellation should not be considered for the following reasons. Under the present contract the 15 million bushels in question would be sold at $2.06. If this 15 million bushels were sold to other purchasers under the International Wheat Agreement this year, at the ceiling price, it would bring $2.03, but at the floor it would bring $1.65. This means that, under the best circumstances, the cancellation would mean the loss of 3 cents a bushel, but, in view of the weakening of the market, it more probably would mean a loss of something up to 40 cents a bushel, assuming sales were made before July 31 next. If the wheat had to be carried over and sold next year the loss could be of the order of 50 cents a bushel, that is, a possible loss of some 7½ million dollars. The Wheat Board is of the firm opinion that they will probably be selling under the ceiling very shortly as a result of strong increased American competition in all markets. It is, therefore, pretty certain that a cancellation would mean a substantial loss to the wheat producer. The problems that such a course would raise are obvious. There would be the question of the wheat farmers carrying the problems of other groups i.e. hog producers, fishermen, newsprint industry etc., but more important is the whole history of the wheat contract and the "have regard" clause.

2. We are assuming here that with respect to cheese the British will have to buy from North America approximately 100 million pounds of cheese and that special provision is already made for such purchase apart from the wheat deal. The contract would have to be negotiated but this would be undertaken in the normal course and in the usual way.

3. With regard to the other products concerned the important question in the Chancellor's mind will no doubt be price and we will naturally be most interested in anything that the Chancellor indicates in this regard. Again for your own information the thinking here is that there would have to be some reduction from last year's prices, but that we should not go below the general level of prices that we would obtain if we were selling into the U.S. market or the United States support prices whichever is higher. Any greater reduction would probably involve subsidy on the part of the Canadian Government.

4. With regard to newsprint we do not anticipate the British will be so concerned with price because we understand the publishers are quite prepared, in view of the small amounts involved, to pay the going Canadian price. Any price reduction in this field would very probably bring a corresponding price reduction in our sales to the United States and would result in a very serious loss of dollar earnings. It is the intention that the small quantity of newsprint involved would be furnished entirely by Newfoundland to help ease that province's transitional problems.

5. In Mr. Abbott's message some leeway was left to allow for adjustments. We have pretty well accepted the fact that we will sell no pitprops, but, needless to say, if any interest were shown it would ease a difficult problem for us in connection with small producers in New Brunswick.

6. It may be that the Chancellor will bring into discussion the question of Newfoundland codfish. You are already familiar with the messages that have been sent but you may be interested to know that we received an ECA authorization yesterday for the sale of 1 million dollars of Newfoundland codfish to Greece. This should strengthen our hand in discussion with the British by showing that we are endeavouring to obtain dollars for this product and to relieve the British of their obligation in this respect.

7. Mr. Howe is sailing on the Queen Elizabeth on January 12th for a holiday in France. If desirable he could go first to London to discuss these matters.

London, December 5, 1949

Your telegram No. 2124 of December 4th, regarding United Kingdom import programme from Canada:

1. I called on the Chancellor of the Exchequer this afternoon at his request. He told me that a reply to Mr. Abbott's message of November 24th had been telegraphed to Clutterbuck, but that before it was delivered Sir Stafford wished to give me some verbal explanations of their counter-proposals.

2. In suggesting the transfer of 20 million dollars from wheat to other products, they had in mind the cancellation of an equivalent quantity of wheat and not the postponement of shipment. They appreciated, however, the reasons why we could not agree to cancellation, and therefore were proposing the deferment of a certain quantity into the subsequent crop year. They had originally suggested 20 million dollars, and we had proposed 30 million dollars. The compromise between these two figures was 25 million dollars, and this is what they were now proposing in relation to the deferment of wheat purchases until the next crop year and switching of the expenditure to be saved in this crop year to the purchase of other products.

3. The main question for them was the distribution of this amount of 25 million dollars among the various products. They could not undertake to purchase goods which they did not need. This applies to eggs, and they had made it clear to us that the orders placed in 1949 were intended to be a tapering off of shipments.

4. Sir Stafford then said that a similar situation applied to newsprint, since if they bought Canadian newsprint they would have more than they required, and they would have to compel the newspapers to increase their editions. He therefore proposed that the amount of two and a half million dollars which we had suggested for newsprint should be used for Eastern Canadian softwoods.

5. At this point I mentioned the importance we attached to newsprint, and referred to the intention that the small quantity of newsprint involved would be furnished entirely by Newfoundland to help ease that Province's transitional problems. He said he understood that the Newfoundland newsprint mills were now quite busy, and he did not see how newsprint could be a transitional problem.

6. Sir Stafford's reference to Eastern Canadian softwoods permitted me to refer to pit props. I said that I understood that 17,000 fathoms had been cut in anticipation of United Kingdom orders, and that an amount of 500 thousand dollars might clear these pit props. He said that if this was the case, it should be possible to include pit props in the amount allotted for Eastern Canadian softwoods.

7. When I asked about cheese, he said that this product was included in the original programme, and that he understood that 16 or 17 million dollars had been allotted to cheese. I then said that we had expressed a preference for a contract covering the whole year. He replied that he thought this would conflict with ECA requirements, and that it was their intention to purchase both from Canada and the United States from time to time according to requirements.

8. As regards bacon, he said that if two and a half million dollars were allotted to Eastern Canadian softwoods, and 5 million to canned fish, there remained 17 and a half million available for bacon. He believed that if we deducted eggs, this was the amount Mr. Abbott had in view in his proposal of November 24th.

9. Sir Stafford Cripps concluded by raising the question of prices, and repeated that they could neither permit prices or subsidies to increase. When I mentioned that we did not think we should go below the general level of prices that we would obtain if we were selling to the United States market, or the United States support prices, whichever is higher, Sir Stafford stated that they could not take into account the United States support prices, nor could they afford to pay such high prices as would increase the cost of living in this country. Sir Stafford discouraged any further discussion of prices or terms of contract by stating that these were details which could be worked out later.

10. I concluded the interview by stating that the Canadian Government would be very disappointed that no provision could be made for the purchase of newsprint.

Ottawa, December 5, 1949

Dear Mr. Abbott,

Thank you for your helpful letter of 24th November about the 1949/50 United Kingdom import programme in Canada, the substance of which I at once communicated to the United Kingdom Government. The proposals you made in it have been very carefully considered by United Kingdom Ministers, and I have now received their observations.

The United Kingdom Government are very glad to know that there is scope for a mutually satisfactory arrangement by means of deferring part of the 1949/50 purchases of wheat to 1950/51 and substituting purchases of other commodities to an equivalent value. If this solution is adopted, their understanding would be that the quantity of wheat of which the purchase would be deferred from 1949/50 would be bought in 1950/51 under the terms and conditions applying to the present contract, and that it would be regarded by both Governments and represented in public statements as merely the postponement of deliveries under the 1949/50 contract.

As regards the quantity to be deferred, you suggested that it should be up to 15 million bushels, representing $30 millions. On the other hand it was stated in Sir Stafford Cripps's message of 19th November that we could contemplate taking up to $20 millions less wheat in 1949/50. It would be difficult for the United Kingdom Government to go as far as you suggest, and the figure which they now propose in order to go as far as possible to meet the wishes of the Canadian Government is $25 millions (12½ million bushels).

It is desired that the reduction of $5 millions, which then needs to be made in the detailed figures in the third paragraph of your letter, should be made from the figure of $22½ millions which you suggested for bacon and eggs, and it is further desired that the resulting figure of $17½ millions should be applied to bacon only. The United Kingdom Government have sympathetically considered the Canadian Government's wish to export some eggs to the United Kingdom in 1949/50, but, as you will already be aware, they had previously reached the conclusion that they could not in present circumstances devote any of their limited dollar funds to the purchase of eggs—which could not in any case be expected to be a continuing trade—and they do not feel that they would be justified in modifying this conclusion.

Another modification of detail which the United Kingdom would wish to be made is in the $2½ millions which you suggested should be provided for newsprint. United Kingdom Ministers fully appreciate the importance which the Canadian Government attach to the United Kingdom continuing to import newsprint from Canada, but, since 1949/50 requirements can be adequately met from non-dollar sources, it would be extremely difficult for them, in our present dollar position, to justify an allocation of dollars for this purpose, and they would prefer to spend $2½ millions on a further purchase of Eastern Canadian soft wood.

To sum up, the United Kingdom suggestions for the special purchases of $25 millions (Canadian) are:—

Commodities	Millions of dollars (Canadian)
Bacon	17.5
Canned Salmon	5
Soft wood	2.5

These special purchases would be in addition to purchases of Canadian cheese under the proposals explained to the Canadian officials who visited London in October. In this connection I have been asked to emphasise that the original allocation of $27.5 millions for supplementary food purchases in North America will all be required for cheese, whether from Canada or from the United States.

In conveying the foregoing suggestions to you I have been asked to stress that they should be regarded, so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, as subject to the essential proviso that agreement should be reached between Canada and the United Kingdom on satisfactory prices, especially for cheese, bacon and canned salmon. This point was the subject of considerable discussion between Canadian and United Kingdom officials, both in Ottawa in September and in London in October the difficulty being that devaluation of sterling has made North America a high-priced source of supply, and the United Kingdom Government are anxious to avoid either an increase in the United Kingdom Exchequer subsidy or an increase in price to United Kingdom consumers.

The United Kingdom Government most earnestly trust that agreement can now be reached between the two Governments on the lines suggested above. If the proposals are acceptable in principle to the Canadian Government, the United Kingdom Government will make arrangements on their side for the early negotiation of the details.

Yours sincerely,
ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

Dear Sir Alexander,—

Thank you for your letter of December 5th concerning the 1949/50 United Kingdom import programme in Canada.

My colleagues and I have now had an opportunity to consider the proposals contained in your letter. I would be grateful if you would convey to the United Kingdom Government our agreement in principle to the suggested arrangement for deferring 12½ million bushels of the 1949/50 purchases of wheat to 1950/51 and substituting purchases of other commodities (bacon, salmon and softwood) to an equivalent value. I wish to confirm that it would be the understanding of both Governments that this quantity of wheat of which the purchase would be deferred from 1949/50 would be bought in 1950/51 under the terms and conditions applying to the present contract, and that it would be regarded by both Governments and represented in public statements as merely the postponement of deliveries under the 1949/50 contract.

Please convey to the United Kingdom Government our appreciation of their efforts to find a solution. It should now be possible to bring the outstanding matters to a conclusion in the near future. We are prepared to proceed with arrangements for the early negotiation of the details.

Ottawa, December 12, 1949

The United Kingdom High Commissioner asked to see me today to express the "grave concern" which his government felt over certain statements reported to have been made by the Minister of Agriculture on the subject of Anglo-Canadian trade.⁵⁴ They were particularly disturbed because these statements were made in the midst of negotiations between the two governments on this matter. The suggestion that there was a conscious effort being made by the United Kingdom Government to stop imports from Canada without an explanation of the dollar difficulties of that government could only create a misunderstanding. Sir Alexander said that the worries of his government about this matter would be increased when they were able to study the statement made by Mr. Gardiner in the House of Commons on Saturday morning. Sir Alexander added that we ought to be able to understand their preoccupations in this matter as we had reacted so quickly to the statements made in the United Kingdom which seemed to indicate a misunderstanding of the Canadian position.

2. I told Sir Alexander that I would bring this matter to your attention. If you agree, I think it might be desirable if I mentioned it at a Cabinet meeting. There is no doubt that the impression created in the United Kingdom by Mr. Gardiner's statements has been an unhappy one, and I think that if it had not been for Sir Alexander himself we would have had a more vigorous and a more formal intervention by the United Kingdom Government. (In fact, Sir Alexander told me in confidence that he had persuaded that government to leave the matter in his hands, rather than adopt the Prime Minister channel.)

My dear Prime Minister,

Mr. Gardiner's recent public utterances about Britain's attitude to food purchases from Canada have been widely and prominently reported in the United Kingdom press, and I have now received a message from Mr. Attlee asking me to tell you personally how greatly perturbed and discouraged he and his colleagues have been to read these statements, particularly those passages alleging that United Kingdom officials have been engaged in a "deliberate onslaught" to drive Canadian Gardiner répéta ses commentaires à la Chambre des communes, ce qui poussa Wilgress à suggérer une déclaration à Abbott pour faire le contrepoids. Heeney fut d'un avis contraire et Pearson d'accord.

This refers to a speech by J.G. Gardiner at Brantford, Ontario, which received wide coverage in the British press and editorial comment in the Daily Express on December 9, 1949. food products out of the British market and sometimes even have sought to buy from the American continent for dollars what they decline to buy from Canada.

As you know, Mr. Attlee had himself taken steps, in pursuance of the personal messages exchanged with you, to discourage and repudiate comment in the United Kingdom which was critical of Canada and which did not of course carry any official authority. It is therefore the more distressing to him to find that a distorted picture of the official policy of the United Kingdom Government is publicly enunciated and attacked by a Minister of the Canadian Government. He will of course continue to seek to restrain unofficial comment in the United Kingdom, but he feels sure that you will understand that his task in trying to do so will be rendered more difficult, and may indeed be made impossible, by repercussions from statements such as those made by Mr. Gardiner.

Yours sincerely,

Attention Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre

Dear Sir:

I have yours of December 14th enclosing a memorandum which you have had prepared summarizing the work of the Conference of Commonwealth Finance Ministers held in London last fall.† I have only been able to read this memorandum in great haste, but I regret to say that this hasty reading did not give me the impression of receiving a very accurate or illuminating picture of what went on at that Conference.⁵⁵

In particular, the memorandum gives little idea of the fundamental strategy and general pattern of the Conference. The purpose of the Conference was to provide a forum in which the United Kingdom could impress the various other sterling area members of the Commonwealth with the seriousness of the exchange reserve problem of the sterling area; expound in detail the nature of, and the reasons for, the dangerous trends in those reserves which had become visible in the second quarter of the year and the steps which the U.K. itself was putting into effect to remedy the situation, particularly the drastic restrictions on dollar imports; and bring pressure upon the other members of the sterling area to put into effect a similar drastic program of dollar import restrictions. Canada was probably invited to participate not merely because she is a member of the Commonwealth but also because it was felt she could assist in emphasizing the seriousness of the current trends and in making it clear that it would be folly to rely for a complete solution upon actions to be taken by the United States.

The Commonwealth Conference began immediately after the conclusion of the tripartite discussions among the U.K., the U.S.A. and Canada. When it opened, members of the Commonwealth who had not been present at these tripartite discussions were very curious as to what they had accomplished—all professed some disappointment over the apparently innocuous content of the communique which had been issued, and at least one member found it difficult to avoid showing pique that it had not been represented in the discussions.

The British Chancellor of the Exchequer handled the Conference with very considerable skill. At an early stage he had indicated his expectation that all the other sterling area members of the Commonwealth should and would impose restrictions on dollar imports as drastic as those which the U.K. was putting into effect, i.e., restrictions designed to reduce dollar imports during 1949–50 by 25%. This was the general nature of the short-run program for which he was seeking approval. When the program was first suggested, the heads of all the other delegations began with one accord to make objections—it would be quite impossible to effect so drastic a saving during the current year; already commitments had been made which could not be repudiated; some thought it would be wiser and more practicable for them to increase dollar earnings rather than reduce dollar spendings; Mr. [Walter] Nash of New Zealand thought that it would be wiser to borrow from Canada and the United States; in one or two cases the standard of living was already so low that imports could not be further restricted without grave political and social danger; etc.; etc. Sir Stafford Cripps then allowed discussion to develop on the medium-term and long-term measures but kept coming back from time to time to the acute short-run situation and giving new information to emphasize the rapidity of the deterioration in the sterling area's exchange reserves which was taking place. Finally, in the concluding sessions of the Conference he obtained a reluctant acquiescence on the part of most delegations to the type of program in which he was primarily interested.

Canada made it clear from the outset that she was, by history and force of economic circumstances, a member of the dollar area rather than the sterling area, and that she could not therefore be considered as giving approval in any sense to the decisions of the others to restrict dollar imports. Mr. Abbott did admit his appreciation of the fact that when a hemorrhage was in process it might be appropriate temporarily to apply a tourniquet to stop the flow of blood, but emphasized that the greatest care was necessary to avoid allowing the tourniquet to become a substitute for other positive measures designed to avoid the loss of the limb. In other words, he stressed, in season and out of season, the necessity of constructive rather than restrictive measures and of securing agreement of the various members of the Commonwealth to the adoption of a medium-term and long-term positive measures designed to remedy the unbalance between the sterling and dollar worlds. In this connection, he had repeatedly to endeavour to persuade various delegations that it would be a mistake to attribute the loss of exchange reserves largely to business recession in the United States (in fact, United States business activity had been maintained on a very high level and Canada had been able to increase her exports to the United States in 1948 by an extraordinary proportion and to maintain them during 1949), and to point out that probably a more serious cause of the trouble was the high level of costs and prices in the United Kingdom and other parts of the sterling area.

The major difference between the two schools of thought found most frequent reflection in the discussions, both amongst Ministers and in the Committee of Experts, of the long-term constructive program to be recommended by the Conference. In the Committee of Experts, Dr. Coombs, the leading economic adviser of the Australian delegation, probably expressed in the most clear-cut way the type of approach that tended to minimize the difficulties over the level of costs and prices in the debtor countries resulting from full employment and welfare state policies, and to maximize the difficulties resulting from business recession in the United States and the pursuit by the United States of economic policies unbecoming to a surplus or creditor country. In fact, however, after several meetings, formal and informal, it was possible to secure the agreement of the experts of all delegations to a statement of long-term measures which represented a very satisfactory compromise between the two points of view—in other words, a compromise which assigned responsibility in fairly equitable proportions to both creditor and debtor countries. (Incidentally, in the External Affairs memorandum, it is suggested that this statement of an agreed long-term program, which was later revised in only minor detail by the meeting of Ministers, was essentially a draft of proposals initially submitted by the United Kingdom; this is very far from an accurate statement.)

I am sorry I have not the time to criticise the memorandum in detail nor to go back and check the records of the Conference. However, there are a few points in the memorandum which I have noted as perhaps calling for a brief comment.

Paragraph 2(e), last sentence—An important cause of the decline was the fact that the United States Government reduced its own stockpiling purchases for much the same reason as United States business men reduced their inventory purchases.

Paragraph 3—The euphemism employed by Sir Stafford Cripps for the business recession in the United States was “a change from a sellers’ to a buyers’ market”.

Paragraph 7—Both in the tripartite and the Commonwealth discussions Canada and other countries raised the question of the loss of dollars to the United Kingdom involved in transactions in cheap sterling, and both Canada and the United States in particular were inclined to believe that the loss due to this factor and to the “leads and lags” factors arising out of devaluation rumours referred to in paragraph 7 were a good deal more important than the British Treasury was inclined to admit.

Paragraph 21—As already noted, the long-term recommendations agreed to were very far from being “an expanded version” of the program suggested by Mr. Harold Wilson.

Paragraph 27—Mr. Nash raised the possibility of direct loans from U.S. and Canada as well as acceptance of sterling. The paragraph seems to abbreviate unduly the reply given by Mr. Abbott.

Appendix A—My impression is that this appendix, particularly that part of it dealing with long-term measures, lacks in precision and balance as a summary of the recommendations agreed upon. For instance, it seems ridiculous to say that “the countries represented at the meetings agreed...(e) to restore international monetary reserves to levels etc., etc.” Again, the final paragraph appears to be completely oblivious of the special position of Canada and the caveats entered at its request.

The same criticism can be made about Appendix B. Note the phrase “The meeting agreed...”; “Cheap sterling transactions should be eliminated” (a consummation devoutly to be wished but I fear a bit impracticable); and again I doubt if I understand the references to Canada opposite the title “Maganese Iron”.

I think that with the general background which I have given and more precision in summarizing the chief documents, it should be possible to produce a memorandum which would be more helpful to the delegation proceeding to Colombo.

Yours very truly,

W.C. CLARK

The Prime Minister had a call on the telephone from the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon about a proposed announcement regarding bacon prices. Mr. St-Laurent emphasized the importance of indicating that the proposed arrangement would last only for six months, and specifically requested Mr. Gardiner to clear any announcement with Mr. Howe before it was issued.

Mr. St-Laurent then referred to a letter he had received from the United Kingdom High Commissioner conveying a message from the Prime Minister of Great Britain in which Mr. Attlee had expressed concern about the publicity given to recent statements by Mr. Gardiner at Brantford, Ontario, and in the House of Commons on the last day of the session. Mr. St-Laurent pointed out that these statements were being used by the political opponents of the present administration in the United Kingdom, and expressed regret that anything said by a Member of the Canadian Government should be so used.

In reply to a query by Mr. Gardiner, Mr. St-Laurent said that he did not think it would be helpful to make any explanatory speech, or indeed any different speech at all, at this time, but suggested that every care be exercised to avoid saying anything which could be misrepresented or misconstrued.

In response to a further observation by Mr. Gardiner, Mr. St-Laurent said that he understood Sir Alexander Clutterbuck had been present at the sessions of the recent Agricultural Conference and had reported favourably to his government on the statement Mr. Gardiner had made at that conference.

1. My talk with Cripps on Friday morning turned out to be pretty general and inconclusive. He reviewed the considerations which other United Kingdom spokesmen had already put forward about the difficulties they found in meeting our counter-proposals in respect of quantities and prices for 1950-51 and 1951-52. In general I felt afterwards that we had been perhaps arguing at cross purposes, since he spent more time explaining the impossibility of the United Kingdom taking war-time peak quantities of foodstuffs from Canada than in meeting the immediate practical problem of a fair deal on wheat. He said, however, that he was meeting to discuss the whole question with the Cabinet Committee on Economic Policy on Monday, to prepare their reply which would be communicated to you through Clutterbuck. It was left that Wilson-Smith would get in touch with me again before instructions were actually sent to Clutterbuck.

2. When I saw Wilson-Smith this morning he told me that yesterday's meeting of the Ministers was presided over by the Prime Minister, attended by Cripps, Bevin, Morrison, Aneurin Bevan and Strachey (Noel-Baker being still in Greece). They came to the conclusion that they could not agree to the quantities and prices we had proposed for the two contingent post-contract years. I gathered that in general they find commitment in respect of quantities more difficult than commitment in respect of prices, and that though they might go some distance to meet us under both heads, their new suggestions might fall seriously short of our view as to what is reasonable. I told Wilson-Smith, and have since expressed the same opinion to the Commonwealth Relations Office, that I thought the United Kingdom would be well advised at this stage in the discussions to concede on their own initiative that their counter-proposals in respect of quantity and price might not strike the Canadian Government as a fair and reasonable settlement of the "have regard to" obligation,⁵⁷ and that they should of their own motion offer to forego drawing such part of the outstanding Canadian credit as might seem required to supplement their present offer in a full and mutually satisfactory settlement of the "have regard to" obligation.

3. It seems to me that the question of further drawings on the credit would inevitably be raised in our Cabinet if the United Kingdom counter-proposals fell appreciably short of our last offer, and that the general discussions could proceed in a less fractious spirit if the United Kingdom took the initiative of recognizing this relationship at this time.

4. They can make quite a good case on its merits against the continuing commitment to take 140,000,000 bushels of wheat through 1951–52, particularly on the eve of new negotiations for an International Wheat Agreement. They can also argue with some plausibility that $1.55 is a fairly high floor price to project four years forward, but in stating their case on these points they are apt to overlook the political importance of cleaning up the "have regard to" obligation in a tidy and mutually satisfactory way. Ends.

1. I understand that Clutterbuck's instructions have now gone forward as approved by the Cabinet Committee yesterday, and that my last-minute representations, as reported in my telegram under reference, have been ineffective. I have not in fact been shown Clutterbuck's instructions, so cannot confirm my guess that they fall sufficiently far short of meeting our proposals as to make my suggestion that the British themselves raise the possibility of their foregoing some appropriate part of the credit a reasonable or realistic one. This is, of course, a matter of judgement and primarily of their judgement, and they appear to think that their counter-proposals do represent a reasonable settlement of the "have regard to" obligation.

After the Cabinet meeting yesterday afternoon, I asked Sir Alexander Cluttbuck to come and see me and told him that the Government had been giving some preliminary consideration to the United Kingdom counterproposal on wheat which he had stated to me orally earlier in the day.

I told him that, irrespective of our attitude towards amounts and prices, we could not consider the change from optional arrangements for 1950–51 and 1951–52 to a firm price for those years. I added that our first reaction was that the United Kingdom counterproposal, largely because of the inclusion of this new element, was even less attractive to us than the proposal which had been made in London and which Mr. Gardiner had rejected.

Sir Alexander, who was accompanied by Sir Andrew Jones, seemed surprised and somewhat puzzled by our attitude as he said that he had learned from Department of Agriculture sources here that this change would commend itself to the Canadian Government. I admitted to Sir Alexander that Mr. Gardiner had not been present at the Cabinet meeting, but said that I would be very surprised indeed if our Minister of Agriculture's reaction was different from that which I had just expressed. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was also present, said that he felt sure that Mr. Howe would also share the opinion that I had expressed.

I then asked Sir Alexander to put the United Kingdom counterproposal in writing as I wished to make sure that we had the exact information concerning it. He is doing this.⁵⁸

The High Commissioner then explained that the quantities suggested (120 million bushels for 1950–51 and 100 million bushels for 1951–52) were, in the opinion of the United Kingdom authorities, entirely reasonable as was the price suggested, and that they could not consider as accurate the figures which I had given to him (and which had been given to me by the Minister of Agriculture) for average shipments from Canada to the United Kingdom covering the prewar years. I said that these figures had been sent hurriedly without an opportunity for checking them, but that in any case our argument did not rest mainly on them.

There is no doubt that we are reaching a very difficult stage in our wheat negotiations with the United Kingdom and that our difficulties are increased by the vulnerability of our position vis-a-vis the United States. The United Kingdom know, of course, that our capacity to bargain with them in this matter is lessened by the fact that any arrangement we make with them must be, in principle if not in detail, acceptable to the Americans: otherwise, the Americans can make the arrangement null and void by refusing to allow E.C.A. funds to be used in Canada for purchases under it. The United Kingdom can be expected to use this situation to strengthen their own position. Therefore, it may suit their purpose to sit back and make no further wheat offer at this time, on the assumption that the logic of events will force us substantially to meet their terms. The only effective wheat card we have to defeat this game, if it is played, would be the threat to rescind the wheat contract immediately and sell wheat in the open market for what we can get. I am assured by Mr. Gardiner (with whom I spoke this morning) that, if no satisfactory price arrangement is reached by the middle of January for 1950-51, we are not breaking faith in any way if we end the wheat agreement under these conditions. However, there are strong arguments against taking this course. It would, of course, mean that we would get more for our wheat immediately, but we would throw away long term market security and stability as well as forfeit any "have regard to" rights, and thereby make it almost impossible to refute the argument which would certainly be used by our opponents that our whole wheat policy has been wrong all along and has ended in disaster.

My view is, therefore, that, if the United Kingdom will not accept our recent offer and we do not wish to end the wheat contract, we must make another offer to the British as soon as possible. If so, there are three courses open to us, as I see it:

1. to persuade the British to accept a proposal for $2. for 1949-50 and the optional proposals for the subsequent two years to cover, say, 120 million bushels of wheat at $1.55 or $1.50;
2. to establish a $2. price for 1949-50 and leave the "have regard to" obligations to be determined later; or
3. some combination of 1. and 2. with the British giving up $100,000,000 or so of the loan, which could then be used for any purpose we desire.

I feel that it is of the very greatest importance that while we are talking to London on this subject we also talk to Washington. We will have to discuss our wheat negotiations with the Americans in any event and we should not permit the United Kingdom to anticipate us in this regard. The attached disturbing telegram from London [No. 33]† indicates that discussions between the United Kingdom and the United States on our wheat negotiations have, in fact, already taken place. We certainly cannot, to say the least, expect the United Kingdom to put the case for a successful outcome of these negotiations as strongly as we could ourselves.

Furthermore, these wheat discussions are merely one aspect of the whole question of economic relationships not merely between the United Kingdom and Canada, but also between the United States and Canada. Those relationships with our neighbour would be seriously endangered if the United States took any action to make impossible a satisfactory wheat arrangement with the United Kingdom. To prevent this, I think the time has come to have serious discussions on the highest political level in Washington on Canadian-United States economic and political questions. It seems to me that our best chance of a favourable United States reaction to any plans which we may have for safeguarding our own position, is to explain our difficulties and our objectives, frankly and in language they will understand, to the top people in Washington. If the United States wish us to cooperate with them both economically and politically, they will have to show some realization of these difficulties, and some interest in these objectives. On the face of it, we seem to be in a very favourable statistical position and, for this reason, United States officials not especially concerned with the political aspect of questions, will insist that we should make greater "sacrifices" for European recovery. In my view, we must get completely away from this approach. This, however, will require high-level political rather than official talks. If we wish those talks to be as successful as they should be, we should link up wheat and E.C.A. questions with questions concerning cooperation in other fields, such as defence, Atlantic security, the United Nations, the St. Lawrence Waterway, etc.

I mentioned this subject yesterday in Cabinet and I think it is one that should be given most serious and immediate consideration.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du haut-commissaire pour le Royaume-Uni

Memorandum from High Commissioner of United Kingdom

SECRET

Ottawa, January 6, 1949

WHEAT PRICE 1949-50

United Kingdom Ministers have carefully considered the proposals put forward by the Canadian Government in the message communicated by the Canadian High Commissioner in London to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 24th December.

2. As regards quantity, United Kingdom Ministers feel that the request that this should be increased to 140 million bushels in the two options raises extreme difficulty, for the following reasons:—

(1) Total United Kingdom requirements of wheat and flour may be taken to be of the order of 220 million bushels of wheat. Of this quantity it is hoped to obtain 60 million bushels from Australia, and 20 million from other non-dollar sources of supply. If we were committed to obtain the whole of the remaining balance of 140 million bushels from Canada, not only would our supply programme be deprived of any margin of flexibility but we should be placed in a very difficult position in relation to any International Wheat Agreement. Indeed, the effect would be that we should be virtually contracting out of the Agreement for a period of three years.

This would be likely to meet strong objection from the United States, and the prospects of securing a satisfactory International Agreement might be fatally prejudiced.

(2) It is vitally important to us (and also, it is suggested, to Canada) that our wheat supplies from Canada should continue to be secured by off-shore purchases under E.R.P. An International Agreement would guarantee the Americans a market for an agreed quantity of wheat but it would not guarantee a price above the floor price. If the United Kingdom import programme were to be wholly committed in advance as in (1) above, and given also a continuance of heavy crops in the United States, it might well be that the Americans would be compelled to accept very low prices for any wheat that was not covered by E.C.A. finance. In such circumstances the strain on the off-shore purchase system would clearly be insupportable.

(3) The conclusion is unavoidable that if we are to be assured of a continuance of E.C.A. finance for off-shore purchases of wheat from Canada, the quantities to which we are committed in advance must, in order to be proof against criticism from the United States standpoint, bear reasonably close relation to the pre-war volume of supply. During the years 1921–38 inclusive the average United Kingdom retained imports of wheat and flour from Canada were substantially less than 100 million bushels in terms of wheat equivalent. Hence the insertion of the figure of 100 million bushels in the United Kingdom proposals, as the maximum figure likely to be acceptable from the standpoint of E.C.A. finance. The adoption of this figure would not of course mean that the United Kingdom would not in practice take more than 100 million bushels in any circumstances; it would, however, mean that the United Kingdom would not be committed in advance to take more than 100 million bushels, and that the question of filling the balance of its import requirements would be left to be determined in the light of supply and financial conditions at the time.

3. As regards price, on this head too the proposals of the Canadian Government raise serious difficulty. The price of $1.40 suggested by the United Kingdom Government in the two options is above the floor proposed in the draft International Wheat Agreement. To increase this price to $1.55 would raise it still further above the floor and would indeed introduce a new conception into the options.

The options were devised, in an effort to meet the Canadian Government, with the object of putting Canadian farmers in a specially favourable position compared with other producers by giving them a guaranteed floor price in the years in question higher than the floor proposed in the draft International Agreement. At the same time Canadian hands are not tied in any way. There is nothing to prevent Canada from seeking to sell at higher than the floor price, and indeed there is no commitment on Canada's part to sell to the United Kingdom at all. Thus the options are heavily weighted in Canada's favour, the United Kingdom obligating herself to buy at a specially favourable floor price if Canada requires her to do so, but being left in a position of complete uncertainty as to her forward supply position.

To advance the proposed floor price to $1.55 would weight the options still more heavily in Canada's favour while leaving the United Kingdom in the same position of uncertainty. Moreover, a floor price of $1.55 would be wholly out of line not only with the contemplated floor prices in the International Wheat Agreement, but also with any realistic estimate of world supply prospects in eighteen months' time.

4. In these circumstances United Kingdom Ministers feel that, if difficulties are seen in the proposals communicated to Mr. Gardiner in London, a solution might best be found in an alternative line of approach.

For the reasons stated they fear that there would be serious risk of difficulty with the United States over the provision of E.C.A. finance if the quantities envisaged were to be in excess of 100 million bushels. In order, however, to meet the Canadian Government they would be prepared, if what follows is acceptable, to agree to a figure of 120 million bushels for 1950–51 while leaving the figure of 100 million for 1951–52, and they would do their utmost to justify these figures to the E.C.A. If an increase in price to $1.55 is desired, it is clear to United Kingdom Ministers that this could only be justified and defended to E.C.A. and to other signatories of the proposed International Wheat Agreement if the proposal was not an entirely one-sided one, related only to a floor price, but carried with it an obligation on the part of Canada to sell as well as an obligation on the part of the United Kingdom to buy. Even so, while they would be prepared on this basis and in order to achieve a settlement, to envisage a price of $1.55 for 1950–51, they do not feel that they could reasonably go further than $1.45 for 1951–52 when the supply position may be expected to be very substantially easier.

5. Accordingly they would urge on the Canadian Government the merits of a settlement on the following lines, the proposition to be considered as a whole:—

(1) Payment of $2.0 for 140 million bushels in 1949–50, the last year of the existing Agreement.

(2) A firm commitment on the part of the United Kingdom to buy, and on the part of Canada to sell, 120 million bushels in 1950–51 at a price of $1.55.

(3) A firm commitment on the part of the United Kingdom to buy, and on the part of Canada to sell, 100 million bushels in 1951–52 at a price of $1.45.

(4) Recognition that on the above basis the obligations of the "have regard" clause in the existing Agreement will be fully satisfied.

[Ottawa], January 8, 1949

The Prime Minister yesterday afternoon, after discussion with Mr. Pearson and myself and a telephone conversation with Mr. Gardiner, asked Sir Alexander Clutterbuck to see him about the wheat contract. He requested Clutterbuck to propose urgently to his Government that a settlement should be arrived at at once on the basis of a price of $2.00 for the 140 million bushels to be delivered in 1949-50. The negotiations for a further settlement under the "have regard to" clause would be postponed until some convenient time in that crop year. Mr. St. Laurent supported this proposal by the following arguments, among others.

(1) It would permit immediate announcement of the reopening of the U.K. credit, which had become very urgent from the point of view of E.C.A. in Washington.

(2) It would not prejudice in any way the outcome of the International Wheat Conference opening on January 24th, whereas any extension of the contract specifying quantities and prices (whether firm or as floor prices) might be regarded as affecting the prospects of an International Wheat Agreement.

(3) It would postpone the issue probably until after the elections in Canada.

(4) It would remove the most serious outstanding controversy with the U.K. about the imports from Canada, and if this controversy were not removed, it would be impossible for the Canadian Government simultaneously to extend credit to the U.K. and to complain that they were being unfairly treated by the U.K.

The Prime Minister went on to urge the importance of settling this difference for broader reasons of policy so as to permit the two governments to continue to work together harmoniously in many fields. Clutterbuck said that he would submit the matter urgently to his government. Later Mr. Pearson spoke to Mr. Robertson on the telephone and told him of the proposal. Mr. Robertson said that he would seek to see Sir Stafford Cripps this morning and press him strongly to accept the proposal at once. In the course of the evening, Murray of the Washington Embassy telephoned to tell me that he had just heard from Mr. Strange of E.C.A. that a meeting of senior officials had been held yesterday afternoon in Washington to discuss these wheat negotiations, which was attended, among others, by Dr. Fitzgerald of E.C.A., Mr. Nitze of the State Department and Mr. Loveland, Under-Secretary of Agriculture. At this meeting very grave concern had been expressed about the effect on the International Wheat Conference of any commitment extending the Canadian wheat contract beyond the next crop year. The meeting had concluded that urgent representations should be made both in Ottawa and London. Apparently some information about the U.K. offer and our counter-offer for the two following crop years had reached Dr. Fitzgerald. I informed Murray of the proposal put to Clutterbuck and told him that he should tell Strange at once that we submitted a proposal to the British Government, which involved no commitment on quantity or price beyond the year 1949-50. Murray added that Strange had told him that the $2.00 price for 1949-50 would not cause them any special concern in Washington, presumably on the ground that it would be below their support price for the next U.S. crop.†

I have this morning told Mr. M.W. Mackenzie and Mr. Deutsch about these discussions yesterday.

Ottawa, January 12, 1949

My dear Prime Minister,

Wheat Price 1949-50

I reported at once to my Government the proposal which you put to me at our meeting on Friday, and I am happy to say that I have now been authorised to inform you that they are ready to agree in all the circumstances, and especially in view of the representations made by the United States authorities both in Washington and London, to leave the matter as you suggested.

It seems to United Kingdom Ministers that the following points arise:—

(1) Bearing in mind the terms of Article 7 of the Canadian/United Kingdom Wheat Agreement, Ministers regard it as very desirable, and they feel sure that the Canadian Government will agree, that we should take such steps as are possible to avoid having representations made by any of the Governments who will be represented at the forthcoming International Wheat Conference to the effect that, whatever may be the ceiling fixed for the purposes of the International Wheat Agreement (should one be negotiated) the Canadian price must be brought within that ceiling for the crop year 1949-50.

(2) In this connection my Government have in mind particularly the attitude of the other importing countries some of whom have already expressed interest in the price likely to be fixed for the fourth year of the Canadian/United Kingdom Agreement. Under the draft International Wheat Agreement of 1948 the other importing countries would have taken 320 million bushels out of the total of 500 million bushels and Canadian wheat to the amount of up to 90 million bushels would have gone to them. It is evident therefore that, if there is to be an International Wheat Agreement, the other importing countries will wish to feel that their freedom to negotiate ceiling and floor prices has not been prejudiced by the fixing of a $2.00 price for the last year of the Canadian/United Kingdom Agreement, and it seems to United Kingdom Ministers that the only way in which this can be assured is for the two Governments now to say plainly that, if prices under an International Wheat Agreement differ in 1949/50 from $2.00, this will subsequently be taken into account in making a final settlement of any balance of the United Kingdom obligation under the "have regard" clause.

(3) At one stage during the discussions with Mr. Gardiner in London the Canadian representatives handed to the United Kingdom representatives for consideration some pro forma clauses for an agreement of the kind we are now contemplating. These clauses are contained in the minutes of the meeting held at Montagu House on the 14th December. It is not suggested that there should be any formal document of the kind then contemplated, but Ministers regard it as important that the two Governments should agree upon a joint announcement which will make it plain that United Kingdom agreement to pay $2.00 in 1949-50 will in certain circumstances be taken as having at least partly settled our "have regard" obligation. I enclose for your consideration a suggested text for such an announcement, which incorporates some part of the wording proposed by the Canadian representatives on the 14th December.

Accordingly, with the foregoing considerations in mind, I am asked to inform you that the United Kingdom Government agree to a price of $2.00 a bushel for 1949-50 and to your proposal that the question of liquidating the "have regard" clause should be left over for further discussion during 1949-50, on the understanding that both Governments make as plain as possible what they are doing by issuing simultaneously an announcement on the lines suggested above.

In this connection I have been instructed to add for the record that the United Kingdom Government do not regard the type of arithmetical calculation which was presented to them in the London discussions as forming a satisfactory basis for settling the "have regard" obligation. Accordingly, in the later negotiations, when the matter comes up again, they will hope to be able to reach agreement to link final liquidation of our obligation under the "have regard" clause, if any still remains, with the further purchases of wheat which we shall no doubt desire to make from Canada in subsequent years. In order to prevent any possible misunderstanding on this point I am asked to make it clear that in the view of Ministers it would not be satisfactory from the United Kingdom standpoint to have to make a further cash payment in respect of any of the wheat coming within the four years of the 1946 Agreement.

The next step is to agree upon the wording of a simultaneous announcement, and I should be most grateful if you would let me know whether the draft announcement enclosed is acceptable to you. It will of course be necessary to clear the agreed draft with E.C.A. before the announcement is issued by the two Governments, and I am in consultation with our representatives in Washington with a view to their standing ready to take this up immediately agreement on the wording has been reached between us.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

DRAFT ANNOUNCEMENT FOR ISSUE SIMULTANEOUSLY BY THE CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENTS AFTER CLEARANCE OF TEXT WITH E.C.A.

Representatives of the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments have had discussions on the price to be paid by the United Kingdom for Canadian wheat in 1949/50, the fourth and final year under the United Kingdom-Canadian Wheat Agreement of 1946. After taking into account all relevant considerations, including the United Kingdom obligations under Clause 2(b) of the Agreement, the two Governments have agreed upon a price of $2.00 per bushel.

The two Governments have also agreed that their representatives shall meet not later than 31st July, 1950, to settle any obligations of the United Kingdom which may then still be outstanding under Clause 2(b) of the Agreement. The extent to which any such obligations will remain will depend largely upon the actual prices ruling for wheat during 1949/50. Further, in the event of an International Wheat Agreement operating in 1949/50, the two Governments are agreed that any excess of the price of $2.00 over the average price for wheat falling under the International Wheat Agreement shall be taken into account in the final settlement.

My dear High Commissioner:

I have considered with my colleagues your letter of the 12th instant and the annexed draft of announcement regarding the wheat price for the crop year 1949-50.

With regard to the points numbered (1) and (2) in your letter, the Canadian government is in agreement. As for the point numbered (3) our government is pleased that the United Kingdom government agrees to a price of $2.00 per bushel on the understanding that the question of additional consideration under the "have regard to" clause should be deferred for settlement during 1949-50. We have noted that the present view in the United Kingdom is that they would prefer to link settlement of any obligation under the "have regard to" clause with further purchases of wheat in subsequent years rather than have to make a further cash payment in respect of any of the wheat delivered under the 1944 agreement.

We hope it may be possible when we come to discuss a final settlement to find one mutually satisfactory which would relate to future purchases, but as the essence of this present agreement is to leave open the matter of the final adjustment of whatever may be the obligations outstanding under the "have regard to" clause, we wish that reservation to remain quite unqualified.

As for the draft announcement, we suggest that the second sentence of the first paragraph be amended to read:

"After taking into account all relevant considerations, but without attempting to reach a final settlement of the United Kingdom obligations under Clause 2(b) of the agreement, the two governments have agreed upon a price of $2.00 per bushel."

We suggest further that the final sentence should be amended to read as follows: "Further, whether or not an International Wheat Agreement is in operation during 1949-50, the two governments are agreed that any difference between the price of $2.00 per bushel and the average price at which Canadian wheat is sold for export outside the contract shall be taken into account in the final settlement."

Subject to these amendments, which have been included in the draft annexed hereto,† we are prepared to issue the joint statement, and to regard it as expressing the terms of our agreement.

Yours sincerely,

LOUIS S. ST-LAURENT

SECRET

Ottawa, January 18, 1949

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

In the letter under date of January 12th which you received from Sir Alexander Clutterbuck, and in the paragraph numbered (3) of that letter, it is stated: "At one stage during the discussions with Mr. Gardiner in London the Canadian representatives handed to the United Kingdom representative for consideration some pro forma clauses for an agreement of the kind we are now contemplating. These clauses are contained in the minutes of the meeting held at Montagu House on the 14th December."

In my memorandum dated December 22nd reporting to Council upon my negotiations with the British Minister of Food, Mr. Strachey, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Cripps, on page 3 I referred to what is here called some pro forma clauses for an agreement. On page 3 of the document I referred to these clauses in these words: "Before going to that meeting we drew up a statement which I would be guided by in discussing the matter with Mr. Strachey and his officials. It reads as follows:—

1. The loss calculated on the difference between the Fort William price of wheat delivered to the United Kingdom and that delivered to other countries is $1.08 a bushel averaged over two years on 320 million bushels of wheat. In addition to this, there would be a difference on wheat delivered in the third year.
2. We are prepared to agree that more than half of the claims on that basis cannot be justified, and that a dollar a bushel on 140 million bushels in 1949-50 might be considered a reasonable basis from which to discuss a reasonable settlement.

3. We are prepared to agree that the dollar a bushel be calculated from the actual price at which wheat could be marketed in other countries whether that price is above or below two dollars a bushel. This would limit the amount for which the United Kingdom is liable.

4. The above is only intended to indicate the steps by which we reached our conclusions to the effect that we are prepared to accept two dollars a bushel basis No. 1 Northern Fort William as a payment for our wheat in 1949-50 provided the final settlement of clause 2 (b) in the contract is made in accordance with the plan set out in #3 above.

5. If it were not agreeable to provide for a settlement as outlined above, we are prepared to accept $2.50 a bushel for the 1949-50 crop as a final settlement of the United Kingdom's obligations assumed under 2 (b) of the July 24, 1946, contract."

I wish to state that after returning from the meeting at which I handed to Mr. Strachey a copy of the notes which I myself was using I re-drafted the four points in order to make them a little better understandable to others and more in conformity with the nature of the discussion which took place.

In view of the fact that this document has been referred to in the letter which may become part of future discussions, I think it important that there should be on the file a memorandum in the same words as that which I presented to Mr. Strachey at the time. The document was as follows:—

"1. The loss is $1.08 a bu. average over two years on 320,000,000 bu. of wheat. This is made up of the difference between Ft. William price of what we sold the United Kingdom and what we sold others.

2. We are prepared to cancel more than half of it and agree that $1.00 a bu. on 140,000,000 bu. delivered in 1949-50 would be taken as final settlement.

3. We are prepared to agree that the $1.00 a bu. be calculated from whatever the price is which we are able to sell wheat to others for basis Ft. William in 1949-50.

4. We are prepared to accept $2.00 a bu. basis Ft. William No. 1 Northern as the payment to be made by the United Kingdom for 140,000,000 bu. of wheat during the crop year 1949-50 on condition that a final settlement (based upon the above) is made at the end of the crop year.

5. If that is not satisfactory we agree to accept $2.50 a bu. for 1949-50 crop as a final settlement of the arrangement entered into under Clause 2 (b) of the agreement."

I took some notes of the discussion that took place. They are written at the bottom of my copy in these words:

"During the discussion it was agreed that the first three statements numbered 1, 2, 3 merely set forth the reasoning by which we reached a conclusion and that the proposal is really stated in 4. The British suggested that "based upon the above" be eliminated.

Five was an alternative based upon discussions in farm organizations particularly United Farmers of Alberta before we left. This was not considered by the British and can scarcely be said to have been formally presented by us."

It will appear from this and the wording of the letter of Sir Alexander Clutterbuck of January 12th, 1949, that the notes numbered (1), (2) and (3) were eliminated as a part of any proposed settlement and that they are basing their proposed interim settlement on the proposal in (4) with the words "based upon the above" eliminated.

I repeat that I think it would be well to have this on the record.⁵⁹

Yours sincerely,

JAMES G. GARDINER

CHEESE; PERMITS TO EXPORT; U.K. CONTRACT

5. The Minister of Agriculture reported that the U.K. had been informed that cheese to cover the contract for 1949 would be delivered by the end of July or early August. There would be an additional 30 million pounds in excess of the contract, domestic requirements and the limited market available in the British West Indies.

In view of the provision in the agreement limiting exports of cheese, the U.K. had been asked whether they would be prepared either to purchase Canadian cheese in excess of the contract figure or to agree to the waiver of the limitation on exports. The U.K. had replied that it was impossible to say anything definite with regard to surplus cheese, and that they had no objection to the issuance of export permits for shipments to other markets of quantities of cheese not needed to ensure fulfilment of the U.K. contract.

(Telegram No. 1090, External Affairs to Canadian High Commissioner, London, June 16; † telegram No. 1300, Canadian High Commissioner, London, to External Affairs, June 23, 1949†).

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Minister of Agriculture and agreed that immediate measures be taken to permit the issue of export permits for quantities of cheese not needed to ensure fulfilment of the 1949 contract with the United Kingdom.

AGRICULTURE; PURCHASE OF CANADIAN APPLES BY U.K. GOVERNMENT

8. The Minister of Agriculture said that, following Mr. Howe's visit to London last spring, the latter had announced that the British had agreed to set aside $1,500,000 for the purchase of Canadian apples in 1949. It had been intimated at that time that the Canadian government might put up an equal sum to make it possible to export a larger quantity of surplus apples to the United Kingdom.

If this commitment were to be carried through, a total of $3 million would be spent on Canadian apples during the current season. In view of the dwindling American market for B.C. apples and also because of higher than expected crops in both British Columbia and Nova Scotia, it was anticipated that this sum would not obviate the necessity of extending prices support to apple producers. It was therefore recommended that, in the circumstances, it would be advisable to increase the size of the British order and to that end match the $1,500,000 proposed to be spent by the U.K. government by a Canadian contribution of $2,500,000.

In preliminary discussions with U.K. negotiators, it had been intimated that the U.K. government would want to keep prices as low as possible in order to get maximum delivery for the money expended. Although there was some indication that B.C. producers would be prepared to reduce their prices, N.S. producers were apparently reluctant to take this step.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Department of Agriculture memorandum, Aug. 15, 1949—Cabinet Document 1008).†

9. Mr. Gardiner added that food prices would no doubt have to be lowered in the more or less distant future and that apples should logically be amongst the first commodities to be reduced in price.

10. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that everything should be done to expedite the signing of this apple contract with the United Kingdom prior to the holding of the forthcoming tripartite discussions at Washington.

11. The Prime Minister suggested that Canadian apple producers should be informed that the government would be prepared to place an order of $3 million provided producers would sell their apples at prices 20% lower than the last sale prices to the United Kingdom.

12. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that negotiations be continued with U.K. representatives with a view to reaching an agreement at the earliest possible date on the basis that the U.K. expenditure of $1,500,000 would be matched by an equal Canadian contribution, the tentative prices to be 80% of those prevailing in the last (1946) Canada-U.K. contract for the purchase of Canadian apples.⁶⁰

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM; BACON; CHEESE

96. The Minister of Agriculture reported that, in negotiations for bacon and cheese contracts, the U.K. representatives had indicated that the United Kingdom did not require Canadian bacon to maintain the present ration. It had been made clear that the agreement to defer a portion of wheat purchases and transfer the dollar amount to bacon and other products had been to meet Canadian wishes. In agreements on bacon and cheese, the United Kingdom would not be willing to go higher than competitive prices from other sources. Their policy was definitely against any increase in price to the consumer or any increase in food subsidies.

⁶⁰ Le 24 août 1949 M. Bertrand, le ministre par intérim de l'Agriculture, rapporta au Cabinet que l'achat total, au prix de 3 millions de dollars serait réparti, comme suit: 72 p.c. à la Nouvelle-Écosse et 28 p.c. à la Colombie-Britannique.

On August 24, 1949 Mr. Bertrand, the Acting Minister of Agriculture, reported to Cabinet that the total purchase of $3 million would be allocated with 72% to Nova Scotia and 28% to British Columbia.

⁶¹ Voir/See: Document 632.

Department of Agriculture information on bacon was that, after January 1st, 1950, the price of Danish bacon would be 217 shillings per long cwt. giving a landed cost of 221 shillings and 4 pence. To provide the same landed cost the price of Canadian bacon f.a.s. Canadian seaboard would be $28.75 per cwt. In the negotiations, the U.K. representative had indicated that he was authorized to offer $27.50 per cwt. which would result in a landed cost in the United Kingdom of 212 shillings. $27.50 for bacon would mean a price of $20.45 per cwt. for Grade A hogs at Winnipeg or $15.35 live weight. The prevailing price, dressed weight, for hogs at Winnipeg was $27.25 to $27.50 per cwt. On the basis suggested by the United Kingdom, he thought it would be possible at present to get 3¢ to 4¢ per pound more by selling to the United States.

It had been proposed to the U.K. representative that, as the dollar cost was the principal consideration, the cost of shipping, which was in sterling, should not be included. With this in mind, it had been suggested that the price should be $30.00 and that the Canadian Government should pay a subsidy of $3.00 per cwt. so that the net reduction in price would only be $3.00 per cwt. (from $36.00 to $33.00).

If this proposal were accepted, a six to nine months' programme might possibly be entered into and exports might be diverted to the U.S. market about July 1st or October 1st, 1950. It was not clear, however, whether the United Kingdom would be agreeable to such a programme as they had indicated a desire for a twelve-month arrangement calling for equal weekly deliveries over the entire period. On the basis of contract exports of about sixty million pounds, the proposed subsidy at 3c per pound would come to $1.8 million. If agreement could not be reached on a price over 29¢, the cost to the Federal Government would be $2.4 million. The subsidy arrangement could be justified on the grounds that a drop of 6-7¢ per pound in bacon prices would be catastrophic for producers and that the Government was accordingly absorbing approximately half for an interim adjustment period.

So far as shipment to the United States was concerned, it would at present be more profitable than an arrangement with the United Kingdom calling for anything less than $30.00 per cwt. However, it would be undesirable to have hogs moving to the U.S. market at a time such as the present when U.S. production was at a maximum. It would be desirable to defer such movement until a later date.

In the case of cheese, the U.K. offer was based on the former price of 30¢ per pound, less adjustment to take into account the devaluation of sterling in terms of the Canadian dollar. The original U.K. offer had been 25¢ per pound. Canadian representatives had said that producers would expect 30¢ per pound but that 28¢ might be acceptable. It seemed probable that the best that might be done was to get the U.K. offer up to 25½¢. If a subsidy were extended for bacon as proposed, it would be difficult to refuse one for cheese. On the basis of a contract for eighty million pounds, the difference between 25¢ and 28¢ would amount to $2.4 million.

97. The Prime Minister was of the view that, in considering proposals for subsidy arrangements on bacon and cheese, regard had to be given to pressure to have subsidies provided for other products such as butter, fish, and apples. The proposed price of 33¢ for bacon suggested a support level less than 10% under the peak price. This was high and could be justified only as being for a transitional period. If agreed to, it should be limited definitely to a duration of six months.

98. The Minister of Finance stated that, in its agricultural policy dating from the wartime period, the Government was committed to some degree of price support. This did not, however, mean support at existing levels and consideration had to be given to what was a reasonable point at which to place a floor. If a bacon subsidy were given, it might be desirable to give further consideration to the freight subsidy being paid on feed grain.

99. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was of the view that general permits should be extended immediately and from this point forward for export of bacon to the U.S. As to the level of support, a price of 32¢ seemed preferable to 33¢ as providing more opportunity for export sales.

100. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that:

(a) the Government undertake to purchase bacon up to the amount required to complete the contract under negotiation with the United Kingdom at a price such that the amount of contribution by the Federal Government per cwt. purchased would be 50% of the difference between the price as agreed with the U.K. for the contract amount and the price of $36. per cwt. prevailing for the 1949 contract; such purchases to be limited to the period up to July 1, 1950, and to be so stated in any announcement of policy;

(b) the policy be initiated immediately of issuing general permits for export of bacon to the United States;

(c) further negotiations with United Kingdom representatives in respect of the contract for bacon be carried forward by the Minister of Agriculture; and,

(d) decision with regard to price and other arrangements for cheese be deferred for further consideration in January 1950.

DESPATCH 10

Ottawa, March 3, 1949

SECRET

Sir:

With reference to previous correspondence concerning the export of strategic and critical materials from Canada to Czechoslovakia, the following information has been assembled in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Commerce, and outlines the manner in which export controls are at present being implemented.

2. The Department of Trade and Commerce exercises what is known as "area control", i.e., it is necessary to obtain an export permit in order to ship anything to countries in Europe and the Mediterranean area (with the exception of the United Kingdom and British possessions). The United States "A" and "B" lists referred to have been communicated to the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments, and I understand that similar, although less comprehensive lists have been communicated to a number of other countries, together with an invitation to follow a parallel policy. List "A" comprises items for which the United States will not grant permission for export to Eastern European destinations. List "B" comprises items for which permission to export will be granted only for limited quantities. There has, in the past, appeared to be some divergence between the United Kingdom and the United States policy with respect to the items which should be included in each of these lists.

3. Canada is following closely the United States policy with respect to the control of strategic materials to Eastern European destinations. At the present time a new United Kingdom list is being checked against the United States list with a view to measuring the divergence of opinion between the controls being operated in the two countries. No approvals have been given in recent months for the export from Canada of any items on the United States "A" list, and only limited quantities of items on the "B" list have been approved. Indeed, we have gone one step further and denied permits for non-ferrous metals such as nickel, zinc, lead, copper and aluminium, which are included in neither "A" nor "B" list.

4. Canadian approval of items on the "B" list has been guided, to a certain extent, by the importance of the particular export to the Canadian manufacturer. For example, approval was recently given for the shipment to Czechoslovakia of synthetic rubber, as it is important that the Polymer Corporation maintain its production. On the same ground, approval was recently given for the shipment to the Soviet Union of general purpose lathes, such as are used in garages and small machine shops. This order will keep the Modern Tool Works, Limited of Toronto in active production for the balance of 1949. Approval was also given for the shipment to Czechoslovakia of four boring mills of a type smaller than the mills referred to in the United States "A" list. In this instance the firm was John Bertram and Sons, Limited which very definitely needs the business to keep in production.

5. Generally speaking, all applications with respect to materials of United States origin, as well as materials having a direct war application are refused. However, it is proposed to discuss with United States officials during the present month, the question which has arisen concerning an application for permission to ship Polystyrene molding compound to Czechoslovakia. The chances are better than ten to one that this molding compound would be used for the manufacture of imitation jewellery and other plastic novelties. There is however, a possibility that it might be used for the manufacture of non-magnetic land mines, and accordingly applications already made have been refused. Such refusal, however, presents a difficult problem because Canada is in surplus production, and we know that within the next few months the United Kingdom and Brazil will be producing molding compound. If we continue to refuse permission for the export of this commodity there is every reason to believe that one or other of these countries will fill the orders.

6. At the present time, as you will note, the situation is still somewhat fluid and each application is, in theory at least, dealt with on its own merits so far as Canada is concerned. It should however, be possible within the next few months to prepare a firm Canadian list of items which will not, under any circumstances, be approved for export to certain countries, as well as a firm list of items which will be approved only in limited quantities. However, it will probably be desirable to retain a certain amount of discretion at all times in order to ensure that the control of the export of strategic materials from Canada reflects as closely as possible Canadian policy derived from political, economic and strategic considerations.

7. We have avoided any statement with respect to the above mentioned control restrictions. The mere fact that such lists exist had not been admitted in the United States until a few days ago, when a statement was made before a Congressional Committee which inferentially revealed that these lists had been established. Likewise, in reply to a question in the British House of Commons, the answer given was to the effect that the export of strategic materials was carefully scrutinized.

8. I am sending copies of this despatch to London, Washington, Warsaw, Belgrade, Moscow and the Canadian Permanent Delegate in New York.

I have, etc.

Willis Armstrong, Deputy Chief of the Economic Resource and Security Policy staff of the State Department, who was in Ottawa recently with the United States group discussing security export controls to Eastern Europe, told [R.E.] Collins yesterday of possible developments in which we may be interested. Perkins, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, who has been chairing the meetings of the International Working Group in connection with North Atlantic Treaty Organization, has just returned from the meeting of United States Heads of Missions in London and will probably give a general report to the Working Group at its next meeting on Wednesday, November 2nd, in the course of which he intends to make a reference to the importance of export controls in regard to Eastern Europe. The purpose behind this is to attempt to tie such controls in with the general obligations of the North Atlantic countries under the Treaty, (though not with the Treaty Organization), and build up suitable pressure to bring the Dutch and Belgians into line, since these two countries are apparently thought to have been dragging their feet in this respect. It is connected with an informal meeting of the major European countries to discuss export controls on November 14th, to which the United States has been invited.

2. If present plans are carried out, Perkins is expected to ask the representatives on the Working Group of Canada, France, Italy, Norway and the United Kingdom to a private session on Tuesday at which he will explain the problem, and to suggest that some expression of support for his statement at Wednesday's meeting would be appreciated. He may also suggest that diplomatic representations, as appropriate, might be made by the interested Governments to the Netherlands and Belgium before November 14th, pointing out the importance that is attached to uniform procedure on applying export controls to Eastern Europe.

3. We shall probably not know until some time on Monday whether Perkins will actually follow the tactics suggested above. In order that we may be prepared, however, I should appreciate any comments you would like to make on the attitude we should adopt in the event that a general reference is made to export controls at Wednesday's meeting.

Your WA-3001, October 29. Export Controls to Eastern Europe. Following from MacKay.

1. We have discussed your telegram with Bull of Trade and Commerce who says that Trade and Commerce is quite in sympathy with the objective of bringing the Dutch and Belgians into line. Plumptre, who is now in Washington, was a member of the Committee which was discussing this problem here and is generally familiar with it. I suggest you consult Plumptre and if convenient he might attend the meeting. If Plumptre or you wish clarification I suggest you get in touch with Bull by telephone.

2. We might have some doubt about the desirability of using Atlantic Treaty Organization to co-ordinate export control policies in general but in the absence of precise proposals from the U.S. authorities we are not raising objections at this stage although it would be wise to bear this possible doubt in mind in any discussion of the proposal.

My WA-3001 of October 29th. Export controls to Eastern Europe.

2. Perkins called the special meeting yesterday mentioned in paragraph 2 of my WA-3001. He said that the purpose was to discuss means of working out a uniform approach to the control of I-A items, and that this group (representatives of Canada, France, Italy, United Kingdom, United States) had been brought together because the countries represented appeared to be ready to cooperate in this field. There had been some thought that this was really a question which should be dealt with under the North Atlantic Treaty, since it was fundamentally related to the common defence of the area rather than to purely economic considerations, and he wanted to have our reactions to this idea. He referred to his recent meeting in London with heads of United States Missions and said that all those from Eastern Europe agreed that even the limited embargo which had been imposed, had been very useful, especially in forcing the satellites to turn to the U.S.S.R. for equipment which the Soviet economy could not deliver.

3. Perkins also explained that the NAT countries could take the lead in this matter since they were the most important, only Germany, Austria, Sweden and Switzerland being outside the group. He did not think that dealing with export controls under the Treaty would, in fact, prejudice the case in terms of eventual participation of non-Treaty countries, since it appears most unlikely that either Sweden or Switzerland would agree formally or publicly to come into the scheme, although they might very well in practice find means of following the example of the other European countries.

4. The immediate problem according to Perkins, is to get all the Treaty countries to present a common front, and it was partly because of the lack of complete cooperation to date by the Belgians and Dutch, and because of the impending meeting of the major European countries in Paris on November 14th to carry on further discussions of control procedures that he was raising the question at this time and suggesting the advisability of relating it in some way to the Treaty. The Belgian and Dutch aspect might be dealt with by raising the question at today's meeting of the Working Group, and also perhaps by individual diplomatic representations from other Treaty countries.

5. Ignatieff said that while he was sure the Canadian Government was fully sympathetic with the objectives of export control concerned, he personally had some doubts regarding the advisability at this time of bringing export controls formally under the machinery of the Treaty although it might be possible for parties to the Treaty to consult informally on this question. With reference to Perkins' suggestion regarding diplomatic representations to Belgium and the Netherlands, he said he thought it would probably be inappropriate for Canada to be associated with such a step, since we were not involved in the Paris discussions.

6. Hoyer-Millar for the United Kingdom pointed out that if export controls were put under the Treaty organization this would be the first instance of NAT machinery being used for other than purely defensive purposes. Export controls of the type involved in the I-A list were obviously directed against specific countries, and as we had been very careful up to now to give no grounds for the contention that the Treaty had any aggressive character whatever, association of such controls with the Treaty might expose us to undesirable criticism. Perkins rather weakly proposed that the way around this might be to present the controls as applying to any countries outside the North Atlantic area, in the interests of common defence. Hoyer-Millar then went on to suggest that export control problems might well be discussed informally within the context of the Treaty by an ad hoc body such as the Working Group. This would provide a means for "gingering up the laggards" while leaving the actual machinery for operating the controls outside the Treaty organization.

7. With reference to the question of Belgium and Holland, there was a good deal of discussion of the best tactics to be adopted. The United Kingdom view seemed to be that the preliminary discussions among the countries in Paris during October had gone fairly well, and that care should be taken not to upset what was already being achieved through perhaps ill-advised pressure here before it is seen how far the Belgians and Dutch are actually willing to go at the November 14th meeting. The Italian representative said his Government was on the contrary pessimistic regarding the developments at Paris and indicated that he would be in favour of pressure at this time from any quarter. The French seemed to favour "friendly representations" from countries members of both NAT and OEEC. Achilles mentioned incidentally that a direct diplomatic approach might not be such a good idea at this time in view of the fact that it was hoped The Hague Conference on Indonesia would be successfully concluded today, and it would be undesirable to do anything which might disturb the new era of felicitous relations with the Netherlands which was about to begin.

8. The conclusion of the discussion appeared to be that Perkins would raise the question of export controls in very general terms at the Working Group today, without pointing the finger at anyone, and, calling attention to the relevance of this problem to the aims of the Treaty, would stress the importance of maintaining a common front among the Treaty countries, especially in view of the discussions which are about to resume in Paris. He will probably also suggest that Governments give consideration to the best means for achieving such a common front. As we understand it, the possibility of diplomatic representations is now left to the discretion of the individual countries.

9. We had not received your EX-2660 before the meeting, but, as you will note from the above report, Ignatieff did express personal doubts along the lines indicated in paragraph 2 of this teletype.

My WA-3031 of November 2nd. Export controls to Eastern Europe.

At the conclusion of this afternoon's meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Working Group Achilles, who was in the Chair, introduced the export control question. He pointed out that various Governments represented at the meeting had at different places and different times been discussing the problem, although there was as yet no particular framework within which it had been dealt. He said that it had occurred to the State Department that it was a question of common interest to the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty which would appear to require common action by all concerned, since no one country wished to maintain restrictive controls only to find that orders for certain items had been filled by a neighbour. He therefore would appreciate any ideas that members might have or that Governments might later wish to submit on:

(a) What action might be taken by Treaty countries to achieve a common front, and

(b) What could be done to bring other countries into cooperation.

2. Hoyer-Millar said London was aware of the common interest in this question and that he would certainly report Achilles' remarks to London. He pointed out that his Government would probably wish to wait until after it had seen how the Paris meeting on November 14th went before considering whether anything should be done under the North Atlantic Treaty, and stressed the undesirability of crossing wires with the Paris group. He agreed, however, that it would be a good thing if all members of the Working Group would remind their Governments that export controls do have a treaty aspect.

3. Ignatieff said that while he thought that the Canadian Government fully supported the idea of a common front and was interested in ensuring that there should be as few gaps as possible whereby orders for controlled items might be filled elsewhere, the treaty aspect of the problem raised new issues to which the Governments concerned would undoubtedly wish to give consideration.

4. After appropriate statements had been made by Italy and France, Achilles said there was no intention of discussing the question further in the Working Groups before November 14th unless someone had a specific suggestion to make, but that he hoped it could be discussed at a later date in the Working Group.

5. Your comments on the points raised by Achilles as reported in paragraph 1 of this message would be appreciated, as the question will undoubtedly be raised again after the meeting of November 14th in Paris.

Following from Heeney. Reference your WA-3036 and WA-3031 dated November 2, 1949, Export controls to Eastern Europe.

1. While I agree that the North Atlantic Treaty countries should adopt some system of mutual information or co-ordination of export controls, I am not fully convinced that it is necessary to establish a formal (repeat formal) committee under the Treaty for this purpose, particularly at this time. On the other hand, I do not fully agree with Hoyer-Millar's argument that the consideration of export control within the Treaty organization would be inappropriate on the grounds that the Treaty would then be used for other than purely defensive measures. There would be no need to issue a communique to this effect and the possibility of any criticism on these grounds would be eliminated. Secondly, I do not feel that the prohibition of strategic exports to countries which have already been labelled as potential aggressors would be an offensive act on our part. It is recognized by all of the signatories that the primary purpose of the Treaty is to deter Russian aggression. This would seem to indicate that, in addition to building up our own military strength, we should do everything in our power by peaceful means to prevent the Soviet Union and its satellites from increasing their military strength.

2. I feel that the problems related to the control of strategic exports could be suitably discussed in the first instance by the Working Group, the aim of which should be to

- (a) adopt uniform export control lists, and
- (b) circularize statistics of export of strategic materials.

It might become desirable at some later date to establish an ad hoc committee, perhaps under the Military Production and Supply Board, the terms of reference of which are, I think, broad enough to include problems of this type. It would of course be undesirable to delegate executive functions to any ad hoc or special committee created to deal with export controls. Such a committee would, I feel, be concerned solely with co-ordinating policies and with the exchange of information. If such a body were to have any executive functions, our present procedure for granting export permits would be unnecessarily complicated particularly if it became necessary to refer export permit applications to the committee for approval.

3. Assuming that a common policy was achieved among the North Atlantic countries with respect to control of strategic exports, I would have no suggestions to offer as to how other countries, for example Sweden, Switzerland, Western Germany, etc., might be brought into line although this might be done bilaterally by the United States perhaps through their E.C.A. Missions. In any case, the adoption of a uniform system by the North Atlantic Treaty nations would be a step in the right direction.

4. You will appreciate that the above views are purely official and that no ministerial consideration has as yet been given to the problem. You may, however, pass these views along to the State Department (or to the Working Group if this matter is raised again) as our preliminary reactions.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Reference your message EX-2867 of November 30th re export controls to Eastern Europe.

1. Ignatieff and Collins have now had an opportunity of having a further discussion on the question of export controls to Eastern Europe and their relationship to North Atlantic Treaty arrangements with Edwin Martin, Director of the Office of European Affairs, and with Willis Armstrong, Deputy Chief, Economic Resources and Security Staff of the State Department. This message records the information and views which were given by the State Department in these conversations, which took place separately.

2. You will recall that the discussion in the Working Group, reported in my messages No. 3031 and No. 3036 of November 2nd, took place before the meeting of certain European countries to discuss export controls in Paris on November 14th. The State Department's views now reflect the conclusions reached at the Paris meeting which took place from November 14th to November 23rd and at which time the United States, United Kingdom, France, Italy, The Netherlands and Belgium participated, with Denmark and Norway sending observers. This meeting originated from consideration of the question of export controls among the O.E.E.C. countries and was not related to the North Atlantic Treaty.

3. Apparently substantial progress was registered at this meeting. Agreement was reached, subject to reference to respective Governments, on the imposition of embargoes on 129 items in the 1A list which concerns prohibited items; 12 items were left over for further technical studies since all those concerned were not yet prepared to place them on the prohibited list, and 35 items proposed for prohibition by the United States were not accepted. There was little progress made in the imposition of quantitative controls and in the discussion of transshipment problems, but it was agreed that one item—merchant ships—should be subject to quantitative restriction. Moreover, it was agreed that further study be given to the problems of quantitative restriction and transshipment and also to trade agreements with the U.S.S.R.

4. As regards organization, there was general agreement in Paris on the necessity for the establishment of an Ad Hoc Continuing Advisory Body on an entirely informal and secret basis for the purposes of co-ordinating export control policies and for the exchange of information. Although no final plans were adopted, it was suggested that there might have to be a Chairman and Secretariat, and Permanent Technical Committees which would facilitate the exchange of information and the preparation of statistical data between sessions of the Advisory Group.

5. The question of the relationship of such a group to the North Atlantic Treaty was apparently not discussed at the meeting, although The Netherlands representative did raise this point. This question, however, was recognized to be closely related to the question of the composition of the group. It was the general opinion that an agreed export control policy should be implemented by as many countries as possible and should include not only the North Atlantic countries but also Sweden and Switzerland and, if possible, Western Germany. The United States, in particular, with the support of the United Kingdom, urged the participation of Western Germany in order to close an important potential gap in export controls in Europe. The French apparently were not so keen on the idea of having Germany participate and this is one of the matters on which the Governments represented at the meeting will give consideration before a further meeting, which is scheduled on January 9th.

6. The State Department seem well pleased with the results of the Paris meeting and are now disposed to favour proceeding with the organization of an Ad Hoc Group with the addition of such members as might wish to participate in the establishment of effective export controls. In this connection, Martin said to Ignatieff that they would be interested to have the informal reactions of the Canadian authorities to the idea of having Canada associated with such an ad hoc organization. As far as the State Department is concerned, he indicated that they would be entirely favourable to Canadian participation.

7. As regards the relationship of such a group to the N.A.T., Martin said that there would, of course, be no objection to having consultation on the matter of export controls between the North Atlantic Treaty partners and that the Working Group might be used for this purpose from time to time as may seem appropriate. He would be disposed to agree with the view expressed in your message EX-2867 that it is not necessary to establish a formal committee under the Treaty for this purpose, particularly at this time. The reasons for this are two-fold—

(a) The question of composition;

(b) The importance that the arrangements be kept as secret as possible and on an informal basis.

8. With regard to composition, the State Department want to have as many countries as possible participate fully in an export control policy, and are particularly interested in having Western Germany, as an important potential source of strategic exports to Eastern Europe, co-operate in export controls. If any formal machinery were established under the North Atlantic Treaty, Germany would presumably have to be excluded. This would also apply to Sweden and Switzerland. Martin said that the United Kingdom have also raised the further objection, based upon considerations related to the United Kingdom-Soviet Treaty of Alliance, that any formal arrangement under the N.A.T. would provide the Russians with a formal excuse for denying the defensive nature of the N.A.T., and would reinforce their argument that the N.A.T. is incompatible with the obligations assumed by the United Kingdom under the Anglo-Soviet Treaty. (This apparently accounts for the point made by Hoyer-Millar as reported in paragraph 6 of my message No. 3031 of November 2nd).

9. As regards (b), Martin thought that it would be more difficult to keep export control arrangements secret from the Russians if formal organizational arrangements were made under the Treaty than if the arrangements were kept on an ad hoc and informal basis, with the functions of such an informal group limited to the exchange of information and the drawing up of recommendations for the co-ordination of respective Government policies.

10. I should like to have your reactions at your early convenience to the State Department's views reported above. As you see, the organizational arrangements on the basis of an ad hoc and informal group are at present in their formative stage and appear to be not (repeat not) inconsistent with the tentative views expressed in your message EX-2867 of November 30th.

11. I might add that as the strategic and security considerations assume a greater importance than purely economic considerations in the determinations of export control policy, the State Department is taking over more responsibilities from the Commerce Department, and I think that we should, on our side, bear this in mind in the arrangements we make for sharing responsibilities between the Departments of Trade and Commerce and External Affairs. Ends.

Your WA-3341 of December 6—Export Controls to Eastern Europe.

1. In general we favour the use of an ad hoc group for the coordination of policy and review of statistics of actual shipments.

2. We would be glad to participate in the ad hoc group as suggested in your paragraph 6.

3. In paragraph 11 you invite us to consider transference of some responsibility from Department of Trade and Commerce to Department of External Affairs following a similar transference in the United States. This has been discussed with Trade and Commerce and also Chiefs of Military Intelligence. We have decided to make no change, with one possible minor exception. At present Trade and Commerce is only referring to us export permit applications covering arms, ammunition and aircraft. From now on they may also refer applications falling under the U.S. IA list. However, Canadian exports of these items are very small indeed.

4. A general change following the pattern of the United States Administration is not desirable here. The Government has decided that, in the event of an emergency, economic warfare would be carried on by Trade and Commerce in collaboration with Chiefs of Staff. Under these circumstances it is not desirable to build up any sort of economic warfare organization in this Department. The Joint Information Bureau in the Chiefs of Staff is likely to be expanded slightly to look after additional work in connection with export controls.

5. We understand that Trade and Commerce will be extending their system of "area control" to cover Far Eastern destinations in the near future; at present this system only covers Europe and the Mediterranean area. Details of their proposals are probably in the hands of Mr. [John] English by now.

1. Messrs. English, Ignatieff and [P.M.] Towe met Martin, Armstrong and Snow at the State Department, Thursday, December 22nd, and in accordance with the suggestion contained in your teletype under reference, indicated to them informally that we would be willing to participate in the Ad Hoc Group, the function of which would be to coordinate export control policies and exchange information.

2. Martin explained that while the State Department would favour our participation in the Ad Hoc Body, the other participants would have to be consulted before we could be invited to become a full member. Martin said that the State Department would ask Harve Alphand (of the Quay D'Orsay), who is acting as Chairman of the Ad Hoc Group, to seek the approval of the United Kingdom, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark and Norway to our participation as a member of the group. Martin also suggested that we should approach the British with whom the French worked very closely on this problem, with a request that they support Canadian participation in the Ad Hoc Body. Martin explained that the Ad Hoc Group had originally consisted solely of European members, and that the United States, themselves, had only become a full member at the last meeting, having attended as observer previously.

3. The next meeting of the Ad Hoc Group is to take place in Paris on January 9th and Martin estimated that it might last as long as seven days (the last meeting lasted ten days). The United States expected to send a team of six experts, while the French and British will probably send approximately four.

4. As reported in my WA-3341 of December 6th, the last meeting of the Ad Hoc Body was concerned mainly with 1(a) Items. Martin indicated that the January 9th meeting would probably be concerned primarily with quantitative restrictions, trans-shipments and trade agreements problems. Although the Group is an informal one, at the last meeting all the delegates, with the exception of the Netherlands, agreed to recommend to their Governments the acceptance of certain general principles with respect to the control of strategic exports (see my despatch No. 3111 of December 15th).†

5. If we are prepared to participate in the continuing Ad Hoc Body it appears that we should communicate our desires to United Kingdom authorities without delay. Early consideration should also be given to selecting our representative or representatives for the January 9th meeting.

1. Willis Armstrong Deputy Chief of the Economic Resources and Security Policy Staff of the State Department met with English and Towe at the State Department today to discuss the January 9th meeting in Paris of the ad hoc group and the question of our participation.

2. Armstrong stated that the United States Embassy in Paris had approached the French suggesting that they seek the concurrence of the other participants in the ad hoc group to Canadian membership. Instructions had also been sent to the United States missions in the United Kingdom, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark and Norway that they ask those Governments to agree to our participation. We expressed appreciation for the United States efforts on our behalf and said that if a timely invitation were forthcoming from the French (on behalf of the other participants) we would be prepared to participate in the January 9th meeting as a full member. Armstrong suggested that our Embassy in Paris might discuss the problem with the United States and British Embassies there with a view to hastening the invitation from the French. (Armstrong had just sent a telegram to the United States Embassy in Paris informing them that the Canadian Embassy would probably be in touch with them and with the British Embassy). Armstrong said he hoped that we would ask the British to approach the French authorities giving support to Canadian participation in the ad hoc body.

3. With respect to the agenda Armstrong pointed out that in the previous meeting, the United States had secured the agreement of the other participants to the imposition of embargoes on 126 items of the IA list. They hoped that at this meeting other items might be placed in the IA category or as an alternative, placed under quantitative restrictions. The January 9th meeting would also consider in some detail the procedures for 1B items and the problems of transshipment. Armstrong said that now the ad hoc body had been established the United States did not intend to add to or remove from their lists any further items until all the other participants agreed to similar restrictions.

4. With respect to 1B items, Armstrong admitted that quantitative restrictions were extremely difficult to impose. He said that the United States authorities were convinced that such restrictions should be imposed by Governments themselves and not repeat not through industrial agreements. He had in mind particularly the creation of cartel arrangements under the guise of national or international security.

5. Armstrong also outlined the preliminary United States views on the organization of the ad hoc group. He said that the plenary session should be composed of fairly senior representatives meeting perhaps quarterly. He said there might also be an Executive Committee meeting weekly and composed of representatives available in Paris. (We pointed out that the use of the word "executive" might be an unfortunate choice as the group he had in mind would be concerned mainly with the collation of statistics and exchange of information. We suggested that the term "Standing Committee" might be a better choice. Armstrong agreed.) In addition to the plenary organization and the Executive or Standing Committee, Armstrong thought there might be sub groups dealing with 1A and 1B lists and trans-shipment problems. The membership of these special or working groups would be kept to a minimum and it would probably be unnecessary to have all the participants represented on the sub groups.

6. Armstrong said that the choice of Harvey Alphan as Chairman of the ad hoc group had not been completely satisfactory and the United States hoped that the Chairman of the Executive or Standing Committee would be given to Dorlandi of the Italian Foreign Office.

7. When queried as to who would be representing Canada at the January 9th meeting (if Canada were invited) we said that no definite decision had been reached as yet but that Mr. Bull would probably attend. Armstrong agreed that Bull would be an excellent choice and suggested that Bull might wish to get in touch with him in Paris on January 6th or 7th for preliminary discussions.

8. We hope to receive further information on the United States views on the items on the agenda for the January 9th meeting early next week. In the meantime you might consider it appropriate to suggest to the United Kingdom authorities that they approach the French as suggested in my paragraph 2 above. You might also wish to have our Embassy in Paris discuss the problems with the United Embassy there.

Export of strategic materials to Iron Curtain countries.

1. We have been approached by State Department in Washington and by United Kingdom High Commissioner here in regard to a meeting in Paris on January 9th. We have said that we would be glad to have Canadian representatives participate fully in the meeting if this is agreeable to the others. In discussing the matter State Department officials have said that they will seek the approval of the United Kingdom, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark and Norway to our participation; on the other hand the United Kingdom has indicated that they are sponsoring us jointly with the United States.

2. Throughout the war and postwar period we have worked very closely with the United States in matters of export control, whether these controls have been designed to conserve scarce materials on the North American continent, or to prevent war material and supplies from reaching possibly hostile destinations. There are no border controls between Canada and the United States; the imposition of such controls might involve serious impediments to trade; hence our controls on overseas exports must be closely in line with American controls.

3. Officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce in Washington are in frequent contact with officials in the Department of Commerce and State Department who are concerned with United States export controls. In addition policy meetings have been held from time to time and members of this Department have attended.

4. Over the past year or two the United States has been putting increasing pressure on E.R.P. countries to bring their export controls into line with United States (and Canadian) policy. This has become more necessary as wartime scarcities have disappeared; as long as strategic materials, machinery, etc., were in very short supply there was little likelihood that Western European countries would ship them to Eastern Europe.

5. At the beginning of this month the United States asked us if we would participate in an ad hoc international group to coordinate export policy to Eastern Europe. We agreed to do so. The wider the group of Western countries participating and the more fully they keep each other informed of their actions, the more effective will their joint policy be. We warned the United States, however, that while we were anxious to coordinate policies as far as possible, we could not agree to any system which would involve us in getting approvals from them or from some international body in advance of individual shipments.

6. In agreeing to participate in the ad hoc group we expected that it would meet in Washington. However, it is meeting in Paris. This is satisfactory from our point of view as long as our specially close relations with the United States (for geographical reasons) are understood by the other participants. We have emphasized this point to the United Kingdom High Commissioner here.

7. When the United States first proposed that we should join in an international group it was in connection with arrangements under the North Atlantic Treaty. We agreed with them that this was not (repeat not) desirable. It would limit the membership of the group; it would make secrecy more difficult; and if news of the arrangement leaked out, it might be used by the Eastern countries as evidence that the North Atlantic Treaty was offensive rather than defensive. The fact that meetings are to take place in Paris raises the question whether the group might become associated with O.E.E.C. We would regard this as objectionable for the reasons already given; in addition any formal association with O.E.E.C. might have wider implications for Canada which would make our continuing association with the group impossible.

8. If we had understood that meetings were to take place in Paris we should, of course, have been in touch with you earlier. We are sending by air mail copies of relevant documents.

9. We understand that the meeting, beginning on January 9th, is likely to last about a week and that six experts are going from the United States and four each from France and the United Kingdom. The Department primarily concerned here is Trade and Commerce and we trust it will be possible for [James P.] Manion to attend. In addition, however, we would like to have a member of this Department closely associated with the meetings to report to us on policy matters. It is probable that Mr. Bull of the Department of Trade and Commerce, or one of his associates in Ottawa, will go to Paris for the meeting; we will give you further word on this. In any case Trade and Commerce will be briefing Manion.

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], February 14, 1949

I refer to the attached memorandum of February 3rd concerning exports to China, and to your enquiry as to the present position of the matter.

2. At the meeting of Cabinet on February 3rd, Cabinet noted the report submitted on the subject and agreed that "the question of exports of military equipment to China be deferred for future consideration; in the meantime, manufacture of such supplies under order was not to be interfered with." This decision has no immediate effect on three of the four military items under order because they will not be available for shipment for some weeks.

3. However the fourth item, which is aircraft engines and parts to the value of $575,000 for Harvard trainers, is ready to go forward and application has been made for an export permit. In our memorandum of February 3rd it was indicated that the export of these parts might be permitted as they do not represent new commitments but are components for equipment which has already been shipped from Canada. For this reason we are proposing to put forward a separate memorandum dealing solely with these aircraft parts, which might be considered pending a decision on the broader principles.

4. It was my understanding that Cabinet had deferred its decision because shipments on the major items will not be made at this time, and by the date on which they are available the whole continuing position of the Nationalist Government in China might be clearer. It was also my understanding that Mr. Howe would at some future date reopen the question for Cabinet discussion. In the meantime, I think there is little I can add to my memorandum of February 3rd which points out the desirability of a decision being made one way or the other immediately.

Memorandum for Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], February 3, 1949

The Minister of Trade and Commerce may ask Cabinet to reconsider its conclusion regarding exports to China. Cabinet had decided on the following course of action—

(a) An examination of the list of civilian items by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce to determine any item which for political or strategic reasons should not go forward.

(b) Immediate cessation of deliveries of all items of a strategic or military nature.

(c) The Minister of Trade and Commerce be empowered to negotiate with the Chinese government Supply Agency and the Canadian producers concerned, with a view to cancellation of the orders and to recommend to Cabinet equitable terms of settlement.

(d) Continuation of the export of items not of a strategic or military nature.⁶²

2. Officials of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and External Affairs met pursuant to the Cabinet decision with representatives of Canadian Arsenals Limited and Canadian Commercial Corporation. Agreement was reached as follows on each of the four points listed in paragraph one above—

(a) Of the civilian items now on order for the Government of China or for which export permits to China have been requested, none should be refused export for political or strategic reasons at present. Among such items we find $1.5 million of steel bridges and bridging equipment, and $100,000 of telecommunications equipment the export of which we may wish to prevent for strategic reasons at some future date.

(b) The only significant military items which have not been delivered are—

(i) 20 mm. links for ammunition to be used in Mosquito aircraft. Half of the order has been shipped and delivery of the remainder ($110,000), will be completed by May 1949.

(ii) Eighty-five million rounds of 7.92 ammunition ($5.9 million), none of which has been delivered. This ammunition is now in production and Canadian Arsenals Limited estimate that they have expended something less than $1 million for tooling up, purchase of materials, etc., as of the beginning of this week.⁶³

⁶² Le Cabinet approuva ces recommandations du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures le 25 janvier 1949.

Cabinet approved these recommendations by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on January 25, 1949.

⁶³ Le 7 mars, le Cabinet approuva l'envoi de 1,5 millions de cartouches au Gouvernement de la Chine à Formose. Le 3 mai le chargement fut suspendu «pending reconsideration of the matter in the light of any proposals brought forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.» Le 20 juillet, le Cabinet autorisa l'exportation de 3 millions de cartouches additionnelles, «it being understood that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would raise with Cabinet the question of the policy to be followed with respect to any further shipments of military equipment to China.» Le 31 août, le Cabinet décida de «taper off production» immédiatement des munitions, et de cesser la production au 15 novembre. Après des discussions additionnelles en novembre et en décembre, le Cabinet se mit d'accord les 21–22 décembre pour que les munitions fabriquées avant le 15 novembre et livrées à l'agence d'approvisionnement du Gouvernement de la Chine, dans son entrepôt au Canada, ne devraient pas être exportées. Un permis d'exportation fut donc refusé. Cette décision reflétait le contrôle établi par les Communistes sur le continent, ainsi que le risque perçu que les munitions envoyées à Formose puissent tomber aux mains des Communistes.

On March 7, Cabinet approved shipment of 1.5 million rounds to the Government of China in Formosa. On May 3, shipments were suspended "pending reconsideration of the matter in the light of any proposals brought forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce." On July 20, Cabinet authorized export of a further 3 million rounds, "it being understood that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would raise with Cabinet the question of the policy to be followed with respect to any further shipments of military equipment to China." On August 31, Cabinet decided to "taper off production" of the ammunition immediately and to cease production by November 15. After further discussion in November and December, Cabinet agreed on December 21–22 that the ammunition produced before November 15 and delivered to the Chinese Government Supply Agency at its warehouse in Canada should not be exported. An export permit was thus denied. This decision reflected the control established by the Communists on the mainland and the perceived risk that ammunition shipped to Formosa might fall into Communist hands.

(iii) Aircraft engines and parts to the value of $575,000 for Harvard Trainers previously exported from Canada.

(iv) A ship valued at $2.2 million to be completed in May 1949 for the Ming Sung Industrial Corporation.

Items (iii) and (iv) are being produced by private firms.

(c) If the production is continued and the export permitted of items under (a) and (b), no orders will have to be cancelled.

(d) Export of items not of a strategic or military nature is to continue.

3. Representatives at the meeting took cognizance of the following factors—

(a) The United States is continuing to permit exports of military equipment under its $125 million loan to China. It was noted that the United States is able to control the destination of these exports as they are usually shipped in American vessels and delivered through United States shore establishments. Canadian Commercial Corporation could attempt to ensure that Canadian shipments are made only to specified destinations but policing action would not be easy.

(b) Although deliveries of 7.92 mm. ammunition are being made to the Chinese Supply Agency in Canada, the latter does not normally make a shipment until ten million rounds have been accumulated. It is estimated that such quantities will not be available within three months and consideration could be given to the refusal of an export permit depending on the political situation in China at the time the application is made.

(c) the shipment of the 20 mm. ammunition links is made in Canadian vessels, which makes supervision easier and would enable directing them to Formosa if it was so desired.

(d) A sudden cessation of work by Canadian Arsenals Limited might affect at least temporarily the employment of some 200 people in Quebec and 60 in Toronto.

4. The arguments against continuing shipments might be summarized as follows—Nationalist resistance to Communist domination of China is unlikely to continue for many more months except possibly on the island of Formosa. The decision of the North Atlantic group of Powers to leave their Ambassadors in Nanking for the present rather than transfer them to Canton is based primarily on the recognition that the Nationalist game is all but up. If nationalist resistance is disintegrating it might be prudent, in order to protect long-term Canadian interests in China, missionary, commercial and financial (1946 loan) to taper off Canadian commitments to and support for the Nationalist Government as unobtrusively as possible. Moreover there is a small but vocal body of opinion in Canada opposing shipment of arms. In addition, the order was placed on behalf of and payment made by the Government of Kwangtung, and it might be prudent to obtain some assurance from the Chinese Supply Agency that there is no objection to deliveries being diverted to the Government of Formosa.

5. Arguments for continuing shipments are—

A decision to permit the production and export of arms for China now on order in Canada would be in keeping with our past policy of supporting resistance to Communist domination of China. Such a policy conforms to that being pursued by the United States Government. There is some evidence that resistance to the Communists will at least be continued on the island of Formosa with United States assistance. Our reputation with the Chinese Communists already is sufficiently shady that it probably would not be greatly improved by cessation of shipments now. Financially and administratively it would be in the immediate Canadian interest not to interfere with these programmes. Neither the ship for Ming Sung Industrial Corporation nor substantial deliveries of 7.92 mm. ammunition will be available until the end of April and, therefore, we might await political developments during that period rather than cancel the orders at this time. The parts for the Harvard aircraft and the remainder of the 20 mm. links do not represent new commitments as they are components for equipment already shipped.

6. A review of the factors outlined above indicates that there would be no serious objections to the continuance of these contracts. However, all available evidence leads to the conclusion that the collapse of Nationalist resistance on the mainland is only a matter of time, and the eventual situation in Formosa is uncertain because of the Formosans' antipathy toward the mainland Chinese. Therefore, the wisest course might be to decide now whether we should discontinue immediately all exports of munitions to China or taper off such shipments as rapidly as possible. If the latter course is adopted, a confidential instruction might be issued to Canadian Arsenals Limited not to make further substantial expenditures for materials, without Cabinet authority.

Dear General McNaughton:

You will no doubt recall that during your recent visit to Ottawa you made enquiries as to whether you could assume that no Canadian military equipment was now finding its way to Netherlands forces in Indonesia. The discussions which I have had on this subject with Economic Division and an investigation of the material on the relevant files indicate that we should not be justified in making an unqualified statement to the effect that no Canadian equipment is at present being used by Dutch forces in the Netherlands East Indies.

Apart from the substantial amount of surplus war material which Canada sold outright to the Netherlands at the end of the war in Europe, the Government has since, from time to time, agreed to export smaller quantities of military equipment to the Dutch for their use in the Netherlands. In these cases, the Canadian Government has been careful to obtain assurance from the Netherlands Government Purchasing Commission that the material in question was not intended for use outside Netherlands home territory. While there is no reason to assume that these undertakings are not being fulfilled by the Netherlands authorities, it is impossible for us to be absolutely certain that small items such as aircraft parts and ammunition are not being used to service or supplement military equipment which is shipped to Netherlands forces in Indonesia.

Every effort is of course being made to ensure that Canadian supplies are not being used by either of the parties to the Indonesian dispute, but, in view of the possibility that vehicles and arms of Canadian make may conceivably still be in use by Dutch forces as a result of the 1945 sale of surplus equipment, you may think it wise to avoid stating definitively that no Canadian material is being employed in the Indonesian fighting.

I need hardly add that the recommendations contained in your telegram No. 10 of January 6, 1949† are being complied with, and that no sales of military equipment to the Netherlands Government are being completed without the fullest possible assurance that the items purchased are strictly for use in the Netherlands.

Yours sincerely,

J.W. HOLMES

[Ottawa], March 25, 1949

EXPORT OF CIVILIAN AIRCRAFT PARTS

1. Each application for permission to export from Canada items of military equipment is submitted to Cabinet before approval for export is given. The recent practice has been to obtain Cabinet approval also for exports of civilian aircraft parts. No specific direction has, however, been given by Cabinet in this respect.

2. Canadian manufacturers of civilian aircraft parts are seeking to expand their export markets and it is desirable that every co-operation be given them. Many of the aircraft parts for which export applications are received are for use with civilian aircraft which have previously been sold by Canadian exporters. The granting of export permits will be expedited by delegating authority to approve such applications when it seems appropriate to do so. Most of the applications are straightforward and it seems unnecessary to clog the Cabinet agenda with large numbers of such items.

3. Accordingly, I recommend that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to approve or refuse, in consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, applications for permission to export civilian aircraft parts. Applications involving questions of principle or of major political import as well as applications for permission to export civilian aircraft would continue to be referred to Cabinet for decision.⁶⁴

EXPORT OF SMALL ARMS AND SMALL ARMS AMMUNITION

A number of applications have been received for permission to export to private individuals or business firms in foreign countries, small quantities of small arms and ammunition, obviously intended for non-military purposes. It therefore seems desirable that authority be delegated by Cabinet for the granting or refusing of permission to export such orders, in order to expedite the processing of applications and to avoid clogging Cabinet agenda.

2. Cabinet conclusion of April 7, 1948 directs that sales of arms from current production may be permitted provided that sales are placed on behalf of governments. It seems obvious that this direction was not intended to include orders for limited quantities of small arms and small arms ammunition destined to private individuals and sporting goods firms.⁶⁵

3. Order-in-Council P.C. 570 of February 8, 1949 established a list of commodities for which an export permit is required. Group 9 of these commodities is entitled "Arms, Ammunition, Implements or Munitions of War: Military, Naval or Air Stores" and specifies the following, among other items:

I. (a) Rifles and carbines using ammunition in excess of calibre .22, and barrels for those weapons.

(b) Machine guns, automatic or auto-loading rifles, and machine pistols using ammunition in excess of calibre .22, and barrels for those weapons.

(c) Guns, howitzers, and mortars of all calibres, their mountings and barrels.

(d) Ammunition in excess of calibre .22 for the arms enumerated under (a) and (b) above, and cartridge cases or bullets for such ammunition; filled and unfilled projectiles for the arms enumerated under (c) above.

⁶⁴ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 8 avril 1949.

Approved by Cabinet on April 8, 1949.

⁶⁵ Dans une note de couverture à Pearson, Heeney remarque que ceci avait affecté un exposant lors d'une exposition internationale de commerce, à l'effet qu'il aurait besoin de l'approbation du Cabinet afin d'acheter deux ou trois fusils à plomb lors d'une visite au Canada.

In a covering memorandum to Pearson, Heeney noted that this had recently affected an exhibitor at an International Trade Fair, who would require Cabinet approval to purchase two or three shotguns while visiting Canada.

[II]. (a) Revolvers and automatic pistols using ammunition in excess of calibre .22.

(b) Ammunition in excess of calibre .22 for the arms enumerated under (a) above, and cartridge cases or bullets for such ammunition.

4. In order to maintain supervision over the export of small arms it is not proposed that any change be made in the Order-in-Council so that applications for export permits would continue to be necessary.

5. Accordingly, I recommend that applications for permission to export small lots of small arms and ammunition need not, in future, be referred to Cabinet for decision if, in the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the small arms and ammunition are destined to a private person or business firm in a friendly country and are not to be used for improper purposes.⁶⁶

EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT AND CIVILIAN AIRCRAFT; TEMPORARY ARRANGEMENTS FOR APPROVALS

Canadian firms find that competition is becoming keener in the export market for military equipment and civilian aircraft. Last summer, several firms reported that they were unable to obtain orders because it was not possible for the Government Departments concerned to assure them of a reply to export permit applications within a period of two or three weeks. As Cabinet meetings are likely to be less frequent during the next several months, Cabinet may wish to make temporary arrangements to delegate to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, authority to approve or refuse applications for permission to export military equipment and civilian aircraft.

2. The following should, however, be the guiding principles in examining such applications:

(a) applications for exports to the U.S.S.R. and Soviet satellite states should be refused;

(b) applications for exports to countries which have indicated their intention of signing the Atlantic Pact should ordinarily be approved;

⁶⁶ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 3 mai 1949.
Approved by Cabinet on May 3, 1949.

(c) applications for exports to Commonwealth countries should ordinarily be approved;

(d) applications for exports to areas with respect to which the United Nations Council or other U.N. organization is seized of responsibility should ordinarily be refused, e.g. Palestine and Indonesia.

(e) Applications for exports to Central and South America should ordinarily be approved, subject to consideration of the internal political situation in any such country or the possibility of its intention to wage aggressive war.

3. I recommend temporary delegation of authority in this matter accordingly.⁶⁷

EXPORT OF AIRCRAFT SPARE PARTS TO THE NETHERLANDS EAST INDIES

Several applications have been received recently for permission to export aircraft spare parts to a total value of $75,750 to the Netherlands East Indies for the use of the Royal Netherlands Navy. The parts are said to be for use with Dakota and Canso aircraft. I am attaching copies of telegrams exchanged between the Department and the Canadian Permanent Delegate in New York† as a result of which, if you agree, I shall inform the Department of Trade and Commerce that this Department cannot agree to the proposed export.⁶⁸

The reasons for refusing, which are set forth in the attached exchange of telegrams, may be summarized as follows:

(a) In the existing critical stage in the negotiations concerning Indonesia, which were started largely at our initiative, we should lay ourselves open to criticism if approval were given for the export of any equipment of possible military value;

(b) Although we have a letter from the Netherlands Purchasing Commission in New York setting forth the peaceful administrative functions being performed by aircraft of the Royal Netherlands Airforce, we cannot be certain that such aircraft will not at any time be employed for military purposes against the Republican forces;

[Ottawa], October 18, 1949

Requests have recently been received for permission to export arms and military equipment from Canada to Costa Rica, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic. This raises the general question of what should be our attitude towards the shipment of arms and military equipment to the Central American and Caribbean area at the present time.

2. The general political situation in that area since the war has been marked by varying degrees of uneasiness. The principal causes have been the ruthless dictatorships of President Trujillo of the Dominican Republic and General Somoza of Nicaragua, and the activities of the Caribbean Legion, which was formed in 1947 for the purpose of overthrowing them.

3. The Legion is a motley collection of adventurers, mercenaries and political exiles of various nationalities which, at its greatest strength, has never numbered more than 1,500. It has taken part in two attempted small scale raids on the Dominican Republic, one in 1947, which was called off at the last moment, and the other—in July last—involving some 60 men and two aircrafts. Its most important activity to date was its intervention in the civil war in Costa Rica, which brought the present government of that country into power in April, 1948. The continued presence of the Legion in Costa Rican territory was one of the principal motives for the border incident between Costa Rica and Nicaragua of last January.

4. Although recently the Legion announced its dissolution, elements are known to remain in Costa Rica and Guatemala, with the greater number in the latter country. The Legion, however, has virtually ceased to exist as a military force of any consequence, but has a certain propaganda value which the various governments concerned have made use of for their particular purpose. As the Legion has enjoyed the official support of the Governments of Costa Rica and Guatemala, the possibility of any arms shipped to these countries being intended for the Legion should not be overlooked.

5. The Dominican Republic has requested the convocation of a special inter-American conference to deal with what it referred to as “the current threat to peace in the Caribbean”, but the United States, which does not appear to view the situation with any great concern, has instead called together the Inter-American Peace Committee, which is now dealing with the question.

6. Relations between Nicaragua and Costa Rica over the past year or so have been none too cordial. Last December, there was an "invasion" of Costa Rica by a force of about 1,000 men (some of whom were Costa Rican exiles) which came from Nicaragua. This incident was quickly settled by means of the machinery provided by the Rio Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance. On August 6 last, however, Costa Rica officially accused Nicaragua of reinforcing her frontier guards and of carrying on a "programme of activities against the Costa Rican Government".

7. In July, 1949, an application to export rifles and ammunition to Costa Rica was refused because the political situation in the country was somewhat confused, and the Government was in the hands of the Military Junta which had just taken power. In February, 1949, approval was given for the export of 900 .38 revolvers and 100,000 rounds of ammunition, as there did not seem to be any unusual amount of unrest in the Central American States, and the Government of Costa Rica appeared to be firmly established. In January, 1949, we turned down an application for the sale of one million rounds of small arms ammunition to Nicaragua.

8. As part of its programme to re-establish its former trade position in Latin America, the United Kingdom has sold all types of arms to various Latin American republics, including the Dominican Republic, which has purchased destroyers, jet fighters, small arms and ammunition. Some three years ago, the United States prohibited for a while all exports of arms to the Dominican Republic, and two years ago also prohibited such exports to Nicaragua. At the present time, however, I understand that instead of maintaining a complete embargo on the sale of arms to these countries, the United States judges each application on its own merits.

9. I should appreciate direction from Cabinet as to what Canadian policy should be.⁶⁹

YUGOSLAV APPLICATION FOR CIVILIAN AIRCRAFT PARTS

The Yugoslav Government has recently made an application to import from Canada, for the use of Yugoslav Airlines, civilian aircraft parts valued at $55,000. The application was originally turned down according to our established policy not to supply strategic materials to countries behind the Iron Curtain. This policy has lately been reviewed against the background of the Soviet and satellite offensive against Yugoslavia. This offensive has been carried out in three ways: economically, by the virtual stoppage of trade between Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia; militarily, by heavy concentrations of troops along Yugoslav borders and by the military and guerrilla training given to Yugoslav dissidents; psychologically, by concentrated propaganda attacks emanating from all Yugoslavia's erstwhile Communist friends and against which the Yugoslav people feel wholly isolated.

2. Already the Western democracies have endeavoured to help Yugoslavia to withstand Soviet pressure against its economy, and at the same time relieve the feeling of isolation of the Yugoslav people. The British have negotiated an important trade pact with Yugoslavia, which will materially assist the economy of that country. The Americans have recently permitted an American firm to contract with the Yugoslav Government for the construction of a complete $3 million steel mill, and the Export-Import Bank has been allowed to grant Yugoslavia a 20 million dollar loan. Furthermore, the United States Government is now in the process of revising its regulations on the export of certain strategic materials, so as to make possible further economic help to Yugoslavia.

3. In Canada, on April 8, 1949, Cabinet delegated to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, authority to approve the export of civilian aircraft parts to any destination "which raised no new questions of principle and involved no important political considerations". In the case of the Yugoslav application, however, important political considerations are involved, and a new question of principle is thereby raised. A decision by Cabinet is therefore required.

4. Various long and short term considerations are involved and must be taken into account.

A. Arguments for approving the Yugoslav application

One of the crucial factors in keeping the Tito regime going is the economic situation within Yugoslavia. With the economic blockade imposed by the Cominform countries, his regime is becoming more and more dependent on supplies from the West, and therefore any goods sent from Canada will be of assistance in his survival. It is assumed that the survival of a Yugoslavia independent of the U.S.S.R. is desirable for the following reasons:

(i) Strategic

(a) To maintain the present situation which deprives the Soviet Union of a fairly strong ally and of access to the Adriatic Sea and to Italy. (In the event of a general war the Yugoslavs might try to remain neutral but at the most they would be a confused, divided and probably largely unwilling associate of the U.S.S.R.).

(b) The economies of the satellites, especially Czechoslovakia and Poland, are adversely affected by the cessation of trade with Yugoslavia.

(ii) Psychological Warfare

(a) To keep before the eyes of the world the nature of the Soviet imperialist system which requires absolute subservience on the part of other Communist states and Communist parties; and to encourage Titoist tendencies in the satellites and in Western Communist parties.

(b) To "unmask" the Soviet Union's claim to be the leading force in the world for peace.

B. Arguments against approving the Yugoslav application

(1) Yugoslavia still is a ruthless Communist state. (But the only alternative to the Tito regime which can at present be envisaged is another Communist regime subservient to Moscow. Furthermore, there is some reason to hope that isolation from Moscow and prolonged closer relations with the West may lead to a gradual liberalization of the Tito regime).

(2) The Soviet Union might succeed in overthrowing the Tito regime in any case and thus adding to the Soviet system's war potential the commodities which had been released to Yugoslavia as a result of relaxing export controls. In my view Tito's chances of survival are good enough to make this risk worth taking. Furthermore, an amount of aid which would mean a great deal to Tito's chances of survival would still be only a small fraction of the total Soviet war potential.

(3) There is some long term danger that the success of "national Communism" (i.e., Communism free of Moscow's control) might present a new threat to the West. But this development cannot be foreseen in detail and the risk seems worth taking.

(4) Some of the goods sent to Yugoslavia might be transhipped to another source. In view of the economic and political Blockade imposed by the Soviet Union and all the satellites, and the denunciations by these countries of their trade pacts and treaties of friendship with Yugoslavia, I think this highly unlikely.

It will be noted that each argument against approval can be convincingly answered.

5. I therefore recommend that Cabinet agree to this proposed sale and export of civilian aircraft parts to Yugoslavia.⁷⁰

Ottawa, August 5, 1949

I attach a copy of an interesting letter of August 2 from Wrong to Heeney† reporting on a conversation with George Kennan in which Kennan came out in favour of a super-federation combining the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada.

2. Kennan reported that the planning staff of the State Department, with the assistance of some outside advisers from universities, had been carefully examining the long-term policy which should be followed in connection with European and North Atlantic federal union. Kennan has recently been discussing with Jebb and others in London the tentative conclusions of the planning staff. Apparently he believes in a federal union in Europe which would exclude the United Kingdom and which would be devised so that it could be extended eastwards to countries now behind the Iron Curtain whenever the opportunity arose. He expressed doubt though not certainty that the economic problems of the United Kingdom could be settled within the existing framework of sovereign states. Even if it were technically possible, he doubts whether it would be politically possible. This has led him to his belief in the desirability of the federation of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. He considers that the North Atlantic Treaty has been a step towards this objective and that another important step which might prove to be not out of the question before very long would be the establishment of complete freedom of movement between the three countries.

3. At the end of his letter, Wrong refers to his despatch on the resolutions now before Congress on the subject of federal union or world government. I attach a copy of this despatch (No. 1793 of August 1)† together with a copy of the resolution† proposing that the President should invite delegates from the countries which originally sponsored the North Atlantic Treaty to meet with delegates of the United States in a federal convention. There is also attached the speech† given by Senator [Estes] Kefauver when he introduced this resolution.

4. The resolution is sponsored by the "Atlantic Union Committee", the President of which is former Justice Roberts. You may recall that in a note which I gave you on April 6† of a conversation which I had that day with Hickerson, Hickerson said that he personally favoured the proposals of Justice Roberts for the immediate formation of a North Atlantic federation. He also went on to say that he was toying with the idea of what he called an "economic union" of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. He defined an economic union to mean the free movement of goods and money but not of people.

5. I had previously heard through Arnold Smith that Kennan's planning group had been considering very carefully the possibility of an economic union of these three countries but had not heard that they had gone so far in their thinking as to consider the desirability of a super-federation. Now that we have learned that the planning staff in the State Department has been giving careful examination to such large proposals, I suggest that it would be wise if we were to start turning these ideas over in our own minds. I would suggest for your approval that I might send a copy of Wrong's letter of August 2 for comments to Robertson, Wilgress and Plumptre, MacDermot, Holmes and [G.G.] Crean. I might also get in touch with Arnold Smith since I think he will be able to throw further light on the studies which have been made by Kennan's planning staff.

Dear Mr. Reid:

I was extremely interested in reading over the copy of the letter, dated August 2, from Mr. Wrong to Mr. Heeney, attached to your letter of August 16.⁷¹ It was refreshing to read Mr. Wrong's account of his luncheon conversation with Mr. George Kennan of the State Department, in which Mr. Kennan came out in favour of a super federation combining the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada.

The very fact that such an imaginative idea could be advanced by a responsible United States official is an indication of the times in which we are living, and of the revolutionary changes which are now taking place before our eyes.

I do not share entirely the doubt expressed by Mr. Kennan that the economic problems of the United Kingdom could be settled within the existing framework of sovereign states. The economic problems of the United Kingdom are not distinct from those of the other countries of Western Europe. What we are experiencing is a rapid decline in the conditions which made it possible for the countries of Western Europe to maintain highly developed economies with a consequent high standard of living. The rapid industrialization of the outside world is making it impossible for Western Europe to continue on the same economic basis as in the past.

Among others who were also asked for their assessment of Kennan's views were A.F.W. Plumptre, T.W.L. MacDermot, Arnold Smith and John Holmes.

The problems of the United Kingdom are greater in degree, but are not very different in kind from those of other countries of Western Europe. The United Kingdom belongs to Western Europe and is very much needed by the other countries of Western Europe. All of these are now under the ever-present threat of Soviet aggression, which is bringing about that force so needed for the cooperation of all these countries in solving their economic problems. There are complications presented in the case of the United Kingdom by the close economic ties with the three southern Dominions. This presents the United Kingdom with a choice, just as Canada is said to be presented with a choice, but the pressure of events will no doubt make the choice for the United Kingdom just as it is making the choice for Canada, without any conscious effort or direction on our part.

Given this set of circumstances, I believe that what we and the United States should do is encourage the United Kingdom to integrate their economy more closely with that of the other countries of Western Europe, and gradually bring about that degree of political and economic cooperation which will lead to the development of institutions through which this cooperation can be effective. As it becomes effective and well established, it will be the means of exerting influence on those eastern countries which are on the periphery of the Soviet sphere of influence. Such a magnet I am sure will, in the course of time, prove irresistible. As there is a waning of Soviet power through internal tensions, one by one the Eastern European countries will seek escape by adhering to the gradually expanding cooperative union of European states.

All of this will mean a tendency for Europe to live more within itself, but the possibility of maintaining a fairly satisfactory standard of living will be presented by European cooperation with the United States in the development of the more backward areas of the world. This can be accomplished by increased specialization of the European countries leading them to find outlets for their skill, which cannot be matched even by the industrial efficiency of North America.

You will see from this that I am a proponent of the European future of the United Kingdom, a future in which I believe the people of these islands can play a part which will not be any less brilliant than the part which they played on the world stage during the previous 150 years. Before this comes about, however, there will have to be a lot of soul searching in this country, and a realization that the clock cannot be put back.

With kindest regards,

Yours sincerely,

DANA WILGESS

Note de la direction de l'économie
Memorandum by Economic Division

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 21, 1949

MEMORANDUM ON EUROPEAN ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION⁷²

It seems clear that Canada's attitude toward the various plans for European economic co-operation or integration requires urgent re-examination in the light of:

(a) Mr. Hoffman's speech of the 31st October to the Council of OEEC when he called on the members to have ready early in 1950 a plan for economic integration,

(b) the supplementary personal message from Mr. Acheson to Mr. Bevin in which Mr. Acheson expressed the hope that the United Kingdom would play a more positive role in fostering European economic co-operation.

(c) planning which has been proceeding in the State Department under the direction of Mr. George Kennan of a political as much as an economic cast looking towards the creation of "supranational institutions in Western Europe."

2. There are two reasons for this new attempt by the United States to push towards European economic co-operation. In March of next year, the programme for the third year of the Marshall Plan has to be submitted to Congress, and the United States authorities are afraid that, if they are unable to present some dramatic development, they may not be able to secure a further ECA appropriation. In addition, they are anxious that Western Germany should be integrated as soon as possible into the Western European community. German nationalism is again rising, and the danger of a Russo-German combination is real. The best way to prevent this danger would be to magnetize Western Europe, so that it would have a stronger attractive pull than Moscow. It might also be added that it would be a great advantage in the ideological conflict which divides Western European countries if the non-Communist camp could present European unity as a positive ideal and a practical possibility. Europe needs hope almost as much as it needs United States dollars; and plans for European unity would open a vista to an independent and prosperous future.

3. Mr. Hoffman's programme is the latest of a long succession of schemes for European economic co-operation, few of which have come to anything. The main features of this most recent proposal are as follows:

(a) Co-ordination of national fiscal and monetary policies.

(b) Provision for necessary exchange rate adjustments.

(c) Means to cushion the effect of inevitable temporary disturbances of the economy in particular countries.

(d) Co-ordination of commercial policies and practices.

⁷² Passée par Heeny à W.C. Clark, Graham Towers et M.W. Mackenzie le 25 novembre 1949.

Circulated by Heeny to W.C. Clark, Graham Towers and M.W. Mackenzie on November 25, 1949.

Since Mr. Hoffman referred to other arrangements involving smaller groups of countries, and expressed his conviction that such plans would turn out to be steps toward the objective of European economic integration, it is possible to subsume under this most recent initiative other more limited plans for co-operation between smaller groups of countries. It is likely that Mr. Hoffman had particularly in mind the French plan for a currency union between France, Italy, Belgium and the Netherlands, a plan which was scotched by the devaluation of sterling. He may also have been thinking of the projects for economic unity between the Benelux countries, between France and Italy, and between the Scandinavian countries. And although he said nothing about the tripartite economic co-operation which now exists between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, there is no inherent incompatibility between the programme he urged on the Council of OEEC and the existing tripartite system of consultation and co-operation. Two further initiatives for European economic co-operation also deserve to be noted. The statute establishing the Council of Europe makes provision for economic co-operation among its members and the Economic Committee of the Assembly has already held a series of meetings. Finally, more than two years ago the members of OEEC entered into a Convention in which they pledged themselves "to strengthen their economic links by all methods which they may determine will further the objectives of the present Convention".

4. The work of OEEC has been the most promising of all the efforts towards economic co-operation, because it has included a large number of countries in its membership and because it has been backed by heavy financial aid from the United States. But from the outset, attempts to work out, within the framework of OEEC, long-range plans for the rationalization of Europe's economy have been impeded by two serious difficulties. In the first place, much of the Organization's time and energy has been spent in allocating ECA aid among its members, so that long-range planning has had to take second place. Secondly, whenever the members have been able to apply themselves to long-range planning, they have encountered the dilemma of how to integrate economies, some of which are rigorously planned and directed whereas others are moving rapidly towards a free market system. More generally, progress toward some form of permanent economic co-operation has been slow because at critical moments the action has been interrupted by the appearance of very live ghosts from Europe's troubled past. Old fears and rivalries and antipathies are still strong; and any essay in economic co-operation in Western Europe, an undertaking in which co-operation is essential not only from France and the United Kingdom but also from Germany as well, must be more haunted and ghost-ridden than any North American can readily imagine. Whatever the reason, it is fair to say that OEEC has accomplished little in the way of a plan for rationalizing Europe's productive capacity. Attempts, for example, to control and co-ordinate the capital investment programmes of the member countries so far as they concerned steel capacity and oil refineries have failed.

5. Moreover, even the medium of co-operation that has been achieved in allocating ECA funds has been threatened. The United Kingdom's exchange difficulties and the revision of the allocation which they made necessary had already severely strained good feeling within the Organization, when the events of last September combined to reduce it almost to the vanishing point. The concurrence of the tripartite discussion in Washington, the United Kingdom's decision to devalue sterling without consulting its partners in the OEEC and the plan for a European currency union which the French had developed without informing the United Kingdom produced so many rancours and resentments that the Organization's usefulness seemed almost at an end.

6. What should be Canada's policy in these circumstances? It seems certain that none of the existing plans for European economic co-operation, including Mr. Hoffman's most recent programme, can be realized in the near future. When this is appreciated in the United States, the disappointment which will ensue may endanger friendly economic relations in the non-Communist world. It would appear, therefore, to be in our own interest to do whatever we can to prevent the imposition on European countries of demands for economic integration which show insufficient regard for the genuine difficulties to be overcome and which, in any case, can contribute very little to the solution of the immediate dollar difficulties. But, at the same time, it must be realized that ECA desperately needs to present some striking accomplishment to Congress so that any Canadian representations to the United States, urging that enthusiasm should be tempered with realism, can hardly be expected to do more than slightly modify the Administration's insistence on some positive commitment towards economic integration in Europe.

7. It was with these considerations in mind that Mr. Pearson suggested in his speech in the House of Commons on the 16th of November, that the time had come to consider what machinery should be set up to secure, under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty, the widest possible economic collaboration between the North Atlantic nations. Article 2 reads as follows:

"The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

8. There would seem to be a number of advantages in using Article 2 of the Treaty. Some of these are:

(a) By making use of Article 2 of the Treaty, it might be possible to prevent fissures opening up between continental countries, on the one hand, and the United Kingdom, on the other, and also between European countries, on the one hand, and Canada and the United States, on the other.

(b) Although the development of concrete economic co-operation between all the countries joined in the North Atlantic Treaty must inevitably be a long and slow process, in general this is the shape which we would prefer economic co-operation to take. If that is the case, the sooner other plans for economic co-operation are firmly set within the framework of the North Atlantic community, even though that framework must remain sketchy on its economic side, the better our interests will be served.

(c) At the very least, if some body for economic consultation were established under Article 2 of the Treaty, there should be less danger of such resentments arising as have recently been provoked.

(d) It is not yet clear which of the various plans which have been advanced for European economic co-operation will prove either feasible or salutary. If they could be considered in the light of Article 2 of the Treaty, there might be a chance of keeping them in solution and suspense until their merits and possibilities could be more carefully assessed.

(e) Continuing co-operation with the United States and the United Kingdom on economic matters is essential to Canada. But exclusive tripartite co-operation may lead to increasing resentment on the part of European countries. If Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty were brought into force and equipped with some machinery, it would be possible, and might be desirable at some stage, to present tripartite co-operation as a trust given to the three countries by the other signatories, in somewhat the same way as the primary responsibility for military planning under the Treaty has been entrusted to the United States, the United Kingdom and France. On this analogy, perhaps an Economic Committee of the North Atlantic Council might be set up on which all members of the Council would be represented, and this Economic Committee might establish a steering group composed of the United States, United Kingdom, Canada and perhaps France.

(f) The United States has already undertaken two important Treaty obligations under Article 2: to eliminate conflict between its foreign economic policies and the international economic policies of the other members of the alliance and to encourage economic collaboration between the United States and the other signatories.

9. At the same time, it is recognized that use of Article 2 might involve some dangers:

(a) Western Germany, for example, could not at present be included in any committee which might be established under Article 2, and economic co-operation under the North Atlantic Treaty might run the risk of excluding the productive capacity of the Ruhr. On the other hand, it might be argued that what is needed at the moment is not so much an organization for economic co-operation in which Western Germany could be included (this is already provided in the OEEC) but rather a comprehensive initiative within which practical efforts to vitalize the economy of Western Europe and so attract Germany westward, could be harmonized.

(b) Action under Article 2 might run the risk of becoming merely another empty gesture. To this objection it might be answered that in any case the United States will insist on some new gesture; and that it would be preferable for whatever gesture is made to be in keeping with the long term pattern which Canada would like to see emerging.

10. If this latter danger is to be avoided, urgent consideration must be given both to what type of machinery should be set up under Article 2 and also, and more important, to what work any committee established under this Article of the Treaty might profitably do. Attention should also be directed toward two related sets of questions:

(a) Which of the plans for European economic integration are feasible? Desirable? How great is the danger that some of the existing projects would result in the formation of closed economic areas or in the growth of government-sponsored cartel arrangements? How could such possibilities best be avoided?

(b) Is it desirable to try to influence United States policy in the direction of a greater awareness of the difficulties in the way of European economic integration? If so, how could this best be done?

*Draft Minutes of a Meeting*⁷³

SECRET

[Ottawa], December 7, 1949

MINUTES OF AN INFORMAL MEETING HELD ON THE 30TH OF NOVEMBER, TO DISCUSS THE PROBLEMS OF EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COOPERATION

PRESENT: MR. A.F.W. PLUMPTRE, CHAIRMAN
MR. J.J. DEUTSCH, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE
MR. J.E. COYNE, BANK OF CANADA
MR. L. RASMINSKY, BANK OF CANADA
MR. J.R. BEATTIE, BANK OF CANADA
MR. T.W.L. MACDERMOT, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
MR. R.A. MACKAY, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
MR. L. COUILLARD, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
MR. D.V. LEPAN, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
MR. P.M. TOWE, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Agenda

1. A memorandum, which is annexed to these minutes, on the problems of European economic cooperation had been circulated before the meeting. It was agreed that in discussing the memorandum, it would be convenient to consider the following four topics separately:

- (a) the problems of Western Germany,
- (b) plans for limited regional economic co-operation in Europe,
- (c) Mr. Hoffman's speech to the Council of the OEEC on the 30th of October,
- (d) the use to be made of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Western Germany

2. Mr. MacDermot reported that the German Federal Republic was rapidly acquiring a large measure of autonomy. Dismantling had been cut by 90%; the flow of exports had reached a very considerable volume; and decisions had been taken by the three occupying powers to admit Germany to international organizations, to permit the building of a merchant marine limited as to maximum individual tonnage and to sanction German consular and trade representation abroad. These developments had been made possible by a wide shift in the French attitude towards Germany. It now seemed to be generally recognized in France that the threat of Soviet domination of Europe could be countered only if Germany were reinstated in the community of nations and allowed to trade and produce. At the same time French fears of Germany made adequate guarantees against remilitarization essential. Mr. MacDermot thought this change in Germany's status was one of the chief reasons for the State Department's anxiety to urge forward plans for European integration. Unless Germany could be articulated into a large and powerful grouping of Western European countries, which would include the United Kingdom and which would be bound together by a free flow of trade, it might once again dominate Europe. The meeting agreed with this analysis. Mr. Deutsch added two further reasons why the rebuilding of German industry and Germany's reemergence as a quasi-independent trading country made necessary plans for less constricted trade relations throughout Western Europe. Since the end of the war, Belgium and the Netherlands has suffered economically from the snapping of their trade links with Germany. The Netherlands, in particular, had been damaged by the loss of its export trade in agricultural products in return for German manufactures. Moreover, the shrinkage of German trade had borne hardly on the prosperity of the Rhine and Scheldt ports. If Germany's trade were to flow westward, it could make a large contribution to economic recovery in the Netherlands and other limitrophe states. Equally, a westward orientation of Germany's trade would deny to some of the satellite countries, particularly to Czechoslovakia, exports which they badly needed. Mr. Deutsch thought that the economic strength of the Soviet bloc as a whole could be seriously impaired if the whole trade of Western Germany were directed away from the satellite states.

⁷³ Aucun procès verbal corrigé ne fut circulé.

3. It was suggested, particularly by Mr. Rasminsky, that basically the United States concern over the integration of Western Europe rested on strategic considerations. Indeed, it might be said that most, if not all, of the various plans for regional economic groups, either large or small, owed a good deal to the perhaps vague, but nevertheless powerful, feeling that countries bound closely together by economic ties would be more able to contribute effectively to their own defence. In pressing for economic integration, Mr. Hoffman was no doubt thinking immediately of the necessity of presenting some striking development to Congress in order to secure a further ECA appropriation. But this consideration was probably not much more than a surface phenomenon. Below the surface in the United States lay the unexpressed conviction that economic integration would contribute to military strength.

Plans For Limited Regional Economic Cooperation in Europe

4. Some consideration was given to the various schemes for regional economic groupings which had been advanced to date. The proposals for a Scandinavian customs union, a French-Italian customs union and a currency union between France, Italy and the Benelux countries (as well as the existing Benelux customs union) would fall into this category. On the whole, those present at the meeting were not disposed to quarrel with Mr. Hoffman's assumption that such limited schemes would ultimately conduce to the formation of a wider area of economic cooperation covering the whole of Western Europe, although it was realized that this could not be taken for granted. Mr. Coyne thought there might be a danger that an agreement for economic cooperation might be harder to reach once such limited unions had been effected, simply because the units concerned would then be in a stronger bargaining position. Mr. Plumptre suggested that each of these proposals, if implemented, would result in at least some temporary economic dislocation; and countries which had undergone such disturbances, involving no doubt some unemployment, would be reluctant to submit themselves to a second round of readjustments. It was also pointed out that, in order to reduce the dislocations which any such proposals would entail, cartel arrangements for dividing markets and for regulating prices, might prove attractive; and such new rigidities might be more difficult to remove than those which existed at present. In spite of these dangers, however, it was agreed that Canada should adopt a sympathetic attitude towards these more limited schemes. Every effort should be made to see that they did not prove injurious to countries which were not included, and that they were so designed as to contribute to a progressively wider multilateralism. But it would be virtually impossible to lay down provisos and conditions of general applicability to that end.

Mr. Hoffman's Latest Proposals

5. It was agreed that Mr. Hoffman's use of the word "integration" in his speech before the Council of the OEEC on the 30th of October was misleading. Mr. MacKay said that in his view, Mr. Hoffman's use of the word betrayed a confusion between the vocabularies of strategy and economics. Military planning could be comparatively precise and could envisage the complete integration of defence forces and strategic concepts. The various committees which had been established under the defence articles of the North Atlantic Treaty were already making progress towards the coordination of armed forces, standardization of equipment, pooling of productive capacity and agreement on lines and areas of defence. In such a context "integration" could bear its full and accepted meaning. This was hardly true of the word when used in an economic context. It would seem that Mr. Hoffman had borrowed the term from the submissions which had been made to Congress when the Military Defense Assistance Programme was presented. It was further suggested that the ambiguity contained in the word might have been quite deliberate. Mr. Hoffman was faced with the necessity of obtaining a new appropriation from Congress and to do so, he might have to use phraseology which went beyond what he himself really believed to be feasible. Already the edge had been taken from the sharpness of his demands by the glosses on his speech which he had made in his press conference after he returned to Washington, and by the informal interpretative comments which had been given by Mr. Harriman and other ECA officials to the British.

6. The requirements which Mr. Hoffman had laid down for an acceptable scheme for European "integration" seemed very vague. But it was agreed that a meaning could be given to all of them. "Coordination of national fiscal and monetary policies" could be translated into inter-governmental discussions on inflationary and deflationary tendencies within participating countries with a view to reducing the danger of mass unemployment. By "provision for necessary exchange rate adjustments", Mr. Hoffman probably meant the introduction of some limited form of fluctuating exchange rates within a system of European currencies which would be convertible inter se. He had also called for "means to cushion the effect of inevitable temporary disturbances of the economy in particular countries". This could be interpreted to mean the creation of some unspecified central reserve institution for Western Europe which would make use of the $150 million in the last ECA appropriation, which was not to be allocated to any individual country. The required "coordination of commercial policies and practices" might boil down to not more than the progressive relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports. Mr. Rasminsky recalled that in addition to the four requirements which had been listed in the memorandum under discussion, Mr. Hoffman had also insisted on the elimination of the practice of double pricing. If these demands in their attenuated form were added together, it was agreed that they would amount to little more than a plea for the creation in Western Europe of an island of multilateralism. It would be analogous in many ways to the sterling area. If, in fact, that was what Mr. Hoffman's programme meant, it seemed to the meeting:

- (a) that it could be realized by 1952,
- (b) that it would represent some economic progress in the right direction, and
- (c) that the amount of difference it would make to the economic position of the countries concerned would not be very substantial.

Such a programme would deserve Canadian support, although not too much should be expected from it, and care should be taken to see that it was regarded as a step towards a worldwide system of multilateral trade rather than as the creation of an exclusive trading bloc.

7. It was recognized that the terms in which Mr. Hoffman's programme had been framed might rouse expectations in the United States and Europe which could not be realized and which, indeed, would be in excess of what Mr. Hoffman himself had in mind. If these hopes were disappointed, there might be unfortunate consequences. Mr. Deutsch, however, recalled that a whole succession of economic plans had been over-sold in the United States. This had been true of the Bretton Woods proposals and of the United States loan to the United Kingdom. These measures had been highly useful and neither Congress nor American public opinion had been much disturbed when performance had fallen short of promise. The same might prove to be true of Mr. Hoffman's programme for European "integration". It might produce worthwhile results without evoking much dangerous disappointment when it turned out to be a much narrower initiative than Mr. Hoffman's language would suggest. Mr. Deutsch, however, did think that it would be useful to draw this danger to the attention of United States officials and add that the successes which had already been achieved by the European Recovery Programme were so considerable that, if they were properly presented, they might be sufficient to secure an adequate ECA appropriation next year.

8. Some attention was also given to the military advantages which might be expected to flow from the creation of such a multilateral area in Western Europe as

Mr. Hoffman seemed to have in mind. By eliminating uneconomic production and by gradually promoting a more efficient regional division of labour, it could contribute to the total economic strength of the area. On the other hand, this development would probably be crossed by planning of production for defence. In this field, economic planning would be concrete and immediate. It would likely make a much more significant contribution to the military strength of the countries concerned than the slow accruals of economic well-being to be expected from Mr. Hoffman's programme.

Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty

9. Is the area envisaged by Mr. Hoffman large enough to secure the expected advantages? This question was raised by Mr. MacKay but was left unanswered. With it the discussion turned to Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Mr. Coyne expressed the personal view that at some point there must be a marriage between the tripartite machinery and OEEC and suggested that this marriage could best be effected under the rubric of Article 2. In general, this proposal was acceptable to the meeting, although it was doubted whether the time was yet ripe for such action. Speaking for the Department of Finance, Mr. Deutsch said that there were a number of considerations which counselled caution. In the first place, the tripartite machinery had been only recently established. It would be wise to wait until it was clearer what its functions would be before setting up any machinery under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Secondly, it would be very difficult at this stage to find competent personnel to represent Canada on an additional international body of this kind. Thirdly, Canadian participation in an Economic Committee under the North Atlantic Treaty might result in pressure for further financial assistance to Western Europe for which we were not prepared. For these reasons he thought that, although Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty would probably prove useful, at this stage it would be well to make haste slowly.

10. It was recognized that one disadvantage of an approach under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty would be that some important members of OEEC would be excluded. A table which is annexed to these minutes,[†] was circulated listing the members of OEEC, the Treaty of Brussels, the North Atlantic Treaty and the Council of Europe. This showed that three countries whose co-operation would be important in any effort to consolidate Western Europe economically are not signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, although they participate in the work of OEEC. They are Sweden, Switzerland and the German Federal Republic. There are also other members of OEEC—Ireland, Austria, Greece and Turkey—which are not members of the North Atlantic Alliance; but their absence would not be so serious. It was agreed that any scheme for economic cooperation in Europe which omitted Western Germany would be unrealistic. Mr. MacKay suggested that, although it was impossible at the present time to contemplate the admission of Western Germany to the North Atlantic Alliance, it might be possible to devise some way in which Western Germany could be associated with any measures of economic cooperation undertaken under the North Atlantic Treaty. It was felt, however, that such a compromise would present grave difficulties. Mr. Coyne suggested that, if OEEC remained in existence after the end of the European Recovery Programme in 1952, it might not be too important whether or not economic cooperation conducted under Article 2 included Western Germany, Sweden and Switzerland. It might be enough if the North Atlantic Treaty Organization were to provide an economic link between the countries which are now associated in tripartite economic consultation and a nucleus of OEEC countries sufficient to be representative of continental opinion. The European members of the North Atlantic Alliance might be adequate for this purpose, he thought.

11. According to the Convention which established OEEC, that Organization is intended to be a continuing body. It was recognized, however, that with the end of financial assistance from the United States, one of the chief pressures towards European consolidation would be removed. For the last two years the countries of Western Europe have been subjected to two pressures both forcing them into closer association. One has been the positive weight of United States policy backed by the sanction of financial aid. The other has been the fear of Soviet aggression. If, as seems likely, the positive pressure exerted by the United States is likely to grow weaker as the European Recovery Programme approaches its end, it might be wise to make fuller use of the other stimulus urging Europeans in the same direction, i.e., the fear of the Soviet Union, by subsuming economic cooperation under the North Atlantic Treaty, the avowed purpose of which is to deter Soviet aggression.

MEMORANDUM ON ECONOMIC COOPERATION IN THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

It seems to me that the various regional economic groups which either are in being or have been proposed are, basically, strategic concepts. This is sufficiently clear in the case of the North Atlantic Alliance. But it is also true, I think, of the pattern formed by the European Recovery Programme and the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. Exactly four weeks before Mr. Marshall spoke at Harvard on the 5th of June, 1947, Mr. Acheson, who was then his Under-Secretary of State, spoke at Cleveland, Mississippi. Mr. Acheson's speech was an analysis of the worldwide shortage of United States dollars. But although posing the problem very sharply and clearly, he had no solution to offer, and indeed it would have been possible to suggest a considerable number of ways of handling the problem which he had analyzed so brilliantly. In point of fact, however, it was decided in the State Department in the course of the following four weeks to tackle the dollar problem by pouring goods and credits into Western Europe. The reason why this method of dealing with the worldwide dollar shortage was adopted instead of any other was, essentially, I think that the United States administration wished to make Western Europe a firm bastion against the Soviet Union. To take another illustration of what seems to me a principle of wide application, the proposal for a Franco-Italian customs union was made by France primarily in order to prevent Italy from ever again becoming so dependent on trade with Germany that a military alliance between the two countries would be highly probable.

2. As strategic expedients, these regional groupings may be useful and even necessary. They are certainly inadequate. This is true even of the largest regional grouping which has been developed so far, i.e., the North Atlantic Alliance. While the Alliance was being formed, and while the attention of policy makers in Washington and elsewhere was focused on the North Atlantic Treaty, the Communists were overrunning China behind our backs. The formation of the Alliance was, of course, a step of great value and importance in checking Soviet aggression. But there is every likelihood that the cold war may last a very long time. In the long run, the solidification of a homogenous group of countries covering even so large an area as is now spanned by the North Atlantic Treaty will not provide an adequate security guarantee for western civilization. In these matters, it is sometimes wise to commune with the ghost of Halford Mackinder. An alliance against the Soviet Union from which the whole of the Eurasian land mass, with the exception of its febrile western tip, was excluded would in the long run be sufficient insurance against Soviet domination. There is the further consideration that the conflict is not merely one between nations and areas but between cultures; and any alliance which is not formed in such a way as to invite sympathy and support from individuals throughout the world, will prove inadequate to the stresses of the ideological conflict.

3. The moral is that all of these regional groupings, including the North Atlantic Alliance itself, must be devised as open-ended contracts. What does that mean in practical terms in the case of the North Atlantic Alliance? It means, I think, that every effort must be made to preserve and strengthen the filaments which now bind countries in the Middle and Far East to members of the alliance. On the economic side, it seems to me that this conclusion points to the necessity either of preserving the sterling area or else finding some substitute set of arrangements which would confer the same advantages on the west as the sterling area confers at present. There were no doubt tangled motives behind India's decision to remain within the Commonwealth. But not the least of them was the determination to convert its sterling balances in London into capital goods for Indian development. The sterling balances, Indian leaders realized, were merely marks in ledgers in a distant capital. If they were to be realized in the form of goods, friendly relations would have to be maintained with the ledger keeper. There can be no doubt, of course, that the strain imposed on the United Kingdom's economy by the sterling balances is intolerable and must be lightened. But this should be done without destroying the economic links which now bind India to the west.

4. The maintenance of the sterling area, or rather the maintenance of some perhaps altered but similar system which would keep India and other eastern countries within the economic orbit of the west, is not a policy which is likely to appeal strongly either to Americans or Canadians. The sterling area has often been defended in the United Kingdom with extravagant and inadmissible arguments, and some of the motives behind the attachment of the British to it are not likely to be congenial to us. Nevertheless, the political arguments in favour of dealing with it cautiously, as I have suggested, are strong.

5. Do not commercial considerations point in very much the same direction? The American proposals for "integration" of Western Europe are perplexing and contradictory. The Administration's policy in the last few weeks has reminded me rather of an inexperienced man's attempts to sharpen a knife. With one stroke of the steel he puts an edge on the blade, with the next he takes it off. Since Mr. Hoffman spoke to the Council of OEEC on the 31st of October, the edge has been taken off his remarks with a vengeance. From remarks at his press conference after he returned from Washington and from indications which have been given to the British both by Mr. Harriman and other ECA officials, it now appears that, insofar as the Americans have a clear idea of what they want in Western Europe, it is merely a multilateral area of countries trading freely among themselves without quantitative restrictions or exchange controls. Such an island of multilateralism is very much what exists already in the sterling area. This area, like Western Europe, must by every means possible be prevented from becoming unnecessarily closed and restrictive. But to encourage regional groupings which would impair its value still further would be mistaken. What is needed is a delicate operation conducted by the United States and the United Kingdom principally, by which the complicated organism of the sterling area could be made to function more wholesomely.

6. If the analysis contained in the preceding paragraphs is accurate, it would seem that the attempt to equip the North Atlantic Treaty with economic machinery is premature. There can be little doubt that the delicate operation of which I have spoken can best be performed in the hushed atmosphere of the tripartite discussions. The surgeons should not be unnecessarily disturbed while they are putting in the sutures. When this operation has been successfully completed, it will be time enough to consider what forms of economic cooperation could best be conducted under the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty. For, as matters stand at present, it would be almost as difficult for the United Kingdom to participate fully in economic cooperation under the Treaty as it is now for the United Kingdom to throw in its lot wholeheartedly with that of continental Europe. The problems of the sterling area would still remain and would be made, if anything, less tractable by the economic consolidation of the North Atlantic regional group cutting across the maritime and worldwide ties which hold the sterling area together.

Dear Wynne [Plumpton]:

You gave me, when I was in Ottawa recently, a copy of LePan's draft memorandum dated November 21 on European Economic Cooperation. At the same time you suggested, I think, that you would welcome some comments on this draft from the Embassy.

I have asked Dick Murray to present his comments, and I am enclosing a memorandum which he has given to me in response. This is mainly concerned with an assessment of the aims of the United States in urging the integration of European economy, which were scantily treated in LePan's draft.

He does not go into the problems of organization under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. The more I think of this, the more I find myself in a haze about what can profitably be proposed at the present time. LePan points out in paragraph 9 of his paper two of the major dangers which are in my mind—the relationship of Germany to a purely North Atlantic economic and financial body, and the risk that anything done now would merely increase the complexity of economic organization without any productive results. In addition, it is apparent that a North Atlantic body would be a most inappropriate agency for dealing with the problem of the sterling-dollar gap, which is the problem of greatest importance to Canada. The tripartite machinery for consultation here is about to concern itself with the intricacies of the finances of the whole sterling area, which is a matter, of course, that the United Kingdom could not discuss frankly in a twelve-power committee or even in a small steering group containing a representative of the continental countries.

I suggest that we should, for the present, put into the back of our minds the questions of eventual organization under Article 2 of the Treaty and concentrate on working out answers from the Canadian point of view to the questions which LePan proposes in paragraph 10(a) of his memorandum. Until we have done this in some degree, I consider that we should not do anything to seek to influence the policy of the United States.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

MEMORANDUM ON EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COOPERATION PREPARED IN THE DEPARTMENT IN OTTAWA ON NOVEMBER 21ST

The comments given below are confined principally to the first half of the Ottawa memorandum, i.e., that part of it dealing with the United States impetus behind the drive towards European economic cooperation. What could be or should be done under Article 2 of the N[orth] A[tlantic] P[act] except insofar as it relates to the State Department's attitude towards integration is not commented upon in these notes.

2. There is one important omission in the memorandum,—an omission which ignores the most essential point: Para. 2 suggests that there are only two reasons for the latest United States attempt to push Western Europe towards economic cooperation; the first arises essentially from the old familiar congressional bogey. Do something dramatic is the suggestion, or else Congress will not give you any more money. This is a statement which Americans sometimes use in too loose a way to back up their arguments to get something done which very frequently it is desirable to have done on its merits alone. The same congressional bogey is not infrequently used by other countries to take away from, if not discredit the drive the Americans may be making in any given direction. The fundamental reason which underlies the ECA proposals is that Hoffman, Bissell and their principal advisers hold deep convictions about the necessity for the Europeans in their own interest to take the steps to advance as far as possible towards economic union.

3. It is certainly true that there will be immense difficulties in the way of getting what the Europeans, ECA and Canada might consider an adequate third ERP appropriation. Attempting to predict what Congress might do to an appropriation is a hazardous and unpredictable enough venture at any time. At the present time, several months in advance of the date when Congress will act it is only useful insofar as it enables us to look at this question of integration with a certain amount of perspective. We know that ECA will ask for a sum in the neighbourhood of $3.1 billions. Normal congressional wear and tear will probably reduce this request to $2¾ billions. Assuming the worst, it is unlikely that the figure will go below $2.2 billions. Even the strongest opponents of the Marshall Plan will hesitate in an election year mortally to stab the ECA. Senator [Robert A.] Taft has said the ERP should be carried through to its completion date in 1952 and then stopped. It would seem to be a legitimate guess, therefore, that some sum in the neighbourhood of $500 to $750 million will depend, to put it in its crudest terms, on the Europeans doing something "dramatic"; something that will give the solid but not always articulate mass of supporters of the Marshall Plan some concrete achievements to point to. It is quite possible that the Europeans could do something "dramatic" and still get only a little over $2 billions. That would be bad for everyone. If, however, the Europeans are able to make no substantial progress towards much greater economic cooperation it is certain that they will have to get along with an ECA appropriation of something like $2 billions. The additional sum which the Europeans stand a good chance to get by doing something "dramatic" (or, looking at it from the threat or scare point of view, which they stand to lose if they do not do something dramatic) is probably fairly close to the amount which the ECA would wish to see thrown into Europe to back up any worthwhile schemes for liberalizing trade and payments or underwriting regional economic unions which might emerge.

4. It seems to me that the attitude which we should take on this point for the time being at any rate is that the Europeans stand a good chance in 1950-51 of getting $2 billions with which to buy North American (principally United States) supplies and a few hundred millions with which to back up useful trade liberalization schemes if they can work out such schemes and agree on them. Otherwise, they will get $2 billions with which to buy principally United States supplies and the Marshall Plan will, at that point, start to turn downhill rather sharply.

5. This whole point was put succinctly in the November 10th issue of "Foreign Report" (Page 1, paragraph 5) as follows:

(5) "Genuine belief that the solution of the dollar and political problems lies in creating a free mass market in Western Europe is behind Mr. Hoffman's demands. It is a mistake to attribute them solely to his desire to appease Congress.

"The position of Mr. Hoffman and his colleagues is that American willingness to put up Marshall funds was based on agreement between the United States and the participating countries on two points: (a) that revival of production was a necessary preliminary to a return to economic and political stability; and (b) that efforts must be made to use and plan the manpower and resources of the Continent (and its overseas dependencies) as a whole. Otherwise, Europe could not form a Third Force that would produce enough to resist the pull of America or Russia.

"As regards the second objective, the Americans in ECA are now convinced that nothing much is going to happen. The opposition comes, they feel, from two sources: (a) the European Foreign Offices, who in ECA eyes are opposed to unification both because it is difficult and because they fear the effects on the class structure of Europe of a broad downward spread of consumer goods; (b) from the technicians, who object to abandoning the State trading and regulation of trade on which their domestic policies depend. The American members of the ECA think they find reluctance among their 'striped pants' opposite numbers on the Continent to opening up new strata of demand among the lower classes."

6. The second or additional reason given in the Department's memorandum arises from the anxiety that Western Germany should be "integrated as soon as possible into the Western European community." This is, of course, an important point, particularly insofar as the State Department is concerned. It was probably the State Department's concern about Germany which led them to support the ECA's initiative. The State Department, as we know, have had their worries about Mr. Hoffman going too far and too fast as well as concentrating too much on Europe. As a result, we know that they have been giving some thought to what might be done for the whole North Atlantic community under Article 2 of the N.A.P. The State Department's thinking on this question, however, still seems to be somewhat remote. In the meantime, the State Department are in the position of having to sort out their thoughts on integration and put them into some kind of reasonable order by December 15th. In fact, officials of ECA and State are now meeting daily at ten to work out an integration scheme. A resolution has been passed by OEEC which requires a report by December 15th on the steps which the European countries have taken and propose to take toward European economic unity.

7. This leads to the third or real reason behind the integration drive. Perhaps as good a way as any to explain Mr. Hoffman's concern is to look at the reaction to his speech rather than to the reasons which led up to it. An article in "Foreign Report" (December 1st) entitled, "Europe Scurries for Cover", gives as good a clue as any in the following comment on the reaction of European firms to the threat of liberalization of trade:

"European producers are taking fright at the movement to liberalise trade in the Marshall area and are hastily thinking up ways to protect their industries from the searching winds of foreign competition. For a generation much of European industry has been sheltered behind an assortment of protective devices, ranging from the classical type of international cartel to the more recent expedient of import quotas. It is the threat to import quotas which has set European businessmen fumbling for their umbrellas.”

8. ECA officials are busily thinking up, as they have been for some months past, the best practical methods of pushing the European countries as far as possible along the road of economic integration. (Hoffman wanted to put “integration” on the agenda for the Ministerial talks in September but was dissuaded from doing so by Snyder and Acheson.) The four broad points which ECA has in mind were made known clearly enough by Hoffman in Paris. The ECA does not wish to try to spell out particular proposals in detail. As always the great hope is to have the Europeans come forward with the ideas which they themselves regard as workable. ECA officials are, however, flying back and forth between Washington and Paris with a high degree of frequency at the present time. Bissell is just finishing a hectic week in Paris during which new ideas for the payments scheme involving possibly a central bank are being worked out. Since Hoffman spoke in Paris over a month ago, U.S. officials have been pleased to see the U.K.’s attitude move forward from one of active indifference to one of benevolent neutrality and now apparently to one of leadership in forming a regional bloc of its own. It does seem surprising, in view of the close association between the two governments and the fact that the financial and economic talks were held so recently, that it would take so much manoeuvring and time to get Messrs. Cripps, Bevin, Hoffman and Acheson to understand each other’s point of view.

9. If we in Canada are in a position to offer any constructive suggestions or criticisms of proposals which have been made concerning European integration these would be greatly welcomed by United States officials. The statement in para. 6 of the memorandum that “it must be realized that ECA desperately needs to present some striking accomplishment to Congress so that any Canadian representations to the United States, urging that enthusiasm should be tempered with realism, can hardly be expected to do more than slightly modify the Administration’s insistence on some positive commitment towards economic integration in Europe”, is probably not quite the right way in which to state the case. ECA is not desperate. They are undoubtedly extremely anxious to see the Europeans, for their own sakes, make more progress than they are making to free trade within Europe. Two years ago the key word in the Marshall Plan was that vague unfeeling word, “viability”; today, as ERP moves into its second phase, a new word, “integration”, that seems equally vague and may be equally unattainable, comes forward to take the limelight.

10. If our officials do intend to devote a good deal of energy to the “urgent re-examination” of the various plans for European economic cooperation, I would think that before tackling larger schemes under Article 2 it would be a worthwhile exercise to see if in Ottawa we have many definite ideas on schemes aimed at liberalizing trade in Europe and making possible a constantly rising standard of living. Is it time, for instance, to have important changes made in the intra-European payments scheme? Do we agree with Mr. Hoffman that dual pricing is a bad thing economically and an absurdity from the point of view of the Europeans’ pledges for mutual cooperation? The Americans talk from time to time about the creation of a Central Bank for Europe. Such an institution, in the first instance, probably would exercise nothing more than an advisory role. A trade regulatory body along the lines of a super Interstate Commerce Commission is another idea which many U.S. officials find attractive. As the OEEC fortunately moves away from the grinding and disruptive tasks of minute programming and attempting to divide up the ECA allocation, it might be able to develop into a rather more formal and permanent body having wide powers in the trade regulatory field. The ECA's aim is somehow or other to get the Europeans themselves to break down as many trade barriers as possible without resurrecting new ones and at the same time build up a European organization which would have growing authority in the fields of fiscal and monetary policy and the regulation of trade.

11. I think that we need not concern ourselves about trying "to influence United States policy in the direction of a greater awareness of the difficulties in the way of European economic integration". The sixteen ECA Missions in Europe as well as the many competent State Department officials in Western Europe, unlike a good many congressmen and newspapermen, are only too aware of the difficulties to be overcome. Mr. Hoffman speaking at West Point on December 1st, shows that he realizes the difficulties are great but that the goal is nevertheless one which must constantly be aimed at:

"For 50 years, there has been a lack of real competition and, consequently, a lack of the results that come only from true competition. The individual countries kept competition outside their boundaries by withdrawing into almost water-tight compartments. They imposed import controls, ran up tariffs and negotiated cartels. Monopolies became the rule in practically all the basic industries. Research for new materials and products and methods was unnecessary. Products and production methods became static. It is going to require immense adjustments in Europe to meet these basic problems, for they are not only physical, they are entrenched in the European mind. They will not be met overnight.

"Just a month ago I met with the Council of Ministers of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation in Paris. What I had to say to the Ministers resulted from my own thinking on the problem, and from long talks with our ECA Special Representative in Europe, Ambassador W. Averell Harriman, and with our Ambassadors in the participating countries. Growing out of these consultations was the program of action that I presented to the Ministers on October 31st. I gave them certain short term objectives—ending dual pricing, making up a much longer and better list of goods that could move without import quotas, and establishing some means for facilitating the convertibility of currencies.

"But more vitally, I held up a long-range goal. The long-range goal I put before the OEEC was the effective integration of the economy of Western Europe—the building of a single market of 270 million consumers, in which quantitative restrictions on the movement of goods, monetary barriers to the flow of payments, and eventually all tariffs should be permanently swept away.

“No one knows better than I do the difficulties in attaining the long-range goal which I set before Europe. Not only will traditional prejudices among the Western European nations have to be resolved, but, in addition, new and frenzied efforts by Russia’s fifth columns will have to be overcome. For Russia sees in the integration of Western Europe the single greatest threat to her plans for world conquest.”

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I imagine that you will have seen Bill Mackintosh’s⁷⁴ interesting article in the October issue of Foreign Affairs on “Canada’s Stake in Anglo-American Solidarity”. In the final paragraph of the article, he drew attention to the fact that the North Atlantic community in two wars had “sprung into being for the salvation of Western civilization” and went on to insist that the “Atlantic Pact is so much paper unless behind it stand a community of interest and a group of healthy cooperating nations”. In the course of a lecture which he delivered to the National Defence College in Kingston on the 15th of November, he developed this theme rather further. After suggesting that the nations associated in the North Atlantic Treaty form a natural and fairly coherent economic unit, he advocated that steps should be taken under the Treaty to keep under examination the problems of trade within the area and to develop joint measures by which the present difficulties might be overcome.

2. In view of these remarks, I thought that it might be worthwhile to ask for his views as to how we might best proceed in implementing Article 2 of the Treaty. Accordingly, when he was in Ottawa earlier this week, I arranged for a few people to meet with him at lunch to discuss this problem. Lou Rasminsky was there and Terry MacDermot and LePan as well as myself. Bill’s ideas on this subject, I am afraid, are not much more precise than ours. He did, however, have one interesting suggestion to make.

3. After protesting modestly that it was unfair to expect a professor to be able to translate the peroration of a lecture into government policy, he explained that, when he was speaking to the National Defence College, he was thinking of only two concrete points:

(a) Canada’s traditional trade with the continental countries of Western Europe has been considerably greater than the trade figures would suggest, since many ⁷⁴ W.A. Mackintosh, doyen de la Faculté des Arts, université Queen’s.

W.A. Mackintosh, Dean of Arts, Queen’s University.

shipments (of wheat, for example) which were destined for continental countries were consigned in the first instance to United Kingdom ports and went to swell the total of exports to the United Kingdom in the trade figures.

(b) In two world wars, Canada and the United States were drawn into what amounted to a North Atlantic Alliance, and for the duration of the war this area operated more or less as an economic unit. On both occasions, however, after the war Canada was extruded economically, as it were, from the area. It would be well for Canada to try in every way possible to prevent itself from being squeezed out of this economic grouping.

4. There are important points, but do not carry us very far in answering the question of what should be done to implement Article 2. Bill had not yet seen the passage in the Minister's speech on this subject. When it was shown to him, he said that he would not be in favour of establishing a formal committee under Article 2, at least at this stage. He recalled his rather disillusioning experience as a member of the wartime Economic Committee between Canada and the United States, which as you will remember, was highly ineffective. However, he suggested that it would be useful to convene a conference of all the North Atlantic countries in order to consider the problems of economic cooperation between them. The calling of this conference should be represented, he thought, as an isolated event, although if it became clear in the course of the conference that some permanent mode of economic cooperation would be advisable, the establishment of committee machinery need not be ruled out. This method of approach attracted me, since it would avoid the danger of establishing economic machinery before it was certain whether there was real work to be done. Two difficulties, however, present themselves. I am not sure whether such a conference could appropriately be convened within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty organization, which seems to consist throughout of a fairly rigid committee structure. Secondly, I am doubtful whether, if it became clear in the course of such an ad hoc conference as he had in mind that permanent economic machinery was inadvisable, we could stop such an initiative dead at that point. The ground is already littered with any number of committees which obstinately refuse to die, although they have now no further purpose. We might find that, if we participated in a conference of this kind, it would result willy-nilly in the creation of another unnecessary body.

5. Nevertheless, I think Bill's suggestion is worth exploring. I suspect that there will be little for an Economic Committee established under Article 2 of the Treaty to do until the European Recovery Programme is much nearer to its close. That is still a long time in the future, however, and we can hardly expect Mr. Wrong to stall for perhaps a full year in the Working Group. In addition to throwing light on what an Economic Committee of the North Atlantic powers could do when ERP comes to an end, an ad hoc conference would have the advantage of bridging an awkward gap.

6. On the question of timing, you might be interested in looking at a personal memorandum which has been drawn up by LePan. This memorandum suggests that the most urgent question at present is some resolution of the problems of the sterling area; and those problems can be dealt with most effectively within the tripartite framework. If this line of reasoning is correct, it would not be advisable to establish economic machinery under the North Atlantic Treaty before an operation has been performed on the sterling area. Bill was inclined to agree with this argument but he suggested, sensibly I think, that it would not be necessary entirely to mark time in the meantime. Steps could be taken to forward economic cooperation under the Treaty (an ad hoc conference for example could be convened) before the problem of the sterling area had been resolved, even though it was realized that economic cooperation on this scale could hardly be effective until the United Kingdom's obligations to its sterling area creditors had been lightened. I might explain, by the way, that all of us were assuming that the problems of the sterling area could not drag on indefinitely; they would have to be resolved one way or the other by the end of 1950.

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

We have now consulted with the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada concerning Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. I have also had a conversation with Dr. W.A. Mackintosh on this subject.

2. There is wide agreement on the following four conclusions:

(a) At some stage it would be useful to establish machinery under Article 2 of the Treaty in order to effect a marriage between the tripartite economic machinery and OEEC.

(b) The time is not yet ripe to establish such machinery, since it is not yet clear what the real content of economic cooperation between the North Atlantic powers might be.

(c) The need for economic machinery under the North Atlantic Treaty will not become pressing until the European Recovery Programme is much nearer its close.

(d) The closer economic consolidation of the North Atlantic community would be neither desirable nor possible until there has been some resolution of the problems of the sterling area.

3. In the view of the Department of Finance, there are three reasons which argue in favour of caution in setting up machinery under Article 2:

(a) The tripartite machinery has been only recently established. It would be wise to wait until it is clearer what its functions will be before setting up any machinery under Article 2.

(b) It would be very difficult at this stage to find competent personnel to represent Canada on an additional international body of this kind.

(c) Canadian participation in an Economic Committee under the North Atlantic Treaty might result in pressure for further financial assistance in Western Europe, for which we may not be prepared.

4. At present, the United Kingdom is inhibited from cooperating fully in economic matters with continental Europe because of its commitments to the sterling area. Until these sterling area problems have been resolved, it would be equally difficult for the United Kingdom to cooperate wholeheartedly in a North Atlantic economic grouping. What is needed is a delicate operation conducted by the United States and the United Kingdom, principally, on the complicated organism of the sterling area. This operation can best be performed either in the hushed atmosphere of the tripartite discussions or perhaps in direct bilateral negotiations between the United States, on the one hand, and the United Kingdom and its sterling area creditors, on the other. The problems of the sterling area must be resolved in some fashion during 1950. Either the United Kingdom must refuse to permit drawings on the accumulated balances in order to check the drain on its gold and dollar reserves or else the United States must undertake some of the responsibility for repaying these debts. This is the most urgent financial problem at the present time and until it has been tackled, it would be impossible to expect close and effective economic cooperation between the North Atlantic countries.

5. It will, therefore, be necessary for our representatives in the Working Group of the North Atlantic Treaty organization to stall for quite some time on our proposal for implementing Article 2. The best policy would seem to be that they should recommend that this question be remitted for study by a small group of experts to consider what might be the real content of economic cooperation between the North Atlantic Treaty countries, and also through what machinery this cooperation might best be effected.

6. Our representatives in Washington may wish to consider a tentative suggestion which has been made by Dr. Mackintosh. He has suggested that it might be useful to convene an ad hoc conference of all the North Atlantic countries in order to consider the problems of economic cooperation between them. The calling of this conference might be represented as an isolated event, although, if it became clear in the course of the conference that some permanent mode of economic cooperation would be advisable, the establishment of committee machinery need not be ruled out. This method of approach would seem to have the advantage that it would allow the problems of economic cooperation in the North Atlantic area to be thoroughly canvassed without committing governments to the establishment of permanent economic machinery. It would also serve to fill in what may prove to be an awkward and embarrassing interval. On the other hand, it might have two disadvantages:

(a) It is doubtful whether such a conference could appropriately be convened within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty organization, which seems to consist throughout of a fairly rigid committee structure.

(b) The momentum created by the calling of an ad hoc conference might result inevitably in the establishment of permanent economic machinery, whether or not it was clear that there would be real work of a permanent kind to be done.

Nevertheless, I think that this suggestion is worth exploring.

7. I have listed in an annex the various papers which have now been prepared on this general subject, and have given some indication of their contents, in case you may wish to peruse this subject further. All of these papers are attached.

8. I am circulating this memorandum, along with the other related papers, to Mr. Reid, Mr. MacDermot, and Mr. MacKay. After the policy meeting on this subject which, I understand, is to be held next Tuesday, the 20th of December, I suggest that these papers might also be referred to Washington and London.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 23, 1949

Dear Mr. Wrong,

Thank you very much for your letter of the 10th of December enclosing some comments by Dick Murray on our memorandum on European economic cooperation. His main point that pressure from ECA for economic "integration" in Western Europe is the expression of a profound conviction held by Hoffman, Harriman, Bissell and others that closer economic cooperation in Europe is in Europe's own best interests was a useful corrective here. Until recently, one of our difficulties in understanding United States policy in this field has been that, although we could detect a note of passion and conviction in Hoffman's statements, we could not discover with any precision, the objective towards which his passion was directed. Now that it is much clearer what type of economic cooperation ECA has in mind for the OEEC countries, the obscurity in which we were groping has been pierced. Dick's memorandum represented a valuable stage in our enlightenment.

In your own letter, you mentioned various reasons which would make it difficult at this time to implement Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Those reasons, I think are appreciated here. Since you were in Ottawa, several further memoranda on this whole question have been prepared. They will be sent to you as soon as they have been discussed and approved. One of them makes very much the same point as you do about the impracticability of considering the problem of the sterling-dollar gap within some North Atlantic body. It seems to us here that the most pressing question at the moment is to come to some resolution of the difficulties of the sterling area. What is needed is a delicate operation on the complicated organism of the sterling area conducted by the United States and the United Kingdom, principally. This operation can best be performed in the muted atmosphere of the tripartite discussions or perhaps in direct negotiations between the United States, on the one hand, and the United Kingdom and its sterling area creditors, on the other. Until this problem has been tackled, it would be impossible to expect the United Kingdom to cooperate wholeheartedly in any North Atlantic economic grouping. I hope before long to be able to write to you more fully about this whole subject.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Wrong,

We have been grateful for the interesting and valuable material which you have been sending us lately on the United States pressure for economic "integration" in Europe. Now that the froth has been blown off this subject and it is possible to see more closely the body of the United States' proposals, I think I should let you know that there are serious misgivings in many quarters here about the form events are taking.

In the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada and elsewhere there is apprehension that the ECA plans for a European Clearing Union may lead to the creation of a closed trading bloc from which we and the United States would be increasingly excluded. Full credit is given here to Mr. Hoffman's missionary zeal; but it is doubted whether it is well directed and whether Mr. Hoffman and his associates have examined carefully enough what would probably be the practical consequences of the gospel they are propagating. There is, of course, some substance in his main argument that the formation of a wider market in Europe with fewer barriers either of exchange control or of quantitative restriction should lead to some increase in competition and so to greater efficiency and to lower costs and prices. Some European industries which have been long established might in this way feel the salutary spur of competition. However, it is also highly likely that the type of arrangements for which Mr. Hoffman is pressing would result in a spate of uneconomic developments. European countries are being urged to trade more freely among themselves and to supply more of their own needs. Under this incitement they will have every excuse for developing within this area both new high-cost industries and increased high-cost agricultural production to provide for their own requirements. Already this has been happening with the blessing of ECA. It is a widely held view here that such undesirable developments are likely to be increased rather than retarded by the introduction of this new plan for a Clearing Union.

Another serious objection to it is that it would include the sterling area. As you know, inflation is still rampant in many sterling-area countries. One effect of the Clearing Union plan would be to infect the whole of the area included in the plan with the sterling-area's virulent inflation. What many of our experts are afraid of is that this plan would mean in fact the creation of a closed, high-cost, inflationary economic bloc.

I should also tell you that there is some suspicion here that the enthusiasm in Washington for economic integration in Europe may be the counterpart of pessimism that the United States will ever be able to eliminate its export surplus by encouraging imports and by investing abroad. To many people here the attempt to set up Western Europe as a much more self-contained economic unit appears to be a subtle kind of neo-isolationism. The Americans are understandably insistent on bringing to an end the continual series of appropriations for Europe, which even now are very difficult, and which before long may become impossible, to secure. If by 1952 or earlier Western Europe were "integrated", it could be set adrift with fewer qualms of conscience.

To all this it could be argued that the Americans are merely insistent that Western Europe countries become self-supporting and that they hope this can be accomplished by their exporting more to the dollar area rather than by importing less. The plan for a Clearing Union, however, will generate no forces to drive the countries of Western Europe to solve the problem of viability in this way. Indeed it is considered here that in all likelihood under the pressure for "integration" the solution will be found by restricting dollar imports further and further.

If this is indeed the inwardness of United States policy at the present time, it must be a matter of great concern to us. The United States with its comparatively slight dependence on exports could perhaps afford such a policy without too great internal economic dislocations. That is not true of Canada, to which exports are so enormously more important.

In order to make clear the misgivings which are felt here, I may have overstated them. They are serious, however, and stubbornly rooted. I gather that you are planning to meet with Mr. Acheson and Sir Oliver Franks early in the New Year. I should be grateful if you would bring this matter up informally and outline the reasons why we are fearful of the possible consequences of United States pressure for European integration.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

Ottawa, December 29, 1949

We have received from Mr. Wrong a telegram, WA 3472 of the 22nd December,† which I think you have seen, concerning Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Mr. Wrong reminds us that a routine meeting of the North Atlantic Council is proposed for January 5th or 6th, and he indicates that the question of machinery under Article 2 of the Treaty may come up at this meeting. He recommends that we should not ourselves introduce the subject. If, as is possible, the question is raised by one of the other ambassadors who have taken an interest in it, he suggests that he might take the line that too little time has elapsed since the last meeting to develop suggestions which could profitably be discussed in the Working Group.

2. His recommendation should be accepted, I think. There are a number of strong reasons why it would be unwise at the present time to attempt to advance this question further in the North Atlantic Council:

(a) In spite of consultation with the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce and the Bank of Canada, we have been unable to define what a Committee established under Article 2 of the Treaty might do.⁷⁵

(b) It seems unlikely that economic cooperation between the North Atlantic countries could be profitable at the present time. It is generally believed that this Article of the Treaty will become useful only as the European Recovery Programme is nearer to its close. There is the further difficulty that at the present time the United Kingdom would be inhibited from close economic cooperation with other members of the North Atlantic community because of the burden of its sterling indebtedness. The problem of the sterling balances will have to be resolved in one way or another during 1950. Until this has been done genuine economic cooperation under Article 2 would be impossible. The problem, as you are aware, has already been considered in a preliminary way in the continuing tripartite conversations in Washington; and it seems clear that it can be resolved only there or in some other similarly closed forum.

(c) There is a very considerable divergence of view among officials here, not only concerning Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty, but also concerning the insistence of the United States authorities on economic "integration" in Europe, which has now crystallized into the ECA proposals for a European Clearing Union. Until a commonly accepted Canadian view on this subject has been established, further attempts to give institutional form to Article 2 of the Treaty would seem premature.

⁷⁵ Note marginale/Marginal note:

Has any report been made as a result of this consultation [L.B. Pearson]

(d) As Mr. Wrong notes in his telegram, some preliminary discussions with the British and the Americans would seem advisable before this complex issue is thrown for study into an international body representing twelve countries.

3. For these reasons, I think that we should accept Mr. Wrong's recommendation to temporize for a little longer in the North Atlantic Council. When our own ideas have become clearer and when we have had an opportunity of consulting with the British and Americans on this subject, we will be able with much less risk to promote plans for genuine economic cooperation in the North Atlantic area. At the present time I imagine a Canadian initiative in the Council would attract considerable support from some countries, notably France and Norway, which have already expressed their interest in equipping Article 2 with machinery. Such support, however, might prove highly embarrassing and even dangerous if we had not clearly defined in advance what we wished to be the consequences of our initiative. I have therefore prepared a reply to send to Mr. Wrong, if you agree, accepting his suggestions.⁷⁶ This draft is attached.†

4. Copies of the interlinked papers which have been drawn up within the Department in the last few weeks on this general subject† are attached for your information.⁷⁷

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: ARTICLE 2 OF ATLANTIC PACT

Following our discussions of this subject (including the more or less accidental discussion with Mr. Willoughby in my office) it was raised at a meeting in Mr. Heeney's office. Mr. Heeney then had a discussion with our Minister. The following decisions were reached:

(a) The question of cooperation under Article 2 should not be raised for the time being by Canada in the North Atlantic Council. This does not mean that the proposal is abandoned, but rather that further consideration and exploration is necessary

⁷⁶ Note marginale/Marginal note:

I don't object to the course proposed; an additional point is that the first examination might well be at a ministerial meeting of the Council. We must be very careful however not to give the impression that we are losing interest in Art 2—which is not the case LB P[earson]

⁷⁷ Note marginale/Marginal note:

Mr. LePan: Minister asked to have full set of these papers for Colombo journey. Pl[ease] see his comments on memo. Wire to Wrong & despatch may require amendment in view of Mr. Pearson's note on p. 3 Dec 31 A H[eeney] before it can be usefully discussed in the Council. I attach a teletype to Washington, dated December 31, 1949,† on this subject.

(b) It was desirable to get the views of our missions abroad, not only in Washington, but also in London and the European capitals. Hence we have despatched to these points sets of papers on this subject. (You have already seen almost all of these papers in one form or another). Comments are invited from the missions and these should reach us within two or three weeks.

(c) Cooperation under Article 2 should be explored with the United States and the United Kingdom informally before introducing the subject into the North Atlantic Council. The Tripartite meetings should provide a useful forum.

(d) Quite apart from Article 2 it seemed desirable to warn United States authorities of certain misgivings in Ottawa regarding "European integration". This should be done immediately and again the Tripartite forum should prove useful. I attach a copy of a letter from Mr. Heeney to Mr. Wrong dated December 29, 1949.

2. In our last meeting (the one with Willoughby) the new E.C.A. plan "On Intra-European Currency Transferability and Liberalization of Trade" was under discussion. Mr. Rasminsky has written a letter to Mr. Bissell of E.C.A. on this subject, dated January 3rd.† I attach a copy of Mr. Rasminsky's letter. You will see that it fits in closely with Mr. Heeney's letter to Mr. Wrong.

3. Most of the discussion here has been a little sceptical both of the purposes and the results of European integration. We have received from Washington a vigorous defence of the E.C.A. position written by Dick Murray. I think this is useful to act as an antidote against extreme pessimism! I attach a copy of it.†

Ottawa, April 7, 1949

RE: HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT WITH THE INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION

On March 23, 1949, Mr. Pearson authorized the Department to discuss with officials of ICAO a draft "Headquarters Agreement" on Privileges and Immunities. The draft would extend to ICAO only the privileges and immunities capable of implementation under existing federal legislation; it would not extend exemption from provincial or municipal taxes. A principal object of these discussions was to determine whether ICAO would insist on privileges and immunities extending specifically to provincial and municipal taxes which might mean that these authorities would have to be asked to join in the negotiations.

2. A meeting was held Monday, April 4, with Dr. [E.] Pépin, the Legal Adviser of ICAO, in the course of which our representatives learned that ICAO would not be content with anything less than total exemption from taxation of every kind both for the Organization and its Representatives of Members, viz., federal, provincial and municipal taxes, direct and indirect. It was stated that Council Members are of the opinion that the Government of Canada, as a host state, is at least morally obliged to grant total exemption from taxation, since many of the Members of the United Nations and Specialized Agencies have done so with consequent benefit to Canada in the way of reduced contributions to the budgets of these Organizations.

3. Accordingly, it would appear that in order to satisfy ICAO demands, the contemplated agreement cannot be concluded until (and unless) we obtain the concurrence of the Provincial and Municipal authorities at least in regard to exemption from taxation coming within their jurisdiction. The problem is: should the concurrence be obtained by direct negotiation between ICAO and these authorities or should the Provincial and Municipal authorities be invited to join with the Federal Government in the negotiations now proceeding?

4. In some instances, ICAO has sought exemptions from provincial taxes by direct representations to the province. In particular, ICAO sought to obtain free licence plates for the cars of the Organization and of the Representatives of Members. The provincial authorities, we were informed by Dr. Pepin, turned down the request, although Consuls in Montreal are not charged. This decision on the part of the provincial authorities has apparently much disturbed the Council Members. At a session held recently, they instructed their Secretary-General to write to the Premier of Quebec to find out just what the status of ICAO was and especially where they stood in regard to a privilege, already granted to Consuls, to which they considered themselves also entitled. We were informed that the Council Members have decided not to purchase their 1949 licence plates but to await developments. It seems that they are even disposed to face possible court action. Similarly, instructions are being issued to discontinue paying the provincial sales tax, particularly on printing matter which involves an expenditure of many thousands of dollars without this point first being approved by the appropriate authorities.

5. This attitude on the part of the Council, coupled as it appears to be with reluctance on the part of the provincial authorities, may cause considerable embarrassment if it is not modified in time. Even now there is a Resolution before the Council which, if adopted, will provide that the seat of the Headquarters can be moved to another country by a straight majority vote.

6. My own view is that before replying to Dr. Pepin (who has officially sought our views) on the relatively minor issue of licence plates, we should first determine whether we would wish to discuss the general problem (of immunity from provincial and municipal taxation) with the appropriate provincial authorities. Our reply to Dr. Pepin would almost certainly be affected by the attitude of the Quebec authorities. If, for instance, they were to appear to favour tax exemption in principle, the problem of licence plates might not have to be taken up specially with Mr. Duplessis.¹

7. To forestall a possible serious breach in the relations between ICAO and Quebec, not to say between ICAO and the Federal Government, and to be in a position to proceed to a conclusion, the government might think it advisable to sound out informally the Provincial Government on their attitude to an agreement of the kind desired by ICAO. Soundings might be made to Quebec by officials of the Department; on the other hand the Government might wish to have this done at the political level. If there were grounds for believing that the Provincial Government were favourably disposed, their concurrence to the general terms of the Agreement and to the granting of exemptions from provincial taxation might then be requested either by the Federal Government or by ICAO direct. ICAO might negotiate directly with Quebec or, alternatively, Quebec might be asked to join in the negotiations with the Federal Government. My own feeling is that the former procedure would be preferable.

8. The alternative appears to be for us to tell ICAO to go ahead, so far as provincial and municipal taxes are concerned, and to negotiate directly with the province, without any intervention by us. After all it is the municipality and the province which profit most from the presence of ICAO at Montreal. On the other hand we would be telling ICAO to "go ahead", without ourselves knowing where the chips might fall, and we might, probably would, be accused of not furthering to the maximum the desires of ICAO for privileges and immunities.

9. I would appreciate your early instructions since the matter is pressing. You may wish to mention the matter in Cabinet.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION HEADQUARTERS—MONTREAL

When Montreal was selected as headquarters for the International Civil Aviation Organization, the facilities of the Department of Public Works were made available to find temporary accommodation for which the Organization paid the usual commercial rental.

2. Discussions have taken place between International Civil Aviation Organization, the Department of Public Works and the Canadian National Railways concerning the terms upon which the Organization could obtain permanent headquarters, consisting of 91,020 square feet, in the International Aviation building being constructed in Montreal by the Canadian National Railways. It has been agreed that the space should be leased by the Department of Public Works, the International Civil Aviation Organization to be a sub-tenant.

3. The Canadian National Railways are willing to lease this space to the Department of Public Works for twenty years at a rental of $3.25 per square foot per annum, which rental is reasonable in comparison with that being paid for similar accommodation in Montreal.

4. The Secretary General of the International Civil Aviation Organization has stated that he does not consider the Organization should be asked to pay an amount in excess of $2.50 per square foot per annum including the amortization over the term of the lease of special work, being undertaken to adapt the premises for the requirements of the Organization, at an estimated cost of between $250,000 and $300,000. Annual payments of $18,484.32, or 20.307¢ per square foot would repay $275,000 with interest in twenty years.

5. The Secretary General bases his request on the example of the interest-free loan granted by the United States Government to finance the United Nations headquarters in New York. He states that similar offers have been made by European Governments to provide suitable accommodation if they are selected as the headquarters for subsidiary bodies of the United Nations.

6. The Director of the Cost Inspection and Audit Division of the Office of the Comptroller of the Treasury advises that $2.50 per square foot would appear to be a reasonable estimate of the cost of the space to be leased by the International Civil Aviation Organization. The rent asked by the Canadian National Railways will, therefore, result in an annual profit of $68,265.

7. I do not consider the Canadian Government has any obligation to provide headquarters accommodation for the International Civil Aviation Organization below cost, but I do not think the rental charged to the Organization should include a profit for a Canadian Government-owned corporation.

8. I, therefore, recommend that space in the International Aviation building be rented to the International Civil Aviation Organization at $2.50 per square foot per annum plus an amount that will repay, over the term of the lease, the cost of special work being undertaken to adapt the premises for the requirements of the Organization, and that the Department of External Affairs provide, in its estimates, a sum sufficient to pay to the Department of Public Works the difference between the rent to be received from the Organization and that to be paid to the Canadian National Railways.²

RE: HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT WITH ICAO

Further to my memorandum of April 7, and in accordance with your suggestion, I asked ICAO to send us a letter requesting the Government to use its good offices in arranging for representatives of ICAO to meet with the appropriate authorities in the Province of Quebec in order that satisfactory arrangements for privileges and immunities coming within the provincial jurisdiction might be concluded concurrently with the completion of a Headquarters Agreement with the Government of Canada. Such a letter, dated April 14, 1949,† has been received and is now attached for your consideration.

² Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 12 avril 1949.
Approved by Cabinet on April 12, 1949.

2. You also suggested that I might prepare a draft communication to the Premier of Quebec along the lines indicated in paragraph 1 above. Attached for your consideration is such a draft communication.†

3. You may wish to know, on July 22 (and again on October 4, 1948), the Department wrote to the Quebec authorities on the general question of immunities for diplomats, as well as for international organizations such as the International Civil Aviation Organization. The letter of October 4 was in the nature of a hastener. However, it referred specifically to the question of free licence plates and of tax-free gasoline. We were informed by Mr. Duplessis on December 9 that his Executive Council had decided that, in dealing with questions of exemption from provincial taxation, they would prefer to examine and decide each individual case on its merits rather than to accord privileges on a general basis. In addition, he made a statement to the press in January, 1949, to the effect that the Province of Quebec would not grant diplomatic immunity to Soviet representatives.

4. This experience, coupled with the fact that ICAO has already been refused free licence plates (by Quebec provincial officials) for 1949, leads me to believe that the approach to the Quebec Government should be most tactful. It might indeed be advisable to defer writing formally to the Premier of Quebec, until the nature of the probable reply has been ascertained through informal soundings. These could, of course, be taken either on the official or on the political level. Mr. Pearson, in considering the reply to be made to Mr. Duplessis' letter of December 9, indicated (on January 19, 1949) that:—

“It is my view that no letter of any kind should be sent to Mr. Duplessis at this time”.

5. The foregoing is not particularly reassuring as to the probable reaction of Quebec to our “good offices”. There is, certainly, some risk of a formal and positive rebuff. It might therefore be better (so far as satisfying ICAO is concerned) not to run the risk of such a closure until ICAO has had an opportunity of dealing directly with the provincial authorities.

6. If, after informal soundings have been taken, it appears that the Government of Quebec is not willing to cooperate, the Government might not wish to write formally to Mr. Duplessis, but to advise ICAO that the Organization is free to initiate arrangements directly with the provincial authorities. If, at this later stage, ICAO is unsuccessful, it would still be possible for the Government to espouse ICAO's cause formally with the Province.

7. I would be most grateful if you could indicate whether the probable Quebec reaction should (as suggested) first be ascertained informally, either at the political or official level, or whether you think that we should now communicate formally with Mr. Duplessis along the lines of the attached draft. The letter, if it goes forward, would of course be in the French language. As now drafted, it is addressed by the Prime Minister to Mr. Duplessis. A possible alternative, however, would be for a letter to go from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Provincial Secretary.

8. You may wish to discuss these matters with your Cabinet colleagues. Mr. Pearson has of course been most actively interested.

9. The matter is of some urgency in that the Council of ICAO meets on June 8 and hopes that its status in Canada (both under the principal Headquarters Agreement and under a supplementary agreement with Quebec) may be settled at the sessions beginning on that date. The principal agreement is now in its final stages and could, I think, be quickly completed. ICAO is however anxious that the provincial aspects are completed simultaneously.

to Secretary of State for External Affairs*

[Ottawa], June 1, 1949

RE: HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT ON PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES WITH THE INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION

At the invitation of the Department of External Affairs, ICAO submitted to the Government on March 24, 1948, a provisional draft of a headquarters agreement, dealing with the privileges and immunities to be accorded by the Government of Canada, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs found acceptable as a basis for discussion. This draft was then submitted to the various interested departments for examination and comment. A number of revisions were found to be necessary. However, agreement on a new text was reached among the departments concerned in May of this year. The draft has since been prepared in final form and unofficially submitted to ICAO's Legal Adviser, who is prepared to recommend its acceptance by the Organization.

2. The draft agreement would regulate such matters affecting ICAO as come within the federal jurisdiction. There are, however, other matters which lie within the competence of the provincial and municipal authorities and which the officials of ICAO consider necessary to the fulfilment of its purposes. The good offices of the Department of External Affairs were accordingly requested by the Secretariat of the Organization in its negotiations with the Province of Quebec. In a letter dated April 25, 1949,† addressed to the Premier of that Province, the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs enquired whether the appropriate provincial authorities would be prepared to enter negotiations with ICAO on the subject of privileges and immunities within provincial jurisdiction. A reply to this enquiry has not yet been received.

3. Since the Assembly of ICAO will convene in Montreal on June 7, the Department asked the Secretary-General of ICAO whether the Organization would prefer to proceed now toward the conclusion of an agreement with the Government of Canada or to await a response from the Province of Quebec. The Secretary-General of ICAO in a reply dated May 31 requested the Department of External Affairs to move formally towards the conclusion of the agreement. Attached is the text of the draft agreement.†

4. Ideally, I suppose that the consent of the Houses of Parliament should be obtained. However, this is not legally required and would be impossible to obtain. Presumably, the Government might be prepared to assume the responsibility for regularizing the position of ICAO in Canada, even though Parliament is not sitting. As you know, we are in default vis-a-vis ICAO in this matter.

5. I believe you know that the opinion has been expressed that the agreement could be implemented by Order-in-Council under the Privileges and Immunities (United Nations) Act, if that Act is given a liberal interpretation. I am not sure whether you would wish or would have an opportunity to raise this with your colleagues in the Cabinet.³

6. In the light of the foregoing, it is recommended that authority be granted to proceed formally with the conclusion of a headquarters agreement, in accordance with the attached draft, establishing the privileges and immunities to be accorded to the International Civil Aviation Organization, to the representatives of its members and to its officials in Canada; and to effect an exchange of notes between the Government of Canada and the International Civil Aviation Organization.

IACO'S HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT

I refer to Mr. Heeney's memorandum to the Minister of June 3,† to which was attached for his signature a letter to the President of the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization, offering to conclude a Headquarters Agreement on the basis of the Fifth Draft, this course of action having been approved by Cabinet decision on June 2.

2. The following is a brief summary of developments since that time.

3. The Secretary General of ICAO acknowledged our letter on August 23 and stated that, owing to pressure of work, the Council had not been in a position to complete a detailed examination of our draft. He mentioned, however, that inasmuch as our draft agreement covered only such matters as are within the jurisdiction of the federal Government, the Council had decided to initiate negotiations with the provincial and municipal authorities on matters coming within their sphere of action. The Secretary General concluded by expressing his satisfaction with our offer of good offices in facilitating the proposed negotiations between the Organization and the provincial authorities (cf., our letter to the Premier of Quebec, April 28, 1949†).

Approved by Cabinet on June 2, 1949.

4. A discussion eventually took place on November 5 between Mr. Duplessis on the one hand and Messrs. Roper and Pepin of the Organization on the other. I was informed by Dr. Pepin that this meeting had been conducted in an atmosphere of cordiality and that the Organization considered it to have been successful. Moreover, Mr. Duplessis had agreed that The Honourable Onesime Gagnon⁴ should meet with representatives of the Organization in order to examine in detail the question of privileges to be extended to the Organization by the Province of Quebec.

5. This development promises to remove one of the most serious remaining difficulties in the way of the establishment of ICAO's status in Canada.

6. On September 15 the Secretary General submitted to us a list of suggested modifications to the Fifth Draft. These were carefully examined with the various interested departments and, on the basis of the conclusions mutually reached, a further draft (the Sixth Draft) has been prepared and transmitted to the Organization together with an explanatory letter. Dr. Pepin has intimated to me to-day that this Sixth Draft will be acceptable to the Organization.

7. As you know, I have been working on this Agreement continuously since last April and as a result have been unable to take any holidays. Provided you have no objection, I propose to take a vacation starting December 12.

8. In anticipation of this, I have prepared a draft memorandum for the Cabinet, together with the draft order-in-council required for the implementation of the Agreement. Both of these documents are being placed in the hands of the Legal Adviser, as it is understood that the matter of the actual signature of the Agreement and the submission of the order-in-council will be undertaken by the Legal Division.

9. As regards the implementation and initial administration of the Agreement, this will of course require close attention, which I shall be able to give upon my return.

10. I might add that in my conversation with Dr. Pepin this morning, he informed me that he was leaving for Europe this week and would not return to Montreal until January 25. This means that the question of the Headquarters Agreement will remain in abeyance until his return.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION; LONDON CONFERENCE

3. *The Minister of Transport*⁵ reported that the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization had convened a conference to be held in London beginning April 20th, 1949, in order to revise and extend the international agreement on North Atlantic ocean weather stations. Concurrently, the conference would consider a request from the Danish government that financial aid be extended towards the operation and maintenance of Loran stations in the Faroe Islands and Greenland.

4. Mr. Chevrier, referring to the proposed revision and extension of the international agreement on North Atlantic ocean weather stations, suggested that Canada participate in the conference and undertake to continue a contribution towards the aforesaid agreement, such contribution, however, not to exceed provision and operation of one ship in the North Atlantic at an estimated annual cost of $400,000.

Since November 22nd, 1947, the Royal Canadian Navy had operated one ship (approximately 42% of Station "B") in the North Atlantic at an estimated annual cost of $400,000.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Joint memorandum, undated, Minister of Transport, Minister of National Defence and Secretary of State for External Affairs—Cabinet Document 950).†

5. Mr. Chevrier, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 6th on the suggested Canadian contribution towards the maintenance of Danish Loran stations, reported that the Canadian government operated three Loran stations. One of these was located in British Columbia and the other two in Nova Scotia. The approximate annual operating and maintenance costs involved in the operation of these stations were as follows:

Spring Island, B.C.	$65,000
Baccaro, N.S.	$45,000
Deming, N.S.	$50,000

The initial cost of establishing a Loran station was approximately $300,000 depending upon the accessibility of the location.

⁵ Lionel Chevrier.

(Memorandum, Deputy Minister of Transport (Air Services), Apr. 7, 1949).†

Since the Canadian government received no assistance from other countries benefiting from the operation of Canadian Loran stations, it was suggested that the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming ICAO conference be instructed to indicate that the Canadian government would be willing to contribute towards the maintenance of Danish Loran stations in the Faroe Islands and Greenland provided similar assistance were extended to Loran stations operated and maintained by Canada.

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the reports by the Minister of Transport and:

(a) approved Canada's participation in the ICAO conference to be held in London beginning April 20th, the Canadian delegation to consist of the following:

C.S. Booth—Canadian Representative to the Council of ICAO—Head of Delegation;

P.D. McTaggart-Cowan—Department of Transport—Delegate;

L.E. Coffey—Department of Transport—Delegate;

O.G. Stoner—Department of External Affairs—Delegate;

(b) agreed that Canada continue a contribution towards the international agreement on North Atlantic ocean weather stations, such contribution, however, not to exceed the provision and operation of one weather ship in the North Atlantic at an estimated annual cost of $400,000; and

(c) agreed that the Canadian delegation be instructed to indicate to the conference that the Canadian government would be willing to contribute towards the cost of operation of Danish Loran stations in the Faroe Islands and Greenland provided similar financial aid were extended to Loran stations operated and maintained by Canada.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], October 26, 1949

I refer to Item No. 5 of this week's Cabinet Agenda concerning Pacific Weather Stations.

The United States State Department have been pressing us incessantly over the past few months to approve this network of Pacific Ocean Weather Stations. There is a fairly strong international commitment on Canada's part to supply one complete station in the Pacific in addition to the undertakings which we have made bilaterally with the United States and which are referred to in Cabinet Document No. 1087.† The United States authorities feel there is an additional commitment as a result of the recent revision of the North Atlantic Weather Stations Agreement. When this Agreement was being revised at London last May the Canadian contribution, by the yardstick adopted by the Conference, amounted to about one and a half ships. However, Canada stated she would only supply one ship. The United States accepted this on the understanding that Canada would shortly be relieved of this responsibility in the North Atlantic and assume the operation of a full station in the Pacific. I feel that we should be able to notify the State Department very shortly that we are in a position to undertake these commitments.

PACIFIC OCEAN WEATHER STATION; OPERATION BY CANADA

12. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 28th, 1947, said Canada had agreed to undertake full operation of a North Pacific ocean weather station, provided the United States would undertake full operation of ocean weather station "B" in the North Atlantic at present partly operated by Canada. U.S. action had been delayed on this proposal pending revisions of the International Agreement on North Atlantic Weather Stations. This revision had been made in May, 1949.

Technical representatives of the U.S. and Canadian governments had recommended, in July, 1949, seven locations for North Pacific ocean weather stations. Of the seven stations, four would be operated by the United States, two by Japan and one by Canada. The location of station "P", to be operated by Canada, would be approximately five hundred miles west of Victoria at 50N 145W. Three vessels would be required to operate the station.

It was proposed to transfer to station "P" the vessel "St. Stephen", now operated by the Royal Canadian Navy at station "B" in the North Atlantic. The R.C.N. would provide this vessel and crew for one year and thereafter would assign the "St. Stephen" to the Department of Transport for operation and staffing. The cost of two additional vessels required would be approximately $800,000 and annual cost of operation per vessel was estimated at $350,000, or an estimated total annual cost of operation for the station of $1,000,000.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Joint memorandum, Ministers of National Defence and Transport, Oct. 21, 1949—Cabinet Document 1087).†

13. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that corvettes would probably be suitable for this service and would be less expensive to operate than frigates.

14. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) approved the network of seven Pacific Ocean weather stations recommended by technical representatives of the Canadian and U.S. governments;

(b) agreed that Canada undertake full operation of Pacific Ocean weather station "P" at an estimated annual cost of $1,000,000 provided the United States undertook full operation of North Atlantic Ocean weather station "B";

(c) agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to conclude an agreement to this effect with the U.S. government;

(d) agreed that the Department of Transport provide and operate the vessels required for the station;

(e) approved transfer of ownership of the "St. Stephen" from the Royal Canadian Navy to the Department of Transport; and

(f) agreed that the Minister of Transport consider and report on the possibility of acquiring two corvettes for use in the operation of the station.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE ICAO PROGRAMME FOR JOINT SUPPORT OF AIR
NAVIGATION FACILITIES IN GREENLAND AND THE FAROES

At the ICAO conference held in London, England, in May, 1949, a Final Act was prepared which set out the basis on which the cost of maintaining air navigation facilities in Greenland and the Faroes would be shared by those countries who participated in North Atlantic flying. The Final Act was signed by the Canadian Delegation with the reservation that Canada was not prepared to accept the financial implications. Instructions to sign with this reservation had been sent to the Canadian Delegation since, in the view of the Canadian authorities, Canada was already contributing to the maintenance of North Atlantic air navigation facilities an amount which is in excess of her proportionate share. To this end the Canadian Delegation indicated that Canada wished ICAO to make overall assessment of all facilities in the North Atlantic; all future contributions to ICAO Joint Support schemes in this area would then be based on this survey.

2. Notwithstanding this Canadian reservation a share of the cost of the programme was charged to Canada. ICAO has now sent an official notice of assessment indicating that Canada's first payment is approximately $230,000.

3. Although Canada did not agree to accept her share at the Conference, it is felt for the following reasons that there is strong cause for the Canadian Government to pay at least the initial contribution to this programme;

(a) There is general agreement that the Danish air navigation facilities in Greenland and the Faroes must continue in operation and that Denmark must have financial help in doing so. On numerous occasions Canada has confirmed her agreement with the principles of Joint Support in ICAO. The action of Canada in taking unilateral decision not to contribute to a project which benefits Canadian aircraft and which Canadian authorities agree is essential might strike a serious blow at the principles of Joint Support within ICAO. This might tend to prejudice the success of future projects and might result in the usefulness of ICAO being substantially curtailed in this important field.

(b) Both the United Kingdom and the United States have indicated that they will not pay any excess share which might arise out of Canada's failure to contribute. This contention has been borne out by the fact that neither of these countries has yet accepted their assessment; it appears that they are waiting to see what Canada does before committing themselves.

(c) Prior to the London Conference, Canada gave no advance notice to ICAO of her desire for an overall assessment of all facilities in the North Atlantic. As a result other states were not in a position to offer figures concerning the total facilities which they were supplying. Had the Conference accepted Canada's premise, it would have been necessary to postpone the Conference until the overall assessment could be completed. Obviously this would have been unacceptable to Denmark who required immediate financial assistance.

(d) If Canada decides not to accept her assessment it will mark the first time that we have failed to pay our share of any programme sponsored by an international organization in which we were full participants. There is no question of our actual participation in this programme from a user point of view since these facilities are essential to Trans-Canada Airlines and Royal Canadian Air Force operations. In these circumstances failure to contribute might lead to criticism by other states and might adversely affect Canada's international reputation.

4. The undersigned, with the concurrence of the Minister of Transport, has the honour to recommend that Canada should notify ICAO that the Canadian Government is prepared to accept the first assessment made in connection with this programme. However, it would be clearly indicated that future contributions would not be forthcoming until an overall assessment of North Atlantic facilities as originally proposed by Canada was undertaken by ICAO.⁶

PACIFIC WEATHER STATION; ACQUISITION OF SHIPS

21. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 27th, reported that the possibility of using corvettes as weather ships had been explored.

⁶ Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 3 novembre 1949.
Approved by Cabinet on November 3, 1949.

While Castle class corvettes might meet requirements, they were regarded as less suitable than frigates for this work. Moreover, there were very few corvettes available and the purchase price was likely to be high.

It was accordingly recommended that frigates be used and that steps be taken to acquire the necessary ships and refit them for weather station work. It was estimated that they would cost about $125,000 each and about $175,000 to refit.

22. The Cabinet, after discussion, authorized the Minister of Transport to take steps for the acquisition and refitting of frigates for operation as weather ships, if, upon further examination and after consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it was determined that the use of other ships such as minesweepers was not feasible.

CABINET POLICY IN BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENTS; "FIFTH FREEDOM"

It is expected that in bilateral discussions with the United States and with the United Kingdom, "Fifth Freedom" rights may shortly be granted officially for the first time in Canada. This action would undoubtedly lead to requests from a number of other countries for similar rights. The Air Transport Board is of the opinion that its position in dealing with these requests would be strengthened by a general decision on government policy in regard to extension of these rights.

Fifth freedom, so called, is the traffic on an air route moving between points on the route outside the country of origin of the service. Traffic to and from the country of origin is generally known as third and fourth freedom traffic; e.g. on the route between Canada and the United Kingdom, traffic moving between Canada and the United Kingdom is third and fourth freedom traffic for T.C.A. and B.O.A.C. Traffic between Ireland and the United Kingdom is fifth freedom traffic for T.C.A. but is third and fourth freedom traffic for B.O.A.C. since the two countries involved are outside Canada. Traffic between Ireland and Canada is third and fourth freedom traffic for T.C.A. but fifth freedom traffic for B.O.A.C.

International air services are largely dependent on third and fourth freedom traffic, that is traffic to and from their own country. In international discussions the primary interest in and right of an air line to carry the traffic to and from its own country has always been recognized. When a country grants fifth freedom rights to another country in effect the foreign carrier gets rights which will entitle him to take up some of the traffic to and from the first country; that is, fifth freedom traffic for one carrier is in each case, third and fourth freedom for another country and carriage of fifth freedom traffic results in a diminution of the third and fourth freedom traffic available to some other operator.

The problem has been to maintain a situation which will permit international air lines to have access to the major proportion of their own traffic and yet at the same time, allow a reasonable amount of fifth freedom or pick-up traffic at intermediate points. This latter is important economically to any carrier on a major international route of any distance since the third and fourth freedom traffic diminishes as the carrier moves outward on the route from its homeland. The Canadian government approach to this problem over the last five years has been to seek a multilateral agreement under which all these traffic rights would be freely exchanged between nations in a multilateral document which would include principles and rules that would protect the right of each nation to carry a reasonable proportion of its own traffic and allow, on the other hand, a reasonable scope for exercise of fifth freedom rights. This objective has not been achieved.

In the view of the fact that these matters must now be worked out in bilateral agreements, the Air Transport Board feels that any agreements entered into by Canada, should provide reasonable protection to Canadian air lines operating internationally. This is particularly important in view of the fact that Canada is on the major routes from Europe and Asia to the United States and that the great majority of foreign air lines to and from the United States to Europe and Asia cross Canadian territory; if all exercised unlimited traffic rights in Canada the economic position of Canadian carriers would be seriously prejudiced.

The Board therefore recommends as follows:⁷

(a) In cases where a scheduled Canadian air line wishes to exercise fifth freedom rights in another country, Canada should be prepared to grant fifth freedom rights in Canada in return, provided a satisfactory exchange could be worked out.

(b) In cases where the Canadian line wishes to exercise only third and fourth freedom rights in another country, Canada should grant only third and fourth freedom rights to that country with one exception.

(c) The only exception to (b) should be in cases where fifth freedom rights in Canada requested by the other country were not competing with any present or prospective international or domestic services operated by a Canadian carrier, i.e. to areas outside the United States not served by TCA or CPA; in such cases an exception might be granted by Canada if necessary in order to obtain third and fourth freedom rights required by the Canadian carrier.

⁷ Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 6 avril 1949.

Approved by Cabinet on April 6, 1949.

(d) In cases where a country wishes traffic rights in Canada but no Canadian airline wishes traffic rights in that country in return, no agreement should be made unless the service to be provided by the foreign carrier is required by the public in addition to existing services; no agreement should be made where an additional foreign service would add excessive capacity to existing services and be injurious to a Canadian carrier operating in the region; any such agreement should in any event be limited to third and fourth freedom rights.

(e) In any case where fifth freedom rights in Canada are given, the number of carriers allowed in at any given point with fifth freedom rights should be limited as a measure of protection for third and fourth freedom rights of the domestic carrier; the exact number can only be decided on an ad hoc basis in each case.

(f) The Board would keep under constant review, the effect of any granting of fifth freedom rights; i.e. the amount of traffic carried on this basis. If it appeared that the amount of fifth freedom traffic being carried out of any given point in Canada by either the foreign carrier or carriers with rights at that point, was excessive in relation to the total amount of traffic out of that point or in relation to the total amount of capacity being provided by the foreign air line or air lines, the Board should intervene under authority of the appropriate bilateral agreements to correct the situation.

MULTILATERAL AGREEMENT; CANADIAN POLICY

Recent discussions with U.S.-U.K. and French aviation officials have indicated a substantial interest on the part of all of them in the future of a multilateral air agreement. All are considering the attitude which they should adopt when the matter comes up in the Council of ICAO during the coming winter and at the Assembly next spring. I have been considering the Canadian policy as well with the following general result.

At the Geneva conference in 1947 we came close to reaching a final agreement. For the first time articles on rates, capacity and arbitration were generally accepted. Moreover the general framework of a multilateral agreement was worked out. The conference broke down on the right of a country to limit its grant of fifth freedom rights within the framework of a multilateral agreement.

The Geneva type of multilateral would have provided a broad framework of principles which would apply to the operation of any international services of a signatory state. The actual routes to be operated and the traffic stops to be made would, however, be the subject of bilateral negotiation between the parties concerned and once negotiated the services on the route would have to be operated in accordance with the framework of the multilateral.

I am inclined to think that an attempt might be made to proceed from where we left off in Geneva; that is, we should assume that we have worked out satisfactory articles on capacity, rates and arbitration which hitherto have been among the most controversial topics and should attempt to solve the outstanding problems of the manner in which routes and points of call would be negotiated within the framework of such a multilateral.

The difficulty that arose at Geneva was over U.S. insistence that once a member state had accepted a multilateral it must grant full traffic rights including fifth freedom in all circumstances and over the opposition of other countries to this attitude based upon their belief that they should be in a position to exercise some degree of control over the extent to which they would grant such traffic rights.

I believe a compromise between the two positions is possible. The failure that took place at Geneva really resulted from inability on the part of the United States to define its own position clearly and loss of the initiative in the meeting to certain smaller countries who threw the situation into reverse by insisting on a positive statement that they should be entitled to grant fifth freedom or only third and fourth freedom rights as they wished under the multilateral, an attitude which the United States would not accept as written into the multilateral.

My view is that the Canadians might attempt to bridge the gap by putting up a formula based upon the idea that once a party has accepted the multilateral it may then enter into a route exchange with any other party; that it retains discretion as to whether or not it will make such a route exchange (I don't like this but it would probably be necessary because nations could not accept a commitment to grant rights to a satellite country); that in any case where a route exchange is made, a member state would be committed to granting full traffic rights including fifth freedom at a reasonable point of call in its own territory but that the points of call on the route granted to the other party in third countries would be a subject for negotiation and that the granting country would not be automatically committed to include any point of call which the requesting country wanted.

Put into words the article of the multilateral dealing with this subject might read somewhat as follows:

"Each contracting party agrees to name for any other contracting party with which it is making a route agreement, an airport or airports reasonably situated in its territory at which the airline or airlines of the other party as indicated in the route agreement may pick up and set down traffic. The airport or airports so named and the points in the territories of third countries which may be served from the named airport or airports shall be the subject of bilateral negotiations between the two countries as part of the route agreement."

I would welcome your comments.

Ottawa, September 9, 1949

Dear Mr. Baldwin:

Thank you for sending me a copy of your memorandum of August 10 concerning Canadian policy towards a multilateral air agreement.

In your memorandum you suggested that we should follow the course we adopted at the Geneva multilateral conference in 1947. However I am wondering if the situation for Canada has not altered since then. At the present time we have succeeded in obtaining from the United Kingdom and the United States the majority of rights which our airlines are in a position to use. From an operational point of view I understand that these two countries are the only ones in which Trans-Canada Air Lines would have an interest in Fifth Freedom for some little time. In the case of Canadian Pacific Air Lines we already have negotiations under way which will amend the Australian and New Zealand agreement to include Fifth Freedom. This, together with the recent concessions we have obtained from the United Kingdom and the United States generally satisfies Canadian Pacific Air Lines' present operational demands.

On the other hand there might be some disadvantages for Canada in a multilateral at the present time. If we were party to a multilateral agreement I think we would be obligated to grant, almost without exception, full traffic rights in Canada to all European countries. Under our present policy of bilateralism we have been reasonably successful in granting certain rights to some countries while refusing them to others on a more or less "quid pro quo" basis. However under a multilateral agreement such discriminatory practice would be forbidden. This would mean that half a dozen or more European airlines presently flying to the United States would all seek Fifth Freedom stops in Canada. This would not only adversely affect our trans-Atlantic business but trans-border traffic being carried at the present time by Canadian airlines would also be reduced. At the same time Canadian airlines would not be in a position to operate to Europe and make any use of their reciprocal rights.

There is another difficulty which might arise if we were party to a multilateral agreement. At the present time we are being exposed to the plethora of procedural difficulties and delays which Canadian airlines can experience when they request a license from the United States Civil Aeronautics Board. Other countries may have equally difficult licensing procedures. On the other hand the Canadian procedure is relatively fast and simple. We might at a future date however conceivably be in a position where the applications of Canadian airlines for licenses were being held up in several countries. Under a multilateral agreement where so many nations are involved it would be most difficult to adjust such a situation.

I have only one comment to offer on the proposed article which you suggested might cover route exchanges in a multilateral. I am not sure that the article as worded in your memorandum would ensure that the Canadian government has the right to freely designate the Canadian airport which would be used by foreign airlines. The clause in your memorandum referred to "an airport or airports reasonably situated in its territory". On this basis it might be difficult to justify the designation of Gander as a major international terminal.

From the point of external relations there would be great merit in Canada proposing a formula for a multilateral agreement which could draw together within ICAO those nations who are presently at variance with each other in their views on this subject. I do not wish to take a pessimistic approach to such a possibility, but in this letter I have undertaken to mention some of the difficulties that might arise from a multilateral. However in the last analysis these considerations can no doubt best be determined by the Air Transport Board in consultation with the Canadian carriers.

Yours sincerely,
H.O. MORAN

Dear Mr. Moran:

I have your letter of September 9th regarding Canadian policy toward the multilateral air agreement.

I am in full agreement with your observations regarding the new factors in the situation which for the present, make less desirable to us such a multilateral air agreement. It is for this reason that the general line we are taking is not to take any initiative or press for further discussion on the multilateral but should have a line of approach prepared which we can follow should the need arise.⁸

While a multilateral air agreement does not offer the same attraction to us that it did a few years ago and while the type of multilateral that is likely to materialize is far from satisfactory, I am of the opinion that in the long run such an agreement would be in our interests.

Sincerely yours,

Canberra, August 30, 1949

Dear Mr. Plumptre:

I am sending by concurrent air mail despatch No. 522,† dated today, concerning a proposed amendment to the Australia-Canada Air Agreement of June, 1946, and I would like to offer a few comments which I did not want to include in the despatch and which you may take for what you think they are worth.

You will recall that the Minister for Transport on 2nd July, 1948, announced the Canadian Government's decision to designate Canadian Pacific Air Lines to operate the Vancouver-Sydney air route. This announcement was a cruel blow to the Australian Government who would have preferred and actually expected that Canada would designate T.C.A. to the route. The Minister for Civil Aviation repeatedly expressed disappointment at the decision and an exchange of telegrams between the Prime Ministers of Australia and Canada took place. At the third meeting of S.P.A.T.C. held in Wellington, New Zealand, last November-December, the Australian delegation, led by Mr. Drakeford, openly criticized Canada's action in designating a privately-owned company to operate to Australia and the situation, as Mr. Rive and Air Vice Marshall [A.] Ferrier can tell you, was, to say the least, at times quite tense.

Although the Australian Government had no option but to accept our Government's decision, from all our dealings with them since I cannot but feel that they still have not resigned themselves completely to it. They appear to put out special efforts to make things as difficult as possible by employing delaying tactics whenever we have occasion to approach them on matters dealing with the operation of the Vancouver-Sydney route. For instances of this I should like to refer to your telegram No. 61 of 3rd May† in which you instructed us to seek the Australian Government's concurrence of C.P.A.'s designation. Although we acted immediately here a period of almost two months elapsed before this concurrence was granted. Again, on 24th June we approached the Australian Government along the lines directed in your despatch No. 314 of 15th June† seeking fifth freedom rights on a similar basis to those which had been enjoyed by the Australian air line operating to Canada for the past three years. Although there would appear to be no justifiable reason for it the Australian authorities again delayed for over two months in providing a reply in spite of the fact that, as directed in your despatch No. 378 of 10th August,† we persisted in pressing them for it. In both cases, of course, the replies were favourable.

I should not want you to think that the above remarks are the product of a defeatist mind on my part. I am sure our former High Commissioner, Mr. K.A. Greene, would support all I have said. I know for a fact, as I have been told by two different officers of the Australian Department of External Affairs, that the trouble does not spring from that Department but rather from the Department of Civil Aviation which appears to revel in attempting to frustrate us every time we approach the Australian Government on such matters.

Yours very truly,

Dear Mr. Rau:

Thank you for your letter of August 30 in which you commented on the uncooperative attitude which Australian aviation officials are assuming vis a vis Canadian Pacific Air Lines operations between Vancouver and Sydney.

We have been generally aware of this situation since the return of our delegation from the meeting of the South Pacific Air Transport Council in Wellington last year. Moreover we have also felt that this Australian attitude had some bearing on the slowness which has been evidenced by the New Zealand Government in their negotiations with us on a bilateral air agreement.⁹ As you know, the latter agreement has not yet been finalized, although the New Zealand authorities initialled the draft in Wellington with Air Vice Marshall Ferrier last November.

Because of this situation we have impressed on the officials of Canadian Pacific Air Lines the need for the fullest cooperation with the Australian authorities. By virtue of this and our own display of good will within the South Pacific Air Transport Council I trust in time we will be able to break down the intransigence of Mr. Drakeford and the members of his Department.

In despatch No. 413 of September 10† we forwarded to you the specific wording for the amendment of the Canadian-Australian air agreement which would enable both countries to exercise Fifth Freedom. Since the Australian authorities

PROPOSED AIR AGREEMENT WITH CHINA

When the Canadian Government designated Canadian Pacific Air Lines to operate air services to the Pacific region it was anticipated that one route would be to the north via Alaska, Tokyo, Shanghai and Hong Kong. Canadian Pacific Air Lines have indicated that in addition to the value, on a long-term basis, of stops in China on this route, there is at present a great amount of traffic being generated on the Shanghai-Hong Kong portion of the route. Since they anticipate being able to begin operations towards the end of this summer, C.P.A. have requested us to secure the necessary traffic rights for them in China. This would require the negotiation of a bilateral air agreement with China.

2. Beyond these economic arguments advanced by C.P.A. and which are supported by the Minister of Transport, I believe there are certain political advantages in concluding an air agreement with the present Government of China even though its future is uncertain. In the event of a change of government, it would be preferable to take the risk that a Communist-controlled government would honour the existing obligations of the former government rather than be forced to prematurely raise the question of directly recognizing a new government by approaching them to negotiate an air agreement.

3. On the other hand, it was thought that consideration should be given as to whether, should the present Government of China fall, there would be a certain disadvantage from the security point of view, in having an agreement with a Communist-controlled government which would give them the right to fly their civil aircraft over Canadian territory or land at specified Canadian airports.

4. The Chiefs of Staff Committee meeting on April 5, however, cleared the proposal for an air agreement with China from the security point of view. In addition, Article X of the proposed agreement permits its termination three months after the date of receipt of the notice of termination by either contracting party.

5. Informal explorations have already been made by our Ambassador in China who has reported that the present Chinese administration is prepared to negotiate a bilateral air agreement.¹⁰

6. It has been the practice for bilateral air agreements to be negotiated on the authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of Transport, without seeking special authority from Cabinet. The Minister of Transport has already informed the chairman of the Air Transport Board that he agrees to the opening of negotiations with the Chinese Government. If you agree, therefore, I will instruct our Ambassador in China to formally approach the Chinese Government and propose the negotiation of a bilateral air agreement.

BILATERAL AIR TRANSPORT AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND CHINA

In April of this year we opened negotiations with the Chinese Nationalist Government for the purpose of concluding a bilateral air agreement which would enable Canadian Pacific Air Lines to exercise traffic rights in Shanghai. These negotiations broke down in the face of subsequent political developments in China. However Canadian Pacific Air Lines are still most anxious to secure landing rights in Shanghai since there is a great volume of traffic originating from that city.

Mr. Davis, the Canadian Ambassador to China, has suggested that it might be possible for Canadian Pacific Air Lines to negotiate a purely commercial ad hoc arrangement with the new Chinese Government for a service to Shanghai. This agreement would be a non-governmental level, and would not prejudice any future bilateral negotiations or raise the question of recognition of the new government.

It is my feeling that Mr. Davis's suggestion is a good one, but a little premature. The Communists are now engaged in the intricate task of organizing the adminis-

TRANSPORT; AIR TRAFFIC RIGHTS IN CHINA

42. The Minister of Transport said that, in order to operate its air route to the Orient, Canadian Pacific Air Lines would require certain traffic rights in Communist-held China. C.P.A. felt that they might be successful in negotiating for such rights direct with the Communist government and had requested authority to enter into negotiations immediately.¹²

43. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that such direct negotiation might possibly cause some future embarrassment to the Canadian government. The implications should be carefully considered before the company was authorized to negotiate.

44. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the suggestion of the Minister of Transport that Canadian Pacific Air Lines be authorized to open negotiations for traffic rights in Communist-held China and deferred decision pending further consideration.

REVISION OF THE BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED KINGDOM AND CANADA

The United Kingdom have now made the formal proposal that ministerial discussions to revise the bilateral air agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom should take place in London, England, from the 21st to the 23rd of July. There will also be presumably an exchange of draft agreements prior to this date together with some preliminary discussions at the official level.

The Chairman of the Air Transport Board has advised me that this arrangement is satisfactory to Mr. Chevrier who, barring any unforeseen difficulties, has planned to attend himself.

At the present time a draft is being prepared by the Canadian authorities which can be forwarded for the consideration of the United Kingdom authorities. The format of this draft will be generally in keeping with the standard type of the bilateral air agreement normally concluded by Canada. The draft will consolidate all existing agreements or arrangements with the United Kingdom and in addition, will propose certain new traffic rights exchanges for both countries.

One of these will be the grant to the United Kingdom of full traffic rights at Gander. As you know, the United Kingdom presently exercise traffic rights to Gander by virtue of an exchange of notes which extend these rights of the United Kingdom only until June 30, 1949. The Interdepartmental Committee on Civil Aviation at its last meeting recommended that there should be a further extension until the 31st of August, 1949, pending the completion of the new agreement.

If you agree with this procedure, I have prepared for your signature a note to the Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, suggesting that this extension be formalized by an exchange of notes.¹³

CANADA-U.K. AIR AGREEMENTS; PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

24. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister reported upon the progress being made in current discussions with the United Kingdom leading to a revision of the Canada-U.K. air agreement.

The Canadian delegation were seeking landing rights at Hong Kong, traffic rights at Barbados and other revisions of the present West Indies agreement.

The U.K. delegation were seeking traffic rights at Montreal on their London-Chicago route, traffic rights at Montreal and Toronto on their London-New York route, and rights to fly across Canadian territory with landing rights at either Churchill or The Pas, Manitoba.

In view of the questions that these proposals would raise, it was anticipated that the draft agreement emerging from the discussions would be referred to the respective governments for their consideration prior to signature.

25. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister on the progress of Canada-U.K. discussions in connection with a new air agreement.

CANADA-U.K. AIR AGREEMENT; SIGNING POWERS

6. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of July 5th, stated that negotiations for a new air agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom had been concluded on August 2nd.

The air agreement represented a step forward in that it adopted a much simplified and more logical structure than that generally employed in bilateral air agreements in the past. It also granted fifth freedom rights for the first time in agreements of this nature between Canada and the United Kingdom.

It was recommended that the Minister of Transport be authorized to conclude and sign, on behalf of the government of Canada, the new Canada-U.K. air agreement.

7. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the Minister of Transport be authorized to conclude and sign, on behalf of the government of Canada, the air agreement recently negotiated by Canada and the United Kingdom; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly.

BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENTS WITH THE UNITED STATES; DISCUSSION; CANADIAN DELEGATION

7. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 6th, reported that May 23rd had been tentatively set as a date for discussions with the United States at Sulphur Springs, North Carolina.

The primary purpose of these discussions would be revision of the existing Canada-United States Bilateral Air Agreement and arrangements regarding the reciprocal granting of traffic rights, including an exchange of "fifth freedom" rights.

8. Mr. Chevrier recommended that Canada participate in these discussions and that the Canadian delegation consist of representatives of the Air Transport Board, the Department of Transport (Air), and the Department of External Affairs; the delegation to be under the chairmanship of a Minister.

9. The Prime Minister observed that it would be difficult for a member of the government to participate in any lengthy discussions at that time; it might be ascertained whether any member or members of the United States Cabinet would participate in the proposed negotiations.

In the meantime, approval in principle could be given to Canada's participation in the forthcoming discussions, decision on the Canadian delegation's composition to be deferred pending return to Ottawa of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

10. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved in principle Canada's participation in the forthcoming bilateral air negotiations with the United States, to be held at Sulphur Springs, North Carolina, beginning May 23rd, and deferred decision on the delegation's composition pending return to Ottawa of the Secretary of State for External Affairs; the Secretary to the Cabinet to ascertain whether any member or members of the United States Cabinet would participate in these discussions.

BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENTS WITH THE UNITED STATES; CANADIAN DELEGATION

43. The Minister of Transport, referring to the discussion at the meeting of April 27th, reported that information had been received from the U.S. State department on the composition of the American delegation to bilateral air negotiations to be held at Sulphur Springs, North Carolina, beginning May 23rd. Final decision respecting the U.S. delegation would be made the following week, but it was not expected that the head of the delegation would be above sub-Cabinet level. He might possibly be a member of the Civil Aviation Board.

44. Mr. Chevrier suggested that Mr. Symington of Trans-Canada Air Lines might be appointed head of the Canadian delegation in the event that it would be impossible for a member of the government to attend the discussions. In addition to representatives from the Air Transport Board, the Department of Transport and the Department of External Affairs, the Canadian delegation might also include a representative of Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

45. The Prime Minister suggested that if representatives of T.C.A. and C.P.A. were included in the Canadian delegation, there was a possibility that the American delegation would have to include a large number of representatives of American commercial air lines. In the circumstances, it might be preferable to appoint representatives of T.C.A. and C.P.A. merely as advisers to the Canadian delegation.

46. Mr. St. Laurent suggested further that choice of the head of the Canadian delegation be deferred pending final decision on the composition of the American delegation.

47. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming bilateral air negotiations with the United States consist of representatives of the Air Transport Board (including the Chairman), the Department of Transport (Air) and the Department of External Affairs; representatives of T.C.A. and C.P.A. to be appointed as advisers if required; and,

(b) that decision as to the head of the Canadian delegation be deferred pending information on the composition of the U.S. delegation.¹⁴

[Ottawa], June 1, 1949

The following document contains a report on the Canada-United States civil aviation discussions and the comments of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Civil Aviation on certain problems related thereto.

Report

During the civil aviation discussions between Canada and the United States in New York last week, a new draft bilateral agreement was prepared and accepted in principle by both parties but was not signed. This agreement would provide that Canada be granted rights for a direct trans-border service between Montreal and New York while the United States would be permitted to extend its present trans-border service between Great Falls and Lethbridge on to Edmonton and would be authorized to operate a direct service from New York to Toronto in place of its present Buffalo-Toronto service. On the through routes the United States would be granted a through route (presently operated by three U.S. carriers) from the United States to Europe with traffic rights at Gander and a through route from the United States to the Orient (presently operated by one U.S. carrier) with traffic rights at Edmonton. Canada would receive traffic rights at Tampa, St. Petersburg Florida on its through route to the Caribbean and traffic rights at Honolulu on the C.P.A. service to Australasia.

Both delegations are of the opinion that this is a fair and reasonable agreement. The document was not signed because of the U.S. desire that either a separate agreement be signed giving the U.S. military base at Stephenville in Newfoundland the status of an alternate airport for Atlantic services (to be used when Gander is closed) or alternatively that the bilateral contain a stipulation that it would not be effective until an agreement as to Stephenville was made.

The importance placed upon Stephenville for civil aviation lies in the fact that it was prior to April 1st used as an alternate to Gander; after Confederation, while a temporary three months extension of traffic rights at Gander was granted by the Canadian government, Stephenville was not retained as an alternate and may now be used only in emergency in which event the aircraft must go onward to Moncton or Sydney or Gander for clearance.

The U.S. delegation was anxious to sign the bilateral agreement and might perhaps have dropped the contingency clause if they could have been certain of support by their own airline operators. Six U.S. operators would be affected by the new bilateral. One, Colonial Airlines, will oppose the bilateral in any case, but the U.S. delegation felt it could justify the bilateral so long as the other five carriers would support it. Of these five, the three operating through Gander, when consulted towards the close of the discussions, took the line that in the absence of some assurance regarding Stephenville they could not support the bilateral agreement.

Use of Stephenville as an alternate for civil aviation purposes is a reasonable proposition from the point of view of Atlantic operations, provided practical details can be worked out, and would be of considerable benefit to all Atlantic operators. Trans-Canada Air Lines supports this view and in fact prior to Confederation, at T.C.A. request, the Canadian government had urged that Stephenville be opened up on an even broader basis. The Canadian delegation realized that the question of civil use of Stephenville was however, related to other broad questions of importance to the government regarding the position of the U.S. bases in Newfoundland and that the government would wish to consider it in this context.

Subsequently as a result of consultation between the Ministers of Transport, Trade and Commerce and National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the importance of early signature of the new bilateral agreement, the United States has been informed that the Canadian government would agree to the designation of Stephenville as an alternate airport to Gander on the understanding that this action on the part of Canada would be taken into consideration in the further discussions of the matters connected with the U.S. military bases in Newfoundland which Canada wishes to take up with the United States.

As a result of discussion of this problem by the Inter-departmental Committee on Civil Aviation the following relevant factors have been brought out:

(1) The designation of Stephenville as an alternate airport raises a number of physical and economic problems which will have to be worked out both in Ottawa and in consultation with the U.S. authorities. It is therefore proposed that if acceptable to the United States rather than attempting to work out the detailed agreement necessary at this stage before signature of the bilateral, an exchange of notes between the Canadian and U.S. governments take place, stating that both governments agree to the designation of Stephenville as an alternate and that discussions will be initiated at once with a view to conclusion of a detailed agreement for this purpose prior to opening Stephenville as an alternate.

(2) The designation of Stephenville as an alternate should be on a non-discriminatory basis, i.e. should make Stephenville available directly to all aircraft entitled to use Gander rather than limiting it to the aircraft of the United States and Canada.

(3) Customs, Immigration and Health in consequence of the designation of Stephenville as an alternate will be faced with the problem of providing a staff at Stephenville for clearance of aircraft. Any agreement should be on the basis that U.S. authorities at Stephenville will provide the necessary facilities for the Canadian governmental staff required there.

(4) The matter of use of customs free gasoline at Stephenville also raises a problem on the part of the Department of National Revenue which will have to be determined in the detailed discussions.

(5) Aircraft presently landing at Stephenville do not pay any regular landing fee and the danger exists that heavy use of Stephenville would reduce the revenues received by the government from landing fees at Gander or alternate airports under Canadian control. While it is true that U.S. military authorities are not likely to encourage the use of a military base by civil aircraft, nevertheless the Canadian authorities should do what they can to protect themselves from this particular danger. For one thing they can rely upon the statement which the U.S. government is prepared to write into the agreement on Stephenville to the effect that it may be used only when the responsible Canadian authorities at Gander determine that weather conditions or other reasons do not permit use of Gander. It may also be desirable to extend the review of trans-Atlantic landing fees which is presently taking place, and change the basis of approach to this subject so that instead of providing a landing fee for the use of a specific airport on Atlantic operations, all facilities provided by the Canadian government, no matter where, should be considered as a single packet for which a fee is charged. Under this approach a system of payment to the Canadian government on the basis of any landing on trans-Atlantic operations within the boundaries of Canada related to this packet might be introduced in a fashion which would include Stephenville rather than maintaining the present system of relating the fee to the use of any single airport. This would provide an economic deterrent to excessive use of Stephenville.

(6) It is also proposed that the U.S. government be requested to agree with Canada that Argentia, the other U.S. military base in Newfoundland which is near St. John's be designated as an alternate to Torbay, the domestic terminal of T.C.A. operations. This would be of considerable benefit to T.C.A.

(7) It is further proposed that in opening up Stephenville the U.S. be requested to permit T.C.A. to use the airport to pick up and set down traffic as a flag stop on its domestic service in order to take care of the west coast of Newfoundland which otherwise has no direct access to commercial services.¹⁵

CANADA-U.S. AIR AGREEMENT

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 26th, reported that Colonial Air Lines' application for an injunction against Trans-Canada Air Lines operating on the Montreal-New York route had been disallowed in the lower court, and that it was the company's intention to appeal.

There was a possibility that the U.S. government would grant permission to T.C.A. to fly the route pending a settlement but, if not, there would likely be a long delay before the T.C.A. service could be instituted.

¹⁵ Le Cabinet approuva le rapport le 2 juin 1949.
Cabinet approved the report on June 2, 1949.

There had been some interdepartmental consultation as to the course that the Canadian government should follow. One alternative was to withdraw from U.S. commercial companies landing rights at Gander, but it seemed unfair to penalize these operators. Another alternative was to cancel Colonial Air Lines' licence to operate on the New York-Montreal route. This was, however, a fairly drastic step and it would mean that, for some time at least, there would be no air service on that route.

The matter was under consideration in his department and a recommendation would be submitted in due course.

14. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the developments in connection with the implementation of the Canada-U.S. Air Agreement.

CANADA-UNITED STATES AIR AGREEMENT; IMPLEMENTATION

9. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 18, reported that the Air Transport Board had enquired as to the desirability of issuing an order requiring Colonial Airlines to show cause why its present rights should not be suspended in view of the action taken by the airline to block the implementation of the Canada-United States Air Agreement.

The matter had been discussed with the Canadian Ambassador in Washington who felt that there would be no harm in the initiation of such action. It would be desirable, however, for External Affairs to be able to inform the U.S. State Department in advance as a matter of courtesy. It was recommended that no instruction be given to the Air Transport Board in the matter but that they would be informed that, if they felt it desirable in the execution of their functions, the government would have no objection to the issuance of a show-cause order.

(Memorandum, Chairman, Air Transport Board to Secretary to the Cabinet, Nov. 23, 1949† and External Affairs memorandum, Nov. 22, 1949).†

10. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and agreed that there would be no objection to the issuance of a show-cause order by the Air Transport Board against Colonial Airlines should the Board feel that this would be desirable.

IMPLEMENTATION OF CANADA-UNITED STATES BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENT

I—General Background

The Canada-United States Bilateral Air Agreement signed on June 4th, 1949, confirmed all previous existing services between the two countries. In addition, Canada was granted the right to fly a route between Montreal and New York (a route which had previously been a United States monopoly); a route through Tampa, Florida, between Montreal and the Caribbean, and a route through Honolulu between Vancouver and Australasia. In return for these rights, Canada granted the United States new trans-border routes from Toronto to New York and from Edmonton to Great Falls. The United States were also granted traffic rights at Gander, Newfoundland, on a route to Europe, and at Edmonton, Alberta, on a route to the Orient.

2. This Agreement marked the first time that Canada had exchanged Fifth Freedom rights with any country. The major compensation for this concession from Canada's point of view lay in the new route between Montreal and New York which was in fact the pivotal point for the whole negotiation. United States negotiators agreed that it was only equitable that the traffic flowing between the two major air terminals of this continent should be divided between airlines of both countries.

3. Following the signature of this Agreement, the United States negotiators were called before a hearing of the Senate Committee on Foreign Commerce to justify the Agreement. During this hearing the legality of the Agreement and its actual value to the United States were questioned. The legality of the Agreement was challenged on the grounds that it had been made by Executive authority and that it had not been ratified by the Senate. This use of Executive authority was a procedure that the United States had followed in the case of thirty-six previous air agreements negotiated since the end of the war. The conclusions of the Senate hearing were that the Agreement should stand as written although admittedly drafted in secret and contrary to the feelings of the Senate Committee that presumably writes legislation on this subject.

4. In the meantime Colonial Airlines began to wage an active campaign against the Agreement and its negotiators. They found strong support amongst those Congressmen who are inclined to view the whole procedure of Executive agreements as dangerous if not illegal. Press comment on the whole throughout the United States did not favour the Agreement. This was probably due to the fact that newsmen were piqued by the fact that no information was given out during the negotiations until the Agreement was finally concluded. Colonial Airlines made an abortive appeal to the United States Government for a monetary subsidy and for new routes to compensate for the losses they would incur when Trans-Canada Air Lines began to operate between Montreal and New York. Colonial were particularly interested in securing the New York-Toronto route, one of the new routes granted under the bilateral; they were also interested in securing an additional domestic route between Washington and New York.

II—Chronology of Events concerning the Montreal-New York route

5. Shortly after the signature of the Bilateral Air Agreement, Trans-Canada Air Lines filed application to the Civil Aeronautics Board for the license to operate between Montreal and New York. A pre-hearing conference was opened by the CAB on July 7th and completed on July 18th. The date for the final hearing was set for August 29th. On August 17th Colonial requested a postponement of the hearing on the grounds that the Board had no power to issue a license. When it was refused Colonial then took action in the courts to charge that the Board was acting in an unconstitutional manner if they proceeded to grant the license to Trans-Canada Air Lines. Colonial also secured an injunction which would enjoin the Board from sending any recommendation concerning a license to the President. The Board then filed with the courts a motion to dismiss the charge by Colonial Airlines.

6. The hearing went ahead on August 29th and was completed on September 2nd. The examiner then began preparation of his report which would go before the Board.

7. On September 2nd Mr. Wrong gave to Dean Rusk, Assistant Under Secretary in the Department of State, a memorandum urging the State Department to do everything possible to expedite proceedings and pointing out the difficulties that the Canadian Government were experiencing in Canada in justifying to the Canadian public the existing situation where U.S. airlines were operating new rights under the Agreement at Gander while no Canadian airline had been permitted to exercise any of the new Canadian rights. Mr. Pearson also spoke to Mr. Acheson on September 9th. During these discussions it was reported by our Ambassador in Washington that Acheson urged "that no retaliatory action should be taken by Canada and...suggested that one or two extensions of thirty days should be granted to the airlines operating through Gander.... [H]e considered it reasonable to assume before this extension ran out that the situation would be clarified".

8. On October 6th, a 3-judge court met at Washington to hear the Board's motion to dismiss the Colonial case. On November 16th, a decision was given by this court which was two to one in favour of the Board. Colonial Airlines however appealed this decision and were successful in securing a continuation of the injunction at a court hearing on November 30th.

9. It was at this time that the State Department gave the first intimation that the Colonial action had not delayed the proceedings of the CAB vis-a-vis TCA. Up until that time we had been led to believe that the examiner was sitting on his report since no action could be taken in any event until the injunction was dismissed. However, at the end of November we were informed by the State Department that when the examiner completed his report (which he had been preparing for nearly three months) it would be necessary for at least another forty days to elapse to take care of interventions, oral arguments, etc. before the Board could take the case under considerations.

10. Towards the end of November Canadian officials in Ottawa began to feel that some action should be taken against Colonial who, by virtue of their activities in United States courts were acting against the Canadian public interest and against the spirit of the Bilateral Air Agreement. It was proposed that a show cause order be issued to Colonial if they continued to maintain their obstructionist position. This information was conveyed by John Baldwin to Russel Adams, a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, on November 17th and 25th and shortly thereafter this information was conveyed to the State Department by our Embassy. Similar intimations were also made to the United States Embassy in Ottawa. When this information was passed to the State Department, Mr. Snow, who occupies the Canadian Desk, replied that the State Department would have no real objection if all possible steps that might be undertaken by Canada were within the terms of Canadian legislation. If this were the case there would presumably be no State Department support for the Colonial case.

11. The show cause order was issued on December 1st when it became apparent that the Colonial injunction was to be indefinitely continued. The prospects for a hearing before the Supreme Court of the United States were extremely vague; at the very best the case might be heard in February, but more seasoned observers felt that a year would be a more modest estimate.

12. Following the issue of the show cause order to Colonial, a flurry of criticism broke out in the United States. Members of the United State Senate were in the van of this movement but extravagant attacks on Canada came from many other sources including Governor Dewey of New York and Mr. O'Connell, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board. These protests should be set against the fact that during the period that Colonial Airlines have been successfully obstructing the grant of a license to Trans-Canada Air Lines no official Canadian statement was made to derogate or criticize United States administration or Colonial Airlines. On the other hand, the United States press and public sentiment remained undisturbed despite the obvious injustice of the situation until the logical and inevitable action was taken against Colonial Airlines. It depends one may presume on whose ox is being gored.

III—Status of other new rights granted under the Agreement

13. Canadian Pacific Airlines filed an application last summer for its traffic rights through Honolulu. The hearings on this case were completed by the Board on September 2nd, the same day as the Montreal-New York hearings. The examiner completed his report and a license was issued to CPA by the end of October.

14. Trans-Canada Air Lines also applied for traffic rights through Tampa to the Caribbean. There were a number of minor delays in connection with this hearing, but the hearing was finally completed on November 29th. The examiner indicated that his report would be ready by December 21st. However, it is anticipated that there will be more interventions when this report is presented and that the procedural steps in connection with this application would not be completed until some time in February.

15. It is interesting to note with respect to the above cases that the examiner's report in connection with the Honolulu case was prepared in about six weeks, and it is expected that the report on the Tampa case will be completed in less than a month. The examiner's report on the Montreal-New York route on the other hand was over three months in preparation.

16. We have also completed plans to make Stephenville available as an alternate airport to Gander. This was in accordance with an exchange of notes concluded at the same time as the Agreement and represents a concession to United States airlines. On the other hand, plans are still incomplete to make Argentia an alternate to Torbay for Trans-Canada Air Lines domestic use. The delay is the result of the failure of State Department and Navy who administer the base to properly get together.

17. On the opposite side of the ledger, United States airlines were permitted to continue their traffic rights at Gander without interruption since confederation. Two permanent licenses have now been issued to American Overseas and Trans-World Airlines, and a third to Pan American is being completed. Licenses for the new rights at Edmonton will be issued as soon as Northwest Airlines complete their documentation with the Board. In addition we have permitted American Airlines to continue to fly the route between Buffalo and Toronto pending their designation of a carrier for the new Toronto-New York route although the Buffalo-Toronto route is non-existent under the new Agreement.

U.S.-CANADA CIVIL AVIATION DISCUSSIONS

The following summary may be useful to you in the event that you wish to report to Cabinet on the progress of the civil aviation discussions with the United States.

2. Subsequent to notes being exchanged between the two governments, representatives of the United States and Canada have been meeting to discuss matters relating to the order issued by the Air Transport Board to Colonial Airlines to show cause why their license to operate air services between Montreal and New York should not be suspended. The United States group was led by Mr. Adrian Fisher, Legal Advisor to the Department of State. During the discussions the whole question of the operation of the Montreal-New York route was thoroughly explored. It was evident that the United States did not agree with the interpretation placed by the Air Transport Board on sections of the Bilateral Air Agreement signed last June. The fundamental difference lay in the contention by the United States Delegation that nothing in the Bilateral Agreement would permit suspension of Colonial's license on the basis suggested in the evidence placed before the Air Transport Board as a result of the hearing with Colonial Airlines. In this respect our own Legal Division has made a preliminary examination of the Air Transport Board case, and there are some reservations on their part as to whether it is beyond legal challenge.

3. The United States Delegation made it abundantly clear that by virtue of an injunction granted by the United States court, the U.S. authorities could take no action to grant a license to Trans-Canada Air Lines to operate the Montreal-New York route until the Supreme Court had settled the case between the Civil Aeronautics Board and Colonial Airlines concerning the validity of the Air Agreement. They anticipated that such a decision could be handed down by June 15th. They gave assurances that every effort would be made by both the Civil Aeronautics Board and the State Department to expedite the handling of this case by the Supreme Court. In the meantime they urged that the Air Transport Board should not suspend Colonial's license. The United States would be required to take exception to any finding of suspension and make formal representations to the Canadian Government that it constituted a violation of the Bilateral Air Agreement. The United States are prepared, if necessary, to submit this as a difference of interpretation to arbitration. They pointed out that this ruled out from their point of view any suggestion that the Air Transport Board might suspend Colonial's license but grant some temporary continuation of their operating rights.

4. On the Canadian side, at the outset of the discussions it was made clear that at no time had the Air Transport Board or the Canadian Government ever questioned the constitutional right of Colonial Airlines to have determined by the United States courts the validity of the Bilateral Agreement under United States law. However, it was also pointed out that the Air Transport Board was an autonomous agency in Canada empowered to make its own findings on the evidence submitted to it. It would not be appropriate for the Government to intervene in its deliberations nor to anticipate or to guarantee to the United States what its decision would be.

5. During these discussions there was general agreement on both sides that it would be most regrettable if this matter of interpretation of the Agreement developed into a controversy between the governments and was eventually submitted to arbitration. As a result many formulas were explored in the hopes of finding some possible method which would ease the situation for both governments. Most of these formulas were rejected for various reasons by one group or the other.

6. It became clear early in the discussions that Colonial Airlines' chief objective was to secure from the United States Civil Aeronautics Board an additional domestic route from New York to Washington, and the new trans-border route from New York to Toronto. The Canadian delegation suggested that the existing difficulties might be resolved if the CAB could meet these requirements of Colonial. The United States rejected this suggestion on the grounds that certain statutory administrative procedures had to be carried out in connection with the granting of these routes which could not be completed, in the case of the New York-Washington route, until mid-summer when the Supreme Court case would in any event be completed. For the New York-Toronto route these administrative procedures could be completed by February, but the designation of Colonial to operate another route between Canada and the United States would only cause additional worries for both governments. The United States delegation also rejected this possibility on the principle that the integrity of the CAB would be seriously damaged if they succumbed to what was in effect blackmail by Colonial and granted concessions in an attempt to call off Colonial's obstructionism.

7. It was also suggested that the United States might designate another airline to operate the Montreal-New York route in place of Colonial. This was also unacceptable to the United States representatives on the basis that such redesignation could not be procedurally complete before August.

8. The Canadian Delegation stated it could see no reason why an injunction to prevent the grant of a license to TCA should be retained pending the termination of the constitutional point. The United States delegation explained that under United States law an appeal could be brought before the Supreme Court only on the basis of some specific court action; in this case the injunction was the only relevant court action.

9. During these discussions, the U.S. requested in strongest terms that the Air Transport Board should make no finding. As noted above it was explained that the Government would find it difficult to suppress any finding. The furthest the Canadian Government could go, and this was with some reservations, would be to withhold making suspension effective pending the conclusion of inter-governmental discussions.

10. Out of the many proposals put forward by both sides, three possible courses of action remain under consideration.

(1) The first one, which is acceptable to the United States, would involve the Air Transport Board announcing that it had completed its review of the Colonial case and that it had decided that it would be justified in suspending the license of that airline. It would, however, withhold action on the basis that one of the Board's important functions is to ensure that the air transportation requirements of the Canadian public are met; until the United States authorities are free to license a Canadian airline, Colonial Airlines can provide the only direct service between Montreal and New York. The Air Transport Board in announcing such a move could make reference to the representations of the United States Government and indicate that the United States Government was prepared to make a concession in agreeing not to designate a United States airline to operate the direct route between Toronto and New York until the United States authorities are in a position to license a Canadian airline over the Montreal-New York route. This would tend to relieve in part the inequitable situation.

This course of action has several objections from the Canadian point of view. It suggests to the public that pressure has been brought by the United States Government on the Canadian Government to influence a decision of the Air Transport Board. The argument concerning the necessity of maintaining air services between Montreal and New York would appear somewhat fatuous since the general public would anticipate that the authorities had given full consideration to such an eventuality when the action was undertaken against Colonial. Moreover, in realistic terms, the United States would not be making a major concession in deferring the designation of a carrier to operate the Toronto-New York route.

(2) A second course of action which would also be acceptable to the United States, involves a slight variation of the first proposal. In view of the reasons outlined in this first proposal, the Board could avoid making a decision on the grounds that it would be inappropriate at this time. This is to some extent preferable in that it removes the undesirable situation of finding Colonial unsuitable and then allowing it to continue to operate. However, the same general objections obtain for this proposal as for the first proposal.

(3) A third course of action, which is far less acceptable to the United States, would involve the reopening of the Colonial investigation by the Air Transport Board. During the initial hearing Colonial Airlines did not testify and made motion for adjournment pending clarification of their position under the Logan Act. The Board might grant this motion and invite Colonial to appear again and give evidence.

This procedure has obvious disadvantages. If the Board decided after the new hearing that there was insufficient evidence to suspend, the Canadian public would interpret the reopening of the hearing and the ultimate decision as evidence that Canada succumbed to United States pressure. It would also appear that the Air Transport Board has acted precipitately and it would unquestionably lose face having regard to all the publicity which the matter has received. If the Board decided to suspend, this would provoke additional reaction in the United States and lead to new representations from the United States Government and eventually an interpretational controversy over the Bilateral Air Agreement.

11. In connection with proposals (1) and (2) above, the United States delegation is exploring the possibility of appealing to the Chief Justice to stay the injunction temporarily on the grounds that it is prejudicing the United States Government's international relations. This would be an additional concession to offset any action on Canada's part to withhold suspension.

12. The meetings adjourned on Wednesday with the understanding that both governments would give additional consideration to the three proposals outlined above. Each government would also look more fully into the general position of the other government in the hopes of finding some satisfactory solution.

CANADA-U.S. AIR AGREEMENT; RECENT DISCUSSIONS

31. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on discussions with the United States which had concluded that morning.

U.S. officials had taken the view that the recent action of Colonial Airways in questioning the validity of the Canada-U.S. Air Agreement did not justify suspension of their license by the Air Transport Board. While Canadian officials had argued against that point of view, they had been impressed with the legal strength of the U.S. position. In these circumstances, if the Air Transport Board were to decide on suspension, the U.S. Government might claim that Canada had violated the agreement and ask for the application of the arbitration procedure provided in the Agreement.

While it was not desirable for the Government to influence the Board in arriving at a decision, should it be in favour of suspension, arrangements might be made to withhold any action until the validity of the agreement had been determined.

Certain rights exchanged under the agreement had not yet been granted and possibly some formula could be devised involving concessions by both sides. Such an arrangement might satisfy public opinion in Canada for the time being.

32. The Prime Minister observed that, in general, the agreement provided for an exchange of two kinds of rights, those in effect prior to the agreement and which were continued; and those granted for the first time. A useful approach might be to leave the "continuing" group in effect but to withhold action on the granting of new rights until the validity of the agreement had been determined. If this course were followed, any decision on the part of the Air Transport Board to suspend Colonial Airway's licence would remain inoperative until such time as the validity of the agreement had been established and new rights became exchangeable.

33. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on recent discussions with the United States on the Canada-U.S. Air Agreement, and agreed that the question of policy to be followed by the Canadian Government be decided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport in consultation.

OBLIGATIONS OF CANADA AS A RESULT OF MEMBERSHIP IN SOUTH PACIFIC AIR TRANSPORT COUNCIL

Last autumn, as a result of projected initiation of Canadian Pacific Air Lines service to Australasia, Canada joined the South Pacific Air Transport Council, the other members of which are Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Fiji. Canada participated for the first time as a member of the Council on the occasion of its annual meeting in November-December 1948. Most of the recommendations of this Council meeting dealt with routine technical matters which are being handled at the official level, but one major policy matter came forward for discussion, namely the provision and subsequent operation and maintenance of air navigation facilities in the South Pacific, the biggest item of which is an international airport in Fiji.

Nandi airport in Fiji, which is presently used by international services and also, to some extent, by regional services, was a military field which was turned over for civil use after the cessation of hostilities and is now maintained jointly by the original members of the Council. The New Zealand Government, which is responsible for the air defence of Fiji, has notified the South Pacific Air Transport Council that Defence requirements necessitate that Nandi should be taken over within the next five years by the Royal New Zealand Air Force, and that civil operations from that airport will have to cease and, therefore, it becomes necessary to construct a new international airport on Fiji territory. At its third meeting, the Council decided that the site for the new airport should be at Suva, the capital of the colony, and it was the obvious desire of the original members of the Council that Canada should contribute to the capital costs of the new airport and the early initiation of a survey for this purpose.

The Canadian Delegation, in accordance with instructions it had received, reserved Canada's position with regard to any question of contribution to capital expenditures although, after consultation with Ottawa, it committed Canada in principle to participation in the costs of operating the South Pacific Air Transport Council and the costs of operation and maintenance of those air navigation facilities in the South Pacific which could reasonably be counted as necessary for the operation of trunk line services. Subsequently, it was made known informally to the other members concerned that the Canadian Government did not favour making any capital contribution to any of the air navigation facilities in the South Pacific and, in particular, to the construction of the new international airport at Suva, Fiji. In this connection, it is to be borne in mind that Nandi is in a rural area more than 100 miles away from Suva, the capital, and it would be most advantageous to the operators of the regional services of the South Pacific to have a good modern airport at Suva. Pressure is now being put on Canada for formal action on the recommendations of the third meeting of the South Pacific Air Transport Council. Accordingly, it is recommended that the other member Governments of the Council should be informed:

(1) That Canada does not propose to make any contribution towards the capital costs of any air navigation facilities in the South Pacific and, in particular, the proposed new international airport at Suva, Fiji, (because it believes that its contributions to international civil aviation in the northeast Pacific are an adequate quid pro quo for the facilities it might enjoy in the southwest Pacific).

(2) That Canada will be prepared, however, to contribute as indicated during the third meeting of S.P.A.T.C. to the maintenance and operating costs of the air transport facilities in the South Pacific which can be attributed to international trunk line services used by the airline designated by Canada, and suggests that a fair contribution in this connection would be 25%.

(3) That the Canadian Government would like to have an estimate from the other member Governments of the S.P.A.T.C. of the extent to which the facilities in the South Pacific, including Fiji, can be attributed to trunk line services to be used by the airline designated by Canada, so that some assessment in the costs involved can be made.¹⁶

The Canadian Delegation recommended to the Council that the facilities in Fiji should be made the subject of an application to the International Civil Aviation Organization for joint support, but it quickly became clear that the attitude of the other member Governments in excluding the I.C.A.O. and the United States of America was based partly on considerations of prestige and partly on reluctance to permit the United States to acquire any voice in the matter because of difficulties they had already experienced vis-a-vis the U.S. carrier, Pan American Airways.

The total maintenance and operating cost of present facilities is about $450,000 annually. Until further information is received, it is not known to what extent these should be attributable to regional services and to what extent to trunk line services. The proposed contribution would be 25% of that portion attributable to trunk line services.

SECURITY SCREENING OF IMMIGRANTS

SECURITY SCREENING OF IMMIGRANTS
PRESENT PROBLEMS

The present methods of screening, the results thereof and the problems arising therefrom, can best be considered under the headings of the different immigration schemes involved and the countries or areas presenting special difficulties. These are set down hereunder.

Close Relative Scheme

2. Persons who immigrate to Canada under the above scheme may be (a) D.P.'s¹ or (b) persons from other countries who have been sponsored by a relative or other individual in Canada.

3. D.P.'s are screened by direct interview in Germany, Austria, Sweden, etc. and normally do not come forward until such time as a report has been received indicating that they are clear or not clear for security.

4. Security screening of persons under (b) category follows an entirely different plan popularly referred to as the 14 day plan. This procedure is that applications are received at the Immigration Offices in Canada and providing the applicant meets all requirements other than security the application is then forwarded to R.C.M.P. Headquarters for security screening of the sponsor in Canada and the proposed immigrant overseas. 14 days after the application has been forwarded to R.C.M.P.

for security screening and regardless of whether a security report has been received or not, the Visa Officer in the country concerned is advised by the Immigration authorities in Ottawa that the application has been approved. In short, this gives the R.C.M.P. 14 days only in which to screen the sponsor in Canada and the proposed immigrant overseas. If no report is received within that period from the R.C.M.P., and it practically never is, the immigrant can come forward.

5. It is absolutely impossible for the R.C.M.P. to complete this screening in the prescribed time of 14 days. First the application when it is received at R.C.M.P. Headquarters must be carded and passed through registration channels before it is dispatched overseas. At the moment there is a backlog of approximately 3,000 cases. This means that the application does not leave Headquarters for overseas usually until after the 14 day period has expired.

6. There is a backlog in London of 13,365 cases and it is anticipated that it will take from a year to a year and a half for current applications under this scheme to reach final screening in London.

7. The situation in London is this. All applications forwarded to London are taken to British contacts for screening against their files. British contacts can handle approximately only 35 a day. The R.C.M.P. are dependent on their co-operation to complete this work and are in no position to ask them to deal with more than they are prepared to accept. It therefore will be seen that regardless of the number forwarded from Canada to London they can pass through the screen at the rate of 35 per diem and no more.

8. From the above it will be seen that London can clear approximately 840 a month. The R.C.M.P. have been sending to London, as received from Immigration, a much larger volume than this. The current applications more than exceed the London quota of 35 per day and the backlog can only continue to increase without hope of being dealt with so long as the present volume of applications received from Immigration continues.

9. Furthermore, the R.C.M.P. are requested very frequently by Immigration to expedite certain cases, many of them behind the 'Iron Curtain'. These expedited cases must fall in the quota of 35 a day with the consequence that older applications drop back further into the backlog.

10. It is believed that a very large percentage of the present London backlog consists of persons who are already in Canada and concerning whom no screening report will be available for months. If an unfavourable report comes forward after entry, there are apparently no legal provisions under which the persons involved can be deported as they have already been granted a permanent landing.

11. The only useful purpose therefore which this screening under the 14 day scheme serves is to provide the R.C.M.P. eventually with a record of persons who have come into Canada who may be considered subversive.

Labour Scheme

12. Under this scheme persons are brought forward to Canada in bulk for the purpose of filling labour shortages in such fields as mining, lumbering, etc. These persons are presented for screening by the I.R.O. before Immigration teams in Europe and are dealt with before Immigration teams in Europe and are dealt with on the spot by a Security Officer. There is therefore, no great problem or backlog in dealing with this scheme.

13. There are, however, certain security difficulties which should be noted. There have been cases of men who have applied to come forward with a group on, for instance, the Mine Workers' Scheme and have been turned down for security. Some of these men have immediately departed for another section of Germany and made application to join, for instance, a group of lumber workers coming forward to Canada and the I.R.O. file at the point where they made previous application does not follow them forward. On arrival at the new point of application I.R.O. make up a new file which does not disclose that the man has been previously rejected on security grounds. He is by now better prepared to face interrogation and quite frequently is passed. Similarly there have been cases of men having been rejected as D.P.'s and who, under similar circumstances have made application to come forward under a Labour Scheme and have been accepted due to there being no record of their previous screening.

14. The R.C.M.P. are endeavouring to overcome this by the circulation of a black list among all Security Officers overseas. Any man rejected is immediately circularized on this black list. Quite frequently, however, the second application takes place within a matter of days and before the names on the black list can possibly get to all Security Officers.

C.N.R. and C.P.R. Schemes

15. The railways are recruiting throughout Europe labour for use on maintenance of way etc. The problem in these cases is that the applications, called Form 357, are forwarded to London Office of the R.C.M.P. by the Immigration Office there for screening through London channels. These are all marked "Preferred Attention" due to the fact that shipping space is usually available. They are, therefore, screened ahead of routine cases and here again this results in the building up of a backlog of routine cases.

Screening behind the Iron Curtain

16. The R.C.M.P. have now advised Immigration and the Department of External Affairs that attempts to screen persons who desire to come forward from 'Iron Curtain' countries are proving impossible to carry out. No security information is obtainable in the country of origin; there is only the London check. This is a hit-and-miss method which may only catch one in several hundred or a thousand and would only show up well known Communists or Nazi collaborators. The R.C.M.P. therefore consider that screening of applications behind the 'Iron Curtain' is now impossible. The only exception is Czechoslovakia for which there are good sources outside the country itself. These sources will eventually disappear but for the present are useful.

Far East

17. Recently, at a meeting held in the office of the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, the R.C.M.P. pointed out that screening of applications in the Far East, particularly Shanghai, is now almost unproductive. There are no Security Officers in the area and the Canadian Vice-Consul who has carried out this screening through his local contacts has now advised the Department of External Affairs that outside of special cases it is now almost impossible to obtain useful information under the present chaotic conditions in China. At the same meeting it was agreed that a certain number of the refugee types who escaped from Nazi domination should be admitted without screening. Since this meeting the R.C.M.P. have been advised by associated intelligence organizations that the Russians propose to use this channel to infiltrate agents into Canada and the United States. The name of one known agent who will be applying to come forward has already been supplied to Immigration by the R.C.M.P.

Israel

18. The question has been raised regarding the screening of persons in Israel applying for entry into Canada. The R.C.M.P. feel that it is impossible to offer any effective screening of persons applying to come forward from Israel. The only security records known to be available are the former British Palestine Police records which are now maintained in Cairo. Access to such records could only be sketchy and they do not begin to cover the thousands of people who poured into Israel illegally during the trouble and who have immigrated to Israel since the British withdrawal.

Special Considerations

19. It is pointed out that:

(a) Communist organizations abroad are doing everything possible to infiltrate Communists into this country. Other groups are doing the same for former Nazis and Nazi collaborators. There is proof that such operations have been planned and in a number of cases have been successful.

(b) If immigration is to continue at its present volume, it must be clearly understood that security risks are involved and must be accepted. Security screening will necessarily be incomplete and it cannot be assumed that an effective screen exists through which all persons coming to Canada must pass.

(c) If the present situation is considered so serious that effective security screening must be established and maintained, then the present volume of immigrants to Canada must be sharply reduced.

(d) An increase in the number of Canadian Security Officers does not meet the situation in any way for the reason that this country does not maintain an overseas intelligence or security organization and we are dependent upon the records of those friendly countries which do collect and collate such information.

I. SECURITY SCREENING OF IMMIGRANTS—PRESENT PROBLEMS

1. The Panel had before them a request from the Immigration Branch, Department of Mines and Resources, to review security immigration policy and procedure in the light of problems which have developed since April, 1948. In this connection a memorandum had been circulated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for consideration of the members entitled "Security Screening of Immigrants—Present Problems".

The security screening programme had become partially ineffective by:

(a) over-loading of screening facilities due to the large number of prospective immigrants; and

(b) the impossibility of securing any information relative to security from Eastern European countries, the Far East and Israel.

At present there was a backlog of approximately 13,000 cases awaiting review.

(R.C.M. Police memorandum of March 31st, 1949—Security Panel document SP-40)

2. *Mr. Jolliffe*² opened the discussion by pointing out that the problem was divided into two basic questions; first, what information should be given to applicants or to the sponsors of applicants when a visa is refused on security grounds; and, secondly, what changes in the present government policy of immigration, and the procedure for implementing that policy, are required to speed up the completion of security enquiries?

3. During the general discussion which followed, the following major points were brought out.

(a) The R.C.M. Police is having difficulty in safeguarding the sources of information on which an applicant is turned down for security reasons. In such cases the sponsors of the immigrant may correspond with either Members of Parliament or with the minister concerned and are often given information from the highest levels which embarrasses the Police in respect to their relations with the U.K. and U.S. security services.

(b) The present 14-day delay in taking action on sponsored requests for immigrants to enter Canada was originally provided in order to give the R.C.M. Police additional time to institute security enquiries. In view of the large backlog of cases under review, the advantages of this 14-day delay have become nullified.

 A.L. Jolliffe, Director of Immigration, Department of Mines and Resources.

(c) The present arrangements for security screening in France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark, Norway and Sweden are generally satisfactory and should be continued.

(d) The examination of displaced persons in camps in Europe is a useful method of checking their desirability and should be continued. Of the 60,000 D.P.'s considered for entry into Canada, approximately 1,000 have been rejected for security reasons.

(e) Under present circumstances it is virtually impossible to obtain any information concerning applicants from Eastern Europe and the security screening of such applicants is almost valueless. Hence, if such immigrants are to be admitted to Canada at all, it must be on the understanding that no opportunity exists for adequate security screening.

(f) Of the backlog of 13,000 cases now under review by the U.K. authorities, some 11,000 applications are from Eastern European countries. It is very difficult to assess the real meaning of this backlog as many of the applicants are already in Canada and, of the remaining number, it is impossible to state how many might eventually obtain exit permits from their countries of origin.

(g) It was noted that the countries of Eastern Europe are refusing to grant exit permits to any able-bodied citizens and the flow of immigrants is largely confined to dependent families of immigrants already in Canada. Any able-bodied worker from Eastern Europe who holds an exit permit from his country of origin should be looked upon with suspicion.

(h) In view of the impossibility of adequately screening prospective immigrants from Eastern Europe, if it is decided to continue the present immigration policy, measures should be considered to meet the added security risk by improving the security situation inside Canada. Such measures might include:

- (i) an increase in personnel available to the R.C.M. Police;
- (ii) a form of registration for aliens; and
- (iii) a modification of the deportation regulations.

(With regard to (iii) it was noted that undesirable aliens can only be deported from Canada if their country of origin is willing to receive them).

(i) Security screening of prospective immigrants from the Far East or from the State of Israel is just as difficult as the screening of those from Eastern Europe. It was noted that the Israeli Government had set up some form of screening facilities of their own in order to control the flow of undesirables attempting to enter Israel from Central Europe, many of them in transit to other countries.

4. It was agreed, after discussion, to report to Cabinet on the major difficulties that have arisen in connection with the conduct of security enquiries concerning prospective immigrants and suggestions for meeting the problem without curtailing immigration plans; this memorandum to include the following points:

(a) The desirability of issuing a Cabinet instruction to all departments of government that no security reasons would be given for the refusal of a visa.

(b) Security procedure concerning persons in D.P. camps and those resident in France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark, Norway and Sweden is satisfactory and should be continued.

(c) Because of the restrictive emigration policy of the satellite countries, any able-bodied applicant from Eastern Europe in possession of an exit permit should be regarded with suspicion.

(d) Because of the ineffectiveness of security enquiries concerning immigrants from Eastern Europe, the Far East and Israel, there were two alternative courses of action; either to permit unrestricted (in a security sense) immigration, or to severely restrict immigration from these areas. In the former case a problem might be created in Canada which would warrant additional measures to meet the increased internal security risk.

(e) A decision would be sought from the Cabinet whether, in the circumstances, security checking of immigrants from Eastern Europe, should be continued.

IMMIGRATION; SECURITY SCREENING OF APPLICANTS

7. The Minister of Mines and Resources reported that the procedure for screening prospective immigrants for security purposes had recently been reviewed by the Security Panel.

Their report called attention to the difficulties which the R.C.M. Police encountered in securing information on applicants in eastern European countries, Israel and China. As a result, the Police had a backlog of some 20,000 cases which had been referred to them, but had not yet been dealt with. In some cases the individuals concerned were already in Canada.

In the circumstances, the Panel suggested that there were three alternative methods of coping with the problem—by rejecting all applications from persons in the areas referred to, by waiving security regulations for these categories, or by adopting a new procedure which would satisfy security requirements and at the same time permit the entry of deserving cases. The last alternative was recommended.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Memorandum for Cabinet, Chairman, Security Panel, Sept. 22, 1949—Cabinet Document 1055).†

8. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) approved the following procedure for security screening of certain classes of prospective immigrants:

(i) Applicants who are citizens or residents of eastern European countries (U.S.S.R., Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Albania, Rumania, Bulgaria) and of Israel to be informed that, if they proceed for examination to visa-issuing centres at London, Paris, Brussels, Stockholm, Rome, Karlsruhe or Salzburg, their cases would be considered on their merits.

(ii) Applications from China to be rejected, with the exception of the following classes:

women with children under 18 years of age not accompanied by an adult male; unaccompanied male and female children 18 years of age and under;
men over 65 and women over 60 years of age;
priests, clergymen, recognized members of religious bodies.

(iii) Applicants from Central and South American countries, other than native born nationals, to be subject to security screening in order to prevent European immigrants from entering Canada through this channel without adequate examination.

(b) agreed that the Security Panel be instructed to keep this general subject under review.

Directive du Cabinet

Cabinet Directive

CIRCULAR NO. 14

Ottawa, October 28, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

REJECTION OF IMMIGRANTS ON SECURITY GROUNDS

The purpose of this directive is to bring to the attention of all government departments and agencies concerned the necessity for withholding information with regard to the rejection of immigrants on security grounds.

Displaced persons and certain classes of prospective immigrants desiring to enter Canada are investigated under established procedures by the R.C.M. Police. Persons in specified categories (i.e., Communists, members of the Nazi or Fascist Parties or of any revolutionary organization, "collaborators", and users of false or fictitious names or documents) are regarded as inadmissible under the Immigration Act and are refused a visa. As some of the persons so rejected are not aware that their subversive records are known to security and intelligence agencies, disclosure of the reasons for their rejection as immigrants tends to excite suspicion and compromise valuable sources of information.

For these reasons, it is important that, in such cases, no intimation be given to the applicant, the relatives or the sponsor that entry had been refused on security grounds. In some instances, this information has been passed on to the applicant or the sponsor by persons who, because of their position, have had access to the facts. This has resulted in serious embarrassment to the immigration authorities and to the Police.

In view of the above, the Cabinet decided on September 29th, that under no circumstances should the reason for withholding permission to enter Canada, in the case of displaced persons and prospective immigrants, be attributed to security grounds. The only information to be given out in these cases should be a simple statement, without explanation, that a visa has been refused.

REVOCATION OF NATURALIZATION; NATURALIZED CANADIANS HAVING SERVED IN ENEMY FORCES

3. The Secretary of State referred to a Cabinet decision of June 2nd, 1948, to the effect that the Immigration Branch should be instructed not to facilitate the re-admission to Canada of naturalized Canadians having served in enemy forces.

Each individual case had been reviewed under the provisions of the Immigration Act. In a few cases the Board of Review had felt unable to recommend revocation of the certificates of naturalization. It was suggested that naturalized Canadians falling within this category might be re-admitted to Canada.

4. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that any case of a naturalized Canadian having served in enemy forces in respect of which a Board of Review had concluded that revocation of citizenship might not be justified be referred to the Department of External Affairs for examination and report.

READMISSION OF CANADIANS WHO SERVED IN THE ENEMY ARMED FORCES

On February 17th I sent you a note† on this subject along with a draft letter to the Secretary of State. Mr. Gibson³ had written to you suggesting that he raise the matter in Cabinet. The draft reply asked him to do so and briefly reviewed the position, pointing out its many difficulties. You will have seen the reference to this matter in the Cabinet minute of February 18th.

2. The Cabinet decision as now minuted is as follows:

“It was agreed by the Cabinet that any case of a naturalized Canadian having served in Enemy Forces, in respect of which a Board of Review had concluded the revocation of citizenship might not be justified, be referred to the Department of External Affairs for examination and report.”

3. This decision clearly needs clarification since there is no aspect of the matter upon which this Department could examine and report after the decision of the Secretary of State had been taken to sustain a person in his citizenship. Mr. Gibson has written to Mr. Heeney suggesting that the Cabinet minute does not correctly reflect the decision and he suggests to Mr. Heeney that, if there is any doubt as to the decision in this matter, he will be glad to refer it back and have the decision clarified.

4. While the paper I sent you on February 17th† sets out my view of this matter at some length, it is possible to summarize as follows:

(a) On December 12, 1947, the Cabinet approved a recommendation of the Cabinet Committee on Immigration Policy to the effect that the matter should be referred to Justice for consideration of the necessary legislation to deprive persons who had served in the Enemy Armed Forces of their citizenship.

(b) Meantime and pursuant to Cabinet Instruction, Officers abroad were informed that the re-entry to Canada of Canadian citizens by birth and naturalization who had so served was not to be facilitated and that they were not to be advised of their admissibility to Canada as of right.

(c) Subsequently cases came to attention in which such persons had been sustained in their citizenship by the constituted Commission for Enquiry, and some had been given Certificates of Canadian Citizenship. Nevertheless, under the instructions their return to Canada can not be facilitated.

³ Colin Gibson fut le secrétaire d'État jusqu'au 1er avril 1949, lorsqu'il remplaça J.A. MacKinnon à titre de ministre des Mines et des Ressources. MacKinnon devint sénateur.

Colin Gibson was Secretary of State until April 1, 1949, when he replaced J.A. MacKinnon as Minister of Mines and Resources. MacKinnon became a Senator.

(d) In at least one case [...] the Commission for Enquiry heard the case and sustained the man in his citizenship. There was then a vigorous protest made by his brother-in-law, an ex-serviceman of Chatham, Ontario, against the return of one who had served in the Enemy Forces. Revocation proceedings were then re-instituted and, to the best of our knowledge, have still not been completed. None the less, the Department of the Secretary of State is advising the wife of the man that the question of facilitating his return to Canada is a matter for this Department.

5. It is not clear why the original decision of the Cabinet on December 12, 1947, was not implemented. Discussion recently between an Officer of this Department and the Under-Secretary of State led to suggestion that legislation should be introduced depriving alleged traitors of their citizenship but setting up adequate appeal machinery so that such persons could establish their right to be reinstated in their citizenship.

6. The present position in which people are being sustained in their Canadian citizenship by the constituted authority, but refused travelling facilities, is contradictory and embarrassing. At the same time there may be grave political objections to permitting the return to this country of people who have notoriously served in the Armed Forces of the enemy. The case [...] referred to above, is one in point.

7. 44 cases of this nature have come to the attention of this Department. Revocation has been ordered in 34 of them, but in 10 (nearly a quarter) the persons concerned have been sustained in their citizenship. The intent of the Citizenship Act toward persons of this category in the future is very clear under Section 17. The provisions of that Section are not retroactive and the Commission for Enquiry must therefore deal with present cases under Section 21 "disloyalty and disaffection to His Majesty". The tendency of any judicial body leans over in favour of absent persons. The impression which has been gained in this Department is that the decisions of the Commission for Enquiry lack consistency and that in some cases their attitude is exceedingly lenient.

REVOCATION OF NATURALIZATION; CANADIANS HAVING SERVED IN ENEMY FORCES

18. The Secretary of State referred to the decision at the meeting of February 18th. As recorded, this required reference to External Affairs of cases where the Board of Review had concluded that revocation of citizenship might not be justified.

Some uncertainty existed as to departmental responsibilities in giving effect to this decision and it was suggested that it be reconsidered.

19. The Secretary of State for External Affairs observed that any action to facilitate re-entry of Canadian citizens who had served in enemy forces and whose citizenship had not been revoked by the Board should be the subject of very careful consideration.

20. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for External Affairs consult together with a view to submitting for consideration, at a later date, recommendations on the procedure to be followed respecting re-entry of Canadian citizens who had served in enemy forces.

CANADIANS HAVING SERVED IN ENEMY FORCES; ADMISSION TO CANADA;
REVOCATION OF NATURALIZATION

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to the decision of Cabinet of June 2nd, 1948, and subsequent discussion of February 18th and March 11th, 1949.

The decision of June 2nd had made it necessary for missions abroad to refuse issue of passports to Canadians who had served in enemy forces. This applied even where there might be no possibility of revocation of status, as in the case of persons who were Canadian citizens by birth, or where a Commission of Inquiry had recommended against revocation of naturalization.

It seemed desirable to allow some flexibility by having missions refer all such cases to Ottawa for consideration. It would also clarify the position if further examination could be made of cases of revocation which might be pending or doubtful. Reconsideration might be desirable in some instances where revocation had not been ordered.

16. The Minister of Mines and Resources and Acting Secretary of State agreed that reference to Ottawa would be desirable as suggested.

17. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that Canadian representatives abroad be directed that applications for passports or for facilities to come to Canada be referred to Ottawa when received from:

- (a) natural born Canadian citizens who had served in enemy forces; and,
- (b) naturalized Canadian citizens who had served in enemy forces and whose status had not been revoked.

*Memorandum from Head, Consular Division

[Ottawa], July 12, 1949

I had a long talk yesterday with Mr. Jolliffe about a number of immigration problems that are more or less thorny. One of these is the admission to Canada of Canadians, native born or naturalized, who served in the enemy armed forces.

2. As you know, there has been no very clear directive from Cabinet on this question over a long period. We have now reached a stage of what is certainly considerable administrative difficulty and, in some cases, amounts to complete absurdity.

3. You are aware of the problems which have arisen over the return of naturalized Canadians who served in the enemy armed forces. It is with the native born that we are now faced with the absurdity to which I refer. You will recall that thirty years or so ago it was quite customary for Italian labouring families to come to this country, work on construction or maintenance gangs at the lowest standard of living which they could manage and return thereafter to Italy with perhaps $4,000 or $5,000, which was big money. We are now confronted with the aftermath of all this. Small Italian boys were taken back by their families at the age of two or three and, in due course, naturally had to serve in the Italian forces. They are now excluded because, as Canadian-born individuals, they served in the forces of the King's enemies. Their younger brothers, who were born in Italy the following year or so also served, naturally, in the Italian forces. Because, however, we have made a peace treaty with Italy, all is forgotten about the younger brothers and they are allowed to come to Canada as immigrants. We have at least one case in which the younger brother is already in Canada but his Canadian-born brother cannot come.

4. All this has brought Mr. Jolliffe to the point of recommending as follows:—

(a) Naturalized Canadians who have had their cases considered by a Commission for Inquiry and who have been sustained should immediately be given the necessary facilities to enable them to return to Canada, if they wish.

(b) Native-born Canadians should be given travel facilities, irrespective of their service in enemy armed forces.

Alternatively, Mr. Jolliffe will recommend an immediate amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act by which persons who served in the forces of the enemy shall automatically be deprived of their citizenship. The onus of re-admission to citizenship will then fall upon the persons concerned. The assumption must be that all assumed the citizenship of the country for which they fought and so would not be left stateless. Some, in due course, could be re-admitted as immigrants and thereafter have to "work their passage" to restoration of citizenship.

5. Despite the outcry which I daresay will come from a few isolated spots, I believe that the first alternative is, on the whole, the better. I have come to the conclusion that the Government is not willing drastically to change the Canadian Citizenship Act to introduce what would be a penalty in retrospect.⁴

CANADIAN CITIZENS WHO SERVED WITH ENEMY FORCES; READMISSION TO CANADA

26. The Minister of Mines and Resources, referring to Cabinet decisions of December 12, 1947, June 2, 1948, and May 18, 1949, stated that the procedure then agreed upon had not disposed of cases and applicants were continually pressing for decisions on admissibility.

With the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it was now recommended that passports be issued to Canadian citizens by birth notwithstanding service in the enemy forces and that cases involving naturalized citizens be referred to the Department of the Secretary of State for consideration prior to decision regarding passports.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Joint memorandum, Minister of Mines and Resources and Secretary of State for External Affairs, undated, Cabinet Document 1076).†

27. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources, as concurred in by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that:

(a) passports be issued to Canadian citizens by birth notwithstanding the fact that they had served in enemy forces; and,

(b) cases involving Canadian citizens by naturalization be referred to the Department of the Secretary of State for consideration by a Commission under Section 21 of the Canadian Citizenship Act; passports to be granted and admission to Canada allowed in cases where naturalization was not revoked; admission to Canada to be refused in cases where naturalization was revoked.

[Ottawa], March 1, 1949

On February the 19th you attached to a personal letter written by the Ambassador to China to the Minister, an enquiry as to whether I thought the Minister might raise in Cabinet the question of the present prohibited entry of German citizens to Canada. I learned the other day that the Minister of Mines and Resources is raising this question himself. It seems to me, however, that the whole matter should be approached with caution.

2. German citizens are at present debarred from entry into Canada by Order-in-Council P.C. 4850 of November 27, 1947, which prohibited the entry or landing in Canada of enemy aliens. The Order-in-Council, however, provided that exceptions could be made in cases of people who had been opposed to the Nazi regime. Relatively few such exceptions have been made.

3. I am told that there are large numbers of people in this country of German origin who are pressing for the admission of near relatives from Germany. Under the present law, of course, the Immigration authorities can only refuse to do anything with their applications. On the face of it this seems a little inhumane at this stage of the post-war developments. I suppose it must be presumed that, but for the differences which have arisen between the Allies, a peace treaty would by now have been negotiated with Germany and some reasonable steps might by now have been taken to bring German individuals back into the human family. How long the present situation can continue and whether the Western Allies will not have sooner, perhaps rather than later, to make some settlement separate from the Eastern group, is a matter of high politics. Presumably the decision would have to be taken in concert with all the Western Allies.

4. Apart from any other consideration, if there is to be any hope of trade reviving between Germany and the rest of the world it is obvious that there must be adequate interchange of people who are conducting trade matters in the two countries. At present our commercial people can be granted permission to visit Germany but there is little or no traffic in the other direction. All this seems to be rather absurd and getting a little out-moded by the march of events.

Reid forwarded this memorandum to Pearson on March 11, 1949.

5. On the other hand, there are very real and practical aspects of this matter which suggest the wisdom of taking no very hasty action. There are, for example, large numbers of refugees who still have not been moved under the I.R.O. scheme. There are also large numbers of non-German close relatives still waiting to come. There might be a very loud outcry against any movement of German nationals proper until it was clear that non-Germans had been dealt with.

6. From the purely domestic political standpoint it seems to me to be a question of weighing the popularity among a group of people of admitting their relatives and the unpopularity amongst other sections of admitting Germans.

7. While the principle of "magnanimity in victory", so often the path of common sense, seems to dictate the pulling down of this barrier, it is my own personal view that this is not the moment to do it.

ADMISSION OF ENEMY ALIENS

1. At present, under the authority of Order in Council P.C. 4850 of November 26, 1947, the entry to or the landing in Canada of enemy aliens (nationals of Germany and Japan) is prohibited except of those who satisfy the Minister of Mines and Resources that they were opposed to their enemy government.

2. The question of allowing entry into Canada of enemy aliens who are relatives and friends of Canadian residents was discussed at the meeting of the Cabinet of April 4, 1949.

It was decided at that meeting that the present policy should be modified to the extent of allowing enemy aliens to enter

- (a) if their entry was sought by a person resident in Canada;
- (b) if they could present themselves for examination by Canadian officials in Europe; and,
- (c) if they were recommended for admission after examination.

It was understood that no change in the regulations was intended; the intention was simply that individual cases might be brought to Council, through the Minister of Mines and Resources, for special decision in respect of each.

3. The Minister of Mines and Resources would now like to obtain a clarification of Cabinet's decision in order that the Immigration Branch may carry out effectively the policy that the Government wishes to apply.

4. The Department of Mines and Resources feel that if the Cabinet's decision is to be broadly interpreted the results would be as follows:

(a) Any resident of Canada could apply for a relative within the admissible classes and that relative would then be admissible to Canada if he or she could reach one of our offices outside Germany or, presumably, either our headquarters at Karlsruhe or one of our immigration teams (of which there are nine) operating in various parts of Germany. All that would be required would be to prove that the particular Germans for whom application had been made are in good health and of reasonably good character.

(b) By adoption of this policy the Germans would be placed in a favourable position as compared with the citizens of any other countries except France, the United Kingdom and other Dominions, and the United States because, whereas we have in other countries only one centre at which application can be made, in Germany we will have ten.

(c) There is now in the Immigration Branch a backlog of requests for the admission of German nationals which involves several thousand cases.

(d) The adoption and effect of implementation of the policy proposed would result in the probable admission of more Germans than any other nationality, except British, during the next year or longer. Every ship coming across the Atlantic from a continental to a Canadian port during the next twelve months would be loaded with German nationals.

5. The Minister of Mines and Resources also submits for consideration the following points in relation to enemy aliens:

(a) Distinction between relatives within the admissible classes and other Germans;

(b) Distinction between Germans who served in the Armed Forces against Canada and those who did not;

(c) Distinction between Germans who were members of the Nazi party and those who were not.

(d) Consideration should also be given to the position of Italians of dual nationality (Italian and Canadian) whose admission to Canada is not to be facilitated if they had served in their Armed forces.

(e) Consideration should be given to the position of Germans of dual nationality (German and Canadian).

6. The Committee might wish to recommend to Cabinet definite provisions in clarification or modification of the decision of April 4, 1949.

GERMAN NATIONALS; ENTRY INTO CANADA

5. The Minister of Mines and Resources sought clarification of the Cabinet's decision of April 4th, regarding entry into Canada of persons of German nationality, whose admission was sought by persons resident in Canada.

6. The Prime Minister said that his understanding of the present arrangement was that the Minister of Mines and Resources might in special cases seek the authority of the Governor in Council for the admission of a person of German nationality where an application had been made by a relative resident in Canada and where circumstances appeared to justify favourable consideration.

7. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the Prime Minister's remarks and agreed that the Minister of Mines and Resources bring the matter forward for consideration at an early meeting.

IMMIGRATION; ADMISSION OF GERMAN NATIONALS

23. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 28th, observed that, under present regulations, there was no absolute impediment to German nationals being admitted to Canada. Special consideration could be given to deserving cases and admission approved by Order in Council.

24. The Minister of Agriculture suggested that, in present circumstances, it would be difficult to admit German nationals on a discretionary basis. Exceptions made to the general prohibition would probably create misunderstandings and cause some dissatisfaction among Canadians of German origin residing in Canada.

25. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that no change be made in the present restrictions on admission to Canada of German nationals and that any public statement on this matter should indicate that no change in the present policy could be considered until such time as Canada was at peace with Germany; the Minister of Mines and Resources to bring forward for individual consideration by Cabinet any particularly deserving cases that might arise.

[Ottawa], July 12, 1949

Yesterday I discussed with Mr. Jolliffe the question of the admission of German nationals to Canada. As you know, they are at present excluded by the Order-in-Council which prohibits the admission of enemy aliens.

2. Mr. MacDermot and I have recently had some talk on this subject arising from the new status of Western Germany.

3. My own view is that we find ourselves in this matter in a position which is not very practical. We have, for example, made a peace treaty with the Italians and, as a result, Italians can come to this country under the ordinary prevailing immigration regulations. The fact that they were enemies is forgotten and forgiven, but the Italians are not very good settlers in Canada. We have not made a peace treaty with the Germans because our quarrels with our Russian allies have made such a treaty impossible. Consequently, the Germans are still enemies, despite the fact that we wish to cultivate better feelings, at least with Western Germany. They cannot come to Canada, although over the long call of the years they have been consistently good immigrants in this country.

4. Mr. Jolliffe thinks, and he is probably right, that the country is not yet ripe for a return to full-scale German immigration and that there would be an immense outcry against any general opening of the gates to Germans. He is, however, working on a proposal by which there should be a gradual pulling down of the barriers which keep Germans out. He would propose, for example, that the wives or husbands and minor children of German nationals already in Canada should be admitted. He cites one case of a man who came to this country in 1938, leaving his wife and one or two children in Germany. The war came and he could not get them out here because of the operation of the enemy aliens legislation. The unfortunate fellow is still here and he has not seen his wife and children for several years. Mr. Jolliffe says rightly that this is not only immoral but brutal. He would also recommend the admission of fathers and mothers of Germans who are already here and then perhaps as the general temperature of the country permitted gradually extend the classes of Germans to whom admission could be granted. Perhaps this is not very bold but, in the light which is vouchsafed to us, it may not be possible for us to do more than grope. I thought you would be interested in knowing how the thoughts of the Immigration people are turning on this subject.

IMMIGRATION; ADMISSION OF ENEMY ALIENS (GERMAN NATIONALS)

21. The Minister of Mines and Resources explained the difficulties encountered by his department in administering present policy with respect to the admission of German nationals. This provided that only "deserving cases" were given favourable consideration. A great many applications on file were represented as "deserving cases" and if exceptions were made, it would be difficult to keep immigration within reasonable limits.

It was, accordingly, suggested that the entry of certain categories of close relatives be authorized.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, undated-Cabinet Document 1036).†

22. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that consideration might be given to extending the classes to include certain Canadian-born German nationals who now sought permission to re-enter Canada.

In his opinion, the time had come to grant temporary admission to German businessmen and students.

23. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) authorized the Minister of Mines and Resources, subject to provisions of the Immigration Act, to deal favourably with applications for admission to Canada of the following categories of German nationals—

the wife and unmarried children under 18 years of age of a legal resident of Canada;

the husband of a legal resident of Canada;

the parents (aged 65 years and over) of legal residents of Canada;

(b) agreed that the question of extending the categories of admissible German nationals and of permitting entry to Canada, on a non-immigrant basis, of certain German nationals be the subject of further consideration and recommendation by the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

OTTO STRASSER

In September, 1940, the United Kingdom Foreign Office asked Mr. Massey⁶ if we would take Strasser in before his permit to remain in Portugal expired on October 2nd, 1940, (thus saving him from the Gestapo). The British Secret Service told the R.C.M.P. he might be most useful in Canada, apparently, to head a Free German Movement here and in the United States. For humanitarian reasons, for reasons of prestige, and with the sponsorship of the United Kingdom Government, it was agreed to admit him on the assumption that he had means of financial support.

2. Gradually Strasser lost the United Kingdom sponsorship, which became disfavour, as Strasser's anti-Soviet propaganda became embarrassing. His activities were curtailed and his source of revenue dried up.

3. Strasser landed at Saint John, N.B., on April 8th, 1941, from Bermuda as a political refugee. His entry into Canada was permitted primarily on humanitarian grounds but also partly to prevent Hitler from extracting prestige from the capture of a renegade German whom the Allies were powerless to help. The United States was then neutral and Strasser was not able to go there. The United Kingdom was obviously unable to play host under the conditions of 1940-41 and Canada agreed to accept him.

4. In September, 1945, Strasser was pressing two suits:

- (a) for permission to enter the United States for an operation;
- (b) for travel documents to travel to Switzerland.

Both were pressed with varying degrees of vigor until suit (b) was rejected on July 18th, 1947, after consultation with the United Kingdom. On suit (a) we agreed to re-admit Strasser after his visit to the United States but on November 25th, 1947,

⁶ Vincent Massey, alors haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni.
Vincent Massey, then High Commissioner in the United Kingdom.

he informed the Department that the United States had refused to permit him to enter. At the same time he renewed suit (b).

5. On September 24th, 1948, in a talk with Mr. Chance he produced a letter from the French Consul in Winnipeg promising a visa. He then gave notice of his intention to apply for a travel document to enable him to go to France. The application came on November 19th, 1948. On December 13th, 1948, we asked the United Kingdom, United States and French Governments for their views. Replies were all unfavourable.

6. Strasser, unfortunately, could provide leadership for reviving German nationalism. His writing and personal testimony lead one to believe that a Strasser-led party would not be in the interests of German stability.

I have recently received reports concerning the activities of Dr. Otto Strasser which make me think that we should reconsider urgently the whole question of Strasser's position in Canada.

I attach an extract from a letter which has been forwarded to me concerning Strasser,† together with copy of an advertisement which appeared in the German language newspaper "Courier".† This and other evidence indicate that Strasser is trying very hard to establish himself as a leader amongst German-speaking Canadians.

We have been forcing Strasser to remain in Canada because of the difficulty which might be caused by his presence in Germany. Sooner or later, however, we shall have to permit him to leave this country. In the meantime, it is difficult for us to restrict his movements or activities here, particularly since we are forcing him to remain. I wonder, therefore, if we should consider urgently whether more trouble is not likely to be caused by keeping him here and permitting him to organize German Canadians, than by getting him out of the country as soon as possible and letting him return to Germany.

If we are going to change our policy in regard to Strasser, I think we should do so as quickly as possible and I would, therefore, be grateful for an early report on this question.

RE: OTTO STRASSER

Following the decision of Cabinet of April 28, and under your directions, enquiries were made of the United Kingdom authorities regarding the possibility of Otto Strasser being returned to Germany. It was pointed out that the case was somewhat awkward for this country and we should be interested to know if the Foreign Office had altered its view about his return to Europe. In reply, July 8, Canada House reported that it was still the view of the Foreign Office that "if Strasser returned either to Western or Eastern Germany he would cause considerable embarrassment to the Western Occupying Powers. His arrival would be particularly unfortunate at a time when the German Government in the West is just coming into being". They went on to point out that while Nationalist groups in Western Germany were now very active, they were also divided, but that the advent of a commanding personality like Strasser might give them a leadership which might become a serious menace.

The Foreign Office said, therefore, that they would be grateful if the Canadian authorities would maintain "for the present" their refusal to grant a Certificate of Identity.

On July 1, Strasser wrote to you, as he said, "for the sixth—and last—time" asking for the Certificate and saying that for the time being he wanted only to go to France, and then to Switzerland, to rejoin his family.

In reply to this, we notified Strasser that it had been decided that there was no reason to change the decision to refuse his request.

Meanwhile reports from Germany freely predicted the return of Strasser to lead his party—The League for Revival of Germany—and a newspaper report from Berlin adds that all preparations for his return had been made and a flat in Munich had been secured. In view of the latest developments, including Strasser's letter to the Prime Minister of July 28,† and the report received by you concerning Strasser's activities in British Columbia,† I would suggest that the attached letter† be sent to Strasser asking for the necessary information, a pre-requisite to issuing the Certificate, but not committing ourselves to doing so. In the meantime, Canada House could be asked to advise the Foreign Office of your concern about Strasser's activities and your present intention to consider granting him the travel document he requests. A draft telegram† on this point is also attached for your approval.⁷

In a telegram to London, dated August 12, which you approved, we asked Canada House to inform the Foreign Office that Strasser's political activities have been embarrassing and were threatening to become more so and that you were considering acceding to his application for travel documents to facilitate his leaving the country. In the replies ultimately received from Washington and Paris, the State Department and the French Foreign Office replied that they hoped we would be able to keep Strasser in Canada because if he left here it would be almost impossible to prevent him from reaching Germany where he would be a dangerous embarrassment both to the new government and to the occupying powers. Canada House reported that the Foreign Office, on the official level, shared these views. Berlin was kept informed of these exchanges.

2. On September 9, we asked the Foreign Office for their final opinion as we did not wish to act until we had learned the views of the Occupying Powers, but that it might become necessary to do so in the next two or three weeks. On September 17, instructions were sent to London, Washington, and Paris to inform the local authorities that we proposed to inform Strasser, on October 1, that we would grant him a Certificate of Identity, provided he could obtain evidence of admissibility to some other country. Berlin was again informed. Canada House reported that the United Kingdom Government was consulting the other Occupying Powers.

⁷ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

3. In the meanwhile the French and United States Governments reiterated their views that Strasser's removal to Europe would create serious difficulties and asked again that we reconsider our decision. On September 23, we received a telegram from London, reporting that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of the Commonwealth Relations Office had called on the High Commissioner to ask us to defer final action beyond the date October 1, which we had mentioned. It was intimated that Mr. Bevin might speak to you about this during his visit to Ottawa. On September 28, the French Ambassador in Ottawa, M. Guérin, on the occasion of one of his first official calls on the Department, left with me a note asking us to give up our plan of permitting Strasser to leave Canadian territory.

4. Some of these communications were passed on to you in New York and on your instructions, further consideration was given to this question. As a result, on September 29, we informed London, Washington and Paris that we were re-examining our decision and that until our study was completed, no Certificate would be issued.

5. On October 1, a memorandum† was prepared for you recommending that we inform the occupying powers that we would postpone granting Strasser a Certificate of Identity and that we should warn them that we did not believe it would be possible to keep Strasser out of Germany or in Canada indefinitely, because his departure was not a matter over which the Canadian Government had complete control. This memorandum was not sent to you, as on October 3, in a conversation with Sir Roger Makins, I agreed that we might absorb the embarrassment of Strasser's activities in this country as a contribution towards preventing a greater embarrassment in Germany. This decision was later communicated to London, Washington, Paris and Berlin.

6. On September 27, the Managing Director of Der Courier wrote to you asking for a statement of policy on Strasser's application. Der Courier is the German language newspaper in Regina which has published a great deal of Strasser's work. On October 17, I signed a reply† on your behalf stating that a Certificate of Identity is issued at the discretion of the Canadian Government and that in the exercise of this discretion, the Government had decided not to issue this document to Dr. Strasser "at this time".

7. According to press reports last week, Strasser has asked Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and other notables to intervene on his behalf on the grounds that he is being deprived of a human right.

[Ottawa], January 29, 1949

Some time ago we discussed the possibility of reviving the proposal under which the Government of Canada would have made a broad gesture toward the anti-communists who escaped from Czechoslovakia.

I have been making what enquiries I can as to the desirability of our doing anything more in this direction and have come to the conclusion that the time has passed at which anything useful might be done.

Senator [Cairine] Wilson has succeeded in getting a Committee together and has collected some $3,000. She hopes to get more. Her Committee has already given some assistance to the few of these refugee Czechs who have arrived in Canada.

You will remember that at least in part as a result of our own efforts a decision was taken to admit 1,000 of these people. So far about 30 have come and I understand that there is a similar group on the way. Their placement has not been very easy as, although theoretically they came forward for specific work, they were not all quite suitable and there has been a certain degree of clashing between our friends the Nemecs⁸ and the Labour Department.

I notice in the Immigration-Labour Committee that there is a stiffening of resistance to immigration movements. There is no indication of any great anxiety on the part of these Czechs to come to Canada and though I was very keen on the project when it was first mooted I do not think in the present atmosphere we should make any progress with the proposal to admit a considerable number of white-collar workers.

Unless you have contrary views, therefore, I should be inclined to leave matters as they are and see how things work out concerning the approved thousand.⁹

IMMIGRATION; ADMISSION OF SMALL GROUPS OF ESTHONIANS; ADMISSION OF BALTIC UNIVERSITY IN EXILE

5. The Minister of Mines and Resources referred to the problems arising out of the arrival, from time to time, in Canadian ports of small parties of refugees from Europe who had not been cleared or qualified, in the usual way, for admission to Canada by Canadian immigration officers abroad. In the past such persons had had to be maintained at public expense in Canada for considerable periods pending completion of medical and security tests which should have been passed before their departure from Europe. A further complication of this type of unauthorized immigration was that Canadian regulations required an intending immigrant to have $2,000 as initial capital, while Swedish exchange regulations would not permit them to transfer more than $400 from that country.

In the circumstances it was recommended that immigration officers in Sweden be authorized to warn prospective immigrants that persons presenting themselves for landing in Canada without passing through the usual immigration procedures would be refused admission and returned to the country from which they came.

At the same time a recent report from Sweden indicated that four ships were preparing to sail for Canadian ports carrying approximately 300 Esthonians who had previously sought refuge there. Some warning should, therefore, be given promptly.

It had been suggested that, since Swedish authorities would allow emigrants to take only $400 per person out of the country, some consideration might be given to amending immigration regulations by lowering the amount of total capital assets required of immigrants.

6. Mr. Gibson further reported that the Refugees Defense Committee, New York, supported by the Executive Committee of the National Council of Canadian Universities, had applied for approval of the transfer to Canada from Germany of the Baltic University in Exile. This institution was staffed by a group of Esthonian, Latvian and Lithuanian scholars. Transfer would involve the movement of approximately 1,200 displaced Baltic persons. It was represented that no practical difficulty would be encountered in arranging for affiliation with one or other of the Canadian universities.

It had been suggested that admission of the Baltic University be authorized subject to the following conditions:

- (a) that Canadian universities agree to take in the Baltic students and staff; and,

(b) that evidence be secured to the effect that sufficient funds would be made available from the United States or other sources for maintenance and operation of the organization.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Minister of Mines and Resources, May 25, 1949—Cabinet Document 973).†

7. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the reports by the Minister of Mines and Resources and agreed:

(a) that no changes be made in immigration regulations to facilitate admission of small groups of European refugees arriving in Canadian ports aboard private vessels; Canadian immigration officers in Sweden to be instructed to warn prospective immigrants that persons presenting themselves for landing in Canada without passing through the usual procedures would be refused admission and returned to the country from which they came; and,

(b) that the transfer to Canada from Germany of the Baltic University in Exile be not approved.

IMMIGRATION; D.P. IMMIGRANTS; VISAS

1. Senator MacKinnon, as Acting Minister of Mines and Resources, said that, with a view to controlling the increasing movement of D.P.'s arriving from Sweden on small vessels without prior examination and without obtaining Canadian visas as required by law, the Cabinet had agreed, on May 27th, that no changes be made in the immigration regulations to facilitate admission to Canada. Canadian immigration officials had consequently warned captains of ships and representatives of various national groups that persons applying for entry into Canada without obtaining visas would be denied admission.

A group of 154 Baltic displaced persons had recently arrived at Halifax from Sweden aboard the motor vessel "Parnu". It was reported that they were of a particularly desirable type. In the circumstances, it was recommended that they be authorized to remain in Canada subject to the usual requirements of health and character.

2. Senator MacKinnon suggested that, with a view to discouraging similar movements, a press announcement be issued summarizing the government's position and stating, amongst other things, that owners, agents or masters of vessels operating in this trade would be prosecuted in all cases where a violation of the Immigration Act could be established.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Acting Minister's memorandum, Aug.29, 1949—Cabinet Document 1030).†

3. The Prime Minister suggested that, to avoid future embarrassment, the announcement should not be couched in too binding terms. It might be preferable to re-word the proposed announcement to constitute a categorical warning to immigrants who might try to come to Canada without visas. It would also warn operators of ships engaged in this traffic that they would be prosecuted. At the same time, the announcement might leave a possible opening to permit genuine hardship cases to be allowed entry without reversing any stated policy of the government.

4. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the immigrants aboard the "Parnu" be transferred from Halifax to immigration detention buildings at Quebec and Montreal pending their obtaining security clearance;

(b) that the owners, agents or masters of vessels operating in this trade be prosecuted in all cases where violation of provisions of the Immigration Act could be established; and

(c) that the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources issue a public announcement stating the government's policy in this matter, amended along the lines suggested by the Prime Minister.

IMMIGRATION; ARRIVAL IN CANADA OF DISPLACED PERSONS WITHOUT VISAS

9. The Minister of Mines and Resources, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 31st, reported that additional numbers of displaced persons had arrived in Canada without prior examination and clearance by Immigration authorities.

The S.S. Sarabande, with 258 passengers, and the S.S. Amanda, with 31 passengers, had reached Halifax from Sweden and were now being detained pending decision as to their disposition. Legal proceedings had been instituted against the Captain of the S.S. Sarabande for violation of the Immigration Act.

The passengers were of Baltic origin and, provided they were in good health and satisfactory from a security standpoint, were a desirable type of immigrant. If they were deported, this would have to be done at public expense.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Sept. 20, 1949—Cabinet Document 1051.)†

10. The Prime Minister suggested that the best way of dealing with this difficult situation would be to adopt a policy inflicting the least unnecessary hardship on the displaced persons themselves, but which would discourage further movements of this kind. Persons of good health, cleared for security and otherwise admissible under the Immigration Act, might be permitted to remain but any person failing to meet these requirements should be deported. Prosecutions under the Immigration Act against captains and owners of vessels should be pressed to serve as a deterrent in future and to recover expenses incurred.

11. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the policy suggested by the Prime Minister and agreed that:

(a) unauthorized immigrants now at Halifax be admitted provided that they were satisfactory from health and security standpoints;

(b) persons failing to meet health and security requirements be deported; and

(c) prosecutions for violations of the Immigration Act be pressed against captains and owners of vessels employed in this trade.

IMMIGRATION OF POLISH CHILDREN

1. A group of 135 Polish children was recently sent to Canada under the auspices of the International Refugee Organization. The children had been in a refugee camp in Tanganyika and their transfer to Canada for placement in private families was arranged by the Canadian Catholic Conference. The Immigration Branch was approached by a representative of Archbishop Charbonneau of Montreal and, having been satisfied that arrangements for the care and maintenance of the children would be made, the Director of Immigration authorized their admission. It was understood at that time that all the children were orphans.

2. During the course of the children's movement to Canada through East Africa, across Europe via Rome and Bremen, the Polish authorities made a number of strenuous protests urging that the children should be repatriated to Poland. They protested, for example, to the local I.R.O. office in Rome and again in Bremen. They also protested on August 11th to the United States and Canadian missions in Germany, urging that the children be not embarked in Bremerhaven on a ship bound for Canada. On September 10th, immediately after the arrival of the first 123 children in Canada, the Polish Minister in Ottawa sent a formal note to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, asking whether the Canadian Government was aware that the children had been brought to Canada without the consent and against the will of their lawful guardians and secondly, what steps the Canadian Government was prepared to take to return the children to Poland. In his note, the Polish Minister claimed that some of the children had parents living in Poland, that others had close relatives there and that the remainder should be considered as wards of the Polish State.

3. Almost half of the children have passed their 17th birthday; they are considered by the I.R.O. to be no longer children and to be capable therefore of making up their own minds on whether they wish to be repatriated to Poland. Children under 17 who are orphans are covered by the I.R.O. Constitution. Annex 1, Part 1, Paragraph 4 of the Constitution states: "The term 'refugee' also applies to unaccompanied children who are war orphans or whose parents have disappeared and who are outside their countries of origin". Almost all the children come within one or other of these two classes, and a good case could be made in support of the I.R.O. action in sending them to Canada.

4. It is possible, however, that of the children under seventeen, eleven are not orphans but have one or both parents living in Poland and six have parents living outside Poland and that the parents in Poland would probably wish their children to be reunited with them in Poland. It would appear that the I.R.O. should not have sent these children to Canada until it had satisfied itself either that the parents did not exist or that they wished their children to come to Canada.

Recommendations:

5. It is recommended¹⁰ that the reply to the Polish Minister's note should state that the Canadian Government authorized the admission of the group of Polish children in good faith in the belief that all the children were orphans and were therefore properly within the mandate of the I.R.O., and that if, in the opinion of the Polish Government, certain children should not have been included in the movement, they should address their representations to the I.R.O.

RE: ADMISSION FROM CHINA OF CHINESE WIVES AND CHILDREN OF CANADIAN RESIDENTS

1. By Order-in-Council P.C. 2115 of the 16th of September, 1930, the Chinese wife and unmarried children under 18 years of age of a Canadian citizen are admissible to Canada. The Chinese Benevolent Association of Vancouver, B.C., has requested that the regulations be modified to permit the admission of wives and children under 18 years of Chinese residents of Canada, who have applied for Canadian citizenship but have not yet been naturalized; this to avoid hardship to the families of those who moved to Hong Kong following the filing of Declaration of Intention and before naturalization is actually granted to the head of the family.

2. Since the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act on May 14, 1947, 523 persons of Chinese origin have been admitted to Canada, the majority being the wives and children of Canadian citizens. At present immigrants in this category are being admitted to Canada at the rate of about 60 per month. As residents of Canada who have obtained naturalization are now filing applications for the admission of their dependents at the rate of 80 per month, the number of admissions will increase proportionately.

3. During the 12 months period ended October 31, 1949, approximately 2800 Chinese have filed Declaration of Intention to become Canadian citizens. As fifteen months must elapse between the filing of the Declaration and the granting of naturalization, it can be assumed that during the year 1951 applications for the admission of the dependents of these new citizens will average 230 per month.

4. Should it be decided to deal favourably with applications for the admission of families following the filing of Declaration of Intention, and assuming that the majority of cases relate to persons of good character who eventually will be granted citizenship, it is estimated that most of the 2800 Chinese referred to in paragraph (3) would promptly apply for the admission of their dependents. It would take the present Hong Kong staff eighteen months to process this number of cases. If we increase the staff to ten inspectional officers with appropriate clerical staff, the cases could be cleared in about four months. This number of families, however, could not secure transportation in anything approaching such a short period of time.

5. The Chinese Benevolent Association claim that the families of Chinese residents of Canada who have already applied for naturalization are quickly becoming destitute in Hong Kong where they are awaiting entry to Canada, through the unnatural conditions existing in the Colony. It is doubtful that any appreciable number of families in this category have left their homes in Kwang-Tung Province to wait in Hong Kong for about fifteen months before being able to present themselves for examination. The Immigration Officer-in-Charge in Hong Kong makes no reference to such a situation in his reports. He does, however, state that the number of approved cases reporting in advance for examination is becoming smaller, due, no doubt, to the conditions in the Province now completely dominated by Communist forces.

6. As approval of the proposal of the Chinese Benevolent Association of Canada recorded in paragraph (1) of this memorandum, would probably result in the dependents of Chinese residents of Canada moving from their homes in the Province of Kwang-Tung to Hong Kong as soon as the head of the family applied for Canadian citizenship, and would mean approval by Order in Council for the admission of approximately 2800 families within a few months, it is recommended that the proposal be not approved. However, on humanitarian grounds and in order to prevent hardship to families that may have disposed of their homes and proceeded to Hong Kong in anticipation of being admitted to Canada, it is recommended that where a Chinese resident of Canada has applied for naturalization prior to December 1, 1949, is of good character and there is no likelihood of citizenship being refused, provision for the admission of his family be made by Order in Council waiving the requirements of P.C. 2115, provided it is established that the family has proceeded to Hong Kong prior to December 1, 1949.¹¹

CABINET DOCUMENT 1117¹²

This document deals with the proposed admission to Canada of the wives and unmarried children of Chinese who are resident in Canada, and who have made application for Canadian citizenship. At present, such people are not admissible to Canada, but only those who are the dependents of Canadian citizens.

2. The document recites the increased number of applications by Chinese for Canadian citizenship and the fact that pressure is being brought on our Immigration authorities for modification of the law because of the present situation now prevailing.

3. I discussed this some time ago with Mr. Jolliffe and have today discussed it with Mr. [A.R.] Menzies. We are of opinion that it is desirable that Chinese living in this country who are people of good character should become citizens. In view of the numbers involved, as set out in Cabinet Document, it seems to Mr. Menzies and me that the proposal made by Mr. Jolliffe in the concluding paragraph is eminently sensible. It will be noticed that he does not think that we should, at this stage, say that the dependents of anyone who has applied for Canadian citizenship should be admitted, but that the dependents of Canadian residents who applied for Canadian naturalization prior to December 1, 1949, be admitted, provided it is established that they themselves arrived in Hong Kong prior to December 1, 1949.

4. The point of the last part of the proposal is that pressure is being brought upon the Immigration authorities on the grounds that these people are pouring into Hong Kong and are destitute there, because they have left their homes, which are under Communist domination. I think Mr. Jolliffe's doubts on this score are probably well-founded.

5. If, however, it is found later that real hardships are developing, both Mr. Menzies and I agree that it will probably be necessary to have another look at this question.

6. For the present, we think Mr. Jolliffe's proposal goes as far as is necessary or desirable at the moment.

Dear Mr. Reid:

I have just read the copy of the dispatch from our High Commissioner in India, dated "about Oct. 26/48", in which Mr. Kearney discusses the immigration of Indians to Canada.¹³ I have a good deal of sympathy, as I am sure you have, for Mr. Kearney's point of view but I am not satisfied that his proposals would constitute the best way of solving the problem that we face. It seems to me that it might be useful for you to suggest to Mr. Kearney that he consider the advisability of proposing to the Indian Government that they enter into an agreement with Canada along the lines of our proposal for an Immigration Treaty with China. I am still of the opinion that the principle underlying the proposals we made to the Chinese Government offer the best hope for meeting the problem of oriental immigration to Canada. These principles have been endorsed by the Government as recently as the first of May, 1947, when the then Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, stated that the Canadian Government "is prepared, at any time, to enter into negotiations with other countries for special agreements for the control of admission of immigrants on a basis of complete equality and reciprocity".

If Mr. Kearney thinks that a proposal of the kind that we made to China might meet the situation in India, your Department and ours could then get together with a view to working out a suggestion which might be laid before the Government here for consideration.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Kearney,

We were interested in receiving your letter which we arbitrarily gave the date of October 26, 1948,¹⁵ in answer to Mr. Pearson's letter of August 12,¹⁶ on the subject of Indian immigration to Canada, in particular your suggestion for a modification

¹⁴ On ne saurait dire, d'après le dossier, si cette ébauche fut envoyée à Kearney. Elle contient, néanmoins, les vues des directions consulaire et du Commonwealth en ce qui a trait aux lettres de Kearney et Keenleyside. Leslie Chance inscrit un commentaire à l'effet que ceci n'était pas «a question which is going to be settled very easily or very quickly and I should have thought that it is better to let it stand as it is at the present.» Son homologue, en tant que chef de la direction du Commonwealth, R.A. MacKay, affirma qu'il «would seem to us inadvisable to take any initiative in a manner of this kind» (Note du 21 janvier 1949, DEA/50017-40).

It is unclear from the file whether this draft was sent to Kearney. It does, however, incorporate the views of the Consular and Commonwealth Divisions regarding the letters from Kearney and Keenleyside. Leslie Chance commented that this was "not a question which is going to be settled very easily or very quickly and I should have thought that it is better to let it stand as it is at the present." His counterpart as Head of the Commonwealth Division, R.A. MacKay, stated that "it would seem to us inadvisable to take any initiative in a manner of this kind" (Memoranda of January 21, 1949, DEA/50017-40).

¹⁵ Volume 14, Document 815.

of our immigration policy to permit the entry for permanent residence of a small annual quota of Indian citizens. This was considered in the Commonwealth and Consular Divisions and referred to the Department of Mines and Resources as well as to all our missions in Commonwealth countries.

2. Dr. Keenleyside wrote to me regarding your letter on January 19. A copy of this letter, which I think you will find very interesting, is attached.

3. As you may have noticed from the Minutes of the Heads of Division meeting of January 24, an Inter-Departmental Committee has been constituted to review and revise the Immigration Act and Regulations. This is a matter in which this Department, as well as the missions abroad, have an obvious and considerable interest. The Inter-Departmental Committee which has been charged with the work of examining the existing Act, has not been given any authority to consider any alteration of its basis, under which the flow of immigrants to Canada is controlled by Orders-in-Council. However, this may not necessarily preclude us from making recommendations if we feel these are desirable, and consideration is being given to this matter by the Divisions concerned. We are happy, therefore, that you have taken some trouble to give us your views on this subject. Our officers who deal with relations with China and other Far Eastern countries, as well as those concerned with the new members of the Commonwealth in Asia, have been giving consideration to the consequences of our present policy of excluding persons of Asiatic race. They have been much attracted by the arguments in favour of a quota system and are preparing memoranda on this subject.

4. During the coming weeks, when the Immigration Act will thus be under careful examination, we will be glad to receive any views that Heads of Mission may wish to make.

5. We will not attempt, therefore, to prepare any general answer to your letter of last October. There are, however, one or two comments which might well be made at this time. In reply to paragraph 2 of your letter it may be said that Mr. Nehru did not at the meeting of Prime Ministers in London last October raise the subject of Indian immigration within the Commonwealth. These informal meetings deliberately avoided any specific issues between different members.

6. In paragraph 7 of your letter you raised the intriguing suggestion that it might be possible to arrange to have the few Asian immigrants who might come to Canada under a quota scheme reside in provinces other than British Columbia. While it is true, of course, that under Section 95 of the B.N.A. Act, the provinces have concurrent powers of legislation respecting immigration, these in fact have to be pretty well limited to settlement arrangements within provinces. The question of entry to Canada itself is a matter exclusively of federal jurisdiction. It is a fundamental principle that there should be freedom of movement between the provinces for all persons, including aliens in peacetime, although in wartime restrictions have been placed on the movements of enemy and other aliens. While, therefore, certain administrative arrangements might be made to encourage certain types of immigrants to settle in certain provinces, there would be no possibility of preventing them from moving to some other part of the country if they desired to.

7. We have been puzzled by the point raised by Dr. [D.P.] Pandia which you quote in paragraph 8 of your letter to the effect that the Canadian-born Indian men choose their wives in India with the result that Canadian-born Indian women must remain spinsters. It is rather difficult to understand why this should be the case especially as the number of men in the Sikh community far exceeds the number of women, and we do not know whether it is a general phenomenon among the Sikhs resident in and about Vancouver. In any event, it was certainly useful as an argument for Dr. Pandia, to seek some relaxation in our regulations so that fiancés of Canadian-born Indian women could come to Canada. This type of case was covered in Dr. Keenleyside's letter to Sardar Malik of June 25, 1948, a copy of which you have.

Yours sincerely,
[ESCOTT REID]

IMMIGRATION; SPECIAL CATEGORIES OF ITALIANS

12. The Prime Minister reported that representations had been made by the Italian Ambassador for greater Italian immigration to Canada.¹⁷

Present overcrowding and unemployment in Italy had prompted the government to do what they could to alleviate the situation. The Ambassador had given assurances that his government would take precautions to ensure a good type of immigrant being selected.

(External Affairs memorandum, Sept.15, 1949)†

13. The Minister of Mines and Resources reported that admission of Italians for farm labour had not been particularly successful. If any group movement of this type of immigrant was contemplated, it was suggested that a minimum of $5,000 capital be required instead of $2,000 as at present.

¹⁷ L'ambassadeur de l'Italie discuta avec la direction de l'Europe une proposition d'admettre 5000 agriculteurs italiens, le 15 juin 1949. Il déclara à ce moment-là que les capitaux nécessaires viendraient des fonds de l'Administration de la coopération économique.

The Italian Ambassador discussed a proposal to admit 5,000 Italian agriculturalists with the European Division on June 15, 1949. At that time he stated that the capital requirements would be met from Economic Cooperation Administration funds.

During the first five months of the current year, some 3,500 Italians immigrants had entered Canada and represented the second largest national group of alien immigrants.

(Immigration—Labour Committee memorandum Aug. 25, 1949).†

14. The Cabinet, after further discussion, deferred decision on the question of encouraging group movements to Canada of Italian immigrants, the Italian Ambassador to be informed that present arrangements appeared to be working not unsatisfactorily with substantial numbers of Italians being permitted entry.

BRITISH IMMIGRATION

There has been a marked decrease in the volume of British immigration during the present calendar year and this trend is continuing.

The following figures record the peak years of British immigration since 1900 and for the full period from 1945–46 to August 1949 inclusive:

Period	British	All Others	Total	Percentage of British to Total Immigration
1912–13	152,373	230,468	382,841	39.8%

British immigrants admitted to Canada in 1945–46 and 1946–47 were mainly dependents of Canadian servicemen.

From 1945 to 1947 demands for ocean transportation to Canada by prospective immigrants in the British Isles exceeded the accommodation available. In 1948 and 1949 the Canadian Government provided subsidized transportation and this problem largely disappeared. Immigration from the British Isles commenced to decline in the late autumn of 1948, and for the eight months ended August 31st, 1949, had decreased 45% compared with the corresponding period in 1948.

The main reasons for the decrease are:—

1. The backlog created by the complete cessation of immigration during the war period was disposed of by December 1948.

2. Restriction on the export of capital. British regulations effective from April 21st, 1948, permit emigrants to transfer one thousand pounds at the rate of two hundred and fifty pounds per annum. Previous to that date five thousand pounds could be exported at the rate of one thousand pounds per annum. (The devaluation of the £ will further discourage British immigration).

3. Little immigration publicity on Canada in the British Isles and the intense campaign of the Australian Government to secure settlers.

The following are contributing but less important factors in the situation:—

(a) The high cost of transportation (estimated at £170 per family of three).

(b) The cost of medical examination (estimated cost of X-ray examination six to seven pounds per family of three plus £1.10. where immigrants are examined by roster doctors.)

(c) Housing shortage in Canada.

The following proposals are submitted for the purpose of stimulating British immigration:—

I. Continue efforts to ease the regulations covering the export of capital belonging to immigrants coming to Canada, and continue also the effort to find some arrangement in Canada which will facilitate the financial establishment of these immigrants.

II. Open three additional immigration offices in the British Isles, possibly at York, Cardiff (or Bristol), and Inverness. The approximate cost of each office would be $30,000 per annum.

III. Conduct a continuing publicity campaign, by press advertising, newspaper articles on Canada, films and the distribution of literature through travel agencies.

IV. Supply free X-ray examinations at all immigration offices in the United Kingdom.

V. Coordination of Labour Department representatives in the United Kingdom with the Immigration Service.

Ottawa, October 29, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Cabinet Committee on Immigration considered today¹⁸ (inter alia) a paper from Mines and Resources on immigration to Canada from the United Kingdom.

2. Paper recites decrease in United Kingdom emigration to this country citing following causes:

- (a) Wartime backlog disposed of by December 1948.
- (b) Restrictions on export of capital.
- (c) Little publicity on Canada and intensive Australian campaign.
- (d) High cost transportation.
- (e) Cost of medical examination.
- (f) Housing shortage in Canada.

3. Paper made following recommendations for purpose of stimulating British immigration into this country:

(I) Continue efforts to ease relations covering export of capital and continue efforts to find some arrangement in Canada to facilitate financial establishment of immigrants.

(II) Open three additional immigration offices in British Isles; following suggested: York, Cardiff, Bristol, Inverness.

(III) Conduct a continuing publicity campaign by press advertising, newspaper articles on Canada, films and distribution literature through travel agencies.

(IV) Supply free X-ray examination at all immigration offices in United Kingdom.

(V) Coordination Labour Department representatives in United Kingdom with Immigration Service.

4. Discussion was adjourned for your considered advice on recommendations stated in paragraph 3 above especially 3(V). Questions raised by 3(I) are, as you know, already under consideration. 3(II): Some doubt was expressed on wisdom of initiative on part of Canada to increase immigration at this time, when there are some indications that over next twelve months present high level of employment may decline. Keenleyside argued that if efforts were to be soft-pedalled in times as good as these, the future for immigration into this country would be dark indeed. 3(III): Attention was directed to very high cost and questionable value press publicity in United Kingdom in present circumstances. 3(IV) met with general approval.

¹⁸ Le 28 octobre 1949/October 28, 1949.

3(V) reflects continuing policy differences between Labour and Immigration Services. Labour was not represented at meeting. Immigration, however, urged that separate Labour activities in United Kingdom were causing real difficulties. It was stated activities Labour Department, London Office, had resulted in only 38 immigrants in first 8 months present year. Immigration argued that at very least two offices should be in same place and work coordinated.

5. You are requested to submit within next ten days, if possible, your views on all five recommendations. Matter somewhat urgent as Minister Mines and Resources wishes to have immigration policy for next twelve months delineated by time he has to present estimates.

TELEGRAM 2086

London, November 2, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference your telegram No. 1907 of October 29th, future policy regarding emigration to Canada from the United Kingdom.

2. I concur in the general conclusions set forth in your paragraph 2 as to the causes of the decrease in United Kingdom emigration to Canada, although (b) is, of course, the controlling and most important. Moreover, since devaluation, (d) has assumed more importance on account of the increase in sterling steamship fares. As regards (c), I do not think paucity of Canadian publicity and an intensive Australian campaign are contributory causes of any importance. Apart from general publicity about Canada, there was considerable advertising and publicity in connection with the recent efforts of Ontario to stimulate interest in migration to that province. As far as migration to Australia is concerned, the Australian Minister of Immigration, in a public statement at Canberra on March 30th, said that "1949 would be the most vigorous Australian emigration year since the gold rush days", and that 12 ships would bring the record number of 12,772 British emigrants. The majority of these would travel under the Government's free and assisted passages scheme, which also provided for the nomination of immigrants by relatives and friends guaranteeing accommodation. In making comparisons it should be borne in mind that in the case of migration to Australia, no dollar exchange problem arises, and that assisted passages are not available for emigrants to Canada. Yet our London Immigration Office figures show that 13,375 emigrants had proceeded to Canada this year up to the end of June.

3. Regarding the recommendations made for the stimulation of United Kingdom migration to Canada, referred to in paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference, I will deal with these points serially:

I. My telegram No. 2013 of October 22nd† made enquiry regarding current thinking in Ottawa arising out of the effects of devaluation on remittances by emigrants. I would assume that under present circumstances the Canadian view would be to regard this as entirely a matter for the United Kingdom authorities and there is little likelihood of their relaxing the existing regulations governing the export of capital. Any arrangement in Canada to facilitate the financial establishment of immigrants is, of course, another matter.

II. In my judgment, there is no case, under present conditions, for opening three additional emigration offices. You are aware that an office was opened in Glasgow by Ontario and this has now been closed. My telegram No. 1962 of August 14th† informed you of a statement by the Agent General for Ontario in London, who said this decision was influenced by the understanding that the Federal Government proposed extending its immigration services both in Canada and Britain. I think the real reason was that the Ontario authorities did not consider the continuance of the office warranted.

III. I have grave doubts as to whether a publicity campaign by press advertising would be a warrantable expenditure of public funds under present circumstances. Our Immigration Office could ensure a fairly general distribution of literature through travel agencies and other outlets if the material were available. Press advertising is very costly and our advertising experience in connection with the Canadian Government air charter scheme, when upwards of $100,000 was spent, does not encourage the belief that expenditure on advertising now would be any more productive of results, particularly having regard to the over-riding financial factors already referred to.

IV. There is a strong case for the supply of free X-ray examination by our immigration services in the United Kingdom. This free service was available in the Ontario office until its recent closing, and you will recall that in my telegram No. 1962 of October 14th† regarding the Ontario decision, we were offered the purchase of the X-ray equipment of two machines.

V. It is obviously desirable that there should be a greater degree of co-ordination between the activities of our Labour Department representatives and the Immigration Service in the United Kingdom. These offices could most effectively work in collaboration in the same place, and it is difficult to see, in view of the results indicated in your telegram, how the employment of the present numbers in a separate Department of Labour office is warranted.

4. In general terms, I am of the opinion that we are entering a period in this country when it would be the height of unwisdom for Canada to embark now on a plan to increase emigration involving the opening of new offices and increased personnel and expenditure. It is necessary for those considering these questions to have a full appreciation of the gravity of the existing economic crisis in the United Kingdom. Before the crisis the United Kingdom Treasury was seriously concerned about the dollar drain involved in emigrant remittances to Canada. Now they are still more worried about what is to them equivalent, in effect, to imports from dollar sources. Furthermore, the recent devaluation has placed settlement in Canada beyond the financial reach of many prospective migrants.

5. This is, of course, directly related to the larger question of the expansion of Canadian Government departmental offices in the United Kingdom. I fully share the concern expressed by my predecessor in this matter. The office of one Department can no longer be considered in isolation from the others and there is room for a much greater degree of co-ordination of the activities of the various Departments in London in the interests of efficiency and economy. At the moment, the total personnel of Canadian Government employees in London, excluding those in the offices of the provinces, is approaching the 500 mark. In 1939, only 7 Departments were represented here. We now have 12 departmental offices and also a number of Canadian Government agencies, such as the Canadian Commercial Corporation, Wheat Board, Film Board and R.C.M.P.

6. Referring to my telegram No. 1962 of October 14th† about the communication addressed to me by the Agent General for Ontario concerning the availability in London of office space and equipment as a result of the closing of the Ontario Immigration Office, I should be grateful for instructions as soon as possible as to what reply should be made, as it is necessary for the Ontario authorities to come to an early decision with regard to this matter.

Ottawa, November 30, 1949

Dear Mr. Robertson,

As you know, there have been further evidences recently of friction between the Labour Department and the Immigration Service.

I dare say you have seen a copy of a letter recently sent by Mr. MacKinnon, the United Kingdom Representative of the Labour Department to Mr. Wilgress. In case you have not done so, I enclose a copy.†

We are not anxious to take sides in this unfortunate matter but the theme of this letter does seem a little naive. I doubt that the quality of the Labour counsellors in the United Kingdom is so much different from that of the Immigration Officers that they, and they alone, are able to advise people about openings in Canada and to decide on the suitability of persons from an employability standpoint. Surely if there is a lack of this kind of service among our Immigration people they should repair it, either by training their own people better or by having Labour Department advisers attached to them for the specific duty.

I realize that this is but a part of the wider question of integration of Canadian representation abroad which will sooner or later have to be dealt with as a whole.¹⁹ It occurs to me, however, that something might be done about the situation between these two Departments at this time when the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration is being set up. Perhaps it might be possible for you to give some thought to this question in relation to the definition of the duties of the new Department. I am afraid that unless this constant friction is removed the situation will be no better, and perhaps worse, as the result of the setting up of a new Department. I personally incline to the view that the activities of the Labour Department abroad should be reduced to those ordinarily associated with Labour Attachés.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

¹⁹ Dans une note à Heaney, qui provoqua cette lettre, Chance fit le commentaire suivant:

In a memorandum to Heaney that prompted this letter, Chance commented as follows:

I have a strong feeling that the activities of the Labour Department abroad should be reduced to those ordinarily associated with Labour Attachés and that this business of entering into the field of another Government Department is completely wrong. I am afraid, however, that situations like this will continue to multiply until the problem of an integrated Foreign Service is faced as a whole. Incidents of this kind are an odd result of having to put the cart before the horse and having established Immigration, Trade and Commerce, and representatives of other Government Departments abroad before we had really done anything at all about a Consular Service. I wonder if we are really prepared to face the issues now and see what can be done about gathering up all these elements into one control before the muddle comes out into public view.

IMMIGRATION FROM THE UNITED STATES

With the exception of six years following the depression and three of the war years, immigration from the United States is at its lowest ebb since the turn of the century.

The following statement records the general trend over the past forty-six years:—

Immigration from United States and Overseas

	From U.S.	From Overseas	Total Immigration
1903	49,473	78,891	128,364
1912-13	119,418	263,423	782,841
1919-20	40,728	67,680	108,408
1928-29	30,560	137,163	167,723
1929-30	30,727	132,561	163,288
1931-32	14,297	11,455	25,752
1932-33	13,196	6,586	19,782
1944-45	4,624	10,682	15,306
1945-46	7,454	23,627	31,080
1946-47	11,410	55,580	66,990
1947-48	9,034	70,160	79,194
1948-49	7,306	118,297	125,603
8 months ended
Aug. 31, 1949.	5,049	66,926	71,975

It is estimated that 7000 immigrants will settle in Canada during the present calendar year.

With the restrictions that exist in European countries from which Canada has in the past secured a large proportion of desirable immigrants, the obtaining of immigrants from the United States has become an increasingly important factor in Canada's immigration policy. High level employment and present wage scales in the United States tend to decrease the movement of immigrants to Canada and it is recommended that consideration be given to plans for materially increasing immigration from that country.

Several Canadian Immigration Agencies were opened in the United States prior to the First World War and in the early 20's these were increased to fifteen, located as follows:—

Fargo, N.D.	Minneapolis, Minn.	Great Falls, Mont.
Spokane, Wash.	Kansas City, Mo.	Buffalo, N.Y.
Detroit, Mich.	Omaha, Nebr.	Boston, Mass.
Woonsocket, R.I.	Chicago, Ill.	Manchester, N.H.
San Francisco, Cal.		Columbus, Ohio
		Indianapolis, Ind.

During the fiscal year 1929–30, which was a peak year for U.S. immigration, a total of 30,727 immigrants were admitted to Canada from the United States, and of these 13,056 were recruited by Immigration Agents located in the offices listed above. These immigrants brought with them effects valued at over $12,000,000, plus an unknown amount of cash and other assets which they transferred to Canada. The cost of operating the above offices, including staff salaries, travelling expenses, rent of office space, publicity, etc., was $270,328.53 for the year 1929–30. All of the above named offices were closed during the early years of the depression.

The Colonization Departments of the two Railways also had representatives in a number of States of the Union. At present they are only operating in Minneapolis. The Colonization officials of the Railways have expressed the view that many excellent settlers can be obtained from the United States if some encouragement is offered by means of judicious advertising and personal solicitation. It is understood that if the Canadian Government is prepared to actively enter the United States field, the Colonization Departments of the two Railways also would increase their activities in that country.

The most suitable locations for immigration agencies would be New York State, Michigan or Illinois and the middle Western States. The approximate cost of operating each office would be $25,000.00 per annum: this does not include the cost of advertising and literature.

The Department of Mines and Resources recommend that they be authorized to initiate a programme of this sort, commencing with the immediate establishment of not more than four offices.²⁰

A.L. JOLLIFFE

²⁰ Le 28 octobre 1949, le Comité du Cabinet sur la politique de l'immigration remit à plus tard la considération de cette proposition.

On October 28, 1949 the Cabinet Committee on Immigration Policy deferred consideration of this proposal.

IMMIGRATION; EXCEPTION OF ARMENIANS, LEBANESE AND SYRIANS FROM "ASIATIC RACE" PROHIBITION; INCLUSION IN ADMISSIBLE CLASSES; AMENDMENTS TO REGULATIONS—NEWFOUNDLAND AND CITIZENS OF IRELAND

18. The Minister of Mines and Resources submitted three recommendations to Council relating to immigration matters.

Two of these provided respectively for exception of immigrants of Armenian, Lebanese and Syrian origin from Order in Council P.C.2115 of September 16th, 1930, which prohibits admission of immigrants of "Asiatic race", and for inclusion of Armenian, Lebanese and Syrian immigrants in the admissible classes defined by Order in Council P.C.4849 of November 26th, 1947.

The third provided that Newfoundlanders and citizens of Ireland would no longer be subject to the passport regulations established by Order in Council P.C.4851 of November 26th, 1947.

(Minister's recommendations to Council, Apr.28 and Apr.29, 1949).†

19. The Secretary of State for External Affairs noted that the recommendation for exception of Armenians, Lebanese and Syrians from the Order in Council prohibiting the admission to Canada of Asiatics might create difficulties in pointing up the position of Turks and Palestinians and might also re-open the question of the status of Indians under the immigration regulations.

20. Mr. Pearson pointed out that the only portion of Armenia presently constituted as a state was one of the Soviet Republics within the U.S.S.R. In the circumstances, it might be preferable to avoid any reference to Armenians.

21. The Prime Minister suggested that consideration might be given to the establishment in Canada of a quota system for the admission of all immigrants. This would avoid most of the difficulties referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

22. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the two recommendations to Council relating to immigrants of Armenian, Lebanese and Syrian origin be not approved;

(b) that the provisions of the Immigration regulations applicable to European countries, other than the United Kingdom and France, be extended to Syria and Lebanon;²¹ and,

(c) that decision on the recommendation relating to Newfoundlanders and citizens of Ireland be deferred pending further consideration.

IMMIGRATION; ADMISSION OF SYRIANS, LEBANESE AND ARMENIANS.

9. The Minister of Mines and Resources, referring to discussion at the meeting of May 4th, 1949, reported that renewed representations had been made urging that Syrians, Armenians and Lebanese be exempted from the provisions of Order in Council P.C.2115 of September 16th, 1930, which regulated Asiatic immigration.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

10. Senator MacKinnon said that the Syrian, Lebanese and Armenian colonies had been pressing this matter for some time. Their main purpose appeared to be to remove the inference that Syrians, Armenians and Lebanese were Asiatics.

11. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed that Syrians, Armenians and Lebanese should not be treated as absolutely barred by the provisions of the Asiatic Order (P.C.2115 of September 16th, 1930), it being understood that meritorious individual cases be dealt with by Order in Council; the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Justice to ascertain whether any further action was required to permit such entry by Order in Council.

55. Senator MacKinnon referring to discussion at the meeting of September 29th said that it had been his understanding Cabinet had then agreed, that for purposes of immigration, Syrians and Lebanese would no longer be considered as Asiatics but as Europeans.

It had recently been brought to his attention that, in practice, the Immigration Branch were still treating Syrians and Lebanese as falling under the provisions of the Order in Council relating to Asiatics.

56. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the remarks by Senator MacKinnon on the designation of Syrians and Lebanese as Asiatics and agreed that this question be deferred until the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration had been established and a minister appointed thereto.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

You will have seen C.R.O. circular telegram H.2 of January 1[†] which summarized the position taken by the Commonwealth governments on the proposals on Commonwealth consultation which were made at the meeting of Prime Ministers in London, and in which the United Kingdom suggested an amendment of the London proposals for regular meetings at the Ministerial level on foreign affairs, providing for the substitution for the words "at least once a year and twice a year if possible" the words "once a year or more frequently if occasion requires."

2. This telegram has not yet been answered. We did, however, send a telegram to Mr. Robertson on January 5[†] stating that it did not appear likely that the amendment now suggested would do anything towards meeting the difficulties felt by the Canadian government, though the matter had not been considered by Ministers. Mr. Robertson informally told officials of the Commonwealth Relations Office that we did not regard their draft amendment as going any substantial distance to meet Canadian criticism of the original paper. They hoped for the record that we were replying to Circular H.2.

3. The governments of Australia, New Zealand and Ceylon have approved the proposed amendment. India, on the other hand, largely followed the line taken by the Canadian government in its reply of November 5. On January 26 the South African government at last circulated its views and comments on the original paper of October 21. A copy of its telegram No. 3 is attached.[†] It will be noted that it expressed general satisfaction with the existing arrangements for consultation but makes certain specific comments and proposed amendments, particularly with regard to the London recommendations for regular meetings on foreign affairs and on defence consultation. The views of the South African government are clearly very close to our own but it is thought that if their statement as well as ours of November 5 were published, ours would appear to be less cooperative and more negative. This might well expose the Canadian government to unjustified criticism.

4. As you are aware, a considerable amount of attention has been given to this subject in the press during the last few days as a result principally, it seems, of the remark made by Dr. Evatt on his arrival in Perth on January 13 to the effect that "one of the most important decisions" of the October meeting had not yet been announced. Both London dailies and Canadian newspapers have mentioned the proposal to hold a meeting in Ceylon on foreign affairs a few months hence.

5. You will no doubt wish to consider urgently what action should now be taken by the Canadian government in regard to the reply that might be sent to London on the subject of the proposals on Commonwealth consultation.

Alternatives

6. The following alternative courses of action might be considered:

I. A telegram might be sent to the United Kingdom, and repeated to other Commonwealth governments, intimating that the United Kingdom's suggested amendment to the text of the statement does not meet our views.

It might be anticipated that this telegram together with our original reply would have to be published, probably at an early date. Although our previous comments would probably be quite acceptable to the majority of the Canadian people, publication of replies of all governments might have the unfortunate effect of indicating a much more serious split among Commonwealth governments in the matter of consultation than is actually the case.

II. We might draft a new statement on consultation and endeavour to have it accepted by other Commonwealth governments. Since the main public interest in speculation in the press about consultation has been on the proposed meetings of ministers on foreign affairs, and on the subject of defence consultation, our proposed statement might be confined to these points.

It may be seriously doubted whether we would have much success in getting such a statement accepted by other Commonwealth governments in view of the fact that so far all discussion between governments has been on the statement drafted in London and in view of the apparently strong pressure from Australia for the present statement, which includes proposals for consultation on economic matters.

III. We might endeavour to have the statement amended to take account of views expressed in our reply to the United Kingdom and the South African reply. It is felt that this course would be the more practical. If this course is adopted, a telegram might be drafted along the following lines:

(a) We might repeat our reluctance to the publication of the Statement on Consultation on the ground that it would tend to make more rigid and formal the present arrangements, which are working out quite satisfactorily, largely because they are flexible and informal, but we might indicate our assent to publication of an amended statement if other Commonwealth governments feel strongly that such a public statement is desirable.

(b) We might seek amendment of paragraph 2 of the statement along the following lines:

"A meeting on foreign affairs will be held by the Heads of Commonwealth delegations to the General Assembly of the United Nations immediately following the conclusion of each regular annual session of the Assembly. This arrangement will be subject to review as circumstances warrant. At such meetings the necessity or desirability of further meetings on foreign affairs at the Ministerial level will be discussed.”

(c) We might accept the South African amendment for Recommendation 4, paragraphs (a) and (b) as well as their suggested deletion of 5 (b).

(d) We might accept the South African amendment of Recommendation 6, adding a sentence along the lines of Mr. St. Laurent’s reservation at London. Below is the South African redraft of paragraph 6. (Deletions are bracketed, additions are underlined.)

“In furtherance of the general aim of cooperation between all peace-loving nations to deter and resist aggression there will be close consultation between Commonwealth Governments to arrange cooperative action in matters of defence (including) with particular reference to those matters which arise from a common interest in the security of a particular region. The military advisers of these Governments will consult together to frame proposals and plans for submission to their respective Governments.

“Meetings will be arranged on the Ministerial level as the occasion demands to discuss (defence problems whether general or regional) specific problems of particular interest to the Governments concerned.

“In the system of Commonwealth service liaison officers there already exists machinery for the exchange of military information of general interest and Commonwealth Governments will consider how that machinery can be improved to render it fully effective as a means of exchanging information about the progress of the defence plans, whether general or regional, and securing the maximum appropriate degree of defence coordination.”

The following sentence to cover Mr. St. Laurent’s reservation at London might be added:

“It is, however, recognized that it would be unrealistic to regard as effective either general or regional plans of defence which would comprise Commonwealth countries exclusively, and which did not also include other peace-loving countries prepared to cooperate in resisting aggression.”

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION; MINISTERS' MEETINGS ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 28th[†], observed that the amendment suggested by the U.K. government concerning meetings of Ministers on foreign affairs did not meet the fundamental Canadian objections to the London proposals on Commonwealth consultation.

The governments of Australia, New Zealand and Ceylon had approved the proposed amendment, while India and now South Africa had followed a line similar to that taken by the Canadian government in the communication circulated to Commonwealth governments on November 5th last.

It might help to avoid a public division on this question if some alternative were suggested. For this purpose a draft paragraph had been prepared which would provide for meetings on foreign affairs by the heads of Commonwealth delegations immediately following each regular annual session of the UN Assembly. At such meetings the necessity or desirability of further meetings could be discussed.

(External Affairs memorandum to the Minister, Feb. 1, 1949, and attached documents).[†]

2. The Prime Minister observed that it seemed likely that the Australian and New Zealand governments would continue to press for some centralized machinery with a view to the formulation of a common foreign policy for the nations of the Commonwealth.

Reports from Wellington indicated that some such proposal for the co-ordination of foreign policy with the United Kingdom would be supported by New Zealand. If Canada were to agree to an arrangement such as that suggested by the Minister, it would have to be clearly understood that the proposed meetings of Ministers were solely for the purpose of consultation and exchange of information, not to make decisions and determine joint policies.

(Telegrams 13 and 14, Canadian High Commissioner, Wellington, to External Affairs, Feb. 1, 1949).[†]

3. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs prepare, for consideration at the next meeting, a draft circular telegram to Commonwealth governments suggesting amendment of the London proposals for meetings on foreign affairs by providing for such meetings immediately following the conclusion of sessions of the U.N. Assembly and for the sole purpose of consultation and exchange of information; the message to emphasize the objections taken by Canada to anything in the nature of centralized Commonwealth machinery for the purpose of concerting policies on external affairs.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that, at the meeting of February 4th, the Cabinet had agreed that a telegram be prepared for circulation to Commonwealth governments, restating the government's views.

After consultation with the Prime Minister, it was now proposed, as an alternative, that a brief message be sent to all Commonwealth governments to the effect that, as agreement could not be reached on a formula which would be satisfactory to all members of the Commonwealth, the matter be left in abeyance for the time being.

(External Affairs memorandum, Feb. 16, 1949, and attached draft telegram to the Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom).†

24. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that a message be sent to all Commonwealth governments, as recommended by the Minister, suggesting that, since agreement between all members of the Commonwealth on arrangements for consultation was not now possible, the subject be left in abeyance for the time being and be reconsidered at a later date.

Commonwealth consultation. Please convey the communication set forth below to the United Kingdom Government. We are giving similar instructions to our High Commissioners in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India. Would you also please give copies to the High Commissioners for Pakistan and Ceylon for transmission to their governments. Text begins.

1. The Cabinet has given consideration to C.R.O. Circular Telegram H.2 of January 1† and the telegram of the South African Government of January 26, addressed to London as No. 34† and repeated to the other Commonwealth Governments, on the subject of Commonwealth consultation.

2. The amendment suggested in paragraph 2 of H.2 does not meet the difficulties already expressed by certain Commonwealth Governments. It seems clear that agreement cannot now be reached in regard to this matter on a formula which will be satisfactory to all members of the Commonwealth. Further efforts at the moment to reach agreement on this subject might create more problems than they solved. The Canadian Government, therefore, feels that the matter might be left in abeyance for the time being, though it could be reconsidered at a later date if desired. In any event we are most anxious that no publicity should be given to it, as it could serve no useful purpose, we think, to underline the differences of view point on this matter within the Commonwealth. As you know, the Canadian Government is quite satisfied with the existing mechanisms of consultation within the Commonwealth. Ends.

London, April 6, 1949

Dear Mr. Pearson,

At the last meeting of High Commissioners with the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, Mr. [J.A.] Beasley, the Australian High Commissioner, mentioned that, to his way of thinking, the meetings constituted a kind of Commonwealth Cabinet. I do not know whether this is the Australian Government's concept of these meetings but it is very revealing to discover that it is Mr. Beasley's, who conducts himself as though the meetings were for the purpose of expressing the views of Governments and formulating policy. I therefore think the time is opportune for me to raise with you the whole question of these High Commissioners' meetings, which could be discussed when you are here.

For some time before his departure, I understand, Mr. Robertson was perturbed by the course which the High Commissioners' meetings seemed to be taking, but he was too busy during his last six weeks here to do anything about it. In the course of the last year it appears that the Commonwealth Relations Office has gradually reinstated the practice of regular meetings of High Commissioners, and the two which I have attended, if they are typical, and I am assured that they are, also lead me to believe that it is a matter which we cannot any longer let drift without an examination of all its implications.

In reviewing the correspondence on this matter may I draw your attention first to a letter addressed by Mr. King,³ dated the 22nd March, 1927, to Mr. [L.S.] Amery, then Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. After the 1926 Imperial Conference, Mr. Amery had proposed regular meetings of the High Commissioners and this proposal was eventually turned down by Mr. King in terms which were so sharp that it apparently killed the idea for the next 13 or 14 years. Mr. King's reasons were briefly as follows:

If the Conferences were unofficial, he thought they were unnecessary and should be avoided as liable, sooner or later, to create in the minds of someone an erroneous impression as to the obligations arising therefrom. If they were to be official, to countenance them would be helping to build up in London, in conjunction with the Dominions Secretary, a sort of Commonwealth Cabinet, the members of which would have had from their Governments no instructions of any kind, and with respect to the doings of which their Governments, in the nature of things, would have little or no knowledge.

Secondly, Mr. King believed that these meetings would be a retrograde step and not truly indicative of the new position of equality of the Dominions. He also thought that such meetings would tend to make the High Commissioners more and more representatives of the Secretary of State for the Dominions in communication with their Governments, rather than the representatives of their Governments in communication with the Government of the United Kingdom.

Mr. King then went on to state that the Canadian Government considered that the Canadian High Commissioner should hold a position corresponding in dignity, importance and status to that of the Ambassadors or Ministers who represent foreign states. To hold meetings of this sort, he thought, was not entirely compatible with that status.

You will be familiar with the position regarding High Commissioners' meetings when you were in London during Mr. Massey's⁴ term of office, and the difficulties which, I understand, arose at the beginning of the war when the then Secretary of State endeavoured to organize them. I believe some embarrassment arose as a result of the instructions Mr. Massey received from Ottawa regarding attendance at the meetings. Apparently it was only towards the middle of the war period that Mr. Massey was authorized to attend the daily meetings which were held for the specific purpose of keeping High Commissioners informed of the course of the war, and were discontinued at the end of hostilities. These meetings were purely personal to High Commissioners. Their deputies did not attend the meetings in their absence, and they were not accompanied by any members of their staff. These meetings, like the present meetings, were intended to be of a purely informational character to enable the High Commissioners, at their discretion, to make supplementary reports to their Governments on current problems or subjects under discussion.

After the end of hostilities, occasional meetings were held in order to discuss specific questions. On the 26th February, 1947, Lord Addison⁵ proposed that henceforward he should meet regularly with the Commonwealth High Commissioners at fortnightly intervals. When Mr. Robertson informed you of this you replied, in your telegram No. 341 of the 28th February, 1947, that you would prefer a return to the irregular discussions. You stated: "It is felt that great caution should be exercised in this matter and that there should be no developments which would give the impression that a Cabinet of High Commissioners was being established or any unnecessary institutional machinery." Mr. Robertson replied that he had given the substance of your views to Sir Eric Machtig⁶ and added that he thought it very likely that the intention to have regular meetings would break down from natural causes. In spite of this, fairly regular meetings were arranged by Lord Addison during the remaining period of his tenure of office.

When Mr. Noel-Baker took office, he indicated his anxiety to reinstitute regular meetings of High Commissioners. Mr. Robertson wrote about this to you on the 13th November, 1947, pointing out that there would now be new force in the arguments against holding regular meetings, because of the presence of the High Commissioners for Pakistan, India, and shortly, Ceylon. There might have been some justification for the previous meetings from the point of view of exchanging information, but the presence of representatives of the new Dominions would mean that little real information could be given out and discussions would necessarily be somewhat restricted. At the official level in the Commonwealth Relations Office, these meetings have been deplored, and I believe Liesching has always held the same view as Machtig that they are on the whole a waste of time. Nevertheless, the meetings continued, and sometime in March, 1948, it seems to have been agreed that there should be regular meetings every other Friday.

While the reasons produced in 1927 against having the meetings of High Commissioners have not quite the same force today, nevertheless there is still, I believe, a possibility that some of my colleagues and/or the United Kingdom Government may wish to interpret the meetings as constituting some sort of inner Cabinet of the Empire. I have already mentioned Mr. Beasley's point of view on this. Furthermore, the meetings really do add very little indeed to our general knowledge, and the time wasted in them—often up to two or two and half hours—might be more usefully employed in personal talks with the Minister of State, [Christopher] Mayhew, Noel-Baker, Strang, or other top officials, by which channel we could get far more information about United Kingdom policy.

In addition to having little utility value, they tend to become forums for discussion of controversial points and often after some of the more violent discussions, those High Commissioners who have been most vocal have to admit that they are talking only for themselves and do not know what their governments' policies are. To my way of thinking the meetings are actually doing harm by the exacerbation of personal relationships, due largely to the personalities of the Australian, Indian and Ceylonese High Commissioners. At the last meeting, for example, Mr. Beasley launched into an extremely ill-mannered attack on Sir Percivale Liesching for the way in which the negotiations for the sending of emissaries to the Commonwealth capitals had been done directly between Prime Ministers. He resented not being kept informed and accused Liesching of not being a gentleman for having failed to keep him in the picture. This, as you can imagine, led to a rather wild and unhappy controversy. His attack on a Civil Servant obviously stemmed from the belief that as a member of the "Commonwealth Cabinet" he had as much right to criticize a United Kingdom Civil Servant as Mr. Noel-Baker. On other occasions, and notably with regard to Indonesia, the quarrels have been of no value as regards determining the policies of the various Commonwealth governments, but have only created bad feelings.

⁶ Alors sous-secrétaire d'État permanent aux Affaires des dominions.
Then Permanent Under-Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

The one really useful reason I can think of for continuing the meetings is that it does give us an opportunity to find out the special approach to world problems of the new Dominions. On many occasions the Indian, Pakistan or Ceylonese High Commissioners have produced refreshing light on some international development, which, for my part, at any rate, I would not have thought of. Since our contacts with these three Dominions are not very close, there is perhaps something to be said for the opportunity which these meetings afford us of finding out their points of view.

You will, I am sure, appreciate that a very real question arises as to whether these meetings of High Commissioners serve a useful purpose and should continue to receive our support. I look forward to discussing the whole question with you during your visit to London.

Yours sincerely,
L.D. WILGRESS

Ottawa, September 14, 1949

Dear Mr. Wilgress:

On April 6 you wrote to the Minister about the practice of holding meetings of the High Commissioners in London with the Commonwealth Relations Secretary and other United Kingdom cabinet ministers. You will understand the reasons why it was not possible to give final consideration to the matter at the time.

While the Canadian Government has from time to time had some misgivings about these meetings, it does not seem advisable for us to stay out of the arrangement if the other countries concerned are anxious to continue it. Mr. Beasley's view that the meetings constitute a kind of Commonwealth Cabinet is, of course, completely incompatible with the first principles of responsible government. The Canadian Government's hesitations concerning such meetings were based largely on the probability that they would give rise to misconceptions of this kind.

The Minister considers that, if a suitable opportunity arises, you should refer to the impression prevailing in certain quarters that these meetings constitute a kind of Commonwealth Cabinet. You should then make it clear that the Canadian Government has participated in them on the understanding that nothing of the kind was contemplated.

Yours sincerely,

Our telegram No. 2239, December 16th, 1948,⁷ relations between India and the Commonwealth. We asked the Commonwealth Relations Office today for information regarding developments since Mr. Attlee sent the telegram on December 15th to Nehru.

2. There has been no reply from Nehru. In the course of conversations between the Commonwealth Relations Office and [V.K. Krishna] Menon (High Commissioner for India in London) the Commonwealth Relations Office reminded Menon that there has been no reply from Nehru. Menon showed no disposition to press Nehru for a reply and the United Kingdom Government does not feel that it would be wise for the United Kingdom to press Nehru. However, the long delay in getting a reply from Nehru does not bode well for a favourable reply.

3. Menon, speaking only for himself, hinted that it must be membership in the Commonwealth or nothing. He did not think that India would like the idea of an association with the Commonwealth which did not constitute membership.

4. Menon put forward, as his own personal suggestion, the idea that a link with the Crown would be implied if provisions for Commonwealth citizenship were inserted in the Indian Constitution. The Commonwealth Relations Office does not think much of this argument.

5. The United Kingdom High Commissioner in India has no special instructions to remind Nehru that Mr. Attlee is waiting for a reply to the message of December 15th.⁸ However, as Kearney said in his telegram to you of December 31st,† Nye expects to see Nehru this month and no doubt he will take the opportunity to discuss the whole question.

6. The Commonwealth Relations Office is not happy about Nehru's delay in replying but feels that to press him for a reply might prejudice the chances of getting a reply that offered any possibilities for agreement.

7. The Commonwealth Relations Office thinks that there is a possibility that the Constituent Assembly may adjourn in January and February for some weeks before adopting the draft constitution.

8. I shall, of course, continue to keep in touch with the Commonwealth Relations Office on this subject. Ends.

DESPATCH NO. 28

New Delhi, January 13, 1949

TOP SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my telegram No. 7 of January 13th,[†] relative to India and the Commonwealth. I wish also to acknowledge receipt of your despatch No. 795 of December 22nd,[†] containing a departmental memorandum of December 17th⁹ and two telegrams Nos. 2238¹⁰ and 2239¹¹ both of December 16th which you sent to London, and to which you refer in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 5 to me.[†] Before dealing specifically with my last telegram No. 7, it would perhaps be appropriate for me to review the situation as I see it, and make a few comments on previous correspondence.

2. The discussions regarding an appropriate formula under which India might join the commonwealth, have apparently been carried on among five countries, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and India. If other commonwealth countries have entered the discussion the fact does not appear from our file. In this office, we understand that the United Kingdom Government is speaking in the name of the four older commonwealth countries. We presume the views of these four countries are pooled in London at least to the extent required to make the United Kingdom representative spokesman. Since the return to India of Mr. Nehru, negotiations between the United Kingdom (as spokesman for the four) and India have been carried on partly through the Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, and the Indian High Commissioner in London, and partly through instructions which Sir Archibald Nye, the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Delhi, receives from the United Kingdom Commonwealth office, and which he is expected to transmit to Mr. Nehru.

¹⁰ Volume 14, Document 882.

¹¹ Volume 14, Document 883.

3. From the negotiations so far carried on, two aspects of Indian Commonwealth Relations seem to have been substantially agreed upon. One is that there should be a commonwealth citizenship; the other is that there should be a common declaration of membership in the commonwealth. As far as I have seen, the terms of this declaration are nowhere formulated, nor is it certain whether it should be in the form of an executive pronouncement or of legislation, or simply by an agreed-upon informal statement to be simultaneously released to the press by the respective commonwealth countries concerned. All agree that these two things would contribute to ensuring universal acceptance of the commonwealth as a legal and political entity, but the four senior commonwealth countries think they do not go far enough, and India has not declared her opinion that they do go far enough for the purpose just mentioned.

4. As to commonwealth citizenship, there apparently will be little difficulty in effecting appropriate legislation as far as domestic law is concerned, but there is much anxiety that the resultant situation may not be regarded as valid internationally as justifying Imperial preferences, and that this fact might have the effect of complicating and disturbing commercial relations which presently exist between commonwealth and other countries. Moreover, particularly from the Canadian and Australian point of view, and the same would be true of South Africa, because of their immigration policies, commonwealth citizenship is regarded at best, as a makeweight on which very little reliance can be placed. It is chiefly these anxieties which induce the four senior commonwealth countries to regard the two points cited in the preceding paragraphs as inadequate to insure the commonwealth being willing to regard India as an associate member. These four countries are, therefore, urging that some further link be retained and that this link should be the crown. The crux of the situation seems to be the nature and strength of the link with the crown, dependent upon which, India will be regarded either as a full member or associate member of the commonwealth. It seems abundantly clear that India wishes if possible, to remain a full member of the commonwealth, but if circumstances make this impossible we do not know whether India would wish to remain in the commonwealth as an associate member. The four older commonwealth countries appear willing to admit India as an associate member.

5. Until my interview with Sir. Archibald Nye on January 11, referred to in my telegram No. 7, I was led from the trend of the discussions so far held to believe that the United Kingdom was prepared to look upon India as being qualified for full membership in the commonwealth if, apart from a declaration of intention to remain in the commonwealth and the adoption of a commonwealth citizenship act, India was prepared to accept a link with the crown by the means of the king delegating his powers of accreditation to the president of the Indian republic. But in my recent interview with Sir Archibald Nye, I learned that Mr. Attlee had informed Mr. Krishna Menon that from the constitutional point of view it was doubtful if the king had the legal right to delegate his powers of accreditation to the president of a republic, regarding whom he had no power of choice or means of control, and Mr.

Attlee made mention of the necessity for what he called a real link, i.e., allegiance. What prompted Mr. Attlee to adopt a change of front, I do not know. Neither do I know whether this was done with or without prior consultation with you. Sir Archibald Nye does not know whether the reason given for this change of front, i.e., constitutional doubt, is to be taken literally or whether it may be for the tactical purpose of having Mr. Nehru become apprehensive that the link with the crown through delegation of accreditation is slipping away from him, and that he will stop dallying and propose this latter link himself.

6. I shall here interrupt my trend of thought to make a few observations on your telegram No. 5 of January 5th, and particularly your following observations in paragraph 4 thereof: "Furthermore, the views expressed at the Jaipur Conference¹² seem to indicate that there will be little hope of India remaining a full member of the commonwealth." I may be wrong, but I think your above observation would seem to indicate that in your opinion something happened at the Jaipur Conference which lessened the likelihood of Mr. Nehru accepting a link with the crown through delegation of accreditation, but I do not think this to be the case. As far as I can learn Mr. Nehru did not discuss at the Jaipur conference details of how membership in the commonwealth could be worked out, but contented himself with discussing a matter of broad principle, i.e., should India be in the commonwealth or not, and as a result it was agreed that India should remain in the commonwealth. I do not think any restriction was placed on Mr. Nehru as to method or means by which India might become or remain a member. I think this is significant because the suggestion of a link with the crown through delegation of accreditation had been bandied about in the press and elsewhere for months before the Jaipur Conference and the fact that nobody raised an objection at the Jaipur Conference to this suggestion would lead me to infer that Mr. Nehru, if he thought it necessary, could without offending the Congress agree to this link.

7. The situation at the moment seems to be that Mr. Nehru desires that India should be a full member of the commonwealth on terms which would be least embarrassing to him politically. Following this line of thought, Mr. Nehru I think, would prefer to have no link with the crown, but this in my opinion, does not mean

The Jaipur Session of the Congress Party of India passed a resolution on December 18, 1948, which noted the necessity for change in India's association with the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth to take account of India's "complete independence and the establishment of a Republic of India." However, the resolution went on to affirm that "the Congress would welcome her free association with independent nations of the Commonwealth for their common welfare and the promotion of world peace." This resolution gave Nehru some latitude in negotiations on India's relationship with the rest of the Commonwealth which had been absent from previous party commitments on the constitutional question.

that if a link with the crown through delegation of accreditation provided full membership for India, Mr. Nehru would not agree to it. I believe that if Mr. Nehru agreed to the link through delegation of accreditation there would be political repercussions in India, but I am disposed to think that they would come far less from within the Congress Party than from those outside it. The Socialists who have broken away from the Congress party have taken the stand that India should not remain in the commonwealth, (see my despatch No. 16, January 14th [sic]),† but it does not follow that even Socialists would single out for criticism the link with the crown, and although they might very well do so, I think their criticism would be directed against the principle of India being a member of the commonwealth, rather than the means by which she was made a member. I do not wish to convey the impression that I am sure that Mr. Nehru would accept the above referred to link, but simply that I am more optimistic on the subject than you appear to be.

8. You will doubtless recall that in my telegram No. 4 of January 7th,† I asked you if in your opinion and that of the other commonwealth countries, India would be entitled to full membership in the commonwealth, if she accepted the link through delegation of accreditation, because if this is answered in the affirmative, in my opinion, Mr. Nehru would likely accept it. On the other hand, if my question is answered in the negative, and there are to be two classes of membership, I think Mr. Nehru would not only reject the aforesaid link with the crown, but he might very well decline any second rate membership on behalf of India.

9. I think Sir Archibald Nye is as much puzzled as I am by what I have referred to as Mr. Attlee's change of front, and I sincerely trust that the doubt about the king's constitutional right to delegate his powers of accreditation to the president of a republic is more simulated than real. I hope Mr. Attlee has brought forward the constitutional doubt to make Mr. Nehru rise to the bait which had been previously held out to him of a link with the crown through delegation of accreditation. I realize that prerogative is essentially the power which is appropriate to the king as opposed to his subjects, and that it has been frequently held that the courts have the power and duty to decide in any case of delegated legislative power, the question whether there is legal authority for the delegation. But are we dealing with a case of legislative power? I will be surprised if there exists a case which could be looked upon as a precedent with regard to the proposed delegation by the king of his power of accreditation to the president of a republic. It might be argued, it seems to me, that the proposed delegation of some of his prerogatives by the king might be justified on the grounds of being the only means of insuring India's adherence to the Commonwealth and that such adherence is conducive to national security. Although I have not looked into this question deeply, it would appear to me that the king, who can do no wrong, could, especially with the concurrence of Parliament, delegate his powers of accreditation in the manner proposed. Who in any case is likely to challenge his right to do so?

10. I fear that the United Kingdom attitude with regard to India and the commonwealth is becoming far too legalistic and too little realistic. It occurs to me too, that the United Kingdom Government in this matter may not be immune to the trend of weighing matters in the light of the next general election. It is conceivable, I suppose, that if Mr. Attlee agrees that the link with the crown through delegation of accreditation is sufficient to admit India to full membership in the commonwealth, he may fear this will give Mr. [Winston] Churchill a stick to beat him with at the next election. Mr. Attlee's purpose in suggesting that India should have a link with the crown through allegiance to the king is, to my mind, so far removed from the realm of practical politics in India, that it can hardly be taken seriously. One thing certain amid so many uncertainties is that India is determinedly republican in spirit. An essential feature of republicanism as the Indians understand it, is that the individual citizen is subject to no person. To ask Indians to accept allegiance to any man is bad enough, and it becomes far worse when that man happens also to be the King of Great Britain. It must likewise be remembered that under a recent resolution of the Constituent Assembly, Mr. Nehru has also an election to face "as early as possible in 1950".

11. Father de Souza, a member of the Constituent Assembly to whom I have had occasion to refer in previous despatches, told me something recently which he described as "super secret", i.e., that although in his opinion the Indian cabinet would accept a link with the crown through the delegation of accreditation, it detected a regrettable note of coldness in some of Mr. Attlee's recent communications which did not augur well for future Indian relations with the commonwealth.

12. Before my recent conference with Sir Archibald Nye, while discussing other matters with Mr. K.P.S. Menon, Foreign Secretary in the Ministry of External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations, the question of India and the commonwealth, and particularly the link with the crown came up. At that time, with reason I believe, I thought that the link through delegation of accreditation was a desideratum. I mentioned to Mr. Menon that as there would be a lapse of several months before the Constituent Assembly sitting on constitutional matters reconvened, it might be a good move for the king to delegate his powers of accreditation to the present governor-general, and to accompany this with a declaration to the effect that these powers might be further delegated to the head of the Indian republic, if India decided that she desired to be a member of the commonwealth. If this were done, it would act as a feather in the wind, and might permit India to ease herself into the commonwealth by degrees. If there were any serious political objection, it would make itself known both in India and England and this could be weighed before any final step were taken. I was surprised to learn when I later spoke to Sir Archibald Nye that Mr. Krishna Menon who like Sir Girja Bajpai seems personally in favour of a link with the crown through delegation of accreditation, had already made an almost identical suggestion.

13. If we assume for the sake of argument that a link with the crown through allegiance or delegation of accreditation is unfeasible, perhaps as an additional makeweight, it might be worth while to go back to a suggestion which came from the Indian side and which seems to have been lost sight of, i.e., to include in the declaration of intention to be a member of the commonwealth, a statement that the king is the "symbol of association of members of the commonwealth" or if possible some stronger phrase. Added to a declaration of intention to remain in the commonwealth and a commonwealth citizenship act, might it not be regarded as sufficient at least as a basis for India becoming what is called an associated member, provided India as a last resort is interested in such a type of membership? I entirely agree with you that insofar as Canada is concerned, commonwealth citizenship carries little weight.

14. I will not harass you further with other permutations and combinations which could arise in connection with the problems at hand. I am sorry that this despatch is already too long drawn out, and I will leave, at least for the time being, observations on the significance of Imperial preferences, particularly in the light of the debate in the House of Lords on Ireland and the Commonwealth. I think too that the meaning of the terms "full" and "associate" membership may merit further comment.

15. I hope that before Mr. Nehru asks to see Sir Archibald Nye, the latter will receive from his government additional explanations and further information concerning what I have called the "change of front". Also that he will know whether he might tell Mr. Nehru that a link with the crown through delegation of accreditation, together with a declaration of intention to remain in the commonwealth and the enactment of a commonwealth citizenship act, will be sufficient to constitute a basis for full membership in the commonwealth insofar as India is concerned. If Sir Archibald were called in to see Mr. Nehru tomorrow, I fear he would be at a great disadvantage, and I am happy to think that Mr. Nehru will not ask to see him until at least some weeks hence. I have been thinking of suggesting to Sir Archibald that he should ask his government to recall him for consultation, as the intricate problems involved warrant personal contact rather than long range communication. Sir Archibald asked me to think over the new developments which he told me about, particularly with regard to the "doubt" concerning the king's power to delegate some of his prerogatives, following which he suggested that we should have a further discussion. In this connection, I will, of course, keep you advised.

I have, etc.

2. You will have noted from Kearney's telegram that the United Kingdom authorities may have some doubt whether the King could constitutionally delegate his powers of accreditation to the president of a republic, but that Kearney is uncertain whether the point is being raised for tactical purposes only or whether it is of a fundamental nature. I should be grateful if you could by informal enquiries obtain some clarification of this matter.

3. The Legal Adviser of the Department is surprised to learn that it may be beyond the imagination of the United Kingdom legal advisors to find or create a constitutional basis for a delegation of royal prerogative powers to the President of India. He is inclined to think that, if the King were prepared to delegate and the President prepared to receive these powers, and the Government of India thought this to be desirable, ways and means could readily be found.

Top Secret and Personal. Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference your telegram No. 164 of January 21st† and Kearney's despatch No. 28 of January 13th:

1. I am given to understand that the reason why the suggestion that the King might delegate his prerogative power of accreditation to the President of the Indian Republic has been allowed to recede into the background of current thinking about possible forms and symbols of Commonwealth association is that the King himself was not at all receptive to the idea. I am not likely to get any confirmation or elaboration of this information, but I am satisfied that it is true. The "constitutional doubts" attributed to the United Kingdom Government are presumably meant to protect what is believed to be the King's own position and interest in the matter.

2. I do not think this very delicate aspect of the question should even be hinted at in India, but I think Kearney could be told that my enquiries in London satisfy me that there are no grounds for assuming that the United Kingdom is any less interested than it had been in trying to devise some mutually and generally agreeable basis of association which would enable India to remain within the Commonwealth.

3. For your own information and that of the Prime Minister, I will say responsible opinion here attaches so much importance to the preservation, if at all possible, of Indian membership in the Commonwealth that very serious thought is now being given to the possibility of proposing to the other members of the Commonwealth some new basis of association in which recognition and use of the Crown would not be a necessary symbol of Commonwealth membership. The political and international implications of such a conception of the development of the Commonwealth need no underlining. What should be appreciated, however, is that if proposals such as these are to be put up to the Commonwealth Prime Ministers for their consideration, this would presumably have to be done before the resumption of the Indian Constitutional Congress in August; otherwise it could not accomplish its primary purpose. It is therefore a possibility to be kept in mind in making general plans that Mr. Attlee may feel he has to suggest a special consultation of Commonwealth Prime Ministers on this question, perhaps in July. Ends.

Ottawa, February 17, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge your despatch No. 28 of January 13 regarding India's relationship with the Commonwealth. Your thoughtful analysis has been both interesting and valuable to us.

2. Mr. Robertson, to whom you sent a copy of your despatch direct from New Delhi has commented on it as well as on our telegram of January 21,† which was repeated to you as No. 18. Mr. Robertson is satisfied that the United Kingdom Government has a good reason for the "constitutional doubt" regarding the proposal that the King might delegate his prerogative power of accreditation to the future president of the Indian republic. His enquiries have led him to believe that there are no grounds for assuming that the United Kingdom authorities are any less interested than they have been in trying to devise some mutual and generally agreeable basis of association, which would enable India to remain within the Commonwealth. I think that this is all that we can say on this point at present, though it is obviously a matter of very great importance.

¹³ Le secrétaire privé du roi George VI.
Private Secretary to King George VI.

3. One or two observations should perhaps be made on paragraph 2 of your despatch under reference. As far as we are aware, the only members of the Commonwealth which have been brought in to the discussions on the future relationship of India with the Commonwealth, apart from the United Kingdom, are Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, as well naturally as India itself. It may be, however, that the United Kingdom Government has been in touch with the other members of the Commonwealth, South Africa, Pakistan and Ceylon. However, we do not know whether the United Kingdom Government has consulted them or even passed any confidential information to them, nor do we know whether they have expressed any views on the subject.

4. As you will recall, the United Kingdom Cabinet Ministers, who were in Paris in the middle of November for the discussion on the position of Ireland, took advantage of their meetings with other Commonwealth Ministers, who were attending the United Nations Assembly, to report on developments with regard to the relationship of India to the Commonwealth. At the second of the two meetings held in Paris on November 17, Sir Girja Bajpai was present and views were expressed on Pandit Nehru's "Ten Points" by Dr. Evatt and Mr. Fraser. I supported the views of the others as to the desirability of India remaining in the Commonwealth and I underlined to Bajpai the fact that our suggestions to him were made on an informal and entirely non-committal basis, at least as far as Canada was concerned, and did not mean that any concerted policy or approach had been worked out by our governments for presentation to the Government of India. I discussed the subject further in London on December 15 at a meeting which Mr. Attlee called at No. 10 Downing Street, at which Dr. Evatt and Mr. Fraser were also present. As you are aware from the text of my two telegrams from London to Ottawa, namely 2238 and 2239 of December 16, a telegram was drafted at this meeting which Mr. Attlee sent to Pandit Nehru in which he indicated that he had discussed the subject with Dr. Evatt, Mr. Fraser and myself and that the message represented the views of the three of us, as well as Mr. Attlee himself. It was added that Pandit Nehru would realize that Dr. Evatt, Mr. Fraser and myself had not had an opportunity of consulting our governments.

5. It will be noted from this recital of events that Mr. Attlee acted as a kind of spokesman only in the one instance of the telegram drawn up at our meeting on December 15. We do not know the nature of any subsequent messages that may have passed between London and New Delhi on this subject and any United Kingdom telegrams will not have had the concurrence of the Canadian Government. I think that it is important not to give the impression that the United Kingdom in this matter is acting as the spokesman for a group of Commonwealth countries. While we may be quite prepared to let the United Kingdom take the initiative in a subject of this kind, we reserve our own position as to whether any arrangement that the United Kingdom may work out directly with India will be acceptable to us as a basis for India's full membership with the Commonwealth or, alternatively, its relationship with the Commonwealth through some form of association. In accordance with the established practice, we would expect the United Kingdom to keep us fully advised regarding any new developments in negotiations and to consult us before making definite proposals to the Indian Government.

6. We were glad to have your interpretation of the developments which took place at the Jaipur Conference. As you know, the resolution adopted on foreign policy contained the following paragraph on India's relationship with the Commonwealth:

"In view of the attainment of complete independence and the establishment of the Republic of India, which will symbolize that independence and give to India the status among the nations of the world that is her rightful due, her present association with the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth of Nations will necessarily have to change. India, however, desires to maintain all such links with other countries as do not come in the way of her freedom of action and independence, and the Congress would welcome her free association with the independent nations of the Commonwealth for their common weal and for the promotion of world peace."

The President of the Conference in his address on December 18 made the following remarks on this subject:

"The question had arisen whether it was possible and desirable for the future free Indian republic to have some relationship with the United Kingdom and other countries associated with her. This relationship could not be that of a Dominion. It could only be an association of free and independent countries, agreeing to have certain reciprocal relations which did not limit in any way their freedom in regard to domestic or international policy."

7. I think you will agree that these statements are both expressed in vague and general terms which lend themselves to varying interpretations. We had considered that together they indicated a coolness towards the Commonwealth connection but are happy to learn that you do not feel that this is necessarily the case.

8. A copy of this despatch is being sent to the High Commissioner in London.

PERSONAL MESSAGE FOR MR. ST. LAURENT FROM MR. ATTLEE,
DATED 25TH FEBRUARY, 1949¹⁶

Since I discussed the question of India's future relations with the Commonwealth with Mr. Pearson on the 15th December last, I and my colleagues have been giving a good deal of time and attention to the question whether India might be associated with the Commonwealth in some way which would fall short of full membership. We have reached the conclusion that there would be very substantial difficulties in this conception. Moreover, apart from the inherent difficulties, we have been informed by the Indian High Commissioner that the Indian Government wish to be either full members of the Commonwealth or to be outside it. They would not contemplate accepting an intermediate position. Meanwhile the Government of India have made public in India their desire to retain the Commonwealth association and have secured political backing for this policy. A resolution passed at the meeting of the Indian Congress Party on 16th December stated that the "Congress would welcome India's free association with independent nations of the Commonwealth for their common weal and the promotion of world peace".

2. The position therefore is that we shall before long be confronted with a situation in which either India must cease to be a member of the Commonwealth or the existing basis of the Commonwealth association must be so modified that a country can be "a Sovereign Democratic Republic", not owing allegiance to the Crown, and yet remain within the Commonwealth.

3. The Indian Constituent Assembly is expected to pass the new Indian Constitution in June or July and we understand that it is at present intended to bring it into operation on the 15th August. We think it most unlikely that the Government of India would be willing to postpone this programme. On 15th August, therefore, the Crown will cease to have any place in the Indian Constitution and Indians will cease legally to owe allegiance to the King. I think you will agree that before that date we ought to do our utmost to reach an agreed view on India's position in relation to the Commonwealth. Indeed it would be desirable to reach a decision before the Indian Constitution is finally enacted and I should think that the 1st June would probably be the latest date up to which it would be possible to defer making some authoritative public statement on this subject.

4. The problem thus presented is one of intense difficulty and raises far-reaching and fundamental issues, of concern to all members of the Commonwealth. It can only be resolved by the Commonwealth countries in consultation. I do not feel, and I am sure you will agree, that we could get a real meeting of minds on so complex a problem by an exchange of long-distance communications. A crucial decision on our Commonwealth relationship is involved and I feel that, so far as this country is concerned, our people would expect a well-considered and deliberate decision, after direct personal consultation.

5. In spite of the difficulties, therefore, I feel bound to suggest that we should have a meeting of Prime Ministers, to which I propose that Pandit Nehru should be invited, though I should indicate to him that, in the circumstances, we might desire to hold some meetings at which he would not be present. I much regret that this matter was not ripe for consideration in October. In the light of such information as is available to me about Parliamentary sessions in the various Commonwealth countries, the second half of April or the first half of May seems likely to be the time when a meeting can be held with the least general inconvenience. I do not think that such a meeting need last for more than a week, if the preparatory arrangements which I suggest below are acceptable to you.

6. The question, whether the existing basis of the Commonwealth relationship can or should be modified in such a way as to admit that allegiance to the Crown is no longer an essential qualification for membership, plainly raises the widest issues. We have considered the matter in considerable detail. I think that it might be helpful to other Commonwealth Prime Ministers if I were to send personal emissaries to Commonwealth countries who, with a close knowledge of the course of our deliberations here during recent weeks, could explain on my behalf the various considerations which have presented themselves to us and the way in which our own thoughts on the subject have so far developed. If, as I hope, you would find this proposal acceptable, I should like to send to Canada Sir Norman Brook, Secretary of the Cabinet, who would leave this country by air on or about 6th March.

7. I hope that, on considering the situation which I have described, you may be able to tell me that you share my view that it calls for a Prime Ministers' meeting in the latter part of April or beginning of May. I shall, however, quite understand it if you say that you would prefer to reserve your final opinion on this until you have discussed the position with Sir Norman Brook. In view, however, of the short time available, it would help me to have a provisional reply as to whether you could come to a meeting in London between those dates, and as to what precise dates would be most convenient to you, and if you would endeavour to keep yourself free so far as possible to come to a meeting, if it should be the general view that a meeting is desirable.

Note du ministère des Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], March 3, 1949

INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH
A PRELIMINARY SURVEY

The Draft Constitution provides in its preamble for a declaration that India is a "sovereign democratic republic". It commences with the classic words, "We, the people of India..." It is thus quite clear that India is to be a republic and that sovereignty will reside in the Indian people. This aim was set forth as early as January 1947 in the so-called Objectives Resolution of the Constituent Assembly.

2. The Constituent Assembly as such is now adjourned until May 16. So far it has disposed of only some 70 of the 315 articles of the Draft Constitution. A consideration of the preamble has been deliberately postponed as a discussion of the phrase "sovereign democratic republic" must inevitably raise the question of the relationship between this republic and the Commonwealth. In fact the published Draft Constitution has the following footnote on this description of the Indian state:

"This follows the decision taken by the Constituent Assembly. The question of the relationship between this Democratic Republic and the British Commonwealth of Nations remains to be decided subsequently."

Mr. Robertson, in his telegram No. 248 of January 27,† indicates that he expects the new constitution to come into force in August.

3. There seem to be four possible forms that India's relationship with the Commonwealth might take:

(1) Full membership with the other members in the Commonwealth, with a definite equality of status and the use of the same formal constitutional links and symbols.

(2) Some kind of associate membership based on some form of association less binding in the legal, constitutional and formal sense than that of the full members.

(3) A special relationship such as that which will exist between Ireland and the Commonwealth after the Republic of Ireland Act comes into force.

(4) The normal relationship between foreign states, as known in international law, with some kind of treaty relationship between India and at least the United Kingdom, if not also some other members of the Commonwealth as well.

4. The basis of the Commonwealth relationship can be considered under the following headings:

(a) Constitutional link with the Crown.

(b) Common status of Commonwealth citizenship.

(c) Special relationship on the Irish model.

These three headings leave aside the practical or functional aspects of Commonwealth relationship by way of consultation on defence and foreign affairs, as well as economic and financial cooperation of various kinds. These are the material aspects of the Commonwealth connection but do not concern primarily its form or basis.

(a) Constitutional link with the Crown

5. While it is clear that India has every intention of having a constitution which is of the republican kind, at least insofar as its internal form of government is concerned, it has been thought that the Constituent Assembly might be persuaded to agree to retain some link or connection with the Crown, at least for external purposes. This might, of course, not be very different from what has been known as "external association" to describe the position of Ireland under the External Relations Act of 1936, which will cease to operate on April 18. It has been suggested to Nehru that the link with the Crown, which has been considered by most constitutional lawyers as the basic formal feature of the Commonwealth, might be retained through the delegation (if necessary in perpetuity) of the royal prerogatives governing the issue of Letters of Credence, Full Powers, etc., to the President of the Republic. (He will be an elected President and will not be nominated to office.) The position under such an arrangement might not be very different from that of our Governor General under the new Letters Patent of 1947.

6. By their long silence on this suggestion it seems that the Indian authorities are not likely to accept it. Furthermore, there have been certain "constitutional doubts" regarding it in quarters close to the Throne, as explained in Robertson's telegram No. 236 of January 26. As a consequence, according to Mr. Robertson as stated in the same telegram, serious thought is now being given in London to the possibility of proposing to the other members of the Commonwealth "some new basis of association in which recognition and use of the Crown would not be a necessary symbol of Commonwealth membership." What this "new basis" might be we have not yet been told, although according to Mr. Robertson's telegram No. 436 of February 24, we may expect to have something put up to our Prime Minister by Clutterbuck very soon.

(b) Common Status of Commonwealth Citizenship

7. This has been a central feature of Mr. Nehru's proposals for the basis of India's future relationship with the Commonwealth. This was set forth in his "Ten Points" memorandum which he left with Mt. Attlee before leaving London after the Meeting of Prime Ministers last October. It remained also the basic feature of his revised "Eight Points" scheme, which was communicated to Mr. Attlee on December 11. Mr. Nehru described his scheme as a "sincere desire to continue the Commonwealth association and what is practicable and adequate at present."

8. This proposal is that either in the new constitution itself or in a separate statute passed at the same time, it will be arranged that Indian nationals will be Commonwealth citizens (i.e. British subjects) and the nationals of any Commonwealth country will be Commonwealth citizens when they are in India, on a reciprocal basis.

9. The other important feature in Nehru's proposals is that the arrangement for the recognition on a reciprocal basis of the common status of Commonwealth citizenship will be accompanied by a declaration by India that she intends to remain a member of the Commonwealth, although this is not clearly set forth in either the Ten Point or Eight Point statement. It has also been considered that declarations expressing the desire and intention that India should remain a member of the Commonwealth would also be made at the same time by the other members of the Commonwealth.

10. The Law Officers of the Crown (United Kingdom) have stated that the continued membership of India in the Commonwealth might be justified in international law if such declarations were made and were accompanied by a real common citizenship, giving rise in practice over substantially the whole of the Commonwealth to a special position in regard to those who enjoyed it. The Opinion observed that while this would be essentially the case in the United Kingdom, it was not so elsewhere in the Commonwealth where most Commonwealth citizens are treated only slightly differently from aliens.

11. There are certain clear difficulties, particularly for the white dominions, in any scheme whereby the principal element in the Commonwealth connection would be the "common status". The term "Commonwealth citizen", no doubt, refers to a general principle or concept with no defined content, but at the same time it implies that Commonwealth citizens will be in a special position in some way different from that of aliens. It must be borne in mind that at present Indians, though British subjects in our law, are excluded as immigrants to Canada, in exactly the same way as other persons of Asiatic race, such as the Chinese, while United States citizens and French citizens are placed in a preferred category with white British subjects. Rights and privileges are thus accorded to some aliens which are denied to some Commonwealth citizens. It would seem inevitable that we should find ourselves eventually in an embarrassing position regarding our immigration policy if we agreed to a scheme under which the essential feature of the Commonwealth connection would be the common status of Commonwealth citizenship. This would be a device without any real substance, a mere form which would not give any material concrete benefits to citizens from all parts of the Commonwealth. In fact a very obvious discrimination would continue to be enforced against Commonwealth citizens of Asiatic race. Even though the Indian authorities might be prepared to declare now that they were only interested in the form of common citizenship, it could be expected that before long and in view of the feeling in India regarding racial discrimination they would quite logically demand that some real meaning and significance be given to the outward form.

(c) Special Relationship

12. It may be found that the only possible solution of India's future relationship with the Commonwealth will be to have India in a category similar to that of Ireland under the Republic of Ireland Act. This can be described as a "special relationship", replacing the former "external association". Ireland will be recognized as no longer being a member of the Commonwealth but it is intended on the part of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa at least, that Ireland should not be treated as a foreign country or Irish citizens as aliens. Under this arrangement the existing preferential tariff arrangements and trade relations between Ireland and the Commonwealth countries will continue, and Irish citizens will continue to enjoy most of the rights and privileges of British subjects in Commonwealth countries. While they will not be British subjects in law, they will at the same time not be aliens.

13. The continued exchange of preferential tariffs and citizenship rights can perhaps, as argued by the Irish authorities, be justified on the ground of long-established custom and tradition. It remains to be seen, however, whether the favoured treatment of Irish commodities and nationals can be successfully defended in the International Court if challenged by a foreign country under the most-favoured-nation clause of commercial treaties.

14. In regard to India, we would probably have little difficulty in undertaking to continue to exchange the existing rights and privileges extended to Indians or to Indian goods. Mr. Nehru covers this subject in part in his Point providing that, in any new legislation or treaties, Commonwealth countries will not be treated as foreign states, in particular for the purposes of the most-favoured-nation clause, and their citizens will not be treated as foreigners.

15. Failing a solution in one of the three categories outlined above, relations between India and the members of the Commonwealth would be the normal relations between foreign states. There might well be a close treaty relationship, not only bilaterally between India and the United Kingdom but on a wider basis between India and all or most of the Commonwealth countries, with perhaps the exception of South Africa. Such a treaty could not provide for the exchange of rights beyond the limitation placed by the most-favoured-nation clause in existing agreements binding any of the parties to such a treaty.

My dear Prime Minister,

With reference to my letter of the 25th February, and to my subsequent conversations with Mr. Pearson and later with yourself, Mr. Attlee has now asked me to inform you that Sir Norman Brook will be leaving London by air on Wednesday next, 9th March, and hopes to arrive in Ottawa on Thursday evening, 10th March. Mr. Attlee much appreciates your willingness to receive him, and the intention is that he should be at your disposal from Friday, 11th March, throughout the following week.

At the same time Mr. Attlee is sending Lord Listowel to Australia and New Zealand, Mr. Gordon Walker to India, Pakistan and Ceylon, and Sir Percivale Liesching to South Africa, as his personal emissaries for preliminary conversations with the respective Prime Ministers.

These arrangements will inevitably attract some public attention, and Mr. Attlee feels that it will be desirable to issue a short informal notice to the Press in order to forestall undue speculation. It is accordingly proposed to issue to the Press in the United Kingdom, for publication in the morning papers of Wednesday, the 9th March, an informal notice in the form of the enclosed draft.†

If you agree, Mr. Attlee would be grateful if the same line could be taken in relation to the Press here. Sir Norman Brook will be asked to confine himself to quoting the Press notice if he has to deal with any Press enquiries en route or on arrival. Mr. Attlee feels that it would be inadvisable for the subject matter of his visit to be mentioned at this stage.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

Memorandum from Department of External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], March 10, 1949

INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

Attached is a departmental memorandum¹⁷ examining various alternatives regarding India's relationship with the Commonwealth. Since the memorandum was drafted, a copy of Mr. Attlee's memorandum to the Prime Minister, dated February 25, has come to hand. It appears from this message that:

(a) The Indian Government has made public its desire to retain the Commonwealth association and has received the support of the Indian Congress Party for this course;

(b) the Indian Government would not be prepared to accept the Crown as the formal link for India as is the case for the rest of the Commonwealth;

(c) they would not be prepared to accept an intermediary position but desire a position of complete equality with other Commonwealth nations;

(d) the clauses of the Draft Constitution relating to India's status are likely to be under discussion in June or July and it is essential that the question of India's relationship with the Commonwealth should be cleared up before this date in so far as the other Commonwealth countries are concerned.

2. In the past the Canadian attitude towards constitutional negotiations between the United Kingdom Government and the Indian leaders has, in general, been that the matter was one for settlement by the United Kingdom and India. In 1947, however, in connection with the Mountbatten settlement, the Canadian Government indicated its goodwill and sympathetic understanding and added that it would do nothing to impede or delay the carrying out of any agreement which might be reached, even though the agreement might enlarge the number of Commonwealth members. Thus, by implication, Canada's interest in any alteration of Commonwealth relations was asserted. You will also recall that you participated in certain discussions in Paris and London last autumn on India's relationship with the Commonwealth. It would appear desirable that the Canadian Government should take part in consultations on the present issue, since otherwise it may be faced with a fait accompli, which might prove to be embarrassing.

3. As pointed out in the attached memorandum, Mr. Nehru has suggested Commonwealth citizenship as a link between India and the rest of the Commonwealth. Although the United Kingdom legal authorities appeared at the time to be doubtful whether this would be suitable, it may be that the United Kingdom would support this solution in the absence of any satisfactory alternative. As the attached memorandum notes, common citizenship as the sole link might some time or other prove embarrassing to Canada and other "white" Commonwealth nations.

4. It may be assumed that the Canadian people would welcome the retention of India within the Commonwealth, and would probably not object to a special relationship for India, provided this could be done without violating the public's sense of constitutional proprieties. It would, however, be essential from the standpoint of the Canadian public that any special formula worked out for India should not impair or cast doubt upon the validity of the Crown as the basic link for Canada with the rest of the Commonwealth. From the Indian point of view, it would be essential that any special relationship would not imply any inferiority of status.

5. It is suggested that consideration might be given to accepting the membership of India in the Commonwealth by formal Declaration on India's part of intention to remain in the Commonwealth and to adhere to the practices of consultation and co-operation commonly followed by Commonwealth nations. India's declaration might be part of its Constitution, or be merely in the form of an Exchange of Notes, between India and other Commonwealth nations. In turn, other Commonwealth nations would formally recognize by Declaration or Exchange of Notes that India was a member of the Commonwealth. Such formal Declarations on the part of India and other Commonwealth nations would omit references to the Crown in so far as India was concerned, but might, if deemed desirable, declare that the adherence of India by this special arrangement would not alter or impair the historic links relied on by other Commonwealth nations.

6. It should not be overlooked that Pakistan has not yet worked out a Constitution. It might well be that Pakistan could not adopt a solution radically different from that of India. Although Ceylon has recognized the Crown as the link of association, a Ceylonese Government might be compelled to follow India's lead. For these reasons it might be desirable to work out a general rather than a specific formula. The Balfour definition of 1926 might be deemed a useful precedent in this respect. The Balfour definition described the situation as of 1926; a new definition would describe the situation as of 1949. The new definition would have to provide alternative bases for membership: the one, the Crown; the other, association by Agreement. If a general definition were attempted, it would probably be unnecessary to prescribe the procedure for admission by mutual agreement—the procedure which might be adopted for India would serve as useful precedents in later cases.

7. It would probably be desirable, whether a specific or general formula were adopted, to add as a qualification for membership the historic connection with the Commonwealth or the Crown.

8. It would not, of course, be certain that foreign states would recognize membership in the Commonwealth if the connection with the Crown were formally severed. For example, foreign states might refuse to recognize the validity of tariff preferences between members united by a common allegiance to the Crown and other members who had instead retained membership by formal declaration. Members who had severed the link with the Crown would, however, have to take this chance.

9. Assuming some sort of settlement as suggested above could be reached, a new title for the Commonwealth might be desirable such as "the Commonwealth of British and Associated Nations", provided it were made perfectly clear that there was no difference in status between members. Such a title might not, of course, be acceptable to India, though it might be desirable from the standpoint of those members which wished to emphasize that as far as their status was concerned there was no break with the past.¹⁸

Memorandum for Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], March 14, 1949

INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

An examination has been made of the three United Kingdom papers on this subject.† They seem to call for a few comments but no fundamental changes in our memoranda of March 3 and 10.

"The Commonwealth Relationship: Constitutional Questions"

2. The following observations are made on this paper:

(a) While it is probably true that "it must now be recognized that India will not be willing to accept any substantial link with the Crown", at the same time it seems that in paragraph 15 an unsatisfactory and inadequate treatment of the possible "tenuous" links with the Crown is given. Thus "external association" under the Irish External Relations Act is briefly dismissed. The possibility of a delegation of prerogative powers to the President of the Indian Republic is not examined. I think it may be questioned whether such an arrangement "would in fact have afforded an even less substantial foundation for a constitutional relationship". I think we will want to be fully satisfied that the Indian Government is in no way open to persuasion to retain some link with the Crown, even though this admittedly would have to be something less than the "common allegiance to the Crown" of all Commonwealth citizens everywhere.

(b) The paper, I think, shows a lack of appreciation of the real difficulties of association through "common citizenship" for the white "countries of immigration". This point is treated in paragraph 11 of the memorandum of March 3. I think we would hesitate before accepting a recast of the Balfour formula providing for free association by "the rights of common citizenship which the nationals of each enjoy in the territories of the others". It seems incorrect to say that, as is done in paragraph 11, "their immigration restrictions are in practice applied less stringently to other Commonwealth citizens than to aliens"; though it is added in the following sentence that Commonwealth citizens of non-European descent are in practice subjected to discriminatory treatment; and though reference is made in paragraph 13 to "the absence of such a system of substantial reciprocity". The one specific mention of Canada, which is made in paragraph 11, is I think incorrect. The right to vote under the Election Act is given to British subjects after a residence in Canada of one year, not five years as stated.

¹⁸ Envoyé à Pearson par Reid, avec la note suivante, en date du 12 mars 1949:

I am not sure I entirely agree with this but I did not want to delay its submission to you.

(c) The new features in this paper, when compared with earlier statements on the subject, seem to be:

(i) The stress on the value of declarations by India and the other Commonwealth countries that India will continue to be a member of the Commonwealth and

(ii) The emphasis on the historical continuity of the Commonwealth relationship. The following expressions are used:

Para. 3—"a factual association of long standing...still continuing."

Para. 9—"It is on the historical continuity of this development that the main strength of the argument would have to be founded" and "the historical association should have been uninterrupted."

Para. 13—"A general case based mainly on the historical continuity of the Commonwealth connection."

The recast Balfour formula would refer to states which "owe, or have owed, allegiance to the Crown".

(d) On reading this paper one is left with the impression that the United Kingdom is prepared to go great lengths, at grave risk to the existing Commonwealth structure and to the position of the Crown in the older members, and serious danger of jeopardizing the preferential trade system, to keep India in the Commonwealth. The case for doing this, which clearly must be a good one, is given in the second paper which is discussed below.

While it is stated in paragraph 1 that India wants full membership, I think perhaps it is easy to read too much into the resolution of the Jaipur Conference of December 16, 1948, which is set forth in Annex II. This contains the general phrase "the Congress would welcome her free association with independent nations of the Commonwealth for their common weal and the promotion of world peace."

"India's Future Relationship with the Commonwealth: Implications for Commonwealth Countries"

3. The sub-title of this is somewhat inaccurate. The paper really concerns implications for the United Kingdom and her colonies.

4. Of the three hypotheses discussed, the third seems the most unlikely to materialize. It may be seriously doubted whether India would leave the Commonwealth with resentment and hostility and, as a consequence, embark on a frankly anti-Western policy which might eventually lead her to fall under Communist domination (paragraph 30).

4a. I am inclined to agree with the assessment of the Indian situation given in Section II, subject to the following comments:

(a) Perhaps the paper is not sufficiently pessimistic on the economic future of India, both in regard to the dangers of inflation and the absence of any real prospect at all for self-sufficiency in food, even over a long period.

(b) Two important principles, I think, should be added to the list on India's foreign policy in paragraph 6:

(i) A deep and continuing concern for the welfare of Indian communities overseas. This is partly included in the various paragraphs under the heading "Colonial" but is not listed as a principle.

(ii) Advocacy of the principles of racial equality and non-discrimination. Indian representatives have frequently raised this at meetings of the General Assembly and of other United Nations agencies.

These two points are, of course, closely related. The paper fails to raise and discuss the old dispute with South Africa over the treatment of the Indian community, which is a major problem in Commonwealth relations.

(c) Under the heading "Indian Thought", an assessment is attempted of the forces of Westernization and of Easternization. Under the former they might have listed the influence of industrialization and the desire to acquire Western technical "know-how". Under the Eastern influences mention should have been made of the new importance being given to Hindustani and other native languages and the consequent decline that may be expected in the quality and use of the English language. In the clash of Western and Eastern cultural influences, I am inclined to think that the regional, geographical and social influences will be the final determinants. Mention should have been made of the limited community of interests that the Indians share with the European members of the Commonwealth and the gulf which separates Oriental peoples from the Western world. I am inclined to agree with the final sentence of paragraph 9.

5. The subject of India's financial policy which is dealt with at a number of places in this report does not directly concern us as it deals essentially with India's position in the Sterling Area. This is of direct concern to all members of the Commonwealth except ourselves.

6. The strategic appreciation given by the Chiefs of Staff concerns us all in a global sense but primarily the Indian Ocean members, which means in effect all except Canada. Our Defence Liaison Division should have a look at this statement.

7. Each of the three hypotheses is discussed under the headings "Political", "Colonial", "Economic", and "Financial". The summary states that the political considerations are perhaps more nicely balanced as between the first and second hypotheses. I think that we may feel that the political disadvantages under the first hypothesis are quite impressive. The second seems more satisfactory and some of the disadvantages listed against it are perhaps exaggerated.

8. Under the "Economic" heading one soon realizes that the United Kingdom has a big commercial stake in India, not only in trade preferences but even more in the privileged position of British business enterprises in India. Thus United Kingdom private companies are given "national treatment" in regard to taxation, different from that of foreign companies. By comparison we seem to have few economic interests to lose if India withdraws from the Commonwealth. India extends trade preferences to the United Kingdom, some of the colonies and to Burma. We receive no tariff preferences, though we grant British preferential rates to Indian goods. The Ford Motor Company in Bombay, which is a subsidiary of the Canadian firm, enjoys to my knowledge no privileges either in regard to the entry of vehicles or its business in India. The two Canadian life insurance companies who do business in India, the Sun and the Crown Life, are treated as foreign companies for investment requirements. United Kingdom insurance companies on the other hand are placed in the same favoured position as local Indian companies in the matter of investment of assets. Recently we made representations with a view of being treated on a basis of equality with the United Kingdom companies.

"The Commonwealth Relationship: Most-Favoured-Nation Questions"

9. This is a technical paper containing material similar to that received from the United Kingdom on Ireland last November. I think that the arguments in it are well known to our trade experts, though our Economic Division should be asked to examine this paper.

10. I attach a brief memorandum prepared by Miss [Marjorie] McKenzie, giving some constructive suggestions on constitutional points.

THE COMMONWEALTH RELATIONSHIP AND THE POSITION OF INDIA

Comments on United Kingdom memorandum of February, 1949

1. Memorandum on Constitutional Questions, para. 3: possible bases for claim that a special Commonwealth relationship would continue if allegiance to the Crown ceased to be a common element in the relationship.

(a) add to the list of possible bases:

(vii) the right of each member government of the Commonwealth, or of a citizen of any Commonwealth nation, in foreign states where such government or nation has no diplomatic or consular representation of its own, to make use of, or apply for assistance to, the local representative of any other Commonwealth government or nation.

(See Mr. Nehru's statement of Dec. 11, 1948, para. 5. Perhaps, on second thoughts, the clause suggested above might be unscrambled to read: "The right of each member government of the Commonwealth, in foreign states where it has no diplomatic or consular representation of its own, to use the good offices of the local diplomatic or consular representative of any other Commonwealth government; and of a citizen of any Commonwealth nation in similar circumstances to apply for assistance to such local representative.")

(b) No. (vi) in the list, "The Commonwealth citizenship", is the most definite and the most likely to be accepted by foreign countries. On the other hand, the whole conception of Commonwealth citizenship seems questionable. Its validity is dubious and its expediency still more dubious. If we discard it we weaken our hand considerably; if we retain it we are (i) casting doubt on the full sovereignty of each Commonwealth member, since Canadian citizenship, for example, might come to be looked upon as secondary to Commonwealth citizenship; (ii) laying a foundation for endless disputes among Commonwealth members as to what rights are involved in Commonwealth citizenship.

If some other term than "citizenship" could be devised to express this relationship, it would be helpful. "National" is no better than "citizen", as the Commonwealth is not a nation but several nations. The phrase "British protected person" applied to subjects of British protectorates might suggest something. Could we speak of "The right to Commonwealth protection"?

2. Memorandum on constitutional questions, para. 5: redefinition of the Commonwealth.

As suggested in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the memorandum, the 1926 declaration might well be allowed to stand as a historical statement, valid for its time but not purporting to fix for the future what the relations among Commonwealth nations were to be. If, however, redefinition should become necessary, or if it seemed advisable to keep in mind some common basis for replying to questions as suggested in para. 8, perhaps the statement in clause (i) of the proposed redefinition should be slightly altered. The Irish would, I think, contend that they never owed allegiance to the Crown, but merely had it exacted from them at a time when they were in no position to make effective resistance. Indians might take the same view. Clause (i) might therefore be modified to read somewhat as follows:

"independent sovereign states whose sovereignty is now, or was formerly, vested in the Crown."

Either of these definitions would, in itself, include the United States of America and, according to Henry V and other authorities, France. I suppose there would be no objection to either of these countries joining the Commonwealth if they wished, but meantime parts (iii) and (iv) of the redefinition would exclude them.

3. Memorandum on constitutional questions, para. 7: declarations by India and other Commonwealth countries.

The memorandum suggests that in these declarations the complete title "British Commonwealth of Nations" should be used. While this would undoubtedly be acceptable to most of the governments concerned, it might embarrass the Government of India, and possibly one or two other governments, in domestic political argument, since in some quarters the word "British" still has connotations of overlordship. The word "Commonwealth" alone might be sufficient.

4. Memorandum on Constitutional questions, Section IV: ineligibility of foreign states for admission to the Commonwealth except by accepting allegiance to the Crown.

We should try to avoid tying our hands too firmly on this point.

5. Memorandum on India's future relations, paras. 17 and 18: and memorandum on Most-Favoured-Nation Questions, para. 12: dangers to United Kingdom economic stability.

It appears from an examination of the above passages that, under present circumstances, the economic stability of the United Kingdom might well be endangered by two events which would be more likely to occur if India left the Commonwealth than if India remained in the Commonwealth:

(1) Withdrawal by India of tariff preferences to the United Kingdom, and discrimination against United Kingdom commercial interests within India.

(2) International Court action against the United Kingdom by some foreign country, resulting in a verdict that a most-favoured-nation treaty had been violated and an award of monetary damages for violation; or, alternatively, economic reprisals by the foreign country for what it considered violation of a most-favoured-nation treaty.

In the present precarious state of British and world economy, either of these events might have disastrous results. The economic stability of the United Kingdom is of course a major interest of Canada. The conclusion seems to be that it is of considerable interest to Canada, as well as to the rest of the Commonwealth, to find some acceptable means by which India may be enabled to stay in the Commonwealth.

INDIA AND COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

Further comment on United Kingdom memorandum of February, 1949†

1. The last sentence of paragraph 23 of this memorandum states that if India left the Commonwealth "it could no longer be held that there was any moral obligation upon the United Kingdom to come to the assistance of India if threatened by aggression, while India recognised no such reciprocal obligation."

2. The inference here is that there is a moral obligation on Commonwealth members to come to one another's assistance if threatened by aggression, and that if any Commonwealth member exercises its right to remain neutral in a war in which one of the other members is the victim of aggression, it is ignoring this moral obligation.

3. If such a moral obligation exists, it has, I think, never in fact been necessary to act upon it. There have always been compelling motives of self-interest involved when any Commonwealth member intervened to defend another against aggression. Perhaps the nearest approach to disinterested action is that of Canada in 1914; but even in the circumstances of 1914, any disaster to the United Kingdom would have had profound effects on the welfare of Canada. Canadian policy has, however, for about a century been based on the realization that, whether or not there was any moral obligation on the United Kingdom to defend Canada against aggression, the United Kingdom would as a matter of fact be quite unable to defend Canada effectively against the only foreign state which was in a position to invade Canada. In the war of 1939–45, Australia, which has always taken a sentimentalized view of Commonwealth relations, was staggered by the realization that if there had to be a choice between sacrificing Australia and sacrificing the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom Government, lacking the necessary wherewithal to defend both countries, would defend the United Kingdom from being occupied by German forces, even if that meant abandoning Australia to occupation by Japanese forces. Fortunately things did not reach that pass; but if they had, it was obvious what would happen, and no one could fairly blame the United Kingdom if it had had to make this hard choice. In the same way, the Australians seemed somewhat upset to find that Canada wished to retain any available troops to defend its own exposed West Coast against possible Japanese invasion after Pearl Harbor, instead of sending some of them to help defend Australia. Much of the Australian pressure for an Imperial Council or Cabinet during the war seemed to be due to a delusion that in such a body the United Kingdom could be talked into sacrificing its own vital interests to those of Australia. It has been pointed out by another member of the Commonwealth Division of this Department that the Australian action in withdrawing their troops from the Middle East to meet the Far East crisis was another striking example that shows how each government must put the immediate defence of its homeland ahead of all other considerations.

4. Self-interest, however, will likewise ensure that the United Kingdom will always come to the assistance of a friendly India against an aggressor except when its resources of men and material are insufficient for the purpose. It will not matter whether India is in the Commonwealth or not; neither the United Kingdom nor Australia could afford to let a neutral India be occupied by aggressor forces, if there was any way in which they could prevent such a disaster to their strategic communications. It does not, therefore, appear that India's withdrawal from the Commonwealth would in itself reduce the liability of the United Kingdom to defend India against aggression. Needless to say, even the comparatively favourable defence position of Canada would be seriously affected if India fell into the hands of a powerful aggressor.

REVISION BY MR. HEENEY OF THE MEMORANDUM OF MARCH 16, 1949,†
PRESENTED TO THE S.S.E.A. ON INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

When the draft constitution for India comes into force, India will become a "sovereign democratic republic". It is expected that the constitution will be adopted by the end of June and will come into force on August 15. The present draft makes no provision for a link with the Crown, though it is not impossible that the Indian Government might still accept a nominal link. At the same time, the Indian Government has indicated its desire to retain its membership in the Commonwealth and has received the support of the Indian Congress Party for this course. The Indian Government has also indicated that the association of India must be that of a full member and that India could not accept anything less than equality of status.

2. On February 25 a personal message was sent by Mr. Attlee to the Prime Minister on the question of India's future relations with the Commonwealth. This message suggested a meeting of Prime Ministers, which it is now proposed should commence in London on April 20.

3. Sir Norman Brook, the Secretary of the United Kingdom Cabinet, came to Ottawa on March 10 and left with the Prime Minister and yourself three United Kingdom Cabinet documents which discussed in detail the considerations affecting India's future relations with the Commonwealth.

4. At the outset it should perhaps be emphasized that the present position under which the Crown constitutes the basis of Commonwealth membership has been regarded as fully satisfactory by the Canadian Government, which has also expressed satisfaction with existing practices in respect of consultation and co-operation among Commonwealth governments.

5. There is obvious value in India's continued membership in the Commonwealth, from a political and strategic point of view, particularly in view of the present international situation. This is of importance not only in terms of the Soviet menace but also as providing an important link between the peoples of Asia and the Western countries. It would presumably be unwise to drive India out of the Commonwealth by insisting on allegiance to the Crown or some other formal link with the Crown as a necessary condition of membership, if a solution could be found which would not weaken the Commonwealth association or impair Canada's link with the Crown. Moreover, if India left the Commonwealth, it would be far from easy to establish a treaty relationship between India and the United Kingdom, or between India and other members of the Commonwealth, which would be satisfactory as an alternative to Commonwealth membership. Such treaties would inevitably involve an attempt to spell out relationships which have hitherto been regarded as defying definition. It is by no means unlikely that the terms of any treaty which could be agreed would in fact provide much less than is enjoyed by the present indefinite association.

6. The United Kingdom papers suggest that India could be retained in the Commonwealth, even without retaining a link with the Crown, by formal public Declarations by India and the other members of the Commonwealth. They suggest that the Government of India might make a declaration to the effect that, "India, on becoming an independent republic, solemnly declares and proclaims that it confirms and renews its membership of the British Commonwealth of Nations." The other Commonwealth governments might simply declare that, "India, on becoming an independent republic, is and continues to be a member of the Commonwealth." Possibly also, in view of the resolution of the Indian National Congress, the Indian Government would like such a declaration to include a reference to the "free association of the equal and independent countries of the Commonwealth." The United Kingdom papers indicate that, while in due course it will no doubt be necessary to give some explanation of the action taken in declaring India to remain a member of the Commonwealth, the initial public statements need not go beyond the declarations mentioned.

7. The United Kingdom papers suggest that the continuance of the Commonwealth relationship, without a common link with the Crown, could be justified by reference to the following:

(i) The de facto general acceptance by all civilized nations of the existence of the Commonwealth as a unit composed of nations bound together by a factual association of long standing, based up till now on the common sovereignty of the Crown, and still continuing.

(ii) Declarations by the Governments of all the members of the Commonwealth that they wished to be, and regarded themselves as, still bound in a special form of association.

(iii) The practice of consultation between member Governments on all matters of common concern—political, strategic, economic, and financial—and their practical co-operation in many such matters.

(iv) Their co-operation, to the extent desired and approved by each Government, in the military defence of common interests.

(v) The preferential treatment which they accord to one another in trade and commerce.

(vi) The Commonwealth citizenship."

8. Some such combination of considerations might well be sufficient to demonstrate the continued existence of the Commonwealth in the new circumstances. The Canadian Government no doubt would have certain reservations in respect of some of the six points mentioned in the preceding paragraph. For instance, point (iii) would require careful examination in the light of the position recently taken by Canada in the matter of Commonwealth consultation. Point (iv) would presumably require examination in so far as it relates to the "military defence of common interests". It might be unwise to stress point (vi) relating to Commonwealth citizenship, unless it were made abundantly clear that the expression was not intended to confer greater rights and privileges than those presently enjoyed by virtue of such citizenship.

9. In the light of the foregoing, you might wish to suggest the following points to the Cabinet as representing the appropriate Canadian attitude:

(a) Canada regards it of importance, particularly at this period of international stress, that India should remain in close and friendly relations with the Western countries; the Commonwealth connection is an important element in these relations; it is therefore desirable that India should remain formally a member of the Commonwealth.

(b) Canada is fully satisfied with the existing basis of Commonwealth relations and would, therefore, regard it as desirable that India retain if possible a formal link with the Crown, even though its constitution may be republican in form.

(c) If India does not find it possible to accept a continued link with the Crown, Canada should be prepared, at the London meeting, to consult with other Commonwealth countries, including India, on ways and means whereby the basis of membership in the Commonwealth might be broadened to include India as an independent republic. However, it should be made clear that no solution would be acceptable which impaired Canada's traditional relationship with the Crown.

(d) Canada should be appropriately represented at the London meeting in order to assist in working out a satisfactory solution of the present difficulty.

(e) An opportunity should be sought, before the London meeting, to acquaint the Government of India of the following:

(i) Our strong hope that India may find it possible to remain within in the Commonwealth.

(ii) For its part, the Canadian Government is fully satisfied with the present basis of association between the nations of the Commonwealth.

(iii) The Canadian Government feels that there would be grave difficulties in the way of India retaining the benefits of Commonwealth membership unless the traditional link with the Crown were preserved in some form.

(iv) The Canadian representatives at the London meeting would be prepared to discuss the problem in the light of the common desire of India and Canada that India should remain in the Commonwealth.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS; INDIA

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported upon conversations he had had with Sir Norman Brook whom the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had sent to Canada to explain how the question of India's future relations with other countries of the Commonwealth was being considered in London.

Upon the draft constitution for India coming into force, India would become a republic. No provision was made in the draft for a link with the Crown but the Indian government had indicated a desire to remain in the Commonwealth. They had also indicated they could not accept anything less than equality of status with other members of the Commonwealth.

There was obvious value in India's continued membership in the Commonwealth. The problem, therefore, was to seek some formula which would permit this but would not weaken the Commonwealth association or impair Canada's link with the Crown.

(Personal message, Mr. Attlee to Prime Minister, Feb. 25; letter, U.K. High Commissioner in Canada to Prime Minister, Mar. 5; Prime Minister's reply, Mar. 7;† External Affairs memorandum, Mar. 16, 1949).

11. Mr. Pearson added that Mr. Attlee had proposed that a meeting of Prime Ministers be held in London commencing about April 20th to discuss these matters. Indications were that the Prime Ministers of other Commonwealth countries would attend.

He thought that it was in Canada's interest that India should remain formally a member of the Commonwealth and highly desirable that India retain some link with the Crown. If this did not prove feasible, he thought that the Canadian government should be willing to explore the possibility of having India retain membership without such a link, provided this would not impair Canada's relationship with the Crown.

12. The Prime Minister indicated that this problem was one of great concern to the whole world and in his opinion every effort should be made to permit India to retain her membership in the Commonwealth.

Owing to pressure of domestic affairs, he would find it difficult to attend the Prime Ministers' conference in London on the date suggested and he had so informed the U.K. High Commissioner in Canada. In the event that he was unable to go, he proposed that Canada be represented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the meantime it would be helpful if any public reference which might have to be made to the forthcoming meeting described it as a meeting of representatives of Commonwealth countries rather than a meeting of Prime Ministers.

13. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the implications for Commonwealth relationship of India becoming a sovereign republic;

(b) agreed that it was in the general interest to seek some solution to this problem which would permit India to retain her association in the Commonwealth and at the same time would not impair Canada's relationship with the Crown; and,

(c) agreed that the Canadian government be represented at the opening of the forthcoming meetings by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and that the Prime Minister might endeavour to attend the later meetings if that appeared feasible; the U.K. government to be so informed and of the suggestion that the conference be referred to as a meeting of Ministers rather than of Prime Ministers.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], March 19, 1949

Memorandum for File:

RE: COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS—INDIA

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs received Sir Norman Brook and the U.K. High Commissioner yesterday evening at 5.30. The Under-Secretary and the Secretary to the Cabinet were present.

Brook told Mr. St. Laurent that his talks with officials here had been most helpful. So far as he was able to judge the views of U.K. and Canadian officials were substantially similar at the Ministerial and official levels. In both countries it was agreed that while almost certainly substantial difficulties would be encountered, the retention of India in the Commonwealth was of great importance and every effort should be made at the London meetings to work out a mutually satisfactory solution. The United Kingdom appreciated the Canadian desire not to have the present basis of associations through the Crown weakened so far as Canada was concerned. The United Kingdom felt the same.

Brook said that as a result of his conversations here it was felt that Mr. Nehru might have pointed out to him in advance of the meetings the difficulties which we felt in working out any solution which did not include the link with the Crown. He had sent a message to London suggesting that Gordon Walker be instructed to draw Mr. Nehru's attention to these difficulties when he saw him in New Delhi at the beginning of April. Such instructions would have to be drawn very carefully so as to avoid over-emphasis which might seem to indicate that the United Kingdom were unwilling to make any real attempt to meet the Indian desires.

We said to the Prime Minister that we had also discussed the possibility of having Kearney communicate in similar fashion with Mr. Nehru after he, Nehru, had seen Gordon Walker. Kearney might deliver an informal and personal message to Mr. Nehru from Mr. St. Laurent.

The Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson were generally agreeable to the tentative suggestions which emerged, and it was left that:

- (1) Brook would have sent to us a copy of the draft communication to Gordon Walker which he was sending to his government;
- (2) the United Kingdom would let us know, at once, as soon as the timetable for Gordon Walker's visit to New Delhi were settled;
- (3) we would prepare for the Prime Minister a draft message to Mr. Nehru which Kearney might deliver before he, Kearney, left New Delhi. (This would be to the effect that since Mr. St. Laurent was unlikely to be able to attend the London meetings, he wanted Mr. Nehru to know from him, personally, how much importance we attach to having India remain in the Commonwealth, etc.).

The Prime Minister indicated to Brook that it was unlikely that he would be able to go to London himself, though the decision was not final and he would have to await developments. He suggested to Brook that the meeting might be referred to as a meeting of Commonwealth "Ministers" or of Commonwealth "Governments" rather than a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. Brook saw difficulties but promised to take this up.

Brook said that he thought we would be receiving before long from the U.K. government a draft communique on the subject of the meetings. This would probably be in general terms since Mr. Nehru was anxious that the meetings should not appear to be dealing solely with the Indian question.

Reference Mr. Robertson's telegram no. 436 of February 24. India and the Commonwealth.

1. You will be aware that Sir Norman Brook was in Ottawa from March 10 to 19 to discuss with Canadian ministers and officials the question of India's future relations with the Commonwealth following the bringing into operation of the proposed republican constitution, and the manner in which this problem was being approached by the United Kingdom authorities. It was found from these discussions that our tentative views were substantially similar to those of the United Kingdom as outlined by Sir Norman Brook.

2. The Canadian Government considers that it is desirable that India should remain formally a member of the Commonwealth. The Canadian Government is fully satisfied with the existing basis of Commonwealth relations and would regard it as desirable that India retain if possible a formal link with the Crown, even though its constitution may be republican in form. If India does not find it possible to accept a continued link with the Crown, Canada would be prepared to consult with other Commonwealth countries, including India, on ways and means whereby the basis of membership in the Commonwealth might be broadened to include India as an independent republic, provided that it would be made clear that no solution would be acceptable which impaired Canada's traditional relationship with the Crown.

3. We have accepted the suggestion of Mr. Attlee that a Commonwealth meeting should be held to consider this problem. It is now proposed that the meeting should be held in London on April 21. It is expected that it would last for about one week. It is not at all certain that Mr. St. Laurent will be able to attend but I expect to be in London throughout the period of the meetings.

4. As you are probably aware, arrangements were made through Canada House for Mr. and Mrs. Kearney to sail from Bombay on the "Stratheden" on April 7 which should reach England on April 21 or 22. The Prime Minister is anxious that, if it can be arranged conveniently, Mr. Kearney should be present in an advisory capacity during the London discussions and I have sent him a telegram to this effect. It appears that his present sailing arrangements will be satisfactory and it is hoped that no change will be necessary for his departure from India. It may be found necessary later to cancel the reservation made for Mr. and Mrs. Kearney on the "Empress of Canada" sailing on April 26, though it seems unwise to do this now when the plans for the London meeting are still not finally settled.

Note for File 5-E(s)

On Friday morning, March 18, a meeting was held in Mr. Heeney's office attended by Sir Alexander Clutterbuck, Sir Norman Brook, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Heeney, Mr. Reid, Mr. MacKay and myself to consider the draft instruction that might be sent by Mr. Attlee to Mr. Gordon-Walker, indicating the line that the latter might take in his discussion with Pandit Nehru. This, Sir Norman had given informally to Mr. Heeney on March 17.

2. Mr. Robertson wondered whether perhaps the case for the Crown connection was put a little too strongly in Brook's draft. He also suggested that perhaps use could be made of the historical connection of the Crown with parliamentary institutions when the desirability of retaining the Crown connection is taken up with Mr. Nehru. This idea was considered a valuable suggestion. He also suggested that the idea might be informally hinted to Mr. Nehru that the Crown could serve as a possible basis for the eventual reunion of India and Pakistan. This was thought to be a very delicate matter and Sir Norman Brook questioned whether Gordon-Walker would be a suitable person to handle it.

3. Several persons observed that perhaps Brook's draft might bring in the international law aspect, namely whether foreign countries would be prepared to recognize the existence of the Commonwealth in the absence of the Crown link.

4. If the idea of common citizenship as the basis of the Commonwealth connection came up, it was thought that perhaps it might be pointed out that the present basis of such common citizenship is allegiance to the Crown and that there would be a problem in putting it on a contractual basis.

5. It was suggested that, in view of India's comments on the subject of Commonwealth consultation last November, Nehru might be impressed with the argument that there would be value in retaining the Commonwealth relationship on a flexible basis under the Crown as against attempting to define it in terms of citizenship, defence obligations, etc.

6. As India has expressed a desire to be associated with the Commonwealth, it must be assumed that India wishes it to continue to exist and therefore would not wish to have it put on such an uncertain foundation that its continued existence might be endangered.

7. There was some feeling that the draft of Sir Norman Brook was too strong though it was appreciated that the whole approach presented a serious dilemma. If not worded sufficiently strongly, the Indian authorities would not be impressed with our real difficulties in agreeing to a basis of the Commonwealth relationship other than the link with the Crown. On the other hand, if this case were put too strongly, the Indians might feel that we were being uncooperative and unhelpful in meeting their own position and difficulties. It was suggested that perhaps a conclusion might be put on the draft somewhat along the lines of the introductory sentences.

8. Mr. Heeny thought that the references to the King as "the supreme head of the Commonwealth" and to the King as an influence "above politics" would from our point of view be undesirable and might be deleted.

[Ottawa], March 1, 1949

Sir Alexander Clutterbuck called to see me today about the letter to you from Mr. Attlee concerning a possible meeting of Prime Ministers in April or May to discuss the Indian question. I emphasized to him the difficulties that stood in the way of your attendance at a conference in London on this subject at the time suggested. Sir Alexander said that they had already heard from Mr. Chifley, who also regretted the inconvenience that attendance at such a conference would cause him, but added that he thought he could be in London between the middle and end of April. Mr. Fraser can also come at that time, as well as the Prime Minister of Pakistan, though the latter said it would not be very easy for him to leave Karachi.

I told Sir Alexander that we would be glad to receive Sir Norman Brook next week, and that no final decision regarding attendance at the London Conference might be possible until we had discussed the question with him.

After we had finished our talk on the Conference, I mentioned to Sir Alexander the unfortunate effect that was being caused in this country, and which had been the basis of attacks in our House of Commons against the Government, by statements in England which suggested that U.K. trade with Canada would inevitably decrease unless Canada took more U.K. imports. I felt that the unhappy implication of such statements was that we were in some way at fault in this matter when, as he knew, the reverse was the case and we were doing everything we possibly could to urge the British to send us more goods. I said that I hoped that on an early and suitable occasion someone in London with authority would emphasize that we had removed practically all barriers to U.K. imports, and had made every possible effort to increase such imports; that no fault lay in Ottawa in this matter.

Sir Alexander promised to pass this view on to London and said he personally agreed that something along the lines suggested should be done here.

My dear High Commissioner,

As you know, I have been giving careful consideration to your letters of 14th,† 21st† and 23rd† March with the personal message from Mr. Attlee regarding the proposed meeting in London during April.

Would you be good enough in the first place to tell Mr. Attlee how glad I was to have had the opportunity of discussing so fully and satisfactorily the question of India's future relationship to the other nations of the Commonwealth with Sir Norman Brook and to learn that our two Government's views on this matter are close together. Sir Norman's visit was most helpful in this connection.

I note that it is now hoped that the proposed meeting in London will open on 21st April. I have been wondering whether it would be possible for me to alter certain arrangements so that I might be in London at that time. There are, however, very real difficulties in the way of this. In any event, it is proposed to send the Secretary of State for External Affairs to represent the Government at the opening meetings and, if developments occur which make it desirable for me to go to London subsequently, Mr. Pearson will be in a position to communicate them to me and I will do my best to fly over at once. I hope that you will emphasize to Mr. Attlee that the Government is genuinely interested in the proposed meeting and anxious to play its full part therein; that nothing but arrangements which have long been prepared and the cancellation of which would cause difficulty and disappointment, prevent me being present at the opening session.

I am also hoping that during his trip to Washington Mr. Bevin will find it possible to visit Ottawa, in which case I will have an opportunity of discussing this very important question with him here.

If I should not be able to go to London, I can assure you that Mr. Pearson will be in a position to express the views of the Government. I hope that those views will be considered as constructive. I also hope that by consulting together the Governments of the nations of the Commonwealth will be able to reach a satisfactory agreement on this question, the implications of which are important not only for the Commonwealth but for the world.

Mr. Pearson, I understand, hopes to be in London on 18th or 19th April and will be accompanied by a private secretary and possibly an adviser. He tells me that Mrs. Pearson will not be with him, and I should add that, if I am able to go to London, I will not be accompanied by my wife.

We are grateful to the United Kingdom Government for its invitation that the Canadian representative, or representatives, should be its guest in London, and we accept that invitation with pleasure.

I note that it is proposed to make an announcement in certain terms to the press on Tuesday, 29th March, at 3.30 p.m. GMT, regarding the proposed meeting. This is quite agreeable to us. Of the alternative words suggested in the second paragraph of the proposed announcement, we prefer "A".¹⁹

Please deliver as soon as possible the following personal message for Pandit Nehru from Mr. St. Laurent. Text begins.

Owing to long-standing engagements I very much regret that I shall not be able to attend at least the opening sessions of the Commonwealth meeting in London and I am therefore asking Mr. Kearney to give you this personal message before his departure from India.

My colleagues and I have been giving very serious consideration to Commonwealth constitutional problems which will be discussed in London. In this connection, we have noted your plans to adopt a republican constitution and the wish expressed both by yourself and the National Congress that India should continue its free association with the nations of the Commonwealth. All of us here warmly welcome that wish and earnestly hope that India's membership in the Commonwealth will continue after India becomes a sovereign democratic republic.

This we consider to be desirable and important for all parts of the Commonwealth, particularly in view of the present critical international situation. We are anxious that our existing close and friendly relations with India should continue and be strengthened. We hope, therefore, that a way can be found which will be satisfactory to your country and to the other nations of the Commonwealth whereby India can remain within the Commonwealth.

So far as the Canadian Government is concerned, we are satisfied with the present basis of association between the members of the Commonwealth and we do not wish to alter Canada's traditional relationship with the Crown. The Crown is an essential element of our constitution and of our whole parliamentary system of government. We think that the Canadian public would have misgivings in accepting any fundamental change in the present form of Commonwealth association which would appear to weaken the position of the Crown.

The above considerations prompt me to express the sincere hope that you may see your way clear to retaining some link between the sovereign republic of India and the Crown. It seems to me that any alternative presents not only constitutional but also real practical difficulties; for example, we might be hard put to defend against foreign objections the continued exchange of trade preferences.

In any event, you and your colleagues may be assured that the Government and people of Canada earnestly desire that a way may be found through which India can remain a full member of the Commonwealth. Please be assured also of our sincere good will and of our understanding of India's special situation in regard to this matter. I wanted you to know this before you left for London, as well as something of the problems involved from the Canadian point of view in regard to any action which might seem to require a fundamental change in the basis of the Commonwealth relationship.

Mr. Pearson will be representing the Canadian government at the opening meetings in London. If developments are such as to make it seem essential for me to be present, I will endeavour to fly over at once. Mr. Pearson will, of course, be willing and happy to explore with you and the representatives of other Commonwealth countries the ways and means where India, under her new constitution, can, in accordance with our common desire, continue within the Commonwealth. I may add that I have asked Mr. Kearney to be present in London during the meetings as an advisor to Mr. Pearson.

Again assuring you of my deep regrets that I may not have the privilege of personal discussions with you, I wish to send you my very high regards.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS; LONDON MEETING

27. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Prime Minister had sent a telegram to Mr. Nehru explaining that he would not be in London for the opening meetings. The telegram conveyed to the Indian government indication of the understanding of the Canadian government and of its desire that a means be found by which India might remain within the Commonwealth. It explained difficulties which were envisaged in continuing Commonwealth relationship without some link with the Crown.

It seemed probable that most strenuous objection at the meeting to a basis allowing membership without a link with the Crown would come from South Africa.

INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

The Indian High Commissioner was called in by the Under-Secretary at 12:15 a.m., March 31, so that he could be informed of the personal message which had gone forward from Mr. St. Laurent for Pandit Nehru on the subject of India's future relations with the Commonwealth. Mr. Heeney not only read the message but also explained at some length to Sardar Malik²⁰ our attitude on this question, including both the difficulties felt by the Canadian Government and its earnest desire that India should continue as a member of the Commonwealth.

²⁰ Sardar H.S. Malik, haut-commissaire de l'Inde au Canada/High Commissioner of India in Canada.

2. Sardar Malik was clearly pleased with our attitude and happy that we had expressed our desire that India should continue within the Commonwealth. He did not have a great deal to add that was new or very helpful.

3. He remarked that while he could appreciate the sentiment of the Canadian public towards the Crown, the position in India was quite different. The Crown and the personality of the King had not, under British rule in India, endeared themselves to the Indian public.

4. He mentioned India's dispute with South Africa in two connections; first, that the Royal visit to South Africa early in 1947 had created a bad impression in India. It was felt that the King was in this way being too closely associated with the South African Government with which India was then at a serious stage in its dispute over the treatment of the Indian community in South Africa. Malik mentioned that in this way the King had been publicly linked with the policies of one Commonwealth Government and that therefore there was a danger that the King should be dragged into controversial public issues. He also mentioned the question put in the Constituent Assembly recently to Pandit Nehru as to whether he would give an assurance that India would not continue to be a member of an association in which racial equality was not recognized and practised by all its members. Nehru replied that he could not give any such assurance.

5. Malik also mentioned that he thought the question of Indonesia, on which Nehru and other Indian leaders felt so strongly, might well come up in some form at the London meetings but he did not elaborate on this point.

Your telegram no. 77 of March 31st, Commonwealth Relations. Bajpai requests me to convey the following reply from Mr. Nehru to Mr. St. Laurent's message, Begins: "I thank you for your message dated March 31st which your High Commissioner Mr. Kearney has communicated to me.

I am grateful for your explaining so clearly and fully Canada's attitude towards the problem of India's relationship with the Commonwealth. At this stage all that I can say is that although India is committed to the adoption of a Republic constitution both my colleagues and I in the Government of India and the great majority of thinking people in India prefer India's association with the Commonwealth to continue after she becomes a Republic. I shall go to London with the sole desire to find ways and means of continuing this association without the sacrifice of deep-rooted sentiment or fundamental principle either by India or by other countries of the Commonwealth. I can only express the hope that a frank exchange of views in London based upon full and sympathetic understanding of each other's difficulties may help us in achieving the object that we all have in view. I shall of course be happy to have talks with Mr. Pearson who, I feel sure, will represent your Government with great ability. However, it would naturally be a great pleasure for me to renew my acquaintance with you in case you should find it possible to visit London during the Conference.

All friendly remembrances and my very high regards. Jawaharlal Nehru." Ends.

INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

At the outset of the forthcoming discussions it is probably good tactics to leave the initiative to India to suggest a formula for India's association with the Commonwealth, but it may be desirable for us to have suggestions ready to head off any formula which might be objectionable to us.

2. The formula below is based on the following assumptions:

(a) That the Commonwealth has now reached the stage of a personal union; that is, it is now formally united only by the fact that it has a common head, who is still called by the title of "King" and that, conversely, the concept of a common Crown in the sense of the single executive authority no longer in fact obtains;²¹

(b) That India might be prepared to accept the King as the common head of the Commonwealth, provided his title were not objectionable to the Indian people, and provided it were made abundantly clear that complete executive authority were vested in the Indian Government;²²

(c) That any formula adopted to meet the case of India should be flexible while doing as little violence as possible to accepted traditions.²³

3. Suggested formula:

(a) The King might be given some generic title to indicate his relationship with the whole Commonwealth (e.g., "Head of the Commonwealth of Nations"), leaving for each member state to fill in an additional title referring specifically to it (e.g., Canada might add "King of Canada").²⁴

The remainder of the present title might have to be dropped, or, if retained, would obviously need alteration (e.g., "By the Grace of God" might become "By Divine Grace"; "Defender of the Faith" might become "Defender of Faith").²⁵

(b) The specific part of the title referring to India might be something different from "King"—e.g., "Patron of the Republic of India", or perhaps an Indian term in keeping with India's historical tradition. (There is an historical precedent in the case of George I, who was King of Great Britain and Elector of Hanover).²⁶

(c) India might be induced to modify the title of "President" so as to indicate that the office was vested with the powers of the Crown (e.g., he might be called "President and Regent of India", or "President and Governor General of India").²⁷

(d) India might by Letters Patent vest in the elected head all the powers of the Crown. Probably no alteration in the present draft constitution would be needed to do this since it can scarcely be held that the powers of the Crown have yet lapsed with regard to India. The last edition of Canada's Letters Patent of the office of Governor General might serve as a useful model.²⁸

(e) It might be desirable to wrap up the changed title in reciprocal declarations by Commonwealth governments—India declaring its intention to remain, other

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Secretary of State for External Affairs

[London, April 1949]

NOTES ON VISIT TO LONDON, APRIL 19TH-30TH, 1949

Tuesday, April 19th

I had lunch today with Sir Norman Brook, who brought me up to date on the thinking here in regard to the Indian problem. There has been little change from the views he expressed on behalf of the U.K. Government in Ottawa some weeks ago. However, there has apparently been a strengthening of the feeling in certain quarters that India must be kept in the Commonwealth, even as a Republic. They have given up the idea of two types of membership in the Commonwealth, and rightly so, but feel that, while Nehru is not willing to accept the Crown as the source of allegiance, he may be willing to accept the Crown as, to use Sir Norman Brook's phrase, "Head of the Commonwealth". I told him that I did not like this phrase much, as the word "Head" might be misinterpreted, but I thought that the idea was a good one and adequate as a basis for Indian membership. There may however, be some difficulty with other Dominions who wish to go further in keeping the Crown as the link through common allegiance, and also with South Africa. If this idea is carried out, there may have to be some kind of declaration of continuing membership emerge from this meeting, and also some alteration in the King's title. Norman Brook said in regard to the latter, that they have in mind something like, "George VI, of Canada (United Kingdom, Australia, etc. as the case may be), the other Monarchies (Nations) (Realms) of the Commonwealth, King, Defender of the Faith, Head of the Commonwealth". This of course is awkward, but something like this may be worked out.

Brook also discussed with me the procedure for the forthcoming meetings. It is the intention to have bilateral discussions between Mr. Attlee and the Dominion Ministers and between the Dominion Ministers themselves before having a general meeting. This is a good idea in order to keep things from becoming too large and too formal. Apparently Attlee took up the idea I expressed to Brook in Ottawa that there were usually too many U.K. Ministers at these Commonwealth meetings, as a result of which the room tended to become divided between the U.K. and the Rest on a basis of more or less numerical equality. Attlee had decided that only three U.K. Ministers should attend, but he was having great difficulty in choosing his two colleagues as five or six wished to come and three or four insisted. They had hoped that only two from each Dominion should be present, but here again, the Australian High Commissioner was vehement in his determination to attend so there may have to be three from each Dominion. This Constitutional business is the kind of problem that cannot be solved at meetings of thirty or forty people with formal speeches, etc.

²⁹ Yes

I had dinner with Noel-Baker this evening, and found him less friendly to the idea of a Republican India in the Commonwealth than Brook had been. He was apparently very worried about the effect of such development on Pakistan and Ceylon. He does not think that they could retain their present connection with the Crown if India changes hers. This of course may well be true, but is less of an evil than having India completely outside, and Pakistan and Ceylon in. Baker is also worried about South African reaction, and this of course is another difficulty. In fact there is no solution to this Indian problem which does not involve us in some difficulty. It is simply a matter of discovering the lesser of the evils.

Baker said that Attlee was anxious that I should have talks with the South Africans and Indians as soon as possible, as they feel that Canada can be very useful in reconciling differences.

Wednesday, April 20th

Saw Mr. Attlee this morning at 10 Downing Street and we went over the procedure for the forthcoming meeting, discussing ways and means of overcoming some of the difficulties that might occur. Most of the ground I had already traversed with Sir Norman Brook. Attlee was reasonably optimistic, and takes practically the same line in regard to India that we do. He thinks that we should keep our eye on the one objective of keeping her in the Commonwealth. He is a very intelligent little man, and has gained a great deal in authority as he lingers on at Downing Street. He will make a good Chairman of our meeting. I suggested to him that it might be a good thing to have a joint secretariat, say Sir Norman Brook and an Indian. He was interested in this idea, but I doubt if it will be carried out.

I left this afternoon for St. John's College where I dined with the Fellows. It was like old times, and I was relieved to find that nothing had changed at St. John's, or indeed is ever likely to change. I spent the night in my old room and it was as uncomfortable as ever. I was treated just as I used to be treated. In other words, no towel, no hot water, no comfort! Food and drink were of course far better than could be obtained in London, and the Dons did full justice to it.

Thursday, April 21st

We had our first meeting at 10 Downing Street, but it took the form of a pre-luncheon sherry party, a sort-of get-together to establish the social basis on which our political work is to rest. It was very friendly and informal, and after fraternizing inside, we went into the garden where we were photographed and moved by a battery of cameras. Afterwards we motored to Buckingham Palace for luncheon with the Royal Family, all of whom, except Prince Charles, were present! As it was Princess Elizabeth's birthday it was a nice combination of gold plate Royal formality and friendly family atmosphere. I had words with the King and Queen, the Princess and Queen Mary, and a long chat with the Athlones who took me in charge as a fellow-Canadian.

The Royal Family is well briefed because every one of them commiserated with me on the action of E.C.A. in prohibiting the use of dollars by the United Kingdom for the purchase of Canadian wheat. So far as I was concerned, Queen Mary stole the show, and it was quite startling to see her begin the smoking at lunch by putting her cigarette in a long holder which she proceeded to tip at a rakish angle. I think that the Eastern Prime Ministers were suitably impressed by the Palace atmosphere.

Afterwards we went into the grand drawing room and were again photographed in various poses and groups. It was a relief to note that even the Buckingham Palace press photographer is as irreverent and tyrannical as members of his craft invariably are. He pushed the Royal Family around like ordinary beings. When one group seemed to be too stiff, he tried to make us unbend by announcing that we were not a very handsome looking crowd and therefore if we talked and smiled it might minimize our defects and make a better picture. The King emitted quite a guffaw at this sally at which moment the photographer snapped his camera.

In the afternoon I paid my respects to Dr. Malan, the steady stolid Boer Prime Minister, and found him rather a nice old boy, though I should think tough enough when he wishes to be. He was also reasonably optimistic as to the success of our meeting, and is not going to be as difficult as some people have feared. I had tea with him and his wife, and then at five o'clock called on Pandit Nehru, and in the interests of the Commonwealth, consumed another tea.

I had a good talk with Nehru and got the impression that he will do his part to make this Commonwealth conference a success by accepting the King in some form as the symbol of our association. He has a very cultivated mind, a very subtle one, but is not the sort of person one can get to know easily on first meeting.

Friday, April 22nd

We had our first formal meeting at 10 Downing Street. Attlee opened by stating the problem in very mild and sensible terms, and then called on Nehru who circulated the attached document "A"† and said a few words about it. We then spoke in turn, everyone expressing a keen desire to continue the Commonwealth association, although the Australian and New Zealand Prime Ministers were obviously worried about the effect of the admission of a Republic on public opinion in their own countries. Dr. Malan read a prepared statement ("B")‡ which, as Sir Stafford Cripps said, was quite remarkable. It was very friendly to the Commonwealth connection and also very friendly to India's desire to reconcile that connection with a Republican form of government. The South African attitude removes one big hurdle. I spoke last and my remarks were very general.

After luncheon at the Dorchester given by Wilgress, I went to the Savoy to call on Mr. Chifley. He is a sane, homespun, deliberate sort of person, not likely to go off the deep end, and ready to see other peoples' points of view. Thank goodness he is here instead of Evatt! He indicated that as long as our report started off by emphasizing the value of the present connection with the Crown, which none of us desires to change except India, he could then accept a reference in the report to the inclusion of India and recognition of the King as the symbol of our association. Apparently Attlee and his people are drafting something along these lines for submission to us tomorrow for study over the weekend.

Later saw Admiral Grant regarding the Canadian destroyer at Shanghai. I told him at all costs to keep it from going up the Yangtse.

Saw Daniels of the New York Times.

This evening I phoned Tommy Lascelles to see if he could dine with me as I thought it would be a good thing to pass on the sentiments of this morning's meeting and get the reaction of the Palace. I told him that there was every likelihood of India accepting recognition of the King as a symbol of our association and Head of our Commonwealth, and that on the other hand, the rest of us were willing to accept India as a Republic in the Commonwealth on the above basis. I wondered how the Palace would take this. Lascelles thought that this was a very wise and important solution and that the King would be pleased. He said that they had been looking into the question of inclusion of a Republic in an association of monarchies and found that it had been done in the Holy Roman Empire in connection with the Republics of Danzig and Lubeck! It is a good thing to know that the Palace is not going to put any obstacle in the way of our solution.

Saturday, April 23rd

Early this morning a draft Declaration was circulated to us by Mr. Attlee. In fact it consists of two Declarations, one by India which wishes to remain in the Commonwealth but recognizing the King as outlined previously, and another by the rest of us saying that we are going to retain the Crown on the old basis. This is not a good idea as two Declarations really underline the division between two types of membership in the Commonwealth.

At eleven o'clock I called on the Prime Minister of Pakistan. We both agreed that there should be only one Declaration. He is worried about the effect on Pakistan of the admission of a Republic and feels that public opinion in his country will demand the same treatment. I tried to persuade him not to take any precipitate action in this regard. At the same time, I agreed that Pakistan was entitled to have every assurance from our meeting that if Pakistan desires to become a Republic she should be able to do so exactly on the same terms as India. Liaquat Ali Khan is an easier person to talk to than Nehru as he seems franker and more straightforward. It was discouraging, however, to sense the strong feeling of hostility between Pakistan and India. He and Sir Zafrullah Khan were bitter about what they call the unfriendly attitude of India towards them, not only on Kashmir, but on trade and economic matters. I tried to convey the impression of sympathetic neutrality.

I got the other side of the case later when I called on Sir Girja Bajpai. He was also worried about the double declaration. I told him that, as far as we were concerned, his worries were justified. He gave me a very confidential paper of his own ("C")† which was a sort of Balfour Declaration on the new Commonwealth of Republics and Monarchies. It was very well done, but I gathered that he had not been able to persuade his own Prime Minister to put it forward. Meanwhile we may be able to use it in connection with a draft that MacKay and I are preparing to put forward at Monday's meeting if the situation seems to require it.

This afternoon I left for the country, first for a wedding at Stoke Poges, and then for tea with Princess Elizabeth, the Duke of Edinburgh, and Prince Charlie, who was brought in after tea and displayed to Chifley, who was also present, and myself. I hope that relations, not at the moment too good between Australia and Canada, were not further disturbed by the fact that I was able to make the baby laugh while Chifley was not successful in that respect. Possibly I tried harder! The Princess and her husband and child are a charming family group, and would be, irrespective of their station. She is a sweet and good-natured person, obviously conditioned to her job by long years of training, and very sincere in her desire to do well what she is destined to do. He seems to be a high-spirited lad, intelligent and attractive, but will no doubt settle down to the business of Royalty.

I spent the weekend at Roger Makins' place near Basingstoke. It was wonderful to be in the English country again.

Monday, April 25th

At 11 o'clock I had my second conference with Canadian Press representatives, and explained to them very candidly, but off the record, the progress we had been making in our meetings. After they left I saw four chief editorial writers of the Times, and had a very good talk with them.

Then came the Burmese Ambassador with a member of the Burmese Cabinet. They of course are interested in our Commonwealth talks. I formed the view that some of them seem now to think that they may have been a little premature in leaving the Commonwealth. This view is underlined by the mess they are now in. The Burmese Minister is in London to get financial and armament help from the U.K. Government, and he wondered whether we could assist also. I was not very encouraging on that score.

At 2.30 this afternoon we had another meeting at 10 Downing Street, when we went over documents which had been circulated Saturday by Mr. Attlee ("D").† They received very lukewarm support. I said at once that two statements of this kind, one by India and one by the rest of us would be unsatisfactory, and that we should try to combine them in one draft. For that purpose, Chifley and the Ceylon P.M. produced texts, but they were not very satisfactory. The Australian text, supported by New Zealand, threw the whole emphasis on the desire of the rest of us to retain our allegiance with the King, and played down the Indian development as a single exception to the general rule that the Commonwealth could only include monarchies. This is of course unsatisfactory to Pakistan and Ceylon who insisted very vigorously, and in strong language, that they could not subscribe to any declaration which seemed to put them in a less free position to India. At times the language verged on the extreme, as Peter Fraser became more and more British and Zafrullah Khan for Pakistan became more and more determined that they should receive equal treatment with India. The difficulty of course was that Australia and New Zealand, and indeed ourselves, were anxious that our declaration should not give the impression that we were all about to become Republics in the Commonwealth. On the other hand, Pakistan and Ceylon insisted that any attempt to give India prior and exclusive consideration would be repugnant to public opinion in their countries. In supporting this view they emphasized that they were quite happy with the existing constitutional position, but if it were changed in respect of India it might have to be changed in respect of their countries. I was in a rather easy position because this was a battle that could be left to other delegations who took the extreme views on one side or the other. Therefore my efforts could be devoted merely to finding compromises between these extremes. Attlee and Sir Stafford Cripps were in the same situation. At the end of the afternoon the two positions came closer together on this matter, and the atmosphere became friendlier. There were of course other points of difference. Dr. Malan did not like the expression "symbol of our association and Head of the Commonwealth". He thought that this might be interpreted in South Africa as a move towards a centralized Empire. I was inclined to agree on this and suggested a form of words to get over this difficulty, "The King as symbol of our association and as such Head of the Commonwealth." The Indians did not like this for some reason which was so subtle as to be almost metaphysical and proposed for "as such" to substitute "thus". We also have quite a long discussion as to whether the word "British" should appear before "Commonwealth". Our Anzac friends were, of course, insistent on this and South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon were on the other side. This was another fight which I found we could keep out of but I did suggest that we could use the words "British Commonwealth of Nations" to refer to the present situation and "Commonwealth of Nations" when referring to the new state of affairs. At first this did not get much support, but as it happens, it was finally adopted.

At 6 o'clock we were pretty tired, and adjourned to a party upstairs which Attlee had arranged for us to meet the Leaders of the Opposition parties. Meanwhile, he as Chairman, and he had been an extremely good Chairman during this difficult afternoon, suggested that Sir Stafford Cripps and Sir Norman Brook, Secretary, might try to work on a draft of a single statement embodying the points generally agreed on during the afternoon. Attlee asked me privately if I would assist in this work, so I spent an hour and a half with Cripps, Brook and Percivale Liesching working out a draft, which Attlee approved after the cocktail party ("E").† That became the draft which was later, with some minor changes, accepted. We gave it first reading that night at 9 p.m. At first the Anzacs did not like it very much because it did not seem to emphasize enough the role of the monarchy, and the fact that only one part of the Commonwealth was changing its status as a republic. However we argued back and forth, at times as vigorously as we had in the afternoon, without coming to any final agreement. The same points of difference occurred that had caused a division in the afternoon. The Pakistan Prime Minister was insistent that he would not accept any sentence which said that the position of the other Dominions "remained unaltered" as that gave the impression that it could not or would not be altered in the future. It seemed to me that everybody would be satisfied if we suggested for "remains unaltered" the words "is not hereby altered". But as people were very tired and as the atmosphere was not good for final agreement, we were not able to decide on this change.

Tuesday, April 26th

We met again at 11 a.m. to take a further look at the draft ("F")† and reached agreement on nearly all of the disputed points. Dr. Malan was still somewhat worried about the description of "Head of the Commonwealth", but in the new context was willing to give it further consideration if we put "as such" instead of "thus", thereby returning to the original Canadian suggestion. He also wanted an agreed paragraph in the minutes to the effect that "Head of the Commonwealth" had no constitutional significance. I supported him on this as I also was somewhat worried about the use of "Head of the Commonwealth".

Liaquat Ali Khan added to the general satisfaction by now announcing that he could accept the wording in paragraph 3 of the revised draft "the basis of whose membership of the Commonwealth is not hereby changed" if he could be given a satisfactory assurance about Pakistan's position. We had a long and confused discussion as to what form this assurance should take. Liaquat Ali Khan wanted it included in the declaration but the rest of us thought it would be good enough if we had an agreed paragraph in the minutes. This was finally agreed on ("G").† We then had a discussion of a draft paragraph for the minutes on preferential treatment in the Commonwealth, to which we made some amendments to make it more amenable to foreign and particularly United States opinion if it ever became public ("G").† I warned the meeting that I wished to bring up at the next discussion the question of the revision of the King's Title. Nobody showed much enthusiasm about this.

During the afternoon I telephoned Mr. St. Laurent and he was quite agreeable to the draft declaration which I read out to him. He also authorized me later to accept it on behalf of the Canadian Government.

That afternoon I attended a reception of M.P.'s given by the Speaker and met many old friends; from there to dinner at 10 Downing Street. It was a small, informal, and very pleasant affair, just the seven of us. The food and drink were good but the conversation not quite up to the occasion. However, by this time we were all on good terms and ready for the final business meeting at 9.45 p.m. the same evening.

At this meeting we agreed on the procedure to be followed the next day in reporting our declaration to the King. There was some suggestion that we should give him collective advice in regard to the matter but I demurred at this as it seemed to me that constitutionally we could not do so. But we did agree to call on him collectively and have Mr. Attlee read the declaration on our behalf.

We then gave final approval to our document and closed our last business session in an atmosphere of great good humour and goodwill. Fraser and Chifley were particularly hearty. Chifley has a heavy kind of humour which he likes to inflict on the rest of us, while Peter Fraser, when he is not making long-winded pronouncements, loves to interject what he thinks to be witty remarks. Certainly the atmosphere of the last two meetings has been infinitely more good-natured than the earlier ones, even Dr. Malan has thawed out a bit although he is not what you could call a cheerful chap at best. However he has won everybody's respect because he has such a straight-forward honest approach to the subjects under discussion.

Wednesday, April 27th

We met at 10.30 to put the finishing touches to our work and to begin a discussion of the King's Title. This was my particular baby, and I told the meeting that, so far as we were concerned, if the King's Title was now to be changed by removing "Ireland" from it, we wanted some further changes as well. We wanted "dominions beyond the seas" taken out and a title which would mention all the countries by name, or else a different title for the different countries. For example, for Canada it would be "George the Sixth, King of Canada", for the United Kingdom "George the Sixth King of Great Britain and Northern Ireland", etc. ("H"). Peter Fraser and Chifley said they were not going to touch their titles and we could do what we like with ours. I said that we would certainly change ours in the way indicated at the earliest possible opportunity as we did not like "Dominions", especially Dominions with a small d. I was attacked on this point and it was pointed out to me that Dominions in the King's Title had a capital D. We had a good deal of chat about this and I found out, to my chagrin, that I was wrong. It was obviously impossible to get any agreement on this so I said that all I wished to do was bring it to the attention of the other Governments. We had a good deal of chat also about whether we should keep or reject "by the Grace of God" and "Defender of the Faith". Nobody seemed to be quite certain what Faith the King was now supposed to be defending, and it was generally felt that while this phrase may have been satisfactory in the early days of the reign of Henry VIII, it was a little anomalous in the year 1949. No decisions, however, were taken, and we agreed to consider the matter further.

Peter Fraser then began to throw some more fat into the fire by asking the meeting in general and Nehru in particular to define what each meant by Commonwealth cooperation. Peter had been muttering for some days that he was determined to thresh out this matter, and he certainly did so at this time. Nehru, who was put on the spot, made a brilliant reply, arguing that there could be no cooperation except for constructive and peaceful purposes, and that it was not enough to build up a Commonwealth defence bloc and hope to check Communism in that way. I have seldom listened to a more impressive dialectical statement. Nehru certainly has a magnificent mind. At one earlier meeting, when our second draft was being read, he had taken exception to the last sentence which had been included, at my suggestion, by our small drafting group, and which read, "Accordingly the United Kingdom, etc....declare that they remain united as free and equal members of the Commonwealth of Nations, which has proved its value as a[n] instrument for free cooperation in the pursuit of peace, security and progress." Nehru was quite blunt in saying that he was not willing to admit that the Commonwealth had in fact proved its value in this regard on all occasions in the past, and certainly had not always done so in India. Therefore it had been Nehru who had insisted that the last lines be changed to read, "they remain united as free and equal members of the Commonwealth of Nations, freely cooperating in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress." No one objected to this, in fact most of us thought it better, even I who had been responsible for the earlier words. Nehru returned to this theme in what was possibly the last and certainly the best statement of the Conference, when he outlined what he considered to be the purpose and value of the Commonwealth in the world; especially in its relation to nationalist movements in Asia.

At 12 o'clock we left Downing Street for the Palace where in one of the large rooms we paraded before the King and Attlee read our declaration ("I").† The King read a few well chosen words in reply, in which incidentally he mentioned the "British" Commonwealth of Nations and hinted that he hoped that there would not be too many more republics in the Commonwealth. However he gave our work his blessing and seemed genuinely happy about what we had done. Afterwards we all joined him in a glass of sherry and some informal chat. Then quite satisfied at what we had done, we left the Palace. Nehru and Dr. Malan went off together in one car. I hope that there may be some symbolic significance in this, because unless these two Prime Ministers and their countries get along better together, the King will be Head of a somewhat disunited and disrupted Commonwealth.

During the afternoon I worked on a short broadcast which the BBC sent to Canada in time for the 10 o'clock news. Fortunately the release time here, 2 a.m., made it possible for the Prime Minister to read the Declaration in Ottawa that afternoon and for me to broadcast it over the 10 o'clock news ("J").† This meant that in the next morning's papers when the declaration was released here, there were reports from Ottawa about its reception there and reference to my broadcast. I have the feeling that some of the people here thought that I beat the gun. All I did of course was take advantage of our six hours differential.

Thursday, April 28th

The newspapers are of course, full of our Declaration which is generally considered to be another milestone in Commonwealth development. We have been given a good press.

Saturday, April 30th

Looking back, it was certainly an interesting, and, I think, a momentous conference. We have avoided a break in the Commonwealth which might have been the beginning of its end, and we certainly have established a new basis which may be the beginning of something very important and far reaching.

So far as I was concerned, my part was easy to play. Once we decided in Ottawa to support the inclusion of a Republican India in the Commonwealth, and once India accepted the Crown as the symbol of that association, all that I had to do was to help with suggestions to meet the difficulties raised by Pakistan, South Africa and the "down under" countries. In the actual drafting of the final document, I was lucky enough to be able to work with Cripps, Brook and Liesching during the hour and a half Monday evening when the real job was done.

Finally, no delegate had as advisors two people who knew more about the problem or how best to seek a solution for it than John Kearney and Bert MacKay. I was certainly lucky here.

So begins the new "Commonwealth of Nations": British Empire, to British Commonwealth, to Commonwealth-Emperor, to King, to Head.

In saying goodbye to the King yesterday at Buckingham Palace I said that I was happy to convey to him my respectful good wishes as King of Canada and to add to that title his new one "Head of the Commonwealth". He did not seem to be unduly disturbed; indeed he seemed pleased by the new arrangements, but hinted again that he hoped there wouldn't be too many Republican stars in his Crown! He had little patience with Menzies' speech in Australia objecting to our report and was somewhat sad that Smuts should have taken the same line.³⁰ On the other hand, he was pleased at the constructive and helpful speech of Churchill's.

Memorandum by Head, Commonwealth Division

[London, April 20, 1949]

INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH—ALTERNATIVE LINKS

There appear to be two alternative line of approach to the problem:

A. India may be prepared to accept some modified link with the Crown; or

B. India may not accept any continued link with the Crown, in which case some new basis for membership must be found.

2. It may be observed that whatever arrangement is worked out for India is likely to be followed by Pakistan and Ceylon. There are also other prospective members of the Commonwealth—Malay, the B.W.I. (if they federate), Southern Rhodesia, even Burma might ask for re-admission.

A. Possible Links with the Crown

3. Before discussing possible alternatives it will be useful to note that the basic theory of India's draft constitution is directly contrary to that of present Dominion constitutions. All Dominion constitutions (including the Independence of India Act under which India and Pakistan are still governed) are based on statutes of the United Kingdom Parliament, although to a considerable extent these statutes incorporate constituent powers springing originally from prerogative instruments. All present Dominion constitutions vest executive authority in the King or in his representative, the Governor General. In all Dominions, allegiance of the subject to the Sovereign follows from the fact that the King is in theory the head of the State.

4. The draft Indian constitution on the other hand declares that it emanates from the people ("We, the people of India...do hereby adopt, enact and give ourselves this constitution"). It further declares that executive authority is vested in the President. By inference the citizen owes allegiance only to India. The historic link with the Crown which had been preserved in all other Dominion constitutions will thereby be severed if and when the draft constitution becomes effective.

5. It would seem unrealistic to expect the Indian Government at this date to attempt to reverse the course of events and to re-incorporate into the constitution the institution of the Crown. If the Crown cannot be re-incorporated into the constitution it is difficult to see how the concept of the allegiance of the subject could be re-incorporated.

³⁰ R.G. Menzies et J.C. Smuts, respectivement, chefs de l'Opposition en Australie et en Afrique du Sud.

R.G. Menzies and J.C. Smuts, Leaders of the Opposition in Australia and South Africa, respectively.

6. It is possible however that a distinction might be made between the person of the King and the institution of the Crown and that India might be prepared to accept the King as a visible symbol of Commonwealth association. Even this course would appear to require amendment of the draft constitution since the constitution makes no reference whatever to the King and indeed forbids the granting of titles of any sort.

7. If India were however prepared to follow this course it is suggested that it would be quite in keeping with the realities of the present situation in the Commonwealth, even if it marked a break in legal tradition, since in fact if not in form, the Commonwealth now appears to have reached the stage of personal union, that is an association of states whose only formal link is a common monarch. It has not been unusual in such cases for the monarch to have different titles in his different dominions (e.g. George I was King of England and Elector of Hanover) and/or to have a single title covering all dominions (e.g. Holy Roman Emperor).

8. Three possibilities, each involving a change in the royal style and title might be considered:

(a) The King might by mutual agreement be given some title symbolic of his headship for the Commonwealth as a whole (e.g. Titular Head of the Commonwealth, Honourary (or Royal) Patron of the Commonwealth). The necessary legislation might be passed by the United Kingdom Parliament after consultation with other Commonwealth Governments as contemplated in the Statute of Westminster. (As noted, however, some change in the present draft of India's constitution might be necessary.)

(b) It might be further provided that each member state of the Commonwealth could add to the general title, after consultation with the King, a title appropriate to that member state (e.g. Canada might want to add "King of Canada".)

(c) It might not be necessary to provide a special title indicating headship of the Commonwealth, but instead it might be left to each Commonwealth nation to provide for the title in relation to itself in consultation with the King.

B. Arrangements if no link with the Crown

9. If India is not prepared to accept some link with the Crown it is evident that Governments of the older members of the Commonwealth would as yet be reluctant to embark on a new formula applicable to their nations as well as to India. It is to be hoped however that India would accept a special formula for the present covering India alone, but possibly in general terms so that it could be extended to cover other members should they so desire. No attempt is made here therefore, to work out a new formula of association applicable generally and immediately to all Commonwealth nations.

10. It is suggested that India's case might be met by reciprocal Declarations—on India's side indicating the intention to remain in the Commonwealth, and on the part of other Governments, formal recognition of India's continued membership. Such declarations however, would presumably have to stress equality between members whether they are members by virtue of allegiance to the Crown or by virtue of declaration and recognition. It is also suggested that Declarations might put forward historical continuity as a ground for membership. Such a ground might be a defence of continuation of "Imperial" preferences and of some elements of common citizenship.

11. It is not thought that recognition of membership by Declaration would involve any substantial changes in the law insofar as members other than India are concerned. The Statute of Westminster does not apply to India; legislative sovereignty has passed instead to India by the Independence of India Act. Although the Crown is as yet a part of India's constitution, it could presumably be barred by adoption of the new constitution without requiring any action by the United Kingdom Parliament, or any alteration in the Royal Style and Title, the necessary alteration having already been made. It is probable that the Citizenship Acts of the various members of the Commonwealth would however require amendment if it is desired to continue common citizenship for India since the status of British subject or Commonwealth citizenship appears to rest on personal allegiance of the subject.

12. It is possible that India will put forward common citizenship as a link (as suggested in Mr. Nehru's "Ten Points" of last October). This would seem to be a dangerous ground so far as Canada is concerned, and almost inevitably it would lead to the question of immigration. South Africa and Australia would probably have strong views on this point and if the proposal is put forward by India we might leave them to carry the ball.

Note au le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[London], April 21, 1949

I think it can be fairly assumed that India is prepared to recognize the King as "Symbol of Unity of the Commonwealth" or to accept some similar description of His Majesty. I believe that the phrase might be enlarged not to a considerable extent but to some extent.

With regard to the most desirable procedure to give effect to India's willingness to give some recognition to the King, I think the simplest means is by an amendment to the Royal Style and Titles of His Majesty, which can be done by Royal Proclamation, provided it is with the consent of the member nations of the Commonwealth. An obvious advantage of the above procedure is that insofar as India is concerned, it would require no amendment to the Indian constitution, and it would be in keeping with well established precedent. The proposed amendment to the Royal Style and Titles should, I think, if possible eliminate the idea of having a locally variable title for His Majesty because this would necessitate each legislature of the Commonwealth nations passing an act or of causing a Royal Proclamation to be issued and this in turn would undoubtedly beget considerable debate and delay. I think it is also desirable that the revision of the Royal Style and Titles should be sufficiently comprehensive to limit to a minimum the necessity of a joint Declaration by the members of the Commonwealth.

I do think however, that any revision of the Royal Style and Titles would have to be supplemented by some joint Declaration, but I think this could be limited to a joint Declaration naming the nations that are to be members of the Commonwealth. As an addendum to such a joint Declaration a statement could be issued to the effect that those members of the Commonwealth wishing to establish reciprocal citizenship should do so on such bilateral or multilateral basis as might be justified in the circumstances.

With the above considerations in mind, the following is a draft of a proposed revision of the Royal Style and Titles which might be made by Royal Proclamation in the United Kingdom:

George VI by the Grace of God, King of,

The United Kingdom (Northern Ireland) and the British Colonies beyond the Seas.

(each) of the Commonwealth nations owing him allegiance.

and Titular Head and/or Regal (Royal) Patron of the Commonwealth and symbol of unity among all members thereof.

As you will note, the foregoing contains alternatives but I think it comprises such suggestions as have so far been made as would have a good chance of obtaining India's approval.

You will notice that I have inserted the words "Northern Ireland" replacing the word "Ireland" which prevails in the existing Royal Style and Titles. From a note which I see in Dr. MacKay's file it seems to me that the United Kingdom have abandoned the idea of substituting the words "Northern Ireland" for Ireland, but whether they intend to retain or eliminate "Ireland" from the King's Title I do not know. You will also observe that I have substituted for the words "British Dominions beyond the Seas" the phrase "British Colonies Beyond the Seas". One significant thing about this change is that the Commonwealth might henceforth be called the "Commonwealth of Nations" instead of "British Commonwealth of Nations". I have eliminated from the King's title "Defender of the Faith" because with India in the Commonwealth such a title would appear incongruous. In addition, from a historical point of view the title of Defender of the Faith seems to be, to say the least, obsolete. I believe it is a title conferred on Henry VIII by the then Pope of Rome. Since that time as you know, the Church of England has been established as the State Church of Great Britain, and the title conferred on the King by the Pope of Rome would appear to be obsolete. If, for sentimental or other reasons, it is thought that the title "Defender of the Faith" should be retained, I am inclined to believe that the Government of India would take no objection to it, and in support of this it can be said that when the title of Emperor of India was eliminated, the Indian Government did not raise the question of the propriety of the title "Defender of the Faith".

I believe that under the foregoing revision, the King might appropriately be henceforth called the King of Canada, though these words are not specifically used in the proposed revision. I think this would be true even if the word "each" were omitted, though the latter word would add further justification. The word "each" appears to me to have an added significance because thereby the King's relationship with Canada and the other nations of the Commonwealth is put on a personal rather than on a common basis, and this derogation might of course be subject to query.

If you regard the above suggestions as desirable I would like to discuss with you the advisability, if possible, of such a proposal being made by the Indian Delegation itself, or possibly by some Delegation other than our own.

TELEGRAM 824

London, April 21, 1949

TOP SECRET

Following from Pearson, Begins: I arrived Monday afternoon after an uneventful journey, and on Tuesday discussed the forthcoming meetings at luncheon with Sir Norman Brook and at dinner with the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations. On Wednesday morning I had a talk with Mr. Attlee at 10 Downing Street on the questions which are to be considered. I found that the views of the United Kingdom were substantially those which had already been conveyed to us by Sir Norman Brook, and that there was a strong disposition on the part of the Government here to do everything possible to keep India in the Commonwealth. Mr. Attlee has no illusions about the difficulties in persuading the Indians to accept the King in any other form than that of a symbol of the Commonwealth association, but he thinks that this might suffice, through a declaration and a consequential alteration in the King's title to include some such phrase as "Head of the Commonwealth". Mr. Attlee was somewhat worried about the possible attitude of South Africa and New Zealand as well as the difficulty in preserving the present position constitutionally in Pakistan and Ceylon if India became a Republic inside the Commonwealth.

2. This morning there was a social gathering at 10 Downing Street and a luncheon at Buckingham Palace at which no business was discussed but which served to create a very friendly atmosphere. It was agreed that there should be no general meeting today so that delegations could become acquainted with each other and ascertain each others' views. For this purpose I had a meeting with Dr. Malan earlier this afternoon and found him not unreceptive to the idea of India remaining in the Commonwealth as a Republic and with recognition of the King as Head of the Commonwealth. Dr. Malan was inclined to be cautious in expressing his views but indicated that he did not approve of the recent statement of Smuts that there could be no place in the Commonwealth for any country which did not fully accept the Monarchy.

3. I have just returned from a meeting with Nehru and Bajpai at which Mr. Kearney was also present. Nehru was quite firm that there could be no membership for India in the Commonwealth except on the basis of her Republican constitution but if that basis were accepted then India desired to continue the present association. I pointed out to him that we in our turn did not desire in Canada to alter in any way our present connection with the Crown which met our needs and our wishes, but that we recognized that India's position in this regard was different. Nehru said that there was a good deal of opposition in India to any form of Commonwealth association but that he appreciated its advantages and he also appreciated the position of the Crown as a symbol of such association. He has seen Mr. Attlee earlier in the afternoon and had left with him a paper which gave the Indian position. He was good enough to let me have a copy of this paper which I think on the whole establishes a satisfactory basis for discussion and possible agreement. Its text is in my immediately following telegram. It will be put forward by Nehru at a general meeting tomorrow morning but will not be circulated at this stage. I hope therefore that it can be considered as highly secret because Mr. Attlee and I are the only persons who have seen it. I shall hope to send you further comments on it tomorrow. Ends.

Following from Pearson, Begins: Reference my immediately preceding telegram, the following is the paper which Mr. Nehru gave to Mr. Kearney and myself this afternoon, Begins:

“Notes on points of agreement

A.(1) Under its new constitution, which is now before the Constituent Assembly, India will become a sovereign Republic. An elected President will be the Head of the Republic.

(2) India wishes to continue to be freely associated in the Commonwealth after she becomes a Republic. On the assumption that this desire is shared by other members of the Commonwealth, the change in India's constitutional status and structure requires a restatement of the basis of the association.

(3) The following are suggested as essentials of Commonwealth relationship:

(a) Reaffirmation by each of the Commonwealth States of its continued membership of the Commonwealth as sovereign States freely associated with one another.

(b) Continued acceptance of the status of the King as the symbol of this free association.

(c) A Commonwealth citizenship.

(4) The Commonwealth shall be known as the Commonwealth of Free Nations.

B.(1) So far as the United Kingdom is concerned Commonwealth citizenship has been established by the British Nationality Act. Each of the remaining members of the free association shall similarly establish Commonwealth citizenship on the lines of Sub-Section (11) of Section 1 of this Act.

(2) The President of the Republic is the Head of the State in India. The King's status vis-a-vis India arises from the free association of which the King is the symbol and appertains to that association alone." Ends. Message ends.

COMMENT ON INDIAN PROPOSALS

Moderate as are the Indian proposals they appear to raise the following difficulties from the Canadian standpoint.

(a) They contemplate a re-statement of the basis of Commonwealth association.

It is suggested that this should be avoided and that an effort should be made to meet India's position by an ad hoc statement, or by a statement which although specifically relating to India might have general application.

(b) The statement suggests that a Commonwealth citizenship is an essential element of the Commonwealth relationship.

The concept of British subject (or Commonwealth citizen as used in the United Kingdom Nationality Act) is based on personal allegiance of the subject to the Sovereign. This will disappear in the case of India. Commonwealth citizenship could no doubt be provided by all Commonwealth countries by statute, as India suggests, but to give it the content presently enjoyed under United Kingdom law would certainly raise very serious difficulties in other Commonwealth nations. Moreover, to stress Commonwealth citizenship as an essential element of the Commonwealth relationship might be the thin edge of the wedge for raising the whole question of immigration.

It may be that the Indian proposal is primarily for the purpose of permitting diplomatic protection of Indians abroad by other Commonwealth governments, as proposed in Mr. Nehru's "Ten Points" last October. This could however, be provided by other means as, for example, by agreement between Governments.

If India insists on the concept of Commonwealth citizenship it is suggested that an effort should be made to have it a desideratum rather than a requirement for Commonwealth relationship, and recognized on a reciprocal basis.

(c) The Indian proposals include a new title for the Commonwealth—"Commonwealth of Free Nations".

Obviously to change the title expressly would raise political difficulties in Canada. It would be much better to have any change in title come by usage rather than by public declaration.

2. India proposes the acceptance of the King as a symbol of free association between Commonwealth nations. Mr. St. Laurent's message to Mr. Nehru expressed the hope that India could retain some link with the Crown. The Indian proposals would permit a link with the King in person, though hardly with the Crown, but this is probably as far as they can be expected to go.

TELEGRAM 838

London, April 23, 1949

Following for Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins:

The Prime Ministers and I met at Downing Street this morning for two hours. I was accompanied by Mr. Kearney and Mr. MacKay. Mr. Attlee presided and after welcoming us and expressing his appreciation of the efforts we had made to attend, stated that the purpose of the meeting was to determine, if possible, whether and on what basis India, which was now committed to a Republican form of Government, could remain a member of the Commonwealth. Mr. Attlee stated he desired the meeting to be of an informal character and that no verbatim report of what was said would be recorded. He first called upon Mr. Nehru to state India's position towards the Commonwealth, and subsequently invited anybody else who cared to address the meeting, to do so.

2. Mr. Nehru thereupon said in substance but with some elaboration what was contained in my telegram No. 825. Following Mr. Nehru's remarks Mr. Attlee turned to me and asked if I would like to address the meeting. Being the only non-Premier representative present I said I would prefer to defer my remarks until the Prime Ministers present had spoken.

3. Mr. Attlee then called upon Mr. Chifley who indirectly approved of Mr. Nehru's suggestions provided some positive statement would be added thereto that insofar as Australia was concerned, the link of allegiance with the Crown was in no way to be diminished or weakened. Mr. Chifley later confirmed this position in a talk I had with him this afternoon.

4. Mr. Fraser then spoke at some length. In principle he supported Mr. Chifley's views, but stressed the fact that through thick and thin New Zealand and the United Kingdom could count on each other's support in any emergency. Mr. Fraser stated that in these turbulent times interdependence was more important than independence, and the mere assertion of independence was no guarantee that it would be respected. He characterized Mr. Nehru's suggestion as a valuable contribution towards solution, but made the suggestion that in addition to India recognizing the King as the symbol of Commonwealth unity they should recognize him as the Head of the Commonwealth. If this were done and a declaration were added to Mr. Nehru's statement supporting and reaffirming the link of allegiance in the case of the other members of the Commonwealth, he thought a satisfactory decision could be reached on the point at issue.

5. Dr. Malan spoke next. He read excerpts from a prepared statement and was the only Prime Minister to speak from notes. His remarks caused something of a sensation. He backed more strongly than any other delegate the continuation of India's connection with the Commonwealth notwithstanding its Republican Constitution. He also made a strong and clear statement of South Africa's intention to adhere to the Commonwealth, although in South Africa the link of allegiance to the King was not regarded as the only nor the strongest link which bound South Africa to the other members of the Commonwealth. He said he recognized and accepted India's commitment to become a Republic and he also accepted and welcomed India's declared wish to remain in the Commonwealth as a full member thereof. The Commonwealth, he said, had survived, because of its ability to adapt itself to changing circumstances and by the voluntary relaxation by the United Kingdom of what might otherwise have been regarded as fetters. He concluded by stating that the people of South Africa were conscious of the dangers ahead in the world situation, and that South Africa could not stand isolated and without friends, and that she was anxious that her ties with the Commonwealth should remain. At the conclusion of Dr. Malan's speech, Sir Stafford Cripps observed that it was a remarkable statement, and asked Dr. Malan if a copy of it would be available. Dr. Malan replied in the affirmative, and I hope over the weekend to procure and send you a copy of Dr. Malan's notes, which I think you will find most interesting.

6. The main feature of Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan's statement, which followed next, was a statement that Pakistan, which was guarding its own frontiers at this moment did not consider mere association within the Commonwealth enough. He desired a positive declaration on the part of the Commonwealth nations that they would come to the support of each other in the event of aggression. This remark was open to the interpretation that Pakistan feared aggression not only from U.S.S.R. or Afghanistan but possibly from India. He said everybody wants India in the Commonwealth, but he observed that if India is permitted to be a member and at the same time a Republic, consideration would have to be given to the other Republics not presently connected with the Commonwealth which would like to join it, and he suggested that the conference should give consideration to such eventuality. He remarked that Pakistan's long association with the United Kingdom, though sometimes bitter, nevertheless had the effect of binding his country to the United Kingdom. He concluded by remarking that until he saw Mr. Nehru's proposals in black and white he would have to reserve judgment on them.

7. Mr. Senanayake gave the United Kingdom great credit for the help which it gave to Ceylon in achieving its ambition of a full-fledged nation. Curiously enough Mr. Senanayake took the opposite view to Dr. Malan on the importance of allegiance to the Crown and he said that insofar as Ceylon was concerned it was probably the most important link of all. He said he was inclined to believe that if India were admitted as a republic it would have the effect of weakening rather than strengthening the bonds of the Commonwealth. He suggested no decision with regard to India's position should be taken now, but that India should carry on for the time being and allow more time for difficulties to iron themselves out.

8. I was last to speak. After expressing our regrets at the inability of our Prime Minister to attend the conference, I pointed out that in the past the Commonwealth had proved its adaptivity in meeting changing situations as they arose, and that I hoped it would be able to do so again. I observed that the Commonwealth was founded on freedom and equality. The question now before us was, did the freedom enjoyed by each member include its right to declare itself a Republic and remain within the family. I added that the nations of the Commonwealth also enjoyed full equality of status which meant that there should be no inner or outer circle of membership. Canada, I said was satisfied with the Crown and wished to maintain it, and it was important for us that no one should gain the impression from this conference that Canada's link with the Crown was being weakened or changed. This link reflected the history, sentiments and feelings of the member states and therefore it might vary in strength in the different countries. Heretofore it had been not only the source of common allegiance but also a symbol of the association of the nations which composed the Commonwealth. India although not wishing to be bound by allegiance, nevertheless desired to continue its close and friendly association with the rest of us and agreed to retain the Crown as the symbol of this association. The Canadian Government would welcome Mr. Nehru's statement to this effect because it hoped that India could remain in the Commonwealth. In the course of my remarks, I incidentally mentioned that I did not think that the question raised by Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan of if or how Republics not now connected with the Commonwealth might be admitted to it, was of sufficient immediate importance to be dealt with at this conference. Quite a few at the conference table nodded their assent. I concluded by saying that I was confident that this conference would be capable of finding a solution which would permit India to remain as a Commonwealth member.

9. Mr. Attlee then put to the conference the question of the next meeting. It was suggested that Mr. Attlee, in consultation with Mr. Nehru, would prepare a memorandum setting out Mr. Nehru's proposals and coordinating the views expressed by the various representatives, and circulate it as soon as possible among the Prime Ministers so that between now and Monday next they might use it for purposes of discussion and consultation. The next meeting of the conference was then set for Monday, the 25th, at 2.30 p.m.

10. It struck me as rather curious that the younger dominions, namely Pakistan and Ceylon, gave the least support to Mr. Nehru's suggestions and that South Africa with whom India is at loggerheads, should turn out to be its strongest supporter. From my private talks with Mr. Attlee, I know that the United Kingdom

Government is pleased with Mr. Nehru's attitude, and I believe that subject perhaps to some slight modification, the Prime Ministers of the older Commonwealth countries are prepared to agree to India remaining in the Commonwealth on the basis of Mr. Nehru's proposals. I am going to take the earliest opportunity to discuss with my colleagues from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, the implications of Commonwealth citizenship as one of the essentials of Commonwealth membership. As Mr. Wershof has given considerable study to the examination of Commonwealth citizenship, and I find he can be spared from Geneva for a few days, I have arranged for him to fly to London for immediate consultation. See my immediately following telegram. Ends.

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: Referring to my immediately preceding telegram the following is the memorandum from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Begins:

"I was asked to put forward, in the light of the views expressed at this morning's meeting and after further consultation with the Prime Minister of India, some specific proposals which might be taken as a basis for further discussion at our meeting on Monday next.

After discussion with Pandit Nehru I submit the following proposals for consideration.

2. The Government of India should make a declaration in the following terms: 'Whereas the new Constitution of India provides that India shall be a sovereign independent Republic, the Government of India hereby declare and affirm India's continuing membership of the Commonwealth of Nations, as now subsisting by the free will of its member peoples, and their acceptance of the King, Head of the Commonwealth, as the symbol of the free association of the independent member nations within the Commonwealth.'
3. The other Commonwealth Governments should, in reply to this, make a declaration on the same day in the following terms:—

'The Government of India having informed the other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations of the impending setting up of a sovereign independent Republic of India under the new Constitution to be adopted by the Indian people and of India's desire to continue as a member of the Commonwealth of Nations, and having made a solemn declaration of intention so to continue upon the conditions set forth in their declaration of today's date:

All the other members of the Commonwealth of Nations, being the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Pakistan, and Ceylon, do themselves severally and jointly proclaim and declare their continued membership of the Commonwealth of Nations wherein they are bound in unity by their common allegiance to the King, who is also the symbol of their free association, and do accept and recognize India's continuing membership of the Commonwealth of Nations in accordance with the terms of the declaration of today's date by the Government of India.'

4. The foregoing would be public declarations, to be promulgated by the respective Governments. In addition, the present meeting would be invited to place on record their agreement that the special status of Commonwealth countries inter se will be distinguished, by all Commonwealth countries, through:

(a) Legislation adopting the scheme of Commonwealth citizenship embodied in the British Nationality Act, 1948,

(b) Provisions in treaties and legislation making it clear that the other countries of the Commonwealth will not be treated as foreign countries or their citizens as foreigners. C[lement] R. A[tlee].” Ends.

2. I hope to send some comments later in the day. Message ends.

TELEGRAM 842

London, April 23, 1949

TOP SECRET

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: Referring to my telegram No. 838, paragraph 5, the following is the statement made by the Prime Minister of South Africa at the meeting on April 22nd, Begins:

“The question at issue is whether India after becoming a Republic shall be allowed to retain her membership of the Commonwealth, and consequently whether the existing Commonwealth basis shall be broadened accordingly. As this is obviously the main point for discussion and decision, other schemes for the continuance of friendly relations with an India outside the Commonwealth must necessarily be considered as alternatives of secondary importance.

In order to arrive at a well-founded and defensible conclusion it is first of all necessary to have a clear conception of all the facts, and more especially of India's standpoint; of the effect which her exit as a member will have on the rest of the Commonwealth; of the real content of the existing Commonwealth basis, and of the significance of the Crown as a necessary symbol and binding power of Commonwealth association.

As far as India's standpoint is concerned, we have every reason to accept as final her decision to become a Republic. The unanimity with which that decision was taken, as well as the subsequent public commitment of her leaders have made the step inevitable and irrevocable. At the same time we have also to accept as a fact India's expressed desire to remain within the Commonwealth on equal terms with the other independent nations, with which she has so far been associated.

The fact that this desire has been expressed and is actually being considered by this conference, is from various points of view certainly to be welcomed. It at any rate indicates an underlying unity and cohesiveness among the members of the Commonwealth in spite of diversity, which to the outside world must be as impressive as it probably is unexpected.

It must, I think, be obvious to every observer that in spite of the recent internal developments the cohesive power of the Commonwealth has been proved beyond all shadow of doubt. Eire has declared herself as a republic but at the same time she has shown herself to be regarded not as a foreign nation but as the intimate and exclusive associate, though outside the family-circle. What she would have done if she had been allowed to cross the doorstep, can only be conjectured. In the case of India the Commonwealth's cohesiveness has again been put to the test, and with the same result. Common allegiance to the Crown has thus definitely been shown not to be the only, and not even the strongest link, which binds the Commonwealth together.

I would be the last to minimise the importance of the Crown as a symbol of the Commonwealth association and as its binding link. It must, however, not be forgotten that the gradual relaxation of that particular bond is naturally concomitant with the growth of that consciousness among Commonwealth nations of their own separate nationhood, which has been such an outstanding feature in the history of their external relations during the last three or four decades. We must also not lose sight of the fact that however much the Crown is and can be a unifying power in the United Kingdom, where the King, besides being the head of the Commonwealth, is also the ever-present head of the state in close contact with his people, and that however much, though to a lesser extent, this may be the case in Commonwealth countries with a more or less uniform population of British descent, the position in other Commonwealth countries not so situated is, and must naturally be, different. South Africa is in this respect an example. In such countries national unity, which must be the principal aim of every nation, cannot be achieved by the accentuation of an external constitutional connection, which is apt to become a bone of contention between various sections, but rather by its elimination or at least by its attenuation. Such, I take it, have been the circumstances in Eire and in India and has been the underlying motive of their action. Looked at from this point of view the Crown does, under certain conditions, certainly serve as a useful and necessary link between members of the Commonwealth. In other circumstances, however, the allegiance which is demanded may tend to have the contrary effect.

The cohesiveness of the Commonwealth of which I have spoken, results from something obviously less tangible, but certainly more potent, than common allegiance to the Crown. It is partly due to tradition. To a greater extent it emanates from the consciousness of a common outlook and way of life, coupled with the sense of a community of interests, which covers a wide field. The most important source from which it springs is, however, to my mind, the Commonwealth's adaptiveness to changing circumstances, and her respect for freedom and liberty. Rigidity in her Constitution or the imposition of restrictions on the free development or the self-determination of her constituent members, would long ago have spelt her destruction. Her genius for adaptation has been and is undoubtedly the main cause of her survival. By willingly relaxing ties, which otherwise might have been felt as fetters, she has succeeded in capturing the spirit. A further step in the same direction by the broadening of the Commonwealth basis, can do her no harm, but will in my opinion ensure her continued existence, preserve her integrity, enhance her prestige and increase her usefulness and power in the world.

In conclusion, I wish to assure the conference that the people of South Africa are fully conscious of the seriousness of the world situation and of the dangers that lie ahead. All sections, with few exceptions, realize that South Africa cannot stand isolated, but must have friends and must find them generally, it is true, among the likeminded nations of the world, but more especially too in the inner circle of the free and independent nations of the Commonwealth. Within that Commonwealth she desires to remain as long as the Commonwealth herself remains true to her own spirit and basic principles, and can find room for her, whatever course her free development in future may take, within that inner circle of sister-nations, to which she now belongs. In such an association South Africa may ultimately find not only her international security and strength but also her complete national unity." End of statement. Message ends.

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: Referring to my telegram No. 839, I had a brief discussion with Liaquat Ali Khan this morning about the proposed statement. He is not at all satisfied with it and says that it would compel his Government to come out for a Republic almost immediately.

2. I also gather from Bajpai that the Indian delegation is not entirely satisfied. In any case it appears that the statement has not yet been approved by Nehru.

3. My own preliminary views are that the statement may serve as a basis for discussion but that both in form and content it needs substantial amendment. A double statement of the type proposed puts India on one side and the rest of the Commonwealth on the other, and I am inclined to think that a single statement agreed to by all Governments would be preferable. The implications of the words

“Head of the Commonwealth” as now proposed will, I think, also require careful consideration.

4. With regard to paragraph 4 (a) of the statement, if reference is made to Commonwealth citizenship, I feel that it should be carefully restricted to refer only to Section 1 of the British Nationality Act which provides that the term Commonwealth citizen shall mean the same as British subject. It might also be desirable to re-affirm the right of each Commonwealth nation to decide on the content of the term Commonwealth citizen insofar as it is concerned, and to have exclusive control over its immigration.

5. We shall probably have some discussions with other delegations over the weekend. Ends.

London, April 25, 1949

TOP SECRET

Following from MacKay, Begins:

At meeting at Downing Street this afternoon the United Kingdom Government came forward with new draft declaration which is an attempt to meet points of view expressed to them in bilateral conversation. The new draft reads as follows:

“The Government of India have informed the other Governments of the British Commonwealth of Nations that India will shortly become a Sovereign Independent Republic under the new constitution to be adopted by the Indian people. At the same time they have declared and affirmed India's desire to continue her membership of the Commonwealth and her recognition of the King, Head of the Commonwealth, as the symbol of the free association of the independent member nations within the Commonwealth.

The other members of the Commonwealth, while making no change in the existing basis of their relations with one another and with the Crown, accept the declaration of the Government of India as the basis of India's continuing membership of the Commonwealth.”

2. Chifley and Fraser criticized this draft on the grounds that it did not state strongly enough that there was no change in relationship to the Crown on the part of other members. Malan disliked “Head of the Commonwealth” since it might be deemed to imply existence of a super-state. He said he would have preferred India to retain allegiance to the Crown since the Crown could be interpreted as one or several. So far as South Africa was concerned, the Crown must be deemed several. Nehru was inclined to agree with Malan's objection to the term “Head of the Commonwealth” because a super-state might be thereby inferred, and he considered that it should be made clear that this was not so. Nehru also expressed a preference for a single declaration by all members of the Commonwealth. Mr. Pearson suggested that it would be preferable to drop the term Head of the Commonwealth or indicate that the King is the symbol of free association and as such Head of the Commonwealth, but neither proposal was very favourably received.

3. At this point Senanayake intervened to say that while he could accept the first paragraph of the new statement he did not feel he could accept the second. He argued strongly for a simple statement accepting India's changed membership, and against including any statement that would indicate that other members wanted no change. He said that if such a statement were included he would be put in a very difficult position since it could be alleged that Ceylon would have less rights than India.

4. Liaquat Ali Khan and Zafrulla Khan supported Senanayake. They asked whether in the event of any other member of the Commonwealth wishing to adopt a Republican Constitution it must come back and ask for the consent of all the others. Chifley, Fraser and Cripps were disposed to answer affirmatively, saying that India's case should be regarded as an exception. Senanayake asked whether this was on the grounds of India's importance. Cripps replied that he could not imagine any Prime Ministers' conference refusing any other member the right, but thought that it should be a matter for discussion.

5. Chifley, Nehru and Senanayake all produced alternative drafts. Mr. Pearson had one in reserve but did not produce it.

6. After agreeing that the Chairman might produce a new draft in the light of discussions, the meeting adjourned at 5 p.m. to reassemble at 9 p.m. Mr. Pearson was asked by Mr. Attlee to assist in the drafting.

7. At the conclusion of the meeting Kearney had a conversation with Zafrulla Khan. The latter declared that Pakistan did not intend to accept Mr. Attlee's original draft declaration nor the subsequent redraft because Pakistan would refuse to declare that they intended to continue allegiance to the King, and that if necessary he would propose an amendment to the effect that Pakistan was in the course of preparing a new Constitution, and that Pakistan agreed to India remaining in the Commonwealth notwithstanding the latter's Republican Constitution. He did not however go so far as to say that he would inform the meeting that Pakistan would adopt a Republican Constitution similar to that of India.

8. A feature of the discussion which impressed an on-looker was Nehru's amenability. He seemed disposed to agree to any draft which recognized India's membership in the Commonwealth notwithstanding a Republican Constitution.

9. If any definite draft results from tonight's meeting we shall send it forward as early as possible in the morning. Ends.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS; LONDON MEETING

1. The Prime Minister read the latest draft statement which had been substantially agreed by the London meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers and representatives.

The Prime Minister of South Africa did not favour the words "head of the Commonwealth" to describe the King, whereas both the Australian and New Zealand

Prime Ministers felt that the maintenance of the King as head was essential to the viability of the Commonwealth.

The Prime Minister of Pakistan had suggested that the sentence, "The Governments of the other countries of the Commonwealth, the basis of whose membership is not hereby changed,..." be amended to read, "The Governments of the other countries of the Commonwealth, the basis of whose relationship is not hereby changed,..." The amendment proposed by Pakistan did not seem one of substance.

It was understood that, in addition to the public statement, there would be an unpublished agreed statement relating to Commonwealth citizenship. Under the British Nationality Act, "Commonwealth citizenship" and "British subject" had, in effect, the same meaning.

It was further understood that present Commonwealth tariff arrangements would not be affected by the results of the London meeting.

Pakistan had requested assurance that it would get similar treatment to that presently being accorded India in the eventuality of a republican constitution being established in Pakistan.

2. Mr. St. Laurent suggested that the draft statement might be improved by the deletion of the word "however" from the first line of the third paragraph.

3. Mr. St. Laurent further reported that Sir Stafford Cripps had said that he would welcome the opportunity to discuss economic matters of mutual concern to the United Kingdom and Canada with Mr. Howe during the latter's stay in London.

4. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he would arrange to see both Sir Stafford Cripps and Mr. Pearson.

5. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the reports by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be notified immediately of the government's concurrence in the following draft statement being made jointly by the various Commonwealth Governments:

"The Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, whose countries are united as members of the Commonwealth of Nations and owe a common allegiance to the Crown which is also the symbol of their free association, have considered the impending constitutional changes in India.

The Government of India have informed the other Governments of the Commonwealth of the intention of the Indian people that under the new constitution which is about to be adopted, India shall become a sovereign, independent republic.

The Government of India have, however, declared and affirmed India's desire to continue her full membership in the Commonwealth and her acceptance of the King as the symbol of the free association of independent nations and, thus, the head of the Commonwealth.

The Governments of the other countries of the Commonwealth, the basis of whose membership is not hereby changed, accept and recognize India's continuing membership in accordance with the terms of this declaration.

Accordingly, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon hereby declare that they remain united as free and independent members of the Commonwealth of Nations, freely co-operating in the pursuit of peace, liberty, and progress."

Assuming Daylight Saving Time is in effect in Ottawa, this will, of course, be 9 p.m. Wednesday evening. The release time has been agreed by representatives of all Commonwealth countries and it is important that there should be no, repeat no, leak before that time.

Text of communique begins:

During the past week the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan, and Ceylon, and the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs have met in London to exchange views upon the important constitutional issues arising from India's decision to adopt a republican form of constitution and her desire to continue her membership of the Commonwealth.

The discussions have been concerned with the effects of such a development upon the existing structure of the Commonwealth and the constitutional relations between its members. They have been conducted in an atmosphere of goodwill and mutual understanding, and have had as their historical background the traditional capacity of the Commonwealth to strengthen its unity of purpose, while adapting its organization and procedures to changing circumstances.

After full discussion the representatives of the Governments of all the Commonwealth countries have agreed that the conclusions reached should be placed on record in the following declaration:

"The Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, whose countries are united as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations and owe a common allegiance to the Crown, which is also the symbol of their free association, have considered the impending constitutional changes in India.

The Government of India have informed the other Governments of the Commonwealth of the intention of the Indian people that under the new constitution which is about to be adopted India shall become a sovereign independent Republic. The Government of India have however declared and affirmed India's desire to continue her full membership of the Commonwealth of Nations and her acceptance of the King as the symbol of the free association of its independent member nations and as such the Head of the Commonwealth.

The Governments of the other countries of the Commonwealth, the basis of whose membership of the Commonwealth is not hereby changed, accept and recognize India's continuing membership in accordance with the terms of this Declaration.

Accordingly, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon hereby declare that they remain united as free and equal members of the Commonwealth of Nations, freely co-operating in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress."

These constitutional questions have been the sole subject of discussion at the full meetings of Prime Ministers. Ends.

He thought the Prime Minister might wish to make a statement on the meetings in Parliament this evening.³¹ If so, the statement should not, repeat not, be made before 9 o'clock Ottawa DST.

Commonwealth meetings.

At the closing session of April 27th there was a brief discussion on the King's title. The United Kingdom brought forward for purposes of discussion a memorandum† along the lines of the Canadian Government's previous suggestion that there should be a local variable in the title. For example the title for Canada would read:

"George the Sixth (by the Grace of God) King of Canada and of his other Realms and Territories, Head of the Commonwealth, (Defender of the Faith)."

2. These proposals met with general acceptance except from the Prime Minister of New Zealand who felt that the present title was satisfactory, and that change might give rise to political difficulties. New Zealand would no doubt acquiesce in the proposed change.

3. No conclusion was reached by the meeting, the matter being left for further discussion, presumably by correspondence. It was felt that there was no great urgency about the change especially since it might be presumed that the action taken by Ireland had to all intents and purposes extinguished the title as far as Ireland is concerned.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 27th, reported briefly on the recent conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

From Canada's standpoint, the problem had been solved when India indicated willingness to accept the King as the symbol of Commonwealth association. Some divergence of view had been observed between Australia and New Zealand on the one hand, who suggested that India be regarded as a special case, and Pakistan and Ceylon on the other, who wanted principles to be established which would apply to them. It was not unlikely that in due course Pakistan and Ceylon would wish to become republics.

The question of Commonwealth citizenship had been raised but had not been pursued. Some discussion had taken place as to the method of presentation to the King of the conclusions that had emerged from the conference, some holding the view that this was an occasion for submission of collective advice. This view had not prevailed and the Chairman had simply read to the King the text of the declaration and the King had made a speech in reply.

4. Mr. Pearson, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 7th, mentioned that, near the conclusion of the conference, the question of a change in the Royal Style and Titles had been raised.

The U.K. Prime Minister had put forward the suggestion originally made by the Canadian government, the effect of which would be to use separate titles for different countries of the Commonwealth. The title suggested for Canada would be along the following lines:

"George the Sixth, King of Canada and of His other Realms and Territories, Head of the Commonwealth"

No conclusion had been reached on this matter but the various Prime Ministers had undertaken to consider it and offer their views.

(Telegram No. 894, Canadian High Commissioner to the U.K. to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Apr. 28, 1949).

5. Mr. Pearson, in reply to an enquiry from the Minister of National Defence, added that there had been no discussion on the conclusions about Commonwealth consultation reached at the Prime Ministers' conference of October, 1948. It was unlikely that these questions would be revived in the near future.

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the recent conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers regarding constitutional changes in the Commonwealth and the suggested change in the Royal Style and Titles.

RE: COMMONWEALTH MEETINGS—POSITION OF SOUTH AFRICA

Dear Mr. Heeney,

It will be recalled that Dr. Malan made a rather remarkable statement regarding South Africa's position in the Commonwealth at the opening meeting. A copy of the statement was forwarded in telegram No. 842 of April 23rd.

This statement was generally assumed by the meeting to be a strong statement in favour of India remaining in the Commonwealth despite the adoption of a republican constitution. This at least was the impression of the Canadian Delegation, as indicated in Mr. Pearson's telegram to the Prime Minister, No. 838 of April 22nd, paragraph 5. This impression perhaps needs to be qualified for the purpose of the record.

Before the first meeting, Mr. Pearson saw Dr. Malan, and I think also Mr. Forsyth, Secretary for External Affairs. Mr. Pearson subsequently reported to Mr. Kearney and me that he had gathered the impression that South Africa was not very enthusiastic about India remaining in the Commonwealth. We were therefore somewhat surprised by Dr. Malan's statement at the first meeting and perhaps interpreted it as a real change of heart.

Before the second formal meeting I had an hour or so with Mr. Forsyth in which we discussed the first draft statement which had been circulated by the United Kingdom authorities. Like us, the South African Delegation found this statement quite unsatisfactory, but for different reasons. Mr. Forsyth appeared to see no objection to placing India in a separate category if it remained within the Commonwealth. On the other hand, he said quite frankly, "as one official to another" that he foresaw serious difficulties if India were to remain. In this connection he mentioned particularly the large Indian population in South Africa and he also intimated that at best India would be a very uncertain partner in the event of any serious world crisis. He said quite frankly that Dr. Malan's statement had been made for "tactical reasons." He said that South Africa was reasonably content with the present settlement with regard to its relations with the Commonwealth, and that obviously in the present world crisis they had to associate themselves with Commonwealth countries and the United States. He said further, that they were not prepared to share all defence information with India. He implied however that South Africa could not take the responsibility for excluding India. He said that he had suggested to Dr.

Malan that he raise in the meeting, (1) what India meant by accepting the King but not the Crown (Dr. Malan did raise this question, but in a general way and not in a direct question addressed to Mr. Nehru) and (2) what advantage India saw in continuing as a member of the Commonwealth. As I recall it, Mr. Fraser raised the second question, rather than Dr. Malan. Mr. Nehru replied quite frankly that he hoped to be able to influence British policy in Asia, which he regarded as not entirely satisfactory.

A careful reading of Dr. Malan's statement would seem to indicate that it is not inconsistent with the views expressed by Mr. Forsyth, or with the interpretation that it was a "tactical" move. The statement accepts that India's decision to be a republic is irrevocable and notes that Ireland having made a similar decision had found it necessary to leave the Commonwealth although continuing a special relationship with its members. While noting that the Crown has been "a useful and necessary link" it points out that it has not always been a unifying factor internally. (In the discussions Dr. Malan stressed on several occasions that the Crown was divisible, and implied that so far as this was recognized the Crown, as a link, was quite acceptable to South Africa.) On the other hand the statement notes that the cohesiveness of the Commonwealth "results from something obviously less tangible, but certainly more potent, than common allegiance to the Crown. It is partly due to tradition. To a greater extent it emanates from the consciousness of a common outlook and way of life, coupled with the sense of a community of interests, which covers a wide field." The statement emphasizes the Commonwealth's adaptiveness to changing circumstances, but concludes with an affirmation of South Africa's intention to continue. It may be noted that nowhere does it urge continuance of India as an equal member, or even as a member at all.

Whether Dr. Malan was out-manoeuvred; or whether he was satisfied with Nehru's explanation of India's reasons for remaining and the Agreed Minute that the King, as Head of the Commonwealth, has no constitutional functions, and that on these grounds there was no harm in India continuing as a member; or whether he was caught between the dilemma of resting on the status quo and at the same time keeping the door open for a republican constitution for South Africa, I am not able to say. This letter may however serve as a footnote to the proceedings of the meetings.

Yours sincerely,
R.A. MACKAY

DESPATCH 109

Ottawa, May 16, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 303 of April 23[†] which analyzed the press reactions to the decision of Dr. Malan to attend the recent meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. The views which you quoted and your interpretation of them have been found interesting and helpful in understanding the attitude of the present South African Government to the relationship of South Africa with the Commonwealth. Copies of your despatch are being sent to all our missions in Commonwealth countries and it is being circulated in the Department.

2. I think you are aware that Dr. Malan made a remarkable contribution to the meeting in London. At the first full meeting on April 22, he read a prepared statement in which he gave strong support to the continuation of India's connection with the Commonwealth, notwithstanding its proposed adoption of a republican constitution. His statement was, at the suggestion of Sir Stafford Cripps, made available to those attending the meeting and I am enclosing a copy of it for your confidential information. It would seem inadvisable for you to let it be known that the text has reached you. In my B.B.C. broadcast speech on the evening of April 27, a copy of which was sent to you with my despatch No. 127 of May 5,[†] I mentioned that Dr. Malan's wise counsel was of great assistance in reaching the conclusions of the meeting.

3. As you are also aware, from my despatch under reference, Dr. Malan had a minute agreed to on the meaning of the term "Head of the Commonwealth". He disliked this term because it might be deemed to imply the existence of a super-state. It has been noted in a Reuters press report from Cape Town of May 11 that "Dr. Malan disclosed that it was at his request that the London conference adopted the resolution stating that the position of the King as Head of the Commonwealth did not imply a change in the rights of its members." We do not know from this whether the agreed minute, which it had not been intended to publish, has in fact been released in South Africa. It appears rather that its general nature has become known there, but we would be interested to learn whether the text of it was made generally available.

In the same news item, Dr. Malan said that, while South Africa is united in its wish to remain in the Commonwealth in any circumstances, he still believed that the South African people, both the English-speaking and the Afrikaans-speaking, would achieve their greatest unity under a republic within the Commonwealth. In the Times of London of May 7, he was also quoted as saying that the declaration of the London meeting would serve to bring the two sections in South Africa together. These remarks appear to lend support to the views expressed in your despatch, particularly paragraph 8, on Dr. Malan's position prior to the outcome of the London meeting.

5. I am enclosing a copy of Mr. MacKay's letter to Mr. Heeneey of May 4, in which Mr. MacKay expressed certain qualifications to what on the surface appeared to be enthusiastic South African support for India remaining in the Commonwealth.

I have, etc.

LONDON DECLARATION ON INDIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

It has been observed in the issue of April 30 of the Weekly Newsletter of the South African Information Office that the brief account on the declaration issued by the London meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers included this sentence:

"At the request of the Union's Prime Minister, Dr. D.F. Malan, the Conference declared that no change had been made in the constitutional relations between the members of the Commonwealth and that the King did not discharge any constitutional function by his Headship of the Commonwealth."

It is thus evident that the South Africans wasted no time in making use of the Minute agreed to at the London meeting at the request of Dr. Malan, which it had been decided not to publish. It was the understanding of the meeting that he could make use of this Minute if he thought it necessary to do so. It is perhaps significant of the internal political situation in South Africa that the Minute was substantially reproduced in a government publication in Pretoria immediately after the close of the Conference.

2. In a statement in the House of Assembly on May 11, Dr. Malan said that he felt it necessary at the Conference to make clear that the "Head of the Commonwealth" implied no formal constitutional function, or in other words, that it did not in any way suggest that the Commonwealth was or resembled a super-state. He added that he found, rather to his surprise, complete unanimity among the Prime Ministers on this point.

[Ottawa], November 16, 1949, 1949

COMMONWEALTH FOREIGN MINISTERS' CONFERENCE IN COLOMBO

The Prime Minister of Ceylon by circular telegrams to the Prime Ministers of the other Commonwealth countries (No. 375 of November 8 to Canada—copy attached)† proposed that a foreign affairs conference be held at Colombo, preferably from January 11 to 21, 1950. The telegram refers to the discussion on Commonwealth consultation at the October, 1948 meeting of Prime Ministers and states, "At that time I invited the Commonwealth Prime Ministers to hold the first of these meetings in Ceylon which you will recall received general approval at the time."

2. While Canadian Governmental policy has consistently been opposed to the development of Commonwealth consultation on a regular or formalized basis, and while Canada has a smaller interest than other Commonwealth countries in most of the problems which will probably be discussed in Colombo, it would appear advisable for Canada to be represented at ministerial level for the following reasons:

i. Canada's absence might be interpreted as a lack of interest in Commonwealth consultation and in Commonwealth ties. It might also be regarded as indicating an almost exclusive reliance on our relationship with the North Atlantic Treaty powers and above all with the United States.

ii. Canada's absence from the conference held in Ceylon might further be regarded as a slight by the three new Asian members of the Commonwealth and certainly as a lack of interest in the problems with which they are faced.

iii. Ceylon, being excluded from membership in the United Nations (by the Soviet vote veto and despite the best efforts of other Commonwealth members) presumably feels rather isolated and therefore sensitive.

iv. Although Canada has a lesser interest than other Commonwealth countries in such matters as: (a) the Communist menace in Asia, (b) general security problems in the Pacific, and (c) assistance in the economic development of the sub-continent of India,—all of which will undoubtedly be discussed at the conference—nevertheless Canada's interest in these matters is substantial.

v. South Africa's non-attendance due to alleged unavailability of a minister during parliamentary session might be interpreted in some quarters as the result, in part at least, of that government's racial policy and the difficulties over the treatment of Indians resident in South Africa. It would be most unfortunate if Canada were regarded as in any way connected with South Africa in this respect.

3. Agenda

The Prime Minister of Ceylon has asked for suggestions from the other Commonwealth Prime Ministers as to items to be put on the agenda but himself proposes that in addition to a general review of the international situation, including economic aspects, and the situation in Europe, discussion might take place on the Japanese Peace Treaty, the situation in China and any special problems of South East Asia which may be brought up. It is thought that it might be useful to have economic experts "to take stock of the general balance of payments position of the sterling area as a whole in the light of all that has happened since the Finance Ministers' meeting last July."

4. Replies from other Governments

i. United Kingdom—Mr. Attlee, who had been consulted in advance by the Prime Minister of Ceylon, has welcomed and accepted with pleasure the kind invitation, adding, "I earnestly trust that other Commonwealth Governments will equally find your proposals acceptable and that we may look forward to a fruitful meeting." Consideration is being given to the attendance of both Mr. Bevin and Mr. Noel-Baker.

ii. Australia—Dr. Evatt's telegram read in part, "As you will recall, I have always been strongly in favour of frequent meetings of Foreign Ministers of British Commonwealth countries." Canada House telegram No. 2198 of November 14† states, "Australia had, of course, 'jumped the gun' with what the Commonwealth Relations Office regard as Dr. Evatt's premature announcement of the conference and the Australian Government is understood here (in London) to be not only favourable to the proposal but anxious to convey the public impression that Australia is virtually assuming leadership of Commonwealth co-operation in this area." The Australians will be unable to name their delegates until after the national elections on December 10.

iii. New Zealand—Mr. Fraser has supported in principle the proposal for the conference and hopes to arrange for New Zealand representation at ministerial level. The election in New Zealand takes place at the end of November.

iv. India—Mr. Nehru has welcomed the idea of the conference and indicated his own intention of attending, but pointed out that in view of the inauguration of the republic on January 26, he would prefer that the conference end by January 11. This would mean that it would have to begin about January 1.

v. Pakistan—Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan welcomes the proposal and is consulting with Sir Zafrullah Khan at Lake Success concerning the suitability of the proposed dates.

vi. South Africa—Dr. Malan states that, "While feeling that there would no doubt be advantage in the conference you propose, we should unfortunately not find it possible to be represented at the appropriate level at any time during the first half of the next year" because of ministerial responsibilities in parliament which opens in the middle of January.

COLOMBO MEETING

The meeting of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers will be held at Colombo from January 9–14 with the possibility of the discussions being continued into the next week if necessary. While the agenda has not been definitely fixed and the Canadian Government has made no suggestions in this connection, it appears that it will be roughly divided into two parts dealing with political and economic questions respectively. The political section would be subdivided into (1) General review of the international situation, (2) Japanese Peace Treaty, (3) The situation in China, (4) Problems of South East Asia, particularly Viet-Nam and Burma.

2. In his message of invitation, the Prime Minister of Ceylon stated that, since it would not be possible to consider some of the political problems in isolation from relevant economic issues, he thought it would be advisable for each delegation to include one or two senior experts to discuss broad economic questions (not to include detailed questions of supply). The United Kingdom delegation is very heavily weighted on the economic side. The Prime Minister of Ceylon in a telegram of December 3 suggested that as Sir Henry Wilson-Smith (who has been chairman of the previous series of Commonwealth meetings on economic affairs and who took an active part in the tripartite discussions in Washington last September) will lead the "United Kingdom delegation to these economic meetings", he had "suggested to the United Kingdom that he should be invited to preside over the economic meetings at the forthcoming conference".

3. In view of this emphasis upon economic issues, it seems advisable that the Canadian delegation should include experts in this field. The Department of Trade and Commerce has agreed to nominate a representative and the Department of Finance is considering the matter.

4. As the decision had been taken to open the Office of the High Commissioner for Canada in Karachi during February, it seems advisable for reasons of economy to send the personnel of the office to Colombo; the High Commissioner would be an adviser and the Secretary of the Office would act as Secretary of the Delegation.

5. Enquiries were made concerning the relative cost of transportation on commercial airlines and by special plane. In view of the number of persons proposed for the delegation and the weight of supplies and personal effects required at the conference and by the members of the Karachi Office, it appeared that the commercial airlines cost would be the greater. It is therefore suggested that advantage be taken of the willingness of the Minister for National Defence to send an R.C.A.F. plane to Colombo on a training trip, of which half of the cost would be charged to the Department of External Affairs. The special plane could also be used at no extra cost to bring back to Canada officers of other missions due for transfer.

6. The following delegation is proposed:

- (1) Secretary of State for External Affairs
- (2) Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
- (3) D.M. Johnson, Canadian High Commissioner Designate to Pakistan
- (4) A.R. Menzies, Head of the Far Eastern Division
- (5) D.V. Lapan, Economic Division
- (6) Representative of Department of Trade and Commerce
- (7) Possibly a representative of the Department of Finance
- (8) G.S. Murray, Secretary of the Delegation
- (9) Clerical and stenographic personnel—4.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 6, 1949

Dear Mr. Pearson,

COLOMBO CONFERENCE

As you will no doubt have heard direct from Colombo, the Ceylon Government have invited Sir Henry Wilson-Smith to take the chair at the proposed meeting between officials for the exchange of information on economic matters at the forthcoming Conference in Ceylon. This invitation has been accepted and the United Kingdom Government have been considering, for their part, the most suitable form of agenda for the meeting. They suggest that the agenda might be as follows:—

- (1) Balance of Payments.
 - (a) Dollar balance of payments in 1949/50.
 - (b) Dollar balance of payments in 1950 (calendar year).
 - (c) Balance of payments with other hard currency areas (Belgium, Switzerland, Western Germany), 1949/50.
 - (d) Balance of payments with other hard currency areas (Belgium, Switzerland, Western Germany), 1950.
- (2) General balance of payments outlook (dollar and other) after 1950.

(3) Developments arising out of the Washington Conference of September, 1949.

(4) Other matters arising from the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in July, 1949.

(5) Any other business.

As regards item (1), it is being suggested to other Commonwealth Governments that this will involve the compilation of statistics showing the balance of payments of individual Commonwealth countries for the year 1949/50 and the calendar year 1950 with (a) the dollar area, and (b) separately for the three countries mentioned in item (1) (c) and (d). Sterling area Commonwealth Governments have already been asked to provide an up-to-date survey of their dollar balance of payments position for 1949/50 and 1950. It is hoped that they will similarly be ready with estimates of their balance of payments with the three non-dollar hard currency countries referred to above.

As regards item (2), it is not thought that any useful purpose would be served by attempting to compile detailed statistics for balance of payments after 1950, but it has been suggested that any figures illustrative of the general trend would be useful.

As regards items (3) and (4) of the agenda, it is suggested that these should be discussed on the basis of (a) the joint communiqué issued in Washington on the 12th September, and (b) the agreed recommendations of Commonwealth Finance Ministers to their Governments of the 18th July, 1949. The reason why the Washington communiqué has been put above the Finance Ministers' recommendations in the suggested draft agenda is that, as both cover so much of the same ground, it would seem appropriate that the main discussions should take place on the later document, leaving the earlier document to be used merely to ensure that subjects not dealt with at Washington are covered where appropriate.

Detailed questions of supply have been excluded from the agenda in accordance with the suggestion in paragraph 3 of the Ceylon Prime Minister's original telegram of the 8th November.

The United Kingdom Government would very much welcome the comments of the Canadian Government on the draft agenda outlined above and any suggestions or amendments which they would wish to put forward. In this connection I have been asked to suggest to you that, in order to save time, it would be very convenient if the Canadian Government's reply could be telegraphed direct to the United Kingdom Government, who have been charged with the duty of collating the agenda, and could be repeated to other Commonwealth Governments, including the Government of Southern Rhodesia.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

COMMONWEALTH FOREIGN MINISTERS; PROPOSED MEETING IN CEYLON; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 11th, reported on further developments in connection with the forthcoming meeting of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers in Ceylon.

It had been ascertained that the Foreign Ministers of other Commonwealth countries planned to attend. The tentative agenda included both political and economic questions. Probably the most important amongst the former was the question of recognizing the Communist government of China. In the economic discussions, it seemed probable that a further effort would be made to strengthen the position of the sterling area.

In these circumstances, it seemed desirable that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should head the Canadian delegation and that it should include representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance. The Minister of Fisheries who was scheduled to attend an I.L.O. Conference in the Far East might join the delegation if convenient.

An opportunity would be taken to visit Karachi and New Delhi en route.

It was suggested that an announcement of Canada's participation in the conference be made before Parliament rose.

11. The Minister of Finance felt that it would be undesirable for Canadian representatives to participate in discussions which were designed to restrict trade with dollar countries. Moreover, the time chosen was inconvenient to release a senior official from Finance. In the circumstances, perhaps his department need not be represented.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) agreed that Canada be represented at the forthcoming Conference of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers in Ceylon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; the composition of the delegation to be settled by the Minister in consultation with the Prime Minister and Ministers of other interested departments; and

(b) agreed that Canadian participation in the conference be announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at an appropriate time.

RE: CONFERENCE OF COMMONWEALTH FOREIGN MINISTERS, COLOMBO, CEYLON

Dear Mr. Heeney:

I have read your letter of November 26th on the above subject and also copy of the confidential letter dated December 6th, addressed by Sir Alexander Clutterbuck to your Minister, in regard to the collateral discussions on financial and economic matters to be held at the above conference under the chairmanship of Sir Henry Wilson Smith. I also had a chance of discussing the matter you raise about the conference with my Minister, Mr. Towers and some of my senior officials.

We do not think that Canada should send to the conference any financial expert from either this Department or the Bank of Canada. The subjects which will be discussed by Sir Henry Wilson-Smith's Committee will obviously be matters that are of interest to the sterling members of the Commonwealth and will relate primarily to methods of saving, or success already achieved in saving, dollars by restriction of imports from the dollar area. We should be observers at such discussions but we should not be implicated in any way in the programme being followed or the decisions reached.

We all here also believe that it would not be appropriate for us to present for discussion at this conference Canada's balance of payments although doubtless there will be occasion to discuss the statistical aspects of Canada's trade and financial relationships with the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area.

We understand that you plan to send Mr. D.V. LePan as your representative from your Economic Division. We agree he would be a highly suitable choice and believe that he will be quite capable of dealing with our side in respect of any financial and economic discussions that it would be appropriate for us to be involved in.

I think it would be desirable to insert a reservation in your formal acceptance of your invitation to the conference to the effect that we cannot join in and concur in any specific dollar saving programmes.

Yours sincerely,
W.C. CLARK

Ottawa, December 12, 1949

Thank you for your letter of the 8th of December concerning the conference of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers to be held next month in Colombo, Ceylon. I have told Mr. Pearson that you and Mr. Towers feel that it will not be necessary for experts either from the Department of Finance or from the Bank of Canada to be present at this conference. Mr. Pearson understands the reasons for this decision and is quite content with it. He appreciates that a large part of the financial discussions to be held concurrently with the meeting of Foreign Ministers will be concerned with the progress of efforts by sterling area countries to restrict their imports from the dollar area, and that Canada cannot be implicated in any way in that programme.

2. My Minister, however, would prefer not to make a reservation of the Canadian position with respect to financial matters in advance of the Conference. The caveat you suggest to the effect that Canada cannot join in, or concur in, any specific dollar-saving programme has been given formally on a number of previous occasions, notably by Mr. Abbott at the opening of the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers which was held in London last summer.

Mr. Pearson believes that our position would be sufficiently protected if Mr. LePan, at the outset of the financial discussions in Colombo, were to make a statement reemphasizing that Canada cannot in any way become involved in the sterling area's programme of restricting imports from dollar countries. I hope that you will agree with this alternative proposal for making our position clear on this matter.³²

³² Clark indiqua son accord dans une réponse en date du 15 décembre 1949.
Clark agreed to this in a reply dated December 15, 1949.

TELEGRAM 2476

London, December 22, 1949

M.E. Dening, Assistant Under Secretary in Foreign Office in charge of the three Far Eastern Departments, yesterday gave following outline of principal political questions to be discussed at Colombo Conference.

(I) General international situation

2. The principal purpose of this item, Dening explained, was to permit discussion of questions that might be raised with respect to recent developments in Europe, and particularly such matters as the North Atlantic Defence Organization, the Council of Europe, German policy, and the trend towards closer association of the United Kingdom with the countries of Western Europe. It was hoped to elicit the views particularly of the Asiatic Dominions, and also of new Australian and New Zealand representatives on these developments. In the Foreign Office view, United Kingdom policy in Western Europe can only be judged in the light of an assessment as to the degree to which the Soviet Union presents a real threat to European and world security. It may, therefore, be anticipated that there will be some discussion of Soviet intentions and policies.

3. In suggesting this review of European questions, Dening said it was hoped to meet some of the objections and criticisms which have been made by the Asiatic Dominions, and to a lesser extent by Australia and New Zealand as well. In the case of India, particularly, there was still, even after Mr. Nehru's recent visit, considerable distrust of United States "imperialism" and a consequent tendency to play down necessity for defensive measures against possible Soviet aggression. Dening thought that while Nehru's visit had been useful in giving him first hand picture of the complexities of the American scene, it had done little to modify his deep-rooted suspicion of the aims of United States policy. Nehru, he thought, was still not prepared to encourage United States investment on the scale which India required to build up her standard of living. It was to be hoped that at Colombo something could be done to educate him in the economic facts of life, and to encourage India to play a greater part in general economic and security measures calculated to resist Communist expansion in the Far East and in South East Asia.

4. So far as Pakistan is concerned, Dening referred to Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan's "flirtation" with the Russians, which had now come to a reasonably happy conclusion from a western point of view. The Soviet authorities, by their delay in granting the Pakistan Prime Minister a visa, had lost a first-class opportunity for successful propaganda.

5. So far as New Zealand and Australia are concerned, there had been a good deal of criticism of United Kingdom policy in working towards closer association with Europe, at the expense of the Commonwealth, and Dening hoped that at Colombo it would be possible to show that United Kingdom policies are not inconsistent with close Commonwealth relations. Dening seemed relieved at the fact that Dr. Evatt would not be at Colombo, and made repeated references to the difficulties he had had with him over the years.

6. Dening thought that in this discussion Canada could play a useful role, particularly in calming Indian fears as to the intentions of the United States, and, as the only other Commonwealth member of the North Atlantic Treaty, in outlining the reasons why full support is being given to building a stable and secure association in Western Europe.

(II) Japanese Peace Treaty

7. Dening said that it had been hoped that State Department would be able to provide a draft outline of their views on the civil clauses of a Japanese Peace Treaty in time for consideration to be given to them at the Colombo Conference. To date no views have been received, and Dening thought there were still strong differences of view between the State Department and the War Department in Washington. While it was just possible that the State Department would get something over in time, Dening's own guess was that the Conference might have to get on without a detailed United States draft. Should this be the case, he thought it would not be possible to do more than to go over the results of the Canberra Conference in the light of developments since 1947, and to try and bring up to date the recommendations which were made at that time. The Foreign Office has in preparation a brief for the United Kingdom delegation, and for possible circulation to the Conference should the occasion arise, which will deal with the Japanese Peace Treaty under the following headings:

(i) An estimate of the position of Japan in the light of the overall strategic situation;

(ii) An attempt to reconstruct present United States views on a Japanese treaty so far as these are known; and

(iii) A draft outline of the principles for a peace treaty on which agreement might be reached.
