INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

En 1949, l'événement crucial de la vie politique canadienne est l'élection fédérale du 27 juin. Louis St-Laurent, qui dirige le Parti libéral déjà au pouvoir, en est à sa deuxième élection générale, comme candidat, et à sa première, en tant que chef de parti et premier ministre. Avant de se lancer en campagne, St-Laurent a affûté son sens politique par une tournée dans l'Ouest du pays, au cours de laquelle il a reçu le surnom d'Oncle Louis. Son principal adversaire, George Drew, un ex-premier ministre de l'Ontario, avait facilement remporté la chefferie du Parti conservateur fédéral, en octobre 1948. Mais, sa première incursion au niveau fédéral, durant laquelle il mélange une rhétorique criarde à une stratégie inepte, se transforme en déroute. Les libéraux de St-Laurent, qui récoltent un peu moins que la moitié des votes, remportent près de soixante quinze pour cent des sièges de la Chambre des communes : c'est un triomphe presque aussi imposant que celui de William Lyon Mackenzie King, en 1940.

En général, les affaires extérieures ne sont pas controversées avant, durant et après l'élection de 1949. Le développement le plus significatif de l'après-guerre, affectant les politiques étrangère et de la défense, est la participation canadienne au Traité de l'Atlantique Nord, qui est acceptée presque unanimement par les communes lors du sprint des affaires parlementaires qui précède le scrutin. À la réunion des premiers ministres des pays du Commonwealth qui se tient à Londres, en avril 1949, et où l'on discute des liens futurs entre l'Inde et le reste du Commonwealth, St-Laurent se fait représenter par le secrétaire d'État aux affaires extérieures, Lester B. Pearson. Celui-ci a prévu une période d'absence minimale du Canada, suivant en cela les avis prodigués par ses conseillers et ses associés politiques. Au début juin, St-Laurent déclare que son gouvernement n'a aucune «affaire en suspens à discuter lors de cette élection». Il devient rapidement évident que les Canadiens appuient l'assurance donnée par St-Laurent qu'un nouveau gouvernement qu'il conduirait «continuerait à travailler pour la paix et la sécurité, pour une pleine reconnaissance de l'identité du Canada et pour le développement de tous les aspects de la vie du pays». Les plaintes de Drew, à l'effet que le Canada a tourné le dos au marché britannique en faveur du commerce nord-américain, ne font que mettre en lumière le fait qu'il n'a aucune alternative à offrir.¹ Évidemment, certaines décisions de politique extérieure sont repoussées au-delà du 27 juin 1949 parce que les politiciens font campagne et non par crainte, de la part des fonctionnaires, de voir leurs recommandations être contestées. Le résultat électoral confirme en fait l'alliance vitale qui existe entre St-Laurent et Pearson, depuis septembre 1946, lorsque le premier était devenu secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures et le second, son sous-secrétaire d'État.

Le rapport personnel entre les deux hommes, qui, par ailleurs, a facilité l'arrivée de Pearson en politique, en septembre 1948, est renforcé par une communion d'esprit en ce qui touche les affaires extérieures. Cela permet à Pearson d'avoir une grande latitude, dont il s'assure de ne pas abuser par présomption, insensibilité ou indifférence pour ses collègues. Un autre avantage de Pearson est la connaissance qu'il possède de son ministère, où il a servi durant plus de deux décennies, dont

INTRODUCTION

In 1949, the crucial event in Canada's national politics was the election which took place on June 27th. After a pre-election swing through Western Canada, in which he honed his political skills and acquired the nickname "Uncle Louis," Louis St. Laurent led the incumbent Liberal Party in what was only his second general election as a candidate and his first campaign as party leader and Prime Minister. His principal adversary was George Drew, the former Premier of Ontario, who had decisively won the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party in October 1948, but whose initial national electoral foray was a disastrous blend of shrill rhetoric and inept strategy. The result was a rout. The Liberals under St. Laurent won nearly half the popular vote and close to three-quarters of the seats in the House of Commons, a remarkable triumph which fell just short of William Lyon Mackenzie King's great victory of 1940.

For the most part, Canada's external relations were noncontroversial—before, during and after the 1949 election. The most significant post-war development to that point in Canada's foreign and defence policy, its participation in the North Atlantic Treaty, was confirmed almost unanimously by the House of Commons in a pre-dissolution rush of parliamentary business. St. Laurent decided not to attend the meeting of Prime Ministers in London in April 1949 which considered India's relationship with the rest of the Commonwealth. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester Pearson, who represented Canada at that gathering, kept his overseas itinerary to a minimum on the firm advice of his political associates and advisers. In early June, St. Laurent declared that there were "no outstanding issues in this election" and it soon became apparent that Canadians welcomed his assurance that a government which he led would "continue to work for peace and security, for complete recognition of Canadian nationhood and the development of all aspects of our national life." Drew's complaint that Canada had turned its back on the British market in favour of continental trade simply begged the question of what alternative course of action Drew could propose.¹ Certainly some decisions concerning Canada's policy in international relations were deferred until after the election, but this often had more to do with the inattention of politicians out on the hustings than with fear of officials that recommendations would be disputed or contradicted. In effect, the electoral outcome confirmed the partnership between St. Laurent and Pearson which had been so vital to the direction of Canada's external affairs since they were first associated as minister and deputy in September 1946.

That personal association and rapport, which had facilitated Pearson's entry into politics in September 1948, was reinforced by a broad understanding and agreement on foreign policy questions. That gave Pearson an unusual degree of latitude as Secretary of State, which he was careful not to abuse by presumption, indifference or insensitivity. A further advantage for Pearson as minister was his familiarity with the Department of External Affairs. Pearson had been a member of the foreign service for two decades and Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs for two years. His mastery of his portfolio was unquestioned and unsurprising. This knowledge and experience was vital to the conduct of Canada's international relations and to the leadership of the Department.

deux ans à titre de sous-secrétaire d'État. Le contrôle qu'il exerce de son portefeuille n'est pas surprenant ou remis en question, tout en étant central à la conduite des affaires extérieures du pays et à la direction du ministère.

À la mi-mars 1949, Arnold Heeney succède finalement à Pearson, au poste de sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures. Heeney, qui avait été le premier secrétaire du Cabinet et greffier du Conseil privé, connaît parfaitement la vie politique d'Ottawa mais est moins bien versé dans les affaires internationales. Il doit fournir les talents administratifs que son ministre n'a pas, ce qui libère ce dernier «de poursuivre les buts politiques qu'il avait longtemps recherchés».² Son arrivée conduit à d'autres changements. Norman Robertson revient à Ottawa remplacer Heeney auprès du Cabinet et Dana Wilgress devient haut-commissaire à Londres. Les autres grandes ambassades ne sont pas touchées : Hume Wrong reste ambassadeur à Washington, Georges Vanier, à Paris, et A.G.L. McNaughton, délégué permanent auprès des Nations Unies. Escott Reid, qui avait remplacé Pearson, par intérim, comme sous-secrétaire d'État, accepte le nouveau poste de sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint, ce qui assure que le flot déjà existant d'idées et de notes sera maintenu, au moins jusqu'au niveau de Heeney.³

Cette continuité, dans les plus hauts échelons, est parallèle à celle de tendances et de circonstances qui sont là depuis plusieurs années. Ainsi, les pressions se poursuivent pour que le Canada accroisse son nombre de missions ou sa présence dans des conférences. Le Pakistan et le Ceylan sont les «deux seuls pays du Commonwealth où le Canada n'est pas représenté». Dans le cas du Pakistan, un haut-commissaire y est désigné avant la fin de 1949 et son bureau est ouvert un mois plus tard. Quant à Ceylan, la question restera ouverte jusqu'après la conférence de Colombo, au début de 1950 (documents 6 à 8). Les pays de l'Amérique latine sont prêts à échanger des ambassadeurs, mais la réponse du Canada et sa préoccupation au sujet de la légitimité des gouvernements de cette région, plutôt qu'avec les grandes questions touchant l'hémisphère, font montre d'une négligence relative face à cette Amérique (document 10 et chapitre 14).

²Geoffrey A.H. Pearson, Seize the Day : Lester B. Pearson and Crisis Diplomacy (Ottawa, 1993), p. 10. John English, dans The Worldly Years : The Life of Lester Pearson, II : 1949-1972 (Toronto, 1992), écrit que les «capacités administratives de Pearson n'étaient guère admirées» (p. 9). Dans ses mémoires, The Things That Are Caesar's (Toronto, 1972), Heeney remarque (p. 98) que «Pearson avait peu de temps, et peu de goût, pour les problèmes administratifs. Ses talents allaient dans le sens du développement et de la négociation d'avenues de solutions en vue d'actions au niveau politique. On a souvent dit et écrit, à son sujet, qu'il n'aimait pas diriger un ministère et que, par conséquent, il y arrivait mal, laissant à ses adjoints, ultimement à son sous-ministre, les décisions difficiles liées à la gestion du personnel et l'administration au jour le jour». Avec des talents et intérêts différents, note J.L. Granatstein, Pearson et Heeney se complétaient très bien. Voir : A Man of Influence : Norman A. Robertson and Canadian Statecraft 1929-1968 (Toronto, 1981), p. 241.

In mid-March, Arnold Heeney finally succeeded Pearson as Under-Secretary. Heeney had been the first Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet, and so was well versed in Ottawa politics, if less experienced in international affairs. As deputy minister, Heeney provided the administrative aptitude which the minister lacked. Pearson was "thus liberated to pursue the goals of policy he had long sought."² Heeney's appointment necessitated other changes, with Norman Robertson returning to Ottawa to assume Heeney's former duties, while Dana Wilgress took over as High Commissioner in London. The other principal diplomatic positions remained unchanged, with Hume Wrong continuing as Ambassador in Washington, Georges Vanier as Ambassador in Paris and A.G.L. McNaughton as Canada's Permanent Delegate to the United Nations. Escott Reid, who had served as Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs since Pearson's reincarnation as a politician, assumed a new position as Deputy Under-Secretary, which ensured that the flood of ideas and memoranda would not abate, though it might be diverted by Heeney.³

This continuity in the senior ranks of decision-making was matched by the perpetuation of other trends or circumstances which had been evident in previous years. There was still considerable pressure for increased representation of Canada abroad at conferences and in permanent missions. Pakistan and Ceylon had been "the only member nations of the Commonwealth in which Canada is not represented," but by year's end a High Commissioner to Pakistan had been appointed and the office opened one month later. What to do about Ceylon, however, was left unresolved until after the Colombo Conference in early 1950 (Documents 6 to 8). Latin American countries appealed for the exchange of Ambassadors, but the Canadian response, as well as a preoccupation with the legitimacy of governments there rather than with hemispheric issues, indicated Canada's relative neglect of that region (Document 10 and Chapter 14).

Undeniably, the rehabilitation of recently vanquished foes and other aspects of the aftermath of the Second World War, as well as the problems and interests of the North Atlantic community, were assigned a higher priority in Ottawa, one which was reflected in the attention of policy-makers as well as decisions about diplomatic assignments. The Department of External Affairs was able to argue that the John English, in The Worldly Years: The Life of Lester Pearson, II: 1949–1972 (Toronto, 1992), comments that Pearson's "own administrative skills were not much admired" (p. 9). In his memoirs The Things That Are Caesars (Toronto, 1972), Heeney observed that "Pearson had little time, indeed little taste, for administrative problems. His flair was for developing and negotiating avenues of solution, for action at the policy level. It has often been said and written of him that he disliked the business of running a department and that, in consequence, he was no good at it, and that he left to his officials, ultimately his deputy minister, the unpleasant decisions of personnel management and housekeeping" (p. 98). With their distinct talents and interests, as J.L. Granatstein has noted, Pearson and Heeney complemented one another well. See *A Man of Influence: Norman A. Les preneurs de décision accordent une plus haute priorité, qui se reflète d'ailleurs dans les affectations des diplomates chevronnés, à la réhabilitation des ennemis récemment vaincus et à d'autres aspects reliés à la fin de la Deuxième Guerre mondiale ainsi qu'aux problèmes et aux intérêts de la communauté nord-atlantique. Le ministère peut arguer que la présence du Canada à des conférences internationales et son implication dans l'Alliance atlantique Nord justifient une augmentation de son personnel, mais le Conseil du Trésor met en question cette expansion «encore plus au moment où l'on s'efforce de réduire les effectifs de la fonction publique» (document 4). En plus de trois bureaux d'immigration ouverts en Europe, les seuls autres postes créés en 1949 sont une mission, à Bonn, et un consulat général, à Milan. Le rapport annuel observe tristement que «l'année qui vient de s'écouler a marqué la fin d'une période de rapide extension de la représentation à l'étranger».⁴ Dans certains secteurs, comme au Conseil des ministres des Affaires étrangères, le Canada dépend largement de ses principaux alliés pour ses informations. Georges Vanier fait remarquer (document 30) que celles-ci lui parviennent souvent plus facilement du Royaume-Uni et de la France que des États-Unis.

La question de l'information, particulièrement de la dépendance du Canada vis-à-vis de celle fournie par des pays amis pour suppléer ses pauvres sources, surgit de façon cruciale lorsque son tour vient de siéger au Conseil de Sécurité des Nations Unies. Les documents publiés dans ce volume abordant des sujets ayant été soulevés aux Nations Unies indiquent à peine l'importance et l'attention que leur ont accordés les ministres et diplomates canadiens. Cette documentation démontre cependant le vaste éventail de points traités par l'O.N.U. et au sujet desquels le Canada doit définir et articuler une position. Dans certains cas, sur la Palestine et le Cachemire par exemple, le fait que le Canada appartienne au Commonwealth complique sa réponse qui, avec celles d'autres membres, devrait solutionner l'insoluble tout en évitant un conflit entre pays avec lesquels nous voulons promouvoir de bonnes relations.

Le fait que le Canada, durant la Guerre froide, ait choisi de participer à l'Alliance atlantique, s'alignant ainsi carrément avec l'Ouest, détermine et tempère ses réactions aux événements. Ce facteur est spécialement important à la compréhension des efforts canadiens pour aider son allié néerlandais, qui se trouve dans une position impossible en Indonésie, sans en arriver, toutefois, à s'aliéner l'opinion asiatique, en particulier celle du gouvernement de l'Inde (documents 110, 150 et 151). Ce dilemme ainsi que la nécessité, pour le Canada, de développer une politique par rapport à un secteur de l'Asie peu familier, justifient l'importante documentation de ce volume sur cette question. De fait, le Canada aborde la plupart des problèmes traités au Conseil de sécurité à travers le prisme de la Guerre froide. Cette perspective pèse aussi fortement sur l'appui qu'il offre à la candidature de l'Inde pour qu'elle le remplace dans le «siège du Commonwealth» des membres non-permanents du Conseil de sécurité, que le Canada quittera à la fin de 1949, demands of international conferences, as well as the implications of Canada's involvement in the North Atlantic Treaty, justified additional personnel, but Treasury Board displayed a greater disposition to challenge and query that expansion, "particularly at a time when efforts were being made to reduce the size of the Civil Service" (Document 4). With the exception of three immigration offices in Europe, the only new posts opened in 1949 were a Mission in Bonn and a Consulate General in Milan. As the Annual Report ruefully observed, "the past year has marked the close of a period of rapid expansion of Canadian representation abroad."⁴ In some contexts, such as the Council of Foreign Ministers, Canada remained highly dependent on its senior allies for information. As Georges Vanier observed (Document 30), that was often more readily available from Britain and France than from the United States.

That question of information, and particularly the dependence of Canada on sympathetic countries to supplement its own limited sources, arose most acutely during Canada's term on the Security Council of the United Nations. The documentation printed in this volume on questions which arose at the United Nations merely suggests the importance assigned and the attention devoted to these subjects by Canadian diplomats and ministers. However, it does convey the remarkable range of disputes which came before the international organization and upon which Canada was expected to define and articulate a position. In some instances, such as Palestine and Kashmir, Canada's membership in the Commonwealth complicated its response as it endeavoured, with others, to seek solutions to seemingly intractable problems and to avoid open conflicts between countries with whom Canada was anxious to promote good relations.

More commonly, Canada's alignment in the Cold War, formalized by its participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, determined or tempered its reaction to events. That factor is especially important to understanding Canada's efforts to help an ally, the Netherlands, to extricate itself from an impossible position in Indonesia, without alienating opinion in Asia, particularly the government of India (Documents 110, 150 and 151). That dilemma, as well as the need to develop Canadian policy in an unfamiliar part of Asia, accounts for the extensive documentation on this question in this volume. In fact, Canada viewed most issues which came before the Security Council through the prism of the Cold War. That perspective strongly influenced its support for India's candidacy for the "Commonwealth seat" as a non-permanent member of the Security Council, which Canada would vacate at the end of the year, as well as its preference for Yugoslavia over Czechoslovakia as the representative of Eastern Europe (Documents 53 to 55). This emphasis should not be surprising, as the biases of the Cold War permeated Canada's international relations.

Though the division of the world along ideological and strategic lines certainly limited Canada's options in external affairs, Canada's unambiguous position in the ainsi que sa préférence pour la Yougoslavie, plutôt que la Tchécoslovaquie, pour y représenter l'Europe de l'Est (document 53 à 55). Comme les biais de la Guerre froide filtrent toutes les relations internationales du Canada, l'emphase mise par ce volume sur les retombées reliées à cette approche ne surprendra pas.

La polarisation idéologique limite les options du Canada en affaires étrangères, mais le choix sans ambiguïté qu'il a fait, dans ce monde bipolaire, est sans aucun doute le facteur le plus important derrière le consensus de sa population en ce qui concerne les affaires étrangères et la défense, au début de la Guerre froide. Contrairement aux années 1930, les questions internationales tendent à unir plutôt qu'à diviser les Canadiens. Ce degré exceptionnel d'appui public, donné à cette partie de l'action gouvernementale, permet des initiatives et des engagements qui auraient été impossibles, sur le plan politique, avant la Deuxième Guerre mondiale.

Le rôle du Canada dans la négociation et la mise en marche de l'Alliance atlantique en est la meilleure illustration. Dix ans plus tôt, la participation du Canada dans une alliance militaire formelle en temps de paix était impensable. Un gouvernement canadien qui aurait alors suggéré un éloignement si radical de cette position traditionnelle en aurait subi des conséquences désastreuses. Même au moment où les négociations sont très avancées, il y a, à Ottawa, une certaine répugnance à se concentrer sur la sécurité collective et de la nervosité à propos des réactions de la population. Ces considérations, pas toujours comprises ou acceptées par le principal négociateur canadien, Wrong, ou ses vis-à-vis à Washington, sont des facteurs dans la volonté canadienne de faire inclure l'article II, qui parle de «collaboration économique». Cela dit, l'engagement formel qu'implique la signature du traité le 4 avril 1949 est clair et l'appui du public sans équivoque.

Sous cet éclairage, le refus du Canada de participer au pont aérien de Berlin est remarquable. Lorsque Reid suggère de reconsidérer cette décision, à la mi-mars, Heeley écarte ce conseil prétextant que le gouvernement «ne désirerait pas discuter ce point à ce moment-ci» (document 428). Or, lors de la prochaine réunion du Cabinet, le ministre de la Défense nationale, Brooke Claxton, soulève justement le sujet (document 430). Appuyée par St-Laurent et Pearson, une révision est entreprise une semaine plus tard : mais, le blocus de Berlin se termine avant qu'elle ne soit complétée. Curieusement, Maurice Pope, notre principal représentant à Berlin, n'est pas du tout impressionné par l'impact de ce début de percée (document 441).

Entre temps, les hauts fonctionnaires responsables de l'immigration, à Ottawa, considèrent qu'une des façons de réhabiliter l'Allemagne de l'Ouest serait «d'abaisser graduellement les barrières qui empêchent les Allemands d'entrer au Canada» (document 739). De manière plus générale, le ministère des Affaires extérieures revoit, fin juillet, «la politique concernant l'Allemagne de l'Ouest» (document 1007). Une autre étude, en décembre, souligne que le «gouvernement [canadien] a appuyé les efforts entrepris pour amener la République fédérale [d'Allemagne] dans la communauté démocratique et a encouragé les initiatives qui feraient avancer nos intérêts commerciaux en Allemagne». Cela conduit aussi à distinguer clairement la politique canadienne de celle des puissances occidentales bi-polar world was undoubtedly the most important factor in the exceptional domestic consensus on foreign and defence policy which characterized the early years of the Cold War. In marked contrast to the pre-war situation, international questions tended to unite rather than divide Canadians. That exceptional degree of public support for the broad outlines of government policy enabled policy-makers to take initiatives and to make commitments which would have been politically impossible before the Second World War.

Perhaps no single involvement illustrates that point more vividly than Canada's role in the negotiation and implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty. A mere decade earlier, participation by Canada in a formal military alliance in peacetime would have been unthinkable, whatever the rationale. For the government which proposed such a radical departure from Canada's traditional stance, the political consequences then would have been disastrous. Even when the post-war negotiations were well advanced, there was some reluctance in Ottawa to focus too narrowly on collective security and some lingering nervousness about public attitudes. Those considerations, not always fully understood or accepted by Canada's principal negotiator, Wrong, or his counterparts in Washington, were factors in Ottawa's determination to secure Article II, which dealt with "economic collaboration." But the fundamental commitment implied by the signature of the treaty on April 4, 1949, was unmistakable and the public support for it unequivocal.

Seen in that light, the failure of Canada to assist in the Berlin airlift is especially remarkable. When Reid suggested reconsideration of this policy in mid-March, Heeney rejected the proposal with the lofty advice that the government "would not wish to raise this question now" (Document 428). But when the Cabinet next met, the Minister of National Defence, Brooke Claxton, raised precisely the prospect that Heeney had discounted (Document 430). With support from St. Laurent and Pearson, a review was initiated one week later. Before it was completed, however, the blockade was lifted. Curiously, one diplomat who was unimpressed by the practical impact of that breakthrough was Canada's senior representative in Berlin, Maurice Pope (Document 441).

Meanwhile, senior officials responsible for immigration in Ottawa were considering "a gradual pulling down of the barriers which keep Germans out" as part of the rehabilitation of Western Germany (Document 739). More generally, the Department of External Affairs reassessed Canada's "policy regarding the West German State" in late July (Document 1007). As another study commented in December, "the [Canadian] Government has supported efforts to bring the Federal Republic [of Germany] into the democratic community and has encouraged relations which would further our commercial interests in Germany." That also prompted a precise distinction between Canadian policy and that of the western occupying powers on the connection between "termination of the state of war" and "conclusion of a peace" (Enclosure to Document 1008).

Such subtle shadings and fine points of drafting were also vital aspects of the most important Commonwealth question in 1949, whether India should be allowed to remain in that organization after it adopted a republican constitution. As Canada's representative at the meeting of Commonwealth leaders in April, Pearson d'occupation quant au lien à faire entre «la fin de l'état de guerre» et la «conclusion d'une paix» (appendice au document 1008).

Ce type de mise au point et de subtilités est aussi au centre de la question la plus importante traitée au sein du Commonwealth, en 1949, à savoir si l'Inde peut rester membre de cette organisation après avoir adopté une constitution républicaine. Pearson, représentant du Canada à la réunion des chefs des pays du Commonwealth, en avril, favorise des accommodements, en faveur de l'Inde, et participe à la redéfinition de ce qu'est le Commonwealth de façon à y garder ce pays. Les aspects constitutionnels du problème sont sérieusement étudiés à Ottawa comme à Londres, mais tous les responsables sont également inquiets des implications politiques et stratégiques que leur décision aura sur le Commonwealth et l'Alliance atlantique (documents 772 à 821). L'évaluation faite à Ottawa de l'importance de l'Inde, comme marche asiatique et créatrice d'un réseau de sympathie dans cette région du monde, contribue à envisager certaines concessions à l'immigration indienne (documents 754 et 755) ainsi qu'à accorder de l'importance à la visite, à Ottawa, du premier ministre Jawaharlal Nehru (documents 858 à 865). La République d'Irlande n'a pas vu son lien avec le Commonwealth traité en son temps de la même façon, mais le Canada et les autres pays de l'organisation ont maintenu le traitement préférentiel accordé à ses citoyens et ses produits (documents 831 à 843). Dans d'autres secteurs, la relation avec le Commonwealth reste dans une voie bien connue. Ainsi, le Canada exprime ouvertement son refus de se soumettre aux positions communes auxquelles arriverait l'organisation après consultation ou d'indiquer publiquement les différences existant entre la politique du Commonwealth et celle d'autres membres (documents 766 à 771).

Comme par le passé, les relations bilatérales avec les membres du Commonwealth, autres que le Royaume-Uni, sont bien moins importantes que l'attention accordée à l'organisme le laisse entendre. De fait, le regard des Britanniques et des Canadiens est tourné vers les finances et le commerce, deux domaines inextricablement associés aux États-Unis. L'interdépendance des trois pays du triangle de l'Atlantique Nord est soulignée par les discussions tenues, à Washington, entre le Secrétaire au Trésor américain, le Chancelier de l'Échiquier britannique et notre ministre des Finances (documents 593 et 594) ainsi que par les crises ayant précédé ces rencontres et les dévaluations les ayant suivies. La perspective toujours remise d'un libre échange canado-américain, les avantages éventuels de l'Accord général sur les tarifs et le commerce ou, encore, les implications de l'Alliance atlantique sur l'intégration européenne et le commerce transatlantique ne peuvent détourner les décideurs canadiens des bénéfices immédiats provenant des achats hors des États-Unis, permis aux pays bénéficiaires du Plan Marshall, ou de la nécessité d'une entente entre les zones sterling et dollar. La différence des points de vue et les tensions anglo-canadiennes qui découlent des questions financières et commerciales, s'accroissent au fil des mois (documents 633 à 651). Ottawa reconnaît à contrecoeur et accepte souvent que le gouffre avec le Royaume-Uni s'élargisse de plus en plus.

Au contraire, une tendance évidente, depuis plusieurs années, est le renforcement des relations canado-américaines accentué par l'économie canadienne de l'après-guerre et par l'influence pénétrante de la Guerre froide. Il y a autant de favoured accomodation of India and participated in the redefinition of the Commonwealth relationship that was essential to secure that objective. The constitutional issues were considered carefully in Ottawa as in London, though in both capitals policy-makers were at least as concerned with the political and strategic implications of the decision for the Commonwealth and the western alliance (Documents 772 to 821). The evaluation in Ottawa of the significance of India, as a vital link to Asia and a possible bulwark of sympathetic policies in that region, contributed as well to the contemplation of concessions on immigration from India (Documents 754 and 755) and to the importance assigned to the visit to Ottawa of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru (Documents 858 to 865). Although no equivalent gesture was made to the Republic of Ireland in time to affect its relationship with the rest of the Commonwealth, Canada and the other members did contrive to maintain preferential treatment of Irish citizens and goods (Documents 831 to 843). In other respects, however, Canada's relationship with the Commonwealth followed familiar lines, particularly with an expressed aversion to definite commitments to Commonwealth consultation as well as to public indications of the differences between it and other members (Documents 766 to 771).

As in the past, Canada's bilateral relations with Commonwealth countries other than the United Kingdom were conspicuously less important than the attention to that multilateral association would imply. Moreover, the Anglo-Canadian agenda was dominated by questions of finance and trade, which were inextricably linked to Canada's other principal bilateral relationship, that with the United States. The inter-dependence of the North Atlantic Triangle in this realm was underlined by the tri-partite talks in Washington involving the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, the U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Minister of Finance (Documents 593 and 594), as well as by the crises which preceded and the devaluations which followed those meetings. Neither the elusive prospect of Canadian-American free trade nor the eventual advantages of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade nor even the implications of the North Atlantic Treaty for European integration and trans-Atlantic trade could distract Canadian policy-makers from the more immediate benefits of off-shore purchases under the Marshall Plan and the necessity for a fundamental understanding between the sterling and dollar economies. The differences in outlook and consequent tensions between Britain and Canada in matters of finance and trade became even more acute near the end of the year (Documents 633 to 651), but the more typical response in Ottawa was reluctant acknowledgement, often acceptance, that the two partners were drifting apart.

Of course, a contrary trend had been evident for many years in Canadian-American relations, one that was reinforced by developments in Canada's post-war economy and by the pervasive influence of the Cold War. The reasons why Canada should align itself with its southern neighbour in the global confrontation were as myriad as the inter-connections between the two countries. St. Laurent's visit to Washington in February simply confirmed the obvious importance of continental co-operation, while the varied agenda for his talk with President Harry Truman gave only a hint of the range of questions which arose regularly. One perennial topic was the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, for which the American administration was unable to dredge a passage through Congress. With hindsight raisons militant en faveur de l'alignement du Canada avec son voisin du sud, dans la confrontation globale qui est alors vécue, qu'il existe de liens de toutes natures entre les deux pays. La visite de St-Laurent, à Washington, en février, confirme l'importance de la coopération continentale : la variété des sujets qu'il aborde alors avec le président Harry Truman ne donne qu'une mince idée des questions traitées de façon régulière. La voie maritime du St-Laurent et ses projets hydro-électriques, que l'administration américaine ne parvient pas à faire accepter par le Congrès, devient un éternel objet de discussion. Avec le recul, on peut se dire que l'idée progresse en 1949, ce qui n'est pas évident à l'époque.

Dans d'autres régions, par exemple le Grand Nord ou Terre-Neuve, les Canadiens tiennent plutôt à restreindre leurs contreparties américaines qu'à les inspirer. Les implications militaires du conflit larvé soviéto-américain et la situation géographique du Canada entre les deux colosses rehaussent l'importance de l'Arctique aussi bien que le potentiel de mésentente canado-américaine concernant la souveraineté canadienne dans cette partie du monde. Mais, la documentation préparée en vue de la visite à Ottawa du secrétaire d'État à la Défense, Louis Johnson, ainsi que les discussions qui ont alors lieu démontrent également qu'un rapport unique existe entre ces deux pays dont les destins sont si enchevêtrés. Lorsque le Comité de la défense du Cabinet examine les exigences de la défense du Canada (documents 918 et 919), la position stratégique du pays ainsi que le lien existant entre la défense continentale et nord-atlantique sont soulignés.

Les autres relations bilatérales canadiennes paraissent de peu d'intérêt, sauf en vue de l'arrivée d'un visiteur ou autour de la réapparition d'un problème. Par rapport à la normale, Ottawa est presque inondée de ministres des affaires étrangères, à l'automne 1949. Les visites d'Ernest Bevin (documents 868 et 869) et de Robert Schuman (documents 1004 et 1005) sont bienvenues. Il y a moins d'enthousiasme pour celle du comte Sforza (document 1009) alors que celle de Sir Zafrulla Khan (document 867) est mesurée à l'aune du traitement accordé au premier ministre indien. Les fâcheux pourparlers entourant la propriété des trésors artistiques polonais compliquent toujours les relations canado-polonaises ainsi que les rapports entre les gouvernements fédéral et québécois (documents 1010 à 1017). Les échanges d'information ou de propagande dominent les froides relations canado-soviétiques. Le résultat de la guerre civile en Chine, avec ses contrecoups pour les résidents canadiens en terre chinoise et les relations internationales en général, incite à une revue exceptionnelle de la «politique vis-à-vis de la Chine communiste» au début de novembre (document 1050); cependant, on s'attend à ce que le Canada reconnaisse le nouveau régime quelque part en 1950 (document 1055). Cette décision sera finalement retardée par les hauts et les bas de la Guerre froide.

Pour rassembler ces documents sur les relations internationales canadiennes, en 1949, je me suis surtout basé sur les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures (aujourd'hui, des Affaires étrangères et du Commerce international), ceux du Conseil privé et du ministère des Finances, complétés, lorsque nécessaire, par ceux d'autres ministères ainsi que par des fonds privés déposés aux Archives nationales one can claim that progress on that scheme was made in 1949, but it was hardly evident at the time.

In other regions, notably the North and Newfoundland, Canadian policy-makers were more anxious to restrain than to inspire their American counterparts. The military implications of Soviet-American conflict, as well as Canada's unfortunate location between the two superpowers, enhanced the importance of the Arctic and consequently the potential for disagreement over questions of sovereignty. But the documentation prepared for the visit to Ottawa of the American Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson, as well as the discussions which took place then, also demonstrated the unique rapport between two countries whose fates were so completely entwined. When the Cabinet Defence Committee examined Canada's defence requirements (Documents 918 and 919), this country's strategic position, as well as the connection between continental and North Atlantic defence, was underlined.

Most other bilateral relationships tended to be marginal interests for Canada, which attracted attention as a consequence of the arrival of a visitor or the revival of an irritant. By its normal standards, Ottawa was nearly inundated by a tidal wave of foreign ministers in the autumn of 1949. While the visits of Ernest Bevin (Documents 868 and 869) and Robert Schuman (Documents 1004 and 1005) were certainly welcome, the reception for Count Sforza (Document 1009) was less enthusiastic and that for Sir Zafrulla Khan (Document 867) was carefully measured against the treatment of the Indian Prime Minister. The vexatious struggle over custody of the Polish Art Treasures still complicated relations between Canada and Poland as well as the federal government's dealings with Quebec (Documents 1010-1017). Exchanges, whether of information or of propaganda, dominated the bleak landscape of Soviet-Canadian relations. The outcome of the civil war in China, with its implications for Canadian residents and for international relations generally, prompted an exceptional review of "Policy Towards Communist China" in early November (Document 1050), but it was still expected that Canada would recognize the new regime sometime in 1950 (Document 1055). That question too would ultimately be decided by the ebb and flow of the Cold War.

For this documentary record of Canada's international relations in 1949, I have drawn principally on the files of the Department of External Affairs (now the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade), the Privy Council Office and the Department of Finance, supplemented by other departmental records as necessary as well as by collections of private papers in the National Archives of Canada, including those of Louis S. St. Laurent, Lester B. Pearson, Hume Wrong and Escott Reid. The guidelines for the selection of documents in this volume remain those quoted in the introduction to Volume 7 in this series. The editorial devices are described in the introduction to Volume 9. A dagger (†) indicates that a document has not been printed in this volume; an ellipsis (...) represents an editorial omission. I had full access to the records of the Department of External Affairs in the preparation of this volume.

That task was made considerably easier by the assistance of many people. As always, the staff of the National Archives of Canada were courteous and helpful. Historians of Canada's international relations owe a particular debt of gratitude to du Canada, dont ceux de Louis St-Laurent, Lester B. Pearson, Hume Wrong et Es-cott Reid. Les critères de sélection des documents qui suivent sont ceux déjà exposés dans l'introduction au volume 7. L'appareil éditorial est décrit dans l'introduction au volume 9. Ce signe (†) signifie qu'un document mentionné n'est pas dans ce volume; celui-ci (...) représente une partie non citée. J'ai eu accès à tous les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures dans la préparation de ce livre.

Ma tâche a été facilitée par plusieurs personnes. Comme d'habitude, le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada a été courtois et d'une grande aide. Les historiens des relations internationales du Canada doivent beaucoup aux membres de l'unité des dossiers militaires et internationaux de la Division des archives gouvernementales. Les connaissances spécialisées et les dispositions avenantes de Paul Marsden, Paulette Dozois et David Smith ont été particulièrement bien reçues. Le personnel de la bibliothèque Jules-Léger du ministère des Affaires étrangères et du Commerce international ont su partager avec moi leurs temps et connaissances. Plusieurs attaché(e)s de recherche ont été employé(e)s tout au long de ce projet : Michel Beauregard, Neal Carter, Christopher Cook, Lisa Dillon, Brian Hearnden, Ted Kelly, Steven Lee, Leigh Sarty et Jacqueline Shaw ont participé à me rendre plus accessible une masse de documents. Greg Donaghy, collègue et éditeur, et moi-même avons développé une méthodologie qui nous est apparue appropriée pour diviser les sujets qui s'étendaient sur les années 1949 (vol. XV) et 1950 (vol. XVI). J'ai également apprécié les conseils et la patience de l'éditeur-en-chef de la série, John Hilliker, surtout lorsque mes autres responsabilités détournaient mon attention de ce volume. Cette publication doit beaucoup à l'engagement et à la confiance de plusieurs gestionnaires dont, récemment et de façon notable, Mary Jane Starr, Alan Darisse et Peter Lloyd, que je tiens à remercier. La préparation du manuscrit en vue de sa publication a été faite par Jordan, Nesbitt et Associés limitée d'Ottawa. Je leur exprime ma profonde admiration pour le très haut standard de travail ainsi que pour l'efficacité et la bonne grâce avec lesquelles ils ont répondu à quelques-unes des exigences singulières de ce projet. L'équipe éditoriale de la compagnie, dirigée par Norman Hillmer et Bruce Nesbitt, incluait Ann Gregory, David MacKenzie, R.L. Gabrielle Nishiguchi, Jean Pariseau, Boris Stipernitz, Marie Trudeau et Susan Villeneuve. Ted Kelly et Janet Ritchie de la Division historique, les ont aidés. Tout comme pour le volume précédent, mon travail a été facilité par l'assistance de Maria Horner et du regretté Imre Horner ainsi que par l'appui indéfectible de Kathy Giles-Mackenzie, Anna Mackenzie et Sarah Mackenzie.

Pour ce projet, et comme pour mes travaux antérieurs, j'ai énormément bénéficié de la perspicacité exceptionnelle, de l'intelligence, du charme, de la compréhension et de l'amitié généreuse du regretté Ian Drummond. Ian m'a appris à voir les multiples thèmes multilatéraux et bilatéraux des relations économiques internationales du Canada comme des touches formant un portrait compréhensible. Dans les septièmes chapitres des volumes 14 et 15, je tente d'appliquer les leçons qu'il m'a apprises.

the personnel of the Military and International Records Unit of the Government Archives Division. The specialized knowledge and helpful disposition of Paul Marsden, Paulette Dozois and David Smith were especially welcome. The staff of the Jules Léger Library of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade also generously shared their time and knowledge. Several research assistants were employed at various times during this project: Michel Beauregard, Neal Carter, Christopher Cook, Lisa Dillon, Brian Hearnden, Ted Kelly, Steven Lee, Leigh Sarty and Jacqueline Shaw have all helped to make an unwieldy mass of paper more manageable. My fellow editor, Greg Donaghy, and I were able to divide responsibility for overlapping subjects between the 1949 and 1950 volume in a manner which made sense to us. I have also appreciated the advice and forbearance of the general editor of the series, John Hilliker, particularly when my other responsibilities distracted me from this volume. The publication of this book owes much to the commitment and confidence of several managers, most recently and notably Mary Jane Starr, Alan Darisse and Peter Lloyd, to whom I express my thanks. Jordan, Nesbitt and Associates Ltd. of Ottawa prepared the manuscript for publication. I would like to express my profound appreciation for the remarkably high standard of their work as well as for the good grace and efficiency with which they responded to the sometimes peculiar demands of this project. The company's editorial team, led by Norman Hillmer and Bruce Nesbitt, included Ann Gregory, David MacKenzie, R.L. Gabrielle Nishiguchi, Jean Pariseau, Boris Stipernitz, Marie Trudeau and Susan Villeneuve. Within the Historical Section, they were aided by Ted Kelly and Janet Ritchie. As with the previous volume in this series, my editorial work was facilitated by assistance from Maria Horner and the late Imre Horner, as well as by vital support from Kathy Giles-Mackenzie, Anna Mackenzie and Sarah Mackenzie.

I have also benefited in this project, as in previous work, from the exceptional insight, intelligence, wit and understanding, as well as the generous friendship, of the late Ian Drummond. Ian taught me to see the various bilateral and multilateral themes in Canada's international economic relations as aspects of a complete and comprehensible picture. The seventh chapters in volumes 14 and 15 of this series are attempts to apply that lesson.

All of those mentioned above have assisted me in some way with the preparation of this volume, but I am responsible as editor for the selection of documents.

Les personnes mentionnées ci-haut m'ont assisté, d'une façon ou d'une autre, dans la réalisation de ce volume, mais je suis le seul responsable, à titre d'éditeur, de la sélection des documents.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

20. Mr. [K.T.] Burbridge reported that a resolution approving the Address to the King requesting the latest amendment to the British North America Act, 1867, was adopted by the House of Commons on October 27 and by the Senate on November 9. The formal engrossed Address was signed by the Speakers of both Houses on Thursday morning, November 10. It was immediately presented by them to the Governor General, who on the same day transmitted it by air to the King's Secretary in London. The United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office, the Secretary to the Governor General and the Canadian High Commissioner in London were informed in advance of the text of the Address and of the proposed amendment, with the result that on November 10 the Government and the Department were informed by the Private Secretary to the King (through the Office of the Governor General) and His Majesty was pleased to approve the Petition and that steps were being taken to introduce the necessary legislation in the United Kingdom Parliament.¹

21. The text of the proposed amendment reads:

"1. Section ninety-one of the British North America Act, 1867, is amended by renumbering Class 1 thereof as Class 1A and by inserting therein immediately before that Class the following as Class 1:

"1. The amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional Act granted or secured to the Legislature or the Government of a Province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language, or as regards the requirements that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least once each year, and that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the Writs for choosing the House; provided however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the Parliament of Canada, if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the Members of such House.

“2. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949 (No. 2), and the British North America Acts, 1867–1949, and this Act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867–1949 (No. 2).”

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES

34. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the United Kingdom sought the agreement of the government to a change in His Majesty's style and titles in consequence of the withdrawal of Ireland from the Commonwealth. The change suggested was the substitution of “Northern Ireland” for “Ireland”.

This raised the larger question whether the government should agree to make the one isolated change in relation to Ireland or whether the opportunity should be taken to suggest wider amendment with a view to removing anomalies to which objection had been taken in Canada.

If it were decided to follow the latter course, several alternatives suggested themselves. One possibility would be to have the King's title differ for each country, so for the United Kingdom it might be “of the United Kingdom and the other nations of the British Commonwealth, King”, in respect of Canada “of Canada and the other nations of the British Commonwealth, King”.

To permit further consideration of this matter, it was suggested that the U.K. government be informed that we would like to take this opportunity of studying a more general revision of the Royal Style and Titles and would like some time to formulate proposals.

35. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the request of the United Kingdom for a change in the Royal Style and Titles with respect to Ireland and agreed that the U.K. government be informed of the government's desire to have further time to consider changes of a more comprehensive nature with a view to the submission of proposals.

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES; U.K. REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 19th, stated that the United Kingdom had again asked that Canada agree to the substitution in the Royal Style and Titles of "Northern Ireland" for "Ireland" and be prepared to take steps to seek parliamentary assent to the change.

A draft reply to the U.K. High Commissioner at Ottawa was submitted and read.

(External Affairs memorandum, Jan. 31, 1949, and attached documents†).

4. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that a reply be sent to the U.K. High Commissioner along the lines suggested by Mr. Pearson; viz., the Canadian government agreed that the present expression "Great Britain and Ireland" would be inappropriate on the coming into force of the Republic of Ireland Act and could not, therefore, object to the course proposed to be followed by the United Kingdom; however, the Canadian government did not propose to seek parliamentary approval for any change in the Royal Style and Titles until, in the light of other existing anomalies, a general revision could be put forward after consultation with other Commonwealth governments.

PERSONNEL

39. Mr. Moran said that an Establishments Committee would be set up to examine the personnel requirements of Divisions in Ottawa and Offices abroad with a view to producing a personnel establishment by numbers and ranks for the Department and all our missions. It was recognized that considerable flexibility would have to be permitted to care for shifting burdens of work but such establishments were necessary to permit long-term planning for recruiting, postings and promotions.

40. Mr. Moran explained that in the immediate postwar years it was accepted by the Civil Service Commission and Treasury Board that large intakes of all ranks would be necessary to enable our programme of expansion to be carried out. Consequently, little difficulty was experienced when submitting our requirements for additional officers. We have now been advised that any further expansion will be subjected to the closest scrutiny and we have been encountering some difficulty in obtaining approval for our present request for twenty-two more junior Foreign Service Officers. After prolonged discussions and the preparation of a number of memoranda, we were successful in having the Civil Service Commission certify to Treasury Board that it was satisfied, after examination, that these additional officers were necessary.

41. When the item was placed on Treasury Board agenda, they asked for additional supporting evidence which was supplied. The Board, at this week's meeting, decided that this was a matter of such importance, particularly at a time when efforts were being made to reduce the size of the Civil Service, that our application would have to stand over until next week's meeting³ when all of the Ministers would be present.

The Heads of Division did not meet in the week following, and records of the next four meetings are missing, so there was no follow-up report. The appointments were approved by Treasury Board, which later in the year devoted similar attention to the rapid rate of promotion in the Department of External Affairs, another consequence of the postwar expansion.

42. It was explained in our submission to Treasury Board that among the factors which have contributed to our existing personnel deficiencies are:

(1) Wastage by transfers and attachments to other establishments amounting to twelve during the past year.

(2) Separations—Three officers;

(3) New Offices Abroad;

(4) Specialized Training—Soviet Union, Middle East, Far East;

(5) International Conferences;

(6) Atlantic Pact;

(7) General Understaffing—both in Ottawa and abroad;

(8) Replacements for Retiring Officers.

The Secretary of the Treasury Board has supplied some written comments on our brief in which he is in general agreement with most of our arguments but it is interesting to note that on the heading of Understaffing he comments as follows;

“I am somewhat concerned at the comments you make on understaffing, as we had not derived a general impression that either your offices abroad or the Department at home was currently short of staff—at least not by comparison with other Departments. However, I understand that it is the intention of the Department to examine required establishments, both at home and abroad, in considerable detail in the next year or two, and no doubt this detailed review will supply the only sort of answer that is satisfactory in regard to a question of this kind.”

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN PAKISTAN AND CEYLON

Pakistan and Ceylon are the only member nations of the Commonwealth in which Canada is not represented by High Commissioners. The practice was developed early in the war of 1939–1945 of exchanging representatives between Canada and other nations of the Commonwealth in addition to the United Kingdom. We also exchanged High Commissioners with Ireland which cannot now be properly regarded as a member of the Commonwealth. This system of representation should probably now be completed by sending High Commissioners to Karachi and Colombo. The new Asian members of the Commonwealth are likely to be sensitive about the equality of their status within the Commonwealth and, sooner rather than later, may indicate their displeasure with the fact that Canada exchanges representatives with all the white members of the Commonwealth, including relatively small countries like South Africa and New Zealand as well as Ireland, which is not a member in good standing of the Commonwealth group, but has so far failed to send representatives to two of the new Eastern members of the Commonwealth.

Pakistan

2. It was agreed and announced on August 15, 1947, the date on which the new state of Pakistan came into existence, that the Governments of Canada and Pakistan would exchange High Commissioners “when this is administratively possible.” The announcement went on to say that “as a preliminary step in this direction, it is expected that Trade Commissionerships will be established in each country in the near future.”

3. An Acting Canadian Government Trade Commissioner arrived in Karachi on September 1, 1947 and has carried on his duties there since that date. A Trade Commissioner has not yet been sent to Canada by Pakistan. At the beginning of last December we learned that the Pakistan Government was taking steps to appoint a High Commissioner to Canada but up to the present there has been no word of an actual appointment.

4. The reasons that would justify the opening of a Canadian diplomatic mission in Karachi include the following:

(a) Pakistan is the largest Muslim state in population (approximately 70,000,000) and enjoys a key position as a country with close connections in the Middle East as well as roots and influence in South East Asia.

(b) Western Pakistan would have great strategic importance in the event of a war with the Soviet Union. The air bases about Karachi and farther north might well be the most important point for attack on the Soviet Union. Conversely, the defence of Pakistan against Soviet pressure on her North West Frontier is of great value to the Western world.

(c) It is now evident that Pakistan is likely to survive as a separate state for many years. Like India it is now one of the few Asian countries with a strong stable government. Its outlook is both pro-Commonwealth and anti-Soviet.

(d) It would seem important to us to keep ourselves informed of political and other developments in Pakistan, and the aims and problems of her government. For example, on the Kashmir dispute it has been felt that we have been receiving, inevitably, somewhat one-sided reports from our mission in New Delhi.

(e) It may be regarded by Pakistan as a lack of courtesy and a bias in favour of India if we continue for some time without establishing a diplomatic mission in Karachi.

5. The United Kingdom and India have, for obvious reasons, had High Commissioners in Karachi since August 15, 1947. An Australian High Commissioner's Office was opened in Karachi in March 1948 under an Official Secretary, but the appointment of a High Commissioner has not yet been announced. Pakistan has taken no action to send a representative to Canberra.

Ceylon

6. Perhaps the most important reason for establishing representation in Ceylon is the very great strategic importance which Ceylon would have in the event of a general war. The naval and air facilities which Ceylon would provide would be of the greatest value.

7. The present government of Ceylon is clearly very favourable to the Commonwealth connection. It is under some pressure from the extreme Left and would, no doubt, be glad of any support shown by other Commonwealth countries, which would be evidenced by the sending of a High Commissioner. The refusal of the Soviet Union to agree to the admission of Ceylon to the United Nations has clearly caused great concern and some embarrassment to the government of Ceylon. It has perhaps given some comfort and even political support to the Left-wing elements.

8. The question of Canadian representation in Ceylon came up for consideration by the government early in 1948. When Mr. Kearney was in Colombo in February the question came up in a discussion with the Prime Minister of Ceylon as to whether Mr. Kearney might not be accredited to Ceylon as well as to India. Mr. Senanayake desired to have this arrangement made and proposed in turn to accredit the Ceylon High Commissioner in London to Canada. Mr. Kearney was in favour of the idea, particularly because in the event of the evacuation of Europeans from India to Ceylon it would be desirable to have some Canadian representation in Colombo, and furthermore, a visit to Colombo in the summer months would be a good change from the intense heat of New Delhi.

9. The matter was submitted to Cabinet which on May 6, 1948 decided against the extension of representation to Ceylon. It agreed that for the present an exchange of representatives with Ceylon was inadvisable and that any matter which Ceylon might wish to discuss with the government could be taken up with the representative of Ceylon in the United States if the Ceylon government so desired.

10. In view of these circumstances and of the relatively minor role which Ceylon plays in both Commonwealth and international affairs, it might still be thought best to have our High Commissioner in New Delhi also accredited to Ceylon, with a fairly junior officer located in Colombo throughout the year. Generally speaking, relations between India and Ceylon are good, although there is some disagreement over the entry to Ceylon of Indian immigrants and much discussion regarding the rights and disabilities of Indians resident in Ceylon.

11. It might be added that the United Kingdom, India and Australia have High Commissioners in Colombo.

MISSION IN PAKISTAN

If we are to open a Mission in Pakistan, early action is desirable with a view to obtaining accommodation because reports indicate there is a very serious building shortage in that country. Before we instruct the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Karachi to commence any negotiations, the Under-Secretary felt that you would wish to make a report to Cabinet and ensure that there are no objections to our proceeding to obtain an option in the event that a suitable building can be located.

2. To enable you to make this report to Cabinet I attach a departmental memorandum dated July 12 on the subject. The case for establishing such an office is set forth in paragraph 3, perhaps in somewhat greater detail than you will require. The principal arguments are reciprocity, the importance of Pakistan as a Muslim and anti-Communist country, its membership in the Commonwealth, its strategic location and the opportunities for developing Canadian markets in Pakistan.⁵

ESTABLISHMENT OF MISSION IN PAKISTAN

It was agreed and announced on August 15, 1947, the date on which the new state of Pakistan came into existence, that the governments of Canada and Pakistan would exchange High Commissioners "when this is administratively possible". The announcement went on to say that "as a preliminary step in this direction, it is expected that Trade Commissionerships will be established in each country in the near future."

2. A Canadian Government Trade Commissioner took up his duties in Karachi on September 1, 1947. A Trade Commissioner has not been sent to Canada by Pakistan. However, on April 4, 1949 the Pakistan Government indicated its desire to appoint Mr. Mohammad Ali as its first High Commissioner to Canada. This appointment was agreed to and announced in Karachi on April 8. Mr. Baig came to Ottawa from the Pakistan Embassy in Washington on May 25 to open the mission as Acting High Commissioner. Mr. Mohammad Ali arrived in Ottawa on July 9.

3. The case for opening a Canadian diplomatic mission in Karachi may be set forth as follows:

(a) As we are publicly committed to exchange High Commissioners with Pakistan, and Pakistan has already taken action, it would be discourteous to delay very long before making our reciprocal appointment. Any long delay might be misinterpreted by Pakistan as prejudice in favour of her rival and bigger Commonwealth country, India, where our Office has now been set up for over two years.

The United Kingdom and India have, for obvious reasons, had High Commissioners in Pakistan since August 1947; an Australian Office under an Official Secretary was opened in Karachi in March 1948, and an Australian High Commissioner was recently appointed. Pakistan has not yet sent a representative to Canberra because, we understand, of lack of personnel.

(b) Pakistan is by far the largest Muslim state in population (approximately 74,000,000), though not in area, and enjoys a key geographical position as a country with close connections in the Middle East, based on ties of religion and culture,

(c) It is now evident that Pakistan, although a somewhat artificial creation, will survive as a separate state for an indefinite period. Like India, it is now one of the few Asian countries with a strong, stable government. It is anti-Communist in its outlook and should be encouraged in every possible way to resist the spread of Communism both within Pakistan and among its neighbours. We should do our share in maintaining and strengthening the Western influences in Pakistan. Pakistan favours continued membership in the Commonwealth and has advocated closer Commonwealth co-operation and consultation. It has, however, on occasion been critical of what it considers to be lack of support from Commonwealth countries. It is uncertain at present whether Pakistan will continue its present form of membership in the Commonwealth or whether it will follow the example set by India and establish a republic within the Commonwealth. It seems important that we should, by the sending of a High Commissioner, indicate that we attach importance to Pakistan's membership in the Commonwealth and that we do not relegate Pakistan to a less favoured position than India.

(d) Because of the strategic value of Pakistan's location, it would appear that Canada should make some effort to cultivate good relations and to understand Pakistan affairs. Pakistan, particularly West Pakistan and the air bases about Karachi and further north, would have great strategic importance in the event of a war with the Soviet Union. The defence of Pakistan against Soviet pressure on her North-West Frontier is of great value to the Western Powers, and might be vital in keeping the Persian Gulf open in the event of war.

In addition, as Pakistan has demonstrated her interest in what Canada is doing in the defence field by sending a military mission to Ottawa, it is felt we should do what we can, despite the security difficulties, to develop closer relations in this field.

(e) It would seem important to keep ourselves informed of political, economic and other developments in Pakistan and the aims and problems of her government, partly for the reason given in (d) above. The opening of a mission would seem to be the only way to obtain adequate and systematic reports on Pakistan. For example, on the Kashmir dispute it has been felt that we have been receiving, inevitably, somewhat one-sided accounts from our mission in New Delhi. It is desirable to obtain an understanding of Pakistan's views on her relations with India on Kashmir and other questions, as well as of Pakistan's present tense relations with Afghanistan.

(f) Over a period of time there should be great possibilities for expanding Canadian exports to Pakistan, particularly if the Pakistan Government pursues its declared policy of industrialization. Pakistan, in contrast to India, has enjoyed a favourable trade balance and has recently been in the perhaps unique position of being a net earner of United States dollars. The Pakistan Government, through its officials in Washington, have placed substantial orders for military equipment with Canadian Arsenals Limited. This has occasioned a number of visits to Ottawa by Pakistani missions and officials, including the Ambassador in Washington, and the military mission at present in Ottawa. It seems that Pakistan took the initiative in opening an office here because of its great interest in obtaining military and other supplies from Canada. Their officials have said on several occasions that Pakistan has dollars to spend in North America on munitions and capital goods.

The interests of Canadian companies in Pakistan are now not large but may be expected to grow. Pakistan desires to encourage "foreign" investment and apparently would particularly welcome Canadian capital. Pakistan also desires technical assistance from abroad and plans to send personnel to other countries, including Canada, for advanced education, especially technical training.

(g) The Canadian community in Pakistan is at present small, and there are consequently limited consular responsibilities, but the number of Canadians is likely to increase, especially if business with Pakistan grows.

Personnel Establishment

4. It is thought that, owing to conditions in Karachi, including the problems of day-to-day housekeeping or administrative work in an Eastern country, the need for special summer leave because of the climate, as well as the division of the country into two regions, our mission should have the following Canadian personnel:

- High Commissioner
- First Secretary
- Third Secretary
- Canadian male clerk
- 2 or 3 women stenographers

At the beginning, it is thought that the officers should preferably be unmarried because of the difficulty in securing suitable accommodation.

In addition, some locally hired staff would be required. The present Trade Commissioner in Karachi would presumably become Commercial Secretary of the mission and would continue to have his work done by locally-hired clerical staff.

Appropriation

5. Approximately $35,000 is available in the Estimates for the opening of an Office in Karachi during the financial year ending March 31, 1950. This should, of course, be regarded as an appropriation for operation during part of a year only. (These Estimates have not yet been voted by Parliament: during Interim Supply about half of $35,000 would be available.)

Accommodation

6. As Karachi only recently became a national capital, and has had an enormous increase in population as a result of the war and the creation of the new state, accommodation of all kinds is exceedingly difficult to obtain. A number of diplomatic missions already in Karachi have apparently not been able to obtain more than a very few rooms in the principal hotel for both living and office purposes. However, our Trade Commissioner in Karachi has reported recently on plans to build new office premises and residential bungalows. He is being encouraged to endeavour to have suitable office and living quarters for the Canadian staff of a mission earmarked for our future use, in the building projects now being planned, without as yet making any definite commitments. It is still uncertain what accommodation would be immediately available for a mission in the next few months.

Ceylon

7. When we send a High Commissioner to Karachi, Ceylon will be the only member-nation of the Commonwealth in which Canada will not be represented. On May 6, 1948 Cabinet decided, for the time being, against having our High Commissioner in New Delhi jointly accredited to Colombo. Because of Ceylon's relatively minor importance in Commonwealth and world affairs, it is probably unnecessary for us to take any initiative now, and we can await a move from the Ceylonese authorities. Owing to their lack of personnel and limited resources, an approach from Ceylon seems unlikely for some time, though our action on Pakistan may perhaps prompt Ceylon to initiate an exchange of High Commissioners.

EXCHANGE OF REPRESENTATIVES BETWEEN CANADA AND CEYLON

Even if you do not wish to open the question yourself, it is possible that during your visit to Colombo the Prime Minister of Ceylon will enquire concerning the possibility of exchanges of representatives between his country and Canada. I understand from Mr. Chipman that you had indicated to him that he might be accredited to Ceylon as well as to India. When I appeared before the Standing Committee on External Affairs on November 22, the matter of opening a Canadian mission in Colombo was discussed; I stated that I was not in a position to indicate what action the Government might take. Next year's estimates contain, under the item for new missions, provision for the cost of opening an office in Colombo in case the Government should decide to take this action.

2. Following the opening of our mission in Karachi, Ceylon will be the only member of the Commonwealth in which Canada maintains no representation. The Soviet veto of the proposal for Ceylon's membership in the United Nations undoubtedly gives Ceylon a feeling of isolation. It would be unfortunate to have this increased by any impression that Canada is not interested in maintaining normal Commonwealth contacts.

3. Ceylon's evolution to autonomy within the Commonwealth followed a less painful and indeed a much more happy course than was followed by India and Pakistan. As a consequence, there is considerably more pro-British feeling in Ceylon than in the other two Asian Commonwealth countries. This, added to the relative military weakness of Ceylon, is responsible for the arrangement under which the naval bases of Colombo and Trincomalee are at the disposal of the Royal Navy and the Commander-in-chief of the new Ceylonese army is a United Kingdom officer.

4. It is probable that Ceylon places a special value on the Commonwealth connections because of her very natural fear of her large neighbour. The historic, political and economic bases of this fear are summarized in the attached memorandum† on relations between Ceylon and India. These factors explain, in part at least, the unusual treaty relationship between Ceylon and the United Kingdom.

5. The war gave a great impetus to trade between Canada and Ceylon. During the period 1935–39 Canada imported from Ceylon goods (mainly tea, rubber and coconuts) at the average annual value of $4,015,000. In 1947 imports reached the record amount of $11,653,000. On the export side Canadian trade with Ceylon has made still sharper gains. During the years 1935–39 the average annual value of our exports to Ceylon was $246,000. In 1945 exports totalled $8,290,000 though they dropped to $4,079,000 in 1947.

6. At the present time no representative of the Trade Commissioner service is stationed in Ceylon as that country falls within the territory of the Acting Commercial Secretary in Bombay. There would seem to be a sufficient volume of trade, actually existing and with still greater possibilities for the future, to warrant the appointment of a resident Commercial Officer for Canada. At the moment members of the Trade Commissioner service are stationed in New Delhi and Bombay.

7. If Trade and Commerce were to post a suitable officer to Colombo he might serve as Acting High Commissioner during the absence of Mr. Chipman, so long as the latter has the dual appointment. (Mr. Chipman may want to remain in Colombo for the greater part of the months from May to September when the climate in New Delhi is particularly trying). An alternative would be to post a junior Foreign Service Officer to Ceylon. From this distance there seems to be a real question as to whether an External Affairs officer would be appointed for the present at least. You might well feel that a Third Secretary who could deal with such political and consular problems as may arise should be stationed there.

8. It is assumed that eventually there will be an exchange of High Commissioners (or Ambassadors) between Canada and Ceylon but for the time being I think that Ceylon's personnel problems are perhaps even more difficult of solution than our own. Even if no appointment is made immediately, it is to be anticipated that the Ceylonese authorities would be pleased to learn that you have been giving thought to the appointment of a Canadian representative to Ceylon.

9. You may wish to mention this matter to the Prime Minister or in Cabinet. Presumably decision will be deferred until you return from Colombo.

CONVERSION OF CANADIAN EMBASSY OFFICE IN SHANGHAI INTO A CONSULATE-GENERAL

The Department has had under consideration for some time now the desirability of consolidating the offices of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of External Affairs in Shanghai into a Consulate-General. For many years a Canadian Trade Commissioner had been stationed in Shanghai. In 1946 the Department of External Affairs assigned a Junior Officer to the Canadian Embassy in Nanking to take care of consular, immigration and political work that required attention in Shanghai. Colonel L.M. Cosgrove, Senior Canadian Trade Commissioner in China, who has had a concurrent designation of Commercial Counsellor of the Embassy, left Shanghai a few days ago to return to Canada. This leaves a Junior Trade Commissioner of the Department of Trade and Commerce and a Junior Secretary of the Department of External Affairs in Shanghai.

2. Shanghai is the greatest city in East Asia, with a population of seven million. It is the commercial, financial, industrial, news distribution and radio centre of China. The majority of Canadian commercial interests are concentrated there. Regardless of any change in Government, Shanghai will retain its importance. The city faces a grave period ahead as the Communists have already extended their power to the north bank of the Yangtze River and are threatening an early crossing.

3. Under these circumstances it seems wise to have a senior and experienced officer of the Department in charge of the Shanghai Office. Dr. G.S. Patterson, who served as Counsellor in Chungking, Nanking and Tokyo and as Canadian Representative on the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, is available to go to Shanghai immediately. In order to give a status that would parallel that of other foreign consular representatives in Shanghai and that would enable him to deal satisfactorily with the local Chinese authorities it is proposed that he should be designated Consul General. He would occupy existing office space and would not require additional staff. The Department of Trade and Commerce concurs in this appointment.

4. The Honourable T.C. Davis, Canadian Ambassador to China, expects to sail from Shanghai on May 26 to return to Canada for consultation and a short period of leave. In order that Dr. Patterson may reach China before Mr. Davis leaves it has been tentatively arranged, pending Cabinet approval of his appointment, that he should sail from San Francisco on April 29.⁶

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH LATIN-AMERICAN COUNTRIES

You will recall that during the course of the visit of the Colombian Foreign Minister to Ottawa last July, Dr. Zuleta brought up the question of an exchange of diplomatic missions between Canada and Colombia. You then asked that a general review be made of our commitments to open new posts in Latin America, in order to ascertain how Dr. Zuleta's request fitted in.

2. Of those Latin-American countries with which we have not as yet exchanged missions, there remain only three to which I think we need give serious consideration: Uruguay, Colombia, and Venezuela. With Uruguay and Colombia we have already made definite commitments, whereas with Venezuela the question has been discussed without any firm promise being made on our part. The position with regard to these three countries is briefly as follows:—

I. Uruguay

3. The establishment of diplomatic relations with Uruguay was approved in 1944 by the then Prime Minister after receiving an official request from the Uruguayan Government. That government was informed that "we would be glad to receive a mission from the Government of Uruguay on the understanding that we should reciprocate when circumstances permit." In April 1947 the Uruguayan government again raised the question and upon receiving an answer in similar terms proceeded with the appointment of a Minister, Dr. Cesar Montero, who presented his credentials in March 1948.

4. The case for early reciprocation can be set forth as follows:

(a) It is now nearly two years since the Uruguayan Minister arrived in Ottawa and any further delay in reciprocation is likely to cause offence. Furthermore, it will be difficult to explain to the Uruguayan authorities our inability to reciprocate for the present either on grounds of lack of personnel or for budgetary reasons, or both, should we first exchange missions with Colombia and Venezuela.

Approved by Cabinet on April 12, 1949.

(b) Uruguay has a good record of democratic and progressive government, exceeding by far that of any other Latin-American country, and during the war was consistently anti-Axis in sentiment. It has always had strong sentimental ties with the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth. It has also become a home for political refugees from Argentina, and as such would be a useful post to supplement reports received from that country.

(c) Uruguay is generally acknowledged to be, with Cuba, one of the two most important centres of communist activity in Latin America and the Soviet Legation in Montevideo the principal centre from which Communist parties in the various Latin-American countries receive their instructions, propaganda, finance, etc. A mission in this capital would therefore be valuable in attempting to keep track of such activities.

(d) The only Canadian representative accredited to Uruguay is a Trade Commissioner who resides in Buenos Aires. His position would be greatly enhanced by according him diplomatic status in respect of Uruguay.

(e) Canadian trade with this country has increased appreciably over the past years, as will be seen from the following figures:

Year	Imported from Uruguay	Exported to Uruguay
1926	$ 88,134	$ 3,092,984
1936	116,535	405,293
1941	688,378	930,610
1946	617,552	2,670,524
1948	714,218	11,200,925

In 1948, the total trade between Canada and Uruguay was greater than Canada's total trade with either Peru or Chile, with whom we already have diplomatic relations.

(f) The principal Canadian interest in Uruguay is the Royal Bank of Canada, which enjoys a good reputation in banking and commercial circles.

5. In considering the manner in which we might proceed, there are three possible courses:

(a) Establishment of a joint mission with Argentina.

(b) Establishment of separate post with a separate Minister, or placed initially under a Chargé d'Affaires as we did in Stockholm.

(c) Accreditation of the Ambassador in Buenos Aires as Minister to Uruguay but with an office in Montevideo under a Chargé d'Affaires, except during those periods of time when the Minister would be in Montevideo.

6. It is not felt that (a) would provide an adequate solution. When we had such a mission for Argentina and Chile, the absence of a resident officer in Santiago caused inconvenience for all concerned: The Chilean Government, the Canadian colony, the British Embassy, and the Legation itself. Moreover, when in 1944 we first agreed to an exchange of missions, we informed the Uruguayan Government that we expected to accredit the same Canadian representative to Montevideo and Buenos Aires; our intention was apparently interpreted as meaning that no office would be maintained in Montevideo and the Uruguayan Government did not view this suggestion favourably. When, in April 1947, the Uruguayan government once again raised the question, no reference was made to sharing a Head of Mission with Argentina, and shortly after Dr. Montero was appointed Minister.

7. Course (b) would, of course, be the ideal, but would involve a greater expenditure. It is estimated that a mission on this basis would cost in the neighbourhood of $50,000 annually. In addition to a Minister, the mission would require an F.S.O. I or II, two Canadian stenographers, and the usual locally engaged personnel (bilingual stenographer, messenger boy, receptionist, etc.).

8. Course (c) might provide a temporary solution, but in view of Uruguay's previous attitude it would be desirable, if you agree, to make an approach through the Uruguayan Minister here in order to ascertain whether this course would be acceptable, emphasizing that this arrangement would be but a temporary one and that for the moment it would not be possible to appoint a resident Minister. Such an arrangement, which would call for an F.S.O. III or IV as Chargé d'Affaires (with one Canadian stenographer and locally engaged staff), it is estimated would cost approximately $32,000 annually.⁷

II. Colombia

9. Colombia first requested an exchange of diplomatic missions in 1942. After receiving repeated requests, the Prime Minister agreed in November 1947 to the establishment of a Colombian diplomatic mission in Ottawa on the understanding that no assurance could be given with regard to the date of the establishment of a Canadian mission in Bogota. This invitation was communicated to the Colombian Government. A further request made in the form of a telegram from the President of Colombia to the Prime Minister was received in February, 1948 and in replying we reiterated our previous invitation and added that insofar as reciprocation was concerned, this "may prove feasible sometime in 1949". The Colombian Government took no action with regard to this renewed invitation but apparently have not lost sight of the matter, since Dr. Zuleta raised the question in the course of his conversation with you. You replied to the effect that you hoped it would be possible for us to make arrangements to establish a mission in Bogota in the near future. Since Dr. Zuleta's visit to Ottawa, we have again been approached by him through our Ambassador in Washington. On that occasion, Mr. Wrong replied in the same vein.

10. When the question of an exchange of missions with Colombia was previously considered, it was suggested that we establish a joint mission with Venezuela. Discreet inquiries, however, revealed that Colombia and Venezuela would only be willing to share an Ambassador provided he were to reside permanently in their respective capitals. It is therefore assumed that we should only consider a separate mission in Bogota. The case for this mission may be stated as follows:

I think we should try this LB P[earson]

(a) Colombia ranks as the fourth largest nation in Latin America and until recently had a good record of internal stability and democratic government. At the present moment, in common with other Latin-American nations, it is facing serious economic difficulties stemming principally from the shortage of exchange, inflation, and high living costs. However, observers are generally agreed that once these difficulties have been overcome, the country will develop rapidly and in the long run will rank next to Argentina and Brazil among the leading Latin-American republics. During the war, Colombia had a consistent anti-Axis record and was among the first South American republics to sign the United Nations Declaration.

(b) Canada has substantial economic interests in Colombia. Canadian firms operating in this country include the Tropical Oil Company, a subsidiary of the International Petroleum Company of Toronto, the Royal Bank of Canada (four branches), the Confederation Life Assurance Company, the Pato Consolidated Gold Dredging of Vancouver, capitalized at $5,000,000, and the Nechi Consolidated Gold Dredging of Vancouver, capitalized at $4,000,000.

(c) Canada's trade with Colombia in 1948 totalled over $16,000,000, more than double our total trade with both Chile and Peru. In this respect, Colombia ranks seventh as a Latin-American market. The Department of Trade and Commerce consider that Colombia will eventually prove a more important market for Canadian goods than Cuba, Chile and Peru. As a whole, Canada's trade with Colombia in recent years has shown a substantial increase, as the following table will show:

Year	Imports from Colombia	Exports to Colombia
1926	$ 1,040,408	$1,019,034
1931	5,051,350	648,911
1936	4,669,526	1,064,660
1941	12,912,526	1,791,755
1946	9,708,416	8,930,005
1948	8,667,804	8,406,104

The principal commodity which Canada imports from Colombia is coffee. The principal Canadian exports are newsprint, aluminum products, machinery and wheat.

(d) There are approximately 250 Canadian citizens resident in Colombia. The majority of these are employees of the firms mentioned in (b) above.

(e) Of late, there has been a considerable increase in consular work, which in the absence of a Canadian diplomatic mission has to be handled by the British Embassy (the Trade Commissioner's office, however, handles passport work). An additional burden is therefore being placed on the British Embassy which is already short of staff.

(f) There is a great deal of goodwill for Canada in Colombian business and governmental circles. In part, this goodwill stems from a long historical attachment to Great Britain and the British Commonwealth; it also arises from an admiration of Canada's war effort by a population only a little larger than Colombia's. The office of the Trade Commissioner in Bogota is repeatedly being called upon to answer queries concerning Canada and requests for assistance in placing students in Canadian schools and universities. At the present moment there are approximately 125 such students in Canada.

11. On the basis of current costs, it is estimated that the annual expenditure necessary for an Embassy in Bogota would be approximately $55,000. The establishment would be made up of a head of Mission, 1 F.S.O. I or II, two Canadian stenographers, 1 locally engaged stenographer, 1 locally engaged clerk, and a messenger boy.

III. Venezuela

12. Venezuela has been particularly pressing in its request and in July 1946 the Prime Minister authorized a circumstantial communication to the Venezuelan Government, stating that "it would be much more convenient from the point of view of the Canadian Government if the opening of the Venezuelan mission might be delayed for a short time. The Canadian Government will then be in a better position to receive a mission from Venezuela—the appointment of which it would cordially welcome and which the Canadian Government would wish to avail itself of an early opportunity to reciprocate."

13. On the occasion of the inauguration of President Gallegos of Venezuela in February last year, Mr. Strong, as Special Ambassador, on instructions assured the Venezuelan Foreign Minister that "we have Venezuela very much in mind" and that "we sincerely hope that 1949 might find us in a position to consider definite action."

14. The case for an exchange of missions with Venezuela may be set forth as follows:

(a) Canada has substantial economic interests in Venezuela. The Royal Bank of Canada operates three branches. There are also local offices of the Confederation Life Assurance Company of Canada, and the Crown Life Insurance Company. In the field of petroleum, International Petroleum has a share interest in properties operated by the Mene Grande Oil Company, a subsidiary of Gulf Corporation. Canadian mining companies which own concessions are Guayana Mines Limited (Ventures Limited of Toronto), the International Nickel Company, the Asbestos Corporation, the Patrick Mining Company (New York and Toronto). In addition, the C.A. Energia Electrica de Venezuela is controlled by Canadian capital and there is a large Canadian capital investment in the Industrial and Development Corporation of Venezuela.

(b) There has been a substantial increase in the volume of trade for the past ten years. It is not expected in the predictable future that Venezuela will encounter any exchange difficulties. Venezuela as a result has become Canada's best export market in Latin America. The modus vivendi signed in 1941 has now expired and it is possible that the Venezuelan Government will ask for the establishment of diplomatic relations as one of the conditions for its renewal. At the present moment

Venezuela is Canada's principal supplier of petroleum. Following are comparative trade figures:

Year	Imported from Venezuela	Exported to Venezuela
1938	$ 1,469,000	$ 1,256,000
1948	94,758,000	16,935,000

(c) Owing to the latent discordance between Colombia and Venezuela, it would be desirable to establish diplomatic relations with both countries at the same time. These two countries are equally proud of their position in the Latin-American economy and of their recent material progress.

(d) The fact that we already have a Consulate General in Caracas has served to identify Canada as an independent nation, but the Consul General as such does not of course enjoy the same status or facilities as would the head of a diplomatic mission, and is therefore unable to conduct negotiations with the Foreign Office as would be desirable.

15. It is estimated that the annual cost of an Embassy in Caracas would be approximately $90,000. The establishment would include in addition to the Head of Mission, an F.S.O. I or II, two Canadian stenographers, and the usual locally engaged personnel.

16. Recommendations

(a) Since the Uruguayans have already opened a Legation in Ottawa, I think we have a prior obligation to reciprocate with them before establishing relations with either Colombia or Venezuela.⁸

(b) While a case might be made for opening up more or less simultaneously in the three capitals, there are certain political reasons in favour of leaving over the question of establishment of relations with these two countries for reconsideration in six months' time.⁹ At the present moment, Venezuela is governed by a three-man military junta which, while not wholly reactionary, is certainly not liberal in its policies and attitudes. It imposes, for example, a strict censorship of the press and Congress does not function. Recent developments in Colombia—declaration of a state of siege, the imposition of censorship and the closing of Congress and so forth—are of such a nature that I do not think this would be a propitious time to announce the establishment of relations. Such a postponement would also enable us to consider both countries simultaneously as would be desirable, once we have been able to regularize our position with regard to Uruguay.

17. I should be grateful to know whether you agree with the above recommendations and particularly whether you think the Uruguayan Minister should be approached along the lines indicated in paragraph 6.

OPENING OF HUNGARIAN AND POLISH CONSULATES IN TORONTO

On June 2, 1949, the Hungarian Charge d'Affaires in London enquired if the Canadian government would agree to the setting up of a Hungarian Consulate in Toronto. In February 1948, we had stated that if the Hungarian Government wished to open a consulate general in Ottawa we would extend the usual facilities, but we would not be prepared to reciprocate.

2. The Polish Legation here in a note of March 30, expressed the wish to establish a consulate in Toronto (to be responsible for the Provinces of Ontario and Newfoundland (sic)) to take the place of the Consular Division of the Polish Legation in Ottawa.

3. In considering what replies should be given to these two requests, we consulted the State Department and the Foreign Office and also asked the R.C.M.P. for a report on the activities of Communist missions in Canada. We learned from the United Kingdom Foreign Office that it would normally accede to such requests. The State Department, on the other hand, told us that their policy normally was not to permit the establishment of new consular posts in the United States by the Soviet Union or any satellite government. The Commissioner of the R.C.M.P. informed us in a letter of June 29, a copy of which I attach†, that Communist missions in Canada are actively engaged in spreading propaganda, particularly among foreign language groups, and that Toronto is the best location for this type of work.

4. I decided that we should refuse the requests of Hungary and Poland to open consulates in Toronto. In view of our earlier agreement, however, I felt we should allow Hungary to open a consulate in Ottawa.¹⁰ I attach for your information despatches No. 1636† and No. 1637† to London and Note No. 34† to the Polish Minister in Ottawa, dated July 28, relating to these decisions.

5. We have been examining, concurrently with the Hungarian request for consular representation in Canada, a proposal submitted by the Hungarian Legation in London to the Canadian High Commissioner to extend the jurisdiction of their commercial attache to commercial matters in Canada. I attach copies of telegrams Nos. 2039 of October 27 from London,† 1896 of October 27 to London,† and 2050 of October 28 from London.† No. 2039 informs us that applications had been received by the United Kingdom Minister in Budapest for Canadian diplomatic entry visas for a Hungarian, Janos Balasz and his wife. Balasz wished to travel to Canada to take up an appointment with the Hungarian Consulate at Montreal and the Hungarian Chargé d'Affaires was to call at Canada House the next day October 28.

2. In despatch 1636 of July 28† we informed our High Commissioner in London that the Canadian Government would have no objection if Hungary wished to open a consular office in Ottawa, but did not wish to have a Hungarian consulate in Toronto, which they had requested on June 2, 1949. When the Minister discussed this matter with you on August 2, he said that he was not anxious that a Hungarian Consulate be opened in Ottawa. If a note had already gone from Canada House to the Hungarian Legation in London therefore, we should pursue a policy of maximum administrative delay in giving effect to the agreement. As we were able to have the High Commissioner postpone taking action on despatch No. 1636, the views contained in it were not transmitted to the Hungarian authorities in London.

3. When the Hungarian Counsellor called at Canada House on October 28 he left a note and an aide memoire informing the High Commissioner that the Hungarian Government have appointed Mr. Janos Balasz as Consul General for Canada. The Hungarians have evidently taken the line that in March 1948 the Government committed itself to permitting the establishment of a Hungarian Consulate General in Canada, although Mr. Robertson's letter of March 5, 1948 had referred specifically to Ottawa. Although Montreal is not mentioned in the aide memoire or note of October 28, it is given as the destination of the proposed Consul General in his request for visas, and this is the first indication we have had that the Hungarian government plan to establish a Consulate in Montreal.

4. I attach a draft despatch, for your signature if you agree, asking our High Commissioner to inform the Hungarians that we do not wish to have any Hungarian consulate in Canada.

My telegram No. 1896 of October 27† and your telegram No. 2050 of October 28. † Establishment of a Hungarian Consulate General in Canada.

2. Although our undertaking to receive a Hungarian Consul General in 1948 is admittedly somewhat embarrassing, we have good reason for reconsidering our position (see my Despatches No. 1407 of June 20† and No. 1636 of July 23†) and in the light of recent developments are under little or no obligation to their government. Macdonnell's application when Chargé d'Affaires in Prague for a visa in February was not answered. We are party to a dispute with Hungary over the implementation of the Peace Treaty. I do not wish therefore to consent to receive their Consul.

3. If you feel you are in a position to take a leaf from their book and stall the request of the Hungarians by withholding an answer of any kind, please feel free to do so. If, however, inaction is not feasible, I should be glad if you would inform the Legation that the whole policy of the Canadian Government with regard to the opening and location of foreign consulates in this country has been and is still under review and that in consequence the Canadian Government does not at this time agree to the establishment of a Hungarian Consulate in Canada.

ARGUMENTS FOR AND AGAINST MAINTAINING CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS IN SATELLITE COUNTRIES¹¹

1. In a recent endeavour in the Department to determine the value to this country of our diplomatic missions abroad, the functions that might be fulfilled by them were separated according to the following:

(a) Reporting, interpreting, and anticipating political and economic development;

(b) Acting for the government and government Departments (negotiating business, making enquiries, immigration work, etc.);

(c) Representational work: appearance at ceremonies, speaking for and about Canada, showing the flag in general;

(d) Consular work;

(e) Information work.

2. The question now arises: do our posts in Warsaw, Prague and Belgrade justify their very considerable cost by the extent to which they fulfil their functions?

3. A negative answer might be given on the following grounds:

(1) Political and economic reporting and interpretation could be adequately or even better done from United Kingdom, and occasionally United States, sources and by the continuous study of printed sources.

(2) The interpretation of events from a Canadian standpoint which is so important in posts like Washington and Paris is much less so in Eastern Europe where the Canadian view is generally apt to be similar to that of the United Kingdom.

(3) The day-to-day business to be transacted with satellite Governments and in their countries on behalf of the Government is sufficiently slight and infrequent to be conducted easily through United Kingdom missions as is now done, for example, in Bulgaria, Roumania and Hungary, where we have no missions.

(4) Canadian consular work could be satisfactorily handled through United Kingdom offices or, alternatively, through Canadian consular offices alone.

This draft memorandum was prepared at Heeney's request and forwarded to Reid for comments on November 17, 1949. A more specific assessment of Canadian representation in Czechoslovakia and Poland was prepared in February 1950.

(5) Canada has no missions in Roumania, Hungary and Bulgaria and appears to suffer no especial disability thereby.

(6) In general, Canadian economic and diplomatic interests in this area do not warrant the cost of diplomatic posts. It might be said with some truth that these arguments also apply to others of our smaller posts, for example, Peru, Chile, Cuba and Denmark.

4. On the affirmative side we might say that it is only partly true that the Government would be adequately informed by using United Kingdom and other non-Canadian sources alone. In each of the three satellites, issues have arisen during the past year or two in which the Canadian Government had a particular concern because they were directly related in one way or another to Canadian interests. The Polish art collection, the religious persecutions, and the effect of Tito's movement on Canadian economic policy in Yugoslavia are cases in point. We cannot specify any one report or set of reports from our representatives which may be said to have shaped Canadian policy on these matters directly, but in preparing policy material the despatches and reports accumulated in the Department and the ability to consult our diplomatic representatives on particular points have been useful. Both in the countries themselves and at the United Nations it has been possible to make our position clearer and firmer as a result of having our own diplomatic sources.

5. Our representatives are also useful in welcoming and steering Canadian travelers, in making enquiries about individuals, and in immigration matters where for special reasons responsible discretion is required. These services are seldom urgent or spectacular, but occasions do arise when it is most desirable to have a Canadian representative who can act quickly at the diplomatic level.

6. There is little or no representational work, strictly speaking, in the satellite countries, but the maintenance of a diplomatic mission is proof that the Canadian government does not regard the satellites as doomed to remain permanently behind the Curtain. It preserves one more link between them and the Western world. The mission is also evidence of a common policy of representation with the other North Atlantic countries which maintain offices there and the closing of our missions now might have unfortunate implications. In fact, the difficulty of withdrawing our diplomatic representation is far from being an insignificant reason for keeping them open. Economy could hardly be urged as a reason when we retain some of the others, or contemplate opening new posts let us say at the Vatican or in Uruguay. Withdrawal would be regarded as the severance of diplomatic relations.

7. Consular work is not great in Yugoslavia and it may decrease. The office is visited, however, by many Yugoslavs who vainly seek to return or go to Canada. In Prague and Warsaw immigration work takes up the major part of the time of the Legations and the volume is too large to be handed over to the British Embassies. To replace the mission with a consulate would not reduce the cost materially and would deprive it of its diplomatic weight. It would also deprive the offices of the protection, rations, customs and other privileges which go with diplomatic status and are so necessary to maintain any sort of tolerable living in "Transcurtainia." At the same time it must be remembered that consular work at these posts may diminish considerably.

8. These missions are unable to perform any appreciable amount of the normal information work. They have been, however, and should become more useful in estimating the value of the programmes of the C.B.C. International Service and in assisting us to advise the C.B.C. about the content and direction of these programmes. We are also informed that Canadian films could be put to good use with small private audiences if they were available.

9. These considerations are based on a comparatively short view of the utility of the missions. In the longer run, there is even more value in building up in the Department a Canadian body of knowledge about the satellite area. As has been suggested above, particular points of policy either in the countries themselves or at the United Nations are materially conditioned by the continuous study of material from those parts in the Department and the sense of actuality created by having direct and immediate contact with our diplomatic representative. By way of illustration and in contrast to this is our position in the Middle East area. Here the making of recommendations on policy is hampered by the fact that we have no body of observation and comment gathered from one or more Canadian representatives through which we can consider matters from a Canadian point of view.

10. Another valuable consequence of these missions is that they are excellent training ground for officers of the Department in an environment whose outlook and development is of great significance. It should be a first charge on the time of an officer to learn the language of the country. Moreover, the more people we have with the experience and knowledge of the Communist way of life and some of the individuals behind the Curtain the better, again especially at the United Nations and international conferences where we sit with representatives of the Communist world.

11. It is difficult to foresee when posts of this kind will assume new and added importance. At one time, for example, the Yugoslavian post appeared to be the most obvious candidate for closure, but that situation has changed and it is now probably as important a mission as any of the three. With the creation of a new East German state and the foreshadowing of a new type of aggression by Soviet Russia in the absorption of the Eastern countries we may soon be confronted with new circumstances in Poland and Czechoslovakia. A last but perhaps not unimportant point is that the maintenance of these missions gives breadth and interest to our foreign service in its own right and offers a special field for Foreign Service Officers who are attracted by or have special aptitude for work in that part of the world.

12. The question is one of principle as well as practical return on money spent. An independent foreign service as widespread as possible is both a symbol and the working instrument of our position in the world. It is not apparent that that position is growing any less in importance. To maintain it we should, I think, defend the potential as well as the actual and immediate utility of our missions behind the Curtain.

13. The cogency of many of the arguments for maintaining the posts is directly related to the rank and ability of the head of the mission.

14. Mr. Macdonnell and Mr. Kirkwood have both recommended strongly that new consideration be given to appointing Ministers to Prague and Warsaw. The main reasons suggested are as follows:

(a) A Minister carries more authority, and has freer access to officials and governments.

(b) The subordinate rank of Chargé tends to reflect on the standing and capabilities of the incumbent.

(c) Canadian prestige suffers. Status is important in these countries, and the appointment of a Chargé d'Affaires suggests hesitancy and lack of interest on the part of the Canadian Government.

(d) In critical times like these the more weight the mission carries the better.

(e) Poland and Czechoslovakia Catholic and bourgeois are both of great potential interest and importance to us in the war against Russian domination.

(f) Of the 19 diplomatic missions from the Western world in Prague, 4 have ambassadors (U.K., U.S., France and India), 12 have Ministers, and 3 (Greece, Uruguay and Canada) have Chargé d'Affaires in situ.

(g) The cost would not be appreciably greater.

15. There is some reason to think that our understanding of the real situation in these countries is still inadequate. Contacts with non-official persons are rarely made. Yet from the people of these countries (Poland and Czechoslovakia in particular) peasants, professional classes, churchmen, technicians, etc., there is much useful information to be had, of an economic and social kind.

16. The posts therefore call for lively imagination and great energy if they are to be fully used. Hence the importance of selecting Heads of Mission and their staff with especial care.

Décret

Order in Council

[Ottawa], November 22, 1949

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 16th November, 1949, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing:

(a) That in view of the establishment of the Federal Republic of Germany in the three Western Zones of occupation, and the intention of the occupying powers to vest in the government of the Federal Republic of Germany increasing responsibility for the conduct of its own affairs, and in view of the fact that the Allied Control Council, to which Canada's present military mission in Germany is accredited, is no longer exercising authority, it is expedient to accredit a mission for the purpose of protecting and maintaining Canadian interests in the Federal Republic of Germany;

(b) That the head of this mission should be accredited to the Council of the Allied High Commission and have access to its subordinate bodies and, through the Allied High Commission, to the government of the Federal Republic of Germany;

(c) That this mission should be established at or near the provisional seat of the government of the Federal Republic of Germany in Bonn as soon as it is expedient to so do;

(d) That the Minister has approved the designation of Lieutenant-General Maurice Pope as Head of Mission; and

(e) That Lieutenant-General Pope should continue to be Head of the Canadian Military Mission in Berlin and, as such, continue to be accredited to the Allied Control Authority.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, advise:

(1) That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorised to organize a mission with authority to protect and maintain Canadian interests within the Federal Republic of Germany and to do such other things as may be referred to it by the Secretary of State for External Affairs;

(2) That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be responsible for the Canadian Military Mission in Berlin and that the Head of Mission in the Federal Republic of Germany be, ex officio, Head of the Canadian Military Mission in Berlin;

(3) That the Head of the Mission in the Federal Republic of Germany (ex officio Head of the Canadian Military Mission in Berlin) exercise general supervisory powers over all officials and representatives of the Canadian Government normally resident in Germany to the same extent and in the same manner as if he occupied the position of an Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary;

(4) That Lieutenant-General Maurice Pope be named the Head of the Mission in the Federal Republic of Germany and be accredited to the Council of the Allied High Commission.

EXCHANGE OF AMBASSADORS WITH IRELAND

40. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that Ireland wished to exchange Ambassadors with Canada, and had asked if Canada would be willing to receive a representative having this designation.

Other Commonwealth Governments had been consulted by Canada and the U.K. had expressed the hope that the Canadian Government would be able to defer decision on the matter until the whole question of designation of Commonwealth representatives had been discussed at the forthcoming Colombo Conference.

It was difficult to refuse the Irish request, since Ireland was not a member of the Commonwealth and had only asked if Canada was willing to receive an Ambassador. It was accordingly proposed to inform them of the Canadian Government's concurrence. No change in the designation of the Canadian High Commissioner to Ireland would be made immediately.

41. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the request of the Government of Ireland for the exchange of "Ambassadors" rather than "High Commissioners" be approved in principle; the timing and other details to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

ISRAELI CONSULAR REPRESENTATION IN CANADA

In his telephone message on March 2 concerning Israeli membership in the United Nations, Dr. Eliahu Elath, Ambassador of Israel in Washington, raised with Riddell, who took the message for me, the question of Israeli consular representation in Montreal. Elath reminded Riddell that he had mentioned the matter during his visit to Ottawa on February 7 and said that he had now received instructions from his Government to ask again if the Canadian Government would be willing to receive an Israeli Consul in Montreal. He said that the Israeli Government was anxious to establish this office for commercial reasons.

2. I should be grateful if you would inform Elath that the Canadian Government would be willing to receive, through the Canadian Embassy in Washington, a formal request from the Government of Israel for the recognition [of] a designated official as Israeli Consul in Montreal. Canadian Government is prepared to grant to an acceptable official, through the same channel provisional recognition as Consul pending the issue by the President of Israel of a Commission of Appointment and the granting by the Governor General of an exequatur.

3. When the question was first broached to us on February 7 we were not in a position to give an immediate affirmative answer. For your information, we regard the situation as having changed since March 4 when Canada voted in favour of the admission of Israel to the United Nations. This vote we regard as tantamount to de jure recognition, but we would not wish to make a statement to this effect at the present time. For your further information we do not consider that we should be precluded, either by our vote on March 4 in the Security Council or by the acceptance of an Israeli Consul, from voting against the admission of Israel to the United Nations when the question comes before the General Assembly in April should circumstances require it. Our de jure recognition of Israel in connection with the vote on March 4 and our acceptance of an Israeli Consul relate merely to the fact of statehood, which is not denied; the admission of Israel to the United Nations, however, depends on the fulfilment of other requirements beside statehood, which are set out in Article IV of the Charter. Israeli representatives have already been made aware of our view on this point. Accordingly in discussing this matter with Elath you might limit yourself to the statement contained in paragraph 2 above and not enlarge on the attendant considerations discussed in this paragraph. Neither should any reference be made to analogies between our position and that of the United Kingdom, since the presence of the United Kingdom Consuls in Israel is a consequence of the former position of the United Kingdom as mandatory power in Palestine and since the United Kingdom has taken no action yet which is tantamount to recognition.

OPENING OF A TRADE COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE IN MADRID

8. Mr. MacDermot reported that the Department of Trade and Commerce had proposed the opening of a Trade Commissioner's office in Madrid.¹²

9. In view of the Canadian attitude towards the Franco Government and the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly asking members to recall heads of diplomatic missions from Madrid, there is the possibility that the appointment of a Trade Commissioner might be misinterpreted as a step towards the opening of diplomatic relations or at least to the establishment of a Canadian Consulate in Madrid. Since the commercial considerations have been judged to be more cogent than the political disadvantages, the Minister has concurred in the proposal of Trade and Commerce.

10. It is undesirable that any special publicity be given to this appointment, but a press release will probably be necessary. It has been suggested to Trade and Commerce that a general release, summarizing Trade and Commerce appointments and listing new offices opened in 1949 might be an effective way of putting the Madrid appointment in its proper perspective.

Memorandum by Head, Consular Division

CONSULAR CONFERENCE

A conference of Canadian Consuls in the United States was held April 6–8, inclusive, at the Embassy at Washington under the auspices of the Ambassador. The Consuls General at New York, Chicago and San Francisco and the Consuls at Boston, Detroit and Washington attended. During a large part of the conference the Ambassador presided himself, being relieved from time to time by the Minister or the Chief of the Consular Division as seemed appropriate to the subjects under discussion. The Deputy Under-Secretary for External Affairs was also present throughout the discussions on April 6.

2. On opening morning there was discussion of subjects of topical importance when the Ambassador and his staff dealt with such questions as the “The Changing Position of the Commonwealth”—India, Pakistan, Ireland: The North Atlantic Security Pact; Newfoundland and her Admission to Confederation and The St. Lawrence Seaway. The afternoon was devoted to Canadian Trade Promotion at consular posts in which discussion was led by the Director, Trade Commissioner Service and to The Part of Canada in the European Recovery Programme which was dealt with by the member of the Embassy staff in charge of that work.

3. The morning of the second day was reserved for discussion of purely Consular Problems and useful work was done in the exchange of views of those present. In the afternoon again under the direction of the Ambassador, there was fruitful discussion of the difficult problems surrounding Economic and Political Reporting by Consular Posts and the Relations existing between the Embassy and the Posts. The day closed with a discussion of the Canadian dollar position led by the Financial Counsellor.

4. On the third day the subjects were Information and Publicity—Films—Tourists—Immigration—Customs. In all these subjects the conference had the benefit of senior officials, including the Acting Head, Information Division, the Director of Distribution, National Film Board, the Director, Canadian Travel Bureau, the Director, Canadian Exhibition Commission and the Director of Immigration.

5. This was the first conference of Canadian Consular officials ever held. Lessons were learned from which improvements can be devised for future occasions. For example, the schedule as planned was throughout a little too tight. More time could very usefully have been taken on the subject of information and Publicity. On the whole, however, the conference can justly be regarded as productive and useful. The highly desirable aim of welding all Canadian representation in the United States into one team under the leadership of the Head of the Mission has (it may be hoped) been advanced. If that hope is realized, it alone will be ample justification of the conference. Doubtless the Ambassador will be reporting on the conference from his standpoint. It may be anticipated that he will recommend that such a conference be held annually.

6. If it is not inappropriate to do so here, I should like to record my own personal appreciation of the very keen interest which the Ambassador in particular and his staff took in the conference. It was a major contributing factor to what I regard as its success. Similarly, I should like to record the thanks of the visitors for the warm welcome and generous hospitality which was shown to them.

Consul en charge, Boston, au chef, direction consulaire
Consul-in-Charge, Boston, to Head, Consular Division

CONFIDENTIAL

Boston, October 31, 1949

RE: THE FUNCTIONS OF A CONSULATE

Dear Mr. Chance:

At long last, I am free to attempt a considered answer to your exacting queries regarding the objectives towards which Canadian consular activity in the United States should work. Since the multiplicity of detail in the endeavor of any one consular post is great, and since satisfaction of at least one portion of your request requires enumeration of activities which enable the Canadian taxpayer to see practical and tangible results, the task you have set is one of some difficulty and complexity. Each day's effort sets in motion a wide variety of services, and, it is to be hoped, produces a consequent harvest of achievement and good-will. Frequently, when the harvest seems to be only good-will, that result is nevertheless productive of subsequent tangible benefit, or sets up a chain-reaction which leads to it. Accordingly, the measurement of visible and immediate results means the measurement of only one portion of a consulate's service, and sometimes only of the portion which is routine and minor.

In part, you have asked for a review of those features of consular activity which could be considered by anyone unfamiliar with the work as justification for its existence. In part, you have asked for the opinion of your men in the field as to what projects, demanding imagination and initiative in greater measure than those needed in daily routine, should be selected as objectives for the future. If my interpretation of your request is correct, you are asking, therefore, for an analysis of what we do and, following that, an opinion of what we should do. If my reply to the former too often seems to be a laboring of the obvious or a restatement of your own consular instructions, and, if my discussion of the latter sound like the vapourings of a former embassy public relations officer, your blood must be to a large extent on your own unfortunate head.

Feeling, also, that what you want is a discussion of the U.S. consular establishment as a whole rather than the activities of the Boston Consulate in particular, I shall confine myself as much as possible to generalities, and call upon happenings of the first year of our Boston experience only by way of illustration.

In terms of history, we have travelled far from the days when the consular post of any nation was merely concerned with matters of trade. Trade assistance, trade information and negotiation constitute important features of the work of any consulate, and are of vital importance in considering the work of any Canadian consulate in the United States, but inevitably the full usefulness of a Canadian consulate must be the fruit of its capacity for varied and versatile performance.

In many ways, a consulate can be said to resemble a minor embassy or a legation. It, too, represents its country in a given foreign district. It must be prepared to serve the wishes of any and all departments of the Canadian government (even when transmitted through External) and to negotiate locally for them, if necessary. It serves as an observation post with regard to the areas under its jurisdiction. It has lower-level representational duties similar to those with which, at a higher level, an embassy is involved.

In lesser degree, prestige factors affect the establishment of consular representation abroad as of embassies and legations. In the larger cities of the world, where an increasing number of nations have set up consular representation, the absence of a Canadian consul may strengthen the suspicion that Canada has not reached the degree of international maturity which she professes. If there were no more pressing reason for the establishment of a Canadian post in a locality where a British consulate has traditionally represented us, the shouldering of our own responsibilities in that area, and the consequent local and visible proof of the present stature of Canada thereby presented constitute strong justification for such a venture.

If, in certain respects, a consular post resembles a minor embassy, nevertheless, in others, it differs from a senior post in more than mere matters of status and degree of importance. One of the aspects of its work most noticeably different either from that of an embassy or the Department in Ottawa is the closeness of its relationship to the general public. In one of your own writings on consular work, you have described a consulate as a "shop-window" of its country. This description seems to me to be apt, but insufficiently comprehensive. It is not only the shop-window, but also the shop behind the window. It not only advertises attractive wares, but it transacts business through salesmen who are in constant personal contact with a foreign public. For such reasons, consulates are, and should be, located only a few steps from the man on the street. For such reasons the decor of a consulate, the appearance of its personnel, the attitude of its staff towards the public, and the pains taken to serve the latter are factors important in making the post a force within its geographical area.

The realization that much consular work abroad is done verbally in the immediate presence of the "customer" seems at times to be absent from the consciousness of officials at home. I know very well that it is all too easy to think of a foreign post as merely a section of the Department in Ottawa transferred to a foreign location, but the techniques of operation differ in many ways, and I sometimes feel that the multiplicity of ingenious systems and procedures, the plethora of administrative returns and Gallup-poll reports demanded from the "branch store" abroad might be diminished in number, if the authors could see how much time is thereby raped from work normally to be considered the primary reason for the post's establishment. Your own understanding of these matters, as well as that of the ambassador, is comprehensive, and what I have just said in no way indicates any ignorance of the value of reports from the field to our own and other departments of the government; it merely suggests caution in keeping such demands to a minimum.

Generally speaking, I suppose that one could say that a consulate should act abroad for the government and people of Canada in a limited area mainly as an executive and negotiating instrument, a reporting instrument, and an advertising instrument.

Its services are mainly performed for three types of people: (1) visiting Canadians (2) residents within its jurisdiction who possess Canadian citizenship or who are of Canadian stock (3) in small degree, visiting nationals of other countries and (4) nationals of the country in which it is located. In the first category, the consulate may be called upon for protective services, for relief to the distressed, for investigation of the rights of deportees, for the resolution of a large volume of customs problems, for assistance to returning citizens, for local services to visiting Canadian officials and businessmen. For the second group, service is afforded in passport and immigration matters, in the registration of births, execution of documents, legal problems, estate rights, return of bodies of deceased, and, relief for hospitalized and distressed Canadian citizens. (Because of the adjacency of New England to Canada, a prominent part of our work in Boston has to do with problems of Canadian veterans or veterans of the Canadian armed services in both great wars—pension problems, repatriation, hospitalization expense. Some of these services must also be performed for the considerable number of American citizens in the district who have at one time or other served in the Canadian armed forces.)

For the benefit of people within this second category, the consulate should try to become the focus for Canadian activity within the area. Liaison should be established with Canadian organizations, such as Canadian Clubs, Canadian Women's Clubs, Daughters of Canada, the Canadian Legion, Newfoundland Society, Canadian student associations, etc. Their club functions should be attended, and help and advice requested should be given to them. Assistance in the provision of Canadian speakers, films and other forms of entertainment, should be provided when desired. A word of advice can frequently enable such groups to avoid policy pitfalls, but interference and dictation by the consul should be avoided as the plague. Care should be taken to see that representatives of such clubs are on the consulate entertainment list. The pride of such organizations in the decision of the Canadian government to provide a priest for their parish and a vestry for their use is one of the rewarding features of consular work. (In the Boston area, the comment of such people is understandably "This is wonderful, but why were we ignored so long?"). The consul should eventually seek out every Canadian organization, not only within the city where his consulate is located, but within his entire jurisdiction, and, as time permits, either he or a member of his staff should visit what may prove to be a surprising number of such clubs. The good-will created is likely to have its effect not only in the region, but, through letter and visit, on relatives and friends in Canada.

Services to people of other than Canadian or American stock are usually confined to immigration or tourist problems or may constitute assistance to consuls, diplomats, businessmen, journalists and V.I.P.'s of other countries who intend to visit Canada. This category locally is not as small as might be expected, since Boston is a seaport and an international airport. The recent submissions here of a Fiji Islander who wished to settle in Canada posed an interesting problem.

Naturally enough, dealings with American citizens occupy most of our time, and in this fourth category come immigration queries requiring decisions of nationality, customs queries, requests for information by would-be Canadian settlers, trade queries, requests for the legalization of documents and a flood of general informational and touristic services.

Trade

With a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce now on hand at each U.S. consular post, the activities of the trade commissioner service should produce results more concretely measurable than many other facets of a consulate's work, although the end results of such activities are not always likely to be as immediately determinable in financial terms as that of a recent New England order for ten million feet of rock maple placed with Canadian dealers through the efforts of this consulate. As outlined in Foreign Trade magazine for March 6, 1948, the work of the trade member of the consulate staff embraces assistance of a great many kinds to manufacturers, exporters and importers on both side of the border. In general, he advises local buyers of the supply position and sources of Canadian products and informs Canadian buyers of the supply position and sources of products within the consulate's geographical jurisdiction. He publicizes Canadian products by speeches, movies, personal contacts and distribution of literature. He advises business visitors from Canada and local businessmen regarding trips to Canada. He acts as liaison with local business and trade organizations. As required, he makes representations to municipal, state and federal officials within the jurisdiction. He watches developing commercial situations of interest to Canada, and reports on them by despatches or by articles in Foreign Trade magazine. He busies himself with the promotion of the International Trade Fair in every way possible. He gives information to the public on general business and commercial queries concerning Canada. One of the most satisfactory forms of his endeavor is assistance and advice given to local firms or individuals who may wish to set up business in Canada or to establish a branch plant above the border.

With the need for greater export of Canadian products and services to the United States, the direct importance of the trade commissioner's efforts should be immediately visible. With New England sympathetic to the importation of many Canadian products and with many of these now obtainable at the "revalued" price, the opportunities for fruitful activity are endless, and limited only by the number of demands on the trade commissioner's time.

Up to this point, I have been enumerating the normal functions of consular work which in the main are "concrete", neo-traditional and routine. They are for the most part "services" given in answer to outside requests, and success lies in satisfactory compliance to demand.

There is, however, a very large area of consular work which depends upon "promotional" effort and calls forth such qualities as ingenuity, imagination and initiative. Its possibilities must be sought out and explored, rather than merely awaited. It is an area which embraces the advertising function, whereby the consulate directly or indirectly advertises a remarkable product called "Canada". It embraces what is commercially known as the field of public relations. It includes what has become known by governments as informational activities. It comprises excursions into international education and the furtherance of international cultural exchange. It makes of the consular agent the publicity director of a campaign for the better knowledge of the country he represents and a missionary for the correction of bias, distortion and misconception and for the creation of good-will. Its tangible results are frequently hard to evaluate, since they are likely to appear only in secondary and later consequences. The immediate result may be the creation of an impetus, of a desire, of a predisposition,—perhaps to visit Canada as a tourist, perhaps to settle as an immigrant, perhaps to do business in such a country, perhaps merely to become more familiar with Canadians and treat them with respect and affection, to accept their products and seek out their culture. In general, it aims to create or further that favourable climate of opinion towards things Canadian which may nourish results of direct worth but results frequently difficult of immediate assessment.

The immensely profitable field of information abroad holds endless possibilities for fruitful work and is only limited in its scope by the time, initiative and resources available. Within the consulate, the answering of general information requests, the dissemination of literature to office visitors, and the research sometimes necessary for the satisfaction of specialized queries occupies in itself a liberal amount of time. The dispensing of tourist information and literature (of direct value in its siphoning of American dollars into Canada) is in the Boston Consulate not undertaken by a specialist but included among the general information responsibilities of the office. (With the addition to our staff of Major R.H. Tait, former Newfoundland Publicity Director, as Attache, we are, nevertheless, equipped to handle in a specialized way the growing volume of tourist queries about Newfoundland).

One form of consular information activity to which (usually because of space limitations) insufficient attention has been paid in the past is the establishment of some sort of library-reading room stocked with books on Canada (and not merely our standard works), with an adequate number of representative Canadian newspapers, Canadian periodicals, pamphlets and reference books. The information division of the Department is now co-operating liberally and intelligently in the supply of such materials and with these resources at hand, the staff is able, without fear, to invite journalists, teachers, scholars, researchers and, in fact, anyone interested in Canada to visit the Consulate and browse among its Canadiana. The materials should be kept under the strict care of someone deputed as librarian, but can valuably be used for display purposes or for study by interested organizations.

Naturally, because of previous personal experience in the information field, I feel strongly that its rich soil extends in every direction and merely awaits cultivation, but rather than try your patience by extravagant elaboration, I shall try to enumerate briefly certain types of informational projects, where, if time and staff permit, the expanded activity of any consulate can bring profitable result.

(1) Press Relations

A highly specialized but also highly rewarding field. One story in print can reach, and sometimes influence, thousands of people. Press confidence is to be gained through personal association, through care in the form and timing of releases (not too prolix, not too often, not too demanding, especially when release is not really news) through tips for stories when possible, through careful and liberal research when sought, through simple, candid, but judicious background analysis when desired.

Careful promotion can increase the volume of news, articles, and editorials about Canada in the area press and, in money terms, can stimulate thousands of dollars worth of free publicity.

Occasionally, if sufficient assistance is offered, local newspapers can be persuaded to publish whole supplements on Canada or some Canadian theme, e.g., Boston Herald supplement on International Trade Fair.

(2) Radio and Television

Many of the same considerations apply, but the personal factor necessarily becomes more prominent. Press releases should always go to radio stations. The consul should encourage radio programs on Canada, and be ready to participate in interviews and forums, even when the topic to be treated is other than Canadian. Frequently, radio interviews, with local radio tie-ins and sometimes network and international broadcasts, can be arranged for visiting Canadian speakers of importance.

(3) Films

With varied resources now in supply, wide circulation and frequent showings are possible through consular promotion. Special showings with carefully screened invitation list either in the consulate or in free halls can now be arranged. (The recent Washington Embassy showing of American films on Canada offers a good model for consulates to follow). Care in the selection of a film program suitable to the audience should be observed—Trade Fair film for business audience, tourist film for audience likely to take vacation in Canada, Canadian art film for cultural group, etc. Members of the consular staff should be trained to make short speeches of introduction for film program, when the latter is considered advisable.

(4) Photographs and Display

Photographic editors of newspapers, periodicals, and text-books, should be visited and shown samples from photographic library available at consulate. Photographic blow-ups can be loaned to clubs and institutions for display purposes. Photo features can be offered to press as received from Ottawa.

Display panels, or displays assembled from materials available in consulate, can be put to good use in store-windows, at bazaars, conventions, club-meetings, etc.

(5) Packaged Programs on Canada

Many clubs and educational groups, large and small are willing to devote a unit period to a program on Canada, if the latter can be supplied. Programs can comprise varied items such as the showing of films, a speech by the consul, the singing of Canadian songs, readings from Canadian literature, music by a Canadian artist, the playing of Canadian recordings, the recounting of a travel trip to Canada by a member of the club, the dramatization of a script on Canada. Canadian flags, coats-of-arms, photographic blow-ups, maps, silk screens, can be offered from Consulate stock for decoration, and Canada from Sea to Sea and other publications given free distribution.

(6) Educational Projects

The distribution of pamphlet literature to regional schools can be made on a large scale. Frequently, this can be achieved most satisfactorily by approach through boards of education, rather than through individual teachers or school principals. If resources such as Fact Sheets and Canada Sea to Sea can continue to be supplied in large numbers, whole school and college areas can be blanketed through this type of promotion.

Talks by members of the consular staff to school and university classes are usually welcomed and provide direct opportunity for the distribution of literature. Visits by consul to universities within his jurisdiction and consultation with history, geography, social studies teachers usually leads to distribution of pamphlet material and more intelligently adequate teaching.

Now that the Information Division stands ready to supply presentation volumes, competitions in university and school classes for such volumes can be encouraged and a prize formally presented by the consul for the best essay on some phase of Canadian life. (In New England, this is a regular procedure by the French Consul at major colleges and universities).

Discussions can be held with professional educational organizations, college presidents, and department heads leading towards the encouragement of increased study of Canada in school and college curricula. The consul should be ready to suggest methods for the expansion of such study programs and be prepared to offer materials for use.

If opportunity presents, attempts should be made to influence universities and colleges to establish formal courses, or parts of courses, on Canadian history, Canadian geography, Canadian literature.

Text-book publishers within the jurisdiction should be informed of the consul's readiness to assist in the editing of books, or sections of books, pertaining to Canada.

Canadian student clubs at universities should be visited and encouragement given to students to seek opportunities at home after graduation, rather than accept lucrative positions in the United States. (The Boston Consulate is attempting to persuade certain large Canadian firms to approach the 65 Canadian students at the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration with employment offers so that these highly-trained young graduates may not be lost to Canada).

(7) Cultural Projects

Display of Canadian art and handicrafts, ranging from the photographic and silk-screen level to large exhibits provided by the National Gallery, should be encouraged in local museums and other places suitable for showings.

Opportunities for the lending of musical recordings to clubs, schools, and social groups can be sought, and, where possible, concert and lecture agencies should be encouraged to secure Canadian professional talent.

Representation and Public Relations

The consul should, of course, strive to become acquainted with the most influential members of the community including as many as possible of the federal, state, and municipal officers in his jurisdiction, since at any moment, their assistance may be needed. Entertainment at the consular residence should be carefully selective, and consulate lists for such purposes should be established and retained. The head of the post and his staff should be prepared to speak to audiences on Canadian and other topics, but the number of invitations accepted should be governed by a careful estimate of the benefit to accrue. Large and influential organizations should be invited to seek eminent speakers from Canada and should be given assistance in selecting and obtaining the latter, but care should be exercised in the timing and frequency of such visits. For certain visiting Canadians of importance, all the stops in the public relations apparatus can sometimes profitably be pulled to obtain a maximum of favorable publicity. For an occasion of major significance, public relations techniques can include press releases, press interviews, circulation of speech copies, radio hook-ups, radio interviews, calls on Mayor, Governor, and local celebrities, a small but select cocktail party for the honored guest and so on, depending mainly on the disposition and strength of the visitor. At such a time, the consul through his knowledge of the local scene should exercise sagacity in his advice as to which invitations should be accepted and which refused.

Certain major public relations opportunities, such as visits by units of the Canadian Navy, present important hazards as well as benefits and because of the elaboration of detail required, discussion of the consular role in this particular type of operation will be undertaken in a separate and subsequent communication.

Reporting

In my opinion, the "listening post" function of a consulate should be considered as an important part of its work, and careful attention paid to it by the consul and his staff. Beyond routine reports on the normal functions of consular work, beyond the exposition of topics occasionally suggested by the embassy, studies of certain political, economic and social matters peculiar to the jurisdiction can be of service to the embassy, to the Department in Ottawa, and to other departments of the government. It is natural that a consul should fear that he may be devoting valuable time to the assembling and despatch of information already known to his own authorities but he and they should keep in mind that the complete content of such despatches may not be known to all of them, and some of it may be known to none. A report on the current Maine potato situation, for instance, may have value for various specialists in Ottawa. It may or may not offer much that is new to External Affairs, yet it may provide the Department of Agriculture with new information about current New England agricultural conditions and the volume expectation of the Maine crop. It may at the same time throw certain light on potato smuggling across the United States border, and, therefore, have interest for the customs officials of the Department of National Revenue. It may inform the Department of Labour that the number of Canadian potato pickers to be employed in Maine this fall will be much lower than in previous years. Accordingly, the sum total of the information forwarded may justify the effort put into its preparation and despatch. If the fish interests of New England are publicly citing Canadian competition as ruinous and lobbying for either a quota or a higher tariff, an examination of pertinent and current facts about the New England industry is likely to be of benefit to those working to ward off the imposition of such American enactments.

In each area, certain conditions exist which have either a direct or indirect impact on some phase of Canadian affairs, and the observation of these by the man-on-the-scene, if carefully made and judiciously presented, can be of importance to officials who may, then or later, have to participate in relevant government action or international negotiation. On subjects of broad scope, certain reports may enable the ambassador to complete a picture of national actions and attitudes area by the area, and one of the primary duties of the consul should be to assist him in achieving this. When of sufficient importance, first hand information on corruption in local politics, the reactions of local Canadian organizations, the possibilities of expanded import of Canadian goods, the regional attitude towards reciprocal tariffs, towards joint defence, Canadian-American power projects, and towards various similar topics of periodic or continuing interest should be transmitted in official form to our Washington and Ottawa authorities rather than remain within the files of the consulate or the mind of the consul.

Adequate reporting calls for the gaining of careful knowledge of the regional scene, acquaintance with the discussion with specialized authorities of the area, and wise evaluation of material gleaned. It can be facilitated by the establishment and upkeep of confidential consular files on regional problems, on important district personalities, on local press politics, on the background of state and municipal politics, on local history behind current movements, on the district economy, and so on. A careful clipping of the more important newspapers of the region is of great help in this regard, and can be effected by distributing for examination a different copy of the press daily to each member of the staff. Important excerpts can be incorporated in the topical files mentioned above, but also when pertinent, should be forward to Washington for incorporation in the Embassy supplementary press scan.

I have enumerated by no means all of the functions, actual and potential, of Canadian consular work in the United States. Nor am I suggesting that the Boston Consulate, for one, can successfully undertake in high gear all phases of such a program until time, energy and the abilities of its staff permit. But I hope that this overlong screed may suggest in outline enough of what is being done and of what can be done to make you feel that the potentialities of such posts more than justify the expense of their establishment. Even if it should fail to do what you wanted, perhaps it will offer an idea here and there which transmuted and shaped by the brooding genius of your disciplined brain, can then be fitted to the master pattern of our work.

Yours sincerely,
T.F.M. NEWTON

CONSULAR DIVISION

You may recall that, after the Consular Conference at Washington last Spring, there was some correspondence between Mr. Wrong and me which resulted in a letter going to all Consuls General and Consuls in the United States (save New York). Its purpose was to get the Heads of posts thinking about the general usefulness of their establishments and to cause them to plan, at least in their own minds, what they ought to be doing if the taxpayer of Canada was going to get the best value for his money out of the establishments. I have already sent you copies of the replies† which were received from Detroit, Chicago, and San Francisco. Last week I received the reply from Mr. Newton.

2. I attach a copy of his letter of October 31. It seems to me that, while Mr. Newton envisages operations on a scale which would obviously be beyond the strength and resources of his present establishment, he, nevertheless, exhibits a general grasp of a very high order.

3. What is interesting to me particularly about this report is that it shows that the practical can be combined with what we might call the academic or intellectual approach. Mr. Newton never gets lost in the cloud of cultural and so-called "representational" activity. He is always down to earth and aware of the importance of an efficient business office. While he realizes the importance of an exhibition of Canadian paintings, he is equally alive to the desirability of the Embassy and the Departments in Ottawa knowing about the New England views on the fish industry. The lowly potato is equally not beneath his notice.

4. We are at some pains to lecture in the University of the East Block on what a Consul does and what is expected of our young men in consular activities. In my view, this letter is an excellent document to put in the hands of our young officers for their study. I am sending a copy to Personnel Division with that thought in mind.

IMPLEMENTATION OF BALKAN PEACE TREATIES

As the Soviet Government has refused to allow discussion by its heads of mission in the capitals of Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria, of the disputes concerning the interpretation of the Peace Treaties, we are now considering the composition of commissions as provided for by the Peace Treaties.

2. We have received word from the United Kingdom and the United States that the latter has suggested that the disputes should be dealt with collectively; that is in the disputes with Hungary and Roumania, there would be five countries constituting one party to the dispute on the one side with Hungary-Roumania on the other, and similarly there would be four countries constituting one party to the dispute with Bulgaria. This would call for only three commissions, each of which would be composed of a representative of the ex-enemy State, a representative of the Allied States and an independent chairman who would be chosen by both parties or, if they fail to agree, by the Secretary General of the United Nations. The United States has put forward tentative and incomplete proposals for the selection of the commissioners and advocates for each commission.

3. While waiting for further details of the United States Government's suggestion, we threw out the idea to both London and Washington that one method that might be followed would be to have the five countries involved in the disputes with Hungary and Roumania discuss jointly and agree upon a commissioner and an advocate for Hungary, and the same for Roumania. A similar procedure might be adopted, (though Canada would not be included) for the dispute with Bulgaria. It would, I think, be quite suitable to have these discussions in London between the United Kingdom Government, the United States Ambassador and the New Zealand, Australian and Canadian High Commissioners. I should be glad to know if you approve in principle of this approach.¹ I shall take the matter up in detail with our representatives in London or Washington.

4. Whatever procedure is adopted, we must decide how far we wish to be involved in these commissions. We could content ourselves with participating in the discussions and making sure that competent, though non-Canadian commissioners and advocates are appointed. Alternatively, we could ask that a Canadian commissioner for the dispute with either Hungary or Roumania be chosen.

5. In favour of Canada's nominating a commissioner there are the following:

(a) Canada has already strongly denounced violations of human rights in Eastern Europe and associated with the United Kingdom and the United States in formal protests;

(b) a Canadian representative on one of the Commissions would acquire a knowledge and experience of this complex problem which we do not now have;

(c) Even if the three countries do not co-operate in the establishment of commissions, the appointment of a Canadian Commissioner would have a useful propaganda value;

(d) Mr. Ackerson, of the State Department, has informally and tentatively suggested that a Canadian commissioner be chosen for one of these commissions.

6. As against this, we might refrain from making any nomination, the reasons being that we do not believe the satellite powers will conform to the Treaty terms, nor can we expect anything of value to religious freedom to flow from all this pother. There might also be some difficulty in deciding upon a Canadian nominee.

7. I am disposed to recommend that we make a nomination of a Canadian Commissioner for either Hungary or Roumania.²

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 28, 1949

VIOLATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS IN HUNGARY, ROUMANIA AND BULGARIA

Commonwealth Relations Office telegram No. 58 of November 14[†] stated that the United States have informed the United Kingdom that they (the U.S.A.) intend soon to nominate their members for the Treaty Commissions. The United States believe that this is necessary if the International Court of Justice is to answer the questions in the resolution of the General Assembly on this subject.

2. The United Kingdom agreed to this and proposed that a separate Commission be set up for each dispute with each signatory, and will so nominate. The United Kingdom consider the legal position under the Treaties will be sounder if separate Commissions are proposed at this stage. Later, if there should be any sign of co-operation from the Balkan Governments, it will be necessary to approach them to see if they would agree to joint, rather than separate Commissions.

3. The United Kingdom also consider that there is a strong argument in favour of appointing independent persons of standing who are not officials or members of the government. They may name one nominee to act on all three Commissions and Sir Elwyn Jones, a United Kingdom lawyer, has been asked if he would accept an appointment as the United Kingdom representative. The United Kingdom intend to give the name of its commissioner to the three satellite governments in notes to be sent on or immediately after December 3, and has asked whether the Canadian, Australian and New Zealand Governments would propose to take parallel action either at the same date or subsequently.

4. The New Zealand Government have replied that they would prefer not to nominate representatives to Commissions, and would prefer to await the International Court's decision, at least on Question I; i.e. whether or not a dispute exists, before taking further steps. (It is probable that New Zealand would not have anyone available for a Commission).

5. The Government of Australia agree with the United Kingdom that the appointment of members to Commissions could not affect the decision of the International Court of Justice on Questions I and II. They believe that we should try to dissuade the United States from going ahead with the nomination of members to the Commissions. If, however, the United States Government insists, as it does, Australia would prefer to have the protesting signatories jointly nominate one representative for each of three Commissions.

6. The United Kingdom proposal for separate Commissions now seems to have been accepted by the United States. According to Mr. Rumbold of the Foreign Office, the United States will appoint Mr. Ben Cohen as its representative on each of its three Commissions.

7. Canada was one of the sponsors of the General Assembly resolution submitting the questions to the International Court of Justice and the Government has shown special interest in the violations of human rights in the satellite countries.

8. When the question of Canadian representation on a joint Commission was referred to you in July, you indicated that we should wait until the representatives of the Five Western Powers met "and if the suggestion was made then a Canadian should act on one of the Commissions we could agree."

9. After considering several alternative methods of Canadian action I would recommend, if you agree, that we should appoint a Canadian to serve on the Commission considering the dispute with Hungary and on that considering the dispute with Roumania. (One nominee would be sufficient).³

10. The first step would then be to inform the Commonwealth Relations Office by December 3 that we intend to nominate.

11. No name need be given at this time, but I have thought you might consider approaching Mr. Justice Ilsley.⁴ We could let him know that there is little chance of his ever having to act.

Washington, December 28, 1949

Secret. Reference your teletype EX-3045 of December 27th.† Implementation of Balkan Peace Treaties.

A meeting of representatives of five plaintiff countries was held to-day in Jellicoe's office at the United Kingdom Embassy. Matthews and Wallis were present on behalf of this Embassy. John Campbell, Assistant Chief of the Southeast European Affairs Division and Stein of the Legal Branch represented the United States, F.H. Corner represented New Zealand and Owen Davis represented Australia. The following recommendations were agreed upon on the five topics of the agenda given in paragraph 2 of my teletype WA-3495 of December 27th.†

Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Yes LB P[earson]

2. Nominations of representatives—The United States representative stated that his Government has appointed Professor Edwin Dickinson, Dean of the Law School at the University of Pennsylvania, as the United States representative on the three commissions. The United Kingdom representative stated that Mr. F. Elwyn Jones, K.C., M.P., had been appointed as the United Kingdom representative on the three commissions. We confirmed that the Right Honourable Justice J.L. Ilesley, P.C., would represent Canada on the two commissions for Roumania and Hungary.

3. The drafting, timing and delivery of notes to the satellite countries concerned—In view of the change of Government in Australia, the Australian representative confirmed the fact that his Government had decided to await the ruling of the International Court of Justice and would not appoint a commissioner at this stage. The Australian Government felt that the appointment of a representative at this time would not increase the strength of the legal case, that it would have no practical result on the eventual settlement of the disputes and might, on the contrary, prejudice the case before the International Court which had been called upon to rule on whether there was or was not a dispute. Australia, of course, still intended to co-operate in efforts to implement the Peace Treaties and welcomed the method of the appointments by the other plaintiff countries in preparation for the eventual consolidation of the commissions.

The New Zealand representative stated that his Government would probably not wish to name a representative at this stage. He had not yet been given his Government's reason for adopting this position and said he would confirm his Government's stand before the presentation of the notes was due to take place.

On the question of timing, it was decided that the notes would be presented by the United Kingdom and United States Ministers in the Balkan capitals concerned on January 5th.

With regard to delivery, we stated that you would be requesting the Commonwealth Relations Office through Canada House to have the Canadian notes to Roumania and Hungary presented by the United Kingdom Minister in Bucharest and Budapest at the same time as the United Kingdom's notes are presented.

The draft of our note as given in paragraph 2 of your teletype under reference met with general agreement. The United States representative stated that their notes would probably mention that the United States Government had authorized the United States Ministers in the three capitals concerned to enter into consultation with Balkan country with a view to the appointment of the third member of the commission as stipulated in the Peace Treaty. The United States felt that this would put the satellite countries "on the spot" since it would indicate that the United States Ministers in the three countries had full power to proceed on behalf of the United States Government with the implementation of the Peace Treaty. The United Kingdom representative confirmed our understanding that the phrase "enter into consultation with His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom" in the United Kingdom draft note (see paragraph 5 of Canada House telegram No. 2480 of December 22nd†) only defined the United Kingdom Government and did not imply that consultation should take place only in the United Kingdom. He stated that he would consult his Government about the desirability of mentioning in the United Kingdom notes that consultation with a view to the appointment of the third member should take place with the United Kingdom Minister in each of the Balkan capitals concerned. You might, therefore, wish to consider whether greater co-ordination would be secured by informing the satellite countries in our notes that consultation with regard to appointment of the third member should be entered into with the United Kingdom Minister in the capital concerned acting on our behalf, rather than through this Embassy. The United Kingdom and United States officials do not have any objection to the proposal in your draft note.

4. The drafting and timing of notes to the Secretary General—It was felt that two notes should be delivered to the Secretary General of the United Nations by each of the plaintiff countries which had appointed commissioners, the first note on January 6th at 11:00 a.m. E.S.T. This note to the Secretary General would include copies of the notes sent to the satellite countries and would request the Secretary General to transmit the correspondence to the International Court of Justice. The second note to the Secretary General would be sent one month after the presentation of the notes of January 5th. This was considered desirable in view of the provisions in the Peace Treaties that, if the parties to a dispute failed to agree within a period of one month on the appointment of a third member, the Secretary General of the United Nations could be requested by either party to make the appointment. The second note to the Secretary General would merely inform him that the parties had failed to agree on the appointment of the third member (should that be the case). The Secretary General would not be requested to make the appointment until the International Court had ruled on the two questions presented to it for a decision.

It was felt that the notes to the Secretary General should be correlated in New York and sent by the heads of the Canadian, United Kingdom and United States delegations to the United Nations. Should the Ministers in the satellite countries concerned be unable to confirm the actual delivery of the notes by January 6th due to a delay or breakdown in communications, the notes to the Secretary General would be presented in any case so long as it was known that the Ministers in the satellite capitals had actually received the notes and their instructions to present them on January 5th.

5. The timing and co-ordination of press releases.—We suggested that the press releases should contain a brief factual announcement together with the texts of the notes to the three satellite countries and should be issued simultaneously in Ottawa, London and Washington immediately after the presentation of the three notes to the Secretary General of the United Nations. It was agreed that the press releases might be made at 11:15 a.m. E.S.T. on January 6th.

The Australian representative stated that, since Australia was not appointing a representative to the commissions at present, the release of statements to the press by Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States might make it appear that Australia did not support the action taken by the three countries. He and the New Zealand representative felt that some statement clarifying the position of their countries would probably have to be issued in Canberra and Wellington. They said that they would bring this point to the attention of their Governments.

6. The type of commissions to be eventually established—It was felt that should the commissions be established, they should be consolidated into three joint commissions, one with a United States commissioner, one with a United Kingdom commissioner and one with a Dominions commissioner. The United States member remarked that the commission would have either three or two members: three members if the satellites agreed to participate, two members if the International Court ruled that a two-man commission was legal in view of the refusal of the satellite countries to participate. The New Zealand representative agreed that there should be a single representative for all five plaintiff countries on each of the three joint commissions. The Australian representative also agreed and stated that he understood that there would be mutual consultation should Australia decide at a later stage to appoint a representative. It was felt that the Secretary General of the United Nations should be consulted about the appointment of a neutral member as soon as there was a likelihood that the commission would be established—either through the participation of the satellite countries or by virtue of a ruling of the Courts. The United States member felt that joint commissions would be possible since only the satellite countries would object and they would probably be “out of Court” by that time.

The United States representative raised the point that the case against the satellites should be presented before the proposed three commissions under central direction and that, therefore, each commission should have a general counsel in charge of the presentation of the case. The counsel for each commission should be from a different country to that of the commissioner. It was agreed that there should eventually be three counsels one for each of the three commissions but that these persons need not be appointed until there was a possibility of setting up the commissions. Since the United States had assumed primary responsibility for preparing the case against the satellites, it was felt that the counsels should eventually meet in Washington to co-ordinate their line of action.

7. I should appreciate your informing me if the arrangements made at the meeting meet with your approval.

TELEGRAM EX-3073

SECRET

Reference your teletype WA-3509 of December 28, 1949. Implementation of Balkan Peace Treaties.

We agree with your recommendations and have arranged to take the following steps:

(a) ask Canada House to request the Commonwealth Relations Office to have the Canadian notes presented by the United Kingdom Ministers in Budapest and Bucharest acting on our behalf, at the same time as the United Kingdom notes are presented viz January 5.

(b) inform the Governments of Hungary and Roumania in our notes that consultation with regard to the appointment of the third member of the commission should be entered into with the United Kingdom Minister acting on our behalf in the capital concerned.

(c) have a note delivered to the Secretary General of the United Nations by the Head of the Canadian Permanent Delegation to the United Nations on January 6 at 11:00 a.m. E.S.T., including copies of the Canadian notes sent to Hungary and Roumania, and requesting the Secretary General to transmit the correspondence to the International Court of Justice. (We shall be ready to have the second note to the Secretary General presented one month after the presentation of the notes of January 5th, informing him that the parties had failed to agree on the appointment of the third member, should that be the case.)

(d) make a press release on January 6 at 11:15 a.m., E.S.T., containing a brief factual announcement together with the texts of the Canadian notes to the Governments of Hungary and Roumania.

2. Reference paragraph 1, section (b) above, the Canadian notes to the Governments of Hungary and Roumania will read as stated in our teletype to you EX-3045 of December 27, 1949† para 2 down to “proposed commission”. The final sentence will read as follows:

“It is accordingly requested that the Hungarian/Roumanian Government appoint its representative forthwith and, at the same time, enter into consultation with the British Minister in Budapest/Bucharest acting on behalf of the Canadian Government with a view to the appointment of the third member as stipulated in the Peace Treaty”.

Ottawa, May 13, 1949

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS MEETING

On May 23, as you know, the Foreign Ministers of the four Occupying Powers of Germany will meet in Paris to discuss Berlin, currency and Germany generally.

We understand that Messrs. Bevin, Acheson and Schuman will have a preliminary talk on May 21 presumably to decide on a common line to take when the Council meets.

2. The Soviet Union's proposal at the meeting can be forecast with reasonable precision although there is still some question regarding the Soviet motives and what they hope to obtain from the meeting. The terms of the Soviet proposals will probably draw heavily upon the programme given in the Warsaw Declaration of June 24, 1948, of the Soviet and satellite foreign ministers which mentions:

- (a) The implementation of measures to ensure final demilitarization.
- (b) The institution for a definite time of four-power control over Ruhr industry.
- (c) The establishment of a provisional democratic peace-loving government for the whole of Germany.
- (d) The conclusion of a peace treaty with Germany followed by the withdrawal of occupation forces within a year after its conclusion.
- (e) The elaboration of measures for the fulfilment by Germany of her reparations obligations.

3. More recently, the Soviet Government has encouraged a German suggestion that the four powers should guarantee Germany's perpetual neutrality thereby preventing its membership in the O.E.E.C. or the Council of Europe.

4. The extent to which the U.S.S.R. is willing to meet known western requirements for Germany on these subjects will give the Western Powers their first definite information as to which of the following motives has prompted the Soviet Government to reopen four-power talks:

- (a) To exert pressure on the Germans to delay the formation of a West German Government.
- (b) To obtain a lifting of the counterblockade which has been working considerable hardships on the eastern zone of Germany.
- (c) To obtain a settlement based on German unity which might eventually lead to communist domination of the whole country.
- (d) To disengage itself from Germany in order to concentrate elsewhere. (e.g. Yugoslavia, the Middle and the Far East).

5. If the Soviet Union enters the negotiations with the limited objectives expressed in (a) and (b) of the preceding paragraph, the Western Powers would have to deal with a familiar problem and it should not be too difficult to show that the U.S.S.R. was not seriously concerned with a German settlement. If on the other hand the Soviet Union intends to seek a settlement for reasons indicated in (c) and (d) of the preceding paragraph and if it is prepared to make considerable concessions, the Western Powers would be confronted with a new situation in the face of which it may not be easy for them to obtain agreement among themselves. Probably the most difficult questions to decide on would be those of withdrawing occupation troops and establishing a central German government.

6. During the last year the Western Powers have reached a number of agreements covering, in effect, almost every aspect of a general German peace settlement. A list of these agreements is attached.† In general the Western Powers have consistently announced their willingness to have the Soviet Union subscribe to these agreements and to play its part in their execution. Occasionally this attitude has been stated explicitly and officially but in most cases it has been implicit or announced by individual participants. The basis for all these agreements was the London Report of June 7, 1948, and the United Kingdom and United States made it clear that its terms and the agreements reached under it were applicable to all of Germany whenever the Soviet Union reached a more amenable frame of mind. (See extracts attached).†

7. The information we have received from London, Washington and Paris tends to support the view that the Western Powers will oppose a complete withdrawal of occupation forces from Germany. The existing three-power agreements on Germany depend in varying degrees upon the continuation of the occupation. Assuming that the Western Powers intend to base their proposals for a general settlement on these three-power agreements, it would be difficult for them to accept the end of occupation without first making substantial changes in them. To attempt to do so might threaten western unity. There is a possibility, however, that if the Soviet Government is determined to withdraw its forces from Germany the Western Powers may be obliged to modify their three-power agreements or be held responsible by the Germans for the continuation of the occupation and division of Germany.

8. From the western point of view the German problem is three sided:

(a) To democratize Germany and create a community of interest with the west.

(b) To prevent Germany from going communist either to come under Soviet domination or to capture the leadership of world communism.

(c) To prevent Germany from returning to militant nationalism which might be accompanied by an alliance with the Soviet Union.

9. In many respects the solution to any one of these aspects of the problem is antithetical to the solution of the other two. Thus, the conditions required to make Germany a democracy might be used to pave the way to communist control; the steps necessary to ensure against communist domination might conflict with its democratization and could contribute to the rise of neo-Naziism; provision against German military resurgence might make Germany powerless against communist organizations and limit the freedom which we consider to be essential to democracy.

10. Any solution that would satisfy the west involves the taking of calculated risks based upon an assessment of the probable attitude of the Germans themselves. It is not possible to prescribe conditions which would exclude the possibility of pressure tactics by German communists, with or without the backing of Soviet occupation forces. In any circumstances, particularly in the elections which must precede the establishment of a central German government, the Western Powers would have to take a chance that the Germans would not only prefer association with the west but would resist communist pressure and threats in order to produce a pro-western government. It may be that the Germans' slavophobia and their experiences of Soviet policies would be enough to ensure their activity in favour of the West if all possible measures were taken to protect would-be western advocates from violence.

11. If the Soviet Union is in earnest in wishing a general settlement, it would appear that the Western Powers could seek a solution along the following lines:

(a) Offer to extend their tripartite agreements to all of Germany, including Soviet membership in the three-power control organizations already provided for.

(b) Create, so far as may be possible by the laying down of the terms, the conditions calculated to encourage all those opposed to the Soviet Union to take an active part in the political life of the reunited country.

(c) Ensure the continued sympathy of their present supporters by offering some alternative to the Soviet proposal for withdrawal either by limiting the occupation in point of time, or by limiting it to certain parts of Germany, or a combination of both.

(d) Insist on German's eventual independence and right to choose its future course in world affairs for itself, thereby anticipating or countering any Soviet demand for a four-power guarantee of German's perpetual neutrality.

12. Some comments on these issues are being prepared in the Department should the Government wish to present views to the Western Foreign Ministers at their meeting on May 21, or should any of the participants ask for our opinion.

RE: COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS MEETING

The Minister has read and returned your memorandum on the Council of Foreign Ministers. He was congratulatory. He feels that it is a competent and well done job—so do I. The Minister's copy is returned to your herewith.

2. Mr. Pearson wonders whether anyone in the department is considering what attitude should be adopted if at the C.F.M. meeting the Russians propose the withdrawal of all occupation forces east and west. The evident embarrassment for the Western Powers in withdrawal of U.S. forces from Europe might be offset by arrangements under the Atlantic Pact for exchanges of forces for training, etc. so as to permit the stationing of effective U.S. formations close to the Western border of Germany.

3. I would be grateful if consideration could be given to some such solution which would enable the three Western Powers to entertain proposals for withdrawal of occupation troops without sacrificing essential security.

4. I am sending a copy of this note to the Defence Liaison Division with whom you should concert. Mr. Holmes should also be consulted.

CANADIAN COMMENTS ON A GERMAN AGREEMENT

The Canadian Government has from time to time emphasized its interest in the German settlement and has offered its views on the nature of that settlement. Any decisions by the present meeting of the Council of Foreign ministers in Paris will naturally affect the German settlement. It is therefore thought desirable to record the views of the Canadian Government on the situation as it now exists.

2. These views are necessarily general in character and do not pretend to anticipate the course the negotiations may take. Further comments may therefore be offered at a later date on the basis of information received concerning proposals for dealing with specific aspects of the settlement.

3. We assume that the first task of the Western Powers will be to determine the Soviet intentions: whether the U.S.S.R. wants a settlement badly enough to make serious concessions in order to obtain it or whether it is seeking a modus vivendi coupled, if possible, with a propaganda victory.

4. The chances both of reaching a general settlement and of maintaining Western initiative might be enhanced if the Western Powers were to suggest that, before trying to reach agreement on a general settlement, the powers should first try to reach agreement on a number of specific measures for removing some of the more serious sources of past conflict and of immediate difficulties. These measure could incorporate the essentials of a modus vivendi which could continue in operation whether or not a general agreement was reached. They need not prejudice any more comprehensive arrangements reached by subsequent negotiation. Should no general agreement be reached, however, these limited arrangements would themselves represent a considerable achievement on the part of the Council of Foreign Ministers.

5. We consider that a modus vivendi would require:

(a) The removal of the incongruous situation created by the presence of Western troops and the existence of Western responsibilities in Berlin deep within territory occupied by the Soviet army; and

(b) The removal of the economic and financial division of Berlin and the assurance of communications with the West.

6. Subject to strategic considerations, on which we are seeking the opinion of the Chiefs of Staff, it would appear to be politically desirable if Soviet troops were to withdraw from Berlin and behind a line beginning, for example, where the western boundary of the Soviet zone touches the Baltic Sea to Berlin, to Magdeburg, to where the western boundary of the Soviet zone touches the Czechoslovak frontier. The Western Powers might make an equivalent withdrawal, for example, from where the eastern boundary of their zones touches the Baltic Sea to Hamburg, Hanover, Kassel, Frankfurt and along the Main river to the Czechoslovak frontier.

7. This arrangement assumes the establishment of full German authority over transportation in the unoccupied area; in the East by the German Economic Commission, and in the West by the Bizonal Economic Council, pending the establishment of provisional governments. We consider that with Western troops out of Berlin, it would be impracticable for the German authorities to reimpose a blockade, the only purpose of which could be the starvation of fellow Germans.

8. With communications ensured by some arrangements as suggested above, there would appear to be no overriding disability in agreeing to economic and financial arrangements for all of Berlin on the lines of the United States counter proposal submitted early this year to the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade at Geneva. To attempt political unification of Berlin would, we consider, raise all the questions of ensuring political freedoms in Germany generally which properly belongs to the wider problem of a German settlement. The existing political arrangements, including the presence in Berlin of occupying authorities and their participation in the city government, should be reaffirmed. The actual officials could, of course, be civilians.

Occupation and German Unity

9. In our view the problem of the withdrawal of occupation forces and of the establishment of a central German government are closely inter-related. We would rather not comment on how German unity might be safely effected until it is first known what arrangements might be made for redistribution of occupation forces. As this question has a direct bearing on the security of the North Atlantic area, it would seem appropriate for the North Atlantic nations to examine the security implications of any appreciable change contemplated in military dispositions in Germany before any final decision is taken by the occupying powers.

Austria

10. We assume that the Western Powers will press for a speedy Austrian settlement. It would be unfortunate if the impression were created in Austria that a German settlement or steps to end or limit the occupation in Germany were to precede comparable arrangements for Austria.

Germany's Political and Economic External Relations

11. Should the U.S.S.R. in the early stages of the talks attempt to secure agreement on the principle of an unoccupied, neutralized Germany we would favour, as a counter proposal, the principle of German national independence. The Western Powers should insist on any German government's freedom to take part in the Council of Europe and the O.E.E.C., conditions essential to the integration of Germany into Western Europe.

Frontiers

12. In our view it would not on balance be wise for the Western Powers at this time to support extreme German claims in the matter of the German-Polish frontier. To do so might be a service to the U.S.S.R. which is acutely embarrassed by the animosity its espousal of the Polish cause has created in Germany, and by the hostility the Soviet Union would incur in Poland if it were to advocate a revision of the Oder-Western Neisse line. An extreme demand by the West would give the U.S.S.R. the chance to agree to a modification of the West's claims and tell the Poles they had saved them from a worse fate at Western hands, and the Germans that what they got was due to Soviet generosity.

13. It would be preferable, we believe, for the Western Powers to propose that the Polish frontier conform to the West's original suggestion, ie. along the Oder-Eastern Neisse line. This could be represented as a reasonable line which the West had always had in mind but had, unfortunately, given the appearance of abandoning under the Potsdam arrangement for Polish administration pending a settlement. The Polish Government had long been aware of the West's views that the present line was provisional but had nevertheless exceeded the Potsdam Agreement by incorporating this territory into the Polish State. The Polish Government had also aggravated the situation by their violation of the Potsdam agreement on the transferring of German populations. The result of all this is a refugee problem in Germany so great as to appear almost insoluble unless a considerable part of the German territory now administered by Poland is restored to Germany.

Prisoners of War and Displaced Persons

14. Although there has recently been some considerable movement of German ex-prisoners of war from the Soviet Union, the Western Powers might insist that the parties to a general settlement undertake to return immediately to Germany all German prisoners of war, deportees and forced labourers. In order that this undertaking may be effective, they might further insist that a four-power or United Nations Commission should have the power to satisfy itself, by on-the-spot investigations, if necessary, that this undertaking was being honoured. This would help to ensure that no Germans (especially scientists and technicians) were being kept away from Germany against their will. This provision would be embarrassing to the Soviet Union in view of the large number of German prisoners still known to be on Soviet territory and the use which the Russians are making of German technicians and scientists in their armament industries.

Dear General Vanier,

As you know the Canadian Government has expressed a continuing interest in the German question on all occasions when a settlement was under consideration. We have been following the current meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers therefore very closely and have found your reports most useful. Owing to the scope of the discussions and the rapidity with which they develop from day to day, it has not been possible so far for us to offer any particularly pertinent comment; nor does it appear to be a suitable time for a formal expression of views on the part of the Government.

I am enclosing, for your personal consideration only, a draft memorandum⁵ which deals with some of the broad issues in a very general way. Some of the points raised have already perhaps been outdated by events in Paris and, as you will see, the draft is quite tentative, but it would be very helpful to have your comments.

As the discussions proceed we should also welcome your judgment on

(a) what particular subjects or aspects of topics on the Agenda of the Council you consider we should be prepared to offer comment either for your own use or for formal or informal communication to members of the Council;

(b) what special Canadian interest may be involved in the discussions, and

(c) when and under what circumstances we should be ready to present the views of the Canadian Government.

In short, any guidance you can offer us in the preparation of material or in the anticipation of events would be most acceptable.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

Paris, June 30, 1949

Dear Mr. Heenev,

Your letter regarding the Paris session of the Council of Foreign Ministers although dated June 3rd only reached me on June 15th, the day before the anticipated conclusion of the Council's meeting and two days before it actually terminated. It would therefore not have been possible for us to make any suggestions for formal or informal communication to members of the Council and in any case, for reasons which are developed later in this letter, I hardly think that in the circumstances much purpose would have been served by putting forward Canadian views during the actual session of the Council. In our telegrams during this meeting we have attempted to keep you in touch with the day to day developments in the Council and to pass on to you the views of the three Western Delegations insofar as these have been available to us. I understand that you have been receiving through the United Kingdom Foreign Office a record of the discussions, together with the princial texts of documents and that the Foreign Office have also been keeping the Commonwealth High Commissioners in London informed. At this end there were informal daily meetings at the British Embassy attended by representatives of the Australian Embassy, the South African Legation and Mr. Ritchie. Representatives of the Indian Embassy were also present at first but the questions they asked showed very slight acquaintance with the issues at stake and before long they desisted from attending altogether. The meetings were usually taken by Mr. Dean of the United Kingdom Delegation or Mr. Millard of the British Embassy. In addition to the information gathered at these meetings, I have had personal talks with Mr. Bevin and Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick and Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Dean have seen a good deal of each other on an informal footing. Our contacts with the United Kingdom Delegation have therefore been pretty close. So far as the French are concerned, Ritchie has seen M. de Margerie of the Quai d'Orsay at frequent intervals throughout the Conference. De Margerie has talked with rather remarkable frankness and although what he said usually coincided closely with what we already knew from the United Kingdom Delegation his views often brought out special French interests and preoccupations.

Our relations with the United States Delegation have been pleasant enough on the social plane and when Mr. Bevin and Mr. Acheson dined with me at my house I found the latter particularly forthcoming (see my telegram No. 391 of June 7th†—an account of our conversation). On the other hand, in spite of several attempts on our part to establish the same kind of informal liaison with the Americans as with the British and French, we did not get very far. In this respect there was a marked contrast with the eagerness of the Americans to maintain touch with us during the Security Council discussion on Berlin and afterwards at the meeting of the Technical Committee on Berlin Currency and Trade in Geneva when we had information which they wanted to get from us.

Your letter raises important points on which you were kind enough to ask for my judgment in connection with the presentation of Canadian views on the German settlement. Without going back over the long and familiar history of our attempts to secure adequate participation in the preparation of a peace treaty with Germany, I should like to make a few observations on the way in which this whole question has evolved since the failure of the meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Moscow in March 1947 and in London at the end of 1947. At that stage we were, of course, still pressing for the adoption of a procedure which would permit Canada, together with other middle powers, to play a really effective part in drawing up the German peace treaty. From then on, however, it became increasingly unlikely that the great powers would agree on the basis for drawing up a treaty. Thenceforward, Canada's relationship to the German settlement entered upon a new phase. In the first place our advocacy of our right to participation in the peace-making machinery has become increasingly remote from current realities as the prospects of a peace treaty have receded into the indefinite distance, although we had, of course, to maintain our claims and to take such formal action as was necessary at different stages for this purpose. But meanwhile it was becoming increasingly clear that the real decisions affecting the future of Germany (or of that part of Germany whose future the Western Powers are capable of affecting) were being taken on a tripartite basis by the three Western Occupying Powers. As this situation developed, our position became more complicated. Under the Potsdam Agreement setting up the Council of Foreign Ministers, the limited (much too limited) participation of other allies in drawing up the peace settlement with Germany was, at least formally, acknowledged. Our efforts were directed at making our participation more far-reaching and effective. Our situation with regard to tripartite decision on Germany was less clear-cut. We, like the other middle powers principally interested, were not occupying powers in Germany. We had no formal ground on which to put forward representations as to actions taken by the three Western Occupying Powers, either jointly or singly in their Zones in Germany. We had, on the other hand, a strong political claim to have our voice heard in decisions which were increasingly important in laying down the lines along which the German settlement was likely to develop. This situation was summed up, as you will recall, in a memorandum prepared in the Department for the Secretary of State for External Affairs on April 3rd, 1948, after the 6-Power meetings on Western Germany which took place in London in February and March 1948. As that memorandum stated "it seemed evident that a peace settlement for Germany is being reached and that no satisfactory method has been found for associating the smaller powers with that settlement".

You will recall, of course, that when we decided to put forward informally our views on the future political organization of Germany to the governments of the Western Occupying powers we also decided not to present our Note to these governments claiming fuller association in the peace settlement.

You will also recall that a few weeks later Mr. St. Laurent, at that time Secretary of State for External Affairs, in an important statement in the House of Commons on May 25, put the Canadian position when he said—"we have not wished to appear to be attempting to put forward technical claims which might require the Occupying Powers, in order to give offence to no one, to invite all those who had declared war against Germany. This, in our opinion would have a delaying effect on the measures that the Occupying Powers were trying to make to bring about some semi-permanent settlement of the problem. But we are still insisting that when it comes to the making of the final peace with Germany the Powers who took a substantial part in the winning of the war shall be given a role proportionate to their importance in the conflict". From that time to this, Canadian policy with regard to our association with tripartite decisions on Germany has been based on the position then taken by Mr. St. Laurent. We have realized that the attempts of the three Western Occupying Powers to reach an agreed policy on Germany, difficult and delicate enough in themselves, would have been fatally hampered by the presentation by the middle and smaller powers of a claim to participation in their discussions and decision. We have not wanted to rock the boat. There can be little question of the wisdom and realism of this attitude which indeed has been openly or tacitly shared by the other Commonwealth Governments and to some extent by Belgium and the Netherlands. We were not blind, however, to the fact that these tripartite decisions were indeed shaping the future destiny of Germany in a fundamental fashion—the form of the constitution, the economic organization of Germany, the Ruhr, demilitarization and security—the very questions which would have formed the subject matter of agreement in the Council of Foreign Ministers and at the Peace Conference had it not been for the dissension between East and West. For this reason we have, from time to time, put forward our views on various aspects of the settlement unofficially to the Foreign Office, the State Department and the Quai d'Orsay. We have not, so far at any rate, felt it necessary to take more formal action because our principal interest has been the general one of seeing agreement developed and maintained between the three Occupying Powers and because their joint views as they have evolved in the course of tripartite discussions, have resulted in a German policy with which we were in agreement. We have therefore been content, for the most part, to hold a watching brief, with the exception of our involvement in the Berlin Trade and Currency dispute arising out of our membership in the Security Council.

You will I hope forgive this somewhat lengthy review of past policy as I understand it, but it has, I think, a direct bearing on the questions which you raise in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) of your letter. For the considerations which have governed Canadian policy since the failure to reach agreement on a German treaty in the Council became apparent two years or more ago still seem applicable today. Again at the present Council meeting, as in London and in Moscow, Canadian interest in the discussions was a general interest in the establishment of a stable, prosperous and democratic Germany and in 4-Power agreement on the general principles which should govern a peace treaty with Germany. Questions of specific interest to Canada did not arise. It speedily became apparent that there was no more likelihood at this Council session than at previous ones of attaining agreement on a Peace Treaty. The Western Powers took their stand on the necessity for a previous political unification of Germany and the constitution of a German Government with which a peace treaty could be signed. Soviet insistence on an early peace treaty while at the same time side-stepping the issue of political unification, meant that Vychinsky and the three Western Foreign Ministers were talking different languages from the start. Vychinsky's suggestion that the deputies should again take up preparation of a treaty was put aside as unrealistic by the Western Powers in view of the fact that no basis of agreement existed on which they could start to work. At one point in the discussions there was, I believe (for I have not seen the full record of the meetings), a somewhat academic discussion of the procedure to be followed in drawing up a treaty and of the association of other Powers in the peace-making machinery, but in view of the fact that all four Foreign Ministers knew that no such treaty-making machinery was likely to function in the foreseeable future, this discussion was of an abortive character. There was therefore no point at which it would have been appropriate for the Canadian Government to reassert its claims for full participation.

As no opportunity arose for us to put our views within the context of the preparation of a Peace Treaty with Germany, there only remained the possibility of our offering comment on the actual discussion in the Council of Foreign Ministers as it developed. The proceedings at this session of the Council fell into two broad categories. In the first place there was general debate staged largely for public consumption on the principles which should govern a German settlement. As the Canadian Government was presumably in agreement with the principles advocated by the Western Foreign Ministers—political unification on the basis of the Bonn Constitution, free elections and a guarantee of civil liberties—there was at this stage perhaps little more that we could have achieved by offering our comment than to give our general blessing to this policy. The Council also occupied itself with the detailed discussions of precise questions such as the voting system on the Kommandatura, Soviet claims to German assets in Austria, etc. In these discussions there was an exchange of formulae between the Western Foreign Ministers and M. Vychinsky which formed part of a detailed negotiation. It would have been well nigh impossible for the Canadian Government, however well informed of these negotiations, to offer timely and relevant comment on matters which were the subject of close negotiation between the Four in which each day marked some shift of position or modification in policy. It is in fact difficult to have a policy at all without participation, although as we know from experience at international conferences, policy is apt, within certain general lines to be laid down beforehand.

I now turn to point (c) in your letter, which raises the question of when and under what circumstances the Canadian Government should be ready in the future to present its views. Failing 4-Power agreement on a peace treaty, there remain the possibilities of continuing to present our views through diplomatic channels to the three Western members of the Council, or, if we deem it advisable, making representations to the Council as a whole either expressing our general views on the German settlement or our views on particular points arising out of it. If we should decide to adopt either of these courses in relation to the next meeting of the Council, the date of which is expected to be decided in New York in September, I believe that we should be wise to make our preparations well in advance of the actual meeting of the Council. Indeed I think that it is at this preliminary stage before the Council meets that we shall have the best opportunity of putting forward comment and views which may have some effective bearing on the proceedings. As you know, prior to this session of the Council Dr. Jessup, M. Parodi and Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, together with their respective officials and experts, worked out a very detailed appreciation of the issues likely to arise at the Council meeting and their recommendations both as to policy and as to the tactics which might be pursued during the Council discussions. When the Foreign Ministers arrived in Paris, they accepted the recommendations put forward by their officials as the basis for an agreed policy to be followed in the Council. By the time the Council opened, therefore, policy had to some extent hardened and, while like all Conferences and perhaps even more than most, this Council meeting diverged from expectations and resulted in new shifts in policy, this agreed memorandum was important in clarifying the intentions of the Western Powers. I am inclined to believe that the stage just prior to the meeting of the Council would have been the appropriate moment for us to put forward our comments at the official level. For these comments to be a useful contribution to the discussion it would, of course, be necessary for us to have prior knowledge of the proposed agenda of the meeting and full information as to the development of thinking on German questions in Washington, London and Paris. This information, however, was pretty fully available to us (at any rate so far as London and Paris were concerned) in the case of the present meeting and will no doubt be so again. Comment on precise points likely to arise in discussions is always apt to be more helpful to those preparing for a negotiation than a statement of general principles. If we have sufficient information to prepare such comment in advance it might, I think, give us an opportunity to participate at least in some measure in the preliminary discussions engaged in by the representatives of the three Western Powers before the Council meeting begins. The Canadian representative would then be able to call up his United States, French or British colleagues with specific suggestions and this in turn would give him a basis on which to conduct informal talks with them and would put him in a better position than if he were simply seeking information. It would be for consideration whether, as the Council session progressed, the Canadian Government might find it advisable to develop these unofficial suggestions into a formal representation to some or all of the members of the Council. I think that some procedure of this kind would be more effective than the presentation of our views for the first time in the midst of a Council session when lines of policy have hardened and when representatives on the Council are busily engaged in the heat of debate and negotiation.

To turn for a moment from the German settlement to the Austrian Treaty, there our position is, of course, a somewhat different one. Between now and September 1st the deputies are supposed to draw up an Austrian Treaty in final form so, in that case, the question of our adequate participation within the framework of treaty-making procedure does arise. I am not sure that our records here are quite complete with regard to Canada's participation in the Austrian Treaty. So far as I am aware, however, we have never received any reply to the request contained in the representations which we submitted to the special deputies for Austria on February 25th, 1947, asking that "an opportunity will be provided for Canada and the other Allies to examine the Draft Treaty with Austria before it is put in final form by the Council of Foreign Ministers for signature and ratification". The last development with regard to the Austrian Treaty of which we have any record here in the Embassy was the interview which Mr. Wilgress had on March 21st with Mr. Bevin (see despatch from the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow No. 238 of May 14th, 1947) in which Mr. Wilgress explained that the Canadian Government would be prepared to be listed in the Preamble of the Treaty and sign as a full participant only if the opportunity were given to examine the Treaty in its final form and before the signature by any State, provided the terms were acceptable. Mr. Bevin said on this occasion that he was in favour of an adherence clause because it would take too long to consult with the other Allied States and secure their signatures simultaneously with the signatures of the 4-Powers. I do not know what the most recent views of the United Kingdom Government or of Washington and Paris may be on this point but I should imagine that having at last obtained agreement in principle on the form of a Treaty and being exceedingly anxious to see its early completion, they would not favour any procedure which might delay attaining this objective and might consider association of other Allied States to provide such a complication (besides raising special difficulties in the case of Yugoslavia). Perhaps, therefore, we would continue to prefer adhering to the treaty in whose preparation we had not participated. However, I should be grateful to have your views on this question. Meanwhile as far as we have been able to ascertain, there was no discussion in Paris of the association of other Allied States with the preparation and signature of the Austrian Treaty. It may be that if we have decided that we do not wish to be listed in the Preamble of the Treaty or to sign it, we should make our views known to the special deputies (unless there is a gap in our records and this action has in fact already been taken). In any case, I assume that touch will be kept with the Foreign Office as to the progress of the work of the special deputies and we will be informed when the question of the association of other allies in the treaty comes up for discussion in that body.

I am sending you herewith comment on the draft "Canadian Comments on a German Agreement" of May 25th which was enclosed with your letter and which, if I may say so, struck me as a very able and interesting paper.

I fear that this letter has grown much longer than I intended but it hardly seemed possible to deal with the points which you raised without some consideration of the background of the whole question.

Yours sincerely,
GEORGES P. VANIER

NOTE ON THE DRAFT "CANADIAN COMMENTS ON A GERMAN AGREEMENT"
OF MAY 25, 1949

Paragraphs 1 and 2. Questions arising out of these two paragraphs have been dealt with in my covering letter.

Paragraph 3. This may be an appropriate connection in which to attempt a brief estimate of Soviet intentions as revealed in the course of this session of the Council.

a) It is now clear that the U.S.S.R. did not want a settlement badly enough "to make serious concessions in order to obtain it". The principal misconception as to Soviet policy which existed in some quarters and which was to some extent reflected in Western official circles was the belief that the Soviet Union was aiming at this stage at setting up a unified and "neutralized" Germany which they would hope to draw into their own camp through pressure on a central government in Berlin. The fear of a Russo-German rapprochement was in the back of the minds of many Western observers. There was some tendency to think that the Soviet Government might even give up its control over the Eastern Zone of Germany and advocate the early withdrawal of Occupation troops in order to obtain a German Government which might be susceptible to Soviet pressure and grateful to the Soviet Union; this surmise credited the Soviet Union with greater possibilities of attracting a united Germany than the Kremlin's own estimate of the situation. It may be that the high percentage of anti-Communist votes cast in the elections in the Eastern Zone of Germany coming just before the Council of Foreign Ministers revealed to the Soviet Government the strength of anti-Soviet sentiment in Germany; it may be too that pressure from satellite governments, particularly Poland, influenced Soviet policy. In any case, it became evident that the Soviet Government did not want a unified Germany now and were therefore not willing to make the slightest concession to obtain it.

b) What the Russians did apparently want was to gain some compensation in economic terms for raising the blockade of Berlin (although raising the blockade was a political and practical necessity from their own point of view).

c) The Soviet Government undoubtedly also desired to create a "détente" in the strained relations between East and West. This was perhaps their major political interest in the Council meeting. They had one eye on Washington throughout and particularly on Congress and they obviously hoped that the success of the Council would delay the passage of military aid legislation through Congress until the long-awaited American economic depression became a reality. The emphasis which Communist propaganda is putting on the improved prospects in relations between East and West resulting from this meeting underlines the aspect of their policy.

On the other hand if the Russians hope to obtain [a] propaganda victory over the German population by proving themselves the advocates of an early German settlement they seem to have played their hand badly. Indeed one of the surprises of the Conference was the clumsy way in which Vychinsky handled propaganda themes. His advocacy of a "return to Potsdam", his insistence on 4-Power control and above all his refusal to give any satisfactory answer to Mr. Bevin's question "would the Russians oppose the conception of a German Government" were hardly likely to commend themselves to German opinion. It is true, of course, that Vychinsky did argue in favour of a very early peace treaty and of troop withdrawal (although not immediate withdrawal but only one year after the conclusion of the treaty). No doubt Soviet propaganda will repeat ad infinitum that the Soviet Government was only prevented from obtaining these objectives by the obstruction of the Western Powers. It remains to be seen how much effect this will have on the Germans. All present indications in the West German press seem to show that they are unimpressed by the Soviet propaganda case.

Paragraph 4. The order in which it is suggested in the Memorandum that the business of the Council should be conducted is the reverse of the order in which business was actually dealt with. The council began with what proved to be a fruitless and time-consuming discussion of general issues and only in the last days of its existence did it get down to negotiation of the agreed communique on Germany and the Austrian Treaty. You may perhaps have noticed that the London Times in several leading articles published during the meeting of the Council advocated an order of business similar to that suggested in the Draft Canadian Memorandum. In the event it is hard to say whether the order of handling business had much effect on the outcome of the Council's meeting. One factor which influenced the Western Foreign Ministers, and particularly Mr. Bevin, not wishing to tackle the general issue first was the desire to make a declaration at an early stage of the principles on which the Western Powers would be willing to proceed with the unification of Germany.

Paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9. The modus vivendi, if can be so described, actually reached by the Foreign Ministers in their agreed communique on Germany was a very much more modest affair than that contemplated in the Draft Canadian Memorandum, which is based on the withdrawal of Occupying Forces from Berlin and the creation of a central unoccupied area in Germany. The three Western Foreign Ministers agreed in Paris before the Council meeting began that they would not favour any troop withdrawal although they might under favourable circumstances have been prepared to consider the regroupment of troops of all the four Occupying Powers and the concentration in garrisons in the centres of their respective Zones. It would be interesting to know the views of the Chiefs of Staff on the strategic considerations involved in the plan sketched out in the Draft Canadian Memorandum. The political objection to any measure of troop withdrawal and particularly to the so-called "Kennan Plan" for withdrawal based on German ports (a more extensive proposal than that contemplated in the Draft Canadian Memorandum) was strongly felt in Paris. As we reported in our telegrams at the time, the French were particularly alarmed at such a possibility and were much relieved to be informed by Dr. Jessup that the United States were not considering anything of the kind. The broad argument against any measure of actual withdrawal of troops was that this would look like a Western retreat and would have a very unfavourable effect, particularly on Western European countries neighbouring on Germany. It was felt that particularly coming just after the conclusion of the Atlantic Pact it would have a unfortunate psychological effect. It may be recalled that the French in particular are very insistent on the idea of a defence "in depth" of their Eastern frontiers. Any step which at this juncture brought the Western Occupation Forces back nearer to the line of the Rhine would certainly have been viewed with alarm and despondency by the French Government. Meanwhile the problem to which your Memorandum calls attention of the "incongruous situation created by the presence of Western troops and the existence of Western responsibilities in Berlin deep within the territory occupied by the Soviet Army" remains. The solution put forward in the Draft Canadian Memorandum may yet have to be considered in different political circumstances from those which existed at this session of the Council. As is suggested in that memorandum, it would seem appropriate for the North Atlantic nations to examine together the security implications of any change contemplated in the disposition of the occupying forces in Germany.

Paragraph 10. There appears now to be a fairly good chance of obtaining a speedy Austrian settlement as advocated in this memorandum.

Paragraph 11. The line advocated here was more or less that followed by the Western Foreign Ministers in Paris in their Preparatory Memorandum. Actually the subject did not quite come up in this form as the Soviet representative pressed not for a neutralized and unoccupied Germany now, but for the completion of the Peace Treaty plus the setting up of a German Economic Council. In fact it was pretty plain that the Soviet Government could not risk a neutralized Germany now, or in fact any kind of unified Germany now, because they knew that such a Germany would not in reality be neutral but would be pro-Western.

Paragraph 12. The question of the Eastern Frontiers never in fact arose at this Council session. The Western Occupying Powers were undoubtedly very much aware of the type of argument put forward in the Draft Canadian Memorandum but they were reluctant to take any stand at this time on a vexed and delicate issue which might have set in train unforeseeable complications. As you will have seen from my telegram 351 of May 9th, the French Ambassador in Washington reacted most unfavourably to a suggestion by the State Department that the Polish Government should be asked to admit as settlers a number of refugees from the areas which they occupy in Eastern Germany who are now in Western Germany. M. Bonnet took the line that this would be regarded as a first step in the direction of returning the Eastern Provinces to Germany and as such was most undesirable. The Soviet Government for their part seemed equally anxious to avoid this thorny question in Paris.

Report on the Council of Foreign Ministers' Meeting

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS' MEETING, PARIS, MAY 23–JUNE 20, 1949

Introduction

The Council of Foreign Ministers was established by the Potsdam Conference of July–August, 1945, to be composed of members representing the United Kingdom, United States, France and the USSR. The Council was responsible for concluding peace settlements with Germany and its allies. It was subsequently agreed that the Council should assume the same responsibility for a treaty reestablishing Austria as an independent state, following the decision reached at Moscow in October, 1943. All these responsibilities have been disposed of except for the preparation of the Austrian and German Treaties.

2. Concerning the Austrian Treaty, the Council of Foreign Ministers first discussed a draft at Moscow in March, 1947. This draft has been subject to lengthy but interrupted discussion by the Foreign Ministers' Deputies since then and at the opening of the Paris meeting no agreement had been reached. Indeed, they could not agree on how they should report their differences to the Council.

3. Concerning Germany, the Potsdam communique had this to say: "The Council should be utilized for the preparation of a peace settlement for Germany to be accepted by the government of Germany when a government adequate for the purpose is established."

4. Although the Council of Foreign Ministers was intended to deal with Germany's future, leaving day to day administration to the Four Power Allied Control Council, it soon became a court of appeal for the Allied Control Council where the rule of unanimity paralysed government. In its effort to agree on a German peace, the deliberations of the Council of Foreign Ministers have been constantly complicated by the need to settle urgent problems of the day.

5. At the Council's meeting at London in November–December, 1947, an attempt was made to discuss terms for a peace settlement but the Western Powers were particularly concerned to obtain Soviet agreement on much more limited issues. From their point of view, a formal peace might be delayed without too much harm being done but the same could not be said for the solution of the great and increasing number of political and economic problems confronting the occupying powers in Germany:

6. The failure of the Potsdam machinery to deal with these problems brought the Western Powers to the London meeting in the hope that a general settlement might provide the answers or, at least, that Mr. Molotov would reverse Marshal Sokolov-sky's vetoes and allow quadripartite government to function.

7. The Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Molotov, showed that his Government did not intend to permit a Four Power solution of the vital issues of Germany's future. He sought, it must be assumed, to keep Germany as a financial drain on the Western Powers and to prevent Germany from contributing to the new United States plan for European recovery. This policy had the added attraction, to the Communists, of maintaining political instability in Germany.

8. The failure of the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers to deal with immediate problems, let alone problems of a peace treaty, led the Western Powers to consult among themselves on how they might best introduce conditions of stability into as much of Germany as lay within their control. The London Talks of February–June, 1948, produced the broad outline and subsequent agreements among the three Occupying Powers—sometimes Benelux and sometimes German representatives took part—have filled in the details, which now amount to a reasonably complete peace settlement for the three Western Zones of occupation.

9. This process had not gone very far before it provoked a violent Soviet reaction at the point where the West was most vulnerable—Berlin. The Berlin blockade, owing to the successful airlift and counter-blockade, not only failed in its purpose of bringing developments in Western Germany to a standstill but enhanced the West's prestige and hurt the economy of the Soviet Zone.

10. Negotiations in Moscow in the summer [of] 1948 and at the United Nations in Paris in the fall came to nothing. It was not until the airlift surmounted the trying winter months that the USSR showed any interest in seeking a way out.

11. Through informal talks between Mr. Malik, a Soviet representative at Lake Success, and the United States delegate, Mr. Jessup, carried on between February 15 and May 4, 1949, the USSR indicated its willingness to accept conditions for the lifting of the blockade, the substance of which it had previously rejected. The blockade was lifted on May 12 and the Council of Foreign Ministers was called for May 23. The USSR's earlier position was that the blockade could not be lifted until the Council of Foreign Ministers had been summoned. The Western Powers refused to have the Council of Foreign Ministers meet while under the duress of the blockade.

12. The communique, released on May 5, in which the agreement was announced said that the Council of Foreign Ministers would "consider questions relating to Germany and problems arising out of the situation in Berlin" including also "the question of currency in Berlin".

Part I—Summary of Discussions

A. Agenda

13. At the first meeting of the conference on May 23, Mr. Schuman proposed the following agenda:

- (1) Problems of German unity including economic and political principles and allied controls.
- (2) Berlin, including the currency question.
- (3) Preparation of the German Peace Treaty.
- (4) Discussion of the Austrian Treaty.

The other three Foreign Ministers quickly agreed except for a mild suggestion by Mr. Vishinsky that the first item be "Four Power control of Germany". Mr. Vishinsky also raised, but did not immediately press the question of a conference to discuss the Japanese Peace Treaty.

14. The Council devoted eighteen meetings, from May 24 to June 12, to repetitive and largely futile discussion of the first three items on the agenda. It became obvious that no real agreement was to be expected. The Western Powers therefore, at a restricted meeting immediately following the open session on June 12, tabled proposals for continuing consultation on the various German questions. At the same time Mr. Schuman suggested that the Foreign Ministers could agree on the three major questions involved in the Austrian Treaty and instruct their Deputies to finish drafting that Treaty by September 1. One more week was consumed in bargaining on the details of these two sets of proposals.

15. The course of the discussions in the first three weeks is briefly reviewed below by topics, followed by an account of the salvaging process in the last week of the conference.

B. German Questions

Problems of German Unity

16. Mr. Vishinsky took the initiative in the discussion of German unity. He made a long statement, apparently "for the record", reviewing the alleged failure of the Western Powers to carry out the arrangements for Four Power control agreed upon at Potsdam and condemning tripartite arrangements in the Western Zones. He followed it by proposals for the reestablishment of the Allied Control Council for Germany, the Inter-Allied Kommandatura of Berlin and the All-Berlin Magistrat and for the creation of a German State Council based on existing German economic organs.

17. The Western Ministers countered with the general argument that these proposals were retrograde in reverting to arrangements which had already proved unworkable, that they dealt only with the machinery of control and avoided the basic political and economic principles which must first be agreed upon, and that they would mean the abandonment of the progress made in the Western Zones in rebuilding the German economy and restoring to the Germans control over their own affairs. Mr. Vishinsky repeatedly refused to discuss practical issues such as reparations. In rebuttal of figures quoted by Mr. Acheson to show the progress made in restoring the German economy in the Western Zones, Mr. Vishinsky produced optimistic figures on the prosperity of the Soviet Zone, including a claim that industrial production was now 96% of 1936.

18. At the sixth meeting Mr. Bevin put forward the Western proposals for German unity. They included the accession of the Eastern Zone to the Bonn Constitution, on specific conditions of freedom for all political parties, free speech, an independent judiciary etc., and the enactment of a quadripartite Occupation Statute similar to that now applicable to the Western Zones. Mr. Vishinsky completely rejected these proposals and reiterated his own. After three more meetings it was apparent that the deadlock was complete and the Council passed onto the next item on the agenda.

Berlin

19. The initial proposals of the Western Powers on Berlin were put forward by Mr. Acheson at the tenth meeting on June 2. They called for a reconstitution of the City Government as in 1946 and the drafting of a new constitution by the Berlin Assembly, with the simultaneous reestablishment of the Four Power Allied Kommandatura on a basis to be agreed by the Foreign Ministers at this conference.

20. In the course of the next few meetings the Western Ministers produced detailed arrangements for the Berlin elections and for the division of powers between the Magistrat and the Kommandatura. Mr. Vishinsky refused to accept any real modification of the "unanimity rule" in the Kommandatura or to turn over to the Magistrat any appreciable degree of power.

21. The blockade of Berlin was officially lifted on May 12 in accordance with the New York Agreement. In fact, however, when the Council convened on May 23 restriction on transportation had not been entirely removed and negotiations were still proceeding in Berlin. The Soviet authorities maintained restrictions which were, in the view of the Western Powers, in contravention of the New York Agreement. (The strike of Berlin railway workers, which continued throughout the conference, further complicated the problem of restoring transportation to and from the Western Zones). At the 16th meeting on June 9 the Council agreed to instruct the four Commandants in Berlin to complete by June 13 the negotiations arising from the New York Agreement, although Mr. Vishinsky at first maintained that all Soviet restrictions on trade and communications had been removed.

22. At the same meeting Mr. Vishinsky insisted on discussing the Berlin currency question and demanded the introduction of the Eastern mark as sole currency. He based this demand on the directive issued on August 30, 1948, after the Four Power talks in Moscow and tried to use the report of the Technical Committee set up under the auspices of the Security Council to support his case. The Western Powers pointed out that a single currency was out of the question in a city whose administration was split. In an exchange with Mr. Vishinsky on the subject of the Technical Committee, Mr. Acheson made the point that the Committee had not made recommendations—it had produced proposals which were not, however, acceptable.

The German Peace Treaty

23. The Council turned to the third item on the agenda at the seventeenth meeting on June 10. Mr. Vishinsky made a speech aiming to prove that the USSR was the sole champion of the German Peace Treaty. He proposed that the four Governments prepare separate drafts of a Treaty, providing particularly for the withdrawal of occupation forces a year after the conclusion of the Treaty, and that the procedure for the preparation of the Treaty be settled at this session of the Council.

24. Two more meetings were spent in pointless discussion of Mr. Vishinsky's suggestions. The Western Ministers stressed the futility of attempting to draft a treaty when such problems as reparations and German unity were far from settled. On the proposal for the withdrawal of occupation troops, Mr. Acheson suggested that the Soviets make a beginning by reducing the 340,000 troops they had in a Zone half as large as the Western Zone, where there were only 270,000 troops. Mr. Vishinsky asserted, in contradiction, that the Western Powers had 400,000 troops in Germany.

Permanent Consultation on Germany

25. At a restricted meeting of June 12, the Western ministers, convinced that further discussion of the general issues at this meeting was pointless, presented a plan for continuing consultation. The provision of the plan included:

(a) An exchange of views at the next session of the United Nations General Assembly on arrangements for a further meeting of the Council to discuss Germany.

(b) Consultation between the occupation authorities in Berlin on increased trade, movement of persons and the exchange of information between Berlin and the Zones, and on the administration of Berlin.

(c) Consultation with German experts to assist in this work.

(d) Negotiation of an agreement in Berlin on the requirements of the Western Allies for communication and transportation to and from the Western Zones.

26. These proposals were accepted by Mr. Vishinsky as a basis for discussion and for another week the Council bargained over the details, and simultaneously discussed the Austrian Treaty. Mr. Vishinsky's counter-proposals contained some minor changes in the wording, provision for a coordinating German economic body between the Zones, a reference to developing financial relations between the Zones and a redraft of the paragraph on access to Berlin which placed the responsibility for maintaining communications on the occupation authorities in their respective Zones. The Western Powers revised their proposals partially to meet Mr. Vishinsky's suggestion and eventually an amended version, in the form of a communiqué, was agreed upon. The final text of the communiqué is appended to this memorandum. In brief, it expresses the intention of the Ministers to discuss at the next session of the General Assembly arrangements for another meeting of the Council, provides for continuing consultation between the occupation authorities on trade and other relationships between the Eastern and Western Zones of Germany and between sectors of Berlin, and reaffirms the agreement on the lifting of the blockade.

C. Austrian Treaty

27. At the meeting on June 12 at which the Western Ministers presented their plan for continuing consultation on Germany, Mr. Schuman suggested that the Council try to reach agreement on what appeared to be the three major questions involved in the Austrian Treaty, viz., delimitation of the Austrian frontiers; Yugoslavia's claim for reparations; and the settlement of Soviet claims to German assets in Austria. With these three issues settled, the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers could be instructed to finish drafting the Treaty by September 1. Mr. Vishinsky gave his general assent to this procedure.

28. In the subsequent discussion, Mr. Vishinsky made some notable concessions, although he also bargained very closely on certain details. The outstanding change in the Soviet attitude was the abandonment of support for Yugoslavia's claims to reparations and cessions of territory. Mr. Vishinsky was particularly stubborn over the wording of a provision for the export of profits and other incomes from German assets in Austria ceded to the USSR. On the last day of the conference, after the final communiqué had been issued to the press, Mr. Vishinsky suddenly asked for another meeting to amend this section. He had apparently received new instructions from Moscow. He demanded the re-inclusion of a paragraph which it had been agreed earlier to omit. Mr. Acheson, on behalf of the Western Powers, agreed to its inclusion with the proviso that the point be subject to clarification by the Deputies. Mr. Vishinsky, however, would not consider any modification or clarification of his proposal and was forced to drop it.

29. The agreement on the principles of the Austrian Treaty, which is also included in the communiqué appended to this memorandum, provides inter alia:

- (a) That Austria's frontiers shall be those of 1938;
- (b) That Yugoslavia shall have the right to Austrian property within its territory and that the Treaty will provide a guarantee of protection for Slovene and Croat minorities in Austria;
- (c) That in compensation for German assets ceded to Austria, the USSR will receive $150,000,000 from Austria in six years. In addition other specified German assets are to be retained by the USSR;
- (d) That the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers will complete the drafting of the Austrian Treaty by September 1.

D. Japanese Peace Treaty

30. At the last session of the Council on June 20 Mr. Vishinsky reverted to the question of the Japanese Peace Treaty, which he had raised in the course of discussion on the agenda. He suggested that the Foreign Ministers set the date for a meeting to deal with this question, to which China should be invited.

31. The Western Ministers held that the Council of Foreign Ministers was not the appropriate body to deal with this matter and that the other nations represented on the Far Eastern Commission must participate in the Japanese peace-making. Mr. Vishinsky made an unsuccessful attempt to prove that the Potsdam agreement provided for the drawing up of the Treaty by the Council of Foreign Ministers. Having stated their respective positions the Ministers quickly agreed that further argument was useless.

Part II—Commentary

A. German Questions

32. Mr. Vishinsky's first major speech suggested, and later discussions confirmed, that he had no realistic offer to make on the issues standing in the way of a unified Germany. He did not, however, immediately seize the opportunity to indulge in purely propaganda speeches. His proposal to reestablish the Allied Control Council was hardly designed to appeal to the Germans and was only slightly softened by the suggestion for a German State Council. But with the tabling of the Western programme for German unity, Mr. Vishinsky launched into a long propaganda display in which he attacked the Bonn Constitution as a "diktat" of the Western Powers and contrary to Potsdam. He followed this up with his completely unrealistic demand for a Peace Treaty and the withdrawal of occupation troops—obviously aimed at his German audience.

33. For some time after it became obvious that Mr. Vishinsky was deliberately advancing proposals which he knew to be unacceptable to the Western Powers, it was thought that he might be interested in achieving some kind of agreement on trade between the Eastern and Western Zones. However, no serious attempt was made by the Russians to achieve a modus vivendi in this field. The provisions for encouraging trade which did emerge from the conference were largely a result of initiative of the Western Powers. It is possible that the Russians had intended to try for an agreement on trade between the Zones, after a preliminary propaganda barrage, but decided that they had no need to make any concessions to obtain it. The mounting evidence of a recession in the United States may have convinced the Soviets that they and not the Western Powers were in the stronger position.

34. If, as seems probable now, the Soviet Union made no more use of the conference, as regards German problems, than as a platform from which to reiterate their views, the question remains, why they took the trouble to have the meeting called. Although they had acknowledged by agreeing to lift the blockade that it had been a tactical failure they may have believed, as suggested above, that they held the better cards and that the Western Powers would be forced to make concessions.

35. It has been suggested, also, that one Soviet object may have been to achieve a détente which would delay approval of the North Atlantic Treaty and passage of a military aid bill by the United States Congress. The lifting of the blockade had a tendency to weaken public support for these measures. It seems certain that Mr. Acheson did not want an agreement with the Russians on Germany to emerge from the conference. It could hardly have been achieved without compromising on vital Western policies in Germany and it might, by making the Russians appear reasonable, have seriously endangered Congressional support for the whole United States program including ERP.

36. The arrangements for Germany enumerated in the final communiqué have been termed a modus vivendi but they are rather an undertaking to consult on working out a modus vivendi. The only definite gain that the Western Powers appear to have made is the fairly explicit commitment on access to Berlin. Apart from that, the result is the purely negative one of not having given anything away.

B. The Austrian Treaty

37. The readiness with which Mr. Vishinsky accepted the Western plan for settling the basic principles of the Austrian Treaty was probably the only surprising development at the conference. The Soviets apparently decided that their support of the Yugoslav claims was no longer useful in their struggle with Marshal Tito and therefore sold out the Yugoslavs.

38. The Russians have obtained substantial economic interests in Austria. Besides the cash payment of $150,000,000 they have been ceded 60% of the oil rights in Eastern Austria and the bulk of the assets of the Danube Shipping Company. On the other hand, they will have to withdraw their troops from Austria. They may, of course, raise further difficulties in negotiating the details of the Treaty or procrastinate on troop withdrawal after the Treaty is signed.

39. The Austrians themselves have been increasingly restive under the occupation and very anxious to see a Treaty concluded. They feel confident of being able to deal with their native Communists and the remaining Soviet administrative and technical personnel once the Soviet army is gone. They believe that the admittedly heavy drain on their economic resources involved in the terms of the Treaty is a price worth paying to rid themselves of the Red Army. The lifting of the burden of occupation costs is, of course, a compensating factor. It is important to note that the conclusion of an Austrian Treaty will remove the legal basis (maintenance of lines of communication for Soviet forces in Austria) for the presence of Russian troops in Roumania and Hungary.

C. General

40. The discussions on the Allied side were dominated by Mr. Acheson. Mr. Bevin's health was evidently poor: he was bored by the legalistic battle raging about him and physically ill. More and more he tended to leave Mr. Acheson free to make the running. Throughout, the latter employed the tactics and methods of the highly skilled legal counsel that he is, and in this seems to have won an ascendancy over Mr. Vishinsky. The latter appears to have been under a severe double handicap during the debates. He was given no latitude whatever by Moscow and it is reported that his master in the Kremlin became inaccessible during the last days of the meeting. Moreover, it became clear also that Mr. Vishinsky's forte is that of the prosecuting attorney, not a diplomat, and for this type of ability the Paris meetings gave little or no scope.

41. The policy followed by the United States delegation evidently assumed that an acceptable general settlement was not possible; first, because a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers was not an occasion best suited to negotiations on matters of great delicacy and secondly, because the time was not right for agreement. It is also clear that the USSR was not prepared to offer any dramatic concessions to obtain an early settlement but, on the other hand, it did not intend to break the communications it had so laboriously established at Lake Success.

42. The results of the meeting reflect the cautious attitudes taken by the dominating delegations. Little was accomplished toward a settlement of outstanding issues but ample provisions were made for putting off decisions without breaking off negotiations.

CONFIDENTIAL

Paris, August 19, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney,

I noticed in reading the report on the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers held in Paris between May 23rd which was prepared in the Department and which was forwarded to us under cover of your Circular Document No. A.53 of August 6th,† a somewhat unflattering reference on page 8 to M. Vishinsky's capacities as a diplomat. You will recall that it was stated in paragraph 40 that "it became clear also that M. Vishinsky's forte is that of a prosecuting attorney, not of a diplomat, and for this type of ability the Paris meetings gave little or no scope". It seemed to be the opinion of the officials of the three Western delegations at the Council that Vishinsky had not put on a very impressive performance in Paris and the general view of those who had been present at the meeting seemed to bear out the statement contained in the Department's report. It may be worth recording, however, that on the occasion when Mr. Bevin dined with the Ambassador during the meeting of the Council in Paris, the question of Vishinsky's capacity as a diplomat was raised in general conversation. Mr. Bevin intervened in his usual emphatic fashion to pay tribute to Vishinsky's abilities as a diplomatic negotiator. He said he thought it would be a mistake to underrate Vishinsky.

Some members of the Canadian Delegation at the meeting of the United Nations last autumn in Paris may recall the behind-the-scenes conversation which took place between Vishinsky and Senor Bramuglia, the President of the Security Council, in connection with the attempt of the "neutrals" on the Security Council to find a solution to the Berlin problem. Certainly these conversations seemed to be conducted on the part of M. Vishinsky with great adroitness. It would be a mistake to underrate one's opponent and my own impression, for what it may be worth, is that any diplomat who entered into negotiations with Vishinsky would have to keep his wits about him. In fact Vishinsky's admittedly poor showing at the last meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers does not seem to have much bearing on his skill as a negotiator. In the early weeks of the meeting no serious negotiation took place but rather there was arid exchange of prepared statements and a hollow bickering over legalistic points. It was only in the last few days of the meeting that the Council got down to negotiation over the agreed communique. A perhaps more justified criticism of Vishinsky might be that he fumbled the publicity aspect of his statements on Germany in the Council. Here, however, it is probable that he was, as is suggested in the Department's report, limited by very rigid instructions from Moscow.

In passing, I should also like to comment on the statement contained in the same paragraph of your report regarding Mr. Bevin's health. While he was certainly in poor physical shape when he was in Paris, I do not know that we should go so far as to describe him as "physically ill". I make this point in case statements made to me by various members of the United Kingdom Delegation about Mr. Bevin's health, which I passed on to the Department, may have left an exaggerated impression. As it happens I was talking to one of his Private Secretaries only a week or two ago and this subject came up. He said that the Foreign Secretary was undoubtedly thoroughly exhausted by arduous and uninterrupted years of government responsibility. He thought that his basic trouble was fatigue and that he was ageing rapidly under the strain—"he is a tired old man" were his words—but he did not think he had anything gravely the matter with him.

Yours sincerely,
C.S.A. RITCHIE

AUSTRIAN TREATY

The communique issued on June 30, 1949, after the Paris meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers, laid down the principles on which agreement on the Austrian Treaty was to be sought. The Foreign Ministers' Deputies who have been negotiating the Treaty since January, 1947, were instructed to report on September 1. When this deadline passed nine articles remained unagreed. The Foreign Ministers of the four negotiating Powers themselves met in New York on September 26, September 28, and October 6 to attempt to break the deadlock. The Deputies were instructed to continue their meetings and have since reduced the number of unagreed articles to seven. The principal obstacle for many months has been Article 35 (German Assets in Austria) which provides for the granting of oil concessions and the property of the Danube Shipping Company (D.D.S.G.) to the Soviet Union. Recent reports indicate that negotiations have reached a critical stage and that once the text of Article 35 is agreed the remaining six unagreed articles will present little difficulty. Substantial progress appears to have been recently made on Article 35.

2. In these circumstances, it is considered advisable to review existing Canadian policy on the Austrian Treaty to see to what extent our policy may still be applicable, what comments the Government might like to make on it before agreement is reached, and what attitude the Government might take in the event of an agreement.

3. Existing Canadian Policy—On February 25, 1947, the views of the Government were transmitted in a memorandum to the Special Deputies. The same day Mr. St. Laurent read a statement to the House of Commons (copy attached as annex B).† The statement applied to the Austrian settlement the same position as the Government has taken in connection with the German settlement i.e. that Canadian participation in the settlement should reflect the part Canada played in the defeat of naziism.

4. In the February statement the Government supported the declaration of the Moscow Conference of 1943 which expressed the intention of the four powers to see re-established a free and independent Austria. At the same time the Government referred to Mr. Mackenzie King's statement of January 30, 1946, in which he said that the Government "noted with satisfaction the steps which have been taken in Austria and which had resulted in the re-establishment of an autonomous Austrian state and of an independent Austrian government". These principles are reaffirmed in Article 1 of the draft Treaty as it has been agreed by the United Kingdom, United States, France and the U.S.S.R.

5. The memorandum suggested that the boundaries should be those existing before the Anschluss and this has been agreed in Article 5.

6. Our desire to see an early withdrawal of occupation forces after the ratification of the Treaty is met in Article 33 of the draft Treaty.

7. Our proposal that the powers of the Allied Commission should be handed over to the Austrian Government appears to be satisfied by Articles 1, 2 and 33 of the draft.

8. The prohibition against a new Anschluss, mentioned in our statement, is incorporated as Article 4 of the draft.

9. The declaration that the signatories will respect Austria's independence (Article 2) contains no guarantee for the security and future integrity of Austria which the Government, in its statement, considered to be a matter for the United Nations or the four great powers.

10. Section II (Articles 21–30) of the draft deals with the establishment and preservation of democratic institutions and human rights as well as with the suppression of German and nazi organizations about which the Government expressed concern.

11. There are, then, only two aspects of the Treaty in which the Government has shown interest that may not be adequately looked after by the draft. The first is the general desire that the settlement should be "of a nature to contribute to a set of circumstances mostly likely to ensure a permanent European peace". This requirement is further examined below. The second Canadian requirement so far unfulfilled is for an acceptable procedure for associating this country with the settlement. Events since February 25, 1947, will have to be taken into account and so this subject is discussed more fully below.

12. Present Canadian Interests—In a letter (to the Minister of Mines and Resources) dated January 22, 1948, on the subject of Austrians entering Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

“The position now is that Canada never recognized de jure German sovereignty over Austria, although de facto recognition of German sovereignty was accorded. Austria is now recognized as an autonomous state, liberated from German occupation. Canada was never at war with the political entity of Austria, nor with any Austrian predecessor to the present government”.

13. The substance of this statement was communicated to the Austrian Minister in Washington in April, 1948, and on January 25, 1949, Cabinet agreed to accept an Austrian Consul-General in Ottawa.

14. The absence of a Treaty does not, therefore, greatly affect our political relations with Austria. It should be noted, however, that Article 14 provides that unless Canada accedes to the ratified Treaty, any bilateral treaties that were in existence between Canada and Austria before 1948 would have to be renewed bilaterally, if we wish to have them continued in force. Should Canada accede to the Austrian Treaty, these treaties would continue in force, or lapse, at our option. (See Annex C for a list of Canadian-Austrian treaties).†

15. Trade—Canada, on September 7, 1949, extended Most-Favoured-Nation treatment to Austria. The following table indicates the value of our trade with Austria before the war and in recent years.

Year	Imports from Austria	Exports to Austria
Average
1935-39	$245,000	$ 27,000
1947	89,153	3,069,648
1948	280,853	3,109,835

16. There would appear to be no difficulty in Canadian-Austrian trade relations arising out of the absence of an Austria Treaty.

17. General Interests—In its memorandum of January, 1947, the Government stated that it “wishes to see a satisfactory settlement concluded between Austria and all the Allies at the earliest possible date”. This outcome is, perhaps, a matter of greater importance now than it was in 1947. The continued occupation can only favour the political extremists both in Austria and in Eastern Europe where the occupation of Austria affords the U.S.S.R. a reasonable excuse for maintaining armed forces. The Soviet pressure on Yugoslavia might be lessened if the occupation of Austria brought about a withdrawal of Soviet troops from the area.

18. Undoubtedly, the draft Treaty offers something short of the liberal arrangements that the Government might have supported to ensure a stable Austria, but increasing hostility to the occupation within Austria and the disadvantages of having Soviet lines of communication in Eastern Europe, suggest that any arrangements that do not prejudice the establishment of an independent and democratic Austria may have to be accepted.

19. Procedure—Article 59, as agreed in the draft text, provides that the treaty will become effective upon ratification by the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Austria. There therefore need be no conference comparable to those held on the satellite treaties and consequently no formal opportunity for the Canadian Government to examine and comment upon the final text. Article 58, also agreed, provides for accession by states which were at war with Germany and which had the status of United Nations on May 8, 1945. Consequently, we shall be able to accede to the Treaty. In view of the considerations mentioned above, however, it would appear to be our over-riding interest to have an acceptable Treaty concluded even though Canada should have no adequate part in drafting it. Whether or not Canada should accede to such a Treaty is, of course, another question.

20. Conclusion—The complexity and long duration of the negotiations suggest that it would be generally undesirable, if not impossible, to attempt to alter any agreement already reached. Thus any representations the government may wish to make should be confined to the unagreed articles. Of these articles, No. 35, Disposal of German Assets, has been the source of the greatest disagreement. It has been thoroughly canvassed by the Deputies for more than two years and the differences of opinion are so sharply drawn and so detailed that it would be beyond our resources of information to offer any suggestions to break the deadlock. To attempt to interject any provision to further Canadian interests would almost certainly be regarded as an irresponsible act on our part.

21. Certain Canadian interests are involved in the other unagreed articles (Nos. 16, 26, 27, 43, 48 and 48 bis).⁶ If, upon enquiry, the existing proposals of the Western Powers are found to be unsatisfactory, it might be possible for the Canadian Government to make effective representations to the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France. The advisability of making such representations would depend, in part, upon the magnitude of the Canadian interests involved.

22. It is suggested therefore, that other interested departments of the Canadian Government be consulted to ascertain their interest in, and opinions on the text of the unagreed articles of the Austrian Treaty. On the basis of the replies we receive we would be able to determine the nature of any representations we might offer. (Annex A indicates the interests of other Government departments in the Austrian Treaty.)†

23. It was suggested that the Canadian Government present a general statement concerning the Austrian Treaty to the Governments of the United Kingdom, the

These dealt with displaced persons and refugees (16), disposal of war material of Allied and German origin (26), prevention of German rearmament (27), United Nations property in Austria (43), and debts (48 and 48 bis).

United States and France, on the basis of the existing agreements and proposals. But since the general views of the Canadian Government on the Austrian settlement were stated in February, 1947, and since the Canadian Government has taken no part in negotiating the Treaty, it was not considered advisable to make any general statement of this sort at the present time. Such a statement could only be regarded as an irresponsible criticism of the Western Powers for obtaining better terms for Austria from the Russians than they have been able to obtain, after almost three years of hard bargaining.

24. A further study should be made of the whole draft treaty, when and if one is agreed, in order to ascertain:

(a) Whether it is necessary for us to accede in order to benefit under the treaty's provision and,

(b) Whether the benefits would be of sufficient importance to warrant our accession although it may be politically undesirable to do so.

It is proposed that drafts of the agreed Treaty, when they become available, be circulated to interested Government departments in order to ascertain their views upon the accession to the Austrian Treaty by Canada.

25. The articles of the draft providing for accession (Articles 59) mention no date before which instruments of accession must be deposited. It is therefore possible for the Government to refrain from acceding until and unless it becomes apparent that Canada cannot avail itself of the Treaty procedures in advancing Canada's interests. Canada, by Mr. Mackenzie King's statement of January 30, 1946, mentioned in paragraph 4 above, has already recognized the re-established state of Austria as well as its Government. Any further requirements of this nature that might be considered necessary after the Treaty came into effect might be met by a unilateral declaration.

I wish to bring to your attention certain aspects of the Treaty for the Re-establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria in which your Department may be interested.

2. Although the Canadian Government has taken no part in negotiating the Austrian Treaty, its general views on an Austrian settlement were communicated to the four negotiating Powers in February, 1947 (see Annex A).† Admittedly, the procedure followed and certain of the articles already agreed upon are not in complete accord with the general Canadian views on the subject. But the fact that the negotiations have been wholly the responsibility of the four Great Powers, the sharp conflict of interests in Austria, and the overriding importance of reaching some agreement make it difficult and probably undesirable for Canada to intervene in any way.

3. At the present time the negotiating Powers have agreed upon forty-four articles of the Austrian Treaty. Seven remain unagreed. Particularly stubborn difficulties have been encountered in drafting an acceptable text for Article 35 (German Assets in Austria) which provides for the transfer to the Soviet Union of former German oil and shipping property in Austria and for the payment by Austria of an annual sum to the Soviet Union. Reports indicate, however, that progress has recently been made on the drafting of Article 35 and that negotiations on the whole Treaty are moving to a conclusion. It is expected that the remaining unagreed articles will present little difficulty once the text of Article 35 has been settled.

4. We do not propose, at this time, to offer any suggestion to the negotiating Powers with respect to the Articles that have been already agreed, nor with respect to Article 35. Agreement on most articles has been reached only after much bargaining; the various proposals for Article 35 have been thoroughly canvassed by the four Deputies. To make independent proposals concerning these articles at this time does not appear to be feasible.

5. In the unagreed articles of the Austrian Treaty, however, certain Canadian interests are involved. These articles are Nos. 16, 26, 27, 42, 48, and 48 bis. I have attached copies of the proposed texts of these articles for your consideration and comment.† You will understand, of course, that unless the Canadian interests involved in these articles are very great, and unless it is considered that substantial Canadian interests may be jeopardized by the proposed articles, it would be unwise to offer any suggestions to the negotiators on these matters. The complexity and long duration of the discussions on the Austrian Treaty generally make it undesirable for us to press our views unless the stake is considerable.

6. When final agreement between the negotiating Powers is reached on the Austrian Treaty, the Canadian Government will have an opportunity to review the Treaty as a whole and to consider what its attitude towards the settlement should be. Copies of the agreed draft will be sent to your Department for your consideration. It is anticipated that Canada will be offered an opportunity to accede to the ratified Treaty and to become, under the terms of the Treaty, an "Associated Power".

RE: SETTLEMENT OF MILITARY RELIEF CREDITS

On Tuesday, May 31st, 1949, a meeting was held in the office of Mr. Plumptre to discuss the general problem of settlement of our accounts with those European countries to which we supplied goods for the succour of the civilian population in the latter part of the war and in the early post-war period.

2. The following were present:

Department of External Affairs—

Mr. [A.F.W.] Plumptre

Mr. [L.] Mayrand

Mr. [A.C.] Anderson

Mr. [P.] Tremblay

Mr. [K.C.] Brown

Mr. [W.P.] McLeod

Mr. [A.J.] Matheson

Mr. [J.B.] Seaborn

Department of Finance—

Mr. [R.B.] Bryce

Mr. C.L. Read

3. The amounts of the debts due to us by the various countries concerned are as follows:

Belgium	—	$7,822,462.00	U.S.
Denmark	—	565,200.00	"
France	—	12,389,021.00	"
Greece	—	612,352.00	"
Italy	—	28,400,000.00	"
Norway	—	1,703,098.00	"
Yugoslavia	—	226,242.00	"

In some of these countries, it may be necessary to take at least partial settlement in local currencies. The question then arises: what is the best way of using the money? Three major uses to which it can be put are the purchase of premises, the financing of regular expenditures by our own and other government departments, and the support of a cultural and educational program. The projects are to be in that order of priority. It is emphasized that any cultural and educational program would have to have the approval of Parliament.

4. The situation with respect to the settlement of military relief credits is briefly as follows:

a) Greece Greece will not be able to make more than nominal settlement and we are prepared to accept premises in full payment. Before his departure, we should brief the new Ambassador, whoever he may be, to find suitable premises.

b) Yugoslavia We have agreed to accept dinars in full settlement of the account. They will be used for the operations of the Mission which, within about two years, will use the total amount available. Our Minister is attempting to negotiate an agreement.

c) Albania External Affairs is to find out where we stand re Albania. Is a bill to be presented to that country for military relief? Will we get any share of it?

d) Italy Italy will only be able to make a nominal settlement, considering the magnitude of the account. Nominal settlement should include both premises and some money for an educational and cultural program. We should start to negotiate when we have the Désy-Monette report on premises, which will probably be in the summer.

e) Netherlands A residence has been bought but suitable premises for the Chancery have not yet been found. We have approximately 6.2 million guilders for local use by the Canadian Government and by Canadians for cultural and educational purposes. There should be a substantial amount for culture and education.

f) Belgium We are getting 300,000 francs per month from the Belgians which is being used for the expenses of the Mission. As Belgium's exchange position is relatively good, we should, at least at the beginning of negotiations, try to accept a minimum in local currency (for government expenses only) and ask for the rest in dollars. We should agree to the British reductions. We should move forward soon with the Belgian negotiations, attempting to present the bill through diplomatic channels, i.e., via Brussels in the first instance.

g) France The French financial position is such that we cannot expect to get a large portion of our $13,000,000 account paid in dollars. We will have to accept a larger amount in local currency and should, therefore, be able to allot between 1 and 2 million dollars for culture and education as soon as we know the cultural and educational program.

h) Luxembourg We should tell the Belgians that we are about to present a bill to Luxembourg as well. We should be able to get most of the Luxembourg settlement in dollars.

i) Denmark The Danes have offered to pay us a further 1,000,000 kroner for the settlement of their account. We should delay acceptance until we have agreed upon the total amount of our claim and until we have a clearer picture of the amount to be spent on premises and on expenditures by other government departments. The premises question should be taken up again soon.

j) Norway We will probably have to accept a substantial amount of the Norwegian settlement in local currency. We should, therefore, explore the possibilities of the purchase of premises and of a cultural and education program.

5. Premises. It was agreed that the acquisition of premises should have high priority in ways of using currencies. Our representatives abroad should make new efforts to find suitable premises. Consideration should be given to finding an assistant for Mr. Monette, the departmental architect.

6. A statement of the estimated annual expenditures by government departments is attached.† The Administrative Division will check to see if there are any additional expenditures for, for example, the Department of Labour and the Secretary of State's Department, and if so, will submit a new estimate.

7. The discussion on a memorandum prepared by the Information Division of External Affairs on "The Use of Funds Blocked in Western European Countries for Cultural and Educational Purposes" emphasized the following points:

a) Insofar as the settlement of military relief accounts is concerned, it is our obligation to Parliament (i) to obtain dollar settlements if we possibly can, and (ii) to give the purchase of premises and expenditures by other government departments priority over cultural and educational programs. Therefore, we can only hope definitely for a cultural and educational program in France, Italy and the Netherlands, and possibly in Denmark and Norway.

b) Consideration should be given to giving assistance to

(i) musicians, for study and performances;

(ii) sports and physical culture.

c) Mr. Bryce doubted that it would be possible to capitalize that portion of the local currency which we intend to allot to cultural and educational purposes and use the interest from it for annual expenses on this program. Hence, it seems that we will have to use up the amount allocated to culture and education over a period yet to be decided, possibly 10 to 20 years. This might serve as the nucleus for a continuing program.

d) Any program which we are able to evolve for the use of funds in this way should be brought to the attention of the Royal Commission headed by Mr. [Vincent] Massey.⁷

MILITARY RELIEF—CULTURAL PROGRAMME

Today I telephoned Mr. C.L. Read (Finance) to discuss future progress on this matter. I also tried to push matters ahead and found him rather reluctant.

2. It emerged that there was a difference of view within his Department. He said that "a senior official" was very unwilling to move ahead on the basis that had generally been agreed between Departments concerned. This official felt that if any financial provision was going to be made for scholarships abroad, and other "cultural finance", it should be with the countries that have the best educational facilities to offer Canadians. It should not be simply with a mixed bag of countries with which we happened to be in a creditor position on military relief account.⁸

3. Mr. Read said that he was going to discuss the question with Mr. Bryce, who is now reappearing in his office on a part time basis. However, it is unlikely that we can expect any action very quickly.

4. I told Mr. Read that I had hoped we could get Parliamentary approval for the cultural programme at the current session of Parliament. He said he did not think that there was any hope of this. Not only was there the divergence of view within his own Department, but in addition there was the question of getting some sort of clearance for the programme from the Royal Commission on Culture.

5. I asked Mr. Read what was the best way of getting approval from Parliament for the proposed expenditures out of military relief funds. I suggested that it might be accomplished by the inclusion of an item for $1.00 in the departmental estimates. This is the way that capital outlays from military relief funds are being covered.

6. Mr. Read said that he had not discussed the form in which the cultural programme should be put to Parliament. He thought it would be desirable to decide on the programme first and consider ways and means afterwards.

7. Do you agree (a) that it is hopeless to try to get any programme approved at the present session of Parliament, and (b) that we should let the matter stand over for a few weeks until Bryce is fully back in harness?⁹

MILITARY RELIEF—SETTLEMENT OF CANADIAN CLAIMS AGAINST YUGOSLAVIA

I attach for your approval a draft Memorandum to Cabinet on this subject.

I expect to be sending you within the next fortnight similar memoranda for Cabinet relating to settlement of military relief claims against Italy and Greece.¹⁰

Yugoslavia, Italy and Greece fall into the same general category for military relief purposes; they are all "Mediterranean countries" within the terms of the P.C. 3065 of July 31, 1947. A copy of this basic Order-in-Council is attached to the Memorandum for Cabinet.†

There is a fourth Mediterranean country where we have a military relief claim—Albania. We have agreed with officials of the Department of Finance that this claim should not be put forward for the time being, partly because of political difficulties with Albania, and partly because of the very small likelihood of getting any money from them. A similar attitude is being taken by the United States and the United Kingdom.

MILITARY RELIEF—SETTLEMENT OF CANADIAN CLAIMS AGAINST YUGOSLAVIA

Canadian policy regarding claims against European countries for military relief was set forth in P.C. 3065 of July 31, 1947. A copy of that document is attached.† In paragraph 5) (a) (iii) the Canadian claim against Yugoslavia is set at $226,242 (U.S. dollars).

2. On May 30, 1947, the Government of Yugoslavia was advised of the total military relief bill from the total military relief bill from the United States, United Kingdom and Canada, and of the shares of the three countries, including the Canadian share mentioned above. The bill was presented in terms of U.S. dollars, but the actual forms of settlement were to be agreed by each of the three countries with Yugoslavia.

3. The Government of Yugoslavia is willing to negotiate a settlement with Canada. It requests, however, that in determining the amount to be repaid, the very heavy losses in human lives and materials sustained by Yugoslavia during the last war against the common enemy be taken into consideration, as well as the fact that similar supplies were received later by Yugoslavia from UNRRA free of charge. It is prepared to settle the claim so determined by opening an internal dinar account in favour of the Government of Canada, to be utilized for the needs of Canada's diplomatic and consular representatives in Yugoslavia. This follows the pattern of a settlement made between Yugoslavia and the United States referred to below.

4. The United Kingdom and the United States have already made settlements on terms favourable to Yugoslavia. In both cases the settlement involved other claims in addition to military relief.

5. On July 31st, 1947, the United Kingdom agreed to settle all debts of Yugoslavia to the United Kingdom, known or unknown, incurred up to that date and arising in connection with the late war, by accepting the sum of £1 million, against known claims totalling approximately £2.7 million. In September, 1947, when the United Kingdom presented to Yugoslavia its bill in respect of military relief, amounting to approximately $3.6 million, the Government of Yugoslavia was advised that in accordance with the agreement of July 31st, 1947 the United Kingdom agrees not to demand any specific reimbursement for United Kingdom.

6. On July 19th, 1948, an agreement between the United States and Yugoslavia provided that in consideration of the supplies and services received as Lend-Lease (approximately $32 million), in consideration of the obligation to the United States for civilian supplies received as military relief (approximately $6.5 million), and in consideration of the other provisions of the agreement, the Government of Yugoslavia would pay the Government of the United States the sum of 45 million dinars (equivalent to approximately $900,000 U.S.). The dinars are to be used by the United States in Yugoslavia in the acquisition of consular property or for other expenses of the United States diplomatic or consular missions, excepting the purchase of commodities for export. This agreement was somewhat overshadowed by another agreement signed on the same day, in which Yugoslavia agreed to pay $17 million to the United States in settlement for American property nationalized in Yugoslavia and other pecuniary claims between the two countries, and the United States agreed to unfreeze Yugoslav assets in the United States, including $47 million worth of gold.

7. Canada has so far settled its military relief claim against only one country: The Netherlands. This is a North West European country and the considerations applying to it are somewhat different from those applying to Yugoslavia.¹¹ However, the Canadian claims covering both military relief and surplus guilders were written down substantially.

8. In view of all these considerations I recommend:

(a) that negotiations be conducted with the Government of Yugoslavia for the settlement of Canada's claim in respect of military relief;

(b) that, in the first instance, our claim should be written down from $226,242 (U.S.) to $150,000 (U.S.);

(c) that the claim be further reduced to a figure of not less than 50% of $226,242 (U.S.) if this proves to be desirable during the course of negotiations; and

(d) that payment be accepted in Yugoslavian dinars at the rate of exchange between United States dollars and dinars current at the times of payment.¹²

MILITARY RELIEF—SETTLEMENT OF CANADIAN CLAIMS AGAINST ITALY

Canadian policy regarding claims against European countries for military relief was set forth in P.C. 3065 of July 31, 1947. A copy of that document is attached.† In paragraph 5 (a) (iii), the Canadian claim against Italy is set at 5.4 per cent of the total bill rendered to Italy for military relief supplies, i.e. $28,400,000.00 (U.S. dollars).

2. On May 15, 1947, the Government of Italy was advised of the shares of the United States, United Kingdom and Canada in the total military relief bill, including the Canadian share mentioned above. The bill was reckoned in U.S. dollars, but the actual forms of settlement were to be agreed by each of the three countries with Italy.

3. On April 15, 1947, the Italian Representative in Ottawa was informed that in view of the difficult financial position of the Italian Government, the Canadian

In correspondence with R.B. Bryce of the Department of Finance, the Department of External Affairs argued that "a politically amicable gesture" should be made to Yugoslavia in light of the tension between that country and the Soviet bloc (DEA/2295-AH-7-40).

Government proposed to request no more than a "nominal settlement". This policy was confirmed in P.C. 3065 (attached).†

4. The United Kingdom and the United States both waived their military relief claim against Italy. The United Kingdom action was made conditional on ratification of the Italian Peace Treaty by the Italian Government and was taken as a political goodwill gesture. The United States waived its claim of $390,500,000 as part of a comprehensive Agreement with Italy on August 24, 1947, shortly before the Italian post-war elections. The Agreement also provided for the unfreezing of Italian properties and assets, the turning over to Italy of twenty-eight merchant ships and the payment by Italy of $5,000,000 to settle claims of United States nationals. The purposes of the Agreement were said to be to ease the "burdensome clauses" of the Peace Treaty and to contribute to Italy's peacetime economy.

5. In view of the fact that the United Kingdom and the United States have waived their claims the Italians have expressed the hope that Canada will accept one dollar as "nominal settlement". When the United Kingdom and the United States were waiving their claims they invited Canada to do the same. It was felt, however, that such a gesture by Canada would not carry much political weight in Italy and that Canada's financial contribution to post-war European recovery could better be made in other ways. In addition the effect on Canada's post-war claims against other countries, some of them allies throughout the war, had to be considered.

6. I do not think that we should insist on payment from Italy in dollars; however, the Canadian Government expects to have a number of uses for lira. These include the purchase, repair and furnishing of a Canadian Chancery and a residence for the Canadian Ambassador in Rome, the current operating expenses of Canadian Government departments, and the operation of a cultural and educational programme in Italy similar to the one envisaged in our settlement of military relief and other accounts with the Netherlands. Funds needed for these purposes will probably amount to about 10 per cent of our claim against Italy and I feel that, under the circumstances in this case, we can consider this to constitute a "nominal settlement".

7. In view of these considerations, I recommend:

(a) that negotiations be conducted with the Government of Italy for settlement of Canada's claims in respect of military relief;

(b) that, in the first instance, our claim should be written down from $28,400,000 (U.S.) to $3,000,000 (U.S.);

(c) that the claim be further reduced to a figure of no less than $2,000,000 (U.S.) if this proves to be desirable in the course of negotiations;

(d) that payment be accepted in Italian lira at the rate of exchange current between United States dollars and lira current at the times of payment; and

(e) that provision be made for expenditure of the lira received in payment for the purchase, repair and furnishing of a Canadian Chancery and a residence for the Canadian Ambassador in Rome, the current operating expenses of Canadian Government departments, and the operation of a cultural and educational programme in Italy.¹³

[Ottawa], May 2, 1949

SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS AND RELEASE OF ASSETS: HUNGARY, ITALY AND ROUMANIA

1. Canada has signed Peace Treaties with Hungary, Italy and Roumania. Under these Treaties,

(a) Canadian nationals are entitled to compensation, in local currency, for war damage done to their property up to the extent of two-thirds of the replacement value of the property;

(b) the Custodian has the right to seize, retain or liquidate assets of their nationals within the limits of our claims against these countries.

2. The War Claims Branch of the Secretary of State's Department has prepared a detailed report on the claims of Canadians against Hungary, Italy and Roumania. All the claims are now recorded and the total of the claims is as follows:

Hungary	—	$9,462,962.04
Roumania	—	1,047,839.95

These are the maximum figures of claims against these countries. They include certain claims for compensation for nationalization which it may not be possible to entertain under the terms of the Peace Treaty.

3. The totals of the assets of the nationals of these countries currently held by the Custodian are as follows:

Hungary	—	$ 596,361.54
Italy	—	4,851,040.81
Roumania	—	291,658.64

¹³ Le Cabinet approuva ces recommandations le 5 janvier 1950.
Cabinet approved these recommendations on January 5, 1950.

4. As yet, no attempt has been made to "screen" our claims; no attempt can be made until we have entered into negotiations with the three countries concerned. The Secretary of State will be recommending the establishment of a Royal Commission to screen the claims and to satisfy the individual claimants. The question now arises: on what basis should we start to negotiate?

5. In my opinion, the settlement of Canadian claims should be considered as a charge against the ex-enemy country as a whole, and not as a charge against individual citizens of that country who happen to have assets in the hands of the Canadian Custodian. For this reason, I advise a "lump-sum settlement" for each country. Under such a settlement, Canada would first receive a lump-sum payment for the compensation of its claims against the ex-enemy country; the Custodian would then return to the registered owners all the assets of that country in Canada.

6. The alternative would be for the Custodian to start liquidating the miscellaneous assets in his possession; out of the moneys he received the Government could then meet some of the claims of Canadians against these three countries. We may be forced into this rather clumsy and unfair procedure, if we cannot arrange a lump-sum settlement; but it seems desirable to try for the lump-sum settlement first.

7. In the case of Italy, assets held by the Custodian exceed our claims. Therefore, we can probably arrange a settlement which will provide full satisfaction for claimants. If the Italian Government will provisionally put at our disposal a sum sufficient to satisfy all the claims we have recorded, we can then proceed to screen these claims. Afterwards we can return to the Italian Government any surplus that may be left.

8. In the case of Hungary and Roumania, our claims exceed greatly the assets held by the Custodian. A lump-sum settlement would probably be sufficient to satisfy only the most deserving claims. These countries will probably be less willing than Italy to enter into negotiations. We may be forced into the procedure mentioned in paragraph 6 above.

9. The Government of Newfoundland has claims against Italy totalling $277,760.63. The Newfoundland Custodian holds Italian assets worth $26,092.53. I recommend that we espouse Newfoundland claims when we are negotiating with Italy for the other Canadian claims.

10. I recommend, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for Canada and the Minister of Finance, that the Department of External Affairs be authorized to enter into negotiations with these three countries individually to effect the best possible lump-sum settlements for the satisfaction of war claims and for the release of enemy assets.¹⁴

MOST-FAVOURED-NATION TREATMENT FOR AUSTRIA

1. Austria has asked Canada to exchange reciprocal most-favoured-nation tariff treatment with Austria.

2. The Austrians participated in the Havana Conference which drew up the proposed Charter for an International Trade Organization. They have signed, and plan to ratify, the Final Act of that Conference. However, because of their unsettled national status, they have not participated in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

3. At present Austria has a single-schedule tariff. The exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment would not give Canada any immediate tariff advantage in Austria. If, however, a second schedule were added to the Austrian tariff at a later date, Canada would be guaranteed the lower rates. Austria is expected to introduce a revised tariff early in 1950, but it is not known whether it will contain more than one schedule.

4. There appear to be no political objections to the Austrian proposal. On the other hand, there are two political reasons for agreeing to it:

a) We have taken the view that Canada was never at war with Austria. We have, however, granted most-favoured-nation treatment to Western Germany, with which, technically, we are still at war.

b) The Austrian Government and people are putting up, at considerable risk to themselves, strong resistance to Soviet and Communist efforts to dominate Austria. Any gesture that can be made as an expression of sympathy for the Austrian Government is desirable.

5. The United States accords most-favoured-nation treatment to Austria by virtue of a 1928 Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Consular Rights.

6. The Inter-departmental Committee on External Trade Policy has recommended that most-favoured-nation treatment be exchanged with Austria. I concur in that recommendation.¹⁵

CANADIAN TRADE ARRANGEMENTS WITH WESTERN GERMANY¹⁶

In September 1948 Canada completed a most-favoured-nation agreement with the areas of Western Germany under military occupation. It is to be emphasized that for Canada to extend most-favoured-nation treatment is to grant a valuable concession. Most-favoured-nation tariffs open up definite opportunities of entering the Canadian market, which is one of the largest import markets in the world for all types of goods. Canada has received from Western Germany in return the nominal advantage of most-favoured-nation tariff treatment, but our trading opportunities in that country have been seriously impaired by the discriminatory trade practices which arise from the bilateral trade agreements between Western Germany and other countries.

When the Import Advisory Committee of the Joint Export-Import Agency publishes authorizations to import goods from abroad, it stipulates the countries from which the goods may be obtained. Not being a party to a bilateral trade agreement with Western Germany, Canada is in practice hardly ever mentioned in the lists of countries from which purchases may be made. When Canadian exporters attempt to do business in Germany, they are often told that, lacking a bilateral agreement, they must not expect to do business unless the Canadian price is substantially less than other prices. Even where the Canadian price is, apparently, below the world price, Canadians still find it almost impossible to sell Canadian goods in Western Germany.

JEIA officials have more than once proposed that Canada enter into some form of bilateral trade arrangement with Western Germany. They have told Canadian officials that their policy is to encourage importers to acquire their goods from countries with which bilateral agreements exist rather than from other countries, even though the latter might offer better prices or terms on specific commodities. JEIA officials have intimated that "non-agreement" countries, such as Canada, Il fut dépêché à Washington le 17 juin 1949. This memorandum was prepared, at the suggestion of the Ambassador in the United States, for presentation of Canadian views to the Department of State. It was forwarded to Washington on June 17, 1949.

would have to quote prices at least 5% below those quoted by "agreement" countries in order to compete.

On the specific question of selling Canadian flax seed to Western Germany, JEIA officials told our officials that JEIA would consider an offer even in the absence of a bilateral agreement if the price was significantly lower than that offered by any country with which they had such an agreement. Subsequently it proved impossible for Canadian flax to be sold in Western Germany.

It may be that good reasons can be adduced to explain why the whole structure of bilateral trade arrangements has been set up, but what concerns us is that the administrative procedures involved constitute the very essence of discrimination against us. This is in sharp contrast with the favourable consideration which is rendered German imports into Canada. It will be recalled that the United States government strongly pressed the Canadian government to enter into its present most-favoured-nation Treaty with Western Germany.

The United States along with Canada has supported principles and proposals designed to re-establish world trade on a multilateral basis. The policies followed by the Joint Export-Import Agency at present appear to contradict these principles of commercial policy in their unqualified adherence to doctrines of the strictest bilateralism.

[Ottawa], July 20, 1949

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 7th July, 1949, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing:

1. That on September 14, 1948, Canada signed the Agreement on Most Favoured Nation Treatment for Areas of Western Germany under Military Occupation, which came into force on October 14, 1948;

2. That it has been suggested that the provisions of the said Agreement should be construed as applicable to the sectors of Berlin (Germany) under the occupational control of the French Republic, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America and that this interpretation should be recorded in a memorandum of understanding, along the lines of the annexed draft, † to be signed by the countries parties to the said Agreement;

3. That the Interdepartmental Sub-Committee on External Trade Policy has recommended that the interpretation of the said Agreement indicated above be concurred in by Canada;

4. That it is expedient to provide for the signature of the said memorandum of understanding on behalf of Canada.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, advise that Leolyn Dana Wilgress, Canadian High Commissioner to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, be authorized to sign on behalf of Canada a memorandum of understanding relative to the application to the Western Sectors of Berlin (Germany) of the Agreement on Most Favoured Nation Treatment for Areas of Western Germany under Military Occupation (Geneva, September 14, 1948) along the lines of the annexed draft.

SETTLEMENT WITH JAPAN

Present Position

1. Two and a half years have elapsed since the United States proposed on July 11, 1947 the convening of a conference of the eleven states members of the Far Eastern Commission to draft a peace treaty for Japan, with decisions to be adopted by a two-thirds majority vote. Only China and the U.S.S.R. did not accept the proposal. The Chinese wanted to retain the FEC Big-Four veto procedure at the conference; the Russians wanted to have the Council of Foreign Ministers draft the treaty. There has been deadlock since then. Meanwhile, the United States, desiring to lighten the $500 million annual financial burden and to restore Japan to a state of peaceful intercourse with the rest of the world, has taken unilateral and piecemeal action to achieve these ends. Friendly countries have not been consulted and it is not to be wondered that a good deal of dissatisfaction has developed. Accordingly, during his visit to Washington in September, Mr. Bevin urged Mr. Acheson to have another good look at the possibility of concluding a Japanese peace treaty. Mr. Acheson agreed to push ahead with a re-examination of this whole question.

2. The State and Defence Departments in Washington have been discussing during the past three months the basic provisions they wish to see incorporated in a settlement with Japan. It is understood that the United States views on the substance of the settlement are to be in the form of proposals for discussion with interested friendly powers rather than hard and fast requirements, even though the views are to be approved by the National Security Council and the President.

3. It had been hoped that the United States views would have been available for discussion at the Colombo Conference. The latest information from Washington (December 22) indicates that differences of view between the State Department and the Defence Department over security requirements have not yet been sufficiently reconciled to enable the State Department to let us know before departure for Colombo the position reached in their thinking.

4. In these circumstances, it seems likely that the Conference will use the views expressed at the Canberra Conference in September 1947 as a point of departure for discussion of a settlement with Japan. It will, of course, be necessary to bring up to date those views in the light of international developments and developments in Japan during the past two years. It is understood that the Foreign Office has in preparation a brief for the United Kingdom delegation, and for possible circulation to the Conference should the occasion arise, which will deal with the Japanese peace treaty under the following headings:

(a) An estimate of the position of Japan in the light of the overall strategic situation,

(b) An attempt to reconstruct present United States views on a Japanese treaty so far as these are known, and

(c) A draft outline of the principles for a peace treaty on which a measure of agreement might be reached.

It will be as important for the Colombo conferees to avoid establishing fixed positions which it might be difficult to maintain later as it is for the United States to avoid setting out hard and fast requirements which leave no room for discussion.

Security Requirements

5. With the development of post war tension between the Soviet Union and the Western powers it has become a primary United States objective to deny the industrial potential and large body of trained manpower of Japan to the Soviet Union. It has been the prevailing United States view heretofore that Japan could be most easily defended against Soviet domination by maintaining the United States occupation. Soviet forces are stationed in the Kurile Islands and South Sakhalin only a few miles away from Japan. They also have a powerful base at Vladivostok and their military influence extends into North Korea and China. There is an argument that if a peace treaty were signed now and Japan cast adrift, the Soviet Union and Communist China could be expected to exercise a good deal of military pressure against a demilitarized Japan. It is felt that the present arrangement with United States troops serving as garrison forces from the Okinawas to Hokkaido has a stabilizing effect within Japan and also is a guarantee against any possible high-handed measures from Russian or Chinese Communist quarters. It is understood that some influential officers in the United States Department of Defence continue to believe that a continuation of the occupation during the present period of international tension will serve United States strategic interests best. They argue that if a peace treaty and defence agreement were concluded with Japan, the United States would still have to pay for maintaining security forces in or near the Japanese Islands and would have less control and less flexibility than they have under present arrangements.

6. In August 1949, Mr. Kennan asked Mr. Denning of the Foreign Office informally how Commonwealth Governments would be likely to regard bilateral United States-Japanese security arrangements as part of a "non-punitive peace treaty providing for non-excessive post treaty controls". It would appear that the intention of this United States formula is three-fold:

(a) To restore Japan to a state of peaceful economic and political relations with the world,

(b) But to continue to deny to the Soviet Union the industrial potential and trained manpower of Japan by the conclusion of a bilateral United States-Japanese defence agreement, and

(c) To prevent the Soviet Union from being able to meddle in Japanese affairs after the treaty by restricting the regime of post treaty allied control to a minimum.

7. The Canadian Government has favoured, for more than two years now, the conclusion of an early peace treaty with Japan. It would, therefore, have no objection to Japan being returned to a state of peaceful economic and political relations with other nations provided that:

(a) The threat of revival of Japanese militarism and aggression was taken care of, and

(b) Japan met the usual clauses of a peace treaty such as are contained in the European peace treaties.

8. As will be discussed below, Canada can have no real expectation of receiving any reparations from Japan but it would be logical to keep Japanese assets in Canada to offset in part against Canadian claims for war loss or damage arising out of the Japanese war.

9. There does not appear to be any reason for the Canadian Government to object to the conclusion of a bilateral defence agreement between the United States and Japan provided that the agreement does not call for or encourage the revival of Japanese militarism or build up to a threatening point the aggressive potential of Japan. It is obviously in the Canadian interest to see Japan's industrial resources and trained manpower continued to be denied to the Soviet Union. The United States is assuming that responsibility now and the formula by which it continues to do so in the future is not of substantive importance to us. It is assumed that any such defence agreement would not call for the deployment of larger United States forces in the Japan area than are now there. If the commitment was to be increased, it might be of some concern to Canada to question (although the political appropriateness of so doing is very doubtful) whether the commitment of an additional portion of the limited United States defence forces in the defence of Japan would be wise in the light of the greater critical importance of Europe and the Middle East in any future war with the Soviet Union.

10. The considerations discussed above are based on a view of Japan as a bulwark against the expansion of Communism in the Far East rather than as a menace to security in the Far East. This is, of course, a dramatic change of view from that prevailing at the end of 1945. It is argued by the Australians and others with some cogency that in United States' preoccupation with the Soviet menace they have lost sight of the long range possibility that Japan may once more re-emerge as an aggressor nation. This concern is dismissed by United States military analysts as unrealistic. General MacArthur has given it as his opinion that even with considerable assistance from the United States, Japan's war potential could not be built up to any threatening strength in less than 25 years. Everyone will agree that in the physical sense Japan has been pretty effectively demilitarized. Even the Japanese Constitution renounces war. Whatever the estimates may be of Japan's future physical capabilities for making wars attention should be given to those who hold tenaciously to the view that it is an important part of the peace settlement with Japan that everything possible should be done to preclude the re-emergence of Japanese militarism which cannot be submerged very far below the surface of thought in even a defeated Japan.

Economic Provisions

11. When the Far Eastern Commission initiated its study of the economic controls to be placed on Japan during the occupation period it was seen that the questions of Japanese industrial war potential and reparations were closely linked; hence the attempt was made to fix for the year 1950 a peaceful level of economic life for Japan based on the 1930-34 mean with suitable increases for population growth, technical advances, adjustments in foreign trade, etc. What was surplus to this peaceful level in the war supporting industries was to be made available as reparations.

12. The Far Eastern Commission has never been able to reach a decision on the levels to be permitted in the various categories of Japanese industry. The closest approach to an agreement is contained in a policy paper, FEC-242/32 which is based on original United States proposals (Pauley Reparations Mission). At present, all members except the United States, the Soviet Union and China are under official instructions to support this paper.

13. In addition, there has been failure to reach agreement on the percentage of reparation shares to be allocated each of the claimants. China and the Soviet Union have posed the greatest difficulties here. Canada put in a nominal claim for 1½% of Japan's industrial facilities to be made available for reparations claims in order to make it clear to Canadians who suffered war loss or damage in the Pacific area that the Government is keeping their interests in mind. At the same time there has been practically no interest on the part of Canadian industries in obtaining Japanese industrial equipment. It would not be difficult, therefore, for the Canadian Government at a later stage to indicate that Canada is prepared to forego its share of industrial reparations while retaining control over Japanese financial assets in Canada at the outbreak of war.

14. Following the visit of various United States committees to Japan, the United States representative announced in the Far Eastern Commission on May 12, 1949 that his Government had decided to suspend reparations removals from Japan and to rescind United States interim directive of April 4, 1947 which had provided for an advance transfer program of reparations removals. In an Aide-Memoire handed us by the United States Embassy at that time the position of the United States Government with regard to reparations and level of industry in Japan was set out. It pointed out that the United States Government was compelled to drastically reduce its earlier estimates of the reparations which Japan could afford to pay. The loss of Japanese property had reduced Japan's ability to support even on a minimum level the needs of its people. With a constantly increasing population, Japan, it was stated, would require all of its present resources "and more", to maintain itself. The Aide Memoire emphasized that the deficit in Japanese economy had been borne by the United States Government which was now determined that the burden should be reduced. It was also stated that once it had been made certain that Japan could not recover its capacity to make war, no limitation should be imposed on its peaceful productive capacity.

15. A review of the position adopted by Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom with regard to the United States action may serve to indicate the trend which discussions may take in the Colombo Conference with regard to the reparations and level of industry problem.

16. Upon receiving a United States Note similar to the Aide Memoire which we received, the Australian Government replied that to date inadequate evidence had been presented in support of the contention that no surplus capacity was available for reparations. However, in a statement which was made in the Australian House of Representatives, the Australian Minister for Defence said that a strong case could be made out in support of the argument that Australia should not take war reparations from Japan, that Australia should give Japan an opportunity to build up an economy which would give its constantly increasing population a chance of a decent standard of living and that when the matter came before the Far Eastern Commission, the opinion of the dominant member of the Commission (the United States), would have to be weighed very carefully.

17. The New Zealand delegate to the Far Eastern Commission stated in connection with the reparations question that the Government of New Zealand "...in assessing the respective claims of Allied security and Japanese viability—which in its view is the fundamental issue involved—the New Zealand Government finds itself confronted by a number of conflicting estimates of existing productive capacity in certain of the "war supporting industries: in Japan and it is embarrassed by the absence of any precise and official estimate of the magnitudes upon which the statement of the United States Government is based; therefore he had been requested to obtain the "latest official figures" on the subject".

18. In a statement which Mr. Bevin made in the British House of Commons on October 19, 1949, he said that "...it would be misleading to hold out any hope that Japan will ever be able to pay any further substantial reparations and at the same time pay her own way in the world".

19. The most recent statement with regard to Canada's position on the problem is contained in a personal message which the Prime Minister, Mr. St. Laurent, sent to

Mr. Attlee through Sir Alexander Clutterbuck on July 22, 1949. In this letter, the hope was expressed that the United States might be persuaded to agree to accept a reduced but still viable level of industry for Japan, which would not be regarded as menacing to Japan's Pacific neighbours.

Post Treaty Controls

20. As regards the regime of post treaty control in Japan, the Canadian Government has always been anxious to see this kept to a minimum, consistent with the maintenance of security precautions and observation that Japan is fulfilling her treaty obligations. It is in the Canadian interest to see that the Soviet Union is not permitted to take advantage of any regime of post treaty control to meddle in Japanese internal affairs. Since Canada did not assume any direct responsibilities in the immediate post surrender occupation of Japan it seems unlikely that there would be a disposition in this country to assume any extensive responsibilities in regard to a regime of post treaty control in Japan. If Canada is not prepared to accept such responsibilities it would be difficult to expect other countries to continue indefinitely to do so on our behalf if they were not disposed to do so. In these circumstances, it should not be too difficult to work out post treaty control arrangements which would be satisfactory to Canada and the United States.

Procedure for the Settlement with Japan

21. On July 11, 1947, the United States Government proposed that a conference of representatives of the eleven states members of the Far Eastern Commission should be convened to discuss and draft a peace treaty for Japan with decisions to be adopted by a simple $\frac{2}{3}$ majority. Nine of the eleven members of the Far Eastern Commission (Australia, Canada, France, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States) favoured this proposal. China took the view that the voting procedure employed in the Far Eastern Commission would be more appropriate. In that body, decisions are taken by a majority vote including the concurring votes of China, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. The Soviet Union rejected both these procedures and insisted that the Council of Foreign Ministers comprising the representatives of China, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and the United Kingdom should draft the peace treaty. In a note addressed to the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary on July 3, 1948, Mr. Molotov further clarified the Soviet attitude. He said that in the Soviet view adequate provision for the expression of the views of other interested powers in the drafting of the Japanese peace treaty might be made through a procedure similar to that suggested for the German peace treaty. This envisaged a series of committees and subcommittees and a conference for information and consultation.

22. At a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers on June 20, 1949, Mr. Vyshinsky proposed that the Council should agree upon a date for a meeting to deal with the peace treaty for Japan. Mr. Acheson said that other countries were interested in this matter and the Council of Foreign Ministers was not the appropriate body for its discussion. Mr. Schuman said that the French Government had accepted the suggestion made by the United States Government two years ago and they maintained their decision. Mr. Bevin also confirmed that the position of the United Kingdom Government had not changed.

23. Mr. Vyshinsky in a lengthy speech claimed that under Potsdam Agreement Council of Foreign Ministers and not Far Eastern Commission was the appropriate body to draw up Treaty for Japan. He hinted that intention of Western Powers was to exclude China and repeated with emphasis that sole and legitimate body to deal with Japanese Treaty was Council of Foreign Ministers. Members of Far Eastern Commission who were interested would come in after the Council of Foreign Ministers had drafted a Treaty in the same way as other nations had been brought in after the Council of Foreign Ministers had drafted Treaties for Italy and the satellites. Mr. Acheson refuted Mr. Vyshinsky's arguments on the following grounds:

- (a) Japanese Treaty was not referred to at all in Potsdam Agreement.
- (b) At time that Postdam Agreement was signed, Soviet Government were not even at war with Japan.
- (c) "Tasks" for which the Council of Foreign Ministers was established were clearly the preparation of Peace Treaties for satellites, Italy and Germany.
- (d) No Government had claimed more loudly than the Soviet Government that those who had borne the brunt of war should bear major share in peace-making. Soviet Government could not claim to have borne the brunt in the Pacific war. Other nations represented in the Far Eastern Commission had borne the brunt and they must participate in peace-making not only as consultants but as equals. It was useless to continue present debate.

Mr. Vyshinsky agreed that it was pointless to continue the argument. He took exception, however, to Mr. Acheson's statement that the Council of Foreign Ministers was not competent to consider the Japanese Peace Treaty.

24. If the United States proceeds with its present intention to draft and submit to friendly powers for comment broad proposals for a settlement with Japan, some progress will be made in giving the rest of us a broad view of United States intentions which will clear up the present unsatisfactory piecemeal approach to the problem. It seems likely that the essential provisions of the United States draft will be brief and in a form which would not exclude the later conclusion of a bilateral defence agreement between the United States and Japan. When the United States has the comments of friendly members of the Far Eastern Commission it will be possible for them to tell whether they can expect the support of a $\frac{2}{3}$ majority at a peace conference for their proposals. If such support is not evident, there would be little purpose in the United States proposing a conference which would include the Soviet Union and Communist China (assuming that by that time the new regime in Peiping is recognized). If there is satisfactory support for the United States draft then consideration might be given to inviting the Soviet Union and China to attend a peace conference with decisions to be taken by a $\frac{2}{3}$ majority. Should they refuse to attend, consideration might then be given to whether it would be desirable to conclude a separate peace treaty with Japan or simply postpone the peace treaty but agree upon an interim settlement with friendly powers which would have the effect of bringing Japan back to as normal a state of intercourse with the world as possible.

25. The Canadian Government will, of course, wish to give full recognition to the primary responsibility which must rest upon the United States Government in the formulation of policy for Japan while it continues to bear the major responsibility for the occupation and economic support of Japan and since it would have to bear the heaviest burden in the event of any misstep in relations with the Soviet Union and China over the settlement with Japan.

POLICY REGARDING JAPANESE-OWNED PATENTS IN TERRITORIES OF COUNTRIES AT WAR WITH JAPAN

For some time consideration was given in the Far Eastern Commission to the formulation of a policy decision with regard to Japanese-owned patents, utility models and designs in territories of countries at war with Japan. On March 17, 1949, however, the representative of the U.S.S.R. vetoed a proposed policy decision which had met with the approval of the majority of the other members of the Far Eastern Commission. Due to this opposition on the part of the Soviets there has not been any further attempt in the Far Eastern Commission to reach a policy decision on the subject.

2. The United States Government, however, recently proposed that an informal meeting be held among the members of Committee No. 1 whose governments had approved FEC-311/7, the document containing the proposed policy decision vetoed by the U.S.S.R., to discuss the possibility of obtaining international agreement to a modified version of FEC-311/7.

3. The first meeting, at which we were represented, was held on October 5. A report on the proceedings of this meeting is contained in teletype No. WA-2809 dated October 7 from Washington, a copy of which is attached.†

4. In paragraph 5 of this teletype it is stated that according to present thinking in the State Department and to the consensus of opinion on the part of the representatives of the other countries attending the meetings it would be unnecessary to go through the formalities of convening a conference for the purpose of obtaining an international agreement along the lines of accord on German patents of July 27, 1946. The suggestion is that the United States Government might address notes to all countries represented on the Far Eastern Commission with the exception of the U.S.S.R., proposing that their governments agree to apply the provisions of any draft agreement which is reached on the treatment of Japanese patents outside

Japan. It is then proposed that on the basis of the formal replies to this initial exchange of notes the United States Government could then notify other countries included in the non-enemy category and invite them to agree to the application of similar provisions.

5. I would be grateful if you would give me your opinion as to the legal implications of the proposed procedure outlined in the above paragraph.¹⁸ I think that there is a very good chance of reaching a mutually satisfactory agreement with respect to the technical aspects of the question in the discussions now taking place. If, however, a full scale conference were called to include countries in the non-enemy category, there is then a definite possibility that negotiations might drag on indefinitely and that no satisfactory policy would be agreed upon. Consequently, I believe that the procedure under consideration, from the political point of view, is the one most likely to achieve positive results, although it may prove distasteful to some countries who are not represented on the Far Eastern Commission.

6. Copies of the teletype under covering letters have been sent to Trade and Commerce and the Commissioner of Patents, requesting their views on the changes outlined in paragraph 2 of the teletype.

UNITED STATES PROPOSAL TO INVITE JAPAN TO ENTER INTO TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH A VIEW TO ACCEDING TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

A decision is required on whether or not Canada should support the United States proposal that an invitation be extended to Japan to enter into tariff negotiations with Contracting Parties to the General Agreement and with certain other countries with a view to Japan's accession to the General Agreement.

The view of the Acting Legal Adviser (K.T. Burbridge) was that there was no legal objection to the procedure, though it did not come within the Terms of Reference of the Far Eastern Commission (memorandum, October 31, 1949†).

2. The tariff negotiations have been scheduled by the Contracting Parties for September, 1950. Present Contracting Parties will negotiate between themselves and with other countries to be invited. It is expected that the United States will propose, at a special meeting of a Committee of the Contracting Parties to be held in London beginning Monday, September 26, that Japan should be invited to those negotiations with a view to its accession to the General Agreement.

3. A decision is required now as to what countries, like Japan, which are not Contracting Parties, should be invited because of the long prior preparations which are required (e.g. exchange of information on trade and tariffs, lists of tariff concessions desired, etc.). Our High Commissioner has been asked to give an opinion on Tuesday, September 27.

4. The negotiations which are scheduled to begin at the end of September, 1950, will probably be quite lengthy in view of the fact that as many as forty countries will probably be participating. In the light of past experience, the results of those negotiations would probably not enter into force before the second half of 1951. There is little likelihood, therefore, that Japan could accede to the General Agreement before that time. A two-thirds vote of the Contracting Parties is necessary to approve such accession. Once a Contracting Party, however, Japan would have to be granted MFN treatment by all other Contracting Parties, including Canada.

5. The United States proposed earlier this year that the Contracting Parties, at their Annecy meeting, should consider the possibility of entering into a multilateral most-favoured-nation agreement with Japan. This proposal was placed on the agenda of the Annecy meeting. In this connection, Cabinet approved in April of this year the following instructions to the Canadian delegation to the Annecy Conference:

“(1) The Canadian Government cannot consider entering into an unconditional most-favoured-nation agreement with Japan at the present time.

“(2) The Canadian delegation should try to persuade the United States representatives to drop, or at least postpone, the whole proposal.

“(3) If the United States representatives will not agree, the Canadian delegation should explore the possibility of a conditional most-favoured-nation agreement. The agreement should provide reasonable protection to Canadian industry against the products of cheap labour, dumping, arbitrary currency valuations and similar practices, while promoting mutually advantageous trade between the two countries.”

6. Because of strong opposition by those Contracting Parties whose participation in the proposed most-favoured-nation agreement for Japan was essential or desirable, the United States delegation withdrew its proposal and the item was dropped from the agenda. The attitude of the Canadian delegation, based on the second paragraph of its instructions outlined above, was probably the determining factor in the United States decision.

7. The main arguments for and against Japan's participation in tariff negotiations and its accession to the General Agreement remain fairly well the same as those which were placed before Cabinet earlier this year when the question of an MFN agreement was discussed.

Arguments for

(1) Canada's trade policy since the war has been to lower tariff barriers. We have followed this policy by extending most-favoured-nation treatment unconditionally to many countries and by urging other countries to do the same for us and for each other. In this policy we have worked very closely with the United States. Each country has depended on the support of the other. If we turn back now, this fact will be seized upon by other countries that have either abused the most-favoured-nation approach in general, or have given it lip-service while in fact pursuing a policy of bilateral trade treaties. It is probably not too much to say that, if Canada now announced that it would have nothing to do with the American proposal, this would put an end to the American efforts in that direction.

(2) It is Canada's post-war policy to help rebuild the economy of conquered countries such as Japan. Japanese trade is at present most unsatisfactory. There is an adverse trade balance of about half a billion dollars a year. The United States is at present having to advance money to Japan to cover this deficit. Japan cannot permanently continue as a pensioner of other countries. If Japan is excluded from all useful export markets, it will be a fertile field for the spread of misery, disease and communism.

(3) Many of the undesirable pre-war trade practices of Japan were adopted by the Japanese Government or under its influence for the purpose of waging or preparing to wage war. With the removal of the former government, and of the motive of preparations for war, it is not to be expected that pre-war practices will be resumed, especially if improved access to world markets makes it possible for the Japanese economy to become self-supporting without them.

(4) If other countries make most-favourable-nation treaties with Japan, Canada should do so too. Otherwise, those countries will have freer access to the Japanese market than ourselves; our exporters will be at a disadvantage, and we shall probably find a substantial Japanese content in some of our imports from most-favoured-nation and preferential sources.

(5) One of the arguments which we made against our participation in an MFN agreement for Japan was based on the fact that different rates were quoted for the yen in terms of foreign currency. This meant that, by arbitrary decision of the authorities in Japan, goods could be offered at unduly cheap prices in foreign markets. This situation has now been corrected and a single value of the yen was stabilized on April 25, 1949.

(6) Negotiations between Japan and the United States would mean that many United States tariff items might be reduced. This has not been possible in former negotiations when the United States withheld these tariff items from its negotiations for the reason that Japan was the main supplier.

(7) Japan's membership in the General Agreement would mean that it would be bound on a reciprocal basis by all the provisions of that Agreement to the same extent as all other Contracting Parties. These obligations would extend far beyond the MFN rule particularly once the Agreement is applied definitely. Furthermore, Japan's trade practices would be subject to the close supervision of the Contracting Parties who would have a more effective and direct channel of consultation and complaint than is available at present.

Arguments against

(1) Experience during the 1930's has taught us that Japanese goods are likely to be dumped in this market—and in other markets of the world. It seems that the danger of dumping and other unfair trade practices in fact is still present.

(2) In addition to Canadian fears about unfair practices, such as selling below cost, there is the underlying fear of competition from Japanese goods produced by very cheap labour.

(3) Japan must obviously increase its exports if it is to stand on its own feet. However, we are likely to bear more than our fair share of the impact. If the increase of export takes place under unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment, the goods that the Japanese will place most vigorously into foreign markets are: textiles, metal products, pottery, glassware, toys. These are not products in which Canada has any special "natural advantages". Our domestic producers are not in a position to stand up to intense foreign competition of goods produced by cheap labour.

(4) Our most-favoured-nation duties on these products are substantially lower than those of the United States.

(5) It is not only our own manufacturers who will suffer the impact. The sort of goods that we take from Japan are the same as the sort that we take from the United Kingdom. Yet, it is the present policy of the Canadian Government to foster imports from the United Kingdom.

(6) The question of Japanese trade and tariffs should not be discussed apart from the whole question of Japan's industrial and economic future.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE; PROPOSED INVITATION TO JAPAN

3. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 29th, said it was expected that the United States would propose, at a special meeting of a committee of the Contracting Parties to GATT which had begun the previous day in London, that Japan be invited to forthcoming tariff negotiations with a view to its accession to the General Agreement.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

Prior to the Annecy Conference last April, Cabinet had agreed that the government could not then consider entering into an unconditional most-favoured-nation agreement with Japan. Although there did not appear to be any reason to alter the then position taken, some indication might be given that the Canadian government would reluctantly agree to the inclusion of Japan amongst the countries to be invited to the negotiations scheduled for September, on the assumption that Japan would have regained autonomy over her external trade at that time and her politic and economic future had been placed on a firm basis.

4. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that the government could not, under present conditions, extend unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment to Japan but that, nevertheless, Japan might be included amongst the countries invited to participate in tariff negotiations to be held next year in the expectation that, before the results of negotiations came into effect, the Japanese would have regained autonomy over their external trade and that the politic and economic future of the country had been placed on a firm basis.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE EXPENSES OF THE UNITED NATIONS¹

The primary responsibility for making recommendations to the General Assembly for the assessment of contributions of member states of the United Nations rests in the Committee on Contributions, a fourteen man body elected for staggered three-year terms of office by the General Assembly. Under its terms of reference the Committee is required to apportion expenses "broadly according to capacity to pay" and in the measurement of "capacity to pay" the comparative estimates of the national income are considered prima facie to be the fairest guide. However, other factors are taken into account, including comparative income per head of the population, temporary dislocation of national economies arising out of the Second World War, and the ability of members to secure foreign currency.

2. In the first scale recommended in 1947 the Committee on Contributions pointed out the extreme difficulties arising in obtaining reliable current statistics and evolved, therefore, a formula based on the best available pre-war statistics adjusted to take into consideration war-time dislocation and the other factors mentioned in its terms of reference. In this scale the United States would have been assessed 49.89%, while Canada would have paid 3.10%. However, the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly decided that, as a matter of sound policy, "in normal times" no one government should be required to contribute more than one-third of the total budget and that, under existing circumstances, the United States' contribution should be set at 39.89%. This figure was accepted by the United States on condition that the scale would be revalued, in succeeding years, on the basis of new evidence which would become available. Accordingly, 39.89% became, in effect, the first "ceiling" on the scale of assessments. The Canadian contribution under this scale was set at 3.35%.

3. Since that time the scale of assessments has been reconsidered annually both in the Committee on Contributions and in the General Assembly. Each year, despite the fact that the Assembly has called upon member states to assist the Committee in its work by the provision of adequate and reliable statistics, the Committee has been seriously handicapped by the lack of such information. Accordingly, apart from minor changes to provide for the admission of new members, there has been no significant modification of the original scale of assessment. In 1948, however, Canada secured recognition of the principle that the per capita contribution of any member shall not exceed the per capita rate of the member making the largest contribution.

4. A table† showing the scale of assessments for the 1950 budget is appended to this memorandum. The ten highest contributors have been indicated in red. It might be noted that the Committee has recommended that the 1950 scale should be the same as that for 1949 with minor modifications affecting the contributions of Sweden and the United States. The Canadian assessment remains at 3.2%, at which figure it was set in 1948 after the admission of several new members.

5. Thus it will be seen that from the first Canada has been one of the major contributors to the United Nations budget. This has been due not only to the fact that the basis on which the Committee on Contributions determines "capacity to pay" automatically places Canada high (seventh) among the member states, but also because Canadian statistical and other information provides an immediate and reliable reflection of changes in the Canadian economic situation. Therefore, in contrast with certain other member states whose true "capacity to pay" is not apparent, the Committee on Contributions is always in a position to recommend adjustments in Canada's percentage contribution.

6. In order to safeguard the Canadian Government against unwarranted increases in the Canadian contribution, the Canadian Delegation has generally supported the United States ceiling proposals and has expressed extreme disappointment with member states who have not yet provided information which would have permitted the Committee on Contributions to make definitive recommendations for revision of the scales. In the Canadian view it was time to recognize the improvement in the economic position of many governments such as the countries of Eastern Europe, which had been given special consideration when the original scales were established, and certain Latin American states which seem considerably under-assessed at the present.

7. The Canadian position might therefore be summarized as follows: the Canadian Government is convinced that it is now paying more than its reasonable and equitable share of the total United Nations budget. Therefore, Canada is not prepared to have this share increased whether this results from adjustments in the contributions of other member states or from adjustments of the ceiling. Nevertheless, Canada does wish to see an equitable and sound scale arrived at as soon as possible. For that reason, if any proposals directed toward achieving equity were to be introduced, the Canadian Delegation would support them, provided always that the new scale did not require Canada to assume a disproportionate share of the burden.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the second paragraph of your teletype No. 522 of 13 June concerning the Interim Committee of the General Assembly in which you invite my comments regarding the future of that body. The following are some preliminary comments which I should like to make and which I hope to be able to amplify after I have had an opportunity of discussing these matters further with other delegations.

2. I think it is necessary to recall the circumstances in which the Interim Committee was established in order to assess its value to date and to examine the question of its future. It will be remembered that it was the Netherlands Delegation in October, 1945, at the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations in London, which first suggested the need for the establishment of a Standing Committee of the General Assembly for Peace and Security. The Netherlands proposal called for a subsidiary organ established under the provisions of Article 22 of the Charter, which would be charged with preparing recommendations to the General Assembly with regard to the exercise of the functions and powers attributed to the General Assembly by Articles 10, 11, 14 and 15 of the Charter, subject to the provisions of Article 12. The Standing Committee's terms of reference would have limited it to such subjects as were referred to it by the General Assembly, or as were brought before the General Assembly under Article 11, paragraph 2; or Article 15, paragraph 1, in the interval between the sessions of the General Assembly. One of the main arguments advanced by the Netherlands delegation in favour of the establishment of such a committee was that it would enable a better preparation of the work of the General Assembly on the highly important questions relative to peace and security, falling within its competence. It was argued, on the other hand, that a Standing Committee of the General Assembly for Peace and Security established as one of the five or six committees into which the General Assembly would be divided during its yearly sessions, however useful such a committee might be, would not be enabled to perform any preparatory tasks in a proper way, because it would cease to exist at the end of the session of the General Assembly.

3. Because of the many other problems of a more urgent character which were before the Preparatory Commission, the proposal of the Netherlands delegation was not acted upon, and it was not until the Second Session of the General Assembly that the idea was revived, when the United States delegation introduced a resolution proposing the creation of a Standing Committee of the General Assembly, constituted as a committee of the whole, principally for the purposes of dealing with situations and disputes under Articles 11 and 14 of the Charter.

4. In the interval of two years between the meeting of the Preparatory Commission and the Second Session of the General Assembly, experience had shown that the work of the Security Council was so impeded by the application of the rule of unanimity, that it had been unable to act effectively even in the pacific settlement of disputes. In addition, the agenda of the General Assembly had become so crowded that it was found impossible, in the time allotted to regular sessions, to permit adequate study of every item. The United States proposal for an Interim Committee, therefore, came at a time when a number of delegations had been thinking along similar lines and with a number of important modifications it was adopted by a resolution of the General Assembly, 41 states voting in favour, six against and six abstaining.

5. When the discussions began in the First Committee, the countries of the Soviet bloc argued that the United States' proposal was a violation of the Charter and a deliberate attempt to circumvent the Security Council. Subsequently a number of modifications were suggested and agreed to in the First Committee with a view to making the proposal less open to the constitutional objections raised by the Soviet bloc. When final discussion of the establishment of an Interim Committee of the General Assembly took place in plenary session, the U.S.S.R., Poland, Yugoslavia, Byelorussia, the Ukraine and Czechoslovakia, however, reiterated their opinion that the Interim Committee was "unconstitutional" and announced their refusal to take part in the work of the Committee. The terms of reference, as they were finally adopted represented a compromise. In certain respects they are not best designed to accomplish what, in two years of work it has transpired, has been the principal and most useful function of the Interim Committee; namely the long-term studies in implementation of Article 13 of the Charter and the study of the voting procedures in the Security Council.

6. Throughout the life of the Interim Committee, the countries of the Soviet bloc have maintained their boycott of the committee and continue to claim that it is "unconstitutional". Moreover, so long as the countries of the Soviet bloc have refused to participate in the Interim Committee there has been a disinclination to refer to it any work of major political importance. For instance, at the Second Part of the Third Session a Special Committee on Methods and Procedures was established as an ad hoc body, although unquestionably the work of this Committee has an important bearing on the work which the Interim Committee was established to do. Similarly, the work assigned to the committee established by the General Assembly to consider the Secretary-General's proposal for the creation of a United Nations Guard Force was not referred to the Interim Committee, although this would have been the logical body to study such a proposal were it not for the fact that it was boycotted by six of the countries whose participation in any discussions concerning a guard force are essential, if any practical effect is to be given to the proposal.

7. If one of the most important functions of the United Nations organization at the present time is to put into effect the maximum possible amount of cooperation between the Soviet Union and the West (despite the present division of the world) in order to preserve peace, then there would appear to be strong grounds for the argument that the usefulness of the Interim Committee is seriously impaired by the refusal of the Soviet Union to participate in this body. The question thus arises how can the Soviet bloc be persuaded to participate in the work of the Interim Committee? Past experience has shown that, as in the case of the Trusteeship Council, the Soviet Union may, if expedient, reverse its position. It might be possible, therefore, to induce the countries of the Soviet bloc to participate in the Interim Committee's work either by changing the committee's terms of reference or by giving the Interim Committee more important work of a political character in which the Soviet Union might feel it an advantage to participate.

8. I would hope that Sub-Committee 7 will attempt to approach the problem before it from the point of view of considering how best to expedite and to improve the work of the General Assembly. If the Sub-Committee approaches the problem from this broader point of view, it is more likely to make a report which can be of assistance to the General Assembly when the problem is under review at the fourth regular session. For instance, I think experience has shown that if the General Assembly is to continue to attract delegates of the status of foreign ministers, whose presence is so necessary if the prestige of the General Assembly is to be maintained, its business will have to be arranged in such a manner that the most important political items requiring the presence of senior political representatives can be disposed of in three or four weeks. One of the apparent weaknesses of the General Assembly is the great amount of time taken up in discussion of matters of secondary importance, inevitably at the expense of the time allotted for discussion of important matters. The Interim Committee could, I think, be a useful means of assisting the General Assembly to arrange its business in such a way that most of the political matters of secondary importance are discussed before the General Assembly convenes, always granting of course that the countries of the Soviet bloc are prepared to participate in the Interim Committee's work.

9. The report submitted by the Interim Committee last year (document A/606 of 13 August 1948) is a very full study of the Interim Committee based largely upon the report submitted to it by Sub-Committee 4 which, as you are aware, was charged with substantially the same task which has been given to Sub-Committee 7 this year. Sub-Committee 4 of the Interim Committee in its report last year studied a number of important matters relating to the work of the Interim Committee as such, but it did not examine in any detail one important aspect of the Interim Committee's work, namely the part which that body can play in accomplishing useful preparatory work for the General Assembly.

10. In assessing the talk which is before Sub-Committee 7, I think one has to consider: (a) what is to be the form of the Interim Committee, and (b) the nature of the functions to be assigned to it. Obviously these are two aspects of the same problem, but for the sake of clarity I have chosen to deal with them separately. I think it more logical to discuss the question of functions first, as the nature of the task assigned to the Interim Committee will decide, to some extent at least, the form which it should take. To the question "Should the Interim Committee be continued?", I think one would be justified in replying in the affirmative. There are good reasons, to be found in the Charter itself, which can be advanced in favour of continuing the Interim Committee. Article 11 and Article 13 charge the General Assembly specifically to carry out certain studies. Article 13 particularly requires the General Assembly with: "(a) promoting international cooperation in the political field and encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification; (b) promoting international cooperation in the economic, social, cultural, educational, and health fields, and assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." The language of Article 13 makes these duties of the General Assembly mandatory, and the work of the Interim Committee in this field alone would seem, therefore, to warrant its continued existence. If this interpretation is accepted, the question then arises of what other functions the Interim Committee can or should perform. In considering the present terms of reference of the Interim Committee, one must bear in mind that the situation which existed in the Security Council in 1947 no longer holds to the same extent. At the time the Interim Committee was established in 1949, the Security Council had not yet demonstrated its capacity to perform the important functions assigned to it under the Charter in the field of mediation and the peaceful settlement of disputes. Since that time the Security Council has had notable, if limited success in this field, in the cases of Palestine, Indonesia and Kashmir, and one of the principal reasons originally justifying the establishment of the Interim Committee, therefore, has to some extent at least disappeared. Any examination of the terms of reference of the Interim Committee, therefore, must be made with this changed situation in mind.

11. The first function of the Interim Committee, as laid down in its terms of reference, paragraph 2(a) of General Assembly resolution 196(III), is "to consider and report with its conclusions to the General Assembly on such matters as may be referred to it by or under the authority of the General Assembly". So far, the only matter referred to the Interim Committee by the General Assembly has been the question of Korea in which the Interim Committee was able to perform a useful but limited function. To date the Interim Committee has not been called upon to fulfill any of the functions called for under paragraph 2(b) of General Assembly resolution 196(III) relating to consideration by the Interim Committee of "any dispute or any situation which, in virtue of Articles 11 (para. 2), 14 or 35 of the Charter, has been proposed for inclusion in the agenda of the General Assembly by any Member of the United Nations, or by any non-member State under Articles 11 (para. 2) or 35, or brought before the General Assembly by the Security Council, provided the Committee previously determines the matter to be both important and requiring preliminary study." The Interim Committee has performed its most useful work in relation to paragraph 2(c) of General Assembly resolution 196(III); studies in the field of international political cooperation. The Interim Committee to-date has not had occasion to implement paragraph 2(d) of General Assembly resolution 196(III) relating to the summoning of a special session of the General Assembly. Similarly, the Interim Committee has never exercised its right to "conduct investigations and appoint commissions of enquiry within the scope of its duties, as it may deem useful and necessary, provided that decisions to conduct such investigations and enquiries shall be made by two-thirds majority of the members present and voting." It will be seen, therefore, that the Interim Committee has so far only discharged a small part of the duties permitted to it under its terms of reference.

12. Despite the limited operation of the Interim committee to date I think there would be sufficient grounds for continuing it solely on account of the important functions assigned to the General Assembly under Article 13. Its continuation is all the more essential when one considers that it is only in the political and security field that the General Assembly lacks a body to do essential preparatory work. In the economic and social field, in the trusteeship field, in budgetary and administrative matters and in the legal field as well as in a number of other specialized fields, there are various bodies established to perform necessary preparatory work. In regard to security matters the Security Council, the Commission for Conventional Armaments, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Military Staff Committee may be regarded as doing some preparatory work; there is no equivalent body doing necessary preparatory work for the General Assembly in respect of international cooperation, except the Interim Committee. If it is recognized that the participation of the countries of the Soviet bloc in the Interim Committee would revitalize it and permit it to carry out useful preparatory work for the General Assembly, then there would seem to be good grounds for considering revision of the terms of reference to make it possible for the countries of the Soviet bloc to participate in its work. This might be accomplished by restricting the terms of reference to the duties of doing preparatory work in the political and security field and to the long-range studies referred to in Article 13 of the Charter (sub-paragraphs (a) and (c) of paragraph 2 of General Assembly 196(III)). Alternatively, the Interim Committee might be continued with its present terms of reference for an unspecified period until more definitive conclusions can be reached regarding the functions which such a body can usefully perform.

13. With these alternatives in mind, I think one can consider the various forms which the Interim Committee might take. When the Interim Committee was established, a number of different proposals as to its form were considered. For instance, it was suggested that the General Assembly might, by a simple adjustment of its Rules of Procedure, be kept in session throughout the year, meeting as the occasion demanded. It was also suggested that similar results might be obtained by depending upon the convocation of special sessions of the General Assembly, and there was a third suggestion to establish a committee of the whole Assembly to meet between regular sessions. Advantages and disadvantages were to be found in each of these methods and it was eventually decided that the establishment of an Interim Committee was the method best suited to the circumstances then pertaining. It is possible, however, that, in the present circumstances, the General Assembly might wish to reconsider its original decision. For instance, if it were considered that the countries of the Soviet bloc could be persuaded to participate in the Interim Committee's work if its terms of reference could be modified to meet their objections, it might be possible to reconstitute the Interim Committee on a different basis.

14. I shall deal with the alternative suggestions in the order in which I mentioned them in paragraph 13 above. The suggestion to keep the General Assembly in session throughout the year could be given effect by making the Interim Committee one of the main committees of the General Assembly, establishing it either as the Seventh Committee or with a status and with functions similar to the Ad Hoc Political Committee. Such a proposal, however, would undoubtedly meet with the same objection which was put forward to the Netherlands proposal made in 1945 for a Standing Committee of the General Assembly for Peace and Security. It is not clear from Article 20 of the Charter if a proposal of this nature would be constitutional. However, if the constitutional difficulties could be overcome, there would be certain advantages in this method. As a seventh committee of the General Assembly, for instance, the Committee might be allocated items in the agenda requiring long-range preparatory work and studies including matters which heretofore have been entrusted to special committees, such as the Special Committee created to study the establishment of a United Nations Guard Force, and the Special Committee on Methods and Procedures of the General Assembly. In addition, of course, the Committee could continue to carry out, at the direction of the General Assembly, the studies called for under Article 13 of the Charter. In this manner studies of a detailed character which require a good deal of time could be carried on and the resulting reports dealt with only in plenary session, thus lightening the load of the Political Committee. More important than this however, the transformation of the Interim Committee into one of the main committees of the General Assembly might serve as an inducement to the countries of the Soviet bloc to participate in its work as, if they did not do so, they would only be able to discuss the items dealt with by the committee in plenary session and at a stage when thinking on those matters would have hardened to a degree which might make it impossible for them to have any appreciable effect on the discussions. Should the recommendation to amend Rule 59 of the General Assembly's Rules of Procedure, which is now under consideration by the Special Committee on Methods and Procedures of the General Assembly, be adopted, this argument would more than ever apply.

15. The suggestion to depend upon the convocation of a special session of the Assembly seems to have no particular advantage, at least not in so far as the solution of the problems which are before the Assembly at present is concerned. It is within the power of the members of the General Assembly now to call a special session at any time in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and it is generally thought that this procedure should be sparingly used to deal with special situations requiring the urgent attention of all the members of the organization.

16. In addition to these suggestions, there are two other alternatives which have to be considered. It would be possible for the Political Committee to elect, in accordance with Article 22 of the Charter, at each session a special and select committee to perform whatever preparatory work might be assigned to it during the Assembly and which could meet between regular sessions to carry out that work. One advantage of such a proposal is that it would circumvent the constitutional objection which has been raised to the establishment of the Interim Committee as one of the main committees of the General Assembly meeting only between regular sessions. This, however, would raise difficulties regarding the question of its composition if the membership were to be less than the membership of the whole organization.

17. There is of course, in addition, the more modest proposal, which seems to have the support of the United States delegation, to leave the Interim Committee's terms of reference virtually unchanged with the exception that no specific time limit be placed on its life. Such a proposal would be an advantage from an administrative point of view, it being simpler to budget and to provide a secretariat for a permanent body. It also would lend more stability to the work now being done by the Interim Committee. It would not, however, do much to solve the principal problem which appears to be to lighten the load of the Political Committee and to perform useful preparatory work for the General Assembly in the political and security field. This, as I have suggested, seems to involve bringing the Soviet Union and its satellites into cooperation with such a body.

18. None of these proposals seems to provide a satisfactory or conclusive answer to the problem. The form which the Interim Committee takes, of course, depends largely upon the functions which it is decided to give to it. If agreement could be reached upon the general objectives which it is desired to set for the Interim Committee, and the place which it is to have in relation to the work of the General Assembly and the other organs of the United Nations, I think the decision as to the form it should take, could more easily be agreed upon. I doubt, however, whether Sub-Committee 7 will be able to do more than analyze the problems and set out the various alternatives without attempting to reach any conclusions or make any specific recommendations to the Interim Committee.

19. The United States delegation apparently favours a recommendation to continue the Interim Committee, without limiting its life to a specific period of time and without any change in its present terms of reference. The United Kingdom delegation appears to be thinking along similar lines, although they have not yet received any instructions.

20. It does not seem to me that Sub-Committee 7 is the appropriate place to reach any conclusions on any of the broader issues which I have mentioned in this despatch. In my opinion the role which the Interim Committee can play in the United Nations can best be assessed in the General Assembly when the recommendations of the Special Committee on Methods and Procedures of the General Assembly are available and when the General Assembly has been able to decide whether it wishes to approve long-range studies which are being formulated in the Committee on International and Political Cooperation. There are, however, a number of questions I have outlined in this despatch which you may wish to have considered in Sub-Committee 7. I should be grateful to have your comments on this despatch and to have any instructions which you may care to give to our representative on Sub-Committee 7. It should be recalled that our representative was elected Rapporteur of Sub-Committee 7 at its first meeting.

I have, etc.

CONFIDENTIAL

Your despatch No. 322 of August 2.† Interim Committee.

Regarding report submitted by Working Group I of the Sub-Committee on International Political Co-operation, you are correct in assuming that we should support the report, though recognizing its tentative and rather limited nature. I agree that the Sub-Committee will probably recommend that the study should be continued and, if you think it necessary, the Canadian representative might speak in favour of its continuation. He should stress, however, the need in future stages of the work to arrive at more complete and comprehensive conclusions regarding the organization and work of United Nations commissions.

2. Regarding the report of Sub-Committee Seven, I think that at this stage we should confine ourselves to support of the Sub-Committee's recommendations and findings. It appears that the majority of the members of the Sub-Committee, while expressing sympathy with the objective of lightening the burden of work of the General Assembly, are not prepared to press for any drastic change in the terms of reference of the Interim Committee.

3. I have read with interest your despatch No. 288 of June 30 and I agree in principle that with appropriate changes in the terms of reference the Interim Committee could be used to lighten in no small way the load of the Assembly, particularly that of the Political Committee. However, as you have pointed out, this would seem to involve bringing the Soviet Union and its satellites into co-operation with the Interim body. Such a rapprochement would be likely only by means of a private approach to the Soviet Delegation on the part of the major Western powers. It is not likely to be achieved by any action of the Interim Committee itself.

4. In my opinion the Interim Committee should not be considered unsatisfactory merely because it is not kept busy. Essentially it was brought into existence to meet emergencies. The absence from the agenda of the Interim Committee of political questions is therefore, if anything, a good sign. We should be prepared to keep this Committee in existence, even if it seldom meets and even if its agenda is not of urgent importance, merely for the role which it might play in emergencies.

5. I think it may be true, as you have pointed out in paragraph 6 of your despatch No. 288 of June 30, that such questions as the Establishment of a United Nations Guard and the Study of Methods and Procedures should be referred to a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly, similar to the present Interim Committee. For the moment, however, I think it desirable to wait for the reports of the Special Committees presently constituted to deal with these two questions in order to determine to what extent Members of the United Nations are prepared to accept changes in the present organization. For example, when we have the results of the discussions of the Special Committee on Methods and Procedures before us, we shall be in a better position to decide whether the General Assembly would be likely to accept an over-all change with respect to the work of the Interim Committee. It is my impression that generally speaking the majority of Members of the United Nations are not inclined at the moment to accept recommendations for far-reaching changes in that organization. Therefore, I doubt the advantage of putting forward at the present time our long-term views as to the future of the Interim Committee.

Ad Hoc Committee.

1. You will have seen from the summary and takes 1 to 7 of United Nations press release GA/AH/43 of October 14th† that the ad hoc committee continued general debate on the Interim Committee's report. Of the five speakers, four of them spoke against the continuation of the Interim Committee. The speeches by the representative of Pakistan and the representative of Israel are of particular interest as they give a reasoned, albeit superficial case against continuing the Interim Committee. This opposition was not unexpected as Israel and Pakistan are amongst the eight or nine countries which voiced opposition to the continuation of the Interim Committee when that body met in August. However, in the light of a possible move by certain of the South American countries represented on the Committee, which we learned of last night, this opposition may take on a more serious aspect.

2. We learned, in confidence, that the representative of Bolivia together with the representatives of Panama and Uruguay have made informal approaches to the representatives of Czechoslovakia and Poland with a suggestion that the Interim Committee as such be disbanded; that in its place there be established a seventh main Committee to sit after the General Assembly rises and to carry out only such work as is assigned to it by the General Assembly. The Polish and Czechoslovak representatives we understand while not unreservedly accepting the suggestion for the establishment of such an ad hoc preparatory Committee gave the South American representatives to understand that they might be prepared to consider it.

3. The dangers in the Bolivian proposal are obvious. It is likely in Committee it may get the tacit consent of the Slav Bloc which might have the effect of defeating the draft resolution, which re-establishes the Interim Committee for an indefinite period, only to find that in plenary the Slav Bloc would declare upon reconsideration they had found the proposal to be "illegal". The other danger lies in the lack of proper terms of reference for the ad hoc preparatory Committee proposed by the Bolivian representative. Quite apart from the fact that there has already been some discussion in the United Nations as to what constitutes a "subsidiary organ" under the terms of Article 22 of the Charter (it is open to question whether a body without specific terms of reference can be considered a subsidiary organ), there is the danger that any matter within the purview of the General Assembly could be referred to this ad hoc preparatory Committee. For instance, it would presumably be possible to refer administrative and budgetary matters and economic and social matters to this body for preparatory study.

4. The United States delegation have expressed some concern in private at this manoeuvre by the South American countries and we understand that they have had a number of informal talks with members of certain South American delegations in an effort to head off the Bolivian proposal. How successful these attempts have been we have not yet been able to find out but it seems likely that the Bolivian may make his proposal at the next meeting of the ad hoc political Committee on Monday morning. It is possible that he may not put the proposal in any concrete form but rather suggest it as an idea upon which he would wish to have comments from members of the Committee.

5. The United States delegation in trying to dissuade the Bolivian representative have stated that they might have no objection to his proposal provided the newly constituted ad hoc Preparatory Committee were to have in its terms of reference paragraph 2b of the draft resolution on the re-establishment of the Interim Committee for an indefinite period. This is, you will recall, the "fire house" clause which in the opinion of the United States delegation is the pith and substance of the present terms of reference of the Interim Committee.

6. It would be our thought in any remarks which we make in Committee during the debate to oppose any suggestion of this kind put forward by the Bolivian representative or by his colleagues. We will, of course, in addition support the continuation of the Interim Committee on an indefinite period basing ourselves upon the arguments which are put forward in the commentary. We would, however, be grateful for any comments which you might care to make on the Bolivian proposal and for any suggestion which you may wish to make as to the best way of countering it.

Your Teletype No. 107 of October 15. Interim Committee.

2. It appears from Press Release GA/AH/45† that the Bolivian approach to the representatives of the Slav bloc did not evoke much enthusiasm for the plan to disband the Interim Committee as such and to re-establish in its place a 7th Main Committee of the General Assembly. I believe that this possibility was discussed in paragraph 14 of Despatch No. 288 of June 30 from the Canadian Permanent Delegate in which mention is made of certain constitutional difficulties as an argument against such a proposal. I assume that there is no need at this stage to pursue this aspect of the question.

3. From our reading of recent press releases on this subject it would appear that a majority of the Ad Hoc Political Committee are prepared to support the draft resolution, submitted by the Interim Committee, calling for its continuation for an indefinite period with the existing terms of reference.

4. We are wondering, however, what support exists for the Venezuelan proposal to set up a sub-committee to study the nature of the terms of reference which might be given to a committee subsidiary to the General Assembly and to achieve the co-operation of all members of the United Nations in the subsidiary body. In our view this proposal seems to have merit.

5. On the basis of past experience it seems clear that the terms of reference of the Interim Committee could not profitably be extended, unless there was a clear indication that the Soviet States intended to participate in its future work. This view was fully elaborated in Teletype No. 288 of June 30 from the Canadian Permanent Delegate. If the Slav States are to be persuaded to participate in the type of work carried on in the past by the Interim Committee, or in any other work of a political nature which might be referred to it, the interim body would probably have to be reconstituted, and at the very least, have a change of name in order to save their faces. A sub-committee of the Ad Hoc Political Committee, such as the one suggested by Venezuela, would seem to be the appropriate body for studying the problem. The membership of such a sub committee should in our view be representative of the various interests in the General Assembly.²

ELECTIONS TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

The General Assembly, at its Fourth Session beginning in September, will have to elect three non-permanent members of the Security Council to take the place of Argentina, Canada and the Ukraine. On June 23 we addressed identical telegrams to London (No. 1138)† and Washington (No. 1603),† copy attached, outlining our preliminary views and asking Mr. Wrong and Mr. Wilgress to sound out the State Department and the Foreign Office on this subject.

2. From the attached replies (No. 1767 from Washington† and No. 1329 from London,† both dated June 28) it is evident that on the official level London, Washington and ourselves do not entirely agree at this stage on which countries should be supported for the three vacancies. It is, I think, generally accepted that the Latin American Republics will be successful in getting one of their number (present indications favour Ecuador or Uruguay) elected to succeed Argentina. There is, however, a difference of view between Washington and London as to the disposition of the other two vacant seats. The State Department recognize the importance of having an Asian state other than China on the Council, and, subject to Indian behaviour on the Kashmir issue, they regard India as the most obvious candidate. Their view is, however, that India's only chance of election is to the so-called Commonwealth seat, and they think that New Zealand should wait for a later vacancy. The possibility of electing both India and New Zealand simultaneously has apparently not been considered. For the third vacancy they are still thinking in terms of a Soviet satellite or Republic.

² Le Canada a appuyé la recommandation du Comité par interim, à l'effet qu'il soit prolongé indéfiniment selon les mêmes termes du mandat; la recommandation fut approuvée par l'Assemblée générale le 21 novembre 1949, par un vote de 45 en faveur, 5 contre, et 4 abstentions.

Canada supported a recommendation by the Interim Committee that it be continued indefinitely with the same terms of reference; the recommendation was adopted by the General Assembly on November 21, 1949 by a vote of 45 for, 5 against, and 4 abstentions.

3. The Foreign Office have discarded their original hope of getting both India and New Zealand elected, and at this stage prefer New Zealand to India. The reasons given for this preference are broadly that New Zealand would be a more mature and reliable member of the Council, that Indian membership would complicate the solution of current disputes, such as Kashmir, and other problems, e.g. Hong Kong, which might come before the Council; and finally that if the Chinese vote became Communist and if a Soviet satellite were elected at the next Assembly, the Soviet Union would have three votes already, and might even gain Indian support on occasions (presumably on colonial issues) with the result that the proceedings of the Council might come to "a complete stalemate". The Foreign Office and the Indian Government are now engaged in discussions which the Foreign Office hope will lead to India's standing down and accepting some lesser alternative in compensation. The present Foreign Office view is, however, that if India insists on being a candidate, the United Kingdom will have to support her and attempt to persuade New Zealand to stand down. Until the present discussions with India are concluded the United Kingdom authorities do not intend to consult the State Department, nor have they indicated their attitude to the disposition of the seats now filled by Argentina and the Ukraine.

4. A preliminary Canadian view was first discussed on June 16 at an informal meeting with General McNaughton. The General himself came out very strongly in favour of India and it was agreed that we should consider doing what we could to take the initiative on India's behalf. At the present time this preliminary attitude, as expressed in telegram No. 1138 to London (under reference), appears to be closer to the United States than to the United Kingdom position. We should, I presume, have to accept a nominee of the Latin American Republics as the successor to Argentina on the Council. For the other two seats, I am wondering whether we might not still gain substantial support if we were to suggest the election of both India and New Zealand, the former as a state with great material and moral authority in South East Asia, and the latter as the successor to Canada in the "Commonwealth" seat. (It is possible that the Philippines might be proposed as an appropriate representative of South East Asia, but perhaps if General Romulo were elected to the Presidency of the Assembly, the Filipinos might accept this honour as adequate recognition of their claims).

5. If the prospects of electing both India and New Zealand look dim, however, we should then, I presume, favour India over New Zealand as our own successor, and attempt to persuade the United Kingdom to join with us and the United States in rallying support for India. Our sponsorship of the latter country, of course, would have to be made conditional on its behaviour in the Kashmir issue, and indeed India could be reminded that support in the Assembly of her aspirations for a Council seat would depend on the degree to which she showed a cooperative attitude towards UNCIP.

6. I think it is particularly important that India should be assured of strong support in the forthcoming elections, provided she adopts a reasonable position over Kashmir and other issues such as Hyderabad and, conceivably, French India. It may well be that the Foreign Office underestimates India's suitability for Council membership. In the first place India, by reason of its geographical position, and of the very great moral and material authority which it possesses, would appear to be the one candidate so far mentioned for possible membership of the Council which meets the two criteria set out in Article 23 of the Charter. Functionally, its contribution to the maintenance of international peace would unquestionably be a great deal more valuable than that of New Zealand, and from the standpoint of equitable geographical distribution its claims are just as good. It is true that New Zealand would probably be a more "reliable" member, but the need for an authoritative counterweight to the vote of Communist China, particularly during the next two years when the Council may be faced with its most difficult issues in the Asian area, would seem to outweigh the admitted justice of New Zealand's claim.

7. Furthermore, I think that on the whole the Indians have tended recently to swing away from the policy of independent neutrality which they adopted in the early stages of their membership in the United Nation. Nehru's initiative in calling a conference of Asian states to discuss the Indonesian question, India's cooperation with the United Kingdom over the Burma issue, and the present Indian attitude on Hong Kong may be cited as evidence of a new trend in Indian foreign policy. A responsible, "third-force" independence seems to be taking the place of what was previously a rather irresponsible neutrality. I think it is reasonable to assume that this new trend is likely to be strengthened rather than reversed by India's election to the Council.

8. Finally we must not lose sight of the effect which Commonwealth failure to support India's candidacy might have both on Indian relations with the Commonwealth itself and on Indian foreign policy generally. Questions are still being asked in India as to the value of the Commonwealth connection. Support of New Zealand in preference to India might embarrass those who are trying to work out the new relationship between India and the rest of the Commonwealth. It might also arrest the tendency for India to become a bulwark against communist influence in South East Asia.

9. The attached telegram to our High Commissioner in London† has been drafted for your consideration and signature, if you approve. It summarizes the considerations contained in this memorandum, and asks Mr. Wilgress to place these views before the United Kingdom authorities.³

³ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

I do not think that we should attempt to influence either India or New Zealand to stand or not to stand for the S.C. If they both stand, I think that we should support both as good prospective members of the S.C. Certainly we should not give India any reason to think that we do not consider her "reliable". Elections to United Nations Councils.

1. As Mr. Heeney has already informed you by telephone, after consultation with members of the delegation this morning, I came to the conclusion that in the Security Council elections we should vote for India, Ecuador and Yugoslavia,⁴ and I note from telegram No. 147† that you have now so recommended when Cabinet met today.

2. There has been general support for the Indian candidature for the Security Council in which we have been happy to concur. Ecuador is the choice of the Latin American States, and though we should greatly prefer to see a larger and more responsible State selected, we have little alternative other than to accept this choice. The only difficult decision was in regard to an eastern European State to replace the Ukraine. The Soviet candidate is Czechoslovakia, but Yugoslavia has made known its desire to secure election to the Council and has been conducting a vigorous campaign for support.

3. We cannot be sure that Yugoslavia will be either a more responsible or constructive member of the Council than Czechoslovakia and we have misgivings over the possibility that the election of Yugoslavia will project into the Security Council the angry dispute which is now taking place between that country and the U.S.S.R. We came finally to the conclusion, however, that we should vote for Yugoslavia because it seemed to us, in the circumstances, that the consequences of her defeat would be more serious than of her election. In a press conference yesterday, Mr. Vishinsky stated categorically that the election of Yugoslavia would be illegal and contrary to the Charter. He insisted that a binding obligation rests on the other members of the United Nations to accept the nominee of the majority of eastern European States. In the circumstances, therefore, the election of Czechoslovakia would appear to be a vindication of his wholly false and misleading interpretation of the Charter. It also seems to us that the defeat of Yugoslavia might tend to discourage the growth of national Communist movements in states which are now dominated by the U.S.S.R. For these reasons we came with some misgivings to the conclusion that the delegation should support Yugoslavia in the elections.

4. In regard to the Economic and Social Council a definite slate has emerged for which wide support has developed. We shall have no difficulty in supporting any of these candidates, and we, therefore, propose to vote for the following: the United States, Pakistan, Mexico, Iran, the Ukraine and Canada.⁵ The Ukraine is the Soviet nomination which in this case we think it wise to accept. We have not been pressing our own candidature though we have been assured by the United States delegation and one or two others that Canada will be elected to the Economic and Social Council.

5. With regard to election to the Trusteeship Council, there is still some uncertainty as to the states which will be available for election. It may, therefore, be necessary to take a decision on our vote at the last minute.

6. The proposed course of action described above is consistent with the general instructions approved by Cabinet before the General Assembly convened.

7. We do not (repeat not) intend to inform any other delegations or any newspaper correspondents of our intentions in regard to the vote. If it is possible we shall also refrain from making known the way in which we have voted, even after the vote is taken, although this may prove difficult to do. Sometime ago assurances were given to the Indian Government that it could count on our support for the Security Council, but this is the only instance in which information concerning our vote has been communicated. In transmitting information to Missions abroad concerning our vote in the elections, it might be wise to mention this reservation.

CANADA'S SUPPORT FOR YUGOSLAVIA FOR ELECTION TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. Robertson telephoned me after the Cabinet meeting yesterday to give me the decision of Cabinet for transmission to the Delegation in New York. I therefore informed the Delegation that Cabinet had agreed that, as between Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia, they would be inclined to vote for Yugoslavia and that they had further decided that no public statement should be made on how the Canadian Delegation was voting.

2. Mr. Heeney has just telephoned me, following the daily meeting of the Canadian Delegation this morning, to say that the Minister recommends very strongly a modification of this position. He feels that it would not be possible for him to refuse to discuss with the press at a press conference the rights and wrongs of the claims made by the Soviet Union that a vote for Yugoslavia would be improper and develop with the press the considerations which the Canadian Delegation has had in mind in deciding on which state to vote for. Any such discussion could not help but make clear the Delegations's support for Yugoslavia and he would therefore recommend that, after the election has taken place, he should let it be known, but not for ascription to the Canadian Delegation, that the Canadian Delegation has voted for Yugoslavia.

3. Mr. Heenev added that this matter had been discussed at the Delegation meeting and that the Delegation agreed with this recommendation from the Minister.

4. Mr. Heenev is to telephone me back at 12:00 noon since the Minister will be meeting the press about that time.

5. I should be grateful for your instruction on what I might say to Mr. Heenev.

Since Mr. Claxton was absent from Cabinet, this memorandum was sent to the Prime Minister. Mr. Robertson telephoned me shortly before noon to say that the Cabinet was ready to leave the matter to Mr. Pearson's discretion. He added that the discussion in Cabinet yesterday had been concentrated on the narrower issue—what statement might be made in the House of Commons in answer to a question.

Mr. Heenev telephoned me at noon and I gave him this message.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Mr. Dean Rusk asked me today if I would sound you out personally about your views on the Secretary General of the United Nations in view of the approaching expiration of Mr. Lie's term. He said that the State Department would be very interested in anything that you might have to say because of your long experience in United Nations affairs and your knowledge of the personalities and issues involved.

He went on to say that he was wondering what the proper principles should be—whether it was desirable to aim at rotation of the office or to seek continuity of tenure by the incumbent for a lengthy term. He did not, however, seem to differ when I remarked that in existing circumstances it seemed to me impossible to apply a principle, and that our action should be guided by qualities of the man in office and the possibilities of finding a suitable successor with the veto hanging over the selection. I asked him how seriously Mr. Lie's statement should be taken. He said that he thought that Mr. Lie would probably accept reappointment, or at least agree to remain in office until a successor has been chosen. He went on to say that in his opinion Mr. Lie's term could be extended by resolution of the Assembly without reference to the Security Council, since the Security Council had played no part in the decision which limited his term to five years.

Mr. Rusk did not suggest the names of any candidates for the succession. He was sure that, if Mr. Spaak were prepared to stand, his nomination would be vetoed by the Soviet delegate. He also assumed that you were not willing to stand yourself, and added that, if you did, the Soviet delegate would be likely also to apply his veto. He thinks, however, that a real effort must be made to agree among the permanent members either on an extension of Mr. Lie's term or on the choice of a successor, and he said that the State Department proposed to start consultations with the other permanent members.

It seems difficult to me for you to say anything on this subject at this time, but I told Mr. Rusk that I would pass on his request to you.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 29, 1949

Dear Hume:

I have read with much interest your confidential letter of December 22nd on your talk with Dean Rusk about a successor to Trygve Lie.

My own feeling, as I indicated over the telephone this morning, is that Lie will have to be persuaded to continue and I do not expect that there will be very much difficulty in this. I think that by announcing his decision to retire he is to some extent strengthening his own position in respect of a further term of office. In other words, he is putting the Security Council in the position of having to go to him which will make it easier for him to lay down certain conditions as the price for carrying on. I don't blame him in this at all as I think I would do the same thing if I were in his place. He will obviously be in a much stronger position in the future if the Security Council unanimously requests him to stand for a further term. My own view is that the impossibility of agreement on an adequate successor makes it essential that he should remain, but I think that there is much to be said for him remaining on a year-to-year basis.

It seems quite clear that any person of the calibre of Spaak who is put up the western powers would be vetoed by the Soviet Union, and that in default of Lie, agreement could only be achieved on a colourless and relatively ineffective candidate. Certainly the western powers could not accept any Russian nominee and the Russians would be in the same position in regard to western nominee. Lie would undoubtedly be preferable to almost anyone on whom agreement could be reached. It might be, of course, that somebody like Dr. Nervo of Mexico could be "sold" to the members of the Security Council, but he would not, I think, be as good a Secretary General as Lie who, as you said this morning, has not been a failure.

So far as I am concerned, if I were asked by the Security Council to stand, I would do so, but only on the condition that Russian agreement had been secured beforehand. That makes the question of my candidature a purely academic one because no such agreement, I am sure, would be forthcoming. What I would not do would be to agree to be put forward as an Anglo-American candidate and be vetoed by the Russians. Personally, however, if the occasion ever arose I would be willing to give up my political career in Canada for the job of Secretary General of the United Nations. At the same time, as I have stated above, I would not agree that my name should be brought forward publicly until the British and the Americans had discussed the matter with the Russians. That should make any choice on my part unnecessary.

I mentioned to you this morning that Dr. Evatt will undoubtedly be a candidate. It would be most unfortunate if he had to be vetoed and, therefore, steps should be taken, if and when his candidature becomes apparent, to let him know that he has no chance of success. The only people who could do this would be the Americans. Dr. Evatt is one danger; the other would be the determination of the Latin Americans to elect someone from their ranks and for the purpose to produce a candidate who would not be objected to by anybody, but who would have only this negative quality to commend him.

I have no objection to your passing on these views to Dean Rusk if you so desire.

Yours sincerely,
[L.B. PEARSON]

Instructions à la délégation permanente aux Nations Unies
Instructions to Permanent Delegation to United Nations

[Ottawa, September 15, 1949]

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

I. Historical BackgroundConstitutional Provisions Governing Admission of New Members

1. Article 4 of the Charter contains the following provisions:

“(1) Membership in the United Nations is open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and in the judgment of the Organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations.

“(2) The admission of any such state to membership in the United Nations will be effected by a decision of the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council.”

2. There are two constitutional points relevant to these provisions. The first is that the admission of new members is considered to be a substantive rather than a procedural matter, and is therefore subject to the veto in the Security Council. The second point is that, by Article 18 (2) of the Charter, the General Assembly’s decision to admit an applicant state must be made by a two-thirds majority of the Members present and voting. To gain admittance to the U.N., therefore, a state must receive at least seven affirmative votes in the Security Council, and no negative vote from a Permanent Member; and must also receive, in the General Assembly, the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Members present and voting. Since the United Nations began to consider applications from states which were not original Members, only eight countries (Afghanistan, Iceland, Siam, Sweden, Pakistan, Yemen, Burma and Israel) have succeeded in meeting the above requirements. Of these, the first four were admitted in 1946, Pakistan and Yemen in 1947, Burma in 1948 and Israel in 1949.

General

3. When the General Assembly resumes consideration of this item, it will be faced with the conventional East-West impasse. At the present time there are fourteen states whose applications for membership are outstanding: Albania, Mongolian People's Republic, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, Ireland, Portugal, Hungary, Italy, Austria, Roumania, Bulgaria, Finland, Ceylon, Korea and Nepal. Attached as Appendix A† is a condensed record of the consideration given, to September 15, 1949, by the Security Council and the General Assembly to the fourteen applications, in the order in which they were submitted.

4. These fourteen cases can be conveniently grouped into those which have the support of the U.S.S.R. (Albania, Mongolian People's Republic, Hungary, Bulgaria and Roumania) and those which are favoured by the Western nations (the remainder of the above list). The significant point of difference between these two groups of applicants is that the Soviet-sponsored group has never gained a majority in the Committee on the Admission of New Members, nor seven affirmative votes in the Security Council; while the nine states supported by the Western Powers have all been approved by large majorities in the membership committee and have failed to pass the Security Council only because of the Soviet veto. The General Assembly, at its first, second and third sessions, has made clear its disapproval of the Soviet Union's repeated use of the veto to prevent the admission of new members, and has consistently deplored the Soviet practice of attaching conditions to its vote on new members (e.g. the statement of the representative of the U.S.S.R. in August 1947 and April 1948 that the Soviet Union vote for the admission of Italy on condition that Bulgaria, Hungary, Roumania and Finland were admitted).

5. In an attempt to put an end to Soviet obstructionist tactics, the second session of the Assembly in 1947 adopted a resolution sponsored by the Belgian Delegation, requesting the International Court of Justice to give an Advisory Opinion on whether the Members of the United Nations might attach conditions, other than those contained in Article 4, to their affirmative vote for any membership application. On May 25, 1948, the International Court submitted its Advisory Opinion that considerations other than those stated in Article 4 were extraneous and irrelevant to the question of membership. A Commentary on the International Court's majority and minority findings is attached as Appendix B.†

The Question of New Admissions, September 1, 1948–September 1, 1949

6. During the past year, there has been no fundamental change in the positions of the Soviet and non-Soviet worlds on the question of new admissions. At the first part of its third session in September 1948, the General Assembly gave a clear expression of its wishes in a series of eight resolutions (197(III)A to H), and in a separate resolution on Ceylon's application.

7. These resolutions called upon the members of the Assembly and the Security Council to act in accordance with the Advisory Opinion of the International Court; asked the Security Council to reconsider applications which, though they had been examined, had not been recommended to the Assembly, and made specific and sympathetic reference to the applications of Portugal, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, Italy, Finland, Ireland and Austria.

8. The application of Ceylon, having been submitted in May 1948, and vetoed on August 18, was given separate consideration by the Assembly which adopted a resolution on December 8, favouring Ceylon's admission and requesting the Security Council to reconsider the case at the earliest possible moment. On December 15, the Council re-examined the case of Ceylon, but again the Soviet Union's veto prevented a favourable recommendation being sent to the Assembly. Two days later, Israel's application, which had been submitted on November 29, was taken up by the Council, but failed to receive the necessary seven affirmative votes.

9. Thus, by the end of 1948 the number of outstanding applicants for admission had risen to thirteen. Of these, the General Assembly had specifically asked the Council to re-examine each of the cases supported by the majority; the five Soviet satellite applicants had renewed their applications in the last four months of 1948; and both Ceylon and Israel were certain to press for reconsideration of their cases. Finally Korea, on January 19, 1949, and Nepal, on February 13, submitted their applications, bringing to a total of fifteen the outstanding cases which the Security Council was required to examine.

10. During 1949, the Security Council has dealt individually with the applications of Israel, Korea and Nepal. Israel was recommended for membership on March 4, and formally admitted during the second part of the third regular session of the Assembly on May 11. The applications of both Korea and Nepal, however, were vetoed by the USSR, the former on April 8 and the latter on September 7.

11. The remaining twelve cases, including that of Ceylon, were considered together at a series of Council meetings between June and September 1949. On June 16, the representative of Argentina put forward seven resolutions which called upon the Council to recommend for admission Portugal, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, Finland, Ireland, Italy, Austria and Ceylon. When the Council met again on June 21, the Soviet representative countered this by proposing a more comprehensive resolution which, if adopted, would have had the effect of admitting all twelve applicants en bloc.

12. This was the first time that the Council had had to deal with a specific proposal for a comprehensive "horse-trade" of outstanding applications. Although the majority of the Council spoke against the Soviet proposal as a manoeuvre which lumped all candidates together regardless of whether or not they fulfilled the conditions of Article 4, and which ignored the opinion of the International Court, no member of the Council has appeared anxious to press for a vote on the Soviet draft resolution or on a U.S. procedural motion that a separate vote be taken on each of the twelve applications. Meanwhile the Soviet Union is seeking to gain as much public credit as there is available as a result of its horse-trading offer; and the Western nations have not desired to bring the matter to a vote, no doubt partly because they suspect that some of the friendly applicant states might deplore the loss of this opportunity for admission. On September 13, 1949, after a lengthy procedural wrangle the seven Argentinean resolutions mentioned in paragraph 11 above, were put to the vote. In each of the seven cases, the vote was 9 in favour with 2 against, the Soviet veto once more preventing a favourable recommendation being forwarded to the Assembly. On September 15, the Council adopted, by 8 votes to 3, the U.S. procedural motion calling for a separate vote on each application. On the same day, after further protracted procedural exchanges, the Council voted separately on the applications of Albania, the Mongolian People's Republic, Bulgaria,

Roumania and Hungary, all of which failed to receive 7 affirmative votes. The remaining eight applications, which had been put to the vote on September 13, were not voted on again as it was obvious that the positions of Council Members had not changed. Subsequently, the Soviet proposal for the en bloc admission of all applicant States was defeated. The vote was 2 in favour (Ukraine and U.S.S.R.), 4 against (France, Norway, U.K. and Canada), and 4 abstentions (Egypt, China, Cuba and U.S.). One member of the Council, the representative of Argentina, did not participate in the vote.

II. Previous Canadian Attitude

13. Broadly, the Canadian Delegation has been associated with the majority in insisting that the admission of new members should be governed by the clear provisions of Article 4 of the Charter, and that other considerations were irrelevant and should not be allowed to apply. Canadian representatives have constantly emphasized the importance which they attach to this principle. At the 1947 Assembly, the Canadian position with regard to the veto on new admissions was specifically stated. Commenting on a suggestion that certain of the applications previously rejected by the Security Council should be sent back by the Assembly to the Council for further consideration, the Canadian representative said that such re-consideration would be futile unless the permanent members of the Council would give an assurance not to exercise their veto power on applications for membership. In the Committee debate, the U.S., U.K., China and France offered to waive their right of veto in this respect but the Soviet representative refused to do so on behalf of his Government.

14. Canada entered more fully into the discussions on new admissions after January 1, 1948, when its representative took his seat for the first time on the Security Council. In the debates which were held in the Council during April, the Canadian representative was instructed to vote in favour of the admission of Burma (which was admitted on April 19, 1948), Italy, Transjordan, Ireland and Portugal. He was instructed to oppose Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic; to oppose Finland unless in private consultations with representatives of the U.K. and the U.S. it became apparent that there were good reasons for doing otherwise; and to oppose Austria until such time as the withdrawal of occupation troops was complete, unless, after consultation with the U.S. and the U.K., there appeared to be compelling reasons for voting in Austria's favour. During the discussions on these applications, the Canadian representative spoke in favour of Burma and Italy but, in view of the Council's decision not to take a vote on the other applications, he was not required to outline the Canadian position with regard to them. Canada supported Ceylon's application August 18 when it was rejected owing to the opposition of the U.S.S.R.

15. At the third session of the General Assembly, the Canadian representative again laid stress on the qualifications for admission set out in Article 4 of the Charter, and criticized the efforts of "certain members" of the United Nations who had attempted to introduce irrelevant criteria for membership. In particular, the representative of Canada referred to the question of whether or not an applicant had been a belligerent in World War II, or had diplomatic relations with other members of the United Nations. Both these considerations had been cited by the U.S.S.R. as reasons affecting the eligibility of certain applicants for membership, and neither consideration was relevant. In addition, Canada spoke strongly in favour of the Advisory Opinion handed down by the International Court of Justice in May 1948, which is quoted in Appendix B, and deplored the kind of horse-trading in membership which the U.S.S.R. had proposed in the 1947 Assembly and more recently in the Security Council.

16. On December 15, at the request of the General Assembly, the Security Council reconsidered Ceylon's application. Although nine members, including Canada, voted in favour, Ceylon's application was for the second time vetoed by the U.S.S.R. When, two days later, the Council considered Israel's application, Canada was among the five nations which abstained in the voting. The Canadian representative, explaining this abstention, stated that while we did not wish to defer indefinitely consideration of Israel's application, we desired an opportunity to give the question more careful examination than it had been possible to give it in the short time since the application was received on November 29.

17. The Canadian position on the broad question of new admissions has not substantially changed during 1949. We supported Israel in the Council both on March 4 and in the second part of the third session of the Assembly. The Canadian representative on the Security Council now has instructions to support all but five (Albania, Bulgaria, Roumania, Hungary and the Mongolian People's Republic) of the fourteen outstanding applications. When in June, the U.S.S.R. proposed the en bloc admission of twelve applicant states (Nepal's case was still in the committee stage) the Canadian representative was authorized to oppose the renewed attempt at a constitutionally unjustifiable deal. When, on September 13, the Council voted on the seven resolutions proposed by Argentina (paragraph 11 above), Canada voted in favour in each case, although owing to the Soviet veto all seven were rejected. On September 15, when the Council again rejected the five Soviet satellites, Canada voted against in each instance and also opposed the Soviet proposal for the en bloc admission of outstanding applications.

III. Policy Recommendations

18. The Canadian attitude on the fourteen pending applications has been adequately outlined above. In any consideration of the five Soviet-sponsored applications, the Canadian representative might explain his adverse vote by stating that the Canadian Government was not yet satisfied that the Governments of these states could carry out the obligations which the Charter would place upon them. With particular reference to Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania, he could add that Canada did not consider it appropriate that these states should be admitted to membership while they stood charged with violating their Peace Treaty agreements. As for Bulgaria and Albania, their refusal to co-operate in any way with the United Nations Special Commission on the Balkans was no assurance that they would be good members of the United Nations. The Mongolian People's Republic is not considered in any sense an independent state with control over its own policy.

19. The Canadian position on individual applications, then, is clear. But there are issues of a more general character with which this Assembly may be called upon to deal. The first of these will arise out of the Report of the Security Council. This Report includes references to the Soviet proposal, made on June 21, 1949, and rejected on September 15, that the Council should recommend to the Assembly the admission to membership of twelve outstanding applicants en bloc. (It will be recalled that Nepal's application was still in Committee stage on June 21, and therefore was not mentioned in the Soviet proposal. However, it has since been included.) The Canadian position, based as it is on Article 4 of the Charter and the Advisory Opinion of the International Court, is clearly opposed to this suggested bargain.

20. It is possible that the delegation of Argentina, which has constantly opposed the use of the veto with respect to new admissions, may propose that the Assembly ask the International Court for an Advisory Opinion on the meaning of the word "recommendation" in Article 4(2). The object of such a move would be to secure a ruling from the Court to the effect that the last word on an application for membership would be with the Assembly, and not the Security Council; and thereby to deprive the permanent members of their veto on new admissions. In other words, the proposal would attempt to have it juridically accepted that the "recommendation" of the Security Council was of a purely formal nature. A reference to the Court of this nature may seem to be harmless, but it should be borne in mind that a decision of the Court would probably confirm the present interpretation of the Charter on this point and thereby make it all the more difficult in the future to remove the veto on the admission of members, by custom or convention. The Canadian Delegation should consult with the U.S. and the U.K. and other responsible delegations if this proposal is put forward, and should do everything possible to ensure that the major Western powers act in concert.

21. Although no mention is made of them on the Agenda, there are two other points which may be taken up in the discussion on admissions. The first of these arises from the note on "Universality of Membership" in the Introduction to the Secretary-General's Report for the period July 1, 1948-June 30, 1949. In spite of the frequently repeated arguments expressed by the Secretary-General in favour of the admission of all sovereign states, the present would not appear to be an appropriate time to initiate discussion along these lines in the Assembly. There are two principal objections to striking a bargain at the moment, even if we were so disposed. In the first place the delegation could not contemplate the admission of Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria until the charges of treaty violation have been disposed of. In the second place, the Soviet bloc would gain more proportionately by adding five votes to their present six than the Western powers would gain by adding eight votes, none of which is certain always to be on their side. The U.S. and U.K. are expected to oppose any serious effort to raise this question, and it would seem advisable for the Canadian Delegation to adopt a similar attitude.

22. The second point which may be raised concerns the question of "Associate Memberships" of the Assembly. There has been some informal discussion of the possibility that the Assembly might choose to exercise its independence in this way. It is possible that, if there is no other way through the existing impasse, some delegation might suggest that the Assembly should, by a two-thirds majority, allow applicant states which had received seven affirmative votes in the Security Council but whose application had been vetoed in the Council, a voice in the General Assembly. The question of qualified membership raises the problem of how far the Assembly could go within the terms of the Charter, in giving privileges of association to non-member states. However, if some or all of the Western candidates would accept non-voting participation in the work of the Assembly, the Canadian delegation could support responsible proposals along these lines.

[Ottawa], February 10, 1949

ADMISSION OF ISRAEL TO THE UNITED NATIONS

Israel is likely to submit to the Security Council in March a fresh application for membership in the United Nations.

During his visit to Ottawa on February 7 Dr. Eliahu Epstein, special representative of Israel in the United States, raised the question of Canada's support for the renewed membership application. It was drawn to his attention that Canada would find it easier to support the application if Israel were to cooperate fully with the United Nations. In recent months Israeli offensives have taken place in Palestine in violation of the truce. Israel has been insisting at Rhodes that it should be allowed to retain territory won by truce violations. It apparently hopes to incorporate Jerusalem into the Jewish state. (This was confirmed by Dr. Epstein.) Jewish immigrants are being settled on the property of Arab refugees for whose repatriation the General Assembly's resolution of December 11, 1948 provided. Dr. Epstein's comment on these developments was that nothing which Israel was now doing would prejudice the final peace settlement.

Dr. Epstein seemed to be under the impression that Canada's recent recognition of Israel would imply automatic support for the renewed application for membership in the United Nations. It was made clear to him, however, that criteria for admission to the United Nations go beyond the essential conditions of statehood and that Israel's ability and willingness to carry out obligations under the Charter will have to be taken into consideration before Canada can support the application.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs assured Dr. Epstein before he left that unless Israel took some action which would make it impossible for Canada to recognize Israel as a "peace-loving state" he would recommend to the Government that Canada should support the membership application when it next comes before the Security Council. We would also accept an Israeli consul in Montreal, in view of the desirability of fostering trade and commercial activities between Canada and Israel, it being understood that the arrangement would not constitute de jure recognition of Israel.

ANNEX A

On February 24 Israel asked the Security Council to give renewed consideration to its application for membership in the United Nations so that the General Assembly might take a decision on the matter in April.

When Israel's first membership application was considered on December 17, six members of the Security Council, including Canada, voted for a French motion to postpone action for a month. The situation at that time was far from clear. Only six days had elapsed since the General Assembly had adopted its main resolution providing for the creation of a Conciliation Commission to assist the Arabs and Jews to achieve a final settlement of all questions outstanding between them and to arrange for the internationalization of Jerusalem and to supervise the repatriation of refugees. In our view Israel's qualifications for membership could be judged only in relation to the Assembly resolution and it was too soon to judge whether the Conciliation Commission, when actually established, would command the cooperation of the Jewish state. Thus when Israel's membership application was actually put in the Security Council, the states which were not ready to vote were obliged to abstain, with the result that the application was rejected by a vote of 5 for, 1 against and 5 abstentions (Belgium, Canada, China, France and the United Kingdom).

Today the situation is much clearer. The Conciliation Commission has been active since the beginning of February. It has visited the capitals of the Arab states and the Provisional Government of Israel and is now at work on its first report to the Security Council on the refugee problem. A trend toward peaceful settlement appears to have set in. Renewed hostilities broke out in southern Palestine a few days after Israel's membership application was rejected in December, but an armistice agreement between Israel and Egypt was concluded on February 24 with the aid of the United Nations Acting Mediator, Dr. Ralph Bunche, to whose tact and patience this first successful step toward an agreed settlement in Palestine is due. Israel is now in process of negotiating an armistice agreement with Transjordan under Dr. Bunche's continued chairmanship at Rhodes and with Lebanon, also with the aid of U.N. personnel, between Lebanon and Israel. Iraq has undertaken to be bound by these arrangements when they are completed. Thus the process of establishing more stable conditions in the Middle East has already begun and it is felt that action by the Security Council now, in the form of a recommendation to the General Assembly to approve Israel's application, would be likely to confirm the trend toward a peaceful settlement, while failure to make such a recommendation might conceivably reverse the trend.

It seems likely that still more rapid progress toward peaceful settlement might be made if the outstanding application of Transjordan for admission to the United Nations were to be approved at the same time as the application of Israel. The question of whether this can be done has been under private discussion during the past few days. We still have no indication, however, that the Soviet Union is yet ready to withdraw its veto in the case of Transjordan's application, since Transjordan continues to be regarded as the spearhead of British defence against a possible Communist advance in the Middle East.

The Security Council is to consider Israel's application during its Thursday session. The Canadian representative has therefore been instructed to vote in favour of the application if before the matter is actually considered no action is taken by Israeli leaders which would make it impossible for Canada to recognize Israel as a peace-loving state able and willing to carry out its obligations under the Charter.⁶

New York, April 22, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Application of Israel for membership.

1. Before leaving New York, Mr. Pearson expressed the desire that the delegation keep him informed on developments in connection with the application of Israel for membership, which has been included in the agenda of the present session of the General Assembly and has been referred by a decision of the Assembly in plenary meeting for consideration in the Political and Security Committee. Since the Minister's departure, the following three important developments have taken place:

(a) The receipt of the second progress report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine dealing with the questions of refugees, Jerusalem, and progress in conciliation;

(b) The issue of the Papal Encyclical on Jerusalem; and

(c) The development of a strong opinion in the General Assembly in favour of a more complete examination of the application in committee.

2. As regards (a), the report of the Conciliation Commission on the refugee question indicates that the Commission recognizes the contention of the Arab delegations of the necessity, both for humanitarian and political reasons, of giving absolute priority to the refugee question and of Israel accepting the principle of the return to their homes of the refugees wishing to do so; the acceptance of this principle to be subject only to conditions arising out of practical considerations such as the alternatives which may be offered the refugees if they do not go back and their appreciation of the conditions under which they would have to return to Israel.

⁶ Le Cabinet décida d'appuyer la demande de membership par l'État d'Israël, le 2 mars 1949.

Cabinet decided to support the application for membership by the State of Israel on March 2, 1949.

3. On the question of Jerusalem, the Conciliation Commission has been endeavouring to formulate proposals in conformity with the Assembly Resolution of 11th December for a permanent international regime for the Jerusalem area which will provide for maximum local autonomy for distinctive groups consistent with the special international status of the Jerusalem area. In these talks, the Commission reports that the Government of Israel has indicated (a) that it recognizes that the Commission itself is bound by the Assembly Resolution of 11th December, 1948; (b) that when the Government of Israel itself is in a position to do so on an equal footing with the Arab States (i.e., after admission to the United Nations), it intends to request the General Assembly to revise part of that Resolution concerning Jerusalem; and (c) that while Israel accepts without reservation an international regime for or international control of the Holy places in Jerusalem, in the words of Ben Gurion "for historical, political and religious reasons, the State of Israel could not accept the establishment of an international regime in the city of Jerusalem".

4. On the question of conciliation and rapprochement between the two parties, the Commission reports that it has only been able to do preparatory work in separate conversations with both parties and that its objective at this stage is to continue "exchanges of views between the two parties and the Commission in circumstances which would permit of the achievement of concrete and positive results". The Commission reports that it has obtained the agreement of the Arab delegations not to consider the study and solution of the refugee question as a prerequisite to the opening of discussions on other questions. They still maintain their view, however, that the refugee problem must be considered as the most pressing.

5. As regards (b), in the Encyclical letter on Palestine released 15th April, the Pope repeated his exhortation contained in the previous Encyclical letter entitled "In Multecplicibus" that Jerusalem and its environs containing the Holy places should be given a status under international law designed and effective to protect sacred relics. The letter contained the following specific exhortations:

"We are impelled also to urge our children wherever they may live to work for this just cause to the end that their Governments, which are competent to act in a matter of such consequence, may be persuaded that Jerusalem and its surroundings should be given a juridical status, the security of which under existing conditions should be insured with the support and co-operation of all peace-loving nations respectful of one another's laws.

But beyond this it assuredly is necessary to guarantee the invulnerability and security of all those Holy places which are in other cities and towns of the region besides those situated in Jerusalem." As reported in our telegram No. 466 of 19th April,† the Encyclical, from preliminary inquiries here, may be expected to have some influence on a number of States, and, in particular, upon Latin American delegations. They may insist all the more upon some satisfactory assurance from the Israeli representatives regarding their attitude to paragraph 8 of the Assembly Resolution of 11th December concerning the special international status of Jerusalem and the Holy places before voting in favour of Israel's application.

6. As regards (c), I have nothing at present to add to the information also contained in teletype No. 466 of 19th April which indicates that there is a substantial opinion among delegations that the Assembly would not be justified, in view of the present controversy surrounding Israel's application, to take merely formal action at this time by accepting the favourable recommendation of the Security Council. The Arab delegations are, of course, endeavouring to postpone consideration of the application until the fourth regular session. The Scandinavian delegations have also raised the question of the apparent failure of the Israeli Government to take effective action to find and punish the late Mediator's assassin. Unless satisfactory assurances are received from the Israeli representatives when the application comes up for consideration in Committee on these points, it is possible that there may be increased support for a proposal to postpone taking a decision at this session on the application of Israel.

7. Before the Minister's departure he left the delegation the following instructions:

(a) To support the General Committee's recommendation that the application be considered in plenary meeting without prior reference to Committee, if this were put to the vote first.

(b) If the General Committee's recommendation were accepted by the Assembly and the application considered in plenary meeting, Canadian delegation was to vote in favour of application, and, should a favourable decision be taken by the General Assembly, to associate the Canadian delegation with any expressions of welcome which may be made in the General Assembly to the new member.

(c) To abstain on a motion to refer the application to Committee. This motion was actually put first and the Canadian delegation therefore abstained in the vote at the plenary meeting on 14th April.

(d) To oppose a motion to defer decision on the application until the fourth regular session.

8. I have thought that the developments reported in this message are of sufficient importance to draw them to your attention in case you should wish to consult Mr. Pearson in London. There is still no definite information as to when the application will be considered in Committee. The item was referred to Committee one and is preceded on the agenda by the following items: Franco Spain, the treatment of Indians in South Africa, and Indonesia. We have been informed privately by the United States delegation that they are not prepared to press for priority being given to consideration of the application. On the other hand, it may happen that as soon as the Ad Hoc Political Committee disposes of the item on religious persecutions some items of business of Committee I may be transferred to the Ad Hoc Political Committee, in which case the application might come up for consideration within the next week or two.

ANNEX B

APPLICATION OF ISRAEL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED NATIONS

In the plenary meeting of the General Assembly on May 2 the question of Israel's application for membership was transferred from the First Committee to the Ad Hoc Political Committee. No decision has yet been taken but a succession of resolutions have been placed before the Committee since the debate began.

The Moslem states, led by Pakistan, questioned the validity of the Security Council's favourable decision on the application on the ground that, when the vote was taken, one of the Permanent Members (the United Kingdom) abstained. On a strict interpretation of Article 27 of the Charter, the Moslems had a good case, since paragraph 3 of the Article states that decisions of the Security Council in substantive matters "shall be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members". The Canadian Delegation was instructed to oppose this resolution since we have welcomed the growth of the convention that an abstention in the Security Council does not constitute a veto, as a valuable step towards a more liberal interpretation of the Article. The Moslem states, however, are not pressing the issue.

On May 3, the Arab state of Lebanon tabled a resolution asking the Committee to postpone action on Israel's application pending satisfactory assurances from Israel on the questions of Arab refugees and the internationalization of Jerusalem. The Lebanese plan proposed that the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should be asked to conduct negotiations with Israel along these lines and report to the fourth regular session of the Assembly.

The other resolutions submitted in the Committee have been concerned with the issuing of invitations to representatives of Israel and of religious bodies to state their views, in particular on the status of Jerusalem. The Canadian Delegation has been instructed to oppose resolutions inviting statements from representatives of religious bodies on the ground that it would be more appropriate for these opinions to be made known at the meetings of the Conciliation Commission now taking place in Lausanne.

On May 6, Canada joined with the United States, Australia and four Latin American countries in formally proposing in the Ad Hoc Political Committee that Israel be admitted to the United Nations.⁷

ANNEX B

ISRAEL'S MEMBERSHIP APPLICATION

On May 11 the General Assembly adopted a resolution sponsored jointly by Canada, Australia, the United States and four Latin American states to admit Israel to membership in the United Nations as a peace-loving state able and willing to carry out its obligations under the Charter. The vote was 37 to 12 with 9 abstentions.

Latin American states had discussed the possibility of delaying support for the resolution until the internationalization of Jerusalem was assured. They abandoned this move, however, in view of a declaration by the Israeli representative that an international regime for the protection of holy places would be accepted. Consequently in the plenary session only two Latin American members abstained from voting. Sweden and Denmark both abstained, although the Israeli representative expressed to the Committee his Government's concern over its failure to apprehend the assassins of the United Nations Mediator in Jerusalem and stated that the case was not considered closed. The United Kingdom and Belgium also abstained, and are likely to withhold de jure recognition of Israel until the boundaries of the state are established. China was the only Asian state which voted in favour of Israel's admission to the United Nations.

The Canadian representative in supporting Israel's application drew attention to the importance of the work now being done by the United Nations Conciliation Commission in Lausanne. He thought the Assembly should avoid debate on the subjects with which the Conciliation Commission is dealing—namely, final boundary adjustments, Arab refugees and the future of Jerusalem. The Assembly should be careful not to disturb the course of the negotiations. The Canadian delegation expected that decisions on these points would be reached within the meaning of Assembly and Security Council resolutions and the principles and purposes of the Charter.

New York, February 9, 1949

Sir,

I refer to your telegram No. 139 of February 2, concerning the Korean application for admission to membership in the United Nations.

2. I should be glad if you would have preliminary discussions with the United Kingdom, United States, and such other delegations as you think appropriate in order to ascertain the attitude they are likely to take in this matter; in making its decision the Government will probably wish to have this knowledge.

3. In your discussions you may make use of the following considerations which, at the official level, are thought to be relevant:

(1) On December 12, 1948 the United Nations General Assembly gave full recognition to the Government of the Republic of Korea (Document A/788).† Elections in Korea were observed and approved by the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea.

(2) De jure recognition of Korean Republic is now under consideration by Canada and has already been given by the United Kingdom and the United States. If this recognition is given, it would be difficult for Canada not to support the Korean application for United Nations membership.

(3) Using the yardstick of Article 4 of the Charter, the Republic of Korea has a good prima facie case which would entitle it to acceptance: (a) The United Nations resolution of December 12 recognized the Republic as a state; (b) there should be no objection to supporting the claim of Korea to be a peace-loving state; (c) regarding the Republic's ability and willingness to accept and to carry out Charter obligations, it would seem that the Republic is at least as able to take an independent line and to administer its own territories as, for instance, Yemen, Siam, Ceylon, Trans-jordan, and other states whose applications for United Nations membership have been supported or favourably considered by Canada.

(4) Since Korea was under Japanese occupation prior to and during the last war, the question of its war record should not be very important. From this point of view, the Republic's application for membership should be looked at as was Austria's, which we were prepared to support.

(5) A preliminary estimate of the probable position to be taken towards this application would indicate that, among the major powers, the United States and the United Kingdom and China are likely to take the view that it would be desirable to support the application. The vote on the December 12 resolution gives evidence that the Soviet Union will veto the application and that the Soviet satellites will follow their lead in voting against. Despite the likelihood of this veto, it would be desirable to have the Canadian position placed on record.

New York, February 11, 1949

Reference your despatch No. 89, 9th February, application of Korea for membership in the United Nations, Begins:

1. Korea's application for membership is one of the items on the Council's agenda for its meeting at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, 15th February. In accordance with your despatch No. 89, we have discussed this matter with the United Kingdom and United States delegations and they have both stated that their Governments intend to support the application.

2. At the Council meeting on 15th February the only point under discussion should be the reference of the application of the Republic of Korea (see my teletype No. 140)† to the Committee on the Admission of New Members. This would normally be a routine matter but it is possible that a procedural discussion will develop, in view of the application of the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" which was received by the Secretary General in a telegram dated 9th February (see my teletype No. 161).† You will note that this telegram from the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" was not, (repeat not), distributed by the Secretary General as an official application for admission to membership, but was only distributed "for the convenience of the members of the Security Council which may desire to be informed of it." It should also be noted that the second operative paragraph of the General Assembly resolution of 12th December 1948 states that the Government of the Republic of Korea is a lawful Government and that it is "the only such Government in Korea." In view of this paragraph, it does not seem that an application by the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" should be considered either by the Council or by the Committee on the Admission of New Members.

3. However, there seems no doubt that this latter application will be raised by Malik at the Council meeting on Tuesday. The United Kingdom and United States delegations have not yet decided whether the best course to follow in this matter would be,

(a) To allow the application of the "Democratic People's Republic" to be referred to the Committee on new members and to report back an adverse recommendation from that Committee to the Council, or

(b) To take the position that such an application should not be considered either by the Council or by the Committee in view of the Assembly resolution of 12th December.

4. In so far as the application of the Republic of Korea is concerned, the present indication is that it would secure the necessary seven votes (including China and France) but that it will be almost certainly vetoed by the Soviet Union. Despite the apparent certainty of the application being vetoed however, the United States, in particular, attaches some importance to having as many non-Communist States as possible go on record in support of the application both in the Committee and in the Council. In discussing this matter with the United States delegation on the official level, I gave them informally the preliminary Canadian view as expressed in paragraph 3 of your despatch No. 89. Ends.

Reference your teletype No. 164 of February 11, application of Korea for membership in the United Nations.

1. I think that it would be preferable if the Korean application were formally referred to the Committee on Admission of New Members without a previous propaganda exchange in the Council. However, if the United Kingdom or United States felt strongly that it was tactically necessary to engage in a procedural discussion before the application was submitted to the Membership Committee, we should not object.

2. It would also be advisable if possible to avoid a discussion in the Security Council of the claim to membership advanced by the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea." We assume that a reference of this subject to the Membership Committee would not imply any recognition of the validity of this application. The reference in the Assembly Resolution of December 12 to the "only lawful government" of Korea is a clear-cut justification for our refusal to support the claim of the "Democratic People's Republic."

3. It should be made clear that our concurrence in the plan for referring the original Korean application to the Membership Committee is not to be taken as, in itself, a formal assurance of Canadian support for the application. Nevertheless, when you consider it timely to express the Canadian attitude, you should take the line that, in accordance with the considerations outlined in my despatch No. 89 of February 9, Canada will join with the United States and the United Kingdom in backing the application of the Republic of Korea.

1. The only decision taken by the Security Council at its meeting at 3 p.m. Tuesday, 15th February, was to vote by nine in favour and two against (Soviet Union and the Ukraine) to refer the application of the Republic of Korea (S/1238) to the Committee on the admission of new members. No decision has yet been taken in regard to the application of the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" (S/1247)⁸ or regarding the Governorship of the Free Territory of Trieste. Discussion on these two items will continue at the next meeting of the Council at 3 p.m. today, Wednesday 16th February.

2. In regard to the application of the Republic of Korea, Malik made a lengthy statement charging that this Government was a puppet regime set up by the United States military authorities, and that it did not in any sense represent the Korean people. It was not a convincing performance. In the course of this statement Malik made two references to Canada. In regard to the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, he stated that "the representative of Canada on the Commission called the intercession of the Interim Committee an unreasonable and unconstitutional act." Later on in his statement, he added that when the Commission had reported back to the Interim Committee and had received "illegal" advice from that body, "the representative of Canada declared that that action of the Interim Committee was improper and illegal." This is presumably a reference to your statement of 26th February, 1948, in the Interim Committee, and to the Canadian vote against the resolution adopted by the Interim Committee on the same date (in regard to the holding of elections in South Korea alone).

3. Austin replied by invoking the General Assembly resolution of 12th December, 1948, particularly paragraph 2 which states that the Government of the Republic of Korea is the only lawful Government in Korea. He added that "as the application itself says, the Republic of Korea was set up as the direct result of the mandate of the General Assembly and its general election was observed and approved by the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea." This endorsement by the General Assembly was, according to Austin, a complete refutation to the charges made by the Soviet representative.

4. I intervened very briefly to support the President's suggestion that the application of the Republic of Korea should be referred immediately to the Members Committee "where we shall be better able to give it the detailed consideration which it requires, on the basis of which we shall be able to reach appropriate conclusions." I made no comment on Malik's references to Canada, as the Security Council was not discussing the substance of the Korean application, but only the matter of referring it to the Membership Committee.

5. After the Council had decided by nine votes to two to refer the application of the Republic of Korea to the Membership Committee, a confused discussion then developed concerning the application of the "Democratic People's Republic." In a letter of 11th February (S/1256) Malik had asked the President of the Council to put this item on the provisional agenda. Austin then raised what he called a "Parliamentary question" as to whether the Council should consider this application, in view of the Assembly resolution to the effect that there is only one lawful Government in Korea. The President declined to make any ruling on this procedural point, and Malik then made another lengthy statement contending that the "Democratic People's Republic" was the only representative Government in Korea. The Council adjourned after Malik's statement and will continue discussion of this question at 3:00 p.m. today.

6. As the question of the validity of the application of the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" has now been raised in the Council itself upon the initiative of the United States, and the Council will now have to decide whether or not to consider this application as a valid one to be referred to the Membership Committee, I propose, in the light of the third sentence of your paragraph 2, teletype No. 160 of 14th February, to take the position that, upon the basis of the Assembly resolution of 12th December, this application is not valid and therefore should not, repeat not, be referred to the Membership Committee.

Korea's application for membership in the United Nations.

1. The Membership Committee of the Security Council met at 10:30 a.m. Thursday, 24th February, to examine the application of the Republic of Korea for membership in the United Nations. I was represented by Ignatieff.

2. The main feature of the discussion was the dialectical arguments repeated by the Soviet and Ukrainian representatives, alleging that the Government of the Republic of Korea was a "Puppet Government", that the elections in South Korea, observed by the "so-called" United Nations Commission, had been false, and asserting that the only legitimate Government in Korea was the Government of the "Democratic People's Republic of Korea" at Pyengyang.

3. The nine other members of the Committee spoke in support of the application of the Republic of Korea, basing themselves on the General Assembly resolution of 12th December. In accordance with your instructions contained in teletype No. 187 of 23rd February,† paragraph 2, Ignatieff spoke in support of the Korean application, making no reference, however, to the question of Canadian recognition. In fact, the statement consisted of the suggested text contained in your teletype No. 188,† with the mere addition of connecting phrases. (The text is contained in my immediately following teletype en clair). As the Soviet representative again made reference to the position taken by the Canadian representative on the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, the statement included reference to the Canadian statement in Committee I in Paris, given in your teletype No. 188, paragraph 2.

4. The Soviet representative, at the conclusion of the meeting, tried to make out that the whole discussion had been contrary to the rules of procedure, as the Committee had not formally adopted the agenda, despite the fact that the Soviet representative had objected to the consideration of the application of the Republic of Korea. Although this technical formality is not usually followed in the Membership Committee, the Soviet representative, no doubt, will claim in the Council that the whole discussion in the Membership Committee "violated the normal rules of procedure."

5. When the vote was taken in the Committee, 8 members voted in favour of the application; the Soviet and Ukraine against, and Cuba was absent. (Cuba had previously expressed support for the application.)

6. The next step in the consideration of the Korean application will be when the Committee's report comes before the Council⁹, unless the Soviet delegation asks for a discussion of the Committee's report in the Membership Committee itself, which they gave notice they might do.

⁹ L'Union soviétique opposa son veto à l'application de la Corée, au Conseil de sécurité, le 5 avril. The Soviet Union vetoed Korea's application in the Security Council on April 5.

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SECOND PART OF THE THIRD SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, APRIL 5, 1949

The Canadian Delegation to the Second Part of the Third Session of the General Assembly will be guided in general by the memorandum approved by Cabinet on September 8, 1948, which outlined the general policy to be followed at the Third Session.¹⁰ The Delegation will also be guided by the necessity of keeping the session as short as possible and by the necessity of curtailing any further expenditures in view of the fact that the proposed expenditure for 1949 is already set at thirty-eight million dollars, which is a substantial increase over the amounts expended in previous years. The most important items on the agenda of the April session are listed below with the Canadian policy recommended in each case.¹¹

(1) The Spanish Question

If any move is made to alter the 1946 resolution of the General Assembly concerning Franco Spain, the Canadian Delegation should support any amendment to that resolution which would permit Spain to participate in certain United Nations activities if members of the United Nations derive practical advantage from having Spain committed to membership in those particular agencies. The Delegation should abstain from voting on the question of whether or not Ambassadors and Ministers should be sent to Madrid on the grounds that we have never exchanged diplomatic representation with Spain and that we do not now intend to do so. The Delegation should not support any move to reaffirm all of the 1946 resolution and should oppose any recommendation to the Security Council to take action against the Franco regime. The Delegation should, however, support that part of the 1946 resolution which condemned the Franco regime and called for the establishment in Spain of a government deriving its authority from the consent of the governed and committed to respect fundamental freedoms.

(2) Disposal of Former Italian Colonies

Canada has stated that it regards the whole matter of Italian colonies as coming under the trusteeship provisions of the United Nations Charter, that the present wishes and long term needs of the inhabitants must constitute the paramount consideration in determining the future of each colony and that, if these colonies are not to become independent or to be willingly incorporated in neighbouring territories, they should be placed under international trusteeship. The Canadian Delegation should support the placing of Italian Somaliland under Italian trusteeship and the placing of Cyrenaica under United Kingdom trusteeship with its western boundary moved to include certain settlements of the Senussi. The Delegation should also support the United States-United Kingdom proposal that Ethiopia be given four Eritrean provinces, with the Moslem provinces reserved for disposal at a later date. It will support this arrangement, however, only on the understanding that appropriate arrangements will be made for the protection of minorities in that portion of Eritrea to be included in Ethiopia. With respect to Tripolitania, the Canadian Delegation will support postponement of a decision on the understanding that the United Kingdom will be relieved from certain Hague Convention restrictions if its administration is to be prolonged. If the decision is not postponed, the Delegation will seek instructions on whatever solution is proposed. A postponement of a decision on the Fezza'n should be supported since it is not yet clear what are the wishes of the inhabitants.

(3) Freedom of Information

The General Assembly will consider three draft conventions dealing with the freest possible movement of foreign correspondents and free access to news, an international right of correction of false or distorted reports and a definition of basic freedoms of information. In accordance with the policy of the Canadian Delegation at the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, the Delegation to the General Assembly will give general support to these conventions while making reservations on any provisions which might open the way to peacetime censorship of news.

(4) Measures to Economize the Time of the General Assembly

The Canadian Delegation should support immediate consideration of this matter by the present Ad Hoc Political Committee. The Delegation should also support proposals which the United States or the United Kingdom may make for the application in future of a rigorous closure system to debates in the Assembly and its Committees. If these two countries will give support, the Canadian Delegation should propose that the April Session itself be limited to five weeks and that the General Committee should put into effect immediately such measures as may be needed to ensure that the Session closes on schedule.

(5) Admission of Israel to Membership in the United Nations

The Canadian Delegation will vote for the admission of Israel unless the Canadian Government feels at the time this matter is considered by the General Assembly that the situation in Palestine and the progress of peace talks at Rhodes does not warrant the entry of Israel into the United Nations.

(6) Religious persecution in Eastern Europe

The Canadian Delegation should participate in the debate on this matter, by a statement reiterating Canada's abhorrence of this persecution and drawing attention to the protests made in conjunction with the United Kingdom and the United States. The Delegation should support any motion recommending that the matter be referred to the signatories of the Peace Treaties with Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria for action appropriate under the provisions of the Treaties with a request that action taken be reported to the General Assembly in September. If the Assembly decides not to refer this matter to the signatories of the Peace Treaties, the Canadian Delegation should support any general resolution condemning the actions of these countries or any resolution withdrawing these countries from the list of applicants for membership in the United Nations which the Security Council has been asked to reconsider; it should also in this event support a motion to set up a United Nations commission of enquiry.

(7) Treatment of Indians in South Africa

This question has been a major issue at previous sessions of the Assembly. At present the Department of External Affairs is waiting for further information on the attitude the parties to the dispute may adopt at the forthcoming session. When the situation is clarified, it may be necessary to propose some changes in the instructions which were issued before the session in Paris.

Memorandum for Secretary of State for External Affairs

INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION, APRIL SESSION GENERAL ASSEMBLY

I am attaching for your consideration a draft memorandum to Cabinet concerning the instructions to be given to the Canadian Delegation to the April Session of the General Assembly on seven major items. If you approve, this memorandum will be placed on the Cabinet agenda Thursday, March 31.

Listed below are other matters on the agenda of the April Session which you may not wish to bring before Cabinet. I would appreciate knowing whether you approve the action to be taken by the Delegation which is suggested in each case.

(1) Study of methods for the promotion of international Co-operation

In accordance with previous Canadian approval, expressed both in the Interim Committee and at the Paris session of the Assembly, the Delegation should continue to support the report of the Interim Committee on this subject.¹²

(2) United Nations Guard

The Delegation will be guided by Cabinet's instructions on this subject dated October 20, 1948. The Delegation was instructed to support the Secretary-General's proposal provided that not more than one thousand men were to be recruited, that the cost was not to exceed $5,000 per man, that the Guard was to be a security police and not a combatant force, and that in recruiting men due consideration was to be given both to efficient operation and to equitable geographic distribution. The Chiefs of Staff Committee and the Commissioner of the R.C.M.P. are at present considering certain points about the organization of the Guard which were recently raised by the Department of Finance. If any recommendation for substantial change in our policy is made, new instructions for the Delegation will be sought.¹³

(3) *Problem of voting in the Security Council*¹⁴

The Delegation should maintain in Plenary session the attitude on this question already expressed in the Ad Hoc Political Committee at the Paris session.

(4) Violation by the U.S.S.R. of fundamental human rights, traditional diplomatic practices, and other principles of the Charter

The Delegation should maintain its support in Plenary session of the resolution put forward by the Sixth Committee and supported by the Canadian Delegation in that Committee in Paris.

(5) Sub-commission to study the social problems of the aboriginal populations of the American Continent

The Delegation should oppose the Bolivian proposal to add another Sub-commission to the Economic and Social Council on the grounds that there are enough sub-commissions, that the work done by these bodies has not been overly encouraging, that expenditure for this item cannot be justified, and that Canada does not think that the work of the proposed sub-commission could be of any great use in connection with the aboriginal problems in Canada.

(6) Economic and Social Council report, refugees and displaced persons

There will be considered under this heading a number of items already debated at the Seventh session of the Economic and Social Council along with the reports of certain specialized agencies. The Delegation should be guided by the Canadian attitude as stated in that session of the Economic and Social Council, by the reports of the Canadian Delegations to the various specialized agencies and by our previously expressed support of the work of the International Refugee Organization, and of the principles on which that Organization bases its program for refugees and displaced persons.

(7) Russian and Chinese as working languages of the General Assembly

The Delegation should oppose these proposals in accordance with its opposition to the adoption of Spanish as a working language on the grounds that they entail considerable expenditure and that they would complicate and slow down administrative procedures.

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

In the course of the second part of the Third Session of the General Assembly, which commenced on 5 April and concluded on 18 May, the events which occurred have been reported by the delegation from day to day. At the conclusion of the session I have thought it useful to offer comments on some of the more important trends which have been observed by the delegation, and, in particular, those trends which will be of continuing concern to Canada when the Assembly reconvenes for the fourth regular session next fall.

2. The most important political development which took place during the period of the Assembly was the lifting of the Berlin blockade. As a result of a question submitted casually by Jessup, the United States representative, to Malik, the Soviet representative at Lake Success, an exchange of views was started which led to agreement resulting in the lifting of the blockade and a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers on the whole question of Germany. This event, for which the Assembly cannot indeed properly claim any credit, illustrated, however, in a convincing manner the usefulness of the United Nations (and, particularly, of the Assembly) as a meeting ground in which leading political representatives can still meet both formally and informally and continue efforts to reach a modus vivendi between the communist and non-communist areas into which the world is now divided.

3. I must confess, however, that no change in the outlook of the Soviet Government or its satellites was apparent during the Assembly meetings. The debates were marked with the same vituperation and recrimination on the part of the communist spokesmen. Familiar accusations of warmongering and imperialism were heard, particularly in connection with the discussions on the voting procedures of the Security Council, into which the communist representatives injected the question of the North Atlantic Treaty. On most of the issues the familiar voting pattern was observed: six delegations in opposition. Examples of this were the problem of voting in the Security Council, the United Nations Guard, the question of religious persecutions in Bulgaria and Hungary, the postponement of the Indonesian question, and the approval of the Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction. In each of these cases, and despite the objections of the communist delegations, the Assembly was able to take decisions by a large majority. While in the case of most of the issues which came before the Assembly the Soviet bloc was found in its customary position of being the minority, this was certainly not the case on the admission of Israel in which the Soviet bloc voted with the majority. The Soviet position was shared by a substantial number of delegations when the Assembly declined to approve the resolution submitted by the Latin American states regarding diplomatic relations with Spain. The vote in this case was 26 in favour, 15 against, including the Soviet bloc, and 16 abstentions. Their position in regard to the Italian colonies also found substantial support among the Middle East and Eastern countries, but with this I shall deal later.

4. As in previous sessions, the communists used the Assembly as a sounding board for their propaganda. I must in this connection particularly refer to the attacks of the Polish representatives upon Canada with reference to the Polish art collection, and also in regard to the alleged mistreatment of displaced persons in Canada. The Canadian Delegation made replies in rebuttal to both charges in terms which have already been communicated to you. It should be noted, however, that Poland in this session assumed a leading role among the Eastern European states in propaganda attacks against what was termed the "Anglo-American bloc". The principal spokesman of the Poles was Katz-Suchy, an able though unscrupulous master of the dialectic. These attacks were delivered without any prior warning and the delegation found it necessary to be constantly prepared to deal with them. In the case of the Polish charges in regard to the art collection, it may be expected that, unless some progress is made towards settlement with the Polish authorities before the next regular session of the General Assembly, Katz-Suchy will return to the attack. In fact, the possibility cannot be excluded that the Polish Delegation will seek to have the matter formally put on the agenda of the General Assembly, claiming that this is an item falling within the general competence of the General Assembly under Articles 10 and 14 of the Charter. It should be observed that Katz-Suchy's statement in the plenary meeting of 28 April 1949 included the following words:

"In connection with that statement of the representative of Canada, I wish to state most emphatically that the representative of Poland quoted the problem of the Polish art treasures in Canada only as an example of a case which falls within the scope of Article 14 of the Charter, as a situation—and I am quoting from the Charter—regardless of origin, which deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations' and that it therefore could be discussed within the framework of the present subject under discussion."

5. The Polish charges that Canada was deriving unfair and improper benefits from the use of labour recruited from the ranks of refugees and displaced persons in Europe may also be repeated at the fourth regular session. The item "Discrimination practised by certain states against immigrating labour and in particular against labour recruited from the ranks of refugees", although very closely related to the Polish charges regarding refugees and displaced persons, was carried over as a separate item to the agenda of the fourth regular session and will almost certainly provide the occasion for renewed attacks against ourselves. One of the tactics which the Polish representatives employ is to quote articles from Canadian newspapers and to read what are alleged to be letters of complaints from individual displaced persons residing in Canada. It would therefore seem desirable for the Canadian Delegation to have on hand as much documentary evidence as possible which may be used effectively in rebuttal of the Polish charges. The material which has been supplied to the delegation on that point has been very useful, especially that which was forwarded under cover of your despatch no. 371 of 16 May.† In particular, letters from individual displaced persons or from organizations which represent them would be great use, provided that permission is given to quote such letters in debates here. The Polish technique appears to be a combination of mischief-making and a form of blackmail intended to put pressure on governments so attacked. No doubt both motives were involved in the Polish attacks upon Canada in connection with the Polish art collection. As a further instance of this kind of pressure diplomacy, one might cite the attempt at the last meeting of the General Assembly in this session of Katz-Suchy to introduce the case of Gerhart Eisler as an alleged instance of violation of fundamental human rights and freedoms and traditional practice of political asylum. No doubt more of this kind of thing will be heard at the next session.

6. During the past session it is noteworthy that the propaganda of the communist spokesmen was refuted again and again, and delegates were left with the impression that, despite the repeated and outspoken denunciations of the North Atlantic Pact, imperialism, warmongering, the Marshall plan, etc., as well as of other alleged misdeeds of the Western democracies, the communist bloc was on the defensive. This may, no doubt, be ascribed to the consolidation of the democracies which has taken place in the last few months through the North Atlantic Treaty, the West European Union and the Council of Europe, which have laid the foundations for a union of the North Atlantic communities strong enough to balance and resist communist power, at least in Europe.

7. The Soviets also suffered a notable set-back when the General Assembly adopted on 14 April 1949, by a vote of 43 in favour, 6 against (the Soviet bloc) and 2 abstentions, a resolution on voting procedure in the Security Council of considerable significance in the constitutional growth of the United Nations. The resolution as adopted:

(1) recommends to the members of the Security Council that a number of decisions (listed in the Annex to document A/792)† be deemed procedural;

(2) recommends to the permanent members of the Security Council that they seek agreement among themselves upon what possible decisions by the Security Council they might forbear to exercise the veto;

(3) recommends to the permanent members of the Security Council that they consult together and use moderation in the exercise of the rule of unanimity and to exercise that privilege only when they consider the question of vital importance;

(4) recommends to the members of the United Nations that, in agreements conferring functions upon the Security Council, such conditions of voting within that body be provided as would to the greatest extent feasible exclude the application of the rule of unanimity of the permanent members.

8. In making these recommendations, the General Assembly has, for the first time, put itself on record as being opposed to the abuse of the rule of unanimity, and as being in favour of the principle that the voting privilege granted to the permanent members of the Security Council should be exercised only within certain specific limitations. This decision, taken by such an overwhelming majority, cannot fail to be of outstanding importance in the developing jurisprudence of the United Nations.

9. In this connection, when the question of the admission of Israel was under discussion in the Ad Hoc Political Committee the representative of Pakistan, Sir Muhammed Zafrullah Khan, contested the right of the Security Council to make a recommendation on the admission of new members to the United Nations when that recommendation had been made without the affirmative vote of all the permanent members of the Council. In discussing the point raised by the representative of Pakistan a number of delegations were able to point to the General Assembly's recommendations on the problem of voting in the Security Council and in particular to paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Assembly's resolution of 14 April which bear directly upon the question of the admission of new members. You will recall that the Interim Committee recommended in its report to the General Assembly that any seven affirmative votes in the Security Council should be regarded as sufficient for the Security Council to adopt a recommendation on the admission of a new member, as well as on a number of other decisions listed in conclusion 2, part IV, of the reports of the Interim Committee, supplement no. 10. The General Assembly did not accept this particular recommendation in toto, but in the wording of paragraph 3(c) of its resolution of 14 April, the General Assembly reached a compromise which recognizes the existence of a middle position and gives support to the practice which has grown up in the Security Council that the abstention of a permanent member should not be considered as preventing the Security Council from reaching a decision. Paragraph 3(c) of the General Assembly resolution of 14 April, which reads: "(Recommends to the Permanent Members of the Security Council) if there is not unanimity to exercise the veto only when they consider the question of vital importance, taking into account the interest of the United Nations as a whole and to state upon what ground they consider this condition to be present" represents a compromise reached by the members of the Ad Hoc Political Committee in Paris in an endeavour to find a more elastic interpretation of the system of voting in the Security Council. Similarly, the recommendation contained in paragraph 2 of the same resolution urges the Permanent Members of the Security Council to seek agreement among themselves upon what possible decisions they might forbear to exercise their veto, when seven affirmative votes have already been cast in the Council and to give favourable consideration to the list of such decisions contained in conclusion 2, part IV, of the reports of the Interim Committee.

10. At the time the question of the admission of Israel was under discussion in the Security Council, the representative of the United Kingdom abstained when the matter was put to a vote. At the time he explained his vote was not to be considered as preventing a decision by the Security Council. The Security Council, in recommending Israel's admission to membership in the United Nations, had demonstrated their acceptance of this interpretation. The representative of Pakistan argued that paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter explicitly requires the concurring vote of the five permanent members in a decision affecting the admission of a new member. Voluntary abstention by one of the permanent members, he contended, constituted a negative vote and made the Security Council's recommendation invalid. Zafrullah Khan's statement was of interest in that it was the first occasion upon which the voluntary abstention of one of the permanent members of the Security Council has been used as an argument against the admission of a new member. Later, when the matter was under discussion in the plenary session, the representative of Pakistan repeated his arguments and the President of the General Assembly ruled on the preliminary question of whether the General Assembly was competent to question the right of the Security Council to make a recommendation. Dr. Evatt ruled that it was not within the competence of a body of the United Nations to question the basis upon which a recommendation was made by any other body of the United Nations. His ruling was not challenged.

11. Taken together, the discussion on the point raised by the representative of Pakistan and the discussion on the problem of voting in the Security Council mark an important stage in the constitutional development of the United Nations. The conclusions reached by the General Assembly, for instance, have given support to the practice of voluntary abstention as a necessary voting expedient in the Security Council. Full recognition was accorded to the practice of voluntary abstention at the 173rd meeting of the Security Council when the President made the following recommendation: "I think it is now jurisprudence in the Security Council—and the interpretation accepted for a long time—that an abstention is not considered a veto, and the concurring votes of the Permanent Members means the votes of the Permanent Members who participate in the voting, but those who abstain by their own intention are not considered to have cast a veto". This statement made by the President was not objected to by any of the members of the Security Council. By its recommendations, therefore, the General Assembly has thus for the first time recognized the validity of the practice which has grown up in the Security Council and which constitutes an important stage in the development of the voting procedure of that body.

12. I think in any comment on the work of this Assembly in connection with the problem of voting in the Security Council it should be noted that while the Ad Hoc Political Committee in Paris rejected a proposal submitted by the representative of the Argentine to call a general conference under Article 109 of the Charter for the purpose of reviewing the Charter, the Argentine and other countries who favour outright revision of the Charter may re-submit their proposal if the recommendations of the General Assembly are not acted upon by the Security Council. It seems unlikely that the Soviet Union will agree at this stage to accept most of the recommendations made by the General Assembly. It is possible, however, that the Soviet Union may agree to accept certain of the recommendations which would have the effect of simplifying the voting procedures of the Security Council. They might, for instance, agree to recognize as procedural certain of the decisions listed in the Annex to the General Assembly's resolution of 14 April. It seems unlikely, however, that in most matters they will agree to forbear to use their voting privilege if that seems to be against the interests of the Soviet Union. For this reason, therefore, I think it is not unlikely that the Argentine and other countries who seek revision of the Charter will continue to press for the calling of a general conference.

13. Although I have not undertaken this despatch to deal with specific events, I cannot but fail to register the disappointment of the delegation in the inability of the General Assembly at this session to reach any decision on the disposition of the Italian Colonies. The difficulties, of course, of this thorny question were apparent from the start. The fact that the Foreign Ministers had failed to find a solution and had turned it over to their deputies, who even after investigating parties had surveyed the territories had failed to reach any conclusions, had prepared delegations for a difficult and complicated discussion. The report of this investigation, moreover, had failed to indicate any clear or unanimous conclusion. The resulting confusion as to the facts as well as the conflicts of interest showed up very clearly in the Assembly debates. Witnesses from respective territories, called to the Political Committee to state their views, tended to further complicate the issues by submitting generally conflicting evidence. In the result the Assembly, after a series of votes, both in Committee and in the Assembly, on proposed solutions for each of the territories, had to postpone its decision until the next session on account of the failure to obtain a two-thirds majority for the proposal relating to the trusteeship arrangements for Tripolitania. This development may be ascribed to several reasons. In the first place, there was little enthusiasm among the delegations for the Bevin/Sforza agreement, which came as a surprise at the time when the Political Committee had undertaken, through a drafting sub-committee, to co-ordinate the various proposals which had been put forward. It was felt, with some justification, that as the powers directly interested had failed to reach agreement and for that reason had submitted the question to decision by the General Assembly, it was not appropriate at the moment, when the Assembly was about to reach a decision, to submit what was represented as an agreement which had been made outside the United Nations between two of the powers most directly interested for acceptance by the General Assembly.

14. An important factor contributing to the difficulties of the General Assembly in reaching a decision on an objective basis regarding Italian Colonies was the strength of the Latin-American bloc and its efforts to secure a decision from the Assembly favouring the interests of Italy. Controlling nineteen or twenty votes, the bloc made it apparent from the start that no proposal which did not sufficiently meet the desiderata of the Italian Government would be allowed to go through the Assembly. Frequent corridor consultations and meetings between the Latin-American bloc created the impression among other delegations of helplessness to attempt to work out any solution on a more objective basis. It is indeed ironical that Haiti, one of the members of the bloc, should have been one of the two states which, by changing their vote on the crucial paragraph relating to Tripolitania from an abstention in Committee to a negative vote in the Plenary Meeting, was responsible for the failure of this paragraph to secure the necessary two-thirds majority. The scene of confusion which followed the rejection of the paragraph on Tripolitania did little, to say the least, to increase the prestige and authority of the United Nations. The Argentinian representative declared in the Assembly, without mincing words, that, as the whole resolution had been accepted by the Latin-American states as a compromise only because of the provision which would allow Italy to have the trusteeship in Tripolitania in 1951, with the rejection of this clause, the Latin-American bloc should vote against the resolution as a whole. I am bound to say that the impression left with me was that the bloc system on this occasion went beyond the limits of legitimate consultation between delegations sharing common interests, and placed the United Nations in a position of frustration and inability to take a decision on one of the most important issues which have yet come before the Assembly. It is to be hoped, and it well may be, that the next session will see some reaction in condemnation of this barefaced attempt at pressure.

15. The intervention of members of the Latin bloc in a less important issue, namely the decision of the Assembly to defer consideration of the proposal to add Russian and Chinese to the working languages of the General Assembly, served as another instance of the power of the bloc vote used with an insufficient sense of responsibility. The Fifth Committee, after a full debate on this question, had submitted a negative recommendation to the General Assembly. The Soviet representative threw out the suggestion in the plenary meeting that the Assembly might defer a decision in the interests of international harmony. This suggestion was promptly taken up by the Polish representative. Unexpectedly this idea was given enthusiastic support by the representative of Uruguay. As a result, quite a number of the Latin-American states despite their previous vote in Committee voted in favour of deferment, thus setting at naught the conclusions of the Committee.

16. The experience of the recent Assembly session emphasizes the importance of pressing for necessary revisions in the Rules of Procedure of the General Assembly, and also of a more strict enforcement of the present rules. The question of improving the Rules of Procedure, in order to economize the time of the Assembly, was revived at this session by the three Scandinavian delegations and a special committee was established (upon which Canada is represented), by a decision of the General Assembly to "consider methods and procedures which would enable the General Assembly and its committees to discharge their functions more effectively and expeditiously". One of the revisions which this session has shown is urgently required is a revision of Rule 59 which would make it the normal practice that a report of a Main Committee, which had been adopted by a substantial majority, would not be debated again in the plenary meetings of the General Assembly. It was our experience, in the recent session of the Assembly, that more time was unprofitably consumed by the repetition of arguments, particularly by the delegations of the Soviet group, in plenary meetings on the reports of the Main Committees than in any other manner. In addition to the wastage of time caused by this "double debate", the reopening of committee reports in this manner and the re-introduction of resolutions defeated in Committee tended to decrease the authority and effectiveness of the work of the committees, which would have a greater sense of responsibility and accomplishment if it were known in advance that their reports would not normally be debated again in the plenary meetings. A slight revision of Rule 59 should accomplish this purpose but such a revision will certainly be opposed by the Soviet bloc and by other delegations which favour unrestricted debate in the plenary meetings.

17. I realize the hazards of attempting to draw conclusions regarding the trends to be observed during the Second Part of the Third Regular Session of the General Assembly, because of the limited scope and purposes of this meeting. It is all the more difficult to draw conclusions from the varied experiences crowded within the space of six weeks, for the reason that meetings of the General Assembly, perhaps more than any other international conference, tend to show so much more activity in proportion to the results actually achieved. Indeed, one conclusion which must be drawn is that the very necessity of holding a regular session of the General Assembly in two parts, lasting altogether more than four months, points to the urgent need for reform of the procedures of the General Assembly so that more might be achieved with less effort and in less time. As I have indicated, much time and effort might be conserved by cutting out repetitious and vexatious arguments in plenary meetings which have been more than amply traversed in committee.

18. On the other hand, the United Nations once again proved its usefulness as a meeting ground, at which leading political figures of the world can come together and can in this way initiate, as in the case of the Berlin issue, perhaps in a casual manner the peaceful settlement of outstanding differences. The General Assembly moreover showed its importance once again as the greatest forum for the expression of public opinion on an international scale, in the discussion of such matters as the religious persecutions in Eastern Europe and of the difficult issue involved in the debates on Freedom of Information. But, above all, so long as the United Nations can demonstrate its capacity to adapt itself to changing circumstances, and can prove its capacity to reform, it will be possible to regard the future prospects of the organization with confidence. In the session which has just ended, I have pointed to the interesting procedural and constitutional reforms which have been initiated, and it will be worth watching to see what, if any, developments result in the future. It is therefore with regret that I have to close by referring again to the hindering effect on the progressive development of the organization consequent on the obstructive attitude of the communist minority which sought at this session, as in previous sessions, to exploit the facilities of the organization for purposes of propaganda, seeking to divide and to confuse the democratic nations. I was most struck by the patience and forbearance of the majority of the delegates when exposed to this treatment. It is a measure of the vitality of the United Nations that despite this hindrance the democratic nations have shown a capacity for cohesion and a will to continue to work out measures designed to bring about cooperation in the settlement of international disputes and for the preservation of peace and security.

19. This despatch represents a consolidation of the observations made by the individual members of the Permanent Delegation to the United Nations, notably Mr. Ignatieff, Mr. Starnes, Mr. Carter and Mr. Grande.

I have, etc.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, July 8, 1949

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to your most interesting despatch No. 221 of June 1 commenting on some of the more important trends which were observed by the Delegation during the second part of the third session of the General Assembly.

2. I entirely agree with your conclusions regarding the propaganda attacks on Canada launched by the Polish representative. It appears very likely that we shall see a repetition of such attacks in the fourth regular session and not at all unlikely that the question of the Polish art collections will appear on the agenda as a specific item. Moreover, the item "Discrimination practised by certain states against immigrating labour and in particular against labour recruited from the ranks of refugees", will almost certainly provide Katz-Suchy with causes for renewed recriminations regarding our treatment of displaced persons. We are keeping both these subjects in mind in preparing the Commentary for the next Assembly and we shall make every effort to secure documentary evidence in rebuttal of the Polish charges, including letters from displaced persons residing in Canada. As you know, many letters of this sort were received during the last session when the question was raised in the Press.

3. I have noted with interest your comments on the constitutional questions raised regarding the problem of voting in the Security Council and the admission of Israel to membership. It may well be that in the debate in the Security Council last month regarding the admission of new members, Dr. Arce felt that, in the light of this recent constitutional development at the United Nations, other members might be more receptive to his legalistic arguments to the effect that the affirmative vote of any seven members of the Council was sufficient to secure a positive recommendation for membership under article 27 of the Charter. This is further evidence to suggest that the Argentine Delegation is trying to effect a revision of the Charter by less drastic means than their proposal put forward at the Paris Assembly. However, it does not necessarily preclude the possibility of the Argentine, and other countries who desire a revision of the Charter, continuing their pressure for the calling of a general conference.

4. Regarding the disposition of the Italian Colonies, I share the disappointment of the Delegation that the General Assembly, at the April session, failed to reach a decision. Even though the Bevin-Sforza compromise may have been in many respects unpalatable, the situation with regard to the African Colonies certainly called for an early solution. That the Assembly failed to reach a settlement does not enhance its position in public opinion.

5. Recently the United Kingdom authorities have circulated an informal appreciation from their delegation of the voting in the Assembly on the Italian Colonies question. The interesting conclusion is expressed that the vote on the Bevin-Sforza proposal was probably the most favourable that could have been obtained and that it is now doubtful whether it could ever be reached again because of the impossibility of exerting the same pressure brought to bear in the April session upon unwilling delegations. It seems unlikely that a settlement will be reached at the autumn Assembly. If the matter is to be deferred for any length of time, however, it would appear essential that member states be kept informed, on a continuing basis, of developments in the Colonies. In this regard perhaps the Assembly may feel disposed to the setting up of some sort of standing commission which could collect and collate information about the Colonies for the benefit of member governments.

6. The irresponsible "bloc tactics" of the Latin American states were certainly exhibited at their worst during the April Assembly. We can only hope that the failure of such manoeuvres as regards the question of the Italian Colonies may shame some of the Latin American states into better ways. It is most regrettable that this same combination of votes succeeded in re-opening a consideration of the proposal to make Russian and Chinese working languages of the Assembly, a question which was thoroughly debated and definitively disposed of by the Fifth Committee. It is to be hoped that the Special Committee on Methods and Procedures, now in session, will come up with some recommendation which will prevent, or at least control, the re-opening of debate in plenary session of questions which have been decided by a substantial majority in committee. At the moment, however, it would appear that the majority of the members of the Special Committee are unwilling to take steps to restrict debate, particularly in the plenary meetings.

7. I agree entirely with your view that the need for reform in the procedures of the General Assembly has been demonstrated in a most striking manner by the course of events in both the first and second parts of the Third Regular Session. While those of us who have had experience in United Nations matters can appreciate the importance of the General Assembly as a forum for the expression of public opinion on an international scale and as a meeting place for the leading political representatives of the states of the world, I am wondering whether these two contributions to the cause of world peace and understanding can outweigh in the public mind the apparent lack of positive achievement upon the part of the General Assembly—a situation which is not enhanced by what you describe as "repetitious and vexatious arguments" voiced ad nauseam at every session.

8. I should like to say how much I have enjoyed reading your despatch under reference. Comprehensive reports of this calibre are most useful in assisting us to assess past and future developments at the United Nations.

I have, etc.

[Ottawa], September 12, 1949

FOURTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS, SEPTEMBER, 1949—DRAFT OF STATEMENT FOR THE GUIDANCE OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

General

1. The fundamental principle which should guide the Delegation is the belief that, in spite of its limitations, the United Nations is the best available instrument for development of a system of international collaboration and, eventually, of collective security on a basis of universal participation. It is particularly important at this time to make clear that, although the Canadian Government believes that the North Atlantic Alliance is essential to security and in no way incompatible with the United Nations Charter, Canada has no intention of doing anything to weaken the United Nations. On the contrary, the Canadian Government wishes to strengthen the United Nations by (a) encouraging it to continue the use of procedures of conciliation with which it has already had considerable success, (b) discouraging the acceptance by the United Nations of tasks which are beyond its present competence, (c) restoring the prestige of the Assembly by improving its efficiency and by reducing the time devoted to propaganda attacks and counter-attacks, and (d) seeking to improve its methods within the framework of the present Charter rather than by risking its existence in futile efforts to alter the Charter at the present early stage of its experience.

Selection of Officers and Elections to Councils

2. In the selection of officers for the Assembly and of candidates for the Councils the Delegation should use its influence to secure the choice of competent persons and states giving primary consideration as a basis of selection to ability to make a serious contribution to the work of the United Nations, but making due allowances for the representation of geographical areas.

3. It is particularly necessary that states should be chosen for the Security Council on the basis of their ability to accept the responsibilities which are given to them. For this reason the Delegation should support India for the seat which has in the past been accorded to a Commonwealth country and which Canada will be vacating. For the Latin American seat, to replace Argentina, it is likely that the Latin American states will choose Ecuador. It would be unfortunate, however, if this area were to be represented by two weak states, Ecuador and Cuba, which was elected last year; and the Delegation should support any responsible move to secure the nomination of one of the larger states, Brazil, Mexico, or Chile. The Ukrainian S.S.R. will retire this year, and there may be a movement to transfer to a non-Soviet state the seat usually accorded to a Soviet satellite. The Delegation should support this movement only if it is backed by the United Kingdom and the United States and has a good prospect of succeeding, as a defeat would be harmful to the prestige of the Western powers. The Delegation should not, however, vote for Bielo-Russia since its election would constitute further international recognition of the fictitious independence of the constituent Soviet republics.

4. In view of the importance of the work being done by the Economic and Social Council, Canada should be a candidate for this Council.¹⁵ The Delegation should support the candidature of Pakistan. Support might also be given to Yugoslavia, if circumstances warrant, in view of the open conflict on economic matters between Yugoslavia and the Cominform countries.

Political and Security Questions

5. Reports of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine and of the United Nations Commissions for the Balkans will be presented. The Conciliation Commission is to make recommendations for a permanent international regime for the Jerusalem area and for the protection of holy places in all of Palestine. The Delegation should use its best efforts to ensure that the arrangements suggested should give adequate protection to the established rights and interests of all religious groups and preserve effectively the sacred nature of all holy places. Support should be given to any responsible proposals to continue in its present or an altered form the Balkan Commission and to continue the mediation efforts initiated during the third session of the Assembly. Support should also be given to the retention of the Korean Commission, with or without changes in its terms of reference, provided strong reasons for a different course are not made by the Commission itself or do not appear during the course of the Assembly.

6. The applications of fourteen states for admission to the United Nations are now outstanding. The non-Soviet states oppose the admission of five of these (Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Roumania, Outer Mongolia). The Soviet Union has vetoed the admission of the other nine (Austria, Ceylon, Finland, Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, Ireland, Italy, Korea, Portugal, Nepal). The Canadian Delegation should oppose a "horse trade" under which all fourteen states would be admitted, since Outer Mongolia is clearly not independent and we have joined in charges against the other four states of having violated their peace treaties or of refusing to cooperate with the U.N. Commission on the Balkans. If some or all of the Western candidates would accept non-voting participation in the work of the Assembly, the Canadian Delegation could support responsible proposals to grant this.

7. Two subjects dealt with in the spring meeting of the Third Session will again be on the agenda: the disposition of the Italian Colonies and the observance in Bulgaria and Hungary of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Delegation should be guided by the general instructions on these subjects approved in April. It should support any just agreement on the Italian Colonies arrived at by the parties principally concerned and which is likely to secure a sufficient majority to bring a satisfactory settlement. Support should be given to any general condemnation of the violation by Hungary, Bulgaria and Roumania of the guarantees in the peace treaties of human rights, but care should be taken to avoid irresponsible or impracticable actions which would do no more than create dangerous precedents for undue interference by the United Nations in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a state.

8. In the discussion of atomic energy and the control of conventional armaments the Delegation should seek to avoid a debate which would provide the Soviet Union with an opportunity for making propaganda and securing the support of countries disposed to a neutral attitude on these questions. While making clear that the Soviet Union has prevented agreement in the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments, the Delegation should show no reluctance to continue efforts to find a solution.

9. If, as seems probable, the question of China is raised in the Assembly, the Delegation should support condemnation of Soviet interference in that country provided adequate evidence is produced to support the charges, but it should avoid any commitment to withhold recognition from the Communist regime or to give material support to the Nationalists.

Constitutional Questions

10. The Delegation should favour the continuation of the Interim Committee for an indefinite period and should seek to strengthen it by giving it useful work to do. It should also support the recommendations of the Special Committee on Procedures on which Canada was represented and any further sensible proposals which may be proposed to expedite the work of the Assembly and it should seek to have as many of these as possible adopted at the forthcoming session. The Canadian Government considers it important that the annual regular session of the Assembly should not last for more than two months. The proposals of the Secretary-General for a United Nations Field Service which represent a modification of a previous more extensive plan for a United Nations Guard, should be approved after careful scrutiny in Committee to see if improvements are necessary.

Financial Questions

11. The Delegation should, as in previous years, encourage the efficient and economical administration of the United Nations, scrutinize the budget in order to limit expenditure, and oppose the adoption of proposals which would needlessly increase the costs of operation. It should try to secure a reconsideration of the allocation of contributions to states which, because of post-war dislocation, received low assessments, provided that a new allocation is not likely to result in a higher assessment for Canada. It should oppose any further reduction this year of the assessment of the United States and any increase in that of Canada.

Economic and Social Questions

12. The principal economic subject will be the proposals approved by the Economic and Social Council for the economic development of underdeveloped countries. The Delegation should examine these proposals carefully to make certain that they are efficient and practical, and it should seek further instructions before voting for any proposal which would imply a commitment by Canadians to contribute to the scheme. In the discussions on this subject and in the general consideration of the work of the functional agencies the Delegation should support any moves for the better coordination of the agencies, provided that schemes for coordination do not permit those countries which are not members of the agencies to secure indirect influence over their operation.

13. In discussing the convention on freedom of information the Delegation should be guided by the general instructions to the Delegation at the spring meeting of the Third Session. It should agree to a proposal to abandon the convention on freedom of information in favour of the insertion of a section on this subject in the draft Covenant of Human Rights, if, as is expected, this is proposed by the United States and supported by the United Kingdom and other respectable states.

14. The Delegation should firmly and factually refute the charges which the Communist states are expected to make of alleged discriminations practised by Canada and other states against immigrating labour, and should defend the work of the International Refugee Organization.

15. As the Assembly proceeds, questions will arise in regard both to subjects mentioned in this Memorandum and others on the agenda, concerning which the Delegation will require guidance. Frequent communication should be maintained with Ottawa, and, whenever possible, the Government should be acquainted with all proposals placed before the Assembly and with the action the Delegation proposes to take.¹⁶

Following for Wrong from Pearson.

Since General McNaughton, in his capacity as President of the Security Council this month, must attempt to conciliate the opinions of the Security Council members on problems before the Security Council, notably Indonesia¹⁷ and Palestine, I should be grateful for any information you can send us after informal conversation with the State Department on the line the United States is likely to take to reconcile what appears to us to be its somewhat divergent policies on the questions of Indonesia and Palestine. In my immediately following two telegrams, repeating No. 896† of December 29 and No. 898† of December 30, from Paris you will note Ritchie's comments on the United States attitude toward these two questions. The text of the Acting Mediator's report of December 25 to which telegram 896 refers was published in the New York Times of December 28.

The apparent inconsistency in U.S. policy which is of particular concern to us has arisen from the United States abstention in the Security Council vote of December 29 calling for an immediate cease fire in Southern Palestine and, on the other hand, the strong support given by the U.S. to the resolution before the Security Council on Indonesia. Those governments—including our own—who, subject to their own determination of what is wise and right, and their duty to their own people, wish to give general support to U.S. policy, find it difficult to do so when that policy is so inconsistent as it appears to be when applied to Palestine and Indonesia.

Rusk told Stone yesterday that at the present time the State Department did not, repeat not, wish to concert a plan for settlement with the British and present it to the parties for the following reasons:

(a) They want to give the conciliators a chance. Keenan (the United States member) has very strong instructions to back up the Security Council resolution of December 29th, (Rusk did not volunteer and Stone did not ask for an explanation of the United States abstention), and to work for a peaceful settlement.

(b) They question the propriety of concerting a plan in view of the Assembly's rejection of previous proposals and its expressed preference for "good old fashioned" conciliation. Should conciliation break down they would then be prepared to concert with the British a specific plan to put up to the parties.

(c) In addition to the efforts about to be made by the conciliators, talks are now going on with some indication that some progress is being made between Israel and Egypt and Israel and Transjordan. The State Department want to give these more time. (Talks between Israel and Lebanon have broken down, but it is hoped will be renewed.)

Rusk on the whole was optimistic. He said that he thought that the present situation, in spite of the fighting (which is on a very small scale) offered more hope for a settlement than at any time during the past two years.

The United States has been very active diplomatically with a view to encouraging negotiations, to keeping things on an even keel, to restrict and eventually to end the fighting. To these ends they had made strong representations—so strong last week in the matter of the Israel "invasion" of Egypt that they were surprised that there had not resulted from it a "buzzing of Zionist hornets around their heads".

In view of what is taking place in various fields now and the real chances of success which these activities seem to offer, Rusk hoped very much that the Palestine matter would not flare up violently in the Security Council tomorrow. He would much prefer a couple of weeks of comparative calm during which present events could work out their course.

Franks saw Lovett yesterday afternoon (reference your EX-23† transmitting to me F.O. 84 to United Kingdom Embassy here) and Rusk said that this was the line which the Under Secretary "was supposed" to take. While Stone was with him he was not able, however, to confirm that the Under Secretary had, in fact, taken this line. I can confirm this morning that he did. My immediately following most immediate teletype contains the text of Franks' reply to F.O. 84, reporting his conversation.

I should add that Rusk impressed upon Stone the high desirability of not letting it be known to anyone that he had spoken to us so frankly.¹⁸ Ends.

Dear Sir Alexander [Clutterbuck],

Thank you for your notes of 5th January† with the message from the United Kingdom Government about Jewish forces on the Egypt-Palestine border and the personal telegram to me from Mr. Bevin giving the text of a personal message he received from King Ibn Saud. Would you please tell Mr. Bevin that we have been watching here with anxiety recent developments in the Negev and on the Egyptian border and that we have noted with relief that the intervention of the United Kingdom Government with the United States Government in this matter seems already to have had some satisfactory results.

May I add that I agree entirely with the position taken by Mr. Bevin in his instructions to the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington that the time has come for the United States and United Kingdom Governments to reach firm agreement on lines already discussed and to use their joint influence insistently with both sides to stop fighting and accept definite frontier lines. I can assure you that we will do what we can to support action of this kind either in the Security Council, or by exercising any influence that we may possess in Washington. We remain, however, very conscious of the unwisdom and possible danger of the Security Council passing resolutions on this matter which cannot be, and indeed are not meant to be, put into effect to the extent required to achieve the purpose desired. The inconsistency, as it seems to us, between United States positions in regard to the Security Council's resolutions designed to stop the fighting in Indonesia and in Palestine reinforces our anxiety in this regard.

Yours sincerely,

NOTES FOR CABINET MEETING: PALESTINE

Progress in implementing the Security Council's Resolution of December 29

For several days after this resolution was adopted considerable difficulty was foreseen in securing the implementation of its three provisions—an immediate cease-fire, restoration of facilities to enable the United Nations truce observers to do their work (these facilities had been suspended by Israeli authorities on December 21), and withdrawal of Israeli forces to provisional truce lines established on November 13 by the United Nations Mediator in compliance with the Security Council's resolution of November 4.

Instead of withdrawing to the provisional truce lines Israeli forces had driven southward through Arab territory in the latter part of December and had invaded Egypt. On January 1 the Foreign Ministry of Israel released a statement defending the policy of the Government and stating that it "found itself constrained to resume its freedom of action" in order to stabilize Israel's security and put an end once and for all to "an intolerable situation". The latter phrase is a reference to the fact that Egyptian troops were still on Palestinian soil although since mid-October they had been confined to areas of Palestine which the United Nations Assembly had originally planned to allow the Arabs to retain.

On January 4 Egypt took the initiative in accepting the Security Council's latest cease-fire order and offered to enter into direct negotiations with Israel under United Nations chairmanship to implement the Security Council's earlier resolutions of November 4 and 16 dealing with truce and armistice arrangements respectively. With the aid of the Chief of the United Nations Observers' staff the agreement of Israel was obtained to this plan. The cease-fire went into effect on January 7 and on the same day Israeli representatives assured United Nations observers that the usual facilities would be provided to enable them to function as they did before the recent Israeli drive began in December 22. Thus when the Security Council's committee of seven met on January 7 there was nothing for it to do but to listen to conciliatory statements and to a report from the Acting Mediator on plans for an early conference between representatives of Egypt and Israel at Rhodes under his own chairmanship. United Kingdom and Egyptian members to the committee of seven felt that another meeting of the committee should be called in ten days since Israeli forces had not yet actually withdrawn to the truce lines established on November 13. It was arranged, however, that the committee should not meet again until a session was requested by the Acting Mediator, any member of the committee or by the chairman.

Egyptian frontier incident and its consequences

The incursion of Israeli forces into Egypt in the last week of December and retaliatory Egyptian air raids led the United States to make representations to Israel and Egypt at the year-end in which the danger of a wider extension of the conflict was pointed out to both. The Israeli government replied, according to a State Department release of January 4, that its forces had been recalled from Egypt and that no Israeli troops remained on Egyptian soil. The United Kingdom asserted, however, that Israeli forces were still being maintained in positions on Egyptian territory. R.A.F. aircraft from the Canal zone therefore continued to carry out reconnaissance flights, pilots being strictly ordered not to cross the Palestinian border. On January 7 five of these aircraft were shot down over Egyptian territory. An official United Kingdom protest directed to the Jewish authorities in Tel Aviv was not accepted on the ground that it was not addressed properly to the Provisional Government of Israel. The Acting Mediator ordered United Nations truce observers to make an impartial investigation of the incident since Israeli forces had claimed that the aircraft were supposed to be Egyptian, that they had flown over Palestinian territory and that some of them had attacked Israeli positions.

The United Kingdom Government has already made its position clear. Throughout 1948 it has supported the United Nations truce arrangements in Palestine. It has consequently refrained from supplying arms to Palestine or neighbouring Arab states and from sending fighting personnel to the area. Its observance of the truce resolutions has forced the United Kingdom to leave unfulfilled certain contracts into which it had entered in fulfilment of existing treaties with Arab states. While the United Kingdom itself has adhered faithfully to the requirements of the Security Council's truce resolutions, Israel has imported arms freely from Czechoslovakia and clandestinely from elsewhere. It has built up a navy, an air force and the armed strength of its ground forces during the truce period. Since mid-October it has conducted campaigns in southern Palestine in direct defiance of successive resolutions of the Security Council and its armed forces have made incursions into both Transjordan and Egypt. Since continued disregard of Security Council resolutions by Israel and a continued failure by the Security Council to take vigorous action may easily result in a sudden extension of the Palestine conflict which might bring chaotic conditions to the Middle East and invite a general catastrophe, the United Kingdom Government has therefore sent troops to the port of Aqaba in Transjordan and the Air Ministry has ordered United Kingdom aircraft to regard as hostile any Jewish aircraft encountered over Egyptian territory.

Israeli representatives have threatened to accuse the United Kingdom before the Security Council of having repudiated the Security Council's truce orders by the reconnaissance flights of its aircraft in Egypt, by despatching troops to Aqaba, and by building up the air strength of Transjordan. It has made sensational charges that the United Kingdom Government has been turning large amounts of military equipment over to the Egyptian and Transjordanian governments. These charges are emphatically denied by the United Kingdom.

It is hoped that the impartial enquiry into the Egyptian frontier incident which has been ordered by the Acting Mediator and talks which are now going on between United States and the United Kingdom and further representations which may be made to Israel by the United States may have the effect of reducing the tension in the Middle East. The Secretary General of the United Nations is very anxious that no opportunity should be lost to create an atmosphere conducive to the success of the negotiations about to take place at Rhodes.

Editorial comment in Israeli newspapers

The reaction in Israel to the reported withdrawal of all Israeli forces from Egypt was varied. Even a middle-of-the-road newspaper observed that it was a new phenomenon for a victorious army to retreat from occupied positions before a peace treaty was signed and that the evacuation of Egypt should not have taken place. Another suggested, on the contrary, that chances of peace were now great if certain sections of the Israeli public did not support too enthusiastically the British desire to continue hostilities.

Palestine.

1. A significant development on the Palestine situation at the United Nations yesterday, Tuesday, January 11th, was the publication of a letter from Eban as representative of the Provisional Government of Israel to the President of the Security Council, the text of which is given in my immediately following teletype.†

2. You will note that the letter expresses the concern of the Israel Government on what is alleged as "the menacing attitude adopted by the United Kingdom towards the State of Israel by recent military, naval, aerial and political measures."

3. The question arose as to whether a meeting of the Council should be called in consequence of this letter. No request for a meeting of the Council accompanied the letter. Eban arranged a press conference before I had received the letter. At this conference, in answer to a direct question Eban indicated that he had no instructions to request a meeting of the Council. I consulted my United States and United Kingdom and French colleagues immediately the letter was available and Jessup after consulting Washington said that the United States Government was most anxious that no meeting of the Council should be called on this matter at a time when armistice negotiations between Israel and Egypt were about to commence in Rhodes. Cadogan said that the United Kingdom Government would have no objection to a meeting and would welcome the opportunity of denying what he described as misstatements of fact in the Israel letter but indicated that he would like to have time to consult his Government and obtain the necessary data to enable him to reply to the charges made by Israel. The Secretary General intimated to me through Cordier that he would prefer not to have a meeting of the Council called as this might prejudice the result of the armistice negotiations by creating an unfavourable atmosphere. The Secretariat told me that they had already felt some concern about these talks as the Egyptian Government have nominated as their representatives officials of comparatively junior rank (it is understood that the Egyptian representatives consist of three Colonels and a legal adviser). Israel on the other hand has indicated that they are prepared to send Shertok if the Egyptian Foreign Minister would come to Rhodes. Parodi expressed the view that there was no urgency in the matter.

4. In the circumstances I felt that it would be wise to refrain from calling a meeting of the Council unless a specific request is addressed to me either by the representative of Israel or by a member of the Security Council, and in answer to press enquiries I made this position clear. My first inclination was to call a meeting of the Council without delay, as I thought a meeting might serve to help dispel the atmosphere of mutual recrimination which has developed between the Governments of the United Kingdom and Israel. My Chinese colleagues also held this view. I also thought that as President I might be open to criticism on the grounds that it might be represented that in failing to call a meeting of the Council I had appeared to be biased in favour of the United Kingdom in this matter. However, on balance the arguments that were put to me, particularly regarding the possible effect of a meeting of the Council on the Israel charges, at a time when the armistice talks were about to get under way at Rhodes, left me in no doubt that it would be better to wait until a specific request for a meeting were addressed to the President.

5. As regards the shooting down of the RAF planes and the possibility of a meeting of the Council on this question, I have now been informed by the United Kingdom delegation that they do not expect instructions "for the moment" from London requesting a meeting of the Council.

6. As President of the Council therefore, I propose on the matter of calling a meeting of the Council on Palestine to be governed by the recommendation contained in the report of the Committee of the Security Council on Palestine, a copy of which was referred to you under cover of form despatch No. 10 of January 8th, which stated that "the Committee was of the opinion that no further action by it was required at the moment and decided that the chairman should so report to the Security Council."

Eban, the Israeli representative, called upon me this morning, to explain the position of the Israeli delegation on their recent complaint against the United Kingdom Government. His original instructions had been to press for an investigation by the Security Council. However, following assurances from the United States Government and in order not to prejudice the outcome of the Rhodes armistice talks, they had acceded to the view that it would not be advantageous to request a meeting of the Security Council at this time. He expressed the hope that he had not put me in an embarrassing position, as President, by appearing to leave the initiative in calling a meeting to the President. He pointed out he had taken pains, however, to make it clear that he had not requested a meeting of the Security Council. Eban wished to learn my attitude as President of the Security Council.

2. I assured him that I concurred whole-heartedly in the view that nothing should be allowed to happen which might impede the successful outcome of the Rhodes talks. I referred to the Acting Mediator's recent and encouraging messages, which confirmed our hopes for results from this conference.

3. Eban's original instructions had been prompted by the opinion of his Government that if there was any possibility of United Kingdom forces being actively involved in Palestine, the Security Council should take action before rather than after the event. Eban stated that two teams of United Nations observers had been despatched to the Aqaba and Egyptian frontier areas. He said that Jewish forces have now been withdrawn entirely from Egyptian territory. In making this comment he pointed out that his Government has always considered unjust the unilateral nature of the complaints that Israeli troops were occupying Arab territory. His Government felt that Arab forces should equally be required to withdraw from Israeli territory. He added that some Arab forces were still occupying Israeli territory.

4. When the Security Council next meet, his Government is of the opinion that a decision should be reached upon the interpretation to be given to the ban on the importation of armed forces into the Middle East. He described as "eccentric" the United Kingdom view that only the countries directly involved in the Palestine war should be banned from importing troops. It would be the view of his Government that the Security Council resolution prohibits movement of troops of all countries into the area. He pointed out that if the Security Council did not give such a ruling it might be possible for "other countries" (he obviously was referring to the U.S.S.R.) to introduce troops into the area.

5. Eban then addressing himself to me, in my capacity as Canadian representative, referred to the application of Israel for admission to the United Nations at the last session of the General Assembly. He asked me to advise you that his Government were thinking in terms of seeking General Assembly action by the end of April or May. He said that, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure, it was likely the matter will have to come before the Security Council in February.

6. Concerning conditions in Palestine he informed us that feeling in Tel Aviv, both for psychological and economic reasons, was to end the conditions of war as soon as possible. This earnest desire for peace had its dangers, however, for, if an end to the fighting could not be brought about by peaceful means, the Israeli Government might be led to more drastic measures. He said that, at the time he left, truce talks between Trans-Jordan and Israel were proceeding apace and were being transformed into armistice discussions. In Jerusalem itself life had returned to normal. There has been direct contact for some time between military commanders and there are the beginnings of political contacts. Truce negotiations were begun in Paris during the General Assembly with Lebanon, and are continuing. Eban thought that it would be easy to reach agreement as the territory affected is [a] relatively small area and an adjustment of the Israeli-Lebanese frontier could probably be easily reached. To date all attempts to reach a truce with Iraq have been unsuccessful. Before the change in Government in Iraq United Nations and Israel's attempts to negotiate a truce were turned down. Eban expressed the hope that truce negotiations with Iraq could now be begun, as some 15,000 Iraqi troops are placed in a strategic part of Palestine and constitute a serious military threat to Israel.

7. He had been present in Tel Aviv when Canada had recognized Israel. He said that it had had a tremendous impact upon the Government and upon the people. He pointed out that, coming at the time it did, Canada's action will have a definite effect upon the elections which are to take place on or about the 25th of January. Canada's recognition, he said, counter-acts in some measure the influence of those political groups in Israel which favour orientation towards the countries of Eastern Europe.

8. In discussing the future of Arab Palestine he said that it was becoming increasingly evident how unrealistic it is to suppose that a separate Arab State can exist either from an economic or a political point of view. He thought it probable that Abdullah is correct in claiming that a majority of the Arabs in Palestine wanted union with Trans-Jordan.

1. Crisis over shooting down of RAF aircraft

The United Kingdom and Israeli representatives at Lake Success have refrained from asking for a special meeting of the Security Council to discuss the shooting down by Israelis of RAF aircraft near the Egyptian border. In Tel Aviv there seems to be a tendency on the part of officials to draw back from an adventurous enterprise likely to lead to full-scale war and to emphasize instead the importance of getting on with the resettlement of Jewish immigrants. All Israeli troops appear to have been withdrawn from Egyptian soil. In the United States, however, Zionist groups have launched a publicity campaign to mobilize public opinion against the United Kingdom, which is described as "the real enemy of Israel" desirous of frustrating peace between Israel and the Arab states.

2. Conciliation Commission

Despite the resignation last week of the United States representative on the Conciliation Commission, the first meeting of the Commission was held in Geneva according to plan. The Commission will begin to function in Jerusalem on January 24. The Acting Mediator, Dr. Bunche, has suggested that the Security Council should turn over to the Commission the functions he has been exercising.

3. Arab-Jewish negotiations

(a) At Rhodes negotiations are proceeding between Egypt and Israel looking toward an agreement on the basis of the Security Council's resolutions of November 4 and 16. Egyptians besieged at Faluja in the no-man's-land of Southern Palestine are now to be permitted by Israeli authorities to withdraw. The question of the voluntary withdrawal of a considerably greater number of Israeli troops from the whole northwestern portion of the no-man's-land is still under discussion.

(b) Direct negotiations between Israel and Lebanon in the past few days have concerned the evacuation of a strip of Lebanese territory by Israeli forces and the withdrawal of Lebanese troops from a pocket in Western Galilee. Partial withdrawals are said to have begun already.

(c) Direct negotiations between Transjordan and Israel have been going on for some time. Israel, which formerly opposed the annexation of part of Palestine by Transjordan, is now disposed to acquiesce in this feature of the plan proposed by the late Mediator, Count Bernadotte.

4. Press comment

In Canada more than one newspaper has supported the view expressed by the London Times that nothing has been of more encouragement to aggressive policies in Israel than the inability of the United States to declare a clear policy and take a firm line. The appearance of a Jewish state is welcome, but the need is "to fix upon the new state the duties and the responsibilities which are the very marks of statehood" and to settle in discussion, not on the battlefield, the limits which must now be set to Israel's territory.

Palestine—Rhodes negotiations.

1. The Secretary General showed to me in strict confidence a personal and confidential report which he had received from Bunche reporting that, following separate talks with the Israeli and Egyptian delegations upon their return from their respective Capitals, he has come to the "inescapable" conclusion that prospects for an armistice agreement are virtually nil.

2. The Egyptians take the resolution of the Security Council of 13th November as the basis upon which they draw armistice lines and they insist that advantages gained under the truce should not be confirmed by armistice agreement. Israeli position apparently is that any withdrawal agreement must be on a reciprocal basis and will be controlled by distance of Egyptian forces from Palestine frontier.

3. Bunche reports that, despite the impasse, neither delegation wishes to take responsibility for walking out of the negotiations and would prefer to have the Acting Mediator take the responsibility for closing negotiations by declaring that no hope for agreement exists. Bunche says that he will try to avoid being put into this position and, at the worst, will try to persuade both parties to adjourn indefinitely and to report fully to the Council. In view of the stalemate, Bunche suggested that the Council should intervene in some form even if only by a cable from the President of the Council.

4. Lie consulted me about the possibility of my sending a message to Bunche as President of the Council. I pointed out, however, that, as, by agreement of both parties at the beginning of the Rhodes negotiations, no official report had been submitted to the Security Council on the progress of the negotiations except that contained in the report on the Cease-Fire Agreement referred to you in our teletype No. 107 of 26th January,† I could not act in my capacity as President of the Council and on behalf of the Council until the Council had been apprised of the facts.

5. Consequently, I made the suggestion to Trygve Lie that he might reply to Bunche along the following lines:

“I have consulted the President who indicates that it is not possible for him on behalf of the Council to express an opinion on matters which have not yet been communicated to the Council. He feels it is most important that meetings should not be suspended but only adjourned to enable both parties to reconsider their positions. If the meetings are adjourned, you should secure agreement of both parties to release of a statement setting out the reasons for the difficulties, which they have encountered in their negotiations for an armistice. On receipt of such a statement, it might then be possible for the Council to make a decision and to take some useful action.”

Lie agreed and said that he would advise Bunche in the above sense.

Memorandum for Prime Minister

[Ottawa], February 10, 1949

PALESTINE

The following is a brief outline of current issues relating to Palestine in which Canada is interested as a member of the Security Council:

I. Security Council Responsibilities

2. Despite the Security Council's truce order of July 15, 1948 the Israelis have continued to improve their military position in Palestine by imports of arms, ammunition and war supplies, and by launching three offensives—(a) in the northern Negev (October 14–November 19), (b) in northern Galilee in the latter part of October, and (c) in the central Negev (December 22 to January 7). During the first offensive armed incursions of Israelis into Transjordan took place from the Negev. During the second, the occupation of a strip of territory in the Lebanon began. During the third Egypt was invaded. As a result of the two offensives in the south the Egyptians were driven from all but a small fraction of the areas in southern Palestine allotted to the Arabs under the General Assembly's partition resolution of November 29, 1947.

3. The first southern offensive was dealt with in the Security Council's resolution of November 4, providing for the withdrawal of forces behind provisional truce lines established by the Acting Mediator on November 13. These left the greater part of the Negev as a no-man's-land to await final disposition under the peace settlement. The Israelis have so far failed to comply with this resolution. A further Security Council resolution of November 16 provided for a rapid transition to armistice conditions by negotiations conducted either directly or through the Acting Mediator.

A marginal note indicates that this memorandum was "Not used".

4. On December 29, during the second offensive in the Negev, the Security Council called upon Israelis and Egyptians to order an immediate cease-fire, to implement without further delay the resolution of November 4 and to facilitate complete supervision of troops by United Nations observers, which the Israelis had been preventing. On January 4 Egypt broke a long deadlock by offering to enter into direct negotiations with the Israelis under United Nations chairmanship with a view to implementing the Security Council's resolutions of November 4 and 16. A cease-fire went into effect on January 7 and discussions began on the Island of Rhodes on January 13 with the aid of the Acting Mediator.

5. Up to the present two agreements, both dated January 25, have resulted from the Rhodes negotiations. The first merely confirms the cease-fire agreement of January 7. The second provides for food and medical supplies to be taken in United Nations convoys to an Egyptian brigade and townspeople surrounded by Israeli forces at Faluja. On the main issues, however, no agreement has been reached. The Israelis still refuse to evacuate territory won in southern Palestine since mid-October or to agree to compromise suggestions for armistice lines offered by the Acting Mediator, although the Egyptians appear to have accepted them almost entirely.

6. Transjordan has now accepted the Acting Mediator's invitation to begin discussions with the Israelis at Rhodes. Syria, Lebanon, and Iraq have undertaken to do so as soon as the talks between Israel and Egypt have reached a successful conclusion.

II. Intervention by the United States and United Kingdom

7. When the Israelis invaded Egyptian territory in the last week of December the United Kingdom, feeling that the Security Council would be unable to take effective action, asked the United States to intervene. The United States made simultaneous representations at Tel Aviv and in Cairo, as a consequence of which Egyptian air raids ceased and the Israelis reported the complete withdrawal of their forces from Egyptian territory. Since Israeli forces were nevertheless still operating in Egyptian territory, reconnaissance flights by RAF planes based near the Suez Canal were ordered and on January 7 five RAF aircraft, which the Israelis took to be Egyptian, were shot down.

8. The United Kingdom, fearing that the incursions into Transjordan in November and into Egypt at the year-end were part of a deliberate Israeli policy which the Security Council might not be able to stop, despatched an armed force to Aqaba and alerted its naval and military units in the Mediterranean as a deterrent to further violations of established boundaries by the Israelis. The United Kingdom's treaties with Egypt and Transjordan are similar in certain respects. In either case when there is risk of a rupture with a third state efforts will be made to settle the dispute by peaceful means in accordance with the United Nations Charter (in the Egyptian treaty the League of Nations Covenant was originally specified). If these efforts fail the United Kingdom will come to the aid of either country in the capacity of an ally. Nothing in either treaty is to prejudice the obligations of the United Kingdom under the Charter. The Transjordan treaty provides that in case of an imminent menace of hostilities the high contracting parties will immediately concert together the necessary measures of defence. This is in consonance with Article 51 of the Charter, which concerns the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence "until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security".

9. In the crisis which followed the shooting down of the RAF aircraft the Provisional Government of Israel did not attempt to defend its own successive violations of Security Council resolutions but gave the Security Council a memorandum denouncing the United Kingdom for allegedly violating the truce by supplying arms to the Arabs (which the United Kingdom has denied), by conducting reconnaissance flights in a battle area and by despatching British armed forces and aircraft to Transjordan. Since then, however, the tension has been partially relieved by the release of Jewish refugees from Cyprus, the de facto recognition of Israel by the United Kingdom on January 29 and an arrangement for the immediate exchange of diplomatic representatives between the United Kingdom and Israel.

10. On January 13, while tension was greatest, the United Kingdom Ambassador discussed with President Truman the possibility of committing the United Kingdom and United States governments to a joint effort, based on a firm and agreed policy, to achieve peace in the Middle East. Hitherto Mr. Bevin had seen no prospect of this because of frequent shifts in United States policy in Palestine, including the abandonment of support for the Bernadotte report and abstention by the United States delegate from voting on the Security Council's December 29 resolution reaffirming a decision for which the United States had voted on November 4. Now, however, the United Kingdom proposed a joint effort toward a settlement which would enable Israel to be admitted to the United Nations. This would entail acceptance by Israel of the Security Council's resolutions of November 4 and 16 and of December 29, the repatriation of Arab refugees and United States cooperation in developing the Arab sections of Palestine. The United Kingdom hoped that the United States would agree to this course in preference to endorsing a series of decisions arrived at by force of arms.

11. When President Truman showed interest in these proposals Mr. Bevin decided to take the conciliatory measures referred to at the close of paragraph 9. The United States accorded full recognition to Transjordan on January 31 when it granted de jure recognition to Israel. Owing to difficulties in timing, however, no public statement was issued in London and Washington, as originally planned, announcing that the United Kingdom and United States governments were working closely together toward a final settlement in the Middle East.

Conversations at Rhodes

On February 20 an armistice agreement between Israel and Egypt was tentatively agreed to by representatives of the two states in conference at Rhodes. On February 23, after consulting his government in Cairo, the Egyptian representative returned to Rhodes for what is expected to be the early signature of the armistice agreement. The Government of Israel had already approved the text of the draft agreement and commended its own representatives for having acted within the scope of their instructions throughout the period of negotiations. Terms of the agreement will be kept secret until its signature by Egyptian and Israeli representatives.

It is expected that armistice negotiations between Transjordan and Israel will begin at Rhodes on February 26. An exchange of prisoners of war between Transjordan and Israel is already taking place.

Work of Israeli Constituent Assembly

During its preliminary sessions in Jerusalem last week the Constituent Assembly of Israel elected the President of the State and adopted an interim constitution. The confirmation in the Presidency of the moderate Zionist leader, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, was supported on February 17 by 83 votes in a body composed of 120 representatives. The opposition was led by former Irgunists who control the extremist Freedom Party, fourth-strongest group in the Constituent Assembly. The left-wing labour party, Mapam, voted for Dr. Weizmann but in doing so dissociated itself from his political orientation.

The Chairman and two Vice Chairmen of the Constituent Assembly are drawn from the three strongest parties, Mapai, Mapam and the religious bloc. Mapai is a moderate socialist group, Mapam desires an eastward orientation of Israel's foreign policy and the religious bloc includes extreme leftists as well as moderates. These three groups are expected to supply 12 of the 15 members of a new coalition government to be created when the Prime Minister of the Provisional Government recovers from a temporary indisposition. Of three Arabs who have taken their seats in the Assembly one will support the moderates while two are Communist. Communists in the Constituent Assembly have read out of the party a fellow deputy who refuses to follow directives from Moscow where these do not coincide with the national interests of Israel.

Conciliation Commission

The United Nations Conciliation Commission, composed of representatives of Turkey, the United States and France, have been touring Arab capitals and will complete their itinerary with a visit to Tel Aviv on February 24. They have been laying the groundwork for the permanent settlement of the Palestine question which is to follow the armistice agreements now being worked out at Rhodes. Two of the questions they have been discussing are the General Assembly's recommendations in favour of the repatriation of Palestinian refugees and an international regime for the Jerusalem area.

The Provisional Government of Israel has not consented yet to the repatriation of Arab refugees and shows no inclination to do so except on a highly selective basis. Refugees who have recently returned to their former homes under cover of darkness have been sent back to refugee camps outside of Israel by the Jewish authorities pending a decision as to the future of the refugees generally. No official proposal on this question appears to have been made yet by the Conciliation Commission.

Three suggestions for the future administration of Jerusalem have so far been made:

(a) The Provisional Government of Israel suggests that only the old city, which is now controlled by Transjordanian forces, should be placed under international administration, while the new city outside the walls should be incorporated in the State of Israel. Mr. Shertok has intimated that Israel does not plan a coup d'état to take possession of the new city of Jerusalem so long as there is a possibility of establishing the Jewish claim on a basis of general agreement.

(b) Transjordan has suggested the establishment of a Transjordanian trusteeship over the old city and an Israeli trusteeship over the new city, the administering authority in each case being responsible to the United Nations.

(c) The Conciliation Commission has suggested tentatively that a Jewish administration in the new city and an Arab administration in the old city should each be represented on a federal body to include the consuls of the major powers and a representative of the United Nations. The federal authority would supervise both the Arab and Jewish police forces of the old and new cities.

No official report on the Commission's conversations with Arab and Israeli governments is expected until the tour of the Commission is completed.

ISRAEL AND ITS NEIGHBOURS

In Palestine and Rhodes the Acting Mediator and his staff are still making efforts to arrange for a peaceful transition from truce to armistice conditions between Israel and its Arab neighbours on the north and east. Although the situation remains difficult, progress has been made within the past week in negotiations between Israel and two of its neighbours, Lebanon and Transjordan, under the chairmanship of United Nations representatives.

While the negotiations have proceeded, Israeli forces have been establishing themselves in key positions along the eastern frontier from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Aqaba, facing Transjordan. On the Dead Sea coast, the northern half of which has been in Arab hands, Israelis announced on March 15 that they had taken over a position at Engedi, four miles north of the truce line established by the Acting Mediator on November 13. In the south, where no truce lines were established, clear warnings from the British allies of Transjordan appear to have prevented any serious violations of the frontier during the past week while Israeli forces were establishing positions near the Gulf of Aqaba, taking over the five-mile strip of Palestinian coast and establishing their lines of communication with the north. They are at no point closer than five miles to the Transjordanian port of Aqaba where a small token force of British troops is maintained.

On the southwestern frontier, between Palestine and Egypt, where no British force is maintained, the situation has apparently been different. Here it has been repeatedly stated that an Israeli force moving down to the Gulf of Aqaba from Beersheba crossed into Egyptian territory and made use of a 35-mile stretch of Egyptian road leading southward to the Gulf, thus violating the recent armistice agreement with Egypt. If these reports are confirmed by the United Nations truce observers it will be a matter for reference to the mixed Armistice Commission of six members which meets under the chairmanship of a United Nations representative in a demilitarized zone on the border between Egypt and Palestine.

On March 11, while the situation at the Gulf of Aqaba was causing anxiety in view of the close proximity of Israeli and Transjordanian forces, and the possible involvement of United Kingdom troops, a cease-fire agreement was signed at Rhodes representing the first step toward a negotiated settlement on Israel's eastern frontier. The agreement called for a general cease-fire, applicable to all elements of the military or para-military forces of Israel and Transjordan found in proximity to each other anywhere from a point near Lydda west of Jerusalem to the southern tip of Palestine. No element of the ground or air forces of either party is to advance beyond or pass over lines or positions now held by the foremost elements of its ground forces. Complete supervision of the truce by United Nations observers is to be allowed. Civilian movements across the truce line are not to occur except by mutual agreement.

Perhaps the most dangerous situation is that existing north of Lydda in a sector from which Iraqi forces are being withdrawn and replaced by Transjordan troops. Israeli forces have been concentrated in this sector for some weeks and the Israeli Foreign Minister has announced within the past week that occasional sniping in the area by Palestinian Arabs may lead his government to order an advance. The withdrawal of Iraqi forces began after Iraq announced that it would consider itself bound by any agreement with the Israelis reached by other Arab states.

The talks between Israel and Lebanon have not come to an end yet because of continuing differences as to the location of the proposed armistice line, but agreement is expected soon.

PALESTINE

(A) Armistice Agreements

Israel, which signed armistice agreements with Egypt on February 24 and with Lebanon on March 23, has reached this week the final stages in negotiations for an armistice agreement with Transjordan as well. Since no separate agreements will be needed with Iraq, Saudi Arabia or Yemen, an armistice agreement with Syria is the only one still to be considered.

We have no detailed information yet regarding the provisions of the armistice agreement with Transjordan. The armistice agreement between Israel and Lebanon, however, follows closely in its general provisions the precedent established in the armistice agreement with Egypt. It establishes the right of each party to freedom from attack and to submit any political or other claims it may wish to make in the final peace settlement. It defines areas on both sides of the border within which armed forces are to be reduced to defensive strength. It arranges for an exchange of prisoners and for the creation of a mixed armistice commission under the chairmanship of a United Nations representative. A curious feature of the armistice agreements with both Egypt and Lebanon which we are told is found also in the agreement with Transjordan, is the provision for early renegotiation, apparently aimed at an early reduction of Arab-held areas in Palestine. At any time the parties may press for revision of the territorial provisions of any of the armistice agreements. Since any such revision would be made under pressure at the expense of territories which the United Nations have always regarded as being purely Arab, there is some anxiety in United Nations circles lest the present precarious balance should be upset by an early invocation of the renegotiation in clauses of the armistice agreements by the Government of Israel.

(b) Military Movements

On March 23 the Acting Mediator reported fully to the Security Council on the recent Israeli drive to the southern tip of Palestine. It was clear, he said, that since the first week of March Israeli forces had effectively occupied the southern area, which had earlier been lightly patrolled by Transjordanian forces, now entirely withdrawn from Palestine. The positions had been established contrary to the terms of the truce. Patrolling activity and reinforcing of pre-truce forces on either side of the frontier had been in conflict with truce conditions accepted by both sides.

On March 21 the Israeli delegation to the United Nations presented to members of the Security Council a memorandum attacking the United Kingdom both for having sent troops to Aqaba in January and for having reinforced them in March. The Security Council truce resolution should have prevented British forces from arriving at Aqaba in the first place and its armistice resolution of November 16 would seem to call for their withdrawal. On March 28, in answer to a question in the House of Commons at Westminster, Mr. Mayhew pointed out that Israeli forces had not only invaded Egypt but had also invaded and occupied Lebanese territory. These facts and the repeated contravention by Israeli forces of the injunctions of the Security Council had given the Government of Transjordan ample reason to fear that Israelis intended also to invade its own territory in the Aqaba region and it had therefore invoked its treaty with the United Kingdom and asked for aid. The United Kingdom Government did not understand that it was debarred by the Palestine truce from reinforcing or altering the composition of its forces in the Middle East. Movements between British forces stationed at various Middle Eastern points had in fact been freely carried out without comment or criticism from the Acting Mediator or the United Nations. Far from impeding armistice negotiations between Israel and Transjordan it was only the presence of a defensive British force at Aqaba which had stabilized the situation and enabled the negotiations to proceed.

(c) Refugees

To begin consideration of how to deal with the problem of the Palestinian Arab refugees, whose number now exceeds 800,000, the United Nations Conciliation Commission has been in session in Beirut, Lebanon, since March 21. After preliminary discussions with representatives of the Arab states and of organizations interested in the refugee problem, the Commission has asked official and non-governmental representatives to prepare memoranda incorporating their specific proposals with regard to further procedures. A memorandum from the Government of Israel has already been received.

Two main issues have emerged from the preliminary discussions. The first relates to the urgency of the problem, the second to the manner in which it should be settled. The Government of Israel does not wish the refugee problem to be discussed except as part of a general peace settlement. The Arabs, on the contrary, maintain that it is of such urgency that it should be settled immediately before peace negotiations begin. In the second place the Israelis maintain that owing to the virtual disappearance from Israel of an Arab economy it would be easier to resettle the Arab refugees in Arab countries than to restore them to their former homes in what is now Israeli territory. Israel is willing to readmit only certain categories, including the Christian minority, members of the professions and immediate relatives of Arab citizens of Israel. Arab officials and voluntary organizations, on the other hand, report that the overwhelming majority of the refugees desire to return to their former homes and feel they should be accorded this right. They therefore ask for implementation of the Assembly resolution calling for the repatriation and rehabilitation of refugees and the payment of compensation for property losses.

While discussions of the terms of a long-term settlement proceed, it has become apparent that further short-term assistance for the relief of refugees will have to be considered also.

[Ottawa], April 11, 1949

RELIEF OF ARAB REFUGEES

The United Kingdom has requested Commonwealth countries to consider—

(a) the desirability of placing an item on the Agenda of the Second Part of the Third General Assembly next month, recommending an appeal for further funds for the relief of Arab refugees from Palestine. No estimate of the amount of money required has been made but the latest figures available indicate that there are over 800,000 refugees at the present time;

(b) The question of resettlement of these Arabs.

2. Canada has already given approximately $250,000 in response to the Bernadotte appeal of August, 1948 and approximately $750,000 in response to the General Assembly Resolution of November, 1948. In both instances the bulk of the gift has consisted of commodities purchased under price support measures in Canada. It is estimated that immediate needs for refugees can be met until August, 1949 out of the contributions already received or expected. Response from countries other than the Commonwealth, the United States, France and some of the Northern European countries has been negligible; in particular Latin America has contributed almost nothing.

3. Apart from the purely humanitarian interest, there are two reasons why Canada should continue to contribute toward Arab relief:

a) because the Security Council, of which Canada has been a member since January 1, 1948, has been attempting to promote a peaceful settlement of the Palestine dispute, which might be endangered, despite the armistice agreements, if relief contributions for Arab refugees should suddenly be cut off;

b) because the strategic interests of the United States and the United Kingdom with which we find ourselves identified require a stable condition in the Middle East.

4. Accordingly, I recommend,²¹ with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, that the United Kingdom authorities be informed that—

(a) Canada would not oppose a General Assembly resolution prolonging the provision of relief beyond August, 1949, and recommending an appeal for further funds.

(b) Subject to conditions which may exist at the time, Canada would consider making a further contribution to relief for Arab refugees, preferably in kind.

(c) The amount of the Canadian contribution would be affected by—

(i) Contributions which have been made in response to the Bernadotte and General Assembly appeals;

(ii) Undertakings made by other countries to contribute to a new appeal.

(d) Contributions should be on a voluntary and not an assessment basis. In the long view an assessment procedure opens the way for countries which contribute very little to the United Nations budget to press indiscriminately for contributions to numerous welfare projects. The Cabinet conclusion of November 17, 1948 authorized the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly either to vote in favor of a resolution providing for voluntary contributions or support any alternative proposal for the establishment of relief on a basis of assessment.

(e) The question of relief cannot be separated from the problem of early Arab resettlement. Continued large relief contributions will lessen the pressure on Israel and the Arab states to find a permanent solution to the refugee problem. It may be that recent proposals with respect to the provision of assistance for undeveloped areas may be implemented in the Middle East as a means of overcoming the resettlement problem.

New York, July 29, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Following from Starnes, Begins: Palestine.

1. In General McNaughton's absence, Mr. Eban, the permanent representative of Israel to the United Nations, asked to see me yesterday morning at 11:00 a.m.

2. The purpose of Eban's visit was to discuss the Acting Mediator's final report (document S/157 of 26th July), copies of which are being sent forward to you in today's bag. You will note that in the last paragraph, the Acting Mediator attaches as an annex a memorandum suggesting the general lines of the action which the Security Council might now consider it appropriate to take. In fact, as you will see, the memorandum is a draft resolution.

3. Eban, who has just returned from a two and a half week visit to Palestine, wished to inform me that it was the view of his Government that it might be wise in the light of the present state of the peace negotiations to include in the draft resolution a paragraph which would have the effect of continuing the embargo on the shipment of arms to the countries affected by the armistice agreements. Eban said that none of the countries affected are in a sufficiently strong military position at present to carry on any prolonged military operations, and it was the feeling of his Government that, at least until the peace negotiations have been concluded, it would be wise to continue the status quo. He pointed out that the resolution of the Acting Mediator as presently drafted would permit Egypt, Iraq, Syria and other Arab countries to carry out their present plans of rearmament, which he said were quite extensive. Egypt, for instance, he said has budgeted for [a] 200 million dollar rearmament programme for this year. It was the further thought of his Government, Eban said, that by continuing the embargo and by linking it to the successful conclusion of the peace negotiations, it would act as an added incentive to conclude those negotiations rapidly.

4. While Eban had not had an opportunity to phrase his proposal with precision, he suggested the following tentative wording which might be inserted as a separate paragraph in the resolution:

"Calls upon all the Governments concerned to assist the parties in the maintenance of the armistice pending the establishment of peace, and to refrain from importing into their countries arms and war material, except for the due requirements of their national security."

5. Eban informed me that he has made this suggestion to Cordier and to Byron Price, who have undertaken to transmit it to the Acting Mediator who at present is in Los Angeles. Bunche apparently is expected to be able to give his reply to Eban within the next two days. Similarly, Eban has approached the Norwegian and Argentine delegations, both of whom he said reacted favourably to his suggestion. He has approached the United States delegation and they have undertaken to give him their reply within the next two days. It was his intention, he informed me, also to approach the United Kingdom delegation. If the United States Government are unwilling to support his suggestion, Eban said he would not press it as without their support he doubted if it would succeed. Moreover, as the United States is one of the principal potential suppliers of military equipment to the Middle East, he considered United States support was essential if any practical effect was to be given to the suggestion. In the event that military equipment were to be freely imported into the Near East, Eban said his Government, albeit reluctantly, would be forced to take steps to see that Israel's military position was no weaker than that of her Arab neighbours.

6. I did not of course offer any comment on Eban's suggestion, merely informing him that I would transmit his suggestion to you. I made it clear I was not in a position either to know what your reaction would be, or how soon you would be prepared to give him an answer.

7. In the course of his remarks, Eban confirmed reports which we have been receiving from the Secretariat that the negotiations in Lausanne are now proceeding with greater success. Eban said a settlement of the refugee question, which he considered to be one of the principal matters under discussion, seemed more likely as a result of the most recent negotiations. It seems likely he said that a formula whereby each of the countries concerned will agree to take their quota of refugees might be accepted. If such a scheme were approved it was proposed to share the cost amongst the participating countries and the interested international agencies. Eban felt that scheme would offer some hope of reducing to manageable proportions the numbers remaining.

8. In so far as the draft resolution suggested by Bunche is concerned, you will note that the memorandum prepared by the Acting Mediator omits any mention of terminating the functions of the Truce Commission. I understand the omission was deliberate, the Acting Mediator being of the opinion that he was not in a position to suggest the termination of the functions of a body which is a creature of the Security Council. It has been suggested that it might be appropriate, therefore, to amend the present text, expressing appreciation of the Truce Commission's work and suggesting termination of its functions and the transfer of its remaining functions to the Palestine Conciliation Commission.

9. I understand it is the hope of the Secretariat that the Security Council, perhaps in a separate resolution, will decide to express its appreciation of the work of Count Bernadotte and Dr. Bunche. From conversations which I have had with the Secretariat I am informed that it has been suggested it might be more appropriate if one or more of the smaller countries on the Security Council were to present such a resolution. In the event that the Canadian delegation is approached in this connection, it would be useful to learn your views on the matter in advance.

10. I am informed by the Secretariat that the Security Council is expected to meet to consider the Acting Mediator's report at the end of next week. It would be useful, therefore, to receive your comments on the report, and to learn whether we could support the text which has been suggested by the Acting Mediator.²² Ends.

1. We have learned informally from the Secretariat that the Acting Mediator is likely to take the view that the proposal made by Eban for continuation for a limited period of the arms embargo is unrealistic. Bunche apparently would be opposed to the idea on the following grounds: (1) continuation of the embargo would only serve to increase the importation of arms through underground means; (2) it would raise the difficult question of supervision and the reestablishment of teams of observers; (3) in taking action it might appear as if the Security Council was questioning the validity of the armistice agreements. If Bunche is to take this line apparently he would not propose to mention the first two reasons but would base his argument on the third reason.

2. Starnes learned from Noyes²³ of the United States delegation that they have not yet received any comment or instructions from the State Department on Eban's proposal, although they expect to receive these instructions sometime today. The United States delegation, Noyes said, has been considering various alternatives and has been exploring the possibilities of finding a device of an informal nature which would have the same effect as Eban's proposal. Noyes said one possible way of achieving the desired result would be by mutual agreement amongst suppliers nations not to furnish arms and ammunition to the affected countries until the successful conclusion of peace settlements. However, as he pointed out, such a proposal to be effective would require the participation of all major supplying nations. Noyes said the United States delegation appreciated the undesirability of taking any action which would have the effect of promoting an arms race in the Near East. However, as in any event the underground supply of arms would probably continue if the embargo were to remain in force, he expressed the personal view that it might be more realistic to lift all restrictions and to allow a more natural balance of power to take place. In addition he was inclined to think that the continuation of the embargo would present considerable administrative difficulties as it would be impossible effectively to enforce the embargo without rebuilding the observer organization, which would hardly be practicable for so short a period of time.

3. Concerning the suggestion made by the Secretariat that a separate resolution be introduced expressing the Security Council's appreciation of the work of Bernadotte and Bunche and their staffs, referred to in paragraph 9 of my teletype under reference, Noyes suggested it might be possible to achieve the same results by a presidential statement, which could then be endorsed by the various members of the Security Council.

4. In this connection a member of the United Kingdom delegation has asked to see Starnes tomorrow morning at 10:15 a.m. to discuss Eban's proposal and I will send you an account of their discussion as soon as possible.

1. You will have seen the account of yesterday's meeting as contained in United Nations press releases No. S.C./993 and S.C./995 of 4th August, and I am forwarding to you today copies of the verbatim record of yesterday's meeting of the Security Council (document S.P.V. 433† and S.P.V. 434†).

2. Immediately prior to the meeting yesterday morning, I had discussions with Austin and with Shone, in which it transpired that the United Kingdom Government was authorized to co-sponsor the resolution with ourselves and with the United States and with any other "respectable" members of the Council who might wish to join us. However, Austin was apparently under instructions not to sponsor the resolution, principally on the grounds that if they were to do so it might place them at a disadvantage vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. It was suggested, however, that if I could obtain authority to sponsor the resolution alone, the United Kingdom and the United States delegations would make prior statements declaring that their Governments would do nothing to promote an arms race in the Middle East and that they would undertake to export only those arms necessary to the legitimate "internal security and defence requirements" of the countries affected. It was suggested that it would be desirable, if possible, to have France, and possibly one other country such as Norway, co-sponsor the resolution with Canada.

3. Accordingly, I undertook to seek your approval of this suggestion and upon obtaining that approval I spoke after the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States had made their statements concerning the supply of arms, and sponsored the resolution which was appended to the Acting Mediator's report (document S/1365). The Norwegian representative did not feel free to co-sponsor the resolution with me without first obtaining instructions from his Government, and the representative of France did not wish to sponsor it as he had a number of amendments to suggest to the text submitted by the Acting Mediator.

4. You will note from press release S.C./995 that before making my statement, I sought clarification from Dr. Bunche concerning the references to the Conciliation Commission made in paragraphs 5 and 6 of his draft resolution. The United States delegation at the meeting of the Security Council in the morning had pointed out to me in private that in their opinion it would be undesirable to continue to combine the functions of mediation and conciliation with the functions of supervision and enforcement, which had been the case in the past and had been at times a considerable embarrassment to the Mediator and to Dr. Bunche. As I learned from Dr. Bunche that he would have no objection to a proposal to separate these functions and as the suggestion had in fact been made by the representative of France at the morning meeting, I agreed to deal with the matter by asking Dr. Bunche if he saw any objection to a modification of this nature being made to the draft resolution annexed to his report. Dr. Bunche stated that he had no objections to the changes suggested, it being his opinion that it would be altogether to the advantage of the Conciliation Commission if that body were to have no responsibilities of a supervisory or enforcement nature, leaving it to the United Nations Chief of Staff with such personnel as might be necessary to deal with these matters.

5. The Acting Mediator's report received general support from the Council, the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, China, Egypt and Cuba indicating that they would be prepared to support the draft resolution suggested by the Mediator with the changes I had indicated. The representatives of Israel and Syria also spoke in support of the Acting Mediator's report, and I learned in private from the representatives of Norway and Argentina that they are also prepared to vote in favour of the resolution. The representative of France while giving support to the Acting Mediator's report and its conclusions had certain suggestions for amendment to the text of the resolution suggested by the Acting Mediator and put forward specific amendments to paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the resolution annexed to the Acting Mediator's draft resolution. In addition, the representative of France suggested the addition of a paragraph at the end of that resolution (document S/1364). The amendments to paragraphs 3 and 4 suggested by the representative of France do not appear to us or to the United Kingdom and United States delegations to offer any serious difficulties, and with certain changes in the language it might be possible to accept these amendments. The other amendments suggested by the representative of France do not seem acceptable, and particularly the amendment he suggested for paragraph 6, which reads as follows:

“Requests the Conciliation Commission to take, in conjunction with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, any measures necessary to ensure the availability on the spot of the staff required for the operation of these armistice agreements.”

This, it is felt not only by ourselves and the United Kingdom and United States delegations, but by the Acting Mediator, would have a very serious effect upon the armistice agreements. Dr. Bunche spoke in this sense just before the adjournment of the afternoon meeting of the Council, pointing out the necessity in his opinion for retaining the reference to “the United Nations Chief of Staff of the truce supervision organization”. This, he pointed out, accords with various provisions that were worked out in the armistice agreements. Moreover, he said, the French amendment would introduce a new element into the agreements, namely the Palestine Conciliation Commission, which the French delegate himself had earlier stated should not be done.

6. As it appeared desirable to the United States and the United Kingdom delegations and to ourselves to attempt to clear up these difficulties with the French delegation before the next meeting of the Council (which is scheduled for 11.30 a.m., Monday, 8th August) a meeting between the delegations of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves and the Acting Mediator has been arranged for today in an effort to work out a compromise wording which would be acceptable.

7. In regard to the resolution expressing appreciation of the work of Count Bernadotte and Dr. Bunche, in accordance with the instructions contained in your teletype No. 597 of 2nd August, when the delegation of Norway indicated that they would wish to co-sponsor such a resolution with us, we drafted a joint resolution, the text of which has now been circulated to members of the Council in document S/1362. It would be my intention to introduce this resolution at the conclusion of the debate on 8th August, and I have no reason to doubt that it will receive the unanimous support of the Council.

1. The Security Council met at 10:30 a.m., 8th August, to continue consideration of the report of the Acting Mediator. Prior to the commencement of the meeting I had a short conversation with Chauvel, who informed me that he had received instructions from Paris which would allow him to co-sponsor the new draft of the Canadian resolution, the text of which was reported to you in my teletype No. 892 of 5th August. The only change requested by Chauvel was in the final paragraph of the resolution, where it was agreed to delete the words "of the Truce Supervision Organization" and insert after the words "Chief of Staff" the words "mentioned above." We have now learned that tentatively this resolution will receive the support of nine members of the Council.

2. In view of the French request, I accordingly withdrew the original Canadian draft resolution contained in Document S/1365 and introduced a substitute draft resolution submitted jointly by Canada and France (Document S/1367). Chauvel in turn made a brief statement in support of the resolution and withdrew the French amendments contained in Document S/1364. The Norwegian representative, Lunde, also spoke in favour of the resolution.

3. The President, Tsarapkin, speaking for the USSR, stated that he favoured direct negotiations between the parties without any outside pressure from the Palestine Conciliation Commission. He said further that he saw no need for continuing the Commission or for maintaining a staff of United Nations observers. It was his contention that the observer functions could be handed over to the parties themselves. He then introduced a number of amendments to the original Canadian proposal contained in Document S/1365. These, he said, would be adapted to the new text of the joint Canadian-French draft resolution (Document S/1367). These USSR amendments are listed in paragraph 9 below and are contained in Document S/1368.

4. After the introduction of the USSR amendments, I received a note from Dr. Bunche who asked me if I would direct a question to him to what effect the elimination of observers would have on the Armistice Agreements. I accordingly suggested that the Acting Mediator give the Council his views on what the effect would be on the Armistice Agreements were the USSR amendments to be adopted. Bunche in reply stated that such amendments would have very serious effects on the Armistice Agreements and would actually nullify important provisions in each of them. He further stated that the Agreements provided for United Nations personnel to supervise their implementation and to take on special duties in certain specific cases, and particularly where demilitarized zones have been established. He was in favour of the withdrawal of observers in due course but said that it was necessary to retain a nucleus until the final peace settlement was reached, or until the Armistice Agreements were changed.

5. Fawzi Bey, speaking for Egypt, said that his country was naturally desirous of eliminating supervision as soon as possible but felt that the Armistice Agreements required the retention of observers for the time being.

6. Eban, speaking for Israel, suggested that the Council might consider the withdrawal of observers except those specified as required by the texts of the Agreements. He considered that the United Nations Chief of Staff was a representative of the Security Council, and that his functions would be those given him by the parties to the Armistice Agreements or by a Security Council resolution.

7. The Syrian representative supported the views given by Egypt.

8. After some discussion it was agreed that the next meeting to discuss the Palestine situation would be held at 10:30 a.m., Thursday, 11th August.

9. The following are the proposed USSR amendments to the former Canadian draft resolution (Document S/1365) which will be adapted to the new joint Canadian-French resolution (S/1367).

(1) Give paragraph 2 of the draft resolution the following wording:

“Expresses the hope that the Governments concerned will, by means of direct negotiations, achieve agreement at an early date on the final settlement of all questions outstanding between them.”

(2) At the end of paragraph 3, add the following phrase:

"...and in this connection decides to recall the United Nations observers from Palestine and to release them from their duties, and to disband the staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization."

(3) Give paragraph 5 the following wording:

"Terminates the office of the United Nations Mediator on Palestine."

(4) Delete paragraph 6.

Unless I hear to the contrary the Canadian delegation will vote against these amendments.

10. As regards the meeting on Thursday, I will, as you know, be in Ottawa for the Cabinet defence meeting and the representation will fall to Smith with Ignatieff also present. We do not expect to have to take a material part in the discussion.

Ottawa, August 10, 1949

In view of the concern which you have expressed over the Canadian Press reports of the meeting of the Security Council on Thursday, August 4, I mentioned this matter to Mr. Ignatieff when I was speaking to him on the telephone. He said that he would look into the reports. Later in the day General McNaughton telephoned me to say that he had just seen the reports in the Canadian papers and was very much disturbed by them. They had completely distorted the sense of the Council meeting. General McNaughton said he had discovered that the Canadian Press correspondent did not attend the meeting but had based his stories on the reports in the New York papers. These reports, in view of the special interests of many of the New York papers, were not objective. They had given the impression that the only subject under discussion was the removing of the arms embargo which Eban had mentioned. He himself intended speaking to the Canadian Press correspondent to point out to him that this kind of second-hand reporting was not good enough. On the whole, he said, Alstedter was cooperative and although he was inexperienced he was trying hard. The Delegation would consider further what they could do to assure more responsible reporting.

We have now received the verbatim record of last Thursday's meeting, a copy of which is attached.† General McNaughton's statement (which is flagged), in the opinion of the European and the United Nations Divisions, is strictly in accordance with his instructions. General McNaughton in fact followed Bunche's own explanations and made no special reference to the arms embargo.

I am also attaching, in case you have not see it, the delegation's report of Thursday's meeting.

Palestine.

1. The Security Council met at 10:30 a.m. August 11th, to continue consideration of the report of the A[cting] Mediator (Document S/1357). In my absence Arnold Smith represented Canada, with Ignatieff also present.

2. The first speaker, Chauvel of France, stated that his Government's position with regard to the supply of armaments was along parallel lines to those of the United States and the United Kingdom. He then dealt with the USSR amendments to the joint Canadian-French resolution, which were reported to you in paragraph 9 of my teletype No. 903 of 9th August, none of which were acceptable to the French delegation.

3. The next speaker, Austin, said that the United States strongly supported the joint Canadian-French resolution and laid stress on the fact that our resolution explicitly reaffirms and continues the "cease-fire" order. The order to the parties to observe a "cease-fire" should, he said, continue in force and be binding upon all parties, and this result would be achieved under the terms of the Canadian-French resolution. It was his opinion that it would only be appropriate for the Security Council to withdraw its "cease-fire" order when a permanent peace had been achieved in Palestine. Austin went on to say that the Soviet proposal to withdraw all United Nations personnel from Palestine would disrupt the armistice agreements, each of which provides that the United Nations should furnish a Chairman for the mixed Armistice Commissions whose Chairman in each case is designated as the Chief of Staff or a senior officer of the United Nations observer group in Palestine. He then went on to criticize, point by point, the remaining Soviet amendments and stated that he hoped the Council would reject them all and approve the joint resolution of Canada and France.

4. The Chairman, Tsarapkin, speaking for the USSR, stated that he did not consider the various arguments against the Soviet amendments convincing. He laid stress on direct negotiations and did not favour any participation by a third party, namely, the Conciliation Commission. He did, however, concede that the Soviet amendment to give paragraph 5 of the original Canadian resolution (Document S/1365) the wording "Terminates the office of the United Nations Mediator on Palestine" was unnecessary, as a similar effect is achieved in paragraph 5 of the new Canadian–French resolution. He wished, however, further to revise the Soviet amendments, so as to adapt them to refer to the Canadian–French draft resolution instead of the original Canadian draft resolution. Thus, paragraphs 6, 7 and 8 of the joint Canadian–French resolution should, he proposed, be deleted. These revised Soviet amendments are contained in Document S/1375. Tsarapkin also said that if the Soviet amendments were acceptable, he had hopes for a unanimous agreement on the resolution, free from any inconsistencies which he said existed in the French-Canadian text.

5. The Council then proceeded to a vote on the various proposals which were before it with the following results:

(a) The joint resolution submitted by Canada and Norway (Document S/1362) was adopted unanimously, no vote being necessary.

(b) The revised Soviet amendments were all defeated on a paragraph by paragraph vote. The first Soviet amendment was defeated by a vote of 2 in favour (Ukraine and USSR), 2 against (United Kingdom and United States) and 7 abstentions (including Canada). Senator Austin interjected after the vote that he did not wish his negative vote to be considered a veto. (His advisers had expected him to abstain). The second amendment was rejected by the same vote, and the third was rejected by 2 votes in favour to 6 against (including Canada), with 3 abstentions.

(c) The Canadian–French resolution was then adopted by a vote of 9 in favour (including Canada), with 2 abstentions (Ukraine and USSR).

We abstained rather than vote against the first two Soviet amendments because it seemed probable that the USSR would abstain on the final vote, and it seemed unnecessary to do anything to prejudice this. However, we fell in with the majority in voting against the third part of the Soviet amendments.

6. The Acting Mediator, Dr. Bunche, then spoke briefly and expressed his appreciation for the courtesy extended to him by the Security Council and for its invaluable support and assistance.

7. In connection with the joint Canadian–French resolution (Document S/1367), one small amendment was made by Canada to paragraph 2, which changed the words "agreement by negotiations concluded" to read "agreement by negotiations conducted." The word "conducted" was used in the text of the General Assembly resolution to which this paragraph refers. This small amendment was accepted with no comment.

[Ottawa], October 15, 1949

CANADIAN POLICY ON PALESTINE AT THE UNITED NATIONS²⁴

I. Items on Assembly Agenda—

Questions relating to Palestine are to be discussed in the Political Committee under three headings:

- (a) An international regime for the Jerusalem area;
- (b) Holy places throughout Palestine—their protection, assurance of freedom of access;
- (c) Assistance to Palestinian refugees.

2. Items (a) and (b) will be discussed together on the basis of reports from the United Nations Conciliation Commission on Palestine. Item (c) will be discussed in connection with two reports—one from the Secretary General, on the outcome of the Assembly resolution asking Members to contribute $32,000,000 in cash or kind for emergency relief, the other from the Conciliation Commission on plans for repatriation, resettlement and economic rehabilitation of refugees.

II. Proposals of Conciliation Commission for Jerusalem and the Holy Places—

3. The starting point of the discussion in the Assembly about the disposition of the Jerusalem area is the plan submitted by the Conciliation Commission for an international regime for Jerusalem and the protection of the holy places. This plan is summarized in Appendix A.

4. Its main features, explicit and implicit, are as follows:

(a) It meets the requirements of the Assembly resolution adopted on December 11, 1948, which embodies the principle that the Jerusalem area “should be accorded special and separate treatment from the rest of Palestine and should be placed under effective United Nations control”.

(b) It appears to us to go as far toward meeting the present views of the interested parties as could be done without impairing the basic principles of the resolution.

(c) It offers a much less rigid and comprehensive scheme of external control than the plan produced by the Trusteeship Council in April 1948, under which an undivided Jerusalem would have been ruled, under the Trusteeship Council, by a

United Nations Governor normally exercising full executive power and authorized during emergencies to exercise legislative power as well.

(d) It accepts a divided Jerusalem, greatly reduces the secular responsibilities of the United Nations representative, or Commissioner, and assigns to the competence of responsible Arab and Jewish municipal authorities in the two zones all matters not specifically reserved for the United Nations Commissioner or the tribunals and the General Council to be created under the plan.

(e) Unlike the plan of the Trusteeship Council, it was drafted only after attempts had been made both in Palestine and at Lausanne to secure agreement between Arab and Israeli authorities. Consequently during the negotiations conducted by the Conciliation Commission the extent and nature of existing agreement regarding the holy places became more clearly defined.

(f) Finally, the new plan may expect to have the support of the United States, of France (according to a statement made to Mr. Martin by Mr. Schuman) and of the United Kingdom, no matter how reluctant the latter may be. We are informed that the Vatican also favours the plan. Furthermore it conforms to the specific recommendations made by Canada at Assembly meetings in 1947, 1948, and 1949.

5. The plan suffers, however, from one serious practical limitation. It does not call for, nor rest upon, agreement of the two national parties immediately concerned, the Israelis and the Arabs. It has been flatly rejected by the government of Israel because it limits the sovereignty of Israel over the Jewish-populated area of Jerusalem, and Israeli authorities insist that this part of the city must be established as the capital of their country. Moreover, we are not altogether certain that Jordan will agree to the proposals, though the opposition of that country might be overcome by further mediation. Without some concord in principle between these two peoples the plan will be beset from the outset with grave difficulties.

III. Action by the Assembly—Possible Alternatives

6. The position would not necessarily be eased by a retreat from the principle of internationalization. It has not been demonstrated yet that the proposal for an international commission responsible only for the protection of the holy places, operating in an area divided between Arab and Israeli control, could be effectively carried out. The intensity of religious and political sentiment focussed on the Jerusalem area and the intricate pattern of rights established there by a great variety of sects may make any plan difficult to operate.

7. One course of action open to the Assembly would be to approve the plan of the Commission as being likely to result in a solution which would in the long run best meet the legitimate interests of all the religious and secular authorities concerned. On these grounds the Assembly would urge Israel and Jordan to accept the plan. As soon as the Secretary-General had been informed of their acceptance, the plan would be put into operation. Since the Assembly has itself no legal or other power to force Israel and Jordan to accept the plan, the Assembly would have to rely upon the United Kingdom and the United States, France and other powers with influence in the region to bring pressure to bear on Israel and Jordan to accept it. The Great Powers would, through diplomatic channels, use the means of persuasion which Great Powers possess.

8. Alternatively the Assembly might proceed, after approving the plan in principle, to provide means for the further study of problems relating to its application. The experiment might be tried of sending to Jerusalem an able negotiator to see whether the parties might not be brought, under the direct encouragement of the Assembly, to modify their positions if there were a prospect of securing an agreed settlement. Since the interests of the Great Powers are directly engaged in the creation of more stable conditions in the Middle East, it might be expected that they would also exert their influence in the same direction as the Assembly.

IV. Canadian Policy—

9. The immediate role of the Canadian delegation should be to keep itself informed of policy trends among delegations representing all the interests directly involved in the Jerusalem controversy. While the delegation of Israel develops its plan for establishing a United Nations Holy Places Commission in Jerusalem on a treaty basis, the Canadian delegation should ascertain what position is likely to be taken on the internationalization of Jerusalem by Catholic countries, by Russian and Greek Orthodox interests, by Christian Arabs in Palestine, by Moslem countries, particularly the Arab group, and by Orthodox Jewish communities both in Palestine and in the Diaspora. If any tendency to consider introducing a new stage in the negotiations, such as is suggested in paragraph 8, should manifest itself, the Canadian delegation, without developing a detailed plan of its own, should stress the necessity of keeping the terms of reference of a Special Commissioner as flexible as possible, so that he may have room for manoeuvre and free play for his powers of persuasion and conciliation. It is most desirable also that the United Nations representative should strive to induce the parties concerned to take the lead themselves in seeking a peaceful settlement in consonance with the interests of the United Nations.

V. Assistance to Palestinian Refugees—

10. Israel has not agreed yet to the principle of repatriation of Arab refugees embodied in the Assembly resolution of 11 December 1948. It has intimated on the contrary that it will only permit the return of 100,000 refugees, including 15,000 who have already managed to find their way home and some 10,000 who are expected to come back under a special arrangement for the return of wives and young children of heads of Arab families legally resident in Israel. Syria and Jordan have agreed in principle to accept a certain number of refugees who may be unwilling to return to Israel. Lebanon and Egypt, already over-populated, have been unable to make similar offers.

11. Meanwhile about 940,000 Arabs are on relief rolls, many of them receiving less than 1200 calories a day. Relief workers have threatened to withdraw from the area entirely unless the United Nations will guarantee a minimum of 1500 calories a day for all refugees, and a minimum supply of blankets, tents and fuel for the winter months.

12. The Economic Survey Mission appointed by the Conciliation Commission to evolve practical plans for submission at the present session of the Assembly has been in the Middle East since mid-September. It is to report on measures to overcome the economic dislocation caused by the Palestine conflict and on economic measures conducive to peace, as well as on specific measures to facilitate repatriation, resettlement and rehabilitation of refugees. The Mission, finding that tension relating to the refugee situation is becoming increasingly serious, is said to be concentrating on a two-year work relief programme to begin in the spring, to tide over the refugees until their repatriation or resettlement can be arranged on a definitive basis.

VI. Canadian Policy—Refugees

13. The Assembly may be asked to consider only two issues in relation to refugees—(a) the question of immediate emergency relief for the coming winter and (b) the approval of the Economic Survey Mission's interim plan for refugee self-support pending a final settlement.

14. If majority support develops in the Assembly for the provision of adequate emergency relief for the refugees during the coming winter on humanitarian grounds, Canada would go along with the majority. The same principle would apply to a resolution approving any proposals which the Economic Survey Mission may make for an interim work relief programme for Palestinian refugees. It will continue, however, to be Canada's position that a permanent settlement of the refugee problem should be arrived at as soon as possible.

15. The Conciliation Commission found that the repatriation and resettlement of refugees depends so largely on where the boundaries of Israel are to be established that the refugee problem and the boundary question can no longer be dealt with as two entirely separate issues. In the interests of an early settlement of the refugee problem the Canadian delegation should therefore be on the alert for useful opportunities to engage in discussions of how a boundary settlement may be expedited, particularly since a permanent regime for the Jerusalem area must also be affected by the boundary agreement.

APPENDIX A

INTERNATIONAL REGIME FOR JERUSALEM AREA AND PROTECTION OF HOLY PLACES

Proposals of the Conciliation Commission

(a) The United Nations to have "full and permanent authority" over the Jerusalem area, embracing about 65 square miles;

(b) A United Nations Commissioner, responsible to the General Assembly, to supervise demilitarization of the area and observance of human rights and to ensure the protection of and free access to holy places;

(c) The existing division of the area into Arab and Jewish zones to be continued, with Arab and Jewish municipal officials exercising all administrative powers not specifically reserved under the instrument;

(d) Services of common interest, maintenance of public order and economic development of the Jerusalem area to receive the attention of a mixed, appointive General Council;

(e) Disputes between Jewish and Arab authorities and disputes regarding holy places to be heard by an international tribunal of three members elected by the General Assembly and Security Council;

(f) Civil and criminal cases involving residents of either zone and non-residents to be heard by a mixed tribunal;

(g) The existing proportion of Jewish to Arab inhabitants to be maintained in the Jerusalem area;

(h) The Commissioner to employ guards to protect holy places and roads leading to them in the Jerusalem area;

(i) Holy places outside the Jerusalem area to be protected under guarantees given by Israeli or Arab authorities, the Commissioner to supervise implementation of these guarantees, with disputes being submitted at his discretion to the International Tribunal.

Palestine.

Twelve delegates have spoken so far in general debate which might be summed up as follows.

2. First there is attitude of Israel in favour of mild functional internationalization concerned with protection of Holy Places only and to be effected by means of agreement between United Nations and Israel as regards Jewish portion of Jerusalem.

3. Secondly there is attitude of Australia, supported by Salvador, in favour of reverting to proposal for territorial internationalization as provided by resolution of November 29th, 1947, and taking action accordingly at fifth session of General Assembly. This may well have been inspired by political motives, and before it could be put into effect Israel and Jordan might reach agreement and put United Nations before new fait accompli. Egypt has expressed sympathy for Australian proposal insofar as territorial internationalization is involved. Soviet Union, judging by amendment which it has produced, would favour similar proposal except that it would entrust elaboration of statute to Trusteeship Council rather than to enlarged Conciliation Commission.

4. Thirdly there is attitude of Turkey, France, United States, United Kingdom, Belgium, Brazil, Haiti and Syria, all in favour of Conciliation Commission report, viz. an international regime providing for the maximum local autonomy for the two zones. Some of them however (France, Belgium, Cuba and Haiti) mentioned with various degrees of insistence that they would welcome something closer to resolution of 1947.

5. It appears that there will be substantial majority for third solution. Israeli delegation has made it clear however that such a solution would be highly unpopular with people of Israel and could not easily be put into effect.

6. Considering all the circumstances, conciliation report appears to be middle ground between Australian position and position of Israeli Government, and it seems to us advisable to support it. We propose therefore to prepare short statement in support of Conciliation Commission report which, subject to further consideration here and in Ottawa, we might use on Monday or Tuesday. Will you please therefore advise as soon as possible.

Your telegram No. 384 of November 26, Jerusalem.

We agree with the view that the plan of the Conciliation Commission represents middle ground between Israeli and Australian positions and that it should be supported in principle by the Canadian delegation in the general debate. We regard the plan as better adapted to conditions actually prevailing today in Jerusalem than the proposals of the Trusteeship Council which the Australian resolution commends.

2. In the statement of United Kingdom policy transmitted to you under cover of teletype No. 211 of October 31† it was indicated that one of the reasons which had led the United Kingdom to support the Conciliation Commission's plan was because the United States government, main sponsor of the plan, believed it would be able to overcome Israeli opposition. We do not know how the United States intends to proceed in the matter, but presume you will be kept informed.

3. Various expedients for reducing the gap between the proposals of Israel and those of the Conciliation Commission are doubtless being discussed by many delegations. With this purpose in mind we might, if you thought it wise, support in sub-committee an amendment of Article 5 (maintenance of the present "demographic equilibrium" of the City of Jerusalem). If you agree we might also support any amendment to give the plan greater flexibility, as for example by adding to it the Trusteeship Council's proposal that the Jerusalem regime should be re-examined after a given period of operation. We would not suggest this, however, except as a means of securing Israel's agreement to the Assembly's resolution.

4. We have wondered whether you would consider it worth while to throw out a suggestion in discussions with members of other delegations that a United Nations liaison officer might be appointed to discuss with the governments of Israel and Jordan the detailed preparations which should be made before the actual arrival of the Commissioner. This might be a means of winning greater local support for the proposed international regime. We feel that anything which can properly be done to help the government of Israel to modify its present uncompromising stand while retaining the support of its own public would be useful.

5. We have received no United Nations press summaries on the Jerusalem debate over the Thanksgiving week-end and are not au fait with the mood and circumstances in New York which may render impracticable any such move at this juncture. But if more time can be gained and the possibility of negotiation kept alive, the worst consequences of matching the irresistible and the immovable might be avoided.

6. We should be interested to have your comments on the story by Thomas Hamilton on the Palestine debate on pages 1 and 29 of the New York Times for Sunday, November 27.

1. The Ad Hoc Committee decided today, Tuesday, to set up a 17 member sub-Committee to study all proposals so far submitted in connection with the internationalization of Jerusalem and the protection of the Holy Places. This sub-Committee will also examine any other proposals submitted to it, and attempt to present an agreed resolution or resolutions to the Ad Hoc Committee within 3 days i.e. by Saturday, December 3rd. Canada was nominated to this sub-Committee and will be represented by Mayrand. Other States nominated to the sub-Committee were Australia, El Salvador, Ukraine, Israel, Cuba, Lebanon, Netherlands, Iraq, Uruguay, Egypt, India, Sweden, Greece, Mexico, Peru and the Soviet Union. We did not press for membership on this sub-Committee but as a number of delegations were keen that we serve we did not deem it advisable not to accept membership.

2. The sub-Committee held its first meeting on Tuesday immediately following adjournment of the Ad Hoc Committee and appointed Dr. Castro of El Salvador as Chairman and the Swedish member as Rapporteur.

3. In the meantime the Ad Hoc Committee will continue with the consideration of the item of assistance to Palestine refugees and will return to the sub-Committee's report as soon as it is available. In this connection we would appreciate your early comments on the proposed resolution on assistance to Palestine refugees forwarded under our teletype No. 377 of November 25th.†

Palestine.

Sub-Committee held two fruitless meetings yesterday, Wednesday, when it failed even to agree on procedure to deal with its task.

2. With reference to paragraph 5 of my telegram No. 384 of November 26th, you will have noted that further developments in general debate did not corroborate prognostic [sic] which I made, viz., that there would likely be substantial majority for Conciliation Commission plan. Arab delegations other than Syrian and Jordan, most Latin American and pro-Soviet delegations reverted to resolution of November 29th, 1947, and supported it almost as if resolution of December 11th, 1948, did not exist. It thus happened that delegations favouring Conciliation Commission plan spoke at the beginning of debate and this gave us false impression which I reported.

3. In talks with various Latin American delegates I have ascertained that their Governments have simply decided to follow Vatican directives whatever their merit may be. Those who have direct knowledge of conditions in Palestine will agree privately that territorial internationalization will be most difficult to implement; yet in their speeches and votes they behave as if they had no serious apprehensions in this regard. It is somewhat ironical that these extremists are generally in agreement with delegates of Soviet Union and Ukraine, who are both on Sub-Committee.

4. Yesterday, with a view to starting on more realistic basis, we supported Netherlands proposal that Sub-Committee first determine the principles which should govern a solution without referring specifically to any of the previous resolutions and plans. Sweden, Australia, Israel, Uruguay and Peru also voted for this proposal which however was not adopted (7 in favour, 7 against and 2 abstentions); and I am afraid that attempt will be made today to adopt plan of 1947 as basis for discussion. There may be some significance in fact that the two Latin-American delegations which voted with us were those which were represented on UNSCOP. I may add that Dr. Paul Mohn, former Swedish alternate on UNSCOP, later collaborator of Bernadotte and until very recently United Nations consultant on Palestine, is himself of opinion that plan of 1947 simply could not be peacefully imposed upon Israel. Members and staff of Conciliation Commission and experts from the Secretariat who have returned from Palestine share the same view.

5. In the circumstances, unless change in situation occurs, we propose to maintain attitude of reserve, merely laying emphasis whenever possible on the practical aspects rather than to take open initiatives for less rigid internationalization, as this might be misinterpreted without giving positive results.

6. I am sending you by bag text of draft resolution which French delegation have in mind to introduce in Committee if no satisfactory solution can be reached at present Assembly. It provides, inter alia, for the immediate appointment of a United Nations Commissioner for the Holy Places in Palestine and invites Israel and Jordan to do nothing which might compromise the establishment of an international regime for the Jerusalem area by the Fifth Assembly. Your views on it would be much appreciated.

RESTRICTED

Palestine.

1. Sub-Committee in night session yesterday adopted following draft resolution on Jerusalem:

“The General Assembly,

HAVING regard to its Resolution 181 (II) of 29th November 1947 and 194 (III) of 11th December 1948,

HAVING studied the reports of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine set up under the latter resolution,

BELIEVING that the principles underlying its previous resolutions concerning this matter, and in particular its Resolution of 29th November 1947, represent a just and equitable settlement of the question,

DECIDES

In relation to Jerusalem,

1. To restate, therefore, its intention that Jerusalem should be placed under a permanent international regime, which should envisage appropriate guarantees for the protection of the Holy Places, both within and outside Jerusalem and to confirm specifically the following provisions of the General Assembly Resolution of 29th November 1947 (A/519, P.146):

(1) The city of Jerusalem shall be established as a corpus separatum under a special international regime and shall be administered by the United Nations;

(2) The Trusteeship Council shall be designated to discharge the responsibilities of the administering authority...and

(3) The city of Jerusalem shall include the present municipality of Jerusalem plus the surrounding villages and towns, the most eastern of which shall be Abu Dis; the most southern Bethlehem; the most western, Ein Karim (including also the built-up area of Motsa); and the most northern Shu'Fat, as indicated on the attached sketch-map (annex B).†

2. To request for this purpose that the Trusteeship Council at its next session, whether special or regular, complete the preparation of the Statute of Jerusalem (T/118/Rev.2), omitting the now inapplicable provisions, such as Articles 32 and 39, and, without prejudice to the fundamental principles of the international regime for Jerusalem set forth in the Resolution of 29th November 1947, introducing therein amendments in the direction of its greater democratization, approve the Statute, and proceed immediately with its implementation. The Trusteeship Council shall not allow any actions taken by any interested Government or Governments to divert it from adopting and implementing the Statute of Jerusalem.

CALLS upon the States concerned, to make formal undertakings, at an early date and in the light of their obligations as members of the United Nations that they will approach these matters with good will, and be guided by the terms of this resolution.”

2. Vote on the whole draft resolution was as follows: 9 in favour (Egypt, El Salvador, Greece, Iraq, Lebanon, Peru, Ukraine, U.S.S.R., Australia), 6 against (Cuba, Israel, Mexico, Netherlands, Sweden, Uruguay), and 2 abstentions (Canada, India). We explained our abstention by reiterating our doubts as to whether this constituted a realistic approach [to] problem at the present time and indicated that we might alter our position in committee after having better ascertained will of the majority to carry out such a resolution.

3. This was passed as revised Australian draft resolution amended by El Salvador (in paragraph 1) and by Lebanon (in paragraph 2). Original Soviet amendments were all defeated, although Lebanon incorporated Soviet idea of reference to Trusteeship Council.

4. Report of sub-Committee to main Committee will enclose adopted draft resolution, together with other texts upon which no action was taken. The latter include the Conciliation Commission plan and a new Netherland proposal which I am sending you by bag.

5. Question of Jerusalem will not revert to full Committee before tomorrow and possibly not before Monday. We propose to give it serious consideration today, after which we may be in position to make concrete suggestions to cope with this very difficult and delicate situation. Meanwhile would appreciate any guidance as well as information concerning latest reactions of the Canadian public.

Your teletypes no. 411 and 416 of December 1 and 2, Jerusalem. Following for the Minister from Heeney. Begins:

The position you have taken in support of the Conciliation Commission plan and Canadian abstention in Subcommittee left our hands free to continue to search for a solution. (We note that you like ourselves are concerned by the Russian support for the Australian resolution in Subcommittee.) We hope with you that everything possible may be done to avoid the Assembly committing itself to a course of action that the United Nations is not in a position to carry out, or that conditions in the Jerusalem area render impracticable. Conversely international concern about the Holy Places must be satisfied.

2. Our own position, already made clear by Gen. McNaughton, is that the settlement should not be postponed if this can possibly be avoided, that we are very doubtful about the practicability of the resolution of November 1947, and that the plan of the conciliation Commission, supported as it is by the three Western great powers, offers a reasonable basis for settlement.

3. If a two-thirds majority is not forthcoming in favour of the establishment of an international regime, we would judge from paragraph 6 of teletype No. 411 that the French plan might be useful from our point of view. It is true that it appears to postpone a final settlement and it goes further toward meeting the views of the inhabitants than the plan of the Conciliation Commission for which we have declared. But it does propose to establish a United Nations official in Jerusalem to safeguard the Holy Places, and it provides time and opportunity for further negotiation to which we attach importance.

4. If therefore there is an opportunity to consider an alternative resolution, whether the French, the Netherlands or another, which avoids the dangers of the Australian resolution, we would think it should be favourably considered.

5. Pending the receipt of texts of new proposals we should like to suggest the importance of precise terms of reference for the United Nations Commissioner, and a firm declaration by the Assembly of the principle of United Nations responsibility for protection of the Holy Places.

6. I suppose that you may yourself have an opportunity on Monday to bring the matter before Cabinet if you consider that desirable in the circumstances. Ends.

Following from Heeney. Your teletype No. 416 of December 2, Jerusalem.

Following is text of a memorandum which the Minister has asked me to send you for the consideration of the Canadian delegation. It is offered as a suggestion on which action may be taken if a two-thirds majority cannot be obtained in the Assembly in support of the Conciliation Commission's plan for modified territorial internationalization of Jerusalem or for the more far-reaching Australian resolution as amended. Text begins:

"2. We have wondered whether it would not be possible after all to secure at this Assembly a recommendation which might be carried into effect immediately with the consent of all concerned. Israel and Jordan both feel they are capable of administering the holy places in a manner which would commend itself to the Christian world. Both have made definite offers. Both show a disposition to try. If no other plan is supported by a two-thirds majority, would it not be possible to capitalize on the anxiety of Jordan and Israel to show what they can do by appointing them officially as the administering authorities for the Arab and Jewish zones of Jerusalem respectively—that is to say, as the legally designated representatives of the international community?

"3. If the Assembly merely calls upon Israel and Jordan to cooperate in doing or refraining from doing certain things until the fifth session, the United Nations will be likely to forfeit forever its claim to exercise authority in the Jerusalem area. If, on the contrary, Israel and Jordan accept appointments as administering authorities from the United Nations, the continuing responsibility of the United Nations will be clearly established.

"4. The appointments might be made on some such conditions as the following:

(a) Agreements would be concluded between the United Nations and the two administering authorities providing for the observance of human rights and setting forth the principles applying to the protection of holy places.

(b) The appointment of Israel and Jordan as administering authorities would be reviewed at stated intervals. Provision would be made for territorial readjustment if the final peace settlement between Israel and Jordan should call for the establishment of a boundary which does not follow the present armistice demarcation line.

(c) A small United Nations Commission resident in Jerusalem would act in an advisory capacity to the governments of Israel and Jordan, with special concern for the manner in which agreements regarding the protection of holy places and observance of human rights are carried out. Membership of the Commission might change from time to time so as to distribute the responsibility fairly.

(d) The United Nations Commission would report at regular intervals to the Secretary General of the United Nations on the manner in which both governments had fulfilled their duties.

"5. Israel may be reluctant to accept an appointment as administering authority for the new city at the hands of the United Nations, since it claims sovereignty over that area in its own right. This may be an advantage, however, because it will give Israel an opportunity to yield what it regards as an important point in a spirit of accommodation, thus making it easier for Christians in their turn to make the corresponding concession which the plan would represent for them. A settlement based on an appeal to the magnanimity of Israel and Jordan might also contribute substantially to a genuine pacification of Palestine as a whole.

"6. If Israel and Jordan were to put on their mettle to satisfy the international community it might be possible in this instance to combine the morally desirable with the practical. Moreover, it has been recognized as a sound principle of United Nations policy that the maximum use should be made of the independent and cooperative instincts of nations in working out the solution to their own problems. This is probably wise for an organization which does not possess executive power and is committed to promoting reforms without interference in the internal affairs of member states."

1. Political Ad Hoc Committee met this morning to consider report of Sub-Committee. French delegation, although with some reluctance, said they would vote for it. United States delegation spoke strongly against the report of Sub-Committee as impracticable and expressed hope that compromise solution would be found.

2. The following texts are now before the Committee:

(1) Proposal of the Sub-Committee, together with Cuban amendment, which I am sending to you under separate telegram;

(11) Bolivian proposal for functional internationalization to be elaborated by Special Commission of 7 members, and which would be the object of a special conference in the beginning of 1950. I am not sending you the text of this proposal as its author intends to withdraw it in favour of the Netherlands-Swedish proposal;

(111) Netherlands-Swedish proposal, the text of which is also being sent to you under separate telegram.

3. It seems to us that the Netherlands-Swedish proposal is closest to the original conciliation Commission plan and represents the best compromise to date. I propose to vote for it.

4. Tomorrow's proceedings will open with a question of procedure as some of the delegations would like to have the Netherlands-Swedish draft resolution put to vote first, contrary to usual practice. I think there is good ground for this suggestion, since no compromise solution was examined in Sub-Committee. I propose, therefore, to support this suggestion.

5. If the Netherlands-Swedish proposal comes first, I propose to vote in favour. If the proposal of the Sub-Committee (amended Australian resolution) comes first, I propose to vote in favour of the Cuban amendment, which corrects it to a large extent. If the Cuban amendment is defeated, I propose to abstain in the vote on the proposal of the Sub-Committee. If you desire that I would vote differently, I suggest that you let me know by telephone at the Biltmore not later than ten o'clock tomorrow morning, if possible.

JERUSALEM

Yesterday in the Special Political Committee of the United Nations General Assembly a draft resolution proposed by Australia, the Soviet Union and Lebanon for the purpose of establishing an international regime for the Jerusalem area was adopted by a vote of 35 to 13 with 11 abstentions—enough votes to carry the proposal in the Assembly itself.

2. The proposal is that the Trusteeship Council should administer Jerusalem and its environs on behalf of the United Nations. The Trusteeship Council would be asked to complete the articles of a statute for the Jerusalem area, approve it and put it immediately into effect. The Trusteeship Council must not allow any action by interested governments to divert it from carrying out the obligation laid on it by the Assembly. Arabs and Jews would be asked, meanwhile, to make formal undertakings that they will be guided by the terms of the Assembly resolution.

3. The consequences of the resolution would be the following:

(a) Jerusalem, Bethlehem and an area of some 65 square miles would be fully administered by the United Nations.

(b) Nazareth, Capernaum, the Sea of Galilee and a number of other places in Palestine held sacred by the Christian world would not come under international administration but would be covered by guarantees which Arab and Israeli authorities are ready to give.

(c) The actual control over the eastern and western portions of the Jerusalem area which Jordan and Israel now exercise would have to be surrendered to the United Nations. Israel has stated it cannot do this. Jordan has made no official statement since yesterday's vote was taken but is known to fear the consequences of withdrawing its troops from the Arab zone of Jerusalem.

(d) The cost to the United Nations of the regime for 1950 is estimated tentatively at $8,150,000 exclusive of expenditure which might be occasioned by local disturbances. There would be a continuing annual charge on the United Nations but this would be offset by revenues from the area which cannot yet be estimated.

4. All advice we have received from those who are acquainted with conditions in Palestine confirms statements made at Lake Success that the direct administration of a United Nations Governor cannot be established peacefully. It has seemed to the Canadian delegation that even if the Assembly had the power to make binding decisions and the United Nations possessed an army to enforce Assembly decisions, the use of force in this case would defeat the purpose of the resolution, which is to preserve the peace of Jerusalem and protect holy places and the interests in the area of three world religions. The Mandatory Power, which had at its disposal experienced troops under unified command, found it impossible to guarantee public security in Jerusalem after 1945, when the inhabitants adopted a policy of opposition to the regime.

5. The Canadian delegation therefore gave its support to a resolution which seemed more practicable than the plan which the committee has now recommended and which was closer to the plan of the Conciliation Commission. The plan supported by the Canadian delegation would also have set up an international regime in closer conformity with the Assembly resolution of December 11, 1948. With regard to the draft resolution which the Committee adopted yesterday the Canadian delegation, like the delegations of the United Kingdom and United States, has expressed doubts that it could ever be carried out. The Canadian delegation abstained in yesterday's vote. The United Kingdom and United States voted against the resolution.

6. It is probable that efforts are now being made to persuade abstainers to vote against the resolution in the Assembly. If five of the eleven abstainers were to do this the resolution would be lost. Whether or not the Canadian delegation should continue to abstain when the Committee's resolution is submitted to the Assembly in plenary meeting is the question which the Cabinet will now have to decide.

Mr. Pearson told me following the discussion on Palestine in Cabinet this morning, that the Government has decided that the delegation in New York should abstain on the resolution concerning Jerusalem which had been adopted in the Committee and which would be voted on in Plenary tomorrow. He added, however, that the Government is concerned about the implications of the resolution and that, if there were any satisfactory alternative resolution for the delegation to support, they would be disposed to instruct the General to vote against the Australian resolution.

2. I have spoken to the General on the telephone, and given him this information. He said that the United States delegation was now urgently casting about for some alternative resolution calling for further investigation that could be put before the Plenary session tomorrow. It told the General, therefore, that his instructions now were to abstain on the Jerusalem resolution in Plenary session. If, however, any alternative resolution emerged before tomorrow he might ask for a reconsideration of these instructions.

3. I attach a copy of a telegram confirming these instructions, which I am giving to the Minister for his signature.

1. Reference my telephone conversation this afternoon with Riddell, the situation is now as follows:

2. We have now been assured by The Netherlands and Swedish delegations that they will reintroduce their resolution in plenary tomorrow morning and speak strongly in support of it. I hope, therefore, that in view of this development, you can authorize me to support this joint resolution, and to vote against the Ad Hoc Committee resolution initiated by Australia.

3. There are indications that several delegations may withdraw support from the Australian resolution (and some may oppose it) and give support to the Swedish-Netherlands resolution. Thus, it is not impossible that the Swedish-Netherlands resolution may be carried and the Australian resolution defeated.

4. The United States delegation have informed us that they have not yet received instructions but are hoping to get authority to support the Swedish-Netherlands resolution. Another possibility, which the United States is considering, is to introduce a "stop-gap" resolution, which would ask the Secretary-General, in agreement with the Palestine Commission, to appoint a Commissioner in Jerusalem, with the dual responsibility of,

(a) Looking after the Holy Places, and

(b) Working out a long-term plan for consideration by the next session of the General Assembly. The United States delegation tell us that this "stop-gap" device is less likely, since the Swedish-Netherlands decision this afternoon to re-introduce their joint resolution, than it had been this morning when it seemed necessary as a last resort.

5. The United Kingdom delegation tell us that they hope to have authority to support the Swedish-Netherlands resolution.

2. If, between now and the time that a vote is taken, an alternative resolution is presented to the Assembly for its consideration, and if you consider that this alternative resolution has substance and has some possibility of being carried instead of the resolution which was reported from Committee, I should be grateful if you would inform us immediately of these circumstances, in order that we may reconsider the position. General Assembly today adopted draft resolution on internationalization of the Jerusalem area as recommended by Ad Hoc Political Committee. Vote on the whole resolution was 39 in favour, 14 against and 6 abstentions. We voted negatively on every part as well as on the whole, all by roll call.

2. Other negative votes were those of Costa Rica, Denmark, Guatemala, Iceland, Israel, Norway, Sweden, Turkey, South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay and Yugoslavia. Abstentions were those of Chile, Dominican Republic, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, and Thailand.

3. Soviet Union re-introduced amendment for dissolving United Nations Conciliation Commission but this was rejected by 5 votes in favour, 43 against and 8 abstentions.

4. Before vote on main draft resolution took place, Uruguay and Denmark introduced motion to adjourn the debate on the item of Palestine during the present session and to hold a special session of the General Assembly at the date to be fixed by the Secretary-General in consultation with the members of the United Nations. This gave rise to lively debate as President wanted to put motion to vote in accordance with Rule of Procedure No. 70. French delegate thereupon proposed to adjourn the meeting was given priority and defeated. We voted in favour.

5. As for motion of Uruguay and Denmark this was also defeated by roll call vote of 21 in favour, 33 against and 5 abstentions. We voted in favour.

6. Tomorrow in plenary the question of appropriations for implementing the decision on Palestine will be under consideration. Yesterday the Fifth Committee decided that the implementation of the resolution would require $8,150,000 during 1950, of which $4,000,000 would be appropriated immediately, the balance to be called for only if the experience indicated that this would be required during 1950. The Soviet Union, however, have recommended that only $3,000,000 should be appropriated. In the Fifth Committee we abstained on the question of appropriations. However, it is our opinion that now that the Assembly has taken a decision we should support the estimate made by the Fifth Committee to carry out the Assembly resolution. Otherwise we might be accused of attempting to obstruct the implementation of the resolution by the provision of inadequate funds.

MR. MAYRAND'S VISIT TO MGR. VACHON RE JERUSALEM

In accordance with your request, Mr. Mayrand paid a visit to Mgr. Vachon²⁵ on December 20. It was very cordial and lasted about one and a half hours.

2. Mr. Mayrand explained how the Jerusalem item had been dealt with at the General Assembly and left with the Archbishop copies of the resolutions and amendments, as well as copies of General McNaughton's speeches of November 29 and December 9.

3. Mgr. Vachon admitted he was unaware of the technical elements of the issue and felt unable to oppose our thesis. He said he could only note that we had acted contrary to the wishes of the Holy Father and that this was very embarrassing to him. Actually the Holy Father had expressed his regret that the government of a country having such an important Catholic population as Canada had voted against the full internationalization of Jerusalem.

4. Mgr. Vachon showed to Mr. Mayrand a copy of The Canadian Register of December 10, which praised the Canadian Government for having been "on the side of justice". It was clear that the author of the article had not understood the situation too clearly. Nevertheless, The Canadian Register had been ordered to publish a retraction in its next issue.

5. Mgr. Vachon added he was the more grieved because the Government had not yet found it possible to appoint a special Ambassador or Representative to the Vatican for the Holy Year. The Catholic authorities, both in Rome and in Canada, had much difficulty in finding an excuse for this negative attitude. Mr. Mayrand said he would bring this view to your attention.

6. Mr. Mayrand also intimated that you or Mr. St. Laurent would be quite willing to discuss further the Jerusalem problem with Mgr. Vachon, if the latter so desired. Mgr. Vachon, however, found this was unnecessary.

7. In connection with the same problem, you may be interested to know that Mr. Mayrand saw Mr. Camille L'Heureux of Le Droit last week and pointed out to him the inaccuracy of this first article on the Jerusalem issue. A few days after, Mr. L'Heureux wrote another article in which he mentioned that there was ground for the attitude taken by the Canadian Government although such Canadians who favoured the Australian resolution were none the less sincere.

²⁵ Le Très révérend Alexandre Vachon, archevêque d'Ottawa.
Most Rev. Alexandre Vachon, Archbishop of Ottawa.

8. Mr. Mayrand also paid a visit to Father Barthelemy, Commissioner for the Holy Land in Ottawa. Father Barthelemy is a distinguished Franciscan who spent years in Palestine and Lebanon. Mr. Mayrand had no difficulty in convincing him that the Catholic Church had apparently made a serious mistake. When Mr. Mayrand asked him how he could explain such a mistake, Father Barthelemy said he was afraid it was due to deep ignorance of the situation. Since then, however, Father Barthelemy has been more reticent as he seems naturally afraid of compromising himself in regard to his ecclesiastical authorities.

9. A copy of this memorandum has been sent to Mr. Léger of the Prime Minister's Office.

INDONESIA

The "police action" undertaken by the Netherlands in Indonesia on December 18 created a serious problem of the Security Council which had been attempting, through the Committee of Good Offices, to assist in bringing about a peaceful settlement of the Indonesian problem. The Dutch action was brought immediately to the attention of the Security Council, and a resolution was tabled by the United States, Columbia and Syria, which called for an immediate cease-fire and for the withdrawal of Netherlands troops to positions occupied before the recent operations were commenced. The resolution also called for the immediate release of Indonesian leaders who had been imprisoned by the Dutch.

2. This resolution was vigorously supported by the United States Delegation and by the representatives of Australia and India who attended the Council for the discussion of this problem. The U.S.S.R. Delegation proposed a much more vigorous denunciation of the Netherlands, and eventually refused to support the United States resolution because it did not go sufficiently far. The Canadian representative on the Security Council was instructed to vote for the first part of the resolution (cease-fire order), but to abstain on the second part of the resolution (withdrawal of troops). These instructions were maintained, in spite of representations from the United States, India and Australia, and in spite also of the fact that the United Kingdom supported the United States position. The reasons for the policy of the Canadian Government in refusing to support the demand for the withdrawal of Netherlands troops are the following:—

(a) the proposed action seemed precipitate, particularly in view of inadequate information.

(b) it was doubtful whether the Netherlands authorities, having taken action to invade the Indonesian Republic, could or would in fact re-establish the truce lines.

(c) there was no evidence that the United States or any other State which supported the demand upon the Dutch for the withdrawal of their troops, intended to advocate any further steps if the Dutch refused to acquiesce. The Canadian Delegation to the Security Council has avoided where possible, initiating action which might lead to sanctions, if there was not good evidence that the powers which would be principally responsible for imposing the sanctions would, in fact, take this responsibility;

(d) the action proposed, in any case, seemed unduly severe in contrast with the much more tentative policy adopted in the Security Council in relation to problems such as Greece and Palestine.

3. It was realized at the same time that the action of the Dutch in Indonesia had created serious problems in the relations between the Western Powers and the peoples of South East Asia. Instructions were therefore sent to the Canadian Ambassador in The Hague, asking him to inform the Netherlands authorities of the concern of the Canadian Government over the probable results of their action, and to point out to the Dutch the responsibility that now lay upon them to take action which would assure the peoples of Indonesia that their national aspirations would be rapidly fulfilled.

4. The Netherlands authorities have made rapid progress in their military operations in Indonesia, and these operations will soon be completed, if they have not already ceased. It is not yet certain, however, that the Dutch will not encounter severe continuing guerilla operations, and it may, in fact, be difficult for them to maintain peaceful conditions in Indonesia.

5. In statements in the Security Council, the Netherlands representative has now given assurances that the Netherlands Government intends to proceed rapidly with the establishment of the Indonesian federation, including the Republic of Indonesia, according to plans which had previously been announced. The Netherlands Prime Minister has also gone to Indonesia for the purpose of initiating new discussions with Indonesian leaders whom he hopes will co-operate. In the meantime, however, there have been indignant protests from the U.S.S.R., Australia and India over the failure of the Security Council to take disciplinary action against the Netherlands.

6. Since the discussions took place in the Security Council, both the United Kingdom and the United States Delegations have indicated that they were not as insistent as they had originally indicated on punitive action against the Dutch. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington has reported that the State Department regards the Australian position as being somewhat irresponsible, and in a statement in the Security Council itself, the United Kingdom representative referred to the "impetuosity" of the Council's actions. These evidences of a more restrained attitude on the part of the United Kingdom and the United States are an additional indication of the wisdom of the restraint with which the Canadian Delegation acted on this subject.

7. The problem of Canada's relations with the countries of South East Asia, and the relations of Western Powers generally with this area, nevertheless remain serious. The action of the Dutch appears to the people of Asia, and in particular to the Indians, as a recrudescence of outmoded imperialism, and they are critical of the failure of Western European countries on the Security Council to insist upon punitive action against the Dutch. It may therefore be necessary to make certain that Canada's position is adequately understood, particularly in New Delhi.

1. A background memorandum outlining developments in Indonesia during 1948, the discussion of the Indonesian question in the Security Council during 1948 and the attitude of various interested governments towards this problem including the stand taken by Canada is being sent to you by this afternoon's bag.

2. You have already received by despatch or teletype copies of all communications dealing with the Indonesia question. From them you will be able to see the instructions which were sent to our representative in Paris. These instructions still stand.

3. An effort will probably be made by certain delegations to raise the question of the non-compliance of the Netherlands with certain parts of the Resolutions already agreed to by the Security Council in December. You will see the statement that Van Royen made indicating what steps the Netherlands Government would take to comply with the case-fire order, the release of political prisoners and facilities for the Good Offices Committee. We are inclined to doubt whether the Netherlands Government will go beyond these statements at this time and whether there is anything practicable that the Security Council can now do to ensure more literal adherence to its Resolutions.

4. Some question will probably be raised regarding a change in the terms of reference of the Good Offices Committee in view of the disappearance of one of the parties, the Indonesian Republic. It is a fact that the Indonesian Republic, as a more or less autonomous party to the dispute, has radically changed its form. However, we have no information that the Dutch intend to break up the Republic as a state. We think it would be unwise to be over-hasty in altering the terms of reference of the Good Offices Committee until it is possible to see more clearly just what future role it can appropriately play.

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Reference EX-17† and 18.²⁶

Stone saw Dean Rusk yesterday late afternoon to discuss Palestine and Indonesia. This message concerns itself with the latter problem. I shall deal with Palestine in a following teletype.

Rusk said that the problem of Indonesia was “crucifying” them. The State Department had hoped that some solution might be found before the serious effects of the mess on the most important aspects of United States foreign policy began to be felt, and before the United States itself (presumably as distinct from the United Nations as a member of the Security Council) was forced to get too tough with the Dutch—which, in Rusk’s view, would also have an adverse effect on foreign policy generally. He was very much afraid that this would not now be possible unless the Dutch themselves in the near future were to make some effective and dramatic move towards furthering Indonesian independence.

Rusk said that they were very deeply worried in the State Department about the increasing anti-Dutch sentiment in Congressional circles (particularly in the Senate). If this sentiment should continue to increase at its present rate he shuddered to think what might happen to E.R.P. legislation (on which hearings begin on January 24th), Atlantic Pact, etc. They were already under heavy pressure, he said, to use E.R.P. as a sanction. Quite apart from the fact that they had successfully maintained what he described as “the very wise decision” never to use E.R.P. as a political weapon—if one were once to start, where would it end?—the amount that Indonesia was actually receiving was a drop in the bucket in its national economy, and to cut it off would, in Rusk’s view, be an ineffective sanction if the Dutch were determined not to deviate from their present course.

Rusk was sure that E.R.P. and colonialism would get together in Congressional minds. There have already, in fact, been indications of this and he said that the people concerned in the State Department dreaded the embarrassing questions which might be put forward calling for explanations of E.R.P. assistance to the Netherlands in terms of Dutch action in Indonesia. An amusing, if it were not so serious, aspect of this situation is that it will offer a golden opportunity to Right-Wing Republicans to pose as Liberals.

In public opinion, Rusk said, forces are being let loose which might be uncontrollable. (He compared the situation to the anti-British feeling arising out of the Palestine business last June.) He said he was being "waited upon" two or three times daily by representatives of organizations which normally are 100% behind a firm and courageous United States foreign policy—National Council of Churches, C.I.O., A.F. of L., various women's organizations, etc.—protesting against Dutch action and urging the United States Government to take very strong and often irresponsible measures. Worst of all, he said he could see a possibility of this Indonesian trouble driving liberals and isolationists into each others arms.

He thought that official statements from here would be more and more condemnatory and tougher in tone. Cochrane has been withdrawn from Indonesia. They are impressed both in the State Department and in the Pentagon that without exception everyone from here who has been in Indonesia has gone out pro and returned anti-Dutch. The stupidity of the whole thing from the strictly military view horrifies the Pentagon.

Rusk asked whether we had put in a word of any kind with the Dutch, and if not would we consider doing so. Stone said that apart from what might have been said by Ritchie to Van Royen on a personal basis, he did not think we had. He undertook to pass on to you the suggestion that we might. In particular, Rusk thought, if you would agree, that it might be useful for us to emphasize to the Dutch the serious trend of Congressional and public opinion as we had observed it in the United States. He had the impression that there was a similar trend in Canada.

Finally, Rusk asked Stone to ask you most earnestly to pass along any ideas that you might have which would help towards a solution.

Since the above message was prepared, and only this morning, (due to holiday delays both in the Department and in this Embassy), a copy of your No. 170²⁷ to our Ambassador in the Hague has reached me. I shall inform Rusk of the line that Dupuy was instructed to take. I should be grateful if you would let me know if and when you send further instructions to Dupuy in the light of this message. Ends.

General McNaughton, in his capacity as president of the Security Council this month, will have the task of attempting to conciliate the opinions of the Security Council members on the Indonesian question. During the past week we have had an opportunity to observe reactions to developments in Indonesia and have noted increase of anti-Dutch sentiment which will certainly find expression in Security Council discussions. Declarations of Netherlands delegate at Security Council, while giving an indication of Dutch desire to respect Council's resolutions, are coming to be regarded as evasive in substance and not in fact indicating any willingness on part of Dutch to depart from original plans.

2. Canadian Ambassador in Washington has reported that popular and Congressional opinion (especially in Senate) in the United States is increasingly anti-Dutch and strong pressure is being put on American Government to take lead in measures against the Netherlands and to use ERP as a sanction.

3. Calling by India of conference of Asiatic nations to discuss ways of helping Indonesians is indicative of repercussions among Eastern countries. If Dutch fail to alter present policy and to make conciliatory moves, prospects of East-West division will be greatly increased and Indonesians will be encouraged to intensify guerilla activities and thus render solution of Indonesia's problems more difficult.

4. Popular opinion in Canada, while more cautious than that expressed in United States, shows a growing tendency to criticize Dutch and to urge that Canada's delegation to the Security Council take a stronger stand than at previous discussions on Indonesia.

5. In paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 170 of December 26 I stressed grievous consequences of Dutch action and heavy responsibility now resting on Netherlands to demonstrate the good faith of their intentions in regard to the ultimate solution in Indonesia. In view of trend in Canadian and United States public opinion and of strong possibility of Asiatic nations taking an irrevocable stand at forthcoming Delhi Conference, I would be glad if you would again communicate our views to the Netherlands authorities and inform them that unless some further generous concession is made very soon to assuage public opinion in Asian countries in particular we foresee increase in popular pressure on United States and Canadian Governments to adopt a sterner attitude toward Dutch policy in Indonesia and we foresee increasing difficulty on that account for Canadian Chairman of Security Council in maintaining discussion on a temperate and realistic basis. Reference your telegram No. 6, dated January 7th, concerning Indonesia.

2. Substance of your telegram was immediately communicated to the Netherlands Foreign Ministry who agree that something spectacular should be done to release tension before Tuesday's Security Council meeting.

3. They have called Batavia to request full details be sent to Van Royen concerning movements of military and consular observers, giving places where they have arrived or are proceeding to.

4. On his arrival in Batavia, Thursday last, Dr. Drees²⁸ had conversations with Netherlands local authorities and non-Republican Indonesian Federalists. Contact with Republican leaders established through latter, and first meeting including Federalists, Republicans and Dutch is scheduled to take place Monday, January 10th. It is not yet certain whether Van Royen will be able to report on these conversations as early as Tuesday.

5. Out of 23 Republican leaders captured by the Dutch, 19 have already been unconditionally released. Remaining 4 are Soekarno,²⁹ Hatta,³⁰ Salim³¹ and Sjahrir,³² and Netherlands Foreign Ministry has strongly advised Batavia to effect their early release, without knowing, however, how soon this could be done owing to local conditions.

6. Netherlands Cabinet has approved declaration to be made by Van Royen inviting foreign observers to come to Indonesia to supervise elections as in Greece and Korea. Instructions to this effect have to be confirmed by Drees from Batavia.

7. Foreign Minister hopes that outside world has appreciated spectacular moves of sending Netherlands Ambassador, London, and Prime Minister to Batavia, and of broadcast by the Queen renewing her mother's pledge to replace former Colonial regime by federation of free and equal partners on democratic basis.

INDONESIA

During the past week there has been a virtual cessation of hostilities in Indonesia. It is clear, however, particularly from discussions at Lake Success where the Security Council is considering Indonesia, that further action in regard to Indonesia will be expected from the Security Council.

2. General McNaughton presided at Lake Success on January 7 when Dr. van Royen, the Netherlands representative at the Security Council, made a statement that a cease-fire was now fully in effect in Indonesia and that several political prisoners had been released. However, Dr. van Royen admitted that President Soekarno, Premier Hatta and two other prominent Republican leaders were still in custody. The Netherlands policy was criticized by the representatives of India, the Philippines and Australia, the first two of whom suggested the United States should suspend Marshall Plan aid to the Netherlands.

3. One disturbing element in the Indonesian situation is the extent to which it is affecting Commonwealth relations. At a meeting of Commonwealth High Commissioners in London, the High Commissioners for India, Ceylon and Australia expressed vigorous dissatisfaction with United Kingdom policy, and urged the United Kingdom to join in an unequivocal condemnation of the action of the Dutch. The United Kingdom, however, is attempting to avoid action in the Security Council which would make it more difficult for the Netherlands Government to modify its policy, and at the same time is pressing the Netherlands authorities to establish an interim government in Indonesia at once, and to announce immediately the date for the transfer of power to the Indonesians.

4. Meanwhile, the Australian Delegation in New York is endeavouring to place before the Security Council a resolution condemning the Dutch and insisting that they withdraw their troops to the positions occupied prior to the recent police action. General McNaughton does not think that a resolution in this extreme form will carry. There is, however, a strong feeling in the Security Council that additional pressure should be put on the Dutch. He considers, therefore, that the Canadian Delegation should be permitted, if necessary, to support a resolution generally in the following terms:

(a) Regretting the fact that the Netherlands authorities have not yet fully complied with the resolutions of December 24 and 28. (These are the resolutions calling for a cease-fire and the liberation of Indonesian political leaders.)

(b) Requesting the Committee of Good Offices to submit specific proposals for the restoration of peaceful conditions in Indonesia, and for the resumption of negotiations between the Dutch and the Indonesian leaders. (A resolution in similar terms was put forward by the Canadian Representative during the meetings of the Security Council in Paris, but did not then have sufficient support for adoption.)

RE: INDONESIA

During the past week there have been no hostilities in Indonesia apart from sporadic guerilla activities by scattered Republican bands. Premier Willem Drees of the Netherlands is now in Indonesia and it is reported from The Hague that negotiations are progressing between Republican and non-Republican Indonesians and the Dutch. Despite the Security Council resolution of December 28, calling for the liberation of Indonesian political leaders, President Soekarno and Premier Hatta are among those still in custody.

2. Considerable pressure has been put on the Netherlands Government to make some dramatic and immediate move towards demonstrating their good faith in Indonesia. Canada has pointed out to the Netherlands Government the necessity for some such move before the conference, on January 20, of Asiatic nations who were called together by Mr. Nehru to discuss ways and means of helping Indonesia.

3. A stiffening of United States policy towards the Netherlands was indicated at the Security Council meeting of January 11, when Dr. Jessup, the United States representative, made a vigorous denunciation of the Dutch and stated they had failed to comply with the Council's resolutions calling for a cease-fire and release of prisoners. Dr. Jessup was strongly critical of the Netherlands Government's failure to co-operate with the Committee of Good Offices in Indonesia. He went on to suggest some of the fundamental principles which the United States Government considered should be incorporated in any Security Council resolution aimed at resolving the present dispute.

4. Discussion on Indonesia was resumed at the Security Council meeting of Friday, January 14, at which Dr. van Royen, Netherlands representative, replied to Security Council criticisms of Netherlands policy which, he said, had shown "obvious bias and unfairness". Dr. van Royen reiterated previous claims that the Security Council was not competent in the Indonesian question and suggested that this question of competence be submitted to the International Court of Justice. At the end of his statement, Dr. van Royen gave an outline of his Government's plans for the future of Indonesia which were to include the transfer of sovereignty to the United States of Indonesia in the course of 1950. The Canadian delegate has reported by telephone that Dr. van Royen's statement was so carefully hedged around with qualifications that it did not make a favourable impression on members of the Council.

5. Attached copy of telegram No. 51 of January 14† gives a text of a proposed United States resolution which spells out in some detail the steps which the United States consider should be taken to resolve the Indonesian dispute. This resolution leaves little latitude for the Dutch and provides for:

- (a) release of political prisoners.
- (b) reconstitution of the government of the Republic of Indonesia.
- (c) deadlines for the accomplishment of various steps leading to the establishment of a Federal Government for Indonesia and transfer of Netherlands sovereignty.
- (d) endowing the Commission with powers to recommend solutions of problems if the parties do not agree.

6. The Security Council will meet again on Monday afternoon. It is hoped that agreement can be reached on a resolution by Wednesday, January 19 as the Asian Conference has been called for January 20 and the United States Presidential inauguration also takes place on that date and will tie things up for the rest of the week. General McNaughton is meeting with the United States and United Kingdom delegates on Monday morning at eleven o'clock and wishes to be able to give them some indication at that time of our attitude toward the United States draft resolution. He has learned that the United Kingdom will probably support the resolution. The United States delegate has asked if we would be prepared to sponsor the resolution jointly with other members. General McNaughton thinks the resolution is a good one and recommends that we support it. The Cubans and Australians are trying to promote stronger resolutions. General McNaughton thinks that, with some minor amendments, the United States draft resolution is workable and while it will not be liked by the Dutch, it is probably the best they can get.

7. I recommend that we inform General McNaughton that he can tell his United Kingdom and United States colleagues that there has been a generally favourable reaction to the draft resolution here. We would, however, like a little more time to consider the workability of its detailed provisions and to learn the reactions of other delegations including the Netherlands. However, should the resolution be pressed to a vote before he can consult with us further, he may support the resolution with any minor amendments he considers would improve its workability.³³

E[SCOTT] R[EID]

³³ Notes marginales/Marginal notes:

I agree with the above. Why shouldn't we raise the point in discussion of the resolution as to what, if anything, the Security Council is prepared to do if a reconstituted Indonesian Govt is quite unable to maintain law & order or to prevent its extremists crossing the boundary and murdering Dutch & Indonesian-Dutch citizens. I saw the Netherlands Chargé d'Affaires this afternoon who told me that his government could not possibly accept the United States resolution on the Indonesian question which is, according to their information, to be produced today at the Security Council. He went over the objections they had to this resolution, with which you are already familiar. I told him that we also had some reservations on certain parts of the resolution, but I did not give him any details about our proposed amendments. Van Blokland³⁴ felt that the resolution was so bad from their point of view that it was beyond amendment, but I told him that he should wait and see what could be done to it before coming to any decision.

Van Blokland was particularly incensed at the reports which the G.O.C. were now sending back from Java and which he said were false and possibly malicious.

I also emphasized the very great importance of the Netherlands Government going to the extreme limit, and then beyond that, in concessions to make it possible for their friends to support them in this unhappy business. He said that on this point his government hoped to be able to produce very shortly some positive proposals which would help. He agreed that it was not enough merely to damn resolutions to which they objected and that they must produce something on their own which was acceptable to other democratic countries as well as to their own public opinion.

Your telegram No. 51 of January 14† forwarding text of United States draft resolution on Indonesia.

2. This draft resolution would be generally acceptable to us with the three changes outlined in paragraph 6 of this telegram.

³⁴ Jonkheer G. Beelaerts van Blokland, conseiller, ambassade des Pays-bas au Canada.

Jonkheer G. Beelaerts van Blokland, Counsellor, Embassy of the Netherlands in Canada.

3. We recognize the need for the Security Council to assume a more positive role in the Indonesian dispute at this time by setting a timetable for the achievement of Indonesian self-government and through empowering the Committee of Good Offices to recommend solutions where the Netherlands and Indonesian Republicans fail to agree. At the same time, there are certain dangers in the Security Council attempting to lay down a comprehensive and far-reaching programme such as those contained in the U.S. resolution. A realistic balance should be found between the need for giving public assurance of international support for the legitimate aspirations of Indonesian nationalists for the early realization of full self-government and the need to ensure the workability of any proposed solution by making it possible for the Netherlands to go along with the plan. You might therefore continue to make use of your position as President of the Security Council to avoid being too closely identified at the outset with any one proposed solution. We suggest, therefore, that you limit yourself to informing the United Kingdom and the United States delegations informally and confidentially that there has been a generally favourable reaction to the draft resolution in Ottawa. You might add that you would hope to be able to support the resolution but that your final attitude would depend to some extent upon the amendments made in the draft resolution and the reactions of other delegations. You would not be able to act as a joint sponsor of the resolution in its present form. You would then go on to discuss our proposed amendments outlined in paragraph 6 below.

4. If you have not been able to secure these amendments at the informal meeting in the morning, and if the resolution in its present form is submitted to the Council, you should, at the conclusion of the general debate in the Council on this draft resolution, say that you thought that the United States draft resolution merited careful clause by clause consideration. In the detailed discussion of the draft resolution, you should then endeavour to secure inclusion of changes proposed in paragraph 6 below. In addition, if there is any evidence that the Dutch have not rejected this draft resolution out of hand and are giving serious consideration to the workability of its provisions from their point of view, you should make an effort to see that any constructive amendments they may suggest are given due consideration.

5. Before the resolution is brought to a vote you should ask for instructions on whether you could support it, letting us know whether you are reasonably satisfied that in the light of the discussions and the amendments adopted the resolution is a reasonably viable one.

6. We have three amendments to the United States draft resolution to suggest:

(a) Transfer of Sovereignty to U.S.I. We think it would be desirable to consider some qualification of the terminal date for the transfer of sovereignty to the United States of Indonesia. Otherwise it might be claimed by the Netherlands that by refusing to negotiate in good faith for the conclusion of a statute of Netherlands-Indonesian Union the United States of Indonesia could achieve complete separation from the Netherlands. While this may be an inherent right and possible ultimate development it is not contemplated in the Linggadjatti and Renville Agreements. We therefore suggest that a semicolon should be placed at the end of paragraph 3(c) and the following words added immediately thereafter, "provided that if no agreement on the terms of the Netherlands-Indonesian Union is reached by March 1, 1950, the Commission shall immediately report to the Security Council with its recommendations for a solution of the difficulties."

(b) Commission Voting Procedure. This is a controversial point. In the past the Belgian member of the GOC has been able to exercise a sort of veto power by refusing to subscribe to sections of the reports proposed by the other two members of the GOC. On the other hand there is a possible danger that the Australian and United States members of the commission may act impetuously on occasion. We are inclined to think, therefore, that consideration should be given to amending the last sentence of the first provision of paragraph 4 to read, "The Commission shall make its recommendations to the parties by majority vote. However, its reports and recommendations to the Security Council shall present both majority and minority views if there is a difference of opinion among the members of the Commission."

(c) Return of Administration to the Republican Government. In our opinion the fourth provision of paragraph 4 should be amended so that the Commission would be empowered only to "recommend" and not to "determine" the extent to which areas should be progressively returned to the administration of the Government of the Republic of Indonesia. We suggest therefore that this provision might be amended to read as follows: "The Commission shall, after consultation with the parties, recommend the extent to which, consistent with reasonable requirements of public security, areas in Java, Sumatra and Medura (outside of the city of Jogjakarta) should be progressively returned to the administration of the Government of the Republic of Indonesia, and shall supervise such transfer. The Commission shall, after consultation with the parties, recommend, which if any Netherlands forces shall be retained temporarily in any area in order to assist in the maintenance of law and order. Should either of the parties find itself unable to accept the recommendations of the Commission mentioned in this paragraph, the Commission shall report immediately to the Security Council with its further recommendations for a solution of the difficulties."

My telegram No. 69. Indonesia.

1. We understand that the United States and United Kingdom delegations are impressed with the desirability of getting a resolution on Indonesia passed before the Asian Conference meets in Delhi on January 20. As President of the Council you will have considerable responsibility for the timetable of the debate. It may be useful to you to have our views on some of the considerations that should be taken into account in determining the timetable for the debate.

2. The advantage in having a resolution on Indonesia through before January 20 would appear to be that it would go a long way toward dissuading delegations to the Asian Conference from taking action which would circumvent the Security Council or making more difficult a solution of the Indonesian dispute. If a Security Council resolution had been passed, the delegations to the Asian Conference might be content with getting off some oratory, endorsing the Security Council resolution, and going home. On the other hand they might not feel that the resolution adopted went far enough and might press for a further Security Council resolution or take some direct action.

3. If the United States draft resolution had been discussed but had not yet been brought to a final vote at the time of the Asian Conference, the delegations to the Asian Conference might be content to urge passage of the United States draft resolution with such amendments as were discussed at the Conference. In other words the Conference would be given a live and yet reasonably safe subject to discuss and would not be tempted to criticize a decision that the Security Council had already taken, or to take action to circumvent the Security Council. Their discussion would be directed toward assisting the Security Council to determine on a suitable resolution. In this case the Security Council could return to its discussion of the United States draft resolution after the United States Presidential Inauguration weekend, having the benefit of the views of the delegations to the Asian Conference and the well-considered reactions of the Dutch.

4. There may be some pressure put on you as President of the Council to press the draft United States resolution to a vote by Wednesday night. As suggested in the previous paragraph we do not think the reasons for getting a resolution through before January 20 are overwhelming. We do not therefore think that you need permit yourself or the debate to be hustled. This United States draft resolution has such far-reaching implications that there should be provision for the fullest discussion. At the same time we would not wish you as President of the Council to have to assume the responsibility for stalling off a vote without having the concurrence of some of the more important delegations in such action. If you think it wise, therefore, you may discuss the considerations outlined in paragraphs two and three above on a highly confidential basis with your United Kingdom and United States colleagues.

1. We are glad to note the improvements in the draft resolution. We find difficulty, however, in understanding the United States delegation's objection to our suggested amendment to sub-paragraph (c) of paragraph 3. You state that they consider that no proviso is necessary to this sub-paragraph since it must be read within the context of the first clause of the paragraph. This does not seem to be consistent with the fact that they have agreed to a proviso to sub-paragraph (a) of the same paragraph, which is governed by the same first clause. Moreover the first clause of the paragraph does not make any specific reference to the establishment of the Netherlands-Indonesian Union as envisaged in the Linggadjati and Renville Agreements and therefore sub-paragraph (c) as it now stands could well be interpreted to mean that all the Indonesians have to do is to stall the negotiations and get complete independence outside the Union by July 1, 1950. I should be grateful if you would point this out to the United States delegation and again advance the amendment which we have already suggested.

2. You may inform the United States and the other delegations concerned in this draft that it is in general satisfactory. Nevertheless, we reserve the right after it has been introduced, to put forward certain amendments to improve it.

1. If you find it necessary to make any statement concerning Indonesia, you might consider including in your statement a reference to the following points:—

(a) In Indonesian, Palestine and Kashmir questions, Security Council has followed a general pattern of procedure. This has been to call for a cease fire as a first step, and to regard maintenance of peaceful conditions as a primary objective of great importance. Council has then proceeded to consider and adopt proposals of one kind or another leading to negotiations in some form for a peaceful settlement of the question. This method of procedure will not be satisfactory unless it is followed with a reasonable degree of consistency in all cases. The Canadian Delegation, therefore, is concerned over the fact that statements in the Council during the last few months seem to indicate that some members have regarded the cease fire orders in, say Palestine, as being of less urgent and immediate importance than those issued elsewhere. It has been the policy of the Canadian Delegation to attach great importance to action in Security Council calling for a cease fire, and it is our view that, whatever the circumstances, the parties concerned should make every effort immediately to comply when the Council calls upon them to introduce a cease fire.

(b) During the discussions of the Indonesian question, reference has been made to the fact that the Security Council is acting in a more positive manner in regard to the situation in Indonesia than it has in regard to other situations which are equally urgent and even more dangerous to the peace of the world. Particular reference has been made to the situation in the Balkans. Council has not so far, in regard to any question brought before it, endeavoured to do more than bring an end to fighting and to make provision for negotiations to be undertaken. It is regrettable that in some cases the operation of the veto has prevented the Security Council from taking even this preliminary action. This, however, need not prevent the Security Council from taking action which it deems appropriate where it is advisable to do so. It does, however, lay a heavy responsibility on any power like the U.S.S.R. which enjoys the privilege of the veto and which uses it for the purpose of preventing the Security Council from taking even preliminary steps to put an end to fighting and to bring about a peaceful settlement of a dispute, in the case of states in which they have a particular interest, while in other parts of the world they press for drastic and punitive action.

(c) The necessity for an orderly and peaceful development of political change in the Netherlands East Indies has been emphasized in the draft resolution. In this way, responsibilities have been placed not only on the Netherlands, but also upon the Indonesian authorities. The Council must be prepared to regard seriously any inability or failure on the part of the authorities in Indonesia to fulfill these responsibilities and to protect both life and property in the areas under their jurisdiction during the course of the negotiations.

1. In accordance with your instructions I again pressed the United States delegation to accept the amendment to sub-paragraph (c) of paragraph 3 which you suggested. I have the additional arguments contained in your message No. 84, namely that their objection to our suggested amendment would not appear to be consistent with the fact that they had agreed to a similar proviso to sub-paragraph (a) of the same paragraph. The United States delegation have agreed for their part to the following amendment, and are prepared to urge acceptance on the delegations associated with them in sponsorship, Begins:

(1) Delete the proviso in sub-paragraph 3 (a). (2) Add an additional sub-paragraph (d) to read as follows: "Provided that if no agreement is reached by one month prior to the dates referred to in sub-paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) above, the Commission referred to in paragraph 4 below, or such other United Nations agency which may be established in accordance with paragraph 4, shall immediately report to the Security Council with its recommendations for a solution of the difficulties." Ends.

2. You will note that this amendment fully covers the proposal given in your teletype No. 69 of 17th January. I propose therefore, unless I hear to the contrary, to accept this wording.

3. You state in your paragraph 2 that I may inform the United States delegation that the draft in present form is "in general satisfactory" but that "we reserve the right, after it has been introduced to put forward certain amendments to improve it."

4. You will recall that in paragraph 3 of your teletype No. 69 of 17th January you instructed me to inform the United States delegation that there had been a "generally favourable reaction to the draft resolution in Ottawa" and that I "would hope to be able to support the resolution."

5. I recognize the tactical advantages of preserving freedom of action as regards acceptance of verbal changes which might improve the resolution as it may be finally adopted. However, the instructions under which the United States delegation is at present operating require it to have advance (repeat advance) assurance from any six other delegations that they will vote in favour before they may introduce the draft resolution.

6. As my present instructions do not enable me to give such an assurance, and also in view of certain amendments proposed by the United Kingdom delegation, the United States delegation was unable to undertake to introduce a draft resolution at the meeting called for this afternoon and I was therefore obliged to seek the consent of the members of the Council to a postponement for twenty-four hours. In view of the march of events I am sure you will appreciate that it would be most unfortunate if a third postponement could possibly be ascribed to Canada. I understand that the United Kingdom delegation are clarifying their position with London this afternoon.

7. I should be grateful if you could let me know, if at all possible this afternoon, if I may give the United States delegation the following assurance: "Canada will support and vote in favour of the resolution as now amended; if further verbal changes for the purpose of clarification are found necessary, we will consider these on their merits, but if they are not accepted we will support the agreed text as introduced."

8. Since dictating the foregoing I have been informed by Cadogan that the United Kingdom delegation now has authority to vote for (repeat for) the resolution. The clarification of our position is therefore immediately essential.

We shall not ourselves propose any further amendments to it. If changes are proposed by other delegations, we will consider them on their merits; but if they are rejected by the Council, we will support and vote for the agreed text as introduced. UNQUOTE.

2. In this way you will remain free to support in the Council proposals for changes in the resolution which might make it more satisfactory to the Dutch. If any proposed changes of this nature which you supported, were not accepted by the Council, you would then support the agreed text as introduced.

3. I presume that the text of the new sub-paragraph (d) of paragraph 3 of the resolution should refer to "such other United Nations agency as may be established" rather than "which may be established."

Your telegram no. 19 of January 20, re Indonesia.

1. Resolution concerning Indonesia will be introduced in Security Council today by United States Delegation and will be supported by the United Kingdom, China, Cuba, Egypt, Norway and Canada.

2. As discussions in Security Council on Indonesia developed last week, it seemed probable that two or three draft resolutions on Indonesia would be introduced into the Security Council, none of which would secure sufficient support for adoption. The United States Delegation, therefore, undertook to attempt preparation of a draft resolution which could be supported by members such as Cuba who advocated strong action, and also by members such as the United Kingdom and ourselves who had taken a more moderate position. The United States Delegation made it clear from the first that in taking this action it was seeking only to discover whether sufficient agreement could be reached to carry some resolution in the Council, and that it did not intend to submit the draft resolution unless it had assurances that at least seven votes would be cast for it.

3. The Canadian Delegation was instructed to secure three amendments to the draft resolution proposed by the United States Delegation, which we thought would make it less onerous upon the Dutch and easier for them to accept. All these amendments were incorporated in the resolution, and the Canadian Delegation has consequently agreed to support it. We have, however, reserved the right to consider on its merits any amendments to the resolution which may be put forward. We have in mind particularly the possibility that changes in the resolution may yet be made which will make it acceptable to the Netherlands Government.

4. My immediately following two telegrams contain the text of the instructions which were sent to the Security Council Delegation informing General McNaughton that he might support the amended resolution and suggestions to him concerning any statement which he might make in the course of discussions.

5. I should be grateful if you would explain our position to the Netherlands authorities, and in doing so, state that we have been genuinely concerned not to give our support to a resolution unless it has been couched in the most moderate and reasonable terms possible. It is for the Netherlands Government to decide, of course, what attitude it will adopt toward the resolution. We hope, however, that they will eventually formulate their policy in accordance with it. We would be fully prepared to consider on its merits any amendment to the resolution which might be introduced in the Security Council for the purpose of making it more acceptable to the Netherlands authorities, and we shall also, in any statement which is made by the Delegation, lay emphasis on the necessity for maintaining order and protecting life and property in Indonesia.

Indonesia.

Upon receipt of your instructions contained in your teletype No. 88, 20th January, an assurance of Canadian support for the [US?] draft resolution was given to the United States delegation in the terms which you specified.

2. The United States delegation upon receiving this assurance circulated, as Document S/1219 of 21st January,† a draft resolution jointly with China, Cuba and Norway. The text, which includes the amendment proposed in our teletype No. 79 of 20th January and which was approved in your message under reference, is given in my preceding teletype en clair.

3. The Council met on the afternoon of Friday, 21st January, and three of the sponsors, Cuba, the United States and China, gave explanatory comments on the text, stressing that the text was essentially a compromise between differing points of view and was not expected to please either party completely or indeed any of the sponsors.

4. Jessup in his statement explained that the resolution was based upon four premises:

(a) The Council must continue to concern itself with the Indonesian question and has an obligation to help reach a pacific settlement.

(b) There were, and are, two parties to the dispute and the realities of this situation have been established by the fact that both parties have agreed to sign an agreement "under the auspices of our agency" (Renville Agreement).

(c) "We do not believe the Council can put its seal of approval on the results of the recent military action...the problem before us is not whether the troops should be withdrawn; the real problem is the method and timing of withdrawal."

(d) "The negotiations should be assisted by an agency of this Council. Both parties have heretofore accepted such assistance; we assume they will continue to accept it."

5. The representative of Belgium also made a general statement in which he recalled the doubts which his delegation have had all along about the competence of the Security Council to deal with the Indonesian question and made the suggestion, which however was not made in a formal proposal, that the question of competence be referred to the International Court.

6. Malik made a statement severely criticizing the draft resolution in detail, particularly the provisions concerning troop withdrawal. He contended that the draft resolution represented a "deal" designed to shield the Dutch aggressors and to protect American monopolies in Indonesia.

7. I consulted both delegations as to a convenient time for the next meeting. Both the Netherlands and Republican representatives wished to have time to consult their Governments and accordingly I have arranged the next meeting for Tuesday afternoon, 25th January, at 3:00 p.m.

8. The preliminary reaction of both parties, though guarded in the absence of instructions from their Governments, indicates that it satisfies neither side. Dr. Palar indicated that the influences of compromise had in his view watered down the effectiveness of the original United States draft, particularly on the question of troop withdrawal. He had received a message from Hatta through the Committee of Good Offices indicating that Messrs. Sjahrir and Leimena would be consulting with Hatta at Bangka and that qualified officials of the Republic would be sent to Lake Success. Van Royen said that he would have to wait until his Prime Minister returned to The Hague before he could get authoritative reaction but he said that he was not very hopeful about acceptance.

Indonesia.

Yesterday I sent a memorandum to the Prime Minister concerning the memorandum which the Netherlands Charge left with us yesterday for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister agreed that I should see the Netherlands Charge this morning and try to explain to him our position in regard to the Netherlands memorandum and to suggest to him that the Netherlands authorities consider whether the resolution now before the Security Council could not be made the basis for their future policy in Indonesia, in spite of their misgivings.

2. At my request, Beelaerts came to see me this morning for a 20-minute talk. Reid was also present.

3. He emphasized that the reconstitution of the Republic would create grave psychological difficulties within Indonesia; in particular, it would perpetuate the division among Indonesians between Republicans and Federalists; the Federalists were as good Nationalists as the Republicans. In the opinion of the Netherlands Government a solution could only be achieved if the Federalists and the Republicans got together and worked out their own destiny. The resolution would also put a premium on delaying tactics by the Republicans and would stop all progress towards the goal of self-government.

4. I explained frankly to Beelaerts that with very great difficulty we had succeeded in securing United States acceptance of three amendments to the earlier draft of their resolution; that as a price for securing these amendments we had agreed to support the resolution, with the precise understanding, however, that we would be prepared to consider, on their merits, any amendments which any delegation moved to the resolution, and if we considered those amendments to be good we would vote for them. However, if the amendments were rejected we would vote for the resolution as introduced.

5. We had been fully conscious of the danger that the resolution, as originally drafted, might put a premium on delaying tactics by the Indonesians. For this reason we had urged the addition of a general proviso and this has been accepted.

6. The point which I emphasized most in speaking to Beelaerts was that it seemed to us that the passage of the resolution in its present form would, on balance, be in the interests of the Netherlands. The resolution places squarely on the Republicans an obligation to call off guerrilla warfare and to negotiate in good faith with the Netherlands authorities. If the Republicans were unwilling or unable to carry out their obligation to call off guerrilla warfare their incapacity would be demonstrated to the governments and peoples of the world. There would thus be a public demonstration of the validity of the Netherlands position on this question and the hands of the Netherlands Government would eventually be strengthened. The Security Council would then be faced with a situation where it might well be compelled to authorize the Netherlands to act on its behalf in restoring order.

7. If the Republicans demonstrated that they were unwilling to negotiate in good faith, this might, as the Netherlands feared, put off the effective date for the establishment of the Indonesian Union. On the other hand, such a demonstration would again strengthen the hands of the Netherlands.

8. Without questioning the Netherlands contention that the resolution in its present form would create psychological difficulties within Indonesia, I thought that this disadvantage ought to be balanced against the advantage that its acceptance by the Netherlands would serve to lessen the psychological difficulties in the Security Council and in the countries represented on the Security Council. There was a very strong feeling in many of those countries, including our own, that the Netherlands had committed an act of aggression last month. For this reason I indicated that it was scarcely practical politics to suggest that the resolution should not propose a reconstitution of the Republic.

9. I asked whether there was perhaps not another psychological difficulty which arose out of the personnel of the proposed Commission and I suggested that if this were so perhaps something might be done to change the personnel of the Commission, though I could give no assurance that the United States would be willing to consider such a suggestion favourably.

10. Finally, I urged that the Netherlands Government might examine carefully the effect of the amendments which had been made in the resolution at our insistence. I hoped that such an examination might lead them to conclude that in their total effect these amendments went far to meet their position. I again repeated that we would be most happy to consider on their merits any proposals for further amendment which the Netherlands Government might care to put up.

11. Beelaerts made it clear that his Government appreciated all that we had been trying to do on their behalf as a candid friend.

12. I should be grateful if you would speak to van Roijen in the sense of my talk this morning with Beelaerts. I am repeating this telegram to our Ambassador in The Hague and asking him to speak in the same sense to the Netherlands Government.

13. The next move, it seems to me, is up to the Netherlands and I most fervently hope that at the next meeting of the Security Council the Netherlands delegation will be authorized to adopt a most conciliatory and forthcoming attitude and to take the present resolution now before the Security Council as the basis for their future policy in Indonesia in spite of their misgivings.

14. Subsequent to my interview with Beelaerts the latter telephoned Riddell to say that he had reported his conversation with me this morning to Dr. van Roijen in New York. Beelaerts said that van Roijen had replied that there was no possibility of the resolution being acceptable to the Dutch. In the first place, the very fact that the resolution had been tabled had resulted in a complete cessation of negotiations between the Netherlands authorities in Indonesia and the Indonesian leaders. The Netherlands Government regarded this as evidence that interference by the Security Council only complicated their task in Indonesia. Van Roijen added that the resolution would be unacceptable. In the words of Beelaerts, it made the Netherlands into a kind of "stooge of the Security Council". Since the Security Council had always been prepared to pay more attention to the claims of the Indonesians than to those of the Dutch, the Netherlands authorities could not put themselves in a position where their decisions in Indonesia might be overridden by the Security Council. Ends.

Indonesia. Begins:

Upon receipt of your instructions contained in your message No. 102 of January 22nd, I got in touch with Van Royen and arranged to see him first thing Monday morning, January 24th. I told Van Royen of your interview with the Netherlands' Charge in Ottawa on Saturday and spoke to him about the draft resolution introduced in the Council on the Indonesian question, in the sense of your talk with Beelaerts. In particular I repeated that it is the fervent hope of the Canadian Government that, at the next meeting of the Council, the Netherlands' delegation will be authorized to adopt the most conciliatory and forthcoming attitude and to take the present resolution as the basis for their future policy in Indonesia, in spite of their misgivings.

2. Van Royen told me that he had not yet received instructions from his Government as the Prime Minister had returned to the Hague only on Sunday and had been ordered to rest by his doctors. The Netherlands Cabinet was meeting today, January 24th. He would, of course, draw the views of the Canadian Government to the attention of the Netherlands Government and expressed appreciation both for the modifications introduced in the original draft resolution as well as for the frank and friendly advice which had been offered by us both in Ottawa and in New York.

3. He said, however, that the preliminary reactions in the Hague were not favourable and that he would be misleading us if he did not say that the resolution, as a whole, was considered unacceptable. The most that he hoped was to persuade the Netherlands Government not to instruct him to say this outright at the next meeting of the Council on Tuesday. He explained, that the resolution as a whole, in its approach to the problem was objectionable to the Netherlands Government mainly on the following grounds:

(a) It represented a statement of lack of confidence on the part of the United Nations in general, and the Security Council in particular, in the policies and motives of the Netherlands Government in Indonesia and proposed to place the Netherlands Government in Indonesia under what Van Royen termed the "tutorship" of the Security Council.

(b) By restoring the Republican Government it would give the Republicans a renewed prestige and power which would make negotiations difficult, if not impossible, as the Republicans would look to the Council and its Commission in Indonesia for support and this in turn might make the Federalists side with the Republicans.

(c) That the Security Council, by the terms of this resolution, was singling out the Netherlands for especially harsh treatment. Repeating previous arguments used in the Council, Van Royen said that the people of the Netherlands could not help seeing that the Council had appeared more critical of Netherlands' policy in Indonesia than in analogous cases (and he mentioned the attitude of Israel in Palestine and India over Hyderabad). He said that the Calvinist streak in the Dutch character rebelled against what they thought to be an injustice to the Netherlands and that the Netherlands Government had, of necessity, to take the present state of public opinion in the Netherlands into account in determining its policy. Summarising this position Van Royen said that the Netherlands Government felt that they must oppose this resolution both on grounds of principle as well as on practical grounds.

4. I urged Van Royen, nonetheless, to take into full consideration the arguments which we had put to his Government counselling moderation and restraint at this time. I expressed again the hope that the Netherlands Government would not reject the resolution out of hand, especially in view of the modifications which had been made in its terms and which now provided the framework for resuming negotiations. I emphasized the argument that the resolution in its present form would, in fact, be in the overall interests of the Netherlands, for the reasons given in your telegram and also that it represented the only way in which the United Nations could be employed as a moderating influence in the negotiations, ultimately and in stabilizing the result by putting world public opinion behind it.

5. I also assured Van Royen, in accordance with your instructions, that if the Netherlands delegation, or any other delegation, proposed amendments to the present resolution, we would be prepared to consider them on their merits, and, if we believed that they would improve the resolution by making it more capable of implementation, we would support them. Van Royen indicated that he might have one or two verbal changes to suggest but in view of their fundamental objections to the principles of the resolution, he doubted whether it could be made acceptable to his Government by amendment.

6. As regards the possibility of a change in representation on the Committee of Good Offices or the Commission, raised in paragraph 8 of your telegram No. 99† of January 22nd, Van Royen said that, in conversation with Jessup, he had tentatively raised this point by suggesting that the present representatives on the CGO might be replaced on the Commission by men of more senior rank. Jessup had indicated that, as far as the United States member was concerned (Cochran), he thought that the State Department would not be willing to replace him. I shall, however, take the first opportunity of discussing this question informally with my colleagues as you suggest. Ends.

Telephone Message from Ambassador in The Netherlands

[The Hague, January 26, 1949]

MESSAGE TELEPHONED TO MR. REID BY MR. DUPUY FROM THE HAGUE, 4:30 P.M.,
JANUARY 26, 1949

I had a conversation this afternoon with the Prime Minister about the present Indonesian deadlock. He confirmed that his Government could not accept the United States resolution for reasons already stated.

2. I took upon myself to ask his opinion on this purely personal (repeat personal) suggestion

(a) that van Roijen declare at the Security Council that his Government would accept conference at which only representatives of Indonesian population could participate.

(b) This would exclude Netherlands, the Committee of Good Offices, Security Council, Asiatic and any foreign interference.

(c) This conference could be convoked at once and would take place in neutral country. We mentioned Island of Malta or Switzerland.

(d) The only term of reference approved by Netherlands and Security Council would be establishment of separate government covering all of Indonesia and preparations of free elections for setting up of United States of Indonesia within Dutch Indonesian Union. Dutch would have no objection to United States of Indonesia being called a republic.

(e) Delegates to conference would be designated on basis of proportional representation and could include any Republican leaders.

3. Meanwhile status quo would be maintained in Indonesia and United States resolution postponed or withdrawn at Security Council until results of conference are known.

4. Prime Minister said he would be favourable to suggestion and would consult his Cabinet at once.

5. It occurs to me while drafting that if above suggestion or proposal were made by President of Security Council it would carry more weight than if made by Netherlands representative.

Foreign Office has been consulted and approved suggestion and the rest of the Cabinet will be consulted within a few hours. End of message.

Following for Dupuy from Reid, Begins: Indonesia. Your telephone message this afternoon. I have not yet been able to discuss this with Mr. Pearson.

2. My preliminary view is that a suggestion of this character would have to be put forward by the Netherlands representative at the Security Council. In doing so, he would have to be in a position to state pretty clearly how a general proposal for an Indonesian conference of this character is to be operated. There would be many points on which clarification would be required. Among those which have occurred to us are the following:

(a) How would the delegates to the conference be designated in such a way as to satisfy Indonesians generally, other interested powers, and the Security Council of their representative character?

(b) What would be the terms of reference of the conference? Would the purpose of the conference only be to agree on the formation of an Interim Cabinet which would operate within the terms of the framework already laid down by the Netherlands for the Interim Federal Government in the Royal Decree of December 18, 1948? Or would the conference be empowered to determine the form and powers of the Interim Federal Government pending the elections and convening of a constitutional convention? If the conference were given such powers, how far would they be restricted by powers already reserved to the individual states in agreements between the Netherlands and individual states?

(c) What arrangements are envisaged for the conference? Would the Secretariat of the conference be supplied by the United Nations?

(d) What powers would continue to be held during the interim period by the Netherlands (including the High Representative of the Crown) after the formation of the interim government by the conference? It is noted that you suggest that the status quo would be maintained in Indonesia until the results of the conference are known. The problem arises of how powers would be handed over to the new government after the conference and what powers would be handed over.

(e) What powers does the Netherlands Government consider should be reserved to the Netherlands-Indonesian union and how would these powers be administered?

3. McNaughton as President of the Security Council could not introduce a resolution of this character without (a) pretty full information on the above points, (b) knowledge of Netherlands acceptance of the plan, and (c) assurance that the plan had a workable measure of support from other members of the Council. The situation is further complicated by the fact that McNaughton has, as you know, already given assurance of his support for the United States draft resolution. In giving this assurance of support he told the United States representative that he reserved the right to support any amendments to the draft resolution on their merits which might be introduced during the discussions in the Council. We understand that Van Royen has already suggested some minor textual changes in the United States draft resolution. If the proposal for a conference of this nature appeals to the Netherlands Government perhaps it could be introduced into the United States draft resolution as an additional provision. We have not had time as yet to consider how this could be done. In our view such a proposal would have to come from the Netherlands.

4. As you are probably aware the Security Council meets again tomorrow (Thursday) morning at eleven. McNaughton has informed us that it is possible that the United States draft resolution may come to a vote then. McNaughton has already taken responsibility for postponing discussion of the Indonesian question on two occasions. It would be asking a good deal of him to request a further adjournment of the debate unless the Netherlands representative was in a position to make a statement indicating that his Government expected to be in a position to accept the general terms of the United States draft resolution but wished a little more time to consider the wording of certain amendments, possibly including one relating to a conference of Indonesian leaders such as you have suggested, which in their view would make the resolution more workable.

1. Dupuy's suggestion for a conference between Indonesian Federalists and Republican leaders leading to the establishment of an Interim Federal Government, reached me through telephone conversations which Ignatieff had with the Department on the night of Wednesday, 26th January, and the morning of Thursday, 27th January. It was accompanied with the suggestion that I seek postponement of a decision by the Council on the joint draft resolution.

2. I was given to understand that the suggestion had also been recommended by the United States Ambassador at The Hague and also by the United Kingdom Ambassador. After consulting Washington, the United States representative, Jessup, informed me emphatically that any views expressed by Mr. Baruch at The Hague did not (repeat not) represent the policy of the United States Government. Cadogan, after consulting London, said he also was given to understand that the United Kingdom Government was not prepared to alter its position, namely, it would continue to support the joint draft resolution whenever it came to the vote.

3. These positions were reported in a conversation between Reid and Ignatieff by telephone and I understand that Reid, after consulting the Minister, suggested that I say to Van Royen that, if he (Van Royen), after consulting with The Hague, was able to put forward some new constructive proposal capable of amalgamation with the joint draft resolution, and was able to indicate that such a proposal, if adopted by the Council, might enable the Netherlands Government at least to acquiesce in a resolution by the Council, then adjournment might be regarded by the Council as justifiable and be given the necessary support.

4. I then spoke to Van Royen and Ignatieff spoke to Snouck Hurgronje in this sense. I also pointed out that I had a dual capacity. As Canadian representative, I was anxious to do everything possible to help the Netherlands Government in its present difficulties, in so far as I acted in accordance with the instructions of my own Government. However, as President of the Security Council, I was obliged to preserve a position of complete impartiality to either side and I could not, therefore, use this position to seek an adjournment.

5. Van Royen and Snouck Hurgronje both said that it would be impossible for the Government of the Netherlands to come forward with "a new constructive proposal" by this afternoon, and indicated that an adjournment of some days would be required to prepare such a proposal. Later, he informed me that he was unable to contact The Hague owing to "a breakdown in communications."

6. I told Reid over the telephone that I would do whatever I appropriately could from the Chair to ensure that the request from the Netherlands delegation, for a reasonable time to consider the new amendments which have been submitted, would be granted.

7. I myself am suggesting an amendment to paragraph 4(e) to the effect that the Commission may, repeat may, observe elections throughout Indonesia, but is required to take responsibility for conditions only with the areas of the Renville Agreement, that is, Java, Madura and Sumatra. This proposed amendment is welcomed by the Netherlands and has been accepted by all the sponsors of the joint draft resolution.

Reference your telegrams nos. 24† and 25† of January 27,³⁵ and telephone conversations concerning proposal for an Indonesian Conference.

2. We have reported your discussions in The Hague to Wrong and McNaughton. The State Department had already asked the Canadian Embassy in Washington for further information, as they had received a report on your proposal from their Ambassador in The Hague. After considering the proposal, however, the State Department decided to issue no new instructions to Jessup. Jessup told McNaughton that he had been instructed to press for passing of the resolution today. Wrong reports, however, that he had gathered that if it became apparent that the resolution would not be adopted, the State Department might take the line that it should not be brought to a vote. Your suggestion for a conference, he said, had been rejected by the State Department as a possible alternative course, although they had hinted that a conference on the lines you proposed might be held after the passage of the resolution.

3. I instructed McNaughton before this morning's meeting to endeavour, if possible, to postpone a vote on the resolution. McNaughton pointed out, however, that it was difficult for him to advocate still another postponement unless he had some new constructive proposal which must be given further consideration. In particular, he must avoid appearing to be using his position as President on behalf of one party to the dispute. McNaughton has pointed out further the difficulties in securing support for a new proposal at this time when so many members of the Council are committed to the resolution and determined to carry it through.

These convey information in Document 130.

4. I said to him that I agreed but that we must consider fully any possible proposal which might provide us with a resolution which the Dutch could accept or at least acquiesce in. If a resolution is passed which the Dutch will not carry out, the consequences to the United Nations, the Western Union and the North Atlantic Union might be most far-reaching and very dangerous. In addition to these more general consequences, the Council would be faced with most serious problem of enforcing its decision. Another possible consequence which would cause great embarrassment is that the Asiatic Powers would establish their own sanctions. We, of course, were committed to supporting the resolution and, if it came to a vote, we must vote in favour, but I thought it would be criminally irresponsible for any Member of the Council to force a vote today if there was any possibility of the Netherlands putting forward a new constructive proposal.

5. As there seemed no way in which McNaughton could postpone a decision unless the Dutch themselves made some new proposal, I asked General McNaughton to speak to Van Roijen before this afternoon's meeting. Both Van Roijen and Snouck, who have little information on the proposal, expressed grave doubts as to whether their government would instruct him to propose it. They agreed, however, to telephone The Hague. Presumably they had not yet received any instructions along the lines which you mentioned in your telegram no. 25.

6. We have not yet received a reply to our telegram no. 21. If this delay is due to the present electrical disturbances, you should send the messages through commercial channels. McNaughton, in spite of this, is going to do his utmost to persuade the Council to adjourn the voting till tomorrow.

7. The next move is up to the Netherlands and, if it is to be useful, Van Roijen will have to have precise instructions from his Government by tomorrow (Friday) morning at the latest. It would seem to us that it will also be essential for the Netherlands by then to have made it clear in London and Washington that the Netherlands is prepared to acquiesce in the resolution provided that their proposal, in a constructive and precise form, is added to it.

1. In my message No. 113 of 27th January I reported on developments which took place on Thursday, 27th January, in connection with the suggestion put forward by Dupuy reported in your No. 117 of 27th January.†

2. In this message I shall deal with the developments in the discussion of the joint draft resolution at the two meetings of the Council in the morning and afternoon of 27th January. At the opening of the meeting the representative of the Republic of Indonesia, Palar, made a statement on the joint draft resolution. I have learnt that he is under instructions not to reject the resolution nor to delay the vote but to criticize its shortcoming as compared to the New Delhi resolution. While expressing appreciation for "the spirit of good faith, impartiality and justice evidenced by the sponsors of this resolution", Palar dealt at some length with its alleged shortcomings, and urged that the following ideas contained in the New Delhi resolution be embodied in the form of amendments to the joint draft resolution.

"A. That the withdrawal of Dutch troops to the truce lines of January 17th, 1948, and the restoration of the territory under Republican control as at December 18th, 1948, be completed not later than March 15th, 1949, when the interim Government should come into existence.

B. That Dutch troops be immediately withdrawn from the residency of Jogjakarta (a well defined administrative unit comprising the City of Jogjakarta and adjoining areas) and progressively from the rest of the Republican territories under conditions prescribed by the United Nations Commission on Indonesia.

C. That the Republic of Indonesia be given an adequate economic basis.

D. That the elections for a Constituent Assembly be completed not later than October 1st, 1949, and that sovereignty over the whole of Indonesia be completely transferred not later than January 1st, 1950."

3. The representatives of Australia and Burma likewise urged the incorporation of these provisions from the New Delhi text as amendments to the joint draft resolution.

4. As the discussion was evidently coming to a close, and I had no more speakers prepared to make statements on the text as a whole, and Tsiang of China had indicated that he was prepared to move the amendments accepted by the sponsors, (which were referred to you in our message No. 111 of 26th January† and approved by you in your No. 116 of 27th January†), I decided to make a brief statement expressing support for the joint draft resolution, but at the same time indicating that I would submit an amendment to paragraph 4 (e). This amendment, which the Netherlands delegation had requested, has been the subject of discussion between ourselves and the sponsors. None of the sponsors were willing to move an amendment along these lines, but were willing to accept it if I agreed to introduce it. Under those circumstances, after consulting Reid by telephone, I submitted the amendment, making my statement at the afternoon's meeting. (The text of (a) my general remarks, (b) the text of my amendment and (c) of my explanatory statements regarding the amendment, are all given in my teletype No. 114 of 27th January).†

5. Tsiang introduced the other amendments agreed to by the sponsors and made explanatory comments to them.

6. At this point the debate had apparently been exhausted, and Van Royen asked to speak. He explained that he had been unable to reach his Government by telephone to consult with them in regard to the various amendments which had been put forward. He consequently asked for adjournment of twenty-four hours before the voting.

7. In accordance with my assurance given to Reid by telephone, that I would do all that I could to obtain a deferment of the vote, I at once said, as President of the Council, that I thought that Van Royen's request was a reasonable one and should be granted, and said that unless there was objection, the Council would adjourn until Friday afternoon at 3 p.m.

8. Jessup, however, expressed the view that the adjournment should not be twenty-four hours in view of the extreme urgency of reaching a decision in the Council, but suggested that the Council might adjourn until 11 am. Friday. This would enable delegations to make statements in the morning and the Council could then proceed to a vote on the joint draft resolution in the afternoon.

9. (I should explain that Jessup had by this time received word from the State Department of Dupuy's suggestion and had told me in private that his delegation could not help feeling that the purpose of adjournment might be for the Netherlands to introduce a proposal alternative to the joint draft resolution, along the lines of Dupuy's suggestion and not, repeat not, for the purpose of considering amendments to the joint draft resolution. He indicated that his Government had become anxious at what he termed the "stalling-tactics" of the Netherlands Government. I told Jessup that the Council should, of course, consider any proposal from the Netherlands Government within the framework of the joint draft resolution, but that any further proposal to defer a decision would have to be decided by the vote of the Council, and that a motion for adjournment would have to be sponsored by a member of the Council, according to the rules of procedure. For the purpose of the present meeting, however, I was willing to suggest from the Chair that the Council would accede to the Netherlands request).

10. Following Jessup's statement in the Council, the representative of China suggested that it would be more convenient for him if the Council met in the afternoon rather than the morning of Friday, 28th January. I then proposed to the Council that, in deferment to the request of the representative of China, the Council should meet at 3 p.m. rather than at 11. This was agreed.

Indonesia.

Holmes informs me that you have requested clarification of my views on the line which you should take at this afternoon's meeting of the Council.

2. This paragraph applies to the situation which will arise if the Netherlands representative puts forward this afternoon a new constructive proposal which would be added to the existing resolution and come within its framework. He should, if possible, be asked to put his proposal in the form of a formal amendment of the existing resolution. I understand that, under the rules of the Security Council, the amendment will have to be sponsored by a member of the Council. However, it would not, it seems to me, be fair to require the Netherlands, before this afternoon's meeting to secure a sponsor or sponsors, though if they could do so this would be helpful. If they have not been able to secure a sponsor, then it seems to me that you should, as Chairman, follow the general line which I indicated to you yesterday, namely, that you should say that the Netherlands representative has now put before the Council a new constructive proposal and that the members of the Council will no doubt wish to consider this proposal in all its aspects before they are asked to vote on it. You might then say that you assume, therefore, that the members of the Council will wish to have the vote postponed for 24 or 48 hours.

3. This paragraph relates to the situation which will arise if the Netherlands representative is unable this afternoon to make a new constructive proposal. In this case, it seems to me that you have done all that you possibly can do for them, both as Canadian representative and as Chairman of the Council, and that if the Council wishes to vote this afternoon, the vote will have to take place.

4. I had not even hoped yesterday that you would have been able to put off a vote in the Council yesterday afternoon, in the absence of a new constructive proposal from the Netherlands. I am very grateful to you for what you did yesterday, which must have been an extremely difficult and trying task.

Indonesia. Your telegram No. 21 of January 26th. I am replying to your questions as follows:

Paragraph 2 Section (a) concerning representative character of Indonesian delegates:

(1) As far as non-Republican negaras are concerned, such representatives already exist and Netherlands delegates at Security Council could establish such character.

(2) With regard to Republican delegates, they could be designated by Republican leaders, and Dutch would have no objection.

Paragraph 2 Section (b) concerning Terms of Reference:

(1) Netherlands Government consider terms should be laid down and approved by Netherlands Government, Security Council and Indonesians, both Republicans and non-Republicans.

(2) The delegates will decide among themselves the composition of Interim Federal Government. (For your personal information: Netherlands Government would be ready to consider proposals made by Conference for amendment of Royal Decree of December 18th, 1948, should delegates prefer ordinary Cabinet to Directorate already proposed. Dutch, however, wish this possibility not to be mentioned in Terms of Reference). As soon as set up, Interim Federal Government would proceed with preparation of elections for Constitutional Assembly, to take place in third quarter of 1949, on basis of Royal Decree.

Paragraph 2 Section (c) Secretariat would be organized by delegates themselves without foreign interference.

Paragraph 2 Section (d). All powers of internal Government would be transferred with following restrictions: authority of representative of the crown to intervene in case of emergency and on specific grounds as mentioned in Royal Decree. These powers were discussed with Republicans and agreed upon except on the question of army organization and command. (This information not to be included as such in any resolution as it is more elaborately described in Royal Decree).

Paragraph 2 Section (e). Interim Federal Government will discuss with the Netherlands Government statute of future Netherlands-Indonesian union.

Paragraph 3 Section (a). Above information, which could be supplemented if necessary, was supplied by Netherlands Foreign Office. It should be considered as unofficial information pending Cabinet approval which should follow within next few hours.

Paragraph 3 Section (b). Already covered by my telegram No. 25 of January 27th.

Paragraph 3 Section (c). I quite realize that any resolution introduced by McNaughton should be discussed at length with his Security Council colleagues.

If you consider, after thorough examination, that a resolution based on my suggestion would be justified, I would recommend that we retain the initiative because if it comes:

- (a) From the Dutch, the Republicans will be automatically prejudiced,
- (b) From United Kingdom and France, they are too directly concerned with South East Asia,
- (c) From United States, they have been too deeply involved in this case,
- (d) From other members, they do not carry sufficient weight.

Canada appears to me as country having protected its objectivity, and I need not stress advantage for us, both internally and internationally, of breaking Indonesian vicious circle.

With regard to possibility of embodying my suggestion in United States resolution, I think it would be useless. What is essential now is a new approach: let Indonesians do their own cooking.

Indonesia.

The Security Council met at 3 p.m., Friday, 28th January to continue discussion of the joint draft resolution submitted by the representatives of China, Cuba, Norway and the United States.

2. Prior to the meeting of the Council I spoke to Van Royen and gave him the gist of the position which you suggested I should take in your message No. 125 of 28th January, stressing that, if the Netherlands delegation were to put forward a constructive proposal which would be within the framework of the joint resolution, our delegation would do everything it could to have it given full and proper consideration by the Council. Van Royen replied that he fully understood our position and that he had already reported it to his Government on the basis of his conversation with Ignatieff and me on 27th January. He said that all he would ask for was an opportunity to make a statement in the Council just before the joint draft resolution was put to the vote. I agreed to give him this opportunity.

3. The first speaker at the meeting of the Council was the representative of Egypt. He said that, while the amendments advanced by the four sponsoring delegations to their joint draft resolution were only partially acceptable to him (in that they did not fully meet the points emphasized in the New Delhi resolution), he would vote in favour of the joint draft resolution as amended, with the understanding that it was only the first step forward in the final solution of the Indonesian question and that the Council would need to continue to keep the situation under constant review. The Argentine representative then stated that he believed the Security Council should only use its good offices and "mediatory powers" in regard to the Indonesian question. Accordingly, he would vote in favour of those paragraphs which seemed to him to conform to this principle and would abstain on the paragraphs which his delegation believed went beyond this principle.

4. The Soviet representative then strongly criticized the joint resolution, in particular the clauses dealing with the withdrawal of Netherlands troops. He introduced an amendment to the first paragraph of the operative part of the draft resolution which would have substituted for the present text of this paragraph, the following text: "The Netherlands troops shall be immediately withdrawn to the positions provided for by the Renville Truce Agreement."

5. As there appeared to be no further speakers and the Council was about to vote on the joint draft resolution, I called on Van Royen to speak. He then gave a lengthy prepared statement of his delegation's position. His statement was most important presentation of the Netherlands position regarding Indonesia and I am sending a copy to you today by bag. Van Royen emphasized again that the Netherlands regarded the draft resolution as containing "so drastic and deep an interference in the domestic affairs of a State as no member of the United Nations has ever accepted when signing the United Nations Charter". He added that "not only the present Netherlands Government, but no Netherlands Government at all, and in fact no responsible Government of any country in the world, should be required to surrender such essential rights of sovereignty." He urged the Council again to submit to the International Court of Justice the question of whether the Council was competent to deal with the Indonesian question. He added that the provisions in the draft resolution regarding the Commission's making decision by a majority vote, would, in effect, mean "that the Netherlands would during the interim period, hand over fundamental rights, constituting part of its sovereignty over Indonesia, to the United States of America." Van Royen summarized the "four fundamental objections" of the Netherlands Government to the draft resolution in the following words:

"First: point (2) which provides for the reinstallation of the Government of the Republic of Indonesia in Jogjakarta:

"Second: The final paragraph of point (3), which empowers the Commission and the Council to deal with the establishment of a Federal Interim Government, the holding of elections, and the transfer of sovereignty;

"Third: The last sentence of paragraph 4 (a) laying down the majority rule for decisions of the Commission;

"Fourth: Paragraph 4 (f), which empowers the Commission to make recommendations to the Council for the return of certain areas to the Republican Government and for the withdrawal of Netherlands troops, and implicitly authorizes the Council to make decisions on those points."

Finally, summarizing the position of his Government, Van Royen made the following statement:

"We must fundamentally object to paragraph 2, the final paragraph of point 3, the last sentence of paragraph 4 (a) and against paragraph 4 (f), because these sections require the Netherlands to surrender certain vital rights in Indonesia during the interim period. We must appeal to the Council not to ask from us any such sacrifice, which it has never before asked from any member of the United Nations, which it is not entitled to ask under the Charter, and which no member of the United Nations could concede. These paragraphs in fact would put the Netherlands under guardianship of the United Nations. The Government and the people of the Netherlands have not merited this treatment. The Dutch have not guided the development of Indonesia for 350 years to surrender its responsibility in the last minute before the final consummation of that development: the achievement of statehood for Indonesia.

"In the rest of the resolution there are many things which are difficult for us to accept, and many which we should like to see changed. But we realize that each party must make sacrifices and we shall therefore formulate no objections to the rest of the resolution. My Government will carry out this resolution if it is adopted by the Security Council, to the extent to which it is compatible with the responsibility of the Netherlands for the maintenance of real freedom and order in Indonesia, a responsibility which at this moment no one else can take over from us."

6. After Van Royen's statement the Council proceeded to vote on the joint draft resolution paragraph by paragraph. The text of the draft resolution, every paragraph of which was adopted, is contained in my immediately preceding teletype. The paragraphs of the preamble and of the first three operative parts of the resolution were, in nearly all cases, adopted by 8 votes in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions (France, Ukraine and the Soviet Union). The fourth part of the operative portion of the resolution was adopted by 7 votes in favour and 4 abstentions, (in addition to the other 3 States, the Argentine abstained on this paragraph which dealt with the functions and powers of the proposed Commission). In paragraph 6 the fifth and sixth portions of the operative part of the resolution were also adopted by seven votes in favour and four abstentions (including Argentina).

7. The Soviet amendment to the first part of the operative portion of the resolution was defeated with 4 votes in favour (Cuba, Egypt, Ukraine and the Soviet Union) and 7 abstentions.

8. After all paragraphs of the draft resolution had been adopted, there was no necessity for a vote on the whole resolution and I adjourned the Council on the Indonesian situation sine die.

New York, February 10, 1949

Dear John [Holmes],

I should like to reply to your letter of 4 February† to me regarding the suggestions for a statement on the Indonesian Question contained in the Department's teletype no. 85 of 19 January.

2. I have discussed the letter with General McNaughton and he wishes me, in the first place, to recall his position as President of the Council in January and his anxiety to do everything possible to maintain the impartial position of the Chair. For this reason the General did not speak in the Council as Canadian representative until the very last stages of the debate and when he spoke he sought to restrict his intervention to expressing support for the joint draft resolution as a practical and necessary measure, without showing favour to either side.

3. As you say in your letter, our understanding was that the three suggestions contained in the Department's message did not constitute instructions for a Canadian statement but were only meant as points which General McNaughton might consider making, in the event that an appropriate opportunity developed. I can assure you that in fact, the three points concerned were carefully considered by the delegation and it was felt that, for the reasons set down below, it would not be appropriate at this stage to develop any of these three points to the extent suggested in teletype no. 85.

4. The first suggestion contained in teletype no. 85 deals with the necessity for parties to a dispute observing cease-fire orders by the Security Council, not only in the Indonesian case but in all cases where the Council passes a cease-fire resolution. This point is touched upon to a certain extent in General McNaughton's statement of 26 January, where he said, "in the consideration of the Indonesian dispute by the Security Council, as in the case of other disputes which have come before, the Canadian delegation has supported proposals which have sought to bring about a cessation of hostilities and the restoration of peace and order as essential preliminary conditions to a negotiated settlement". We did not, however, feel that it would be advisable to go beyond this general statement and to refer specifically to the question of Palestine, as suggested in teletype no. 85. It seemed to us that it would not be appropriate for us, at a time when the cease-fire order was at last being observed in Palestine, and when negotiations were taking place at Rhodes for an armistice, to contend that certain members of the Council appeared to regard the cease-fire orders in the Palestine case "as being of less urgent and immediate importance than those issued elsewhere".

5. The second point contained in teletype no. 85 concerns the heavy responsibility of "any power like the U.S.S.R., which enjoys the privilege of the veto, and which uses it for the purpose of preventing the Security Council from taking even preliminary steps to put an end to fighting". It should be remembered that, during the preliminary stages in the development of the joint resolution, the representative of France on the Security Council had indicated to the United States representatives that, if the joint resolution went too far (in the opinion of the French Delegation) in constituting an infringement of Netherlands sovereignty, the Delegation of France might be obliged to veto the resolution. This being the case, it did not seem an opportune time to refer in the Security Council to the use of the veto in previous cases by the Soviet Union, or, indeed, to raise the question of the veto at all.

6. The third suggestion in teletype no. 85 concerns the responsibilities which lay with the Republic of Indonesia, as well as the Netherlands, "for an orderly and peaceful development of political change in the Netherlands East Indies". At the time General McNaughton intervened in the Council, as Canadian representative, to state our position on the joint resolution, the final position of the Netherlands Government towards the joint resolution had not been stated (you will note from our teletype no. 125 of 29 January that Dr. Van Royen made a lengthy statement regarding the Netherlands position on 28 January just before the joint resolution was put to the vote.) However, in the Council meetings which had been held before the General spoke, the Netherlands representative had adopted a generally rather uncooperative and defiant attitude towards the Council, and had reiterated that the Netherlands Government regarded this question as being outside the competence of the Council. In view of the reaction in the Council to the successive Netherlands statements, it did not seem appropriate on 27 January for General McNaughton to refer specifically to the responsibilities which the resolution would place on the Republic of Indonesia. However, as you will note from our teletype no. 114, the last paragraph of General McNaughton's intervention states that the Canadian Delegation fully recognizes that the effectiveness of the joint resolution, or any resolution on Indonesia, "depends upon its acceptance by both parties and upon their cooperation in implementing its terms". The statement goes on to add that the Canadian Delegation believes that the joint resolution "offers a reasonable and practicable basis for both parties to work towards a lasting settlement" and that we therefore "commend its acceptance to both parties". The clear inference from this portion of the statement is that both the Netherlands Government and the Republic of Indonesia have a grave responsibility for implementing the resolution and for working together towards a settlement in Indonesia.

7. The above comments will, I hope, explain why the points suggested in teletype no. 85 were only used in a very general way in General McNaughton's statement of 27 January. However, you may be assured that we have examined teletype no. 85 with close attention and that we shall make every effort to make further use of the suggestions contained in it if an opportunity develops.

Yours sincerely,
G. IGNATIEFF

ANNEX B³⁶
INDONESIA

On Saturday last (Feb. 26) the Netherlands Government issued a statement of their proposals for a Conference in The Hague to be held as early as March 12, if possible, to discuss plans for Indonesia. Invitations to the Conference have been issued to Federalists, Republicans and the United Nations Commission on Indonesia. It is hoped that agreement can be reached in the Conference on the transfer of sovereignty to the United States of Indonesia, the simultaneous formation of the Netherlands-Indonesian Union and the creation of a Federal Interim Government for the interim period.

The American and Far Eastern Division prepared this annex to a memorandum from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, March 2, 1949, for a report to Cabinet.

2. In these proposals the Netherlands Government have recognized the urgency of working out some agreement before conditions in Indonesia deteriorate further. They also recognize that the force of world opinion stands behind the Security Council resolution of January 28. Early reports from Indonesia indicate that the Republican leaders have not reacted any too favourably to these proposals. There are two difficulties: (a) unwillingness of the Netherlands authorities to permit the Republican leaders to return to their capital at Jogjakarta, although they have been released from custody; and (b) the vagueness of the Netherlands proposals relating to the terms of reference and specific objectives of the Conference.

3. Under the terms of the Security Council resolution of January 28 the United Nations Commission on Indonesia is obliged to send a report to the Security Council on February 15 on the status of the negotiations between the Netherlands and the Indonesian Republic and their recommendations for a solution to their difficulties. Agreement was later reached on the postponing of the reporting date to March 1. In a lengthy report dated March 1 the Commission reports that up to that date "there has been failure of the parties to the Indonesian question to reach agreement on the establishment of an Interim Federal Government. This situation results from the failure of the Netherlands Government to accept the procedures of the resolution of January 28 and not from a mere difference of viewpoint on details of governmental structure and functions". The report goes on to state "the Commission itself has no authority under the terms of the resolution of January 28 to accept the invitation received by it to attend a 'Round Table' Conference at The Hague". The Commission regards the Netherlands invitation as "a counter-proposal or substitute for the provisions of the January 28 resolution and submits this information to the Security Council for the latter's consideration with the request that the Commission be instructed as to what its position should be toward the invitation under reference".

4. In its concluding paragraph the Commission reports "The Commission has interpreted its duty to be that of assisting with the implementation of the Security Council's resolution and of reporting facts pertinent to the situation which this resolution was intended to resolve. It will not interfere with any efforts of the parties to arrive freely at agreements, and it is available to all parties for consultation. At the same time the Commission regrets that it has not been possible to proceed with the implementation of the resolution. It is also conscious of the progressive deterioration of the situation in Indonesia and of the augmented danger to world stability which must result".

5. A further debate on Indonesia will be precipitated in the Council by this Commission report. Present indications are that the Netherlands Government intends to go ahead with the Conference even if the Republicans do not attend. The distance that now separates the Netherlands Government from the terms of the Security Council resolution of January 28 is not great. It may be that prior to or during the forthcoming debate in the Security Council some further means can be found to work out a compromise that would be satisfactory to both parties. If such a compromise cannot be found a very difficult and embarrassing situation in respect to Netherlands relations with the United Nations may arise and conditions in Indonesia may well take a further turn for the worse.

INDONESIA

Dr. van Roijen is leaving for New York this afternoon or on Friday to speak for the Netherlands in the Security Council debate on Indonesia. He has asked if he could have before he leaves some indication of the views of the Canadian Government on the Netherlands proposals of February 26.

2. Dr. van Roijen told me that opinion in the Netherlands was hardening and that they would go ahead with the Conference at The Hague regardless of the attitude of the Security Council and the Republicans. He had been instructed to take a very strong stand in the Security Council. He was to indicate that the Netherlands had gone to the absolute limit in cooperating with the Security Council. If the Security Council decided on sanctions which would hurt the Netherlands economy they would press on with their Conference, transfer sovereignty to the Federalists and get out of Indonesia. He concluded by saying that he thought that a very little difference now separated the Netherlands position from the Security Council resolution.

3. I attach a copy of telegram No. 227 of March 2† from the Canadian Permanent Delegate in New York transmitting the conclusions of the United Nations Commission on Indonesia's report of March 1. The report points out that the Netherlands proposals of February 26 constitute a counter-proposal or substitute for the provisions of the Security Council resolution of January 28. The Commission therefore asks the Security Council for instructions on the attitude it should take toward the invitation to attend the Conference. The report repeatedly makes the point that the Netherlands has been unwilling to accept the Security Council resolution as a basis for procedure. The greatest stumbling block is, of course, the question of the re-establishment of the Republican Government in Jogjakarta. While the wording of the Netherlands statement is hopefully ambiguous on this point, I gathered from Dr. van Roijen that the Netherlands Government is adamant on this question.

4. It seems to me that our primary responsibility in this matter is as a member of the Security Council. Prior to the passage of the January 28 resolution we went as far as we could to give the Netherlands an opportunity to submit amendments which they considered would make the resolution more workable. Now that the resolution has been placed on the public record with our support I find it difficult to see how we could lend support to a plan to set aside a major provision of that resolution (the return of the Republican Government to Jogjakarta) unless both parties to the dispute agree.

5. I think we shall have to explain this difficulty to Dr. van Roijen. We could tell him that from our examination of the Netherlands statement of February 26 it appears to us to be a statesmanlike and constructive approach and one in general harmony with the Security Council resolution of January 28 except for its ambiguity regarding compliance with Article 2 of the Security Council resolution providing for the re-establishment of the Republican Government in Jogjakarta. The portion of the Netherlands statement on this point reads:

“In the desire to facilitate a prompt beginning of the discussions for a speedy creation of the sovereign United States of Indonesia and in order to fulfill the terms of the resolution of the Security Council on this point, the Netherlands Government has decided to lift the remaining restrictions on the liberty of movement of the Republican leaders and to consult with them concerning their wishes as to their future residence and the arrangements which will have to be made in this respect”.

6. We might say that we are glad to note from this passage (a) the Netherlands' desire to fulfill the terms of the Security Council resolution, and (b) that they propose to consult with the Republican leaders about the implementation of this point. We would hope that if, as it may well develop, the question of the return of the Republican Government to Jogjakarta is the only major impediment in the way of the Republican leaders agreeing to attend the Conference, that the Netherlands will not close the door to negotiations on this point. If a satisfactory agreement can be reached on implementation of this point it may well be that the Security Council could give its blessing to the Conference proposed by the Netherlands. We might even dare to hope that the ambiguity of the Netherlands Statement on this point has been slyly designed to finesse this trick.

Would you let me know if you will speak to Dr. van Roijen or wish me to do so?³⁷

Indonesia. My teletype No. 240 of March 4th.†

1. I was able to obtain preliminary reactions from the United Kingdom and United States delegations in private talks which I had before the meeting of the Council, Friday, 4th March, regarding the proposal of the Netherlands Government

³⁷ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

I would be glad if you would speak to him along the lines outlined above LB P[earson] for a round table conference on Indonesia at The Hague. These are only preliminary reactions because neither of these delegations have yet been in receipt of instructions from their Governments.

2. I gathered from both delegations, though of course more particularly from the United Kingdom, that they had been disposed to regard favourably the Netherlands suggestion for a round table conference, provided that the conference included representation from the acknowledged Republican leaders. They thought that at least the proposal should be carefully examined by the Council to see whether it represented a workable alternative to the procedure set out in the Council's resolution of 28th January.

3. Both delegations, however, indicated that the situation had been materially affected by the decision of the Netherlands Government reported from Batavia in today's press (New York Times, Friday, 4th March, page 8) that a new group had been recognized by the Netherlands Government to represent former Republican territory at The Hague conference on Indonesia, as the Republican leaders had apparently refused to attend the conference unless they regained their former capital at Jogjakarta.

4. The United States delegation indicated that until yesterday they had still entertained hopes that the Netherlands Government would be prevailed upon to concede the return of Jogjakarta to Republican administration as a quid pro quo for Republican attendance at The Hague Conference. The nomination of selected representatives by the Netherlands, however, would appear to rule this possibility out and almost certainly close the door to the possibility of Republican attendance.

5. My own preliminary reaction is that the Council should not rule out consideration of any alternative proposed by either party to the procedures recommended by the Council in its resolution of 28th January, but the acceptance of any such alternative must surely depend upon whether it represents a practicable procedure which could possibly lead to a solution by agreement. In my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of the majority of my colleagues on the Security Council, an essential characteristic of the practicability of any proposal which may be put forward now is that it should have a reasonable chance of acceptance by the Republic of Indonesia, whose extinction has not, and cannot very well be, recognized by the Security Council. I must point out, moreover, that at this stage in the Indonesian affair, namely, following the Netherlands recent military action against the Republic, and the sharp reaction to it of Asiatic States at New Delhi, any disposition to disregard the Republican position might well lead to very serious repercussions in Asia and the possibility of action independent of the United Nations. Already, upon the initiative of Romulo, the Philippines representative, seventeen members of the United Nations represented in New York (all but two of the nineteen Pacific and Near-Eastern nations which had met at New Delhi) are to hold a private conference in New York on the Indonesian question, it was announced today (New York Times, Friday, 4th March). Shone told me that it was his impression that this would certainly develop into a form of a protest meeting against the Netherlands suggestion "to by-pass the Security Council resolution". In any case, the declared purpose of the meeting is "to try to come to agreement on possibilities of stronger action to force the Dutch to comply with the Council's decision".

6. I shall keep you informed of developments as they occur here, but I do urge that these considerations be taken fully into account when decisions are made as to how the Indonesian question should be handled in the Council.

1. In our view the recent proposals by the Netherlands Government for a conference in The Hague constitute on the whole a statesmanlike effort to reach a solution. Although they are, to some extent, an alternative to the Security Council's Resolution, they do not, except in one respect, go counter to the Resolution. After careful study of the information available to us we still hold the view that implementation of Article 2 of the Security Council Resolution of January 28 need not prejudice the Netherlands position in Indonesia. Nevertheless we understand the reservations held by the Netherlands on this point. The Netherlands, for its part should recognize the difficulty that states which voted for this provision would have in condoning the Netherlands disregarding Article 2 entirely. We have grave doubts, furthermore, whether the Republicans would accept the invitation unless they were allowed first to return to their capital. These views we have already expressed to the Netherlands Ambassador, who has given us little reason to hope that his Government would make a concession on this point.

2. We consider it most important, however, that the door should not be slammed by either side on this invitation and that it may, after some negotiation involving concessions on both sides, be developed into a practical procedure. According to the information we have received, the U.K. and U.S. attitudes to the Dutch proposal are substantially similar to ours.

3. We hope that the vagueness of the Netherlands statement regarding implementation of Article 2 of the Security Council resolution of January 28 will permit the Council when it discusses the subject this week to request the Commission to explore with the parties the possibility of reaching some mutually satisfactory compromise on this point. Above all it is important that the Netherlands Government should recognize that the Republican Government is one of the parties to the dispute and that the Security Council cannot accept the disappearance or dispersal of this party. The negotiations for the creation of new governmental arrangements in Indonesia must be genuine, voluntary negotiations and not have even the appearance of being between the Dutch and their own nominees. In this connection we have already pointed out to the Netherlands Embassy here the unfortunate impression created by the press report from Batavia of the establishment of a Netherlands-sponsored provisional regime in occupied Republican territory. We hope that van Roijen can clear the misunderstanding which has arisen over this point and inform the Council that there is no intention of having representatives of this provisional Government attend The Hague Conference.

4. We think it would be helpful if he could give further detailed information regarding procedure for and objectives of The Hague Conference, emphasizing the willingness of the Netherlands Government to permit the Conference to determine their own procedure and objectives and the constructive role that U.N.C.I. can play in assisting negotiations at the Conference.

5. It would be appreciated if you would convey the above views to the Netherlands Government. The meeting Saturday in New York of representatives of states which attended the Delhi Conference is expected to give rise to demands that the Security Council condemn the Netherlands for evading the January 28 resolution. In considering what constructive action the Security Council can take we still are hopeful that the Netherlands proposals can be given sympathetic consideration. This will be possible only if the statement by the Netherlands representative is conciliatory in tone; we would therefore hope that he would make use of the more felicitous phrases employed in the letter addressed to the President of the Security Council by the Netherlands representative on March 2 and avoid adopting an intransigent position which might further aggravate the already difficult situation which will exist in the Council.

6. We are requesting the Canadian Delegate to the United Nations to express views along the lines outlined above to the Netherlands representative.

Your telegram No. 40 dated March 7th concerning Indonesia.

1. I had interview with Foreign Minister and Secretary General of Foreign Office to convey substance of your telegram under reference.

2. I found the above mentioned moving in direction you recommend and trying to have return of Republican authorities in Jogjakarta approved by Cabinet under certain conditions.

3. In order to strengthen his hand in Cabinet discussions Foreign Minister has taken the initiative of sending personal letter to Bevin stressing conditions under which his colleagues are likely to accept Republicans' return to Jogjakarta.

4. I am sending in immediately following telegram† substance of letter to Bevin and will forward full text† by bag Thursday.

5. I am told that Acting Minister for Overseas Territories is already favourable to Mr. Stikker's proposals. Opposition, however, is to be expected from Right-Wing elements in Cabinet who would prefer to be forced by further decision from Security Council to permit Republicans' return because this would avoid their being criticized by the population for making such concession. Both United Kingdom Ambassador and myself have stressed danger of such procedure which might lead to unforeseen complications.

6. Substance of Minister for Foreign Affairs letter was telephoned to London yesterday and discussed at Cabinet meeting which on the whole approved proposals. United Kingdom Government is therefore expected to support them, but could not guarantee that United States support would be forthcoming. At the same time, British reserve freedom to consider on merits any amendment that might be suggested.

7. Minister for Foreign Affairs is expecting written reply from Bevin any moment and hopes to have proposals approved by the Netherlands Cabinet in time for the instructions to be sent to United Nations Organization representative, since meeting postponed until tomorrow.

8. You will note that Minister for Foreign Affairs' letter is more elaborate than necessary, being also arranged to facilitate his task within the Netherlands Cabinet.

9. I consider that Minister for Foreign Affairs proposals should be supported by us in the Security Council, as it seems most unlikely that Netherlands will go any further. In fact they are substantially complying with Article 2 of the resolution of (December 21st?).

10. Please repeat to London.

Indonesia.

The telegrams exchanged between the Delegation and the Department indicate I think that we both see the problem from the same point of view. It may be useful however to restate our present views in advance of this afternoon's meeting.

2. We anticipate that this afternoon's meeting will be taken up for the most part by statements of Netherlands and Indonesian representatives. As indicated in previous communications we very much hope that these statements will be conciliatory in tone and that no firm positions will be taken from which it would be difficult to recede. Should there be a certain stiffness in the statements of the Netherlands and Republican representatives we would hope that other members of the Security Council in their following statements would seize upon the more felicitous and conciliatory phrases in the Netherlands and Republican statements to emphasize the need for conciliation and accommodation between the parties. If you think it desirable we would agree to your making a general statement in this sense.

3. We are still hopeful that the Netherlands proposals of February 26 may be used as a means to achieve a settlement of the Indonesian dispute. Advancement of the date for the transfer of sovereignty, by shortening the interim period in which misunderstandings might arise between the parties is, we feel, an important concession on the part of the Netherlands. The principal difference to be overcome in bringing the Netherlands proposals of February 26 into line with the Security Council resolution of January 28 and securing the participation of the Republican leaders in the proposed Hague Conference arises out of the reluctance of the Netherlands Government to permit the reestablishment of the Republican Government in its capital of Jogjakarta prior to the Conference in accordance with article 2. We believe that there is reason to hope that some accommodation may be reached on this point. The Netherlands statement of February 26 is vague on this point and speaks of consultation with the Republican leaders regarding their wishes as to their future residence after freedom of movement has been accorded them. The Netherlands Government has also recognized the Republican Government as a party to the dispute by extending an invitation to attend the Hague Conference to Mr. Soekarno as President of the Republic. Yesterday's telegrams from the Canadian Ambassador in The Hague indicate that the Netherlands Government is exploring the possibility of working out a formula that would not simply mean Netherlands compliance with the Security Council resolution through a return to the status quo ante but would mean making arrangements under which the new era of cooperation that will be required in any case under the federal structure would begin even before The Hague Conference. President Soekarno in his reply to the Netherlands invitation to attend the Conference has indicated on the whole agreement in principle with attending the Conference although pointing out the difficulty that Republican leaders would have in committing the people of the Republic to decisions when in fact they were not now recognized as a Government. The above developments indicate that the parties are moving closer to agreement on this point.

4. In its report of March 1 the UNCI states that it considered that it was authorized to act only within the terms of reference of the resolution of January 28. It regards the Netherlands proposal for a round table Conference as a counter-proposal and asks the Security Council for instructions on the position it should adopt. The question will arise therefore whether the Security Council should pass a further resolution instructing the Commission on the attitude it should adopt toward the Netherlands proposals. If this were done, presumably such a resolution would instruct the Commission to explore with the parties the possibility of reaching some compromise on the question of the reestablishment of the Republican Government in Jogjakarta which would enable the Republican Government to attend the proposed round table Conference at The Hague. The Commission would presumably be given freedom in such a resolution to seek a practical compromise on article 2 without prejudice to any rights, claims or position of either party under the previous resolution of the Security Council.

5. However, as there is evidence that the parties are moving closer to each other already and that the Netherlands Government may be prepared to make a proposal for meeting the Republicans on article 2 it may be unnecessary for the Security Council to pass a formal resolution of instructions to the Commission. Perhaps the requirements of the existing situation could be met by a direction from the President of the Council in the sense of the discussions at the meeting or by postponing discussions to permit the parties, with the assistance of the UNCI, to seek accommodation on this point.

INDONESIAN QUESTION

2. Mr. [A.R.] Menzies said that the current discussions in the Security Council were focussed on the Netherlands proposal for round-table discussions to be held at The Hague in an attempt to find a means for the transfer of sovereignty to the United States of Indonesia. A number of governments had counselled the Netherlands to make an effort to meet Paragraph 2 of the Security Council Resolution of January 28 which called for the reestablishment of the Republican Government in Jogjakarta. The Netherlands had so far been reluctant to comply for reasons of prestige, security and economics. The Republicans, for their part, while agreeing to the idea of a round-table conference, had stated that they could hardly be expected to approve decisions at such a conference on behalf of the people of the Republic without first being reestablished as a functioning government in their capital.

3. Mr. [H.B.] Robinson said that over the week-end the Netherlands Cabinet had authorized Dr. Van Roijen to accept the proposal put forward by General McNaughton on March 11 in the Security Council. The effect of this proposal would be that the Security Council should instruct the United Nations Commission on Indonesia to convene a preliminary conference between the Netherlands authorities and the Republicans with a view to finding a mutually agreeable means whereby both parties could participate in The Hague Conference proposed last week by the Netherlands Government.

4. Dr. Van Roijen said, however, that the Netherlands Government could not accept the Canadian proposal if it meant that the preliminary discussions should be conducted only on the basis of the January 28 Resolution. The Netherlands Government would however agree to the terms of the proposal if the preliminary negotiations could include modifications acceptable to both parties, of the strict terms of the January 28 Resolution. If UNCI were authorized to sponsor such negotiations according to these broader terms of reference the Netherlands Government would accept the Canadian proposal. Dr. Van Roijen had authorized the Canadian Delegate to inform the United States and United Kingdom representatives privately of this decision of the Netherlands Government.

5. General McNaughton said that it appeared that satisfactory progress would be made if the intent of the Canadian proposal were followed. Undoubtedly the anticipated strong speeches by the United States and United Kingdom delegates would influence the attitude of the Netherlands Government. He felt that the virtue of the Canadian proposal for the preliminary conference was that it would enable the Netherlands to adopt a more reasonable course without losing face, and should permit a practicable solution to be reached which would be acceptable to both parties. The greatest difficulty arose from public opinion in Holland which had been consistently misinformed about developments in Indonesia and now tied the hands of the Netherlands Government. The holding of The Hague Conference would give them a chance to give their people a clearer picture of the situation.

6. General McNaughton added that the Security Council would not adopt a resolution on the question which would have the effect of modifying the resolution of January 28. The Security Council would be willing to accept any solution which both parties to the dispute would find acceptable. The Security Council would probably implement the Canadian proposal by incorporating it in the form of a letter from the President of the Council to the UNCI.

New York, March 15, 1949

Following from Ignatieff, Begins: Indonesia.

It is expected that at the meeting of the Council on Indonesia, Wednesday 16th March, the point will be reached in the discussion when the suggestion made by General McNaughton in the Council Friday 11th March might be brought appropriately to a focus in the form of a summing-up of the discussion by the President of the Council. Having in mind also the various references which were made to General McNaughton's statement in the meeting of the Council Monday 14th March (see our No. 301 of March 15th),† I have prepared the following draft text of a statement which might be used by the Canadian representative if you approve. Text begins:

2. "Some questions have been raised by several representatives with regard to the statement made by the Canadian representative in the Council on Friday last, and I should like to take this opportunity to provide the further explanations of that statement which are apparently desired by members of the Council.

3. It would appear from the comments made by most of the members of the Council, as well as the representatives of other nations participating in our discussions, that the idea of having the United Nations Commission for Indonesia convene the representatives of the Netherlands Government and of the Republic of Indonesia in preliminary discussions in order to assist the parties in reaching agreement as to the time and conditions for holding the proposed conference at The Hague, has generally met with support.

4. This proposal has already been accepted by the Government of the Netherlands. The distinguished representative of the Republic of Indonesia raised some questions with regard to the proposals of the Canadian delegation at the meeting of the Council on the 14th of March. In the first place, let me confirm to Dr. Palar the interim assurance given by the Canadian representative at that meeting to the effect that the statement of General McNaughton on 11th March related only to the preliminary discussions to be carried out under the auspices of our Commission in Indonesia, and not to the conditions under which the subsequent conference between all parties to the Indonesian dispute, which has been proposed by the Government of the Netherlands, might be held. In fact, the Canadian delegation had endeavoured to make it clear that its proposal was intended essentially for the purpose of opening the way, by developing the necessary agreement and cooperation of all parties, to enable the suggestion of the Netherlands Government for a subsequent round-table conference to be developed into a practicable and acceptable procedure. In our view such a preliminary discussion is not only desirable but absolutely necessary. Otherwise little or no progress may be expected towards the negotiations, contemplated by the Resolution of the Council of 28th January in its third operative paragraph.

5. It is clear to our delegation, as I hope it is clear to other members of the Council, that it would be impracticable that the Council should itself attempt to specify the conditions and procedures which might enable the parties to undertake direct negotiations as proposed by the Netherlands Government. These are questions which in our opinion should be worked out in the preliminary discussions and on the spot, with the assistance of our Commission, acting by virtue of the Council's Resolution of 28th January and with the powers conferred upon it by that Resolution, which include the power to make recommendations to the parties as well as to the Security Council on matters within the competence of the Commission. And here let me say to the representative of the Republic of Indonesia that this understanding with regard to the powers that our Commission would have in the exercise of its responsibilities in the preliminary discussions is not intended, in any way, to be confused with the status that the Commission might have in the subsequent conference which it is hoped will take place at The Hague. This question will have to be decided later by the Council.

6. The distinguished representative of the Republic of Indonesia raised another question with regard to the statement of the Canadian representative on Friday last, when he suggested that our proposal was founded on the mistaken impression that the aims of the Netherlands Government, as set forth in its proposal of 26th February, are identical with the aims of the Security Council and the Republic of Indonesia. The distinguished representative of the Netherlands made a reply on this point at the meeting of the Council on the 14th March. Referring to this question of the ultimate objective of Netherlands policy the transfer of sovereignty from the Netherlands Government to the United States of Indonesia, he said "I should now like to state most emphatically that the transfer according to the agreement of Renville will be real, complete and unconditional." However, it is my view that the objection of the distinguished representative of the Republic of Indonesia, (even if it were not already satisfactorily disposed of by the distinguished representative of the Netherlands) would not constitute a valid reason for rejecting a proposal that preliminary discussions might be held between the representatives of the Republic of Indonesia and of the Netherlands Government for the express purpose of trying to reach an agreement which might enable the representatives of the Republic to attend a conference at which this very question of the transfer of sovereignty would presumably be one of the principal subjects of negotiation.

7. As regards the question raised by the distinguished representative of India as to the status in which the representatives of the Republic might attend the preliminary discussions now proposed, as well as the subsequent negotiations suggested by the Government of the Netherlands, I should like to make it clear that it would be the understanding of the Canadian delegation that at the preliminary discussions leaders of the Republic of Indonesia would be invited by the United Nations Commission on Indonesia to attend and that one of the principal questions to be considered at these preliminary discussions would be the manner in which the Republic of Indonesia would be represented in any subsequent negotiations such as those suggested by the Government of the Netherlands. Nothing in this most important issue would be regarded as pre-judged, as our proposal specifically states that these preliminary discussions would be "without prejudice to the resolutions of the Security Council and to the rights, claims or positions of the parties."

8. This brings me to the question raised by the distinguished representative of the USSR at the meeting of the Council on Monday, 14th March. I understood the representative to have asked whether such a conference would be equivalent to a conference between prisoners and the warden of the prison. Insofar as this is not a rhetorical question, to which the distinguished representative himself knows the answer, I would say that the preliminary discussions would be held between the representatives of the Netherlands Government and the leaders of the Republic of Indonesia, all of whom, it is my understanding, have already been released in accordance with the Resolution of the Council of 28th January. As I have said, one of the principal problems of these preliminary discussions would be to find a mutually acceptable and voluntary agreement which would enable the Republic of Indonesia to participate fully and under conditions acceptable to the Republic of Indonesia as well as to the Government of the Netherlands in the subsequent direct negotiations in accordance with the proposal of the Netherlands Government.

9. It has occurred to me that, in order to assist you, Mr. President, in summing up the sense of the Council on the discussion which has taken place with regard to the suggestions made by the Canadian delegation on 11th March, that I would submit at this time the following summary of that proposal which might serve as a basis for communication from the President to our Commission in Indonesia. With your permission I shall read it at this point and I shall pass a copy of this portion of my remarks to the Chair." (Here would be inserted whatever text of the "summing up" was agreed between seven members of the Council). Ends.

Following for Ignatieff from Holmes.

Your telegram No. 305 of March 15. Indonesia. Following are our preliminary views on your draft statement and recent developments in the Council.

2. If a preliminary meeting is to be convened in Indonesia for the purpose of discussing the conditions for holding a round table conference at The Hague, there must be preliminary agreement between the three parties: the Netherlands, the Republicans and the Security Council on the terms of reference for this meeting. In our view it is important to get the parties together again around a conference table. To achieve this first step the preliminary conditions set should be kept to a minimum. We consider that the presence of U.N.C.I. at the meeting will be sufficient guarantee that the basic purposes and objectives of the Council's resolution of January 28 will be kept constantly in view.

3. We are gratified to learn from your telegram No. 301 of March 15† that the Netherlands representative announced the willingness of the Netherlands Government to accept the Canadian proposal in the terms and with the objective formulated by General McNaughton in his speech on March 11. While it is unnecessary to ask the permission of the Netherlands Government before modifying the terms of our proposal we are a little uneasy that they should feel that we had switched our position pretty substantially if we are to give our support to the United States draft summing up given in your telegram No. 298 of March 14† without making a further effort to obtain a compromise wording closer to the rather less restricted conditions that General McNaughton suggested for the preliminary meeting. We think therefore that an effort should be made to bring the Netherlands representative along with us giving him to understand that we must go along with whatever the majority regards as the consensus of the discussions in the Council.

4. We are inclined to think that the United States draft summing up is perhaps worded more with an eye to the record than to getting the parties together around a conference table again. This may be practical politics but we suggest that you make a further effort to secure agreement on a more generalized wording of the conditions for the preliminary meeting. The United States draft, for instance, mentions in three places the resolution of January 28. We would think it would suffice if it were indicated at the beginning of the summing up that throughout the discussions it was made abundantly clear that the Council continued to regard the resolution of January 28 as the procedure best suited to achieve a just and lasting settlement of the Indonesian dispute. Thereafter, the statement might mention that the Council hoped that some way acceptable to all parties might be found to take advantage of the proposal of the Netherlands Government for a round table conference for the purpose of seeking early agreement for the transfer of its sovereignty over Indonesia to an Indonesian Federal Government fully representative of the whole of Indonesia. With this objective in mind the Security Council wished U.N.C.I. to assist the parties in reaching an agreement as to the time and conditions under which the proposed conference at The Hague could be held.

5. We realize, of course, that the wording of the summing up must receive majority support and it may be that the United States wording is closer to the sense of the discussions. At the same time we would hope that a further effort might be made to achieve what we consider is a more practical approach to the problem.

6. Our comment on the draft remarks contained in your telegram No. 305 depends to a considerable extent on the wording of the summing up that would be given at the end. We have the impression that your draft is based on the more general conditions for the preliminary meeting envisaged by General McNaughton in his statement on March 11. If however more explicit reference to the January 28 resolution is to be included such as that contained in the United States draft we feel that a number of your paragraphs might be strengthened with reference to the January 28 resolution. It is our view also that the intention of the last sentence of paragraph 5 of your telegram might be more fully explained.

7. We have not been able to secure the Under-Secretary's views this morning. Though we have no reason to believe that he will differ with the views expressed as they conform to the general lines of policy previously approved by the Minister, nevertheless you should know that the telegram as it stands represents only the thinking of Menzies and myself.

Indonesia.

1. On my return from the Joint Board discussions I had an opportunity to review the various messages which have been sent to you from the delegation, reporting the development of views on the idea that the Council should authorize its Commission in Indonesia to hold preliminary discussions between the Netherlands and the Republic in order to clear the way to the holding of The Hague Conference. At this stage in the Council's discussion the point is likely to be reached where decisions will have to be taken, either on Monday, or at the immediately following meeting of the Council. Accordingly, I should like to take the opportunity of briefly summarizing the position, as I see it, in order that you might let me know whether I may proceed along the lines indicated in this message.

2. I have been proceeding in the discussions here on the basis of your message No. 219 of 7th March,³⁸ addressed to the Canadian Ambassador to the Netherlands and myself, and your subsequent message No. 249 of 14th March,† addressed to Wrong in Washington.

3. Summarizing the position indicated in these messages, which I have followed in the Council, as well as in my discussions with Van Royen and the other representatives concerned in this matter, the following are, in my view, the essential elements:

(a) We welcome the Netherlands offer to seek early agreement for the transfer of sovereignty over Indonesia to the United States of Indonesia, and the suggestion that a conference be held at The Hague to negotiate this agreement, provided arrangements are made that this conference takes place with the agreement and co-operation of all parties directly concerned.

(b) In order to enable this conference to take place, it must be regarded as a "practicable and acceptable" procedure by all the parties concerned in the proposed negotiations. To this end, UNCI should, in the first instance, seek, within the powers conferred upon it by the resolution of 28th January, a way of bringing about an acceptable and voluntary agreement between the representatives of the Netherlands and of the Republic, which would enable the latter to participate in The Hague Conference as one of the parties to the negotiations leading to the transfer of sovereignty in Indonesia.

(c) The principal obstacle to the participation of the Republic in The Hague Conference is the question of implementing Article 2 of the operative part of the resolution of 28th January, calling upon the Netherlands Government "to facilitate the immediate return of the officials of the Government of the Republic of Indonesia to Jogjakarta". An endeavour should be made, with the assistance of UNCI, without prejudice to the Council's resolution of 28th January (including Article 2) to seek agreement on the manner in which this restoration should take place, and also on the time and conditions for holding the proposed conference at The Hague.

(d) As one of the members of the Council which supported the resolution of 28th January and contributed to its drafting, we stand by the resolution of 28th January. What we seek at this time is to help the Netherlands Government and the Government of the Republic to work out an agreement regarding the implementation of those parts of the resolution which are essential for further direct negotiations between all parties concerned in the Indonesian dispute leading to a peaceful settlement whereby sovereignty may be transferred from the Netherlands Government to the United States of Indonesia.

4. When I spoke in the Council on 11th March, I merely advanced the suggestion for a preliminary conference for the consideration of the other members of the Council. However, the representative of the Netherlands was instructed by his Government to accept the idea in the precise terms in which I had made my suggestion, as if it were a final proposal. I have, in private conversations, left Van Royen with no doubt, however, that, if the suggestion is to be acceptable to a majority in the Council and, in particular, to the members who supported the resolution of 28th January, (namely, Canada, China, Cuba, Egypt, Norway, United Kingdom and United States) my suggestion would have to be developed in the light of their comments. I have also suggested that it would not be necessary for the Council to take a new resolution, as all that was being suggested was that UNCI be invited by the President to take the necessary steps, within their existing authority, to aid the parties to reach agreement on the manner in which the resolution of 28th January might be implemented so as to enable the Republic to participate in the negotiations necessary for a settlement.

5. At a conference held in the office of the United Kingdom delegation this morning, a formula was provisionally agreed to, in the terms contained in my immediately following teletype,† between the delegations of the United States, United Kingdom and ourselves. It was further agreed that I would approach the President of the Council (Alvarez of Cuba) at 10:00 a.m. Monday morning, and explain to him more fully the suggestion for preliminary discussions on Indonesia, under the auspices of UNCI, which, at present, he is reluctant to accept for the reasons given in paragraph 2 of my teletype No. 313. If, as seems probable, the President does not agree to put forward the formula himself, it is proposed that I should do so in a statement to the Council on the lines of paragraph 3 above. This is on the understanding that the formula would have been accepted beforehand by seven members of the Council. The United Kingdom and United States delegations undertook to approach the other delegations which had supported the resolution of 28th January and to inform the Netherlands and Republican representatives.

6. I recommend that I be given authority to follow the line of action I have suggested in time to enable me to speak to the President on Monday morning, 21st March. The Council meets on Indonesia at 3:00 p.m. Monday.

7. In my opinion, and this is shared by the delegations of the United Kingdom and United States, if the present suggestion for preliminary discussions to be initiated by UNCI is not accepted by the Council, there seems little or no prospect that The Hague Conference will take place with the result that it will probably not be possible to avoid a head-on collision between the Netherlands and the Council. There is no hope of a majority of the Council authorizing UNCI to attend The Hague Conference until the prior question of the participation of the Republic in such a conference is settled on a basis acceptable to the Republic as well as to the Netherlands. As I have already reported, our present information is that the Federalists will not be willing to attend The Hague Conference unless this prior question is settled.

After discussing with you last evening the position of the Canadian Delegation concerning Indonesia, I had a talk with Mr. Ignatieff by telephone.

2. General McNaughton and Mr. Ignatieff feel strongly that as a result of our pressing them to seek a compromise solution which might be accepted by the Dutch as well as the Indonesians, they have found themselves with the bit between their teeth. To withdraw at this point would end any hopes of the Council finding a compromise, because the initiative is recognized by all Members of the Council to rest with us.

3. The attached telegram† which came in later last evening from New York describing the views of the Indian Delegation is, I think, particularly revealing. If the Indians as well as the Dutch are looking to us to find the answer, then we really ought to make an effort.

4. It appears, however, that the initiative may be somewhat diffused at this point. At eleven o'clock this morning the General is meeting informally with the United States and the United Kingdom representatives in the latter's office, to discuss a possible text of a statement for the President, which might be put to the seven sponsors of the January 28 resolution. The Americans have previously expressed the view that the decision at this point would be not a substitute for the January 28 resolution but a further definition of it, and that, therefore, responsibility for this definition should rest with all of the sponsors.

5. It will probably not be possible for us to inform General McNaughton of the Minister's wishes before he goes to the meeting, but I suggested to Mr. Ignatieff that the General might, at the meeting, explore the possibilities of a compromise text and then submit this compromise text to us for the Minister's consideration. We would, therefore, have something much more concrete to put before the Minister.³⁹

6. It is understood that if an agreed text were reached in the meeting this morning, the initiative would rest with the three parties concerned to speak to the other four. What was originally, therefore, a Canadian suggestion has become less our private proposal.⁴⁰

7. However, the President has asked General McNaughton to see him on Monday at ten o'clock to tell him what we have in mind and to see if he can or cannot

³⁹ Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree [Escott Reid]

⁴⁰ Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Good [Escott Reid]

support our proposal. Presumably the exact nature of what the General could say to the President will depend on the meeting this morning.

8. Mr. Ignatieff has said that he will report to us immediately the results of this morning's meeting so that they may be reported to the Minister. We are making tentative arrangements to have the wire open to New York tomorrow for an hour so that we might, if necessary, communicate with them.⁴¹ Would it be possible to have the Minister prepared in advance to consider this message when it arrives? It might be here this afternoon, but I doubt if we could expect to receive it before one o'clock.

9. I should be grateful to have your views as soon as possible so that I might make the necessary arrangements with the Communications officers.

Indonesia.

1. Van Royen came to see me Wednesday, 23rd March, and I gave him the text of the formula which was agreed between the seven delegations at the private meeting in the office of the President Tuesday, 22nd March, text of which was transmitted to you in my message No. 338 of 22nd March.†

2. Van Royen expressed the view that the revisions made in the formula were an improvement on previous versions, but regretted that there were so many references to the 28th January resolution.

3. I told him that the present text represented a compromise which had to be reached between a majority of the members of the Council, was not intended to be weighted against either party and followed essentially the lines indicated in the statement made by myself and the representative of China in the Council on 11th March. It did not and could not reflect, I pointed out, certain interpretations of what I had said as contained in certain statements made in the Council including that of Van Royen. I pointed out that the text represents a message which would be sent, if approved by the Council, from the President to UNCI. The Commission would then get in touch with both parties in order to commence the preliminary discussions. I made the personal suggestion that the reaction of the Netherlands Government to the proposal might appropriately be withheld until the Netherlands Government had been invited by the Commission to appoint representatives to participate in the preliminary discussions in Indonesia.

⁴¹ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Could you & Menzies arrange this through Riddell E[scott] R[eid]

4. Van Royen referred again to the difficulties in which his Government found itself, particularly in consequence, as he said, of the attitude of the United States Government, and referred to a suggestion which had apparently been made by Dupuy in The Hague that the Council might postpone any decisions until Stikker had had an opportunity of meeting with Acheson and yourself in Washington, possibly within a week's time. Van Royen evidently did not expect that this represented a practicable proposal, for he recognized that, now that a compromise text had been agreed between seven delegations, there would be difficulty in seeking a postponement of further discussion in the Council. I confirmed this view.

5. Actually, all I know of Dupuy's suggestion is what Ignatieff heard of it in his conversation with Holmes this morning. I must point out that, in addition to the views which Ignatieff expressed at that time, particularly the likely interpretations which might be given to this suggestion on the part of the Asiatic nations in relation to the North Atlantic Pact, a postponement would certainly lead to grave difficulties with the President of the Council, Dr. Alvarez. He was most reluctant to accept even the compromise formula and did so only, as he said, because the other six delegations which had supported the resolution of 28th January were willing to accept it. He would be, in my view, very quick to seize upon a request for postponement, to refuse to have anything further to do with a suggestion for preliminary discussions in Batavia, and would resume the position which his delegation has maintained, namely that no discussions of any kind should be initiated with the Dutch until they had complied with the requirements of the resolution of 28th January, to restore fully the Republic as a negotiating party. In yesterday's private meeting he left us in no doubt as to his real convictions on this point.

Indonesia.

At the meeting of the Security Council, Wednesday 23rd March, the Council agreed by a vote of eight to none with the Soviet, Ukraine and France abstaining, to have the President request UNCI to initiate preliminary discussions in Indonesia in the terms contained in my teletype No. 338 of 22nd March.†

2. It was found necessary to put this text to a vote, instead of adopting the text as a ruling from the President, because the Soviet Union called for a vote.

3. The decision was not taken without difficulty, however, as it developed that the Egyptian representative, in giving his consent reluctantly to the agreed text, at the preliminary consultations between the seven delegations, had not, repeat not, obtained the assent of the other representatives of the New Delhi group participating in the discussion in the Council. Thus, after I had made a statement, the text of which was transmitted to you in my teletype No. 347, the Indian representative and Hood of Australia attacked the agreed formula and my interpretation of it. In particular, Sen of India, speaking for this group, went back to the point which had been urged previously by Cuba and Egypt in the consultations between the seven delegations, namely, that the preliminary discussions themselves must be divided into two stages. The first of these stages would relate only to the restoration of the Republic to Jogjakarta (Article 2) and its reconstitution as a fully qualified negotiating party. Only after the full reconstitution of the Republic as a negotiating party, would discussions be held concerning both the implementation of the cease fire clause of the resolution on 28th January (Article 1), and the time and conditions on which the Hague Conference might take place.

4. The representatives of India and Australia made their arguments with such insistence, and spoke in such critical terms of the text which I had put forward, that the representative of Egypt informed the President (Dr. Alvarez) that he had no alternative but to withdraw his support for the formula as it had been put forward and with the explanation which I had given in my statement.

5. In the circumstances, I spoke to Tsiang, who informed me that, prior to the meeting, Palar had indicated that, while he was not entirely happy about the formula, he had been persuaded by Tsiang that the last sentence of the text (stating that "if such an agreement is reached, the holding of such a Conference and the participation by UNCI" would be in accordance with the Council's resolution), provided sufficient safeguard for the Republican position. However, in consequence of the Indian and Australian statements, he (Palar), had no alternative but to adopt the same position as the other New Delhi members. Tsiang offered the comment that Palar's friends had not served him well in taking such extreme positions. Tsiang agreed to make a statement urging the New Delhi group to accept the formula as it stood, without insisting on the preliminary discussions being held in two separate stages, for the reasons he had given to Palar.

6. Despite Tsiang's helpful statement in the Council, I found it necessary to speak to Fawzi Bey personally and urge upon him the grave situation which would arise if the Council failed to take any decision at this time, and the inevitable repercussions of such a situation in Indonesia, leading to mounting violence. Fawzi agreed with my view, but asked me to understand that, as a representative of a Moslem country and of a nation represented at the New Delhi Conference, he was under great pressure to maintain the position urged by the New Delhi group. However, he finally consented to support the resolution, provided I would not object to his making an explanation before the vote, stating that he was supporting the formula with the interpretation given it by the New Delhi group. In fact, he said he would only vote for the resolution if his interpretation was not challenged by any member of the Council. I then spoke privately to Arce of Argentina who said that he had hoped to continue his policy of abstention in this controversy, but, provided Egypt would vote in favour (to make the necessary majority of 7 votes without him) he would add his support. In fact, Arce made a useful short intervention in favour of our proposal.

7. You will see, from this account of the events yesterday, the serious difficulties which arose because of the real differences of approach to the Indonesian problem as between the New Delhi group (and those who support their position), on the one hand, and the Western Nations on the other. This is a situation to which I have previously referred several times in my reports and which gives me grave and increasing anxiety. I must emphasize that it was only through the personal intervention and prestige of Dr. Tsiang that any decision was reached by the Council yesterday, and, even though a decision was reached, there was clearly no agreement as between the two groups on the interpretation of that decision. Our Commission in Indonesia will thus be left with the difficult task of applying this text, which has now a background of several differing explanations given in the Security Council.

8. I must also point out that the difference between the New Delhi group and the other members of the Council who supported our formula, was regarded by the former group as being based on a matter of principle. In their view, the Dutch had endeavoured to "eliminate" one of the parties to the Indonesian dispute by force and, in their opinion, no negotiations of any kind should be undertaken with the sanction of the Council until the Republic had been fully restored in accordance with Article 2 of the resolution. Delegating authority to UNCI to undertake discussions to help the Dutch and the Republicans to implement Article 2 is, in their view, a compromise with principle which the Council should not have accepted. We were urged by their spokesman to insist on the immediate and full implementation of Article 2, before sanctioning any negotiations with the Dutch, whether at The Hague or in Batavia.

9. I venture to report this view in full, as I can not emphasize too strongly that, should the preliminary discussions in Indonesia fail to materialize, owing to continued objection on the part of the Netherlands Government, or should these preliminary negotiations, once begun, break down for reasons which might clearly be attributed to the attitude of the Netherlands Government, then the Council would be faced with very severe pressures to insist upon the full implementation of the resolution of 28th January, including the consideration of sanctions under Chapter 7 of the Charter.

10. If events should develop in this way and should the Council, as seems possible, fail to take action under Chapter 7, the New Delhi group might meet to consider some concerted action of a coercive nature, on the grounds that the Council had failed to take action to restore peace and security in South-East Asia. In this connection, members of the Indian delegation here have expressed the view to us that there is a growing anxiety among the nations of South-East Asia as regards the effect of the North Atlantic Pact on the Indonesian question. They have said that, while they fully understand the justifications for the North Atlantic Pact in terms of the self-defence of the Western Nations against the threat of Communism in Europe, they would hope that this Treaty would not be used to support Dutch policies of colonialism in Asia at the expense of the wider considerations of international peace and security, as formulated in the Charter. Ends.

New York, March 24, 1949

My dear Mr. Pearson:

You will have by now seen my message No. 353 of 24 March, reporting on the adoption, on 23 March by the Security Council, of the Canadian proposal for preliminary discussions in Indonesia under the auspices of the UNCI. From this message, you will be aware of the grave anxieties I have come to feel in regard to the way in which the Indonesian situation is developing, particularly from the standpoint of Canada's relations, as a Council member, with the nations of South-East Asia and the Pacific.

I have reported my views fully in the last few weeks concerning the most recent stages in the discussions of the Indonesian question and, therefore, perhaps I need not recapitulate them in detail at this time. The position which we have taken in the Council has sometimes been misinterpreted by various observers as being essentially directed to aid the Dutch to find a way out of their grave difficulties in Indonesia. I have not so regarded our position and I have consistently taken the view that the Council must endeavour to use every possible means of pacific settlement and that it should only resort to coercive measures if such procedures of pacific settlement have been clearly exhausted beyond all possibility of doubt. For this reason, and taking advantage of the opening given by the Netherlands Government by their offer of a conference at The Hague to discuss an earlier transfer of sovereignty to the United States of Indonesia, I have pressed our proposal to have the Council's Commission in Indonesia undertake further efforts at bringing the representatives of the two parties together in an endeavour to reach agreement on the implementation of the Council's Resolution of 28 January.

However, I must confess to you frankly that the reported attitude of our representative at The Hague, on the occasion of the consultations leading to the adoption of the Council's Resolution of 28 January, and, subsequently, when the Council was about to take a decision on our latest proposal on Wednesday, 23 March, has given me serious concern that neither our position in the Council nor the dangerous state of affairs which may well develop in South-East Asia is fully appreciated by him.

In regard to our position in the Security Council, the Canadian Delegation has, as you know, during the past year and a half, endeavoured, at all times, to maintain a record of the strictest impartiality on all matters which have come before the Council. We have constantly sought to find, in so far as possible, practicable solutions to the difficult and complex disputes which have come up for discussion.

We have heretofore always been able to maintain our reputation for impartiality and objectivity with the nations of South-East Asia with whom, particularly as a result of what we were able to do in the Kashmir dispute, we have had relations of friendship and understanding. Our accession to the North Atlantic Pact will, in a sense, make even more difficult this problem of our maintaining friendly relations with these states. While these nations are fully prepared to understand our position concerning the necessity for maintaining in Europe a firm front of resistance against Communist expansion, they have repeatedly shown apprehensions lest the possible effect of the North Atlantic Pact might be to divert the fullest drive of Communist expansionism from Europe to Asia. They also fear lest some of the nations participating in the North Atlantic Pact, and by reason of the guarantees which this will give to their security at home, might feel free to divert forces to Asia for the purpose of supporting their colonial policies, and, of course, these apprehensions are primarily concerned, at this time, with the Dutch.

In short, what I really fear is that, out of the Indonesian question, might develop a very serious rift between the states participating in the North Atlantic Pact and those nations of South-East Asia and the Pacific which are trying, in most difficult circumstances, to stem the tide of Communism and to maintain democratic forms of government. I believe it is imperative that these nations should be given our support and that they should continue to be regarded as our friends.

I have ventured to write to you very frankly as I am sure that you regard this matter as I do. I am not so sure, however, that these views are sufficiently appreciated by our representative at The Hague and this is the reason for my writing to you in this manner. In closing, I cannot emphasize too strongly my opinion that we must continue to act in this Indonesian dispute with the most scrupulous impartiality and objectivity. The dangers to which I have referred are, in my judgment, so real that any departure from this course would arouse against us such a tide of resentment among these Eastern nations that our influence in the Council would be weakened and thus the possibilities would be compromised of our working with them to counteract the spread of communism in Asia.

Yours sincerely,

A.G.L. MCNAUGHTON

[Ottawa], March 26, 1949

Attached is a copy of an immediate telegram no. 73 of March 22 from the Ambassador in The Hague,† reporting the discussion at a meeting to which the Netherlands Foreign Minister called the United Kingdom, French, Belgian and Canadian Ambassadors in order to express his objections to the latest text of a formula being worked out by the seven powers which had supported the January 28th Resolution to express the sense of the recent discussions in the Council. Mr. Stikker's principal objection was that by placing the return to Jogjakarta on top of the agenda of the proposed Batavia conference, the Republicans would be put in a position in which they could obtain a decision on this point and then refuse to accept the other part of the bargain, which was the Round Table Conference. Mr. Dupuy, along with the United Kingdom and French Ambassadors, attempted to persuade Mr. Stikker that he was misinterpreting the latest text, and that the Dutch would be very wise to accept it. Mr. Stikker agreed finally that the matter was one of drafting, and he therefore showed considerable interest in a proposal made by Mr. Dupuy that an appropriate text might be discussed among Bevin, Spaak, Schuman and Stikker, who were sailing the next day on the Queen Mary for New York. Mr. Dupuy further proposed that this agreed text should finally be submitted at a meeting in Washington attended by the Foreign Ministers mentioned above, together with Mr. Acheson and yourself.

2. This telegram arrived Tuesday evening and was referred to the Delegation in New York. Mr. Holmes discussed it on the telephone with Mr. Ignatieff. Mr. Ignatieff's view, which was later confirmed by General McNaughton, was in keeping with our own impressions and with what we had expected would be the view of the Delegation. These views might be summarized as follows:

1. There was no chance whatsoever that the President of the Council would at this point agree to a postponement in order to make way for a text revised to please the Dutch. Mr. Alvarez had very reluctantly agreed to join the other seven supporters of the January 28th Resolution in the compromise text which was finally accepted by a narrow majority in the Council. The result of an endeavour to secure such a postponement would probably have been to spoil any hope of securing a successful conclusion to our present endeavours at reaching a compromise.

2. The amendments agreed upon just before the Council meeting by the seven powers had done something to remove Mr. Stikker's objections. Mr. Stikker's principal objection was, furthermore, hardly valid. Our attitude has been that the Batavia meeting is to discuss two subjects, that there is no bargain, and that no conditions can be imposed by either side in advance.

3. The present statement is to be a directive to the United Nations Commission. It is not an instruction to the Indonesians or to the Dutch. There is no need, therefore, for the Dutch to accept it or reject it.

4. Perhaps the principal objection to Mr. Dupuy's suggestion, is that there is latent in it a precedent which we ought not to adopt without most serious consideration. The proposed meeting in Washington would be a meeting in fact of the Foreign Ministers of the original signatories of the North Atlantic Pact. Mr. Dupuy did not suggest that it should be called by such a name, but the impression given abroad would be that a new institution had been inaugurated and that the first consideration of the new institution was the protection of the colonial interests of one of the North Atlantic powers.

In this connection we should bear in mind a remark made to General McNaughton several days ago by the Indian Permanent Representative in New York, Mr. Menon. Mr. Menon, who had shown a great deal more understanding of the good intentions of the Canadian Representative than had some of the other representatives of the New Delhi powers, nevertheless said to General McNaughton that, if Canada and other members of the North Atlantic Pact were going to consider their obligations to other members of the Pact as having priority over their obligations as members of the Security Council, the effect on Asia would be disastrous. Such criticism of a well-intentioned meeting of Foreign Ministers might be somewhat unfair, but we should not ignore the interpretation which would be placed on it by the Indians and others. It would be particularly unfortunate, at the present moment, to give such an impression of our conception of the North Atlantic Pact to the Indians when the question of their relations with the Commonwealth is a subject of urgent discussion.

3. If we are to help our Dutch allies we should act within the framework of the Security Council. The present group of seven, which has been working together in the Council and which includes countries like Egypt and China, is more likely to impress world opinion than a group of North Atlantic powers which might be described as getting together to cook up a solution in aid of a fellow imperialist power.⁴²

4. In view of the above considerations I did not think that we could press General McNaughton to request adjournment of the Council for a matter of at least a week. He was instructed, however, to consult with his United Kingdom, French and Belgian colleagues in order to find out if they had received any instructions as a result of the discussions in The Hague. The Delegation reported that the other countries concerned did not seem to be pursuing actively the proposal for a postponement and that Dr. van Roijen himself thought it impracticable. In the hours before the Council meeting it became more and more clear that the formula as drafted by the seven powers included the best possible concession to Dutch wishes that could be secured. The meeting itself was a difficult one, and it was only the redoubtable energy of General McNaughton and Mr. Ignatieff in holding their support that made success possible.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, March 29, 1949

Dear Pierre [Dupuy]:

Dr. van Roijen called on me this morning to take his leave and to discuss his assignment to head the Netherlands Delegation at the preliminary conference to be held in Batavia shortly. Mr. Holmes and Mr. Menzies were present. Dr. van Roijen looked tired and it was evident that he had been under very considerable nervous strain for some time and it is unfortunate that he will have to press on so soon without rest to undertake these new and critical negotiations.

2. It was apparent that Dr. van Roijen did not relish the prospect of his new assignment. He said that the Government had decided that it needed some new blood to undertake the negotiations in Batavia, particularly as new concessions were to be made in respect to the return of the Republicans to Jogjakarta. In making these concessions, Dr. van Roijen said that he might well damage his own reputation in the Netherlands where he might be regarded as an appeaser.

3. Dr. van Roijen was much concerned about the state of the public opinion in the Netherlands. He said that in many democratic countries there was a point beyond which no Government dared to go. The Netherlands Government had been compelled recently to tread dangerously close to this line. At one point, Dr. Drees and Dr. Stikker had contemplated resigning. He did not know what would have happened if they had done so.

4. I asked Dr. van Roijen what was being done in the way of a domestic information program to keep the Netherlands public in step with the decisions which the Government was taking. He said that everything possible was being done but that there were naturally many difficulties.

5. The United States attitude toward the original suggestion thrown out by General McNaughton in the March 11 debate had seriously upset Dr. van Roijen. He felt that certain United States officials had gone out of their way to impose the will of the Security Council on the Netherlands Government. He noted that the formula mentioned the January 28 resolution three separate times. He was not so concerned about the wording of the formula as the attitude on the part of responsible United States officials which he thought it revealed. He was afraid that the United States Government would not instruct Cochran to try to facilitate compromises at the preliminary conference by putting pressure on the Republicans as well as on the Dutch.

6. I asked Dr. van Roijen if he did not think that the United States Government required to be as sensitive to domestic public opinion in the United States as the Netherlands Government was in its own country. Dr. van Roijen replied that many of the important columnists writing in United States papers had expressed sympathy for the difficulties that the Netherlands Government was facing in Indonesia. He mentioned Arthur Krock and Dorothy Thompson in particular. Mr. Holmes said that he thought that the United States delegation was not alone in insisting on adherence to the January 28 resolution. He thought this was in the minds of all delegations. Mr. Menzies said that he thought that it should be remembered that the New Delhi Conference countries considered that they had already gone the limit in compromise in accepting the procedures of the January 28 resolution rather than a full return to the status quo before the December "police action".

7. I told Dr. van Roijen that one of the things that had been troubling us during the last fortnight was a certain suspicion in some of the Asian countries that the North Atlantic Pact might be used to protect the colonial interests of some of the members. The suggestion that had been made recently that the Foreign Ministers of the North Atlantic alliance might discuss the Indonesian question at the Conference in Washington at the end of this week had therefore seemed to us most unwise; this was not in our opinion the type of question which should be discussed at a meeting of this kind. Dr. van Roijen agreed that it would have been tactically inexpedient. He thought however that advantage might have been taken of the conference to have some informal conversations on the subject. He hoped, for instance, that if the United States was genuinely anxious to have the Indonesian problem removed permanently from the Security Council agenda they might be convinced that pressure should be brought to bear on the Republicans as well as the Dutch to make concessions. So far he had not seen any disposition on the part of the United States officials to do this. Unless some direction came from the State Department he was afraid that Cochran, with his rather legalistic attitude, would not take any initiative.

8. I told Dr. van Roijen that we had been upset by reports that we had received from various quarters about the extent of Indonesian casualties during the December "police action" and in the round up of guerrillas since then. I said that if these figures were made public there would be general revulsion. Dr. van Roijen did not seem to me to grasp this point any too well as he spent some time explaining just how these high casualties were incurred.

9. We discussed for some time the difficult problem of securing cessation of guerrilla activities in the Indies. We tried to make the point to Dr. van Roijen that it would be necessary for the Netherlands Government to make some pretty generous offers in an effort to encourage the Republican guerrillas to desist from their present activities. Dr. van Roijen said that he recognized that this would be one of the thorniest problems. He said that the Netherlands was naturally as interested as anyone in finding some means of bringing these guerrilla activities to an end to restore law and order in the country.

10. Finally we had some discussion about the necessity of preventing untimely political organizational activities outside the preliminary conference occurring. Mr. Menzies mentioned that there had been reports of Federalist leaders in Sumatra proposing to call a conference of representatives of all territories in the island, including Republican territories. He thought that if this conference were to coincide with the preliminary conference in Batavia it might well create an unfortunate impression. Dr. van Roijen said that this was a matter which he would have to discuss with Dr. Beel on his arrival in the Indies.

11. Dr. van Roijen had a conversation along similar lines with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Heeney yesterday.

12. I am attaching a copy of notes which were prepared for my guidance in the conversation this morning with Dr. van Roijen. While we did not adhere to this outline we did touch on most of the points during the course of our conversation.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

NOTES FOR USE IN CONVERSATION WITH NETHERLANDS AMBASSADOR IN DISCUSSION OF INDONESIA

1. Difficulties in securing agreement on formula proposing preliminary conference.

It is unnecessary to go over in detail with Dr. van Roijen the difficulties which the Canadian Delegation to the Security Council had in securing agreement of the eight original supporters of the January 28 resolution to a formula permitting sufficient flexibility in preliminary negotiations. There were two particular problems:

(a) The insistence of all delegations on adherence—and some more rigidly than others—to the January 28 resolution. The New Delhi powers felt that they had already gone the limit in compromise in accepting the procedures of the January 28 resolution rather than a full return to the status quo before the December “police action”.

(b) Suspicion of the ultimate intentions of the Netherlands Government in regard to transfer of sovereignty—a suspicion which we do not share.

2. Essential for Netherlands Delegation to create favourable impression in preliminary conference.

(a) It must be realized that every statement and communication of the Netherlands Delegation at the preliminary conference will be reported to the Security Council by the United Nations Commission. Care should be taken therefore not to permit the impression to be gained that the Netherlands is trying to get around the January 28 resolution or that the transfer of sovereignty will not be “real, complete and unconditional” as indicated in Netherlands statements.

(b) Consideration might be given to ways in which the Netherlands can meet the special preoccupations of the various U.N.C.I. delegations and secretariat. It would seem especially important that a further effort be made to seek to allay Australian suspicions. We have found the Indian Government has adopted a responsible attitude and has influence with the Republican leaders.

3. Disposition of Republican Army (Guerrillas) will prove most difficult problem.

(a) Dr. van Roijen should know that we have been shocked by the report we have received that 24,000 Republicans have been killed since the commencement of the December "police action" compared with 450 Netherlands soldiers, a ratio of 55 to 1.

(b) We recognize the obligation on the part of the Republican Government to issue a cease fire order. However, the Netherlands must recognize the necessity for making preliminary arrangements to see that this cease fire order can be made effective. Some facilities will have to be placed at the disposal of the Republican leaders to enable them to reestablish contact with the guerrilla groups and to reassert their authority over them. Otherwise the guerrilla leaders will repudiate the authority of the Republican leaders and there will be a drift to continued lawlessness and extremism. Some means of encouraging the guerrillas to cease their military activities must be found.

4. Should recognize the political organization activities going on outside the preliminary conference will arouse suspicion especially if touching Republican territory.

(a) Dr. van Roijen will recall the concern that was felt at the time reports were received of the establishment of a provisional regime in former Republican territory. Happily it was possible to show that these organizational activities were confined to territories that had been under Republican control before the first police action. Nevertheless, the reason why this concern was felt was due to previous Netherlands Government encouragement of political organization activities in former Republican territory at a time when they were conducting negotiations with the Republic.

(b) There have been reports that Federalist leaders have been considering convening a conference of representatives of all areas of Sumatra, including Republican territories. If such a conference were held at the same time that the preliminary conference was taking place it might well upset the negotiations.

13. Mr. Menzies reported that the Netherlands and Republican delegates to the preliminary conference in Batavia had signed an agreement providing for the restoration of the Republican Government to its capital of Jogjakarta with authority over the whole residency. For their part, the Republican leaders had signified that they personally favoured the Republican Government, when re-organized, issuing a cease-fire order and sending representatives to a round-table conference at The Hague. Evidence that certain elements are dissatisfied with this agreement is to be found in the reports that Dr. Beel, High Representative of the Crown in Indonesia, has resigned. Mr. Maarseveen, Minister of Overseas Territories, has given a report to the Netherlands Parliament indicating that the Government believes this agreement to be a necessary step in resolving differences in Indonesia with a view to securing progress toward a final political settlement.

14. As the result of the conclusion of this agreement, the Australian and Indian representatives to the General Assembly of the United Nations who had sponsored the proposal for placing the Indonesian question on the agenda, submitted a further proposal calling for deferment of discussion of the question until the fall meeting of the Assembly. This proposal secured general support.

5. Mr. Menzies said that agreements between the Netherlands and Indonesian delegations on all subjects under negotiation at the Round Table Conference which has been going on at The Hague for the past two months were signed on November 2. On the recommendation of the United Nations Commission, the question of the future status of New Guinea was left over for a year. Enquiries have been received concerning Canadian views on this question and the matter is now under study.

THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Mr. Holmes reported that on November 18 at a meeting called by the President, Dr. Arce, of Argentina, the Security Council noted the receipt of the special report of the United Nations Commission for Indonesia on the Round Table Conference at The Hague. It is believed that Arce's motive in calling the meeting was his personal wish to preside again before the Argentine membership expires this year. Fortunately there was no discussion of substantive questions which, in view of the pending ratification of the agreement reached at The Hague, would have been inopportune. The Canadian representative supported a Ukrainian statement that the report was of such importance that the Council should have full information before it, and added that he wished on a later occasion to pay proper tribute to both the Dutch and the Indonesians and to the United Nations Commission for Indonesia.

Indonesia.

The Indonesian question is on the agenda of the Assembly and the Security Council, and likely to come up shortly in both forums.

2. In the Assembly, the item is to be taken up tomorrow morning, December 3rd, in the Ad Hoc Committee. It is hoped that the debate will be short. The delegations whose Governments took part in the Delhi Conference have been meeting, and have decided to introduce jointly a short resolution welcoming The Hague Agreement and the forthcoming establishment of the Indonesian Republic. The text of this resolution, which has been given to us in confidence, is contained in my immediately following teletype.† The most interesting point is that it has now been decided not to incorporate a final paragraph, which Palar (Indonesia) had originally wished to include, keeping Indonesia on the agenda for the fifth session of the Assembly. Palar has told us that he now realizes that such a paragraph would provoke Netherlands objections and might jeopardize Netherlands ratification.

3. The Indonesian and Indian delegations have both told us that they expect substantial criticism of The Hague Agreement from the Soviet Bloc, but have decided that they will not reply. Probably only two or three of the sponsors will speak; Palar says that he does not intend to ask to be heard; and it is to be hoped that most delegations will not speak at all, so as to avoid having anything said by other than Soviet delegations which might create difficulties in Indonesia or the Netherlands before ratification is completed.

4. In the Security Council, we have tentatively decided not to call a meeting to consider the Commission's report until the latter part of next week, or more probably early in the week of December 5th. The full documentation is being distributed in English only today, and will not be available in other languages until Monday. We understand that ratification in the Netherlands will begin on Tuesday, and is expected to be concluded by the end of next week. Palar has told Arnold Smith that he is satisfied to have Indonesia removed from the Assembly agenda, but attaches importance to favourable comments from the Security Council on the agreement, and evidence of continued Security Council interest which can be used by the Indonesian authorities to strengthen their internal support. Continuing the Commission will, he acceded, accomplish this purpose.

5. We are considering Canadian sponsorship of a resolution in the Security Council, welcoming the agreement, noting with satisfaction the Commission's report, commending the Commission and the parties, and possibly providing explicitly for continued functioning of the Commission. We will send you a draft resolution along these lines, for your comments, in the next day or two. Naturally we would also wish to discuss such a draft with our friends on the Council, and with the Netherlands and Indonesian delegations, before introducing it.

My telegram No. 789† of November 30 and your telegram No. 421 of December 2. Indonesia.

Dr. van Royen, Netherlands Ambassador, called at the Department yesterday afternoon to discuss with Mr. Holmes and Mr. Menzies some aspects of the Indonesian question in relation to its discussion in the General Assembly and the Security Council. Dr. van Royen intends to go down to New York early next week to be on hand for the discussion of the report of the UNCI in the Security Council. He will get in touch with you soon after his arrival.

2. Terms of Reference of the Commission. Paragraph 105 of UNCI's special report to the Security Council on the Round Table Conference (S/1417 of November 10) describes the further responsibilities which the Commission has been asked to assume in Indonesia. Article VI of the covering resolution of the Round Table Conference (actually contained in the correction sheet) provides "The United Nations Commission for Indonesia or another United Nations agency shall observe in Indonesia the implementation of the agreements reached at the Round Table Conference." Apart from this general provision, there are special provisions such as cooperation with the Joint Technical Commission to be established in connection with the repatriation of the Royal Netherlands army from Indonesia and overseeing the plebiscites called for in respect to the self-determination agreement.

3. Paragraph 116 of the special report of UNCI says "The Commission ... will continue to carry out its functions in accordance with its terms of reference, and observe in Indonesia the implementation of the agreements reached at the Round Table Conference". Dr. van Royen said that in drafting this paragraph, the commissioners deliberately overlooked the question as to whether the present terms of reference of the Commission were adequate to its new functions.

4. The resolution of 28 January, 1949 (S/1234) gives the terms of reference of the UNCI. Paragraph 4C says "Upon agreement being reached in such negotiations (for the establishment of an interim federal government, the holding of elections for an Indonesian Constituent Assembly and the transfer of sovereignty) the Commission shall make recommendations to the Security Council as to the nature, powers and functions of the United Nations agency which should remain in Indonesia to assist in the implementation of the provisions of such agreement until sovereignty is transferred by the Government of the Netherlands to the United States of Indonesia". The order of events envisaged in the resolution has been changed with sovereignty being transferred first and elections being held later. It seems to us rather doubtful whether it could be argued that the resolution of 28 January is adequate to the new responsibilities of the Commission. You may, therefore, wish to discuss this question with other delegations.

5. If new terms of reference are required, you will wish to bear in mind the possibility of the Soviet Delegate vetoing the resolution. While the Soviet Delegate has contented himself with abstaining on previous resolutions there is some question as to whether his government may consider the present time appropriate for making a complete break. You will recall that Mr. Arutunian, speaking in the ad hoc Committee on the Soviet peace resolution, criticized the Round Table Conference for setting up a puppet state in Indonesia. This is consistent with the present line of Soviet propaganda on this subject. If the Soviet Union were to veto the new terms of reference for the UNCI, it seems to us that it would be difficult to arrange for the transfer of this question to the General Assembly with a view to that body appointing a Commission, although this possibility has apparently been considered by the Dutch and the Americans.

In an unusually short debate marred only by Soviet propaganda tactics the ad hoc Committee commenced and completed on December 3rd its debate on the question of Indonesia (Item 20). The Committee adopted by a vote of 43 in favour (including Canada) to 5 against (Soviet bloc) with 4 abstentions the joint draft resolution (Document A/AC.31/L.50) sponsored by 14 states of the "Delhi group."

2. The "Delhi group" resolution was ably introduced by Benegal Rau (India) and was strongly opposed by the Soviet bloc with Manuilsky (Ukraine) in the van. Manuilsky introduced a counter-resolution (Document A/AC.31/L.51) which demanded, inter alia, the withdrawal of Netherlands forces to specified positions; the release of Indonesian political prisoners; the dissolution of UNCI, and the establishment of a United Nations Commission empowered to investigate Netherlands activities, and to prepare and submit proposals for the settlement of the Dutch-Indonesian problem "on the basis of the recognition of the independence and sovereignty of the Indonesian people."

3. Manuilsky, after criticizing the Dutch at length, led an unsuccessful filibustering campaign to keep the debate open, using as a pretext the fact that annexes to UNCI's report had been distributed only to members of the Security Council. Manuilsky requested that no vote be taken on either resolution until this documentation was available to the Assembly.

4. There then ensued a lengthy procedural battle with the Soviet bloc using "over our dead body tactics" to keep the debate open. The Committee decided, however, to proceed to the vote immediately. As the Security Council is seized of the Indonesian problem, the Chairman put successive prior questions on each of the resolutions as to whether or not the Committee considered they constituted a recommendation in the sense of Article 12 of the Charter. The Committee voted that the joint (Delhi) draft resolution did not constitute a recommendation but that the Ukrainian resolution did, and then proceeded to adopt the joint resolution. In view of the Committee's decision regarding Article 12 the Ukrainian resolution was not voted.

5. The Netherlands delegate, who had contented himself with a short and restrained reply to Manuilsky's charges, was obviously relieved at the speedy way in which the item was dealt with.

Reference our teletype No. 421 of December 2nd. Indonesia.

1. As mentioned to you in paragraph 4 of our teletype under reference, we are contemplating sponsorship if you approve of a draft resolution in the Security Council, which will probably meet on Monday, December 12th, on Indonesia.

2. We do not wish to firm on the text for a few days as some flexibility is desirable during this period of consultation with other delegations. However, we have prepared a tentative draft, which I am transmitting in my immediately following teletype and on which your general comments would be appreciated.

3. We have discussed this draft with Palar (Indonesia) and the United States, United Kingdom, and Indian delegations, all of whom have given preliminary agreement. They will be giving us a more considered opinion in the next day or two. They have all welcomed the idea of a Canadian initiative in this matter.

4. Arnold Smith discussed the subject with Van Royen this afternoon. As you know, he has been uncertain whether the old terms of reference of the Commission would allow it to discharge its future responsibility in the absence of a new resolution. He was also inclined to fear that the Soviet delegation might veto a new resolution. Hence he wondered about the possibility of having the Assembly appoint a Commission. On this last point, Arnold Smith said that this would open up the question of membership of the Commission, which seemed undesirable, and more serious, it would necessitate having the Security Council first decide to remove Indonesia from its agenda. This step might be difficult and might give rise to misinterpretation and unfortunate repercussions in Indonesia. Van Royen said that he quite agreed, and felt that it would be better not to have a Security Council meeting until next week and to abandon the idea of transferring the question to the Assembly.

5. Van Royen was told that it was our view on the delegation that it seemed best to proceed on the assumption that the Soviet would probably not, repeat not, veto the resolution and that if they did the Commission could in fact continue satisfactorily under its previous terms of reference as the Commission itself had stated. This interpretation will allow the Commission to carry on even despite a Soviet veto, while admitting any alternative interpretation is likely both to invite a Soviet veto and to preclude any easy solution in the face of such a veto. This is also the strong view of the United States delegation. The Secretariat has not questioned this interpretation, which has obviously come to their attention as it is contained in the recommendations in the Commission's special report. It seems unwise to ask the Secretariat for a legal opinion and thus risk putting the idea of any other interpretation into Zinchenko's mind. Indeed, it is difficult to see just what action should be taken if our interpretation were to be abandoned. Van Royen said that he was inclined to agree that the best course was to assume this interpretation and to maintain it if it is challenged.

6. For all these reasons, Van Royen is now of the view that the general lines of our resolution are probably the most satisfactory that can be devised.

7. Arnold Smith also told Van Royen that Palar had said that he attached particular value to the last paragraph of the Canadian draft resolution, since this explicit evidence of continuing Security Council interest in Indonesia will be helpful in strengthening the authority of the Indonesian political leaders over their extremists including some of their military people. Van Royen said that he too felt that there was much weight in this point.

Following from Arnold Smith, Begins: Indonesia.

1. On December 6th Van Royen told us that he had been giving further thought to the desirability of including the last paragraph in our draft resolution, requesting UNCI to continue its functions, and after discussion with other members of his delegation he was inclined to think that it might be wiser to omit this paragraph. His reasons were that the Soviet delegation would be less likely to veto our resolution if no such paragraph were contained in it, and that the Secretary General might refuse to continue paying UNCI in the face of the Soviet veto. The old terms of reference would probably be adequate, and the Secretary General would be less likely to raise difficulties if there were no Soviet veto. Van Royen told us that he shared our view that we should not formally ask the Secretariat for a legal opinion or a commitment, but wished himself to ask Pelt (Dutch Assistant Secretary General) to ascertain discretely from Feller (Assistant Legal Adviser) the probable Secretariat appreciation.

2. We told Van Royen that we had no objection to his enquiry to Pelt but that we were not ourselves inclined to share his fears. We felt that we had, as it were, three lines of defence:

(a) The Soviet delegation would probably not veto our resolution including the last paragraph, since to do so would put them seriously in the wrong with Indonesian public opinion and with that of the overwhelming majority of the United Nations, while they would have little to gain because we could in any case act despite the veto;

(b) The Commission almost certainly could, and certainly intends to carry on, if necessary, under the already existing terms of reference;

(c) If necessary, the Interim Committee could set up the Commission by a two-thirds vote, by having any member nation put the Indonesian question on the Assembly agenda for next year. If this were necessary to override a Soviet veto, and were requested by both parties (as it would be), there is little doubt that the requisite two-thirds vote would be obtained.

3. Van Royen acknowledged the force of these considerations, but wished to get Pelt's view and promised to keep us informed.

4. We then re-examined our view with the United States, United Kingdom, Indian and Indonesian delegates, all of whom said that they fully agreed with us and felt that the last paragraph should be included.

5. On Wednesday afternoon, December 7th, Van Royen told me that he has now come round entirely to our view and that he is completely in favour of our resolution as it now stands, including the final paragraph. Pelt has told him that Trygve Lie, on his own initiative, raised the matter and said that whether the USSR vetoes a resolution for UNCI to continue or not, he will arrange "somehow" that it continue. Trygve Lie then said, "I will find a way, even if I have to use the Interim Committee. The overwhelming majority will back me." This indication of Lie's views has entirely reassured Van Royen.

6. We have made a few verbal improvements in our tentative draft resolution and the text as it now stands is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

7. We have now discussed this draft informally with all the members of the Security Council except the USSR and the Ukraine, and with the Australian delegation. All have given us warm provisional approval. Ends.

I approve entirely your draft resolution and the steps you have taken to secure support. I also approve your plans for a satisfactory programme in the Security Council. The final paragraph of your resolution seems to be as safe and satisfactory a way as possible for preventing difficulties in continuing the work of UNCI. We had at first been concerned lest the verbs "to discharge" and "to observe" contained in the resolution would not cover all the activities which the two parties in The Hague agreement requested the Commission to carry out. The addition proposed in paragraph one of your telegram No. 1149 is a considerable improvement. From the further comments in that teletype and from Holmes' telephone conversation with Smith, I understand that both the Netherlands and Indonesian representatives consider your amended resolution as adequate to cover their needs.

Indonesia.

1. At the Security Council meeting on this subject at 3:00 p.m. on December 12th I introduced the Canadian draft resolution with the statement contained in my teletype No. 1164.† (The text of the Canadian draft resolution, as distributed to the Council, is identical with that contained in my teletype No. 456† from the General Assembly delegation, with the addition of the words “and assist in”—see paragraph 1 of my teletype No. 1149†).

2. After I had spoken, Van Royen for the Netherlands made a lengthy statement of a generally conciliatory character regarding the round table conference and concerning future relations between the Netherlands and the Republic of the United States of Indonesia. However, Van Royen, apparently under instructions from his Government, did feel compelled to reiterate the position of the Netherlands regarding the competence of the Security Council to deal with this question, and stated that “it remains a matter of regret to us that the Netherlands Government’s repeated suggestions to have the International Court of Justice pronounce on the question of competence was never followed up.” Van Royen also added that his Government was “profoundly convinced that also without the assistance of the Security Council and its organ, the United Nations Commission for Indonesia, a just and satisfactory agreement, through probably somewhat different from the present one, would have been reached.” Prior to the meeting Van Royen had informed me that he was going to refer again to this question of competence, as he was under obligation to France, and particularly to Belgium, to adhere to this position. I pointed out to him that to do so might be to invite critical statements against the Netherlands from several members of the Council. This Dutch attitude is in contrast to the emphasis which, in another conversation, Van Royen placed on full assurance that UNCI would be able to actively assist, in particular, in regard to the provisions of Article 2 of the “Agreement on Transitional Measures.” In fact I added the last paragraph of my statement in order to cover, by implication, this point. In general, however, Van Royen’s statement was moderate and constructive and, so far as the Canadian draft resolution was concerned, he said “I wish to state that my delegation is in agreement with the contents of that resolution and believes that its adoption by the Security Council would be helpful to all parties concerned in carrying out the provisions of the agreements reached at The Hague.”

3. For the Indonesian delegation, Palar made a lengthy statement reviewing in detail the character of the Statute of Union agreed to at The Hague and the Charter of the Transfer of Sovereignty. The main burden of Palar’s remarks was that, although these agreements had required considerable concessions on the part of the Indonesian Republic, they in no way restricted the freedom of action of the Republic of Indonesia as a fully sovereign State. "We have here two sovereign States which have voluntarily agreed to cooperate with each other on a basis of equality laid down in an agreement which, like all other agreements, can be terminated if, and as soon as, it became clear that either of the parties is not adhering to that agreement." Palar also referred to the New Guinea issue and emphasized his delegation's view that it was necessary for UNCI to continue in order that "an experienced mediating body" could assist the parties in reaching a solution of this question. Palar emphasized that until the New Guinea question was settled a shadow would be cast on cooperation between the Netherlands and the Republic of Indonesia. He said, "the New Guinea issue could be considered a territorial restriction of our sovereignty. But, as you are well aware, this question must be settled within one year. We are determined to have New Guinea sharing our sovereignty within a year." Palar concluded by supporting "whole-heartedly" the Canadian draft resolution. He also paid tribute to Van Royen, "whose statesmanship was largely instrumental in bringing about a meeting of minds in Indonesia."

4. The representatives of Norway, Pakistan and China made brief statements of a conciliatory nature and commended the parties and UNCI on the agreement which had been reached. The Chinese representative, however, made reference to Van Royen's comments regarding the competence of the Council and stated that: "If, therefore, we are to pronounce judgement on that question of competence by results, I feel that the Security Council has been right on that question, and the delegation of the Netherlands has been wrong."

5. The Ukrainian representative made a long propaganda statement of a familiar character and repeated virtually all the arguments previously made by the Soviet bloc against "Dutch terrorism." The gist of his remarks was that the "Hatta clique" had sold out to the "Colonial Powers". He hinted at Communist-led violence in Indonesia against the Hatta Government and stated that "the Indonesians have actually succeeded in ejecting Netherlands forces from the mountainous parts of Java and Sumatra. It cannot be concealed that Republican troops fighting against the Netherlands are not under the control of the Hatta group. They have been shifting in masses to the resistance movement against the Netherlands. In particular, the 16th Brigade has announced that it is fighting both the Dutch and the Hatta soldiery." He called for rejection by the Council of the Canadian draft resolution and submitted another draft resolution similar to that recently introduced into the Assembly by the Ukrainian delegation—the text of this resolution is contained in a separate teletype en clair.

6. From the statement of the Ukrainian representative it is not yet clear whether or not the Soviet Union plans to veto the Canadian draft resolution. If, however, the USSR does use its veto, I propose to take the position that UNCI can in any case continue to discharge its functions under the terms of the Council's resolution of 28th January 1949. The indications are that this position would be supported by the majority of the Council, as well as by the legal authorities of the Secretariat.

7. The Council is meeting again on this subject at 3:00 p.m. on Tuesday, 13th December.

SECRET

New York, December 15, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my teletype no. 1166 of 13 December, and other correspondence regarding the debates in the Security Council of 13 and 14 December on Indonesia. My teletype no. 1166 reports to you the developments of the first day of this debate. In this despatch I intend to report on the Council meeting of Tuesday, 13 December, when, as you know, the Canadian draft resolution was vetoed.

2. At the beginning of the meeting I suggested that unless I heard opposition, I proposed that the Council should use simultaneous translation, rather than the usual consecutive translation, for all statements, both of Council members and of other representatives; and that we should revert to consecutive translation only on procedural matters, and when we came to voting on the resolutions before us. There were no objections to this procedure, which I therefore had followed. The substantial saving in time proved very valuable, as it allowed us to finish the question that day, and avoided the disturbing effects on public opinion in Indonesia and the Netherlands which the Soviet statement that they intended to veto our resolution might otherwise have produced.

3. The representatives of India, Cuba, Egypt, Belgium, the United States, the United Kingdom and France spoke in support of the Canadian draft resolution. The United States representative, Gross, who sat at the Security Council for the first time, delivered his prepared statement very well. Incidentally, he took the opportunity to emphasize that the agreement reached at The Hague was "an example of the constructive role which mediation can play in helping the parties to help themselves in the solution of such disputes".

4. The Soviet representative (Tsarapkin) stated:

"The delegation of the Soviet Union considers that the Canadian draft resolution is inappropriate; it does not correspond to the true state of things in Indonesia, nor does it meet the principles, purposes and objectives of the United Nations. Accordingly, the delegation of the Soviet Union will vote against the Canadian draft resolution."

5. The statement that the Soviet Union intended to veto our resolution caused considerable discussion in the corridors. Before the meeting began, we had checked once more with Protitch, the Secretary of the Security Council, and Feller, the Legal Adviser of the Secretariat, to ensure that they were quite clear that the Commission could carry on under the Council's resolution of 28 January 1949, irrespective of a new veto. Both assured us that they had no doubts on this point. However, after the Soviet statement that they would veto, Arnold Smith was telephoned urgently by Cordier (Executive Assistant to the Secretary-General) and Feller, to suggest that it might be wiser if we withdrew the last paragraph of the resolution, in the hope of avoiding a veto and thus hoping to avoid any question regarding the competence of the Commission to carry on in the face of a veto resolution. Cordier and Feller were told that the legal position was clear, and that we would not consider withdrawing at this stage. If the Soviet Union wished to make an issue of it, we would meet them squarely. Cordier and Feller then assured us that if we did this they would back us to the hilt.

6. The United States delegation also approached us to ask whether we would have our resolution voted paragraph by paragraph, in the hope that some of the paragraphs at least would escape a Soviet veto. We told them too that we did not like this idea. There would probably be advantage in having the Soviets veto the paragraphs congratulating the parties, commending the Commission, welcoming the forthcoming establishment of the new Indonesian Republic, and also vetoing a resolution asking the Commission to continue. The result of the vote would merely be to show up the U.S.S.R. in the most unfavourable possible colours. The American delegation said that "it was a Canadian play, and they would let us play quarterback. They would give us full backing".

7. However, when the Council came to the actual voting on the resolutions, Arce of Argentina requested that a separate vote be taken on the last paragraph of the Canadian resolution. Accordingly, I put to the vote the first four paragraphs of our resolution, which received nine votes in favour, and two against (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine). I ruled that these paragraphs had been rejected due to the Soviet veto.

8. Dr. Arce said that in his view these paragraphs were merely procedural and not substantive, and therefore they should be considered as adopted. I said that my ruling was that they were not merely procedural but substantive, and asked whether the Argentine wished to challenge this ruling; Dr. Arce said he did not wish to do so.

9. I then put to the vote the last paragraph of the Canadian draft resolution, which received eight votes in favour, two against (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine), and one abstention (the Argentine). The Argentine representative abstained in view of his delegation's consistently strong interpretation of the domestic jurisdiction clause (Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter). I then declared that this paragraph also had been rejected due to the Soviet veto.

10. Cadogan, for the United Kingdom, then enquired on a point of order what was the position of the United Nations Commission for Indonesia in view of the veto of the Canadian draft resolution. I stated, as President, my ruling that:

"The Security Council has before it document S/1431 (i.e., the Canadian draft resolution) and it is on that resolution that we have been voting. That resolution has no effect whatsoever on the previous decisions which have been taken by the Council unless that resolution should have been passed. If this resolution is defeated, as it has been, the previous resolutions in the Security Council remain in full force and effect.”

This interpretation was not challenged in the Council.

11. We then voted on the Ukrainian draft resolution (the text of which was forwarded to you in my teletype no. 1167 of 13 December†). This was rejected by a vote of two in favour (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine) and nine against. The United Kingdom and the United States delegations had previously asked us whether we considered that they would be wiser to abstain or to vote against this resolution. We told them that we hoped everyone would vote against it, as the main point was the psychological effect on public opinion in Indonesia and the Netherlands, and the procedural method of killing a resolution by mere abstentions would not be adequately understood. Moreover, we hoped for a maximum contrast between the Council's view on the Canadian and on the Ukrainian resolutions. We also discussed this matter with the French and Chinese delegations.

12. As I intimated earlier in this despatch, I considered it a matter of considerable importance that once the Soviet Union had made it clear it intended to veto our resolution to continue the Commission, we should continue the meeting to the end, so that the interpretation could be made after the veto that it had no effect on the continuation and activities of the Commission. Luckily the simultaneous interpretation for the bulk of the meeting made this possible. Otherwise, I fear that the psychological repercussions and confusion in the Netherlands and Indonesia might have been unfortunate, as the legal position probably would not have been understood and moreover the additional time gained if the meeting had to be adjourned might give the Soviet delegation the opportunity to prepare a fight on the legal interpretation, which we were prepared to meet if need be, but naturally hoped to avoid.

13. After the voting was concluded, I took the opportunity which had been given me. As I saw it, the Soviet representative had injudiciously put himself over a barrel, and with some relish I proceeded to take appropriate action. Mentioning that I was speaking as Canadian representative, I gave a statement (the text of which was transmitted to you in my teletype no. 1177 of today†). I regretted that the Soviet representative chose, by the exercise of his veto privilege, to prevent the congratulations to the parties, the welcome to the Republic of Indonesia, and the commendation to the Commission which the vast majority of Council members had expressed, from being conveyed officially through a formal resolution to the parties. I expressed, however, our happiness in the confidence that the parties and the Commission, and indeed the public opinion of the entire free world, would, despite this veto, learn and understand the views on this matter of the overwhelming majority of Council members. I said also that it would be “a source of reassurance and satisfaction to the peoples of Indonesia and the Netherlands, and to world public opinion”, to know that this Soviet veto could have no retroactive effect, and that the Commission would continue to discharge its remaining obligations to the Council and would in the future, as in the past, render assistance to the parties to the full extent of its ability.

14. I added:

“My delegation is, of course, saddened at this latest demonstration that the Government of the U.S.S.R. does not welcome the peaceful settlement in Indonesia, and does not wish the United Nations to assist further in the establishment, as a new member of the family of sovereign and independent nations, of the Republic of the United States of Indonesia.

“It is nevertheless a source of profound reassurance and satisfaction that Soviet chagrin will not, in this instance, be able to prevent, the peoples of Indonesia and the peoples of the Netherlands from proceeding on the course upon which they have embarked through this agreement; and that Soviet chagrin and the Soviet veto will not be able to prevent the further contribution which we confidently expect the United Nations Commission for Indonesia to make.”

15. I then made the following statement as President:

“Having regard to the views which have been expressed in the Council, in my capacity as President, I will, as a matter of procedure, request the Secretariat to transmit to our Commission for Indonesia a copy of the proceedings of this and our previous meeting, with the request that the Commission will take due note of what has been said, as guidance in the further action which remains to be carried out under the provisions of the Council’s resolution of 28 January 1949.”

16. I have since ascertained from the Secretariat that the proceedings were duly forwarded to the Commission.

17. Mr. Tsarapkin, the Soviet representative, then asked to say a few words. However, he did not challenge any of my rulings as President, greatly to the relief of several Council members. Tsarapkin restricted himself to restating the Soviet Union’s arguments against the Canadian draft resolution and their reasons for voting against its adoption.

18. After the meeting, Van Royen told us that he was delighted with the afternoon’s developments, and that the veto was the best thing that could possibly have happened. It would put beyond question, he thought, ratification of The Hague Agreement by the Netherlands Upper House, and should have a healthy effect on conservative opinion regarding these agreements, as well as on general opinion against the Communists. Palar, the Indonesian representative, spoke to us separately and also emphasized his delight. Palar said that the injudicious Soviet veto, and the statement made after the veto, should be very useful in weakening the position of the Communists in Indonesia.

19. The use of the veto by the Soviet Union at the Council meeting of 13 December was in my view both ineffectual and injudicious. It does, I think, to some extent constitute a precedent, as it is, so far as I know, the first occasion where a veto has had no real effect on the substance of the Security Council position in regard to the question. The Council’s proceedings on 12 and 13 December show the wisdom, or good fortune, in the drafting of the previous resolutions whereby the already existing terms of reference are sufficiently broad in nature, and open-ended as to duration, to allow appropriate action to be taken despite the rejection of subsequent consequential resolutions. Moreover, the official transmission of Council debates, for the guidance of the Council's Commission, despite the fact that these debates led up to a vetoed resolution, is to my mind a useful technique.

20. After the adjournment of Tuesday's Council meeting, I asked Mr. Protitch, the Principal Director for Security Council affairs and Secretary of the Security Council, whether he had any reservations on the correctness of what I had done. He said that he had none; that everything had been entirely correct in his judgment.

21. I have seldom enjoyed a Council debate more.

I have, etc.

KASHMIR

The Indian and Pakistan authorities issued cease-fire orders in Kashmir which took effect at 11:59 p.m. on January 1, 1949.

2. This action followed successful negotiations between the Kashmir Commission (United Nations Commission on India and Pakistan) and Indian and Pakistan reprerepresentatives in Paris during the session of the General Assembly, followed by a recent visit to India and Pakistan by a representative of the Commission. The two Governments had accepted the Commission's proposals for a peaceful solution of the Kashmir dispute, including the holding of a free and impartial plebiscite in Kashmir to determine its final accession to India or Pakistan.

3. The Commission, which is now in New York, is planning to return to the sub-continent in the next few days to continue its efforts for a final settlement.

4. The proposals call for the withdrawal of military forces by both parties to the dispute, and the organization of a plebiscite by a Plebiscite Administrator, to be nominated by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and formally appointed to office by the Government of Kashmir. The Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Commission have asked General McNaughton whether he had any suggestions to make for this appointment. General McNaughton has asked for comments on this point. The resolution in question calls for the selection of a person of high international standing who will command general confidence.

5. The cease-fire and subsequent truce arrangements are to be supervised by a group of military observers. On December 10, during the course of the negotiations in Paris, the Secretary-General enquired whether the Canadian Government would be willing to place Service Officers at the disposal of the Commission for this purpose. It was estimated that twenty observer teams, each consisting of a senior and a junior officer, would be required to supervise the cease-fire arrangements in Kashmir. They would have to be capable of speaking and writing English. It has been pointed out that the selection and despatch of military observers to Kashmir is now a matter of urgency since no appropriate arrangements exist at present for supervising the cease-fire. The request made to Canada is now being considered by the Department of National Defence.

KASHMIR—APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN MILITARY OBSERVERS

Mr. Claxton decided to refer this matter to Cabinet and it was considered on Thursday, January 13, with the result that Cabinet decided to leave this matter to you and to the Prime Minister to determine.

2. Mr. Claxton telephoned me after the Cabinet meeting to say that Cabinet was "allergic" to the proposal and that two questions were asked:

Why was Canada one of the countries invited to appoint observers?

What other countries had accepted the invitation?

3. I am attaching a copy of a memorandum dated January 12, which was prepared for Mr. Claxton and of which a copy was sent to Major General Weeks.

4. Applications for this duty were invited by the Adjutant General on January 10 and General Weeks now reports that twelve officers of the reserve list have applied. He is quite certain that either four or six suitable candidates can be nominated forthwith. The deadline for applications was fixed at 10:00 a.m., January 15.

5. Our missions in the countries invited by the Secretary General to provide military observers (Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Mexico, Norway, Sweden and the United States), have been asked to discover what these various governments are proposing to do. A reply so far has been received only from the United States, which is undertaking to send eighteen military observers including personnel required for a special plane.

6. The following is an explanation of the choice of Canada as one of the countries invited to send observers:

(a) Military observers must be able to speak English fluently since English is the common language of Indian and Pakistan military officers.

(b) The Secretary General of the Kashmir Commission recommended that only countries with no possessions in Asia be invited to send military observers.

(c) The Secretary General of the Commission also suggested that only countries not directly involved politically with the Kashmir dispute should be requested to provide teams of military observers.

Of all countries Canada and the United States most obviously fulfil these conditions.

7. Pending the decision which the Prime Minister and you will take on this matter, I am finding out from New York details concerning joining instructions and equipment for the officers nominated if this is your decision. The Department of National Defence is prepared to despatch the officers nominated to any point in Canada or the United States.

8. A decision is necessary on the following two points:

(a) will Canada send military observers to assist the military adviser to the United Nations Kashmir Commission;

(b) if so, will Canada send four or six officers for this duty.⁴³

CANADIAN MILITARY OBSERVERS WITH UNCIP

You will recall that in January of this year, the Canadian Government agreed to provide four Canadian Army officers to serve as Military Observers with the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan. From the attached telegram No. 779 of June 25† you will note that the Commission has requested an increase from 36 to 60 in the number of its Military Observers, and that the Secretary-General of the United Nations has asked the Canadian Government to increase its quota from four to eight officers. As I understand it, we shall now have to (a) decide whether we favour doubling the Canadian contribution and (b) if so, ask the Department of National Defence to provide four additional officers.

2. I do not think that we should have any objection in principle to complying with the Secretary-General's request. It is true that we are being asked for a larger proportionate increase than the United States, but in view of the generous response which similar United Nations appeals normally receive from the United States authorities, I doubt if we should quibble over this point. Furthermore, we have learned informally that while choosing replacements for Vallee and Sellings last week, the Army established a further waiting list of six Reserve Army officers who would be willing to serve as observers with UNCIP. I have no doubt that, provided the Department of National Defence is agreeable, four of them could be made available in response to the Secretary-General's request.

3. The only foreseeable obstacle is the possible reluctance of the Department of National Defence to meet the added financial commitments which would be involved. If additional observers were to be supplied by Canada, they would presumably have to be sent on the same administrative basis as the original group of four, who received their Army pay and allowances from the Department of National Defence, and all other expenses (transportation, living, etc.) from the United Nations. In view of the fact that in January there was some initial doubt as to the willingness of the Department of National Defence to defray these expenses, I suppose it is possible that they might object to being responsible for the pay and allowances of four additional officers.

4. In spite of this possibility I think that in the first instance we should merely recommend that the number of Canadian observers be increased to eight, and that we should ask the Department of National Defence to provide them under the same administrative arrangements as prevailed for Tremaine, Angle, Vallee, and Sellings. If any difficulties should arise, we might then consider having the matter settled on a ministerial level.

5. If you agree with this approach, I will draft a letter for your signature along these lines to the Deputy Minister of National Defence.⁴⁴

INDIA–PAKISTAN RELATIONS; KASHMIR

Malik called on me this afternoon and we had a long and intimate personal conversation on this subject. He is very much concerned about the recent deterioration in relations between India and Pakistan over the Kashmir issue. He had nothing to ask of the Canadian government, nor was he under instructions to make any representations to us; before leaving Canada, however, and because of our own personal friendship during his time in Canada, he wished to tell me quite frankly what he thought and felt.

2. Malik had no hesitation in saying quite categorically that India would not attack Pakistan. He was equally categorical, however, in saying that if Pakistani forces (or the Pakistan armed and equipped Azad-Kashmir army) attacked Indian troops in their present positions in Kashmir it would mean war and the war would be carried to Pakistan by India.

3. Indian leaders recognized the appalling results which could be anticipated from a war with Pakistan. But the government would be quite unable to resist popular pressure (after all the Indian people felt that they had suffered already at the hands of Pakistan) if the Pakistanis were guilty of further aggression in Kashmir.⁴⁵

4. I told Malik that I had been impressed, over the past few weeks, in speaking to Pakistani representatives, civil and military, by what might almost be termed an inferiority complex. The present High Commissioner, the Secretary of Defence, and a number of others had spoken to me of their fear of attack by superior Indian forces. They felt that Kashmir belonged to Pakistan by every natural law of race and religion. They had no doubt whatever that if a plebiscite could be conducted under fair conditions the Kashmir people would declare in their favour. They had been in different degree sharply critical and more, of what they regarded as the completely unjustified incursion of Indian troops into Kashmir. They would not attack but if themselves were attacked would fight to the last.

⁴⁵ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

5. Malik spoke of the harsh and inhuman treatment of Hindus in Pakistan. India contained some 40 million Mohammedans whose rights and safety were being protected. The position of Hindus in Pakistan was intolerable. The property of Indians in Pakistan was not respected, while the Pakistani High Commissioner in London continued to draw his large rents from his immense holdings in India.

6. Pandit Nehru and the Indian leaders had exercised and caused their people to exercise the very maximum restraint.⁴⁶ But they could not hold them down indefinitely, unless conditions improved. Indian forces had gone into Kashmir to protect the country from invasion. They could only retire in the face of equal retirement by Pakistani forces and their local tools and allies the Azad-Kashmir army. If the people of Kashmir voted for accession to Pakistan, in a fairly conducted plebiscite, India would accept that solution.⁴⁷

7. I said to Malik that we in Canada were gravely concerned at the recent turn in events. We would not take sides and we hoped to be friendly with both of our sister nations in the Indian sub-Continent. But we looked to India for the exercise of that extra degree of patience and magnanimity, without which I felt that no solution would be possible. We had this in mind in considering India's candidature for the Security Council.

8. Malik left me with the attached memorandum,† on a personal and private basis. It was sent him for his own information by his government and he wished to have it returned.

9. When our conversation had concluded I had the distinct impression that Malik was pretty pessimistic about the possibility of a peaceful settlement. He agreed that the only hope lay in the United Nations and thought that conciliation would have a marginal chance of success only under some conciliator of unusual prestige and authority.

I am sending a copy of this note to the U.N. Division and to the Commonwealth Division.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE KASHMIR DISPUTE

On August 19 the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan announced that it had abandoned its proposal to hold a meeting of representatives of India and Pakistan for the purpose of negotiating a truce agreement in the Kashmir dispute. Both Governments had agreed to attend such a meeting but each of them had added so many "observations" to its acceptance that the limitations thereby imposed made it clear to UNCIP that agreement even upon the agenda was impossible.

2. In anticipating that UNCIP would, in view of this setback, propose the alternative solution of submitting to arbitration the disputed points in the truce issue, the United Kingdom and United States Governments decided that letters from Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman should be sent to the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan urging that arbitration be accepted. The Department had been secretly advised by Earncliffe⁴⁸ that the United States Government intended to invite Canada and other nations represented on the Security Council to send similar messages to Pandit Nehru and Liaquat Ali Khan.

3. On August 30 the Secretary-General of the United Nations confidentially informed the Canadian Permanent Delegate that UNCIP had made the expected proposal concerning arbitration.

4. Mr. Acheson announced on August 31 that "in view of the great interest of this Government in the peace and stability of the sub-continent, the President has addressed a message to Prime Minister Nehru of India and Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Khan of Pakistan, urging that they accept the Commission's recent proposal for settlement of the truce issue". It was reported from London that Mr. Attlee had forwarded similar letters to the two Prime Ministers.

5. The United States Government made no approach to the Governments of other nations represented on the Security Council suggesting similar action. The Canadian Permanent Delegation was of the opinion, which was supported in the Department, that it would be inadvisable for Canada to intervene in the dispute at this stage, either by a similar letter from the Prime Minister or by the more informal method of an oral communication of the Government's views by yourself to the High Commissioners for India and Pakistan. It was feared that the Indian Government might regard such a move as an indication of "ganging up" against India as it is generally believed that delay in settlement of the dispute will work to the advantage of India and, therefore, effective recourse to arbitration would be advantageous to Pakistan.

6. Although Pandit Nehru on September 4 told a public meeting in Allahabad that he was "surprised at the intervention of President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee in the Kashmir dispute", it is reported that his answers to Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee were courteous, friendly and reasoned.

7. UNCIP has not yet published the text of the replies from the two governments, but it has been learned confidentially that Pakistan has accepted the proposal for arbitration and that the Indian Government, while approving of the principle of arbitration, has rejected it. It is understood that India made the disbandment of the Azad-Kashmir forces a pre-condition to arbitration.

8. Consequently it appears that the arbitration proposal has met with the same frustration as the earlier UNCIP proposal for a meeting of the two governments. As the positions of India and Pakistan appear to be basically irreconcilable, it seems unlikely that UNCIP will be able to modify the terms of the arbitration proposal to make it acceptable to both. The assumption is, therefore, that the whole matter will be referred back to the Security Council by UNCIP.

THE KASHMIR QUESTION

In view of the economic conditions on the Indian sub-continent and the situation in Asia, the increasing deterioration of Indo-Pakistan relations is serious. A number of disputes have arisen between the two countries but the most explosive of them concerns the political allegiance of Kashmir. The United Nations Commission on India and Pakistan (U.N.C.I.P.) recently left the Indian sub-continent for Geneva to make another interim report to the Security Council. The achievements of the Commission are:

(a) the agreement of the Indian and Pakistan governments to a number of principles on which a truce agreement might be implemented;

(b) a cease-fire on January 1, 1949, and agreement in July on a complete demarcation line in Kashmir between the forces of the two countries.

The Commission failed to secure sufficient agreement to warrant a joint high-level meeting to discuss a truce agreement and later failed also to secure the acceptance by the Indian government of a proposal for arbitration of the points in dispute regarding implementation of the truce.

The Commission has made it known that the main obstacles to implementation have been the following:

(a) the schedule of withdrawal of troops;

- (b) the status and disbandment of the Azad ("Free") Kashmir forces;
- (c) the defence and administration of the mountainous and sparsely populated area in the north of the State.

The prestige of the Commission in the eyes of the Pakistan and Indian governments has declined considerably. The decline may be attributed partly to the apparently conflicting statements made by the Commission in the course of its correspondence with the two governments and partly perhaps to the anxiety of both governments to bring the dispute to a satisfactory conclusion at an early date.

Technically speaking India has handled its case well. The de jure government of Kashmir (headed by a Hindu Maharaja and a Moslem Prime Minister) acceded to India after the rise of the Azad Kashmir forces and the incursion of the tribes across Pakistan territory into the State. India accepted the accession subject to ratification in due course by a plebiscite. This procedure was legally justifiable since after the 1947 partition of the sub-continent and the termination of United Kingdom sovereignty any State was free either to accede to India or Pakistan or to remain independent. India has declared that it chose the course of peace, rather than of war against Pakistan, in appealing to the Security Council.

Pakistan has handled the matter less skilfully. When charged with sending its own troops into Kashmir, the Pakistan government first denied and then admitted the truth of the charge. There is also some evidence that it may have connived at the passage of the raiding tribes across its territory. Thirdly, it has taken over operational control of the Azad Kashmir forces and merged them with its own frontline troops. It thus damaged its original case that the "stand-still agreement" between Pakistan and the Maharajah of Kashmir gave Pakistan rights over the State analogous to those of the old Imperial Government.

From the standpoint of equity, however, the Pakistan case is much stronger than the Indian. India has argued that its trade routes and its own defence give it a vital interest in Kashmir. Pakistan is able to base its case not only on an equally great, or even greater, strategic interest in Kashmir but on the very principle upon which the partition of the sub-continent was based. The population of Kashmir is predominantly Moslem (about 77 per cent.). The Hindus constitute 20 per cent. and the Sikhs under 2 per cent. The ruling house is Hindu. Geographical and economic factors also favour the Pakistan case. Two main rivers, the Chenab and the Jhelum, flow out of the Kashmir hills and through West Pakistan to join the Indus. The import and export trades of Kashmir link the State closely with Pakistan, while Karachi would seem to be the most suitable port. Pakistan can also point out with a certain rough justification that in the States of Junagadh and Hyderabad the Indian government used pressure to depose Moslem rulers in favour of the presumed will of the predominantly Hindu populations. Junagadh had acceded to Pakistan.

Both sides are committed to a plebiscite as the means of determining the future allegiance of the people of Kashmir. There is room for doubt that India is now so enthusiastic on this point. Feeling about the dispute runs very much higher in Pakistan than in India, where it is said only Mr. Nehru and official circles feel at all strongly about the matter.

Canada desires to see the termination of this unfortunate dispute between two member nations of the Commonwealth and to support a solution that will not sow the seeds of chronic conflict on the Indian sub-continent; the dispute could well spread alarmingly were India and Pakistan to go to war. Pakistan has already uttered vague threats that in the event of war help would be sought "elsewhere", wherever it could be found. The Commonwealth is regarded as having failed either to help the just cause of Pakistan or to provide adequate machinery for a settlement. Pakistan charges the Western powers with playing up India as the main bulwark against Communism in Asia and consequently carefully avoiding offence to India with respect to Kashmir.

THE QUESTION OF KASHMIR

1. The Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson had a discussion on October 25th with Mr. Nehru and Sir Girja Bajpai. During this discussion the question of Kashmir was gone into at some length.

2. Mr. Nehru began by giving a very detailed and impressive analysis of the position from the Indian point of view, emphasizing that the culprit in Kashmir had been Pakistan, which had committed the original aggression by permitting armed bands to violate its territory and eventually by moving its own troops across the border. It is clear that his emotions as well as his political instincts are very deeply engaged in this matter and he has a strong feeling that the Pakistan Government is taking advantage of the position to stir up religious feelings in Kashmir against India and is indeed using religious fanaticism in Kashmir and elsewhere as an instrument of national policy.

3. Mr. Nehru then argued that India's record in Kashmir had been good and that if only Pakistan had agreed to establish the conditions which would make a plebiscite possible a decision as to the wishes of the people might have been taken by now. He had particularly in mind the disarming of the Azad forces. It was not enough to have the Indian and Pakistan regular forces withdrawn as long as the Azad forces, which now amounted to thirty-one battalions or more, remained armed. As long as they were there, armed, there could be no peaceful plebiscite. However, Mr. Nehru stated emphatically that war could be ruled out as a solution for this problem and that India would commit no aggression.

4. There remained, therefore, the question how to find a peaceful solution. The United Nations Commission had not been a very effective agency for this purpose. He thought there should be a new approach through the appointment of a mediator. However, he also seemed to feel there should be some kind of recognition of the original Pakistan aggression, though he did not press this position when it was shown how incompatible it would be with mediation. As far as mediation is concerned, it was pointed out to him that it would be very difficult and indeed undesirable to remove the matter from the jurisdiction of the United Nations to which it had been submitted. The Security Council might, however, when the report of the Pakistan Commission was being considered in November, decide to appoint a mediator with general terms of reference, which might indeed be extended to cover not only Kashmir but other questions at issue between the two countries. Mr. Nehru seemed to agree with this idea.

5. When it was mentioned to him that some quarters felt that India was deliberately holding up a settlement by negotiation because she had much to gain by delay, Mr. Nehru replied that these were malicious and unfounded suspicions. They would be glad to proceed along the line indicated above without delay.

6. When Mr. Pearson saw Mr. Nehru off at the airport on the morning of October 26, Mr. Nehru expressed great satisfaction at the talk on Kashmir which he had had with the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson on October 25. He expressed the hope that we would use our good offices with our friends on the Security Council to advance the principles of a solution along the lines we had explored. Mr. Pearson said that we would do our best to facilitate an agreed arrangement and that we would pass on to the United States and United Kingdom representatives, and possibly others, the gist of the discussion.

7. Our understanding here is that Mr. Nehru had not been responsive previously to the idea of a United Nations mediator acting under general instructions laid down by the Security Council but that he wished to have a mediator outside the United Nations. If this is so, the position which Mr. Nehru took in his discussions here represents an encouraging development. There was also some indication from his talks here that Mr. Nehru may believe that the result of a plebiscite in Kashmir might be such as to warrant some kind of partition of the area between Pakistan and India. He felt that if all of Kashmir went to Pakistan there would be a large exodus to India, including some Moslems.

8. In spite of the depth of Mr. Nehru's feelings about Kashmir, Mr. Pearson is convinced that Mr. Nehru is entirely sincere when he states that force must be ruled out in Pakistan-India relations and that, in respect of Kashmir, mediation followed by a plebiscite should go forward as quickly as possible. On this basis it appears that it should be possible to work out a satisfactory solution.

9. Our impression here is that Mr. Nehru is inclined to think that it would be wise if the mediator were someone who had not hitherto been connected with the Kashmir dispute. This would mean separating the functions of mediator from that of plebiscite administrator, the position which Admiral Nimitz holds.

Ottawa, October 29, 1949

Sir:

The Prime Minister and I had a private discussion on Tuesday, October 25, with Pandit Nehru and Sir Girja Bajpai. In the course of the discussion we went into the question of Kashmir at some length. When I saw Mr. Nehru off at the airport in Ottawa on the morning of the next day Mr. Nehru expressed the hope that Canada would use its good offices with its friends on the Security Council to advance the principles of a solution along the lines we had explored. I replied that we would do our best to facilitate an agreed arrangement and that we would pass on to the United Kingdom and United States representatives, and perhaps others, the substance of the discussion.

2. The Under-Secretary accordingly wrote to Sir Alexander Clutterbuck on October 26. I am sending as an enclosure to this despatch a copy of his letter† and of the attached memorandum of the same date regarding the question of Kashmir.

3. Mr. Wrong was able to make use of an appointment with Mr. Acheson on the morning of October 27 to speak about Kashmir. Mr. Jessup was also present. Mr. Acheson, after reading carefully the substance of our message to Mr. Wrong, drafted on the same lines as the memorandum enclosed with this despatch, said that our discussion followed very closely the conversations between Mr. Nehru and himself and between Mr. Nehru and the President in Washington last week. There was one main difference. Mr. Nehru had not gone as far as he did with us in showing readiness to agree that the Security Council should appoint the mediator. It was clear that Mr. Acheson approved this idea. I expect to discuss in New York with Mr. Jessup the best way of following up this development.

4. During the same conversation between Mr. Wrong and Mr. Acheson the possible scope of the mediation was examined. As you know, Mr. Nehru has in recent statements expressed a general readiness on the part of India to accept arbitration not only on the Kashmir issue but on the other differences that now exist between India and Pakistan, chiefly the diversion of canal waters in the East Punjab and the disposal of evacuee property. There is therefore a danger that mediation in the Kashmir dispute might be delayed if separate and irrelevant disputes should become linked with it. Both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Jessup observed that the Security Council cannot appoint a mediator to deal with an issue which is not before the Council and that, of the issues between India and Pakistan, the Kashmir dispute is the only one before the Council. When Mr. Jessup suggested that in appointing the mediator for the Kashmir dispute the Council could at the same time authorize the mediator to mediate any other disputes by consent of India and Pakistan, Mr. Acheson observed that the other main issues I have mentioned were entirely separate from the dispute over Kashmir.

5. This despatch deals only with Kashmir. A comprehensive account of the visit of Mr. Nehru to Canada will shortly be sent to you.

I have, etc.

MILITARY OBSERVERS IN KASHMIR

1. Attached is a copy of Teletype No. 363 of November 23,† from the Assembly Delegation, concerning a suggestion by the United Nations Secretariat that Lieutenant-Colonel H.H. Angle be named to succeed General Delvoie as Military Adviser to the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan.

2. General Delvoie, a Lieutenant-General of the Belgian Army, has served as chief of the group of observers since its formation last December. In the past few months General Delvoie has been subjected to criticism by both the Government and the press in Kashmir and India. The motive for this attack appears to be a wish to undermine the prestige and effectiveness of the U.N. Commission, and an indiscretion on the part of General Delvoie has been exploited to the full. In any event, it is expected that his retirement will be announced shortly.

3. On completion of his tour of duty in October of this year, Lieutenant-Colonel Angle returned from Kashmir to his civilian employment as a magistrate. Attached is a biographical note.† While it is not known whether Lieutenant-Colonel Angle would be able to accept this new appointment, he expressed on his return a willingness to go back to Kashmir and "see the matter through, having gone this far with it."

4. The suggestion of the Secretariat that we now supply a replacement for the Military Adviser is a tribute both to Lieutenant-Colonel Angle personally and to the calibre of the Canadian officers serving in Kashmir. You will recall that when the arrangements for the Plebiscite were being made last December, the Canadian Government was unable to accept an invitation to nominate either a Plebiscite Administrator or a senior officer to act as assistant to the Military Adviser. As Canada is not represented on any other commission of the United Nations, I believe it would be opportune to meet this request of the Secretariat in regard to Lieutenant-Colonel Angle, which is a logical consequence of our having agreed to furnish observers in the first instance.

5. The present arrangement is that this Department will reimburse the Army for the basic pay and allowances of the observers. Under this arrangement, Colonel Angle's basic pay and allowances would be a charge on this Department, and the U.N. would pay travelling expenses, a per diem living allowance and insurance costs.

6. Attached for your signature, if you approve, is a letter to the Deputy Minister of National Defence,† asking whether, in the event that the U.N. formally approaches us, the Army would be prepared to give Lieutenant-Colonel Angle the acting rank of Brigadier required for this appointment.⁴⁹

THE KASHMIR ISSUE

The Canadian Permanent Delegation to the United Nations has been inundating the Department with telegrams (copies of which have been sent to you) reporting on the almost hourly developments in the Kashmir issue. General McNaughton, as President of the Security Council, having been instructed to "meet informally with the two parties and examine with them the possibility of finding a mutually satisfactory basis for dealing with the Kashmir problem", has been carrying on a series of meetings with the two principals (including representatives of the Azad-Kashmir Government and Prime Minister Abdullah of Kashmir) as well as with United Kingdom and United States representatives in New York.

2. When Sheikh Abdullah has accompanied the Indian representatives, they have adopted a rigid line which, in effect, they hasten to modify as soon as they can escape from the Sheikh's presence. Generally speaking a conciliatory atmosphere (born of the recognized pressing necessity of reaching a solution) prevails between the Indians and the Pakistanis and the United Kingdom and United States representatives agree on the basic approach with the Canadian Permanent Delegation.

3. General McNaughton has drafted two alternative proposals for demilitarization. Alternative A is given in teletype No. 1201 of December 20th.† Alternative B is given in teletype No. 1196 of December 19th.† Both teletypes are attached.

4. Alternative B adopts a rather "tougher" line towards India. Its salient features are that the Azad-Kashmir forces (who are regarded by the Indians as "rebels") are equated to the Indian Army forces and, for the first time, there appears the suggestion that the Dogra Army and State Militia (which are pro-India) must also be disarmed.

5. The United Kingdom delegate feels that the "softer" alternative A would not be accepted by either United Kingdom or the Pakistan Government. The United States representative agrees with General McNaughton in preferring the alternative B. Indian representatives have intimated in secrecy to General McNaughton that, while it would be politically impossible for them to agree voluntarily to accept unfavourable terms, they would not rule out the possibility that India would bow to a decision of the Security Council, embodying unfavourable terms.

6. At the official level the Department has indicated its approval of the steps taken by General McNaughton and has authorized the delegation to continue along the lines they have been following without waiting for specific instructions from Ottawa which might hamper the freedom of their negotiation. It has been suggested that they should seriously endeavour to make the "tougher" alternative B effective; this will involve a continual examination by General McNaughton of the eventual readiness of the Indians to accept such a proposal if formally approved by the Security Council.

7. In view of the large issues at stake, the delegation would be most grateful for an indication at your earliest convenience of your personal approval of the strategy and tactics which they are following.

I gave your memorandum of December 21 concerning Kashmir to the Minister immediately following the Cabinet meeting yesterday afternoon, since General McNaughton was telephoning urgently from New York for an indication of the Government's attitude. I pointed out to Mr. Pearson that the alternative (a) referred to in your memorandum had been sent by the Delegation simply for information, and was not to be regarded as a current draft to which consideration could now be given. The only decision required, therefore, was whether or not we were prepared to let the General go ahead, using alternative (b) as a basis for his further negotiations.

2. Mr. Pearson said that he hoped the General would, if he could possibly do so, avoid getting into the position where one delegation accepted his draft proposal and the other refused it. He suggested, therefore, that the draft should be considered informally first with the Indian Delegation, since that delegation was most likely to reject the draft. Every effort should be made to get agreement from the two delegations before the draft was put to them formally. On this basis he thought it would be quite satisfactory for the General to proceed with his negotiations, using the tentative proposal which he had sent to us. I subsequently gave this information to General McNaughton in New York over the telephone.

1. My immediately preceding teletype† contains the text of India's written reply to our proposal, which was given to me at 9 p.m. last night, 26th December, at the Barclay Hotel by Rau. At this meeting Rau was accompanied by Bajpai and Sheikh Abdulla. Arnold Smith, Angle and Carter were with me.

2. As you will see, this reply amounts, in effect to an outright rejection of our proposal, and an uncompromising restatement of India's position on the Kashmir question.

3. Rau stated that they were replying in writing since our proposal had been in writing.

4. I avoided commenting on this reply. I did, however, mention the careful consideration which we had given to all aspects of the Kashmir question, and said that we regarded our proposal, to which we had given much thought, as being equitable to both sides, as well as providing a basis for an expeditious settlement of the Kashmir question.

5. I asked Bajpai and Rau what, in their view, the next step should be. They had no suggestion to make.

6. I advised the Indian representatives of my intention to proceed with the Security Council meeting arranged for 11 a.m. on Wednesday, December 28th. I said that I assumed that it was my duty to the Security Council to report to them, and to make our proposal public, together with the replies of the Indian and Pakistan Governments. Bajpai agreed with this procedure. He stressed, however, that it would not be fair to make India's reply public until Pakistan's reply had also been submitted and that the replies should be made public simultaneously. If Pakistan's reply has not been received by the time the Council meets, Bajpai asked that I do not make his reply known. I agreed that this was fair and also assured Bajpai that we would not in any way give Pakistan any indication of India's reply until Pakistan had submitted its own reply to me.

7. Bajpai said that he recognized the very hard work that had gone into our proposal and the spirit in which it had been submitted. He said he had not failed to report all this, together with all our observations, to his Government. He also hinted at disagreement regarding our proposals within the Government of India. He said that we would recognise that a democratic Government had to take into account public passions and prejudices as well as long-term national considerations. He also said that in communicating his Government's reply to us he was merely doing his duty as a servant of his Government.

8. At the beginning of the meeting, Bajpai had unnecessarily selected a hard chair for himself and said that it was appropriately "a stool of penance". It is also worth reporting, I believe, that Bajpai and Rau appeared somewhat dejected at this meeting, whereas Sheikh Abdulla looked very pleased indeed with himself. The Indian Government's rejection of our proposal is, of course, a triumph for Abdulla.

Kashmir.

1. At his request Zafrulla Kahn came to my office this morning at 10.30 a.m. accompanied by Gurmani and Mohammed Ali. Ayub later joined the meeting. Arnold Smith and Grande were with me.

2. Zafrulla told me that Mohammed Ali and Gurmani had been speaking to the Prime Minister of Pakistan by telephone at 6.00 a.m. this morning, and as a result he now had the reply of his Government to my proposals. This reply was handed to me in writing a few minutes later when Ayub arrived. The text of the reply has been sent to you in my immediately preceding teletype No. 1253 of 28th December.†

3. Zafrulla said that his Government's telegraphed instructions had been to propose the deletion of paragraph 6 of my proposals. However, after Ali had explained in his telephone conversation with the Prime Minister the reasons which I had given for the inclusion of such a paragraph, it was decided that Pakistan would accept it, subject to the deletion of the two words "and enduring". Zafrulla emphasized, however, that, in accepting paragraph 6, the Prime Minister did so on the understanding that in putting it forward no reference would be made to its being designed to cover partition or rectification of frontiers. Zafrulla said that he had given this assurance to Liaquat Ali Kahn. I gave Zafrulla to understand that I now understood this paragraph to be general and all inclusive and not particular or exclusive. I said I personally would not make reference to partition or frontier adjustments when referring to paragraph 6. However, I said that I, of course, could not control what other delegations might say, but that I would, insofar as possible, discourage others from doing so.

4. You will have noticed that the amendments which Pakistan has suggested are almost the same as those which Zafrulla suggested to me at our meeting on Monday, 26th December (see our teletype No. 1247 of 26th December). You will note that Pakistan insists on the deletion of the words "to the Government of India" in the guarantee clause contained in paragraph 3(a) of my proposals. She has not suggested the substitution of the words "to the United Nations", although in discussing this point at today's meeting Zafrulla made it clear that the guarantee would be to the United Nations and not under any circumstances to India.

5. I told Zafrulla that, as President, I was prepared to suggest the Pakistan amendments to India and to say that they seemed to me to be clarifications of intent rather than changes of substance. However, I emphasized that my proposals could, of course, not be changed without the agreement of both parties. After my explanation of the role I envisaged for myself as President, at my suggestion Zafrulla changed the wording of one of the sentences in his letter of acceptance to me. Originally, the third sentence read, "they are confined to such of the amendments originally proposed by us as you were prepared to sponsor." Zafrulla deleted "were prepared to sponsor" and substituted, at my suggestion, the words "agreed might well be accepted as clarifications of intent".

6. I then told Zafrulla that I had not yet received India's final reply to my proposals but expected to have it in my hands by tomorrow morning. I would then arrange simultaneously to deliver to him the Indian reply and to the Indians the reply of Pakistan. After that, I would be at the disposal of either party if they wished to see me before the meeting of the Security Council tomorrow afternoon at 3.00 p.m. Finally, I told him that I was planning to make a short statement giving the reasons why I considered my proposals fair and practical. At the same time I planned to table my proposals together with the replies of India and Pakistan. Zafrulla agreed with this procedure.

Following for Mr. Pearson from General McNaughton, Begins: Kashmir.

1. Following my telephone conversation with you, I arranged to have Bajpai come to my office at 6:30 p.m. yesterday, Tuesday, December 27th. He was accompanied by Rau.

2. I told Bajpai that you had asked me to speak to him in view of your great personal friendship with him and because of the special importance of clearing up matters in dispute with Pakistan before the Colombo Conference. I told Bajpai that it would be most unfortunate if India's reply were given out as it would be read by the world as a demand by India for the moral condemnation of Pakistan to be given before the process of mediation could proceed. I said that this position if maintained by India would make it very difficult for her friends to help her. I said that it had been your thought and mine that perhaps in my proposal we might be able to adjust some of the language on specific matters but I said we could not accept the idea of moral condemnation of Pakistan. I made it very clear that there was no possibility of compromise on this idea. I asked Bajpai therefore, does he and his Government view with equanimity the publication of a document taking this position. I then reminded Bajpai of the talk which you and Mr. St. Laurent had had with Nehru in Ottawa at which he had been present and in which the question of "moral condemnation" had been discussed and in which Nehru had agreed that there could be nothing of the sort. Bajpai said he well remembered this conversation. I then said obviously something had happened in India to disturb the progress of our discussions here and told him that you had instructed me to ask him "What is it?" I also asked "was there anything in my document which particularly upset Nehru?"

3. Bajpai said that in his opinion Nehru had not changed his views on moral condemnation as he had expressed them in Ottawa. However, he thought that Nehru believed that the members of the Security Council should take mental note of the fact that India was in a different legal and moral position from Pakistan as regards Kashmir, Pakistan being the aggressor and having no legal rights there. Further, he thought that Nehru would wish the Council to take note of the fact that Pakistan had taken advantage of the past two years to consolidate its illegal position in Kashmir.

4. Bajpai then said that personally he thought that Nehru was probably upset by the possible interpretation which might be placed on paragraph 2 of my proposal. He thought that India was here placed on the same footing as Pakistan and, more particularly that the armed forces and militia of the State of Jammu and Kashmir were placed on the same footing as the rebel forces of the illegal Azad Government which was not recognized even by Pakistan.

5. As regards the "northern area", Bajpai said that Nehru felt very strongly on this point. Bajpai emphasized that for the sake of peace, India had already abandoned her just claims in Azad-Kashmir and by so doing had over-ruled the State Government of Kashmir and had incurred its displeasure. Now India was asked to give up her legitimate claims in the northern area. Bajpai thought that Nehru believed that my proposal was in line with the Commission's treatment of this question and thus ignored the just claims of India.

6. As regards paragraphs 3 and 4 of my proposal, Bajpai said that he himself could not see anything in them "to give rise to the thought that Pakistan and India have been put on the same level."

7. As regards paragraph 6, Bajpai thought that in its present form it might have been interpreted by Nehru to be linked specifically with paragraph 4. I told him that this was not our interpretation, and reminded him that he himself had approved, and indeed had largely drafted, the wording of this paragraph as it now stood. This he admitted. He pointed out that his Government was not opposed to the idea of a single mediator with wide powers. In this connection, he thought that possibly the United Nations representative might also be authorized to make suggestions to the Security Council, as well as to the two Governments concerned. We replied that the United Nations representative would naturally have the right to report to the United Nations.

8. Bajpai and Rau then emphasized why, in their view, the proposal should not place Pakistan and India on the same level as “the aggressor would then be reaping the fruits of his aggression”.

9. Referring to the suggestion that the Security Council meeting might be postponed in the anticipation that the Indian reply might be reconsidered, Bajpai said that he would have to refer this to his Government, as indeed he wished to refer the whole of your message. I then said that a certain degree of “malleability” still existed in my proposal and that it had always been open to change the wording by agreement between both parties, or for the purpose of clarification in the intent. We then told Bajpai that, in its present form, the Indian reply seemed to rule out the possibility of reaching any agreement. Did the Government of India not wish to take advantage of that degree of flexibility which still existed? Did she not wish to keep open the possibility of negotiations here now in New York? If so, then would she be prepared to make a reply to our proposals which did not shut the door on negotiations, but rather advanced Indian suggestions for modifications which, when received, I was prepared to put to the other side?

10. Bajpai was then asked for his personal judgment as to whether he thought that his Government would be prepared to make the type of reply we had suggested, putting forward modifications to my proposal, rather than to stand rigidly on the basis of their present reply. He said that he personally did not see how his Government could refuse to submit amendments, in the light of your message. In view of Bajpai’s encouraging opinion, I said that I felt justified in calling for a further twenty-four-hour postponement of the Security Council meeting “to allow time for further communications with the sub-continent”. I have accordingly arranged to have the next meeting of the Security Council take place at 3 p.m. on Thursday, 29th December. Ends.

1. At my suggestion a meeting was held Tuesday afternoon, 27th December, at 3:00 p.m. in my office with the United Kingdom and United States delegations. The following were present: Cadogan, Curson, and Campbell (United Kingdom) and Gross, Maffitt and Hyde (U.S.A.). Arnold Smith and Grande were with me.

2. We first discussed the procedure to be followed at tomorrow's meeting of the Security Council. I said that in view of India's insistence on having her reply tabled before the opening of the Security Council meeting (together with Pakistan's reply) and Zafrulla's agreement with this procedure, I had come to the conclusion that my proposals and both the Indian and Pakistani replies should be reproduced as documents and circulated prior to the Security Council meeting. I also reported that both Bajpai and Zafrulla had advised against postponing this meeting. I said that, in my view, the attitude of the parties seemed to make it inevitable that everything should now be brought out into the open in the Security Council as soon as possible so as to forestall leaks which might distort the true facts. (Bajpai this morning had stressed this, and urged the danger of leaks in Delhi and Karachi!). In this connection I pointed out that certain heads of Mission in New Delhi had already been told by Nehru of my proposals and of India's reply.

3. Cadogan and Gross agreed that the Security Council meeting should be held as planned, and agreed with the procedure on this.

4. I then said that I proposed at the opening of the meeting to make a statement explaining my proposals and stating that they represented what was, in my judgment, a fair and practicable method of arriving at a practicable and equitable solution. I said that I thought that the Council must then have a frank debate during the course of which an opportunity might present itself for some one, perhaps for me as President, to make some sort of partition suggestion if the parties had agreed on this in advance and had given me an appropriate opening. It would be my intention to avoid criticism of either party, in my opening statement, and to use my position in the Chair to be impartial, as between the parties, in the hope of being able in due course to put forward some mutually acceptable proposition.

5. Gross said that Washington was at present considering what position the United States delegation should take in order best to strengthen my hand as President. According to Gross, the State Department was caught off their guard by India's insistence on having her reply tabled before the opening of the Security Council debate. He hoped to have word from Washington later on today and promised to advise us accordingly.

6. During our meeting Cadogan received a wire from London by messenger instructing him to give strong support to my proposals as soon as possible in the debate, in the hope that the Indian position will become somewhat more flexible as a result.

7. I then mentioned certain ideas on partition which, I said, had occurred to me and which had been discussed very tentatively during my meeting with Zafrulla. (These suggestions have been reported to you in my teletype No. 1259 of December 28th, 1949).† In reply to my question both Cadogan and Gross seemed to think that the time had not yet come to openly abandon the aim of a single plebiscite for the whole of Kashmir in favour of any form of partition.

8. During the meeting Zafrulla phoned Arnold Smith and told him that he had not yet been able to get in touch with Karachi by phone but hoped to be able to do so some time before 10:00 a.m. Wednesday, 28th December. Consequently we agreed that it would be wise to postpone the Council meeting until 3:00 p.m. Wednesday (28th December) and this was arranged.

1. In the event of India putting forward reasonable amendments to our proposals, or leaving the door open to further negotiations in New York, it is possible that I will be asked by one or both parties, or by members of the Security Council, to continue during January in some capacity my association with the Kashmir negotiations. Indeed there have already been a number of suggestions from each of the two parties, and from the United Kingdom, United States, and other friendly members of the Security Council, expressing hope that I will undertake this further task. As you will recall, when this question was raised earlier, I said that I did not wish to have any discussion on this matter at the present time, and I then said that I would not run away from responsibility if there was a real necessity for it, nevertheless I was not convinced that this real necessity would in fact exist.

2. I had also maintained the 31st December deadline as perhaps a minor but no irrelevant lever on the parties in the hope of drawing them toward agreement.

3. It is not impossible now that a firm decision on this question may have to be taken in the next twenty-four hours.

4. My views on this matter are as follows. As I have said I would not wish to run away from responsibility, or do anything to jeopardize the possibility of agreement, if indeed such a possibility appears to have come into existence. I have, however, no personal desire to undertake responsibility in the Kashmir question after the end of December. Moreover, I have, as you know, a number of other commitments, including the very important P.J.B.D. meeting early in January.

5. These commitments would mean that even if it was decided that I should have Kashmir responsibilities in January, I might have to delegate them during part of the time.

6. Quite apart from this, my inclination is to let it be known that I will not undertake this task lightly. I feel that when approached further on this matter I should indicate that I would only consider acceptance on the conditions which follow:

(1) That both parties should strongly request my continued participation;

(2) That both parties should give me convincing evidence that they earnestly seek an early agreement and that there is a real likelihood that early agreement will in fact be obtained, and in particular, that asserted positions on legalistic issues will not be used to prevent agreement on practical procedures;

(3) That the Security Council should by a procedural resolution formally request me to undertake this continued responsibility.

Among other things I think any question of continued responsibility by myself should be used for whatever it may be worth as a lever on the parties. In (3) I am of course protecting my position at the time in the future when I would have to report to the Security Council.

7. Moreover, you will realize that Canadian participation in this matter inevitably involves a somewhat thankless and perhaps invidious task. While this responsibility could hardly be avoided with dignity during our membership on the Security Council and my tenure as President, the responsibility after 31st December will remain squarely on the members of the Security Council, and the Western Powers chiefly interested are the United Kingdom and the United States. I think we should avoid being used by these two Powers as a convenient method of shirking any of their own responsibility in this matter or evading any embarrassment which expression of views in this dispute may entail. Therefore, a fourth condition which, in my judgment, should be met before any decision is made, is that we should have firm assurance that the United States and United Kingdom Governments are themselves strongly and persistently pressing both parties, publicly when necessary, to reach an early agreement.

8. I would appreciate a very early indication of your views on this matter.

Kashmir.

Could you deliver to Prime Minister Nehru following message as soon as possible. Matter is one of urgency as the Security Council is to meet tomorrow in New York on the above matter, begins.

General McNaughton has sent me a copy of the reply of your Government to the proposals handed to the representatives of India and Pakistan by him as President of the Security Council and which, it was thought, might provide a basis of settlement for the Kashmir dispute. General McNaughton is, of course, acting in this capacity for the Council and not as a representative of Canada, but I expressed to him, and I hope you will permit me to express to you, my disappointment that his proposals as they stand are not considered as satisfactory by your Government. I do not know yet what attitude the Government of Pakistan has taken to them.

I think I can understand the Indian position on this issue, especially after your visit to Ottawa which we remember here with so much pleasure, but I am sorry that in a note which I assume is to be made public, the position is taken that as Pakistan is the aggressor in Kashmir, she cannot be regarded as being on a footing of equality with India. I am not, of course, quarrelling with your views on this aspect of the matter, but if their acceptance by Pakistan is required, this seems to me to make any agreed settlement through the United Nations practically impossible. I think that a case can be made for amendments to certain parts of the proposal, especially to those dealing with demilitarization and demobilization, which would help to meet your point of view. Certainly General McNaughton never expected his proposal to be the last word on these questions. But if the position stated regarding the acknowledgment of Pakistan as the aggressor is maintained, I am afraid that little progress can be made on other aspects of the question.

I do not, of course, wish to interfere officially in this matter at all, or prejudice any position which the Indian Government may find it necessary to take, but I thought that I should give you my personal views, especially on the "aggressor" aspect of the question to which I have referred above. I feel sure you will not misunderstand my motives in doing so. Kindest personal regards. I am looking forward very much to seeing you shortly in Colombo. Ends.

Following for McNaughton from Pearson, begins: Kashmir.

The Indian reply to your Kashmir proposal is certainly a disappointing one. I am, of course, anxious not to intervene in this matter officially in any way, but I thought that the possibility of a breakdown, with consequent publication of the relevant documents, justified me in sending a message to Prime Minister Nehru, which I forwarded to you in my telegram No. 838.

If the Security Council is called together to hear your report, the proposal which you have made as mediator will, I assume, have to be made public, together with the replies of the Indian and Pakistan Governments to that proposal. I suppose that the proposal will become known as a Canadian one, which makes it all the more desirable, of course, that it include nothing which can justifiably be regarded by either party to this dispute as weighing the scales against it. I know that you have had this very much in mind in the fine and tireless effort you have been making to establish an agreed basis for a solution.

So far as procedure is concerned, I am glad you have been able to secure a postponement of the Security Council meeting in order to avoid the hardening of positions on both sides. This is, of course, essential as long as there is any possibility of agreement. I appreciate, of course, the special difficulty you are in because your term of office expires at the end of the week. However, I should think that the Council would be anxious for your successor to continue your work along the lines so well laid down by you as long as there is any possibility of success, and that the Council would also wish you to be put at the disposal of your successor to assist him. However, this is, of course, a matter for the Council itself to decide.

So far as the Indian reply is concerned, if they insist on the position that Pakistan must be considered as an aggressor and, therefore, on a different basis than India, no United Nations mediation effort is likely to be successful. It is hard for me to believe that the Indian Government will continue to insist formally on this point, though I must admit that their reply to you indicates that is the position they will take. :

So far as the specific points made by the Indian Government in its reply are concerned, I am wondering whether it would not be possible to meet them in one or two respects so far as demilitarization and demobilization are concerned. I have not, of course, given this matter the thought that you have, but I have in mind some modification of 2(a) which would remove the impression that the Azad forces and the Kashmir forces are to be treated on exactly the same basis. I know that the Indians feel strongly about this as the Azad forces have been built up entirely since the dispute began and, indeed, since the United Nations intervened in that dispute. I have in mind the possibility of making some concession to this Indian feeling by altering 2(a) so that the last sentence would read somewhat as follows: "Also the reduction by disbanding and disarming of the Azad forces, and after this process has begun, disbanding and disarming the armed forces and militia of the State of Kashmir."

This idea, of course, could be better expressed, but you will gather what I have in mind. However, any such change requires the abandonment of the "guilt" concept by India and their willingness to suggest specific amendments to your proposal or to discuss those suggested by you. You, of course, will be in the best position to judge whether this can be done at this stage, or whether it is, indeed, too late. Certainly we should not give up as long as there is any remote possibility of an agreed proposal for submission to the Council.

I cannot end this message without thanking you and your advisers for the magnificent work you are doing to help solve this complicated and difficult problem. It is a fitting finale to your distinguished representation of Canada on the Security Council which has won so much admiration on all sides.

My telegram No. 338, December 29th, Kashmir.

I received at eleven o'clock p.m. from Mr. Nehru, who explains that he was busy with the Cabinet and other meetings all afternoon and evening, the following message for you, Begins:

Thank you for your message which has been forwarded to me by the Canadian High Commissioner. I appreciate your interest in the Kashmir dispute. We are eager for a settlement, but certain factors have come in the way of such a settlement which I endeavoured to explain to you. We do not wish any public discussion of this issue, if it can be avoided. Hence our original suggestion for a mediator. But if public discussion does take place, then it is impossible to hide obvious and important facts. I understand our delegation at Lake Success has suggested certain amendments to General McNaughton's proposals.

We have always attached great importance to the moral aspect of the Kashmir issue and we are convinced that the ignoring of this has added to the difficulties of settlement. Throughout our discussions with the Commission, and in our published correspondence, we have laid stress on this. No just or durable decision can be arrived at unless premises are sound. We do not desire any condemnation of Pakistan, but (point out?) we cannot accept statements made which ignore (group corrupt) real situation. Bajpai will no doubt explain fully our position to you.

I am looking forward to meeting you in Colombo. Kind regards. Ends.

Heeney has explained to me your objections to following the course of action which we had suggested when the Council meets this afternoon. If you consider that there is no alternative other than to table your proposals together with the replies of the two parties, we will of course be guided by your judgment of the situation on the spot. It seems to us, however, that the formal publication, above your name at this point, of the proposals, especially accompanied by the replies will make it much more difficult for further adjustments to take place. We had hoped, therefore, that it would be possible for you to say to the Council that you had prepared certain draft proposals, that you had submitted these proposals for comment to the two parties, that you had received a number of suggestions and proposed amendments from both sides, and that you considered that the process of negotiation should now be continued. It seemed to us that you might then go on to say that both the proposals and the replies were in so flexible and tentative a condition that you thought no useful purpose could be served by making them formal through tabling them at the present time. You would, of course, be guided by the Council in this matter but your own judgment was that it would be preferable to avoid giving any greater degree of formality than was necessary to the negotiations at their present stage.

2. In making this suggestion, however, I would like to repeat that I am prepared to be guided by your judgment, based on the circumstances as you consider them to exist at the present moment in New York. Ends.

Kashmir.

1. At his request, Bajpai came to my office yesterday afternoon (Wednesday, 28th December) at 5.30 p.m. He was joined by Rau. Arnold Smith and Grande were with me.

2. Bajpai told me that he had received his Government's reply to the message which he had sent them Tuesday night after his meeting with me. He read from the message he had received, approximately as follows: "We do not desire the Commission or the Council to condemn Pakistan either publicly or privately, but basic facts cannot be ignored. We are quite agreeable to making suggestions for amendments." I then asked Bajpai whether he had specific amendments which he could give to me at this time. He said that he would need some time to formulate these. I then asked whether he could do this and give them to me as soon as possible. He said that he would. At the end of the meeting he told me that if he and Rau were the only two persons to consider he could have the amendments ready within a very short while. However, he said, "I have to carry my team with me." I said that I understood. He further said at the end of the meeting that he had not yet informed Abdullah about his meeting with me (and presumably about the message which he had just received from India), and that he would have to do so immediately.

3. There then followed some discussion as to whether and when the Indian amendments should be given to Pakistan and vice versa. Further, there was considerable discussion as to whether and when the replies of India and Pakistan should be made public. We said that, as India had agreed to submit amendments to my proposals, we would regard the first Indian reply as past history and would neither exchange it nor have it made public. Bajpai agreed with this suggestion.

4. Both Bajpai and Rau made it very clear that they did not think it wise (a) to exchange the replies of India and Pakistan prior to the Security Council meeting this afternoon, or (b) to make public these two replies at this time. They implied that if, for instance, the Indian reply were given to Pakistan prior to the Council meeting, Pakistan might take advantage of this to say to the Council that she had substantially accepted my proposals whereas India had not. Thus, positions would be hardened and the process of harmonising the two sides would become extremely difficult, if not impossible. Further, both Bajpai and Rau said that if the two replies were made public at this time a similar situation would occur and further harmonising would become extremely difficult, particularly in view of the reaction of the public in both India and Pakistan. Bajpai and Rau said they were very concerned lest a public debate in the Council at this time on the basis of my proposals would cause other members of the Council to support them in so forceful a manner that India might have to take up an equally strong stand along the lines of her original reply. They pointed out that the Indian Government would find itself in a very difficult position if it received strong criticism at this time in the Council.

5. (On this point I would observe that judging from the prompt reaction of India to the message which I gave to Bajpai on your behalf Tuesday night, I am disposed to think that it would be useful for some indication to be given by other Council members of the unfavourable impression which would be created should India adopt a position of obduracy.)

6. Bajpai also said that it would be unfortunate if the Soviet representative, desiring to make mischief, should make a statement strongly supporting the Indian position, when other Council members were in effect inclining toward the Pakistan position. Such a statement would be widely reported in the Indian press, and sink into the public mind, to create an impression that the Russians were truer friends of India than the western democracies.

7. (I did not comment on this statement. It may be largely bluff, but it may not. I am unable as yet to assess what position the USSR is likely to adopt.)

8. I said that I would naturally consider very carefully the explanation which I would give to the Council as regards my proposals and my negotiations with the two parties. I said that I would of course do my very best not to aggravate the situation. Bajpai and Rau seemed particularly concerned that I should not use any such phrase as "the truth lies between extremes" in referring to my proposals. I had previously told them that I had been thinking of using some such phrase to indicate the position set forth in my proposals. Subsequently I said that I would eliminate this type of phrase from my statement. Further, I tentatively agreed, subject to the consent of Pakistan, that I would, at Thursday's meeting of the Council, after tabling my proposals, then say that the two parties had put forward amendments which had been received only recently and which required more time for study. Further, more time was required for an attempt to harmonise the two points of view expressed in these amendments from both sides. I could then say that these amendments would be interchanged between the two parties and that perhaps the parties might need to refer some points back to their respective Governments for instructions. Finally I said I would express the hope that the Council would agree that someone should carry on the negotiations in this manner. I would also, of course, point out to the Council that my term of office as President and Canada's membership in the Security Council would expire on 31st December. The Council would, of course, have to decide in what manner further negotiations should be carried on. Bajpai suggested that perhaps Norway might propose that I carry on. I told Bajpai that I personally did not really wish to carry on, but I emphasized that I would not "run away from responsibility" if both parties and the Council really wanted me to continue and there was real prospect of agreement. I would not, however, seek any such office.

9. Rau said that he would hope that my statement to the Council would not give the impression that my mind was finally made up and that my proposals were hardened. I said that I, of course, would not suggest that my proposals were to be regarded as final in any respect as this had never been my intention. These proposals were in fact a first step to be regarded as a point of departure for further negotiations. However, I emphasized that after the leak which had occurred in New Delhi reported in yesterday's New York Times (see my teletype No. 1251†) and the anxiety which it had caused and would cause, I felt that it was essential that I should make a statement to the Council at this time and therefore it would not be proper to propose another deferment of the meeting. Bajpai and Rau both agreed.

10. We suggested that perhaps we might get both India and Pakistan not to make statements in the Council today. Rau countered with "What about the other members of the Security Council?" I said that, apart from the Soviets, I felt that most of them were very responsible and probably would be careful not to aggravate the situation at this critical time.

11. The meeting ended on the understanding that, subject to the agreement of Pakistan, the new reply of India, including her amendments (which Bajpai said he would be ready to hand to me at a meeting in my offices this morning at 10.00 a.m.), and the reply of Pakistan would not be interchanged until after today's afternoon meeting of the Security Council. My proposals, of course, would be made public at the time of the meeting. After the meeting, if the Security Council agreed, the process of negotiation on the basis of these amendments would continue.

Kashmir.

1. You will by now have seen the United Nations press release No. SC.1087 of 29th December,† carried on the United Nations teleprinter, which contains a summary of the Security Council meeting at 3:00 p.m., 29th December. The text of my statement after distributing my proposals to members of the Council, is contained verbatim in "Takes" 3 to 6 inclusive in SC.1087.

2. Before the agenda of this meeting was adopted the Soviet and Ukrainian representatives made a declaration regarding China's representation on the Security Council. This subject is reported on in a separate teletype.

3. In so far as the Kashmir question was concerned, once I had made my statement, our proposals were given general support by the representatives of Norway, the United Kingdom, France, the United States and China. Sunde of Norway stated that "you have succeeded in defining clearly the areas of disagreement. Your proposals for a basis of agreement, in my opinion, cut across those remaining areas in a fair and equitable manner." For the United Kingdom, Cadogan said that the proposals "pay the utmost possible regard to the legitimate interest of the two parties in this dispute". Gross, speaking for the United States, said "I believe that they (the proposals) constitute a fair and reasonable approach to the problem based upon a principle to which the President has already referred and which has been accepted heretofore by both parties: that the future of the State of Jammu and Kashmir will be determined by the will of its people, freely expressed." Tsiang of China said that his study of the proposals showed "that they were carefully framed so that, in so far as possible, no appearance of prejudicing the rights and claims of either parties should be allowed to appear." Chauvel of France said that "we are in full agreement with the suggestions which the President has made."

4. It will be seen from these extracts that the support given to my proposals was of a general character and that the representatives from these friendly delegations did not discuss the proposals in detail.

5. The question of the future conduct of informal negotiations between India and Pakistan caused more discussion in this meeting of the Council than did the substance of the proposals I had submitted. In this connection the representative of Norway made an informal proposal that "the President's mediation should continue, if necessary, and if he is willing, after the expiration of his term as President." This proposal was supported by the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and China.

6. The Norwegian proposal, and the supporting remarks of other members, were made without previous consent from me. When approached by various colleagues on my willingness to continue in January, I had spoken along the lines you know. Moreover, it had been agreed with the United Kingdom and United States on Wednesday afternoon that we should avoid any action on this matter being taken at Thursday's council; and on Thursday morning, in reply to further enquiries, we had let it be known that I did not wish to decide this question at once and that there was no urgency—it would be best to leave the matter to the parties and to the next Council in January. The statements supporting the Norwegian suggestion therefore savoured of an attempt to railroad me into a commitment which I wished neither to accept nor reject at this stage.

7. I was therefore amused when Malik pointed out for the Soviet Union that Canada's membership on the Council ended on 31st December and that it would be "unprecedented" for the Council to have a non-member continue with these "mediation" functions. Malik added it would "put the representative of Canada, in the first instance, in a position which would be embarrassing or at least delicate. It is an innovation which is not provided for in the charter, in the rules of procedure, or in the practice or the records of the United Nations." Malik added that such a procedure would add a third category to membership in the Security Council (in addition to permanent members and non-permanent members). This third category would be that of a "prolonged member."

8. Towards the end of the meeting I made the following statement in regard to this suggestion of the Norwegian delegate, as supported by other members of the Council: "I should like to assure my colleagues that under no circumstances do I seek to evade trouble or work, but I think they will forgive me if I say that before undertaking such a mission as has been indicated, I should satisfy myself that there is in fact a real necessity for me to do so. I feel that if this should be so, and as the representative of the Soviet Union has indicated, it would only be right and appropriate that the functions of this mediation between the two parties, in this vitally important matter, should be most carefully and most specifically defined by the Security Council in full agreement with the parties, and that the parties should also be in agreement as to the person who should undertake this duty. I again say that I do appreciate most sincerely the courtesy which has been given to me today, but I must ask, in all sincerity and with a regard for what I think is the proper and expeditious handling of this matter, that we defer consideration of these particular problems until the new Security Council is in office."

9. In replying to further questions from Cadogan and Gross I emphasized that I would continue to participate in the discussion of this problem with the two parties "until the expiration of my mandate as president of this Council." So far as reporting on further discussion with the parties until the end of that period (i.e., 31st December 1949), I said that I should "be glad to come myself in any capacity which the Council may desire, in order that the information (i.e. a report of these discussions) may go forward."

10. Gross (United States) who, as you know, is anxious to avoid any resolution and consequent challenge to a double-veto, suggested that I act without a new resolution, either by considering that my mandate was personal and did not expire with my tenure of office as President, or under Article 33 by decision of the two parties. Near the end of the meeting he asked me to rule whether anything said at the meeting would preclude action under Article 33, and I said such action was not precluded.

11. This matter was thus left on the following basis:

(a) I would continue any meetings with the parties which they might feel useful until the end of this month;

(b) I would be prepared to submit the report of these meetings to the Council in any manner which the Council might wish;

(c) So far as further participation in these discussions by me was concerned, after the end of December, this was a matter to be decided by the new Council which would come into existence on 1st January, 1950, and by the two parties;

(d) Action under Article 33 of the Charter is not precluded.

12. The representatives of Pakistan and of India both spoke gracefully of my efforts, and both happily avoided saying anything on the substance of the dispute between them.

13. In New York, after the Security Council meeting the replies of the two parties were interchanged as had been agreed. i.e. A copy of Pakistan's reply was given to the Indian delegation, and a copy of the second Indian reply was given to the Pakistan delegation.

Thank you for the quick action which you were able to take in regard to the message for Mr. Nehru about Kashmir. I do not think any further approach to him is required for the time being, but if you should see him and the question arises, you might mention that strong pressure is being brought to bear on McNaughton to continue his mediatory efforts in some capacity after Canada leaves the Security Council and that while we are not running away from any responsibility we are not particularly anxious that he should do this; certainly we would not wish McNaughton to continue unless the two parties to the dispute are both really anxious that he should do so. Confidentially, the unfavourable reception by the Government of India to the proposal which General McNaughton put forward increases our reluctance that he should continue his present mediatory duties after Canada leaves the Council.

2. Mr. Nehru mentions in telegram 339† his disappointment that the original suggestion for a mediator was not carried out and that if public discussion takes place it is impossible to hide obvious and important facts. Any negotiations taking place in New York now are, of course, for the purpose of establishing conditions which would make it possible to appoint a mediator with reasonable chances of successful results being achieved. Mr. Nehru's representatives during the discussions have not at any time, as far as I am aware, quarrelled with this procedure. It might have been possible to adopt an alternative procedure by which the Security Council would merely turn over all its functions in this matter to a mediator with simple and broad terms of reference, but this has not been suggested by the Indian representatives or anybody else, and I am, therefore, a little surprised that Mr. Nehru should have considered that the way the negotiations have been conducted may not be in line with his earlier ideas about the appointment of a mediator.

COMMISSION FOR CONVENTIONAL ARMAMENTS

1. When the Working Committee of the Commission for Conventional Armaments met on May 26, the French representative presented a plan for an exchange of information on armed forces and conventional armaments. This plan had its origin in the General Assembly resolution of 19th November, 1948, which called upon the Security Council "to pursue the study of the regulation and reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces through the agency and the Commission for Conventional Armaments". In accordance with paragraph 6 of that resolution the Commission asked its Working Committee on 23rd February to undertake as its first task "the formulation of proposals for the receipt, checking and publication by an international organ of control within the framework of the Security Council, of full information to be supplied by member states with regard to their effectives and their conventional armaments".

2. The French working paper, a copy of which is attached,† was presented as the first step in the implementation of the November 19th resolution. Although presented to the Working Committee by the representative of France, the present paper is nevertheless based largely on the United States draft paper which the Chiefs of Staff Committee had before it at its meetings of 26th April and 11th May. The only differences between the present paper and the United States draft are:

(a) that the present paper is the product of informal discussions among the delegations of Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States, and

(b) that in the joint paper the original provisions of the United States paper have been simplified by a shortening and revision of section 1 (General Considerations), by the exclusion of a detailed listing of items to be covered in the proposed census of effectives and armaments, and by the exclusion of some details of the verification procedures.

The present paper, then, confines itself to broad proposals for the census and verification, leaving the details of method to be worked out by agreement in the Expert Sub-Committee which is to be set up.

3. It is almost certain, judging from the remarks of the Soviet representative in the Working Committee on May 26th, that the U.S.S.R. will reject the terms of the French working paper. This being the case, the Western Powers are anxious to advance a proposal which will be as clear-cut and simple as possible in order that by rejecting it, the Russians will be placed in an unfavourable propaganda light. To do this, however, the Powers supporting the provisions of the present paper must be prepared, if necessary, to implement these proposals under existing political conditions.

4. In considering this question, the Chiefs of Staff Committee, bearing in mind the fact that the Canadian Government has not revealed to the United Kingdom and United States nor even to the Parliament of Canada information on its holdings of military equipment, attached a proviso to their recommendation that the Canadian delegation should be instructed to support the use of the American working paper as a basis of discussion for the final stage of the informal talks. This proviso was to the effect that, from the military standpoint, the Canadian Government should not agree to the release of information on military equipment until the census and verification of information on personnel had first been carried out in good faith by the U.S.S.R. This proviso, however, was not incorporated by the Working Committee in the wording of their final paper because it was felt that the introduction of a security check of this nature would weaken the strength of the proposals, and might enable the U.S.S.R. to argue that such a suggestion was merely an attempt to place the Soviet Union in the position of having to divulge information on personnel in which they were known to be stronger than the Western Powers.

5. Although there are no definite assurances that the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France will in fact agree to the terms of the present working paper, it would appear reasonable to assume that they will accept it without serious reservation as they have been actively concerned in the successive stages of its preparation. Moreover, if (as is extremely unlikely) a census and verification of armaments and effectives were to take place as a result of the present proposals, the United States, the United Kingdom and France would undoubtedly be required to release a greater volume of important military information to the control organ than would Canada. Their willingness to participate in the present plan may, it is true, be largely based on their conviction that the U.S.S.R. will reject it. In any event it would seem that if these three governments are willing to subscribe to the plan, the Canadian Government would have less to lose by giving a similar assurance and should therefore keep in step with the other three Governments in what is essentially a manoeuvre in the cold war.

6. Bearing in mind, therefore,

- (a) that it is unlikely that the U.S.S.R. will agree to the present proposals; and
- (b) that it would be desirable, in order to place the U.S.S.R. in an unfavourable propaganda light, to put forward proposals which are as clear-cut and simple as possible; and
- (c) that the U.S., U.K. and French Governments are expected to subscribe to the terms of the present working paper; and
- (d) that Canada shall have an opportunity, when the Expert Sub-Committee is set up, to express further views on the method of carrying out the proposals, the Chiefs of Staff recommend:

(i) that the Canadian Government subscribe to the terms of the present working paper; and

(ii) that the Canadian Government agree to implement these terms if the need should arise.⁵⁰

DESPATCH 416

New York, October 19, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to enclose one copy of the Verbatim Record of the 452nd meeting of the Security Council, held at Lake Success at 3 p.m., October 18, 1949.†

2. As you will have already seen from United Nations press release SC/1053, the Council concluded the debate on the proposal for census and verification of armaments and armed forces adopted by the Commission for Conventional Armaments (document S/1372), and proceeded to a vote on the three draft resolutions pertaining to this subject. These resolutions were forwarded under cover of my despatch No. 413 of October 15† (documents S/1399/Rev.1; S/1405/Rev.1 and S/1408/Rev.1).

3. Prior to the vote on the three resolutions the Soviet and Ukrainian representatives made their usual abusive and distorted statements along what are now familiar propaganda lines. Neither of these statements added to the knowledge or humour of the Council, and as was to be expected, consisted mainly of an inaccurate survey of the work of the Commission for Conventional Armaments, and a reiteration of the "practical measures" for disarmament previously proposed by the Soviet Union, and which have been aired at considerable length in the General Assembly, the ⁵⁰ Ces recommandations furent télégraphiées à la délégation aux Nations Unies (no. 527, le 15 juin 1949) avec le commentaire suivant: «It has not been possible to obtain Ministerial authority so far and it may well be impossible to do so for some days.» On a voté sur l'exposé français, le 21 juin, lorsque la délégation canadienne vota avec la majorité, dans le but d'appuyer la Commission sur les armes conventionnelles.

These recommendations were sent by telegram to the Delegation to the United Nations (No. 527, June 15, 1949) with the comment that "It has not been possible to obtain Ministerial authority so far and it may well be impossible to do so for some days." The French paper was put to a vote on June 21, when the Canadian Delegation voted with the majority on the Commission for Conventional Armaments to support it.

Security Council, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Commission for Conventional Armaments at various times during the past few years. You will note that an otherwise dull meeting was enlivened to some extent by the attention given by both the Soviet and the Ukrainian representative to the remarks which had been made by Mr. Pearson at the previous meeting of the Council. The relevant, or "irrelevant", Soviet and Ukrainian criticisms are contained on pages 22 to 25 and 37 to 40 of the attached Verbatim Record, from which can be gathered the rather obvious fact that Messrs. Malik and Manuilsky were none too pleased with Mr. Pearson's remarks. I felt that a reply was unnecessary as the fallacies and lack of logic of the Soviet and Ukrainian criticisms were self-evident and any reply would merely have prolonged an already lengthy debate.

4. After a short and very able statement by Cadogan (U.K.), it was decided to proceed to a vote on the three resolutions before the Council. Prior to the vote, however, Malik (U.S.S.R.) intervened with a remark to the effect that the French resolution (document S/1399/Rev.1) to approve the proposals on census and verification was being put to the vote merely to provoke a Soviet veto. He thought it would be quite proper merely to transmit to the General Assembly the various documents dealing with the question, and in view of this he saw no reason to proceed with a vote on the resolution. This suggestion received a cold reception, and the voting then proceeded as follows:

(a) The French resolution to approve the census and verification proposals (document S/1399/Rev.1) was vetoed by the U.S.S.R., the vote being 9 in favour (including Canada) to 2 against (Ukraine and U.S.S.R.).

(b) The Soviet resolution dealing with the submission of information on conventional armaments, armed forces and atomic weapons (document S/1405/Rev.1) was defeated, the vote being 3 in favour (U.S.S.R., Ukraine and Egypt), 1 against (China) and 7 abstentions (including Canada). It had not been anticipated that Egypt would vote with the Soviet bloc on this resolution, but, as you are aware, the Egyptian position is not always consistent.

(c) The French counter-resolution (document S/1408/Rev.1) recognizing that information must be adequately verified was vetoed, the vote being 8 in favour (including Canada) to 2 against (Ukraine and U.S.S.R.), with one abstention (Argentina).

(d) A French procedural motion to transmit the Working Paper adopted by the Commission for Conventional Armaments to the General Assembly, together with records of the discussions in the Security Council, the Commission for Conventional Armaments and its Working Committee, was adopted by 9 in favour (including Canada), none against, with two abstentions (Ukraine and U.S.S.R.).⁵¹

⁵¹ Le 5 décembre 1949, l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies adopta une résolution parrainée par la Norvège et la France (laquelle résolution reflétait un consensus entre le Canada, la France, le Royaume-Uni et les États-Unis) par un vote de 45 en faveur, 5 contre et 5 abstentions.

On December 5, 1949 the U.N. General Assembly adopted a resolution sponsored by Norway and France (which reflected a consensus reached by Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States) by a vote of 45 in favour, 5 against, with 5 abstentions.

5. You will already have noted, from Press Release SC/1053, that at the opening of the meeting the President made a short announcement on voting procedures in the Security Council. I am reporting his remarks separately today.

6. The next meeting of the Council is scheduled for 3 p.m. on Tuesday, October 25.

I have, etc.

1. The Political Committee has now completed its discussion of this item and has taken the following decisions:

(a) Regarding the question of the Greek children, the Committee adopted unanimously on 3rd November a draft resolution the text of which is contained in my immediately following teletype en clair.† The draft resolution introduced by Australia, China, the United Kingdom and the United States, (the text of which was sent to you in my teletype No. 180 of 27th October)† was revised by the four sponsors in a manner which made it less condemnatory of the Governments which had failed to comply with the Assembly's Resolution 193 (III) concerning the return of these children to Greece. This revised resolution of the four sponsors was further amended on 3rd November by various representatives in the Political Committee with a view to achieving a unanimous vote. The resultant language adopted by the Committee is thus much milder in tone than the original proposal of the four sponsors.

(b) The joint draft resolution of Australia, China, the United Kingdom and the United States (see my teletypes No. 175† and No. 180) was adopted in the Political Committee on 4th November by a vote of 38 in favour, 6 against (the Soviet bloc and Yugoslavia) and 2 abstentions. Canada voted in favour of this draft resolution. We did not participate in the general debate on this item in the view that our general position had been sufficiently well covered in the statements of other representatives.

(c) The Soviet proposal (the text of which was contained in my teletype No. 186) was then rejected by successive roll-call votes on each paragraph. (Canada voted against each paragraph). After each paragraph had been decisively rejected by the Committee, the Chairman ruled that under Rule 118 no vote was needed on the resolution as a whole. This rule was challenged by the Soviet representative and was sustained by the Committee by a vote of 43 in favour (including Canada), 5 against and 10 abstentions.

2. After concluding discussion of this item on the morning of 4th November, the Political Committee resumed discussion of the question of Italian Colonies at the afternoon meeting. Ends.

CABINET MEETING, NOVEMBER 10—PROGRESS REPORT ON UNITED NATIONS
GENERAL ASSEMBLY

In making your weekly progress report to Cabinet on the work of the United Nations General Assembly you may wish to refer to the following notes.

3. The Greek question—Preparatory work has finally been completed on the Greek question. It now appears almost certain that the United Nations watchdog commission in the Balkans will be continued in spite of the persistent refusal of the Communist countries to recognize its legality or to cooperate with it. In addition, members of the United Nations and all other States will probably be asked to impose an arms embargo on Albania and Bulgaria. This decision, which was taken over the vigorous opposition of the Soviet bloc, reflects the concern of the majority of the Assembly at the continued friction between Greece and her Communist neighbours. The course of the Assembly's debate on the Greek question left no doubt as to the active part which the U.S.S.R. is still playing in stimulating unrest on the borders of Greece.⁵³

DISPOSAL OF THE FORMER ITALIAN COLONIES

I. Historical Background

The question of the disposal of the former Italian colonies in Africa was referred to the General Assembly of the United Nations on September 15, 1948, when the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and France failed to agree on the matter within the one-year time limit allotted for this purpose under the terms of the Treaty of Peace with Italy. An annex to the treaty provides that the recommendations made by the General Assembly shall be accepted by the Four Powers, who are to take appropriate measures for putting them into effect.

2. Because of a crowded agenda the General Assembly was unable to take up the question at its Paris meeting. At Lake Success and Flushing Meadow in April and May 1949, however, it discussed the matter at length but failed to reach agreement.

3. The future of three territories is in question—that of Italian Somaliland on the Indian Ocean, Eritrea on the Red Sea and Libya facing the central Mediterranean. Within Libya three separate areas have been given individual attention, Cyrenaica adjoining Egypt on the east, and Tripolitania and the Fezzan adjoining Tunisia and Southern Algeria on the west. All these territories with the exception of the Fezzan have been under British Military Administration since the defeat of the Axis powers; the Fezzan has been under French occupation.

4. Among the most pronounced features of the problem have been:

(a) A strong desire on the part of Italy to administer trusteeships in all of its former African colonies except Ethiopia, which is now a member of the United Nations;

⁵³ Le 18 novembre 1949, l'Assemblée générale adopta à l'unanimité une résolution demandant que les enfants grecs soient retournés en Grèce.

On November 18, 1949 the General Assembly unanimously adopted a resolution calling for the return of Greek children to Greece.

(b) The strong antipathy to Italian control of any sort which appears to characterize public opinion in the greater part of the area under discussion, although not the entire area;

(c) The susceptibilities of various European powers having direct interests in Africa, which cannot be ignored since they are inevitably related to the maintenance of international peace and security, and particularly

(i) The desire of Italy for outlets in Africa for its own unemployed population;

(ii) The hope of France for a settlement in Libya which will not force French withdrawal from the Fezzan;

(iii) The wish of the United Kingdom, now shared by the United States, for a settlement which will not be incompatible with the maintenance of a strong military base in Cyrenaica;

(iv) The desire of Ethiopia for access to the Red Sea along a coastline sufficiently extended to meet the present and future needs of Ethiopian commerce;

(d) The existence among the inhabitants of the territories of conflicting views about the most suitable arrangements to be made to assure their rapid development toward self-government or independence;

(e) The absence of normal means of assessing the strength of various political groups and the consequent failure of the Four-Power Commission of Investigation to agree on the implications of statements made to them by local spokesmen during the survey of the three territories made on behalf of the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers between November 1947 and May 1948.

Proposals considered by the General Assembly, April–May 1949

4(a). Throughout the spring session the Slav group maintained that the United Nations itself should be appointed administering authority under the trusteeship system for Italian Somaliland, Eritrea and Libya. A United Nations administrator should be appointed for each territory. He would be assisted in each case by an Advisory Council, in which representatives of the Four Powers, of Italy and of the territory concerned would sit, along with others. The trusteeships for Libya and Eritrea should be for a period of five years, while the trusteeship for Italian Somaliland should continue for ten.

5. These proposals represented a sudden reversal of policy on the part of the Soviet Union, which had begun by advocating dual trusteeships (with Italy and one of the Four Powers serving as administering authority for each territory) and had later urged the creation of individual trusteeships, with Italy alone acting as administering authority.

6. India also favoured the appointment of the United Nations as administering authority for two of the three territories, namely Italian Somaliland and Libya. It proposed that a commission should visit Eritrea to ascertain if the inhabitants of that territory wished to be united with Ethiopia immediately.

7. The Arab states agreed with India on the need for a commission to ascertain the real wishes of the inhabitants of Eritrea. They asked, however, that Italian Somaliland should be placed under a collective trusteeship of five states, and proposed that Libya should be given immediate independence.

8. Australia maintained that the General Assembly did not possess enough information to reach a decision on the disposal of any of the territories and suggested that a United Nations committee should conduct investigations in all of them.

9. Latin American states advocated immediate Italian trusteeships for Italian Somaliland and Tripolitania at least, and asked that the United Kingdom, United States, France, Italy and Egypt should propose to the Assembly in the autumn of 1949 terms and conditions under which the whole of Libya, including Cyrenaica as well as Tripolitania, might be administered under trusteeship for ten years before being given independence. Similarly five governments, with Ethiopia replacing Egypt, should make proposals for the future of Eritrea and for the administration of Italian Somaliland under trusteeship.

10. A United Kingdom proposal also foreshadowed an independent Libya after ten years of trusteeship. The United Kingdom would be the administering authority in Cyrenaica, while the governments of the United Kingdom, United States, France, Italy and Egypt would consider the terms under which the rest of Libya should be placed under trusteeship. Roughly half of Eritrea would be united with Ethiopia, in accordance with the desire of the majority living in this area, guarantees being provided for the protection of minorities. Italian Somaliland would be placed under Italian trusteeship.

11. The Political Committee set aside all these proposals and decided by a vote of 34 (including Canada) to 16; with 7 abstentions, to recommend to the Assembly a plan based on a compromise agreed to early in May by the Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom and Italy, which seemed likely to command more general support. The resolution adopted by the Political Committee provided for the establishment of an Italian trusteeship of indefinite duration for Italian Somaliland. The south-eastern half of Eritrea would be incorporated in Ethiopia, suitable guarantees being given for the protection of minorities and for a charter for the principal towns of Asmara and Massawa where leading business interests are established. No decision was reached on the disposal of the Western Province adjoining the Sudan, however, since the majority of the committee opposed its incorporation in the Sudan and no other suggestion was brought forward. After a period of ten years a united independent Libya was to come into being unless the General Assembly should decide when the time arrived that this step would not be appropriate. During the intervening decade Cyrenaica would be under British trusteeship and the Fezzan under French trusteeship. Tripolitania would come under Italian trusteeship by the end of 1951. Until then it would remain under a temporary British administration, which would be assisted by an Advisory Council made up of representatives of the United Kingdom, United States, France, Italy, Turkey and inhabitants of Tripolitania themselves.

12. When this recommendation of the Political Committee was voted on in the plenary meeting of the General Assembly on May 17, however, it was upset. The proposal for an Italian trusteeship in Somaliland failed of adoption by three votes, those opposing it being a combination of Asian, African and Slav states and Haiti. The proposal for a temporary Italian trusteeship for Tripolitania failed of adoption by one vote, Ethiopia and Liberia abstaining instead of opposing the adoption of this paragraph. In view of the rejection of these two proposals in the paragraph-by-paragraph voting, France and the Latin American group withdrew their support of the compromise resolution as a whole, since their support had been given only on the assumption that, temporarily at least, Italy would have two trust territories to administer. On the final vote, therefore, only fourteen states, including Canada, supported the compromise; 37 were opposed and 7 abstained. The Assembly approved, however, a recommendation of the Political Committee that the Economic and Social Council should be asked to take into account the problem of economic development and social progress in the former Italian colonies.

13. The Soviet Union then renewed its proposal to appoint the United Nations itself as administering authority in each of the three former Italian colonies. Canada voted against this resolution. Pakistan renewed the former Australian proposal that a committee of investigation should be sent to the three territories by the General Assembly. Canada abstained in the vote on this resolution, which was defeated. Similarly the Assembly defeated a proposal of three Latin American states that the question should be referred to the Interim Committee, which should ascertain the wishes of the native populations and other relevant facts and report to the fourth session of the Assembly.

14. On May 18 the Assembly approved a Polish resolution to refer the entire question to the fourth session of the General Assembly.

II. Developments since the conclusion of the third session of the General Assembly

15. In Tripolitania demonstrations against the British took place in May when it became known that Mr. Bevin had agreed to support even a temporary Italian trusteeship for that territory. Threats of non-cooperation with the Administration were not carried out, however, since it soon became clear that with the defeat of the Bevin-Sforza compromise in the General Assembly the plan was no longer considered binding by the United Kingdom Government. The latter, moreover, although it had considered itself bound in the past under the Hague Convention to follow a "care and maintenance" policy in Tripolitania, now decided to send a mission to the territory to prepare the way for a more active programme of economic, social and educational development, and a greater number of Tripolitanians have recently been associated with the administration as an educational measure. It is not believed that the United Kingdom Government would be likely to oppose independence for Tripolitania after a short period of preparation, if this plan receives general support in the Assembly.

16. In Cyrenaica a "national congress" of local notables was held on June 1 to force the issue of self-government under the leadership of the Senussi Amir, Sayyid Idris. The Chief Administrator told this assembly that the United Kingdom Government agreed to the formation of a Cyrenaican government with responsibility over internal affairs, without prejudice to the eventual future of Libya as a whole. The Amir, acting under pressure from local notables, sent requests for recognition of Cyrenaica's independence to the heads of many governments a few days later, but so far as is known there were no favourable replies. Canada informed the Amir that it was following with close interest the development of self-governing institutions in Cyrenaica in accordance with the United Nations Charter, but that we were bound by the Italian peace treaty to recognize the continuing responsibility of the British administration pending a United Kingdom decision regarding Cyrenaica's future.

17. In July the Amir went to London to discuss constitutional matters. He agreed to an arrangement which would leave questions of external policy in the hands of United Kingdom representatives, while his own government would occupy itself with purely local matters if the General Assembly of the United Nations did not object to the proposed division of responsibility.

18. After the rejection of the Bevin-Sforza compromise the Italian Government turned its attention to the possibility of establishing close relations with an independent Tripolitanian government responsible to a freely elected Assembly in which Italian and other minorities would have suitable representation. Italy is now proposing that within the framework of a united and independent Libya separate administrations should be set up in Cyrenaica and Tripolitania. The latter would be associated, in a manner still to be determined, with the United Kingdom and Italy respectively, while the Fezzan would retain its special relationship with France. The French, however, have shown no disposition to support the establishment of a united and independent Libya partly because this would prevent the continued administration of the Fezzan by France and partly because Tunisian nationalists might become restless if Libya were accorded a status more favourable than that of their own country, which is still a French protectorate.

19. For Eritrea as well as for Libya the Italian Government is now asking immediate independence. It is understood that leaders in Rome believe the influence of the Italian commercial class in Eritrea is strong enough to ensure that an independent Eritrea would tend to ally itself voluntarily with Italy. The Four Power Commission of Investigation, however, was agreed that Eritrea is not yet sufficiently advanced to undertake the establishment of an independent administration. The most recent reports on what Eritreans themselves desire have been of a conflicting nature.

20. No new developments have been reported in relation to Italian Somaliland at time of writing.

21. On August 9 there was published the introduction to the annual report of the Secretary General of the United Nations, in which Mr. Lie stated it to be his belief that a direct United Nations trusteeship, with an administrator responsible directly to the Trusteeship Council, would be the best provision to make for each of the former Italian colonies. He recognized "the political and practical difficulties involved in a direct United Nations trusteeship for the territories during the relatively brief period that may precede their independence". Nevertheless he believed that statesmanship "could lead to ... a solution of the problem, and that the political difficulties could be dealt with if the practical difficulties could be overcome". He felt sure that this would facilitate the peaceful development of the territories and strengthen confidence in the United Nations. Mr. Lie gave no indication, however, of the means by which the practical difficulties, which have prevented Western states from agreeing to United Nations trusteeships of this nature, might be eliminated. These have to do not only with financing, policing and the discipline of an international civil service but also with the fact that the Trusteeship Council is not a suitable body for assuming direct responsibility for the administration of populated territories. The Slav group of states alone is already committed to support a policy similar to that proposed by Mr. Lie for all three of the former Italian colonies, although India is ready to support it for Libya and Italian Somaliland.

III. Previous Canadian attitude

22. Canada in its capacity as a signatory of the Treaty of Peace with Italy was twice invited by the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers to offer suggestions for the disposal of the former Italian colonies. The Canadian statements were dated June 7 and August 7, 1948.

23. The first was a general statement made before the Four Power Commission of Investigation had reported on conditions in the three territories. The position was taken that the former Italian colonies must be regarded as falling within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter relating to dependent territories. Thus the interests of the inhabitants must be regarded as paramount. Arrangements to ensure their future development should accordingly be based on the ascertained condition of each territory and the needs and wishes of its inhabitants. Canada would support the application of the trusteeship system to territories not found to be ready for independence if the majority of the inhabitants did not desire incorporation in neighbouring territory.

24. In its second statement the Canadian Government put forward provisional views of how the foregoing principles might be applied. It made clear, however, that the imprecise nature of the findings of the Four Power Commission of Investigation prevented Canada from reaching final conclusions. The Canadian Government was disposed to support an Italian trusteeship for Italian Somaliland and a United Kingdom trusteeship either for a united Libya or for separate trust territories of Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. It favoured the union with Ethiopia of that part of Eritrea where unionist sentiment was predominant. It also considered that facilities should be provided for resettlement of Italians formerly resident in Africa in those areas of the former Italian colonies where foreign settlers were needed and where they would be welcomed by the inhabitants.

25. The Canadian delegation did not participate in the protracted debate at Lake Success in the spring of 1949, considering that its general position had already been clearly enough stated to the Deputies. As already indicated, Canada supported the compromise plan based on the Bevin-Sforza agreement. When this failed of adoption the Canadian delegation took the view that the matter should be referred to the Interim Committee. It hoped the latter might succeed in securing badly needed information of an up-to-date nature about conditions in the three African territories, and particularly about the state of public opinion, concerning which conflicting reports were being received. When this proposal was also defeated the Canadian delegation supported the motion to refer the issue to the fourth session of the General Assembly.

IV. Conclusion

26. The chief interest of Canada in the settlement is that it should serve the long-term requirements of peace and security. Instability in the central Mediterranean would constitute a menace to European and world security. Unrest in the countries bordering the Red Sea, moreover, would threaten the security of Commonwealth communications. The best chance of keeping constant agitation to a minimum is to make arrangements now that will satisfy as soon as circumstances permit the rising demands for political independence in the former Italian colonies.

27. The political units established should be large enough to allow for the development of economically viable states. Local separatist sentiment should therefore be discouraged as steadfastly in African countries as elsewhere in the world, since the creation of separate regimes either to gratify local prejudice or to permit simultaneous establishment of rival foreign interests may prove fatal to general political stability. Our best contribution may be to keep before the states directly concerned the lessons to be learned from the settlement in the Eastern Mediterranean which followed the first World War. There the proposal to set up a single Arab state comparable in size and strength to Iran or Turkey was set aside and instead there came into being a collection of petty Arab states where separate vested interests quickly became rooted. Though easy to justify in terms of the international situation prevailing in 1920, this has not served the interests of long-term peace and security to the extent hoped for at the time. The Canadian delegation might therefore make a sound contribution toward the decision on the former Italian colonies if it were to use its influence to strengthen an existing trend toward agreement to create viable states where steady progress toward self-government and independence may actually be fostered in the sense intended by Chapters XI and XII of the United Nations Charter.

28. Policy recommendations regarding the disposal of individual territories will be supplied in a supplementary memorandum, when the Canadian government has received more precise information than is available at time of writing with regard to (a) the proposals which will be supported by states directly concerned in the settlement, and (b) trends in public opinion in the territories concerned.

ITALIAN COLONIES

With reference to our telephone conversation this morning, I informed Miss [Elizabeth] MacCallum that Mr. Martin wished to have the balance of material required to complete the policy recommendation in the Commentary note on this subject. I said that Mr. Martin would be in town this week-end.

2. Miss MacCallum stated that we would be unable to complete this part of the Commentary for the following reasons:—

(a) We have been waiting to see what proposals the Great Powers will put forward at the fourth regular session;

(b) At present we have inadequate information regarding the desires and aspirations of the local inhabitants, whose interests we consider paramount;

(c) We can play a more important and effective role in the Assembly discussions on this subject if we concentrate our efforts on trying to effect conciliation between the disputing parties, either through the medium of Mr. Pearson as Chairman of Committee One or in behind-the-scenes conversations with the interested parties.

3. Miss MacCallum thinks that it would be extremely unwise, in the light of our past attitude and of our lack of accurate information, to make a statement at the Assembly simply for the sake of making a speech. Furthermore, the final policy on the Italian Colonies is to be discussed at a meeting on Tuesday, whereafter it will be referred to Cabinet for decision.

At a meeting yesterday afternoon attended by the Under-Secretary, Mr. Reid, Mr. Riddell, Mr. MacDermot, Mr. MacKay and others, Canadian policy on Libya was discussed.

2. Mr. Riddell expressed some anxiety lest the action of the United Kingdom in proposing amendments to Section A of the Subcommittee's draft proposals for the former Italian colonies should prevent the Assembly from reaching any decision at the present session. He said the Latin American states were preparing to oppose the amendments. If the amendments should be adopted there would be no further difficulty. If they were defeated, however, it was possible that the vote on the Subcommittee's own proposals for Libya might subsequently be split with the result that the required majority would not be obtained. The United Kingdom could then continue as administering power in Cyrenaica and Tripolitania for another year. If this was the intention of the United Kingdom the latter would be assuming a very grave responsibility.

3. It was suggested during the discussion that if the United Kingdom had desired to prevent an Assembly decision from being taken at the present session a simpler course of action might have been to refrain from influencing other delegations to support an Italian trusteeship for Somaliland. This proposal had been defeated last spring and there was no certainty that a two-thirds majority could be persuaded to support it now.

4. It was reported that the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee had expressed the view that it would be very much against Canada's interests if an Assembly resolution adopted now should result in a collapse of United Kingdom plans for an alliance with Cyrenaica.

5. After a brief discussion, in which the growing strategic importance of the Middle East was mentioned, it was agreed:

(a) That when the United Kingdom amendments were put to the vote the Canadian delegation should support them.

(b) If the amendments are lost the Canadian delegation might then vote for Section A of the draft resolution as submitted by Subcommittee 17, unless it should be found on enquiry that the draft resolution will be opposed by the United Kingdom and that there are compelling reasons for the position taken by the United Kingdom.

6. I should be grateful if you would keep us informed of developments.

Note de la délégation permanente aux Nations Unies
Memorandum by Permanent Delegation to United Nations

[New York, November 16, 1949]

ITALIAN COLONIES

1. This report covers the period subsequent to the submission of the report (A/C.1/522) of Sub-Committee 17 to the Political Committee. Document A/1089 of 15 November contains the report of the Political Committee to the Assembly on this item.

2. On 11 October, 1949, the First (Political) Committee established a Sub-Committee of twenty-one states to study the various draft resolutions and suggestions which had been submitted to the Political Committee in regard to this item. The Sub-Committee held twenty-nine meetings and eventually reported its recommendations to the main Political Committee on 1 November (A/C.1/522).

3. In that report the principal recommendations of the Sub-Committee were as follows:

(a) With regard to Libya, the Sub-Committee recommended unity and independence by not later than 1 January, 1952. The Sub-Committee also recommended that a National Assembly be summoned in Libya to prepare a constitution and that, to assist in the establishment of an independent government in Libya, a United Nations Commissioner should be appointed by the General Assembly, together with a Council consisting of representatives of Egypt, France, Italy, Pakistan, the United Kingdom, the United States and four representatives of the local population in Libya.

(b) With regard to Italian Somaliland, the Sub-Committee recommended that independence should be granted to this territory at the end of ten years unless the General Assembly decided otherwise. Meanwhile, Italian Somaliland should be placed under the International Trusteeship System, with Italy as the Administering Authority.

(c) With regard to Eritrea, the Sub-Committee recommended the appointment of a Commission of five states (the composition of this Commission was not decided by the Sub-Committee) to ascertain more fully the wishes and the best means of promoting the welfare of the inhabitants of Eritrea, and to prepare recommendations on the final disposal of Eritrea.

4. When the Sub-Committee's recommendations were reported back to the Political Committee a general debate developed in which nearly every delegation participated. The Soviet Union re-introduced the proposals which they had previously advanced in the Political Committee and which they had also proposed in the Sub-Committee. Their proposals (A/C.1/487/Rev.1) were to the following effect:

(a) Libya should be granted immediate independence.

(b) Eritrea should be granted independence after a period of five years. During this period it should be "administered in accordance with a Trusteeship Agreement by the United Nations Trusteeship Council, which shall appoint an administrator having full executive powers and responsible to the Trusteeship Council".

(c) Italian Somaliland should be granted independence after a period of five years. During that interim period it should also be administered in accordance with a Trusteeship Agreement by the United Nations Trusteeship Council in the same manner as Eritrea.

The Polish delegation also introduced a number of similar proposals (A/C.1/529).

5. In the discussion which followed, the representatives of the Soviet bloc sought every opportunity to develop the propaganda line that the Western democracies wished to retard the attainment of independence by the peoples of the three territories concerned. In consequence, these representatives reiterated their previous familiar charges concerning the alleged exploitation of the peoples of these three territories by the "colonial powers".

6. The Western democracies replied by endorsing very substantially the recommendations of the Sub-Committee. It was pointed out by a number of representatives that the transition from dependant status to self-government could not be achieved over-night, and that an interim period was obviously necessary for practical reasons. Regret was expressed regarding the postponement of a decision on Eritrea, but the majority of representatives emphasized that, in view of the conflicting accounts of the wishes of the local inhabitants which had been presented to the Political Committee, it was essential to obtain further information as to their true wishes.

7. The United Kingdom representative, Mr. McNeil, spoke generally in support of the recommendations of the Sub-Committee, but introduced a number of amendments (A/C.1/526) which, in his judgment, gave more flexibility to the people of the three territories of Libya (namely, Cyrenaica, Tripolitania and the Fezzan) to decide among themselves whether their form of union should be in the nature of a federal state or of a unitary state. The United Kingdom delegation, however, did not strongly press their amendments, and agreed to a small verbal change in paragraph 1 of the Sub-Committee's recommendations on Libya which, in substance, merely deleted the word "single" in this paragraph. The paragraph, as finally approved by a large majority in the Political Committee, including the United Kingdom, reads as follows: "That Libya, comprising Cyrenaica, Tripolitania and the Fezzan, shall be constituted an independent and sovereign state." In regard to the provisions concerning the appointment of a United Nations Commissioner and Council for Libya, the United Kingdom abstained from voting. In regard to the other provisions on Libya (and concerning the recommendations on Libya as a whole) the United Kingdom voted in favour. They also supported the Sub-Committee's recommendations in regard to Eritrea and Italian Somaliland.

8. The United States representative, Dr. Jessup, spoke in favour of the recommendations of the Sub-Committee, while reserving his position to advance the proposals previously introduced by the United States in the event that the Sub-Committee's recommendations did not secure the required two-thirds majority.

9. The Italian representative (who had been invited to attend the meetings of the Political Committee on this item) said that Italy, if granted the Administering Authority in the former Italian Somaliland, would discharge its functions in a manner which would not threaten the security of Ethiopia or any other state. This assurance obviously did not satisfy the representative of Ethiopia who constantly emphasized his delegation's view that to grant Italian Trusteeship in Somaliland, while postponing a decision on Eritrea, would be to jeopardize the security of Ethiopia. In regard to this particular question, the representatives of the Arab bloc indicated that their acceptance of Italian Trusteeship for Italian Somaliland was conditional upon safeguards being incorporated into the resolution which would prevent Italy from using its administrative position in Somaliland for aggressive purposes. For this reason the Arab states, together with some of the Latin-American states, advanced a proposal for the establishment of an Advisory Council of three states concerning Italian Somaliland, which would "aid and advise" the Administering Authority. On this point the Political Committee adopted a joint proposal of Argentina and Lebanon to establish an Advisory Council consisting of representatives from Colombia, Egypt and the Philippines for this purpose. The vote on this proposal was 48 in favour (including Canada), 1 against and 10 abstentions.

10. After adoption of this proposal regarding the Advisory Council for Italian Somaliland, the Political Committee adopted, by a vote of 48 in favour (including Canada), 7 against (including the Soviet Bloc), and 4 abstentions, the proposal that Italy should become the Administering Authority for this territory. The remaining paragraphs regarding Italian Somaliland were adopted by large majorities. The Political Committee did, however, adopt a Philippine proposal which deleted the provision regarding the independence of Italian Somaliland being reviewed after ten years by the General Assembly. As it now stands the resolution calls for outright independence for the territory after a period of ten years. Canada voted against the deletion proposed by the Philippines, which was, however, adopted by a vote of 33 in favour, 22 against and 4 abstentions. The Political Committee also adopted, by a large majority, a provision in the resolution to the effect that, in exercising its administrative authority, Italy should be "guided by" the annexed draft constitution prepared by the delegation of India† (see document A/1089, page 27).

The Political Committee also adopted a joint proposal of Argentina, Chile and Mexico concerning the transfer of provisional administration in Italian Somaliland from the United Kingdom to Italy. This proposal, which constitutes the present paragraphs 8 and 9 of this section of the resolution (A/1089, page 24) was adopted by a vote of 38 in favour (including Canada), 8 against and 10 abstentions. The whole section of the resolution dealing with Italian Somaliland, as amended, (see A/1089, pages 23 and 24) was then adopted on 12 November by a vote of 47 in favour (including Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom), 7 against (including the Soviet bloc) and 4 abstentions.

11. In regard to Libya, once the United Kingdom amendments had been withdrawn, the various paragraphs of the Sub-Committee's proposals concerning this territory were adopted by large majorities. In the vote on this section as a whole, the Political Committee decided by 50 in favour (including Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom), none against and 8 abstentions to accept the Sub-Committee's recommendations, as amended (A/1089, pages 22 and 23).

12. In so far as Eritrea was concerned, the main discussion centered around the composition of the Commission of enquiry referred to in paragraph 1. Finally, by a vote of 40 in favour (including Canada), 6 against (including the Soviet bloc) and 9 abstentions, it was agreed to have such a Commission, consisting of representatives from Burma, Guatemala, Norway, Pakistan and the Union of South Africa. Canada had been originally proposed as a member of this Commission, but the Canadian delegation withdrew when we learned that South Africa and Australia were both very anxious to serve on it. After our withdrawal, the representative of Turkey then nominated South Africa. So far as the other four states were concerned, the only one which caused any discussion was Pakistan. In regard to this, the Ethiopian representative stated his misgivings about having a Moslem state represented on the Commission. The representative of Pakistan, however, gave an assurance that their delegate on the Commission would act in an impartial and objective manner.

13. After adoption of this paragraph regarding the Commission, the remaining paragraphs concerning Eritrea were adopted by large majorities. On 12 November the whole section on Eritrea (A/1089, pages 24 and 25) was adopted by a vote of 47 in favour (including Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom), 5 against (the Soviet bloc) and 6 abstentions.

14. By a vote of 28 in favour, 25 against (including Canada) and 4 abstentions, the Political Committee decided to submit to the General Assembly one resolution on the substance of this item instead of three resolutions dealing separately with each territory. The Canadian representative voted with the minority in the view that it might be preferable to have separate resolutions on each territory in order to secure the maximum degree of support for each resolution. After deciding to have one single resolution, the Political Committee adopted draft provisions concerning administrative arrangements (A/1089, page 25), by a large majority, and then adopted the draft resolution on the whole substance of this question by a vote of 49 in favour (including Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom), 1 against (Ethiopia) and 8 abstentions (the Soviet bloc, New Zealand, Sweden and Yugoslavia). The New Zealand representative abstained in view of his delegation's opposition to Italian Trusteeship in Somaliland. The Soviet bloc abstained on the whole resolution although they had voted against the sections dealing with Italian Somaliland and Eritrea. The Soviet and Polish representatives also reserved the right to submit their proposals again during the discussions in the plenary sessions.

15. The Political Committee then adopted, by a vote of 46 in favour (including Canada), 4 against and 4 abstentions, the second draft resolution submitted by the Sub-Committee (A/1089, page 28), which was to the effect that a Committee, consisting of the President of the Assembly, two of the Vice-Presidents (the representatives of Brazil and Pakistan), the Chairman of the First Committee, and the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Political Committee, should nominate a candidate for the post of United Nations Commissioner in Libya, and that if they could not agree on a single candidate, they should nominate three candidates.

16. Finally, the Political Committee approved a joint Argentine-Turkish proposal to have the Interim Committee of the Assembly study the delimitation of any boundaries in the three territories which had not already been fixed by international agreement. This proposal (A/1089, page 28), which was strongly opposed by the Soviet bloc, was adopted by a vote of 23 in favour (including Canada), 10 against and 23 abstentions.

Canadian Position

17. The Canadian position on this subject was set forth in the statement of our representative in the Political Committee (Mr. Martin) on 8 November (statement attached).† In general, the Canadian representative emphasized the necessity for a solution of this problem which would meet the wishes and welfare of the inhabitants concerned. He also referred to the necessity for a disposition of the former Italian colonies which would "contribute to the long-term requirements of peace and security" as "instability in the central Mediterranean would constitute a menace both to European and to world security". On the basis of these two principles, the Canadian representative supported the recommendations of the Sub-Committee, together with the United Kingdom amendments concerning Libya (which were later withdrawn). The Canadian representative concluded his remarks by emphasizing the fact that the Sub-Committee's recommendations were essentially a compromise and that "a spirit of compromise is absolutely essential if the General Assembly is to achieve the purposes for which it was established".

Italian Colonies.

At its meeting on the afternoon of 21 November the General Assembly disposed of this item by taking the following decisions:

(a) The Assembly rejected by successive votes on each paragraph a series of Polish amendments to the main resolution adopted by the Political Committee. These amendments were similar to the ones previously submitted by Poland in the Political Committee and rejected there.

(b) By a vote of 49 in favour, one against and 9 abstentions the Assembly adopted the preamble of the Political Committee's main resolution and section (a), dealing with Libya.

(c) By a vote of 48 in favour, 7 against and 3 abstentions the Assembly adopted section (b) of the resolution, dealing with Italian Somaliland.

(d) By a vote of 47 in favour, 5 against and 6 abstentions the Assembly adopted section (c) of the resolution, dealing with Eritrea.

(e) The Assembly then adopted section (d) of the main resolution (concerning administrative and budgetary arrangements) by a vote of 44 in favour, 5 against and 4 abstentions; and then adopted the whole resolution by a vote of 48 in favour, one against (Ethiopia) and 9 abstentions (the Soviet bloc, France, New Zealand, Sweden and Yugoslavia). In addition to abstaining on the resolution as a whole, France also abstained on the section dealing with Libya. (In the Political Committee France had supported all sections of the resolution as well as the resolution as a whole). Apparently the switch in the French vote in the plenary session was due to increased misgivings felt by the French Government in regard to Libya becoming self-governing by the beginning of 1952. The only other switch in vote in the plenary session (as against the vote in the Political Committee) was in regard to Pakistan's vote concerning Italian Somaliland. Pakistan voted for this section of the resolution in the plenary after abstaining in the Committee.

(f) After adoption of the main resolution the Assembly adopted the second resolution recommended by the Political Committee (to appoint a Committee of high officers of the Assembly for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the position of United Nations Commissioner in Libya). The vote on this resolution was 48 in favour, five against (the Soviet bloc) and three abstentions.

(g) The Assembly then adopted the third resolution recommended by the Political Committee in regard to the question of the Interim Committee studying the delimitation of boundaries in the former Italian Colonies (see my teletype No.

312).† The Assembly adopted the resolution submitted by the Political Committee, with the same text as given in teletype No. 312 by a vote of 32 in favour, 13 against and six abstentions.

2. Canada voted in favour of all three resolutions and in favour of the various portions of the main resolution. The Soviet bloc abstained on the section dealing with Libya and on the resolution as a whole, and voted against the sections dealing with Italian Somaliland and Eritrea. New Zealand abstained on the sections dealing with Libya and Italian Somaliland, and on the resolution as a whole. The United Kingdom and United States voted in favour of all sections of the resolution and, of course, on the resolution as a whole. On the main resolution Yugoslavia voted in the same manner as the Soviet bloc throughout. Sweden abstained on all three sections and on the resolution as a whole.

3. In addition to the resolutions submitted by the majority of the Political Committee, the Soviet delegation had also resubmitted to the plenary session the same draft resolution which had been defeated paragraph by paragraph in the Committee. After adoption in plenary session of the resolutions referred to above the United Kingdom delegate, McNeil, said that, under Rule 83, the Assembly should not proceed to vote on the Soviet proposal. This was immediately put to the vote by the President and the Assembly decided by a vote of 17 to 16 with 18 abstentions not to vote on the Soviet resolution. Canada voted with the United Kingdom against having a vote on the Soviet resolution. The United States voted in favour of having such a vote. This decision of the Assembly is interesting in that it is believed to be the first time that the Assembly has ever decided under Rule 83 not to take a vote on a minority resolution after a majority resolution on the same subject has been adopted in plenary session.

THE QUESTION OF RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION BEFORE THE UNITED NATIONS⁵⁴

Historical Background

The outbreak of religious persecution in Eastern Europe in recent months involving leaders of both Protestant and Roman Catholic churches has evoked violent protests, official and non-official, from all parts of the non-Communist world. The actions of the satellite Governments bear one interpretation only. It is that the aim of Communist policy in Eastern Europe is the complete subordination of all church organizations to its will and the suppression of individual liberty, wherever its existence means the existence of opposition to the Communist faith. This is in keeping with the trend of Communist policy throughout the satellite area.

2. Canada, Australia and New Zealand were formally associated with the United Kingdom notes of April 2, 1949, to Hungary and Roumania. These notes listed typical violations by the three governments of the human rights articles of the Peace Treaties, including violations of the clauses guaranteeing freedom of religion, and called upon the governments to adopt prompt remedial measures in respect of these violations. Canada was associated with similar United States notes to Hungary and Roumania and was informally associated with both the United States and United Kingdom notes to Bulgaria.

3. This question first came before the United Nations at the second part of the third regular session of the General Assembly at the request of both the Australian and Bolivian delegations. The General Assembly decided to include in its agenda a combined item as follows:

“Having regard to the provisions of the Charter and of the Peace Treaties, the question of the observance in Bulgaria and Hungary of human rights and fundamental freedoms, including questions of religious and civil liberties, with special references to recent trials of Church leaders.”

This item was included in the agenda despite the opposition of the U.S.S.R. and the satellite countries. Hungary and Bulgaria, in telegrams to the Secretary-General, and the delegates to the General Assembly from the Eastern European member states stated that the only correct procedure for settling disputes relating to the application of the Peace Treaties was provided by the Peace Treaties themselves and that those who accused Hungary and Bulgaria of violations of the Treaties should have resorted to the procedure set forth in the Treaties. According to the summary record of the General Committee on April 7, 1949, Mr. Katz-Suchy, the delegate of Poland asserted that: "If certain Governments thought that Hungary had violated its obligations under the terms of the Peace Treaty, where Human rights and fundamental freedoms were concerned, the only way to settle that dispute would be in the terms of Article 39, paragraph 1, of the Treaty of Peace, to refer it to the Heads of the Diplomatic Missions in Budapest who, acting in concert, will represent the Allied and Associated Powers in dealing with the Hungarian Government in all matters concerning the execution and interpretation of the present Treaty". (A/BUR/SR. 58, April 7, 1949, p. 9) It would be reasonable to infer from this that in the opinion of the Polish delegate a dispute now exists.

4. After some discussion the General Assembly on April 30, adopted a resolution on the matter. In the operative part of the resolution the General Assembly:

(1) Expressed its deep concern at the grave accusations made against Hungary and Bulgaria;

(2) Noted with satisfaction the steps taken by the several states, signatories of the Peace Treaties, regarding the accusations and expressed the hope that measures would be diligently applied in accordance with the treaties to insure respect for human rights;

(3) Urgently drew the attention of Hungary and Bulgaria to their obligations under the Peace Treaties, including the obligation to co-operate in the settlement of all these questions;

(4) Decided to retain the question on the agenda for its fourth session.

5. Each of the Peace Treaties with Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria provides that any dispute concerning the interpretation or execution of the Treaty which is not settled by direct diplomatic negotiation shall be referred to the Heads of Mission of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States in the respective countries. If the dispute is not resolved by them within a period of two months it is then to be referred, at the request of either party to the dispute, to a commission composed of one representative of each party and a third member selected by mutual agreement of the two parties from nationals of a third country. If the two parties fail to agree within a period of one month upon the appointment of a third member, the Secretary-General of the United Nations may be requested by either party to make the appointment.

6. Five of the powers signatory to the Treaty with Hungary and Roumania (United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, United States) and four of the powers signatory to the treaty with Bulgaria (United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, United States, Canada not being a signatory), by notes of May 31 initiated steps under the above-mentioned articles of the Peace Treaties. The three Governments were informed that a dispute had arisen over the execution of the human rights provisions of the Peace Treaty and that these disputes were being referred to the United Kingdom, United States and Soviet Heads of Mission in each of the capitals.

7. The guarantees of the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms are contained in Article 2 of the Treaty with Hungary, Article 3 of the Treaty with Roumania and Article 2 of the Treaty with Bulgaria. By these articles the three countries undertake to secure to all persons the enjoyment of human rights and the fundamental freedoms, including "freedom of expression, of press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and of public meeting". There is an additional subsection in the Hungarian and Roumanian Treaties under which these countries undertake that their laws shall not discriminate between persons of Hungarian (Roumanian) nationality on the grounds of their race, sex, language or religion.

8. The notes to the Heads of Mission recited the history of the dispute and asked that each dispute be considered by the United Kingdom, United States and the U.S.S.R. Heads of Mission in each capital. The United States simultaneously took parallel action with regard to the three countries.

9. The Soviet Government, in notes replying to the United Kingdom and United States, asserted that the three ex-enemy countries had fulfilled their obligations under the Treaties. The U.S.S.R. stated that the charges of violations of human rights and the steps taken under the Peace Treaties were an unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of these countries. The U.S.S.R. saw no cause for summoning a conference of the Three Heads of Missions. This was refuted by both the United Kingdom and the United States, in notes of June 30 to the U.S.S.R. The two Governments pointed out that the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to co-operate in putting the Peace Treaty procedure into practice was in marked contradiction to the regard for the Peace Treaties frequently expressed by the Soviet Government. Further notes from the U.S.S.R. and from Bulgaria made it clear, however, that neither the U.S.S.R. nor any of the three countries would co-operate in a settlement of the dispute. All asserted that no dispute existed.

10. As the three Heads of Mission had not met to discuss the disputes during the two months' period provided for by the Peace Treaties, the United Kingdom and United States on August 1 sent further notes to each of the three Governments asking each that it join in appointing a commission to which the dispute would be referred. Canada, Australia, and New Zealand were associated with the United Kingdom notes to Hungary and Roumania.

Current Developments

11. The three Governments refuse to co-operate in the appointment of a Commission. Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria have rejected the United Kingdom note of August 1 as an interference in their internal affairs and have denied that a dispute has arisen concerning the interpretation of the Treaty. Although the Western Governments have not appointed commissioners, they will, of course, be ready to do so if and when the three countries agree to discuss the creation of commissions.

12. The question of violations of human rights in Hungary and Bulgaria remains on the agenda of the Assembly. The Government of Australia has requested that the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Roumania also be considered at the fourth regular session of the General Assembly.

Previous Canadian Attitude

13. In recent months, the Government of Canada has on a number of occasions expressed grave concern about the violations of human rights in Eastern Europe. On February 2, 1949, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made public the text of a note to which there was no reply to the Hungarian Government in which the Canadian Government protested against "a policy which...appears designed to destroy religious freedom in Hungary". On February 22, 1949, the Prime Minister, in a statement to the House of Commons, condemned the systematic campaign of religious persecution in Eastern Europe.

14. Canada was also associated with both the United Kingdom and United States notes of April 2. When the observance of fundamental freedoms in Hungary and Bulgaria was discussed at the second part of the third session of the General Assembly, Canada, along with the majority, supported its inclusion on the agenda of the second part of the third session of the General Assembly and on April 20, the Canadian representative in the Ad Hoc Political Committee stated that recent events in Hungary and Bulgaria indicated a deliberate policy of religious persecution. Canada supported the resolution adopted by the Assembly on April 30.

Policy Recommendation

15. As Canada is a signatory of the Peace Treaty with Roumania and has been associated with the notes of protest to Roumania, the Canadian delegation should support the Australian proposal to include Roumania in the General Assembly's consideration during its fourth session of violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Eastern Europe. It is probable that the delegates from Eastern Europe will oppose the inclusion of this item in the Assembly's agenda.

16. It will be necessary to report to the Assembly that the three satellite countries and the U.S.S.R. have not co-operated with the Allied Governments in their attempt to use the machinery provided under the Peace Treaty for the settlement of disputes. The U.S.S.R. and the satellite countries deny that any dispute concerning the interpretation of the Treaty exists. Their attitude is in direct contradiction to that part of the General Assembly resolution of April 30 which drew the attention of the Governments of Bulgaria and Hungary to their obligations under the Peace Treaties, including the obligation to co-operate in the settlement of all disputes concerning the interpretation of the Treaty. It can be pointed out that, during the discussion at the second part of the third session of the General Assembly, the Eastern European delegates stated that the Peace Treaty provided the only correct and legal procedure for the settlement of disputes and that the Polish delegate indicated that a dispute does exist. It would seem wise at this session of the Assembly to concentrate on the procedural aspect of the question, that is on the failure of the three satellite states to agree to commissions. The Canadian delegation could therefore support a General Assembly resolution requesting the International Court for an opinion on the following questions:

- (1) Whether or not a dispute exists;

(2) Whether or not the U.S.S.R., by stating that there was no cause for summoning a conference of Heads of Missions, and Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria by refusing to nominate commissioners, have failed to carry out the provisions of the Peace Treaties relating to the settlement of disputes (Article 38 of the Treaty with Roumania, 40 of the Treaty with Hungary and 36 of the Treaty with Bulgaria);

(3) And whether the Secretary-General can appoint a member of the Commission even though the satellite countries have failed to do so, such a commission of two being regarded as competent to render a definitive decision on the dispute.

17. (The Legal Division of the Department of External Affairs is of the opinion that the Court would probably hold that a two-man commission would not be competent. Such a decision by the Court would mean that remedies available in the Peace Treaties had been exhausted.)

18. Although Canada, because it is not a signatory of the Bulgarian Treaty, has not been able to associate itself with action taken in recent months against the Bulgarian Government, there is no reason why the Canadian delegation should not take part in the General Assembly consideration of whether or not Bulgaria is acting in accordance with the terms of the Treaty.

19. There may be pressure in the Assembly for a resolution condemning religious persecution in Czechoslovakia and perhaps Poland. These states, unlike Bulgaria, Roumania and Hungary, are not bound by human rights provisions in peace treaties. They are bound merely by the Charter provisions on human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Charter, however, also contains the domestic jurisdiction clause and it can therefore be agreed that the Assembly is not competent to pass a resolution condemning religious persecution in Poland and Czechoslovakia. Care should therefore be taken to avoid irresponsible or impracticable action which would do no more than create dangerous precedents for undue interference by the United Nations in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of states.

New York, October 14, 1949

Observance of human rights in Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania.

1. The ad hoc Political Committee began the consideration of this item on October 4th. The United States delegation, at the first meeting of the Committee, introduced a draft resolution under which the Assembly was asked to affirm its continuing interest and deep concern in the question of the observance of human rights in these countries. The Assembly was also asked to submit to the International Court of Justice the following legal questions on the applicability and functioning of the machinery provided for the Peace Treaties with these countries:

(a) Whether or not a dispute exists under the Peace Treaties;

(b) Whether Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania are obligated to appoint representatives to the Commissions provided for under the Treaties;

(c) In the event that they fail to do so, whether the Secretary-General could appoint a member of the Commissions, and

(d) Whether the resulting two-man Commission would be competent to deal with the dispute.

2. At the suggestion of the United States delegation, the Canadian delegation agreed to act as co-sponsor of this resolution. We decided to do so in view of the active part taken by Canada in denouncing the violation of human rights and religious persecution that has taken place in these countries. Moreover, the resolution had the merit of convicting these countries of having violated their Treaty obligations in refusing to co-operate in using the settlement machinery provided for in the Treaties themselves. This course of action does not preclude the Assembly from taking, at a later stage, any further steps which might be considered advisable. Bolivia also agreed to be a co-sponsor of the resolution.

3. Mr. Paul Martin made a brief statement on the resolution on October 4th. He reviewed the steps already taken by Canada through diplomatic channels to stress its abhorrence of the policy of repression and persecution followed by these countries. He emphasized the fact that a fundamental disagreement now exists regarding the interpretation of the Treaties and urged that this matter be now referred to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion.

4. Two amendments only to this resolution were submitted to this Committee:

1) An Australian amendment which would set up an ad hoc Committee to be convened immediately by the Secretary-General, should either of the two first questions submitted to the Court (see first paragraph above) be answered in the negative or if answered in the affirmative, if the three countries have not appointed national representatives to the respective Treaty Commissions, thirty days after the Court had given its opinion.

Mr. Martin made a short statement on October 13th on the Australian amendment in which he explained that the Canadian delegation would abstain from voting. First of all, the Canadian delegation was anxious not to confuse the issue by introducing at a premature stage, an alternative procedure calling for action by the Assembly. He also stressed the importance, before resorting to any other procedure, of exhausting all the legal recourses provided for in the Treaties themselves.

2) Brazil, the Lebanon and the Netherlands introduced the other amendment adding to the preamble of the resolution a reference to Article 55 of the Charter and expressing an increased concern at the accusation made against the three aforementioned countries. The amendment emphasized that this concern was justified by the refusal of these countries to cooperate in the Assembly's efforts to have the charges made against Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania examined.

We took the view that there was no objection to including reference to Article 55 of the Charter in this resolution. Accusations of violation of Treaty obligations and human rights were involved and therefore the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter could be given a restrictive interpretation.

5. The vote taken this morning is as follows:

- 1) Joint resolution sponsored by the United States, Canada and Bolivia: for, 41; against, 5; abstentions, 9.
- 2) The Australian amendment was rejected by 29 votes against, 5 in favour and 22 abstentions.
- 3) Lebanon, Brazil and Netherlands amendment: for, 20; against, 7; abstentions 25.⁵⁵

SOUTH AFRICA AND THE UNITED NATIONS: CANADIAN POLICY

1. In your memorandum of February 3 you suggested that a thorough study should be prepared on what Canadian national interests are served by Canada giving even passive support to South Africa at the United Nations in the debates and votes on South West Africa and the Treatment of Indians in South Africa. You suggested further a re-examination of the Canadian position in the light of the primary objective of present Canadian policy—"the creation of an overwhelming preponderance of military, economic and moral force over the Soviet Union."

1(a) South Africa is, admittedly, a handicap to the western world in the struggle of moral supremacy over Communism. It might be a political liability if the native peoples of Central and South Africa were politically conscious, but, fortunately perhaps, they are probably less politically conscious than they were when tribal organization was still intact. The dispute between India and South Africa is also a source of embarrassment to Commonwealth countries and may serve to weaken the link between India and the West, but the Governments of South Africa and India are at least on some common ground in their opposition to Communism.

1(b) Should the "cold war" turn to a "shooting war", it would be imperative to have South Africa as an ally since there are no alternative areas for bases on the Cape route, which would likely become of first importance in any war involving ⁵⁵ La résolution, parrainée conjointement par les États-Unis, le Canada et la Bolivie, fut adoptée par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies, le 22 octobre 1949.

The resolution, co-sponsored by the United States, Canada and Bolivia, was adopted by the U.N. General Assembly on October 22, 1949.

the Mediterranean theatre. It seems very uncertain whether the Mediterranean route could be kept open in the event of a general conflict; in which case the facilities of the South African ports would be vital. A neutral South Africa in such an event would be even more of a handicap than a neutral Ireland. It would thus seem imperative to retain South Africa as an active member of the western world.

1(c) There would appear to be no possibility at the present time of inducing South Africa by external pressure to adopt more liberal policies with respect to the native or Indian peoples, and there would appear to be little doubt that the reluctance of the Smuts Government to adopt more repressive measures against Indians and natives was a major factor in its defeat last spring. In the present temper of South Africa no Government with liberal views on native or Indian questions could hope to survive. Under the conditions external pressure might well drive South Africa into a policy of isolationism, which might involve any or all of: withdrawal from the United Nations, withdrawal from the Commonwealth, and a declared policy of neutrality in any future war.

1(d) It is felt that under these circumstances there should be no major change in Canadian policy in the United Nations Assembly with respect to either the status of Indians or the future of South West Africa.

2. A summary of the course of these issues since the First Assembly, including an account of Canadian policy, follows:

3. The two issues have both been on the Agenda for the first three Sessions of the General Assembly. The question whether South West Africa should be placed under the trusteeship system has been dealt with on three occasions with South Africa being urged or requested each time to submit a draft trusteeship agreement. The question of the treatment of the Indians was dealt with at the first two Sessions and is on the Agenda for the adjourned Third Session which re-opens in New York on April 5. Both issues are hardy perennials for which no solution is in sight, and India may be expected to continue to drag South Africa before the international forum on them.

Treatment of Indians in South Africa

4. On this question at the first two Sessions, we took a cautious attitude and supported the proposal of South Africa, which was not adopted, to have the preliminary question of jurisdiction submitted to the International Court for an advisory opinion. At the Second Session the Canadian Delegate stated that Canada's principal concern was to see a friendly settlement of the dispute between the two parties. He said that the Assembly Resolution should not contain a judgment against either party since the facts and the law in dispute had not been established by an impartial tribunal. As a result, Canada could not support the Indian Resolution which contained such a judgment against South Africa. It did, however, support another Resolution which expressed the wish that "the parties should continue their efforts with a view to reaching an agreement directly settling their dispute, and that, should they fail to reach such an agreement, they should submit the dispute to the International Court". At the Second Session no Resolution obtained a two-thirds majority and, therefore, no action was taken.

5. As the Canadian representatives have consistently stated, when this question has been under consideration, it involves an important legal point, namely whether it can be legitimately contended that the treatment of Indians is a matter which comes "essentially within the domestic jurisdiction" of South Africa. Somewhere between eighty-five and ninety per cent of the Indians in South Africa were born there and, therefore, are South African nationals. Only the small balance could be regarded as Indian nationals and therefore a ground for Indian intervention through an international body to protect the rights of her citizens. As opposed to this argument, however, it must be recognized as stated in Article 1 of the Charter that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to promote and encourage respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms. More recently the Assembly has adopted a Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Furthermore, Article 10 of the Charter states that the General Assembly can discuss any question within the scope of the Charter and Article 14 provides that "the General Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations, including situations resulting from a violation of the provisions of the present Charter, setting forth the Purposes and the Principles of the United Nations." Until this legal question of the nature and extent of domestic jurisdiction, in relation to other provisions of the Charter, is determined, I think we should hesitate before joining in any forthright condemnation of South Africa. It would be difficult to improve on the statement of Mr. St. Laurent made on November 25, 1946 advocating that the mixed questions of fact and law involved in India's complaints against South Africa should be submitted to the International Court.

6. Apart from this legal question, it is very difficult to see any genuine solution to the Indian problem in South Africa. All governments in South Africa have pursued a policy of white supremacy. The facts of racial discrimination and the existence of the colour bar in its many forms cannot be denied. Some governments have been more prepared than others to make concessions to non-European elements but no South African Government is prepared to go the whole length of advocating and practising complete racial equality, which presumably would be the only complete solution of the problem. The most disturbing thing is that the Malan Government is so clearly moving in what can only be regarded as the wrong direction, namely the intensification of segregation and discrimination of many kinds. To advocate racial equality in South Africa at the present time is, of course, to invite political suicide. The social and economic consequence would, of course, be very great of any sudden change to equality among all population groups.

7. The Malan Government advocates "repatriation" as the final solution of the Indian question. This appears to us to be a fantastically unrealistic policy. India clearly would not be prepared to take back the Indians. They now number some 285,000 and have a very high birth rate. Anything in the nature of voluntary repatriation, or at least expatriation from South Africa is out of the question. The Indian community in South Africa has made such social and economic advances that it quite clearly has no desire to go elsewhere.

8. Up to the present time the Indian problem in South Africa has at the United Nations been considered only in terms of the discrimination and restrictions practised against it by the white population of South Africa. The race riots in Durban last January between the Indians and African natives has, however, reminded us that there is some clash of interests between these two groups. There seems to be little doubt that the Africans are exploited by Indian traders and landlords. It might be well to give consideration to the long-term interests of the Africans themselves in this question. It is, I think, arguable that the African natives would be even worse off than they are now if the Indians were the dominant element in South Africa. The African grievances against the Indians are evident at many points on the east coast of Africa, notably in Kenya.

9. The existence of this dispute between two members of the Commonwealth is, of course, a source of embarrassment and difficulty to all Commonwealth countries. It is to be hoped that we will not be called upon to make a choice between keeping one or other of them in the Commonwealth, on the basis of the party which we support in this dispute. The governments of both countries at present are uncertain as to the value of continuing the Commonwealth connection. It seems clear that the South African Government, if it had a sufficient majority would move for the creation of a separate republic, probably on authoritarian lines. The Government of India, while it apparently wants to retain some loose form of association with the Commonwealth, is also endeavouring to pursue a policy of neutrality between the Western Group and the Soviet Bloc. In any event, we may well find that before very long both countries have removed themselves from the Commonwealth group, quite regardless of the policy we support in the present dispute.

10. It is not thought that there should be any fundamental alteration in the attitude we have so far taken on this question. At the request of the United Nations Division we have made some revisions in the Commentary prepared last September. It is suggested that some paragraphs, along the lines of the attached, should be added bringing the story up to date, but it is not proposed to suggest any changes in the final paragraphs in which consideration is given to the Canadian attitude at the forthcoming meetings of the General Assembly.

11. I think we should continue to advocate that the question of jurisdiction should be submitted to the International Court. At the same time we should, I think, avoid in any way any suggestion that we condone or approve the racial policies of the South African Government, particularly of the Malan Government which is so clearly moving in the wrong direction in terms of present world trends in human relations. Possibly the concluding paragraphs of the Commentary should be strengthened by pointing out that, in view of our adherence to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, etc., our representatives should in no way appear to be justifying or excusing the discriminatory practices of the Europeans in South Africa.

12. It is not thought that Canadian intervention in this question could be helpful. It would seem both useless and harmful to approach the present Government of South Africa with a view to having it modify its policy towards the Indians. Both our High Commissioner in South Africa and our Permanent Delegate in New York have recently stated that they do not think that any approach on our part would serve a useful purpose. General McNaughton has observed that such an approach might be favourably considered only if both governments were to invite other Commonwealth Governments to intervene, a situation which seems most unlikely to arise. Possibly there is some hope that in due course the two countries will negotiate directly with a view to reaching some workable understanding. It is hard to conceive, however, that this would be any fundamental solution of the problem. In fact, in some ways the problem becomes more intractable as the Indian community in South Africa advances further educationally and economically.

South West Africa and the Trusteeship System

13. At three Sessions of the General Assembly resolutions have been adopted requesting and urging South Africa to place the territory of South West Africa under the trusteeship system provided for in the Charter. Canada associated itself with the first invitation extended to the Union Government in 1946 but it voted against the second invitation in 1947 because it seemed to imply that South Africa had refused to fulfil a definite obligation and because the imposition of a time limit for submitting a draft trusteeship agreement would do nothing to help change public opinion in South Africa. At the Third Session of the Assembly the Canadian Delegation abstained from voting as it did not appear logical to support a Resolution maintaining the recommendation of the previous year which the Canadian Delegation had voted against at that time.

14. Canada has taken the position that the provisions of the Charter did not in its opinion necessarily imply a legal obligation for South Africa to submit a draft trusteeship agreement for South West Africa. At the same time we have expressed the hope that such a trusteeship agreement would be proposed as it was clearly contemplated that territories formerly administered under the League Mandate system should be brought under the trusteeship system. At the Second Session the Canadian Delegate expressed regret that the South African Government had not seen fit yet to accept the invitation of the United Nations, and expressed the hope that South Africa might reverse its previous decision. Our representatives took no part in the debate at the Third Session.

15. It would appear that South Africa has a strong legal argument in her refusal to put South West Africa under the trusteeship system. She holds South West Africa as a C-class Mandate under the League Covenant which gives her the right to administer it "as an integral part" of the Union. While there may be some argument where the sovereignty over South West Africa devolved with the demise of the League, it still seems that South Africa is under no obligation under the terms of the Charter to place South West Africa under trusteeship. I think we might well continue to support any move to have this matter referred to the International Court for an advisory opinion.

16. At the same time I think it is quite evident that South Africa has a moral obligation to make use of the trusteeship system. It seems to have been the intention when the Charter was drawn up to have all mandated territories brought under the new trusteeship system. Furthermore the General Assembly on three occasions has made a definite request to South Africa, with which it has refused to comply.

17. On South Africa's side it must be admitted that there is the special factor that South West Africa is contiguous territory to South Africa itself, and that South Africa has vital strategic interests in retaining control of it.

18. The present South African Government is taking a defiant attitude, calculated to destroy whatever sympathy exists for its case elsewhere. Legislation has been passed quite recently providing for the representation of South West Africa by six members in the House of Assembly and four Senators. The South African authorities claim that this is a case of "integration" and not "incorporation", though it is difficult to see the distinction. The white population of South West Africa will be grossly over-represented in the Union Parliament under this scheme. There is reason to believe that the change is being made to increase the strength of the Nationalist Party. At the same time South West Africa is being left in a privileged position in regard to taxation and will not be financially integrated with the Union.

19. The Smuts Government agreed on a voluntary basis to submit annual reports on the administration of South West Africa for examination by the Trusteeship Council. Recently, however, the Malan Government has declared that it will not submit further reports. This is another instance of open defiance of the wishes of the General Assembly. When announcing the decision [to] send no more reports, Mr. Louw said that it remained the duty of South Africa to administer the territory in the spirit of the original mandate and according to the principle of trusteeship.

20. While I think we should continue to support South Africa's legal case, I do not think we need give her comfort or support in any other way. It would have been desirable to have brought South West Africa under the trusteeship scheme and we should continue to express this opinion. At the same time it must be realized that South Africa has successfully defied the wished of the General Assembly and presumably will continue to do so.

SOUTH AFRICA AND THE UNITED NATIONS: CANADIAN POLICY

I think it would be useful if you could have a meeting early next week with the U.N. Division, the Defence Liaison Division and Mr. Menzies to discuss the problems raised in your memorandum of March 23. With all respect, it does not seem to me that your memorandum gives an impartial appraisal of the factors involved. Thus, in paragraph 1(a) reference is made to the fact that the lack of political consciousness of the native peoples of Central and South Africa means that the South African treatment of the natives is not a political liability to the Western world. This, it seems to me, is scarcely relevant. The important thing is surely that the behavior of the whites in South Africa to the coloured people in South Africa increases the danger that the white world will not have the full support of the coloured peoples in Asia against the Soviet Union. This is a political liability which must be weighed.

2. Similarly, in paragraph 1(b) the statement is made that, in the event of war with Russia, it would be imperative to have South Africa as an ally. Surely this is an over-simplification of the problem. I assume that in the event of war it will be extremely important to have Pakistan as an ally since Pakistan can be used as one of the forward bases for bombing attacks against the Soviet Union. In the event of war, it would also be important to have the coloured world at least neutral. Consequently the problem is surely one of weighing realistically the relative importance to the Western world of the couple of million whites in South Africa and the half-billion coloured people in South East Asia.

3. At the top of page 3 of the attached memorandum it is suggested that we adhere to our line of November, 1946, that the mixed questions of fact and law involved in India's complaint against South Africa should be submitted to the International Court. It seems to me that this would be a difficult line for us to maintain now when we have refused to support reference to the Court of the Arab contention that the Palestine problem came under the domestic jurisdiction clause, and the Dutch contention that the Indonesian problem came under the domestic jurisdiction clause.

4. General McNaughton and Mr. Holmes have both pointed out recently the extreme importance of the North Atlantic countries not giving the coloured world the impression that the North Atlantic Treaty was a ganging up of the white world against the coloured world. This, it seems to me, increases the importance of the North Atlantic countries at the Assembly in April leaning over backwards not to offend the coloured world.

Note de la direction des Nations Unies
Memorandum by United Nations Division

[Ottawa], March 28, 1949

TREATMENT OF INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POLICY

The memoranda by the Commonwealth Division and by Mr. Reid on the above-named subject raise certain points concerning Canadian policy in the United Nations on which this Division may have to take a stand.

a) Mr. Reid says that it would be difficult for Canada to maintain its support for a reference of this question to the International Court of Justice in view of our refusal to support a reference to the Court of the Arab contention that the Palestine problem came under the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter. He mentions also that we did not support the Dutch contention that the Indonesian problem came under this same clause. It could be argued, however, that in the case of Palestine we did not feel that there was a situation involving mixed fact and law which would have to be examined by the International Court. Events were moving very swiftly in Palestine and it was necessary for both the Assembly and the Security Council to take some action immediately. Palestine had, of course, been under mandate and was logically a subject for international action through the United Nations.

This does not apply, however, to the position of Indians in South Africa. We have already committed ourselves very definitely to the statement that this latter question should be examined in order to determine whether the domestic jurisdiction clause applies. With respect to the Indonesian question, it should be noted that we did not refuse to support any reference of the question to the International Court since the matter has never come formally to vote. The fact that Indonesia was a colony and that fighting was going on would also support United Nations action without prior reference to the International Court. In the case of South Africa, however, there is a stronger case for the applicability of a domestic jurisdiction clause and the United Nations cannot argue that the pressure of events in South Africa forces it to take immediate action.

b) It is true that the conduct of the South African Government in this matter is a liability to the white races in general in their dealings with Asiatic peoples. It should not be impossible, however, to make it clear to the Asiatic nations, and particularly to India and Pakistan, that the Atlantic Pact Powers have no sympathy with the racial theories of the Malan Government. This need not be done, however, by means of a resolution from the General Assembly which finally and formally condemned South Africa without achieving any amelioration whatsoever in the position of the Indians in South Africa.

c) If the domestic jurisdiction clause is not to be examined by the International Court in connection with this dispute, then one might legitimately ask when there is ever to be a line drawn between the powers of the United Nations and those of the member nations. Almost any internal dispute of any magnitude in the world today can have some international repercussions. It should be made clear at some point how far the United Nations is to go in telling individual nations how well they live up to the standards of the Charter.

[Ottawa], May 10, 1949

TREATMENT OF INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA

This question, which has come before the General Assembly at three sessions, is now being considered by the First (Political) Committee at Lake Success. It has two principal aspects: namely, the question whether the Assembly is competent to deal with it and, if a majority hold that the Assembly is competent, the action it should take.

The Question of Competence

2. It has been consistently the South African position that this question, which involves residential and franchise restrictions, constitutes a subject beyond the competence of the General Assembly since the United Nations cannot "intervene" in a matter which is "essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state", as provided for in paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter.

3. The South African representative is expected to go further and to deny that the Assembly has the right to entertain the complaint of India in any way or even to discuss it. He denies that Article 10 of the Charter, which states that the Assembly "may discuss any questions or matters within the scope of the present Charter" and "may make recommendations...on such questions or matters", or Article 14, providing that the Assembly "may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin...", apply in this case.

4. The South African Delegation is expected to contend that the question of competence must be dealt with before and to the exclusion of any consideration of the dispute.

Canadian Attitude

5. Our attitude at the 1946 and 1947 sessions of the Assembly was that there was uncertainty whether this issue did or did not come within the domestic jurisdiction clause. We took the position that it was in a twilight zone; that it involved mixed questions of law and fact; and that it should be referred to the International Court for an opinion. The Legal Adviser has now expressed the view that the Indian position has been weakened juridically by the dropping of any reference to the Cape Town agreements and by referring to South African nationals of Indian racial origin. The right of the Assembly to "intervene" (though not to discuss) is therefore very doubtful.

6. The position our Delegation might take on any resolutions on the question of competence would depend on the wording of such resolutions, but it is thought that:

(a) If the South African Delegation proposes a simple resolution to withdraw the item from the Agenda on the ground of the incompetence of the Assembly to intervene in the question, we should abstain from voting because of the doubt entertained on the issue of jurisdiction.

(b) If the South Africans attempt to force a vote on a resolution which questions the right of the Assembly even to discuss the matter, we should vote against such a resolution and thus assert the right of the Assembly to discuss any question under Article 10.

(c) If the South African Delegation puts forward a resolution expressing the view that the question of competence must be dealt with first and to the exclusion of any consideration of the substance of the dispute, we should vote against it as this would be denying the right of the Assembly to discuss any matter.

(d) If some other Delegation proposes a resolution to have the jurisdictional issue referred to the International Court for an advisory opinion, we should, in accordance with our previous attitude, vote for such a resolution.

7. Instructions to the Delegation should perhaps indicate that in any action it may take on resolutions dealing with competence, it should take every opportunity to point out that it has voted on constitutional grounds and that it has not taken a position on the treatment of the Indian community in South Africa. Non-European countries and especially the Asian Commonwealth countries should not be given the impression that we are automatically supporting the South African Government in its policy towards the non-European elements in its population.

Substance of the Dispute

8. After dealing with the question of jurisdiction, the Committee is expected to consider alternative resolutions concerned with the substance of the complaint. Should a majority of members decide that the Assembly is competent to deal with the issue, we might take the stand that we will abide by the majority decision and then proceed to vote on resolutions which will be brought forward on the substance of the dispute itself. This would clearly be an unsatisfactory and illogical position in view of our attitude on the competence of the Assembly. Nevertheless this was the position we took at the 1947 session when we voted in favour of a compromise resolution, which was defeated, calling upon the parties to the dispute to continue their efforts to reach an agreement through conference, mediation or conciliation.⁹ Some resolutions on the merits of the issue will undoubtedly imply that the Assembly has full jurisdiction. This might mean a circumvention of the domestic jurisdiction clause, which might have serious implications for many members of the United Nations over a period of years, including perhaps Canada. At the same time, since the question of competence will have been evaded, South Africa will continue to have some justification in refusing to carry out any resolution with which it does not agree: it could simply maintain its attitude of refusing to accept any orders or recommendations on the ground that the Assembly has exceeded its powers.

10. The United Kingdom and United States Governments have both indicated to us that they would like to see a moderate resolution brought forward inviting or urging both parties to undertake direct negotiations, or to follow other methods of conciliation or mediation, with a view to reaching a satisfactory settlement or adjustment. Neither country, however, is prepared to take any public initiative along these lines. Presumably, our own attitude is that we would not wish to take the initiative in sponsoring such a resolution, although it is suggested that we should strongly support any such resolution since it is the only kind of resolution which seems to avoid the jurisdictional problem. Moreover, in practice, it is perhaps the only type of resolution that is likely to be at all productive of good results and to make some contribution to a settlement.

11. The text of such a conciliatory resolution would have to be carefully studied. If it were in the nature of a request, the jurisdictional issue would probably be avoided; but if it were in the nature of a demand, or if it were to censure South Africa expressly or impliedly, we could not logically support it. As mentioned above, at the 1947 session, we supported some compromise resolutions including one which expressed "the wish that the parties should continue their efforts with a view to reaching an agreement directly settling their dispute, and that, should they fail to reach such an agreement, they should submit the dispute to the International Court of Justice."

12. The Indian Delegation is proposing a resolution which would provide for the establishment of a Commission of Enquiry to be composed of two Indians and two South Africans who would choose a neutral fifth member. This Commission would go to South Africa, look into the discriminatory legislation, arrive at agreed recommendations to ameliorate the situation and report to the Assembly. We have not yet seen the text of this proposed resolution and the attitude we should take on it might well depend on its exact wording. It seems, however, that it will be a somewhat more moderate resolution than those proposed by the Indian Delegation at the two previous sessions, and it might, as a consequence, be difficult to refuse to vote in favour of it. The adoption of such a resolution, which might well receive the necessary two-thirds majority, would, however, appear to constitute "intervention" in the domestic affairs of a member country. It may be assumed that South Africa would be opposed to such a resolution. It would, therefore, refuse to nominate its members or to receive the Commission. It would continue to defy the United Nations with the not unreasonable claim that the Assembly had exceeded its authority. On the other hand, to vote against such a resolution might well appear to be condoning the racial policies of the South African Government. It would thus seem best to abstain on this resolution, although even this position might well be misunderstood by Eastern countries, including the three Asian Commonwealth countries.

13. When speaking in the Committee on this resolution, or when discussing it with the Indian Delegation, our Delegation might point out that our position is not as different from that of the Indian Delegation as might appear to be the case. As Mr. St. Laurent pointed out in his speech on the subject on November 25, 1946, if the question of jurisdiction were referred to the International Court, a proposal which we favour, the Court could under Article 50 of its Statute appoint a commission to carry out an enquiry. Such a commission could be sent to South Africa to ascertain the facts. While the Court need not select such a commission, it would, if established, perform much the same functions as the Commission of Enquiry proposed in the Indian resolution.

14. The only position it seems possible for us to take is to abstain on a resolution which would order South Africa to take a line of action against its will. We could only vote in favour of a substantive resolution which simply invited or requested the parties to get together.

Attached is a copy of the telegram of instructions† sent to the Delegation last night. I spoke to you of this this morning and you concurred.

Louw is now said to be less intransigent and it is even suggested that (with some modification of the Australian-Swedish resolution) he might be prepared to accept direct negotiations. I agreed that McNaughton should do what he can behind the scenes to encourage South Africa & India to get together but his instructions stand.

Re Treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa.

1. You will by now have seen text of my statement of 11th May in the First Committee. The discussion on this item concluded on the afternoon of 11th May, and, by successive roll call votes, the Committee made the following decisions:

(a) It rejected the South African resolution (my teletype No. 613)† by a roll call vote of 5 in favour, 33 against and 12 abstentions. I abstained.

(b) It adopted the Indian resolution contained in my teletype No. 614† by a roll call vote of 21 in favour, 17 against and 12 abstentions (including Canada).

(c) It adopted an amended French-Mexican proposal (the text of which is contained in my immediately following teletype en clair)† by a vote of 39 in favour (including Canada), 2 against and 11 abstentions. Following adoption of this proposal the joint Australian-Danish-Swedish draft resolution was withdrawn.

2. You will see from the text of the amended French-Mexican resolution that it now contains no reference to the resolution of 8th December, 1946. In its present form it seems to me that this resolution fully meets the point of view expressed in paragraph 3 of your teletype No. 457.⁵⁶ You will note that it contains the essential feature of the joint Australian-Danish-Swedish resolution, regarding direct negotiations between the parties, but that it uses the words "invites" instead of "calls upon" and that it does not contain any reference to the appointment of a Mediator or the participation of the President of the General Assembly. For this reason I spoke in favour of the joint French-Mexican resolution as amended and voted in favour of it.

3. The French and Mexican representatives had agreed to a Byelo-Russian proposal that the reference to the Declaration of Human Rights be deleted from their draft resolution. The representative of Haiti, however, insisted that these words be voted upon and introduced a separate amendment calling for the re-introduction of this phrase. The Haitian amendment was adopted by a vote of 20 in favour, 18 against and 12 abstentions. I voted against the re-introduction of this phrase because I did not believe that it added anything of value to the resolution; also it certainly made the resolution less acceptable to South Africa.

4. After the joint French-Mexican draft resolution had been amended (and prior to its being voted upon), the representative of Australia withdrew his proposal when it became apparent in the Committee that it would not secure the support of a majority of the members. The Danish and Swedish representatives also agreed to this withdrawal.

5. You will note that while the Political Committee thus adopted two draft resolutions on this subject, it seems quite apparent that only one of these (the joint French-Mexican resolution) will obtain the necessary two-thirds majority in the General Assembly. After adoption of the Indian draft resolution the representative of Iran pointed out that it had only secured a bare majority and called for a vote on the French-Mexican proposal. The Chairman agreed to this procedure under Rule 120 and his ruling was not challenged in the Committee. Ends.

Following for Ignatieff from Reid. Begins. Treatment of Indians in South Africa.

1. There seems to have been some misunderstandings between us which I feel I should put straight for the record in this personal message to you.

2. I gather from Holmes that you were somewhat surprised when he told you over the telephone that we would be suggesting to you that you express our appreciation of the moderation of the Indian Resolution. At that time and at the time that we sent you our telegram No. 457 of May 10[†], we had not seen the text of the Indian Resolution and were going on the description of it given you and Heeney by Malik (See Para. 3 of your telegram 600 of May 7).[†]

3. Later we received your telegram No. 614 of May 10[†] containing the text of the Indian Resolution and when we were able to examine this text it became evident to us that it could hardly be described as moderate. Unfortunately, by the time Holmes telephoned to Carter to suggest that no reference to the moderation of the Indian Resolution be made, the Canadian speech had already been given.

4. I would be interested to know whether anyone was surprised by the expression of "our appreciation of the moderate terms" in which the Indian Resolution was set forth.

5. Our study of the Indian Resolution of course reinforces the ground for our decision that you should abstain on that resolution. Ends.

Your message No. 462, 12th May. Treatment of Indians in South Africa.

1. The references in my speech to "the moderation of the Indian resolution" in accordance with instructions I received, resulted in expressions of deep concern by the South Africans who asked me whether we were in fact not opposed to the two operative clauses of the Indian resolution.

2. In reply to South Africa I have taken the line that the reference had been included in my statement because the Indian resolution as now expressed was in fact less critical than on previous occasions. I said that we had on both the South African and Indian resolutions abstained in order to impress both delegations with our friendly attitude. I said that in committee we had expressed the hope that a resolution contemplating direct negotiations would be evolved.

3. Such a resolution has now been evolved in the First Committee and sent on to the General Assembly where I propose that we should give it our full support.

4. As regards comment from the Indian delegation, two members, Malik and Menon, have spoken to Ignatieff expressing appreciation for the position I had taken.

1. The whole difficult problem has been reviewed here once more. After careful consideration of the draft contained in your telegram No. 646 and the reasons advanced in your telephone conversations with Holmes, I think in the circumstances you should not make any statement on the subject and that you should abstain from voting on the Indian resolution as a whole.

2. If the resolution is voted upon paragraph by paragraph, however, you should vote against (repeat against) the paragraph beginning, "is of the opinion that..." and abstain on all other paragraphs.

3. It is difficult to make a clear case on grounds of principle for either abstaining or voting against the Indian resolution, and we recognize that we may well be accused of inconsistency, whichever course we follow. But, on the whole, it seems to us that there are advantages in abstaining, and fewer disadvantages than in any other course.

Treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa.

1. The General Assembly in plenary meeting on Saturday 14th May, adopted a resolution, the text of which is contained in my immediately following teletype,† by roll call vote of 47 in favour (including Canada), one against (South Africa), and 10 abstentions. The following countries abstained: Greece, Paraguay, Poland, Ukraine, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelo-Russia, Czechoslovakia. Ethiopia was absent.

2. Mr. Louw of South Africa objected to the inclusion of any reference to the Declaration of Human Rights in the resolution which was adopted and asked that the words "and the Declaration of Human Rights" be put to a vote separately from the rest of the operative paragraph of the resolution. The President (Evatt) ruled that these words were essentially an integral part of the paragraph as a whole and could not be voted upon separately. In the circumstances South Africa voted against the resolution and the United Kingdom abstained. The other members of the Commonwealth voted for the resolution. The Soviet bloc abstained from voting on the resolution on the grounds that it was "too weak".

3. The representative of India in a most conciliatory statement declared that he would not press for a vote on the resolution which India had submitted and which had been adopted by the First Committee by a vote of 21 in favour, 17 against and 12 abstentions. The other resolution having been adopted the General Assembly at the suggestion of the President consented to the withdrawal of the Indian resolution. The contingency contemplated in your message No. 476 of 15th May therefore did not arise. The procedure in this respect was somewhat confused as the rules of procedure provide for the withdrawal of a motion by the proposer if it is not amended before it is put to the vote. In this case the resolution had been adopted by a committee. However, no objection was raised to adopting the course suggested by the Indian delegation, particularly as it was evident that this proposal would not obtain the necessary two-thirds majority.

4. The Indian position in the debate in the General Assembly was marked by a conciliatory attitude which was in contrast to their attitude in Committee I and also with the attitude of South Africa both in Committee I and continued into the General Assembly. Mr. Louw in a long statement repeated substantially the arguments which he had put forward in the First Committee and gave no indication that South Africa would be willing to enter into direct negotiations upon the basis of the text of the resolution ultimately adopted by the General Assembly. In what appeared to be a contradiction, on the one hand he maintained that the discussion as well as any decision by the General Assembly on the Indian complaint was outside the competence of the Assembly, and on the other hand, he suggested that the Assembly might best take a decision merely calling upon the two parties to enter into discussions at a round table Conference without specifying any basis for these discussions whatever.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 29, 1949

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to the question of "Refugees and Stateless Persons" which is on the agenda of the General Assembly. It is now understood that Committee Three will begin discussing this item on Friday November 4.

2. The report of the Secretary-General which was called for by Resolution 248 (IX)A of the Economic and Social Council has now been circulated as Document A/C.3/527, two copies of which are enclosed.† You will recall that the Secretary-General was requested to prepare a plan for such organization within the framework of the United Nations as may be required to enable the United Nations to discharge the function of international protection of refugees and related functions, taking into account the alternative of establishing a High Commissioner's office under the control of the United Nations or a service within the United Nations secretariat. In addition, the Secretary-General was requested to submit a proposal with respect to the nature and extent of the legal protection functions to be performed. At the same time ECOSOC recommended that the General Assembly decide at this Fourth Session the functions and organization arrangements within the framework of the United Nations necessary for the international protection of refugees after the IRO terminates its activities.

3. You will note that this report of the Secretary-General points to certain questions which the General Assembly might wish to consider concerning the categories of persons who would fall within the mandate of the proposed service, and other related problems. In Chapter 2 of this report the Secretary-General has in some detail outlined what he considers to be the various functions as regards the international legal protection of refugees which the new service might perform.

4. The Secretary-General has not dealt fully with the important question of material assistance in his report, as he was not requested to do so by the ECOSOC resolution. Further, he considered that this question could only be considered on the basis of the IRO plans and the arrangements made for the benefit of needy refugees at present within its mandate. In this regard the Secretary-General has circulated a separate document (A/C.3/528) which contains the text of Resolution 54 adopted by the General Council of IRO on 20 October 1949, as well as a memorandum to the General Assembly which the IRO Council decided to transmit at its last session.

5. As regards the form of the future organization for the protection of refugees, you will note that the Secretary-General favours the establishment of a High Commissioner's office rather than a service within the United Nations secretariat. In Chapter 3, paragraphs 45 to 51 inclusive, of his report, the Secretary-General has outlined in brief the organization which might be established. Further information is given under the heading "Budgetary Implications" in paragraphs 64 to 71 inclusive. The Secretary-General has deliberately refrained from making fully detailed recommendations regarding this organization as he believed that such proposals could more appropriately be made after the decisions of principle have been taken by the General Assembly.

6. No doubt you are already aware of the resolution and memorandum addressed to the General Assembly by the General Council of IRO. As mentioned above, this has now been circulated as Document A/C.3/528, two copies of which are enclosed.† You will note that the memorandum points to the possibility that material assistance of some sort will probably be required for refugees even if member governments of IRO agree to extend the life of that organization until 31 March 1951.

7. It would be appreciated if your comments on these two reports and your suggestions as to the attitude which the Canadian Delegation might adopt on this question of refugees and stateless persons could be forwarded if possible by next Friday, 4 November.

I have, etc.

CONFIDENTIAL

Your despatch No. 22, October 29th—Refugees and Stateless Persons.

1. We have studied the two documents enclosed with your despatch and after consultation with the other interested Departments, we would make the following comments:

(a) The extent to which the U.N. should provide legal protection for refugees and stateless persons.

2. It is our opinion that the I.R.O. and the organization which succeeds it should extend whatever legal protection is required by refugees and persons who are de jure stateless. This generalization would not apply of course to war criminals or other persons who for similar reasons were left outside the I.R.O. mandate. It should, however, apply to refugees who are in that position for purely technical or national reasons even though they are outside the I.R.O. mandate.

3. It seems to us that the more that is done by the U.N. to protect the interests of stateless persons and other refugees, the more likely these people are to find satisfactory havens and the more willing they may be to accept permanent residence in the countries where they are now living. It is to Canada's interest that these persons should become permanently domiciled as quickly as possible and legal protection by the U.N. would be a contribution to that end.

4. The extent of material assistance which should be given by the U.N. is difficult to assess at this time but we think it important that the terms of reference of the High Commissioner's duties should be broad enough to allow consideration of any problem affecting refugees.

(b) The arrangements which should be made to handle the continuing problems of refugees following the termination of the I.R.O.

5. As explained in the Commentary article on the I.R.O., our main concern is that an efficient organization should be established and that its maintenance should be a charge on the regular U.N. budget. The Secretary-General's recommendation for the appointment of a High Commissioner who would report to the General Assembly through ECOSOC and who would comply with directives received from the Assembly and the Council, seems to us to meet our position and we see no objection to supporting it unless, during the course of the debate, serious weaknesses in the scheme which are not at present apparent are revealed. The prominent stature of the High Commissioner would be a constant invitation to the Assembly and ECOSOC to examine and criticize his activities whereas the same sort of work handled by a section of the Secretariat would be less likely to impose itself upon their attention. Moreover, it would be relatively simple at any time to terminate the High Commissioner's responsibilities and incorporate any continuing elements of the problem into the Secretariat of the U.N. should this prove feasible or desirable at some future date. It should be envisaged that, as the proportions of the problem are reduced, a comparable reduction should take place in the number of the employees of the U.N. assigned to handle it. The appointment of a High Commissioner might well facilitate the efficient and economic handling of the problem.

(c) Intergovernmental Committee.

6. Paragraphs 56 and 57 of the Secretary-General's report envisage the establishment of an Intergovernmental Consultative Committee to advise ECOSOC on any aspect of the U.N. work for refugees. While we understand that the object of setting up such a committee would be to include in it countries such as Switzerland and Italy who are not members of the U.N. and while we recognize the interest of these countries in the refugee problem and the desirability of bringing them into association with the refugee work, it seems to us that the advantages to be gained are outweighed by the disadvantages of adding still another to the already alarming number of international bodies. We would think that the attendance of representatives of these countries with observer status, to sessions of ECOSOC, would provide ample opportunity for consultation and that the Intergovernmental Committee would serve no purpose useful enough to justify its establishment.

(d) Budgetary Implications.

7. Finance requests that Pollock examine this aspect carefully before Delegation approves plan.

to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs*

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 19, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to report on item 63 regarding the question of refugees and stateless persons, discussed in the Third Committee.

2. As explained in my despatch No. 22 of October 29, the Secretary-General of the United Nations submitted to the General Assembly, at the request of the Economic and Social Council (Resolution 248 (IX)A of 6 August 1949), a report on the organization required to enable the United Nations to discharge the function of international protection of refugees when the IRO terminates its mandate. The Economic and Social Council had also recommended that the General Assembly at its fourth session consider this matter, on the basis of the General Assembly report, with a view to deciding the organizational arrangements necessary for the international protection of refugees.

3. When the Third Committee began the consideration of this item on November 4, it had for consideration a draft resolution submitted by the French Delegation embodying the Secretary-General's recommendation that a High Commissioner's Office for refugees be established. The French resolution sought, moreover, to define the general principles that would guide the action of the High Commissioner, the organization of his office and the functions that he would be called upon to perform.

4. The first phase of the debate on this item was characterized by a series of criticisms of the activities of IRO rather than a discussion of the specific question on the agenda. The U.S.S.R. and its Eastern European satellites assailed the operations of IRO on the following grounds:

(1) While the main task of IRO should have been to promote the repatriation of refugees and displaced persons, it had instead engaged in resettlement of refugees, even against their will. In support of their thesis, they cited the fact that between 1 July 1947 and February 1948, more than 400,000 displaced persons had been resettled in foreign countries and that during this period only 62,621 had been repatriated. Repatriation had been furthermore discouraged by the IRO policy to fail to provide refugees in IRO camps with essential and unbiased information about their country of origin. The Polish Delegation referred on this point to what was called the "kidnapping" of 123 Polish children by the Canadian Government last August.

(2) A larger number of IRO officials are war criminals who have the full support of the governments members of the Organization.

(3) IRO was merely a recruiting agency for cheap labour at the disposal of the capitalist world. The Polish Delegate illustrated this point by a brief reference to the recruitment of one hundred Polish girls through IRO by a Canadian industrialist. Yugoslavia was also accused of following the example of capitalist countries and bringing cheap labour into its territory. Four thousand Polish families had been recruited in Germany by Yugoslavia.

5. The general accusations directed against IRO were answered by the Director-General of IRO, Mr. Kingsley, in a statement made on November 10. In his statement Mr. Kingsley gave a full picture of the part played by IRO with regard to the Polish children sent to Canada from refugee camps in Tanganyika. Senator Wilson had already answered the Polish charges in a statement made before the Committee on November 4.

6. The second phase of the debate centering on the immediate problem on hand revealed a divergency of approach between the French and the United States delegations. This divergency touched the definition of refugees, the necessity for material assistance and the method of appointment of the High Commissioner.

7. Definition of refugees. Originally the United States Delegation held that the High Commissioner should only be competent to deal with refugees as defined in the Constitution of IRO. They agreed eventually that he should also deal with such categories of refugees which might be defined by the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council. The French point of view, on the other hand, was that the definition adopted by IRO is incomplete, designed to meet certain conditions which no longer exist and that, therefore, it should only be provisionally adopted by the High Commissioner. They wished also that the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council be called upon to define, not specific categories of refugees, as this might have a restrictive effect, but to draft a general definition of the status of refugee.

8. Material assistance. The United States Delegation did not wish mention to be made, in the resolution, of the possibility that any other kind of assistance would be provided by the High Commissioner outside of legal protection. They were afraid that this may give rise to false hopes to the persons concerned. They argued also that this aspect of the refugee problem had been taken care of by IRO and should not be the concern of the proposed Office. The French position, on the other hand, was that the problem of material assistance, especially with regard to the "hard core" category of refugees, will continue to exist. The High Commissioner should, therefore, be given the authority to administer any assistance funds that might be placed at his disposal by the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council, or by private organizations. The French pointed out that Resolution No. 248(IX)A of the Economic and Social Council, envisaged the possibility that assistance funds may be put at the disposal of the United Nations by the General Assembly, for the benefit of certain classes of refugees.

9. Appointment of the High Commissioner. The United States Delegation favoured the direct appointment of the High Commissioner by the Secretary-General. They were concerned that the election of the High Commissioner would affect adversely his relationship with the Secretary-General and would, therefore, be conducive to administrative inefficiency. The French, on the other hand, look upon the High Commissioner as an official whose humanitarian functions calls for the highest prestige and stature. He would not have this prestige if he were appointed by the Secretary-General in the same manner as other officials of the United Nations. They argued that the purpose in establishing a separate High Commissioner's Office, (rather than an office within the United Nations Secretariat), would be defeated if the High Commissioner were to be appointed directly by the Secretary-General.

10. In the general statement which she made before the Committee on November 12, Senator Wilson endorsed the principle of the French resolution embodying the Secretary-General's recommendation that a separate High Commissioner's Office be established. This solution appeared desirable because a separate refugee office would be a constant reminder to the members of the United Nations of the importance of the problem of refugees, and because the close relationship envisaged between the proposed High Commissioner's Office and the United Nations Secretariat would make it easy, at a later stage, to incorporate the continuing elements of this problem into the Secretariat.

11. She also emphasized the necessity for the General Assembly, at its current session, to reach agreement on the functions of the proposed Office. Her remarks on this point were prompted by the United States informal proposal, at an early stage of the debate, to merely ask the Secretary-General to prepare a draft resolution for the next session of the Assembly outlining the functions and the organization of the Office.

12. As for the definition of refugees, Senator Wilson said that for all practical purposes the IRO definition could be used but that in order to achieve the necessary flexibility it would be necessary to add to the High Commissioner's responsibility any group or category of refugees specifically designated by the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council. With regard to the question of material assistance, she stated that whether we want it or not this problem will continue to confront us. Provided that any such assistance was carried on a separate budget, collected on a voluntary basis from all responsible governments, with the specific approval of the General Assembly or ECOSOC, there could not be any objection to enabling the High Commissioner to administer such funds as may be placed at his disposal.

13. The question as to the best method of bringing into consultation the interested non-member governments with the High Commissioner's Office, has remained unsettled and will receive further consideration by ECOSOC. The Canadian suggestion that representatives of these countries be invited to ECOSOC as observers was objected to by the French Delegation on the ground that the status of observer was insufficient in order to enable these representatives to perform functions of advisers. The United States Delegation favoured further consideration being given to this matter.

14. The procedure to be followed regarding the appointment of the High Commissioner was the subject of considerable discussion. Fundamentally this debate reflected the United States conception that the proposed office should only have an administrative status while the French Delegation conceived the office more or less along the lines of the League's Refugees Office directed by Nansen. The Canadian Delegation instructions were that the High Commissioner should be appointed by the Secretary-General. In the informal discussions that took place, however, a compromise solution was reached which would have had the High Commissioner nominated by the Secretary-General and elected by ECOSOC. The U.K. Delegation also favoured this solution. As, on the other hand, the Canadian Delegation had voted in favour of the election of a High Commissioner for Libya, we finally rallied to the French alternative. In the text of the French resolution, as it was finally adopted, the High Commissioner is nominated by the Secretary-General, and elected by the General Assembly as a result of a last-minute amendment proposed by the Lebanese Delegate.

15. In order to complete this epitome of the Canadian position regarding this matter, I should like to mention briefly the various resolutions and amendments on which vote was taken on November 15.

(1) Byelorussian S.S.R. draft resolution (A/C.3/L.25). This resolution sought to censure the repatriation policies of IRO. Canada voted against the whole and each paragraph of this resolution which was rejected by 7 yes, 15 no and 22 abstentions. The Arab countries abstained on this resolution.

(2) Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/L.30), to the draft resolution submitted by France and the United States. Canada voted for paragraph one and paragraph two of this amendment. Paragraph one added one preamble to the French-United States resolution, recognizing the United Nations responsibility for the international protection of refugees. Paragraph two proposed the election of the High Commissioner by the General Assembly instead of by ECOSOC.

(3) Australian amendment (A/C.3/L.31). We voted in favour of the first paragraph of this amendment which enables the High Commissioner to discharge the functions defined in the resolution plus any such other functions as the General Assembly may confer upon him. This amendment ensured a desirable flexibility to the terms of reference of the High Commissioner's Office. We abstained on the second paragraph of the Australian amendment, on the ground that it was repetitious, which would have specifically stated that the High Commissioner could engage in repatriation and resettlement activities, as the General Assembly may determine.

(4) United Kingdom amendment to the French-United States resolution (A/C.3/L.32). The original text of the resolution provided that the High Commissioner should receive policy directions from the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, and that he should report to the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council. The United Kingdom amendment left it to the General Assembly to define the relationship between the High Commissioner, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council. We voted in favour of this amendment because, through the working out of a suitable formula, these amendments make it possible to counter-balance the freedom of action resulting from the election of the High Commissioner by the General Assembly. These amendments were adopted.

(5) Israeli amendment to the French-United States resolution (A/C.3/L.33). We voted in favour of paragraph one of this amendment and abstained on paragraph two. Paragraph one was an improvement in the wording of the resolution, and paragraph two was repetitious.

(6) Draft resolution submitted by France and the United States (A/C.3/L.29). We voted in favour of the United States alternative concerning the definition of refugees, as it was more restrictive. The United States alternative, however, was defeated by a small majority. We voted in favour of the French alternative proposal regarding material assistance. The French text enables the High Commissioner to administer assistance funds which he may receive from public and private sources. The French proposal was approved by a majority of 3 with 16 abstentions. Canada voted in favour of the French alternative proposal regarding the method of appointment of the High Commissioner, which was adopted by 19 yes, 10 no and 15 abstentions. The amended text of the resolution was adopted as a whole by 24 in favour, 12 against (including the United States) and 10 abstentions.

(7) French draft resolution (A/C.3/L.27). This resolution called for all states to furnish assistance to IRO particularly with regard to the admission and care of refugees. It also postponed the consideration of the problem of assistance to the Fifth Session of the General Assembly. We voted in favour of this academic resolution which was approved by 18 yes, 8 no and 18 abstentions.

16. It is to be noted that the United States Delegation finally voted against the amended draft resolution they had sponsored with the French. I should think that Mr. Warren, the principal adviser of the United States Delegation on this matter, is responsible to a large extent for the uncompromising attitude shown by the United States. He seemed anxious above all to reduce the importance of the proposed Office to a purely administrative role and entertained suspicions that the French were trying to build up the Office which would soon undertake the assistance of refugees on a large scale. In fact, one wonders why the United States Delegation ever approved the establishment of a High Commissioner's Office, as the creation of an administrative service within the Secretariat would have been much more in conformity with their professed views on the role to be performed by the High Commissioner.

17. Most of the Arab States abstained from voting on this measure. Their attitude was determined mainly by the fact that they did not wish to contribute to the establishment of an Office whose primary responsibility would be the protection of European refugees. The representatives of India and Pakistan referred to their own refugee problem which they considered far greater in scope than the European problem, and stated that their first duty was to help their own people.

I have, etc.

Refugees and stateless persons.

1. We hope that some further steps may be taken to achieve a compromise before this matter comes up in plenary. In view of the stand which we have already taken in the Committee it does not seem to us that it would be possible for us to vote against or even to abstain on the resolution. Nevertheless it would be unfortunate if the Assembly were committed to a new policy on this important matter by so small a majority. It would be particularly unfortunate, furthermore, if a resolution were passed without United States support, under the provisions of which voluntary contributions might be necessary for the assistance of European "hard core" or other refugees, in view of the fact that United States financial and other assistance would almost certainly be essential for the success of any programme of this kind. The situation is not dissimilar from that in which we found ourselves several years ago on the question of post-UNRRA relief, and it may be useful to talk to Mr. Martin about this subject, with which he was deeply involved.

2. It seems to us most important that the United States and French delegations should make another effort to reach agreement. If they have not done so, we hope it might be possible for you to ask the Americans what amendments they intend to propose in plenary and find out whether these would be accepted by the French and other supporters of the resolution. If a compromise could be reached, I think that we ourselves should be prepared to accept it. We and others who supported the French resolution might then state frankly in plenary that we were now supporting a resolution which was somewhat different from that which we had originally favoured and that we were doing so in the interests of securing wider support.

THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Mr. Holmes said that the General Assembly was rapidly drawing to a close. The Minister and most of the other members of the Canadian delegation have returned to Ottawa. General McNaughton is acting as chairman of the small section of the delegation which remains in New York.

3. The item on Refugees and Stateless Persons was disposed of in plenary session on December 3 with the adoption of a joint French-United States resolution calling for the establishment of a High Commissioner's Office for Refugees. The vote was 35 in favour, 7 against, with 13 abstentions. We had been concerned over this item since the French and United States delegations held divergent views on certain fundamental issues and the resolution which was adopted in Committee with the French alternatives carried with less than the substantial majority which we considered essential for the successful functioning of a High Commissioner's Office. Moreover, in Committee the United States voted against the resolution. Largely owing to the efforts of the Canadian delegation, a compromise was arrived at between the French and the United States delegations before the resolution was put to the plenary where it was supported by both France and the United States.

4. Under the terms of the resolution, a High Commissioner's Office will be established not later than January 1, 1951. The High Commissioner's functions will be primarily of a legal nature but he is authorized to distribute any funds he may receive for material assistance. He is not to request governments for contributions for this purpose except when specifically authorized to do so by the General Assembly.

[Ottawa], October 12, 1949

SIGNATURE BY CANADA OF THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Background

The General Assembly of the United Nations of December 9, 1948, unanimously adopted the text of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide, the first international treaty ever prepared by the United Nations to be proposed for signature and ratification by the states of the world. "Genocide", a new name for an old crime, is defined as "an act committed with intent to destroy a national, ethnic, racial or religious group".

2. At the present time twenty-nine countries, including the United States, France, and Australia, have signed the Convention, while four have deposited their instruments of ratification with the United Nations.

3. Canada's representatives at the first part of the Third Session of the General Assembly in Paris last year were among those who supported the principle that the Genocide Convention should receive the widest possible application. The Canadian delegates to the current Session of the Assembly have been told that they could support any proposals to extend invitations to sign to sovereign states which are not members of the United Nations, and that such support is justified on the grounds that universal application of the Convention is in the interest of the development of international law and is desirable on humanitarian grounds.

4. The Department of Justice is of the opinion that there is no legal or constitutional objection to Canada becoming a party to this Convention and that no legislation will be required for the purpose of implementation since the provisions of the Convention are already covered by the criminal law of Canada.

5. In view of the above it would appear that there are cogent reasons why Canada should sign this Convention with the least possible delay.

Recommendation

6. It is therefore recommended that a submission to Council asking for the issuance of Full Powers for the Secretary of State for External Affairs or for his nominee to sign the Genocide Convention,⁵⁷ should be made in the form of the document attached as Annex 1 to this memorandum.†

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 30, 1949

Sir,

I have the honour to report on the adoption by the Third Committee, of the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others.

2. The discussions that took place on this matter may be conveniently dealt with under the following headings:

First Debate in the Third Committee;

Consideration of the Legal Aspects of the Convention by the Sixth Committee;

Second Debate in the Third Committee.

First Debate in the Third Committee

3. The most important point discussed in the first phase of the debate was the question as to whether the offences defined in the Convention should be further qualified by the words "committed for purposes of gain". The Pakistani Delegation proposed the deletion of these words and, in accordance with our instructions, we opposed this amendment. It was carried, however, and we felt that after having marked our opposition, we could support the article as amended.

4. The Third Committee also decided to ask the Sixth Committee for advice on Articles 8, 9, 10, 12, 25–26–28, 29, 30, 31, and 32 of the Draft Convention. A special resolution was also adopted by the Committee requesting the Sixth Committee to inform it of the legal effects of deleting or retaining the clause "subject to the requirements of domestic law” which appears in various articles of the Draft Convention. The following is a detailed account of the votes taken in the Committee showing in each case how Canada voted.

Article 1

Pakistan proposal to delete the remainder of the Article commencing with the words “provided these offences are committed for purposes of gain”.

Vote: For 22, against 15 (including Canada), abstentions 5.

Article 1 as a whole as amended:—For 35 (including Canada), against 5 (including United Kingdom), abstentions 2.

Article 2

Chairman’s proposal to add “or rents” after “lets” in sub-paragraph (b).

Vote: For 31 (including Canada), against 2 (U.S.A. and U.K.), abstentions 7.

Article 2 as a whole as amended:—For 41 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 1.

Article 3

Amendment to delete “subject to the requirements of domestic law”.

Vote: For 23 (including Canada, U.S.A. and U.K.), against 1, abstentions 17.

Article 3 as a whole as amended:—For 33 (including Canada), against 1, abstentions 8 (including U.S.A.).

Article 5

Vote: For 51 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 0.

Article 6

Vote: For 36 (including Canada), against 3, abstentions 10.

Several amendments all opposed by Canada were defeated.

Article 14

Vote: For 47 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 2.

Article 15

Vote: For 48 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 1.

Article 17

Afghanistan amendment to substitute “take and encourage” for “take or encourage”.

Vote: For 13, against 25 (including Canada), abstentions 7.

U.K.-New Zealand amendment to add after the word “rehabilitation” the words “and social adjustment of victims of prostitution and of the offences referred to in this Convention”.

Vote: For 43 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 7.

Article 17 as a whole as amended:—For 47 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 3.

Article 18

Brazilian amendment to substitute “seaports” for “ports of embarkation”.

Vote: For 29, against 1, abstentions 19 (including Canada).

Lebanese amendment to revise sub-paragraph (d) to read as follows:—“To take appropriate measures in order that the appropriate authorities be informed of the arrival of persons who appear prima facie to be the principals and accomplices in, or victims of such traffic”.

Vote: For 17, against 1, abstentions 27 (including Canada).

Article 18 as a whole as amended:—For 44 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 4.

Article 21

Israeli amendment to add after “persons” the words “in particular, women and children”.

Vote: For 31 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 10.

Article 21 as a whole as amended:—For 48 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 1.

Article 22

Vote: For 46 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 4.

Article 23

As revised by the U.S.A.

Vote: For 21 (including Canada), against 18, abstentions 10.

Article 24

(This was voted on after Article 27 was considered but before Article 27 was deleted.)

Ukrainian amendment to add after “This Convention shall be open for signature or acceptance on behalf of any Member of the United Nations and also on behalf of any non-member State to which an invitation has been addressed by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations” the words: “For the purposes of the present Convention the word ‘State’ shall include all the colonies and Trust Territories of a State signatory to or accepting the Convention and all other territories for which such State is internationally responsible” and delete the words: “It shall also be open for signature or acceptance on behalf of any Trust Territory...” down to the end of the paragraph.

Vote: For 23, against 22 (including Canada, U.K., and U.S.A.) abstentions 5. This was a roll call vote.

Article 24 as a whole as amended:—For 28, against 18 (including Canada), abstentions 3.

Article 27

Ukrainian proposal to delete Article 27.

Vote: For 25, against 19 (including Canada), abstentions 4.

Final Protocol

U.K. amendment.

Vote: For 40 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 6.

Protocol as a whole as amended:—For 49 (including Canada), against 0, abstentions 1.

Preamble

Vote: For 45 (including Canada, against 0, abstentions 5.

Consideration of the Legal Aspects of the Draft Convention by Committee Six

5. The report of the Legal Committee (A/JC.6/L.102) will already have reached you. A separate report outlining the Canadian position on the Committee's recommendations is being prepared by Mr. Pick.

Second Debate in the Third Committee

6. On November 28 the Third Committee convened to study the report of the Legal Committee. Generally speaking, the recommendations of the Legal Committee were adopted without much discussion but it may be of interest to outline the salient points of the debates.

(a) Definition of prostitution—The Sixth Committee at the instigation of the Swedish representative had included in its report a remark to the effect that a number of States would be unable to accept the Convention if incitement to prostitution and similar acts were not further qualified by the words "committed for gainful purposes". The Pakistani representative in the Third Committee took exception to this part of the report on the ground that this was not a legal but a social matter, and that the Sixth Committee had therefore exceeded its competence. He argued furthermore the procedural point that Article 1 had already been adopted and that it could only be reconsidered with a favourable two-third majority vote. A vote was taken on this point, Canada voting in favour of the reconsideration of Article 1 (in accordance with the spirit of the instructions contained in paragraph 2 of your despatch No. 61 of October 26),† but the motion was defeated.

The Committee voted also against the inclusion of a general definition of the term "prostitution" for the purposes of the Convention, as suggested by Committee Six. We voted against this proposal on the ground that such a definition does not appear in the international instruments referred to in the preamble of the Draft Convention.

(b) The non-self executing clause (Article 30). It had been expected that the U.S. Delegation would try to introduce an amendment to the effect that Article 30 recognizes a reasonable time in which to adopt implementing legislation, but they did not do so and the Egyptian text as proposed by the Sixth Committee was adopted without any opposition.

(c) The Federal clause. Although the Sixth Committee had approved the principle that a federal clause should be included in the Draft Convention, it was unable to agree on the nature of such a clause. The French representative requested a vote on the question as to whether this matter should be reconsidered by Committee Three. We voted affirmatively in view of our preference for the inclusion of a federal clause in the Convention, but the French proposal was defeated by a large majority. The Convention as finally adopted does not therefore contain a federal clause.

7. When the vote was finally taken on the amended text of the draft Convention, it was adopted by 34 votes in favour, including Canada, with no opposition and 8 abstentions including the United States, the United Kingdom, and France.

8. I am attaching herewith a list of the votes taken in Committee Three indicating how Canada voted in each case.† I am enclosing also copy of a statement made by the United Kingdom representative explaining why he had to abstain from voting on the draft convention as a whole.†

UNITED NATIONS PANEL FOR ENQUIRY AND CONCILIATION

On April 28, 1949, the United Nations General Assembly adopted a resolution providing for the creation of a Panel for Enquiry and Conciliation to be available to any states involved in controversies and to the General Assembly, the Security Council and other subsidiary organs, when exercising their respective functions in relation to disputes and situations. A copy of this resolution is attached as Annex A.†

2. The Panel is to consist of persons designated by Member States who, by reason of their training, experience, character and standing are deemed to be well-fitted to serve as members of commissions of enquiry or of conciliation and who would be disposed to serve in that capacity. Each member state may designate from one to five persons, who may be either private persons or government officials. In designating any of its officials, however, a state shall agree to make every effort to make such person available if his services on a commission are requested. Two or more states may designate the same person.

3. Members of the Panel shall be designated for a term of five years and such designations shall be renewable. In the performance of their duties members of commissions shall not seek or receive instructions from any government. Membership in the Panel shall not, however, render a person ineligible for appointment, as a representative of his government or otherwise, on commissions or other bodies not formed under the regulations governing the Panel for Enquiry and Conciliation. Members of commissions constituted under these regulations shall receive appropriate compensation for the period of their service.

4. The Secretary-General of the United Nations has requested the Canadian Government to send him the names of the one to five persons designated by it as members of the United Nations Panel for Enquiry and Conciliation.

5. I recommend that the Canadian Government should designate five Canadians for membership on the Panel. In making these appointments it is necessary to bear in mind the importance of having highly qualified persons readily available to serve on such commissions as may be constituted to assist in the settlement of international disputes and situations. The services of persons of the stature of the late Count Folke Bernadotte and Dr. Ralph Bunche have proved invaluable in reaching some degree of settlement in the very complicated Palestine situation.

6. The following is a suggested list of names of Canadians who might be approached with a request that they permit the Government to designate them for membership on the Panel. The first five persons would be approached immediately, and in the event of any of them being unable to serve, the last three, listed as alternates, would be approached.⁵⁸

Item No. 6 on CSC Agenda for April 12, 1949

ADVISABILITY OF RAISING IN SECURITY COUNCIL
THE QUESTION OF THE MILITARY STAFF COMMITTEE
UNDER ARTICLE 43 OF UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

General McNaughton has requested instructions as to what attitude the Canadian Delegation should adopt on this question. The United Kingdom Delegation has also asked for Canada's views.

2. This question has not been discussed in the Security Council since July 1947. At that time the five Permanent Members failed to agree on the initial contributions which they should make to the Armed Forces to be made available to the Security Council under the terms of Article 43 of the United Nations Charter. Subsequently, therefore, the Security Council referred back to the Military Staff Committee the question of what over-all strength and composition would be required for the Armed Forces of the United Nations. In July 1948, the Military Staff Committee reported that it would be unable to make any further progress until the Security Council had overcome the disagreements which existed among its Permanent Members on some of the principles governing the establishment of United Nations Armed Forces. This report was followed in August 1948 by another in the same vein and it seems apparent that the Military Staff Committee will be unable to do anything constructive unless the Security Council itself reaches agreement on the disputed general principles.

3. Since the beginning of this year, there have been informal discussions among the United Kingdom, United States, French, Chinese and Canadian Delegations in New York as to the advisability of raising this question in the Security Council at the present time. The attached United Kingdom Working Paper† outlines the pros and cons of bringing this subject once again before the Council. It shows that while the United Kingdom Government are reluctant to maintain a group of highly qualified representatives in New York with nothing to show for their work on the Military Staff Committee, they admit that this may not be an appropriate time to risk a propaganda debate in the Security Council.⁴ The Joint Planning Committee of the Chiefs of Staff has considered this matter and has concluded that it would not be appropriate at this time to draw attention to the disagreements which exist in the Security Council on the whole question of the Military Staff Committee. The reasoning behind this conclusion is that a further airing of the fundamental disagreements between the Powers in the Security Council would not only fail to produce any agreement on the principles governing the Military Staff Committee but might also be used by the Russians for propaganda purposes as evidence that, having completed the North Atlantic Treaty, the Western Powers were not anxious to reach agreement under the United Nations.

5. Most recent advice from General McNaughton (telegram No. 372 of March 29)† is that the United Kingdom now admits that it would be useless to bring the question before the Security Council. The United States, Chinese and French Delegations are also opposed to any discussion of the Military Staff Committee at the present time.

6. In view of the above, I think it would be advisable to instruct our representative in the Security Council not to initiate any move to have this question reconsidered by the Council for the time being. On the other hand, we should, I think, not appear unwilling to discuss it if the Soviet Delegation should bring it up. If you approve, and if the Chiefs of Staff Committee agree with this recommendation, I suggest that we might send appropriate instructions to General McNaughton in the form of comments on the United Kingdom Working Paper.⁵⁹

Security Council Article 43.

1. Each time I have been President of the Security Council I have felt it my duty to consider carefully whether there would be anything to be gained, or any useful purpose to be served, in calling for formal Security Council consideration of the Implementation of Article 43 of the Charter. Accordingly, two weeks ago I enquired privately of the United Kingdom, United States and French delegations what their views were on the desirability of Council consideration at this time.

2. The United Kingdom delegation, after consideration, advised us that in their view it was definitely undesirable. The Council would not at this time get anywhere in this matter; agreement with the U.S.S.R. on the Military Staff Committee appears not only impossible but probably undesirable; and there would in the view of the United Kingdom be no propaganda advantage to the West in raising the matter at this time.

3. The French delegation said that if we proposed to raise the question, they would be willing to participate in discussions, but they did not themselves suggest doing so.

4. Maffit of the United States delegation has now told Arnold Smith that after consultation with Washington they had decided to advise us not to raise the question at this time. They did not object in principle, but they are at present re-examining the whole question of Article 43, and the relation of atomic weapons and conventional armaments to each other and to this article. The examination will not be completed for some time and they would therefore be embarrassed if the question were raised at present.

5. I propose to take no further action on this matter.

16. The Committee had for consideration a report by the Joint Planning Committee concerning the proposed organization of the United Nations Guard Force as drafted by the Secretary-General.

(Memorandum JPC 19-12 of 4th April, 1949, from Secretary, Joint Planning Committee—CSC 2-4-1-1 of 8th April).†

17. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that two proposals were now being sponsored at the United Nations as to the committee which should handle the subject of the United Nations Guard Force. The first proposal was that the matter should be considered by the Interim Committee. However, as the U.S.S.R. were opposed to both the organization and work of the Interim Committee, they had requested that the matter be considered by a special sub-committee of the General Assembly. As the committee problem might be resolved at an early date, the recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff concerning the proposed organization of the United Nations Guard Force were required for transmission to the Canadian Delegate.

18. The Chief of the General Staff observed that the United Nations Guard Force was to be entirely non-military in character and that its duties were primarily those associated with police or protective organizations. The personnel required for the proposed force should be provided by police forces rather than by military forces.

19. It was agreed, after further consideration:

(a) that the personnel for both the permanent establishment and the reserve should be drawn from sources other than the military forces;

(b) that the organization recommended by the Secretary-General was acceptable;

(c) that only the nucleus permanent establishment should be formed initially;

(d) that national reserves for the United Nations Guard Force should not be recruited until the permanent force organization was in existence; and

(e) that the national reserve personnel for the United Nations Guard Force should be enlisted and trained through a permanent existing organization of the country concerned.

United Nations Guard.

The ad hoc (Political) Committee took up consideration of this item on October 24th. The item on the agenda was the report of the Special Committee which contained two draft resolutions (see PS/10 Appendix A of the commentary).

The general debate on the report of the Special Committee revealed that the proposal for a field service received considerable support, while the proposal for a panel of field observers met with some opposition.

You will recall that the method of establishing the panel as described in the report of the Special Committee is as follows:

(a) The various Governments will furnish a list of names of men recruited both within and outside the Government services which they will recommend as observers to the Secretary-General;

(b) The Secretariat of the United Nations will then select field observers from these names having regard both to their professional competence and geographical distribution;

(c) The Secretariat would finally be responsible to keep this list up to date.

The delegations of the United Kingdom and New Zealand were of the opinion that it was impractical from an administrative point of view for the United Nations Secretariat to keep this list current in such a way that it will be useful when an emergency occurs as the names appearing on the list may not be available when called up to serve.

The Canadian delegation, in a statement made on October 26th, suggested, as a compromise, that instead of the Secretariat being given the responsibility of keeping the panel up to date, the national Governments themselves undertake that responsibility. The Secretariat role will consist only of transmitting to the various Governments a statement of the qualifications required by the observers and the number of observers that will be required from each country. In this manner the Secretariat would have on its list only names of persons available for immediate service.

It was not necessary to introduce this suggestion as an amendment, as the representative of the United Nations Secretariat undertook to follow this suggestion in establishing the proposed panel of observers.

An amendment introduced by Israel seeking to place the United Nations field service at the disposal of United Nations missions, only at the request of the Security Council or the General Assembly, was withdrawn owing to lack of support.

A Lebanese amendment which would have

(a) Curtailed the functions of the field service personnel in favour of the local services;

(b) Authorized, in certain instances, the carrying of side-arms by field observers, and

(c) Made the names of the field observers subject to the approval of the state where they will be called upon to serve, was defeated.

The Canadian delegation voted against this Lebanese amendment on the ground that the United Nations missions should not have to rely primarily on the local services for protection; that field observers do not normally need side-arms and that impartiality of field observers could only be ensured if their selection could not be influenced by the country where they are called upon to serve.

The first resolution relating to the field service was adopted October 27th by thirty-eight in favour (including Canada) five against and eight abstentions. The resolution relating to the panel of field observers was adopted by twenty-eight in favour (including Canada) nine against and eighteen abstentions.⁶⁰

⁶⁰ Le 22 novembre 1949, l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies approuva (46 contre 5, et 3 abstentions) une résolution à l'effet que le secrétaire général avait l'intention d'établir un service de campagne, et adopta (38 contre 6, et 11 abstentions) une résolution demandant au secrétaire général de préparer une liste de candidats qualifiés pour ce service (Le Canada et les Nations Unies 1949, p. 87).

On November 22, 1949, the U.N. General Assembly approved (46 to 5 with 3 abstentions) a resolution taking note of the Secretary-General's intention to establish a Field Service and adopted (38 to 6 with 11 abstentions) a resolution requesting the Secretary-General to develop a list of qualified individuals for the service (Canada and the United Nations 1949, p. 84).

DESPATCH 150

Sir,

1. I would refer to your despatch No. 18 of 6 January† and other correspondence concerning the suggestion that Canada might place an item on the Agenda of the 9th session of the Economic and Social Council which meets this coming July in Geneva.

2. You will recall that Dr. [George F.] Davidson, in his letter of 23 November to the Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs,⁶¹ suggested among other things that it might be “of additional advantage to Canada during her absence from the Council if she were to demonstrate her interest in practical terms by placing one or two small but useful items on the Council Agenda for discussion at the two sessions in 1949.” It was later agreed that rather than make an effort to get several minor items on the Agenda of the Eighth Session, we should plan to introduce some matter of importance at the Ninth session. This is confirmed by you in your despatch No. 18.

3. After giving this matter further consideration and in the light of Mr. Grande's experience in observing the meetings of the Eighth Session of the Council, I should like to submit for your consideration the opinion that Canada should not place an item on the Agenda of the Ninth Session. From remarks which were made from time to time by various members of the Council it was quite apparent that most delegations fully appreciated our interest in the work of the Council by having an observer follow closely the proceedings of the Eighth Session. Indeed many times the question was asked "When is Canada going to again take its rightful place as a member of the Council?" Such delegations as those of the United Kingdom, the United States, and Australia seemed quite anxious that Canada should, in the near future again stand for re-election. It would seem that if we chose to do so there would not be much difficulty in our being re-elected. Indeed in my opinion most delegations would be very pleased to see us back. I would think, therefore, that whatever publicity we might have needed in order to help us get re-elected has already been achieved by means of our observing this past session of the Council, and I hope it will be possible for an observer to follow the Ninth Session of the Council which is to meet in Geneva.

4. This brings us then to the question of whether we should in addition place an item on the Agenda of the 9th session. It is our opinion that, for the reasons outlined above, this is not necessary from the point of view of establishing our continuing interest in the work of the Council. I would think that Canada, as any other member of the United Nations, should, of course, bring a matter to the attention of any of the organs of the United Nations if it is the considered opinion of the government that some item of international importance, especially if it directly affects Canada's interests, requires international action at a particular time. Unless there is some such matter which we think demands the attention of the Economic and Social Council this coming summer, it would not be in keeping with the principle expressed above if we were to bring some other matter to the attention of the Council at this time, no matter how helpful it might be. I would think that this principle is especially valid when a country is not a member of the Council. I say this realizing full well that, of course, any country has the right to raise an issue in the Council regardless of whether or not it is a member.

5. A further reason which I would advance for us not immediately to place an item on the agenda of the Ninth session in Geneva is that the Council's Agenda at that time will be even heavier than its Agenda at the 8th Session. This was pointed out by the President in his closing address. In addition to the Annual Reports of most of the regional commissions and specialized agencies, the Council will have on its Agenda the major world economic debate. The debate just held on this subject at Lake Success was of a preliminary nature only. Even more important and requiring more time will be the discussions arising from the reports which the Secretary-General is now preparing on technical assistance and economic development of under-developed areas. This is regarded by the Secretary-General as being a matter of outstanding interest and importance to the future work of the United Nations in the economic field, and obviously will take up a great deal of the Council's time. Therefore, if a non-member were to place a subject on the Agenda it would almost certainly not receive much consideration and indeed it might be postponed altogether.

6. I say all this because I do believe that the situation has changed since last November. There is one further point which I would like to mention and that is this. Dr. Davidson in his letter of November 23 pointed out that Canada's contribution in the past to the work of the Council has been largely a second-hand one. He calls this perhaps one of the greatest weaknesses of the Canadian contribution. Canada is not alone in this position. As a matter of fact in checking over the fifty-three agenda items of the 8th Session, it has been brought home to me that not one of these was an original item placed on the Agenda by any member government. They were all either in the nature of reports from the Secretary-General, the specialized agencies or regional Commissions, or had previously been raised by non-governmental organizations, such as the W.F.T.U. and the A.F. of L.

7. Summing up, I believe that the suggestion that Canada appoint an observer to attend the meetings of the Council during 1949 was an excellent one. I believe that this action has been appreciated by the members of the Council and its significance has been noted. It would be my opinion that Canada could get re-elected without much trouble if we chose to stand for re-election. I think that someone (perhaps from the office of our delegation to the European office of the United Nations) should observe the meetings of the 9th Session of the Council this coming July in Geneva. Finally, for the reasons cited above I would think that it is neither necessary nor desirable that Canada should, at this time, place an item on the agenda of the Council.

I have, etc.

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP ON THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

Background:

At the Ninth Session of the Economic and Social Council which opened on July 5, there will be considerable electioneering activity on the part of countries which hope to be elected, by the General Assembly in the fall, to the five Council seats which become vacant this year. The Canadian observer at the Ninth Session, Mr. N.F.H. Berlis, will certainly be approached both with requests for support and with inquiries whether Canada wishes to stand for election. Moreover, Dean Rusk of the U.S. State Department, in a recent conversation with Mr. Wrong, suggested that the U.S. would be glad to know whether Canada would accept election.

It is accordingly advisable to reach a decision on this point as soon as possible. I have prepared below brief notes which would perhaps be adequate if you wish to bring the matter up in Cabinet more or less informally. If, however, you prefer to have the material in the regular Cabinet document form, it can be recast.⁶²

Considerations:

1. There are a good many projects initiated or developed in the Economic and Social Council which are of considerable interest to Canada, both from a general point of view and on account of their financial implications. The most important of these at the moment is the programme of technical assistance in economic development.

2. When this programme of technical assistance in economic development and other similar projects are discussed in the Economic and Social Council, it is desirable that "giving" countries such as Canada should be adequately represented, since otherwise the "receiving" countries are likely to call a very ambitious tune without much thought for those who will eventually pay the piper.

3. The membership of both the United States and New Zealand terminates this fall. We have fairly reliable information that New Zealand will not stand again, and it is accordingly desirable that this seat should be filled by a "have" rather than a "have not" country.

4. During its first term of membership (1946–1948) Canada contributed a good deal to the development of a sensible and efficient approach to general budgetary and administrative matters. It is easier to have proposals modified and improved at the beginning, than to have to fight this battle in the General Assembly itself.

5. Canada can also do something to prevent the Council from becoming merely another forum of propaganda to the detriment of its proper functions.

6. The Departments of Finance and National Health and Welfare, which with External Affairs have the greatest interest in the Council's activities and have done a large part of the work entailed by Canadian membership, would both favour Canada's re-election to the Council.

7. From reports made by the Canadian observer to the Eighth Session, it appears that Canada would have a very good prospect of re-election.

8. The cost of sending delegates to the Economic and Social Council on the basis of one session in Geneva and one in New York is, in round figures, about $20,000 a year.

Recommendations

It is recommended:

1. that the decision be taken now to stand for re-election to the Economic and Social Council in the fall;⁶³

ELECTIONS TO THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

1. There are six vacancies in the Economic and Social Council to be filled at the General Assembly in the autumn. The retiring members are the Bielo-Russian S.S.R., Lebanon, New Zealand, Turkey, the United States and Venezuela.

The remaining members will be:

Members	Term of Office Until December 31st
Australia	1950
Belgium	1951
Brazil	1950
Chile	1951
China	1951
Denmark	1950
France	1951
India	1951
Peru	1951
Poland	1950
U.S.S.R.	1950
United Kingdom	1950

2. A list of states that might be supported by the Canadian Delegation in the elections to fill the six vacancies is given below with explanatory notes.

(i) United States In view of the important part to be played by the United States in the current programmes of technical assistance for economic development, it is most desirable that the United States should be re-elected to the Council. There is, I imagine, little doubt that the State Department will be counting on the re-election of the United States.⁶⁵

(ii) Canada A memorandum recommending that Canada should stand for election to the Council has already been submitted to you and approved.⁶⁶

(iii) Mexico We have been informed by the Mexican Government that Mexico is a candidate for election. Mexico has never been on the Council before. It is capable of making a sound contribution to the work of the organization and would be a reasonable choice to replace Venezuela. Considerable resentment would be caused amongst the Latin American countries if one of their number were replaced by a country from another geographical area. Haiti has solicited our support but it would obviously be far less useful in the organization than Mexico. Argentina has also asked for our vote but it seems preferable to us that one of the four Latin American members should be a country outside South America proper.⁶⁷

(iv) Iran Two "Near East seats"—Turkey and Lebanon—will fall vacant this year. Iran has notified us of its candidature and we have learned that the United States will "probably" support it.⁶⁸

(v) Soviet Satellites One of the two remaining seats will probably fall to a Soviet satellite. If it were decided to support a Soviet satellite, the choice might be between Yugoslavia and the Ukraine, both of which served a one year term in 1946. Present political conditions and tendencies in Yugoslavia may perhaps be regarded as weighting the scales in favour of that country rather than the Ukraine. Czechoslovakia has already served a two-year term of 1946–1947.⁶⁹

(vi) Pakistan One predominantly Moslem country (Turkey) and one country with a large Moslem population (Lebanon) will finish their terms on the Council this year. Even if Iran is elected, the Moslem countries may well press for a Moslem state to fill the sixth seat. The Pakistan Government has announced its candidature and has solicited our support. India is already on the Council and for political reasons within the Commonwealth it would, I believe, be very desirable for us to vote for Pakistan's election. This would tend to offset any jealousy which Pakistan might feel because of our support of India for the Security Council. Apart from these considerations, there is also a question as to just what the membership of China, which retains its seat until 1951, is likely to imply for the next two years. The possible transfer of Chinese support to the Soviet group might be counter-balanced in the Far East by the addition of Pakistan.⁷⁰

7. Whatever slate is tentatively decided upon, it will be desirable to discuss it as soon as possible with the United States and the United Kingdom.

UNITED NATIONS FELLOWSHIPS UNDER A PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Background

Resolution 200 (III), adopted by the General Assembly at the First Part of the Third Session, authorized the Secretary-General, among other things, to arrange for facilities for the training abroad of experts in under-developed countries through the provision of fellowships for study in countries which have reached a high level of technical development. The Secretary-General has now enquired whether the Canadian Government would be prepared to receive a small number of U.N. Fellows into the appropriate Departments of Government for short periods of technical training lasting from three to six months. The subjects included in the programme cover a wide range from medicine to statistical methods.

Considerations

1. Technical assistance in economic development has become a subject of rapidly increasing importance in the U.N. Point Four of President Truman's inaugural address, in which he indicated that the United States was prepared, through the U.N. and specialized agencies, to do much to make U.S. technological advances generally accessible, has intensified interest in the subject.

2. In view of this strong and continuing drive towards industrialization on the part of the "under-developed countries", it would be an obvious advantage to Canada ⁷¹ Les pays élus furent le Canada, la Tchécoslovaquie, l'Iran, le Mexique, le Pakistan et les États-Unis.

The countries elected were Canada, Czechoslovakia, Iran, Mexico, Pakistan and the United States.

2. In view of this strong and continuing drive towards industrialization on the part of the "under-developed countries", it would be an obvious advantage to Canada that advanced students from these regions should become familiar with Canadian methods and equipment.

3. If a programme of this kind could be successfully worked out, it would be a genuine and valuable contribution to international understanding.

4. The Canadian Government would incur no financial obligation by co-operating in the project, since the expenses would be borne jointly by the U.N. and the governments which nominate Fellows.

5. Officers of the Departments which deal with the various types of technical work in question have been consulted and have indicated that it would be possible to make arrangements to receive a limited number of Fellows for short courses in technical training.

Recommendations

It is recommended:

1. That the Secretary-General be informed that the Canadian Government is prepared to co-operate in carrying out this programme;

2. that in view of the number of other Government agencies which would be concerned, including the Civil Service Commission, the Department of External Affairs should be responsible for the co-ordination of the necessary arrangements.⁷²

On November 16, 1949, the General Assembly of the United Nations unanimously approved a resolution providing for an expanded programme of technical assistance for the economic development of under-developed countries. For the information of Cabinet, the attached memorandum has been prepared describing the purposes and mode of operation of the proposed Technical Assistance Programme, together with some of the reasons why a financial contribution from Canada may be recommended for your consideration at a later date.

2. The General Assembly resolution requests that all member governments make voluntary contributions to the Technical Assistance Fund. No objective has been set but the Canadian delegation estimates that the total amount of contributions will be about $30 million. The Technical Assistance Conference is to be convened by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, probably in mid-March 1950, to receive statements concerning contributions and to discuss the manner in which amounts from the Technical Assistance Fund are to be allocated to various specialized agencies, and to consider financial arrangements generally.

3. At the Conference, delegates will be invited to indicate as definitely as possible whether their governments will contribute and in what amount. Australia, New Zealand and a few other delegations have indicated that definite amounts have already been approved for contribution by their governments. The United Kingdom and France have stated that they will make substantial contributions in services and in non-transferable funds. President Truman, in his inaugural speech of January 20, 1949, and on several subsequent occasions, has stated that the United States will strongly support a programme of technical assistance for economic development.

4. Contributions may be in forms other than convertible currency. Consideration might be given to a Canadian contribution which would consist of a deposit in an account in Canada to the credit of the United Nations, withdrawals to be made from time to time for such purposes as may be agreed upon by the Secretary-General and the Canadian Government.

5. General instructions are now being drafted for the guidance of the Canadian delegation to the Economic and Social Council which begins February 7, 1950. Furthermore, the participating Specialized Agencies are beginning to make plans preparatory to the implementation of the Technical Assistance Programme. Accordingly, I have felt that it would be desirable to bring the subject before you at this time in order that Cabinet may be fully informed on this subject and may indicate its general support of the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance.⁷³

MEMORANDUM ON EXPANDED TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME

1. The primary purpose of the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme is to improve general economic and social conditions in under-developed countries. The proposal is not to provide relief, but to help these people help themselves.

2. Under-developed countries may be defined as countries in which the economy is generally of low productivity and where an extremely low standard of living prevails amongst the mass of the population. In particular, three countries of the Commonwealth, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, can be considered to be among the under-developed countries.

3. The methods of providing Technical Assistance include the following:

⁷³ Le Cabinet nota ce rapport et approuva la participation du Canada à la conférence des Nations Unies sur l'aide technique.

The Cabinet noted this report and approved Canada's participation in the U.N. Technical Assistance Conference.

(a) Training both in technologically advanced countries and at home in agricultural and industrial techniques, and in such basic administrative techniques as public finance and compilation of statistics;

(b) Survey missions to recommend what economic development can usefully be undertaken in an area;

(c) Setting up, when appropriate, pilot projects.

4. The Technical Assistance Programme is designed to recommend the type and degree of economic development which would be most suitable for the countries which may apply for assistance in increasing their economic productivity. In addition, the Programme would provide training personnel from the advanced countries and would also undertake to provide for the training of personnel from backward countries.

5. The country concerned must, however, make its own arrangements for obtaining the capital required to carry out the recommendations. The country being assisted must determine whether domestic capital, foreign private capital, foreign government loans or loans from the Inter-Bank for Reconstruction and Development are to be used. Some assurance that such funds will be available will normally be required before an extensive project of technical assistance is approved.

6. Applications for assistance originate with the government of the country concerned and are directed to any of the Specialized Agencies or the United Nations. Technical Assistance which involves more than one Specialized Agency is considered by the Technical Assistance Board (TAB) which is composed of the Directors-General of all participating Specialized Agencies.

7. The participating Specialized Agencies are:

Food and Agriculture Organization

International Civil Aviation Organization

International Labour Organization

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

World Health Organization

Other Specialized Agencies of the United Nations have indicated their unanimous agreement to participate in the Programme should their services be requested.

8. The Economic and Social Council meets only twice a year. Therefore, a Technical Assistance Committee, consisting of representatives of each of the eighteen countries comprising the Council, has been approved. Since Canada will be a member of the Council for three years beginning January 1, 1950, it may be expected that Canada will have a strong voice in determining the nature of the Programme and in ensuring its success. The terms of reference of the Technical Assistance Committee as set out in the resolutions of the Economic and Social Council include:—

(a) To make for the Council critical examinations of activities undertaken and results achieved under the expanded programme of technical assistance;

(b) To examine each year's programme presented to it by the TAB and report to the Council concerning it, making such recommendations as it may deem necessary;

(c) To interpret this resolution in cases of conflicts or questions submitted to it by the TAB, through its Chairman, and decide any such conflicts or questions;

(d) To receive reports from the TAB on progress and implementation of, and disbursements of funds under the expanded programme;

(e) To review the working relationships between the participating organizations and the effectiveness of the methods of coordination in connection with their technical assistance programmes, making recommendations when appropriate;

(f) To perform such other relevant functions as the Council may assign to it from time to time.

9. In addition, governments will have control over the expenditure of funds through their representatives both at the annual conferences and at meetings of the governing bodies of the Specialized Agencies.

10. Governments requesting assistance are, wherever possible, to meet all expenditures of local currency required. The Technical Assistance Fund is needed for payment of salaries of experts, costs of training in technologically advanced countries, and other items payable in foreign funds. For this reason, the estimated total amount required for the Technical Assistance Fund is comparatively small. The most important contributions, as one delegate to the United Nations expressed it, are "The know how and show how".

11. A number of cogent reasons for a Canadian contribution to the Technical Assistance Fund are included below.

(1) Canadian Support for the Technical Aid Programme at the General Assembly The resolution on technical assistance has been approved unanimously by the General Assembly and was supported by the Canadian delegation.

(2) To Encourage Investment in Under-Developed Countries One of the early effects of a successful programme should be to create in under-developed countries a suitable investment climate, particularly for United States private capital. At present those conditions do not exist and private capital is unwilling to take the risk. If, as a result of the Programme, United States investments abroad are substantially increased, the resulting circulation of United States exchange should be to the advantage of Canada.

In addition, the increase of United States investments abroad would do much to redress the chronic dollar deficit of the Sterling Area. Such a development would be in keeping with the resolution made at the Tripartite Financial Conference in Washington to encourage dollar investment in the Sterling Area.

(3) To Discourage the Growth of Economic Nationalism The successful development of this Programme would discourage the rise of economic nationalism and lead toward a more extended multilateral system in international trade. Technical experts, retained on the international level, would presumably not encourage the establishment of industries producing commodities which would not compete in price or quality with those produced in other parts of the world. Thus, the establishment of un-economic "infant" industries requiring to be protected behind high tariff walls would be discouraged. In consequence, international action in directing the development of new industry in backward countries, would serve as an additional step toward the evolution of a multilateral world trading system.

(4) To Develop New Markets for Canadian Products An increasing total volume of world trade is important to Canada. At present most under-developed countries are unable to buy from us. The era of extensive expansion of world trade by opening up new geographical regions is now drawing to a close; world trade must now look toward intensive expansion by increasing consumer demands. Improved economic and social conditions in under-developed countries should provide an important outlet for the products of Canadian agriculture and industry.

(5) To Develop Goodwill for Canada There is an advantage to Canada in having Canadian experts and businessmen assist in the development of other countries and in having persons from other countries visit Canada to learn techniques. Those who are being trained as leaders in the under-developed countries will presumably thereby be influenced in favour of Canadian-produced farm implements, machinery, etc., and furthermore future students, will likely follow earlier ones to Canada for training at their own expense. There should also be advantage to Canada from sending experts to under-developed countries who can in turn make recommendations to Canadian producers with respect to the sort of goods which are likely to prove most attractive to the foreign market.

(6) To Encourage Political Stability in Backward Countries There is an evident surge of peoples, particularly in Asia, seeking a more advanced state of economic and social well-being. This surge parallels the recent successful demands of countries in that area for complete political independence. The Technical Assistance Programme, from the point of view of the advanced countries of the west, is an opportunity to channel this new demand so that the under-developed countries will gradually achieve their purpose by evolution instead of revolution. If the latter should occur, world Communism would be quick to take advantage of it.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION ON ROAD AND MOTOR TRAFFIC

The Secretary-General of the United Nations has announced that there will be a conference on road and motor transport to be held not later than August, 1949, with the object of concluding a new world-wide convention on road and motor transport to replace two earlier conventions of 1926 and 1931 which are now obsolete and were applicable only to European states. The forthcoming conference is to be international, although it is apparent from the draft convention, and from U.S. comments upon it, that various of the proposed articles are not appropriate for adoption by the United States and Canada.

2. The conference will try to establish international rules for motor traffic, standardization of road signs and signals, regulations for trailers, agreements for motor registration, driving permits valid for all countries, and the conference will also be concerned with technical matters such as the design of road signals, brakes and lights, and the maximum weight and dimensions of vehicles which the signatory countries will allow on their sections of the international roadway network.

3. The United States government is planning to send a large delegation, in which will be included representatives of the American Association of Motor Administrators (a body which is composed of officials, from the forty-eight states, who are concerned with road and motor transport). In addition, the United States delegation will include representatives of the Departments of Commerce, Treasury, Customs, State, Transport, and officers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the Treaty Division.

4. Since the United States is taking a leading part in drafting the proposed convention, and since the convention will deal with many matters of passenger and freight motor traffic with which Canada and the United States are concerned, it is thought that Canada should be represented at this conference. The Deputy Minister of Transport has stated that Canada should be represented, although the interest of the Department of Transport in this matter is limited to its effect upon freight and passenger earnings of the Canadian National Railway.

5. Since the matters to be dealt with at the conference fall entirely within the competence of the provinces, the nomination of a Canadian delegation will be somewhat difficult. It is suggested to your consideration that there are four possibilities:

(a) That Canada be represented only by an observer from one of the missions abroad.

(b) That each of the nine provinces be invited to send a delegate, under the chairmanship of a representative of the Canadian Government.

(c) That two or three only of the provinces be invited to send delegates, to represent the provinces on the Canadian delegation.

(d) That the Canadian delegation consist of a representative named by the Canadian Government (possibly the Minister of Transport) advised by four other⁷⁴ expert persons also named by the Government and chosen from various parts of the country because of their special knowledge of road transport problems. It is probable, too, that the Canadian delegate should be advised by a representative of the Customs Branch of National Revenue. The provincial governments would be informed that the conference was taking place and would be sent copies of the agenda. They would be told of the arrangements being made for representation and it would also be stated that the Government would be glad to instruct the delegation to put forward any suggestions or proposals which the provincial governments wish to make. It would be made clear, however, that the Canadian delegation would have no power to sign⁷⁵ an international convention and that if any international covenant was approved at the conference, it would be referred to each province before signature and ratification.

6. It is suggested that the last possibility is the most desirable. It would be difficult to send a delegation representing all nine or ten provinces and it would be invidious to invite only certain provinces to take part in this conference. A Canadian delegation, however, composed of a representative of the Canadian Government and advised by four Canadian experts outside the Government service would be open to relatively slight objections on the part of the provinces.⁷⁶

7. If you agree with this suggestion, consideration will be given to the selection of four automotive and transport experts chosen from various parts of the country and also chosen, if possible, in such a way that highway construction interests, tourist interests, and traffic control interests would be indirectly represented.

UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ROAD AND MOTOR TRANSPORTATION,
GENEVA, AUGUST 23 TO SEPTEMBER 17, 1949

You will recall that on April 29 last you concurred in a recommendation of the Deputy Minister of Transport that the Canadian delegation to the above-mentioned Conference should be composed as follows:

The Minister of Transport, or his nominee, as Head;
Representatives of the Canadian Good Roads Association, the Engineering Institute of Canada and the Royal Automobile Club of Canada, as advisers;
An officer of the Department of Transport, possibly as Secretary.

2. The original decision to send a delegation to this Conference was taken on the strength of a letter dated January 29 from the Deputy Minister of Transport, who said he was convinced Canada should attend the Geneva meetings. On April 7 Mr. Lessard wrote that he had discussed the proposed composition of the delegation with his Minister, who asked him to inform this Department that the Department of Transport would be prepared to nominate one of its officers to head the delegation mentioned in paragraph one above.

3. On Saturday, May 14, Mr. Lessard informed the United Nations Division by telephone that he had been discussing this Conference further with the Minister of Transport and that Mr. Chevrier now had some doubts about the wisdom of sending a five-man delegation to Geneva, especially since the Department of Transport is only indirectly interested in the subject matter of the Conference. In view of this, Mr. Lessard agreed that you might wish to review the whole question of the nature of Canadian participation.

4. While the Road and Motor Transport Conference is under United Nations sponsorship, I do not think we should incur the expense of sending a delegation from Canada if the Department of Transport is not particularly interested. As you know, this Conference deals with matters under the sole jurisdiction of the Provinces and it is unlikely that Canada could ever ratify any Convention adopted at the meetings, since such ratification would be subject to the approval of all ten Provinces.

5. In view of the above, I recommend that the present plan to send a five-man delegation from Canada to the Road and Motor Transport Conference be abandoned and that Canadian participation in the Conference be limited to an observer or two from our European Missions. Without being empowered to enter into any engagements on behalf of Canada, these observers would be instructed to report back so that we could keep the Provinces fully informed of the proceedings and decisions taken.⁷⁷

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND OF THE PRESS

This is a brief report for information.

Since April 7 the Third Committee of the United Nations General Assembly has been debating two of the Draft Conventions produced by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information at Geneva in March and April, 1948. It has completed the text of a new draft convention incorporating, with a good many amendments, the substantive portions of the Draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of News, and the Draft Convention on the Institution of an International Right of Correction. The new draft convention is entitled "Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction".

Under the First (Geneva) Draft Convention—on the Gathering and International Transmission of News—contracting states would undertake to permit the widest possible access to news for all foreign correspondents on the same basis as for national correspondents. Under the Second (Geneva) Draft Convention—on the Institution of an International Right of Correction—contracting states would set up a procedure for the correction of erroneous reports. At Geneva the Canadian delegation voted in favour of both Draft Conventions, but made a reservation on Article 4 of the First Convention, which implied an acceptance of the principle of prior censorship in peacetime.

⁷⁷ Note marginale:/Marginal note:

Minister approves this recommendation—proceed accordingly May 16 A H[eeney]

J.A. Irwin, secrétaire de la légation à Prague, participa à titre d'observateur à la conférence de Genève.

J.A. Irwin, Secretary of the Legation in Prague, attended the conference in Geneva as an observer.

From the Canadian point of view some difficulties have arisen in connection with Articles 4 and 9 of the Draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of News.

Article 4. This article established the principle of free egress of news without censorship, except in the interests of “national military security”. Our objection in principle was undermined by the discovery that we had admitted the principle of prior censorship in peacetime in the International Telecommunications Convention of 1947. In the end Article 4 was amended to provide that censorship might be exercised only in the interests of “national defence”.

Article 9. This article, as adopted, contained a paragraph stating that “It is the duty of information agencies and foreign correspondents to report the facts without discrimination...”, etc. Our delegate objected to this paragraph on the grounds that enforcement of duties on correspondents would lead to the totalitarian practice of instructing correspondents as to what they might write.

The Mexican delegation which had sponsored the offending paragraph has, under pressure from the United States delegation, agreed to amendments which, if adopted, will meet our objections. Our delegate has been instructed to vote in favour of the whole Convention if these amendments are, in fact, adopted.

Since April 29 the Committee has been debating the Third of the Geneva Draft Conventions which proposed to establish certain basic freedoms of nationals and non-nationals alike to impart and receive information and opinions. The Committee has adopted a thoroughly unsatisfactory Article 2 which waters down the undertaking to guarantee the freedoms listed in Article 1. Prolonged discussion has led to a stalemate, and it is probable that further consideration will be postponed until the next General Assembly.⁷⁸

UNITED NATIONS SCIENTIFIC CONFERENCE ON THE CONSERVATION AND UTILIZATION OF RESOURCES

A memorandum dated April 13, recommending approval of Canadian participation in the UNSCCUR has been discussed by Cabinet without a decision being reached. It will be reconsidered at the Cabinet meeting on Monday, May 9.⁷⁹ Previously Cabinet had shown some reluctance to approve the submission. You may wish to make use of the following arguments in presenting this question to Cabinet. I understand that the Minister of Mines and Resources will not be present at Monday's Cabinet meeting. The Department of Mines and Resources are primarily responsible for organizing the Canadian delegation and have strongly supported Canadian participation. The Departments of Agriculture and Fisheries are also planning to participate in the Conference.

1. The Conference is intended to provide an opportunity for experts from all countries to exchange information and to become acquainted with each others' work on such matters as soil erosion, floods, crop failures, improved methods of mineral discovery, etc. The Canadian representatives should be expected to receive new information and ideas, to discover new sources of information, and to make useful contacts.

2. The Conference was suggested by President Truman and is being strongly promoted by the United States Government. Although we had originally been sceptical of the advantages of such a Conference, it has been our view that we could not decently refuse to participate, once the decision had been taken to hold the Conference.

⁷⁹ Lors de cette réunion, le Cabinet approuva la participation canadienne à la conférence et attribua la responsabilité de la composition de la délégation au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, au ministre des Mines et des Ressources, et au ministre du Commerce.

At that meeting, Cabinet approved Canadian participation in the conference and left the composition of the delegation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

3. So far as we know, most member countries of the United Nations will be sending delegations. It would be embarrassing for us, in view of our proximity to New York and in view of our special interest in and special understanding of the problems to be discussed, to be one of the very few countries not taking part. The Conference will almost certainly be accompanied by much publicity, and the absence of a Canadian delegation would probably be noted abroad and at home.

4. Much serious and competent preparatory work has already been done for the Conference. Members of five government departments, as well as members of the National Research Council, representatives of various Canadian industries, the scientific faculties of Canadian universities, and of the Ontario Research Foundation, among others, have been at work on the preparation of 23 papers.

5. While we are members of the United Nations "club", we ought to participate in its major activities. There may be activities proposed of which we do not entirely approve, but we ought to accept the majority decision and take part unless there are very strong reasons for our not doing so.

6. The proposed delegation has been carefully chosen to include, in addition to the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources and the Special Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, five delegates, each of whom is an expert in one of the fields to be covered. We could scarcely reduce the delegation below this minimum. It is intended that this group should be augmented by about 10 other specialists who would attend for shorter periods. If we are to put up the best possible team, it would be advisable not to cut the delegation. However, if it is necessary in order to secure approval, the delegation could be trimmed by reducing the number of extra specialists and the time which they should spend in New York.

RE-ELECTION OF A CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE TO THE NARCOTICS COMMISSION

The Economic and Social Council now in session at Geneva will be electing a complete new slate of members to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs. I think it would be desirable for the Canadian Observer to be informed of the Government's position regarding re-election to the Commission.

2. At its Eighth Session, the Council decided "The Commission shall be composed of 15 members of the United Nations which are important producing or manufacturing countries, or countries in which illicit traffic in narcotic drugs constitutes a serious social problem". Ten members of primary importance in these fields are to be appointed to membership of the Commission for an indefinite period until such time as they may be replaced by decision of the Economic and Social Council. The term of the other five members is to be three years. They will be eligible for re-appointment.

3. The present membership of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs is as follows: Canada, China, Egypt, France, India, Iran, Mexico, Netherlands, Peru, Poland, Turkey, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America, Yugoslavia.

4. Canada is a country in which illicit traffic in narcotic drugs constitutes a serious social problem. Figuring on the basis that a grain of any of the important narcotics costs $20 in the illicit market in Canada, it has been roughly estimated that, in order to maintain the appetites of the 2,000 addicts known in Canada, it costs the Canadian economy about $40,000,000 a year in terms of thefts, etc., by addicts. The estimates of the Narcotic Control Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare total $110,000 a year. The costs of maintaining the narcotic squads of the R.C.M.P. is considerably higher than this. The Archambault Report, analysing the cases of 188 recidivists who average 19 convictions each, estimated that they cost the Government $18,000 each for arrest, trial and conviction for a total of over $3 million. Their maintenance in jails, reformatories and penitentiaries amounted to another $1 million. These are pretty impressive figures for the 188 cases studied. Total costs for the arrest, trial and jail terms of first offenders and addicts convicted on other counts would be quite high. Altogether, Canada has a very considerable economic interest in keeping the illicit international traffic in narcotic drugs to a minimum.

5. Canada has had a long record of participation in international control of narcotic drugs by means of the eight multilateral international conventions, of the work of the League of Nations and United Nations. The Canadian representative on the Narcotics Commission, Colonel C.H.L. Sharman, speaks with authority second only to that of Mr. Analinger, U.S. Commissioner of Narcotics. Colonel Sharman was Chairman of the Commission for its first two years of operation under the United Nations. For varying reasons, not all countries have the same interest as Canada and the United States in maintaining the highest standards of control over the illicit international traffic in drugs. It would appear to be strongly in our interest to maintain membership in the Narcotics Commission. The Deputy Minister of National Health, Dr. Cameron, supports this view.

6. Colonel Sharman is the representative of the Narcotics Commission on the four-man Drug Supervisory Body which examines the narcotics estimates of countries. If Canada did not stand for re-election, the balance of this Body would be seriously upset.

7. From the informal discussions with representatives of the states now members of the Narcotics Commission, it is evident that all are anxious to have Canada re-elected to indefinite membership in the Commission. I think there is little doubt but that this will take place. Nevertheless, I shall be glad to have your approval for the issue of instructions to the Canadian observer at the present session of the Economic and Social Council to inform other delegations that Canada will stand for re-election to membership in the Narcotics Commission.⁸⁰

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP ON THE ECONOMIC AND EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

The term of office of Mr. J.J. Deutsch, the Canadian member on the Economic and Employment Commission, expires on December 31, 1949, and elections to fill the seat will take place at the present session of the Economic and Social Council.

2. The Department of Finance has recommended that we make an effort to keep a Canadian member on the Commission and has informed us that Mr. Deutsch is willing to stand for re-election. Mr. Deutsch has played a very active part in the work of the Commission and is fairly sure to be elected if he stands.

3. The Economic and Employment Commission was the first of the functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council to be established and was given a very wide mandate. Its work so far has been disappointing. The deficiency has been partly due to the organization forced on the Commission by the Economic and Social Council, which instructed it to set up two sub-commissions for the purpose of doing preliminary research and preparing proposals and recommendations for discussion. This procedure has not worked satisfactorily and the Commission, largely on the initiative of Mr. Deutsch, has now recommended that the sub-commissions be abolished, leaving the preparatory work to be done by ad hoc groups of experts in cooperation with the U.N. Secretariat. The other difficulty has been the proliferation of the regional economic commissions, which have been popular with the so-called under-developed countries because they are apt to be more responsive to the views and requirements of particular members or groups of members. Canadian policy has always been opposed to the multiplication of these regional organs. The usefulness of the regional commissions is to be reviewed by the United Nations in 1951 and the Department of Finance points out that it would be useful to have a Canadian member on the Economic and Employment Commission at that time for the purpose of doing what he can to check the growth of regional organs.

4. The Canadian observer at the Ninth Session of the Economic and Social Council has already, on ministerial instruction, been told to let it be known that Canada is a candidate for re-election to the Statistical Commission and the Narcotic Drugs Commission.⁸¹ I recommend that he be asked to take similar action with regard to the Economic and Employment Commission.⁸²

MEMORANDUM OF INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE FAO CONFERENCE, WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 21, 1949⁸³

1. Admission of Indonesia

In view of the fact that the United States of Indonesia has not yet come into legal existence, the Canadian delegation to the FAO conference may support this application for membership if it is understood that Indonesia would not become a member until it is a sovereign state. However, it would not be appropriate for the Canadian delegation to take the lead in delaying Indonesia's admission. Therefore, ⁸¹ Le Canada ne fut pas ré-élu membre aux Commissions sur les statistiques et sur la population, mais il continua à servir à la Commission sur l'économie et l'emploi, la Commission sociale, et la Commission sur les narcotiques. À la neuvième session du Conseil économique et social, le Canada fut élu pour la première fois membre de la Commission fiscale.

Canada was not re-elected to the Statistical and Population Commissions, but it continued to serve on the Economic and Employment Commission, the Social Commission and the Commission on Narcotic Drugs. At the Ninth Session of the Economic and Social Council, Canada was elected for the first time to the Fiscal Commission.

if the majority of "friendly" nations favour the Netherlands proposal for the immediate admission of Indonesia, the Canadian delegation should not oppose it and may vote in favour.

2. Election of Pakistan to Council of FAO

The Canadian delegation should support Pakistan's election to the Council provided such support would not entail opposition to the candidature of either the United Kingdom or China. Should this situation arise, the delegation should refer the matter to Ottawa before taking any further action.

3. International Investment and Financing Facilities

The Report on International Investment and Financing Facilities submitted by the FAO duplicates the Technical Aid Programme of the Economic and Social Council of the U.N. For this reason, the delegation should not support the acceptance of this report. Since the Technical Aid Programme would provide, in part, funds for the purpose of developing the agricultural productivity of under-developed countries, the delegation should urge that the report be withdrawn in favour of considerations under the Technical Aid Programme.

4. The Technical Aid Programme

The United States Congress has, as yet, not passed the "International Technical Cooperation Act" whereby the United States would provide the largest part of the funds to be made available to the proposed Technical Aid Board to carry out the Technical Aid Programme of ECOSOC. The Canadian delegation to the United Nations Assembly is, therefore, in concert with other delegations, endeavouring to postpone the Technical Aid Conference to March or April of 1950 when the attitude of the United States Congress will be clearer.

The Canadian delegation to the FAO conference should, therefore, avoid making any commitments binding upon Canada and should urge the discussion of ways and means for the coordination of the FAO Programme with the proposed Technical Aid Programme.

5. Permanent Site for FAO

The Canadian Government favours the establishment of the Permanent headquarters of the FAO on the U.N. site in New York City.

6. Scale of Contributions to FAO

The proposed increase in the Canadian percentage contribution from 4.12 per cent to 4.5 per cent is considered to be unwarranted. In this connection, the Government considers the figure of 4.12 per cent to be equitable. If the 1950 budget is approved, Canada's contribution under the existing rate (4.12 per cent) will be $205,000. Under the proposed rate of 4.5 per cent, Canada would be assessed $225,000.

The delegation should therefore oppose the proposed scale of assessments and should urge adherence to the principle that assessments be based upon the United Nations scale of assessments. This scale is based upon the capacity to pay of the member Governments, as related to the contribution made by the largest contributor, that is, the United States. In addition, the delegation should express the opinion that the imposition of a ceiling by the United States on its contribution to FAO should not be permitted to increase the per capita contribution of Canada to a point where it would exceed that of the United States.

Should the Canadian attitude not prevail, the delegation should reserve Canada's position and refer the matter to the Government for a final decision.

An expanded paper on this subject is appended to this memorandum as Appendix A.†

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO 32ND SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE, GENEVA, JUNE 8—JULY 2

Background

The 32nd Session of the International Labour Conference (established under the Labour Part of the Treaties of Paris, 1919) will be held in Geneva, Switzerland, from June 8 until about July 2, 1949.

The agenda of the 32nd Session calls for discussion of various general and topical labour problems such as those relating to the right to organize and bargain collectively, industrial relations and protection of wages. In addition, the Conference will discuss revision of certain international conventions relating to migration for employment, employment agencies and maritime matters.

The Canadian Delegation to the 31st Session of the ILO at San Francisco in 1948 was composed of twelve representatives, divided equally among government, employers' and workers' groups. It was the experience of the members of this delegation that, because of the length of the agenda at the San Francisco Conference, Canadian representation was not large enough to ensure complete and efficient participation in all discussions. The agenda for this year's Conference is at least as lengthy and, because of this, both employers' and workers' delegates have made representations for the Delegation to the 32nd Session at Geneva to be increased.

In view of the above, the Minister of Labour and the Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed that it would be advisable to include five representatives of each group in the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming Session. However, after this agreement had been reached, the International Labour Office added a further item to the agenda dealing with the revision of maritime labour conventions and it was considered appropriate to include, as an additional Canadian representative, an expert on maritime matters from the Department of Transport, who is already in Geneva as an adviser to the Canadian Delegation to the Diplomatic Conference for the Revision of Conventions Relating to the Protection of Prisoners of War. The names of the proposed delegates and advisers are included in the list which is attached to this memorandum as Annex I.† It will be noted that there are nominations of a technical adviser for the workers' group and of two advisers to the government group yet to be made.

Recommendations

It is therefore recommended as follows:

1. That authority be given for—

(a) Canadian participation in the above-mentioned Conference;

(b) Attendance at the Conference of six delegates and advisers representing the Government of Canada, five delegates and advisers representing the employers of Canada and five delegates and advisers representing the workers of Canada;

(c) Attendance of one delegation secretary and provision of such stenographic assistance as may be required from the Permanent Delegate of Canada to the European Office of the United Nations in Geneva.

2. That the necessary travelling and living expenses incurred in connection with the attendance at this Conference of the above-mentioned delegation be charged to the Department of Labour Vote for international labour conferences.⁸⁴

INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE 32ND SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE AT GENEVA—JUNE 8—JULY 2

Once again we are called upon to play the part of the conciliator in another phase of the running feud between Mines and Resources and Labour. The latest skirmish arises out of instructions to the Canadian delegation to the ILO Conference, with particular reference to the item on the agenda relating to revision of the 1939 Conventions concerning conditions of migrant labour.

⁸⁴ Le Cabinet approuva ces recommandations, le 9 mai 1949.
Cabinet approved these recommendations on May 9, 1949.

2. You will recall that on May 26 the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources asked us to convey to Geneva what he said were the agreed views of officials of his Department and of Labour on the proposed revision of these Conventions. His letter, which is attached,† said: "This matter has been discussed with the Deputy Minister of the Department of Labour, Dr. MacNamara, and he concurs in my views".

3. While we were still celebrating the apparent rapprochement between the two Departments, our festivities were rudely interrupted by the attached letter of May 31 from the Deputy Minister of Labour,† who now disagrees with Dr. Keenleyside's statement that agreement has been reached. Mr. MacNamara is, and I think with justice, disturbed at the implication in Dr. Keenleyside's letter that a Canadian vote in favour of a proposed new convention on migrant labour conditions should be made contingent on the approval of Mr. C.E.S. Smith, the delegation's technical adviser on Immigration. In addition, Mr. MacNamara correctly points out, in paragraphs 3 and 5 of his letter, two technical errors in the instructions which we were asked to send to Mr. Renaud.

4. I think we should avoid as far as possible getting involved in this particular phase of the Mines and Resources-Labour controversy and, if you agree, I should be grateful if you would sign the Instructions to Mr. Renaud as drafted in the attached despatch.† Mr. MacNamara's legitimate objections have been taken care of in paragraphs 8 and 9 while, on the other hand, Dr. Keenleyside's suggestion (in his letter of May 27) that Mr. Renaud, and not Mr. Goulet of the Department of Labour, should give his personal attention to this matter, has been followed by us. In addition, we have agreed with Mines and Resources that the general question of policy should be submitted to Cabinet, a procedure with which Mr. MacNamara appears to disagree.

5. If you approve, I should appreciate your signature on the attached letters to the two Deputy Ministers,† with which I have enclosed a copy of the Instructions to Mr. Renaud, without entering into any unnecessary discussion. I have discussed this matter with Mr. Chance, who concurs in the wording of the despatch to Geneva.

I.L.O. CONVENTION ON MIGRANT LABOUR; INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION

4. The Minister of Mines and Resources reported that Canada had participated in the preparation of the "Convention concerning the recruitment, placing and conditions of labour of migrants for employment, 1939" but had not ratified it. At the meeting at Geneva on June 8th, the I.L.O. would submit for approval a proposed convention on the same matter; a convention concerning personal effects and tools of migrants for employment; a recommendation concerning recruitment, placing and conditions of labour of migrants; and a model agreement on temporary and permanent migration for employment including migration of refugees and displaced persons.

The departments that had examined the conventions and recommendation felt they were too rigid and should not be approved. The United Kingdom had an alternative convention for submission which Canada could support.

It was recommended that the Canadian delegation be instructed:

- (a) to support the convention as submitted by the United Kingdom;
- (b) to take the position that the draft I.L.O. convention was too rigid and would operate as a deterrent to free migration; and,
- (c) to vote in favour of any other proposed convention or recommendation only if it was in accordance with the principles agreed between the departments which had been consulted.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 31, 1949—Cabinet Document 975).†

5. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources and agreed that the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming I.L.O. conference at Geneva be instructed accordingly.

I.L.O. CONFERENCE ON INDUSTRIAL DISEASES; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

I refer to your memorandum of July 7† and to your conversation of July 9 with Mr. Olivier about the Minister of Labour's recommendation to Cabinet concerning Canadian participation in the I.L.O. Conference on Pneumoconiosis and Silicosis to be held in Australia this year.

2. As you pointed out, there seems to be some misunderstanding on the extent of agreement already reached between the Departments of Labour and External Affairs with regard to the composition of the Canadian delegation, and, in view of this, it will be useful to review what has been done by all concerned in this matter from the day the Conference was first brought to the attention of the Canadian Government.

3. An invitation to send not less than two experts to the I.L.O. Conference was sent to the Department of Labour, with a copy addressed to External Affairs, on October 29, 1948. Before taking this matter up with this Department, the Minister of Labour wrote on November 5 to the Department of National Health and Welfare asking their opinion as to the advisability of Canadian participation. On February 7, 1949, Dr. Cameron, Deputy Minister of National Health, replied that his Department did not consider it necessary to send a representative to the Conference but that two experts from the Province of Ontario, Dr. Grant Cunningham and Dr. Riddell, might well represent Canada.

4. On February 10 Mr. Mitchell wrote to Mr. Pearson requesting his views on this subject and enclosing a copy of Dr. Cameron's letter. Mr. Pearson replied on February 19 that since the Department of National Health and Welfare appeared to have only a very limited interest in the Conference, there might be some question as to the necessity of sending Canadian experts to Australia, particularly in view of the expense involved. Mr. Pearson added, however, that it has always been our policy to give full support to the work of the I.L.O. and, moreover, that it is desirable that Provincial Governments should be kept abreast of the work of I.L.O. and should be given every opportunity to be represented when this can be reasonably arranged. In conclusion, Mr. Pearson suggested that Dr. Cunningham and Dr. Riddell might both be asked whether it would be possible for them to participate in the work of this Conference.

5. On February 22 Mr. Mitchell acknowledged Mr. Pearson's letter and informed him that the Department of Labour was writing the Provincial Governments to enquire if they wished to be represented at the Conference at their own expense. This letter made no further reference to Dr. Cunningham or Dr. Riddell.

6. On April 21, replying to a routine follow-up letter from this Department, Mr. Mitchell informed us that three Provinces (Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia) had written to state they would not attend the Conference and two (Ontario and Quebec) had advised that the matter was still under consideration. It was in this letter that Mr. Mitchell first mentioned the proposal by British Columbia that the Province would pay two-thirds of the expenses of a suggested B.C. delegate, Dr. C.H. Vrooman, if the Federal Government would pay the remaining one-third. Mr. Mitchell added that "no decision had been taken here on this question as yet".

7. Routine checks on the progress of arrangements for the Conference were made in the United Nations Division on May 25 and June 27, on which dates Mr. Olivier was informed by the Department of Labour that nothing further was being done, since replies from all the Provinces had not yet been received.

8. On July 5, Mr. Olivier was informed by Mr. Langille that the B.C. proposal was to be submitted to the Cabinet on the following day.

9. From the above, it is clear that despite the statement made in paragraph 2 of the Memorandum to Cabinet,† Mr. Pearson did not agree "that it was not essential that the Federal Government send a representative to this Conference". On the contrary, Mr. Pearson concurred in Dr. Cameron's suggestion that Dr. Cunningham and Dr. Riddell might be asked to represent Canada at the Conference (paragraph 4 above). In actual fact, the Department of Labour informed Mr. Olivier yesterday that no effort to get in touch with these two gentlemen had ever been made.

10. As you indicated in your conversation with Mr. Olivier Saturday morning, Mr. Pearson thinks that a representative of the Federal Government should, in fact, head the Canadian delegation to this I.L.O. Conference. In addition, it seems only reasonable that, if the Federal Government is to share the expenses of one Province's delegate, it should also be committed to do the same for all the other Provinces.

11. In the light of the above, I attach for your consideration a draft letter to the Minister of Labour† suggesting amendments to his Memorandum to the Cabinet of July 4† to provide for:

(a) nomination of a representative of the Federal Government as head of the Canadian delegation;⁸⁵

(b) submission to all the Provinces of the B.C. plan that the Federal Government should pay one-third of the expenses of provincial delegates.

12. I also attach for your signature, if you approve, a memorandum for Mr. Pearson⁸⁶ giving a brief review of the situation and submitting the proposed letter to Mr. Mitchell.

13. Relevant correspondence is flagged on File No. 74-AS-40 (attached).†

ILO CONFERENCE ON INDUSTRIAL DISEASES; CANADIAN DELEGATION

27. The Minister of Labour, referring to the discussion at the meeting of July 6th, recommended, after consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that a representative of the Federal government be named to head the delegation to the forthcoming ILO conference and that Dr. C.H. An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

28. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation submitted by the Ministers concerned and agreed that the delegation to the ILO conference on pneumoconiosis and silicosis, commencing February 25th, 1950 in Australia, be headed by a representative of the Federal government (possibly a member of one of the diplomatic missions in Australasia) and that Dr. C.H. RESPONSIBILITY OF I.R.O. FOR FINANCING TRANSPORT OF JEWISH REFUGEES FROM EUROPE TO PALESTINE

Introduction

1. I understand that Mr. Saul Hayes and other representatives of the Canadian Jewish Congress will be having an interview at three o'clock on Friday January 21, at which they will discuss the subject of financial assistance by I.R.O. to Jewish immigrants entering Palestine.

2. At the last Executive Committee meeting in Rome December 7-13, there was a serious divergence of views between the United States and the United Kingdom on this subject, the United States pressing to have I.R.O. assume financial responsibility for these immigrants. A special meeting was called for January 25 to deal with the matter.

Background

3. Very briefly, the background is as follows, Since May 18, 1948 the I.R.O., on the basis of an administrative decision, has refused to give financial assistance to the movement of immigrants into an area of hostilities such as Palestine. The Jewish Agency for Palestine and the American Joint Distribution Committee have moved large numbers of Jewish refugees into Palestine. In August the Director-General of I.R.O. announced that if the truce were followed by a genuine peace the I.R.O. would give favourable consideration to reimbursing the agencies for I.R.O. eligibles transported. The total of such eligibles moved between May 1 and September 30 is estimated at 44,395. The I.R.O. budget for 1948-1949 provided four million dollars for financing mass immigration movements to Palestine.

Present Position

4. The Canadian representative, Mr. J. Déry, is chairman of the Executive Committee. At the last meeting he worked, though unsuccessfully, to find some solution acceptable to both British and Americans. On January 12 we cabled him instructions that he was first, to attempt to obtain a postponement of the Executive Committee meeting, at least pending the outcome of the truce talks in Rhodes; second, if this was impossible, to work for a solution acceptable to both parties; third, if the matter was finally forced to a vote, to cast his vote against the assumption of responsibility by I.R.O., prefacing his action by a statement to the effect that the vote was based solely on present disturbed conditions in Palestine, which it is to be hoped are temporary, and that when these disturbed conditions have come to an end, Canada would be glad to vote in favour of I.R.O.'s assumption of responsibility.

5. Since these instructions were sent, it has become evident that a postponement of the Committee meeting will not be feasible. The U.S. is certain not to agree and in any case another very urgent problem—that of White Russian refugees in Shanghai—has been put on the agenda.

6. The State Department has made an appeal to the United Kingdom Government and to the Canadian Government (through our Ambassador in Washington) to reverse the present I.R.O. policy. We have been confidentially informed that the United Kingdom Government will not respond to this appeal.

7. The Director-General of I.R.O. and Mr. Désy informed us that with the exception of the United States members of the Executive Committee are opposed to a change of policy.

8. Articles appearing in the press during the last few days have indicated that the Jewish agencies are willing to go the limit in financing Jewish immigration into Palestine; that the Israeli Government is actively engaged in settling Jewish immigrants on land vacated by Arab refugees. The Israeli authorities have several times stated their intention to enter into agreements with Arab states for the exchange of Palestinian Arab refugees with Jewish residents of Arab lands who would be brought to Palestine and settled there permanently. It is Mr. Shertok's personal opinion that Arab refugees resettled in Arab countries should be compensated for property left in Israel, but in his statement to Mrs. Ann O'Hare McCormick on January 16 he made it clear that his government was not yet committed to this principle.

9. We had hoped to avoid adverse comment from Canadian Jewish groups by having the issue postponed so that the Delegation would not have to take up a position. It is now probable, however, that unless Mr. Désy's instructions are altered, he will have to vote against the assumption by the IRO of paramount responsibility for Jewish movements in Palestine.

DESPATCH 51

Rome, February 1, 1949

Sir:

I have the honour to submit my report relating to the Third Session of the Executive Committee of the IRO, opened at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, at 11 a.m., 25th January, 1949, and terminated at 6 p.m., 28th January, and over which I presided as the delegate for Canada.

2. The Committee gave considered attention and issued appropriate directives to the Organization's Administration, as to the policy to be followed and the action to be taken concerning each of the three important items covered by the Agenda (Document EC/16 of 21st January), namely:

(a) The evacuation from China of European refugees within the mandate of the IRO. (Report EC/17, and Resolutions EC/18/Rev.1 and EC/19, herewith)†

In answer to an off the record enquiry from the Director-General, as to whether Canada could accept some of these refugees, I replied in accordance with the terms of your telegram No. 11 of 24th January, † adding that the IRO would be apprised of the Government's decision as soon as possible.

(b) The eligibility of certain refugees in Greece and Italy for IRO assistance (Document EC/15)

This will be the subject of an Administrative Order, based on the Committee's views to be issued by the Director-General and distributed to all Governments members of IRO for their information, the main points being that:

(i) Persons of Italian customary language now in Italy, who were domiciled on 10th June 1940 in areas transferred from Italy to Yugoslavia under the terms of the Peace Treaty with Italy and who had not opted, before 15th September, 1948, to retain Italian citizenship, to be considered eligible for IRO assistance under para. 2, part 1 of Annex 1 of the Constitution, as persons who were outside their country of former habitual residence and, as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of the Second World War, were unwilling to avail themselves of the protection of the government of the country of their nationality or former nationality;

(ii) Persons whose reasons for not remaining in the territory transferred from Italy to Yugoslavia or for not opting to retain Italian citizenship were open to question, could be disqualified from receiving IRO assistance under the terms of para. 1 (e) of the General Principles of Annex 1, or paragraphs (e) and (d) of Section D of Part 1 of that Annex;

(iii) Similar rulings and procedure to apply to the alien refugees at present in Greece, who were of Greek ethnic origin and in regard to whom the Greek Government requested the assistance of IRO.

(c) The Immigration in the countries of the Middle East (Document EC/14, and Resolution EC/22 also herewith).†

3. I think it unnecessary to elaborate on the contents of the documents specifically mentioned in the foregoing and which are attached† for ready reference with copy of the Draft Report of the Secretariat,† except to outline the phases of the proceedings which led to the adoption of the Resolution EC/22 concerning the immigration of Jewish Refugees into Palestine.

4. As heretofore, four copies in English and two in French of the complete documentation on the activities of the Committee during the Session under review, will be forwarded to you by IRO, as soon as they are available. The Summary Records will show the line of argumentation propounded by the members of the Committee who participated in this debate.

5. When the question came up in the forenoon of 26th January, the statements made by the United Kingdom and the United States delegates reflected the same divergent viewpoints in evidence at the Second Session of the Committee held at Rome last December. The United States, Australian and Chinese representatives declared their intentions to approve the Report and Recommendations of the Director-General EC/14, and it was a foregone conclusion that the Venezuelan representative had instructions to do likewise. The other delegations would not do so unconditionally. The Chair was determined that a transactional solution had to be found which could meet unanimous approval, or at least as broad a majority as obtainable.

6. The overall principle of IRO's responsibility for the resettlement of eligible refugees to Palestine was not contested. There are budgetary provisions limiting the financial assistance which can be rendered. The essential point was to ascertain that any action to be undertaken by IRO would not interfere with the peace negotiations by the Conciliation Commission in the Middle East. With this aim in mind, and after private consultations, I prepared a Draft Resolution (Document EC/20 enclosed)† which was in full accord with the instructions contained in your telegram No. 16 of 22nd January† (sent to Rome). There is no foundation in this action for the allegations made by the Canadian Jewish Congress referred to in your telegram No. 13 of January 26th.†

7. This Draft Resolution was tabled as a proposal emanating from the delegations for Canada, Belgium and Norway, at the beginning of the afternoon meeting of 26th January, when both the delegates from France and the United Kingdom stated their reasons for rallying to this proposal. However, it was opposed by the four other members of the Committee. By the end of that meeting, the French representative effected a sudden volte-face and declared that he would adopt the Director-General's Recommendations provided assurance were given that the thousands of Jewish refugees in France on transit permits would receive priority of movement to Palestine. The Director-General voiced then some measure of agreement to the request of the French delegate who confirmed his change of attitude, thus reversing the situation. As it was getting late, the meeting was adjourned and consideration of Resolution EC/20 postponed.

8. The two subsequent resolutions (Annex I and Annex II),† the text of which was sent to you by telegram No. 6 [of] 27th January,† were the outcome of a great deal of further informal negotiations. They were presented as a substitution for EC/20 and had the tacit assent of the Belgian, Canadian, French and Norwegian delegations, as well as that of the United Kingdom representative who had procured the authorization of his Government.

9. Meanwhile, on 27th January, the United States delegate had tabled Draft Resolution EC/21, copy of which is enclosed.† He asked for priority of consideration when official discussions were resumed on 28th January, but the Committee decided for continuation of the debate on the two resolutions substituted for EC/20. By that time I had received your latest instructions encouraging my efforts.

10. At this juncture, the Chinese delegate informed the Committee in effect that he was satisfied with the substance of these two resolutions and would accept them subject to clarification. The United States delegate then submitted a re-draft combining both into one (Annex III),† but gave to understand that his action in doing so was only to bring a clearer picture of the meaning of the proposal before the Committee and that he could not vote for the text he had prepared. The French representative immediately expressed the opinion that all members were of the same mind as to the end to be achieved, whatever the variance in the procedure, and that another attempt at conciliation might bring fruitful results.

11. Finally, following much exchange of suggestions in private during adjournments, the Chairman produced Resolution EC/22, which was put up for vote in three sections, the preamble and the reservations were approved unanimously, whereas the United Kingdom delegate voted against the adoption of the Director-General's recommendations and abstained on the whole, the resolution having carried eight votes to one abstention.

12. As it stands, the decision allows payment of transport costs to the extent of $4,000,000 for the financial year 1948/49, as foreseen in the Director-General's recommendations, and subordinates payment of transportation costs of persons emigrating to Palestine after 31st January 1949, to the results of consultations with the Conciliation Commission.

13. Before closing its Session, the Committee gave some thought to the liquidation of IRO at the expiration of its mandate and what might be envisaged for the post IRO period. The Director-General would become from all Governments members an expression of their views and intentions, as well as guidance in the matter.

14. May I add that the Director-General informed the Canadian delegation that he had received the report from his Executive Officer detailed to enquire into the situation of the Estonians in Sweden. The method of affording IRO assistance for the Transport of these refugees who wish to emigrate to Canada, necessitates careful approach. In any event, Mr. Tuck is writing presently to Dr. Keenleyside in this connection.

15. The next Session of the Executive Committee is scheduled to convene at Geneva on 24th March, 1949.

I have, etc.

FINANCING BY I.R.O. OF JEWISH IMMIGRATION INTO PALESTINE⁸⁷

The I.R.O. on May 18, 1948, stopped paying the transportation costs of Jewish immigrants into Palestine on the grounds that the country was an area of hostilities. Another reason, not openly expressed, was that the influx of Jewish refugees and other causes had driven many thousands of Arabs out of Palestine and that the Government of Israel had made no move to assume responsibility either for relief or repatriation of these persons.

2. There has been heavy pressure on the Executive Committee, both from the United States and from private Jewish organizations, to reverse this decision. Jewish groups in Canada have also made strong representations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

3. At the last meeting of the I.R.O. Executive Committee in late January, a Canadian sponsored proposal was adopted which instructed the Director-General, before resuming payment, to ask the Conciliation Commission for an assurance that this action would not interfere with the execution of the Commission's task. The United Kingdom strenuously opposed the resumption of payments by I.R.O.

4. The Conciliation Commission has now refused to give an opinion on the grounds that the question is outside its competence. The Director-General, at the Executive Committee meeting in Geneva tomorrow, March 25, will therefore propose that I.R.O. resume payment as from February 1.

5. It does not appear that any useful purpose would be served by instructing Mr. Désy to continue his opposition to the resumption of payment by I.R.O. Many thousands of Jewish refugees are now pouring into Palestine, not only from I.R.O. camps in Europe, but also from North Africa, Bulgaria and countries of east Europe. The effect of a continued refusal on the part of I.R.O. might, therefore, be to leave Jews in I.R.O. camps who might have gone to Palestine while permitting other Jews, for whom the United Nations have no responsibility, to make their homes in the Middle East.

6. I accordingly attach for signature, if you approve, a telegram to Mr. Désy† suggesting that he support the Director-General's proposal, but make some statement to the effect that the State of Israel should accept some responsibility for the fate of the displaced Arabs.

FUTURE INTERNATIONAL MACHINERY TO CARE FOR REFUGEES

I. General Background:

The question of future international action to care for refugees and stateless persons is on the agenda of the General Council of I.R.O., the second session of which opens in Geneva on Wednesday, March 30. Mr. Désy has requested instructions as to the position he should take on the recommendations of the Director-General for dealing with the problem. Certain aspects of the matter will also come up at the Ninth Session of the Economic and Social Council and thereafter at the Fourth Session of the General Assembly in September, and it is thus important that Canadian policy should be consistent from the beginning.

The subject has two related parts, first, procedure for the termination of the present work of I.R.O. itself, and second, the international machinery that may be required thereafter.

II. Termination of the Present Work of I.R.O.

The present terminal date for I.R.O. is June 30, 1950. There is no constitutional requirement to this effect, but all financial calculations have been made on this basis. Owing to continuance of political difficulties in Europe, the numbers of refugees applying for assistance and qualifying under I.R.O. rules have increased to an extent not originally foreseen. If new registrations are refused after December 31, 1949, it is estimated that by June 30, 1950 approximately 1,450,000 persons would have been repatriated or resettled, that is to say, almost two and one-half times the number of refugees which came under I.R.O. care when it assumed its mandate in July, 1947. Nevertheless it is expected that on June 30, 1950 about 370,000 persons will still be registered with the organization.

To deal with the situation outlined above, the Director-General makes the following recommendations:

1. Applications for registration to be refused after December 31, 1949;
2. Care and maintenance to be discontinued after June 30, 1950;
3. Resettlement and repatriation program to be continued for one year (to June 30, 1951);
4. Legal and protection program to be continued (this is dealt with more fully in Sections 3 and 4).

If this proposal is adopted, the Director-General expects to repatriate or resettle a further 195,000 refugees, leaving a "hard core" of about 175,000 (for further suggestions regarding this see sections 3 and 4). The estimated cost of this extension of the program would be about $55,000,000. The Canadian share, calculated on the same basis as at present, would be just under two million dollars.

III. Continuing Refugee Problems after June 30, 1951

Continuing refugee problems fall into two groups, those connected with the work done by I.R.O., and those which have been dealt with by one kind of international machinery or another since the First Great War.

The first group concerns responsibility for the "hard core" of 175,000 refugees expected to be left by June 30, 1951 and also legal protection and assistance in readjustment for those refugees for whom I.R.O. has at any time assumed responsibility. It shades into the second group, which centers in the problem of statelessness, however and whenever acquired. This problem has been under consideration by the Secretary-General of the United Nations who has suggested, for examination by the Ninth Session of the Economic and Social Council, four possible ways of dealing with it. Whichever of the suggested methods for dealing with statelessness may be chosen, it would apply equally well to the residual problems of I.R.O.

IV. Choice of Methods for dealing with continuing Refugee Problems

Two of the methods suggested by the Secretary-General, that is the creation either of a unit within the Secretariat or of a semi-autonomous part of that body charged with the responsibility for refugee problems, would mean that the cost would be borne by the U.N. budget and this shared by all members of the organization. The other two suggestions—continuation of I.R.O. in a modified form, or the creation of a new specialized agency—would probably concentrate financial responsibility in a smaller group. In particular a continuation of I.R.O. would mulct still further the countries which have already made a heavy financial outlay.

The arguments used in favour of continuing I.R.O.—use of the experience and administrative machinery already in existence—are not impressive, since there is no obvious difficulty in absorbing into the Secretariat as much as may be needed.

On the other hand, there might be something to be said for retaining the "voluntary principle" wherever possible, as an antidote to the tendency to saddle the U.N. budget with numerous projects enthusiastically supported by those members whose voting power considerably outweighs their financial generosity. This argument does not, however, apply with full force to a problem so truly international in its implications as that of statelessness.

There is also the consideration that, if I.R.O. functions were returned to the United Nations, the Soviet bloc which has bitterly resisted all efforts at resettlement (as opposed to repatriation) might be able to exercise more influence on policy toward refugees. By 1951, however, if we are still on the comfortable side of chaos, the residual resettlement problems should be small enough to make this argument of minor importance.

V. Recommendations

It is recommended that Mr. Désy be instructed to support, at the I.R.O. General Council, a solution which would meet the following requirements:

1. Provided that the other members agree, and adequate financial support is assured, the mandate of I.R.O. should be continued to June 30, 1951, operations being on the reduced scale proposed in the Director-General's report, and financial commitments kept within the limits there suggested.

2. Every effort should be made before June, 1951 to deal with the expected "hard core" of 175,000, all the methods outlined in the Director-General's report (GC/W/3, Paris 29-30) being fully explored.

3. After June 30, 1951, the continuing refugee problems should become a direct responsibility of the United Nations, any division or semi-autonomous agency set up within the Secretariat being urged to make the fullest possible use of the experience gained and the facilities developed by the I.R.O.

FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE CONTINUANCE OF I.R.O TO JUNE 30, 1951

I understand that, since you wish to take up in Cabinet the recommendations regarding the extension of the I.R.O. mandate to June 30, 1951, which were contained in my memorandum of March 28, you would like some further details regarding the financial implications of these recommendations.

The Director General has recommended that the I.R.O. continue to accept applications for assistance up to December 31, 1949, and that the resettlement and repatriation programme (not the care and maintenance programme) be continued to June 30, 1951, which is one year beyond the term originally proposed. It would, of course, be possible to urge that the I.R.O. go out of existence on June 30, 1950, and that no further responsibilities be accepted for resettlement and repatriation operations after that date. In this case the problem would resolve itself into that of statelessness which would presumably require only a small administrative type of machinery and would not call for financial comparison with the Director General's proposals for a continuance of the operational programme.

Any comparison must, therefore, be between the continuance of the repatriation and resettlement programme for one year under the auspices of I.R.O. and the transfer of that programme for one year to the United Nations itself. The figure of fifty-five millions given as an estimate of the cost of this programme by the Director General is based on the assumption that it would be carried out by I.R.O. The total cost, if carried out directly by the United Nations, is not known and would not necessarily be the same. Assuming for purposes of comparison that it would be the same, the Canadian share would be almost identical in each case. The total annual budget of I.R.O. is one hundred and fifty-five million, of which Canada pays 3.2% to the administrative budget and 3.5% to the operational budget. Since our share of the United Nations budget is 3.2%, the difference, as stated above, is slight. This arises from the fact that the United States pays 39.89% of the administrative budget, and 45.75% of the operational budget of I.R.O.

A further consideration which might weigh against any attempt to have the United Nations assume the costs of a resettlement and repatriation programme from 1950–51 is that there would undoubtedly be strenuous opposition from the more than forty United Nations members who have so far got off scot free.

FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

I understand that the question of the Canadian attitude towards a one year extension of the I.R.O. mandate will be discussed in Cabinet on Thursday, April 7. The General Council of I.R.O. has been meeting in Geneva since Tuesday, March 29, and Mr. Désy has asked for instructions on this point at the earliest possible moment. My memorandum of March 29, addressed to Mr. Pearson, gives the background on this matter in some detail, but I have listed below a few additional considerations which you may wish to bring forward when the subject is discussed in Cabinet, since an extension of the I.R.O. mandate would mean an additional Canadian contribution to the organization of between one and a half and two million dollars.

An extension of the life of I.R.O. is desirable for the following reasons:

1. Though the I.R.O. has, from the beginning, been savagely attacked by the countries of the Soviet bloc, it has efficiently carried out a humanitarian task of great value. In the first eighteen months of operation, up to December 31, 1948, almost half a million refugees had been resettled or repatriated.

2. For political, as well as humanitarian, reasons, it is most important that the large numbers of persons in Europe who are still, through no fault of their own, homeless or stateless, should not be turned adrift to form a dangerous source of continuing unrest and discontent.

3. From the purely Canadian point of view, the I.R.O. has been of considerable help in enabling this country to choose immigrants of good character who will in most cases be valuable citizens.

4. The operations of I.R.O. are in some cases actually of financial benefit to Canada. For example, some Canadian ships are used in transporting the refugees. Moreover, I.R.O. has given an undertaking that in the coming fiscal year (July 1, 1949—June 30, 1950) it would be willing to take the entire Canadian contribution in Canadian wheat. During the current fiscal year up to one million dollars of the total Canadian contribution of $5,425,000 is being taken in Canadian commodities.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, June 7, 1949

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO A SPECIAL SESSION OF THE GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION
JUNE 28—JULY 2, 1949

General Background

A special session of the IRO General Council has been called for June 28 in order to discuss plans for the termination of IRO. The Director-General's preliminary recommendations on this subject were discussed at the second session held March 29—April 8 and as a result of the views expressed at that time he has now submitted a revised report.

Suggested instructions for the Canadian delegation covering each item of the report are attached as Annex I† to the present memorandum. They have received the concurrence of the Departments of Labour and Mines and Resources. The principal points are as follows:

- (1) Termination of IRO's resettlement and repatriation operations as soon as possible after June 30, 1950;
- (2) Relaxation of immigration standards by the receiving countries to make this possible;
- (3) Financial provision for the "spill-over" period after June 30, 1950 (financial statement to be presented to the Council);

(4) Arrangements, including financial provision, for the care of the "hard core" of refugees permanently unfit for resettlement or repatriation.⁸⁸

Recommendations

With regard to Points (1) and (2) above the principal recommendations are as follows. The Canadian delegation should support the recommendation that the IRO terminate its resettlement and repatriation operations as soon as possible after June 30, 1950, but should indicate that Canada, which has already made one of the major contributions to the solution of the refugee problem, is not prepared to give an undertaking to make any general relaxation of immigration standards, though willing to continue the exercise of leniency in special cases.

Point (3), the question of financial provision for the period after June 30, 1950, arises because the IRO's original budget was drawn up for three years ending on that date. The total yearly budget is about $155 million of which the Canadian share has been about 5.4 million each year. The Director-General's detailed financial proposals for the "spill-over" operation will be presented only at the session. On the basis of his earlier recommendations, however, it seems likely that the total cost of a winding-up operation will be not more than $55 million. Provided all the present members agree to co-operate, the Canadian share of this supplementary budget would probably be between 1 million and 1.5 million. The necessity for this extension of the organization's mandate arises in large part from the prolonged political uncertainty in Germany and elsewhere, the early transportation difficulties of the organization, and the delay in the authorization of the United States reception programme. Under the Director-General's proposals no new eligibles will be accepted after October 1, 1949 and operations after that date will therefore be a winding-up process. Since it is the opinion of the responsible Canadian officials that the Director-General's estimates err on the side of optimism, a spill-over after June 30, 1950, appears to be unavoidable. It is accordingly recommended that, provided the other members agree and the Director-General's financial proposals appear as a whole to be sound, Canada should be prepared to support an extension of the IRO mandate within the financial limits originally proposed by the Director-General.

Point (4), the provision for the so-called "hard core", relates to refugees who owing to age, disability, disease and other causes, are permanently unfit for resettlement. It is recommended first, that the Canadian delegation should urge the desirability of examining very carefully the extent to which the local economy, chiefly in Germany and Austria, could absorb these groups, bearing in mind that the presence in Germany and Austria of very large numbers of "Volksdeutsche" refugees may well reduce to comparative insignificance the residual problem of IRO, which may total about 175,000 persons. It is further recommended that Canada should support the efforts now being made to negotiate with local authorities, voluntary agencies, and interested governments for the permanent care of specific groups of hard core persons (e.g. village settlements for chronic T.B. cases) and should be prepared, when such arrangements are further advanced, to consider the possibility of some form of financial contribution to the upkeep of certain groups.

Composition of Canadian delegation

It is proposed that the Canadian delegation should be as follows.

Head of delegation	R.M. Macdonnell, Charge d'Affaires a.i., Czechoslovakia.
Delegate	W.P. Black, Senior Representative of the Department of Labour, Canadian Immigration Mission, Germany.
Delegate	O. Cormier, Department of Mines and Resources, Officer in Charge, Canadian Immigration Mission, Germany.

Mexico, April 22, 1949

HIGH FREQUENCY CONFERENCE NO. 11

Sir,

I have the honour to submit a final report on the International High Frequency Broadcasting Conference held here under the auspices of the International Telecommunication Union. The Conference began on October 22, 1948, and lasted until April 10, 1949, when a final act, the Mexico City Agreement, was signed by 51 of the 69 countries participating in the Conference.

2. This summary is not an exhaustive review of the work of the Conference. It is intended primarily to give the political background against which negotiations during the latter weeks of the Conference were carried out. As such it merely supplements my previous reports, as well as those of Mr. C.J. Acton of the Department of Transport and of Mr. Donald Manson and Mr. William Richardson of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

3. Since my last report, No. 10 of February 16, 1949† (which dealt mainly with the United States and U.S.S.R. draft frequency assignment plans submitted to the Conference) the main activity of the Conference was the actual drawing up of a Plan allotting tentative but concrete frequency-hours to participating countries. The difficulty of the task can be gauged from the fact that the number of channel-hours that could be carved out of the section of the spectrum with which the Conference dealt, was of the nature of 5,500, whereas the frequency demands of participating countries totalled some 15,000 channel-hours.

4. As I have reported, the first four months of the Conference had been given over to the establishment of general principles which might be used as a base for equitable distribution of frequency-hours among the countries of the world and of technical ones for the maintenance of sound standards for high frequency broadcasting. General principles, technical standards and individual frequency requirements, once approved by the appropriate Committees, were passed on to the Plan Committee (Committee 6) for its guidance in elaborating a suitable frequency assignment Plan.

5. General principles took the longest time and when at last they emerged in the form of Document No. 589,† copy of which has been forwarded to you, they comprised practically every conceivable factor which any country could propose as the basis for the assessment of requirements and assignments. Because of its catholicity, Document 589 was unanimously approved but for the same reason its value was purely "platonic", a term much used at the Conference. Although it was formally passed on to Committee 6 for its guidance, it served no purpose other than that of a compendium of all the views expressed (including the most fantastic) which delegations could, and often did, quote with equal appropriateness in support of opposing contentions.

6. It might be well to point out, at this stage, that the task of the General Principles Committee (Committee 3) was rendered well nigh impossible because its meetings were used as a forum for the expounding of diametrically opposed political concepts of the Soviet bloc, on the one hand, and of the rest of the world, on the other, concerning the uses to which shortwave broadcasting should be put and the principles upon which it should be based.

7. After four months of wrangling over general principles, of reviewing individual requirements and of playing politics, a Plan Group was finally selected by Committee 6, in order to assign frequencies to participating countries on a tentative basis. It was made up of the following nations: France, India, Mexico, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States. This group sat behind closed doors, much to the displeasure of the other delegates, especially the Latin Americans, to whom this secrecy was "democratically" unsound and indefensible. It was finally decided in Plenary, after hours of discussion, to publish individual assignments as they emerged. From that time on, Plan Group sessions were open, as in the case of other groups.

8. Interpreters' gossip had it that proceedings in the Plan Group were largely on a "scratch-my-back-and-I'll-scratch-yours" basis. In other words, the Plan Group was effectively assigning frequencies on a very "unprincipled" basis. However empirical, the methods used by the Plan Group did produce a first draft, which, when considered in the light of the difficult conditions under which it was elaborated, was really a noteworthy accomplishment. As was to be expected, of course, the first draft aroused universal protest, real or simulated. The Group's real achievement, however, was that it brought the Conference down to earth and gave it a realistic orientation by turning its attention from abstraction and noble principles to concrete plan making. The presentation of the first draft served to narrow subsequent discussions and resulted in a universal demand for "revision".

9. This revision was assigned in early March to what, in effect, was the Plan Group with two major innovations. Firstly, the Plan Group was expanded to include the following countries: Pakistan, Portugal, Roumania, and Uruguay; secondly, the Plan Revision Group (PRG), as it was called, was given its mandate, not by Committee 6, but by the Plenary Assembly itself.

10. The political manoeuvring that went on before the PRG was formed is rather interesting. The U.S.S.R. had, by use of pressure, secured Roumania's accession to the Group. Matters became more complicated, however, when, for reasons of prestige, the Pakistan delegation achieved, by adroit lobbying, representation on the PRG in spite of Indian and United Kingdom opposition. To lessen the possibility of predominant Soviet influence within this Group, (the Pakistan delegate having given some support to the Soviet formula of "area, population and number of languages" because it suited his case, was, unjustifiably, I think, suspected of being amenable to Soviet influence), the United Kingdom and the United States got Portugal and Uruguay included in the Group's membership to offset any possible new alignment.

11. This enlarged Group was given instructions by the Plenary Assembly to work in close collaboration with Working Group "D" of Committee 6 (WG 6D) which had busied itself with exploring the possibilities of frequency sharing. This last Group performed a useful piece of work for it, in effect, increased the number of channel-hours available from some 5,500 to a total close to 8,000. PRG and WG 6 D did in fact work in very close collaboration and, by dint of repeated interviews with delegations, during which adjustments were made on the spot, produced a revised Plan.

12. This revised Plan, when finally presented to the Plenary Assembly, was accepted by 51 countries, out of 69 represented, the Soviet Union (and satellites) and the United States being the most significant non-signatories.

13. The refusal of the United States to sign the plan caused great consternation among the delegates. When the United States delegate made his formal rejection speech, he based his refusal largely on the "technical deficiencies of the Plan" and on the fact that "the United States was not accustomed to being placed tenth on the list of results achieved at international conferences". In concluding, he announced that he would explain his objections more fully at a later date. This "explanation" turned out to be a violent anti-Soviet tirade which threatened to disrupt the Conference on the eve of closure; the Soviet delegations ostensibly felt so incensed by the United States accusations of bad faith that they walked out of the Plenary to the last man. A copy of this United States declaration is attached.†

14. The reasons behind the United States attitude, however, seem to run much deeper. As explained in Report No. 10 of February 16, the plan proposed by the United States, and submitted months after the U.S.S.R. plan, was a compromise allocation established on very high technical standards which, accordingly, kept their own (197 channel-hours) and other frequency assignments, as well as channel sharing, at a minimum. The final Conference Plan, on the other hand, was built on lower standards in order to increase the global figure for channel-hour availabilities and to meet as many frequency demands as possible. The United States never really subscribed to these lower standards and hoped until the very end that their views would prevail.

15. Once it became clear that the Conference would adopt neither the high standards that they advocated nor their Plan as presented, the United States made a very serious mistake in Conference tactics: they never formally and categorically announced that the allocation which they had given themselves in their own plan was below their real requirements and that, if an assignment Plan was to be established on debased standards, they felt entitled to receive a higher number of frequency hours, a number more nearly approximating their real needs than the "sacrifice" 197 hours which they had allotted themselves.

16. When, therefore, the United States came forward with their rather intemperate denunciation of the final Plan, most delegations were left wondering how in logic they could protest when, alone of the major powers, the United States had had their initial requirements of 197 hours fully satisfied, with the whole of that allocation in the "critical" broadcasting bands such as the 15 and 17 megacycle bands. Further, it was generally admitted that, had they requested that their allocation be padded with channels in the non-critical bands (the 6, 21 and 26 megacycle bands) it could easily have been done as there were, so to speak, channels going abegging in those bands. When comparing the Canadian allocation of 200 hours with that of the United States, it must be borne in mind that Canada obtained only 40-odd channel hours in the critical bands, the remainder of our channel hours being mostly in the 6 megacycle band.

17. The behaviour of the United States delegates was indeed puzzling and may have been due to a conflict of authority within the delegation itself. It is known that considerable disagreement existed among the 30-odd members of the delegation, split up as it was in groups representing such diverse interests as the State Department, the Federal Communications Commission, Congress and a medley of private corporations. I am told that discipline was so bad in the delegation that no policy decision could be reached without a vote being taken. I am also told that when certain delegates found themselves in the minority, they went so far as to insist that their dissent be recorded in the minutes of the delegation meetings. There may have been a great many reasons why the United States did not sign, but it might be of interest to mention that, when the Pakistan delegate asked the chief of the United States delegation point blank why he had not signed, he was told that the State Department did not dare ask Congress to ratify an agreement which gave the U.S.S.R. 700 channel hours and the United States only 197. The chief of the United States delegation is said to have added, "The Senators would have chewed their faces off."

18. The impression created on the other delegations by the United States attitude was deplorable. While it was felt that they had blundered into the impasse in which they found themselves, it was generally feared that the Conference would break up as a result, particularly after the United States attack on the Soviet. When the smoke cleared away, however, and when it was learned that the United Kingdom and Canada would sign, a noticeable feeling of relief spread through the Conference. I was told by the Secretary General of the Conference that the announcement that the United Kingdom and ourselves made at this juncture did much to rally the faint of heart.

19. The Soviet's refusal to sign is equally difficult to understand. During the closing sessions of the Conference it had been noted that no member of the Soviet bloc, including the U.S.S.R., had ever explicitly said that they were not going to sign. Although the speeches we heard on the Plan stressed that the Plan was technically unsatisfactory, they never included any declaration of outright rejection.

20. While their proclaimed minimum requirements were 800 channel hours, it is estimated that the Soviet Union was allotted more broadcasting time (700 hours) than they could possibly use at the present time. Reports of both the British and the United States monitoring services agreed on that point. Furthermore, it became obvious that the Soviet insistence on more and more channel hours was largely for purposes of prestige rather than to satisfy actual needs. For instance, demands for broadcasting time to Australia, India or Latin America at three or four o'clock in the morning could not have been made with the intention of reaching an audience, unless it were one of party faithful.

21. One is therefore left to conjecture as to why they did not sign on April 10th. It may be that they wanted to keep themselves free to disrupt international broadcasting, while at the same time proclaiming that they had been dealt with unfairly at the Conference, but there are indications that at least some members of the Soviet delegation had in mind the possibility of adhering to the Agreement at some later date.⁸⁹

22. It might be well to mention a question on which there exists complete uncertainty. Does the Mexico City Agreement provide for adherence subsequent to April 10th for those nations who had not signed on that date? Mr. Pereyra, the Chairman of the Conference, contends that the wording of the Agreement (Article 3), which is far from clear, can be construed as permitting acceptance of the Agreement at any time (i.e., until June 15th), while the British delegation, who took a very active part in the drafting of the Agreement, maintain on the contrary that the right to such late acceptance is categorically denied. As the final text of the Agreement is not yet

This and the following three footnotes appear in the original document:

With regard to the intentions of the Soviet [Union], it is worth noting that when the Secretary General of the Mexico City Conference, Col. Dostert, asked the Soviet delegate on the last day of the Conference if arrangements should be made for Russian interpretation at the Paris session of the Conference, opening on June 15, the Soviet delegate is reported to have replied coyly, "I think it would be a good idea to arrange for Russian interpretation." The Chairman of the Conference, Mr. Pereyra, who reported the incident to me, was inclined to interpret the Russian reply as hopeful of their eventual acceptance.

available, I cannot express an opinion, but it would seem that the loose wording that unfortunately crept into the Agreement in the closing stages of the Conference will give rise to considerable argument. In conversation, Mr. Pereyra told me that he was having the text of the Agreement studied by the legal staff of his Department (the Mexican Ministry of Communications) and that he would let me know confidentially what the views of his legal advisers are regarding the point in question.⁹⁰

23. The present Plan is for one "season" only, i.e., the June median; the remaining seasons (June minimum and maximum, December and Equinox, minimum, median and maximum respectively) will be based on the June median Plan and handled by a special committee, the Technical Plan Committee (TPC), which will meet in Paris from June 15th next. Closing date for TPC activities has been tentatively set for October 1st, although in most circles this date is considered to be optimistic, perhaps as volatile as the December 15th, 1948 closing date set for the Mexico City Conference!

24. The Technical Plan Committee comprises the following fifteen countries: Argentina, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, New Zealand, Pakistan, Portugal, Roumania, South Africa, Soviet Union, United Kingdom, Ukraine, Uruguay and the United States. The Conference ruled that non-signatories could not become members of the TPC and accordingly elected panels of substitutes on a regional basis to cover possible vacancies. Since the Soviet Union, the Ukraine and the United States in particular have not accepted the Agreement, they are not now in a position to participate in the work of the TPC, except as non-voting observers—a position which they may be expected to use to influence friendly members⁹¹ of the TPC. The work of the Committee will of course be subject to review at the second session of the Conference, scheduled to be held in Italy in early autumn of this year.

25. Canada is the United States' elected successor from Region A of the world radio map. We were chosen by secret ballot and obtained overwhelming support. There might be good and valid reasons why Canada should have declined to act as a substitute on the TPC, but in view of the manner in which Canada was elected, she had no choice but to agree. Canada's runner-up in Region A—Brazil—was also reluctant to accept in case Canada defaulted, but finally consented in view of the strong support which she also had received. An odd situation arose with respect to stand-ins for the Soviet Union and the Ukraine in Region C, neither of which has signed the Agreement, when Finland was chosen as their substitute by secret ballot and by a large majority, with Yugoslavia as runner-up. Since Finland has never toed the Soviet line in this Conference, to have Russia's interest represented by Finland is assuredly not a prospect which the Kremlin could envisage with relish!

26. The final instrument of this Conference is an agreement only, not a convention, and much less a treaty. This arises from the status of the Conference itself, which was an administrative and not a plenipotentiary body, although at times this distinction was difficult to grasp. Accessions, therefore, are quite provisional and subject not only to approval by the countries concerned, but also to their being satisfied with the remaining Plans, when they emerge.

⁹⁰ The importance of clarifying this point is explained in paragraph 24.

⁹¹ The United States delegates at the Conference let it be known that the United States proposed sending a strong unit of observers to Paris next June.

27. The last week of the Conference was given over to the task of drafting a suitable text for the Agreement, now known as the Mexico City Agreement. At the outset of the Conference, Canada was elected to the vice-chairmanship of the Drafting Committee (Committee 8). When the Committee finally met in the closing days of the Conference, this post was filled by Mr. Arthur Blanchette of this Embassy.

28. When the work of drafting began, Soviet tactics became very aggressive. Repeated attempts were made to have the text of the Agreement tally with Soviet concepts of general Conference procedure, especially as concerned unanimity. These were constantly rejected by the Conference, but this did not stop the U.S.S.R. from pressing her demands. For instance, when veto powers were ruled out, the Soviet Union attempted to have decisions carry by an 85% majority. Had this proposal been accepted, it might have set a precedent to be pressed tenaciously by the Soviet at future meetings of the ITU.

29. Throughout the Conference, Canada exerted considerable influence on various Commonwealth countries. During the initial stages, Canada looked after the interests of Eire whose delegate, after his arrival, almost invariably followed our cue and very loyally remained within the fold of the Commonwealth family during the Conference. The Australian delegate gave Canada his proxy and usually accepted our views on questions submitted to a vote.

30. By and large, the Commonwealth nations did quite well at the Conference, although by no means acting as a unit. All saw their "minimum" requirements satisfied. Of the Commonwealth countries, perhaps Pakistan achieved the most gratifying results, since she came to the Conference with no transmitters in operation and received a final total of 141 channel hours. These were obtained largely through the efforts and brilliant debating powers of the Chief of the Pakistan delegation, Mr. Ahmed Bokhari, who achieved considerable influence over the Conference by his timely and conciliatory speeches. He successfully played off the United Kingdom, India and the Soviet Union against each other to foster his own aims.⁹² (It may be of interest to you to know that Mr. Bokhari will be spending a few days in Canada next June on his return trip to Pakistan. He will be the guest of the CBC.)

31. No split was visible in the Soviet bloc. The Yugoslav delegate, in effect, toed the Soviet line unwaveringly. The Czechs, however, were much less vehement in their support than had been expected, although this may have been due to the personality of their delegates rather than to coolness to Soviet leadership.

I have, etc.

C.P. HEBERT

⁹² It is worth noting that, throughout the Conference, the United Kingdom was much more wont to support India than Pakistan.

[Ottawa], December 22, 1949

THE UNITED NATIONS TRUSTEESHIP COMMITTEE

One of the most disturbing aspects of the Fourth Session of the Assembly was the outcome of the discussions in the Trusteeship Committee. The satisfaction which has been felt over the voting on such matters as the Soviet peace resolution, atomic energy and conventional armaments must be somewhat diminished by consideration of the voting in the Fourth Committee. Here our friends have been dangerously divided, and the Soviet Union has been able to sit back relatively quietly and exploit this situation. There has, of course, been a strong difference of opinion between the Administering Authorities on the one hand and, on the other hand, those countries who are particularly critical of "colonialism". This difference has now become much more serious, and the position is such that this issue might assume greater importance. The growing seriousness seems to be due to the increasing pretensions of the Trusteeship Committee and the anxiety over these pretensions on the part of the Administering Authorities.

This dangerous cleavage is one which Canada cannot ignore. We have in the past intervened as little as possible in trusteeship questions on the grounds that we were not directly concerned and had no special contribution to make. In the past Session, however, our representative played a more active role in the Committee. We have been quite properly reticent about speaking too much on a subject of which we have no direct experience. At times there has been a suggestion of pharisaism, however, in our explanations, the implication being that the possession of trusteeships is a sin in which we have not indulged. Our experience on the Security Council has taught us that we can play a useful role in matters which do not directly concern us and of which we have no special knowledge. If the Canadian representative on the Security Council can play the major role in securing agreement in Indonesia, it is difficult for us to argue that we can make no contribution to the controversy over Tanganyika. In the Security Council we have now acquired experience, and we have also acquired a reputation. The fact that we have never been implicated in colonial responsibilities is a fact which ought not to be counted to us either as a virtue or lack of virtue. The same is true of the absence of an important colour problem in Canada. Nevertheless, non-European peoples have shown some evidence of looking to us as more objective than those countries which are believed to oppress non-European peoples either inside or outside of their own borders. In addition to this reputation for objectivity, Canadians have also acquired a reputation for being good negotiators. In particular they are expected not to put forward strong views of their own, but to act as honest brokers, seeking to reconcile the views of other parties.

Now that we have left the Security Council we ought to find new scope for our talents. We are not members of the Trusteeship Council, and in view of the strong permanent Commonwealth representation on that body, we are unlikely ever to be elected. This conflict over non self-governing territories, however, exists within the Commonwealth, and a Commonwealth Conference such as that to take place at Colombo might provide an opportunity for seeking some understanding. The seriousness of the problem cannot be under-estimated. It is the subject on which the countries of the Commonwealth are most divided and it could provide the seeds of discord which would lead to disruption.

The primary necessity seems to be some kind of understanding between India and the United Kingdom. Of all the countries which have raised their voice in favour of increasing the obligations of the Administering Authorities, India and Pakistan are perhaps the most honest and responsible. It is difficult to see what kind of agreement can be reached at this stage between India, Pakistan and Ceylon on the one hand, and the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa on the other. In the absence of agreement, however, there might at least be greater understanding. I may be quite wrong, but I have the impression that the Indians and the British have never really thrashed out these matters frankly. It is true that the Indians and their friends have supported demands which are entirely contrary to our principles of responsible government and which the Administering Authorities could not accept. Surely, however, some, at least, of the objections could be explained to the Indians and compromises worked out which would assure the Indians that there was no interference with the progress of non-self-governing peoples to independence. What I fear is that the British, unless the attitude in Whitehall has changed since I left London, still look upon all critics of their colonial policy as tiresome and ignorant people to whom it is scarcely worth while explaining the facts of life.

Under these circumstances the situation would seem to be right for some kind of Canadian initiative at Colombo. This is a Commonwealth problem which cannot be ignored and there is really no other disinterested member of the Commonwealth than ourselves. The Australians and New Zealanders, although they themselves have trusteeship responsibilities, have, because of their general inclinations, been in the past able to promote compromise. Unfortunately, however, the new Governments in both those countries may be expected to be much more rather than much less adamant than the United Kingdom.

The differences of opinion on trusteeship matters are not confined to any one particular issue, although the focus of the controversy seems to be the Special Committee which examines the information submitted by the Administering Authorities on Non Self-Governing Territories. The functions of this Committee were so broadened at the past Session that the Special Committee is approaching a similar supervisory status with respect to Non Self-Governing Territories as the Trusteeship Council has with respect to Trust Territories. This extension of jurisdiction has the support of a large majority of the United Nations Members and of world opinion but it is rejected unequivocally by the United Kingdom. Representatives of the United Kingdom have stated that their government will not comply with a number of the recommendations of the General Assembly. Despite this sharp cleavage, the declared objectives of both the Administering Authorities and the United Kingdom are the same: the development, as rapidly as possible, of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to self-government and independence. If the Administering Authorities are making an honest effort in this direction—and I believe they are—they need not fear examination and supervision of what is being done, provided criticism of their administration is constructive and responsible. The problem, then, is to ensure objective examination and supervision of Non-Self-Governing Territories. This might be accomplished by a demonstration of good faith and a demand for reciprocity in the same direction. For example, the Administering Authorities might agree to accept supervision and supply the fullest possible information on Non-Self-Governing Territories provided that certain conditions concerning the use of this information and the manner of supervision were fulfilled. One condition might be that the information should be given exhaustive study (and not as at present superficial study) by a reconstituted non-partisan Special Committee of experts on colonial administration. Another condition might be that on recommendations related to supervision a two-thirds majority be required for adoption.

DELEGATION FROM THE CANADIAN COUNCIL FOR RECONSTRUCTION THROUGH UNESCO

On May 23 Mr. Heeney received a delegation in the person of Dr. James A. Gibson, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Canadian Council for Reconstruction through UNESCO. Dr. Gibson expressed the regrets of Major Vincent Price, K.C., Chairman of the Council, and the Honourable Thomas Vien, P.C., K.C., Vice-Chairman, who were unable to attend. Mr. R.G. Riddell and Mr. V.C. Moore of the Department were also present.

On behalf of the Council Dr. Gibson presented A Report of Activities, July 1947-March 1949, together with a financial statement and auditor's report.

Although about $500,000 remain to CCRU's credit in the Bank, all of this except $11-12,000 has already been committed to be spent. A new budget for the period to December 31st has been drawn up providing for a greatly reduced staff which will probably consist only of an Administrative Director and an Accountant. Shipping costs overseas are at present an uncertain factor.

Three of the five projects undertaken by CCRU have now been substantially completed. It is hoped that by September 1 all the books collected under the "March of Books" project will have been shipped abroad. There has been a delay owing to the tardiness of Universities and other Institutions abroad in submitting requests; should no more requests be received soon, the remaining books will be despatched to designated countries for distribution in order to avoid the continued cost of maintaining a specialist staff in Halifax.

Successful candidates for Fellowships are to arrive from abroad in July and September of this year and the Canada-UNESCO Fellowships project will terminate in June 1950. The Book Exchange will go out of business shortly, chiefly because of lack of funds from the Library Association. It is therefore possible for the offices in Ottawa to be closed by September 30, 1949. Mr. Heeney welcomed Dr. Gibson's statement that he did not anticipate the initiation of a fresh drive for funds. It was agreed by all present that CCRU had come into being in 1947 for a specific short-time task; with this task accomplished and the needs of the war-devastated countries considerably reduced, it would now be unrealistic for CCRU to tie itself to a new campaign. Dr. Gibson remarked that he believed this view would be held by the majority present at the annual meeting of the Council in Quebec on May 27. Mr. Heeney remarked that the role of the CCRU and other similar organizations should be "ad hoc or ad huke": to do the job for which they were created but not then to find new undertakings simply to justify a prolonged existence.

The conversation turned to a misconception on the part of some officers of CCRU of its role as that of a substitute for a National Commission for UNESCO. It was pointed out, with agreement of all present, that this conception had no basis. CCRU has merely carried out, in a limited field, certain projects suggested by UNESCO; the co-ordinating body has been the Department of External Affairs, which handles the entire field of UNESCO activities as they affect Canada. This latter function may in the future be taken over by a National Commission, which would then be responsible for the whole cultural, educational and scientific aspect of Canadian life, delegating as the need arises specific tasks to ad hoc organizations such as CCRU.

Dr. Gibson envisaged the closing of CCRU's offices in Ottawa by September 30 or more probably December 31, with its work then wound up in a dignified and proper manner. It is unlikely that at that time there would be another delegation, unless UNESCO should request the Council to launch some new project. A further possibility is that it may thereafter continue as a purely voluntary private organization, with no funds or staff, until its activities are absorbed by the National Commission. It would nevertheless be ready at any time to administer any monies put up for new Fellowships and would encourage its member organizations, such as the Boy Scouts, in undertaking projects independently.

It was agreed that the Department would use its good offices in obtaining rent-free premises for CCRU until December 31 or September 30, 1949. The Department of Public Works have re-leased the Sparks Street premises until April 1, 1951, and have offered to sublet it to CCRU for that period. Dr. Gibson pointed out that there are four other organizations sharing these premises; the Canadian Allied Relief Fund, the National Film Board, the United Nations Appeal for Children, the United Emergency Fund for Britain. The Department of Public Works apparently consider mistakenly that CCRU are the sole occupants and wish to remain there until 1951.

Vouchers have already been received by the Department showing the disbursement of the $200,000 grant from External Affairs in purchases in Canada of materials for reconstruction abroad, but advantage has not yet been taken of the Department's offer to arrange for the Auditor General to audit the books of CCRU. It was agreed that the Auditor General should now be asked to review the two reports (to December 31, 1948 and to March 31, 1949) already made by a firm of public auditors, as well as the $200,000 budget. The Secretary of CCRU will make this request in writing after the general meeting.

Dr. Gibson invited the Department to send a representative to the general meeting at Quebec.

A number of extra copies of the Report of Activities will be made available for circulation to interested posts abroad. It was agreed that the Department would formally present the Report to the Director General of UNESCO.

Mr. Heeney expressed his appreciation of the achievements of CCRU. The organization had been created to carry out tasks which this Department wished to see done but could not itself undertake. It was a matter of satisfaction to be able now to report back to UNESCO on a job well done.

UNESCO DRAFT AGREEMENT FOR FACILITATING THE INTERNATIONAL CIRCULATION OF VISUAL AND AUDITORY MATERIALS OF AN EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL CHARACTER

Background:

On April 30, 1948 the Director-General of UNESCO asked for Canadian comments on a draft Convention for Facilitating the International Circulation of Visual and Auditory Materials of an Educational, Scientific and Cultural Character. After consultation with the National Film Board, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Departments of Justice, Finance, Trade and Commerce and National Revenue (Customs), the Canadian Delegation to the Third Session of the General Conference of UNESCO was instructed to support the draft Convention. The Convention was adopted by the General Conference; among the amendments supported by Canada, the change of title from "Convention" to "Agreement" has subsequently been accepted.

The final text of the draft Agreement, a copy of which is attached,† has been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who in a note dated June 27, 1949 informed the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Agreement would be open for signature by all the Member States of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at Lake Success from July 15 to December 31, 1949.

Considerations:

The only new obligations which this Agreement would impose upon Canada are

(a) the possibility that some minor amendments to the Canadian tariff might be required;

(b) that, in accordance with Article 4, paragraph 2, some Agency of the Canadian Government would have to certify that materials are of an educational, cultural or scientific character within the meaning of Article 1 of the Agreement. While the application to admit these materials free of duty would not involve any appreciable sacrifice on Canada's part since most of the materials are already on the free list, Canada would on the other hand gain from participation in the Agreement the free admission of these materials, in particular, films and recordings, into the United States.

Recommendation:

In view of the general agreement of interested Government Departments and agencies on the desirability of Canada's participation, it is recommended that the Canadian Government approve the principle of Canadian adherence to the Draft Agreement for Facilitating the International Circulation of Visual and Auditory Materials of an Educational, Scientific and Cultural Character.⁹³

FOURTH SESSION OF THE UNESCO GENERAL CONFERENCE
SEPTEMBER 19—OCTOBER 5, 1949

As a result of the decision of the General Conference that from 1950 onwards its ordinary sessions should be held in the spring, the next two sessions will be held within seven months of each other. The Fourth Session of the General Conference of UNESCO, to be held at UNESCO House in Paris from September 19 to October 5, 1949, is accordingly to be a "short business session" only. Its agenda is limited to

(a) questions which, under the Constitution of UNESCO and the regulations in force (Rules of Procedure of the General Conference, Financial Regulations, Staff Rules), must necessarily be included in the agenda of all ordinary sessions of the General Conference;

(b) questions whose inclusion in the Agenda of the Fourth Session has been requested by the General Conference in resolutions adopted at a previous session. Other questions will be deferred to the next full-scale Session in May 1950.

2. The six main divisions of the agenda, a copy of which is attached,[†] are as follows:

(a) Programme and Budget. Discussion on the programme will be confined to the consideration of changes in programme emphasis or orientation which involve important budgetary implications. Projects that are entirely new will be discussed at the Fifth Session.

⁹³ Le Cabinet donna son approbation en principe à cette recommandation, le 3 août 1949. Le général A.G.L. McNaughton avait été autorisé à signer l'entente en vertu du C.P. 5736, du 10 novembre 1949.

Cabinet approved this recommendation in principle on August 3, 1949. General A.G.L. McNaughton was authorized to sign the agreement by P.C. 5736 of November 10, 1949.

(b) Administration and Finance

(i) Consideration of questions relating to organization and staffing of the Secretariat, in particular, salaries and allowances, Medical Benefits Scheme, Pensions Scheme;

(ii) Financial questions: Auditors' Report, contributions for 1950, Revolving Fund.

(c) Official and External Relations. There are a number of subjects arising from resolutions previously passed by the General Conference, such as liaison with Member States and National Commissions, consideration of the Agreement between United Nations and UNESCO.

(d) Discussion of General Topic:

"What are the duties of the State in regard to education, science and culture for the purpose of ensuring a better understanding between peoples and what practical steps should it take in order to discharge these duties?"

Three plenary meetings have been set aside for this general discussion. The Director-General requests that the subject for discussion be studied by some leading public figure who would be a member of our delegation and would act as its mouthpiece in these discussions.

(e) Executive Board. The question of the term of office of members of the Executive Board has to be decided, and six new members are to be elected.

(f) UNESCO and the Fourth Point Programme. The original timetable has been extended by three days to permit the examination of UNESCO's contribution to a co-ordinated plan of United Nations and specialized agencies for technical assistance to under-developed countries.

3. Our primary interest at this Conference is to submit the UNESCO programme and budget to critical scrutiny, and this interest can best be served by a small delegation composed of official government representatives. There may be some dissatisfaction on the part of governmental agencies which are not represented (e.g. Film Board, C.B.C.) and non-governmental organizations, but their interest might be diverted to the session which is to take place next spring in Florence. The present session can be considered an interim one to dispose of urgent business, and we can begin to prepare very soon, in liaison with all the interested national organizations, for representation at the full-scale session next May.

4. It is desirable that we should be represented by a delegation which can be relied upon to present the views of the Canadian Government, and to direct the attention of the Conference to some of the more practical considerations which its long-sighted trail blazers have overlooked. I would therefore suggest the composition of the delegation be as follows:

Mr. John B.C. Watkins

Mr. F. Charpentier

A member of the Royal Commission on the Arts, Letters and Sciences

A Secretary from the Department of External Affairs.

5. Dr. Doré, who headed the delegations in Paris in 1946 and 1948, is in his private capacity still a member of the Executive Board. It would be desirable, I believe, to leave him free to devote himself to this work, rather than to place him again in the invidious position of trying to reconcile it with his responsibilities as head of the Canadian Delegation. The work of the Executive Board may, as usual, be very exacting during the coming session. Dr. Doré, has furthermore, consistently taken the position that he acts on the Executive Board as a servant of UNESCO and not as a representative of Canada. This may be a logical position, but we cannot admit that the Canadian Delegation should be bound to agree to whatever Dr. Doré has accepted in the Board. We do not want, for example, a repetition of the situation last year when the Canadian Delegation did not carry out its instructions to criticize the budget presented by the Executive Board. In an attached letter† Mr. Bryce has expressed his concern over this possibility.

6. Mr. Watkins has not had experience of UNESCO, but he would combine a genuine interest in cultural activities with the appropriate scepticism. He will have had a year in Moscow and will be due for a break in his tour of duty there. Mr. Charpentier is well versed in the affairs of UNESCO, having acted for the past year as our direct contact with the Secretariat in Paris and, on occasion, as a substitute for Dr. Doré on the Executive Board. The secretarial work should be undertaken by someone from the Department familiar with the details of UNESCO, our attitude, and the budget. If appropriate arrangements can be made, this will be the officer who is shortly taking over UNESCO work when it is transferred from the U.N. Division to the Information Division.

7. With public attention focussed on the terms of reference of the Royal Commission relative to the establishing of a National Commission for UNESCO, the inclusion of one of the Commissioners would be timely. This first-hand experience of the machinery of UNESCO and of National Commissions already established abroad would be a valuable asset in considering Canada's relationship with UNESCO; the Royal Commission's representative would moreover bring to the Conference an expert knowledge of the functions and problems of our national organizations, and would be well qualified to evaluate the practicability of implementing UNESCO's programmes in Canada. His inclusion in the official delegation would also mean that Canadian educational, scientific and cultural life would be represented, and would obviate any criticism on this point. The Royal Commission's representative could be the spokesman in the discussions of the "general topic" set forth in paragraph 2(d) above.

8. I attach lists of previous delegations and of members of the Executive Board.†

9. If you approve, I shall prepare a submission to Cabinet.⁹⁴

A.D.P. HEENEY

⁹⁴ Le Cabinet approuva une note à ce sujet, le 24 août 1949.

TELEGRAM 448

Ottawa, September 14, 1949

SECRET

Following for Watkins, Head of Canadian Delegation, UNESCO, from Heeney, Begins:

Please delete the general instructions from the Commentary which Jay is taking along with him and substitute the following paragraphs which have been approved by the Minister:

2. Canada's reputation abroad is due, in part, to its usually realistic and pragmatic approach to the problems of international relations. Our constant preoccupation has been to concentrate our attention on those functions of international organizations which give promise of immediate helpful results.

3. This established Canadian practice has particular importance in relation to UNESCO activities and it should be a first duty of the Canadian Delegation at the coming Conference to urge that UNESCO:

(a) avoid dispersion of the Organization's energies and resources over too many projects and activities;

(b) take every means to achieve high standards of administrative efficiency and economy.

4. The Delegation should, therefore, use their best endeavours to have omitted from the present program of UNESO (or to put in low priority which would, in fact, mean deletion) projects not likely to achieve immediately useful results. It is not possible for us to put forward for your guidance a specific scheme of priorities for the items of the UNESCO program. The Delegation may, however, derive some benefit from a critical analysis of such schemes as may have been worked out by the United States and the United Kingdom Delegations.

5. The forthcoming session of UNESCO is to be a "short business session". You should on this ground resist the inclusion of new projects in the program by taking the position that consideration of any new proposal should be deferred to the next regular session in the spring.

6. The second main objective of the Canadian Delegation should be to press vigorously for the utmost efficiency and economy in the administration of UNESCO. The administrative and financial instructions based on a study of the UNESCO budget by the Department of Finance, should prove useful in this regard. The Delegation should not expressly refer to the possibility of Canada withdrawing its support from UNESCO. When an occasion arises, however, the Delegation should warn the Conference that unless there is a greater degree of "realism" in the UNESCO program and a marked improvement in the efficiency of the Organization's operation (including a very considerable reduction in overhead), it will become increasingly difficult to persuade the public of many countries, including Canada, that their governments should continue to give full support to UNESCO.

7. We shall try to supplement the above instructions by letter and you will of course refer to the Department by telegram should you require guidance on any particular issue. Ends.

DESPATCH 830

Paris, October 7, 1949

SECRET

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to the Fourth Session of the General Conference of U.N.E.S.C.O., which concluded its work on October 5th, 1949.

2. Mr. Jay will, of course, be able to report more fully when he returns to Ottawa on about the 18th of this month. In addition, I have been informed that the resolutions and decisions taken here will be transmitted to member states, on October 15, and the full record of the proceedings will be despatched early in November.

Programme and Budget.—

3. As you are aware, the Director General, in his Report and in his first address, stressed the importance of priority planning which he stated had been effected by means of the requests made in his Budget estimates. From what he had to say in the course of the debate, it began to seem that all the items included in the estimates had almost equally high priority. The programme and budget were discussed at the same time by the Programme and Budget Commission which then referred its decisions to a Drafting and Co-ordinating Sub-Committee on which we were not represented. The Budget eventually approved by the Conference totals $8,000,000 and represents the successful effort of the Sub-Committee to make use of all of the amount indicated in the Provisional Ceiling figure.

Provisional Ceiling for Budget.—

4. It had been assumed that the Director General would have arranged for one of the Latin American delegates, several of whom were in his pocket, to open the debate on the provisional ceiling for the budget with a proposal to accept his own figure of 8.17 million dollars, which was what remained of it when the estimated saving from the devaluation of the franc and other currencies had been subtracted. Actually the Director General was able to do a little better than that: the proposal to accept his figure of 8.17 million was made by the Indian Delegation and supported by the Cuban, Swiss, Greek and others. The United Kingdom Delegate then proposed apologetically but firmly a provisional ceiling of $7,660,000, which was supported by most of the other Commonwealth Delegations as well as by the Norwegian Delegation. Finally, the United States Delegate suggested as a compromise that EIGHT million be set as a target figure.

5. According to our instructions, we were not to oppose the adoption of a ceiling figure which had the support of the United Kingdom and United States Delegations and bore some relation to the figure which would be established in any event by the detailed study of the budget. Although the United Kingdom and United States figures were so far apart, we had been informed confidentially by the British that their outside figure was eight million. The head of the United States Delegation told us that the British had said that although they would continue to press for the lower figure in accordance with their instructions, they realized that it would not be accepted.

6. After the United Kingdom and United States Delegates had spoken, therefore, we said that although in general we were opposed to the establishment of an arbitrary figure for the budget and considered that the correct approach was to examine every item with a view to removing any appropriation that could not be justified on the tests of priority and benefits to be expected from the expenditures of the sum proposed, we felt that the examination of the budget which had now been made had been sufficiently exhaustive to allow the Commission to set a provisional ceiling, which would enable the Sub-Committee to do constructive work; and that the ceiling proposed by the United States was certainly the highest we could contemplate and acceptable to us only on condition that the Sub-Committee would do its best, having in mind our criterion of economy, to approximate more closely to the figure proposed by the United Kingdom. There was obviously no possibility whatsoever of the United Kingdom figure being accepted and in the final vote on the United States proposal the United Kingdom Delegation supported it to the applause of the whole assembly and to complete bafflement of the Latin Americans, whose minds just do not work that way.

Technical Assistance.—

7. On the subject of U.N.E.S.C.O.'s participation in the Technical Assistance programme, it was generally recognized that little concrete planning could be done until after the conference scheduled for the first week in November in New York, at which, as the Director General pointed out, changes might be made in the allocation previously proposed. In the meantime, documents 4C/8 (rev.) and 4C/9 were referred, with minor amendments suggested by the United States Delegate in the drafting of certain sections, to a special Drafting Sub-Committee appointed to deal with this problem.

Contributions of Member States.—

8. The United States requested a decrease of 1.4[%] in its contribution, which represents its proportionate share of the contributions of new Member States. We supported this request after emphasizing that we would oppose, until times become normal, any further request for a reduction of the United States share which would have to be borne by the other Member States. We approved of the principle of a 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % ceiling, but insisted that it should be reached only when world conditions have materially improved.

9. Brazil asked to be allowed to pay her contribution in French francs instead of United States dollars. This was unanimously refused.

Admission of Ceylon.—

10. Ceylon's application for membership on U.N.E.S.C.O. was approved unanimously.

Site of Fifth Session.—

11. The proposal that the Fifth General Conference of U.N.E.S.C.O. be held in Florence was also adopted unanimously.

Elections to Executive Board.—

12. The following is a tabulation of the votes recorded in the election of members of the Executive Board.

Total members voting: 44.

Mr. Roger Seydoux (France)	43
Professor Alf Sommerfelt (Norway)	42
Professor P. de Berredo Carneiro (Brazil)	41
Mr. Luther Evans (U.S.)	38
H.E. Dr. C. Parra-Perez (Venezuela)	37
Mr. Kudsi Tecer (Turkey)	34
Dr. Jan Boor (Czechoslovakia)	15.

Accordingly, Messrs. Seydoux, Sommerfelt, Carneiro, Evans, Parra-Perez and Tecer were declared elected members of the Executive Board of U.N.E.S.C.O. for a term of 3 years. The nomination of Dr. Boor was made by the Polish Delegate in the Nominations Committee. As Boor did not receive the endorsement of that Committee, the Polish Delegate again proposed his candidature in the Plenary Meeting at which the election took place. We supported the six candidates who were elected.

Spanish as a working language.—

13. At the last scheduled meeting of the Procedure Committee, the Delegate from Mexico attempted to have an additional item added to the agenda of that committee having to do with the amendment of Article 52 and 55 of the rules of procedure to the effect that Spanish would become more nearly a full working language. After heated discussion, the question was put off until another extraordinary meeting could be held. At that meeting, the Chairman ruled that the Committee could discuss the Mexican proposals for amendment. We objected on a point of order that the procedure for the inclusion of additional items on an agenda had not been followed. The resultant vote was a tie, 11 for the Chairman and 11 for the Canadian point of order. Accordingly, the question was deferred to another meeting where a second vote was to be taken.

14. At the second extraordinary meeting, the Chairman stated that the General Committee of the Conference had reviewed the rules of procedure and recommended that the Procedure Committee could discuss the Mexican proposals, but that no binding decision could be taken. On this basis, the Canadian Delegation agreed to withdraw its point of order and a very lengthy discussion of the pros and cons of using Spanish as a full working language ensued. In the end, a Canadian proposal, amplified by the French Delegate and supported by the United States, United Kingdom and Belgian and most of the other delegations, was adopted. This proposal took the form of a request to the Director General and the Executive Board to study all the implications, budgetary and otherwise, of adopting Spanish as a full working language and a recommendation that the question be included on the agenda for the Fifth Session. Most of the Latin American countries, although voting against this proposal, appeared to be satisfied that they had been fairly treated, although they did not fully understand the procedural niceties.

15. However, the Delegate from Ecuador, a very fiery and bewildered individual, insisted that his protest against the distortion of the democratic rights of the Spanish speaking people should be recorded in the minutes of the meeting.

Arrangements with Non-Governmental Organizations.—

16. In the Official and External Relations Commission, for which Charpentier acted as Rapporteur, the United States stated that U.N.E.S.C.O. should not increase unreasonably its arrangements with and commitments to international non-governmental organizations. De Blonay, of the Secretariat, was quite caustic in objecting to the United States proposal that a thorough review of all existing relationships be presented to the Florence Conference. The United States Delegate stuck to his guns, however, and with our support managed to obtain the endorsement of the Commission.

17. The Director General tried to water down the meaning of the proposal, when the Commission's Report was presented to the Plenary Session. Nevertheless, the United States proposal was accepted and we may expect a considerable amount of paper which may or may not cast light on the murky tangle of U.N.E.S.C.O.'s relationships with non-governmental organizations.

Activities in Germany and Japan.—

18. The Poles, Czechs, and Hungarians objected strongly to the continuation and expansion of U.N.E.S.C.O.'s activities in Western Germany. Their reasons were Moscow's and logical within their limitations. U.N.E.S.C.O. was operating only in Western Germany and this tended to divide rather than unite Germany, which must of course be united. The Soviet Union's failure to reply to U.N.E.S.C.O.'s offers to extend its activities to the Soviet zone was explained indirectly by references to the Potsdam agreement in disregard of which the allied powers had set up the "so-called Western German State". During the period in which U.N.E.S.C.O. had been active in Germany, moreover, "the spirit of nationalism and revanchism had increased rather than diminished." The new Adenauer parliament had opportunely supplied disquieting evidence of this, which nobody was disposed to challenge, just as this Conference was getting started. The statements quoted in the Paris press from German members of parliament demanding the return of former German territory from Poland and Czechoslovakia and advocating the absorption of Austria had made all the other neighbours of Germany uneasy, but the Danes, Dutch, Belgians and French did not agree with the Eastern Europeans that the answer was withdrawal, which, as the Danish Delegate pointed out, would be to admit defeat. When the question was referred to the Co-ordination and Drafting Committee over their protest, the Poles, Czechs, and Hungarians walked out as dramatically as might be and stayed away until the Programme and Budget Commission had concluded its deliberations. This gave them several days to enjoy the city while the rest of us suffered in sultry committee rooms but did not prevent their attending the various receptions which were being given and absorbing their full quota of champagne. Nor did it prevent a Czech and a Pole from making long speeches on the relation of the State to Education from the Marxist point of view at the public evening meetings in the Maison de la Chimie.

19. Refreshed by their rest they returned to the attack with renewed vigour and somewhat anticlimactic violence when the Plenary Sessions resumed. There was, of course, a great deal of sympathy for their sufferings and no attempt to pretend that their anxiety was unfounded. All the opposing speakers were elaborately careful of their susceptibilities and even when they had been deliberately insulting to the United States in particular, to the United Kingdom and France as the lesser occupying powers and to all the Atlantic Pact countries, went no further than to counsel sweet reasonableness and solution of the problem by democratic process of the vote. The Brazilian introduced a resolution containing a clause empowering the Executive Board to suspend activities in Germany if conditions were unfavourable to their success but the Pole considered that if the clause meant anything it would be applicable immediately. Perhaps they would not be able to prevent U.N.E.S.C.O. from being turned into a record to play the tunes of the Atlantic Pact, he said, but to these melodies, they would not march. During the luncheon period the French did some scurrying around to try to find a satisfactory compromise apparently without success. When the Brazilian resolution was voted on, the Poles, Czechs, and Hungarians were supported only by the Delegate of Israel. The Pole then read a declaration on behalf of the Polish, Czech, and Hungarian Governments reserving their position. The general feeling seems to be, however, that they are not planning to withdraw from U.N.E.S.C.O. at the present time.

20. On the question of U.N.E.S.C.O. activities in Japan, the Delegate from the Philippines opposed only the paragraph providing for the inclusion of Japanese experts in technical conferences on the grounds that this would appear to give Japan a kind of international status before the conclusion of a peace treaty. He was supported in this stand by the Australian delegation. To a Canadian question asking whether the "appropriate authority" referred to in the resolution meant S.C.A.P., the answer was in the affirmative. With this on the record we felt free to vote with the United States and United Kingdom for the adoption of the resolution as it stood.

I have, etc.

SECOND CONTRIBUTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND

The International Children's Emergency Fund is now making an appeal for further contributions from governments totalling $20,000,000. On the matching formula adopted by the United States Congress in making its original authorization of a $100,000,000 contribution, contributions to the amount of $20,000,000 if made before June 30, 1949, would call out the full sum authorized by Congress. So far $75,000,000 of this has been appropriated, but only $42,122,404 called out by matching grants.

2. Twenty-eight governments have contributed or pledged a total of about $62,000,000 to the Fund. Eight of them, Australia, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Italy, Poland, Switzerland, South Africa and the United States, contributed twice. The two Australian grants total $7,157,280. The Canadian Government made a grant only in 1947. $5,000,000 of this was a direct contribution and $200,000 a sum turned over to the Canadian Council of the United Nations Appeal for Children, earmarked for the ICEF.

3. Members of the Executive Board, including the Canadian representative, made an inspection tour this summer in Europe during which they were satisfied that assistance provided really reached the intended recipients and that all receiving governments, including those of the satellite countries, were giving cooperation.

Recommendation

4. It is recommended that the Canadian Government now make a second contribution to the Fund of $3,500,000 which would call out a matching grant of $9,000,000 from the United States.⁹⁵

SECOND CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND

This matter was originally brought up in Cabinet on February 4. It was decided not to authorise a contribution at that time but to leave the subject open for further discussion, if and when the Secretary of State for External Affairs wished to bring it forward again.

2. In recent weeks the prospect of a heavy surplus of powdered milk has led the dairy industry to make strong recommendations to members of the Government, particularly the Ministers of Agriculture and Trade and Commerce, to authorize a support programme.

3. Supplies of Canadian powdered milk have heretofore gone largely to the ICEF, which would be willing to use any further Canadian contribution for this purpose. The Fund cannot at present export U.S. dollars to Canada for the purpose of buying powdered milk, as there is a surplus in the United States and the price there is slightly lower.

4. The Minister of Agriculture is most anxious to have this question dealt with by Cabinet as soon as possible. Mr. Pearson, when he was in Ottawa on April 11, agreed that it should be brought before Cabinet again and approved the memorandum, a copy of which is attached.†⁹⁶ It was originally intended to defer action until the Minister's return, but in view of the urgent representations again received from the Department of Agriculture, the matter has now been put on Cabinet agenda for Tuesday, April 26. Owing to the short notice, it was necessary to have copies of the Cabinet memorandum approved by Mr. Pearson duplicated at once for distribution, and it has accordingly not been possible to submit the usual advance draft for your approval and signature.

5. In addition to the brief statement circulated to Cabinet, I attach for your own use a memorandum giving a fuller account of the background.† This was originally prepared for Mr. Pearson's use in February and has now been revised.

INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION; PURCHASE OF POWDERED MILK

25. The Prime Minister, referring to the discussion at the meeting of April 26th, reported that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had been advised by the Executive Director of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund of a serious financial crisis presently facing the UNICEF.

The U.S. Secretary of State had informed the United Nations that, because of the lack of support of this Fund by other governments, the U.S. government would limit its continuing financial aid to the $20 million available from sums already appropriated by Congress. This meant the loss to the Fund of an additional $25 million authorized but not yet appropriated by Congress and, if additional financial aid were not forthcoming, the Fund would have to close down early in 1950.

The U.S. government had agreed to match every dollar subscribed by other governments with $2.57. A Canadian contribution of $4 million would therefore produce more than $10 million from the United States.

(External Affairs memorandum, May 7, 1949 and attached documents).†

26. Mr. St. Laurent also referred to the Minister of Agriculture's proposal that price support be extended to dried skim milk powder in order that the Agricultural Prices Support Board might purchase 20 million pounds of this product at a total cost of approximately $2,500,000. It had been suggested that this powdered milk might form a large part of any Canadian contribution to the Fund.

(Minister of Agriculture's recommendation to Council, May 2, 1949—P.C.2250).†

27. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that no decision could be made on a second Canadian contribution to the International Children's Emergency Fund until such time as the new parliament assembled; and,

(b) that decision on the proposal of the Minister of Agriculture for the purchase by the Agricultural Prices Support Board of 20 million pounds of dried skim milk powder be deferred pending further consideration the following week.

PRICE SUPPORT; DRIED SKIM MILK POWDER

1. The Postmaster General and Acting Minister of Agriculture, referring to the discussion of May 9th, reported that, during 1949 to date, there had been an increase in skim milk production of 40.9% over the first four months of 1948, largely due to the plentiful supply of feed and diversion of milk from other products. Total production for the year could be expected to be at least as great as in 1948—64,253,000 pounds. In 1948, 45.58% had been exported, two thirds going to the International Children's Emergency Fund. Unless the government were to make purchases, whether for contributions to the Fund or otherwise, a substantial fall in the price of milk to producers could be expected. Prices had already dropped by from 50½ cents to 80 cents per hundred pounds.

(Department of Agriculture memoranda, May 17 and 18, 1949).†

2. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister stated that his conversations in the United Kingdom had indicated that no market for dried skim milk could be expected there. It was essential that it be made clear to the industry that, unless they could develop markets, production would have to be reduced.

If any purchases were made at present, they should not exceed $1 million in total, and the price should be at least 1½¢ per pound below U.S. support prices, which, according to the Department of Agriculture, were 12¼¢ for spray process and 11¢ for roller process milk.

(Letter, Deputy Minister of Agriculture to the Secretary to the Cabinet, Apr. 19 and attached memoranda).†

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs felt that, if a purchase were to be made, it should be indicated that the government intended to hold the milk for contribution to the International Children's Fund when authorization from Parliament for a further contribution to the Fund could be secured.

4. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Agricultural Prices Support Board be authorized to purchase dried skim milk powder at prices 1½¢ per pound below U.S. support prices, to a total of $1 million; and,

(b) that it be indicated that it was the intention of the government to hold such dried skim milk for contribution to the International Children's Emergency Fund when authorization for a further contribution was given by Parliament.

INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND; SECOND CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that officials of the International Children's Emergency Fund were presently making special efforts to secure additional contributions, first, in order to call out by matching grants the full $75 million appropriated by the United States Congress, and, second, in order to encourage Congress, at this session, to appropriate the remaining $25 million of the $100 million originally authorized. It was apparent that Congress might be difficult to persuade unless there were further substantial contributions from other countries, particularly Canada.

It was pointed out that in the past Australian and New Zealand grants represented over $1.00 per capita of the population, whereas Canadian grants represented slightly over 40 cents per capita.

At its meeting of May 18th, 1949, Cabinet had authorized the Agricultural Prices Support Board to buy Canadian dried skim milk powder to a total of $1 million, the milk to be transferred to the Fund in the event Parliament authorized a further contribution. Recent surveys of the Department of Agriculture indicated that substantial surpluses of other foodstuffs would probably remain over and above any commodities which might be required in connection with fulfilment of United Kingdom and other contracts.

It was therefore recommended that $1 million worth of dried skim milk powder be transferred to the International Children's Emergency Fund, and that a further contribution of $3 million be authorized, provided the total amount would be spent in Canada and the items to be purchased would be a matter of negotiation between representatives of the Department of Agriculture or the Agricultural Prices Support Board and representatives of the International Children's Emergency Fund.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

15. The Prime Minister said that, before recommending a second Canadian contribution to the Fund, careful consideration should be given to the relative merits of international relief grants and domestic relief measures that might be required. In the circumstances, it might be preferable to withhold decision in this matter until the forthcoming financial discussions had been concluded in Washington and Canada's general financial position had been reviewed in the light of those discussions.

16. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs respecting a second Canadian contribution to the International Children's Emergency Fund and deferred decision pending further consideration following the tripartite discussions to be held in Washington.

INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND; DONATION OF POWDERED MILK

4. The Honourable Mr. Mackinnon, as Acting Minister of Agriculture, referred to the decision of Cabinet on May 18th in favour of contribution to the International Children's Emergency Fund of dry skim milk powder purchased by the Agricultural Prices Support Board; the contribution to be made following authorization by Parliament.

An item of $1,075,000 had been included in the Further Supplementary Estimates of the Department of External Affairs to cover this donation. The milk powder was being held in storage at considerable expense and it was possible that navigation out of Montreal might be closed before the Further Supplementary Estimates were passed. If shipment had to be made from Halifax, Saint John or New York, additional freight charges might amount to $100,000. It was recommended that the Agricultural Prices Support Board be authorized to deliver the milk at once to the Fund; reimbursement to be made by the Department of External Affairs after the vote had been passed.

5. The Minister of Finance said that it was proposed to ask for further interim supply on October 26th and in doing so he intended to ask for approval of 11/12 of the item to cover the donation. Approval by the Senate and Royal Assent could be expected later in the week.

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the reports of the Acting Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance and agreed that the Agricultural Prices Support Board be authorized to proceed with arrangements for delivery of dry skim milk powder to the International Children's Emergency Fund, as previously approved by Cabinet, after a portion of the item in the Further Supplementary Estimates relating to the contribution had been approved by the House of Commons in dealing with interim supply.

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SECOND WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY—ROME, JUNE 13 TO JULY 13, 1949*Background*

1. At its meeting of April 29 the Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that Canada should participate in the 2nd World Health Assembly at Rome.

2. The world health programme for 1950 to be discussed by the Assembly includes joint activity by the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization in combating related problems of food and health; an expanded programme of maternal and child health activities, including greater stress on immunization against childhood diseases; the first international programme in the field of mental health; increased attention to typhus and plague; efforts to help member governments strengthen their public health services and operation of a limited medical-supply service to governments, as well as continuation of work in such fields as malaria, tuberculosis and venereal disease control.

3. In addition to the programme for 1950, the Health Assembly will study administrative and financial problems, details of regional organization, membership applications and other matters directly or indirectly connected with the work of WHO.

Recommendations

4. The Departments of National Health and Welfare, External Affairs and Finance, recommend that the Canadian Delegation be instructed as follows:⁹⁷

Programme and Budget for 1950

5. The Canadian Delegation should examine critically the proposed programme for 1950 and should take the position that, while nothing should be done to obstruct the long-range potentialities of the Organization, projects of low priority or of doubtful urgency should be deferred or transferred to the supplementary Programme. The Delegation should express its opposition to any tendency of the ⁹⁷ Le Cabinet approuva cette recommandation, le 16 juin 1949.

Cabinet approved this recommendation on June 16, 1949.

Organization to expand its activities unnecessarily in a way which may overlap with the programmes of other United Nations organizations; this will apply particularly to such fields as those of public information, collection of statistics, and provision of fellowships.

6. The Delegation will bear in mind that the proposed increase in the regular budget from $5,000,000 to $7,893,000 is relatively large and that, in view of this, stress should be placed on the implementation of those projects likely to bring the greatest and most immediate returns for the expenditure involved.

7. The present Canadian contribution to WHO is $158,000 and, if the proposed budget is adopted, will amount to $248,000 in 1950.

Admission of New Members

8. In view of the general desirability that as many states as possible participate in the work of the World Health Organization, the Canadian Delegation should vote in favour of the admission to WHO of the Republics of San Marino and of Korea (South Korea).

Elections to the Executive Board

9. The Canadian Delegation should support the following slate: United Kingdom, United States, Pakistan, a Latin American country, Norway or another Scandinavian country, and one other. While Canada should not seek membership on the Executive Board, the Canadian Delegation should accept membership if election to the Board comes about without being actively sought.

10. The Executive Board consists of eighteen members and the six members whose term of office expires this year are Australia, Ceylon, Iran, Norway, United Kingdom and the United States. The other twelve members are Brazil, China, Egypt, France, Mexico, USSR, Byelo-Russia, India, Netherlands, Poland, South Africa, Yugoslavia.

Supplementary Budget

11. The Canadian Delegation will not make any commitments on behalf of Canada with respect to the proposed supplementary programme of activity for 1950.

Working Capital Fund

12. The Canadian Delegation will oppose the proposal to increase the working capital of WHO from $1,650,000 to $4,000,000 and will support the stand that $3 million should be sufficient for the present. The Canadian contribution for 1949 to the Fund will be $52,170.

Scale of Contributions

13. The Canadian Delegation should take the position that the scale of contributions should be based on the relative "capacity to pay" of member states and should not support, in any case, an assessment which is higher on a per capita basis than that of the United States.

ELECTIONS TO THE EXECUTIVE BOARD OF WHO

You will recall that the U.S.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. withdrew from membership in the World Health Organization last February and that, since that time, efforts by member governments to induce them to reconsider their decision have been fruitless.

2. The U.S.S.R.'s withdrawal left a vacancy on the eighteen-member Executive Board, to which the Soviet representative was elected in 1948 for a two-year term. This vacancy is in addition to those occasioned by the automatic retirement from the Board this year of six member states, under the provision of WHO's Constitution.

3. While we have not yet received any official notification that Bielo-Russia has also withdrawn from WHO, I think it is a safe assumption that they have followed the lead of the U.S.S.R. and the Ukraine. If so, one other vacancy on the Board has been created, since Bielo-Russia was elected in 1948 for a three-year term on the Executive body.

4. In connection with this matter, the United Kingdom Brief on the Assembly agenda reads, in part, as follows:

"The U.K. are also opposed to the Director General's suggestion, made verbally during a recent visit, that the U.S.S.R. and Bielo-Russian seats on the Board should remain vacant so as not to slam the door against their possible return. They think this point could be met by making it clear when electing Members to fill the vacancies for the unexpired term that they would cease to serve if the U.S.S.R. and Bielo-Russia decided again to designate persons to serve."

5. It is my opinion that the Canadian Delegation should go along with the United Kingdom view that the Russian and Bielo-Russian seats should not be left vacant. On the other hand, I do not agree with the United Kingdom view that members elected to fill the vacancies for the unexpired terms should be asked to step down if the two countries decide they wish to resume their seats.

6. I discussed this question with Mr. MacDermot who is in agreement with the views expressed in the preceding paragraph. He also agrees that the Canadian Delegation should oppose any move to accord preferential treatment to the U.S.S.R. or her satellites.

7. If you agree, I should be grateful if you would sign the attached despatch† to the Head of the Canadian Delegation to the World Health Assembly.⁹⁸

Ottawa, March 26, 1949

SUBJECT: REVISED AND NEW CONVENTIONS FOR THE PROTECTION OF VICTIMS OF WAR

At the invitation of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Canada participated in an International Conference of government experts in Geneva in April, 1947, for the purpose of preparing:

(a) A revision of "The Convention (revised) for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick of Armies in the Field" concluded at Geneva, July 27, 1929.

(b) A revision of "The Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War" concluded at Geneva, July 27, 1929.

(c) A revision of "The Convention (Xth Hague) for the Adaptation of Maritime Warfare to the Principles of the Geneva Convention" signed at The Hague, October 18, 1907.

(d) A draft text of a new Convention entitled "A Convention for the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War".

Canada is a signatory to the three Conventions referred to in (a), (b) and (c).

2. Following the Geneva Conference, the resolutions and amendments proposed by the government experts were consolidated into revised texts which were submitted to the XVIIth International Conference of the Red Cross at Stockholm in August, 1948. Canada sent a Delegation to that Conference which further revised the texts of these Conventions.

3. The Swiss Government invited Canada to a Diplomatic Conference to open in Geneva on April 21, 1949, for the purpose of preparing the final texts. Participating governments will also be asked to sign the new Conventions. On February 25,

⁹⁸ Note marginale aux paragraphes 6 et 7: /Marginal note to paragraphs 6 and 7:
I agree A H[eeney]

1949, the Cabinet agreed that Canada should participate in the forthcoming Diplomatic Conference and also agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in consultation with other interested Departments select the personnel of the Canadian Delegation. The Canadian Delegation has been selected and will be headed by M.E. Vaillancourt, Canadian Minister to Yugoslavia.

4. An Interdepartmental Committee, composed of representatives from the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Justice, National Defence, National Health and Welfare, Secretary of State, Transport, the Office of the Civil Defence Co-ordinator and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, has devoted much study to the texts of the Conventions that are to be considered at the Diplomatic Conference. This study was conducted with a view to preparing instructions to guide the Canadian Delegation. The detailed comments of the Committee are contained in the attached briefs.†

5. Generally speaking, the revised texts of the first three Conventions, relating to the armed services, are substantially the same as those presently binding upon the signatories, but in some respects important changes are proposed. The proposed Convention relating to Civilians is entirely new. The Committee feels that Canada has a direct interest in these Conventions and should press for certain alterations in the texts on some of the more important issues, among which are the following:

(a) The Conventions should provide only the minimum standard of treatment to be given to war victims and allow for improvement in the interests of humanity.

(b) It is proposed to give preferential treatment to the International Committee of the Red Cross and to national Red Cross Societies. Canada should propose that all nationally recognized humanitarian agencies be extended the same privileges.

(c) It is proposed that governments shall incorporate into their educational systems the study of the new Conventions. Canada should propose that this requirement be subject to the constitutional position of the signatories.

(d) It is proposed that the four Conventions shall apply in the event of civil war. Canada should support the United Kingdom which strongly opposes this suggestion.

(e) The 1929 Conventions granted to medical personnel and chaplains attached to armies immunity against attack and the right of repatriation if captured. Canada should support the new proposal to retain such personnel in sufficient numbers to provide medical and spiritual aid to their fellow prisoners.

(f) Canada should support the addition of the following to those considered prisoners of war under the 1929 Convention: correspondents, civilian members of air crew, persons concerned with welfare of armed forces, organized "partisans", and members of merchant marine.

(g) The proposed civilian Convention will apply to all persons, in the hands of a power of which they are not nationals as well as to the whole population of a belligerent. Canada should propose that suitable reservations be made respecting the obligations of a signatory power towards its own nationals and persons suspected of hostile activities.

(h) Canada recognizes the humanitarian purpose of and need for these Conventions, but account must be taken of the consequences of total war and a realistic viewpoint should temper the idealism of the revised texts.

Recommendation

The Secretary of State for External Affairs therefore recommends that the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming Diplomatic Conference in Geneva be authorized to express views in accordance with the observations outlined in paragraph 5 above and indicated in detail in the attached briefs prepared by the Committee if, in the opinion of the Head of the Delegation, it seems desirable to do so in the light of developments at the Conference.⁹⁹

Memorandum for File:

1. Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Max Wershof in Geneva spoke to me in the absence of Mr. Reid and Mr. Holmes concerning developments at the General Conference for the Protection of War Victims. He stated that over the past few weeks he had been sending messages to the Department warning us of the possibility that the Soviet Delegation might attempt to divert discussion at the Conference to questions of aerial warfare and atomic bombing. He said that he had received no comments of any kind from the Department but that the situation which he feared had now arisen. The Soviet Delegation had introduced a resolution which was not seeking an amendment to the Treaty but which the Soviet Union wished the Conference to adopt.

2. The exact wording of this resolution will be teletyped to us this morning. Among other things, it states that it is the duty of all governments who have not ratified the Protocol of June 17, 1925, to ratify the said Pact in the near future and that it is similarly the duty of all governments to prohibit atomic weapons and other similar means for mass extermination of population.

3. Wershof pointed out that the Conference is discussing a Red Cross Convention for the protection of civilians in time of war and methods of regulating enemy aliens and there was never any intention that it should consider problems having to do with the general conduct of a war. Therefore, the Canadian Delegation along with a number of others would argue that this Conference is not the place for such a discussion and move that the Soviet resolution be ruled out of order. In the event that the Conference decided the Soviet resolution should be discussed on its merits, the Canadian and other delegations would then seek time for a study of its proposals.

⁹⁹ Le cabinet approuva la recommandation, le 31 mars 1949, sujet à reconsidérer l'article (b) ci-devant, qui inquiétait le premier ministre à l'effet que cela:

4. In the event that a discussion of the resolution was to take place, the Canadian Delegation, as at present constituted, was not competent, according to Wershof, to debate questions of atomic bombing and would require to have some officer familiar with this subject proceed to Geneva at once to assist the delegation.

5. I stated that there was no officer at any European mission who could be considered an expert in this field and that if we were to send someone to Geneva it would have to be either George Ignatieff or John Starnes from New York.

6. I later discussed Wershof's proposal with the Under-Secretary who expressed the view that in order to debate the Soviet resolution intelligently and effectively it was not necessary to have a detailed and expert knowledge of atomic warfare. He was not of the opinion that it was essential to send such an expert to Geneva but suggested that Mr. George of the Defence Liaison Division in consultation with the United Nations Division should prepare a brief for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation and that Wershof, particularly with his training as a lawyer, should be able to present the Canadian arguments based on that brief.

Ottawa, July 8, 1949

CONFIDENTIAL

For Canadian delegation to Diplomatic Conference. Begins. Your telegrams Nos. 145† and 146† and Moran's telegram No. 171 of July 7.†

Your attitude to the Soviet resolution calling on governments to outlaw weapons of mass destruction, whether bacteriological, chemical or atomic, may be governed by the following considerations:

(a) As you point out, the Conference has been called to prepare final texts of Conventions for the protection of victims of war and not, repeat not, for the purpose of considering how wars should be conducted.

(b) For the past three years, the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission has been trying to reach agreement on the international control of atomic energy. If agreement in this field is reached, an attempt might be made to control other means of mass destruction, but there are much greater technical difficulties in the way of controlling bacteriological and chemical warfare because the processes of manufacture are simpler and the source of materials more widespread, thus making effective inspection virtually impossible. In the field of atomic energy, however, the UN has recognized that international control is technically possible, but the Soviet Union has consistently refused to accept the minimum requirements of an international inspection and control which the great majority of the United Nations consider essential for their security.

(c) Until the United Nations have reached agreement for international control of atomic energy there can be no prohibition of atomic weapons; yet those who stand in the way of international control are the ones who press most loudly for prohibition of atomic weapons.

(d) By an overwhelming vote the General Assembly on November 4, 1948 charged the Atomic Energy Commission and in particular its six permanent members (including Canada) to continue their efforts to reach an agreed system of international control. The AEC has tried to reach agreement and has just decided to postpone further efforts until the Six Powers have met in an attempt to make a fresh start. Their meetings will probably begin before the end of this month. It would therefore be premature to anticipate the results of their meeting by passing a resolution on the subject on which the General Assembly has given them specific responsibility.

(e) We have no objection to paragraph (b) of the Soviet resolution, as we have ratified the Protocol of June 17, 1925; this part appears to be aimed at the United States which has not ratified. If, however, the Soviet delegate tries to use paragraphs (a) and (c) of his resolution to extend the scope of the Convention for the Protection of Civilians in Time of War to situations which have little to do with the more limited purposes we believe the Convention should serve, you should be guided by paragraphs 9 (a) and (b) of the Commentary prepared by the Inter-Departmental Committee in Ottawa. We think it is unrealistic and unnecessary to attempt to draft a Convention to be applied to all civilians as each government should be free to exercise its own discretion in dealing with its own nationals.

2. The Soviet approach to the atomic energy problem is simple and well known. They want prohibition without control. As all peoples long for security from attacks by weapons of mass destruction, the Soviet Union has exploited to the full for propaganda purposes their desire for prohibition and has tried to evade responsibility for the absence of agreement on the fundamental questions of inspection and control.

3. Arguing along the above lines, you should if possible seek to have the Soviet resolution ruled out of order. If it is discussed nevertheless, you should, in consultation with the countries associated with us in the Six Powers Talks (U.K., U.S., France and China), seek to amend the resolution by making it effective only in the event of an international system of inspection and control having been approved by the UN and ratified by its members. If some such amendment is not passed, you should oppose the Soviet resolution (if you find you are in good company in so doing); alternatively you should abstain, as you did when a similar resolution was introduced at the 17th International Red Cross Conference in Stockholm August, 1948, if this course seems preferable in view of the attitude of other delegations.

4. I doubt, in the circumstances, whether the Soviet resolution will reach a vote, but, if there is any prospect that it will, we must have made clear that we are going to abstain not because we do not wish as much as anyone to see weapons of mass destruction outlawed, but because it is not within the terms of reference of the Conference and would be anticipating what is already the concern of a special organ of the UN.

5. I should be grateful for your comments on these instructions. As you see, we regard the problem essentially as a familiar propagandist move on the part of the Soviet Union, and not as a serious proposal requiring technical advice, for which the Atomic Energy Commission would be the proper forum. However, we shall be glad to furnish whatever other technical information you feel you may require, and are sending you by bag certain UN documents on atomic energy which may help you to see the Soviet proposal in the perspective of the UN discussions.

CONFIDENTIAL

RE: THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS FOR THE PROTECTION OF VICTIMS OF WAR.

You will recall that, at the invitation of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Canada participated in an International Conference of Government Experts in Geneva in April, 1947, for the purpose of preparing:

(a) A revision of "The Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick of Armies in the Field" concluded at Geneva, July 27, 1929;

(b) A revision of "The Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War" concluded at Geneva, July 27, 1929;

(c) A revision of "The Convention (Xth Hague) for the Adaptation of Maritime Warfare to the Principles of the Geneva Convention" signed at The Hague, October 18, 1907;

(d) A draft text of a new Convention entitled "A Convention for the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War".

Canada is a signatory to the three Conventions referred to in (a), (b) and (c). The Civilian's Convention (d) is a new one.

2. The resolutions and amendments proposed by the Government Experts were consolidated in the revised texts which were submitted to the XVIIth International Conference of the Red Cross at Stockholm in August, 1948. The Cabinet approved that Canada should also participate in that Conference, which further revised the texts of these Conventions. This Conference also recommended that a Diplomatic Conference be convened later to review the texts of the Conventions, which had been previously revised by the two previous Red Cross Conferences, and to prepare them in final form for signature by governments. At the request of the Swiss Government, Canada sent a delegation to this Diplomatic Conference, which was convened in Geneva from April 21 to August 12 of this year.

3. From the time of the first Geneva Conference, an Interdepartmental Committee has existed on which has been represented the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Justice, National Defence, National Health and Welfare, Secretary of State, Transport, the Civil Defence Co-Ordinator and the R.C.M.P. This Committee has met regularly to study the texts of the various revisions of these Conventions and has also prepared instructions which were approved by Cabinet for the guidance of Canadian delegations to the three Conferences. The Committee has reviewed the report of the Canadian delegation to the Diplomatic Conference and has given careful study to the texts of the Conventions, as adopted by that Conference, in order to determine whether these Conventions are acceptable to Canada and what reservations, if any, should be made at the time of signature.

4. The Committee has now completed its work (minutes of its last meeting attached)† and has concluded:

(a) That the first three military Conventions are substantially the same as those presently binding upon the signatory powers, including Canada and that the text of the Civilian's Convention, although not the most desirable and acceptable from a Canadian point of view, is, nevertheless, the only text that can be adopted in view of the conflicting interests of such a great number of countries (59 governments were represented at the Conference). Moreover, the text is subject to a sufficiently broad interpretation to warrant Canada's acceptance;

(b) That appropriate legislation will have to be passed in order to restrict the further use of two emblems recognized in the Conventions, i.e. the Red Crescent and the Red Lion and the Sun. The Secretary of State Department intends to introduce new trade mark legislation and is of the opinion that there will be no difficulty in incorporating such protection in the new legislation. This is the only new legislation which will be required to implement the Conventions. The emergency powers normally granted to the government in time of war should enable it to meet its other obligations under the Conventions;

(c) That Canada should sign the four Conventions at the formal Signing Ceremony to be held in Geneva on December 8, 1949, and that a reservation should be made with regard to the second paragraph of Article 68 of the Civilian's Convention.

5. We are informed that the United Kingdom and the United States will sign the four Conventions (the United States has already signed the first three Conventions), and that each government intends to make a reservation with respect to the second paragraph of Article 68 of the Civilian's Convention. At the present time this Article would prohibit an occupying power from imposing the death penalty on a civilian within its jurisdiction if the law of the territory occupied did not provide for such a penalty. The Committee and especially the representative from the Department of National Defence was of the opinion that Canada should reserve the right to impose the death penalty for certain offences if the occupying power decided this was necessary in its military operation. The wording of the proposed United Kingdom reservation is as follows:

“The United Kingdom reserves the right to impose the death penalty in accordance with the provisions of Article 68, paragraph 2, without regard to whether the offences referred to therein are punishable by death under the law of the occupied territory at the time the occupation begins.”

6. The recommendations and conclusions of the Committee have been concurred in by the Deputy Ministers of all the Departments represented on the Committee as well as by the Civil Defence Co-Ordinator and the R.C.M.P.

7. These Conventions will not be binding upon the signatory powers until they are ratified. There is no time limit for ratification. The Conventions are to come into force 6 months after the date of deposit of 2 instruments of ratification. They are to come into force thereafter with respect to each High Contracting Party 6 months after the deposit of its Instrument of Ratification.

8. Order-in-Council P.C 1746, dated April 7, 1949, authorized the issue of Full Powers to “Emile Vaillancourt and Max Hirsch Wershof, or either of them, to negotiate and sign ad referendum in respect of Canada such Conventions as may result from the work of the Diplomatic Conference...”. In view of the terms of this Order-in-Council, it is not necessary to ask for new Full Powers. In view of the recent developments in Belgrade, I feel that Mr. Vaillancourt should remain close to his post and I, therefore, recommend that Mr. Wershof be instructed to proceed to Geneva for the Signing Ceremony.

9. In view of the instructions given to the Canadian delegation to the Diplomatic Conference at Geneva which were approved by the Cabinet and in view of Order-in-Council P.C. 1746, I do not consider it is necessary to refer this matter again to the Cabinet.

10. Do you agree?¹⁰⁰

[Ottawa], January 4, 1949

Last week in New York I discussed with Mr. Wrong the draft of the proposed North Atlantic treaty as agreed on by the Ambassadors' Committee in Washington. This draft is in the nature of a first reading and has not yet been cleared in Washington above the level of the Under-Secretary of State, though General Marshall is, I believe, familiar in a general way with its terms. At the present time, Mr. Lovett is discussing the draft with the White House, Congressional leaders and the War Department. It may be therefore that the second draft, which will be submitted later in the light of observations received from governments, will differ in certain substantial respects from the one we now have before us.

I am outlining below the views which we agreed on in New York on the various articles of the draft.

Article 1. (Peaceful Settlement) — The parties undertake, as set forth in Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations, to settle their international disputes in such a manner that peace, security and justice are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Though juridically this article is unnecessary for those signatories who are members of the United Nations, it is politically desirable. We felt that it might be advantageous to include in the treaty an article along the lines of that suggested by the French representative providing that the parties will refer to the International Court of Justice all disputes which come under the provision of Article 36 of the Statute of the Court. When the French Ambassador submitted an article to this effect, it did not secure general approval in the Working Group, but Mr. Wrong will take the matter up again in the second reading. One difficulty is that the United Kingdom has maintained certain reservations regarding submissions to the Court and there would be no value in including a paragraph of this kind in the draft unless those reservations were abandoned.

Article 2. (General Welfare)—The parties will encourage cooperative efforts between any or all of them to promote the general welfare through collaboration in the cultural, economic and social fields. Such efforts shall, to the greatest possible extent, be undertaken through and assist the work of existing international organizations.

We have been doing our best to include in the draft some positive reference to economic and social collaboration between the signatory powers in order to broaden the basis of the agreement beyond that of a mere military alliance. This paragraph is the best we have been able to secure as yet, though we hope that there will also be a reference to economic and social collaboration in the preamble. Mr. Wrong, however, will continue his efforts to strengthen this article in second reading, possibly by the inclusion of some such words as “The parties agree to make every effort in common to eliminate conflict in their economic policies and to develop the great possibilities of trade between them.”

Article 3. (Mutual Aid)—In order better to assure the security of the North Atlantic area, the parties will use every endeavor, severally and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to strengthen their individual and collective capacity to resist aggression.

The only change that we have suggested to the above is the substitution of the words “individually and collectively” for “severally and jointly” (the latter are used in the Brussels Pact).

Article 4. (Consultation)—The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them

- (a) The territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened; or
- (b) There exists any situation which constitutes a threat to or breach of the peace.

This is a useful article and covers the possibility of “indirect aggression”. The obligation, you will note, is one merely of consultation.

Article 5. Paragraph 1 (Mutual Assistance)—

(1) The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them occurring within the area defined below shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith such military or other action, individually and in concert with the other parties, as may be necessary to restore and assure the security of the North Atlantic area.

This is the heart of the draft. The text seems generally satisfactory and goes further than we had thought the Americans would agree to. We should, I think, attempt to maintain this text, though I have a feeling that the Americans may try to water it down somewhat as a result of their discussions with Congressional leaders. The obligation is, of course, a specific one to come to the help of a country attacked, but the determination of what constitutes aggression in any particular case remains with the individual signatories of the pact, as does the formal right or duty to declare war.

Article 5. Paragraph 2 (Definition of Area)—

(2) The provisions of the foregoing paragraph shall be applicable in the event of any armed attack directed against the territory, the population or the armed forces of any of the parties in:

Alternative A

- (a) Europe or North America;
- (b) The sea and air space of the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer.

Alternative B

- (a) Europe or North America; Africa north of latitude 30° north and west of longitude 12° east;
- (b) The sea and air space of the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer; and
- (c) The sea and air space of the Western Mediterranean, west of longitude 12° east [or if Italy comes in, longitude 20° east].

This is a most important article as it defines the geographical area which is to be covered by the guarantee of the pact. I think that our objective in this article should be to make it quite clear that the far northern area and the islands in the Atlantic are included beyond doubt in the security zone and that, on the other hand, the Mediterranean area, including North Africa, should be excluded. It would, I think, be desirable to have a map attached to the treaty identifying the area covered by the agreement. It is rather amusing to note that the guarantee would, either in alternative A or alternative B, cover an attack by Guatemala on British Honduras as this colony would be a "territory" in "North America". It should also be noted that the guarantee is applicable in the event of an attack on the armed forces of any of the parties in Europe or North America. This would cover an attack on United States forces in Germany, or indeed in Trieste.

Article 6. (United Nations)—

1. This Treaty does not prejudice in any way the obligations of the parties under the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. It shall not be interpreted as affecting in any way the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security.

2. Any fact or situation constituting a threat to or breach of the peace and deemed to require consultation under article 4, or any armed attack requiring action under article 5, shall be immediately reported to the Security Council.

3. All measures taken as a result of article 5 shall be immediately reported to the Security Council. They shall be terminated as soon as the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore international peace and security.

This article seems to be satisfactory, though it would be improved if the first lines of paragraph 1 were changed to read, "This Treaty does not affect in any way the obligations...or the authority or responsibility of the Security Council, etc."

Article 7. (Other International Engagements)—The parties declare, each so far as he is concerned, that none of the international engagements now in force between him and any other of the parties or any third State is in conflict with or affected by the provisions of this Treaty.

In its present form this article seems to be juridically ineffective and should be changed to read:

“Each party to this Treaty agrees not to accept any obligations in conflict with this Treaty or with the Charter of the United Nations.”

Article 8. (Organization)—The parties hereby establish a Council, on which each of them shall be represented, to deal with matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty. The Council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The Council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a Defence Committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

No change is suggested.

Article 9. (Accession)—The parties may, by agreement, invite any other country in the North Atlantic or Western European regions to accede to this Treaty. Any State so invited may become a party to the Treaty by depositing its Instrument of Accession with the Government of The Government of ... will inform each of the parties of the deposit of each such Instrument of Accession.

We should try to have an additional article inserted after the above Accession article to read somewhat as follows:

“The parties may, by agreement and on terms to be agreed with the State concerned, extend some or all of the provisions of this Treaty to any other country in the North Atlantic or Western European regions whose defence is considered vital to the defence of the parties to this Treaty.”

The value of such an article would be that it would make possible special arrangements which would include additional territories, e.g. Italy. This, however, could only be done by agreement among the existing signatories. Some or all of the provisions could thus be extended by some or all of the signatories.

Article 10. (Ratification and Duration)—This Treaty shall be ratified by the signatory States and the Instruments of Ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the ... Government. It shall enter into force between the States which have ratified it as soon as the Ratifications of a majority of the signatories have been deposited and shall remain in effect for ... years from that date. It shall come into effect with respect to the other signatory States on the date of the deposit of their Ratifications.

After this treaty has been in force for ... years, each of the parties may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the ... Government.

The ... Government shall inform the Governments of the other parties of the deposit of each Instrument of Ratification and each Notice of Denunciation.

We feel that the duration of the treaty should be no longer than 20 years and might be even 16 or 12. We also suggest that an additional clause might be provided for registration of the treaty with the Secretary General of the United Nations; even though this is not juridically necessary, it would be politically useful and might read somewhat as follows:

“This treaty shall be registered by the ... Government with the Secretary General of the United Nations.”

You will note that there are some points on which agreement has not yet been reached. The most important of these is whether or not Italy and French North Africa should be included. We feel that, while the arguments in favour of Italian inclusion are strong, the arguments against such inclusion are even stronger and that Italy might be taken care of by some guarantee outside the pact. It would, we think, be unwise for Canada to participate in any such guarantee which goes beyond the acceptance of the obligation to consult with the Italian Government in the case of a threat to the peace. Similarly, we feel that we should not support the inclusion of French North Africa in the agreement as this would give rise to possible colonial difficulties and introduce a new and complicating factor.

One difficulty that might arise if Italy and French North Africa were included would be the desire of Greece, Turkey and possibly Iran to be given the same treatment as Italy: this we certainly should not accept.

Another point not covered in the draft is the desirability or otherwise of an article permitting suspension or expulsion of signatories of the pact. We think that, on the whole, such an article would be useful and that provision should be made for suspension, to be followed in certain cases by expulsion; the decision in this regard to be taken by the Atlantic Council on the basis of rules of procedure to be established by it. This leaves open the question of whether expulsion should be by unanimous or two-thirds vote of the Council.

Washington, January 4, 1949

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Since our conversation on the North Atlantic Treaty in New York on December 29th, I have drawn up a memorandum for my guidance and the guidance of Messrs. Stone and Rogers on the working group during the next stage of the discussions here. This is based in the main on the papers prepared by Messrs. Reid and Hopkins, of which you gave me copies, with modifications and additions arising from our own discussion. I am enclosing two copies of the paper, one for yourself and one which I shall be glad if you will pass to Mr. Reid.

The first part deals with the territorial scope of the Treaty and with the procedure to be followed. In dealing with the problems of Italy and North Africa, I have taken the line that we should prefer that Italy should not be a party to the Treaty and that French North Africa should not be specified as a part of the North Atlantic area. I have, however, expressed our attitude in terms which would permit our agreement to the inclusion of both Italy and North Africa if it becomes evident that this is the only solution for which general acceptance can be secured. I propose to resist strongly any suggestion that the North Atlantic group should give special assurances to Greece or Turkey, since I think that if we were to do more than promise to consult, if danger comes from that quarter, we should find that the obligations of the Pact would tend to become world-wide.

As to procedure, there is nothing that I need add in this letter to the three paragraphs that appear on pages 2 and 3 of the enclosure.

The first section of the second part of my paper deals with possible additions to the draft articles. I am almost certain that we shall not secure agreement on including an article dealing with the peaceful settlement of disputes between the parties to the Treaty. The State Department is alarmed at the prospect, partly because they fear that it will involve them in interminable discussions with their own lawyers. If the article were also, as we propose, to provide for the dropping of reservations to the jurisdiction of the International Court, we should get deeper into problems of definition. We will have another try at the proposal, but I have no hope that we shall succeed.

The fate of the proposed article on special arrangements will probably be the same, but for different reasons. I think that the State Department will resist it because they would not be ready to ask the Senate to accept an article which would permit the assumption of new international obligations without embodying them in a Treaty. That would be the effect of our draft, as it would authorize the parties to the Treaty to extend some of its provisions to other countries, presumably by decision of the Council set up by the Treaty.

The proposed article on suspension and expulsion is in the form in which we discussed it in New York. I do not attach great importance to its inclusion and, as I told you, the opinion in the negotiating group here is that it would be a mistake in this or in other connections to include in the Treaty itself any matter which would raise questions about voting procedure in the Council. My draft would leave it to the Council itself to settle the steps which would be necessary to bring about the suspension or expulsion of a party, except that it would require an interval of two months between suspension and expulsion.

I have also added a note on duration, based on our discussion, as this point was not covered in the papers prepared by Messrs. Reid and Hopkins.

The second portion of part 2 of the enclosure deals with drafting points, most of which are taken from the paper prepared by Messrs. Reid and Hopkins. I have, however, added a number of questions about the definition of the area in Article 5, paragraph 2, most of which we discussed in New York.

It looks as though we should not be able to have a meeting before Thursday, January 6th, as the British and some of the continental countries have not yet received their instructions. The Brussels Permanent Commission met in London on December 30th and agreed that the governments should despatch instructions to Washington by tomorrow. I hope that the next stage will be fairly brief and that we shall be able to produce a complete text, except perhaps for the Preamble, before the end of next week. If we succeed in this, I shall hold myself in readiness to go to Ottawa so that I can be available when the text is considered by the Government.

Yours sincerely,

H.H. WRONG

P.S. Since I dictated this letter, you have spoken to me on the telephone about your discussion with the Prime Minister. In the light of this, we shall take a stiffer attitude than that suggested in the enclosure on the possibility of including North Africa and also on the membership of Italy. The enclosure is not meant for circulation to the other delegations. I am adding a supplementary note to it for the guidance of our own group.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

COMMENTS ON REPORT OF THE WORKING GROUP OF DEC. 24TH, 1948

Pt. I. Questions of Scope and Procedure

A. Territorial Scope

1. Italy. The arguments are impressive for the simultaneous association of Italy with the Treaty in some manner. There should be, however, conclusive evidence of a united view among members of the Italian Cabinet before we should consider inviting Italy to become a party to the Treaty, either as an original member or by accession. It is on the whole preferable that some method of simultaneous association of Italy with the Treaty, short of full participation, should be developed. The case for Italian association does not rest on the argument that Italy could make a positive contribution to the defences of the North Atlantic area, for Italy could not do so. The case rests on the importance of maintaining the Western orientation of Italian policy and preventing the extension of Soviet influence into Italian territory.

It is suggested, therefore, that a special arrangement with Italy would be the most satisfactory outcome. This arrangement might contain a statement by the parties to the Treaty that they regarded Italian security as essential to the security of the North Atlantic area, and that they intended on their part to pursue a policy of political, economic and cultural collaboration with Italy. It might go on to say that if a threat to Italian security were to develop the parties would immediately consult together and with the Italian Government on the action to be taken.

2. Greece and Turkey. Under Article 4(b) of the draft Treaty the parties would be bound to consult, at the request of any one of them, in the event that the security of Greece and Turkey was threatened. To attempt to give more specific assurances to these countries would extend the obligations of the Treaty far beyond the North Atlantic area. It is suggested that if any more definite assurance is considered essential, the responsibility should rest with the United States and the United Kingdom rather than collectively with the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty.

The same position prevails even more strongly in the case of Iran. Furthermore, there are other countries which are fearful lest the development of a North Atlantic defence system may increase Soviet pressure against them. Unless, therefore, the obligations arising under the Treaty are limited to the North Atlantic area, we may find that the parties are subjected to demands for special assurances all over the world.

3. North Africa. It is preferred that the limits of the North Atlantic Treaty in the Eastern Hemisphere should be confined to the Continent of Europe and adjacent waters. There seems also little reason to fear that an attack could take place on French North Africa without a prior attack involving the European territory of one or more of the parties. On the other hand, the fact that Algeria is part of the metropolitan territory of France does create an unusual situation, although it may be noted that the French West Indies are also part of the metropolitan territory and are not included in the area to be covered by the Treaty. It is likely that in the long run it will not be a matter of much importance either to France or to the other parties whether French North Africa is included, but the inclusion of that area may add to criticism of the Treaty in some of the countries and qualify public support for it.

B. Procedure

1. The Next Stage. The Canadian understanding is that the adjournment which has been taken over Christmas and New Year's Day was for the purpose of securing the initial reaction of governments to the proposals developed at the meetings held in December. The next stage is to seek to complete the draft for formal submission to the seven governments, after considering their preliminary comments on the questions which were left undecided and their suggestions for improving the draft articles. At the end of the next stage of the discussions, therefore, as complete a draft as can be prepared should be formally submitted to the governments for Cabinet consideration.

2. Final Stage. In the Canadian view it is necessary for the successful launching of the Treaty that its signature should take place at a formal conference which the Foreign Ministers of the parties would be invited to attend. The conference need not last for more than perhaps three days, provided that a virtually complete agreement on the contents of the Treaty has been secured before it takes place.

3. Joint Declaration on Signature. It is suggested that at the time of signature a Joint Declaration might be issued by the parties explaining the purpose of the Treaty more fully, and in language more closely related to the present international situation, that would be possible in the text itself of the Treaty and preamble. Such a Declaration could be drafted so as to meet the charge that the Treaty was a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the United Nations Charter. In it the parties could make clear their intention to adhere to the principles of universal collective security, and to work together to seek to establish the conditions in which the Security Council could exercise effectively its "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security". They could state that they had temporarily adopted the expedient, open to them under Article 51 of the Charter, of a collective security arrangement only because the Security Council had been unable to take the necessary measures to carry out its responsibility.

Pt. II. Additions to and Changes in the Draft Articles

A. Proposed Additions to Draft Articles

The following suggestions introduce points of some importance which are not covered in the draft articles.

1. Peaceful Settlement. An article might be added on the general lines of Article 8 of the Brussels Treaty. This would contribute to the positive and moral content of the Treaty, by making clear the intention of the parties to settle peacefully all disputes between themselves. Such an article should, however, go beyond the existing obligations of the parties, by eliminating, in respect of justiciable disputes between themselves, the reservations made by some of the parties in accepting the jurisdiction of the International Court. This purpose might be attained by adding an article on the following lines:

"The parties agree as follows in respect of disputes which may arise between any of them:

(a) all disputes falling within Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the International Court of Justice shall be referred to the Court and the decision of the Court shall be final and binding;

(b) all other disputes shall be submitted to conciliation;

(c) any party to a dispute which involves questions for which conciliation is appropriate, and other questions for which judicial settlement is appropriate, shall have the right to require that the judicial settlement of the legal questions shall precede conciliation.

The provisions of this Article shall not be interpreted as affecting the application of relevant provisions or agreements prescribing some other method of peaceful settlement, whether provided for in the Charter of the United Nations or otherwise."

2. Special Arrangements. It seems advisable to include an article which would permit the parties by agreement to make special arrangements with countries which are not full parties to the Treaty. If some of the countries whose membership is desired are unwilling to undertake the full obligations of membership, special arrangements with them may become necessary. Furthermore, it may prove wise to enter into special arrangements with some countries not bordering on the North Atlantic, such as Italy. An article might therefore be added after Article 9 on the following lines:

"The parties may by agreement between themselves, and on terms to be agreed with the state concerned, extend some or all of the provisions of this Treaty to any other country in the North Atlantic area or in Western Europe, the defence of which is considered vital to the defence of the parties to this Treaty”.

3. Suspension and Expulsion. It is suggested that the question of the suspension or expulsion of parties to the Treaty requires further consideration. It might be left to the Council to determine the conditions whereby suspension or expulsion could be effected, through the addition to the Treaty before Article 10 of an article on the following lines:

“The Council established by Article 8 may suspend any party from membership of the Council or of any subsidiary bodies set up by the Council. The Council may declare that any party whose membership of the Council or of subsidiary bodies has been suspended for not less than two months has ceased to be a party to this Treaty.”

4. Duration. The duration of the Treaty was left blank in the draft of Article 10. It is suggested that an initial term of twenty years, with a requirement for two years’ notice of denunciation, would be satisfactory.

B. Drafting Points

The following suggestions do not introduce any points of substance, but look to the improvement of the language of some of the draft articles in the interests of greater clarity.

Article 3. The phrase “severally and jointly” is legalistic and not easily intelligible to the general public. It might be altered to read “individually and collectively”, or, since those words are used later in the article, “separately and in common”.

Article 5, Paragraph 2. At the beginning of the article reference is made to “any armed attack directed against the territory, the population, or the armed forces of any of the parties”. The inclusion of the words “the population” does not appear to be necessary, since it would be impossible to attack the population of any party without attacking either its territory or its armed forces.

In both Alternatives A and B greater precision appears to be necessary in order to ensure that all island territories of the parties in the area are covered. The exact limits covered by the words “Europe or North America” are open to dispute. As it is intended to include the Arctic islands and the islands in the North Atlantic area which are part of the territories of parties, but not to include territories of parties south of the Tropic of Cancer, the initial phrase in either of the two alternatives might read, “Europe, or North America north of the Tropic of Cancer, or the Arctic regions.”

Unless a change of this nature is made the article would be open to the following interpretations, among others: (a) that some of the Arctic islands were not covered on the ground that they are a part neither of North America nor of Europe, and are situated in the Arctic Ocean and not in “the sea and air space of the North Atlantic area”; (b) that British Honduras and perhaps some of the West Indian islands belonging to the United States, the United Kingdom and France were included although they are south of the Tropic of Cancer, on the ground that they are part of North America; (c) that Greenland might not be covered, in whole or in part, on the dual ground that it is not part of North America and that a large portion of it is not part of "the sea and air space of the North Atlantic area".

It should be noted that both alternatives would include Malta as part of the European territory of the United Kingdom, and might be held to include Cyprus for the same reason unless it is generally agreed that Cyprus is an Asiatic territory. It may prove desirable to attach a map to the Treaty, showing the exact limits covered by this paragraph.

Article 6. This article is drafted very much in the language of the Brussels Treaty. The language of the first two sentences might well be made more direct by combining them in a single sentence and avoiding the use of the words "prejudice" and "interpret". This might read as follows:

"This treaty does not affect in any way the obligations of the parties under the Charter of the United Nations, or the authority or responsibility of the Security Council to take at any time such action as it deems necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security."

Paragraph 3 of this article might also be changed slightly by using the exact language of the Charter so that its final phrase would read, "the measures necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security".

Article 7. As drafted the article asserts that none of the parties has any international engagements which are not in accordance with the Treaty. This is, however, a question of fact, and the article imposes no obligation. It might be expanded by adding the following sentence: "Each party agrees not to accept any obligations which are in conflict with this Treaty or with the Charter of the United Nations."

Article 10. It is proposed that the following additions should be made to the article as drafted:

(a) A clause providing for registration of the Treaty with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, even though this is not juridically necessary. The clause might read somewhat as follows: "This Treaty shall be registered by the Government of ____ with the Secretary-General of the United Nations".

(b) The usual provision on authentic texts and on the custody of the authentic texts. This provision might read as follows: "This Treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of _____. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that government to the governments of the other signatory states."

(c) The usual termination to the Treaty. This might read as follows: "In faith whereof, the representatives of the governments of _____, having exhibited their full powers found to be in good and due form, have signed this Treaty. Done at the City of _____, the _____ day of _____, one thousand, nine hundred and forty-nine."

[Washington], January 4, 1949

With reference to my memorandum of yesterday dealing with the line to be taken during the next talks on the North Atlantic Treaty, Mr. Pearson spoke to me on the telephone this morning to say that he had gone over the draft with the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister's main concern was about possible political difficulties in Canada if French North Africa and Italy were included in the Treaty, and in particular French North Africa. He thought that this would introduce into public discussion of the Treaty the colonial question and possibly give rise later on to difficult issues should an independence movement develop strongly among the inhabitants of Morocco, Algeria or Tunis. Mr. St. Laurent was agreed that the inclusion or non-inclusion of this area is not a matter of much practical importance in relation to the main purposes of the Treaty, since it is impossible to see how an attack by a great power on French North Africa could take place without a previous attack on France or other parties to the Treaty.

Mr. Pearson did not elaborate on the Prime Minister's views about Italy except to say that he hoped that Italy would not become a full party.

He is going to go over the Working Group's report carefully with the Prime Minister and Mr. Claxton, but will not take it up with other Ministers until the next stage of the talks here has been completed. I told him that I hoped that we might complete this stage by the end of next week unless new and controversial questions were introduced which would require reference to governments. His intention is to submit his full report to the Cabinet when the forthcoming series of talks here has ended.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; WASHINGTON DISCUSSIONS; PROGRESS REPORT

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of December 1st, reported upon the progress of discussions in Washington between representatives of the United States and the Ambassadors of Canada and the Western Union Powers.

With the Canadian Ambassador he had gone over in detail a report which had now gone forward to governments setting out the principal features which it had been agreed should be included in a North Atlantic Treaty.

The Washington discussions had been informal and exploratory throughout and the report represented views on the official level only. It was concurred in by the U.S. State Department but had not yet been taken up with the White House nor with Congressional leaders. Consequently considerable revisions were still to be anticipated.

31. Mr. Pearson described the principal features contained in the Ambassadors' report.

It had been agreed that the Treaty should contain a guarantee of mutual assistance in a form which perhaps went somewhat further than the United States might eventually be willing to go. The Powers would agree to consult in the event of any indirect aggression; this was an important provision calculated to meet Communist subversion from within. The Treaty would provide for collaboration in the economic, cultural and social fields.

Agreement had not been reached on the area to be covered by the Pact and alternative provisions had been prepared for consideration. The French were anxious to include North Africa. The case for and against including Italy had also been discussed but no conclusion had been reached.

It had been agreed that the United States should approach Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland and Ireland. Portugal would be approached by the United Kingdom.

32. Mr. Pearson said that when the Ambassadors met again next week they would consider the comments of governments upon their report. A second version of a draft treaty would then be produced for consideration by governments and for discussion with Congressional leaders in the United States. Thereafter a final text would be prepared for signature at a conference of Ministerial representatives.

33. The Minister of National Defence mentioned the possibility of introducing a resolution into Parliament at an early stage for approval of the Treaty. Whether or not this would be feasible would depend upon the timetable and upon the pressure of other Parliamentary business.

34. Mr. Pearson referred to a proposal put forward by Canadian representatives for a simultaneous declaration by the parties to the Treaty when it was ready for signature. The object would be to emphasize that the instrument was a "Pact for Peace", not a mere defensive military alliance and that it had been worked out within the framework of the United Nations.

35. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that, following the conclusion of the next stage of the Washington discussions, the text of the draft Treaty as then reported be considered by the Cabinet in detail; meantime the Prime Minister and other Ministers immediately concerned to be kept informed of progress.

With respect to the introduction of a resolution into Parliament prior to signature of the Treaty, it was agreed that this would be desirable if it proved feasible.

[Ottawa], January 8, 1949

Mr. Pearson and I discussed the North Atlantic Treaty briefly with the Prime Minister yesterday. The Prime Minister said that he had read the draft with great care. There were three points which struck him as being important for the public acceptance of the Treaty in Canada.

(1) The areas specifically covered should not include any colonial territory. This applied to Algeria as well as to the rest of French North Africa. He would prefer also that Italy should not be a full partner in the Treaty, although special assurances might be given to Italy of the concern with which Italian security was regarded by the other parties. These assurances might be given by the U.S., the U.K. and France, but if it was felt necessary that they should be given in the names of all the parties, he would be willing that Canada should join in them. No special assurances should be given collectively to Greece, Turkey or other countries.

(2) He would prefer that the Treaty should be for a firm term of twelve years. If a longer term was accepted, he thought that it would be well to include a provision which would permit the parties to hold a conference in eight or ten years to discuss whether further continuation of the Treaty was necessary to assure international security. The Prime Minister said that obviously the Treaty was now directed towards the Soviet Union, and while this state of affairs continued, it would be politically easy to defend Canadian participation. The world situation, however, may change drastically within a decade.

(3) The Prime Minister thought that we need not support or oppose the introduction of a reference to constitutional process in the Treaty, but could leave that to the United States. On balance such a provision would be of some value in defending the Treaty in Canada, even though it was only a statement of the obvious.

TELEGRAM WA-76

Washington, January 12, 1949

Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: Reference North Atlantic Pact.

The Working Group met in long sessions on January 10th and 11th. The purpose of these meetings has been to examine the draft Articles one by one and to extract questions arising out of each in the light of instructions received from Governments. All representatives had instructions except the Belgians. While the Dutch had received theirs, they included an instruction to consult with the Belgians on their instructions. Neither the Dutch nor the Belgians, therefore, were able to express any very firm views on the important points even on the working level. An Ambassadors' meeting has been set for Friday next at 3:00 o'clock.

I shall take up the draft Articles one by one below and give you a brief outline of questions which arose in connection with each.

Article 1

A slight revision was made in this Article to make its language conform exactly with that of the Charter. In place of the present wording, please now read after "in such a manner" the words "that international peace and security, etc."

Article 2

The French suggested deleting the words "to the greatest possible extent". Our representatives said that they could not agree with this deletion. We made the point that while we had not at all in mind the setting up of new and complicated international cultural, economic and social organizations, we believed that the Article would be rather worse than useless if it did not provide for the possibility of breaking new ground in these fields. We repeated, as we have said on so many other occasions, that the Canadian Government attached high importance to the inclusion of a strong Article to give the Treaty a positive slant in other fields than strictly military. Other representatives agreed with us, but the French reserved their position which was apparently all they could do on the working level in view of their instructions.

Article 3

A United Kingdom amendment was proposed and accepted combined with a suggestion from us. The first phrases of the draft now should read:

"In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the parties will use every endeavour, separately and jointly..."

Article 4

The Americans, on re-examination of this draft Article, took strong exception to paragraph (b) in that it is so broad that it might be interpreted as substituting consultation between the parties for the work of the Security Council. We suggested that the division between (a) and (b) should be done away with, and that the Article should read:

"...opinion of any of them the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the parties is endangered by any situation which may constitute a threat to or a breach of the peace."

This text was tentatively accepted but the Americans wished to give it a little more thought. They would agree to ending the Article after the word "endangered".

While I would prefer the above wording, I should think if the last phrases were omitted it would not seriously impair the effectiveness of the Article.

Article 5, paragraph 1

No changes were suggested by the Working Group.

Article 5, paragraph 2

The principal problem arising out of this Article is that of the inclusion or exclusion of Algeria and most of the discussion was on this. The French instructions seem to be completely intransigent and on the working level Berard has made some rather rash statements about the complete inacceptability to the French of a Pact which did not include at least the three Departments of Algeria. At both meetings of the Working Group there has been some pretty plain talk. The United States representatives have brought out into the open their two principal objections—

(a) That the inclusion of Algeria would bring up the whole controversial problem of overseas territories, and

(b) That their military people are fearful lest the Pact might be called into operation in the event of native tribal troubles in these areas.

The British representative put it on the record that his instructions are to “urge the French not to press the matter of the inclusion of Algeria in view of United States and Canadian resistance”. Our representative spoke strongly against the inclusion of North Africa and expressed the opinion that the matter had gone as far as it could in the Working Group and should now be referred to Ambassadors and, if necessary, back to Governments for further consultation between them. He added that quite apart from the question of the inclusion of North Africa and Italy, further thought would obviously have to be given to the exact definition of Africa. The Working Group generally agreed on this and it was pointed out that in addition to the question of the inclusion of North Africa and Italy it would be difficult to define the area exactly until it was known what other countries would be members. Paragraph 2 of Article 5, therefore, has still to be worked on.

Article 6, paragraph 1

The Canadian revise of paragraph 1 is tentatively accepted with one amendment, and now reads as follows:

“1. This Treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the obligations of the parties under the Charter of the United Nations, whereby they recognize the authority and responsibility of the Security Council to take at any time such action as it deems necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security.”

Article 6, paragraphs 2 and 3

The United States representatives said that they had had further discussions with the United Nations authorities in the State Department on these paragraphs out of which certain points have arisen. The United Nations experts pointed out that it could be argued that paragraph 2 invokes Article 54. Therefore it might be maintained that, if the Treaty is supposed to come only under Article 51 and not under Chapter VIII of the Charter, its text should be restricted to Article 5 alone. No decision was reached and the State Department are going to discuss the question further.

Our proposal to make a drafting change to use the exact language of the Charter in paragraph 3 and to say "the measures necessary to maintain and to restore international peace and security" was discussed. It was pointed out, however, that this Article was concerned with measures taken as a result of Article 5, which presumably means that an armed attack will have taken place. In the circumstances, it was thought that it was more appropriate to say only "to restore international peace and security".

Article 7

Our suggestion that Article 7 should carry an obligation as well as state a fact did not meet with general favour. The United States representatives in particular disagreed with it on the grounds that it would create difficulties with Congress.

The United Nations experts in the State Department would prefer the elimination of Article 7. If this is not considered advisable they then suggest that the order of the wording should be changed and some text accepted along the following lines:

"The parties declare, each so far as he is concerned, that none of the provisions of this Treaty is in conflict with or affected by any of the international engagements now in force between him and any other of the parties or any third State."

Article 8

The French suggested substituting for the words "which shall recommend measures", the words "which shall prepare the plans and recommend the steps".

The United States wished to amend the present text by inserting the word "general" before the word "measures". They said that the French amendment would be quite unacceptable to the United States military authorities. They thought that in order to go part way to meet the French wishes they might persuade the military authorities not to insist on the inclusion of the word "general". In explaining the matter Hickerson said that the United States concept of the Military Committee set up under this Pact was that it would be an organization on which all signatories would be represented, that it would meet, say, once a quarter to consider available facilities, etc., and that the real planning would be done by the smaller organization now operating in London under the Brussels Treaty with United States and Canadian representatives participating. He could not see that a "rival" organization could be set up by the present Treaty, nor could he see the French Chiefs of Staff, for instance, agreeing that, say, Iceland should have a say in their over-all strategic planning.

The French had a different concept of the Military Planning Group set up under the present Treaty. They envisaged perhaps a large Group on which all signatories would be represented, and a smaller Group which would concern itself with the defence of the whole area covered by the Treaty, whereas the Military Committee sitting now in London concerned itself more specifically with the defence of Western Europe as provided for in the Brussels Pact.

The British representative on the Working Group put forward the views of his Government which were similar to those of the United States representatives.

At this point the French representative made a pessimistic statement to the effect that particularly France and the United States seem so far apart on Article 5, paragraph 2, and Article 8 that he wondered whether any satisfactory compromise could be found. He insisted that no Treaty which did not under Article 5, paragraph 2, include Algiers, and under Article 8 indicate that some immediate military planning would be put in train would ever be accepted by the French Assembly or by French public opinion. The British representative interjected that he could not speak for the French Government, but he could speak for the United Kingdom Government and say that they were in no position to "insist" at all on anything and that they had no intention of looking a gift horse in the mouth "however remotely". It was also pointed out to the French representative that this Treaty, if successfully concluded, would accomplish the purposes of French foreign policy over the last thirty years. As an indication of how disillusioned and pessimistic the French representative is, I should say that he disagreed with this statement and pointed to the Kellogg Pact as having once accomplished the purposes of French foreign policy.

The French representative said that he would have to seek further instructions from his Government on Article 8.

The French representative said that his Government was prepared to insist no longer on the idea that the Council created by the Treaty should be an agency of conciliation between the parties to the Treaty. He also has ceased to insist on the inclusion of an Article specifying the manner for the peaceful settlement of disputes between the parties. In view of the recent conversations which I had with the Minister, our representative did not re-introduce the draft on peaceful settlement which was prepared. Hickerson gave it as his view that the dropping of these two matters meant that the negotiations, in view of the difficulties which they anticipated with both their legal advisers in the State Department and people in Congress, had been shortened by approximately one month.

Article 9

The beginning of this Article was re-worded as follows:

"The parties may by agreement invite any other neighbouring European State to accede to this Treaty." I can say that no member of the Working Group expressed any enthusiasm over this wording, but it was accepted tentatively until a better draft is found.

Article on Special Arrangements

Our representative put forward the draft of the Article on Special Arrangements which we had prepared to follow Article 9. This suggestion found no support in the Working Group. Each representative said that his country as an original signatory to the Treaty would be delighted to take advantage of this Article and subscribe to the Treaty under it by making their own conditions. Hickerson added seriously that they would meet with considerable opposition from Congressmen on the other ground that this might be interpreted as giving the Council power to negotiate agreements with other countries under which the United States would be committed, but which would not be submitted necessarily either to Congress or to the President.

Article 10

Discussion of this Article was under three headings.

(a) Ratification

It had been suggested by the United Kingdom that after the words "a majority of the signatories" there should be inserted the words "including Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States". For the most part it was thought that this would be inadvisable as it smacked too much of the veto. In particular, our representative said that he would not wish Canada to be included in this group. Hickerson said, half seriously, that he did not think the United States would agree to being named unless Canada was named also. It was, of course, recognized that in light of history, European countries when asking for power to ratify would immediately be faced with the question—what is the United States going to do? Hickerson said that he thought that in presenting the problem of ratification to their Governments and to their Parliaments, it could be said that in Washington it was generally agreed that no country would deposit its ratification until the United States had done so.

(b) Duration

The Working Group was informed yesterday afternoon, as I have already told you in an earlier message, that the Under-Secretary of State was thinking in terms of 12 to 20 years. The Brussels Powers, and in particular the United Kingdom and France, are thinking in terms of a longer Treaty, but the United Kingdom is prepared to settle for 20 years, although they have put forward as their present desideratum a period of 40 years.

Our representative put forward a paper yesterday afternoon containing the suggestion that if the Treaty was made for a period of twenty years or more it might be advisable to include a provision that probably at the half-way mark the signatories would consult at the request of any of them to determine whether, in the light of the progress made by the United Nations and its organs in the maintenance of international peace and security, it should be revised or terminated.

In the view of the Working Group generally this idea had merit. Most of the members, however, wanted some time to consider the exact wording of the provision and the suggestion will be discussed at a later meeting.

(c) Our representative also put forward a paper containing three provisions which might be included in Article 10, as follows:

- (a) Registration with the United Nations
- (b) Authenticity of texts
- (c) Paragraph providing for signature.

The majority of the Working Group thought that a provision for registration with the United Nations was not necessary.

The Working Group agreed that something along the lines of (b) and (c) would have to be included and it was thought that this could be done by the Group drafting the final texts.

Expulsion Clause

The idea of an expulsion clause did not find much support in the Working Group. The French representative said that his Government was against the inclusion of such a provision. You will recall also that the clause as drafted by us from the legal point of view might have required a provision that the Council should establish its rules of procedure. This, in the view of practically everyone in the Group, would introduce a complication. As only the French and ourselves were in possession of any Governmental reaction, it was decided to refer this matter back to Ambassadors and to Governments if they considered it necessary.

Preamble

There was a brief discussion of the preamble. A United States draft was circulated which I shall send you by bag. Our representative circulated a personal draft of his own which has at least the merit of brevity. The question was held over and no doubt other drafts will in due course be presented.

Declaration at time of signature

Our representative circulated the draft prepared in Ottawa of a declaration to be made at the time of signature. This was not discussed but the members of the Working Group will now individually give the matter some thought. Ends.

North Atlantic Treaty

1. To supplement our messages of yesterday, the following points, which have come up outside the discussions in the working group, seem worth reporting to you:

(1) Mr. Acheson's succession to General Marshall on January 20th will cause some delay, since it will, of course, be necessary for him to satisfy himself that he should take complete responsibility for what is being done.

(2) No one here seems to have a clear idea of the outcome of the meeting of Scandinavian Ministers last week. The Norwegian Ambassador tells me that he has not received nearly as clear an indication of his Government's readiness to join in the Treaty as was implied in [E.J.] Garland's recent telegram from Oslo. The press today reports that all the Scandinavian Ambassadors in Washington are being called back for consultation.

(3) Hickerson has told me that opposition to the inclusion of Algeria in the Treaty is firmly held in the Pentagon and that the reason is identical with our own—that we should run no risk of involvement under the Treaty in native uprisings.

(4) Our conjecture is accurate that one of the reasons why the French wish to spell out in the Treaty the general powers of a defence organization is their fear that the Combined Chiefs of Staff may in practice become the central authority. On the United States side, they will not commit themselves at this point to support of a definite plan for organizing collective defence. Incidentally, the Combined Chiefs have not held a formal meeting for a long time, but have taken up some questions informally. I think the best current course for us, even though we share French apprehensions, is to leave the problem of defence organization under the Treaty for discussion in the Council later on. The United States will strongly resist putting in the Treaty anything more definite than the language of the present draft, and the United Kingdom will support them in this.

(5) You will have noted in [James] Reston's articles that pressure is being exerted for greater publicity about what we are doing. I have been seeking to hold Reston in check for a few days in the hope that we might get tentative agreement on the matters still under dispute and particularly on the area to be covered. He has been seeing Vandenberg and Dulles and insists on the importance of keeping the language sufficiently fluid to allow suggestions from them and from other Congressional quarters to be discussed and possibly adopted. Ends.

Following for Wrong from Reid, Begins: North Atlantic Treaty. Your telegrams WA-76 of January 12 and WA-93 of January 13.

2. I shall discuss these matters with Pearson immediately on his return to Ottawa on Monday. Meanwhile, I thought it might be useful if you had my own hurried views on some of the questions.

3. I realize the strength of the arguments for leaving the problem of defence organization under the Treaty for discussion in the North Atlantic Council later on. However, my worry is that if Hickerson's views on Article 8, as set forth in your WA-76 are not commented on by us sometime during the discussions in Washington, they will remain on the record without any kind of questioning or challenge recorded as coming from us.

4. This is not a matter of attempting to put anything into the Treaty more definite than the language of the present draft. It is a matter of having the record of the Washington discussions make it clear that we do not support Hickerson's views.

5. I certainly share the fear of the French that the United States and the United Kingdom intend to maintain the Combined Chiefs of Staff, as in practice, the central authority. As you may know, under the emergency planning which is going on between the United States and the United Kingdom, the intention certainly seems to be to retain the Combined Chiefs of Staff and to subordinate to this body Western Union organs and presumably North Atlantic organs.

6. If the United States and the United Kingdom are successful in this and if hostilities should break out, we would find ourselves in almost exactly the same position as we were in during the last war when we were not consulted on questions of policy and when decisions were taken by individuals and bodies who had received no authority from us.

7. From our point of view it is of paramount importance that, to use Norman Robertson's phrase, any Supreme Commander in another war should derive his powers from a "Constitutional grant" from all the members of the alliance.

8. From your teletype WA-75,† it seems to me that Hickerson has confused the issue. I do not think anyone is suggesting setting up a "rival organization" under the present Treaty. It is, however, of very great political importance to us that Canada should be a full member of a Chiefs of Staff Committee along with the United States as a full member. How can we or the United States be full members of a Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee? This smacks of the old "Allied and associated powers", which is an out-of-date concept.

9. I see no necessity for duplicating machinery. Some of the subordinate military organs of Western Union could, I assume, also be used as subordinate organs of the North Atlantic Union. Some bodies might meet at one time as Western Union bodies and at another time—even the same day—meet with exactly the same membership as North Atlantic bodies.

10. I wonder what Hickerson would say if you asked him how the Supreme Commander and the Commanders-in-Chief are going to be appointed under the North Atlantic Organization? Here it is essential for us that the Supreme Commander and the Commanders-in-Chief and the whole chain of command be appointed by the North Atlantic Organization. In this case it seems to me that the North Atlantic Commanders-in-Chief Committee must supersede the Western Union Commanders-in-Chief Committee.

11. These are mainly political arguments, but there is another set of considerations which have to do with the method of carrying out effective planning, whatever the formal structure created. If the United States does not want full membership in any Chiefs of Staff Committee, it confirms my view that they intend to do the real planning in the Combined Chiefs of Staff. I can understand their desire for this arrangement for emergency planning so long as there are not sufficient forces available to prevent the occupation of western Europe; this situation may last for two or three years. From their own point of view, the only possible argument for continuing this arrangement for long-term planning would be their fear of compromising defence information which they regard as vital. This would not, however, seem to me to be sufficient justification for maintaining the Combined Chiefs of Staff as the principal U.S.-U.K. organ for long-term planning. Certainly if they intend to do the real long-term planning in the Combined Chiefs of Staff, it is difficult to see how any effective defence organization can be created under the Atlantic Pact.

12. You cannot, of course, use any references to emergency planning in the discussions. However, I think it would be worth while your trying to get some clarification from the United States and the United Kingdom representatives as to what they are driving at. We have been trying to avoid being excluded from the emergency planning, with some limited success. If the United States and the United Kingdom representatives mean what they said in the working group, there seems a danger that we will be omitted from the strategic planning under the North Atlantic Treaty. Ends.

Following for Reid only from Wrong, Begins: Re: North Atlantic Treaty.

My immediately following teletype† contains the text of a memorandum left at the State Department on January 12th at 5.00 o'clock by the Italian Ambassador in which is made known the desire of the Italian Government to be associated as an original signatory and to participate in the negotiations for a North Atlantic Treaty.

The new situation created by this Italian initiative was discussed in the working group yesterday afternoon. The members of the working group all regret this Italian initiative. However, it was the consensus in the group that it would now be difficult not (repeat not) to include Italy. In presenting this memorandum to Hickerson, [Alberto] Tarchiani, the Italian Ambassador,¹ said that the effect in Italy of excluding her from the pact would be very bad. He said that it would lead to political unrest and create a field day for the Communists and the left wing Socialists. He also said that [Alcide] DeGasperi and Sforza were convinced in their own minds that they could cope successfully with any minor crises in the Cabinet which might arise if Italy were to sign, and carry [Giuseppe] Saragat with them, which they considered, of course, highly desirable, although they have an absolute majority in the Assembly without the right wing Socialists. Hickerson asked Tarchiani what he would think of the plan of making some sort of declaration about Italian security at the time of signature of the Treaty as an alternative to including Italy in the Treaty. Tarchiani gave it as his view that this would be not enough.

North Atlantic Treaty.

1. Reference my WA-105 of January 14th, 1949.† The Ambassadors' group met yesterday afternoon. I shall in this message, and my three immediately following messages, report on the matters which came up for discussion. This message will deal with the question of Italy.

2. The Under-Secretary of State asked for the views of the Ambassadors on the question of the admission of Italy in the light of the new situation created by the presentation of the memorandum to the State Department by the Italian Ambassador, the text of which I sent you in my WA-102 of January 13th.† Each Ambassador agreed that in fact a new situation had arisen and that the complete exclusion of Italy from participation in the pact would, in their personal views, be much more difficult now than before, when we were operating in a field, as Lovett put it, where we had more freedom of action. All of the Ambassadors said they had referred the matter to their Governments and asked for guidance at the earliest possible moment. The general discussion, which was not long, followed in fact more or less the lines of the discussion in the working group yesterday, as reported in my WA-101.

3. I consider it important that I should have some guidance from you before Tuesday afternoon next, when it is planned to hold another Ambassadors' meeting. If we continue to oppose the inclusion of Italy it would be well if we could offer some other alternative suggestion, possibly by commenting on the text of the draft declaration which the United Kingdom suggested might be made in respect of Italy, Greece and Turkey at the time of signature of the treaty.

4. The Netherlands Ambassador yesterday afternoon, in the course of the discussion, made a suggestion which, in its purposes, is akin to the purposes of our suggested article on special arrangements. He put forward, tentatively, the text of a new article which might be added to the treaty as follows:

"The parties recognize that the attainment of the purposes of this convention may be promoted by the association of countries situated outside the area defined in article ____, which in matters of human rights, state, and society hold views similar to theirs. Agreements made with such countries to that end will be in the form of annexes to this convention, and will be considered as forming an integral part thereof".

5. This new article, you will see, provides for the association of countries situated outside the "North Atlantic area" as it is generally envisaged for the treaty, whereas our suggested article on special arrangements, as it presently stands (it did not come up for discussion yesterday and was, you will recall, not supported by the working group), would allow countries within the "North Atlantic area" to participate in the treaty under special arrangements. I merely drew attention to the similarity between the Canadian and the Netherlands suggestions. Some Ambassadors, yesterday afternoon, thought that the Netherlands proposal had merit. Hickerson told me privately after the meeting that he did not think that it would be workable. Ends.

Reference my immediately preceding teletype. North Atlantic Treaty—Ambassadors' Meeting—Algeria.

The French Ambassador confirmed the reports which we have had from both London and Paris and the statements which have been made by the French representative in the working group here that the attitude of the French Government in this matter is absolutely rigid. Bonnet said that no French Government could ever accept and present to the Assembly a pact which excluded the three departments of Algeria. They are evidently prepared, although he said it could cause them difficulties, to exclude Tunis and Morocco. Bonnet made this statement for the official record of the Ambassadors' meetings and, he said, in the deepest seriousness.

The British Ambassador said that his instructions were that should it be possible for the United States to accept the inclusion of Algeria, his Government would be glad and would support its inclusion. If no solution could be found, the British Government could not support the French position.

The Under-Secretary of State explained that the military authorities of the United States still doubt the wisdom of including Algeria. The State Department in its thinking, (as indicated in the working group meetings,) were inclining to the view that the definition of the area by lines drawn on a map presented insuperable difficulties and that the solution to this problem probably lies in naming countries. They had thought of naming "France (including the three departments of Algeria)." They had not, however, arrived at any definite conclusions in the State Department itself and the matter was still under discussion with their military authorities as well.

I said that we were still of the view that it would be unwise for domestic political reasons in Canada to include Algeria. We quite appreciated the constitutional situation, but its inclusion, nevertheless, could not fail to raise in the public mind the whole question of colonial overseas territories.

There seems to be no doubt, when one examines all the information that we have from Washington, London and Paris, that the French are not prepared to budge in this matter, even to the point of sacrificing the treaty. I should, therefore, be very glad to have any suggestions which you may have to offer. In my judgement the inclusion of Algeria would make no real difference in the operation of the treaty, although it might add an undesirable ground for public criticism of its provisions. Ends.

The Under-Secretary of State informed the Ambassadors' group yesterday afternoon that while it had not yet been possible for the State Department to come to any definite conclusion, they were thinking in terms of 12 to 20 years. He thought that any period greater than 20 years would considerably increase their difficulties with Congress here.

All other Ambassadors except myself said that their Governments had been thinking in terms of 40 to 50 years. They indicated, however, that they appreciated United States problems in this matter and left the impression that they would be prepared to settle for 20 years, but would very much regret a shorter period than this. Franks mentioned 25 to 30 years. He said that the United Kingdom Government favoured a longer period for the principal reason that they thought that it would have a greater appeal for public opinion. Lovett said that of course the United States Government was not thinking in terms of any very short term treaty and he agreed that there was merit in the argument for a treaty of, say, 20 years. He repeated that the views of the State Department were not absolutely firm but definitely gave the impression that 20 years was the maximum to which they would be prepared to go.

I said that we were thinking in terms of 12 to 20 years and I put forward the suggestion that if it were as long as 16 or 20, it might be wise to have a permissive provision for review of the treaty at the half-way mark. This suggestion was considered to have merit by all present. I pointed out that it would offer an opportunity not only to terminate the treaty if conditions were such as to make this desirable, but also to strengthen it and give it a longer term of life if present tensions continued for, say, 10 years or got worse. I also said that it would give a further opportunity to refer to the Charter in the treaty and would provide an answer to criticisms which are being made in this country that the result of this pact would be to create a second United Nations organization and to substitute its agencies for the present authority and responsibility of the Security Council.

Obviously the question of duration cannot be definitely settled here until the State Department has taken further Congressional soundings. Ends.

Washington, January 17, 1949

Dear Mr. Reid:

In your message EX-97 of January 14th you expressed concern lest certain views on military organization under the North Atlantic Treaty which were put forward by Hickerson should remain on the record without being challenged by the Canadian representatives. I think that you need not worry about this. No official record of proceedings in the Working Group is kept, and the only papers coming out of the group are their reports and recommendations to the Committee of Ambassadors. Some of the representatives may, of course, keep notes of the discussions, but they are for their private use and have no standing whatever. This practice was adopted when the talks began, and it has permitted the Working Group to discuss the matters before it with great freedom and informality.

The Working Group has only discussed in a very general way the military organization which might be built up under the Treaty, and has made no recommendation to the Committee of Ambassadors. The question itself has not been discussed in the Committee of Ambassadors, and the Working Group has not been asked to make any recommendation on it. I doubt that the views expressed by Hickerson in the Working Group on military organization represent more than his personal estimate of what his Government might advocate at a later stage. I told him in private conversation some days ago that we would have to agree with the French if they were to express criticism of any proposal to employ the Combined Chiefs of Staff as an agency for military decision under the North Atlantic Treaty. He observed that he sympathized with the reasons which led me to make this remark.

In any case there is no record to be set straight, and I am strongly of the view that it would be unwise for us to introduce a detailed discussion of this problem at the present stage of the negotiations. My reason for this is that I would much rather have the Treaty in existence than run the risk of prejudicing its acceptance or prompting the introduction of unwelcome amendments by raising now matters which cannot in fact be settled until the Treaty is in effect. We shall, of course, have trouble in working out a solution of the problem which will meet our point of view.

As I think I have said to you before, my belief is that we shall get a better solution in the Council to be established under the Treaty so long as we are assured, as we are now assured, that the military agencies must be established by the Council.

There are, of course, going to be difficult problems over the relationship of the agencies established under the Brussels Treaty to those to be established under the North Atlantic Treaty. I think no-one could say now what solution will be found. I do not see how the Combined Chiefs of Staff could ever figure officially as one of the agencies for collective planning and control under the new Treaty, nor do I see how we could prevent the U.S. and U.K. from continuing the Combined Chiefs as a bi-lateral body if they want to do so. What we are avoiding, and will continue to avoid, is the acceptance of any suggestion that the Combined Chiefs have power to control Canadian plans and actions.

Incidentally, does the Canadian Government want the Combined Chiefs to be abolished? Can you give me a definite answer to that question? I doubt that you can.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

North Atlantic Treaty. Reference my WA-129 of January 15th† drawing to your attention the State Department statement of policy which appeared in the "New York Times" on Saturday.

In conversation with Achilles today Stone said that it seemed to us that this was a good statement and gave useful background at this time when there was so much pressure for more detailed information about the present negotiations. He added that we were somewhat surprised, seeing it on Saturday morning, that Lovett had not mentioned at the Ambassadors' meeting Friday afternoon that it was to come out. Achilles was a little embarrassed at this point and said that the fact was that Lovett did not know that it was coming out. He then told Stone the history of the thing which I give you below as a matter of interest in indicating how the State Department sometimes works.

At the beginning of December it was suggested that some sort of background paper would be very useful, particularly for those officers of the Department who had to see representatives of various organizations (such as Eichelberger's United Nations Organization, C.I.O., A.F. of L., representatives of women's clubs, etc.) which they could use as a text from which to speak. Achilles agreed and the Press

Division of the State Department put one of its writers on the job of preparing the paper. It went through several drafts and was finally, very early in January, approved on the Achilles level. Since its approval it has apparently been used not merely as a text from which to speak but has, in fact, been given to the representatives of some organizations and its existence finally become known to some members of the press. On Thursday last late in the evening, or Friday morning, pressure became heavy for its release and Achilles, apparently on his own initiative, said that he could see no harm in giving it to the press as it contained nothing which had not already been said either here or somewhere else. (Achilles said, by the way, that they had cribbed from some of the Prime Minister's speeches and some of yours, as well as from some Canadian papers which have been submitted in the course of the present negotiations.)

The "New York Times" is the only paper which has taken the thing up in a big way. Shortly after it was received in the "New York Times" bureau here Reston called Hickerson and said that this paper which had just come into his hands was in his view one of the most important foreign policy statements which had come out of the State Department in years. Hickerson unfortunately himself did not know that the thing had been given to the press and asked Reston to which document was he referring. Reston replied that he was referring to the one on the Atlantic Pact and Hickerson said "Oh yes, that—yes—yes—it was a good statement".

I gather that there has been no unpleasantness at all about this in the State Department and that since the reaction has not been great and since what reaction there has been has been most favourable, Achilles has been given credit rather than censure for his initiative. He said to Stone that it never occurred to him that the "New York Times" would print the thing in full text, and that he thought that the most that would be done would be a Reston story as a follow-up to his previous stories.

Copies of the printed text were forwarded with our despatch No. 123† of January 15th. These are dated prematurely "Spring, 1949". Ends.

Following for Wrong: North Atlantic Treaty. Your WA-120, 121, 122, 123† and 129† of January 15th. I have now had an opportunity of studying these messages from you.

2. Duration. You should keep on pressing our suggestion that, if the duration is as long as sixteen or twenty years, there should be provision for review of the Treaty at the half-way mark. I think that this is a matter of some considerable importance.

3. Netherlands Proposal on a Special Arrangements Article. I see a good deal of merit in this proposal, which has the advantages of our former proposal without the disadvantage that it would tempt North Atlantic countries to participate in the Treaty under special arrangements instead of becoming full members. One obvious advantage of the Netherlands proposal is that it might provide the basis of a compromise on Italy.

On considering the Netherlands proposal, however, I suggest that the following text might be an improvement: "The Parties recognize that the attainment of the purposes of this Treaty may be promoted by the making of agreements with countries situated outside the area defined in Article blank, which in matters of human rights, state and society hold views similar to theirs, and whose defence is considered vital to the defence of the Parties to this Treaty. Agreements made with such countries for these purposes will be in the form of Annexes to this Treaty, and will be considered as forming an integral part thereof."

You will note that we have dropped the use of the term "association" which suggests the creation of second-class members of the Treaty.

In place of the underlined phrase we suggest it might be better to use whatever language is ultimately agreed on for the preamble, e.g., "democracy, political liberty and personal freedom."

I have also thought it might be useful to add the reference to defence. You will recall that our own suggestion for an Article covering special arrangements was based on a strategic rather than a political concept, and was designed to permit the making of special arrangements with countries which were vital to our defence. There might thus be two criteria under this Article for making special arrangements with a country, viz., that the country fulfils the ideological requirements and also that it is strategically necessary to the Parties. The application of both these criteria would eliminate requests from countries like Pakistan or Middle East countries.

The arrangements made under this proposed Article would presumably take the form of a multilateral undertaking between Parties to the Treaty on the one hand and a unilateral agreement by the state approached on the other. If one of the reasons for Hickerson's view that the Netherlands proposal would be unworkable, is that the Senate would object to this provision as permitting the Executive Branch of the Government to increase U.S. commitments, I think that this could easily be met by an understanding that the Annexes to the Convention would require ratification before coming into force.

4. Italy. I still hope that it may be possible to refrain from accepting the Italian request for full membership and that Italy would be covered either by a declaration or under the special arrangements provision. If a declaration is to be made, would it not be better to have the declaration made by the United States and the United Kingdom, which have already given guarantees of one sort or another to Italy, Greece and Turkey, and which could reaffirm in the declaration the guarantees which they have already given. The disadvantage of a declaration signed by all the participants in the Treaty would be that it presumably would have to be weaker than the guarantees already given by the United States and the United Kingdom, and thereby its effect would weaken those earlier guarantees, the reverse to what is intended. You should not, however, oppose too strongly the admission of Italy.

5. Algeria. We would be prepared, although reluctantly, to accept the inclusion of the three departments of Algeria, but still hope the French will make some concession on this point.

6. Leakages. I share your concern about leakages. They are bound to increase as the State Department goes further with its Congressional soundings. While I agree that it would not be wise at present to give the working papers to the countries which are being invited to participate in the Treaty, I feel that the present participants should be very liberal in the amount of information which they give to those countries. They should certainly give them more than is given to the New York Times, and that should satisfy them!

7. I wish you would turn over in your mind an idea which has occurred to me that perhaps it might be useful if, on the day that the discussion on the Ambassadorial level concludes, there be immediately published the draft of the Treaty with a statement that this draft has been prepared on the official level, does not bind the Governments concerned, but has been sent to them for their consideration prior to the holding of a formal conference. This would avoid the danger of inaccurate stories appearing in the press that the draft arrived at in Washington was final and had received governmental approval. Such inaccurate stories would precipitate statements by official spokesmen in the capitals concerned, with the result that before very long the newspapers would in any event have a reasonably accurate account of the draft Treaty text. We might then all find ourselves compelled, under public pressure, to publish the draft Treaty text. Another advantage of publication would be that it would help to stem criticism here and in other countries that the Governments were proposing to sign a Treaty of very great importance without having previously adequately informed their own Parliaments and peoples of the kind of Treaty which was under consideration.

8. Time Table. Any guesses you can give me about the future time table would be welcome. It may be that it would be useful for us to have some discussion in Parliament before the Treaty is signed, and it is difficult for me to plan this without knowing more about the prospective time table.

Your EX-132 of 18th January.

1. North Atlantic Pact. The working group met yesterday afternoon to discuss four items.

2. First, they took up the proposal for a special arrangements clause put forward by Van Kleffens, and the Canadian group brought forward your proposed revision. They also gave the working group your views on the idea behind it. The discussion was inconclusive but seemed to point to a decision that something along the line of Van Kleffens' clause might be accepted to apply to Italy, Sweden, Switzerland and Austria unless it is decided to try to achieve the same object by amending the clause on accession. The discussion did establish that none of the representatives liked the idea of using a special arrangements clause which might be interpreted as setting up a second United Nations.

3. Secondly, there was a further discussion of the question of Italy. Hickerson said that the State Department now wished to have Italy sign the Pact and become a full partner, although he admitted that this had not yet been cleared with the new Secretary of State who would have to give final consent before it could become official policy. It was Hickerson's view that Italy's participation in the Pact should be accompanied by either admission to the Brussels organization or a statement by the Brussels powers that Italy would be welcome as a member of a future Council of Europe when such a Council is set up. Stone again stated Canada's reluctance to accept Italy on these terms but in accordance with your instructions did not press the opposition very far. It was agreed that if Italy was admitted as a full partner something would have to be done to show Western interest in Greece and Turkey.

4. Thirdly, the meeting discussed the draft declaration prepared by the United Kingdom, which was sent to you in WA-85† of 12th January. Stone expressed the Canadian view that such a declaration should be made by the great powers because if the number of signers was small, the Declaration would conceivably be much stronger than if a large number of countries signed. Hickerson said that he would not like to see guarantees of varying strengths given to the different countries. They ought all to be the same in order to avoid invidious distinctions. He also asked if consideration had been given to the inclusion of Sweden in such a declaration and Henderson replied in the negative. Hickerson said that the United States Government would make any declaration in the name of the President and that although members of the Congress might be shown the declaration or even consulted about it the Congress as such would have no part in making the declaration. In the United Kingdom and United States view such a declaration would also have to cover Iran.

5. Stone pointed out that insofar as the United States, at least, was concerned the declaration would presumably be a reaffirmation of what the President said in his speeches of March 12th, 1947, (Truman doctrine) and March 17th, 1948, (Brussels Pact and North Atlantic Community of Interests).

6. Fourthly, Hickerson asked for the personal views of the members of the working group as to the sort of information he should give to the Ambassadors of Norway and Denmark before they return to their countries. It was agreed that he should allow them to see the draft articles and even to take notes though not to make a copy. He was, at the same time, to give them a very careful briefing to ensure that the two Ambassadors understood that the articles were not final and also to emphasize the importance of secrecy. Stone did not, repeat not, bring before the working group your suggestion about releasing the text of the draft articles after agreement on the Ambassadorial level. I want to have a word with Hickerson privately on this before taking it up.

7. Duration of the treaty was not discussed. Stone asked all members of the group however, to study our suggestion about consultation at the halfway mark if the Treaty is to be for, say, 16 or 20 years. I think the suggestion might be acceptable if we omit the word "terminate", on which people here have reservations, and limit the provision to consultation for "revision". Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-260

Washington, February 2, 1949

TOP SECRET

The Working Group for the North Atlantic Treaty met on the afternoon of January 31st. Hickerson set forth at some length the need for Mr. Acheson to become completely familiar with every aspect of the draft Treaty and the discussions to date. He said that this process had been retarded by the press of other problems, notably the crisis in China. A three-hour session with Mr. Acheson had already produced a number of pertinent questions which had not yet been discussed internationally, or, in some cases, even thought of. The uncertainty of his timetable made it impossible for the Secretary of State to fix a definite time for the next meeting with the Ambassadors, especially since he wanted first to talk to the President and Senators Connally and Vandenberg. Hickerson assured the meeting that Mr. Acheson was very well aware of the need for speed. He has also told me that the questions raised by Mr. Acheson would not involve any serious changes in the draft articles.

2. I spoke next in favour of making very rapid progress when the Ambassadors' meetings are resumed, and in this the other representatives agreed. Henderson, speaking for the British group, said that Sir Oliver Franks had instructed him to emphasize that the loss of time was serious. The Russians, he said, had made three attacks on the North Atlantic Treaty already: the Tass statement of 29th January, the threatening note to Norway, and Stalin's expression of willingness to meet Mr. Truman. Henderson emphasized the particular need for speed in dealing with Norway. The Foreign Minister plans to follow up his reply to the Soviet with a statement that Norway will accept an invitation to participate in the negotiation of the Pact, if one is forthcoming. It is the opinion of the British that the invitation should be sent at the earliest possible moment after this statement is made.

3. I asked that all representatives make sure they were in a position to authorize the United States to extend an invitation to Norway and other agreed countries on behalf of all seven Governments, when the time comes. Some representatives thought they already had such authority, and the rest agreed to confirm their position. I also suggested that the State Department should at once sound out again the countries which had made no reply to the semi-formal overtures of the United States, or had answered non-committally, and Hickerson said that he would seek authority to do so. He agreed that other countries should be formally invited at the same time as Norway if there seemed to be a fair chance of their acceptance.

4. A discussion of the countries which had been sounded showed: Ireland has as yet given no proper reply, though will probably do so by making the ending of partition a condition precedent. The United States will not accept this as a basis for discussion. Denmark is still uncertain. The Americans know that the Danes are unhappy, but do not know what they will do. Danish adherence is important both to secure bases in Greenland, and to influence the Icelanders. Iceland had been less unreceptive than was anticipated. The Government has not mentioned the constitution (which is thought to prohibit the raising of armed forces) but has referred to the necessity for Danish and Norwegian participation. Italy we know is anxious to join.

5. In a short discussion of the draft, it came out that nobody had any instructions for dealing with the draft preamble introduced by the Americans (Stone's letter to Reid of January 12th)† nor about the acceptance of Article 5 (bis) and the Canadian revision of Article 10 (my WA-236 of 29th January).†

6. On the subject of publicity, Hickerson said that he understood the desirability of publishing as much as possible, but did not think that a paraphrase of the text should be released yet; a paraphrase would be better than the text itself as publication of the latter might lead to the taking of more rigid positions in negotiation. He agreed that the publication of such a paraphrase would be an effective reply to the Russian statement of the 29th, and that the wording of it would have to be agreed to by all parties before release. A draft paraphrase may be submitted at the next meeting of Ambassadors or the Working Group following it.

7. In relation to the preamble, Hickerson said that the words "in accordance with their constitutional processes" would have to appear in the Treaty somewhere. Possibly it would be enough to have them in the preamble, but they might be needed in Article 5 as well. These words were a "must", he said. For future consideration, he threw out the thought that it might be advisable to have something in the preamble about hoping that greater security would be achieved in the near future by the inclusion of all free nations in regional or other collective security arrangements of some sort under the United Nations. The danger in such a remark, he felt, was that the Chinese, for example, might come forward all too quickly with a suggestion for a Far Eastern Pact.

8. Though no date was set for the next meeting of the Ambassadors' Group, it was agreed that they should discuss:

- (1) The admission of Italy;
- (2) The extension of invitations to other countries;
- (3) The draft Treaty (including duration);
- (4) Publicity; and
- (5) The timetable for future operations.

I am sending a separate message (WA-261) on the line which I might take.

1. It is hoped that the next meeting of the Ambassadors' Group will reach decisions on many outstanding questions and that there may not be another meeting until the circle is enlarged by the addition of representatives of Norway and possibly some other countries. I therefore think it wise to indicate the line which I propose to take on a number of questions coming up at this meeting, unless you instruct me to the contrary.

(1) Italy. I would agree to an invitation to Italy to become a full party to the Treaty unless Mr. Acheson comes out for some different solution of the Italian problem.

(2) North Africa. I would agree to the inclusion of Algeria on the same condition.

(3) Extension of invitations. I would support the extension of invitations to Norway, and probably Italy, and also to other countries likely to accept or hesitating about acceptance. At the Working Group yesterday the view was expressed that the invited countries should be given the draft articles with the explanation that they constituted a working paper only and were therefore subject to change. Invitations to participate would be extended by the United States in the name of seven countries.

(4) Publicity. I would agree that a full paraphrase of the draft articles should promptly be approved for release here and in the other Capitals. This will have to include almost the exact language of Article 5.

(5) Article 5 and 5 bis. I would provisionally accept the language of the drafts contained in paragraph 1 of my WA-236 of January 29th.† I said at the Working Group yesterday that I was not altogether satisfied with Article 5 bis. I was thinking particularly of our Arctic possessions. The contention is that Alaska and the Arctic Islands are covered in the first sentence of Article 5, not in 5 bis which is designed to ensure that the Treaty applies to occupation forces, insular possessions in the North Atlantic, and Algeria. I have received very little comment from Ottawa on the definition of the area. Do you consider it satisfactory?

(6) Article 10. The main point to settle is duration, on which the United States has reserved its position. Mr. Acheson will probably suggest a firm term of twenty years, but may propose a shorter term. I would accept the tentative draft given in paragraph 2 of my WA-236 if he proposes twenty years. You will note that this includes in abbreviated form our suggestion for optional review after ten years. Several others still have reservations on this, and it will not be possible to secure agreement on making a direct allusion to the progress of the United Nations. I should be glad to receive your comments. Incidentally, it is recognized that it will later be necessary to add certain formal provisions at the end of this article on the lines which we have suggested.

(7) Timetable, etc. I would support the necessity for rapid progress and for the convocation of a formal Conference of Foreign Ministers as soon as possible. I would suggest that the Conference be held either here or in Bermuda, unless you instruct me that we should like it in Ottawa. We might aim at a Conference opening on a Monday and concluding by the end of the week.

(8) Preamble. It was agreed yesterday that the Ambassadors' Group should not discuss the preamble at its next meeting. I am sending a separate message on the United States draft, which has only been given very brief consideration in a drafting Sub-Committee. Ends.

[Washington], February 4, 1949

Mr. Pearson has told me on the telephone this morning that the Government does not favour having the North Atlantic conference in Ottawa. The Prime Minister did not himself object to the idea, but some other members of the Cabinet thought that the public might consider that we were playing too large a role if we sought to have the treaty signed in Canada.

I told Mr. Pearson that Senators Vandenberg and Connally had proposed to Mr. Acheson a number of modifications of the draft articles, and I indicated the nature of the change which they suggested in Article 5. He was very put out to hear this. I made it clear to him that we did not yet know whether the State Department would propose the alterations suggested by the Senators. I did not mention to him their desire to eliminate the article giving a blessing to economic and social collaboration between the parties.

I mentioned that the views expressed by the Senators would probably delay proceedings here still further. Mr. Pearson remarked that he intended to devote his speech today on the Address wholly, or almost wholly, to the Atlantic Pact.

TELEGRAM EX-300

Ottawa, February 7, 1949

TOP SECRET

1. Reference your WA-261 of February 2, North Atlantic Treaty, the following are my comments.

2. Italy. I should not oppose an invitation to Italy to become a signatory to the Treaty unless the State Department offers an acceptable alternative solution to the Italian problem.

3. Algeria. I would accept in the circumstances the inclusion of the three departments of Algeria.

4. Extension of invitations. I agree that invitations should be extended by the United States, in the name of the seven countries, to other countries likely to accept or hesitating about accepting. This would certainly include Norway, probably Italy, and possibly Denmark, Ireland, Portugal and Iceland, depending in the latter cases on what their reactions have been to the informal approaches. With regard to Norway and possibly Denmark, I feel that an invitation should be issued in the very near future to relieve Swedish and possibly Russian pressure on those countries. With regard to Ireland, we are considering asking Johnson to take up with MacBride the question of Irish participation. As Johnson will be new to the Dublin post, I think it is undesirable for him to raise the question with the Cardinal. Johnson will not be in Dublin until February 10 or 11, by which time it may be too late for him to raise the matter in any case.

In any event, I propose to discuss the matter with Hearne here.

5. Publicity. I agree that a full paraphrase of the draft articles should be promptly approved for release in the capitals of those countries participating in the Working Group. I think that this is important and that the governments and peoples concerned should not have to rely on Reston of the Times for their detailed information.

Articles of the Draft Treaty

6. Article 1. The draft as reported in your WA-3237 of December 24² is acceptable.

7. Article 2. I understand that the present draft reads as follows:

“The parties will encourage cooperative efforts between any or all of them to promote the general welfare through collaboration in the cultural, economic and social fields. Such efforts shall, to the greatest possible extent, be undertaken through and assist the work of existing international organizations.”

You may have noticed that the Prime Minister and I, in recent statements made both in the House of Commons and outside, have been stressing the paramount importance of the Treaty providing a basis for positive economic cooperation among the signatories and for it not being a mere military alliance. Article 2 is the only definitely non-military article in the draft treaty and it could scarcely be much weaker than it is. The Canadian Parliament and people will expect the Canadian Government to secure something a good deal stronger. Unless we can secure something a good deal stronger, we may face a definite weakening of support for the Treaty in the House and in the country. I should therefore be grateful if you would explain to your colleagues in the discussions the Canadian Government's position in terms of practical political considerations and do your best to get the article strengthened by the addition, after the first sentence, of sentences along the following lines:

“The parties agree to make every effort in common to eliminate conflict in their economic policies and to develop to the full the great possibilities of trade between them. The parties also undertake to make every effort in common to promote the attainment of a higher standard of living by their people and greater economic and social justice, and to bring about a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization.”

8. Article 3. I think that the introductory phrase, “in order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty” is unnecessary. All the Articles of the Treaty are included for the purpose of achieving the objectives, and it seems illogical to include this phrase in one Article alone. Should it be impossible to reach agreement on deleting the introductory phrase, I suggest as a matter of grammar that “more” should be deleted, or alternatively, “most” substituted.

9. Article 4. I continue to favour the inclusion of an article along the following lines, but have no serious objections to Article 4 as drafted at present:—

“The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them,
(a) the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened;

or

² Volume 14, Document 481.

(b) there exists any situation which constitutes a threat to or breach of the peace.”

10. Article 5. I share your doubts about Article 5 bis. Whatever description is used for the area to be covered by the guarantee, it is important for us that there should be no doubt that the Arctic archipelago is included. I understand, however, that the general view of geographers is that the continent of North America includes the area up to the end of the continental shelf. This includes Vancouver Island and Newfoundland and the Arctic archipelago, excluding Greenland. For the sake of clarity, however, I would prefer Article 5 bis to read along the following lines:

“For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack against one or more of the parties to this Treaty shall be deemed to include an armed attack directed against:

1. The territory, the population or the armed forces of any party in Europe or North America;
2. The islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer;
3. The vessels or the aircraft of any party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer;
4. Algeria.”

1. I think this would leave little doubt that the Arctic islands are included, as they would be covered not only by the use of the phrase “North America” but also by the reference to islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic area.

12. I should be inclined to leave Article 5 as it stands, even though reference to Europe and North America is repeated in Article 5 bis. If the terms Europe and North America were deleted from Article 5, we should have to return to the original suggestion that Article 5 bis define the area to be covered by the guarantee in more or less precise terms. If we leave the terms Europe and North America in Article 5, Article 5 bis would not then be regarded as an all-inclusive Article and would not, I hope, be interpreted as limiting the generality of Article 5.

13. Article 6. Paragraph 2. As a matter of drafting, I suggest this would read better as follows:

“All measures taken under Article 5 shall be immediately reported to the Security Council, and shall be terminated as soon as the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.”

14. Article 7. I support the deletion of this Article rather than accept it in the form reported in your WA-76 of January 12, but would, of course, much prefer to have it read:

“Each party to this Treaty agrees not to accept any obligations in conflict with this Treaty or with the Charter of the United Nations”.

15. Article 8. I agree with the wording in your WA-3237 of December 24.

16. Article 9. Accession. I am not satisfied with the use of the term “neighboring European State”. I suggest substituting “any other country of the North Atlantic area”.

17. Article 10. Paragraph 2. I suggest that the order of the two sentences might be reversed so that the paragraph would read:

“After this Treaty has been in force for ten years, the parties shall, if any of them so request, consult together to determine whether this Treaty should be revised. After the Treaty has been in force for twenty years, each of the parties may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the _____ government.”

18. There are at present only two Articles which consist of more than one paragraph, viz., Article 6 and Article 10. In the interests of good drafting, I think it would be an improvement to have only one paragraph for each Article. This avoids the necessity of having to make references to the text of the treaty in the clumsy form of “Article 6, paragraph 2”.

The second paragraph of Article 6 could become Article 7, and the second paragraph of Article 10 a new Article with consequential changes. There would then be one Article dealing with Ratification and one Article dealing with Duration.

19. I shall reply to you separately on the Preamble.

20. I have already let you know my views on holding the formal conference in Canada.

TOP SECRET

Your EX-300 of February 7th, North Atlantic Treaty.

1. You will not be surprised to hear that the meeting of the Ambassadors' Group today was postponed on short notice. The Secretary of State is seeing the Norwegian Foreign Minister this afternoon and was appearing this morning before the Congressional Committees to support the E.C.A. programme. Our latest word is that “there will definitely be a meeting on Tuesday afternoon—unless they change their minds”.

2. I am afraid that we shall not be able to secure acceptance of several of your suggestions for improving the draft articles. The following comments refer to the paragraphs of your message:

Paragraph 7. We are now the only party to the negotiation that really favours the inclusion of anything in the treaty about social and economic collaboration outside a general reference in the preamble. I have learned privately that the Secretary of State does not like the present Article 2 on the ground that it means next to nothing, and that Senators Vanderberg and Connally may wish it deleted because it seems that they want the Treaty to be a straight defence agreement. I think that the most that we may be able to do is to retain the existing language. I shall have a try at strengthening it, but we have tried this before without success. In any case, there would be difficulties about your suggestion for a phrase requiring the parties "to eliminate conflict in their economic policies" because of the issues of free enterprise vs. socialism that might be considered to be involved. The use twice in your addition of the words "in common" might also be taken to require the establishment of special agencies in the North Atlantic area, against which there is very strong opposition.

Paragraph 9. The phrase you would like included was dropped, on the ground that it carried the implication that the North Atlantic Council would undertake functions properly belonging to the Security Council. I think that this objection has some weight and there would be strong resistance to its re-insertion in the draft.

Paragraph 10. We hear that there are difficulties with the Senators over the language of Article 5, but I will await further information on the State Department's views before reporting further to you. I like your re-draft for 5 BIS, and we shall try this out.

Paragraph 14. There is resistance to your wording on the ground that it should be superfluous in such respectable company for the parties to promise to be good. We may, however, have further proposals from the State Department on this point, as they are giving consideration to expanding the Article so as to include an obligation which might permit the expulsion of an offending party.

Paragraphs 8, 13, 17, and 18. These are all good drafting points. They should not come up for discussion in the Ambassadors' Group, but we will keep them in mind when the draft is next considered for detailed revision by the working group.

PERSONAL

Dublin, February 7, 1949

Dear Mr. Pearson,

By the time you receive this letter you will probably have received our reply to the Aide Memoire,† delivered by the United States Government, in relation to the proposed Atlantic Pact. I am writing this personal letter to you as I want to explain our attitude a little more fully and also because I feel that you might be in a position to assist in ending a deadlock which is detrimental, not merely to us, but to Britain and, to a certain degree, to the success of the Atlantic Pact.

Our Aide Memoire of the 7th February sets out the main considerations relating to the problem of Partition and I need not, therefore, repeat these to you. It is by no means an easy problem from the point of view of Britain, because of its internal political implications in the field of English politics. However, I believe that inwardly the members of the British Government—or most of them—would wish to see Partition ended, but feel that it is a dangerous political problem for the Labour Party. They want to avoid Conservative criticism; though, indeed, I think they are inclined to exaggerate, in their own minds, the extent of the opposition they would meet from the Conservative Party. I believe any British Government would be glad to see the problem solved; unfortunately, however, any effort made to solve it is liable to be made an issue in British party politics—and accordingly there is a tendency to shelve the question.

The realisation that a united and friendly Ireland on Britain's western shores is far more important than any outworn mental attitude towards Ireland, is beginning to gain ground within the ranks of thinking people in all parties in Britain. The experience of two wars and of centuries of struggle must lead reasonable people of all shades of opinion to realise that, instead of the mailed fist, the wise and statesmanlike policy lies in securing the friendship and goodwill of the Irish people. Quite apart from Ireland's strategic position and from the fact that Ireland is an essential part of Britain's larder and, therefore, of vital importance in wartime, the goodwill and friendship of the Irish race, scattered throughout the American Continent, in Australia and elsewhere, is of some importance.

As I explained in Paris, there were two last points of friction remaining to bedevil Anglo-Irish relationship. With the passage of the Republic of Ireland Act, we have been able to remove one of these points of friction. We believe that this was a constructive step for the betterment of the relationship between the two islands. There remains now but one point of friction, namely, the Partition of the country. Because of the political difficulties confronting the British Government and because of the somewhat "non-transacting attitude" of our friends of the C.R.O., I felt that no useful purpose would be served by pressing the Partition issue during the discussions which we had at Chequers and Paris. Now that the Republic of Ireland Act has been enacted, without undue fuss or commotion, save for such adverse publicity for which our friends of the C.R.O. were clumsily responsible, I think that it is gradually beginning to dawn on responsible opinion in Britain that this was, in effect, a constructive step. If it were not for the psychological attitude, so prevalent among British public men, that regards Ireland as part of Britain's possessions and the Irish people as "rather charming, but quite impossible", the remaining problem—Partition—would have been solved long ago.

The Irish Government's Aide Memoire in relation to the Atlantic Pact is not a tactical move. It is a genuine effort to explain the difficulties in the hope that they may be faced and solved. No Irish Government could enter into a Military Alliance with Britain while Partition lasts. If it did, it would inevitably find itself faced with a civil conflict within its own area of jurisdiction. Obviously in time of war or crisis, it would have to devote all its energies and resources to fighting its own people, instead of the common enemy, thereby nullifying the very purpose of the Alliance. Of this, there is no doubt. Furthermore, the continuance of Partition and all the means used to maintain it, constitute a constant indictment of the very principles of democracy for which we are all struggling.

A real opportunity now offers to end this centuries-old conflict between Britain and Ireland and to break the deadlock on Partition. For the first time, Britain and Ireland share a common cause. All the irritants and causes of conflict, with the exception of Partition, have been removed. There is a genuine feeling of admiration and friendship for the British people, which is only marred by what we consider to be a completely indefensible and undemocratic anomaly.

The creation of the Atlantic Pact is a matter of importance. The United States Government has been charged with the task of approaching us in relation to it on behalf of the six other countries. We are willing and anxious to join it, if the one obstacle in the way can be removed. This situation enables an approach to the problem which has not hitherto been possible. If the Atlantic Pact is the necessity which I believe it is, then it seems to me that every effort should be made to remove the obstacles that stand in the way. This should enable a new approach to the difficulties which, I think, preclude the British Government from seeking a solution; in other words, it affords a new opportunity of breaking the deadlock which has hitherto existed.

As already indicated, I believe that members of the British Government, and, indeed, many of the public men in Britain, inwardly desire to see this position ended. But, for internal political reasons, they are inclined to shelve the question so as not to get their fingers burnt and because they do not consider it an urgent problem. The proposed Atlantic Pact, in my view, provides a new background against which the problem could be discussed and straightened out without placing the British Government in a political difficulty. While British Statesmen would not admit this, I think that in the long run, they would be grateful for any step that ended this deadlock without causing them political difficulties.

Of the convening nations, it occurred to me that Canada would be the one that could most appropriately take the initiative in this matter, because of Canada's close relationship with both Britain and Ireland. British Statesmen would I think, take proposals of this nature from Canada more readily than they would from any other participating country. British public opinion would feel that it is only right and proper that this approach should come from Canada. In the context of the proposed Atlantic Pact and of the invitation to Ireland to join it, I do not see how the British Government could refuse to discuss the matter. Partition is clearly an international problem, just as much as Palestine and Indonesia are international problems. It is an international problem that stands clearly in the way of the cooperation that should exist in the Atlantic. It is, therefore, but natural that it should be examined by the convening countries and that every effort should be made to remove it.

I am afraid this letter is somewhat long and possibly repetitious, but I felt that I should write freely and frankly to you. Above all, I want to make it clear that our reply is not a tactical one. It is a genuine effort to remove an obstacle in the way of a closer understanding we are keen to bring about. It is not much use having international contacts and holding international conferences unless we can freely discuss the difficulties and the realities without shirking them because they are troublesome.

One of the factors which causes us grave anxiety is the fear that the problem may become an explosive one. It has already exploded several times since Partition was created in 1920. At the moment it shows all the signs of being in ferment again. That is one of the reasons why I believe there is such an impelling obligation on all of us to press on with constructive action before a more difficult situation arises.

I was so sorry that you were not able to visit us on your way back from UNO. Please remember that whenever you can manage to get free for a few days we shall always be glad to welcome you here.

Yours sincerely,
SEAN MACBRIDE

TELEGRAM WA-337

Washington, February 9, 1949

TOP SECRET

North Atlantic Treaty.

1. Mr. Acheson met the Ambassadors yesterday afternoon at their first meeting since he assumed office. He confined his introductory remarks to three important points. First, his contact with Senators Vandenberg and Connally had led him to alter his first impressions on the possible timetable. Mr. Lovett's discussions with the Senators had not gone as far as he had thought. It was now necessary to "proceed slowly enough so that the Foreign Relations Committee is abreast of us at all points". He had tried last week to rush the Senators, and the effort had completely failed. He now thought that signature could not take place until "several weeks after March 1st". Secondly, the language of Article 5 was "the heart of the Senators' concern". They were in complete accord with the nature and extent of the obligation as defined at previous meetings and their objections were verbal. The adverbs and adjectives used at the end of the draft gave an impression of "a rising crescendo of rush and haste". What the Senators wanted was clearly that the words "forthwith such military or other" and "as may be necessary" should be dropped. The inclusion of these words would make no difference in the application of the Treaty, which depended on the initiative and determination of the parties and not on verbal embellishment of the fundamental pledge to take action to restore and assure the security of the area. Thirdly, he said that the Norwegians were feeling a strong pull towards participation but, at the same time, consider that splitting Scandinavian unity is a very serious step. They (the Norwegians) are not sure that it is in our interest that Scandinavia should be split. They said that any Scandinavian bloc would be confined to the home territories: if they made an agreement among themselves excluding an arrangement with the North Atlantic Powers the exclusion would not extend to their overseas territories such as Greenland. (I am reporting more fully on the State Department's talks with the Norwegian Foreign Minister in a separate message.†)

2. Mr. Van Kleffens said that it would be necessary that the Senators' desire to go slowly should be balanced against the opportunity slowness gave for the opponents of [the] Treaty to gain adherents. On the matter of language he was quite willing to try to find more dispassionate forms of expression but emphasized that he would not like to see the general framework materially weakened. In relation to the Norwegian situation he pointed out that the world now knows we have made approaches to Norway and Denmark. Should either or both of them decide not to take part the U.S.S.R. would represent that as their victory and our defeat. He did not think that too much importance should be attached to splitting Scandinavia as their ties are probably strong enough to survive a division of this sort. He posed a military question for the meeting. He asked whether it would be better to have an independent Scandinavian block which would join the west in an emergency, or to have Norway and Denmark join the west now. In other words, did the value of a united Scandinavia outweigh the value of being able to concert plans with part of Scandinavia before an emergency should arise?

3. Mr. Bonnet urged the need not to lose time and said that the language of Article 5 did not look very strong to those who were used to treaties of this nature.

4. Sir Oliver Franks expressed sympathy with the Senators' need for time to consider but emphasized that press speculation and the recent activities of the U.S.S.R. make some sort of positive result necessary. Lack of action will appear to the world to be a defeat. On the point of language he did not agree with Mr. Acheson that everybody understood what was to happen under Article 5. He thought that it was most important that the language of the Articles should reassure the public. While conceding the radical nature of the step being taken by the United States and Canada, he pressed for consideration of the effect of the Treaty both in Western and in Eastern Europe. People in Europe look on this Treaty as the coping-stone of the economic efforts made in Europe by the United States. If this Treaty was to establish some working arrangement for peace in the next generation it should assure people of what is meant. He did not think that it was wise to avoid mentioning the possibility of military action: a sober mention of that possibility would have a very beneficent effect in Europe. He was afraid that understatement in the language of the Treaty might cause the Treaty to fail in its object of showing the world where we stand. On the subject of Scandinavia he did not attach much importance to splitting Sweden from the other two. The United Kingdom attached great importance to the inclusion of Norway. He granted that if we could make a separate arrangement over Greenland that would make some difference to the outlook but it would not be overwhelming. He did not think that Scandinavia could form a very strong alliance of its own. While Norwegian participation might lead the Russians to move troops into Finland it would be unlikely to lead to the invasion of Norway and he, therefore, still favoured the inclusion of Norway and Denmark.

5. When it came to my turn to speak I said that while everybody agreed that the State Department must carry the Senate along with it the rest of us were under pressure from our own Governments to get something done and were hearing of the rise of opposition to the Treaty in some quarters. I said that the Canadian Government liked the language of Article 5 and wanted to keep the reference to military action. I did not think the language could be watered down very much because the public already knows too much about the language of this Article for us to be able to let it appear that we have weakened the obligation. On Scandinavia I said I thought the Canadian Government would favour a Scandinavian alliance linked in some manner with the North Atlantic Treaty, not necessarily on the basis of full partnership; but the Swedes ruled this out. I said we would be reluctant to see the supplies of arms, which would presumably not, in any case, be adequate to meet the demand, go to a country which was maintaining armed neutrality instead of taking a full risk.

6. In reply to these and similar arguments which were made by Mr. Legallais [Luxembourg] and Baron Silvercruys, Mr. Acheson emphasized that the rate of progress is controlled by the Senate rather than by himself. He promised that he would not dally unduly. On Scandinavia he suggested that we might consider three factors:

(1) If Norway and Denmark participate we shall have access to the necessary rights in Greenland. On the other hand, there seems to be a possibility that we can get the same rights some other way.

(2) If Norway and Denmark participate they are obligated to help any other party which is attacked. It has been agreed in the discussions that such help might take the form of maintaining non-belligerency. If consideration of the question reveals that non-belligerency is the form of help they are most likely to give they could give it just as well outside the Treaty as in.

(3) If Norway, Denmark and Sweden conclude a pact to protect one another and fulfil their obligations under the pact we should all be in the same war together anyway. The question is do we need Scandinavian bases or could we co-ordinate Scandinavian defence plans with our own by supplying arms to a Scandinavian alliance on the condition that we have staff talks with them. Staff talks with all three Scandinavian countries might be better than having Norway and Denmark in the Treaty and Sweden out.

7. There was inconclusive discussion on these points from which it emerged that the Swedish condition for a Scandinavian alliance was that there should be no staff talks even if they were secret, and that Norway would not join any such alliance with Sweden unless it were done with specific approval of the North Atlantic countries.

8. There was then some discussion of specific Articles in the Treaty. On Article 2 I informed Mr. Acheson that I had received instructions from you to secure stronger wording. I read part of your message EX-300 to the meeting. In reply to Mr. Acheson's objection that the Senators were fed up with treaties for the improvement of the general welfare I said that I wanted him to tell them about your political difficulties in Canada. I pointed out that it would be difficult to secure support in Quebec for a purely military pact and that some Article along the lines of Article 2 was important to get the support of that province and of other political elements.

9. On Article 4 Mr. Acheson said that the Senators did not like the use of the word "security". Mr. Bonnet objected to their attitude, saying that the other two expressions did not amount to the same thing as "security", which covered a broader field.

10. On Article 5 Mr. Acheson added that the Senators thought that the second paragraph of Article 6 might well appear in Article 5 itself. They are also afraid that the "concert" will decide what is "necessary" under this Article. Mr. Bonnet said that his Government considered the inclusion of the word "military" very important and emphasized that the present wording was the result of a great many compromises.

11. On Article 5 BIS Mr. Bonnet asked what was to happen about Algeria. After a short amount of debating back and forth Mr. Acheson replied that he thought the question of including Algeria by now was purely metaphysical. It was inconceivable that Algeria could be separately attacked, and a "local scrimmage" there would not give rise to the commitments in the Treaty. Mr. Bonnet pointed out that the inclusion of Algeria was a political consideration for France similar to the many political considerations advanced by the United States. Italy was very briefly mentioned, and the only new point was that the inclusion of Italy, according to Mr. [Halvard] Lange, would make Norwegian participation more difficult.

12. On Article 10 Mr. Acheson said that the Senators thought that all seven of the present negotiating Powers should have to ratify the Treaty before it becomes effective.

13. In conclusion Mr. Acheson warned against letting other countries know about what the Norwegians had said to him. He said that the next meeting might be late this week at earliest. Ends.

Following for Wrong only from Pearson. Begins: Reference your WA-322 of February 7 and my telephone conversation with you today.

1. The lack of U.S. enthusiasm for Article 2 on the grounds that it may be an unnecessary complicating factor with Congress is perhaps understandable. Such an article to some extent duplicates existing articles in the bilateral agreements negotiated between the United States and western European countries under the Eco-conomic Cooperation Act. You will recall, however, that the U.S. strongly favoured pledges of economic and social cooperation by the O.E.E.C. countries at the time the bilaterals were negotiated. For our part, we have no similar economic agreements with these countries to which we can point. Perhaps our arguments now for a strong Article 2 are not unlike those previously advanced by the United States.

2. I continue to object to the thesis that the Treaty should be merely a military alliance designed for the immediate emergency. It must, I think, if it is to be acceptable to Canada, go much deeper. You should, therefore, continue to press for a strengthening of Article 2 and should you meet with no success, for the maintenance of the Article as it now stands as the minimum requirement.

3. I have instructed the Canadian High Commissioner, London, to speak to the U.K. authorities at the earliest opportunity with a view to securing United Kingdom support for a strong Article 2.

4. Mr. St. Laurent intends to inform Mr. Truman during his visit of the importance which the Canadian Government attaches to the maintenance of Article 2 in the Treaty either in its present form or in wider terms.

1. You will notice that none of the pending questions was settled and that some new issues were brought up. Acheson's purpose was to sound out the rest of us on the course of his discussions with the Senators and also to collect opinions on the line which the State Department should take in their further talks with the Norwegians. I hope we gave him some ammunition which he will use to defend the maintenance of the phrase "military or other action" in Article 5 with Connally and Vanderberg. I think we can drop the words "as may be necessary" without any pain, and I do not attach much significance to the inclusion of "forthwith". The language should, however, directly indicate that military action is part of the commitment.

2. I brought up our views on Article 2 toward the end of the meeting (which degenerated into a stragglng discussion of various points) so that Acheson would know of the great importance which we attach to an improved article on economic collaboration before he had another meeting with the Senators. There was next to no discussion of our suggestions. I think we can at least maintain the present article, subject to finding some alternative to the phrase "to promote the general welfare", which seems to rouse in senatorial minds a vision of endless hand-outs to the other parties. I am sure we shall not get acceptance of your addition, but it seemed good tactics to propose it in order to emphasize our point of view. It would be worth while for the Prime Minister to mention the political importance of the substance of the article when talking to the President or Acheson.

3. More than half of the meeting, which lasted over two hours, was devoted to Scandinavia. Italy and Algeria were left in the air, and the preamble was not discussed. I have given the State Department our new draft of Article 5 BIS, but this article was not considered at the meeting, nor was anything said about duration.

4. We are now in the old familiar position of being at one end of a double negotiation between the State Department and the other countries on the one hand and the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee on the other hand, with the Senators raising new issues and delaying the whole business. It is apparent, however, that the concern of the Senators so far consulted does not touch on the fundamental purposes of the Treaty, with which they are in full agreement. Acheson will probably have soon to meet the whole Committee in private session. It would be unwise to plan for signature before April 1st. Bermuda seems to be the favoured spot.

5. One reason why Acheson and the Senators are looking very closely at any undertaking to cooperate in economic, social, and cultural matters is that the Bogota Treaty of last year is now being considered by the Foreign Relations Committee. Acheson appeared to support ratification, after a hasty glance at the Treaty for the first time, and expected only to read a prepared statement and leave in five minutes. Instead, he was subjected to a grilling examination on the Treaty, and has told me that he took a terrible beating. He describes the Treaty as blessing nearly every human aspiration, including the provision of a university education for everybody. This unfortunate coincidence has increased the suspicion of general promises to promote welfare and the like. I am trying my hand at a re-draft of Article 2, which would be midway between the present language and your proposed additions. I shall send this to you later. Ends.

that the Canadian people would support the commitment of Canada on these grounds, although the machinery of the treaty would have to be employed to increase the combined power of the parties to it.

He went on to say that it was most important to him that the treaty should not be a military alliance only, but should hold out the prospect of close economic and social collaboration between the parties. An article to this effect would be of the greatest value to him politically in securing the full acceptance of the treaty by the Canadian people.

Not very much was said by the President or Mr. Acheson on the subject of the treaty, and other pending questions in connection with it were not alluded to.

Economic clause in North Atlantic Treaty.

1. Since the very beginning of the discussions in Washington the Canadian representative in the discussions has outlined the need for a satisfactory article calling for economic and social collaboration among the signatories, an article which would contribute to general security, and ensure the widest measure of public support for the Treaty. When we first made the proposal, we received United States support and, though the Western Union countries were not keen, they agreed, somewhat reluctantly, to an article (Article 2) reading as follows:

"The parties will encourage cooperative efforts between any or all of them to promote the general welfare through collaboration in the cultural, economic and social fields. Such efforts shall, to the greatest possible extent, be undertaken through and assist the work of existing international organizations."

2. As you know, both the Prime Minister and I, in recent statements made in the House of Commons and outside, have stressed that the Treaty must include adequate provision for economic cooperation and should not be merely a military alliance designed for the immediate emergency. Article 2, as drafted, is the only essentially non-military article in the Treaty. It is weak, but it does provide a foundation on which to build. A stronger article would ensure increased support for the treaty, both in the Canadian Parliament and in Canada generally.

3. We have, therefore, authorized Wrong to do his best to get Article 2 strengthened by the addition of the following two sentences, which would be placed between the two sentences of the present draft:

“The parties agree to make every effort in common to eliminate conflict in their economic policies and to develop to the full the great possibilities of trade between them. The parties also undertake to make every effort in common to promote the attainment of a higher standard of living by their people and greater economic and social justice, and to bring about a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization.”

4. If he fails to get agreement on this text, he will retreat to a compromise text reading as follows:

“The parties agree that they will make every effort to bring about a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization, and to develop to the full the possibilities of trade between them. To this end they will encourage collaboration between all or any of them in the cultural, economic, and social fields. Wherever it may be appropriate, action to give effect to this article shall be undertaken through and shall assist the work of existing international organizations.”

5. While Wrong is making an effort to strengthen Article 2, the United States may make an effort to delete it. The United States Secretary of State does not approve of it on the grounds that it means nothing, and Senators Connolly and Vandenberg, who favour a straight defence arrangement, may wish to have it deleted.

6. I should be grateful if you would speak to the Government to which you are accredited, explain the reasons why we want the strengthening of Article 2 and express the hope that they will find it possible to instruct their representative in Washington to support Wrong in his efforts to strengthen the Article.

7. Arguments in favour of a strong Article 2 are given in paragraphs 19–21 of the Canadian Commentary of December 6th,⁴ copy of which was sent to you on December 14th.

TOP SECRET

North Atlantic Treaty. Following for Wrong from Pearson.

1. We are of course, very concerned by the implications of the statements made by senators Connolly and Vandenberg in the Senate on February 14. If there is no satisfactory pledge in the treaty, and if that treaty is interpreted by the Senate merely as a mechanism for getting the European states out of difficulties which really don't concern the U.S.A. directly, then its value is greatly reduced and we might have to re-examine our whole position. It might be that in the light of such re-examination we will be compelled to decide that the Canadian national interest involved in this kind of treaty interpreted in this way by U.S. opinion, is not sufficiently direct and immediate to warrant the government recommending to Parliament our adherence to it.

2. We would do this, of course, with the greatest regret, but we might, in the circumstances, conclude that it is better to have no treaty at all than to have a treaty which is so weak and ambiguous as to be meaningless and therefore mischievous, especially since the conclusion of such a treaty might render less likely the conclusion of a really effective arrangement in the future.

3. The over-riding purpose of the proposed treaty is to preserve peace. In our view, the only way to preserve peace today is to make clear to the Russians beyond [a] shadow of doubt that, if they attack any one of the North Atlantic countries, all the other North Atlantic countries will immediately take action to defeat the aggressor. Two things are essential if we are to get people in this country behind a treaty. It must represent a sufficient concentration of force to prevent aggression, and it must give some reasonable assurance that this force can be quickly and effectively mobilised when required.

4. The treaty must make clear to the exposed countries in Western Europe that they are protected against Russian attack by the Russian knowledge that Russia will be defeated in the end if it attacks Western Europe, even though it may win the initial victories. Such a feeling of confidence in Western Europe would enable the work of economic reconstruction to proceed. This concept is so far removed from that put forward by Senator Connolly that there doesn't seem to be much possibility of reconciling the two.

5. These purposes of the Treaty are not going to be fulfilled by an undertaking which is so watered down that it does not create even a moral obligation to take effective action, but is put forward as a charitable donation from the United States. This is reducing the proposed North Atlantic treaty almost to the level of a Kellogg-Briand peace pact.

6. It seems to us that the opponents both in Canada and in the United States of an "automatic commitment" to take action, subject of course, to constitutional processes, are still thinking in the pre-war terms of the North American nations being producers and not consumers of security. They are not, in our opinion, thinking in realistic terms; for surely it is only realism to recognize today that the Western European countries are allies whose assistance we in North America may well need in order to defend ourselves and our freedom. Today these Western European countries are more exposed to direct Russian attack than is North America. However, in ten years' time it may be that the first shock of an aggressive attack will be against the industrial centres of North America which are the arsenal of the whole Western world.

7. Is it not in the long-run interests of Canada and the United States to bind Western Europe to us in a close security arrangement so that if that attack should come the Western European nations will be in honour-bound to come to our assistance with all the forces at their disposal? A vague undertaking in the treaty would presumably make it possible for the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and the Netherlands to remain neutral if the Soviet Union should attack the United States.

8. We are at a loss to understand some of the recent discussions in the United States of the "constitutional reasons" which would debar the Senate from ratifying a treaty containing a firm commitment to act against an aggressor. It seems to us that Senator Vandenberg, four years ago in his speeches proposing four-power treaties for disarming Germany and Japan, made clear the distinction between the right of Congress to declare war and the right of the President to use the armed forces of the United States. I refer particularly to Senator Vandenberg's speech in the Senate on January 10, 1945, and to his speech in Detroit on February 5, 1945.

9. Thus, in his speech in Detroit, Senator Vandenberg proposed that the United States should "with all its major allies sign a hard and fast treaty ... which pledges our constant armed cooperation, instantly and peremptorily available through the President of the United States without further reference to the Congress, to keep Germany and Japan out of piracy for keeps". Senator Vandenberg went on to say: "Oh, but, you ask, if 'only Congress can declare war', how can you give the President plenary power to use our armed forces to keep the Axis permanently demilitarized? The answer is that for 150 years the Constitution has permitted the President to use this plenary power for 'the national defence'—short of war—and it repeatedly has thus been used without question." Elsewhere in his speech Senator Vandenberg referred to his view that the "peace league" (i.e. the future United Nations) "certainly should have peremptorily available, so far as we are concerned, such military force as is traditionally granted under the Constitution to the President for national defence".

10. As a result of Senator Vandenberg's proposals, the United States prepared draft treaties on the disarmament and demilitarization of Germany and Japan. (These were published in the Department of State bulletins for May 12 and June 30, 1946.) These treaties were to remain in force for twenty-five years. They provided that upon receipt of a report and recommendations from a majority of the members of the four-power Commission of Control "the high contracting parties will, by common agreement, take such prompt action—including action by air, sea or land forces—as may be necessary to assure the immediate cessation or prevention" of a violation of the disarmament and demilitarization provisions of the treaty.

11. Moreover, in the revised United States draft of November 1947 (which, so far as we know, has not yet been made public), the undertaking is even stronger. It reads as follows:

"Upon receipt of a report and recommendations from the Commission of Control, the contracting parties will promptly consult together and take such prompt action, including action by land, air, and sea forces, as may be necessary to ensure the immediate cessation or prevention of the violation or threatened violation of the provisions of Article 1. Such action will be taken on agreement of three or more of the contracting parties. Action under this Article shall not be taken by less than three of the contracting parties."

12. If these four-power treaties which the United States itself proposed contain a pledge in these terms, we fail to understand why the United States may now be reluctant, on constitutional grounds, to agree to a treaty for the defence of the North Atlantic containing an equally strong pledge. The draft treaties cited in paragraph 10 above have been public for almost three years and so far as we know have not been attacked in responsible quarters in the United States as being unconstitutional. Hostile critics of the United States might interpret any marked inconsistency between the United States attitude to these treaties and to the proposed North Atlantic Treaty as indicating that the United States was not acting in good faith when it put forward the draft four-power treaties, and that it puts strong pledges in treaties which it knows have no chance of coming into force.

13. If it would make the position of the United States easier, we would be glad to give sympathetic consideration to a redraft of Article 5 along the lines of the published texts of the United States draft treaties on Germany and Japan. The redraft might read somewhat as follows:

“The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or in North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently that if such an armed attack occurs they will, by common agreement, and in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, take such prompt action—including action by air, sea or land forces—as may be necessary to restore and assure the security of the North Atlantic area.”

14. It seems to us to be of paramount importance that whatever formula is used as the primary undertaking in the treaty, what is being undertaken should be made clear beyond possibility of doubt. It would be most unfortunate if, during the debates in the United States Congress and in the Canadian Parliament on the ratification of the treaty, the undertaking were to be interpreted one way in the United States Congress and another way in the Canadian Parliament.

15. In conclusion, it remains our view that the pledge in the North Atlantic Treaty should be firm and that it should be clear from the language of the treaty that the signatories are determined to resist by all necessary means any further encroachments by the Soviet Union in the area covered by the pledge. If, for example, Norway were a signatory and Spitzbergen were attacked or occupied by Soviet forces, the other signatories should, in our opinion, be required to give Norway the assistance necessary to defeat that aggression. This does not, of course, mean that the Congress would have given up its right to declare war. The right to declare war would still be vested exclusively, so far as the United States is concerned, in the Congress, but the Congress would be under a moral obligation to declare war if, in future, such a declaration is necessary to defeat an attack made against a co-signatory of the treaty.

16. The United States is not alone in foreseeing difficulties in the way of securing public support for a forthright pledge. We know that we will meet with difficulties here but we propose to meet criticism by stating that the national interest demands the conclusion of a treaty which is best calculated to prevent war, and that the best chance of preventing war lies in making it clear to the Soviet Union that war with one of the signatories means war with all. Ends.

North Atlantic Treaty. Following for Pearson and Reid from Wrong, Begins:

1. The Secretary of State called a meeting of the Ambassadors this morning at short notice to give them the encouraging results of a long discussion with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday afternoon. Only Mr. Acheson, the five Chiefs of Mission, and Reuchlin, representing Van Kleffens, were present, and no minutes were taken. He said that at his meeting with the Senate Committee the discussion centered around Articles 5 and 2. Article 2 he wished to discuss with me separately. On Article 5 he thought they had reached a very good result. He explained that the Senators were not committed to the language on which they tentatively agreed yesterday, but he clearly thought that they would be satisfied with it.

2. They wanted only two changes in the existing draft. The first was to substitute for "such military or other action" the words "such action including the use of armed force". This was really a distinction without a difference. The second change was to alter "as may be necessary" to "as it deems necessary". The Senators, and indeed all of us, were agreed that if an armed attack on a party took place "an act of will and decision" by the other parties was required to institute action under Article 5. The change made clear what would in any case have to happen.

3. The language at the end of Article 5 would therefore read on this proposal as follows: "By taking forthwith such action including the use of armed force, individually and in concert with the other parties, as it deems necessary to restore and assure the security of the North Atlantic area".

4. In addition, Mr. Acheson said that it would be necessary to include a general Article specifying that the execution of the entire Treaty would naturally be undertaken in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the parties. The Senators seemed agreeable to a separation of this statement of the obvious from the language of Article 5, and a new Article could be added towards the end of the Treaty. They would not be satisfied with the insertion of a reference in the preamble.

5. He remarked that some Senators had gone on a spree in the debate last Monday and were now in a more sober mood. There was no disposition to question both the purposes of the Treaty and the manner in which it ought to operate. Everyone there understood that what the parties proposed to do was to agree on a firm policy that each would assist the other in case of an armed attack. They also understood that the President possessed powers independent of Congress to act as Commander-in-Chief of the forces in a serious emergency. They were satisfied now that the Treaty did not contain a provision for an automatic declaration of war.

6. As to the programme, the State Department would prepare a redraft including some suggested changes in other Articles, which he said were verbal only. This he would clear with the President and with the Senate Committee before meeting the Ambassadors again on Tuesday or Thursday of next week. (Tuesday is a holiday and he might not be able to complete the domestic consultations until Wednesday).

7. I raised the question of procedure for clearance of the text with the Governments other than the United States. It was agreed that there was need for review by all the Governments concerned, and that this should be done before the text was made public. Mr. Acheson thought that we might even agree next week on a text for submission to Governments, and that signature of the Treaty might take place three weeks or so later.

8. He said that before final decisions were taken on inviting other Governments to participate he believed that we should get something concrete between the original seven. He had, therefore, steered the Senate Committee off discussion of the participation of Scandinavian countries and Italy for the present. He remarked in reply to a question by Bonnet that there was "plenty of trouble" about Algeria.

9. Mr. Acheson said that he had urged the greatest degree of secrecy on the Senate Committee. Copies of the draft had been distributed but had been collected at the end of the meeting. The press guidance given by the State Department was that there had been a satisfactory meeting with the Senators and that no differences of principle had arisen. He was most anxious that nothing more should be said by anyone here or abroad.

10. I pointed out that there were a number of amendments to the draft suggested by me and by others which were still awaiting discussion, adding that those which I had suggested that contained points of real substance affected Articles 2 and 10. We agreed that at the next meeting of Ambassadors all such pending points should be mentioned and should be referred to the Working Group for further examination.

11. I remained after the meeting at Mr. Acheson's request to discuss Article 2 with him. On this I am separately reporting. Ends.

1. After the meeting of the Ambassadors I stayed to discuss Article 2 with the Secretary of State who was joined by Bohlen and Hickerson. He described the almost universal reluctance of the members of the Senate Committee to include any Article of this nature in the Treaty itself. This was based on a growing resistance to general commitments in economic, social and cultural matters, in part derived from the language of the Bogota Treaty, in part from their distaste for some of the activities of the Economic and Social Council and UNESCO, and in part from a desire to keep the Treaty strictly limited to the organization of defence. I gathered that Senator [Henry Cabot] Lodge had taken a leading part in objecting to the Article, but that there had been a long discussion in which many other Senators took part.

2. I repeated, I think, all the arguments which we have adduced in favour of a respectable Article of this nature, stressing the position consistently adopted by the Canadian Government, the expectations roused with the public, and the evidences of the political desirability of making the Treaty more than a Defence Pact.

3. I told them of the instructions which you had given me and referred to the conversation last Saturday on this point between the President and the Prime Minister.⁵ As it was quite apparent that your proposal to insert new sentences in the middle of the Article would only increase the difficulties with the Senators, I gave them my compromise text which they promised to take under consideration. There will, however, be very great difficulty over the phrase included in it "to develop to the full the possibilities of trade between them". The Senators are already asking why, among other things, the Geneva Agreements and the I.T.O. Charter are insufficient to cover economic collaboration. Hickerson thought that my redraft might be somewhat less objectionable to the Senate Committee than the original draft, but Acheson and Bohlen gave little encouragement. Acheson said that he would have another try with the Senators and would inform them more fully than he had done of the importance attached to the Article by the Canadian Government. He seemed confident that he could at least secure acceptance of an insertion in the preamble of language in the general sense of the Article. I answered that while we should welcome this we wanted a direct statement in the body of the Treaty.

4. The only encouraging remark came from Bohlen who observed that Eichelberger and others in the United Nations Association might take a different line from the Senators and welcome a general undertaking for economic, social and cultural collaboration.

5. I mentioned incidentally that I had received information that some of the European partners, including the United Kingdom and The Netherlands, had instructed their representatives here to support our point of view on this matter. It will doubtless be further discussed at the Ambassadors' meeting next week. Ends.

Following for Pearson and Reid from Wrong, Begins: My messages WA-446 and 447 of February 19th. North Atlantic Treaty.

I think that you would agree that Acheson has made remarkable progress with the Senators over Article 5 during the last week. He has been helped in this by the attitude of the press towards Connally's and Vandenberg's statements in the Senate on February 14th, which, in spite of a few isolationist echoes, indicated that the Senators were lagging behind the country on the nature of the commitment which the United States should undertake.

2. In my judgment we should accept the language of Article 5 given in paragraph 3 of my WA-446 if this language sticks, as seems quite likely. Your review of the position in your EX-419 of February 17th has been very useful to me, although the change in the situation here made it unnecessary for me to use a number of your arguments. I was able before Acheson met the Foreign Relations Committee to bring to his attention through Hickerson the contents of paragraphs 8 to 12 of this message dealing with Vandenberg's position in 1945 and the draft treaty on the demilitarization of Germany and Japan.

3. With regard to Article 2, I do not know what will come out in the end. One difficulty is that our desire for the inclusion of such an Article in order to confer a general blessing in the treaty on the possibility of closer economic collaboration between Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States would not appeal at all to the Senators. In the hope that as politicians they will be more susceptible to arguments about the domestic political need in Canada for such an Article, I have placed emphasis on this aspect, as indeed the Prime Minister did in his talk with the President. I have emphasized that from the United States point of view a general Article is at worst harmless and that if it were used as a cover for further measures of economic collaboration these measures would be subject to the normal constitutional procedures here. I have also emphasized that there are undoubtedly a good many people in the United States who would welcome some enlargement of the Pact so that it is not wholly a military agreement.

4. Acheson told me that some of the Senators had pointed to Article 3 as covering adequately co-operation between the parties in other fields than defence. There is, I think, some force in this argument. If strong objection continues to be taken to the inclusion of anything on the lines of Article 2, do you think it would be possible for us to get by with Article 3 and suitable language in the preamble? That may be the most that we can secure.

5. With regard to the preamble, the view was expressed at Saturday's discussion that a definitive text should not be attempted for the present, and that our immediate purpose should be to get the Articles into nearly final shape. When this has been done we should take up again the questions of the scope of the treaty (i.e., Italy, Scandinavian countries, Algeria, etc), the assurance to be given to certain countries not included in the Pact, the preamble and the arrangements for final signature. Ends.

North Atlantic Treaty. Your WA-447 of February 19 on Article 2.

1. You will by now have received the repetition of telegram No. 117 of February 19 from Paris,† and No. 43 of February 19 from The Hague.† The French representative in Washington is being instructed to support the two new sentences in the middle of the Article. It appears that the Dutch are also prepared to support these two new sentences and although we have not heard from the Belgians, the Belgian Ambassador here thinks that they will also support them.

2. Consequently, at the next Ambassadors' meeting I feel that you should put forward these two new sentences and see what support they get from the other representatives present. If you get substantial support for them from all the representatives other than the United States, Acheson could report this back to the Senate Committee and in the light of the reaction from the Senate Committee we can decide whether to press for these two new sentences or to be content with your compromise.

3. For purposes of reference, the following is Article 2 as we would like to see it read:

"The parties will encourage cooperative efforts between any or all of them to promote the general welfare through collaboration in the cultural, economic and social fields. The parties agree to make every effort in common to eliminate conflict in their economic policies and to develop to the full the great possibilities of trade between them. The parties also undertake to make every effort in common to promote the attainment of a higher standard of living by their people and greater economic and social justice, and to bring about a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization. Such efforts shall, to the greatest possible extent, be undertaken through and assist the work of existing international organizations."

4. The most important sentence, as Robertson has pointed out, is the second sentence. The meaning of the second sentence would be clearer and it might be easier for the Americans to take if the word "international" were added before "economic policies".

PERSONAL

Ottawa, February 22, 1949

Dear Mr. MacBride:

I greatly appreciate your courtesy in sending me, through your High Commissioner in Ottawa, the text of your reply to the Aide Memoire of the Government of the United States on the subject of the proposed Atlantic Pact. I am even more grateful for the long and frank discussion of the attitude of your Government on this question, which you were good enough to give me in your personal letter of February 7. It is, I feel, a mark of confidence which I greatly value, that you have wished to explain your position to me in this full and friendly way, and I am very glad to take the opportunity of commenting upon that position.

In entering into informal negotiations with other North Atlantic states concerning the proposed alliance, we in this country have hoped that it might be possible to bring these negotiations to a successful conclusion without raising other problems and issues which exist amongst the prospective members of the proposed alliance. There are many such problems, of greater or less urgency, but we are confident that all of them can be settled by a process of negotiation and compromise amongst ourselves. It seems to us, however, that we shall never be able to reach agreement on these problems by the methods to which we are accustomed unless we all remain free and at peace in a world which is relatively secure. The dangers in which peace and freedom stand in the world at the moment seem to us so serious that we have considered it of the first importance to reach an agreement by which we could stand together in this emergency. Only in this way does it seem to us possible to ensure the liberty which will enable us to carry forward peacefully and without interference the process of settling the other problems which exist amongst ourselves.

For this reason we on our part have avoided raising in the discussions concerning the proposed Atlantic Treaty any other question affecting our relations with the participating governments. I do not suggest for a moment that any of these problems looms as large in our national life as the question of partition does for the people of Ireland, but some of them do give us trouble. It had not, however, occurred to us that it would really be in our interests to suggest that our participation in an alliance for the defence of the North Atlantic area would be contingent upon their satisfactory solution. In these circumstances, since we have refrained from projecting into the North Atlantic Treaty negotiations the discussion of other problems which concern us, it would, I am afraid, hardly be appropriate for Canada to raise with the other North Atlantic States the question of partition in Ireland.

Moreover, it seems to me that the question of partition in Ireland will inevitably be raised in the discussions in Washington as the result of your Government's reply to the aide memoire of the Government of the United States. The United States Government was authorized by the other participants in the Washington discussions to get in touch with your Government on the subject of the proposed Atlantic Pact and the United States representative in the Washington discussions will therefore, I assume, be reporting in due course to the other participants on the reply of your Government.

In any discussion which may follow the report by the United States of their discussions with you, you may be assured of our understanding of your desire and the desire of the people of your country to find a solution to the problem of partition through union on a basis that would be acceptable to the people of Ireland as a whole.

There is one further point I should like to make. My personal views on the problem of partition lead me to suggest that, from the standpoint of achieving a satisfactory solution along the lines indicated above, there might be positive advantage to Ireland in becoming an original member of the North Atlantic Community. By joining the association which it is proposed to establish, Ireland would be able to play the same sort of valuable and creative role which it is now playing in the O.E.E.C. Moreover, I believe that if this Community can be successfully established this year, and if the governments of its members act with wisdom, we shall have set in train the development of an even greater political and economic unity of the North Atlantic nations. In such a unity, any barriers of misunderstanding which now separate the various North Atlantic countries should disappear and Ireland and the United Kingdom would become closer partners and friends. Under such conditions, it seems to me that a generally satisfactory solution to the problem of partition could be expedited through arrangements which would be enduring and amicable.

Thank you again for your communication, and for the renewal of your kind invitation to visit you in Ireland. I most certainly hope that we may soon have the opportunity to talk to one another about these questions of mutual concern, either in Dublin or in Ottawa, if you should find it possible to pay us the compliment of a visit.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: North Atlantic Treaty.

As I told you on the telephone yesterday afternoon, I had a long discussion about the possible wording of Article 2 with Hickerson and others. We worked out the following draft, which Hickerson will endeavour to persuade Acheson to accept and to discuss with the Senators before the next meeting with the Ambassadors tomorrow afternoon:

"The parties will contribute toward further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions and promoting conditions of stability and wellbeing. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them. They will make every effort to bring about a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization."

2. The first sentence borrows language from Article 55 of the Charter and was suggested by the State Department. The rest is adapted from our proposals. I think that this is as strong a text as we can secure because of the cantankerous attitude adopted by the Foreign Relations Committee towards any Article at all. Indeed, I doubt that they will take this as it stands. Apart from other possible changes, we may have to re-insert the reference to working through existing international organizations whenever this is possible.

3. I told Hickerson that unless we could get an Article on these lines in the Treaty the Canadian Government would have to review its position towards the whole project.⁶ I also pointed out that if no Article appears in the Treaty, and if we accept it without such an Article, we shall have to make it clear publicly that the omission of any pledge on these lines has been caused by the resistance of the United States alone, since we have received assurances of support for our position from nearly all the other Governments concerned. I drew his attention to the language used in paragraph 8(6) of part 3 of the Washington paper of September 9th and pointed out that it was on the basis of this paper that the Canadian and other Governments had decided to go ahead with the whole project.

Wrong's minute of this conversation does not use such strong language (see Wrong Papers, Volume 6, Minute of February 22, 1949).

4. If we encounter further difficulties, I shall suggest that you should telephone Acheson and give further backing to our position. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 17th,† reported recent developments in connection with the North Atlantic treaty.

Some difficulty had been experienced in reaching agreement on the inclusion in Article 2 of satisfactory provisions respecting economic and other forms of co-operation between the parties to the treaty. Canada had not only supported the inclusion of such an article, but had urged that it be strengthened. Our proposals in this matter were being seconded by the French and Netherlands governments and there was some indication that the Belgian government and others might do likewise.

The latest draft of Article 5 did not provide for an automatic declaration of war in the event one of the parties was the object of aggression. It did, however, place upon the parties to the treaty the obligation to take such action "including the use of armed force" as each might deem necessary to restore and assure the security of the North Atlantic area. Article 5 would have to be supplemented by a clause delimiting the areas in which the obligation to take action existed.

It was generally agreed that there would also be an article reserving the constitutional processes of each signatory.

8. Mr. Pearson briefly reviewed the remaining articles of the draft treaty and explained the position with respect to each.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated with the text of the draft treaty as it stood at present.

9. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the progress of discussions of the North Atlantic treaty and the draft articles of the Pact as presently being discussed in Washington and agreed that decisions with respect thereto be deferred pending—further consideration of the policy questions involved and the procedure to be followed in Parliament prior to signature of the treaty.

Following for Wrong from Reid, begins: North Atlantic Treaty. Your WA-464 of February 23 to Pearson.

I am sorry that there seems to have been some misunderstanding between us about the economic clause. It was not clear to me from your teletypes that you had put forward at a meeting of Ambassadors our maximum desires set forth in our EX-300. It seemed to me that it would be unfortunate not to press our maximum demands at a meeting of Ambassadors, since there was a possibility that we would get support from most if not all the Western Union countries. It is one thing for the Senate Committee to treat cavalierly a Canadian proposal for the strengthening of Article 2. It is quite a different thing for them to treat cavalierly a text which is supported by all the participants in the Washington discussions other than the United States.

2. From telegram No. 431 of February 24 from London,† which has been repeated to you, you will have learned that the Canadian draft of Article 2 as set forth in our EX-300 was discussed at the Consultative Council of the Brussels Powers on February 23; that the Dutch gave it enthusiastic support seconded by the Belgians and that the French and British also promised their support. North Atlantic Treaty.

⁷ Wrong inscrivit la note suivante sur sa copie de ce télégramme (la copie de Wrong se trouve au volume 6 de ses papiers aux Archives nationales):

Wrong minuted on his copy of this telegram as follows (Wrong's copy is in volume 6 of his papers at the National Archives):

I asked Mr. Pearson, when telephoning him this morning, whether he would be satisfied with the Hickerson-Wrong-Achilles draft included in my WA-464 [Document 296]. He said that he would be satisfied. H. W[rong].

In a following message I shall inform you of the discussions which took place at the meeting between the Ambassadors and Mr. Acheson this morning. In this message I am sending you the text of the articles on which the discussions were based. This text has been seen by some or all of the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and has been shown to the President. Mr. Acheson said that he was giving as firm an assurance as he could that this text would be acceptable, but that he could not say it had been "cleared".

2. Text begins:

Article 1 (Peaceful Settlement)

The parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Article 2

The parties will contribute toward further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which they are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

Article 3 (Mutual Aid)

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the parties will endeavor, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist aggression.

Article 4 (Consultation)

The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened.

Article 5 (Mutual Assistance)

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action, including the use of armed force, as it deems necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Article 6 (United Nations)

1. This Treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way, the rights and obligations of the parties under the Charter of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security;

2. Any armed attack requiring action under Article 5 and all measures taken as a result thereof shall be immediately reported to the Security Council.

Article 7 (Other International Engagements)

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the parties of any third State is in conflict with the provisions of this Treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this Treaty.

Article 8 (Organization)

The parties hereby establish a Council, on which each of them shall be represented, to deal with matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty. The Council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The Council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a Defense Committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

Possible Article of Specification Under Article 5

For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the parties to this Treaty is deemed to include, in addition to an armed attack on the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America, an armed attack on (Algeria; on) the occupation forces of any party in Europe; on the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer; on the vessels or aircraft of any of the parties in the same area.

Article 9 (Accession)

The parties may, by unanimous agreement, invite any other European State in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area to accede to this Treaty. Any State so invited may become a party to the Treaty by depositing its instrument of accession with the Government of The Government of ... will inform each of the parties of the deposit of each such instrument of accession.

Article 10 (Ratification, Implementation and Duration)

This Treaty shall be ratified and carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

The Instruments of Ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the ... Government. It shall enter into force between the States which have ratified it as soon as the ratifications of the majority of the signatories, including Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been deposited and shall come into effect with respect to the other signatory States on the date of the deposit of their ratifications.

After this Treaty has been in force for twenty years, each of the parties may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the ... Government.

At the end of the ten years or at any time thereafter the parties shall, if any of them so request, consult together for the purpose of reviewing this Treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the North Atlantic area, including the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The ... Government shall inform the Governments of the other parties of the deposit of each Instrument of Ratification and each notice of denunciation. Text ends.

TELEGRAM WA-499

Washington, February 25, 1949

North Atlantic Treaty. Reference my WA-496 of today.

1. In this message I am reporting separately on the discussion about extending an invitation immediately to Norway to take part in the negotiations here. This discussion came as a surprise to everyone except Bonnet, and ended in an emphatic request by Acheson that we should all by Monday inform the State Department that we support the issue of an invitation.

2. Acheson and Hickerson explained the difficult situation in which Norway is placed. The debate in the Storting begins on March 1st, and the last Soviet note must be answered by Norway promptly. Lange has been told, with approval of the other Governments, that Norwegian participation would be welcome and that a formal invitation would be extended whenever Norway indicated that she was ready for it. If it were not forthcoming, Norway would be placed in a very difficult position indeed, and could accuse the United States and the other Governments of not living up to their pledges. Acheson toward the end of the discussion said that it would be "a colossal blunder" and "catastrophic" if we were not to invite Norway now.

3. It came out that the Brussels Permanent Commission had recently proposed that Norway should accede to the Treaty rather than join in its negotiations and be an original signatory. This view, however, was not taken very seriously by the representatives of the Brussels Powers other than Bonnet. Bonnet, while not denying that we must help Norway in her difficult and exposed position, linked the issue to the question of an immediate invitation to Italy, and argued this point with persistence and heat though not always with logic. He said his Government's view on this was very firm and that to refuse to extend a simultaneous invitation to Italy would cause acute difficulties with French public opinion.

4. I said that I found the discussion surprising and distressing. I had suggested at the meeting on February 8th that we should all put ourselves in a position to be able to agree, without further reference to Governments, that a formal invitation should be extended to any of the five countries (Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Ireland and Portugal) which had been informally approached by common consent, whenever any of them indicated that they wished one. The question of Italy had always been dealt with separately, and no final decision had yet been taken on the participation of Italy in the Treaty. Lange must know where he stood before facing the Storting and before answering the Soviet note. If Norway joined in the negotiations, this might mean a small delay, but now that they had taken a courageous decision on the basis of our informal approach we must not let them down or attach conditions. I think that everyone but Bonnet was in agreement with what I said.

5. During the argument the position of several Governments towards the participation of Italy was clarified. Bonnet repeated his well-known views. Franks said that on the whole his Government would prefer that Italy should not be included, but it was a narrow issue and they would abide by the wishes of the rest. I said that Canada had also entertained doubts for a long time, but that we had come to the conclusion on balance that we could agree to Italian membership. Bonnet and Silvercruys both made the fair point that a decision on Italy was overdue and that we had been waiting for a more definite position from the United States on the merits of the case. They and Franks agreed that the suggestion put forward several times by the United States that it was up to the European partners to propose a satisfactory solution was not helpful.

6. This led Acheson finally to say that the United States favoured the accession of Italy to the Treaty. They did not wish Italy to join the negotiations now. This would be a complicating factor in securing Congressional and public support for the Treaty. The Italian case was very different from that of Norway. Italy had knocked on the door without a prior invitation to do so, and was under no such pressure from the Russians as Norway. To give an equivocal answer to Norway would be a disaster. We could not possibly treat the problem as one of taking both or neither into the negotiations now. This was the first time on which an attempt had been made to tie together Norwegian and Italian adhesion. Was France willing to take the responsibility of placing Norway in jeopardy in order to force an immediate decision on Italy?

7. It was agreed that all should seek definite authority from their Governments as a most urgent matter, since Lange requires an answer by Tuesday morning. I think I already have authority to approve an immediate invitation to Norway. An invitation to Italy now, if at once accepted, would delay the negotiations, since the Italian Government knows nothing of the background of the discussions and the contents of the draft, whereas the Norwegian Government is fairly fully informed. This, however, is a minor matter compared with the necessity of keeping faith with Norway when her Government has taken a courageous decision to throw in their lot with the Atlantic nations.

8. I suggest that you might repeat this message urgently to Vanier and instruct him to approach Schuman, tomorrow if possible, with a view to Bonnet receiving by Monday instructions to agree unconditionally to an immediate invitation to Norway. The State Department is sending their Ambassador in Paris very strong instructions in this sense, and would warmly welcome parallel action on our part. The issue is serious, and unless at once resolved may even affect the fate of the whole project.

TELEGRAM WA-502

Washington, February 25, 1949

My WA-496 of today. North Atlantic Treaty.

2. The Ambassadors and Mr. Acheson today ran over the new draft of the Articles, which is in my teletype under reference, and discussed the question of the admission of Norway and Italy. I am reporting on this latter question separately. In the present message I shall deal with the discussion of the Articles.

3. Mr. Hickerson began by drawing attention to the changes in the various Articles. The points of note in this connection were that in Article 3 the changes were designed to eliminate the charge that this Article constitutes "a bugle call to an armaments race". Concerning Article 5, he said that the word "maintained" had been used because it was Charter language and noted that the last sentence in the Article had been extracted from the old Article 6. In Article 7 he drew attention to the new clause at the end which was intended in a measure as an alternative to an expulsion clause. In Article 9 the chief change was the substitution of the words "any other European State in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic Area" for the old phrase "any other neighbouring European State". Article 10, he noted, had been rewritten and drew attention to the contents of the first paragraph, which constitutes an inconspicuous assertion of the right of Congress to declare war. The Article also contains the provision we had heard of before requiring ratification by the original seven as part of the majority before coming into effect. The United States also enthusiastically supports the inclusion of the provision for review and seems to have settled on a period of twenty years for the duration of the Treaty.

4. The meeting then turned to a discussion Article by Article.

Article 1. No representatives stated any objections to this Article.

Article 2. Mr. Van Kleffens gave enthusiastic support to the idea of an Article of this kind, saying that the Netherlands does not want the Treaty to be solely military. Anything to bring co-operation in economic, social and cultural fields would, he said, be "very warmly welcomed". He was "all for it". He thought that the Netherlands would even want the Article to be bolstered slightly. Mr. Bonnet asked what was meant by the first sentence in this Article. He wanted to know what was to be done about it. I replied that the idea was that this constituted a collective and individual obligation to keep our policies in these fields in line. Mr. Bonnet said that "on the whole" his Government would be glad to see something about economic co-operation in the Treaty. He would, however, have favoured the mention of culture as well as economics. Sir Oliver Franks said that he agreed with Mr. Van Kleffens "down the line". He would be pleased to go a little farther but extended general support to the Article without offering any suggestions for revision. Mr. Legallais said that he thought the Luxembourg Government would be in favour of the Article as also did Baron Silvercruys on behalf of the Belgian Government. The latter said that his Government's position would probably be greatly influenced by the attitude of the Canadian Government; i.e., whether the Canadian Government thought this draft was satisfactory. I thanked the other representatives for their support and said that while this Article did not go as far as the Canadian Government would like, I would see if, in view of the position of the United States Government, this Article would be satisfactory to you. I said to the meeting that this Article was merely an attempt to implement paragraph (6) on page 11 of the paper of 9th September.⁸ Mr. Acheson said he would not like to try to add anything to the present wording and that he was much surprised at Mr. Gross's success with the Senators when he put the case to them yesterday. The President had also been very helpful in getting the Canadian position across as a result of the Prime Minister's intervention with him. It would, he said, ease the position of the United States Government if the Canadian Government could decide that this draft was adequate. Greater definition would mean greater difficulty. Mr. Bonnet tried to have something about culture inserted in the Article but ran into a great deal of difficulty, as Mr. Acheson explained that the Senators were particularly allergic to "ideas of welfare and culture".

Article 3. Mr. Bonnet objected to the substitution for the phrase "will use every endeavour" of the phrase "will endeavour". He was afraid that it would appear to be merely a pious wish when translated into French. Mr. Acheson said that it was necessary, in discussing this with the United States Senate, to bear in mind the need to reconcile efforts for recovery and efforts for rearmament. If "every endeavour" was to be used for rearmament there would be no endeavour left for recovery. This argument seemed to weigh rather heavily with some of the European representatives. I tried to secure the elimination of the words "in order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty" but there was opposition on the ground that the use of the new verb "will endeavour" would sound extremely weak with some such preamble as this.

⁸ Volume 14, pièce jointe au document 398.
Volume 14, enclosure to Document 398.

Article 4. No change and no comment.

Article 5. Mr. Van Kleffens opened the European campaign for a return to the words "as may be necessary" instead of "as it deems necessary". Mr. Acheson replied, whenever this matter was brought up, that to use the first phrase instead of the second because it sounded more complete constituted an attempt to deceive. The Senators so considered it and as it was obvious that the real meaning of this phrase would come out in debates in the Senate it would be better to start off honestly in the first instance. In addition, the new phraseology is the work of Senator Connally himself. Mr. Gross (the legal adviser of the State Department) said that the explicit mention of the use of armed force in this clause was dependent upon the use of the phrase "as it deems necessary". We could not have the former without the latter. Mr. Bonnet, of course, sided with those who preferred "as may be necessary". He thought that there was some contradiction in the Article in talking of action to be taken "in concert" and, at the same time, saying that it is only such action as each country deems necessary. He thought that it would be a good thing to have a reference in Article 5 to Article 8 rather than a reference in Article 8 to Article 5. He thought that by making this change it would be possible to emphasize joint thinking and joint resolutions. Mr. Acheson said he thought this would be "a great mistake" as it appeared to get towards the idea of automatic action. He drew attention to the fact that the debates on the ratification of the Treaty would necessarily be conducted in an artificial atmosphere. The Treaty was intended to deal with an all-out Soviet attack on one of the parties and there was no doubt about what would happen if such an attack took place. On the other hand, the debate in the Senate would be on the ground that the United States might be drawn into war as a result of some "minor fracas". The language, therefore, had to make it plain that such a minor incident could not result automatically in war. Sir Oliver Franks said that this text seemed to be nearer to what everybody wanted than had seemed possible two weeks ago. He thought it would be a good thing to be content with what we have got. He attached great importance to the mention of the use of armed force. I agreed in a general way with Sir Oliver Franks and said that while the Canadian Government would probably favour a stronger pledge than the one originally contemplated we understood the difficulties faced by the State Department and felt that the Secretary of State should be congratulated on saving so much from what had almost looked like a hopeless situation.

Article 6. Discussion of this Article was referred to the Working Group as the changes in it were purely formal.

Article 7. Little comment, except for my endorsement of the addition.

Article 8. Mr. Acheson said that the United States Government did not feel that it could accept the French suggestion to include the word "plans". The meeting then listened to a rehearsal of the argument that had been heard many times earlier on this subject. In the end Mr. Bonnet asked for private conversations with the State Department and will probably get them.

Unnumbered Article referring to Article 5. This Article replaces the old Article 5 bis. Although Algeria is placed in square brackets, Mr. Acheson said "we can struggle with that", meaning that he thought that after considerable difficulty he would be able to persuade the Senators to accept the inclusion of Algeria. It was also suggested that the phrase "the Algerian Departments of France" be substituted for the word "Algeria". I mentioned that in the Working Group we would have some minor suggestions about re-wording this Article.

Article 9. No comment; the changes appeared to be acceptable.

Article 10. Mr. Bonnet said he would not oppose the new provision about review at half time but he said that it was both useless and unfortunate. It was his opinion that this revision could quite well be done under the clause on consultation anyhow. He was afraid that the effect of this provision might be to make the treaty be good for ten years instead of twenty. Mr. Acheson said that he favoured the inclusion of this provision because it seemed to detract from the impression that this Treaty was a permanent military alliance. I said that we would propose some drafting changes in the Working Group.

North Atlantic Treaty. My preceding messages about this morning's meeting.

1. At the end of the meeting, which lasted over three hours, we discussed the order of proceedings. It was agreed that we should proceed as follows:

(a) The revised text prepared by the State Department, after consultation with Senators, should be communicated to Governments immediately. Meanwhile the Working Group should consider certain drafting points.

(b) The extension of an invitation to Norway to join the talks should be dealt with separately and most urgently.

(c) The comments of the Governments on the revised text should, if possible, be available fairly early next week when the Ambassadors' group could put it into "more or less final shape".

(d) We should then communicate again with our Governments and probably with very brief delay inform the other Governments whose accession is desired and possible of the exact text. At this time the text might be published in all the Capitals.

(e) Two or three weeks later, after an interval for public discussion and digestion, the Treaty might be signed. Mr. Acheson answered affirmatively my question whether this would mean if all went well that about March 31st could be the date for signature.

2. There was no discussion of the method of signature and whether it should be preceded by a brief formal conference. Mr. Acheson left me with the impression that he may have in mind that no conference will be necessary because of the exhaustive preliminary negotiations. Have you any strong views?

3. As to the revised text, it is in a more satisfactory shape than I could have hoped a few days ago. I believe that we should accept all the Articles as they stand except for minor drafting changes. The substance of Articles 2 and 7 has been improved considerably from the previous drafts, and the changes in Articles 1 and 9 are also improvements. We shall certainly get nothing better than the present draft of Articles 3, 4 and 5. Articles 5 bis, 6 and 10 may be rearranged somewhat, but their substance meets our views except perhaps for the introduction of the mild reference to constitutional processes in the first sentence of Article 10. This we must accept.

4. As for Article 2, I argued this morning for a stronger Article on the lines of our own proposal, making reference directly to the development of trade, higher standards of living and greater economic and social justice. Mr. Acheson and Mr. Gross were both firmly of the view that they could not secure Senatorial approval for these additions, and urged me to seek to persuade the Canadian Government to accept the present language. They were surprised that the Senators had not opposed this, and are most anxious not to have to go to them again with a new text.

TOP SECRET

Following for Wrong. Begins: Reference your WA-496, Articles of the draft North Atlantic Treaty. The following are my comments:

Article 1 (Peaceful Settlement)

The changes in this article are not substantive and it is acceptable as it now stands.

Article 2 (General Welfare)

I am pleased to note that our representations to the United Kingdom, France and the Benelux countries were fruitful and that you received the support of these representatives in the Ambassadors' Group for a stronger article. I feel that this article is perhaps as strong as we can secure and it is therefore acceptable as it now stands. As a matter of drafting, however, I would suggest that the phrase "a better understanding of the principles upon which they are founded" should read "a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded".

Article 3 (Mutual Aid)

I would accept the article as presently drafted.

Article 4 (Consultation)

This article is acceptable as it stands, although I feel that you might in the Working Group put forward the revision already suggested in my EX 300 of February 7 which reads as follows:

“The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them,

(a) the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened; or

(b) there exists any situation which constitutes a threat to or breach of the peace.”

Article 5 (Mutual Assistance)

I agree that the article as drafted is probably as strong as we could secure and that Acheson should be congratulated on the success which he has had.

I do not see the necessity for placing the last sentence of the second paragraph of Article 6 in this article. It seems to me as a matter of drafting that this sentence really follows from the first sentence of paragraph 2 of Article 6. I would be grateful if you would explain why this change was made.

Article 6 (United Nations)

I would prefer as a matter of drafting that paragraph 2 of this Article follow the lines of my original suggestion, namely, that the two sentences should be joined. The text might then read as follows:

“All measures taken under Article 5 shall be immediately reported to the Security Council, and shall be terminated as soon as the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.”

I would prefer that the second paragraph of Article 6 should become Article 7 with consequential changes. I presume these changes could be discussed in the Working Group.

Article 7 (Other International Engagements)

This article is acceptable as it stands (I am assuming that “any other of the parties of any third state” should read “any other of the parties or any third state.”

Article 8 (Organization)

I note that this article has not been altered and would accept it as presently drafted.

Unnumbered Article to Define Article 5

I would prefer my redraft in EX-300 of February 7. In particular, I feel that the phrase “on the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer” should be replaced by “any islands not included in Europe or North America, which are under the jurisdiction, etc.” This would leave no doubt that the Arctic islands would be included, both by the use of the phrase “North America” and also by the reference to the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic area.

Article 9 (Accession)

I continue to feel that “country of the North Atlantic area” might be substituted for “neighbouring European state”. If the objection to the former phrase is on the grounds that it might exclude Italy, this objection would be overcome if Italy is to be an original signatory.

Article 10 (Ratification and Duration)

I presume that you will raise in the Drafting Group our suggested changes for this article. You will recall that I have suggested that the order of the sentences might be reversed and that there should be two articles, one dealing with ratification and one with duration.

Joint Declaration

I assume that you will at an appropriate time raise in the Ambassadors’ Group the question of a joint declaration and put forward our suggested text as contained in my EX-16 of January 4.†

North Atlantic Treaty. Your EX-510 of February 27th.

1. I am grateful to you, both for the promptness of your comments and for their substance. They include a few minor points which I might elucidate further before the next meeting here.

Article 2. The slight change you suggest had already occurred to me, and I am sure that there will be no difficulty.

Article 4. The trouble about your proposed addition is that it could be regarded as requiring consultation on any issue likely to threaten peace anywhere in the world, and would thus give the North Atlantic Council as wide duties of consultation as those of the Security Council. For instance, in the opinion of the North Atlantic Governments the situation a few months ago in Kashmir and the present situation in Indonesia could only be regarded as threatening the peace. I think that this objection has force, and I am sure we shall not get the earlier language restored.

Articles 5 and 6. We intend in the Working Group to propose that the text which you suggest in your comment on Article 6 should be put at the end of Article 5 and that Article 6 be reduced to its first paragraph. The purpose of including reference to the Security Council in the most important Article in the Treaty is to demonstrate, on the basis of that Article alone, that the Treaty will operate within the United Nations framework. The Senators attach some importance to this, and I think that it has value in explaining and defending the Treaty to the public.

Article defining areas. We shall attempt to secure approval of a re-draft in the Working Group. I have made it clear that we desire more exact language in this Article.

Article 9. It seems almost certain that Italy will not be an original signatory, and therefore language like that in the draft will have to be maintained in order to permit Italian accession.

Article 10. We have prepared a re-draft on the lines that you suggest, including also a reference to authentic texts in both French and English.

Joint Declaration. The time for raising this again should come soon. Ends.

Washington, March 1, 1949

TOP SECRET

North Atlantic Treaty.

A meeting of the Ambassadors was held this morning with the Secretary of State.

2. Mr. Acheson started the meeting by placing before it at once the question which had been discussed Friday—the nature of the reply which should be sent to the enquiry from the Norwegian Foreign Minister. The French Ambassador asked to speak last on this question. The views expressed by the others, including myself, were essentially the same and may be summed up as follows: that our Governments recognized that a favourable reply must be sent forthwith and that they regarded the Norwegian and Italian problems as two separate and distinct problems which should not be linked together.

3. The French Ambassador, although he retreated from the position which he had taken on Friday, in that he recognized that the Norwegian and Italian problems were not the same, said that he had to make it clear in advance that if Italy were not to become a party to the Treaty the French Government would have to reconsider its position in so far as its participation is concerned. He said that he had received the clearest possible indications on this point. He agreed that it is most important to conclude the Treaty urgently, but that French signature will ultimately depend on the “structure of the Treaty”, that is, who is to be party to it. If it was decided to tell the Norwegians today that if they, at the conclusion of the debate in the Storting, asked for an invitation it will be forthcoming. Mr. Bonnet said that he would wish to be able to tell his Government when the Italian question will be decided. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Bonnet made some very embarrassing statements, to put it mildly. He indicated, for example, a suspicion on the French side that delays in reaching a solution of the problems of Italy and North Africa were deliberate tactics on the part of some of the other parties to the negotiations in the hope that the French would, in the end, "bow and accept". He concluded his opening remarks by saying that if a favourable reply were to be sent to Norway, he could only agree on condition that Norway would not be allowed to oppose the admission of Italy and that a decision on this point must be taken by the original seven Governments. The reaction to the attempt to impose a condition was adverse from all the other parties. Faced with this Mr. Bonnet said that he had not meant to impose a condition but had wished to explain the consequences of a rejection of the French position in their effect on the signature of the Treaty.

4. Mr. Acheson took up the insinuation that there had been undue delay on some points and referred specifically to the question of the inclusion of Algeria. He said that when he took office he found the Senators had not known of the existence of the Algerian problem. Yesterday, however, he had been able to get the Senators to understand the French position and to agree to the inclusion of the French Departments of Algeria in the area. He reiterated that there was "nothing Machiavellian" in the United States attitude.

5. It was agreed that a message might now go to Norway to tell the Norwegian Government that if, on the conclusion of their debate, they decided they wanted an invitation, an invitation would be forthcoming.

6. Mr. Van Kleffens suggested that it might be as well to accompany this assurance with a summary of the current position with respect to thinking on Italy in order that the Norwegians might not feel that they had been taken unawares. This was agreed to after some debate.

7. Sir Oliver Franks raised the question of the meaning of Italian participation. He thought there were two questions:

(1) In principle, should Italy be associated with the other signatory States in the Treaty?

(2) Should Italy be an original signatory?

The debate on these points seemed to indicate that by and large nobody had any objections in principle to associating Italy with the other Powers in the treaty and that nobody had definite instructions whether Italy should sign the Treaty or should accede to it, except the French who are, of course, insistent that Italy should sign, and the Americans who now favour the association of Italy by later accession.

8. The question of what reply should be given to Denmark if it should ask a question similar to Norway's was then brought up by Mr. Acheson. Mr. Bonnet said that he would have to ask for instructions from Paris but the other representatives seemed to be in no doubt that there was only one reply which could logically be given to the Danes at this time. A request from Denmark to participate is likely within a week.

A further meeting of the Ambassadors and Mr. Acheson is to be held on Thursday morning to discuss the status of all States which may sign or adhere to the Treaty. These will include Denmark, Portugal, Ireland, Iceland and Italy. I shall, therefore, require before 10.00 o'clock on Thursday your instructions on the following two points:

1) Should Denmark receive the same sort of assurance as Norway if the Danish Government decides to ask the same sort of question? (Only an affirmative answer is really possible.)

2) Should Italy become a full party to the Treaty by signing it, or by acceding to it?

2. The balance with respect to procedure on Italy is that only France has come out in favour of having Italy sign, and only the United States has come out in favour of having Italy accede. The position of the other States is not known for sure.

(1) I agree that an invitation should be issued to the Danish Government to participate in negotiations should they so desire.

(2) I should prefer that Italy should accede to the Treaty after signature unless she gives a pledge not to raise political questions for bargaining purposes before signing. If Italy, having been invited to participate in the current discussions and then to sign the Treaty as an original signatory, raised such thorny questions as the position of Trieste and the Italian colonies, serious delays would be caused and this must be avoided. I think there is serious objection to inviting any power to take part in the current discussions if we have reason to believe that they intend to bargain for purely domestic gains. This would, of course, include Ireland.

I agree with your suggestions on Articles 5 and 6.

Article Defining Areas: One point occurs to me upon which I do not think we have received any information, viz., whether the United States considers that, under this Article as now drafted, or under the Article as we should like to see it drafted, the Aleutian Islands are included. A question on this point might well arise in the House, particularly if I am asked whether the Arctic Archipelago is included.

Article 9: I agree with your arguments, provided it is decided that Italy should not be an original signatory.

Cabinet is meeting on Friday, and I should like, if possible, to place a revised text before them. If, therefore, the Working Group completes its drafting revision in time, I should be grateful if you would send me a clean text of all the Articles so they can be submitted to Cabinet. TELEGRAM EX-561

Ottawa, March 3, 1949

North Atlantic Treaty. Your telegram WA-506 of February 25.

1. In paragraph 2 of your telegram which dealt with the order of future proceedings, you said that the publication of the text of the Treaty would be followed by a two or three weeks' interval "for public discussion and digestion" and then the Treaty might be signed—approximately March 31. You went on to say that there was no discussion of the method of signature and whether signature should be preceded by a brief formal conference but that Mr. Acheson left you with the impression that he might have in mind that no conference would be necessary because of the exhaustive preliminary negotiations. You asked whether we had any strong views.

2. I am not clear what is implied in the phrase “an interval for public discussion and digestion”. In democratic countries such as those participating in the Washington discussions, suggestions for the revision and improvement of the Treaty text will undoubtedly be made by responsible groups during the two or three weeks’ interval between the publication of the text and signature. The governments may well be put in an embarrassing position if they are forced to state that regardless of the merits of the suggestions—some of which might be purely drafting—the text which was published is sacrosanct. It is possible to take this line once a treaty has been signed and is before the Legislature for approval, but it is hardly practical politics to take this line before a treaty is actually signed, once a draft has been published.

3. Not only is it not practical politics but I doubt whether it is wise. As a result of public discussion and digestion of the Treaty in Canada, it may be that the Canadian Government will wish to propose amendments to the published text.

4. I therefore think that it is extremely important that when the text is published it made clear in all the capitals that the text is not rigid but that each government reserves the right to propose amendments.]⁹

3. While I would not anticipate that any one of the governments would make proposals for substantial changes, it seems to me that it would be wise to hold a formal conference before the Treaty is signed at which the final suggestions of the participating governments for amendment of the draft text could be considered. Presumably some deadline could be set—say three or four days before the opening of the formal conference—by which governments should have circulated to the other governments their proposals for the revision of the draft text.

4. There are, it seems to me, other strong reasons for the holding of a formal conference before signature. The signature of this Treaty will be an historic event and it would therefore be appropriate that the Treaty be signed by Foreign Ministers in a public session at which they would have an opportunity to make speeches in support of the Treaty.

5. You will recall that, in the House of Commons on February 4, I said, with reference to the discussions in Washington:

“I hope that these discussions, which have been taking place in Washington on an ambassadorial level, will soon be concluded, and that the representatives who have been participating in them will be able to submit to their governments a complete draft of a North Atlantic Treaty, which in its essentials at least can, I hope, be made public at the same time that it is submitted to governments. The next stage will be a careful study by each government, and careful examination by the public opinion of each country, of the principles embodied in this draft. Amendments can be submitted, and then a conference will be held at which I hope the treaty can be signed. It would then be for each government to submit the treaty to its legislature, in the democratic way, for approval or rejection."

6. I should be glad to have an answer from you at your early convenience on the questions raised in this message, since they have a bearing on the question of the approaches which might be made by the Canadian Government to the leaders of the opposition parties. If the leaders of the opposition parties are to be given an opportunity to comment on the text, I am anxious not to give them the impression that they are being presented with a fait accompli. 1. Reference your EX-553 of March 2nd. The meeting with the Ambassadors was postponed late yesterday until Friday morning at the request of the Brussels Powers, since their Permanent Commission is meeting in London today. Furthermore, the Brussels Powers, or most of them, have not yet received their instructions on the latest text (i.e., that given in my WA-496 of February 25th), so that no meeting of the Working Group has taken place. In consequence, I cannot provide you with a revised text in time for submission to Cabinet on Friday. I suggest, however, that we seem to be so near agreement on all but a few drafting points that you might consider taking up in the Cabinet the text quoted in my WA-496, while explaining the articles in which we desire some improvement.

2. The Aleutian Islands have never been mentioned in the Ambassadors' meetings, but I think that the view probably held in the State Department is that the easternmost end of the chain is included but not the western group beyond the 170th or 175th parallel of longitude. Since the French have been trying insistently to bargain Italy and North Africa against coverage of the Canadian Arctic and Alaska, I should prefer not to raise this matter specifically at a meeting until the Italian question is settled. We shall, however, at the first opportunity make private enquiries in the State Department.

3. With reference to your EX-561 of March 3rd. My impression that Mr. Acheson might not be contemplating a final conference before signature has been corrected by my later private talk with him at his house on Sunday, the gist of which I sent you in my WA-516 of February 28.†¹⁰ While our conversation was confined to the place of signature, clearly he has in mind some sort of a conference preceding signature or he would not have said that he favoured signature in Bermuda. If you have a conference attended by Foreign Ministers, it seems evident that the text cannot be considered unalterable when the conference meets. Mr. Acheson has stated publicly this week that he would welcome public discussion of the text between its release and the signature of the treaty.

4. Because of the French attitude at the last two Ambassadors' meetings, it was not timely to go into these matters in detail. I shall probably be able to get clarification at Friday's meeting or, at latest, at what we hope will be the last meeting before the text is published, which should take place between March 7th and 9th. We shall also discuss this aspect privately with the State Department and the British Embassy.

CANADIAN ATTITUDE IN WORKING GROUP ON DRAFT ARTICLES

Article 3. Support any changes acceptable to the State Department which would strengthen the language.

Article 5. Support the merger of para. 2 of Article 6 and the last para. of Article 5, in accordance with our own draft.

Article on Area. I think that we should not push our original instructions too far and that, in view of Van Kleffens' point this morning, we should agree to specific mention of occupation forces in Europe. I am not myself very sure that the reference which we desire to "islands not included in Europe or North America" is at all necessary as constituting an additional safeguard that the Arctic islands are covered. You might, if the atmosphere is favourable, raise the question of the Aleutian Islands and try to get some commitment from the State Department as to how much of them they consider an Asiatic tail in the chain which would not be covered by the Treaty.

On one minor point, it is unnecessary in the second line to put after "the parties" the words "to this Treaty" as we do not do so at other points.

Article 9. You might raise the point again about using the phrase "European State", but I think that really we should not press it and that the present language is quite satisfactory.

In that conversation Acheson stated his preference for Bermuda as the place of signature, while his officials recommended Ottawa. Wrong stated that Canada "did not want signature in Ottawa."

NORTH ATLANTIC PACT; PROCEDURE FOR CANADIAN APPROVAL

13. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 24th, reported that a draft text of the North Atlantic Treaty would likely be agreed on and submitted very shortly to participating governments.

When the draft text was submitted, it was proposed that it be circulated to the Cabinet and to the leaders of the opposition parties. It might be tabled shortly thereafter in the House of Commons and a resolution of approval put on the Order Paper, the House being informed that the resolution would be discussed prior to the Pact being signed.

In this connection draft letters to the opposition leaders and a preliminary draft of a resolution for introduction in the House of Commons had been prepared.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Prime Minister, Mar. 2, 1949,† and attached draft letter and draft resolution†).

North Atlantic Treaty.

1. The Ambassadors and Mr. Acheson met at 11:00 o'clock this morning to discuss the participation of Italy and related questions, the procedure whereby the treaty should be signed, and the text of the treaty.

2. On the suggestion of Sir Oliver Franks the Italian question was dealt with in two phases: First, the principle of Italian participation, and secondly, the time or method of association. It rapidly emerged that nobody now had any objection to the participation of Italy in principle. However, no formal decision to invite Italian participation could be taken for the reason that, although Mr. Acheson has the authority of the President to agree to Italian participation, he has not yet succeeded in clearing the matter with the Senators. Some of the latter are not yet converted to the idea of Italian participation and would resent it if the decision were taken before they had had time to make up their minds. Mr. Acheson, therefore, asked that, although he had in effect agreed to Italian participation, nothing should be said about it and the agreement should not be considered final until he had secured the consent of the Senators.

3. Having reached this tentative decision the question remained whether Italy should be invited to participate in the negotiations and to sign, or to sign without participating in the negotiations, or to adhere. It emerged that yesterday morning the Brussels Permanent Commission decided that it would be best to agree on a text as quickly as possible among the original seven, to transmit this text to the Home Governments, and as soon as their agreement is received to have the text initialled by the original seven ad referendum. (The Norwegians would not be among those initialling the draft.) After the seven Governments had accepted the draft, they should sign the treaty and any other countries, including Norway and Italy, which have been accepted by the seven would be invited to accede on the same day. There was some discussion over the meaning of "accede" in this sense, and it appeared probable that the Brussels Permanent Commission was thinking in terms of signature rather than accession under Article 9.

4. Sir Oliver Franks thought that the British reason for backing this decision in the Permanent Commission was that they were concerned primarily with speed. He thought that it did not matter when countries like Norway, Denmark and Italy joined the talks after an agreed draft text had been transmitted to the Home Governments, as their participation in the talks would then be more or less academic.

5. I said that you had no strong views as to the choice between signature and accession, although you did prefer that Italy should not take part in the active discussion of the text. I pointed out the possibility that Italy might try to bring up the question of her colonies and of the return of Trieste, but the French Ambassador and Mr. Acheson assured me that the Italian Government was aware that it could not discuss matters of this sort in relation to the North Atlantic Treaty. The Belgian Ambassador expressed the preference that Italy should not participate in the active discussions but that it should sign rather than accede later. The French, of course, are in favour of immediate participation and are the obvious movers of the scheme put forward by the Brussels Permanent Commission. Their explanation for this suggested procedure is that the French Government is of the opinion that all Governments, other than the original seven, should be put on the same footing and that no distinction should be made in the case of Italy.

6. There was some discussion over the question of initialling the draft in which both Mr. Acheson and myself said that we should prefer not to have to initial the text as it seemed to be an unnecessary complication for domestic reasons.

7. In discussing the text which is expected to be agreed in the near future I expressed the view that while it would be more or less final it was understood that our Governments were not committed to every word and every comma. I explained that you intended to take the leaders of the opposition parties into your confidence before the treaty is signed and that you would like to be able to present them with a draft in which alterations could still be made, although it was improbable that they would be made. This was generally agreed to.

8. The United States representatives said that they would like to send the text to the twenty American Republics twenty-four hours in advance of its release to the newspapers to inform them as a matter of courtesy of the obligations being undertaken by the United States. Sir Oliver Franks suggested that the United Kingdom would want to do the same for the Commonwealth countries.

9. In the discussion of the place of signature there was an early move to hold the diplomatic conference in Bermuda. This entailed a discussion of the need for a diplomatic conference. I said that I hoped that several of the Foreign Ministers of the participating countries would gather for the signing, and that there ought to be some formalities and good showmanship to mark the importance of the occasion. I suggested that at the time of signature other things besides the text were going to have to be considered, among them the advisability of making a declaration to explain the special need for signing a treaty of this nature at this time. I pointed out that, in addition, any signing countries which have not participated in the negotiations should be given an opportunity to state why they were signing. Mr. Acheson said that if questions of this nature were to be discussed or if last-minute questions about the text might arise he would rather stay in Washington. He also hoped that Mr. Truman would sign the treaty on behalf of the United States and add his prestige to the occasion. It was, therefore, pretty well agreed that the conference would take place in Washington and that in consequence the blanks in Articles 9 and 10 of the treaty should be filled in with the name of the United States.

10. At this point the Norwegian Ambassador was brought into the room to take his seat at the conference table. The formalities of welcome were very brief and the meeting turned to a consideration of the text of the treaty. As the Working Group is meeting this afternoon to discuss the text and the minor amendments which various countries have suggested I shall cover questions relating to the text in a later message. See also my immediately following message. Ends.

North Atlantic Treaty. Reference my immediately preceding message.

1. The chief results of this morning's meeting of the Ambassadors and the Secretary of State were as follows:

(a) The admission of Norway to participate in the final stages of the negotiations; during the meeting the Secretary of State received a message saying that Denmark did not want to be invited before the Foreign Minister had visited Washington and reported back to the Rigsdag.

(b) A tentative decision that Italy should be an original signatory with the understanding that the Italian Ambassador would not be invited to join the group here until a revised and almost final text had been submitted.

(c) Agreement on all the draft articles except for some drafting amendments to be considered this afternoon and tomorrow by the Working Group. In certain cases this agreement was conditional on further approval by particular Governments.

(d) Agreement that the Ambassadors' Group should meet, if possible, on Monday to pass on the work of the Working Group. If accepted, this would be regarded as "the more or less final text of the treaty".

(e) Clarification of further procedure.

2. Most of these questions are dealt with in my preceding message at some length. I shall report later on the progress made in securing acceptance of the Canadian amendments. In one or two cases objections which seem to me valid were made to our phrasing.

3. The probable solution for Italy will be an invitation to attend the conference preceding signature and to sign with the rest of us, provided that they accept without change the articles approved by the seven Governments. Mr. Acheson said it would take him some days to make firm the tentative decision of the United States that Italy should be a full participant.

4. As to procedure, the probability now is that we shall re-submit the articles with some minor alternations to our own Governments some time next week. It would be understood, however, that the Executive Branch of the Governments has by that time indicated their readiness to accept the treaty in that form without closing the door to suggesting further changes in the light of public discussion of the draft and consultations with parliamentary leaders. The draft would, however, be made public soon after its acceptance by the Ambassadors' Group. There would then be an interval of a fortnight or slightly longer to permit public discussion preceding signature.

5. I imagine that you would wish to consult leading members of the opposition between the submission of the nearly final text and its publication. I should like to know exactly what you have in mind, since I may be pressed as soon as Monday to agree on a release date, and the pressure here is strong for a brief interval between clearing the text in the Ambassadors' Group and making it public.

6. As to the procedure for signature, it seemed to me this morning that little thought had been given to it. I put the case strongly for a conference which would be attended by as many Foreign Ministers as possible and not be purely ceremonial in character. Franks agreed with me and said that Mr. Bevin would wish to come. Acheson indicated that he was impressed by our views and took the reasonable position that, if the text was to be subjected to alteration at the conference, he ought to be able to consult the Foreign Relations Committee without delay. This rules out Bermuda and makes Washington the obvious place.

7. I referred also to our draft joint declaration at the time of signature. No-one opposed it, and Van Kleffens expressed strong support. The question of assurances to Greece and Turkey was not brought up.

8. The Working Group is supposed to produce a preamble immediately, but I doubt that the product will be acceptable to everyone even ad referendum. I think that its language can be left open for a while.

9. Incidentally, Acheson thinks that the Senate in approving the treaty might possibly attach a reservation requiring Senate advice and consent for the accession of any states under Article 9. This is one of the reasons why he is inclined to favour Italy as an original signatory. Ends.

Following from Reid. North Atlantic Treaty. Article 5.

1. I am sending you today by air bag a memorandum by the Legal Adviser on the "Nature of the Pledge."†

2. The Legal Adviser, in this memorandum, has drawn attention to the fact that the change in Article 5 from "as may be necessary" to "as it deems necessary" does a good deal more than make explicit what had been implicit.

3. In the earlier draft, each signatory was pledged to take whatever action a reasonable man would say was necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area. Each signatory was of course the sole judge of what a reasonable man would say.

4. Under the new language, each signatory is pledged to take only such action as it deems necessary. The United States therefore, could, without violating its legal obligation under the Treaty, decide that, even in the event of an all-out military attack against France, it deems it necessary to take only diplomatic sanctions. Such a decision on the part of the United States would be a violation of the spirit of the Treaty, but it would not be a violation of the letter of the Treaty.

5. Our worry is that this interpretation of the language of Article 5 may be given in the course of debate in the United States Senate. An acceptance of this interpretation would greatly weaken the deterrent effect of the Treaty.

6. I should be grateful if you would discuss this matter informally with the State Department, pointing out that the explanation of the amendment which Mr. Acheson gave at the meeting on February 25 was that the amendment merely made explicit what had been implicit; but that in the opinion of our legal adviser the amendment goes a good deal further than this. If the United States Senators did not intend this to be the effect of the amendment, perhaps they would be willing to consider alternative language which would accomplish what they had in mind.

7. My immediately following telegram† contains extracts from the legal adviser's memorandum of March 3. Ends.

Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: Your messages EX-587 and 588† of March 4th, North Atlantic Treaty.

1. The present language of paragraph 1 of Article 5 was accepted at yesterday morning's meeting, all the representatives, including myself, having been so instructed by their Governments. I am not willing to re-open the matter even informally at the State Department unless I receive instructions from Mr. Pearson to do so. In any case there would be no hope of getting the language changed, as the modification which you criticize was the price of securing the support of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for the rest of the article.

2. Furthermore, I am not impressed by the importance of the considerations put forward in your message, especially by the contention that the change in language substitutes the judgment of each party for the opinion of a mythical "reasonable man". While I would have preferred the earlier language, I consider that the reasons advanced in your messages are not strong enough to justify re-opening the most difficult issue in the whole negotiation. If we brought the matter up formally at this late stage, we should either have to give way promptly or considerably delay and thereby endanger the whole project. Ends.

North Atlantic Treaty. Reference my immediately preceding teletypes.†

1. Early in yesterday's meeting Mr. Acheson raised the question whether the Treaty should be regarded as a regional arrangement in accordance with Chapter 8 of the Charter. I think I have had no instructions from you on this point, but I have myself always considered that the Treaty would not be technically a regional arrangement under Chapter 8 and that in references to its regional character the word "regional" was employed only in a broad geographic sense.

2. Mr. Acheson, however, said that he was satisfied that we should get into a great deal of trouble if we took the view that Chapter 8 did not apply to this Treaty. He has promised to distribute a legal memorandum setting forth the arguments, which I shall forward to you as soon as I receive it. This message is therefore a preliminary report only.

3. I spoke early in the discussion, pointing out that the second sentence of Article 53 seemed to give the Security Council a veto on any enforcement action taken by a regional body under Chapter 8. I said that I always assumed that we were working under Article 51 in Chapter 7, and not under Chapter 8. While "enforcement action" could scarcely be regarded as action taken by the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty to resist an armed attack, it nevertheless might be considered as covering whatever they might do to combat indirect aggression, such as a policy agreed upon after consultation under Article 4 of the Treaty.

4. Franks also expressed concern at the views of the State Department and quoted from messages from the Foreign Office which took the line that the primary purpose of arrangements under Chapter 8 was to deal with internal disputes inside a region, whereas Article 51 authorized collective resistance by a group of States to external aggression.

5. Acheson agreed with me when I said that the question seemed to centre round the interpretation of the words "but no enforcement action" in the second sentence of Article 53. He maintained that it would be improper to regard as enforcement action anything which might be achieved under the North Atlantic Treaty. He went on to explain that he had no intention of suggesting that a reference to Chapter 8 should be included in the Treaty, but that it was highly important that all the Governments should agree on what they would say when questions about Chapter 8 were asked in the course of public debate. He hoped that everyone would think in terms of both Article 51 and Chapter 8. This would involve acceptance of the more specific obligations towards the Security Council set forth in Article 54, although, of course, the Security Council would not be given any restricted information.

6. The other representatives took little part in this discussion. Van Kleffens and Bonnet seemed to be in general agreement with Acheson's opinion. It is important that we all do agree on what to say on this point before the text of the Treaty is made public. Ends.

PROPOSED NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

1. Attached is a revised draft text of the proposed North Atlantic Treaty approved by the Ambassadors' Group in Washington on March 7th. The draft has been submitted by the Group for the approval of the Governments now represented at the Washington talks—the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, Norway and Canada.

Time Table

2. The Ambassadors' Group has requested that these Governments instruct their representatives on any changes desired in the draft so that they may be considered at a meeting of the Ambassadors on Friday, March 11, and that Governments agree to sign the Treaty in this form subject to minor amendments. After the meeting on Friday it is proposed that the draft text approved at that meeting should be given to the Governments of Italy, Denmark, Iceland and Portugal with an intimation that they would be welcome as original signatories to the Treaty and could join in the final discussions if they wished.

3. On Monday, March 14th it is proposed that the United States Department of State would transmit the text for information to the Latin American Republics as partners with them in the Rio Treaty. It is also proposed that the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments should jointly transmit the text to other Commonwealth countries at the same time.

4. It is proposed that the text would be simultaneously released to the press in the capitals concerned at an hour yet to be settled on Tuesday, March 15th. On that day it has been suggested that a Resolution with the draft text of the Treaty appended should be introduced in the House of Commons. This should be possible between 3:00 and 4:00 p.m.

5. After publication of the text it has been suggested that an interval be allowed for public discussion. It has been agreed in the Ambassadors' Group that it might be possible to set April 4th as the target date for signature of the Treaty. This maybe optimistic but it is thought that the final conference, to be attended by representatives of Ministerial rank, might commence on that date. The final conference will give an opportunity for discussion of the Treaty and possible final amendments.

Draft Text of the Treaty

6. The chief changes in the present draft text from that submitted to Cabinet in the memorandum dated February 16,[†] are as follows:

Article 2

As the result of representations by the Canadian Government this Article, which deals with economic collaboration, has been substantially strengthened.

Article 5

The main change in this Article results from the substitution of the words "as it deems necessary" for the words "as may be necessary" in the final clause of the Article. The United States introduced this change at the request of members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as they maintained that in practice each party was bound to determine for itself the scale of assistance which it should contribute to meet the threat of any particular armed attack. Other minor changes have been made in the draft of the Article.

Article 11

This Article contains a new provision that the Treaty "shall be ratified and carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes". Provision for the review of the Treaty at the end of ten years has been introduced as the result of representations by the Canadian Government.

Other Articles

Minor drafting amendments have been made in the remaining Articles of the Treaty.

Preamble

The present draft of the Preamble is not as firm as the drafts of the Articles.

Draft Text

CONSOLIDATION OF ARTICLES OF THE DRAFT NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY
(AS OF MARCH 7, 1949)

Preamble

The States parties to this Treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter.

They are determined to safeguard the freedom and the common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on democratic principles, on the rule of law between nations, and on fundamental freedoms for all within nations.

They desire to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area.

They are resolved to unite their efforts for the preservation of peace and security.

They therefore agree to the following articles:

Article 1

The parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Article 2

The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

Article 3

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist aggression.

Article 4

The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened.

Article 5

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action, including the use of armed force, as it deems necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Article 6

For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America; on the Algerian Departments of France; on the occupation forces of any party in Europe; on the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer, or on the vessels or aircraft of any of the parties in this area.

Article 7

This Treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 8

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the parties or any third State is in conflict with the provisions of this Treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this Treaty.

Article 9

The parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to deal with matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense Committee which shall recommend measures for implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

Article 10

The parties may, by unanimous agreement, invite any other European State in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area to accede to this Treaty. Any State so invited may become a party to the Treaty by depositing its Instrument of Accession with the Government of the United States of America. The Government of the United States of America will inform each of the parties of the deposit of each such Instrument of Accession.

Article 11

This Treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

The Instruments of Ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the United States Government. It shall enter into force between the States which have ratified it as soon as the ratifications of the majority of the signatories, including Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been deposited and shall come into effect with respect to other States on the date of the deposit of their ratifications.

After the Treaty has been in force for ten years, or at any time thereafter, the parties shall, if any of them so request, consult together for the purpose of reviewing this Treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the North Atlantic area, including the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

After this Treaty has been in force for twenty years, any party may cease to be a party one year after its Notice of Denunciation has been given to the United States Government.

The United States Government shall inform the Governments of the other parties of the deposit of each Instrument of Ratification and each Notice of Denunciation.

In witness whereof the undersigned Plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty and affixed thereto their seals.

Done at Washington this Day of March, 1949, in English and French, each text being equally authentic, the original of which shall be deposited in the archives of the United States Government and of which certified copies shall be transmitted by that Government to each of the other signatories.

COMMENTARY ON ARTICLES OF DRAFT NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I shall outline below, for your convenience in reporting to Cabinet, some comments on recent changes in the Articles of the draft Treaty.

Article 1

The phraseology in this Article borrows heavily from the United Nations Charter. This Article will be most useful in meeting the Communist criticism that the Treaty is aggressive in character.

Article 2

The first sentence of this Article borrows language from Article 55 of the Charter. The remainder of the Article is adapted from Canadian proposals. In the Washington Working Group we received the support of the representatives of the United Kingdom, France and the Benelux countries, to whom we had made representations for a stronger Article. This Article is perhaps as strong as we can secure in view of the preference of the United States Foreign Relations Committee for the exclusion of any Article dealing with economic and social collaboration.

Article 3

As formerly drafted, this Article contained the phrase "will use every endeavour" immediately following "the parties." As the majority of the representatives in Washington felt that the phrase "will use every endeavour" weakened the Article, the Article was rewritten to eliminate all reference to "endeavour." This Article is designed to permit mutual aid among the signatories in peacetime, and will be the basis for the forthcoming United States Military Aid Programme which will be considered shortly by Congress.

Article 4

There has been no change in this Article recently, and none of the representatives in Washington have raised any objection to the present wording. This is the farthest it proved possible to go to cover the question of indirect aggression.

Article 5

The changes in this Article are outlined in the Cabinet Memorandum of March 9th. At the request of the Canadian representative, the words "they agree" were inserted after "and consequently." The second paragraph of former Article 6 was incorporated into Article 5.

The European representatives have, of course, continued to press for a stronger Article 5 which would commit the United States automatically to come to their aid should any of the signatories be attacked. In particular, the European representatives have pressed for a return to the words "as may be necessary" instead of "as it deems necessary." The Senate Foreign Relations Committee considered that the real meaning of this phrase would be debated in the Senate and that, consequently, it would be preferable to have the real meaning clearly expressed initially. In accordance with the instructions approved by Cabinet on December 1, the Canadian representative has throughout the discussions favoured a pledge as strong as that in the Brussels Treaty where each party agrees to come to the assistance of the others with "all the military and other aid and assistance in their power." The pledge, however, is now as strong as can be secured from the United States. Thus, while an attack against one is an attack against all, it is left for each party to decide on the scale and nature of assistance which might be given to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area, a procedure which was followed in the last War. While there is no automatic commitment to declare war, there is a clear obligation to take action to assist the party attacked on a scale equal to the threat.

Article 6

This Article was formerly Article 5 bis defining the area. The area now specifically includes Algeria. During the discussions it was agreed that "occupation forces" would cover British and American troops in Trieste but would not cover them in Greece. The British representative proposed that the words "armed forces" should be substituted for "occupation forces" in order that British troops in Greece would not be specifically excluded. The Canadian representative resisted this change on the grounds that Greece should not be brought within the possible operation of the pledge. The British representative then dropped his proposal but asked that governments avoid, if possible, any public statement when the Treaty is under debate that British troops in Greece are excluded from the pledge. At the next Ambassadors' Meeting the minutes will be used as a record for future use of some of the important understandings about the meaning of the Treaty which have been accepted in the course of the negotiations. It is the intention of the Canadian Ambassador to record in the minutes the understanding that the Canadian Arctic islands and the islands adjacent to the West Coast are included in the phrase "North America."

Article 7

This Article was formerly Article 6. As some of the parties may not be members of the United Nations they would not have obligations under the Charter. The Article has been re-worded to make it clear that the obligations of the Article are binding on members of the United Nations only.

Article 8

This Article was formerly Article 7. The phrase "undertakes not to enter into any international engagements in conflict with this Treaty" was inserted following the suggestion of the Canadian representative.

Article 9

This Article (formerly Article 8) is now acceptable to all the representatives participating in the Washington discussions. The French representative, recently supported by the Norwegians, had advocated the insertion of "and prepare plans" after "recommend measures" but this phrase was unacceptable to the United States military authorities.

Article 10

This Article (formerly Article 9) has been substantially modified. Unanimous agreement is now required before any other European state (which must be "in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area") can be invited to accede. It has been decided by the Ambassadors' Group that the locale of the conference should be the United States.

Article 11

This Article (formerly Article 10) has also been substantially altered. The Treaty will not come into force until the majority of signatories, including Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have ratified it. On the suggestion of the Canadian representative, provision was made for equally authentic texts in French and in English.

Joint Declaration

The Canadian draft of the Joint Declaration (a copy of which is attached for your convenience†) which is in the hands of Mr. Wrong, is under consideration by the Working Group. It has been suggested by the Washington Group that it should not be made public until the final conference.

Participating Countries

The United States State Department on March 8th gave a brief oral message to the Italian, Danish and Portuguese Ambassadors and the Minister of Iceland, telling them that their countries would be cordially welcomed as signatories. It appears certain that Italy and Denmark will accept the invitation. The response of Portugal and Iceland has been friendly but non-committal. The Irish have ruled themselves out by their reply to the first informal approach.

I understand that you wish to bring to the attention of Mr. [George] Drew, Mr. [M.J.] Coldwell and Mr. [Solon] Low [leaders of the opposition parties] the draft Treaty as it now stands and, to effect this, letters have been prepared for your signature. You may wish to inform Cabinet of this decision.

I attach an annex giving the outstanding drafting changes suggested to Mr. Wrong.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

[ANNEX]

SECRET

OUTSTANDING DRAFTING CHANGES SUGGESTED TO MR. WRONG

We have suggested to Mr. Wrong that he might put forward at the next meeting of Ambassadors the following drafting amendments.

Article 5 paragraph 1

(1) It should be suggested that as a matter of drafting the word "as" is necessary after "considered."

(2) It might be argued that as not all of the parties are members of the United Nations, it would be incorrect to refer to all the parities exercising the right of self-defence recognized under Article 51. It might, however, be argued that the Charter merely recognizes an inherent international right, possessed by all States whether members of the United Nations or not.

Article 5 paragraph 2

While we recognize an advantage in placing the reference to the Security Council immediately after the pledge we have suggested that it should not form part of the same Article. The second paragraph should become a separate Article, "Article 6" which would start "any armed attack requiring action under Article 5." The pledge is so important that it would be preferable if it stood by itself. In addition, if each Article consisted of only one paragraph reference to the provisions of the Treaty would be simplified.

Article 6

(1) The punctuation should be improved. It is doubtful whether grammatically the words "include an armed attack" can govern the phrases after the semi-colons. The semi-colons might be changed to commas and a comma added after "tropic of Cancer."

Article 7

A comma is required after "affecting."

Article 9

We would doubt the wisdom or necessity of depriving the "Council" of its capital and would prefer to see it dignified by the wording "hereby establish the North Atlantic Council," particularly as it will probably be given that name in practice.

Article 11

We feel it would be desirable to split this present unwieldy Article. The following might be an acceptable method of making the split:

(1) The first two paragraphs should become a "one paragraph" article on ratification and coming into force, the words "which will notify all the other signatory states of each deposit", being added at the end of the second sentence.

(2) The third paragraph should become an Article on review of the Treaty.

(3) The next two paragraphs should become a "one paragraph" article on duration and denunciation. The second sentence should be amended by deleting "of each instrument of ratification and."

(4) In place of the last two paragraphs, the following should be substituted:

(a) A final Article: "This treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to the Governments of the other signatory states."

(b) A final clause: "In witness whereof, the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty. Done at Washington, the ____ day of March, 1949."

NORTH ATLANTIC PACT; DRAFT TREATY; PROCEDURE

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 8th, submitted the draft text of the North Atlantic Pact as approved by the Ambassadors' group on March 7th and outlined the timetable proposed for a final conference and signature.

The text as now submitted differed only slightly from the draft considered by the Cabinet on February 16th last:

As a result of representations by the Canadian government, Article 2 dealing with economic collaboration had been substantially strengthened. The principal change in Article 5 dealing with military assistance was the substitution of the words "as it deems necessary" for "as may be necessary" in the final clause. This change had been introduced by the United States at the request of members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The object was to make it clear that, in practice, each party was bound to determine for itself the scale of assistance which it should contribute to meet the threat of any particular armed attack. Article 11 contained a provision that the Treaty "shall be ratified and carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes". A further provision allowed for review of the Treaty at the end of ten years. This had been introduced as a result of representations by the Canadian government.

Participating governments were asked to communicate any changes desired in the draft for consideration by the Ambassadors' group on March 11th. The draft text as approved at that meeting would then be communicated to the governments of Italy, Denmark, Iceland and Portugal, with an invitation to join in the final discussions and to become original signatories to the Treaty if they so wished.

It was also proposed that on March 14th the United States should transmit the text for information to the Latin American republics and that the U.K. and Canadian governments should jointly communicate the text to other Commonwealth countries.

If this timetable were adhered to, the text would be simultaneously released to the press in the capitals concerned at a time to be settled, on Tuesday, March 15th. April 4th had been set in the Ambassadors' group as the target date for the final conference leading to the signature of the Treaty.

An explanatory memorandum and copies of the draft text of the Treaty had been circulated to all Ministers.

(Minister's memorandum, Mar. 9, and attached consolidation of Articles of the draft North Atlantic Treaty as of Mar. 7, 1949—Cabinet Document 911).

8. The Prime Minister observed that, under the Treaty, Canada would forego her right to remain neutral in the event of an attack on any one of the participating nations.

By Article 11, however, each country's "constitutional processes" were safeguarded and it would be the policy of this government, except in circumstances making such action impracticable, to summon and consult Parliament before a declaration of war was made. Furthermore, the extent and nature of Canadian participation in any hostilities would remain a matter for decision by Parliament.

9. Mr. Pearson submitted the text of a draft resolution approving Canadian support for the Treaty. It was proposed that such a resolution would be introduced in the House of Commons on Tuesday next when the draft text of the Treaty was made public.

Meantime, copies of the draft resolution and text would be communicated to leaders of other parties without delay.

10. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the government approve the draft text of the North Atlantic Treaty as approved by the meeting of Ambassadors on March 7th and submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs;

(b) that the procedure reported by the Minister for invitations to the governments of Italy, Denmark, Iceland and Portugal to sign the Treaty and for publication of the text after prior notification to Latin American and Commonwealth governments be approved;

(c) that the Canadian Ambassador be instructed to so inform the U.S. government and representatives of other governments participating in the Washington discussions;

(d) that the procedures recommended by the Minister for communicating the draft text to leaders of other parties and for the introduction in Parliament of a resolution along the lines of that submitted (approving Canadian support for the Treaty), with certain amendments, be approved;

(e) that Canadian representation at the proposed conference for conclusion and signature of the Treaty include representatives of all parties if that was deemed advisable following discussion of the Treaty in Parliament; and,

(f) that, with respect to Article 11, an appropriate statement be made in Parliament to the effect that, as a matter of government policy, except in the event of an attack on Canadian territory (or other circumstances in which such action was impracticable), Parliament would be summoned and consulted before a declaration of war was made in discharge of Canadian obligations under the Treaty.

TELEGRAM EX-636

Ottawa, March 10, 1949

TOP SECRET

Following from Reid, begins: North Atlantic Treaty.

1. I had a word with Mr. Pearson after this morning's Cabinet meeting and he has asked me to tell you that the Government has today approved of the draft text of the Treaty.

2. We will be sending you some teletypes later today in answer to various messages from you. In the meantime, Mr. Pearson has asked me to reply to your WA-641† and 646† on the preamble. He feels that the preamble is now very considerably improved. The only amendment he has to suggest is in the first paragraph. He does not like the states party to the Treaty desiring to live in peace with all governments. He urges the deletion of "and all governments", or, failing that, the substitution of "nations" for "governments".

3. The other point he has asked me to make to you right away relates to the outstanding drafting change which we have suggested to you and which you have not yet been able to secure. Mr. Pearson is impatient with the suggestion reported in the last paragraph of your WA-643† that the question of breaking up Article 11 and all matters of punctuation would be left open for further consideration some time before the Treaty is signed. He thinks that these drafting matters should be cleared up right away and cannot understand why they cannot be cleared up at your meeting tomorrow.

4. I have gone over with him again these drafting amendments and for your convenience I list them below:

(1) Article 5, paragraph 1. The word "as" should be added after "considered", unless there are good reasons to the contrary. There is an "as" in the Rio Treaty.

(2) Article 6. The semi-colons should be changed to commas and a comma added after "Tropic of Cancer".

(3) Article 7. A comma should be added after "affecting", or a comma removed after "affect".

(4) Article 9. Since Mr. Pearson understands that there is some objection on the part of the United States to "North Atlantic Council", he is willing, if this is so, not to press this proposal, but he does consider it absurd that "council" should not be given a capital "C".

(5) Article 11. This unwieldy and clumsy article should be split as follows:

(a) The first two paragraphs should become a "one paragraph" article on ratification and coming into force, the words "which will notify all the other signatory states of each deposit", being added at the end of the second sentence.

(b) The third paragraph should become an Article on review of the Treaty.

(c) The next two paragraphs should become a "one paragraph" article on duration and denunciation. The second sentence should be amended by deleting "of each instrument of ratification and."

(d) In place of the last two paragraphs the following should be substituted:

(i) A final Article: "This treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to the Governments of the other signatory states."

(ii) A final clause: "In witness whereof, the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty. Done at Washington, the ___ day of April, 1949".

6. Mr. Pearson can see no reason why the representatives at the meeting tomorrow should not be willing to accept these proposals for improving the drafting of Article 11. If, however, you cannot get the proposals on Article 11 accepted in toto, we trust that you will at least be able to get the last two paragraphs rewritten as we have suggested. The last paragraph in its present form is really hopelessly clumsy. What does "the original of which" relate to? And the "of which" in the reference later to "of which certified copies"?

7. I note one inconsistency in capitalization which might as well be cleared up. I see that you have adopted the rule that "state" should not be capitalized. This was the rule adopted by the Coordination Committee at San Francisco, so naturally I agree. However, in Article 8 a capital has crept in.

8. Sometimes the term "United States Government" is used; sometimes "Government of the United States".

9. It seems to me that a useful precedent has been set by the ready acceptance of the drafting changes proposed by the United States Senators and that it would be only courteous for the United States at least to be willing to support our drafting proposals. Ends.

SECRET

Reference my telegram No. 30 of March 10th† regarding North Atlantic Treaty.

I delivered your letter to MacBride yesterday and had one half hour with him.

2. A short account of the interview, to be transmitted by despatch, follows:

(a) MacBride was cordial throughout and asked me to thank you for replying at length.

(b) He said he fully understood Canada's view and gave no sign of any disappointment or annoyance with any part of your letter.

(c) As regards penultimate paragraph of your letter, he fully appreciates force of your argument. As Minister for External Affairs, he would like to sign the Treaty, but as a realist he said he must face the fact that Government would fall if it announced its willingness to join the Pact before any progress was made in ending partition.

(d) Mr. MacBride in conclusion said he may raise this question with you again. He would only do so if he thought there was some prospect of success for Canadian intervention. Though he was not specific, my impression from what he said is that he is considering or has already made an informal personal approach to some member of the United Kingdom Government. MacBride seems to think that United Kingdom Government may be favourably disposed towards discussing a solution of partition with Irish Government but would find it easier to do so if Canada took initiative in raising it. If as a result of his inquiries he finds this to be the case, he will no doubt endeavour to enlist your good offices.

TELEGRAM WA-666

Washington, March 11, 1949

TOP SECRET

North Atlantic Treaty.

In this and my immediately following teletypes I shall report on the Ambassadors' meeting this afternoon, which lasted from 3.00 o'clock to 5.30.

The agenda, as I told you in a previous message, was:

- (a) The timetable
- (b) The text
- (c) Invitations to other Governments
- (d) The interpretive notes to be inserted in the records, and
- (e) The question of taking the initiative in bringing the Treaty before the Security Council.

I. Timetable and Procedure

1. Insofar as procedure is concerned, every representative except the United Kingdom Ambassador had word that it would be satisfactory to have the Treaty signed in Washington. The United Kingdom Ambassador saw no possibility that there would be any objection to this on the part of his Government.

2. In my WA-655 of March 10th,† I referred to the problem which had arisen in the timetable as a result of the delays in France in Cabinet approval of the text. No further information on this was before the meeting today. The Secretary of State said that he considered we were in a rather serious predicament as he felt sure that the text would find its way into print, thus giving rise to speculation as to its accuracy and the general necessity of sparring with press representatives. The French Ambassador regretted the delay on the Government's part. He said that he anticipates no difficulties at all and that at its meeting Wednesday next the French Cabinet will approve the text. He could not, of course, give complete assurances. He undertook to make every effort to get his Government's decision by Wednesday evening.

3. Mr. Acheson urged Mr. Bonnet to do this and said that in the circumstances the best that we could hope for would be to get French approval Wednesday in the afternoon, transmit the text to other Governments, as decided upon previously, Wednesday night, and to publish Friday morning. It was agreed that this was the most optimistic timetable that we could hope to carry out. (One of the causes of the delay in the meeting of the French Cabinet is the meeting of Brussels Pact Foreign Ministers in London on Monday and Tuesday. This meeting has been on the cards for some time and cannot now be cancelled).

4. I am sending you a separate message‡ on the hour of release on Friday.

II. Invitations to Other Governments and Communication of Text to Them

1. The French Ambassador suggested that the change in timetable resulting from the delay of the French Government's approval might partly be compensated for by communicating the text to other Governments earlier than had at first been envisaged. Sir Oliver Franks, however, said that his instructions in this were clear and that the United Kingdom Government did not (repeat not) want the text to be given to any other Government until the eight presently negotiating Governments had made up their minds on it. He thought that it would be particularly unfortunate if the text were to be communicated with a rider that one of the eight had not yet approved.

III. The Question of Taking the Initiative in Bringing the Treaty Before the Security Council

Mr. Acheson brought up the question of taking the initiative in bringing the Treaty before the Security Council. There was very little discussion on this point and every representative agreed that it would be unwise, particularly on the grounds of qui s'excuse s'accuse. Ends.

TOP SECRET

North Atlantic Treaty. Your EX-636 of March 10th.

1. At the Ambassadors' meeting this afternoon no changes were made in the text of the Treaty except those proposed by me. I said that the Canadian Cabinet had approved the text, but that we thought that certain minor textual corrections ought to be made before the Treaty was published and asked the meeting to take them up at that point. This was not very popular, but they agreed to do so. The following are the changes approved:

(a) Because of French opposition I could not secure the elimination from the first paragraph of the preamble of the words "and all Governments". Instead, it was agreed to eliminate the word "States" at the beginning, so that it now reads "the parties to this Treaty etc." That change gives consistent usage throughout and makes the parties, rather than the States, re-affirm, be determined, and so on.

(b) Article 5. No one else agreed that "as" was required after "considered" in line 3, and I did not press the point.

(c) Article 6. The three semi-colons in lines 4, 5, and 6 were changed to commas. I did not propose adding a comma after "Tropic of Cancer", since its elimination ensures that the last two phrases are read together and apply to the same area.

(d) A comma was added "affecting" in line 2.

(e) Article 8. The capital was removed from the word "State".

(f) Article 9. There was resistance to capitalizing the word "Council", so I did not press the point.

(g) Article 11. To my surprise, I secured reluctant consent to breaking this Article into four on the lines of your proposal, but with some minor textual changes. The last four Articles therefore now read as follows:

Article 11

This Treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the Government of the United States of America, which will notify all the other signatories of each deposit. The Treaty shall enter into force between the States which have ratified it as soon as the ratifications of the majority of the signatories, including the ratifications of Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been deposited and shall come into effect with respect to other States on the date of the deposit of their ratifications.

Article 12

After the Treaty has been in force for ten years, or at any time thereafter, the parties shall, if any of them so request, consult together for the purpose of reviewing the Treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the North Atlantic area, including the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 13

After the Treaty has been in force for twenty years, any party may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the Government of the United States of America, which will inform the Governments of the other parties of the deposit of each notice of denunciation.

Article 14

This Treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to the Governments of the other signatories.

In witness whereof, the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty. Done at Washington, the day of April, 1949.

2. The only other demand for a textual change was made by the Norwegians, on instructions from Oslo. They are perturbed lest Article 1 should be regarded as inconsistent with their reply of March 3rd in which they refused the Soviet proposal for a non-aggression Treaty and wanted the Article either deleted or transferred to the preamble. Everyone expressed sympathy with the situation in which the Norwegian Government was placed, both in these negotiations and because of the pressure on them from Moscow, but everyone also strongly resisted the making of such a change. I need not repeat the discussion. At the end of it, the Norwegian representative undertook to report the views to his Government.

3. The status of the approval of the text by the various Governments is as follows:

The Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg have approved the Articles, but may not have approved the preamble. The French have not completed their approval, but Bonnet thinks there will be no difficulties at next Wednesday's Cabinet meeting.

The British Cabinet has approved the text, but will want to look at it again with the minor changes incorporated this week. The Norwegians have approved, except for the point made at today's meeting.

The text can therefore now be regarded as almost final, and everyone hopes that no Government will ask for any changes, except perhaps on trifling points, before the Treaty is signed. Ends.

1. The following are the principal points on which I am awaiting your instructions or would welcome your views by early next week. There will probably be an Ambassadors' meeting on Tuesday afternoon, at which all these points may arise.

(a) The application of Chapter 8 of the Charter to the Treaty.

(b) The range of hours within which you would agree to the publication of the text on March 18th.

(c) Any suggestions about procedure at the meeting before signature. April 4th is the day before the Assembly convenes. I have taken the line that we should not plan to have the Treaty signed on that day, as we may require a conference of two or three days. Several Foreign Ministers will be attending the Assembly.

(d) The importance which you attach to an agreed interpretation of Article 6. The State Department says that they are in difficulties over this and that they doubt they can consent to splitting the Aleutians. The others are awaiting instructions on my proposal.

2. In addition, of course, if you disagree with any of the recommendations which I have sent to you as a result of today's meeting, I shall require your instructions. Ends.

North Atlantic Treaty.

The Working Group met this afternoon and went over the English text. There were very few changes made, which I shall indicate below in the order of the articles which were affected.

Article 3. The United Kingdom proposal that the word "aggression" should be changed to read "armed attack" was put forward. Stone registered disagreement and the discussion was indecisive. The view was expressed that it might limit the field, but it was also pointed out that the real consultation article is Article 4, and it was thought that any limitation imposed by the substitution suggested in Article 3 would be covered by the words "political independence or security" in Article 4.

Article 6. Delete the capitals in the words "departments" and "islands", substituting small letters.

Article 12. For "request" substitute "requests".

Article 13. Delete the capital in the second "party" (cease to be a party) and substitute a small p.

In the agreed interpretations the following changes were suggested in the Working Group.

Paragraph 4. Delete paragraph (b) on the grounds that paragraph (a) adequately provides that an attack against Algeria must be an attack by a Foreign State to come under the Treaty. (c) then becomes paragraph (b) of No. 4.

The French representative on the Working Group reported that Paris was not happy about Interpretation 5. The inclusion of this interpretation in the minutes, as you know, is to meet the desire of the State Department to have assurances about the United Kingdom-Soviet and French-Soviet Treaties. The French objections were not strong and in all probability assurances that these treaties would not in any way interfere with the North Atlantic Treaty will be read into the minutes.

Interpretation 6 has been added to meet the French views in the following form:

"6. The Council, as Article 9 specifically states, is established "to consider matters concerning the implementation of the Treaty" and is empowered "to set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary". This is a broad rather than specific definition of functions and is not intended to exclude the performance at appropriate levels in the organization of such planning for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5 or other functions as the parties may agree to be necessary."

The words "for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5" after the words "of such planning" have not been fully cleared in the State Department, but Hickerson anticipated no difficulty. Ends.

TELEGRAM EX-677

Ottawa, March 14, 1949

TOP SECRET

Your WA-626 of March 8 and your WA-658 of March 10th.† North Atlantic Treaty.

I am dividing this telegram into two parts: the first will deal with the legal aspects of the Treaty in relation to the Charter of the United Nations; the second part will deal with the political aspects of this problem.

2. My views may be summarized as follows, viz., that the political arguments in Part II over-ride the legal arguments in Part I. If, however, you are unable to obtain the acceptance of my arguments contained in Part II, then you should press for an addition to the minutes along the lines of paragraph (5) of Part I of my message.

Part I

(1) From a legal point of view, I agree in large part with the legal position taken by the United States in this matter. It would be difficult to maintain successfully, and therefore perhaps unwise to maintain at all, that the proposed treaty does not in important respects contemplate a regional arrangement within the meaning of Chapter 8 of the Charter. Article 52 (1) defines "regional arrangements and agencies" in terms which seem clearly applicable to the arrangements and agencies contemplated under the new treaty.

(2) However, I think that, by clear intendment, the governing Article of the Charter is Article 51 and that nothing in Chapter 8 or elsewhere in the Charter impairs or restricts, or could be construed as impairing or restricting, the unqualified and inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs. In other words, reading the relevant sections together, there is no real difficulty with the second sentence of Article 53 (1). The authorization of the Security Council is not repeat not required in respect of individual or collective resistance to armed attack.

(3) The second sentence of Article 53 (1) must be read in the context of the first sentence which clearly refers to the enforcement of Security Council decisions. It might therefore be maintained that the authorization of the Security Council is only necessary for the enforcement of decisions taken by that body. However, even if it is given a broader interpretation, e.g., for the enforcement of the decisions of any body (including those of the regional agency), the fact remains that no power of executive decision is given to the Council under the draft treaty, so that no problem of "enforcement" could strictly speaking, arise. In any event, as has been said, the authorization of the Security Council would not repeat not be required in respect of actions taken by the signatories to render assistance to one or more of their number in the event of an armed attack.

(4) In my view, an obligation to keep the Security Council informed arises under Article 54. Presumably, periodic reports could and should be sent to the Security Council in respect of activities under the Treaty.

(5) If we cannot avoid recording the legal position in the minutes, then I think it is of the utmost importance to emphasize that, in the view of the signatories as recorded in the minutes, Article 51 is the over-riding provision and that Chapter 8 must be read and regarded as subject to Article 51. In this event, this thought ought to be added at the end of the paragraph suggested by the United States for inclusion in the minutes. The foregoing might serve to draw together to some extent the divergences of view at Washington.

(6) In this connection, Mr. Pasvolksy,¹¹ when he was being cross examined on the United Nations Charter on July 10, 1945, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, spoke as follows of Article 51, "The word 'collective' relates in part to the regional arrangements that I have just described, but it relates also to any group action that may be taken for purposes of self-defence." Therefore, in our view, regional arrangements can take collective defence measures under Article 51 without any authorization from the Security Council.

Part II

(1) While I think the views expressed in Part I represent a sound legal opinion, I am not at all satisfied that, at this stage, the Governments should attempt to justify the Treaty by reference to Chapter 8 of the Charter. We have, as you know, always studiously avoided reference to Chapter 8, and reference to it at this stage by way of explanation of the Treaty would only invite critics to take the view that we were somewhat lamely attempting to justify the Treaty in the light of Chapter 8 of the Charter.

(2) Furthermore, if we base the North Atlantic Treaty in part on Chapter 8, I would expect the Russian propaganda machine to tell the people of Western Europe that the United States does not mean anything by its pledge of assistance since the pledge will become effective only after the five permanent members of the Security Council vote in favour of enforcement action. They might thus explain that the United States had deliberately rendered the Treaty meaningless. On this side of the Atlantic, Russian propagandists might well take the line that the Treaty flouted the provisions of the Charter, since the parties ex post facto attempted to explain that the Treaty rested on Chapter 8 and that we were now merely trying to get out of our awkward position.

(3) If the United States could be persuaded of this view, I feel that we should stick to our original views, viz., that the Treaty rests squarely on Article 51 of the Charter.

3. My immediately succeeding telegram deals with your WA-676 of March 14th.†

I would prefer to have to agree to recording the legal views outlined in my immediately preceding message, rather than change the words in Article 3 to read "armed attack." This Article is designed in our view to deal with indirect aggression, e.g., if the French Government feared a coup d'état by the Communists, they could consult and presumably seek assistance under this Article. It would be difficult to see how this Article could be so used if the words "armed attack" are used instead of "aggression". Please resist this proposal strongly in the meeting this afternoon.

NORTH ATLANTIC PACT; PROCEDURE

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 10th, reported that the English and French texts of the Treaty had been accepted by all governments. Italy, Denmark, Iceland and Portugal would be invited to become original signatories. The text would be released at 11 a.m., E.S.T., on Friday, March 18th. Final arrangements for signature had not yet been made but it was expected that this would take place in Washington in the first days of April.

8. The Prime Minister suggested that notice of the resolution covering the North Atlantic Pact be given to the House the following day but that introduction of the resolution would have to be postponed until emergency legislation had been dealt with. This, in effect, would probably delay discussion until after March 26th or 27th.

It was further suggested that, when notice of this resolution was given to the House, a request be made that the text of the Treaty be included in Hansard as an appendix.

9. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the present position of the North Atlantic Treaty and approved the Prime Minister's suggestion of procedure to be followed when introducing the resolution in Parliament.

ITALY AND THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

As you know, the United States has issued an invitation to Italy on behalf of the Governments participating in the Washington discussions to be an original signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty.

It was agreed in the Washington Ambassadors' group that representatives of the countries participating might at the same time, if they saw fit, approach the Italian Foreign Office and indicate that their Government wholeheartedly welcomed Italian participation.

As Italy was inclined to the view that earlier opposition to her participation centred with Canada, the Canadian Ambassador in Italy was instructed on March 17 to approach the Foreign Office, stating that Canada associated itself enthusiastically with the other countries in the invitation extended to Italy. On March 18 this message was conveyed to the Italian Foreign Office by Mr. Desy.¹²

The State Department informed us today that the Portuguese have asked if they can have changes made in the text of the Treaty. Specifically, they want to change the duration from a minimum of twenty years to a minimum of ten. To avoid having to call a meeting of the Working Group, the State Department asked each Mission of the negotiating countries verbally to find out the answers to three questions on which the Portuguese want information:

(1) Would we object to the proposal to alter the term of the duration?

(2) Would we object if Portugal signed the Treaty with a reservation that its participation was for ten years instead of twenty?

(3) Would we consent to allow Portugal to adhere to the Treaty at a later date with the same reservation as in (2)?

2. The majority and probably all will unquestionably answer No. 1 in the negative. The objection to the second course is that it might start the Senate off on a series of reservations of its own. There is no indication of feeling on the third, but of course it would probably be best now to try to jockey Portugal into being an original signatory without reservations.

3. Would you please let me have your answers by Wednesday if possible.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, March 23, 1949

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I enclose ten copies of a memorandum dated March 23 entitled "Proposals by the Canadian Government for the revision of the March 18 Draft of the North Atlantic Treaty".

I should be grateful if you would immediately present a copy of this memorandum to the State Department and to the representatives in Washington of Belgium, France, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom and Norway. At your discretion, you may also give copies to the representatives in Washington of the other countries who have been invited to sign the Treaty—Denmark, Iceland and Portugal.

In transmitting the memorandum it might be useful if you were to emphasize that the purpose of all the proposals is to improve the drafting of the Treaty and not to change its substance in any way; we consider it important that, in view of the historic character of the Treaty, it should be as well drafted as possible in both French and English.

We have telegraphed the text of the memorandum to Canada House for transmission through Canada House to our Missions in the countries concerned so that they may present the memorandum direct to the governments.

Yours sincerely,

PROPOSALS BY THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT FOR THE REVISION OF THE MARCH 18TH DRAFT OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Part I

Drafting Changes in the English Text

Preamble

(1) In the second paragraph, the comma after the word "peoples" should be deleted as the word "founded" refers to "freedom, common heritage, etc."

(2) The phrase "in the North Atlantic area" in paragraph 3 should be deleted. No reference is made to the North Atlantic area in Article 2, where reference is made to "stability and well-being." In addition, it is felt that the Preamble should contain no limiting phrase of this kind.

(3) A full stop should be substituted for the colon at the end of the last paragraph of the Preamble.

(4) It is not altogether consistent to write the preamble in modern sentence form and at the same time to make each sentence a separate paragraph. It is suggested that the first four sentences should appear as one paragraph. This would improve the appearance of the Treaty.

Article 2

Substitute the words "foster the" for "contribute toward the further" in the first line of Article 2, the opening sentence then to read, "The Parties will foster the development...." It is felt that this would be an improvement over the present clumsy wording.

Article 5

(1) It is suggested that the semi-colon should be deleted after the word "all" in the opening clause.

(2) The words "in exercise of" in the clause "in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence" is bad English. It is suggested that it should either follow the Rio formula, which would read "in the exercise of" or better still, should have the word "exercising" substitute for the phrase.

Article 9

Delete the word “hereby” after “Parties”. The word adds nothing to the meaning of the text and there is no more need for it in this Article than in any other.

Article 10

In the last sentence, substitute the words “That Government” for “The Government of the United States of America.” There would seem to be no need to repeat the latter phrase in the context.

Article 11

In the second sentence, add the words “of America” after “the United States.” In the present text, this is the only reference to the United States without the full and correct title.

Article 12

Substitute “in the light of” for “having regard for.” This is what is actually meant by the phrase “having regard for the factors,” and would be an improvement on the present text.

Article 14

Substitute in the opening line, “The original of the Treaty” for “This Treaty.”

Part IIDrafting Changes in the French TextPreamble

The proposal to delete “in the North Atlantic area” from the English version would, of course, require the omission from the French version of “dans la région de l’Atlantique-Nord.” In addition there would seem to be no good reason why the French version of the preamble should not be written in the same simple form as the English version and why all but the last sentence should not be printed as one paragraph. It is therefore suggested that the French text of the preamble should read as follows:

En conséquence, elles se sont mises d’accord sur ce Traité de l’Atlantique-Nord”.

(1) In the first line, change “contribueront au” for “favoriseront le...”.

(2) Change “sur lesquels ces institutions sont fondées et en développant les...”, to “...qui sont à la base de ces institutions et en réalisant des...”.

Article 3

This article should read as follows:

“Afin d’atteindre d’une façon plus efficace les objectifs de ce Traité, les Parties, agissant séparément et conjointement, d’une manière continue et effective, par leurs propres moyens et en se prêtant mutuellement assistance, maintiendront et...”. The rest of the sentence stays as it is.

(“Séparément” and not “individuellement” is used in Article 56 of the Charter of the United Nations as the French equivalent of “separately.”)

Article 5

(1) At the end of the first paragraph change “rétablir et assurer” to “rétablir et maintenir” as at the end of the second paragraph. “Maintenir” is the word used in the Charter.

(2) In the first line of the second paragraph, “toute mesure prise” should be plural, as in the next sentence we have “Ces mesures...”.

Article 6

(1) “For the purpose of Article 5”, should be translated by “Au sens de l’article 5,” with a small “a” in “article”.

(2) Delete the word “quelconque” in the middle of the Article before “des Parties.”

Article 7

Substitute “Ce Traité”, for “Le présent Traité” at the beginning of the Article.

Article 8

(1) Change “du présent Traité” to “de ce Traité.”

(2) Insert “à” before “aucun engagement”.

Article 9

(1) The first sentence should read as follows:

“Les Parties établissent un conseil, où chacune d’elles sera représentée, afin de connaître des questions relatives à la mise en application de ce Traité”.

(2) The end of the last sentence should read: “...pour la mise en application des articles 3 et 5” instead of “pour l’application des Articles 3 et 5”.

Article 10

Delete the word “présent” before “Traité”.

Article 11

(1) In the third sentence, change “l’ont ratifié”, to “l’auront ratifié”, and insert “d’Amérique” after “Etats-Unis”.

(2) In the third sentence, “Pays Bas” and “Royaume Uni” should be hyphenated.

Article 12

This article should read as follows:

“Après que le Traité aura été en vigueur pendant dix ans, ou à toute date ultérieure, les Parties, à la demande de l’une d’elles, se consulteront en vue de sa révision, en prenant en considération les facteurs influant à ce moment sur la paix et la sécurité dans la région de l’Atlantique-Nord, y compris le développement des accords tant universels que régionaux conclus...” and the rest of the sentence stays as it is.

(The English word “arrangements” should be translated by “accords”, as in Article 52 of the Charter of the United Nations).

Article 13

Substitute “...pourra y mettre fin, en ce qui la concerne, un an après...”, for “...pourra mettre fin au Traité, en ce qui la concerne, un an après...”.

Article 14

The beginning of the sentence should read: “L’original de ce Traité,” instead of “Ce Traité.”.

Part III

1. It is generally recognized that the North Atlantic Treaty is providing a constitutional foundation for a North Atlantic community which already exists. Thus in his broadcast address of March 18, Mr. Acheson said:

“It is important to keep in mind that the really successful national and international institutions are those that recognize and express underlying realities. The North Atlantic community of nations is such a reality. It is based on the affinity and natural identity of interests of the North Atlantic Powers. The North Atlantic Treaty which will formally unite them is the product of at least three hundred and fifty years of history, perhaps more...North America and Western Europe have formed the two halves of what is in reality one community, and have maintained an abiding interest in each other.”

Similarly the sub-heading of the United States White Paper on the North Atlantic Treaty is “Collective defence and preservation of peace, security and freedom in the North Atlantic Community.”

2. Though, when explaining the treaty, it is necessary to use the term “North Atlantic Community,” this term does not appear in the Treaty. This seems unfortunate and could easily be remedied by beginning the preamble with the words “The nations of the North Atlantic Community, Parties to this treaty, reaffirm” etc. In French, this would be: “Les nations de la communauté de l’Atlantique-Nord, Parties de ce Traité, réaffirment...”

3. Similarly, in explaining the Treaty, it is necessary to give some short name to the Council established by Article 9, and it is obvious that the Council will in practice be called the “North Atlantic Council.” It is therefore suggested that Article 9 be revised by substituting “a North Atlantic Council” or, in French, “conseil de l’Atlantique-Nord” for “a council.”

1. I have just received by bag a letter from Reid enclosing a five-page memorandum of which he asks me to distribute copies to the State Department and the representatives of the countries which are expected to sign the North Atlantic Treaty. This memorandum proposes over thirty minor changes in the English and French texts. I have suggested several of these changes at meetings of the Ambassadors' Group and they have not been accepted by the others. I have furthermore stated, on instructions from Ottawa, that the Treaty, or at any rate its English text, was acceptable to the Canadian Government. I also think personally that some of the changes are not improvements.

2. I am most unwilling to attempt at this ultimate stage of the negotiations to put forward plans for further alterations in the text. I greatly doubt that the other parties to the negotiation will be prepared even to consider Reid's suggestions, and if we press for them they will only create an unpleasant atmosphere without producing results. I shall not do what Reid asks unless I hear directly that this is being done on Mr. Pearson's instructions.

3. I am marking this message most immediate because Reid's letter says that the text of the memorandum has been telegraphed to Canada House for transmission to Canadian missions in the countries concerned so that they may present it to the other governments. I urge that these instructions be countermanded. Ends.

1. I have not yet received a reply to my WA-834 of March 24th about Reid's suggested amendments to the North Atlantic Treaty. I have gone through them carefully again today and I recommend most strongly that they should all be dropped. There is a unanimous desire among the negotiators here to make no changes whatever in the published text. The possibility of change between publication and signature was left open only in case comment on the text should reveal important flaws which had previously escaped notice.

2. Reid's changes, trivial though they may be, would open up for discussion the preamble and nearly every article. It now looks as though all four of the countries invited to sign last week would accept the invitation. We should have to ask them to agree to any alterations in the text officially given them on March 17th, and this would certainly invite from them further suggestions for amendment.

3. Acheson also would not agree to some of the suggestions without consulting the Senate Committee. These would probably include the suggestions respecting Articles 2 and 12 and certainly those proposed in Part 3 of Reid's memorandum. He would flatly refuse to do this. Indeed, I am sure that the only result of pushing these proposals would be to create fruitless irritation and to put us in a very awkward position.

4. Will you please let me know what action has been taken on my WA-834, and particularly whether the distribution of the memorandum to the European Governments was prevented? Ends.

Following for Wrong from Heeneey, begins: Your WA-834 of March 24 and WA-856 of March 25. Canadian proposals for revision of the March 18 draft of the North Atlantic Treaty.

1. Reid's letter of March 23 was sent on the Minister's instructions. I discussed the matter with Mr. Pearson this morning and he has asked me to tell you that he fully intended that the drafting revisions contained in the letter of March 23 should be put before the other governments at once. On further consideration, however, he has decided to drop Part III of the memorandum. It is his desire that you should present a copy of the memorandum immediately (omitting Part III) to the State Department and to the representatives in Washington of Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway and the United Kingdom though not, repeat not, to the four countries which did not participate in the discussions—Denmark, Iceland, Italy and Portugal. The Minister feels that, apart from the proposals in Part III, all of the suggestions in the memorandum are for textual improvements which could reasonably be put forward and appropriately be dealt with at this time.

2. We have in fact already arranged though our representatives abroad to transmit the text of the memorandum to the Foreign Offices of Belgium, France, the Netherlands, Norway and the United Kingdom.

3. It is certainly not our desire or intention to embarrass Acheson in any way but we find it difficult to understand how any of the suggestions in Part I and Part II could do so. Nor indeed are these proposals which we intend to "push" in any way.

4. The Minister's intention is that you should do no more than circulate the memorandum as suggestions for improvements in the final draft. If the United States and other governments are unwilling to accept all or any of our suggestions we certainly have no intention of making an issue of any of these points.

5. It might be suggested that a deadline for the receipt of suggestions for changes in the text be now agreed, perhaps Wednesday the 30th.

6. A further study of our proposals in Parts I and II may well result in their proving acceptable to all. Of the dozen or so suggestions for changes in the English text, four improve the punctuation, one corrects the inconsistency of referring once in the Treaty to the United States without "of America" afterwards, one removes a grammatical error, one removes a bit of jargon, and another removes an inconsistency between the preamble and Article 2. Surely Mr. Acheson was not serious when he said that things like this had to be cleared with the Senate Committee.

7. Similarly, of the suggestions for changes in the French text, three correct errors where the Charter language was departed from, three remove the legal jargon of "présent" before "Treaty", one corrects the error of omitting "d'Amérique" after "Etats-Unis", and the others were suggested by Mayrand and [Marcel] Blais so that the French text would not give so strong an impression as it does now of being a translation from an English text. You will I think be interested to know (as indeed you have probably already gathered) that I have yet to see any public statement in the United States about the Atlantic Pact from which has been omitted reference to Article 2. Indeed, as we anticipated, Article 2 is being used constantly as one of the principal pillars supporting the view that the Treaty is not a military alliance of the old kind and that it is designed to encourage activities on the part of its signatories which lead away from and not towards war. Senators Vandenberg and Connally have both made emphatic references to Article 2, as has the Secretary of State, and I notice from the text of a radio broadcast (sent to you under cover of our despatch No. 718 of March 24th)† in which Jessup, Rusk, Dulles and Harkneys took part there are important references to it. I would refer you particularly to the bottom of page 7 of this text.

2. Without Article 2, or with an Article 2 in the meaningless form which we struggled against, there certainly would have been a serious link missing from the chain of arguments now being used in the United States to justify the Treaty.

North Atlantic Treaty.

The amendments contained in Parts I and II of the departmental memorandum dated 23rd March were considered at a special meeting of the Working Group which sat until after 6 p.m. yesterday afternoon. The discussion of the amendments began seriatim, but was interrupted before the preamble had been finished in order to consider the general principle of amending the Treaty at this time. Discussion of the individual amendments was then resumed.

2. The argument on the principle of amendment at this stage may be summarized as follows:

(a) It was thought that to make changes in the text now would hold out an inducement to the Portuguese and others to try to get other amendments made. Their amendments might be substantive. It was the consensus that nothing should be done to encourage suggestions for amendment from countries such as Portugal.

(b) It was recognized that the text published on 18th March was not unchangeable. At the same time, it had been the understanding before publication that a change would have to be "overwhelmingly good" to be worthy of acceptance after publication.

(c) The United Kingdom representatives felt that, if the Canadian proposals were accepted, the United Kingdom Government would feel free to suggest any changes it desired. It had previously refrained from making suggestions for changes for the reasons given in (a) and (b).

(d) The Danes have informed the Department of State that their Parliament has authorized not only signature, but ratification, of the Treaty in its present form. The process in Denmark is apparently such that the two steps are not separated. The Danes, in passing this information to the Department of State, said that they "earnestly hoped" no changes would be made before signature, and that any changes now would be "very embarrassing".

(e) The Norwegian Parliament is to take up the Treaty to-day. Its legislative procedure is somewhat similar to that of Denmark, and, if the debate ends favourably, as it is hoped it will, the Parliament will authorize both signature and ratification. Any changes made now would interfere with this process.

(f) Arrangements have been made in Belgium for the process of ratification to begin on 5th April. A change now would delay that process.

(g) While they were not urging this as a substantive reason for avoiding alterations if possible, the United States group said that the process of engrossing the Treaty in book-form was now almost complete. A change in any article would require that the work be begun again from the beginning.

3. It was agreed that, notwithstanding all these general arguments against amendment (and Stone argued the need to have so historic a document in as exact a form as possible), it was proper to review the proposed changes one by one and to see if any of them was so "overwhelmingly good" as to justify amending the text, starting the engrossing over again, and referring the changes back to Governments. I give below a summary of the sense of the meeting on each amendment:

Part I

Preamble (1). The omission of this comma had been debated earlier. One meeting spent as long as thirty minutes on it. Its inclusion or exclusion was considered to be a matter of opinion, and it was decided not to reverse the earlier decision. The amendment was therefore not accepted.

Preamble (2). This amendment was taken to be a matter of substance, rather than a drafting change. The sense of Article 2 is that "stability and well-being" are to be encouraged among any or all of the parties by the means set forth in the second sentence. The omission of the phrase "in the North Atlantic area" in the preamble would give the impression that stability and well-being were to be encouraged all over the world. The United States group could not accept such a change without reference to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The other groups were not in favour of the change, which was not accepted.

Preamble (3). This amendment was considered to be a matter of opinion. The Working Group did not feel that it could alter its previous decision in favour of a colon.

Preamble (4). All the other representatives preferred to have the sentences remain in separate paragraphs. They therefore rejected the amendment.

Article 2. The United States group would have to consult the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to make a change of this sort. The other members of the Working Group preferred the existing wording, and the change was not accepted. Article 5(1). Earlier the Working Group debated the change now suggested. The semicolon was left in as it was felt there should be a break in the sentence at this point. If the Article had to be done over again, a period would be used. No change was made because it was considered that Article 5 should not be touched for political reasons.

Article 5(2). The insertion of "the" was debated some months ago. The last sentence of the preceding note applies here also; the change would have to be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Article 9. The omission of "hereby" touched off a diversity of argument which showed that only the present wording would do. Some agreed that its omission would be good, but thought that the change was not necessary. Others thought a legal argument could be brought to show that the word was necessary. The French said that this Article was of so much concern that any change would have to be referred to Paris; Mr. Schuman sails to-day.

Article 10. The consensus was that, if the Treaty had to be changed for some more substantial point, this change should be made. It was considered that it was not worthwhile to re-engross the whole Treaty for this one change.

Article 11. "Of America" was deliberately omitted because all the countries in this list are shown by their informal names. If the change were made, the United Kingdom would want "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland", etc. This would make the sentence too clumsy. The United States group preferred to leave the two words out.

Article 12. The words "having regard for" are Mr. Acheson's own, and while this does not make them sacrosanct, it does make the United States group unwilling to rush to change them. There was general agreement that "in the light of" did not mean the same as "having regard for". If a change was to be made, the group would have preferred "taking into account", but did not consider the change worthwhile.

Article 14. The group did not agree with this. The Treaty is the document which will be signed and deposited in the Archives. All the rest are mere copies. The Treaty is therefore literally being deposited.

Part II

Preamble. The French group said that Paris insists on principles because they are regular Treaty form. The use of sentences would be unusual and cause comment. Also, the omission of "etat" would lead to feminine participles, which do not sound right.

Article 2(1). The present wording was considered by the Drafting Committee's Translation Sub-Committee to be an accurate translation of the corresponding English wording. The Working Group did not agree to change the translation.

Article 2. (2). The French group did not agree with the suggested change. Part of the new wording suggested was considered to show signs of Anglicization of French. The rest of the Working Group supported the French-speaking groups.

Article 3. The Working Group preferred the retention of the phrase "d'assurer la realisation des buts" to "d'atteindre les objectifs". "Buts" occurs several times in the Treaty in this sense. "Atteindre" was considered to be a weaker verb than "assurer". In addition, it was pointed out that it is not possible to "atteindre" something by degrees (i.e., "de facon plus efficace"); you reach it or you don't. The use of "separement" was considered earlier, but was rejected because it was considered to call for completely disjunctive action, whereas "individuellement" was thought to allow for co-operative action. The fact that "separement" was used in the Charter was not considered to be relevant in this case.

Article 5 (1). It was the opinion of the French legal advisers that "assurer" was a better translation of "maintain" than "maintenir", which is a weak word. The United States translation staff agreed on this.

Article 5 (2). "Toute" was preferred to the plural because it means "every", and was therefore stronger in sense. It was not considered that there was any confusion with the following phrase, "ces mesures".

Article 6 (1). The group did not agree with the change suggested. "Pour l'application" is the standard Treaty translation of "for the purpose of".

Article 6 (2). The word “quelconque” was held to be an exact translation of “any”.

Article 7. It was agreed a long time ago that the use of “present” in the French translation would be quite acceptable because “ce traite” sounds clumsy in certain contexts.

This decision could not be changed.

Article 8 (1). See Article 7.

Article 8 (2). The French group pointed out that, according to Larousse, “souscrire a” means to be in favour of something; “souscrire” alone means to sign. We have checked this with our Larousse and find it correct.

Article 9 (1). The French and Belgian groups reported that the use of “ou” in this sense was correct until 1560. Thereafter “auquel” became usual, and the French and Belgian groups would prefer to keep to the current usage. Article 9 (2). It was held that “pour la mise en application” would mean “for the organization of implementation” rather than “for the implementation”.

Article 10. See Article 7.

Article 11 (1). This matter was discussed at some length in the Translation Subcommittee, which came to the conclusion that it was a matter of preference. As “l'ont ratifié” seemed to imply more complete action, it was preferred. The Working Group would not reverse this decision.

Article 11 (2). This change has already been made. See my WA-808 of 22nd March.†

Article 12. If it were worthwhile to rewrite the Treaty for that purpose, the French Group would have been willing to change the position of “a la demande de l'une d'elles.” They would not accept “sa revision”, which would seem to imply the revision of one of the parties. “Influent” was considered to be less correct than “affectant”. “Accords” was considered to be a poor translation of “arrangements” in spite of the Charter.

Article 13. The group could not see sufficient merit in this change. It was incidentally pointed out that the existing wording, both English and French, was taken largely from the Brussels Treaty.

Article 14. See corresponding article in the English text.

2. The agreed interpretations, together with the introductory paragraph, are as follows.

“During the exploratory talks which resulted in the draft Treaty, agreement was reached on the meaning of certain phrases and articles. These agreements were not formal, but constituted the understanding of the representatives participating in the discussions as to the interpretation to those phrases and articles. The Committee reviewed those points of agreed interpretation, and instructed the Secretary to make note of them as follows:

(1) The participation of Italy in the North Atlantic Treaty has no effect upon the provisions of the Italian Peace Treaty.

(2) ‘Mutual aid’ under Article 3 means the contribution by each party, consistent with its geographic location and resources and with due regard to the requirements of economic recovery, of such mutual aid as it can reasonably be expected to contribute in the form in which it can most effectively furnish it, e.g., facilities, manpower, productive capacity or military equipment.

(3) Article 4 is applicable in the event of a threat in any part of the world, to the security of any of the parties, including a threat to the security of their overseas territories.

(4) (a) For the purposes of Article 6 the British and American forces in the Free Territory of Trieste are understood to be occupation forces.

(4) (b) The words 'North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer' in Article 6 mean the general area of the North Atlantic Ocean north of that line, including adjacent sea and air spaces between the territories covered by that article.

(5) With reference to Article 8, it is understood that no previous international engagements to which any of the participating States are parties would in any way interfere with the carrying out of their obligations under this Treaty.

(6) The Council, as Article 9 specifically states, is established 'to consider matters concerning the implementation of the Treaty' and is empowered 'to set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary'. This is a broad rather than specific definition of functions and is not intended to exclude the performance at appropriate levels in the organization of such planning for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5 or other functions as the parties may agree to be necessary.

(7) It is the common understanding that the primary purpose of this Treaty is to provide for the collective self-defense of the parties, as countries having common interests in the North Atlantic area, while reaffirming their existing obligations for the maintenance of peace and the settlement of disputes between them.

It is further understood that the parties will, in their public statements, stress this primary purpose, recognized and preserved by Article 51, rather than any specific connection with Chapter VIII or other articles of the United Nations Charter." Ends.

We have been informed that the United Kingdom was prepared to accept them provided none of the other Governments objected. Similarly, I was informed on March 29th that The Netherlands Government orally accepted our suggested amendments of the English text.

As Heeney explained to you in his EX-801 of March 25, I am not anxious to push our proposals if there are going to be real difficulties. If, therefore, views of the representatives in Washington are not modified by instructions from their respective Governments, you should withdraw our proposals. In doing so you

P.C. 1568

[Ottawa], March 31, 1949

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 30th March, 1949, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, submitting:

1. That representatives of the Canadian Government have been participating since last July in negotiations looking towards the preparation of a treaty for collective self-defence within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations;

2. That as a result of these negotiations a draft treaty for collective self-defence within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations was adopted, copy of which is annexed;†

3. That a Conference will be held early in April in Washington, D.C. (U.S.A.) for the purpose of completing the said draft treaty among the following states of the North Atlantic area—Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Norway, the United Kingdom and the United States and such other states as might by agreement become parties;

4. That the participation of Canada at the said Conference and the conclusion on behalf of Canada of a treaty for collective self-defence based on the annexed draft was approved by Resolution of the House of Commons on March 28, 1949, and of the Senate on March [31], 1949.

5. That it is expedient to make provision for the signature of the said treaty on behalf of Canada.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, advise that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Canadian Ambassador to the United States of America, or either of them, be authorized to sign in respect of Canada a treaty for collective self-defence along the lines of the annexed draft.¹⁴

[Ottawa], April 1, 1949

RE: DEFENCE ORGANIZATION UNDER NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

1. A short time ago Brigadier Clark, the Canadian Observer on the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee, submitted two tentative schemes for the defence organization to be set up under the Atlantic Treaty; one had been prepared by U.K. military authorities and the other by U.S. officers.

2. The U.K. scheme envisaged an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee with the United States in the chair, Western Union represented by France, the "Maritime States" by the United Kingdom, Scandinavia by a representative to be selected and North America by Canada. Regional defence committees would be established for Western Union, the Maritime States, Scandinavia and North America. The chain of responsibility was not made very clear and the P.J.B.D. was included as the regional organization for North America. (Attached is a chart showing the U.K. proposals).†

The U.S. scheme, so far as I can gather, was an emergency plan. It envisaged the Combined Chiefs of Staff as the effective planning body for the new Atlantic group.

3. Since we received these preliminary views, General Foulkes has prepared a paper of his own which he has submitted (on a purely personal basis) to General Gruenther (United States) and General Hollis (United Kingdom). Foulkes' scheme involves regional planning groups and what he calls "a strategic reserve group" which would consist solely of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The strategic reserve group would, in effect, be the new Combined Chiefs of Staff designed, primarily, as an acceptable and efficient planning body. It would supersede the old Combined Chiefs of Staff, while maintaining major U.S. and U.K. interests. (I attach a copy of Foulkes' memorandum, dated March 7th).

Hollis is not altogether unfavourable to Foulkes' proposals; he accepts the principle of regional grouping but criticizes the C.G.S.'s scheme principally on the ground that it gives the impression of holding back North Atlantic resources from effective defence planning for Western Europe.

4. Foulkes' proposals have been discussed in a preliminary way with Mr. Claxton and with Robertson and me. Mr. Claxton is aware that Foulkes has put them informally before the U.K. and U.S. staffs.

5. It is, as you know, proposed that, after the signing of the Treaty on Monday, the participating countries should establish a working group in Washington to prepare proposals for organization under the Council. No doubt defence organization will be considered by this working group. I am not at all clear as to the precise type of organization which would best serve Canadian interests but in the following paragraphs I attempt to set out some of the considerations which our representatives should have in mind.

(Incidentally, Foulkes tells me this morning, on his return from Washington, that the U.S. military authorities have reached no conclusion in their own preliminary thinking on this question. It will clearly be some months before any new organization can be agreed on—meantime, the Western Union organs will presumably carry on with U.S. and Canadian observers).

6. It would clearly be inappropriate and unwise for us to take a leading part in putting forward proposals for the form that defence organization might take under the Atlantic Treaty. It could indeed prove very embarrassing if we were to insist on any given scheme for our own representation and then find that we seriously disagreed with the criteria proposed by other countries for apportioning the burden in men, money or supplies.

7. It may be found necessary or advisable to establish an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee but the decision to do so involves at least two serious difficulties:

(a) presumably, there could be no less than six members of the Chiefs of Staff Committee; participation by some of the states whose representatives would attend would involve security problems;

(b) the United States in particular, and possibly the United Kingdom as well, would not be prepared, at this stage, to have overall plans made by an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff group.

There is some indication that the Americans might prefer not to set up an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee now but to employ an expanded Western Union organization to do the planning for defence in Europe. This it is felt would avoid the danger of U.S. and Canadian resources being planned on a joint basis by representatives of all the parties to the Atlantic Treaty.

8. If an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee is created, I believe that Canada should be a member. If we are not, we will be presented with settled joint plans which we will have had no opportunity of discussing in committee. The Canadian Government will naturally insist on determining the nature and extent of our contributions to North Atlantic defence. We would be in a better position to argue our case as members of the Chiefs of Staff Committee when plans are being formulated than, as "outsiders", to turn down or modify the recommendations of a committee upon which we were not represented.

9. You may have to discuss this whole matter with Mr. Bevin and Mr. Acheson in Washington. The Foreign Office and the State Department will have a better understanding of our political position than the representatives of the National Military Establishment and the officers of the U.K. Chiefs of Staff.

10. There is one more point which may be of some importance. If the Combined Chiefs of Staff is to be continued, I think it is important that we should keep our foot in the door as we have managed to do so far during the emergency planning.

I gather that the United Kingdom and the United States intend to shelve the emergency plan. This may be an indication that they now attach less importance to the continuance of the Combined Chiefs of Staff. On the other hand if they are faced with the prospect of an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee upon which all members are represented, they may decide to retain a Combined Chiefs for the really important planning. We should not press for an elaborate Atlantic organization upon which we would be fully represented only to find ourselves omitted altogether from basic United States—United Kingdom planning.

11. With respect to the actual Command Organization, in the event of an emergency I feel sure that we should do everything possible to avoid the position we found ourselves in in the last war when a Supreme Commander was named without our participation in the appointment and without any delegation of authority in advance on the part of Canada. Whatever happens I feel strongly that all the members of the Atlantic Pact should jointly confer authority on the Supreme Commanders who will exercise Command over their forces. I do not think this problem will arise in the immediate future but we should perhaps bear it in mind.

Note du chef de l'état-major

Memorandum by Chief of the General Staff

TOP SECRET

Ottawa, March 7, 1949

NORTH ATLANTIC PACT
MILITARY ORGANIZATION

Object

1. To recommend an outline military organization required for a North Atlantic Pact.

General

2. A North Atlantic Pact will not only encompass a vast territory but will include a large number of sovereign countries with divergent outlooks, strong nationalistic pride and varying military and logistical capabilities. Therefore, it will be imperative that every sovereign country has a voice in the military control of the Pact. This, I suggest, should be done through the Council of Defence Ministers.

3. In addition, I consider that certain basic premises should be agreed by all the countries concerned if there is to be sound planning for the equipping and training of the armed forces in preparation for their employment in war. These basic premises are:

(a) The North Atlantic Pact countries can be divided into several groups, the division being based on the principle of the countries within each group having a common vital interest which, if threatened, would call for immediate military action by all the countries in that group. It appears paramount that if the Pact is to be successful, the basic idea must be that the member nations of each territorial group must be determined to fight to the last man and last round for the defence of their group homelands. If this is accomplished, then all other armed forces not involved in these territorial commitments would be available to the Supreme Commander for counter attacks, for exploitation, for opening up new fronts, for holding strategic bases or any other tasks he may decide.

(b) Each of these groups would then be responsible only for the military planning within the group of their particular interest and may not even be required to fight outside that particular group.

In addition, it would be permissible to have quite different military arrangements within each group varying, if necessary, from the clear-cut agreements of the present Western Union Alliance to a somewhat looser confederation such as might be formed in the Middle East, Mediterranean or Australasia. Thus, there would be a series of interlocking regional groups, capable of mutual support, inspired with the will to fight, and with a knowledge that their battles are part of a co-ordinated strategic plan.

(c) Behind the regional groups who are planning the initial battles will be the Strategic Reserve Group which includes those nations which can provide uncommitted reserves of personnel and material. The planning for the employment of this Strategic Reserve will only be done by the members of the Strategic Reserve Group based on the instructions of a Supreme Commander.

(d) For the efficient co-ordination of the military plans of all these groups of nations, it is necessary to establish a Supreme Commander or a Chief of Staff to the Supreme Commander (as for COSSAC [Chief of Staff to the Supreme Allied Command] before the appointment of General Eisenhower). This officer to be an American.

He will be primarily concerned with the building up and employment of the Strategic Reserve but will be also available to the Chairman of each group's Chiefs of Staff for advice and consultation.

(e) Within each group there would be formed a Defence Committee which in turn would receive the advice of a Chiefs of Staff Committee for that particular group. The Chairman or leader of each Chiefs of Staff Committee would be the officer responsible for consulting and advising the Supreme Commander.

Groups

4. Present international relationships would indicate that the establishment of the following groups within a North Atlantic Pact is immediately feasible. In the near future it may well prove advantageous to include within the Atlantic Pact such groups as a Middle East Group, a Southeast Asia Group and an Australasian Group.

(a) North American Group

Canada — (Chairman—US or Canada)

USA

Denmark (in connection with defence of Greenland only)

(b) Scandinavian Group

Made up of those countries controlling the Northwestern approaches to the Soviet Union.

Norway (Chairman—one of the Scandinavian countries)

Denmark

Iceland

UK

USA

(c) Western European Group

Made up of those countries which form the land mass of Western Europe, together with the USA.

UK — Chairman (with French Deputy)

France

Benelux

Denmark

Western Germany

Italy

Portugal

USA

(d) Strategic Reserve Group

US — Chairman

UK

Canada

Security

5. I realize that one of the over-riding problems connected with planning is security. It is for this reason that I suggest all planning connected with the Strategic Reserve is retained within a special group, which for several years can only comprise US, UK and Canada. Group planning will also assist overall security by dividing plans into comparatively watertight compartments.

Organization

6. A proposed outline organization is shown at Appendix "A" attached.†

Recommendation

7. Bearing in mind the political and geographical problems of an Atlantic Union and the urgent need for sound but secure planning, I consider that all countries must agree to the following basic premises:

(a) The necessity for a number of closely integrated groups within the framework of a larger union;

(b) The military staffs within each group plan only for the action of the forces in that group;

(c) A Supreme Commander (or Chief of Staff) is appointed to advise and coordinate group planning and to relate the plans of the Strategic Reserve Group to the plans of each of the other groups. This officer to be an American. If this procedure is not at present acceptable, then agreement should be reached that another body such as Combined Chiefs should temporarily perform the function of Supreme Commander.

TELEGRAM WA-967

Washington, April 5, 1949

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: My WA-916 of March 30th.† Military organization under the North Atlantic Treaty.

1. Reid has shown me your memorandum of April 1st addressed to Mr. Pearson. I may have some comments to offer on this later. This message deals with the discussion on the morning of April 2nd about the Council and the Defence Committee. You have already received the public statement issued after the meeting of Foreign Ministers.

2. The discussion was limited to the composition of the Council and the Defence Committee, and it was agreed that the record of the discussion, which was very brief, would serve as a general directive to the Working Party, which will begin to meet in a week or so. We shall send the official report of the discussion as soon as the transcript has been corrected and distributed.

3. As to the Council, the understanding is that Governments will be represented either by the Foreign Ministers or by representatives of the Governments. Acheson used the word "plenipotentiaries". What he had in mind was, I think, that someone authorized to speak for the Government as a whole and not for the Foreign Minister alone should attend when the Foreign Minister was not present himself. As I understand it, this would mean that the Ambassador at the place of meeting could sit for the Foreign Minister without any further credentials, but that a representative who was neither the Foreign Minister nor an Ambassador should be designated in the name of the Chief of State.

4. As to the Defence Committee, it was agreed on Acheson's proposal that it should be composed of representatives of the Ministers of Defence, and would therefore be a civilian body. Strategic planning and other professional military matters would be entrusted to other Committees responsible to the Defence Committee. There was no discussion of the form which the purely military organization might take.

5. Bevin, Schuman and Sforza spoke endorsing the proposals made by Acheson and summarized above, and they were agreed without further discussion. Schuman and Rasmussen¹⁵ raised the questions of the seat of the organization, and Schuman advocated Washington. This was left to the Working Party for further discussion. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-1201

Washington, April 29, 1949

My WA-1011 of April 9th,† North Atlantic Treaty.

1. There is still no suggestion that the Working Party established by the Foreign Ministers on April 2nd should meet in the near future. The disposition of the Americans and British, with which I gather the French agree, is that prior agreement in general terms should be worked out informally between the United States, United Kingdom, France, and Canada. The British, Americans, and French also appear to agree that the top military body under the Defence Committee should consist only of officers from their three countries and from Canada and that representatives of other parties to the Treaty should not participate except when matters of special concern to them are under consideration.

2. The British Embassy is in contact with the State Department and expects to present a short paper within a very few days. They have also been in touch with the French. If a four-power military body is established, it may be called by some such clumsy title as "North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Steering Committee". The British are thinking of two planning bodies under this, one which would be made up of the countries concerned with the general defence of the North Atlantic area (i.e., the four already named with, at times, the participation of Norway, Iceland, Denmark, and Portugal), and the second which would be concerned with direct defence of Western Europe, made up, they would hope, of the Brussels Treaty Powers with occasional participation of other European parties and with American and Canadian officers present but not as full members.

3. The State Department's views do not seem to be at variance with the general British ideas. The French have been inclined to argue that certain members should represent other members in the military bodies, but I doubt that this idea will be accepted.

4. The French continue to be anxious that the military agencies should sit in Washington, with a view presumably to the replacement of the Combined Chiefs of Staff by the top North Atlantic military body. The British hope that this part of the organization will be based on London, where it might eventually supersede completely the military agencies of the Brussels Treaty and could meanwhile employ the same personnel in large measure. The British are prepared, as a sop to the French, to have the North Atlantic Council sit in Paris, while such supply and financial agencies as may prove necessary might be based on Washington.

5. You will note that all three Governments are at present prepared to welcome Canada as a fourth member of the most exclusive group. Am I right in assuming that this is what the Canadian Government desires? As to location, I think that the existence of the Brussels agencies there points to London as the most convenient site for the military bodies, although the Defence Committee itself (made up of Ministers of Defence or their representatives), which is unlikely to meet often, could come together in another capital. I have doubts about Paris as the location of the Council and think that the advantages of ensuring the attendance of the Secretary of State in person may justify our supporting Washington.

6. I should be glad to know whether there have been any recent developments in Ottawa on this subject and to receive some indication of your views since I may be involved in preliminary discussions at any time.

Note au Comité des chefs d'état-major
Memorandum for Chiefs of Staff Committee

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], May 11, 1949

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY—MILITARY ORGANIZATION¹⁶

1. On April 2, the Foreign Ministers of those countries signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty agreed in Washington that a Working Party should be established to consider the general question of a North Atlantic Defence Organization. The Working Party has, however, held no meetings to date—the disposition of the Americans, the British and the French being the prior agreement in general terms should be worked out informally between the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada before a full meeting of all the signatories is convened.

Views of United Kingdom Authorities

2. United Kingdom authorities are of the opinion that a permanent Atlantic Pact "Steering Committee", composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the United Kingdom, the ¹⁶ Cette note fut mise en circulation par le secrétaire du Comité des chefs d'état-major le 12 mai 1949, et discutée lors d'une réunion de cet organisme le 18 mai 1949. Hume Wrong assista à cette réunion dont les conclusions sont énumérées au document 354.

This memorandum was circulated by the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee on May 12, 1949, and discussed at a meeting of that organization on May 18, 1949. Hume Wrong was present at that meeting, whose conclusions are listed in Document 354.

United States, France and Canada, should be established. Subordinate to the "Steering Committee" would be two planning bodies—one which would be made up of the countries concerned with the defence of Western Europe, and one which would be concerned with the general defence of the North Atlantic area. The members of the former would be the Western Union Chiefs of Staff, with the occasional participation, when necessary, of Italy, Portugal, Norway, Denmark and Iceland. Canadian and American military authorities also might attend the meetings of this body but would not need to be full members. The North Atlantic defence (planning) body would be composed of representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada, with Portugal, Norway, Denmark and Iceland participating only when necessary.

3. United Kingdom authorities feel that the headquarters of the Atlantic Pact Chiefs of Staff "Steering Committee" should be established in London in order to ensure effective liaison between that body and the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee. This, it is felt, would avoid a considerable duplication of effort in the production of papers and would simplify the problem of security and communications.

4. With regard to the ministerial machinery, the United Kingdom authorities have no strong objection to a French proposal that the Council of Foreign Ministers should meet in Paris. The United Kingdom would also acquiesce in any proposal to establish supply and financial agencies in Washington although there is a general feeling that it will be necessary to have some forward supply and financial machinery in London.

Views of United States Authorities

5. United States authorities also appear to be thinking in terms of a "Steering Committee" of the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee with subordinate representation on a regional basis. The "Steering Committee" would be composed of representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada.

6. With respect to the headquarters of the organization, some United States military authorities are inclined to the view that, should they be established in London, there would be a strong tendency for Western Union to dominate. A section of United States military opinion appears to be opposed to any extension of United States responsibility within Western Union. Moreover, if the headquarters were to be established in Washington, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff would be in a position to use various sections of the War Department for producing the papers which were to be studied.

7. The State Department, on the other hand, supported by some Service opinion, favours London, largely in the interests of close integration with the machinery established under the Brussels Treaty.

Views of French Authorities

8. France, greatly exercised at the possibility of exclusion from over-all strategic planning in which the defence of the Rhine might become a secondary consideration, has been actively campaigning for membership in any top-level North Atlantic planning body. The French feel that, while all the signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty should be represented on an Advisory Council, membership on an Executive Council should be limited to the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and France. France, it appears, has already received the agreement of the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg that France should represent them on any Executive Council. Italy, too, would likely accept such a proposal. The United Kingdom would then represent the Scandinavian countries, including Iceland, on the Executive Council.

9. The headquarters of any Executive Council, the French feel, should be in Washington in order to ensure direct contact with the Combined Chiefs of Staff and with American military authorities. The French preference for Washington as the headquarters reflects their fear that the North Atlantic Defence Organization would, in reality, be subordinate to the Combined Chiefs of Staff, particularly if the headquarters of the former were to be situated in London. The French would agree that the larger military committee (Defence Committee of Ministers) might have London as its headquarters.

10. The French have been greatly concerned at the apparent lack of progress of the Western Union Defence Organization and have stressed that any North Atlantic Organization should be prevented from becoming enmeshed in Western Union problems.

Views of Canadian Authorities

11. General Foulkes has prepared a paper outlining his views with respect to the North Atlantic military organization. This paper was submitted (on a purely personal basis) to General Gruenther (United States) and General Hollis (United Kingdom).

12. General Foulkes is of the opinion that representation on the organization should be by regional groups—each of which would be responsible for the military planning only within the group. He has suggested a Western European group made up of those countries forming the land mass of Western Europe (i.e., the Western Union countries, Denmark, Italy, Portugal), together with the United States; a Scandinavian group composed of those countries controlling the northwestern approaches to the Soviet Union, i.e., Norway, Denmark, Iceland, the United Kingdom and the United States; a North American group composed of Canada, United States and Denmark (in connection with the defence of Greenland only); and a Strategic Reserve Group, including those nations which would be able to provide uncommitted reserves of personnel and material (i.e., Canada, United States and the United Kingdom).

13. The formation of a Strategic Reserve Group, General Foulkes feels, would permit the present strategic planning of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada to be continued without creating an atmosphere injurious to the proper development of territorial defence in each region.

14. The regional groups (and the Strategic Reserve Group) would be responsible to a council of all the North Atlantic Defence Ministers through a Supreme Commander appointed to advise and co-ordinate group planning.

General Comments

Arguments in favour of Canada being a member of a Chiefs of Staff "Steering Committee"

15. (a) It would appear that the United Kingdom, the United States and France agree that Canada should be represented on the top military body under the North Atlantic Treaty. Such membership would ensure that Canada had an equal voice with the United Kingdom, the United States and France in the determination of all questions of North Atlantic defence policy. It would avoid the position where Canada would be presented with more or less final plans which at that stage would be difficult and possibly embarrassing to argue against.

(b) As Canada, like the United States, will have on the outbreak of war uncommitted forces, it would be desirable for Canada to be a member of the Group which would be responsible for recommending the allocation of forces to the various theatres.

(c) Canada, as a supplier nation, should have a full voice in the making of war plans, which will call for the production and allocation of various types of equipment and supplies.

Arguments against Canada being a member of a Chiefs of Staff "Steering Committee"

16. If Canada accepts membership on such a high level body, it may be expected that she will be called upon to make a contribution commensurate with such membership. The Minister of Finance has argued against Canada accepting an invitation to participate in the Western Union Finance and Economic Committee on the grounds that such participation would lead to demands of a financial and economic character on Canada which we are not prepared to meet. If this is indicative of the attitude the Government is likely to take toward economic and financial commitments under the Atlantic Treaty, then membership on a "Steering Committee" might well prove embarrassing to the Government.

17. The Embassy in Washington has asked for instructions as to whether the Canadian Government wishes to have membership on a top level "Steering Committee".

General Arguments in favour of a "Steering Committee"

18. (a) A "Steering Committee", the members of which would represent regional groups rather than exclusively their own governments, may be expected to accomplish work more rapidly.

(b) Security problems would be minimized since it would not appear to be necessary to pass all papers considered by the "Steering Committee" to all the governments represented on the regional organizations.

(c) As France will undoubtedly insist on being a member of a "Steering Committee" or of any other top level planning body which may be set up, there are some advantages in having France represent Western Union on the steering group rather than act solely on her own behalf. France representing Western Union might thus be forced to take a wider view of strategic planning. In this connection, in recent discussions in the Western Union Defence Organization, France has insisted that the primary consideration should be the immediate defence of Western Europe rather than a broader strategic plan favoured by the United Kingdom.

(d) The creation of a "Steering Committee" might persuade the United Kingdom and the United States that their Combined Chiefs of Staff organization was either no longer necessary or at least of much less importance. In this connection, of course, the French are anxious that the Combined Chiefs should be abolished or, no doubt, alternatively that they should be a member.

General Arguments against setting up a "Steering Committee"

19. It is difficult to see what arguments there could be against setting up a "Steering Committee" other than those put forward by General Foulkes in favour of a Strategic Reserve Group. While the latter conception would permit the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada to continue emergency planning, it would not avoid automatically the creation of a large North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee. Even, therefore, if the notion of a Strategic Reserve Group were accepted, there would still be strong arguments in favour of a "Steering Committee" of an Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee.

Arguments in favour of the North Atlantic Defence Organization being set up in London

20. (a) From the political standpoint, the setting up of the organization in London might be taken as a clear indication to the Soviet Union that the North Atlantic powers mean business, and might tend to offset the propaganda that the United States was really the boss of the organization. It would also be a clear indication of the interest of the North American nations in the defence of Western Europe and would, consequently, have a desirable effect on the morale of the people in Western Europe.

(b) From a Canadian point of view, it might permit us to use the staff in London for representation both in the North Atlantic Organization and as observers on Western Union.

(c) It might avoid political difficulties arising from the North Atlantic Defence Organization in Washington being close to the United Nations Security Council.

(d) Security problems, particularly in respect of cyphers, might be less in London, in that if the French were established in Washington, they would undoubtedly wish to use their own cyphers for communication with their own government. If they followed, on the other hand, the rules now laid down for Western Union communications, they would have to send all their communications by bag, a rule which would be difficult to enforce if the organization were in Washington.

Arguments in favour of Washington

21. (a) Direct contact with the United States military authorities would be ensured. The French have also argued that it would permit direct contact with the Combined Chiefs of Staff if it is kept in being. The latter, however, might prove an embarrassment to both the United Kingdom and the United States.

(b) From a Canadian point of view, we would be in a position to send officers on short notice from Ottawa for particular meetings.

(c) It would avoid the possibility of domination of the "Steering Committee" by the Western Union Defence Organization.

(d) The United States authorities might possibly consider that there were fewer security problems arising from having Washington as the location rather than London and thus the United States authorities might treat the organization with greater confidence.

Location of the Council and the economic organs

22. It seems unlikely that a Council of Foreign Ministers would meet more often than, say, once every six months. It does not, therefore, seem to be important where the Council meets and it could change its venue from time to time if desired. There would seem to be no particular objection to meetings taking place in Paris. On the other hand, if a Permanent Diplomatic Secretariat is set up there, while the Defence Organization is established in London or Washington, it might be hampered in its work by lack of liaison with the Defence Organization.

In regard to the economic organs, there would seem to be some merit in having them in Washington as both the United States and Canada would be the major supplying nations. While this might mean that military information necessary for the consideration of problems in the economic organs might not be as readily available as it would otherwise be if both the economic and military organs were located in the same place, this would probably not be an insurmountable problem. A forward echelon of the economic organs might have to be established in London if the military organization is established there.

At request of Foreign Office Rae and Clark attended a meeting at Foreign Office yesterday at which the following United Kingdom officials were present: Sir Gladwyn Jebb; A/M. Sir William Elliot, War Cabinet Secretariat; Shuckburgh, Head of Western Europe Department, Foreign Office; and Cumming-Bruce, of Commonwealth Relations Office.

2. Jebb said he wished to outline the way United Kingdom authorities were thinking about arrangements for North Atlantic Defence Organization. He added that United Kingdom views concerning N.A.D.O. had been informally discussed with State Department officials in Washington and that Mr. Wrong had been kept informed. The United Kingdom authorities had not yet discussed their proposals with the French authorities and would like if possible to obtain the agreement and support of the Canadian Government for their proposals before doing so. He thought United States authorities would be likely to give favourable consideration to the United Kingdom proposals if they were agreed to by the Canadian and French Governments, and he felt that Four Power agreement—(i.e. United States, United Kingdom, Canada and France) was essential before the Working Party in Washington could get down to detailed plans.

[3]. Foreign Office had gathered that M. Ramadier would like to have the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Organization in Washington. In the view of the United Kingdom authorities, however, it would be preferable to integrate the North Atlantic Organization with the present Western Union machinery, particularly on the defence planning side. Jebb would, therefore, like to obtain Canadian support for the United Kingdom proposals and use this to back up their approach to the French.

[4]. Jebb's outline of the United Kingdom proposals for the North Atlantic Defence Organization may be summarized as follows:

A. Political

(I) Council provided for in Article 9 would be composed of Foreign Ministers and would meet about once each year in Paris.

(II) A Permanent Political Committee similar to the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission would conduct the day to day business for the Council. The Council and the Committee would be located in Paris as a quid pro quo for French support for the United Kingdom proposal to locate the Military Organization in London.

B. Military

(I) The Defence Committee would consist of the Ministers of Defence of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada, and would meet two or three times each year probably in London.

(II) A North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee would be set up on which only the United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada would be represented. This would be the senior military agency of the North Atlantic Defence Organization, and would normally meet in London. It would be served by the Permanent Military Organization which now serves the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee.

C. Supply

While the United Kingdom would prefer to see Supply Organization located in London, they would be prepared to agree to its establishment in Washington if it appeared likely that it would be more effective in that location.

[5]. Under these proposals the present Western Union Defence Organization would thus function as a regional agency of the North Atlantic Defence Organization. Its present terms of reference would be modified as follows:

(a) The United States and Canada would continue to be represented on the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee by senior service officers with the status of observers, but authorized by their respective Chiefs of Staff to speak for them within the terms of a very broad directive.

(b) The United States and Canada would be represented as full members on the present Military Committee and its subordinate agencies which would serve the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff and the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committees.

[6]. Jebb hoped it would be possible for the Canadian Government to agree:

(a) That the political organs of the North Atlantic Association to be set up under Article 9 of the Treaty should be established in Paris, and

(b) That the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee should consist of only United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian representatives, that it should be established in London, and be served by the present Military Committee (as modified by paragraph 4(b) above) of the Western Union Defence Organization.

[7]. From the subsequent discussion, several additional points emerged:

(a) The United Kingdom authorities visualize the Combined Chiefs of Staff in Washington and the Permanent Joint Board of Defence as operating completely outside the North Atlantic Defence Organization.

(b) In reply to our question whether the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff would deal with military problems and planning in such areas as the Middle East, South East Asia and the Far East, the reply was that these matters would not be dealt with by the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee. It was clear that the United Kingdom authorities consider that the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff would be responsible only for the defence of the Atlantic community and in particular of Western Europe.

(c) In addition to the foregoing organization, the United Kingdom authorities consider it possible that the need might arise to form another regional group to deal with special problems arising out of defence of Denmark, Norway, Iceland, Portugal and Italy. Although thinking does not appear to have advanced very far on this aspect, such a group, if formed at a later stage, would presumably be served by the Military Committee of the Western Union Defence Organization. In the meantime, on matters relating to the defence of these countries their representatives would deal with the Western Union Defence Organization but not as full members.

(d) United Kingdom authorities anticipate that some of the economic and social activities now carried out by the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission might gradually shift over to and become the responsibility of the Council of Europe.

[8]. From this discussion it is clear that the United Kingdom authorities are anxious to proceed as rapidly as possible with arrangements for establishing machinery under the North Atlantic Pact, and to enlist Canadian support, particularly in Washington, for their views. At the conclusion of our discussion it was agreed that United Kingdom views would be reported to you and that we would let Foreign Office know your reactions as soon as possible.

[9]. It is assumed that the question of North Atlantic machinery, and particularly of Canadian participation, has been under close study in Ottawa. Even in the general form in which they were outlined, the United Kingdom proposals require some comment, particularly on the basis of Brigadier Clark's experience of the working of the existing Western Union machinery. Our comments are set forth in my immediately following telegram.

Extract from Minutes of Meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee

[Ottawa], May 18, 1949

I. DEFENCE ORGANIZATION UNDER NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

1. The Minister of National Defence said that the form and location of the North Atlantic Military Organization were being considered in both Washington and London. Although there were several proposals as to the composition of the principal military body, indications were that it would consist of representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada. While Canada had not yet been officially approached, France, the United States and the United Kingdom appeared to assume that Canada would be a member of the top level Military Committee.

The problem, therefore, was to determine what the attitude of the Canadian government should be. This had some urgency because the United Kingdom had sought Canadian views on their proposals and in addition the Ambassadors' Working Group in Washington were likely to meet soon to consider the matter.

The Chiefs of Staff had considered the question with senior civilian officials and had recommended that the Canadian attitude should be:

(a) defence planning for the implementation of the Treaty can best be done on a regional basis;

(b) planning for the co-ordination of regional arrangements and for the employment of strategic reserves can best be done by a small committee composed of the Chiefs of Staff of some of the North Atlantic nations;

(c) the United States and the United Kingdom will clearly be represented on the principal body for defence plans; France may also seek and be accorded membership;

(d) the relationship of Canada to North Atlantic defence is such that Canada should accept membership on the principal body for defence planning, if invited to do so; and

(e) while the North Atlantic Council may be located elsewhere without disadvantage, the military and supply organizations under the Treaty should be located at the same place; from the Canadian point of view, preferably Washington.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum of 18th May, 1949, from Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee—Cabinet Document D221).†

2. The Chief of the General Staff pointed out that planning under the North Atlantic organization would inevitably involve the use of Canadian troops and Canadian facilities and the Chiefs of Staff considered that Canada should be represented on the senior planning body.

It was understood that the purpose of the North Atlantic Treaty was to provide the strongest possible deterrent to war. If, however, war could not be prevented, then the secondary object of the North Atlantic Treaty was to provide an organization which, backed by the manpower and production of the countries of the Treaty, would be able to win the war. To carry out this latter task, it was obviously necessary to carry out military planning beyond the territorial limits of the countries of the North Atlantic community.

The United Kingdom views concerning the scope of the North Atlantic defence planning had changed considerably and they were now suggesting that this organization should only plan for the territorial defence of the Atlantic community.

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs observed that the main question was whether Canada should be accorded full representation on the senior military body or whether authority should be delegated and arrangements made for association with that body when matters of direct concern to Canada were being discussed. On balance, the former appeared to be the more acceptable. Regarding the scope of military planning, it would be unrealistic to confine strategic planning to the area defined in the Treaty and it did not seem unreasonable that the North Atlantic Defence Organization should develop the overall strategy by which the defeat of the enemy could be achieved.

4. The Canadian Ambassador to the United States reported that no decision had yet been taken regarding the location of the various bodies that would be established under the Treaty. It seemed likely that this would be delayed until the participating countries had ratified the Treaty.

It would be remembered that the agreements provided for a Council composed of ministerial representatives of all the countries and a defence committee at the same level, which could meet promptly if required to do so.

5. The Acting Prime Minister said that in his view the recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff were reasonable. While Canadian representation on the principal military body was desirable and should be accepted if an invitation were received, such representation should not be sought.

6. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed to recommend to Cabinet acceptance of the policy outlined in the report submitted by the Chiefs of Staff and agreed that Canadian representatives be guided accordingly, it being understood that Canada should not actively seek representation on the senior military body.¹⁷

Washington, May 23, 1949

Dear Mr. Heeney:

I had a word today with Hickerson about the organization to be set up under the Atlantic Treaty. He told me that, so far as the State Department knew, the Joint Chiefs of Staff had not yet reached a decision on the proposals which were laid before them last week. He thought that they had given preliminary consideration to these proposals on May 18th.

I let him know that we were inclined to favour Washington as the seat of the military organization and such supply agencies as may be set up and that in the event that this became an issue between London and Washington we should probably support the U.S. position. I also told him that he could assume that we would accept membership on the top military planning body if we were invited to do so, but made it clear that we were not lobbying for an invitation. I said that we had had to give some consideration to the matter, since we had heard that the plans under discussion in Washington, London, and Paris all contemplated the inclusion of Canada in the senior military body.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

Reference your telegram No. 953 of May 23rd.† In addition to points raised by Jebb concerning Military Organization under North Atlantic Treaty, we may also be asked whether the Canadian Government has any specific suggestions to put forward for the establishment of economic machinery to promote economic co-operation between North Atlantic signatories as provided for in general terms under Article 2 of the Treaty. It is the feeling of the United Kingdom authorities that this article was included largely at Canada's request, and I should be grateful for any guidance you can provide on this aspect of the Treaty implementation. North Atlantic Defence Organization. Following from Heeny. Begins. Your telegram No. 1005 of May 12 and Clark's telegram No. 1006 of May 13.†

1. The British proposals as presented to the U.S. authorities are contained in Washington's telegram WA-1328 of May 13,† repeated to you as telegram No. 917 of May 17.† You will note that the terms of the proposals handed to the U.S. authorities differ somewhat from the British views as reported in your telegram No. 1005 of May 12.

2. As the result of consideration of the U.K. proposals by the Chiefs of Staff, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary to the Cabinet, recommendations were put forward to Cabinet Defence Committee on May 18. Conclusions for the guidance of Canadian representatives taking part in any further discussions on the Defence organization were approved by Cabinet Defence Committee and by Cabinet subsequently on the same day. They are set out in the immediately following paragraph.

3. (a) defence planning for the implementation of the Treaty can best be done on a regional basis;

(b) planning for the co-ordination of regional arrangements and for the employment of strategic reserves can best be done by a small committee composed of the Chiefs of Staff of some of the North Atlantic nations;

(c) the United States and the United Kingdom will clearly be represented on the principal body for defence plans; France may also seek and be accorded membership;

(d) the relationship of Canada to North Atlantic defence is such that Canada should accept membership on the principal body for defence planning, if invited to do so; and

(e) while the North Atlantic Council may be located elsewhere without disadvantage, the military and supply organizations under the Treaty should be located at the same place; from the Canadian point of view, preferably Washington.

4. At this stage the above conclusions are communicated to you for the information and guidance of Clark and yourself and not (repeat not) for transmission to the U.K. authorities. It may also be helpful for you and Clark to have the expression of our own tentative views pending our reply to the U.K. proposals which may be anticipated before long.

5. Political Organization. The Council of Foreign Ministers might well have to meet more frequently than is suggested. We have no objection to the Council meeting in Paris but, depending on the availability of Foreign Ministers, it might be best not to pin down the meetings to any particular place. In regard to the permanent Political Committee, we would see no objection to it being set up in Paris although there might be disadvantages if the principal Defence and Supply Organizations were set up in Washington.

6. Military Organization. The memorandum submitted by the U.K. to the U. S. authorities as reported in our Washington Embassy's telegram WA-1328 of May 13, did not appear to limit the Defence Committee to the Ministers of Defence of the U.S., U.K., France and Canada. As Article 9 of the Treaty specifically refers to the setting up of a Defence Committee, it would seem to us to be politically difficult to limit the membership in this way. We had rather contemplated a Defence Committee of the whole since it appears to us that many of the plans and decisions of this body would require the approval of governments on a Defence Minister level in order to be effective.

7. In regard to the senior military committee, the U.K. memorandum presented in Washington refers to an Atlantic Pact Chiefs of Staff Steering Committee which would consist of representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of the U.S., U.K., Canada and France with representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of the other countries being called in when necessary. We think that this proposal has some merit and we would be prepared to be represented on such a body if we were invited to do so. It should be clearly understood, however, that Canadian representatives taking part in any further discussions would not (repeat not) press for representation on any such top planning body. In our view the Military Organization could function best in Washington alongside the Supply Organization set up under the Treaty. We also think that the organization could best be served by its own permanent Military Organization rather than the organization established under the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee.

8. Supply. As a great many of the supply problems will have to be dealt with on this side of the Atlantic, we consider that the Supply Organization could best function in Washington.

9. We agree that the Western Union Defence Organization should continue as a regional one and that we should maintain observers on the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee and other defence organizations of Western Union. In regard to your sub-paragraph (b), this question would not arise if the organization is in Washington and we think there is a good deal of merit in not confusing the North Atlantic Organization with Western Union.

10. From the foregoing it will be seen that we are thinking along the lines of regional groupings under the North Atlantic Organization, of which the Western Union Defence Organization should be one.

11. As I have indicated, the conclusions set out in paragraph 3 above are decisions of the government taken on advice of the Chiefs of Staff and senior civilian officials. Those set out in paragraphs 5 to 10 inclusive, however, are our own tentative views although they have been formulated after consultation with the Chiefs and in the light of discussion in Cabinet Defence Committee. Ends.

Following from Heeney, Begins. Reference your telegram No. 1094 of May 25, North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

1. It is true that the Government attach importance to the provisions of Article 2 but Ministers have not as yet considered the possibility of establishing special economic machinery in that connection. For this reason we are not in a position to express any views on the subject to the Foreign Office and it may be some time before Ministerial consideration will be feasible.

2. Furthermore, it is impossible at this stage to formulate any blueprint which would reflect Canadian views on the whole structure of the North Atlantic Organization. We would, however, anticipate that an Economic Committee, composed perhaps of the Finance Ministers of the North Atlantic states, might be set up to parallel the Defence Committee. Such an Economic Committee might be responsible for financial and economic matters arising from the Treaty and, in particular, with the implementation of Article 2. Possibly an Economic Committee might be served by an Executive Committee meeting more frequently.

3. As you know, members of the Canadian Government, in statements both in the House and elsewhere, have stressed the fact the Treaty would not be solely a military alliance. It is therefore to be hoped that the Organization, as eventually established, will include organs for the economic collaboration envisaged by Article 2. In any event, I feel that some such machinery will have to be established, irrespective of Article 2, for the purpose of considering the financial and economic implications of any military programmes.

4. Should you be queried by the Foreign Office on this point, I would suggest that you might indicate that the Canadian Government has no specific suggestion to make at this stage with respect to the economic machinery which might be established under the Treaty. We expect that the problem will be given consideration at the meeting of the Working Group in Washington.

5. The above views, as I have indicated, are purely personal and are offered now in response to your request for an early reply to your telegram under reference. I shall seek Governmental direction on the points raised in your telegram as soon as there is an opportunity.

My immediately preceding teletype on military procurement.†

1. When discussing yesterday with Hickerson and Snow of the State Department the draft communication on military procurement they raised the question of Canadian participation in the provision of military equipment to the European parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. Senator [Claude] Pepper has already asked about the Canadian contribution and they said that they would like to be able to state at the Congressional hearings on the military assistance programme that discussions were taking place with Canadian officials.

2. I held out no hope that we would be in a position to discuss this matter for some time. I pointed out that any action which Canada might take would be derived from the obligation assumed in Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty, that the Treaty would not be in effect for some time, and that the extent and nature of the "mutual aid" which Canada might provide could not be determined or even considered by the Canadian Government until the Treaty was in force and consultations had taken place between the parties. I said that, while the United States programme of military aid was related to the Treaty, it was formulated as a separate measure which would be discussed in Congress in all probability before the Treaty was in force. They should not expect the Canadian Government to parallel their own action.

3. I suggested that they might deal with Senator Pepper's enquiry by pointing to the Canadian record in living up to international obligations and saying that they had no doubt that the Canadian Government would give proper effect to the principle of mutual aid.

4. I added that as all items of military equipment produced in Canada contained a United States dollar content, Canada could not be expected to do very much unless there was United States military procurement in Canada. Hickerson remarked that one of the elements in the military assistance programme was to stimulate European arms production by furnishing necessary raw materials from the dollar area. He suggested that an appropriate Canadian contribution might be the provision of non-ferrous metals such as copper and aluminum. I said that this idea was unlikely to commend itself to the Canadian Government and also made it clear that ministerial consideration could not be given to the matter for several weeks.

5. They asked me to report this discussion to you. I doubt that it is necessary for us to follow it up, unless you disagree with the line which I took.

Following for Heenev, Begins: Your messages EX-1369† and EX-1370† of May 27th repeating telegrams exchanged with Canada House on economic organization under the North Atlantic Treaty.

1. I am glad to notice the cautious attitude which you have taken about the possible establishment of agencies to give effect to Article 2 of the Treaty. I have not undertaken the considerable task of going through the files to review the negotiations which resulted in this Article, but I am clear in my recollection that from a very early stage the Canadian representatives (both Mr. Pearson and myself) took the line that while Canada attached great importance to the inclusion in the Treaty of a pledge of economic collaboration, it was not our purpose to urge the establishment of special North Atlantic economic agencies. Without such an assurance we should never have secured the agreement of the Secretary of State and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the inclusion of the last sentence in the Article.

2. The objections taken during the negotiations to the inclusion of an economic pledge in the Treaty arose in part from the belief that a North Atlantic economic organization would cut across and complicate the work of other international agencies in the economic field, including the O.E.E.C., the I.T.O., the Economic Commission for Europe and other United Nations bodies. To overcome these objections it was agreed that the pledges which now appear in Article 2 were general pledges designed to be fulfilled by the parties individually or bilaterally or multilaterally as occasion arose. You may recall that we pressed for an economic clause primarily because we believed that it would be useful in negotiating on economic questions with the United Kingdom and United States.

3. A supply agency which will be concerned with financial and economic questions will have to be set up in order to assist in giving effect to the promise of mutual aid in Article 3. I think that our best line would be to concentrate on this and to encourage it to take in a fairly wide field. This would relate economic collaboration to the central purpose of the Treaty, the organization of collective defence.

4. I suggest, therefore, that we go slow in bringing Article 2 into the discussion of the organization to be set up. If the Government decides to seek the establishment of a high-level Economic Committee, as suggested in paragraph 2 of your EX-1370, I recommend that before this is put forward we should be ready to explain fully the relationship contemplated with other international economic agencies and the exact field to be covered. I should be loth to have the matter brought before the Working Group here, when that body begins to meet, without supporting the suggestion with definite proposals about the terms of reference and so on. Ends.

I. NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY—REPLY TO UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS

1. The Committee had for consideration a memorandum from the Secretary concerning the preparation of answers to the United Kingdom proposals which had been forwarded in Despatch No. 1005 dated 12th May, 1949, from the High Commissioner, London.¹⁸

(CSC 5-27 dated 4th June, 1949)

2. The Chief of the General Staff, referring to the Cabinet decisions on the policy to be followed by Canadian representatives in discussions concerning the North Atlantic Defence Organization, stated that it might be advisable at this time to prepare answers to the proposals put forward by the U.K. authorities. To do this, it would be necessary to have an agreed Canadian concept of the purpose and scope of the North Atlantic Defence Organization. Originally the United Kingdom authorities had considered the North Atlantic Defence Organization as the overall organization responsible for the planning and direction of the war and had indicated that this organization would probably consist of representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. At this time the United Kingdom had not considered the inclusion of France on the top level organization. Subsequently, when the necessity of including France became more apparent, the U.K. authorities accepted this arrangement. However, to avoid the problems which would ensue if France were included in the organization planning overall strategy, they then suggested limiting the scope of the North Atlantic Defence Organization to that of the territorial defence of the North Atlantic region.

From the beginning of the North Atlantic negotiations, the U.S. authorities had indicated that, in their view, the North Atlantic Defence Organization should be responsible for the development of overall strategy. The importance of France in the problem of European defence was of such magnitude that consideration had to be given to including France in overall strategic planning despite the problem of French security. This problem was a very real one, but it was not insoluble. Once France became a member of the top level organization, this matter would have to be discussed fully and it would be necessary to indicate to the French representative that, so long as the present situation maintained, it would not be possible to develop overall defence plans.

¹⁸ Voir/See: Document 353.

3. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs observed that the full implications of Canada participating in overall strategic planning were probably not recognized by all ministers. The approval which the Cabinet had given to the recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff had gone a long way. However it was felt that, in giving this approval, the Government had not contemplated that it would include Canadian participation in the overall military direction of the war. On this point there was some doubt. If the North Atlantic planning contemplated more than territorial defence planning for the North Atlantic region, the matter of participation should be referred to Cabinet.

4. General Foulkes pointed out that the North Atlantic Treaty was unique in that the defence planning which would be done in peace would require acceptance by individual governments; in fact, the planning agreements would represent actual commitments. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff, and presumably the Canadian Government, could not permit planning for the use of Canadian troops outside Canada unless there was Canadian participation in the development of those plans. This point had been made clear by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech on the North Atlantic organization given in Kingston last year.

5. The Secretary to the Cabinet observed that the system of defining the geographical limits within which the participation of Canadian troops was authorized had not been entirely satisfactory in the last war. It might be advisable to accept an arbitrary limitation based on certain political factors in order to put the organization into operation. Once the organization was established, it would be possible to broaden the scope if this appeared necessary.

6. The Chief of the Naval Staff questioned the proviso which the Cabinet had included concerning the acceptance of an invitation to participate as a member of the principal body for defence planning. So long as the Canadian Armed Forces were limited to their present size, it might not be advisable to participate in overall strategic planning. It would appear that only the United States and the United Kingdom, who had forces available in peace and who, in war, would have the largest commitments, were in a position to provide the overall strategic direction.

7. The Chief of the Air Staff observed that, if the overall war direction were to be left to the Combined Chiefs of Staff, it might be preferable to have the North Atlantic Defence Organization located other than in Washington.

8. The Chairman, Defence Research Board, stated that the Canadian military and political concepts of the North Atlantic Defence Organization, while individually sound, were not compatible. The military concept, by which the North Atlantic would be responsible for global strategy, did not appear to be politically possible and, in fact, could be considered as a contravention of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. If the North Atlantic countries were to plan world strategy, they would in fact be substantiating the Soviet claim that the North Atlantic Treaty was not a regional defence pact within the meaning of Article 51.¹⁹

¹⁹ Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Art. 51 is not a regional article.

9. Mr. Heeney reported that the Military Committee of Western Union had now decided that they should not make recommendations concerning the organization of the North Atlantic Defence machinery. While there was no necessity at this time to produce formal answers to the U.K. proposals, it might be appropriate to advise the U.K. and the U.S. authorities, informally, of the general views of the Canadian Government, as approved by the Cabinet on 18th May.

10. It was agreed, after further discussion, to advise the U.S. and the U.K. authorities informally of the Canadian views approved by Cabinet, the necessary communications to be prepared by the Secretary.²⁰

Ottawa, June 30, 1949

CONCEPT OF NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION

1. It would appear from recent despatches that there is now definitely a division of opinion concerning the scope of the North Atlantic Defence Organization. On the one hand the United States and the United Kingdom have indicated clearly that they consider the North Atlantic Defence Organization should be limited to regional defence planning; the French, on the other hand, are strongly of the opinion that North Atlantic Defence Organization should provide a medium for the planning of global strategy.

2. The Canadian position is somewhat involved. When the Canadian Government agreed that if Canada were invited to sit on the top level planning body the invitation would be accepted, it was felt by certain officials that the discussion concerning this subject had included the problem of overall strategy as being part of the North Atlantic responsibilities. Other officials are of the opinion that all the ministers were not clear that our acceptance of a position on the top level North Atlantic Defence planning body would involve us in global strategical planning. One point, however, which is generally accepted is that the Cabinet were of the view that Can-

²⁰ Ces points de vue furent transmis officieusement au gouvernement britannique par l'entremise de Canada House, et aux autorités américaines par le biais de l'ambassade du Canada à Washington. Le haut-commissaire à Londres pressa pour une réponse formelle, mais Heeney fit un commentaire à l'effet que: «it is somewhat difficult to receive ministerial guidance at the present time on the overall problem of North Atlantic Organization» (le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni, no. 1095, le 17 juin 1949 [de Heeney], DEA/50030-40).

These views were conveyed informally to the British government via Canada House and to American authorities via the Canadian Embassy in Washington. The Canadian High Commissioner in London urged a formal response, but Heeney commented that "it is somewhat difficult to receive ministerial guidance at the present time on the over-all problem of North Atlantic Organization" (Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom, No. 1095, June 17, 1949 [from Heeney], DEA/50030-40).

ada would have to have a voice in the planning of any operations in which Canadian troops might be involved. If Canada accepts the point of view that the North Atlantic Defence Organization is limited to defence planning, it will be necessary to ensure that Canadian representation is maintained on any body involved in overall strategic planning because of the fact that the bulk of the Canadian forces will probably be deployed outside the territorial limits of the North Atlantic Community.

3. As the organization of the Working Party has been delayed this long, it will become more apparent to all countries of the North Atlantic Organization that certain military discussions must be going on between the major powers. It is possible that, as a result of these discussions, the general pattern of the North Atlantic Defence Organization will be that agreed to by the United States and the United Kingdom, and the other member countries will have opportunity to do little other than accept the proposed organization. While it would not be in our interests to contest vigorously the U.S. and U.K. views, it is felt, nevertheless, that Canada should be prepared to express her opinion on the concept of the North Atlantic.

4. To this end the attached paper has been prepared, setting down certain views which might be considered as a basis on which further discussions on this subject could be carried out.

5. I should be grateful if you would advise me as to whether this matter should now be discussed at a Chiefs of Staff meeting.²¹

A CONCEPT OF NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION

I. General

The concept of the North Atlantic Defence Organisation has been one of the main issues considered by the U.K., U.S. and French authorities. The most recent U.K. view suggests a limitation of scope to the planning of the defence of the Atlantic community and in particular to that of Western Europe. The French authorities on the other hand feel that the highest military planning body under the North Atlantic Organization should consider questions of world strategy. Certain U.S. views restrict North Atlantic defence planning to the North Atlantic area and indicate opposition to the extension of the functions of the planning agencies to global strategy.

²¹ Les recommandations du Comité des chefs d'état-major au Cabinet sont contenues dans le document 367.

For the recommendations to Cabinet from the Chiefs of Staff Committee, see Document 367.

II. United Kingdom Views

In the early discussions with United States and United Kingdom representatives concerning the appointment of a Supreme Commander for the North Atlantic Defence Organization, it appeared to the Canadian authorities that both the U.S. and the U.K. considered the development of global strategy an essential function of the North Atlantic Organization. However, when it became apparent that France had to be included in the top level military body, the U.K. authorities suggested that the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff should be responsible only for the defence of the Atlantic community and of Western Europe in particular. It has become evident that the U.K. is extremely concerned regarding the status quo of the Combined Chiefs of Staff which heretofore has been the medium through which the U.S. and U.K. planned global strategy. The U.K. proposal that the North Atlantic Defence Organization be set up in London rather than Washington was based in part on the desire to leave the Combined Chiefs in Washington free to plan overall strategy without interference from representatives of other countries. The U.K. view is that world-wide strategy should be controlled by the Combined Chiefs of Staff in Washington where those responsible for highest direction should be as free as possible from the special pleading to which they would be bound to be subjected if all the lesser North Atlantic members were present.

III. French Views

The views of the French authorities are based in part on the recommendations of Western Union which in many cases has been unsatisfactory to France. This has been particularly so in the matter of the provision of forces by the United Kingdom for the defence of the Rhine. It appears certain that the French are aware that world strategic planning has been carried out by the United States and the United Kingdom. Realizing the reluctance of the U.K. and the U.S. to station additional forces in Europe, the French authorities are seeking a position on the top level military organization in order to participate in discussions concerning the overall deployment of British and American forces. They have suggested that France be included in the Combined Chiefs of Staff or, failing this, that the Combined Chiefs of Staff as presently constituted be replaced by an overall strategic planning body under the North Atlantic Defence Organization. The French are most anxious that global strategy be the responsibility of the North Atlantic Defence Organization.

IV. U.S. Views

It has been indicated by the Chairman of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee that in the early discussions concerning the North Atlantic Defence Organization, the U.S. authorities considered that global strategy would be the responsibility of the top level military planning body. In furtherance of this view, ABC planning, which is global strategy, was initiated as an emergency measure until the North Atlantic Treaty and subsequently the North Atlantic Defence Organization could be developed. The U.S. authorities have not accepted the French proposals regarding the Combined Chiefs of Staff. Nor have they officially stated their views concerning the inclusion of France as a member of the top level military planning body. Until recently there has been no indication that the U.S. authorities considered limiting the scope of the North Atlantic Defence Organization to that of regional defence planning.

V. Position of France

Because of her manpower and industrial potential and because of the fact that the successful defence of Western Europe will depend largely on French co-operation, France will undoubtedly be invited by the United Kingdom and the United States to sit on the top level planning body of the North Atlantic Defence Organization. Whether her representatives will act on behalf of France or on behalf of a regional defence group has yet to be determined.

French security is at present notoriously bad. This is probably one of the main reasons underlying the U.S. and U.K. proposals to limit the scope of the North Atlantic Defence Organization to that of planning on a basis of regional defence only. While such a limitation might satisfy the security requirements of the British and U.S. authorities, there is little doubt that it would be unacceptable to France. The French authorities must realize that, although the United States and the United Kingdom each participate in regional defence planning, these two great powers must at the same time be studying overall global strategy and making plans for the deployment of their forces. So long as the French are excluded from overall defence planning, they will continue to view the United States and the United Kingdom with increasing suspicion, the basis of which has resulted from unsatisfactory Western Union negotiations. A France, suspicious of its Allies, cannot be expected to become strong, economically, politically or militarily. While a strong France would be of great advantage both to Western Union and to the North Atlantic community, a France, fraught with suspicion of its Allies, could render Western Union ineffective and accordingly reduce greatly the potential strength of the North Atlantic.

If it is accepted that the French security problem is insoluble, the whole of Western Union, and consequently North Atlantic, arrangements become merely an exercise in futility. An indication by the United States and United Kingdom that they wish to bring France into overall defence planning but that such arrangement could only be possible if her security difficulties were cleared, would be the greatest incentive to action in this matter.

If use is to be made of French territory and French manpower in the development of war plans, France must be included in the top level planning organization and the solution to the problem of French security must be given priority.

VI. Overall Strategy

Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty specifies the area within which an armed attack would bring the provisions of Article 5 into operation. There is nothing in the Treaty, however, which limits the action "as is deemed necessary" under Article 5 to the regional area of the North Atlantic countries. As the basic purpose of the Treaty is to provide for effective and collective action to restore and maintain security of the North Atlantic area if an armed attack should occur, the restoration of security will be brought about in the most effective way by the countries of the North Atlantic Treaty. The security of an attacked country can only be restored when the threat has been removed. This will be achieved only after the aggressor has been forced to lay down his arms; for so long as the war continues, the security of each country is imperilled regardless of the fact that its territorial integrity has not been violated.

The only country constituting a threat to world peace to-day is the U.S.S.R. If that country attacks a member of the North Atlantic community, the security of the member country can only be restored if Russia can be convinced that the continuance of war is to her disadvantage. Therefore the restoration of security of the North Atlantic community depends on the ability of the members of that community to bring to bear against the Russians a force of arms sufficient to cause the Russians to surrender. It is obvious that to plan the organization and deployment of these forces, the North Atlantic Defence Organization must develop a strategy which will produce the most efficient and effective means of destroying the Russian will to wage war. This action can only be carried out as a result of global planning.

The military objectives of the North Atlantic Organization, therefore, must be twofold:

(a) to produce sufficient forces to deter any aggression on the part of the U.S.S.R.; and

(b) to produce a plan which, if the peace is lost, will bring about the successful conclusion of the war.

To this end, the primary objective of the North Atlantic Defence Organization must be the development of a global strategy which will bring about, quickly and effectively, the destruction of the Russian war machine and at the same time will provide for the territorial defence, as far as is practicable, of all countries of the North Atlantic community.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: My WA-1513 of June 1st, Canadian participation in Military Assistance Program.

1. Snow reopened this matter urgently with me yesterday. He said he had been attending a meeting of the Foreign Aid Co-ordinating Committee which is preparing data for the information of Congress. Hearings on the United States bill are likely to begin very shortly after the North Atlantic Treaty has been approved. The bill had not yet been introduced in Congress.

2. Snow said that they believed it would be very helpful if they could say to the Congressional Committees something more positive and specific than that the Canadian record showed that Canada could be relied on to do her fair share. He wanted to know at least whether they could state that discussions had been started with the Canadian Government on the Canadian contribution to the Program. I said that all they could say accurately at present was that they had raised the matter with the Canadian Government. I also said that I doubted whether the question could be considered by the Ministers chiefly concerned until early in August and that it seemed to me difficult, if not impossible, for us to say anything more positive at the present time.

3. I furthermore pointed out to Snow that the State Department was at pains to separate the Military Assistance Program from the North Atlantic Treaty so as to make it clear that a vote for the Treaty in the Senate does not commit the voter to support the Program. (This point has been heavily emphasized during the debate in the Senate on the Treaty). Canadian action would have to be taken under Article 3 of the Treaty and presumably in accordance with some general understanding arrived at in the agencies to be established under Article 9. Canada was not a party to the current United States program, and we would be in a position to determine what we could do most usefully only after consultation with the other parties to the Treaty.

4. I should nevertheless be glad if you would talk this matter over with Mr. Pearson before he leaves Ottawa this week to see whether he would agree to our saying something rather more positive than the views which I have expressed. It is after all very much in our interest that the Military Assistance Program should be approved by Congress with a substantial authorization of expenditure, and the argument that the Program and the Treaty are technically separate is not a very strong one. Their particular interest in Canada, of course, arises from their desire to show Congress that some country other than themselves will be a net contributor to the rearmament of western Europe. I always find it difficult to assess the real usefulness of statements of this nature in securing Congressional support. Snow said that the Coordinating Committee thought it very important.

5. Since we have been such strong advocates of the North Atlantic Treaty it is perhaps not unreasonable for the State Department to suggest that we ought now to be in a position to give some very general indication of what sort of policy we intend to pursue in giving effect to our obligations under Article 3. I fully realize the difficulties of saying something definite, but possibly we might go a little further in general terms. Ends.

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Following from Heaney for Wrong. Begins. Your WA-1878 of July 13th, Canadian participation in Military Assistance Programme.

1. As I said to you on the telephone this morning I have now had an opportunity of discussing with the Minister the suggestion referred to in your message that a statement be made to the Foreign Aid Co-ordinating Committee concerning Canadian participation in military aid to Europe. The observations which follow are my own but you can take it that they also reflect accurately Mr. Pearson's views.

2. It is quite impossible to forecast at this time the nature and extent of Canada's contribution to her Atlantic allies until organization under the Atlantic Pact is accomplished and until there have been consultations thereafter between the parties to the Treaty. We had expected that considerable progress would have been made by this time upon such organization and the fact that little or nothing has been done is in no way due to us. We hope that the machinery will be established and the consultations undertaken without further delay.

3. The government fully recognizes the obligations which Canada has undertaken under the Atlantic Pact and Canada can be counted upon to play her just and proper part in the common effort to achieve the purposes for which it was signed.

4. Any pressure from the United States for a commitment at this stage, indeed any public reference to the part Canada should play, might well have quite serious results. We are certainly not impressed by what is going on in Washington at present and we sometimes think that officials there ignore the reactions which the American attitude in such matters is bound to have in this country; at the same time they continue to emphasize the importance of our example in their own political difficulties.

5. I very much hope that the State Department will not pursue any proposal that we be asked to authorize a statement concerning the nature of Canadian assistance.

6. I have not had time to send you a full or careful message on this subject but the situation is well known to you and I feel sure that you will have no difficulty in explaining it to our friends. Ends.

DEFENCE ORGANS UNDER THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Since our last conversation on this subject I have been giving some thought to the question and have refreshed my mind by looking through the file. I agree entirely with your conclusion that our efforts should be directed towards persuading the U.K., the U.S. and France that the general interest would not be served by attempting at this time to define with any greater precision than the Treaty does the role of the "defence committee" which is to be set up under Article 9 of the Treaty. Our motto should be: Solvitur ambulando.

2. Thus the instruction to the defence committee might merely be to "recommend measures for the implementation of Article 3 and 5" of the Treaty. If it is desired to go beyond this, some such language as the following might be used:

"(a) To recommend measures for the maintenance and development of the individual and collective capacity of the Parties to resist armed attack; and

(b) To recommend the action that might be taken, in the event of attack, by the Parties individually and in concert to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area".

3. The following points are, I think, relevant to our consideration of these questions:

(a) The official public Canadian attitude to the Treaty has been consistently that it is a method for maintaining and organizing an overwhelming preponderance of force on the side of peace, not an agency for regional defence. Thus Mr. St. Laurent, in his national broadcast of November 11, 1948, said: "Anything less than a North Atlantic Pact would give us no real hope of maintaining a preponderance of material and moral strength on the side of peace. And it is only if we can maintain an overwhelming preponderance on the side of peace that we can maintain the peace". This and other statements make clear that the Canadian Government's concept of the Treaty has been that it is in essence a great power alliance against the Soviet Union which has been given the "cover" of an agreement between countries in a certain geographical area.

(b) One of the principal arguments which we used in August 1948 in our efforts to persuade the French to be more forthcoming in their support for the Treaty is set forth in Paragraph 22 of Mr. Pearson's letter to General Vanier of August 13, 1948,²² copies of which were sent by us and by the State Department to our respective missions in France, Belgium and The Netherlands for their use in speaking to the governments of those countries. This paragraph reads as follows:

“The French, particularly from their experience in the last war, must be worried by the possibility that if war should break out they will have little or no say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions by the Western allies. The conclusion of a North Atlantic treaty would make it possible to set up formal international bodies, not only for making plans for preventing war, but also for making plans for the waging of war. The establishment in peace time of these bodies would help to ensure that in the event of war France and other Western European countries had a say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions”.

(c) Throughout the discussions which led to the conclusion of the Treaty, the official Canadian position has been that one of the principal incidental advantages of the Treaty to Canada was that it would make possible the establishment in the event of war of a “constitutional” system for fighting the war under which, for example, any Commander under whom the Canadian forces were serving would receive his powers as the result of a constitutional grant of power to him from a body of which Canada was a member. Since, in the event of war against the Soviet Union, there will of necessity either have to be a Commander-in-Chief or a Commander-in-Chief in commission, this means that the Commander-in-Chief or the Commander-in-Chief in commission must be appointed by a body of which Canada is a member.

(d) One serious disadvantage in restricting the sphere of responsibility of North Atlantic Defence organs to the defence of North Atlantic Defence organs to the defence of the North Atlantic area is that this may divert the attention of governments and their defence advisers from the paramount importance of working out a grand strategic concept which would result in the earliest possible defeat of the enemy. The grand strategic concept cannot be based on holding Maginot lines but must include the mounting of offensive operations as soon as possible after the outbreak of hostilities.

4. In peace time the North Atlantic alliance has two main objectives. The first is to deter the Russians by persuading them of the certainty of overwhelming defeat if they should embark on war; in order to persuade them of this certainty, everything possible must be done to organize and maintain a grand alliance against them ready to take the offensive if attacked. The second objective in peace time is to build up increasing confidence in Western Europe that if there is war with the Soviet Union the Allies will take effective measures to prevent a Russian occupation of Western Europe.

5. It is necessary to maintain a very careful balance between these two objectives. It is in the long-run interests of all members of the alliance that this balance should be maintained, although the members will naturally differ in the degree of relative importance which they attach to the two objectives. A successful effort to restrict in advance the sphere of responsibility of North Atlantic defence organs would do nothing to lessen these differences of opinion. It would merely mean that there would be no formal organ in which attempts could be made to reconcile them.

Your EX-1927 of August 5th,† North Atlantic Treaty.

1. I think that the organization of the Council, at any rate at first, should be very simple. This is based on my estimate of how the Council is likely, in fact, to operate. Made up, as it will be, of representatives of States of all sizes between that of Iceland and that of the United States, it is not likely to become a body which meets frequently or requires lengthy sessions. It will in practice, I think, register decisions for formal submission to the parties which have already been agreed upon in the subordinate treaty agencies or in diplomatic negotiations.

2. By the Treaty, the functions of the Council are limited to consideration of "matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty". The only requirements covering its organization are that all the parties shall be represented on it and that it shall be able to meet promptly at any time. The Foreign Ministers agreed on April 2nd that the representatives on the Council should be Foreign Ministers of plenipotentiaries able to speak for their Governments.

3. As the Council will probably meet infrequently, you might consider whether it should be required to meet at least every six months. It is difficult to decide how it should be served. Since the North Atlantic Treaty is much narrower in scope than the Brussels Treaty, I doubt that provision should be made for a permanent Commission on the Brussels model. This might come later if the need arose. I think that the Secretariat will also be unimportant. An archivist and a few clerks may be essential, although these services might be furnished by the host Government.

4. The first meeting, which may possibly be held in September, may be confined to a single sitting for the approval of recommendations to which the Governments are already committed after they have been discussed in the Working Group. This, I know, is in the mind of the State Department.

5. This estimate of how the Council will operate represents my own expectations rather than my view of how it ought to operate. There will be reluctance in Washington, and I think in some of the other Capitals, to the development of the Council into a substantial body of machinery with Standing Committees and Special Committees busy drawing up reports.

6. As to the Headquarters, if my estimate of probabilities is correct this does not matter very much. The requirement that the Council should be able to meet promptly at any time may best be fulfilled by convening each meeting in the most convenient Capital. If, however, the Council becomes a more continuously active body than I anticipate, it should have its Headquarters in an important Capital—Paris, London, or Washington—at which all the parties have diplomatic Missions.

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], August 9, 1949

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION²³

Steering Committee

1. As a result of the recent proposals made separately by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chiefs of Staff Committee consider it essential to make certain recommendations which, if approved by Cabinet, will provide additional guidance for the Canadian representative on the Working Group of the North Atlantic Defence Organization.

2. In the organization for defence, both the United States and United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff propose a Steering Committee, the functions of which are not clearly defined. While the views of the U.S. and U.K. Chiefs of Staff are similar, the composition of the Steering Committee is not the same in both plans. The U.K. proposal shows Canada as a member of this Committee, along with the United Kingdom, the United States and France. There are indications that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff do not consider that the Steering Committee should be enlarged to include Canada.

3. Bearing in mind the previous decision of the Cabinet, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff continue to recommend that Canada should not seek an invitation to sit on the Steering Committee and hold with the previous decision that, if such invitation is forthcoming, it should be accepted. While Canada may not be a member of the Steering Committee, it is likely that she will be a member of one or more regional defence planning groups. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff recommend that our representative on the Working Group should insist that Canadian representatives participate fully in any discussions in the Steering Committee concerning the use or employment of Canadian resources in areas outside those of the regional defence planning organizations of which Canada is a member.

²³ Le Cabinet donna son approbation en principe aux recommandations contenues dans cette note, le 10 août 1949.

Cabinet approved the recommendations in this memorandum in principle on August 10, 1949.

Scope of the North Atlantic Planning

4. There has been a distinct difference of opinion as to the extent of the functions of the Steering Committee. While both the United States and the United Kingdom are opposed to having the North Atlantic Organization prepare strategic plans on a global basis, France, on the other hand, considers that the top North Atlantic military body should be responsible for strategic planning without geographical or other limitations. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff are of the opinion that an attempt to define in advance, with any greater precision than does the Treaty itself, the role of the Defence Committee, might lead to serious conflict at the outset, and that the object should be to let the nature and extent of the Committee's functions enlarge as the discussions proceed.

5. It is recommended, therefore, that the instructions to the Defence Committee from the Council of North Atlantic Foreign Ministers might merely be to recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5 of the Treaty. If the French insist on more precise terms of reference for the senior military committee, the following compromise might be satisfactory:

“(a) To recommend measures for the maintenance and development of the individual and collective capacity of the Parties to resist armed attack; and

(b) to recommend the action to be taken in the event of an attack by the Parties individually and in concert to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.”

6. To this end the Chiefs of Staff recommend that the Canadian representative on the Working Group should endeavour to prevent any effort to determine in advance the precise scope and functions of the Defence Organization.

Regional Organization

7. Both the U.K. Chiefs of Staff and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff have suggested certain regional organizations, the purpose of which will be to plan the defences of the respective regions. These are as follows:

- (a) Western Europe
- (b) The Western Mediterranean
- (c) Northern Europe
- (d) The Atlantic Ocean
- (e) North America.

8. The U.K. Chiefs of Staff include Canada in the North American and Atlantic ocean organizations. The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, in addition to the North American and Atlantic Ocean organizations, also include Canada as an observer in the Western Europe organization, similar to the position shown for the United States.

9. It has been noted that the U.K. proposal for Western Europe deletes Canada as an observer but includes the United States as a full member. If the United States does not accept full membership in the Western Europe organization, but retains its present status as an observer, the Chiefs of Staff recommend that Canada also continue to be an observer on the Western Europe organization. On the other hand, if the United States becomes a member of Western Europe organization, the Chiefs of Staff recommend that the Canadian position be examined in the light of that arrangement.

North American Defence Organization

10. The U.K. Chiefs of Staff, in their proposals for the Defence Organization for North America, refer to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and suggest that the North American organization be brought into line with the other regional Chiefs of Staff Committees.

11. The responsibility for Canadian participation in the U.S.—Canadian Defence Planning was delegated to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff by the Cabinet Defence Committee on 4th December, 1945. While the Permanent Joint Board on Defence is an advisory body to the United States and Canadian Governments on joint defence matters, it has never been responsible for defence planning.

12. The Chiefs of Staff recommend, therefore, that, while the Permanent Joint Board on Defence should continue its normal functions, the responsibility for North American Defence Planning insofar as Canadian participation is concerned, should continue to be that of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff.

Location of Steering Committee

13. In studying the overall problems of the North Atlantic Defence Organization, it has become obvious that the Supply Organization which will be necessary under the North Atlantic Treaty must work side by side with the Military Organization. It is considered that the Supply Organization can be suitably located only in Washington. The Chiefs of Staff therefore feel that their previous recommendation, in which Washington was considered preferable as the location of the Military Organization, is now further strengthened by the necessity of locating both the Military and Supply Organizations at the same place.

Washington, August 12, 1949

North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

This morning Ignatieff and Rogers were invited to the State Department for conversations with Achilles and Galloway about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. They were given two copies of four outline diagrammatic plans which had been taken to Europe by the United States Chiefs of Staff as a basis for discussions on their tour. One copy of each of the four plans is being sent to you under despatch No. 1908† in to-morrow's bag, and the other is being retained here. General

Gruenther will probably give copies of these plans to General Foulkes when he arrives on Monday, but he can see them at the Embassy if he would like to do so before proceeding to his meeting with General Gruenther.

2. The four plans were shown to the Europeans without any indication as to their source. Achilles said that plan "A" was an early British suggestion, plan "B" was the United States suggestion, plan "C" was a Canadian suggestion (cf. General Foulkes' paper of 7th March), and plan "D" was prepared by the United States Chiefs' Staff as a "straw man" in the hope that it would appeal to nobody because it was too weak.

3. The Europeans, Achilles said, expressed a preference for plan "B", which is basically known to you already. At the top there is the Council set up by Article 9. Directly under it is a North Atlantic Defence Committee composed of Ministers of Defence. Under the North Atlantic Defence Committee are two bodies: a North Atlantic Military Supply Board composed of representatives of each signatory; and a North Atlantic Military Advisory Council composed of a military representative of each signatory on the Chief-of-Staff level. Subordinate to the North Atlantic Military Advisory Council is a Steering and Executive Group, and working for this latter group is a North Atlantic Military Staff headed by a Director. All these bodies are related to each other, in the manner shown, for policy direction. Membership on the Steering and Executive Group would be confined to the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, and would exclude Canada, though in cases where our interests were deemed to be directly concerned, we should have the right to appear before the Group. Achilles indicated that the consideration involved was the potential Canadian military contribution.

4. There would, in addition, be five regional planning groups as follows:

(1) Canadian-United States Regional Planning Group

Canada
United States
(preferably MCC)

(2) Western European Regional Planning Group (Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee)

United Kingdom
France
Belgium
Netherlands
Luxembourg
United States*
Canada*
Italy
Denmark

(3) North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group

United States
United Kingdom
Canada
Portugal

France
 Norway
 Denmark
 Iceland

(4) Northern European (Norway—Denmark) Regional Planning Group

Norway
 Denmark
 United States
 United Kingdom

(5) Western Mediterranean Regional Planning Group

Italy
 France
 United Kingdom
 United States
 Portugal

5. These regional groups would all be co-ordinated by the North Atlantic Military Advisory Council but would not be subjected to any command-relationship under it. By way of further explanation, countries marked with a single asterisk are meant to maintain their "present relationship" and countries marked with two asterisks are meant to participate "as appropriate".

6. Achilles said that he thought that the European members would not be satisfied with the United States and Canada participating in the Western European Regional Planning Group only as observers. The United States armed forces, however, were reluctant to have United States responsibilities in the Western European Regional Planning Group extended beyond participation as observers because of the composition of the Group and because of the possible military commitments involved. Achilles thought that this group would be made up of exactly the same men as the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee: Because of this identification of personnel, the Americans would want to keep their connection as tenuous as possible to avoid increasing their commitments for the land defence of Western Europe.

7. There was also some difference of opinion about the nature of the North Atlantic Military Staff. The British were in favour of having it as a Secretariat, while the Americans leaned towards having it act as a genuine military staff to prepare the way for the work of the Steering and Executive Group.

8. Achilles particularly wanted to have even our preliminary reaction to the following points:

(a) Our exclusion from the Steering and Executive Group.

(b) The possibility that the Canadian—United States Regional Planning Group might be cut off the chart entirely in order to avoid having it report through the multi-national North Atlantic Military Advisory Council, and submit plans to it. A later conversation this afternoon disclosed that thinking in the State Department is veering away from this possibility and now tends to favour its retention.

(c) For the reasons given in paragraph 6 above, the United States favours being represented on the Western European Regional Planning Group by observers as at present. Achilles wants to know if we would prefer to maintain observer status or seek fuller participation in Western European military planning at an earlier stage.

(d) The elimination of an economic advisory body which the Chiefs of Staff had originally included in their chart on the level of the North Atlantic Defence Committee or the North Atlantic Military Supply Board (Achilles was not sure which). Achilles wanted to know if we had any views on this. The economic body, incidentally had had as its purpose the assessment of economic factors affecting defence; it was not intended to implement Article 2 of the Treaty.

9. Thereafter the conversation broadened to include a discussion of the programme of the working group. The State Department hopes to initiate talks on 22nd August with the Council to meet about 15th September. The State Department hopes that the working group will be able to prepare an agenda for the North Atlantic Council which would include subjects other than the organizational problem of defence, though no indication was given of what such items might be.

10. The State Department, instead of presenting the working group at its opening meeting with a proposal for a defence organization, plans to give it nothing except a suggested agenda, and Achilles indicated that they would welcome suggestions for the agenda from us ahead of the meeting.

11. Achilles was of the opinion that there would be much less difficulty with the French this time as "the heat is off" now that they are satisfied they will be on the Steering and Executive Committee.

12. The State Department invited further informal exchanges of views with us. If, therefore, there are any points you would like to have clarified or taken up with them, your comments would be appreciated.

Following from Heeney. Begins: Reference your WA-2154 of August 12, North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

1. As the Minister is absent from Ottawa, he has not yet had an opportunity to consider the various aspects of your teletype under reference or to approve instructions to the Canadian representatives taking part in discussions in the Working Group which, I understand, are to commence on August 22. The observations expressed below (with the exception of the Cabinet recommendations which you have already received) are, therefore, my own although I think you may assume that they also reflect accurately Mr. Pearson's views.

2. In general I would hope that the Working Group would not attempt at this stage to formulate any precise or complete blueprint for the whole Organization. The organs under the Treaty, which are to be set up at this time, should be confined to those which are immediately essential. Additional bodies could be set up when the need for them is clearly established. It would, I think, be in order for you to express this view to the State Department.

3. In your teletype under reference, I note that Achilles has expressed the opinion that there would be less difficulty with the French "now that they are satisfied they will be on the Steering and Executive Committee". I feel that the conflict of view between the U.S. and the U.K. on the one hand and the French on the other as to the scope of planning to be undertaken by the military organization is fundamental and I have seen no indication to date that a reconciliation has been achieved. I think it would be desirable, therefore, for you to approach the appropriate U.S. authorities pointing out that we consider that the general interest would best be served by limiting reference of the Senior Military Committee to general terms and by avoiding any attempt at this time to define the Committee's role with any greater precision than does the Treaty itself. Thus the instructions to the Defence Committee from the Council might merely be to "recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5". I would hope that neither the United States nor the United Kingdom will raise the question of the terms of reference in the Working Group. If the French do, I would suggest some such language as the following might be a satisfactory compromise:

"(a) to recommend measures for the maintenance and development of the individual and collective capacity of the Parties to resist armed attack, and

(b) to recommend the action to be taken, in the event of an attack, by the Parties individually and in concert to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area."

4. If such terms of reference (which admittedly avoid the issue) are accepted by the United Kingdom, the United States and France, the possibility of a early impasse in the establishment of the organization might be averted. We would hope that the conflict between the notions of regional and global planning could in practice be reconciled within the organization as experience dictated. On the one hand, any demand by the French for the tabling of U.K., U.S. strategic plans might be prevented; on the other hand, regional planning under the Treaty could go ahead on a realistic basis so long as the United Kingdom and the United States are willing to reveal and discuss in the North Atlantic Steering Committee the more important aspects of their strategic plans. In regard to the latter, I do not see how it would be possible to avoid some discussion of the wider issues in the North Atlantic Organization; at the same time, we agree that it would be a considerable (and unnecessary) embarrassment to the U.K. and U.S. if they were called on to table their complete overall plans.

5. In paragraph 8 of your teletype under reference, you indicated that the State Department wished to have our preliminary reaction on the following questions related to the North Atlantic Organization:

(a) the possibility that Canada may be excluded from the Steering and Executive Group;

(b) whether Canada would agree to the elimination from the North Atlantic Organization of an economic advisory body;

(c) whether Canada would prefer to maintain its present observer status on Western Union or whether Canada would seek fuller participation in Western European planning at an early stage;

(d) the possibility that the Canadian/U.S. regional planning group might be excluded from the North Atlantic Organization.

6. With respect to (a), the composition of the Steering and Executive Group, you have already received the Chiefs of Staff Committee recommendation approved by Cabinet on August 10 (my EX-1971 of August 12)† reaffirming that Canada would not seek an invitation to sit on the Steering Group, but that, in the event such an invitation were forthcoming, it would be accepted. I am happy to note that Achilles has pointed out that if Canada were not included on the Steering Group, our representatives would have the right to appear before the Group in cases where our interests were deemed to be directly concerned. In this respect, I note that all the signatories will be accorded membership on the Military Supply Board and I would hope myself that, if any Supply Executive Group were subsequently established, Canada would be accorded membership. Thus, consultation by the Steering Group (which I consider essential when our interests are involved) and membership on the Military Supply Board and on any subordinate executive body will probably serve to protect our interests reasonably well.

7. With respect to (b), the omission under the U.S. plan of an Economic Advisory Council, we agree that this would be desirable at this stage. Some economic agency may have to be created at a later date for the purpose of considering the various economic and financial problems arising particularly from pledges of mutual assistance. However, it is considered that the Military Supply Board, at least at the outset, will be able to give consideration to the majority of the economic and financial problems affecting defence. I think, therefore, that our general approach at this stage should be that it would be undesirable to establish a special economic committee until such time as its need can be clearly demonstrated.

8. With respect to (c), you have already received Cabinet's conclusion of August 10, "that, in the event the United States remained as an observer in the Western Europe organization, Canada should also continue to be an observer on that organization; if, however, the United States became a member of the Western Europe organization, the Canadian position should then be re-examined in the light of that arrangement". It might perhaps be pointed out to the State Department that Canada shares the reluctance of the U.S. to become more closely related to Western Union and, for your own information, we would not wish that the present happy arrangement be prejudiced whereby Canada participates as an observer on an equal basis with the United States in the Western Union deliberations.

9. The relationship of the Canadian/U.S. planning body to the North Atlantic Defence Organization raises special problems and I shall send you my preliminary views on this subject when I have had a chat with Foulkes. Our present view in the Department is that it would be both undesirable and unnecessary to establish a "North American Chiefs of Staff Committee" in an effort to parallel the other North Atlantic regional Chiefs of Staff Committees.

10. In paragraph 2 of your WA-2185 of August 16,† you asked for our views on the time and place for the meetings of the Council and Defence Committee. As both Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton are absent from Ottawa, I cannot give their views for the present. We will endeavour to do so early next week.

11. With regard to the character of representation at the Working Group meetings, my view is that we would be willing to accept the U.S. decision on whether military representatives should attend. I would appreciate your comments on this aspect.

Following from Heeney: Further to my EX-2021 of August 19, North Atlantic Defence Organization.

1. The views expressed below on questions related to the North Atlantic Defence Organization arising in the Working Group discussions, have received the approval of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, which met in a special session August 22 with Norman Robertson and myself. The suggestions set forth below, therefore, are for the guidance of Ignatieff in the Working Group.

(a) Status of Future Canadian Representation on the Western European Group

It seems to me unlikely that the United States will become a full member of Western Union. On the assumption that Western Union will be the regional planning group for Western Europe, the present arrangement whereby the United States "participates as an observer" in Western Union deliberations should meet all practical U.S. requirements. Their observers have and exercise the right to express opinions in and present proposals to the various Western Union military bodies. Full membership in Western Union might tend to increase pressure upon the United States for heavier financial and military commitments in Western Europe. For this reason, we think that it would be unacceptable to Congress. It has been suggested that the United States might accept an intermediate position between that of observer and that of full membership. In this event the Canadian position might require re-examination but we do not understand what such an "intermediate" position would entail.

The present Canadian relationship to Western Union is satisfactory from our point of view. The Canadian observer appears to enjoy an equal status with the U.S.

observer in the Western Union deliberations and, so far as can be gathered, receives almost all of the information which is made available to the United States. It is unlikely that the Canadian Government would wish to become more closely associated with Western Union—even if the United States should do so. In any event, Canada's position can be distinguished from that of the United States since no Canadian forces remain in Europe.

(b) The Canadian Position with respect to the Steering Group

(1) The Chiefs of Staff have recommended that if Canada is not included on the Steering Group, some formula should be sought under which our representatives would have the right to appear before the Group where our interests are directly concerned. The general principle should, therefore, be established that in any case where the Steering Group planned the use of forces or facilities of any signatory outside the regional grouping of which that signatory were a member, that signatory should have the right to participate, as a member, in the deliberations of the Steering Group.

(2) You will recall that this principle of Canadian participation in planning the employment of Canadian resources was stated in the memo of August 9, 1949, (EX-1971 of August 12) approved by Cabinet on August 10. As it now seems improbable that we will be on the Steering Group, you should emphasize the importance we attach to its acceptance in theory and in practice. In putting it forward you should do so in general terms which would be applicable to any signatory, although in practice its application would be particular to Canada which would be the only non-member of the Steering Group having resources likely to be required outside its own regional grouping.

(3) The choice of the term "Steering" as applied to the Central or Executive Committee is, in our opinion, unfortunate. We would consider that a more suitable and acceptable designation would be "Continuing", "Standing", "Executive" or even "Sub" Committee. We also think that the Military Advisory Council should be called the "North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee", or in any event that the words "Advisory" and "Council" are objectionable.

(c) The North American Regional Organization

While it would, I think, be unnecessary to establish a "North American Chiefs of Staff Committee" in an effort to parallel precisely the other North Atlantic Regional Chiefs of Staff Committees, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff feel it might be advantageous to meet with the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff on occasion. It is felt that the present machinery for Canada-U.S. planning, i.e.: the Canada-U.S. Military Cooperation Committee is satisfactory and should continue to be utilized. If the other signatories feel that for the sake of consistency comparable North American machinery should be established, we would probably be willing to consider the formal creation of a North America Chiefs of Staff.

(d) Canada's position with respect to the Military Supply Board

It appears likely that a Military Supply Board will be set up to parallel the North Atlantic Military Advisory Council, the Board to consist of a high level representative (military or civilian) from each of the Treaty powers. The Board will presumably be responsible for advising the Defence Committee on the supply implications of the defence plans. It seems to us that it may become necessary to establish a Supply Executive Committee (or a Continuing Committee). For obvious reasons our case for membership on such an executive committee would be very strong.

(e) Functions of the Military Council (and Steering Group)

The problem of the relationship of the Steering Group (Continuing Committee) to the Military Advisory Council (North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee) is an extremely important one. The Steering Group should, we feel, be provided for and perhaps actually nominated by the Defence Committee. Alternatively the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff organization could name their own Steering Group (For my part the former procedure would seem more appropriate). The Steering (or Executive) Committee should function as a part of and work on behalf of the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff.

(f) Meetings

The date suggested by the State Department, September 15, for the first meeting of the Council would, in the Minister's view, be inconvenient and inappropriate—inconvenient for us because Parliament assembles on that date and the Minister would find it exceedingly difficult if not impossible to be absent from Ottawa; inappropriate because it would be on the very eve of the Assembly meeting and would certainly be seized upon for propaganda purposes. Mr. Pearson thinks that the first meeting of the Council might take place in Washington after the Assembly has got down to work, say at the end of September or beginning of October.

We consider it important that the organization under the Treaty should be set up with a minimum of delay. But it may prove impossible to agree in advance of the first meeting of the Council on the precise scope and functions of the defence organization. The first meeting of the Defence Committee should take place as soon as possible after the first meeting of the Council.

We will be sending you more detailed instruction possibly today.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION

Summary of Progress

The first meeting of the Working Group, composed of representatives of the North Atlantic Treaty nations, met on August 23 to produce recommendations which would be submitted to the respective governments on the organization to be established under the Treaty. Canada was represented at the meeting by Mr. Ignatieff of the staff of the Canadian Embassy in Washington.

2. Under the procedure being followed by the Working Group, no votes are being taken, the Chairman merely summing up the consensus of opinion of the meeting. Early next week, a report will be drafted and submitted to governments for their comments in the light of which the draft will be revised. The final draft will, no doubt, be presented for approval to the first meeting of the Council.

3. At the outset of the discussions, the United States representative stressed the necessity for speed pointing out that, in order to ensure Congressional support for the continuation of the arms programme, action should be taken under the Treaty to complete plans for the organization, as well as military plans for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5 of the Treaty, by March 31, 1950. The U.S. representative, therefore, proposed that the first meeting of the North Atlantic Council (composed of Foreign Ministers) should be called in Washington for September 15 and that the Defence Committee (composed of the Ministers of Defence) should meet within a week thereafter, preferably in Washington.

4. On instructions, the Canadian representative pointed out that the date suggested by the State Department, September 15, for the first meeting of the Council would coincide with the opening of the Canadian Parliament and that it would be most inappropriate to hold the first meeting of the Council immediately prior to the opening of the U.N. General Assembly for it might be expected that the Soviet bloc would exploit it to the full for propaganda purposes. He proposed that the first meeting of the Council might take place in Washington after the Assembly had got down to work. The majority of signatories, however, agreed with the U.S. recommendation and it was agreed that the first meeting should be held in Washington on September 17.

5. With respect to the first meeting of the Defence Committee, no definite time or place of meeting has been agreed upon. The Canadian representative has expressed the opinion that the meeting should take place in Washington as soon as possible after the meeting of the Council.

6. The United States representative to the Working Group also suggested an outline of the organization under the Treaty. Under the U.S. plan, the highest political body would consist of the Council, meeting perhaps once a year with no permanent headquarters. The terms of reference of the Council should be the entire Treaty.

7. Under the Council would be a Defence Committee composed of the Ministers of Defence of the signatory states having general terms of reference such as "recommending measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5". It was felt that the Defence Committee would need to meet somewhat more frequently than the Council.

8. Serving the Defence Committee would be a Military Advisory Council composed of representatives of all the signatories at a Chiefs of Staff level. The Military Advisory Council would be responsible for formulating recommendations to the Defence Committee on the measures necessary for unified defence and for providing general guidance to the regional defence groups. The Council would have a permanent site, probably Washington, and meetings would be held as required.

9. In permanent session would be a Steering or Executive Group composed of representatives, at the Chiefs of Staff level, of the United States, United Kingdom and France. The Steering Group would give policy guidance to the regional groups on the co-ordination, unification and integration of regional defence plans and would also make recommendations to and presumably receive direction from the Military Advisory Council.

10. A Military Supply Board would also be established consisting of representatives of each of the signatories. The Supply Board would parallel the Military Advisory Council and would be responsible for advising the Defence Committee on the supply implications of the defence plans.

11. The Canadian representative has been instructed that if Canada is not included on the Steering Group, some formula must be sought under which our representatives would have the right to appear before that Group where our interests are directly concerned. He has, therefore, stressed that a general principle should be established that in any case where the Steering Group plan the use of forces or facilities of any signatory outside the regional grouping of which that signatory were a member, that signatory should have the right to participate, as a member, in deliberations of the Steering Group. (Mr. Ignatieff reports that this proposed formula appears to have been favourably received.) It was pointed out by the Canadian representative that the Canadian Government considers it of paramount importance that Canadian representatives should participate from the initial stages in any planning involving the use of Canadian resources or military manpower. Otherwise, plans might be presented to us for approval in the framing of which our representatives would have no voice and the rejection of which by the Canadian Government might prove politically embarrassing.

12. Although nomenclature is probably not of great importance, the terms "Military Advisory Council" and "Steering Group" seem rather objectionable. Mr. Ignatieff was instructed to suggest that the term "North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee" would be more appropriate and less confusing than "Military Advisory Council" and that such terms as "Continuing Committee" or "Standing Committee" would be preferable to "Steering Group". Mr. Ignatieff reports that these suggestions appear to have been favourably received.

13. Further meetings of the Working Group will be held next week and I shall keep you fully informed as to the progress of the discussions.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; DEFENCE ORGANIZATION; PROGRESS REPORT

21. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 10th, reported that representatives of the signatory countries were now meeting in Washington to draft proposals on the organization that should be established under the North Atlantic Treaty. The report of the working group would be presented to the first meeting of the North Atlantic Council and then be submitted to governments for their consideration.

The proposed organization would include a North Atlantic Council composed of Foreign Ministers (this was scheduled to hold its first meeting on September 17th); a Defence Council composed of Ministers of Defence (which was scheduled to hold its first meeting on October 5th); a Military Advisory Council composed of representatives of all the signatories at the Chiefs of Staff level; a Steering or Executive group composed of military representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and France; a Military Supply Board composed of representatives of all the signatories; and five regional planning groups.

The government had already agreed that Canada should participate on the Steering and Executive Committee if invited to do so. However, despite earlier indications to the contrary, the inclusion of Canada had not been suggested. As this was the main planning body, the acceptance of some formula was sought whereby Canada would be represented when our interests were directly concerned. If suitable provision was made for this, Canada would then be able to participate on appropriate occasions in the planning stage and this was regarded as a satisfactory arrangement.

A U.S. proposal to establish an economic advisory committee on defence programmes (to consider payment problems and recommend defence production programmes) had been opposed by the Canadian representative on the working group and there were indications that the U.S. idea would be modified.

It was recognized that the establishment of the North Atlantic organization and the work of the various bodies would create many problems for the signatory countries. In general, the attitude being taken by the Canadian representative on the working group was that these should be met progressively as they arose rather than attempt to solve them at this time. The Canadian representative had made a number of suggestions, including changes in nomenclature, and for the most part these had been accepted.

(External Affairs memorandum, Aug.31, 1949).†

22. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the progress being made towards the establishment of a defence organization under the North Atlantic Treaty.

North Atlantic Treaty. Standing Group and participation of non-members.

2. Reference my messages WA-2345† and WA-2354†, Achilles spoke to Ignatieff Thursday, September 1, in order to ask that we should not continue to press too hard for a "water-tight" formula on the question of participation of non-members in the Standing Group, as he said that Canada could be quite assured of having its interests fully protected as far as the Standing Group was concerned because of our special relations with the United States and the United Kingdom. He suggested that it was to our interest as much as to that of the United States and the United Kingdom that the Standing Group should be enabled to operate effectively. He said that the formula, as it left the Working Group yesterday, had been referred to the United States Chiefs of Staff, who were somewhat perturbed at the idea that non-members should have too free an access to the Standing Group. Achilles said he expected to have the reaction of the United States Chiefs of Staff in a day or two, and said that he would indicate what these were to Ignatieff privately. He welcomed our reactions informally also. Ignatieff took the occasion to point out that the Canadians' interests were specially involved in the question of participation in the Standing Group as in our case the use of forces and facilities outside our own region was more likely to arise than in the case of the other non-members of the Standing Group. Achilles said this point was fully appreciated on the United States side, and again said that, in practice, our interests would be fully safeguarded by the suggested formula.

3. The conversation then turned to the composition of the Regional Groups. Achilles said that it was the United States hope that the Working Group would attempt to define, as far as possible, for consideration of Governments, what respective composition the groups should be as this was primarily a political question. On the other hand, the definition of the degree or nature of participation of non-members in respective groups might be left to be worked out in detail by the military. Achilles said that the United States association with the western union as well as with the other European Regional Groups would almost certainly be on the basis of full participation in planning as non-members. He explained this association by saying that it would be full participation on the lower planning staff level without membership or representation in the higher regional bodies. In this way the United States would have an opportunity to participate in the formulation of regional defence plans without necessarily becoming involved in specific commitments in each region in regard to their forces and facilities. He confirmed Ignatieff's understanding that the Western Union Group were now less anxious to accept full United States membership as it would be difficult in that event to refuse full membership to Italy, especially since that claim is now being sponsored by France.

Following from Heeneey, begins. Reference North Atlantic Treaty Working Group.

1. Following a recommendation by the Canadian Chiefs that the composition of the Standing Group should be decided by the Defence Committee and perhaps be delegated to the Military Committee, the problem was discussed with both the Minister of National Defence and our Minister. The Chiefs of Staff had pointed out that it would be more constitutional for the Military Committee to name the members of its own sub-committee. In addition, they felt that it might be easier to provide for increased membership on the Standing Group in the future if members were named by the Military Committee rather than by the Council.

2. Our Minister explained to the Minister of National Defence that we had originally suggested (our EX-2061 of August 24) that the Steering Group should be provided for and perhaps actually nominated by the Defence Committee or alternatively by the Chiefs of Staff Organization. It was pointed out that this proposal was not satisfactory to the other members of the Working Group. Further, a formula for participation when our interests were directly concerned had been accepted by the Working Group and would adequately protect our interests. (The formula is that given in paragraph 2 (b) of your WA-2354 of August 31).†

3. It was agreed, therefore, that you should not reopen in the Working Group the question of the composition of the Standing Group. It was felt that by so doing the continued acceptance of the formula for participation might be prejudiced.

4. Referring to your WA-2370 Sept 1, the formula for participation by non-members in the work of the Standing Group should be regarded as a minimum Canadian requirement. The Canadian Government would not be willing to accept the concept of a Standing Group on which Canada was not represented without such a formula. You should, therefore, oppose any suggestion on the part of the United States to alter the formula set forth in paragraph 2(b) of your WA-2354. The Minister continues to feel that the word "resources" should be referred to in that formula.

As I mentioned to you over the telephone a few minutes ago, I was quite disturbed by the attached story in this morning's Citizen on "Canadian disappointment" at being "excluded" from the Steering Committee of the North Atlantic Defence Council.²⁶

I talked to Ross Munro about this matter yesterday and emphasized that there was no disappointment, and that our sole aim was to make sure that Canadian interests were protected by Canadian representatives whenever they were discussed by the "Standing Committee". One way to ensure this would be by membership on that Committee; the other way by participation in its work whenever anything of direct interest to Canada was under consideration. I told Munro that either of the above procedures would be satisfactory to us. I told him that we were quite satisfied with developments in the North Atlantic discussions now going on in Washington.

Munro, however, must have spoken to National Defence and received a different impression—hence this morning's story.

I have also talked to him this morning expressing my irritation at the wrong emphasis given in this story. He was very apologetic and stated that the Citizen had left out that part of the story which explained our position as stated above in regard to Canadian participation in matters before the Committee of interest to Canada. He admitted that he had also talked to National Defence "authorities" who had, on the other hand, expressed the disappointment to which he refers in his article. I told him that any of the soldiers or others in National Defence were misleading him if they took this line, and that they did not know what they were talking about if they attempted to represent it as government policy. I pointed out to him that no doubt some of them would be disappointed if Canada were not represented on this inner group, but that their disappointment was personal and not governmental.

I am almost more disturbed by the attitude being taken by National Defence people, and the fact that they are apparently talking to and misleading the press, than I am by Munro's article. I think that it would be a good idea to have a word with Claxton about this, or even better, to send him a memorandum on these lines, a copy of which could go to the Prime Minister.

If we are not careful, this situation regarding the "Standing Committee" is going to be misinterpreted by the press as a defeat for Canada, and for that misinterpretation, the press may not be primarily responsible.

Atlantic Treaty Working Group. Following for Mr. Pearson from MacKay. Begins:

I regret memorandum was not quite finished when you left. Ignatieff can provide you with copies of working papers containing terms of reference of various bodies agreed on to date. Memorandum summarizing progress of working group to September 2 follows. Begins:

The procedure followed in the Working Group is that there is no voting, the Chairman merely summing up the discussions. A Drafting Group has been set up to prepare working papers which are being distributed to Governments, and which, subject to amendment in the light of comments by Governments, will be included in the report to be submitted by the Working Group to the Council when it meets.

At the opening session the Working Group was presented with a set of proposals by the United States which have largely constituted the Agenda. These proposals contemplate the possible establishment of the following bodies:

- (a) Council
- (b) Military Committee
- (c) Military Advisory Committee (now called Chiefs of Staff Committee)
- (d) A Steering Group of the Military Advisory Committee (now called Standing Group)
- (e) Five Regional Planning Groups
- (f) An Economic Committee
- (g) A Military Supply Board.

All the above organizations except the Military Supply Board have now been disposed of and all but the Economic Committee agreed to. The Military Supply Board will come up for further discussion on Tuesday, September 6.

2. The Council. It is agreed that the Council will meet September 17. It will have as terms of reference the North Atlantic Treaty and presumably the report of the Working Group.

3. Military Committee. It is tentatively agreed that the Military Committee will meet October 5 and will provide for the establishment of the military organization subject to direction from the Council.

4. Chiefs of Staff Committee. A compromise appears to have been reached between the view that this body should be an overall planning group and the view that it should be merely a body for co-ordinating regional plans. In effect the work of the Chiefs of Staff Committee is likely to fall mainly on the Standing Group. The terms of reference of the Standing Group are therefore an essential guide to the functions of the Chiefs of Staff Committee as a whole.

5. Standing Group. It is agreed that the Standing Group shall consist of the United States, United Kingdom and France, that it shall represent the whole body, and that "to achieve a unified defence of the North Atlantic area the Standing Group shall co-ordinate and integrate the defence plans originating in the Regional Planning Groups and make appropriate recommendations thereon to the Military Committee".

The following formula providing for participation of non-members when their interests are involved was included: "It is understood that before the Standing Group makes any recommendations on any plans or course of action involving the use of forces, facilities or resources of a party not represented on the Standing Group, going beyond or differing from arrangements previously agreed by the party concerned, that party shall have the right to participate in the work of formulating such recommendations".

6. Regional Planning Groups. Serious difficulties arose over the Regional Planning Groups for the following reasons among others:

- (a) The unwillingness of the United States to be listed as a full member on all Groups;

(b) The dismay of the European members if the United States did not take part in regional planning of the North European and Western European regions;

(c) The desire of all members bordering on the Atlantic to be in the Ocean Group, (Iceland excepted).

A compromise was reached by providing for flexible arrangements for participation in regional planning as follows:

(a) All members interested in a region are listed for the regional group;

(b) Adoption of the same formula for regional planning as for participation in the work of the Standing Group of the Chiefs of Staff;

(c) Any Regional Group may invite any party not a member of the Regional Group to participate in its deliberations if it can contribute to the defence of the region;

(d) With respect to the North Atlantic Ocean region it is proposed that planning might be on a functional basis, that is to say, Committees might be established to plan certain phases eg. convoy. This provision was introduced to avoid the difficulty of equal participation by all members in all planning, and to get around the embarrassing problem of selecting a Standing Group for the region.

7. Economic Committee. It has been agreed that although an Economic and Financial Committee will be ultimately needed its establishment should be postponed pending clarification of the need.

8. Military Supply Board. Conflicting proposals have been put forward by the United States and the United Kingdom. The United States proposal is essentially that the Military Supply Board should be set up in Europe, that it should concern itself mainly with co-ordinating production and supply programmes of European members and inter-European payments, with keeping demands within reasonable budget limits (European and North American), and advising the Military Committee regarding net needs, apparently at the request of the Military Committee.

The United States plan appears to have developed out of experience with the Western Union Supply Board, ECA and the Military Appropriations Programme.

United Kingdom proposals are essentially that the Supply Board should be set up in Washington, that a Co-ordinating Committee of the Board should be established in Europe to work in co-operation with Regional Planning bodies, that the Board should be on an equal footing with the Chiefs of Staff Committee in advising the Military Council with respect to supply needs and planning of production.

It is suggested that we should support the American Programme for the following reasons:

(a) It would appear to place more responsibility on European members for meeting their own needs;

(b) It would appear to leave us to make direct arrangements with the United States regarding supplies and production for the North American region without reference to the Supply Board;

(c) It would appear to leave the initiative more to the United States and ourselves in the matter of meeting the net needs of European members. The British plan might tend to encourage the development of overall supply plans on a substantially greater scale than the United States proposals. Text ends. Message ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; DEFENCE ORGANIZATION

23. The Minister of National Defence and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of August 31st, said it had now been confirmed that, in the report of the Working Group, Canada would not be included with the United Kingdom, the United States and France in the membership of the "Standing Group" (a military planning committee to function under a committee composed of representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of all signatory nations).

In line with the Cabinet's decision, no representations had been made for full membership in the "Standing Group". The Canadian representative had, however, been instructed (after reference to the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs) to propose a formula entitling Canada and other smaller countries to participate in the deliberations of the "Standing Group" when the employment of their resources was being planned. It had been made clear that nothing less would be acceptable to the Canadian government.

The adoption of the proposed formula had met with some opposition from the U.S. representatives but there were indications that their attitude had modified and a satisfactory outcome was now anticipated.

(External Affairs memorandum, Sept. 7, 1949).†

24. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the remarks of the Minister of National Defence and approved the action taken by him and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in instructing the Canadian representative on the Working Group to press for acceptance of a formula designed to safeguard Canadian interests in the early stages of military planning under the North Atlantic Treaty.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, September 8, 1949

With reference to your memorandum to me of September 3rd concerning Munro's articles in the Citizen, on Canada's relationship to standing group of the North Atlantic Military Committee, I have spoken both to Mr. Claxton and to Munro himself.

Mr. Claxton was sceptical of Munro's intimation that he had gathered the impression of "disappointment" from officials of the Department of National Defence. He will make enquiries but is inclined to doubt that any officers had been in touch with Munro on the subject. He agrees, of course, that it would be quite improper for them to express any views to the press, particularly when they run contrary to government decisions.

Mr. Claxton shares your concern lest the impression be created that we had gone all out to obtain membership on the standing group and had failed to do so. He decided to bring the matter up in the Cabinet this week and obtained formal approval of the instructions given to Ignatieff (with his concurrence as well as your own) to accept as a minimum the participation formula which we had been instrumental in putting forward in Washington.

There is no doubt, I think, that Munro did speak to National Defence officers and did gather, no doubt correctly, that they felt that Canada should be a full member of the standing group. This will no doubt be the C.G.S.'s view (when he returns—he has been away on leave for some weeks) and it is probably reflected in his subordinates in the Army. I do not know that this view is shared by officers of either of the other Services. There is, of course, no reason why they should not feel this way, but there is every reason why they should not express their views to the press. From the purely military point there was, as you know, a strong case for our being on the central group with the big fellows.

In the circumstances I have not written to Mr. Claxton but you may wish to bring the matter up with him again when you return.

It has been unfortunate that the C.G.S. has been away during the critical stage of the discussions on military organization in Washington. The other Chiefs have also been away for most of the time. The result has been that our contacts with the Chiefs of Staff Committee have necessarily been less satisfactory and at lower levels.

Minutes of Meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee

I. NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION

1. The Minister of National Defence explained that the purpose of the meeting was to consider the draft report of the Washington Working Group in the defence organization to be set up under the North Atlantic Treaty.²⁷

Two points should be considered—first, the form of Canadian association with the Western European Regional Planning Group, and second, the location of the Supply Board.

With regard to the former, it would be recalled that, at the invitation of the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission, Canada and the United States had participated as non-members in the Western Union Defence discussions. When the Western European Regional Planning Group came into being under the North Atlantic Defence Organization, this relationship would be changed. The United Kingdom was pressing for full participation by the United States in the Western European regional planning; the United States, however, had declined full membership but had agreed:

“to participate actively in the defence planning as appropriate”.

This qualified participation by the United States was applicable also in the case of the Northern European Regional Planning Group and the Western Mediterranean Regional Planning Group.

Participation by other non-member countries was provided under certain conditions. A special relationship was, however, suggested for Canada, Denmark and Italy:

“Other parties may, and in particular Canada, Denmark and Italy will, participate under the provisions listed above”.

While these countries had special interests in Western European planning, these interests were not the same. Both Denmark and Italy sought full membership in the regional planning group; Canada, on the other hand, would prefer to limit its participation to the status of observer. For these and other reasons, it was not desirable that Canada should be classed with Denmark and Italy in the special form of association indicated in the report of the Working Group.

²⁷ Une version quelque peu modifiée du «Report of the Working Group on Organization to the North Atlantic Council» est réimprimé dans: Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States, IV: Western Europe (Washington, 1975), pp. 330–337.

A slightly revised version of the “Report of the Working Group on Organization to the North Atlantic Council” is reprinted in Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States, IV: Western Europe (Washington, 1975), pp. 330–337.

Provision was made for participation by Canada in the Working Group when the use of Canadian resources was being discussed:

“It is recognized that it is the responsibility of individual governments to provide for the implementation of plans to which they have agreed. It is further recognized that it is the primary responsibility of the Regional Planning Groups to prepare plans for the defence of their respective regions.

“Subject to these principles, it is understood that before the Standing Group makes recommendations on any plan or course of action involving the use of forces, facilities or resources of a Party not represented on the Standing Group, going beyond or differing from arrangements previously agreed by the Party concerned, the Party shall have the right to participate in the Standing Group in the work of formulating such recommendations.”

It would be preferable to participate in the early stages of planning on the level of the Standing Group rather than on the Regional Planning Group level. This would give Canadian authorities a better insight into the overall planning and enable them to recommend the allocation of Canadian forces and resources to the different regional groups. The Chiefs of Staff had recommended that the special reference to Canadian participation in the Western European Regional Planning Group be omitted.

2. The Prime Minister stated that Canadian participation in the Western European Regional Planning Group should be permissive rather than compulsory. The general provision for participation by non-members implied that such countries would have an opportunity to determine when they desired to participate in the various planning group discussions. It would appear that the general provision for Canadian participation by non-members in regional defence groups met Canadian requirements.

3. The Chief of the General Staff observed that, if Canada accepted a relationship in the form it now appeared in the report, a commitment of forces would be hard to avoid. However, if the status of observer to the Western European Regional Planning Group could be retained, this would be of advantage. The United Kingdom had indicated that the continuation of Canada's role as an observer would be welcomed. There would therefore appear to be no necessity to make specific mention of this arrangement in the report of the Working Group.

4. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs read a draft amendment to the clause in question which the Canadian representative on the Working Group had been instructed to propose. The proposal might be interpreted as a move to withdraw from association with Western European countries and be opposed.

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, while the amendment might be opposed, a satisfactory explanation could be given to the other members of the Working Group. While specific reference to Canadian participation in the Western European Regional Planning Group could be omitted, it was undesirable to press for observer status for Canada in the Regional Defence Planning Group.

6. Mr. Claxton stated that the Chiefs of Staff considered that the Military Production and Supply Board should be located in Washington, where it could work in close proximity to the Military Committee and the Standing Group. Much of the work of the Supply Board would be closely related to that of these organizations.

7. Mr. Pearson pointed out that the U.S. authorities preferred to have the Supply Board located outside the United States. If it were located in the United States, there would be a tendency for countries requiring supplies to look upon it as a means of obtaining U.S. military supplies, rather than as an agency the purpose of which was to co-ordinate the military production programmes of all the signatory countries. There would be little advantage from the Canadian point of view in pressing for the location of the Military Production and Supply Board in Washington.

8. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed to recommend acceptance of the Working Group's draft report, provided that the form of Canadian participation in the Western European Regional Planning Group be on the same basis as for other planning groups of which Canada was not a member, and that the reference to special arrangements for Canadian participation in the Group be omitted from the report.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; DEFENCE ORGANIZATION

16. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the previous meeting, said that the draft report of the Working Group was now available for consideration prior to its submission to the Council of Foreign Ministers next Saturday.

Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Memorandum for Cabinet, Military Secretary, Cabinet Defence Committee, Sept. 12, 1949† and attached draft report of Working Group, Sept. 10, 1949—Cabinet Document 1041†).

17. Mr. Claxton reported that, as had been expected, Canada had not been included in the membership of the Standing Group (the principal planning body) but provision had been made for participation when the use of Canadian resources was being planned.

On the whole, the form of the organization set out in the report seemed satisfactory. The only matter requiring consideration was the form of Canadian association with the Western European Regional Planning Group. Apart from full participation of the signatories of the Brussels Pact there was provision for active participation in defence planning by the United States "as appropriate"; all other parties had the right to participate on occasions but a special association was recognized for Canada, Denmark and Italy. This provision had been considered by Cabinet Defence Committee in consultation with the Chiefs of Staff and senior civilian officials and it was felt that there were objections to the clause in its present form. It had, accordingly, been decided to instruct the Canadian representative on the Working Group to press for a textual change which would dissociate Canada from Denmark and Italy in defining relationships to the Western European Regional Planning Group.

18. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Canadian proposal had met with considerable opposition in the Working Group because of its possible interpretation as a move on the part of Canada to withdraw from association with Western European countries.

No difficulty was anticipated in having Canada associated with this Regional Planning Group on the same basis as the United States and, unless this would involve unexpected commitments, it might be preferable. There was objection to the Canadian relationship to the Planning Group being identified with that of Denmark and Italy, both of whom were pressing for full membership.

19. Mr. Claxton observed that membership in the North Atlantic Treaty would inevitably commit the Canadian government to expenditures in the interests of common defence. It was, however, open to question whether pressure for this would be increased as a result of closer association with Western Europe.

It should, however, be borne in mind that the United States had substantial forces stationed in Europe and had approved military aid legislation whereas Canada was not in a comparable position in either respect.

20. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved on behalf of the Canadian government the defence organization of the North Atlantic Treaty as outlined in the draft report of the Working Group, subject to reconsideration of the form of Canadian association with the Western European Regional Planning Group by the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

RE: NORTH ATLANTIC ORGANIZATION

As instructed, Ignatieff requested this afternoon, the deletion of Canada from the final sentence under Western European Regional Planning Group. (He had previously asked consideration for some special reference to Canada's participation as an observer—comparable to the role we have had in Western Union.) The reaction of the Working Group was apparently quite strong. They are prepared to make the reference to Canada in almost any terms we wish if we will permit the name Canada to remain. They feel that, if Canada's name is omitted, a significance will be attached to the omission which neither we nor others wish or intend. They (in particular the United Kingdom) besought Ignatieff to ask for reconsideration.

If Cabinet are willing to do so, the following special paragraph might fill the bill:

In addition to the participation provided for under the provisions listed above, Canada will continue the role of participation as a non-member, which has previously been accorded to Canada on the Western Union Military Committee as well as the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee.

I have instructed Ignatieff to hold to our request for deletion, repeating with emphasis the explanation he had previously made that omission of Canada's name was not to be taken as an indication of any lessening of Canadian interest in Western Europe or any desire to reduce our participation in Western European defence planning.

RE: NORTH ATLANTIC ORGANIZATION

My papers for today's meeting are returned herewith.

1. The Cabinet Defence Committee did not accept the recommendation coming from the Chiefs of Staff (and Minister of National Defence) as a result of this morning's meeting, suggesting the insertion of a special sentence to describe Canada's "observer" status in the Western European Regional Planning Group.

The Cabinet Defence Committee agreed that our representative on the Working Group should be instructed to request the deletion of the word "Canada" from the final paragraph of the draft report (under Western European Regional Planning Group) explaining that we would rely on the general provisions to permit of our participation in Western European planning.

I got [Ralph] Collins on the telephone, this afternoon, and Ignatieff was to put forward the request at once in the hope of having it accepted for the final draft report.

2. The Working Group's reaction to the request of deletion was violent. I took the matter up again with the Minister, during the Cabinet meeting, but he felt that the instructions should be adhered to. (See copy of my attached note to Mr. Pearson).²⁸

3. It is possible that the Minister will wish to review our position tomorrow morning. Meantime Ignatieff's instructions stand.

Note de la direction de la liaison de la Défense

Memorandum by Defence Liaison Division

TOP SECRET

Ottawa, September 21, 1949

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION
PROGRESS REPORT

As you know, the Cabinet, at its meeting on September 13, approved a draft report of the Working Group subject to reconsideration by the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary for External Affairs of the form of Canadian association with the Western European Regional Planning Group. Accordingly, the Canadian position with respect to the Western European Group was given further consideration by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and yourself and it was agreed that deletion of reference to Canada with respect to the Western European Group might be misinterpreted by the other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The Canadian representative to the Working Group, on instructions, was successful in having the following reference to Canada inserted in the Working Group's report under the heading of Western European Regional Planning Group:

"Canada and the United States have been requested and have agreed to participate actively in the defense planning as appropriate."

"Other parties may and in particular Denmark and Italy will participate under the provision listed above."

2. You will recall that throughout the Working Group deliberations, Italy pressed for membership on the Western European Group (and to a lesser extent on the Standing Group). At the meeting of the North Atlantic Council on September 17, the Italian reservations to the report with respect to the Standing Group and to the Western European Group were disposed of by the adoption of the following formula:

"It is recognized that there are problems which are clearly common to the defense of the areas covered by the three European regional groups. It is therefore important that arrangements be made by the Defense Committee with a view to insuring full co-operation between two, or if the need arises, all three groups."

3. As a result of the above formula, it will be left for the Defense Committee to give further consideration to the problem. It is understood that the Italian Government interprets the compromise formula in the sense that a special Standing Group should be established for the purpose of co-ordinating the regional planning of the Western European, the Northern European and the Southern European—Western Mediterranean Regional Planning Groups.

4. During the Working Group discussions, the Canadian representative, on instructions, pointed out that if economic and financial machinery was to be established, it should have terms of reference broad enough to include the general objectives contained in Article 2 of the Treaty. This proposal met with strong opposition on the part of the United States and United Kingdom representatives and reference to economic machinery in the report accepted by the Council reads as follows:

“The Council recognizes the importance of economic and financial factors in the development and implementation of military plans for the defense of the North Atlantic area. Consequently, there shall be established as soon as possible appropriate machinery to consider these matters. The details of organization of this machinery, terms of reference, etc., shall be studied forthwith by a Working Group which shall submit recommendations to the Council.”

5. At the meeting of the Council, the Canadian representative (The Secretary of State for External Affairs) received assurance that the recommendations of the Working Group would not in any way prejudice the establishment of machinery under other articles of the Treaty and would not be regarded as exhausting all the possibilities of organization under the North Atlantic Treaty. Accordingly, Council has recorded in its minutes an understanding to the effect that the powers of the Council, in setting up agencies under the Treaty, have not been exhausted and that the Council had, at its first meeting, only created those agencies regarded as immediately necessary for defense.

6. The Council, at the conclusion of its meeting in Washington, issued the Communiqué which was tabled in the House on September 20 and which sets forth in detail the North Atlantic Defense Organization.

The Defence Committee is to hold its first meeting in Washington on October 5. The Military Committee is presently scheduled to commence its sessions on October 7, also in Washington. In the meantime, the Working Group will continue to meet.²⁹

Attached is a copy of telegram WA-2648† of September 24 reporting the text of a paper circulated to the Working Group by the State Department for its meeting on ²⁹ Claxton formula son rapport au Cabinet d'après ce document. Le Cabinet nota le rapport et approuva les dispositions qui y étaient décrites, le 22 septembre 1949.

Claxton based his report to Cabinet on this document. Cabinet noted the report and approved the arrangements described in it on September 22, 1949.

Tuesday, September 27. The paper proposes the following subjects for consideration by the Working Group in preparing a report for the Defence Committee:

1. Defence Committee Secretariat
2. The establishment of organization
3. Security of information
4. Basic defence policies and initial directives
5. Military Production and Supply Board
6. Next meeting

2. With respect to (1) Defence Committee Secretariat, it is proposed that the host Government should provide the secretariat and that any permanent secretariat required between sessions should be located in Washington. I should think this would be satisfactory to us.

[3]. (2) Establishment of organization. It is proposed that the Defence Committee should accept the organization of the Military Committee, Standing Group and the Regional Planning Group as outlined in Council's report of September 17. I should think there is no objection to this (copy of the press communique in which the Council's recommendations are included is attached for your information).†

[4]. (3) Security of information. It is proposed that the Military Committee should establish a Committee of security experts to study a report on a suitable system of security of information for the organization. I should think this would be entirely acceptable to us but it is suggested that we should seek to be represented on this Committee.

[5]. (4) Basic defence policies and initial directives. The State Department paper does not elaborate this heading but it may refer to the terms of reference of the Standing Group as to whether it should be a co-ordinating body or a body with authority to initiate planning. It is suggested that we might withhold comment on this proposal until we see what develops. Our representation on the Working Party might be instructed to report immediately on any developments and seek instructions.

[6]. (5) Military Production and Supply Board. It is suggested that the Canadian representatives on the Working Party be instructed not to take the initiative in proposing any organization for Military Production and Supply and that they report back immediately any proposals made.

[7]. They might, however, be instructed to support general organization along the following lines:

(a) that the supply organization should be allowed to grow naturally and that for the present a minimum organization only should be established;

(b) that the supply organization might be allowed to grow out of existing organizations for Western Union. This would entail adding to the existing organization representatives of countries not in Western Union but in the Atlantic Treaty;

(c) that the supply organization should continue to be centered in Europe and that the organization be authorized to develop such liaison arrangements as it deems desirable with the Chiefs of Staff organization in Washington.

[8]. It is possible that financial aspects of supply may be raised at an early date. It is further suggested that if the question of a financial organization is raised in the Working Group, Canadian representatives might be instructed to oppose a formal organization at this time. It is possible that at a fairly early stage meetings of financial officials of the Treaty powers will be necessary as it was in the case of Western Union, and, if so, the question of financial organization might then be considered.

[9]. Attached for your consideration is a memorandum prepared by Mr. Ritchie based on conversations with Mr. Pierce.†

FIRST SESSION OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE COMMITTEE

The Defence Committee concluded its first session at a meeting held in Washington on Wednesday October 5, 1949.

The principal decisions reached were:

(1) The formal establishment of the organization of the Military Committee, the Standing Group and the Regional Planning Groups as outlined in the North Atlantic Council's directive of September 17, 1949 to the Defence Committee, together with the applicable policy statement contained therein.

(2) The adoption without amendment of a directive to the Military Committee. It was decided that the Military Committee would have its first meeting at the Pentagon at 2:30, Thursday, 6 October.

(3) The approval of the recommendations of the Military Production and Supply Working Party to the Defence Committee and the recommendation for the approval of the document to the North Atlantic Council. The calling of a meeting of the Military Production and Supply Board on a provisional basis pending Council action in London on November 1, 1949.

(4) Decision to locate the headquarters of the Regional Planning Groups as follows:

The Northern European Regional Planning Group in London;

The Western European Regional Planning Group in London;

The Southern European-Western Mediterranean Regional Planning Group—to be decided by agreement by the members of the group—France, Italy and United Kingdom. If the Governments of these countries cannot agree, the first meeting is to be held in Paris, the permanent location to be decided by majority vote of the Defence Committee at its next meeting;

The Canadian-United States Regional Planning Group in Washington;

The North Atlantic Regional Planning Group in Washington.

(5) The Defence Committee delegated to the Military Committee the problem of developing a system of security for the entire North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it being understood the Military Committee would set up a Sub-Committee to study and report on a suitable system as a matter of first priority. Pending such report the United States Government is to make interim security arrangements.

(6) It was agreed that the United States would provide secretarial services until the Defence Committee makes a determination regarding more permanent arrangements for secretariat at its next meeting, both for the Defence Committee and Military Committees.

(7) The next meeting of the Defence Committee is to be decided by the Chairman (Secretary Johnson) after consultation with each Defence Minister, the probable date being early in December.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY, ORGANIZATION; REPORT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

16. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of Sept. 22, reported on the first meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee held in Washington on October 5th.

The Defence Committee had formally established the Military Committee, the Standing Group and the Regional Planning Groups, and had taken steps to set up the Military Production and Supply Board. It had also approved the terms of a directive to the Military Committee to guide their future planning. The Military Committee had held their first meeting following the Defence Committee meeting. The Production and Supply Board was to meet on or about November 1st and the Regional Groups at an early date.
