Ounces of Prevention. Moisture in the Air.

Of the varying conditions of the air we breathe there are three which They are its purity, its temperature, air, at the freezing-point, can contain. But our sitting-room is ventilated from that outside air, which we have warmed to 68°, or perhaps higher, and at 68° it requires seven grains of water for saturation. This heated air, therefore, is at most only two-fifths saturated; in other models it is dry, and it may contain words, it is dry, and it may contain the form that outside air, which is a great future before her, in the opinion of an English traveller. well as purifying and regulating the system. It thoroughly removes those discovering falls. This evaporation and the consequent fall of temperature in the wet-bulb thermometer, give an exact measure of the dryness of the air. A considerable difference (6° or 8°) between two thermometers means that a censiderable evaporation is going on over the bulb: and this means that the surrounding air is comparatively dry, i.e., that it does not contain the means and the results of the surrounding air is comparatively dry, i.e., that it does not contain the surrounding air is comparatively dry, i. ..., that it does not contain enough water to saturate it at the given temperature. And what does a small difference of temperature mean? It means that little evaporation is possible because the air is ture.' The exact degrees of saturation for each temperature are ex-pressed in tables with which we need not concern ourselves here. The practical rule is a very simple one. It is this; the difference between the wet bulb and the dry bulb ther-mometer should not be less than 4° F., nor more than 8°. Where the difference ranges between these extremes, we may consider the air to be about moist enough for health especially concern our health. They are its purity, its temperature, and the amount of moisture it contains.

Of these three, the first two should be pretty well understood; if they are not, it is not for the lack of abundant discussion. But the questions which relate to the amount of moisture in the air are less discussed; they are seldom, indeed, stated very clearly. Of a dozea writers on by giene whose books lie on my table, only one (Dr. W. H. Corfield) gives as accurate and adequate account of even the first principles of the subject.

Let us inquire, then, about the moisture that we breathe. We have to ask: (1) How is water dissolved in air? (2) how can we know the amount in solution in any given place? (3) how wond we missure that ways can we regulate the amount in our sitting regons and houses?

Then, of course, there is no evaporation from the wet bulb, and consequently no chilling of the wet bulb, the water upon it being of the same temperature as the air of the room; and the two thermometers will stand at the same mark, high or low. This means, therefore, that the air is saturated; in winter time the moisture on window-panes will stell you the same thing, at least of the room may be comparatively dry at the same moment.

But when the air is not saturated, the went of the room around the books, and the when the air is not saturated, the went of the room around the books, it never does so violently and with pain, like a drastic cathartic. 3. The practical question is now, What is the proper degree of saturation? We need not know the actual quantity of water per cubic foot of air, for this quantity, as we see, varies immensely with the tempera because the air is already saturated.

2. How are we to know, and conveniently measure, the deficiency or the excess of moisture in the air?

The hygrometer tells us the degree of saturation, whether excessive or deficient, at any temperature. Of several kinds, Daniell's hygrometer is the best. It is very accurately made by Tiemann, of New York. The instrument consists of two precisely similar thermometers. The bulb of one is covered by a little good from its use in this disease.
