

POE'S

WHY BE UNHAPPY?
What's the use to be unhappy?
What's the use to fume and fret?
What's the use to look behind you,
Nursing up the vain regret?

What if life is clouded over,
With its sorrows dark and wild?
What if fortune does look sternly,
And she ever sometimes smil'd?

Why do you fret the sweet away?
Why do you fret the sweet away?
Why do you fret the sweet away?
Why do you fret the sweet away?

Why do you fret the sweet away?
Why do you fret the sweet away?
Why do you fret the sweet away?
Why do you fret the sweet away?

THE BELLE OF THE ORIENT

OR—
THE HINDOO MERCHANT'S LEGACY.

A STORY OF THE EAST AND WEST Concluded.

THE WIDOW AND THE ATTORNEY.

Strange as it may appear, and discordant as it had ever been with her habit and previous character, the widow was all smiles, and was glad to see the attorney once more. She even showed the lawyer at once, but she could speak a little English, and as he had gathered a smattering of the Hindoo tongue, also, she advised that she should converse without the aid of an interpreter, to which the attorney assented, and they were alone together.

The lawyer commenced by giving the lady a full and complete statement of the case, and she listened with the most attentive interest. He explained to her the nature of the property, and she seemed to understand it all. He then told her that she was to be paid a sum of money, and she seemed to be satisfied with it. He then asked her if she had any other business, and she said she had not. He then asked her if she had any other business, and she said she had not.

He pointed out to her that her only child was now in a distant clime beyond the reach of the protector whom she had chosen, he admitted, in opposition to her parents wishes. She was alone, without the means that her mother could so easily furnish to aid her, and which that mother should have been so ready to supply without delay.

By cautious degrees, he worked his proposition up to the point he desired and finally he frankly assured the excited and affrighted widow that if she were disposed to relent and would forth with provide liberally for her child (as he was now the only person who could do so) he would be glad to be engaged to her in a business, and he would be glad to be engaged to her in a business, and he would be glad to be engaged to her in a business.

Matters were soon arranged for the ship's departure from Calcutta. Hargreave never saw the doctor again, nor did he pursue the wretched way he had so nearly caused. There was no way to reach this world, without compromising the widow; and this could not do. The business which called the Maratho to Calcutta having been finally dispatched she got ready at last for sea again. Hargreave visited his son-in-law in six and less and midday.

arriving in China, and what he could not place on board the Maratho he shipped in another vessel then in port, soon bound for England. As usual his purchases were well made, and he returned for Katrin's benefit a large profit upon this judicious and timely investment of his funds.

As he was about to quit India, for the last time, forever, he sat down and penned a careful but brief epistle to Katrin's mother, in which he informed her that he was fully convinced that his wife had been deceived, and that she had intended for him, and was at that writing safe, alive and well! Moreover he assured her that he had never suffered from the annoyances of a troubled conscience—and hoped she would always enjoy the same blessing.

The unfortunate doctor, as he called himself, continued to wonder about the country, from one Hindoo city to another—at one time as a thug disguised in various ways, at others a physician, a mendicant, or a juggler; until death at last released him from a life that he had rendered miserable by his own early errors. He entertained but little regard for anything in life, but he had fallen into the path of his son, most curiously, and he proved of service to him, when the boy was once or twice in a critical condition, as we have seen. Though George Hargreave was grateful for his timely aid, he could not regret this man's absence from his association, and he never thought he had reason to dwell much upon the late history of the doctor, and he never thought he had reason to dwell much upon the late history of the doctor.

Hargreave had been absent from home nearly a year. He had written to his wife and friends several times, and he had not omitted to hint to Katrin that he was busy in the attempt to obtain for her the rights which belonged to her. He had received no replies to his letters, but his faithful wife had written him before she heard from him abroad, and the burden of her fears was to caution him against the machinations and the treachery that she knew must surround him in his native land. But he fortunately escaped the snares that were laid about his path, during his absence, and now he was once more a sight of the home he so ardently desired to see, the Maratho having made a good voyage from the East, with but trifling impediment from the outset.

The final enterprise of young Hargreave resulted happily. The investment he made could be sold for a large sum of money, and the funds belonged to Katrin had been so used that a net surplus of fifty per cent was realized in the end, upon her money also. This in a pecuniary view, Hargreave and his wife were ultimately in possession of a fortune of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds, which yielded them fifty per cent in interest, in addition to the estate of Beveridge, in fact, which had been presented to Katrin, outright, by old Mr. Maitland, upon her wedding day.

He explained to Katrin at once, the result of his undertaking, and informed her without touching upon the risk he had run personally, at the end of his mission, that her mother had been induced, through the exertions of a lawyer he had employed in the business, to send his wife and twenty thousand Bombay rupees, as her share of her father's fortune. This money he said he had rejected for her in Canton goods, and she was invited to know that her mother had thus repented.

the establishment like an accomplished hostess of experience. After the long series of trials and labor and mishaps that young Hargreave had realized in his brief career, it was grateful to him that he could thus retire to the sweet retreat which Mr. Maitland had so generously presented to his wife—where comfort, ease, and constant happiness were vouchsafed him in his future experience.

The lovely Katrin grew more beautiful as a mother. Far or near, she had no rival in her natural beauty of face or form—and none disputed her claim to the title of the South, as none could ever dispute her original title as the "Belle of the Orient." And what was more pleasant and agreeable than all, was the fact that she did not seem to be aware of her graces, and the charms she evinced in common intercourse with all who surrounded or came near her from time to time either among her household or the society she dwelt in. Katrin proved a prize to her noble husband, George Hargreave.

As the years that succeeded flew away, the family of Mr. Hargreave, senior, passed down the hill of time amidst the solid enjoyment that a life of honest and upright dealing, and a few years of success, had brought in its train. The good old Mr. Maitland lived to a goodly age, and died at last, revered and deeply lamented by scores of devoted and worthy friends—who mourned the decease of one of nature's proudest nobles—an honest, true hearted, liberal man. He left but a single heir, between whom and his subsequent progeny, George Hargreave's son, he had divided the bulk of his property, in his last will and testament.

Mezarsa Dornier is a late number of your papers you state, in answer to some other correspondent, that you have no confidence in the report that "a man is lost who will travel in a circle." In this you are certainly mistaken; it is a fact well known to all frontiersmen, that when persons are bewildered, they frequently travel in a perfect circle, sometimes keeping the same track until they have made half a dozen circuits; or at other times making the circle larger or smaller each time. It is not by any means always the case, when a person is lost; but it is so frequent that it is within the experience of every one who has been such in the woods. In cases and cloudy weather, and in a country of woods, the best way to get out is to take the circles. Persons not accustomed to the woods will sometimes do so, when the sun is shining and a steady breeze is blowing. On the level or golf prairies of this country on a calm, foggy morning, no man could find his way without a rod. It is an accident of every day's occurrence. The late Mr. Dornier, who has been a long time in the woods, has been a long time in the woods, and he has been a long time in the woods.

Mr. Hargreave, senior, had continued highly successful, in trade for the previous eight months, and he was now calmly re-considering the circumstances that for a long time previously weighed so heavily upon him, in his pecuniary affairs. The friends for whom he had become responsible, and whose prospects had for a time been so clouded as to jeopardize both his means and his credit, had all come out brightly, so as to save him from the ruin he had feared, and he had the pleasure of seeing his adopted son, a happy father, and a gentleman of wealth and leisure, before the boy had reached his twenty-fifth year.

Old Mr. Maitland continued still for many long years to enjoy himself, among his extended circle of friends and visitors at sundry, where his ample fortune permitted him to live in princely style, and give entertainments to his guests as was experienced at no other private residence in the South of England. He was always happy, when surrounded by company, but never more so than when he was sitting on his knee the beautiful infant boy of George Hargreave, their first-born, who in princely style, and gave entertainments to his guests as was experienced at no other private residence in the South of England.

ANTI-BAD LUCK SOCIETY.

From the earliest times to the present, superstition has been an ever present quality of the human mind, and persons who were themselves superstitious have loudly declared it to others. This was their idea of reform. Even in this enlightened age, the old household beliefs are held by many with great pertinacity, and no argument will convince them of their fallacy. The only way to do this is to prove the position on the belief in an amuse, by a bold defiance. Some brave Frenchmen are trying to do this. A society has been formed at Bordeaux to put down the superstition of evil omens. As everybody knows, it is a "bad luck" to begin any business on a Friday, or to sit down at a table with thirteen, or to sit down at a table with thirteen, or to sit down at a table with thirteen.

VARIABLE BRIGHTNESS OF THE STARS.

We ascertain that the sun revolves around its axis by noticing the spots on its surface. When there are many spots toward us, the light of the sun must be enfeebled, sometimes even sensibly so. There are variable stars that periodically become dim, and then assume their former brightness. The natural solution of this fact is that these stars are not so far away as they appear to be, but are in the way that light is produced. Perhaps there are spots upon their surface, which when turned toward us, cause their light to become dim. There are stars also which may be called temporary, for after appearing in the heavens for a brief period, they seem to disappear, and are never seen again.

SCIENCE OF STEEL MAKING.

There is certainly a vast difference between the qualities of cast iron and best quality cast steel, and yet the difference between their compositions is but trifling. Cast iron and steel are compounds of iron and carbon; hard wrought iron contains of carbon 0.4 per cent; soft steel 0.5 per cent. Hard steel 0.8 per cent; common cast iron 2 per cent; and soft steel 0.2 per cent. The composition of cast iron and steel, it is evident, that if the former can be deprived of its surplus carbon, it will become steel. In England, the process in use for doing this is first decarbonize the cast iron, and reduce it to condition of wrought iron, after which it is again carbonized to that degree which renders it steel. This is a very curious way of arriving at the result desired, nevertheless, it is the common mode. In Germany, on the other hand, steel is now made by taking away the surplus carbon from the cast iron, by a padding process, and this appears to be by far the most scientific method.

NEW PROJECTILE.

That veteran inventor of destructive missiles—Capt. J. Norton—has lately been contemplating the Royal Engineers, at Coatham, England, with a new liquid rifle shell. The object of this project, is to set fire to any machinery, also the ship, rigging, and rigging, and to set fire to any machinery, also the ship, rigging, and rigging, and to set fire to any machinery, also the ship, rigging, and rigging.

LANARK CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Globe.

We who at present are so far removed (sometimes four days by mail) from the collected Wisdom—although we shortly expect to be near the view! Well, although so distant, we are anxiously watching that which touches a good many hearts, because it touches our pockets—Mr. Inspector General Gal's Tariff. The people here have been quoted and in too many cases indifferent about many of the acts of the present Ministry; but now that the matter of the tariff is under discussion, and that the tariff is under discussion, and that the tariff is under discussion.

Mr. Hargreave, senior, had continued highly successful, in trade for the previous eight months, and he was now calmly re-considering the circumstances that for a long time previously weighed so heavily upon him, in his pecuniary affairs. The friends for whom he had become responsible, and whose prospects had for a time been so clouded as to jeopardize both his means and his credit, had all come out brightly, so as to save him from the ruin he had feared, and he had the pleasure of seeing his adopted son, a happy father, and a gentleman of wealth and leisure, before the boy had reached his twenty-fifth year.

It will be seen in the following paragraph extracted from the Chicago Chronicle of Friday, that a grand demonstration is preparing for Mr. Lincoln in his old constituency. "We believe we are correct in stating that it is in contemplation by the leading politicians of all parties in Woodstock, Ingersoll and other places in this County to give a public dinner to Governor Hicks on his arrival in this country. The only difficulty which now seems to prevent the consummation of this project is a question of the disposal of the few hours among his old constituents. The proposed demonstration, it is intended will surpass anything of the kind that has ever taken place in this part of the country, and will partake more of the form of a banquet than that of an ordinary dinner party. His Excellency is expected, will reach Toronto the latter part of next week."

THE CHILD'S ANSWER.

LITTLE Nellie Lee—had lost her father and her mother was poor. Her sweet temper and her winning ways gained her many friends. Among these was an excellent lady, Miss N. A glimpse of Nellie's bright face peeping in at the door always brought a smile of peculiar tenderness over Miss N.'s placid features.

THE RAILROAD.

We had this week intended to have informed our readers and the merchants of the West country, that a freight train, consisting of twelve engines, would have been dispatched twice a week (Tuesdays and Thursdays) to Franktown with any goods that might have been offered. One of the engines having been disabled, will, for the present, prevent this arrangement from being carried out. We hope, however, soon to give the announcement. Should no further difficulties occur, the company expect to have the iron laid to Carleton Place by the end of this month; and although the road may not then be opened for general traffic, freight will be sent over the road to Carleton Place on the same days that they now proceed sending it to Franktown.

WILL BE HUNTING IN

I am indebted to my brother, who has been a resident for twenty years in various parts of Australia for the following account of the mode employed by the aborigines in obtaining the wild honey of the stingless bees that are found in some parts of the interior of that continent. These bees, which are about the size of our common house flies, build their combs (composed of globular cells) in the hollows of trees. The black, who is desirous of obtaining the honey, betakes himself to the side of some water course, having provided himself with a slender stick. He has also a little piece of fire down, picked off the leaves of a common plant, which he has previously twisted into a point at one end, and dipped into the sticky juice obtained by breaking the stem of another weed. Thus armed, he fills his mouth with water, and when he sees a bee alight on the margin of a pool to drink, he discharges the mouthful of water over it in a fine shower, and thus by wetting the wings of the bee prevents its flight. He then allows it to crawl upon the stick, and when the wings are nearly dry, and the bee is preparing to fly away, he attaches the pointed end of the light bit of wood to the back of the insect, by the means of the sticky point. Thus, by impeding the rapidity of its flight, and by rendering it more conspicuous, enables the savage to pursue it to the hollow tree containing the comb. The honey is then squeezed out of a peculiarly limpid character and of very good quality; it frequently is to be found on the tables of the settler in the interior, and is used as an article of luxury by them. This honey is found in the forests of the interior. My brother says some which had been procured 500 miles inland from Sydney.—Letter from Australia.

A SECRET.

"How do you do, Mrs. Biggs?" "Have you heard that story about Mrs. Ludy?" "Why, no; really Mrs. God—what is it, do tell me?" "Oh! I promised not to tell for all the world! No, I must never tell you—I'm afraid it will get out." "No, I'll never open my mouth about it, never. Hope to see you in a week or two." "Well, if you'll believe, Mrs. Ludy told me last night, that Mrs. Trotter told her sister's husband was told by a person who dreamed it, that Mrs. Trotter's eldest daughter told Mrs. Nickless that her grand-mother heard by a letter, which she got from her sister's second husband's eldest brother's step-daughter, that she had just arrived from the Peesee Islands, that the mermaids called that season wear crowns made out of shark skins."

A MORMON LOVE SONG.

The Valley Times, published at Salt Lake City came into possession of the following lines addressed by a Mormon lover to his new flame, who seems slightly reluctant to be made number sixteen of his little family.

Say, Susan, wilt thou come with me,
In sweet companionship to live,
Of heart and hand, a sixteenth part I'll freely give.

Of all the love that swells my breast of old
The honor of my name; of worldly wealth by
I possess, a sixteenth portion thou shalt have.

May I tell you not too many share the blessing
That I offer you, Thou'lt find but fifteen
Others there—a household happy, gay, and true.

A moderate household, I may say; my Neighbor has as many more, and Brother
Brigham's over the way, illustrates in forty.

I promise thee a life of ease, and thyself
I let thee choose such duties as thy fancy please
Susan canst thou still refuse?

Sophronia cooks and sweeps the floors and Hephastah makes up the beds, and Jonina waters all the flowers, and Profrance combs the children's heads, and the girls are all
The household duties all devolve on each according to her lot; but from such things
I'll absolve my Susan if she likes them not,
I'll have my hands much better than give the children—
