Wolf Ranch.

Edward Blecker of New York city went to Colorado on a hunting trip. He put up at Wolf ranch, a picturesque place on a southern mountain slope.

Edward Blecker with his guide hunted in the mountains back of Wolf ranch, and whipped every mountain side stream within thirty miles of the gamey trout.

With his city-bred airs, was a revelation to Phoebe Perkins. Blecker knew that he had made an impression on the heart of this mountain maiden and Blecker was glad of it.

The big, handsome New Yorker, with his city-bred airs, was a revelation to Phoebe Perkins. Blecker knew that he had made an impression on the heart of this mountain maiden and Blecker was glad of it.

On Wolf ranch, employed as a sheep herder, was a young fellow named George Wilson. He was an illiterate man, the reading of books was to him an unknown quantity, but he could read nature, and her page as broader and fairer than that of any book which ever came from the press.

George Wilson's heart was not within him. He alternated with another herder his nights on duty with the sheep fold. When not on guard he stayed at the great ranch house.

Edward Blecker and Phoebe Perkins were on the porch of the ranch. The night was dark to the point of gloom. They were speaking in low tones.

There was a movement back of them. Blecker drew apart from the girl and turned in his seat. George Wilson was standing just back of him.

there had been none for years until one came—a big, gray, hungry fellow, who fattened nightly on the fold. Our dogs were of no service. The wolf was too smart for them.

"I said our dogs were no good. There was something about that wolf that made them fear. I had a dog at the home of my father, miles away. The men said, 'This is no wolf, it's a devil. Your dog will be no better than the rest.' But I knew my dog. I brought him to the fold.

"I just stayed and watched," said Wilson, "Jim went on and on. The wolf had his head up. He had located the lamb. What cared he for a dog? He had seen our dogs turn tail and run.

"I die for France," he said, or words to that effect. "Subsequently, however, he changed his mind and concluded to live for Regis. It took the surgeons a long time to find the wound that had undone Regis. At last they discovered on his left arm a tiny puncture that closely resembled a fresh vaccination wound.

French Duels.

The French duel is always an interesting study. For letching, delicate humor it surpasses anything in the comedy line that the stage has yet given us.

"I fight because I refuse to be called a coward. At the same time I am convinced that Labarquesque is unfit to give satisfaction, as he is a bribe-taker."

M. Labarquesque declined to be drawn into an oratorical contest. He had come to fight, to slaughter, to cut, carve and hew, not to talk.

The duel was stopped while the seconds make a careful survey of the person of Labarquesque. Alas, no wound was found, not even the slightest little scratch, not even the unexpressed horror of the spectators, as well as the courageous, lion hearted Regis.

Not Shell's Fault

Washington, April 13. — Admiral Higginson's report to the navy department upon the fatal explosion on the Iowa last Tuesday shows that a defective shell was not the cause.

"I regret to inform the department of the sad accident which happened on board the Iowa while at target practice today at 12:30 p. m., when on her third shot from the port forward 12-inch gun, the muzzle blew off and the pieces flew."

"It does not appear that this accident was caused by the bursting of the shell, as some witnesses stated that they saw the shell strike near the target. The inner tube presents a fracture, but on none of the pieces into which the muzzle of the gun broke up are the grooves indented or scorched, as in the case of a bursting shell.

Another report from Rear Admiral Higginson, dated April 11, gives the details of the gun's condition in the explosion.

Seattle, April 12.—George Roberts, a well-dressed man of powerful build, was lodged in the county jail yesterday for wife-keeping until Monday, when a hearing to inquire into his sanity will be had.

Asks Big Damages

Seattle, April 12.—Elmer E. Sole has begun action against the Star Machine Company, a corporation, to recover $10,000 damages for injuries alleged to have been received by him while working in their employ.

The complaint alleges that Sole stepped on a plank provided by the company, which was rotten, and he was precipitated into a hole several feet below the ground, sustaining serious internal injuries as a result.

The amount claimed is divided into two separate statements; to wit: For physical injuries, $5,000, and for mental suffering, $5,000.
