In this connection, I think the man exaggerates, for most of the people who devote their time to settlers are absolutely impartial and I wish to give credit to the parish priests of Canada, who carry on such admirable work in promoting colonization. Furthermore, my complaints were not directed against any member of the clergy, as such, but I denounced the erroneous reports of certain provincial government officials.

Another letter is as follows:

Isle-Verte, April 5, 1933.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

After passing many restless nights, I decided to write to you. The other day in reading over the newspapers, I saw that the latter endeavoured to convey that you were mistaken in stating that settlers had undergone hardships. Do not allow yourself to be nonplussed. N. . . D. . . has just told my husband, in my presence, that had he not assisted his brother-in-law—who owns a lot—and his family, they would have starved to death; when food was placed before the children, they burst into tears with their mother. They had been living for three weeks on Swedish turnips.

It is not much better than onions.

The son of M. . . D. . . recently married, after three months' residence on his lot, some people came to call on him from l'Isle-Verte. When they were about to leave the house, his young wife got into the carriage, saying: "I am going back home, before I starve to death—notwithstanding the plea of her husband begging her to stay with him. That is a fact.

These, sir, are a few of the letters which I have received, a few samples only. I could quote others, I simply wished, however, to put these facts before the house, in order to prove that when I denounced certain abuses, under my responsibility as member of parliament, I deserved a better treatment than the insults, aspersions and jeers of members opposite; moreover, I should have been able to depend on their closest, constant and sincerest co-operation.

May I before closing my remarks, quote a letter of an eminent member of the clergy—he uses the third personal pronoun in writing to me:

He thanks you for your information. It is evident that we lack direction and organization, that splendid examples of devotion to duty are entirely lost by being isolated, that considerable sums of money are wasted, that colonization is carried on in regions which are not ready for settlers, that the settler himself is not taken care of in the present crisis and that this is a great national, social and religious misfortune.

Another eminent member of the clergy wrote to me on March 29, 1933, on the same date as the settler from St. Benoit-de-Packington wrote to me to inform me of his distress.

The struggle wears one down, but it ends by helping one out. Be courageous!

This testimonial amply compensates me for the insults, aspersions and jeers coming from the opposite side, when the members who look after the patronage, who are influential with the government, should themselves be the ones to act and relieve the distress of these poor settlers.

The following is a letter which I received from a dignitary of the church, a pioneer of colonization, it is dated April 2, 1933.

Your reply to one of the heads of the back to the land movement would call for more than a passing remark.

I only wish to dwell, for the present on the following: "The preparation both for the future and present of all schemes, as well as all measures must be based on experience and good common sense." Few possess experience in matters of colonization. As to good common sense everybody claims it.

Will the gathering around a table, of those who are interested in settling Canadians in this country, to discuss thoroughly the problem of back to the land, etc., solve the problem?

Likely so.

But around the table, one must not only group missionary agents of colonization and a few other known authorities, whatever may be their knowledge and moral authority. The colonization problem although a social and national one, is also a political problem.

Among the voluminous correspondence received, sir, I have but two more letters to submit to the house.

A number of members may think or imagine that I am not in earnest when discussing the subject, but, I wish to point out to them that it is a crime to allow people of our race to die of hunger.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Text): Hurrah!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I see those yellow creatures, members of the Ku Klux Klan, jeering at me because I am espousing the cause of my French Canadian patriots. I take this opportunity, sir, to state that I cannot understand how members of my race can thus fraternize with members who belong to the Ku Klux Klan, and then go to their province and take part in patriotic demonstrations. I find it very strange, indeed, that in Quebec, there are some who jeer, to-day, at those who endeavour to side with the humble people, those lacking protection and in distress.

I received a letter from a patriot, who belongs to a religious order.

Your letter reached me here where we are holding lent retreats. Allow me to congratulate you on your denunciation of the shocking inertia of our province and your idea of pooling all schemes and bringing together all experts so as to build up some system. Evidently there will still remain to win over the great minister, who obstructs the way and delights in doing so.

We must begin by freeing in every part of the province, the land, the soil, the millions of acres where one can lead and help the thousands and thousands of young men who are merely waiting for something to turn up. For those who look upon money as the first and final expedient of politics, the method of building a country, in a Jean Talon style, engulfing fortunes before producing any results, would be a faux pas bound to bring on failure. Only the pressure of public opinion, the fear of disorders and a general hue and cry can compel one who takes an interest in the fate of the upper classes, but none in that of the humble people, to bestir himself a little.

You enjoy free speech on the floor of the house, people watch for every word of your open and clear cut statements, you are independent, you possess individuality and you are a good patriot, why do you not bell the cat?

I wish to bell the cows, so that it may be heard!

And "Le Droit" commenting on certain statements made in the house, ended an article as follows, quoting my statement:

God forbid, stated the member for Témiscouata, if the sacred character of the priest is attacked in the house, I shall be the first to defend it, as I have already proved it. Whoever is acquainted with Mr. Pouliot will not be astonished at such language.

This article appeared in "Le Droit" on April 7, 1933.

These include all the documents which I intended to submit to the house. The file is far from being complete as I have piles of similar letters which I could consign to Hansard. However, I have quoted enough of them to open the eyes of those who are voluntarily blind, to open the ears of those who are voluntarily deaf, to impress upon members of Quebec, members who are broad-minded and free from prejudices, upon English speaking members as well as those speaking French, upon Protestant as well as Catholic members, that the time has come to cease diverting public funds towards the west, without providing for Quebec's quota. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) succeeded in getting a great deal of information in connection with the government's policy which consisted in granting the western provinces an enormous share of the country's revenue. A large portion of the deficit announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) comes from the advances made to the west. I therefore would request all members who are broad-minded, free from prejudice and parochial ideas, who wish to see the Canadian race survive, first, to bear in mind that the French Canadians of Quebec are entitled to a place under the sun, that Quebec, one of the two provinces which are responsible for more than two-thirds of the government's revenue, is entitled to have its quota when it is a question of relieving the humble, those who lack protection and are in distress.

I did not criticize the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to-day as sharply as he would have deserved if, really, the Gordon scheme, to which he gave his name, was to become the salvation plank of colonization in this country. I wish to especially draw the attention of the Minister of Labour on the statement I have just made and I shall again repeat to him before closing my remarks:

I would ask the Minister of Labour to be fair enough to read the letters which I have just put on Hansard and to take cognizance of them and to see that these people who are suffering the pangs of hunger receive relief at once. I do not wish him to answer me that I must take the matter up with the provincial government. I appeal now as a representative of the people to this high court of justice, the supreme court of justice in this country. I want my people and the Canadian people generally to be treated fairly. I am sure that the minister who is a generous and big-hearted man will see to it that these people are relieved without any further delay.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BAKER: Did the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) ever stop to calculate the cost to the country of the scene he has just put on, when all that was really necessary, as he well knows, was to go to the minister's office, present his letters and explain the case? He would then have received just as much consideration as he will by all this waste of the country's money.

Mr. POULIOT: I will answer my hon. friend in two words. The greatest waste of money since the beginning of the session was the adjournment of the house and the Senate in order that the Prime Minister might go to England. Parliament had to be adjourned for two months because the right hon. gentleman wanted to go abroad, probably for his own business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: If I have taken up the time of the house it has been to arouse public opinion in order that justice may be done in this case as soon as possible.

Mr. BAKER: That has nothing to do with the question you brought up to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend asked me a question and I have answered it better than the Postmaster General answers questions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Perhaps the hon. gentleman was within his rights in reading all these letters to-day. I do not think he was, but I did not choose to challenge his doing so because he speaks so seldom in the house that it would hardly have been fair.

Mr. POULIOT: It was my maiden speech.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But I wish to say that the letters he has read should have gone to the provincial government. He knows perfectly well that this government does not deal directly with individual cases of unemployment or with municipalities, but only through the provincial government. I ask my hon. friend to think what the position of this house would be if every one of us were to read all the letters we receive about unemployment. We all get them and if we were to follow my hon. friend's example we would be doing nothing else from one week's end to another but reading letters such as he has read to-day.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of ways and means, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am going to ask my colleague to move that a new item be inserted in the tariff to be numbered 700a. It arises for the followng reason. A convention relating to international exhibitions was held in Paris in 1928, following which a convention was approved of by both houses of parliament, and one of the undertakings was that there should be a uniform practice with respect to giving free entry, under certain conditions, to exhibits for the purpose of international exhibitions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I beg to move that the following item, enumeration and rates of duties, be included in the list of items indicated in resolution No. 2, of March 21, 1933, as for insertion in schedule A of the customs tariff:

700a. Goods imported temporarily and forming part of foreign exhibits in every exhibition to which the international convention relating to international exhibitions, signed on behalf of Canada, on the 22nd day of November, 1928, applies, and under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Provided a bond shall be first given in accordance with regulations prescribed by the minister as a sufficient guarantee for payment of customs duties and all other duties and taxes applicable to the goods exhibited which are not re-exported within the period fixed after the close of the exhibition.

Mr. HOWARD: Does the word "international" appear there?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. HOWARD: So the item does not apply to ordinary exhibitions?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: Last night I promised to give some additional information sought for by different members. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough wished figures for for 1929, 1930 and 1931 respecting the industries engaged in the knitted goods business. I find that the figures are as follows:

Year	Number of est'mnts	Capital invested	Number of employees	Salaries and wages paid	Cost of materials	Gross value of products
1929. . . .	159	$65,000,000	19,048	$16,000,000	$30,000,000	$60,000,000
1930. . . .	158	64,000,000	18,165	15,000,000	25,000,000	53,000,000
1931. . . .	161	57,000,000	17,698	14,000,000	22,000,000	48,000,000

I have some information concerning volume and values for three successive years for which the hon. member for Weyburn asked. The reply is contained in three full pages of closely typed material. Considerable time would be required to read this material into Hansard, and if the hon. member would be satisfied I should be happy to let him have the file. If at a later stage he wishes to refer to any item in detail he would be at liberty to do so.

DRAWBACKS

3. Resolved,—That schedule B to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by inserting therein the following item, enumeration and rates of drawback of customs duties:—

Customs tariff—1063. Materials, including all parts, subject to drawback when used in the manufacture of engines for use exclusively in the equipment of aircraft—payable as drawback, 60 per cent.

Mr. NEILL: I understand we have not finished resolution No. 1; several items stood for consideration.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; certain items are standing. We will deal subsequently with any such item when it is reached.

Resolution agreed to.

PROHIBITED GOODS

4. Resolved,—That schedule C to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by deleting therefrom item 1215 and by inserting in said schedule C the following items:—

1215. Used or second hand automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, manufactured prior to the calendar year in which importation into Canada is sought to be made:

Provided, that this item does not affect in any manner automobiles and motor vehicles,—

(a) Imported under tariff items 702, 705a, 706, 707 or 708, or under tourists' or travellers' vehicle permits;

(b) Imported by a bona fide settler on a first arrival but not entitled to entry free of duty under tariff item 705a;

(c) Bona fide purchased on or before the first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, by consumers for their own use and not for resale;

(d) Forfeited or confiscated for any offence under the customs laws, or the laws of any province of Canada;

(e) Left by bequest.

1216. Used or second hand aeroplanes and aircraft of all kinds:

Provided, that this item does not affect in any manner aeroplanes and aircraft,—

(a) Imported under tariff items 707 or 708, or engaged solely in international traffic, or brought in by non-resident tourists for temporary use under permit issued by the Department of National Revenue;

(b) Bona fide purchased on or before the twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three, by consumers for their own use and not for resale;

(c) Forfeited or confiscated for any offence under the customs laws, the air regulations or the laws of any province of Canada;

(d) Imported by the Department of National Defence for military purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have these goods not been enumerated before for these purposes? What is the change?

Mr. RHODES: Item No. 1215 is an old one, but we are changing it to meet certain hardships which have arisen in case of bona fide settlers entering the country with motor cars which they own, but had not owned for a period of six months. In some cases those motor cars might have been owned for five months and a half, or some other period, as the case might be. As a matter of fact my attention was directed to one instance where a motor car happened to be owned by a bona fide settler one day less than the required six months.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a prohibition against second hand cars?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. This provision widens the item to permit a bona fide settler to bring in his own car.

Mr. EULER: Does it reduce the period of six months?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it makes for elasticity. Then, item No. 1216 prohibits the entry of second hand aeroplanes.

Resolution agreed to.

5. Resolved,—That any enactment founded upon resolutions 2, 3 and 4 of the foregoing resolutions to amend the customs tariff or schedules thereto, shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Mr. YOUNG: I note that under resolution No. 5 any enactment founded upon resolutions 2, 3 and 4 amending the Customs Tariff shall be deemed to come into force on March 22. At what hour of the day?

Mr. RHODES: Immediately after midnight of March 21.

Mr. YOUNG: The budget speech was delivered on March 21. If this provision did not take effect until midnight of the same day, there would be some eight hours in which people having certain information would have time to act upon it. Is it customary to give that much leeway?

Mr. RHODES: It is quite possible that certain instances might arise, particularly on the western coast, where information could be used to the detriment of the public interest. The budget was brought down this year in conformity with the practice which has obtained in previous years, but, having regard to the objection which the hon. member has quite properly raised, I may say that probably a different practice will have to be adopted in subsequent years, so that no condition can arise such as the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. BROWN: Is it not so that tariff rates have come into effect as soon as a budget is delivered?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, because hitherto the practice has been that budget speeches have been delivered only after customs houses have been closed. However that does not meet all cases, especially in matters of taxation. In the past collectors of customs have been notified by wire the minute the budget has been released, and in such circumstances they have taken customs entries subject to correction, in the light of the terms as set out in the budget. Safeguard has been provided in that respect. But perhaps something may be said in favour of some other course being taken, especially in regard to taxation proposals which in part might be evaded. On subsequent occasions it might be desirable that the budget be delivered in the evening rather than in the afternoon.

Mr. BROWN: A serious condition has arisen in regard to one particular item.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, I am prepared quite frankly to admit that. I have no doubt the hon. member is referring to sugar. I take no exception to his statement.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to re-open discussion on a resolution which has been passed, but I should like the minister to clear up what may be a misconception in my mind with regard to the importation of settlers' effects, with particular reference to automobiles. Under the former legislation an automobile had to be owned for six months in the country from which the settler came before it could be imported as settlers' effects. Is the time now shorter?

Mr. RHODES: The law as it stood was to the effect that entry was totally prohibited unless a motor car had been in the possession of a settler for six months. Under those circumstances a settler who may have owned a motor car for six months less one day, under the regulations could not enter it. The amendment now provides that all bona fide settlers in possession of motor cars which have been owned for lesser periods may bring them in, subject of course to paying the duty applicable to second hand machines.

Mr. EULER: What is that lesser period? Is it three or four months? Or two days less than six months. There must be some definiteness about it.

Mr. RHODES: No date is named. Obviously if a term of three months were named we would be presented with a similar difficulty. The test is the bona fides of the possession on the part of the settler. Each case would have to be decided upon its merits. Obviously if a settler purchased a motor car one day before entering this country, the transaction would be open to question. However, if it had been in his possession three or four months, or in some cases, two or three weeks, it might be allowed in.

Mr. EULER: I realize that in speaking to this resolution I am out of order, but I assure the minister that he will be confronted with difficulties in this connection. It is perfectly obvious that a settler coming to Canada, who is familiar with our law, in order to evade it might purchase an automobile two or three weeks before entering. There is certainly no definiteness in the resolution.

Mr. RHODES: His experience in the administration of departmental affairs will have caused the hon. member to realize the dangers and difficulties that have to be met in connection with any law. I think he should also admit this practical truism, that you cannot frame any general law which cannot be evaded in part or in certain instances. The law as it stood, however, was too rigid, and this amendment is sought merely for the purpose of avoiding injustice to bona fide settlers who desire to come to this country in possession of a second hand motor car.

Mr. EULER: You may have a good deal of difficulty in administering it.

Mr. RHODES: That may be so, but this amendment was really introduced upon compassionate grounds, to avoid imposing any hardship. It appears here because of representations made to me by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Just to clear up the matter, may I ask the minister a question? If the individual entering Canada has not had the car in his possession for six months he cannot secure free entry. Is that so? If he acquires the car within the six month period he must pay the regular duty, as I understand it?

Mr. RHODES: As the law stood, unless the car had been in his possession for six months he could not bring it in at all.

Mr. BROWN: I think the position taken by the minister is the only proper one in the circumstances. The difficulty would arise no matter what period was mentioned; there would always be the possibility of someone falling short by one day.

The CHAIRMAN: I think this discussion is out of order, and I want to remind the committee that there are two items standing.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister was not permitted to answer my question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let the minister clarify it.

Mr. RHODES: I think there was a misunderstanding, and I believe if we are out of order we should give unanimous consent to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN: But items 366b and 568 were not passed.

Mr. RHODES: I thought we were dealing with this item.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is the point about which I should like to be clear. If the individual entering Canada as a settler is in possession of a car which he has had for a longer period than six months the car will come in duty free. If he has not been in possession of the car for six months he can still bring in the car by paying the ordinary duty on second hand cars.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, if it is decided that he is a bona fide settler. My hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. McINTOSH: I believe the minister is taking the right stand in this matter. I know that a few years ago I had many complaints from settlers coming to western Canada from the United States, who suffered particular hardship under the law as it formerly stood. I believe the change the minister has decided upon is the right thing to do, in regard to bona fide settlers coming to western Canada the law should be elastic so that there may be no hardship imposed. This amendment will help the settlers.

Resolution agreed to.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved,—That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act, chapter sixty of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and to provide:—

1. (i) That section one hundred and forty-nine of the said act, as amended by chapter eight of the statutes of 1932, be amended by providing that the rate of excise duties set out by the second paragraphs (a); (b) and (c) of the said section be fixed at two dollars and fifty cents per gallon of the strength of proof on spirits used in the manufacture of patent and proprietary medicines, extracts, essences, perfumed spirits, and pharmaceutical preparations manufactured in bond, instead of $2.40, $2.42 or $2.43 as set out in the said paragraph;

(ii) That said section one hundred and forty-nine be further amended by adding thereto the following subsection as subsection two thereof:—

(2) There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all spirits distilled from the juices of native fruits for use exclusively by registered wine manufacturers under prescribed regulations, a special excise duty as follows:—

On every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, one dollar and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon, and the said duty shall be payable by the registered wine manufacturer at the time such spirits are taken out of warehouse.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to offer to this resolution, which will have the effect of reduciing the duty from $2.50 to $1.50 per gallon. It will be recalled that formerly the duty was 75 cents. In the budget we increased the rate to $2.50, but it is felt that this rate is too high, and we are now asking that it be reduced to $1.50. The Minister of National Revenue will sponsor this motion.

Mr. POWER: It would seem that in the original resolution as introduced in the budget the rate was fixed at $2.50 instead of $2.40, $2.42 or $2.43, as was the case previously. Is that correct?

Mr. RHODES: Those are the rates which have obtained for a considerable period of time; they have reference to spirits used in pharmaceutical preparations, and there is no change in that regard. The change proposed was in regard to the duty upon spirits used in the manufacture of perfumes; that was raised from 75 cents a gallon to $2.50 a gallon, but as I have already explained that rate is now regarded as excessive, and this amendment which will be moved by my colleague reduces the duty to $1.50 per gallon.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask if this is the result of the negotiations and representations carried on by the pharmaceutical association and the medical society?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. RHODES: I think it would be fair to answer yes to that question. The matter was very carefully canvassed in view of the representations which were made, and we were convinced that the proposed rate was too high.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In order to get this clear may I ask what the figures $2.40, $2.42 and $2.43 have reference to? I would construe this resolution to mean that the rate of duty is to be $2.50 instead of $2.40, $2.42 and $2.43, and I think that is what was in the mind of my hon. friend from Quebec South.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): The amendment is as follows:

That paragraph one of the resolution to amend the Excise Act, introduced on March 21, 1933, be amended as follows:

1. By striking out the words "perfumed spirits" in line six of sub-paragraph (i);

2. By adding the following as sub-paragraph (iii) of said paragraph one:

"(iii) There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all spirits used in bond for the manufacture of perfume, an excise duty as follows:—

On every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, one dollar and fifty cents and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon, and the said duty shall be payable by the bonded manufacturer in accordance with regulations prescribed."

Mr. RHODES: I was partly in error in answer to my hon. friend from Quebec South. The position now will be that instead of the rates which heretofore have obtained of $2.40, $2.42, and $2.43, the sum of $2.50 will be charged.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph 2:

2. That subsection two of section one hundred and fifty of the said act be amended by repealing paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

On every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and fifty cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than one gallon.

Thereby increasing to a flat rate of two dollars and fifty cents the duties already imposed at $2.40, $2.42 and $2.43 as the case may be on spirits used by licensed druggists in the manufacture of preparation of medicines, etc.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is a typographical error in the last line, "manufacture of preparation"; it should be "manufacture or preparation."

Mr. POWER: Will it not be necessary to have an amendment here to cover perfume spirits?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that the druggists do not use perfume spirits.

Paragraph agreed to.

3. That any enactment founded on the foregoing paragraphs of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into effect on the twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three, and to have applied to all goods taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date.

Paragraph agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

On paragraph 1:

Resolved,—That it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter fifty of the statutes of 1928, chapter fifty-seven of the statutes of 1929, chapter forty-three of the statutes of 1930, chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1931, and chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1932, and to provide:—

1. That section four of the said act be amended to provide that notes of a bank in circulation in any British colony or possession other than Canada, under the authority of section sixty-two of the Bank Act and in respect of which taxation is levied and payable by or under the laws of such colony or possession, shall be exempt from the taxation required to be made under sections three and four of the said act, provided that if the tax imposed by or under such laws is less than the tax imposed under section three of the said act the amount of such exemption shall not exceed the amount required to be paid by or under the laws of such colony or possession in respect of such notes.

Mr. RHODES: This means that currency issued by the banks for special use in the West Indies will not be subject to the tax. The Canadian banks have a special circulation which they use in certain parts of the West Indies and there they are called upon to pay a substantial bank tax. Under the law as it stands they would therefore be required to pay a double tax, one in Canada as well as one in the West Indies. This relieves them of the tax here.

Mr. YOUNG: Do the bank reports require that they shall show what circulation they have in the West Indies?

Mr. RHODES: They are required to show their total circulation, but whether the circulation in the West Indies is segregated I do not know offhand.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph 2:

2. That the provisions exempting from the stamp tax cheques, receipts to banks, money orders, travellers' cheques and post office money orders, where such instruments are for an amount not exceeding $5 be repealed, except in the case of cheques issued by butter or cheese factories to producers of milk or cream.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the idea of making an exception of cheques issued by butter or cheese factories to producers of milk or cream?

Mr. RHODES: I understand that the practice of a number of butter and cheese factories, particularly in the west, is to issue a number of small documents for very small amounts daily or at all events weekly. These individual amounts are so small that a tax would be excessive, and therefore that particular class of cheque is exempt.

Mr. BROWN: In view of the representations made from this side two years ago I hope that no argument will prevail on the minister to make any change now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The paragraph states that the provisions exempting from the stamp tax cheques, receipts to banks, money orders, travellers' cheques and post office money orders, where such instruments are for an amount not exceeding $5, shall be repealed. So far as they are concerned the present provisions are repealed when the amount does not exceed $5, except in the case of cheques issued by butter or cheese factories to producers of milk or cream.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; they are not subject to the tax if the amount is $5 or under.

Mr. HOWARD: How much revenue does the minister expect to receive as a result of this change?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry it is impossible to give an accurate answer because they use post office stamps and we have no means of checking, but I am told that the amount will be fairly substantial.

Mr. HOWARD: I have no fault to find with the previous resolution, but it will be noted that it exempts the banks from taxation upon their circulation outside of Canada. In the very next resolution the minister proposes to increase revenue by taxing the small cheques which are generally issued by the poorer people.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend presents a contrast which is not quite as evident as the two resolutions might lead one to believe. There would be no question of exempting the banks from taxation upon their circulation if it were not for the fact that the West Indian possessions have instituted a very heavy tax upon the circulation of currency. It would be very unfair to subject the banks to double taxation. In connection with the tax on cheques, I think we always should have taxed cheques. However, two years ago the house in its wisdom decided to exempt cheques below five dollars. We have come to a point where we have to seek every reasonable opportunity for revenue, and that is why we are taxing cheques below five dollars.

Mr. HOWARD: That may be quite true, but it does not change the position I take. It may be that the banks would be unfairly treated by having to pay double taxation, but, on the other hand, it would bring in revenue. I have no objection to this exemption but the fact remains that in the very next resolution a tax is placed upon the smaller cheques.

Mr. RHODES: We have increased the taxes paid by the banks very substantially in this very budget.

Mr. HOWARD: Don't you think you should?

Mr. RHODES: I suppose the banks should be taxed all that they reasonably can stand but my hon. friend will realize that they have had to reduce their dividends because their earnings have fallen off.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is the double taxation on the bank any more unfair than an individual having to pay an income tax to the federal government and then having to pay another one to the provincial government? In some provinces they tax all wages.

Mr. RHODES: That is a different taxing authority. As a matter of international comity the principle has been recognized for a considerable time that an income tax payer in one country will be granted an allowance for the tax he has paid upon the portion of income taxed in another country. That principle applies as between Canada and the United States and between Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. POWER: There may be double taxation in this case because the man will be paying a tax on his monthly pay cheque and then paying income tax at the end of the year.

Mr. EULER: I am glad to hear the Minister of Finance express disapproval of double taxation. I quite agree with his statement that provincial or municipal and federal income taxes are separate things. Perhaps there is not much to be said about them except that these different authorities ought to get together and decide upon having just one income tax. However, I think the minister is quite wrong when he gives the impression that this government and previous governments have not imposed double taxes.

Mr. RHODES: I never said that.

Mr. EULER: I shall not discuss this matter now because it will come up when we deal with the income tax. I think there is only one thing to recommend the statement by the minister that all cheques should be taxed and that is that it presents an easy way of getting money. Ordinarily taxes are collected for some service rendered, but this tax does not come under that heading.

Mr. RHODES: It is revenue.

Mr. EULER: It is revenue, and nothing else. As a matter of fact this is a tax upon the poor fellow who has to pay the money. The man who is getting the money should be taxed. The minister may claim that this tax is necessary in order to obtain money but I consider it one of the most vicious forms of taxation. It is not only a nuisance tax but it is an unjust tax because nothing is given for it.

Mr. REID: As the cheques paid to dairymen are exempted from this taxation, I appeal to the minister to exempt also the cheques paid to poultrymen. In many provinces those who keep chickens are just simply keeping a few hens, so to speak, but in the province of British Columbia chicken-raising is a highly commercialized industry. The economic condition of the poultryman in that province is even more severe than that of the dairyman. A poultryman will receive perhaps eight small cheques per month, probably totalling not more than $20. The eggs are lifted once a day or twice a week, when a receipt is given accompanied by a small interim cheque for $2 or $3. When the eggs are candled, the cheque in final payment is sent to the poultryman. The poultryman receives a greater number of small cheques than the dairyman, and I appeal to the minister to exempt these cheques from the tax.

Mr. RHODES: I have every sympathy with the poultryman but we are not prepared to make further exception, although they may be worthy of consideration.

Mr. REID: Why the dairymen?

Mr. RHODES: Because of a peculiar practice which has obtained in the payment of their accounts. Perhaps it might be better not to have any exception, but that is another matter. Once we begin to make further exceptions, the door will be opened and we will never be able to get it closed. The object we had in mind in imposing this tax was the obtaining of additional revenue. I am sure that if the poultrymen of British Columbia exercise the same mental adroitness as the hon. member for New Westminster, they will be able to devise a method which will permit them to carry on their business without paying too much in this form of taxation.

Mr. REID: When you single out a certain class and give them exemptions, it is only natural that others in like circumstances will object. I have received many complaints from poultrymen and organizations. If every cheque was taxed I doubt if these complaints would have been made. I think a fuller explanation is required as to why the dairymen have been exempted while the poultrymen, who receive so many small cheques, should have to pay this tax.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that in Quebec we have a large number of farmers' cooperative banks, called caisses populaires, that are run by the farmers themselves. Though I am glad to know the dairymen are exempt from the payment of tax on these small cheques, I would like to call the minister's attention to these caisses populaires, farmers' cooperative banks. Are they also to be obliged to put a stamp on each cheque, because they deal in very small amounts? These are not regular banks.

Mr. RHODES: The case presented by the hon. member for Bonaventure had not previously been brought to my attention. Offhand I would be inclined to think those cheques would not be subject to tax. I think the tax applies only to cheques on banks; I do not think under the Bank Act those are classed as banks, but I will look into the matter because it is entirely new to me.

Mr. MARCIL: I thank the minister for his answer. These banks, of course, operate under a provincial charter. They are not banks in the ordinary sense of the word; they are farmers' cooperative savings banks, caisses populaires. They are very well known; they exist in all parts of my province and are patronized solely by farmers, I think they should be exempt.

Paragraph agreed to.

3. That section seventy of the said act, as enacted by chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1931, be amended by providing that the stamp tax on postal notes shall be at the rate of three cents.

Paragraph agreed to.

4. That section fifty-eight of the said act, as enacted by chapter forty-three of the statutes of 1930, be amended by adding thereto and making liable to the excise tax on sale, transfer or assignment of stocks, bonds, etc., the following:—

Any participating interest in the operations or profits of any association, company, or corporation, represented by certificates, documents, or other instruments of title capable of being sold, transferred or assigned, including mineral deeds, oil royalties, and fixed investment trust shares issued by a trustee and representing equitable ownership in deposited securities.

Paragraph agreed to.

5. That section seventy-six of the said act be amended by providing that when matches are put up in packages containing less than twenty-one matches each the tax shall be payable at the rate of three-twentieths of one cent per package instead of at the rate of three-sixteenths of one cent.

Mr. MARCIL: Does this apply to domestic as well as to imported matches?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it applies to all matches. Of course the committee understands that this is a special provision for the small paper folders of matches, the vest pocket match. It is making the tax comparable to the content match tax on the box matches.

Paragraph agreed to.

6. That part X of the said act be amended by adding thereto the following as section 77(a):—

77(a). Except as hereinafter provided, every manufacturer and every importer of cigarette papers in packets shall affix to every packet of cigarette papers manufactured by him or imported into Canada, an adhesive or other stamp of the value of 2 cents for each 100 leaves or fraction of 100 leaves contained in such packet.

2. Except as hereinafter provided, every manufacturer and every importer of cigarette paper tubes shall affix to every package of cigarette paper tubes manufactured by him or imported by him into Canada, an adhesive or other stamp of the value of 5 cents for each 50 cigarette paper tubes or fraction of 50 cigarette paper tubes contained in such package.

3. No manufacturer or importer shall sell or import cigarette papers or cigarette paper tubes unless they are in packets or packages.

4. It shall not be necessary to affix an adhesive or other stamp to packets of cigarette papers or packages of cigarette paper tubes manufactured in Canada for export out of Canada when they are manufactured and exported under regulations made under the provisions of this act.

5. When cigarette papers in packets or cigarette paper tubes in packages are imported into Canada, the adhesive or other stamp shall be affixed to the packets or packages while they are in the custody of the proper customs officers.

6. The provisions of this section shall not apply to cigarette papers or cigarette paper tubes sold to, or manufactured by, or imported by, a manufacturer licensed to manufacture cigarettes, who employs such cigarette papers or cigarette paper tubes in the manufacture of cigarettes subject to the provisions of the Excise Act.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move to this resolution:

That paragraph 6 of the resolution to amend the Special War Revenue Act, introduced on March 21, 1933, be amended by striking out of the fourth line of subsection 2 of proposed section 77a the figure "5" and substituting therefor the figure "4," and by striking out of the fourth and fifth lines of said subsection 2 the figure "50" and substituting therefor the figure "100" in both places.

In a few words, the amendment means that the tax instead of five cents for each fifty cigarette paper tubes will be four cents for 100 cigarette paper tubes. That is to say, the leaves will be taxed at the rate of twenty cents per 1,000 and the tubes at the rate of forty cents per 1,000.

Mr. POWER: Is that an increase or a decrease?

Mr. RHODES: A decrease.

Mr. POWER: From the originally proposed tax?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. HOWARD: Will that permit the industry in Montreal, which closed its doors after the change, to open again?

Mr. RHODES: I am not disposed to take exception to the manner in which my hon. friend put his question. The industry in Montreal may have closed its doors after the tax was imposed; whether that is due to the tax itself or not is open to debate, but it was felt that perhaps the rate as originally imposed was too high and I think it was. Certainly, the relative tax as between the leaves and the tubes was not properly balanced. Now we have them in the exact proportion that they ought to have, as I understand the matter, and in the same relative proportion that obtains in the United States, that is to say, twice as much upon the tube as upon the sheet. This will mean that the man who "rolls his own" will pay a small tax, but nothing comparable to the amount of tax which is paid upon the manufactured cigarette.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. HOWARD: Under the proposed legislation before the amendment was made, is the Minister of Finance cognizant of the change this actually brought about? I say this for this reason: the other night the hon. member for Compton, speaking in the house, stated that he was satisfied with this budget because those who were best able to pay would be taxed. I take strong exception to that statement. I do not happen to be a smoker of cigarettes, but I know what has happened. A little while ago this government reduced the excise tax on package cigarettes by five cents. The price of cigarettes in the package dropped five cents; in other words, it dropped from twenty-five cents to twenty cents a package. But after all a package of cigarettes on a pound basis is a pretty expensive smoke. Consequently, the poorer people, those who cannot afford to purchase cigarettes in packages, have two methods open to them. One is "roll your own," and the other is possibly the least known, the using of tubes. You may buy tubes in two qualities. For ten cents you could buy 500 tubes manufactured in Montreal or you might purchase a better grade at fifteen cents for 500 tubes. After this tax was imposed, the price of tubes increased to 50 cents for 500 tubes and for the better class 60 cents for 500 tubes, and as a matter of fact the company stopped operating.

I am pleased at the proposed reduction but it is a pretty hard way to apply a tax when you reduce the taxes, which will favour possibly only two immense trusts in Canada and you tax the man who wants to economize or who cannot afford to smoke cigarettes in any other way, that is, the man who buys his cigarette paper and "rolls his own," or the man who buys 500 tubes, sits down at home and puts his tobacco into them in order that he may afford to smoke cigarettes the same as the other fellow.

Mr. RHODES: The lowering of the tax upon manufactured cigarettes did not take effect for the purpose of benefit which might accrue to the large cigarette manufacturing establishments. My hon. friend may not have been in the house at the time, but if he will look up the records he will find that a very distinguished predecessor of mine imposed very heavy taxation on cigarettes and it was demonstrated to him within a very short period of time that the larger tax brought far less return than had the lower one.

Mr. HOWARD: As in every case.

Mr. RHODES: Not necessarily. A tax may be too low, that is dealing with it purely from a revenue viewpoint, but there comes a point beyond which you will get less revenue than you will at the lower figure. It was our belief that we had taxed cigarettes to the point where we were getting a lower yield. It is too soon yet to know and we are operating in times which are not normal, so we cannot measure by normal standards what the yield is, but it is our belief that under the lower cigarette duty we shall get a higher yield to the treasury than obtained under the higher rate.

Coming to the question of the unfairness of taxing the man who "rolls his own," even after these taxes are imposed he will be able to have his cigarettes for just a trifle over one-half of the cost of them to the man who purchases the manufactured cigarettes. There is nothing comparable in the amount of return to the treasury as between the tax imposed upon the man who "rolls his own" and the man who buys his cigarettes. This principle has been recognized as fair. It would be manifestly unfair that the cigarette which pays a large return to the treasury should be diminished in its use because of permission to the smoker who rolls his own to purchase without the payment of a tax. In the United States they have resorted to this form of taxation. It is hardly necessary for me to say to my hon. friend that our only reason for imposing this tax is the need for revenue. We are certainly not imposing it, nor have we imposed any others, because we expect thereby to add to our popularity as a government.

Mr. HOWARD: I am exceedingly pleased with the explanation which the minister has given. Following up that same line of argument the Finance minister will find that following the two or three budgets preceding this one, not only was the revenue diminished but it dropped practically to nothing due to the extremely high tariffs imposed by those budgets. The Minister of Finance admits that that is the case and that if you reduce the tax to the large concerns it will lessen the cost of cigarettes, and naturally increase the revenue. The Finance minister must admit that one of the reasons for the decreased general revenue is that the tariffs have been carried too high. I admit that that is not the only reason because business has been falling off and there has been a lessening of purchasing power. I am not objecting to this particular tax from the revenue standpoint, but I do not think you should put so heavy a tax on the poor man. The Finance minister admits by bringing in this amendment that the tax was too high in the first place. He has reduced it a little, which I approve of, but I do not think he should tax the fellow who is willing to do his own cigarette manufacturing to help himself along. When the five cent excise tax was removed from the package of cigarettes the consumption of cigarettes increased for a little while and all the newspapers of the country broadcast what a wonderful thing had been done in that way in increasing the consumption of cigarettes; but if you will look at the papers for the last two or three weeks you will see that the consumption of cigarettes has decreased enormously and possibly the results have not been what the minister expected. Now on top of that you impose this immense tax on the home-made cigarette. I object to the tax because it is taxing the wrong people. It is following exactly the opposite policy enunciated in speeches made on the other side of the house that this budget was taxing those best able to pay.

Mr. RHODES: To the earlier remark of my hon. friend I take no exception, but he must remember this, that there may be two objects in mind with respect to tariffs; one may be revenue, the other protection, or a combination of both, which is an entirely different matter from the question of raising revenue qua revenue. My hon. friend speaks, and I do not find fault with him for doing so, on behalf of the poor man who rolls his own, but even after this tax is imposed the man who rolls his own will pay $3.40 per thousand less to the treasury than the man who buys manufactured cigarettes, so he still has a very wide margin as compared with the man who buys the manufactured cigarette and who will have to pay one cent apiece.

Mr. HOWARD: For that I am truly thankful, and I am sorry the minister did not go further. The figures which he quoted on a previous item go to show that excessive taxation or high protection cause not only a loss of revenue but an enormous decrease in employment. I shall not read the figures which the minister gave, but that is very important. My objection is not from the revenue standpoint because I realize that we have to have revenue, but I object to taxing the man who is least able to pay.

Mr. MARCIL: I am sorry I was not here when the minister gave his explanation regarding stamps on cheques. I presume that the method now followed whereby one is able to use a postage stamp on a cheque will be continued.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any separate account been kept of the postage stamps used in that way for excise purposes? The postal service is of universal use, and we are all interested in getting as cheap postage as possible, and if the revenues of the Post Office Department are increased by the use of postage stamps on cheques, it would be a good thing for us to know just what amount that represents.

Mr. RHODES: There is no possibility of making a return of that.

Mr. BROWN: Could not the banks do it?

Mr. RHODES: If the banks could be called upon to go through the mass of accounting, looking over millions of cheques, it could be done, but the task would be enormous. That of course raises the whole question. I say quite frankly to the committee that if I were imposing that tax as a new tax I would certainly insist upon a specific revenue stamp being used, and the postage stamp not being used, largely for the purpose of earmarking the amount and volume and incidence of the tax. But it is quite another thing when the public have become accustomed for a number of years to the use of a postage stamp. They would regard it as a real grievance now if such a change were to be made, and for this reason it was felt that it would be unwise to make it. There is no possible means of our knowing just what the proportion is, but of course to the extent that postage stamps are used, to that extent the revenue of the post office is augmented.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the minister could tell the committee what the estimate of the department is of the revenue to be derived from the stamp tax on cheques of five dollars and under.

Mr. RHODES: We have not an exact estimate, and one of the reasons why it is difficult to find out exactly is because of the very condition referred to by my hon. friend from Bonaventure, that a proportion of the stamps used are postage stamps.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Following up what my hon. friend from Bonaventure has said, I think it is important that the government should know how much money they get in from that tax. I am not objecting to the tax, although I had hoped that the government would not find it necessary to continue it, but I do think that at the end of the year we should be able to know how much has been derived from it so that we can judge whether or not the nuisance that is created by it is compensated for by the revenue derived. I would like to know from the minister whether that could be checked so that when we come back next year we shall be able to see how much the tax has brought in. It may have an important bearing on the question whether the tax should be continued.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not segregated figures of the estimates of the department relating to that tax. The figure given to me as the yield of the tax from stamps on cheques, drafts, promissory notes and stock transfers—for the same stamp is used for all purposes—is $2,000,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister has no idea as to the proportions—

Mr. RHODES: I have not the faintest.

Mr. MARCIL: The excise department must know exactly the number of stamps they have issued. By deducting that number from the total amount used we would know approximately the number of post office stamps used. If he could ascertain exactly what part of the revenue could be credited to the Post Office Department, the house would be in a better position to appreciate the situation.

Mr. RHODES: It is unfortunate we are not using a specific stamp for this purpose. If we did we would be able to tell to the exact cent the amount of revenue received.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hope this bombardment will not induce the minister to issue excise stamps. It is very handy to be able to affix a postage stamp to a small document. If we must affix stamps, for heaven's sake let us use postage stamps, rather than have to go here and there looking for excise stamps. Even if we cannot trace the exact revenue to each department, my hope is that we will be allowed to use postage stamps.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Assiniboia): The minister has proposed an amendment to subsection 2. I was wondering if the two cents per hundred on cigarette papers is actually an increase, or is it practically the same as it has been before?

Mr. RHODES: This is entirely a new provision.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph 6 as amended agreed to.

7. That subsection two of section eighty-six of the said act be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided that if a licenced wholesaler sells goods to another licenced wholesaler at a price less than the value upon which the tax is to be computed under paragraph (c) of the last preceding subsection, the vendor shall forthwith become liable to pay the tax upon the difference between such value and his sale price.

Paragraph agreed to.

8. That schedule I to the said act be amended by adding thereto the following articles and imposing thereon an excise tax at the rate set opposite the respective article:

(i) Articles, materials or preparations of whatever composition or in whatever form, commonly or commercially known as toilet articles, preparations or cosmetics which are intended for use or application for toilet purposes, or for use in connection with the care of the human body, including the hair, nails, eyes, teeth or any other part or parts thereof, whether for cleansing, deodorizing, beautifying, preserving or restoring, and to include toilet soaps, antiseptics, bleaches, depilatories, perfumes, scents and similar preparations, 10 per cent.

(ii) Tires of rubber, including inner tubes, for automotive vehicles of all kinds including trailers or other wheeled attachments used in connection with any of the said vehicles, 5 per cent.

Mr. POWER: Does that include all soaps?

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move.

Mr. HOWARD: It is a tax on cleanliness.

Mr. RHODES: I move:

That paragraph 8 of the resolution to amend the Special War Revenue Act be amended as follows:

1. By striking out the words "toilet soaps" in line 7 of subparagraph (i) and substituting therefor the words "shaving soaps and shaving creams";

2. By adding the following paragraph:

"Toilet soaps not to include shaving soaps or shaving creams, 5 per cent."

This amendment means that we will reduce the tax on toilet soaps.

Mr. POWER: Yesterday the minister gave us a lecture on the efficiency of a new shaving machine which he had introduced to the country. Now he will not let us use shaving soap.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do it without soap.

Mr. POWER: I am afraid the minister is not consistent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is the measure intended to discourage shaving?

Mr. RHODES: I hope shaving soaps will be used in increasingly large quantities, because as they are used so shall the revenue be.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to subsection (ii) of paragraph 8, the effect of which will be to put the tax upon a poundage rather than a percentage basis. It is felt that that is a fairer method of estimating the tax. It will be less subject to evasions, and will apply with greater equality. The method proposed is that used in the United States. By experience they have found it preferable to have the tax upon the poundage rather than upon the percentage basis. The only difference is that the tax we propose is smaller than that obtaining in the United States. I move in amendment:

That paragraph 8 of the resolution to amend the Special War Revenue Act, introduced on March 21, 1933, be amended by striking out subparagraph (ii) thereof, and that paragraph 9 of the said resolution be amended by adding thereto the following as subparagraph (v) thereof:—

"(v) Tires in whole or in part of rubber for automotive vehicles of all kinds, including trailers or other wheeled attachments used in connection with any of the said vehicles, per pound, 2 cents.

Inner tubes for use in any such tires, per pound, 3 cents."

The respective rates obtaining in the United States are 2¼ cents and 4 cents. We propose a 3 cent tax on inner tubes, whereas that in the United States is 4 cents.

Mr. EULER: Are these specific rates proportionate to the ad valorem rate of five per cent which is being displaced?

Mr. RHODES: It is as near the five per cent yield as it is posssible to make it, upon the poundage basis.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the minister sure the change will not increase the tax on the cheaper grades of tires? I am afraid the higher priced tubes and tires will receive the advantage.

Mr. RHODES: I understand the determining factor in the United States was that with the tax placed upon an ad valorem basis certain individuals and companies tend to minimize the sizes of their invoices.

Mr. EULER: That is a very nice way of putting it.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, that is a nice way of describing that which in effect is a deliberate attempt in certain quarters to avoid paying a full tax.

Mr. POWER: Rubber dealers may have an elastic conscience.

Mr. RHODES: The advantage cannot be taken when the poundage basis is used. For purposes of revenue collection we are not placed in the hands of unscrupulous corporations or companies. I am not suggesting that any company has been unscrupulous but I say there have been opportunities to evade the tax.

Mr. EULER: You do not want too much elasticity in connection with taxes on rubber tires.

Mr. RHODES: I am told the average weight of a Chevrolet tube is three pounds, the tax would therefore be 9 cents.

Mr. POWER: What is the weight of a Chevrolet tire—the casing?

Mr. RHODES: The casing weighs 20 pounds, so the tax would be 40 cents.

Mr. POWER: And how about a larger car, a Packard?

Mr. RHODES: I have the complete classification here if you wish me to read it.

Mr. POWER: Never mind; I withdraw the question.

Mr. NEILL: I did not catch the words of the minister. Is he sure this will not apply to bicycle tires? I thought I heard the words "wheeled vehicles."

Mr. RHODES: No, I think the word "automotive" is the governing word.

Mr. NEILL: The amendment has not been read yet.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Manion that paragraph 8 of the resolution to amend the Special War Revenue Act, introduced on March 21, 1933, be amended by striking out subparagraph (ii) thereof, and that paragraph 9 of the said resolution be amended by adding thereto the following as subparagraph (v) thereof:

(v) Tires in whole or in part of rubber for automotive vehicles of all kinds, including trailers or other wheeled attachments used in connection with any of the said vehicles, per pound, 2 cents.

Inner tubes for use in any such tires, per pound, 3 cents.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

9. That schedule II to the said act be amended by adding thereto the following articles and imposing thereon an excise tax at the rate set opposite the respective article:—

(i) Sugar, as enumerated in customs tariff item No. 134, 2 cents per pound.

(ii) Unfermented wort (sweet wort), 25 cents per gallon.

(iii) Malt syrup, or malt syrup powder, extracts of malt, fluid or not, or any other malt product intended for the brewing of beer, 50 cents per pound.

Mr. RHODES: There is an amendment to be moved to this paragraph, and I think perhaps it will facilitate discussion if it is presented at once, so that the item may be considered in the light of the amendment. The amendment will read as follows:

1. By striking out subparagraphs (i), (ii) and (iii) and substituting therefor the following:—

"(i) Materials enumerated in customs tariff items 134, 135, 135a, 135b, 139 (except glucose and grape sugar), 140 (except molasses); invert sugar and syrup, two cents per pound;

(ii) Glucose and grape sugar, one cent per pound;

(iii) Unfermented wort (sweet wort) suitable for the brewing of beer, ten cents per gallon;

(iv) Malt syrup, or malt syrup powder, extracts of malt, fluid or not, or any other malt product suitable for the brewing of beer, twenty cents per pound."

2. That any enactment founded on the provisions of subparagraph (i) (except with reference to materials enumerated in customs tariff item 134) and of subparagraph (ii) shall be deemed to have come into force on the 26th day of April, 1933, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask if maple sugar will be taxed?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. HOWARD: Is granulated sugar, the kind used ordinarily, still taxed at the rate of 2 cents per pound?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, the tax is maintained at 2 cents per pound.

Mr. HOWARD: And that tax is to take effect as from to-day?

Mr. RHODES: No, that tax came in on the 21st day of March.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand that the rate under 9 (i) is not changed from 2 cents per pound?

Mr. RHODES: We are taxing glucose now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But sugar is left as it was?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the minister tell us what was the idea of leaving that tax of 2 cents and reducing the tax from 50 cents to 20 cents per pound on malt syrup, malt syrup powder, extract of malt or other malt products suitable for the brewing of beer?

Mr. RHODES: That has no relation to sugar; I do not quite understand my hon. friend's question. Malt syrup sold, and I think still sells, at 20 cents a pound. The tax brought down in the budget was 50 cents per pound, which increased the price to the point where it was excessively burdensome to those who had been accustomed to the use of malt syrup; in fact the assertion was made that it was prohibitive. There is a school of thought which believes that it would be a good thing if this tax were made prohibitive; I have had many representations of that character. On the other hand there is a school of thought which believes that because it has not been taxed hitherto it should continue to be tax free. We have steered what I hope will be a reasonably fair middle course between those two extreme points of view. I may say that I received several deputations representing all shades of business and social activity having association with the manufacture and use of the ingredients which go into home brew.

Mr. EULER: Were the brewers among them?

Mr. POWER: Were the consumers listened to?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, from the earnestness with which many of the representations were made to me I took it that the gentlemen making them were reverential consumers. I may point out that in the opinion of the officials of the excise department two pounds of malt syrup would make four gallons of beer.

Mr. MITCHELL: They do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps my hon. friend will be patient for a moment. Those who are in business manufacturing and selling these products told me that this amount would make a rather thin beer, but they did say that you could safely figure on three and a half gallons from two pounds of malt syrup. Naturally they were pleading for their cause, so I thought that by splitting the difference between the two points of view I would come to a fairly accurate result. But taking the figure as given to me by those who manufacture and sell the ingredients for home brew, this is how it works out. A gallon of home brew beer will cost 22·9 cents after all costs are paid, ingredients and tax; whereas to-day the brewer pays to the federal treasury alone 26 cents per gallon. In other words, the man who makes home brew and pays the tax proposed in the amendment will be actually getting his beer per gallon at a cost to him of 3 1/10 cents less per gallon than the brewer pays in taxation to the dominion treasury alone.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that to encourage home industry?

Mr. RHODES: I know my hon. friend's levity, but we must bear this in mind, that there are hundreds of thousands, I am safe in saying, certainly between one and two hundred thousand people in Canada who have been in the habit of making home brew.

An hon. MEMBER: Two hundred thousand in Ontario alone.

Mr. RHODES: I am glad to see that I am under rather than over the mark. Through the years this has become an established practice and naturally to such people this tax will come as more or less a burden. But in these pressing times, when the treasury is in dire need of every penny it can reasonably secure in the form of taxation, it is felt to be only fair that inasmuch as the beer manufacturer pays an extremely heavy tax, a relatively modest tax should be paid by the consumer of home brew.

Mr. HOWARD: The first item in this schedule has been amended, but so far as granulated white sugar is concerned the tax still stands at 2 cents per pound. I want to protest in the strongest words I can use against this tax of 2 cents per pound on granulated white sugar, a commodity which perhaps is in greater demand than most any other product in Canada. At least, it has a wider distribution than any other product I know of. The tax is an enormous one, but that is not the most serious aspect of the situation; there is something else to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee, because I cannot believe that the Minister of Finance can have no knowledge at all of what I am going to disclose to-day on the floor of this house.

I was in this house a few years ago when from this side, by hon. gentlemen now opposite, an attack was made against a personal friend of mine, a minister of the crown in the Mackenzie King government, and a man who was probably as well loved as any minister has ever been in Quebec. I refer to the matter of the customs scandal and the attack made against the late Hon. George Boivin. I sat through that session and heard a two hour speech in which that gentleman was attacked, but the situation then was of minor importance compared to that which exists to-day in connection with the imposition of this sugar tax. I do not want to suggest, so far as this government is concerned, that there have been any leaks from cabinet council, because the proceedings in council are sacred. I would not suggest that any information leaked out from the cabinet so that people outside were able to discover that the tax would be imposed. But I will say that the sugar refineries in Canada, thirty days previous to the bringing down of the budget, were stocked with sugar; their storage houses were filled and other places were filled to overflowing with bags of granulated sugar, which was being absorbed very slowly by the consuming public because of the low purchasing power. Shortly before the budget was brought down, quite suddenly this sugar started to leave the refineries and warehouses, finding its way into the hands of wholesalers throughout the length and breadth of Canada, so much so that one concern in Montreal is rumoured to have taken 70,000 bags on which in twenty minutes it made a profit of $140,000. You can go to every city of Canada, to the wholesalers and the wholesale grocery men of the country, and you will find that these wholesalers were tipped off, and that carloads of sugar had been shipped to them prior to the budget.

An hon. MEMBER: Trainloads.

Mr. HOWARD: I will go further than that. The day before the budget was delivered, in the city of Montreal alone, on St. Paul street, they could not get motor trucks enough to take the sugar out of the refineries and so they hired taxicabs to haul away the commodity from the refineries to the wholesalers.

Now, when we are feeding, in my constituency, 4,000 people; when we find conditions there such as we have never known in the history of Canada; when one had come to the conclusion that owing to extraordinary overcapitalization and frenzied finance in this country our financial concerns should at least have come to their senses, one does think that the ordinary citizens of Canada, the ordinary manufacturers and the common people should have been given a chance to get on their feet again and at any rate to get three meals a day before this new profiteering should occur. But right at this moment we find one concern making a net profit in twenty minutes of over $100,000. I am not finding fault so much with the profit, but I am pointing out that this tax was put on to bring revenues into the treasury of Canada, and the poor people and the masses of this country the day after the budget came down paid $2.50 per bag more; yet the money did not find its way into the coffers of the government but into the pockets of a few.

Mr. COTNAM: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

(Mr. Howard.)

Mr. HOWARD: I am discussing this item.

Mr. COTNAM: Will the hon. gentleman name the refinery that made a profit of $100,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Sit down.

Mr. COTNAM: I will sit down when I am ready. He won't answer the question.

Mr. HOWARD: This matter is most serious, Mr. Chairman. The newspapers of Canada the next day stated that over $5,000,000 would go into the pockets of a few people instead of finding its way into the treasury of the country. As a matter of fact, the taxpayers are paying $2.75 a bag more to-day, and they are taking this money from sources which are practically depleted. But they must have white sugar and so they have to pay the price. But that money is not going into the treasury of Canada. I think it would be well for the government to make the tax retroactive over a period of thirty days, but there is a better suggestion I would offer. I think it is due to the people of this country that the names of those who took this sugar out of the warehouses in the manner I have described should be published in the newspapers so that the people of Canada would know who they were. Possibly in that way we could find out how the information leaked out that this government was going to place a tax of 2 cents a pound on sugar. They are taking it from the poor people and putting it into the hands of those who after all are most responsible for the crisis we are now facing. I claim that this is a worse situation than that of keeping a poor fellow out of gaol after the warrant for arrest has been issued; it is worse than asking that sentence be suspended temporarily. The government should inform this house before the close of this session as to just exactly what happened in connection with sugar and why the information got out. I do not like to impute wrong motives to people but let me say this—

An hon. MEMBER: No?

Mr. HOWARD: No, I do not; I want to be fair.

An hon. MEMBER: That is your reputation!

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members should address the chair.

Mr. HOWARD: I know of one company in Montreal who are in the habit of buying sugar in 200 bag lots. As soon as one particular lot is disposed of they buy another batch. It happened that two days before the budget came down they placed their regular order for 200 bags of sugar. Although the refinery knew quantities of sugar were in their warehouse; they said that they could not fill the order until after a certain date, mentioning the date the budget was delivered in this house. That order for 200 bags of sugar was turned down because the refineries were oversold. Those of us who are acquainted with merchandising know that when prices are falling it is impossible to get people to buy, but once they begin to advance it is extraordinary how people will step in and buy. I do not want to make charges which cannot be substantiated but the fact remains that when this tax was placed upon sugar the natural result was that the price started to advance. It not only advanced the amount of the tax, but it went up an extra half cent per pound to cover the increased capital outlay Let us take another industry as an example. This is the way business has been done for years in the flour industry.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think flour would be covered by this item.

Mr. McINTOSH: Forget about it.

Mr. HOWARD: I was just demonstrating my point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HOWARD: I will continue with sugar. When the price of sugar drops, the travellers go all over the country but find they cannot place an order. Then they go around and say that sugar is going to advance a quarter of a cent per pound and they are able to take order after order. I would not like to say that this was a scheme to clean out the stocks of sugar and put them in the hands of the consumer but when the revenues of this country have been robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars, I think it is the duty of the Minister of Finance either to make the tax retroactive for thirty days or investigate this matter most fully. This investigation should not be carried on by a commission—we have had plenty of commissions—it should be conducted by the members of this house or the members of this government. We should be informed exactly as to what happened in connection with this tax. When the people who can ill afford to pay a tax have to pay a tax on sugar, they want to be able to feel sure that the money goes into the coffers of the government.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can complain at the castigation that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) has given to certain interests in this country who were no doubt able to reap a profit as a result of the tax imposed upon sugar. Even in the case of the very best intentioned individual, a situation might arise where he would have in his possession a commodity upon which a tax had been imposed.

As far as the question of a leak is concerned, I may say that I have been at pains to make as careful an inquiry as I possibly could. I have yet to find the faintest shade, shadow or scintilla of evidence that there was anything in the nature of a leak. My hon. friend smiles, but let me give him my side of the story. Let me say to him, to any hon. member of this committee or to any person in this country, that I will welcome any information which will be kept in the utmost confidence which will put me upon the trail of any evidence to show that there was a leak with respect to the tax upon sugar. If hon. members will recall the press notices they will remember that for days prior to the budget there were all kinds of speculation as to this, that, and the other tax. Sugar was mentioned in the press several days before the government had decided to put a tax upon that commodity. I canvassed this matter within myself, if I may use that expression, for days and days and I broached it only to the officials of the department whose integrity and honour are beyond question. The matter was not mentioned even to my colleagues until a very short time before the date of the budget and the question of the rate was not determined until a few hours before the budget. I refuse to believe that there was a leak. There is no doubt there was shrewd guessing because the country realized that we were sorely put to it to secure additional revenue in an endeavour to balance our budget upon current account. The best evidence of this that I can give to the committee is a transaction which came to my notice. At the same time the press was forecasting a tax upon sugar, it forecast a tax upon tea and coffee.

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody loaded up with those.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. I have positive evidence of one firm in the city of Winnipeg that borrowed $18,000 from the bank in order to take tea and coffee out of bond in the belief that they would be able to reap the same benefit as did those who had sugar in their possession. But they lost. There are dozens and dozens of cases like that throughout the country. My hon. friend shakes his head, but I know whereof I speak.

An hon. MEMBER: They did not lose anything.

Mr. RHODES: They did lose. They did not reap their expectations and they lost to the extent of the carrying charges and the interest on the $18,000 borrowed from the bank. They also have tea and coffee upon their hands which they cannot dispose of. They are actually a substantial sum of money out of pocket. I make reference to this in order to show that the same practice obtained with respect to tea and coffee.

Mr. GRAY: Not to the same extent.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member may know all about it but perhaps he will give me the right of expressing my view. I hope that is not too much to expect. I have discussed this matter with officials in other countries and it has been the subject of discussion in Great Britain for years. That is as to whether a method could be devised which could prevent forestalling, and with all their shrewdness, ingenuity and experience as administrators, the people of the mother country have had to admit that there is no way whereby they can prevent this.

Let me say to the hon. member for Sherbrooke and the committee that there were many business men of integrity who had no idea of loading up with sugar for the purpose of evading the payment of a tax or of making a profit. My hon. friend smiles. I am not suggesting that there were not many who did so load up, but there were in this country honest men, good intentioned citizens who did not. I make that statement merely to lead up to this: I know of my experience in this city of housewives who, having read in the press that there was going to be a tax on sugar, went down to their grocers and ordered in lots of 100, 200 and as high as 300 pounds in individual cases of which I am aware. That being so, I have, I think, every right fairly to assume that if that obtained in Ottawa, it obtained throughout Canada and as a result of that, the multiplicity of those orders made for a market stimulation in orders upon the wholesaler and by him in turn upon the sugar refiner, so that that was a contributing factor, although I do not intend to assert to how large an extent it applied.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: I am speaking without notes and I would like first to express one or two ideas. If my hon. friend does not mind, I would be glad if he would submit his question later.

Another factor which must be borne in mind is a fact which can be verified by access to the records. The hon. member for Sherbrooke says that when the price is going down, people do not buy, but when it is going up, they do. If my hon. friend will look at the records, he will find that there was an increase of ten cents a hundred pounds in the price of raw sugar just a few hours before the budget was delivered. That increase had the same effect my hon. friend said it would have; when raw sugar went up, people immediately rushed to buy the granulated. That is the invariable practice in the sugar business and it so chanced that that is exactly what happened; my word need not be taken for it; the records will dislcose it to have been the case. But let me say this to my hon. friend and to the committee; if any method can be devised which will enable the government to put into the treasury money which ought properly to go there, I would welcome suggestions along that line.

The hon. member has spoken of the amount of loss. If we bear in mind the situation of which I spoke, of the stimulation in the purchase of sugar by the acceleration of orders through the retailers and wholesalers, owing to the attitude of the housewife alone, and the accumulation of those various factors, after very careful investigation and computation on the part of the Department of National Revenue, the estimate which they make is that the net loss of revenue to the treasury is ten per cent. In other words, if the yield from the sugar tax were to be $20,000,000, which is a larger figure than was anticipated, the net loss to the treasury would be $2,000,000. But my hon. friend must also bear this in mind; if a method could be devised which would enable the treasury to go out and secure that two cents per pound tax, some day—and I hope soon—the sugar tax will come off. When it does, the treasury must be prepared to hand two cents to everybody in the country who has a pound of sugar in his possession. There is no question that when the tax comes off, those who still continue in the business will make their contribution to the extent of their stocks on hand; that is the invariable experience. It is true there is never an exact balance, but there is no doubt that there will be a compensating feature through the situation when the tax comes off.

The government, in imposing this tax, was under no illusion that it was going to add to its popularity.

Mr. FACTOR: Why did you do it?

Mr. RHODES: Because we had a full sense of appreciation of our duty to the people of this country including the very people who complain about the two cent tax. If the credit of Canada were impaired as a result of the negligence of the government in properly administering the finances of the country, the cost to the people ultimately would be far greater than two cents a pound on sugar.

Mr. FACTOR: Why place the tax on the poor fellow all the time?

Mr. RHODES: The tax was imposed, as the committee well knows, solely because of the dire necessity for revenue. It may be a new experience to certain people in this country that a revenue tax of this character should be imposed, but it is not new in other countries. In the mother country for many years they have had similar taxes on many commodities, and the people have paid them, perhaps grudgingly in many instances, knowing the treasury had to have the revenue. But it must be borne in mind that even with the price of sugar as it is to-day and with the tax added, the householder can purchase sugar at a far lower price than the average which has ruled over the last twenty years.

An hon. MEMBER: But these are times of depression.

Mr. RHODES: I quite appreciate that; we all realize it, and I might counter by sayinng that if it were not for the conditions in which we live, we would not be imposing a sugar tax. We are living in an unusual period in the world's history and we must resort in some instances to unusual methods to attempt to cope with conditions. It is sad that at a period when the government has to tax most, the people are least in a position to pay. That is one of the very regrettable features; nobody deplores this more than I do, but we would be doing a disservice to the people if we did not protect the financial credit of the country through taxation.

Mr. REID: But we should not protect the profiteers.

Mr. RHODES: I agree with my hon. friend, and if there were any method by which we could get at the profiteers, I would be the first to say that we should do so.

Mr. MUNN: At what time did the tax become effective on granulated sugar?

Mr. RHODES: At midnight on March 21.

Mr. MUNN: Will the minister take the case—

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend wait a moment until after I have made the few remarks which I am making without notes?

Mr. MUNN: I beg pardon; I thought the minister had finished.

Mr. RHODES: If I may make a personal reference, I am suffering with a rather severe headache to-day and I am trying to make just what few remarks I have to make. After that, I shall not object to any questions.

The average price of sugar over the period of the last twenty years is 9·2 cents per pound.

Mr. DUFF: Wholesale or retail?

Mr. RHODES: That is the retail price. That is the average over the whole of each year for the whole of the twenty years. The best evidence of the accuracy of these figures, which I may say are compiled by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, is found in the fact that the highest price quoted for sugar is 19·7 in 1920. That was the average for that year, but as a matter of fact it is within the knowledge of hon. members present that sugar that year at one period was as high as twenty-five cents per pound, in fact, in one case I think it went up to twenty-six cents. It might be interesting to have these figures before the committee:

Retail Price of Sugar

*(First three months.)

Mr. DUFF: What is the price now?

Mr. RHODES: I am unable to give my hon. friend an accurate answer, but three or four days ago I observed in a paper published in the constituency of my hon. friend from Hants-Kings, the Windsor Tribune, that in Newport in that county sugar was selling at ten pounds for 65 cents, and I observed that A. J. Frieman, of Ottawa, in their advertisement of April 21, were offering sugar at ten pounds for 65 cents. I am free to admit that that is probably a leader price. Let us assume that the price is 7 cents.

Mr. DUFF: In New York you can buy ten pounds for 40 cents.

Mr. RHODES: I am not suggesting that that may not be so, but I am not dealing with New York but with Canada, and with the price in Canada to-day as compared with the last twenty years. So even with the tax added, the price of sugar to-day is much less than the average prevailing price for the last twenty years. Having that in mind and having regard to the conditions, I do say that the tax ought not to be regarded as unduly burdensome. I have spoken at greater length than I had intended, and I hope hon. gentlemen will forgive me for not having answered any questions which they wished to put to me while I was on my feet, but to the best of my ability I shall endeavour to answer them as they submit them now.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister cited the fact that householders had purchased sugar on the assumption perhaps that there would be a tax on sugar. We are not complaining about the householders. They were not going to sell sugar and make a profit out of it; it was for their own use in their own household. What we criticize is the fact that in some way or other information got out to certain people, and they purchased sugar before the tax came into effect, and reaped large profits.

My hon. friend from Sherbrooke has spoken of Montreal. There is a rumour—I do not know whether it is correct or not—which the Minister of Finance may have heard, and at least when it reaches his ears he should investigate it, that one brokerage firm in the city of Toronto by some means or other got information which they said was absolutely authentic, and on that information they went to their bankers and the result was that they purchased, not carloads, but trainloads of sugar, and it is reported that their profit was as much as $2,000,000. When I say brokerage firm, I do not mean grocery brokerage but the old-fashioned kind of brokers who used to make money when stocks were being bought and sold. I do not know whether this rumour is correct or not. Nevertheless, even if their profit was $100 instead of $2,000,000, if it was obtained through getting inside information and they purchased to avoid paying the government the tax that was due, the matter should be investigated, and if it is true these people should be prosecuted. There is no comparison between the broker or gambler or speculator who buys sugar and sells it and the householder who buys a few pounds of sugar for use in her own home. I say in all seriousness, and I believe the minister is serious over this and would be glad to get any information he can in regard to it, that he should search diligently to find the source of the leak. For the good of the tax-payers of this country the minister should not let this question rest with this debate, but he should get busy and get his officials busy and try to get some authentic information. I think he will find that the rumours in some degree are correct.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must not think that when I made reference to the individual householder I was for one moment suggesting that there was anything wrong in what that householder did, nor was I complaining in the slightest degree. If my hon. friend had followed me he would have realized that I merely referred to that incident for one purpose and one purpose only. I said that the multiplication of these cases would account for a substantial part of the accelerated movement of sugar prior to the imposition of the tax, and I think that is a fair assumption. I am not complaining of that at all, nor do I complain at the castigation which my hon. friend would give anybody who would profiteer under those conditions at the expense of the people of this country and of the treasury. I have not heard of the incident referred to by my hon. friend. I welcome any information that could be given to me. I may say to him that the officials of the Department of National Revenue have made a check-up in every refinery in Canada and there is absolutely no evidence upon the records of business that any such transaction did take place or could have taken place because the sales were all made to the usual customers and the usual dealers who are purchasers of sugar, and unless one of these had become a party to a transaction of that character there could be no truth in the statement. Certainly there could be no truth in the statement so far as the magnitude of the transaction mentioned by my hon. friend is concerned. I hope that my hon. friend will not for one moment think that we want to fold our arms peacefully and say that this incident is closed—not at all. I am very sincerely desirous, naturally as Minister of Finance, apart from any other consideration, because of the loss to the treasury that the treasury should be recouped to the last farthing if possible. But a pious desire to do so and a method of doing so without doing injustice is another thing. You cannot follow a pound of sugar very well after it has left—

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister might follow a trainload.

Mr. RHODES: The figures which I gave before to the committee are accurate. They are the result of an actual computation made from the books of the refineries themselves, that the maximum amount that could have been lost to the treasury is $2,000,000.

Mr. DUFF: That would be one million bags.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but my hon. friend from South Perth referred to a firm of brokers in Toronto who are said to have purchased trainloads of sugar. There was an acceleration of sugar purchases throughout the whole dominion, but there was not enough sugar loose in the land for trainloads to be put up under those conditions. I repeat that hon. gentlemen owe it as a duty to themselves, to their constituents and the country—rumour and suspicion and that sort of thing is worthless—but if they can get any evidence, which I very much doubt that there was anything in the nature of a leak I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. HOWARD: I appreciate that the Minister of Finance wants to get all the revenue he can, and that is the reason I put the facts before the committee as I did this afternoon. There are two ways in which it could be done. First of all, I think the minister will admit that if a person had been buying sugar from the refinery as he needed it in carload lots, and then all of a sudden purchased ten cars at one time there must have been something extraordinarily wrong. Those things do not just happen. There are two ways of meeting the difficulty. I have already suggested that the provision should be made retroactive for thirty days from the date of the budget. In that way the minister would not be inflicting any hardship on anybody. The householder or consumer who has purchased a bag of sugar has paid $6.50 or $6.75 a bag for it. The only person making any money is the man who either was tipped off or took exceptionally large quantities of sugar for resale. The reason I suggest the change is that it would be in the interests of the country, and provide revenue.

We have been discussing an item to-day in regard to cigarette papers and tubes, and surely the item in regard to sugar should not be allowed to stand as it is. When the banks of the United States found that through people withdrawing gold they had practically no gold left in their vaults, the President issued a statement to the effect that unless the gold were put back into the banks within a week's time he would publish the names of the people who had taken it out. What happened? The gold came back mighty quickly. Why not use this publicity method.

There are many ways of meeting the difficulty this item presents. If the treasury of Canada can get back $2,000,000 from people who had no right to make excess profits in these times, then that would be the wise thing to do, and would be a good deal better than just imposing the tax for which provision is made. I have nothing to say concerning the minister's suggestion, except that according to his figures the average price of sugar was 9·2 cents per pound, while to-day it is only 6·75. Any person in Canada will admit that 6·75 cents is much more to-day than 9·2 was at an earlier period. We must consider present purchasing power.

Mr. RHODES: I hope the hon. member for Sherbrooke will not object to a question. He has stated that the tax should be made retroactive for thirty days. From whom would he collect that tax?

Mr. HOWARD: From the wholesalers who purchased the sugar. The refinery in Canada which takes sugar cane from the south or sugar beets from our fields and converts it into sugar does not sell that sugar to the householder or to the consumer. That is not done. That sugar goes through the regular channels of business into the hands of the wholesalers and from the wholesalers to retailers then to the consumer.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member has suggested that for a period of thirty days prior to March 21, he would impose a tax of 2 cents a pound upon all sugar sold by wholesalers. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWARD: I did not say that.

An hon. MEMBER: You did.

Mr. RHODES: What did you say?

Mr. HOWARD: I shall repeat it. Either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue upon looking into the books of refineries could tell exactly who bought the sugar. They could go back six months and find out how much sugar each firm took in that time. When he finds that the wholesaler has purchased not twice or three times the regular monthly quantity, but that he has purchased from ten to twenty times that quantity, he should ask that wholesaler to pay a tax on the increased quantity of sugar. As I have suggested it was bought because of information received, or for some other reason.

Mr. RHODES: I understood the hon. member to state very distinctly that he would collect from the wholesalers.

Mr. HOWARD: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: A minute later he said he did not mean to make the wholesaler pay.

Mr. HOWARD: I did not say that.

Mr. RHODES: I am not trying to quibble. I am merely trying to pursue the hon. member's line of thought. He has said he would make the tax retroactive for a period of thirty days.

Mr. HOWARD: Yes, and then you would not have to investigate.

Mr. RHODES: And the hon. member would make up the money from sugar which had been sold prior to March 21?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend said that. He has directed his remarks to the excess more recently; he did not mention that angle of the matter at first. However let us deal with the excess. How will the hon. member establish a definition for the term "normal purchase." They could not do it in England —but of course we are much brighter here! Certainly we have not had the same amount of experience. Who will determine what is a normal purchase on the part of a wholesaler?

An hon. MEMBER: Monthly average stock.

Mr. RHODES: What about the case in point in regard to accumulations by householders who have accelerated their orders from local grocers. My hon. friend smiles, but I remind him there is nothing to smile about.

Mr. HOWARD: I agree it is a very serious matter.

Mr. RHODES: Why does the hon. member smile, if he feels that way? I assure you I do not feel like smiling. The sugar tax is a very serious business; it is not nearly as sweet as it sounds. But if this happened —and I have no doubt it has happened—that there has been an accumulation of orders in local groceries, because the housewives anticipated the tax—the hon. member from South Perth shakes his head. From my personal contact with certain householders in Ottawa I know there was that anticipation.

Mr. SANDERSON: We are not concerned with that.

Mr. RHODES: I know we are not. My hon. friend is too bright to allow his mind to be clouded with the thought that I am criticizing the householder. I am not doing that. I am referring to an accumulation of orders, and am not saying that it was not a perfectly proper procedure for the housewife to take. But those orders banked up. If the local grocer's stock is depleted he calls up the wholesaler, and if those orders are multiplied there is sure to be an accumulation. The wholesaler would sell it in the ordinary course of business. The hon. member for Sherbrooke would turn around and make the poor unfortunate wholesaler pay two cents a pound on sugar which he had sold in good faith to the local grocer, and on sales which were brought about by accelerated orders.

I do not believe there is any one commodity in Canada which through a period of years has uniformly yielded such a small profit as has sugar.

The CHAIRMAN: It is six o'clock.

Mr. HOWARD: I believe I should be given an opportunity to say a word in answer. If the minister misunderstood me I am sorry; I thought I had made myself clear. I will leave it to the Department of National Revenue to make collections. But I repeat that if we went into the refineries and ascertained the amounts wholesalers were in the habit of purchasing, we would find out that wholesalers in the habit of purchasing 200 bags per month actually purchased ten times that quantity. If those facts were ascertained the excess could very easily be determined.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member used the word "if." I say to him investigations disclose there was nothing approaching ten times as much bought by any company or individual in Canada.

Mr. HOWARD: I will take the risk on that.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

CONDITION OF SETTLERS IN ROUYN AND OTHER PARTS OF QUEBEC

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) made reference to some settler in the Rouyn district of Quebec, who claimed to have been in very difficult circumstances and, I believe, was said to be in danger of starving to death, and I gathered from the observations made by the hon. member that this settler was induced to go on the land partly by this government, in conjunction with the province of Quebec and the municipalities. Reference was also made to other settlers. I have received to-day a telegram from Mr. J. E. Laforce, who acts for the Canadian National Railways on the committee with respect to this work. The telegram, if I may be permitted to read it, is as follows:

> Relative statement the Gazette this morning. No families back to land were placed Rouyn or immediate surroundings. No back to land families province Quebec in distress provided they have shown willingness to work.
> J. E. Laforce.

I then got the alphabetical list of the names and locations of all settlers in the territory of Abitibi and I do not find amongst them the name of the person who sent the telegram to the hon. member for Témiscouata. I also made inquiry with respect to the placing of settlers in the Témiscouata constituency and I find that, as regards the settlers who were assisted by this government to locate there, we have only two and that they both signify to the committee that they are doing very well. I believe there are other settlers there who were placed by the province of Quebec, and of course I have no report upon their condition because that is a matter essentially for the province to deal with.

SOLDIER SETTLERS—SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) yesterday inquired concerning seed for soldier settlers. I asked him whether he would be good enough to let me have the name of the settler to whom he referred, and he did so. This settler is located not in the constituency of North Battleford but I believe in the constituency of Weyburn.

It would appear that the director of soldier settlement, in order to have the same treatment afforded to all settlers with respect to seed grain in the western provinces, in fact throughout Canada wherever the need arose, made it possible for all settlers to be treated alike. They could apply to the municipality, the same as the civilian settler or any other farmer, and the director, acting within the scope of his authority, gave them a preferential lien, withdrawing the preferred position of the crown, as it were, with respect to seed.

The settler to whom the hon. member for North Battleford made reference received seed last year and was advised some months ago of the course he should pursue if he were without sufficient seed for this season's operation. It would appear that he has ample seed to take care of the land that belongs to the crown in the right of the dominion, but that he has purchased other lands, to take care of which he may not have seed enough. The position was indicated to him some time ago and if he will follow the procedure as outlined, he should have no difficulty.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Thursday, April 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway system and for other purposes—Mr. Manion.—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. MANION: Before we take up any of the sections which were allowed to stand, we might first dispose of the question of amalgamation. It is the intention of the government to put in a clause as part IV of the bill. It was thought that by doing this the clause would stand out more plainly as referring to the whole bill. I have given copies of the proposed amendment to my right hon. friend and other hon. members opposite. If it is agreeable to the committee this clause will be put in as part IV and numbered section 27, or possibly some other number if the numbering of the sections is changed. The amendment reads:

Nothing in this act shall be deemed to authorize the amalgamation of any railway company which is comprised in the National Railways with any railway company which is comprised in Pacific railways nor to authorize the unified management and control of the railway system which forms part of National railways with the railway system which forms part of Pacific railways.

I might say that this amendment has been submitted to the legal officers of the department as well as to the legal officers of the Department of Justice. It is thought that this amendment will provide against any amalgamation of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I understand the amendment, its purport is to prevent the taking over by the Canadian Pacific of any branch lines from the Canadian National, or visa versa. I do not think it was ever intended that such an amendment should go that far. I may be wrong, as one cannot follow the ramifications of an amendment of this character simply by hearing it read.

Mr. MANION: This is to preclude the amalgamation of the two companies but there is nothing to prevent the establishing of joint running rights, the joint use of terminals, the linking up of telegraph or ticket offices and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the time the minister mentioned his intended amendment to the committee I suggested for his consideration the adding to the section of certain words which now appear elsewhere in the act. These were, "in so far as the provisions of this act may be inconsistent with the provisions of this section, they shall be read in the light thereof and be so construed as to conform therewith." Either the minister or the Prime Minister stated that the addition of such words would be superfluous as their intent would be covered by the section as worded. If that is so, I will not press the matter any further.

Mr. MANION: I think the right hon. gentleman is referring to section 24, which still stands, and which reads:

In the event of any conflict between an order of the Board of Railway Commissioners and that of any tribunal, the order or decision of the tribunal shall prevail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was with reference to amalgamation, that the provisions of this act shall be read in the light of the section it is now being proposed to insert, and that nothing therein shall further amalgamation.

Mr. MANION: The reason we have made this section a separate and distinct part is to cover that very point. It was thought that by making it a separate part it would stand out more emphatically. It could have been put in as one of the preliminary clauses which apply to the whole bill, but I am advised by the legal fraternity that making it a distinct part would make the right hon. gentleman's recommendation unnecessary.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose the minister is prepared to admit that the same authority that inserts this amendment can strike it out?

Mr. MANION: Of course. We cannot bind any future parliament and when my hon. friend is Prime Minister he may change this bill or do anything he wishes.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope the amendment will come in long before I am Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAY: Does the minister really think that this amendment is of any real value; does he think there are any teeth in it?

Mr. MANION: The amendment is made to meet the wishes of hon. friends opposite who apparently thought they saw a coloured gentleman in the woodpile. As the hon. member for Cartier said in his speech, he thought this was going to lead to amalgamation. The government had no thought of amalgamation but in order to cooperate with hon. friends opposite, this clause has been suggested. If they desire that it should not be included in the bill, I do not think it would change the effect of the bill at all. It was to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite as well as those outside the house who might think that there was something wrong with the bill that this amendment was suggested.

Mr. GRAY: In other words, it is merely an expression of intention or hope?

Mr. MANION: The intention, and I think the effect of this amendment is to prevent the amalgamation of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not going to argue at any great length with respect to this provision, because the government and the minister have been good enough to accept the suggestion from this side of the house, but I want to put myself on record so that there may be no comeback so far as I am concerned that this is merely a pious hope—and apparently it is about the only thing we can get—that is placed in the bill stating that there shall be no amalgamation. I want to point out to the minister once more that this bill which we are discussing provides for amalgamation of the railroads of Canada; despite anything that may be included in the bill, its actual operation is amalgamation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nonsense.

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friend from York-Sunbury is the best judge of nonsense of any man in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am, and I am looking right at the hon. member.

Mr. HEENAN: Since I have been in the house I have never heard the hon. member give expression to anything but nonsense of the worst kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: Do not any of you Tories think you are going to get away with this.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member address the chair?

Mr. HEENAN: Will the chairman keep his own side in order? I do not want these men who do not know what they are talking about to interfere in my discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must address the chair.

Mr. HEENAN: I am addressing the chair now. I do not intend to allow the Tory party to give away the Canadian National without the people of this country knowing what they are doing. The bill itself provides for the amalgamation of our Canadian railroads. I believe the minister is sincere in thinking that this amendment is of value. I think it is of value to this extent only that the government is enunciating in this provision that it does not intend the amalgamation of the railroads of Canada, but that does not detract in the slightest from this bill which provides for running rights of one road over the other, the merging of services and all the ramifications that go into the operation of a railway. The amalgamation of the railroads of Canada is right in this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just your opinion.

Mr. HEENAN: If I were as ignorant as my hon. friend, I would not give expression to such ignorance.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member knew anything about the English language, he would not make such a statement.

Mr. HEENAN: If I were as ignorant as my hon. friend, I would go to law school.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member lived in the days of Parnell, he would be a dynamiter.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask hon. members to address the chair.

Mr. HEENAN: All I am asking you, sir, to do, is to keep order on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN: That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. HEENAN: I just want to give warning that neither the chairman nor anyone else will shut me up on this measure, because when it means putting 20,000 or 30,000 workers on the streets in order to help the money-lenders of New York, I am going to fight for the citizens of Canada.

I am not going to argue against this amendment, but I want to put myself on record. I am going to support it because it seems to be a pious hope the government have that the railroads will not be amalgamated, but I cannot accept it as being of value and I may be all wrong—

Mr. MANION: The hon. member is.

Mr. HEENAN: —but I want to tell the government and the minister they are all wrong on it. Every provision in this bill means the amalgamation of the operations of the railroads of Canada. Apart from that I want to say that I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have in my constituency as many and probably more railwaymen than has the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in his.

Mr. HEENAN: Why does the hon. member not fight for them?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have just as much interest in them as he has in his, but I am not a self-constituted champion as he is.

Mr. HEENAN: I know the hon. member is not.

Mr HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only position the railroad men in my constituency take is that the principle of amalgamation shall not be included in this bill. It is not included in the bill, but to make assurance doubly sure and to relieve the minds of the railwaymen of this country the government has inserted an amendment which has been read to the committee to-day. If the hon. gentleman knew anything about the drawing and construction of statutes, he would know it is not necessary to insert in a bill a provision which negatives something which does not exist. This proposed amendment is in law absolutely unnecessary, but in order to satisfy public opinion and especially that which I have the honour to represent directly, namely, the railwaymen in my constituency, this is being put into the bill; they are quite satisfied with it and I venture to say that not one of them is asking the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to champion their cause in the house.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee whether there is at present any move on foot to amalgamate the services of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National express companies?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I cannot answer definitely as to that. I may say quite frankly that certain cooperative measures are being studied by the management of the two railways and, generally speaking, the government does not hear the result of such detailed studies until something definite has developed from them. I understand there have been discussions as to operating the express companies to a greater extent in cooperation than has been the case in the past, but further than that I am sorry I cannot definitely inform my hon. friend.

Mr. HEAPS: I happen to have in my possession a communication addressed to me just a few days ago dealing with this question. While the talk is of cooperation and consolidation, this letter refers distinctly to amalgamation of the two companies with the primary intention of saving large sums of money and of course with the result of letting out large numbers of employees. In this communication which comes from a reputable source—and although it is confidential, I will let the minister see portions of it—they talk of the amalgamation of the two services. They claim that the Canadian National service is much superior to that of the Canadian Pacific, and they believe the best portions of the business of the Canadian National will be picked up and amalgamated with the Canadian Pacific. Whether that be correct or not, I cannot say, but the impression is at present gaining ground throughout the country that the privately owned company is taking off the best portions of the Canadian National railway system and that is being amalgamated, while the government or the country will be left with the worst portions of the Canadian National railway services and will no doubt have to maintain that as a losing proposition as time goes on. That is likely to happen. We have already had the consolidation of services between Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto and this was one of the best services which the Canadian National had so far as passenger traffic was concerned. If that is going to be the basis of cooperation between the two railways, I am afraid we are going to do something which we shall ultimately regret. The information contained in this letter, coming from what I believe is a reputable source, is that the income of the Canadian National Express Company is claimed to be much higher than that of the Canadian Pacific Express Company, and if we are going to have instance after instance of the best paying services of the Canadian National system being amalgamated with the poor services of the Canadian Pacific, I am afraid this bill is hardly worth the time we are giving to it in the house.

Mr. MANION: I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to imply that we are going to have instance after instance of the Canadian National being sacrificed to the interests of Canadian Pacific. I have not yet heard of anything which would justify such an assertion. I am just as interested in the Canadian National as is my hon. friend. Furthermore, if as he suggests the managing officers of the Canadian National Railways were so stupid as to permit the Canadian Pacific Railway to pick off their plums in that fashion, then I think the sooner we got rid of the whole outfit the better. That would be my feeling about it. But I do not believe that the managing officers of the Canadian National are stupid. I believe that they are just as capable of taking care of themselves as are the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I believe that they will take care of themselves in any cooperative measures that may be adopted.

My hon. friend said something about the Canadian National giving up its service between Ottawa and Toronto, but the Canadian Pacific has also given up its service between Montreal and Toronto. That is part of the cooperative measures that they are working out. Though on the surface the Canadian National so far as the service between Ottawa and Toronto is concerned apparently suffers, my understanding is that under these pooling arrangements the earnings are divided so that there would not actually be any loss; and as between Toronto and Montreal it is the Canadian Pacific that gives up its service and the Canadian National runs its trains. But it is on the basis of a fifty-fifty division of doing away with services and a fifty-fifty division of the profits accruing from that curtailment of operations. My hon. friend is usually fair, but I do not think he is fair in suggesting that the Canadian National Railways will permit the Canadian Pacific Railway to take over any portion of their better paying services unless the Canadian National gets an equally valuable quid pro quo. I am confident of that. The officers of the Canadian National are experiencing no interference by the government in any shape or form in regard to these cooperative measures, and I repeat, that if they are stupid enough to let the Canadian Pacific Railway put it over them they are too stupid to run a railway anyway.

Mr. HEAPS: I may say that that impression is gaining ground among a great many people.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is not very complimentary to the management.

Mr. HEAPS: I will read one or two lines from these communications which I have here and which I believe come from a very reliable source.

Mr. MANION: If the hon. gentleman is going to read communications to the house it is only fair that he should say from whom they come. Otherwise I submit that he has no right to read them.

Mr. HEAPS: I have not read any portion of these communications for that very reason, but I have what I think are official figures showing the business of the Canadian National express and of the Canadian Pacific express, which services I claim are likely to be amalgamated or coordinated in the very near future. According to my information the business of the Canadian National express was $594,000 as compared with $216,000 for the Canadian Pacific express, so if there is going to be an amalgamation on a fifty-fifty basis we can understand how unfair it would be in that case to the Canadian National railway system.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that there was to be an amalgamation on a fifty-fifty basis, but that whatever cooperative measures were put into effect, the doing away of trains and services, and the remuneration, would be on a fifty-fifty basis.

Mr. HEAPS: I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and the house because I have received a lot of letters from different parts of the country along this very same line. But if we have the assurance of the minister that any cooperation or amalgamation of services, although I am opposed to the whole thing, will be done on a fair basis, I have no more to say.

Mr MANION: The hon. gentleman may have my assurance so far as the matter is within my control. I would object with all the power I possessed against the Canadian National giving to the Canadian Pacific something that it did not get a return for—absolutely.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Under this bill we are appointing a chairman and a board of trustees for a period of years. They cannot be removed by the minister or by this house without the concurrence of the upper house. Am I right in that?

Mr. MANION: By parliament; that is right.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then in Part II of the bill we are giving the chairman of the board of trustees all the power that it is possible to give to any trustee. We are giving him power to amalgamate traffic and amalgamate terminals. The minister will not deny that.

Mr. MANION: I do not admit that there is to be amalgamation at all. We are giving powers to the board of trustees so that the two railways may work in unison and have joint operation of such matters as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: To my mind joint operation means the amalgamation of one terminal with another, for instance. Does it not?

Mr. MANION: I do not admit that joint operation means amalgamation at all.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It means an amalgamation of services if it means anything at all. We appoint this board of trustees, and this government has no control over the board. This house cannot dismiss the chairman of the board of trustees without the concurrence of the upper house. The two houses of parliament have to concur in a resolution before he can be dismissed. If this house passed a resolution to dismiss the chairman of the board of trustees, and the upper house refused to concur in it, the chairman would remain in his office. Now, suppose that the chairman of the board of trustees under the power given him in Part II of this bill does things which he is empowered to do, and which mean the amalgamation of service; what effect will this amendment which the minister proposes have? I cannot see that it will have any effect in preventing the amalgamation of services. May I say this, that a railroad is really a service that is given to the people, and if you are going to permit the amalgamation of services, I do not see how you can get away from amalgamating the railways. Suppose that the board of trustees sanctions the amalgamation of terminals, the amalgamation of railway ticket offices, and of stations, and so forth, I do not see how by this amendment we can undo what they have done in the way of amalgamation. What effect would the amendment have? I am asking for information. The chairman of the board of trustees is appointed for a period of seven years, and he cannot be dismissed except by a resolution passed by both houses of parliament, and if in the meantime he goes on amalgamating terminals and ticket offices and services and stations, there will be very little left of the Canadian National Railways at the end of seven years.

Mr. MANION: I do not agree at all with the hon. gentleman in regard to that. I submit that at the end of seven years, if we get the right kind of trustee, as we hope to do, we shall have the same condition on the Canadian National as we have on the Canadian Pacific so far as independent operation is concerned. It is true that some of the divisional points and some of the branch lines may be worked jointly, and it would have been a good thing for this country had that been done many years ago. There are two things which my hon. friend seems to forget in his remarks. In the first place, we are appointing trustees whose duty it will be to look after the interests of the Canadian National Railways. We are not appointing trustees to work for the Canadian Pacific Railway. If we should be so unlucky as to get a chairman of trustees who would betray his trust, I have no doubt whatsoever that this house would dismiss him at the next session and that the action of this house would be endorsed by the Senate, because after all the Senate, without a doubt, represents the best thought in this country just as does this House of Commons, and if some trustee should be false to his trust I cannot conceive of the other chamber in justice and decency not taking action to protect the Canadian National Railways, just the same as we would. To assume what my hon. friend suggests, we must first of all assume that the trustees are to be false to their trust, and secondly that the other chamber is also to be false to its trust. That would be a wrong assumption. I do not believe that at the end of seven years, if these cooperative measures last so long, there will be any difference except that there will be some joint operation here and there which should exist, because as was pointed out in a committee this morning, and as I have pointed out on the floor of this house, there are many opportunities for joint operation of ticket offices, for instance, and telegraph offices on expensive corners. Joint operation of such services could only redound to the benefit and profit of the two railways, and it could not in any way take away from the independence and autonomy of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): While I was relieved to hear the statement of the Minister of Railways on the matter raised by the hon. member for North Winnipeg a few moments ago, I feel that he should be made aware of the fact that there is now growing over those sections of the line where there are pooled services in central Canada—I refer to the Ottawa-Toronto, Montreal-Toronto, and Ottawa-Montreal pooled services—a feeling that there is something wrong. The remark made by the minister to-day may dissipate that feeling. But when travelling on the train the other day one of the old conductors who has been employed in the service for about twenty-four years, evidently a very estimable type, and well educated, informed me that there had been a sudden transfer of sales of passenger tickets to the extent of nearly eighty-seven per cent in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MANION: Between here and Toronto?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Between Montreal and Toronto. He expressed grave concern about the situation, discussed the matter at some length with me, and asked me what the terms of pooling were to be. I said I did not know, but that the matter could be taken up, and that I would ask the minister. I am now asking who determines the terms of pooling? Is it the minister, the board of trustees or the tribunal? Secondly, what principle of pooling would the minister suggest, and thirdly is the principle of pooling adopted to be established as a regulation which the tribunal or trustees must follow. For example, in addition to the point raised by the hon. member for North Winnipeg, I would suggest this to the minister: Where in the past railway points having both lines operating through them showed forty per cent to the Canadian Pacific Railway and sixty per cent to the Canadian National Railways, and where it is found that those figures are suddenly switched around under the pooling arrangements to sixty-five per cent to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the balance to the Canadian National Railways, what basis would be followed? If disputes, in regard to terms of pooling are to be left to the decision of the tribunal, how are we to approach the tribunal? Reading the second to last clause in the bill I find the following:

> Save as provided by this section no order, decision or proceeding of a tribunal shall be questioned or reviewed, restrained or removed by any process whatever in or to any court.

I do not know whether in that section the House of Commons is included.

Mr. GEARY: Read the other parts of the section.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like the minister to cover those points, if possible, because a good deal of disturbance has been created.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid the hon. member has covered a lot of ground in only a few questions, and possibly I may not be able to answer him fully; however I shall try. In the first place, in regard to tickets being sold between Montreal and Toronto—I believe that is the section of the road he indicated—and the suggestion that a larger proportion of passenger traffic tickets were being sold through offices of the Canadian Pacific, I would answer as follows: In the first place, I do not think that is a correct statement, because there would be no advantage in buying from one ticket office rather than the other for the simple reason that the earnings of the pooled trains are divided fifty-fifty between the two systems.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The conductor would have no object in misinforming me.

Mr. MANION: He probably misinformed himself.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He ought to know, he would collect the tickets.

Mr. MANION: But not the money. The money goes to the railways; the tickets go to the conductors. I believe I am correctly informed when I say that the railways have pooled their passenger traffic between Ottawa and Toronto and between Montreal and Toronto. Between Ottawa and Toronto the Canadian Pacific handles the train. So that as the hon. member for Melville mentioned the other evening, those people who have been accustomed to travelling to intermediate points between here and Toronto by way of the Canadian National railway will find that the service was not as good as it was previously, because the Canadian Pacific is carrying on a joint service between those two points. The same is true, on the other hand, with regard to the service between Montreal and Toronto. No doubt there will be a greater volume of traffic on that service than between Ottawa and Toronto. In that case, the service is pooled and carried by the Canadian National Railways.

I was not going to waste the time of the committee by giving illustrations to show how difficult it is for one railway to obtain an advantage over the other. However, I believe I should tell one incident which occurred and about which I happened to know. The Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National were both running their sixty-miles-an-hour fast trains between Montreal and Toronto. While both railways were carrying a great many passengers, it was decided the two fast trains were not required, and that one could carry the business. They thought, as I believe, that the change was to the advantage of both railroads. The Canadian Pacific agreed that the Canadian National should handle the fast train service between Montreal and Toronto but since the Windsor station was in a better location than the Bonaventure station, that the trains should run out of and into the Windsor station, despite the fact that a Canadian National train was being used. So far as returns were concerned, it would not have meant one dollar's difference to the Canadian National. But the directors and management of the national system took the attitude that if the train ran both out of and into the Windsor station damage would be done to the prestige of the national system and that there would be a loss from the standpoint of advertising. After a good deal of wrangling it has been decided that the train shall go out of the Windsor station to Toronto, but shall enter the Bonaventure station upon its return to Montreal. I believe this illustration goes to show how anxious the management and directors of the Canadian National have been to secure a fair deal for the national system. While the Canadian Pacific argued that the Windsor station should be used exclusively—and I believe their argument carried some weight—the management and directors of the national system insisted that that should not be the case.

I believe this illustration goes to show that officials of the Canadian National system have no intention of giving up any rights, prestige or advertising value connected with any service it now possesses. So far as tickets are concerned, I repeat that the returns from the pooled services are divided equally between the two railway systems. If the hon. member cared to walk over to the station he would see a notice containing the words "pooled train tickets for sale here." The returns on those tickets are divided.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They are divided on what basis?

Mr. MANION: So far as I know, on a fifty-fifty basis.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How can justice be maintained by dividing on a fifty fifty basis? If one system had been selling sixty per cent of the tickets between Montreal and Toronto and the other system selling only forty per cent, a fifty-fifty division would not be fair.

Mr. MANION: But from other points probably the reverse percentage would be the case. If the hon. member will look over the passenger statistics I believe he will find that on the whole, the Canadian Pacific has been doing a better paying passenger business than has the Canadian National, for the simple reason that the Pacific system has as feeders a trans-Atlantic steamship service, and a trans-Pacific steamship service. For those reasons they get a great deal of transcontinental or long haul traffic. My information is that they have thus been getting a larger average revenue per passenger carried than has the Canadian National. Therefore I believe that if passenger service returns are split fifty-fifty the Canadian National system would be getting a fair deal all round. While I may not be able to go into the details as to former percentages of traffic now pooled I believe if both railways can make big savings by cutting off unnecessary trains, they are thereby gaining so much that the possible small amount which one might have gained here or another might have gained there might easily be forgotten.

I believe the hon. member mentioned one or two other points which I cannot call to mind at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the committee is drifting away from the section before it.

Mr. GEARY: I should like to ask a question. At the moment there are arrangements between the two railways whereby, for instance, between Toronto and Hamilton the Canadian Pacific runs over the tracks of the Canadian National. That is an arrangement made between the managements of the two roads. Am I to understand that any matter of inter-company arrangements of that sort must come before the minister or before the House of Commons for consideration or adjustment.

Mr. MANION: No; the hon. member is quite correct in his understanding that it does not come before the minister. However when I hear these matters discussed I endeavour to give whatever information I can to the committee, because my deputy minister is a director of the railway. As a matter of fact the matters to which the hon. member has referred would not be referred to me. If I heard that the Canadian National was getting an unfair deal I should certainly make inquiry as to how such a matter arose. But those arrangements are made by the managements of the two companies plus the committees appointed by the directors.

Mr. GEARY: In other words you do not manage the road?

Mr. MANION: No, of course I never pretended to, I would not be capable. The hon. gentleman also asked how they would divide these profits and losses. If he will look at section 16, starting at line 6:

—and they respectively—

That is the two railways:

—are, for and on behalf as aforesaid, authorized to agree, upon such cooperative measures, plans and arrangements as are fair and reasonable and best adapted (with due regard to equitable distribution of burden and advantage as between them) to effect such purposes.

That clause in brackets "with due regard to equitable distribution of burden and advantage as between them" is the basis upon which they are to cooperate. I think that explains it better than I could by further words.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: After this bill passes, suppose there is amalgamation of services at a given point and it is apparent that the Canadian National railway is getting unfair treatment. I suppose when this legislation is passed the minister will not have the connecting link with the Canadian National that he has at present by virtue of his deputy minister being a director. Suppose the trustees of the Canadian National are amalgamating or coordinating services and the minister finds that the Canadian National is getting the worst of it. These men we are going to appoint trustees will not be infallible. What power has the minister after this legislation is passed to stop it? I cannot see where he will have any.

Mr. MANION: The only power the minister has would be the same power as my hon. friend has or any member of this house. When moneys are required by the Canadian National—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Only capital expenditures.

Mr. MANION: No, deficits, interest on bonds, practically everything except operating details has to be passed by this house. When these are being passed it is the privilege of this house to do as it does to-day, appoint a committee to discuss the whole situation, and there is no reason why the trustees should not be brought before them in fact it is agreed that they may be, and there is no reason why officers should not be. Certainly if a trustee or group of trustees were to betray, either accidentally or intentionally, the rights of the Canadian National, that trustee or those trustees would be amenable to action by this house, and I promise my hon. friend I would support him or any other member of this house if at any time I had proof that these trustees were showing bad faith towards the Canadian National. That is the best assurance I can give.

Mr. HEENAN: I believe the minister is sincere in that, but I want to point out something. Rightly or wrongly I have been looking at this bill from what may be regarded as a narrow viewpoint, that of how it is going to affect the railroad men of this country. In reply to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) the minister said that if it were discovered that these trustees, although appointed for seven years, and not subject to dismissal except on an address from both houses of parliament, were betraying—probably that word is too strong, but were making errors that favoured the Canadian Pacific—means could be taken to dispense with their services. But I want the minister to look at this from my viewpoint for a moment, I think this will drive home the argument that I have been attempting to make for some days. Suppose under this measure the two railroad companies get together—I will admit it would probably have been better, as the minister says, if they had done it many years ago, but they did not. But now they get together. Take, for example, Winnipeg; there are four yards there; Fort Rouge, the Canadian Pacific yard, the Canadian Pacific new yard at North Transcona, and the Canadian National yard at South Transcona. Suppose they merge these four yards into one. They construct rails to radiate from that yard. It would probably cost thousands and thousands of dollars to do that. After that is done, that money spent, the other employees are gone. Dismissal of trustees would not alter that in the least. There will be things done, merging of roundhouses, back shops and other things of like character that will cost thousands of dollars to do in the first instance and once they are done the profits will come after but the employees are gone. The provision for apportionment of employees between one road and the other cannot work out. We have here a conglomeration of railroads, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National and their various branch lines, and men stationed in different parts of the country who have seniority rights in that part and no other part. They have seniority rights on the Canadian National, the Canadian Northern, or other roads at a certain point and no other point on that road. How could a man laid off here be sent several hundred miles away to a place where he is unknown, where he has no rights whatever to displace another man? These are all matters that I submit require the best thought of the house, without any heat. I point out that once the trustees are appointed, once they agree with the Canadian Pacific officials to do these various things, and the machinery is put into operation, it is impossible to undo it again. I agree with the minister that if the Canadian National trustees favoured the Canadian Pacific unduly we could find some means of dismissing them—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the discussion is out of order, and unless the committee consents to review the whole bill again I must ask hon. members to stick to the clause now under consideration. We are now discussing things that have been discussed and adopted.

Mr. HEENAN: If you are alluding to me, Mr. Chairman, I am through.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A moment ago my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) put some figures on the record in regard to the earnings of the Canadian National express and the Canadian Pacific express that I think should be corrected. I do not know where my hon. friend got his information. Accurate information is available to every member of this house, all that it is necessary to do is take the annual report of the Canadian National and the annual report of the Canadian Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I still call the attention of the committee to the fact that unless there is general consent there cannot be a general discussion on the bill. We must confine it to the clause.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the discussion has been going on in relation to the general question of amalgamation, and I understand that this amendment now before the committee deals directly with amalgamation or the negative of it. I merely wish to correct a statement in regard to the relationship existing between the Canadian National express and the Canadian Pacific express.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment just says that nothing shall be deemed to authorize amalgamation. I do not think that permits discussion of the whole question.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I appreciate what you say, Mr. Chairman, but the amendment does deal with amalgamation, and what I want to say will only take a moment. The actual figures, instead of being $500,000 in the case of the Canadian National Railways and $216,000 in the case of the Canadian Pacific, are $12,102,645 for the Canadian National and $15,599,830 for the Canadian Pacific for identically the same services for the year 1931. I put these figures on record for this reason. There is unquestionably a deliberate attempt being made right across this country, by such statements as have been put into the hands of my hon. friend and which have been read in good faith, to convey the impression that this measure that is being passed in an effort to rescue the railways from their present situation, and particularly the Canadian National Railways, is designed to scuttle the Canadian National in the interests of the Canadian Pacific. I think the correct information should be given.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I suggest with all respect to those who want to talk further on this matter that we accept the amendment now, lest peradventure we lose it with all that may be in it. I can imagine myself in the minister's chair, exclaiming, "Well, if they don't want to have it I will withdraw it." Let us have it by all means.

Mr. BRADETTE: In our section of the country we are quite willing to cooperate, but apparently cooperation means elimination or extermination. I said, when the first reading of the bill was under consideration, that so far as the railway commissioners were concerned the port of the country from which I come had never received fair treatment from them. To substantiate this statement, I will say—and the house will be surprised to learn this—that the Duff commission never found it possible to devote so much as half an hour of their time to a consideration of the problems of that section of the country right on the ground itself. They never visited any section of the Transcontinental line passing through that part of Canada. In a word, the Duff commission did not think it desirable to visit a section of the Canadian National Railways comprising one-third of the whole system, and on that ground alone we feel that we have a grievance—a grievance which it is hard for us to understand at all. Time was not a matter of great concern to the commission, so that there is no excuse from that point of view. I contend that they should have been on the ground to see for themselves the physical situation of the railways.

I wish to bring up to-day a matter which is of interest to the whole of Canada; I refer to the passenger and freight service of the railways from coast to coast. A little over a year ago the national trains were taken off from Montreal to North Bay and Cochrane and from Cochrane to Winnipeg; for what reason we do not know. No one in Canada, certainly no one in that part of the country, can imagine what could have induced them to take this step. We find on the other hand that trains were put on in sections where there is no population nor any local traffic. On the longest section of the run from Halifax to Quebec and on to Winnipeg and through to the Pacific coast trains were taken off. The suggestion was made that the reason might be that the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway was charging too much for trains using its roadbed. So far that suggestion has not been verified but there is no doubt that trains were taken off in that northern section.

I repeat, we are willing to cooperate and to do everything we possibly can to make the Canadian National Railways a going concern, but it seems to us that passenger service is being taken away from the Canadian National system and handed over to the Canadian Pacific. At the present time trains leaving Quebec pass through Montreal to Ottawa and then go on to North Bay, whereas in the past they went directly from Quebec to Cochrane and on to Winnipeg. A similar situation exists in the maritimes. The committee will understand to what extent the Canadian National system has been the loser during the past year and a half so far as passenger service is concerned. People travelling from our section of the country have been obliged to take a roundabout route, spending from two to six hours in Winnipeg.

I believe, as I have said both privately and publicly, that the Minister of Railways has the welfare of the Canadian National system at heart, but no matter what he says in answer to the criticism of Mr. Deachman, the fact remains that to-day the Canadian National Railways are losing passenger and freight service, and this applies more particularly to my own section of the country. Before the Christmas recess I asked the minister what seemed to me a perfectly reasonable question but one that apparently came to him as a great surprise, namely, when the passenger service would be really established over the National Transcontinental line, and he told me it was not within his province to know when that would take place. Surely the Minister of Railways, who is in charge of the department, should know what is taking place in that section of the country, a section which, as I have said, constitutes one-third of the Canadian National system. For no assigned reason the trains were taken off that section and a service given to a section where there is no population and no local freight.

Only a few months ago I listened with surprise to a statement made by the Prime Minister to the effect that it was practically a blunder to have built a railway linking up east and west in the northern sections of Canada. That I think is a statement which the right hon. gentleman will come to regret. Surely everyone realizes that owing to the construction of that railway hundreds of thousands of a new population found employment. On that score therefore the construction of that line has been fully justified.

To drive home the inadvisability of changing the passenger service in the manner I have indicated, I wish to give some statistics.

Recently the movement of the Continental Limited, Montreal to Vancouver, was changed and instead of moving Montreal to North Bay via Ottawa, thence via Timiskaming and Northern Ontario to Cochrane and west to Nakina via the Transcontinental line, it now moves via North Bay, Capreol, Hornepayne to Nakina. The actual saving in mileage is actually only sixteen miles, made up as follows:

	Miles
North Bay to Cochrane	255
Cochrane to Hearst	129
Hearst to Nakina	144
	528

	Miles
North Bay to Capreol	83
Capreol to Foleyet	148
Foleyet to Hornepayne	149
Hornepayne to Nakina	132
	512

And the serving of the population of these two routes leaves nothing in favour of the route now in use. The population figures stand as follows:

	Population
North Bay to Cochrane	80,000
Cochrane to Nakina	36,000
	116,000

Nakina to North Bay via Capreol	12,000

There is no reason in the world why this service should have been discontinued. Railroad men have told me that there are trains running through the country where they are now routed with only one passenger in the pullman cars and a total of half a dozen in the whole train, but that was not the case with the trains in our section of the country. We have no direct communication with the western sections of Canada. If we want to go to Winnipeg from Cochrane, which is only 900 miles away, we have to go to North Bay in order to make connections. That is a very roundabout route. I know the minister has at heart the welfare of the Canadian National and the other railroads in Canada and I urge upon him to see that this anomaly is remedied as soon as possible. There has been a current rumour in Montreal that trains numbers one and two will be reestablished on May 1, and I hope this is true. The minister may not be familiar with these details of management but I believe it to be his duty to see that the passenger service of the Canadian National Railways should be made as practicable as possible.

The idea has got abroad that there is a certain amount of sabotage in connection with the activities of the Canadian National Railways. I am not in position to corroborate such statements but I refer the committee to the utterance of the Minister of Railways during the Christmas festivities. He was speaking of nothing less than blue ruin for this great railway system. The feeling seems to be spreading throughout Canada that we should get rid of the Canadian National Railways. I think we should have more optimism than that exhibited by the Prime Minister only a few weeks ago when he was referring to the Canadian National Railways. The railway situation may be very serious but I think our railways could be operated in order to provide a vast amount of good to Canada as a whole.

When speaking on the first reading of this bill I referred to another anomaly which existed in my section of the country in the transcontinental routing of grain.

Mr. MANION: I have listened for some time to the hon. gentleman and it seems to me that he is only making a speech covering every phase of the bill.

An hon. MEMBER: And outside of the bill.

Mr. MANION: I think we should try to keep within the amendment under discussion, and I suggest that the hon. member do so. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite are any more anxious than we are that the discussion should wander all over the map.

Mr. BRADETTE: I think I have the same right as other hon. members.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): I think the point is well taken; the hon. member should confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am referring to amalgamation and I am within the limits of the amendment. I listened to other hon. members dealing with every phase of the railway situation and I do not think there should be a special ruling with regard to myself.

Mr. SPENCE: We have had too much nonsense.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does the hon. member intimate that I have been speaking nonsense?

Mr. SPENCE: I have said we have had too much nonsense now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): I refer the hon. member to standing order 58 which reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. BRADETTE: With all due respect to you, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see why other hon. members should have been permitted to ramble all over the question while I am to be penalized. I have been referring to cooperation and I believe I am within the limits of this amendment. It will only take me a few moments to say what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): I ask the hon. member to confine himself as closely as possible to the amendment with regard to amalgamation.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want the minister to study the situation as it pertains to the National Transcontinental railway question. This is a question which has not received the consideration it deserves from this or past governments. I will be fair, and make that distinction. I hope one of the new tribunals will visit our section of the country to deal with this matter and deal with it fairly. We do not ask for special favours, all we want is the service to which we are entitled.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MANION: There is another amendment which has been practically agreed to by both sides of the house. I think it would be better to take up these amendments and then we could deal with the sections which were permitted to stand. This particular amendment deals with abandonment. I will ask my colleague to move it.

Mr. STEVENS moved:

> That clause 2 be amended by substituting the following as an additional sub-clause:
> Notwithstanding anything in this act or in any other act any railway company may abandon the operation of any line of railway with the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada and no railway company shall abandon the operation of any line of railway without such approval.

Mr. MANION: This amendment has been studied by the legal advisers of my own department and the Department of Justice, and it deals with abandonment in both a negative and a positive way. This was done in order that there might be no misunderstanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does that imply the approval of the governor in council?

Mr. MANION: This has nothing to do with that. This amendment is made so that no abandonment can take place without the consent and approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I might say that either to-morrow or the next day a bill will be introduced to amend the Railway Act by adding practically the same clause. As I explained in a previous discussion, the Canadian Pacific and other railways can abandon lines other than main lines without the approval of the board. It was felt by hon. members opposite and some hon. gentlemen on this side that there should be greater protection against such abandonment, and this amendment is offered to meet their wishes.

Mr. SPENCER: I know of several lines that have already been graded but on which no rails have been placed. In what position will they be? Will the railways have to go to the railway commission before those lines are discarded?

Mr. MANION: They are in exactly the same position as before. When the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National, as the case may be, decide to go ahead with those lines, either railway will be in exactly the same position as it was before to continue; this bill will not have any effect in such a case. The provision applies only in a case where one or other railway wishes to abandon a line as the Canadian Pacific could and the Canadian National to a large extent could do in the past without permission. Now, instead of doing this without permission, they will have to obtain permission from the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. JACOBS: Will it not be necessary that the other company interested be notified to be present before the board, because otherwise one company might, so to speak, steal a march on the other? It would be well that all the companies interested should be notified to be present when the application is made.

Mr. MANION: This is a clause that deals with the whole act. I believe it is correct to say that when any matter comes before the railway commission, notice is given to interested parties, so that the point mentioned by the hon. member is covered in the Railway Act.

Mr. McINTOSH: As regards the abandonment of branch lines, there was a Canadian National branch line in the North Battleford district; had the railway to have the sanction of the Board of Railway Commissioners before that branch line was abandoned?

Mr. MANION: In regard to any branch line that was built of recent years under the Canadian National Railways Act the railway had to go to the board. It is possible the hon. member refers to some individual line of which that is not true, but I think I am correct.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not referring to a line that was built and operated, and then abandoned. I am referring to a line part of which was graded; it had not been steeled. Apparently the line is abandoned. Had the sanction of the board to be obtained before abandonment could take place?

Mr. MANION: The hon. member is asking the same question as that asked by the hon. member for Battle River. That line is and will be in the same position after this bill passes as it was before. The Canadian National, when it finds it can afford to continue that line and figures there is enough business for it, will go ahead and finish it. It is not an abandoned line; it is in exactly the same position as if this measure had never been introduced.

Mr. MARCIL: As regards a branch line, if the people along the route are dissatisfied with the decision given by the railway board, will an appeal lie to the governor in council? I do not know whether that is provided for or not.

Mr. MANION: I am not a lawyer and I am speaking subject to correction, although I rather think I am right; any decision which is given by the Board of Railway Commissioners can be appealed to the governor in council. Whether that applies to the case mentioned, I do not know, but I may say this to the hon. member for Bonaventure, that at the present time the Canadian Pacific altogether, except so far as its main line is concerned, and the Canadian National to a large extent can abandon lines without submitting the matter to anybody, so we are protecting the people to a greater degree than they were in the past, by providing that the railways cannot abandon any line—and I am in a day or two going to introduce a similar amendment to the Railway Act—without submission to the Board of Railway Commissioners. I do not wish to give a legal opinion, but I believe the people will be protected to a greater extent than they have been in the past.

Mr. MARCIL: To complete this matter, the government is obliged to give in this country certain services which are not paying and where there is no competitive service. Supposing this new organization decides that a certain line does not pay; that they are losing too much money on it and that is the only line in the district carrying passengers, freight and mail; if the railway commission decides that this line must be abandoned, a new responsibility is put upon the government of looking after transportation, mail service and so on. That is the reason, I think, it would be wise that we should stand by the old principle that if a decision rendered by the railway commission is found to be unjust to a certain district and contrary to the public interest, there should lie an appeal to the governor in council. That should be provided for beyond a doubt.

Mr. MANION: There is nothing in this measure to change that principle in any shape or form. But at the present time railways are being abandoned without submission to anybody, the governor in council, the Board of Railway Commissioners or anyone else, and not only are we inserting this clause in this bill, but in a day or two I am going to have a clause inserted in the Railway Act for the same purpose, that is of forcing not only the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, but any railway in Canada, before they can abandon any line, to go before the Board of Railway Commissioners. Therefore we are at any rate protecting the people to a greater extent than they have ever been under any government in the past.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand from what the minister has said that if a Canadian National railway branch line had been sanctioned by parliament before this bill was brought down to the house, the Canadian National could abandon that line, I mean temporarily, without the sanction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Am I right in that?

Mr. MANION: Up to the present time the railway could abandon, although I am not sure about some of the branch lines and I do not wish to get myself on record in a wrong manner. I do not like to go into the same discussion again; I would prefer to avoid repeating myself, but I pointed out that the Canadian National Railway Company, according to section 23 of the Canadian National Railways Act, was not permitted to abandon lines without submitting the matter to the Board of Railway Commissioners. That included most of the branch lines that were built since 1923; they were all included in that and make part of the Canadian National Railway Company, so that in the past the railway could not abandon those lines without submission of the matter to the Board of Railway Commissioners. So far as that is concerned, we are making it applicable to every line affected by this bill; the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National, the old Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, or any of those other lines cannot be abandoned without submission of the matter to the board.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am right then in concluding that the line I am referring to, in northwest Saskatchewan that had been sanctioned by parliament and had been abandoned, was not abandoned until the Board of Railway Commissioners gave approval?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid my hon. friend is using the wrong word. That line has not been abandoned. Abandonment means that where a line has been operating, the operation has stopped; it means stopping of operation. The line to which I understand my hon. friend refers was never completed and never operated.

Mr. McINTOSH: The construction was abandoned—the term is correct. We can correctly speak of abandoning construction operations.

Mr. MANION: That is not the proper term. The construction was not completed; that is what my hon. friend means. The line was not abandoned. When the Canadian National Railways have money enough to complete that line, I have no doubt in the world it will be completed.

Mr. MARCIL: For the information of my constituents, I would like the minister to give me the section which provides for an appeal by the people to the governor in council in case the railway commission sanctions the abandonment of any line. I know there is an appeal to the governor in council in the matter of rates, but is there a section which provides for an appeal in case of abandonment of a line? Is there anything in the Railway Act providing for that?

Mr. MANION: My legal adviser says no. Personally I thought there was an appeal to the governor in council from any decision of the railway board. I do not want to advance a legal opinion because I am not a lawyer, but in this bill there is nothing to alter the condition that existed formerly.

Mr. BRADETTE: In a case of dispute between the two railways, would the municipality interested in the dispute have a right to put its case before the railway board?

Mr. MANION: Oh yes, absolutely.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MANION: I think now the best way to proceed would be to start at the beginning and mop up, to use an old army term, as we go. What about the first clause? I do not suppose there is anything in a name. Some great writer has said that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. What about adopting the short title?

Mr. HEENAN: Clause 2 is not carried yet.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now on section 1.

Mr. HEENAN: I wanted to ask a question on clause 2. I am trying to be helpful, and I would like to deal with that matter before we leave clause 2.

Mr. MANION: We are coming back to clause 2.

Mr. HEENAN: Some hon. gentlemen have not come here at all, let alone coming back. The minister promised the other night to consider inserting a provision in clause 2. Why not do that now and then we can start through the bill again. It was a clause with reference to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman apparently did not quite catch what the chairman said. We are dealing with clause 1 now, and after we get through with that we are going through the act. Clause 2 will come next, and when we reach it I shall be glad to deal with the point raised by my hon. friend.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—His Majesty bound.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made a proposal that instead of paragraph (a) of clause 2 we should insert the whole of section 179 of the Railway Act. I have studied that question. I have put it before the Department of Justice and I have taken the advice of the legal officers of my own department. They submit that by inserting section 179 of the Railway Act there is no greater protection for the railway men, and that it does complicate the act, becauses the first portion of section 179 deals with matters that have nothing whatever to do with the men. My hon. friend I know is anxious for compensation for the men under certain conditions, just as they are protected under the Railway Act. But under the bill as it now stands they are amply protected, and I would ask my hon. friend with all respect to withdraw his amendment. I am taking the opinions of the legal advisers who tell me that to accept my hon. friend's suggestion would only complicate the act and not protect the men any further.

Mr. HEENAN: I think there is a misunderstanding. I did not propose an amendment, but when we were discussing the clause I said that it was of little value as it stands now, and I would point out to the minister that notwithstanding the advice he has received from his legal advisers the clause as it stands is of little value. Section 179 of the Railway Act contemplates a different thing entirely from what this measure contemplates. Let me give an illustration.

The CHAIRMAN: There has been an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. POWER: Read it.

The CHAIRMAN: It reads as follows:

The company shall not, at any time, make any change, alteration or deviation in the railway, or any portion thereof, until the provisions of the last preceding section are fully complied with, nor remove, close, or abandon any station, or divisional point nor create a new divisional point which would involve the removal of employees without leave of the board and where any such change is made the company shall compensate its employees as the board deems proper for any financial loss caused to them by change of residence.

Mr. HEENAN: I had overlooked the fact that I had moved that. I thought that I had asked the minister to move it himself. I am glad that the minister is going to bring in a measure to amend the Railway Act because he may cover in that amendment the matter I am now bringing up. Section 179 of the Railway Act contemplates a situation such as this: If a railroad company desires for reasons best known to itself to change its terminals, say from Ottawa, to five miles away from the city, the railroad company must compensate its employees for the loss of property necessitated by the fact that they have to transfer to another point. Section 179 covers that situation fairly well. But when, under this bill, stations are abandoned, there will be many railway men dismissed; not dismissed in the ordinary sense of the word by telling them, "We do not need you any more. Here is your cheque. You can go," but there simply will not be any work for them to do. The men themselves will be abandoned, if I may use the word in that sense, and consequently they will not receive compensation for loss of property from that cause. I think the minister might very well make provision in the Railway Act itself, by amending section 179 of that act, and go beyond the present provision in section 179 which reads, "and where any such change is made the company shall compensate its employees, as the board deems proper, for any financial loss caused to them by change of residence necessitated thereby," because under this bill it would not be a loss of property caused through a change of residence necessitated by the changing of a terminal, but the loss will be through their jobs having been done away with and there being no work for them at all. I know that as a private member I have not the right to move an amendment along that line, because it would involve an expenditure of money, but I appeal to the minister to provide that the men will be compensated for financial loss caused to them by the economies effected hereby. Would the minister take that into consideration when he brings in his amendment to the Railway Act?

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to be in any way discourteous, but I would point out that the very point which the hon. member suggests was embodied in an amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg.

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps not in exactly the same words.

Mr. HEENAN: His amendment provided for compensation for all persons who lost their jobs.

Mr. MANION: But my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River, if I understood him, is suggesting that the same thing apply in regard to any changes that might be referred to section 179 of the Railway Act. I do not wish to go any further than section 179, which provides that in the case of the abandonment of any station or divisional point or the creation of a new divisional point which would involve the removal of employees the leave of the board must be obtained, and the company must compensate its employees for any financial loss caused to them by change of residence necessitated thereby. The point I am making is that they are protected under this new bill just as they were under the old act. In other words, in the new bill there is the statement that that part of section 179 of the Railway Act which relates to compensation to employees for financial loss is incorporated in the bill. I do not wish to go further than that. So far as we have gone in the bill, I am quite agreeable, but I do not wish to carry it further than that. Of course I will promise to consider anything, but there is no use of pretending to the hon. member that I am going to do something which I do not intend to do. I do not believe there is any likelihood of putting in the bill the provision he suggests.

Mr. HEENAN: Probably it is because I am not making myself clear, but I believe the minister does not understand me. Section 179 of the Railway Act contemplates one thing, and I admit that the measure as it now stands probably takes care of the provision contained in the act. But the bill now before us creates a different condition, and we should apply section 179 to that new condition.

Let me give an example which will be familiar to the minister and myself. Let us suppose that the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways, and the railway commission, agree to abandon the town of Sioux Lookout as a terminal point. The railways are not moving the terminal, they are not creating a new terminal; they are not moving employees from one point to another. Railroad organizations will have to negotiate to ascertain which of the men will have the right to follow the work. Those who do not secure work will not only lose their job, but they will lose their property as well, because there will be nothing in Sioux Lookout for them to live by. I realize that to cover such a situation a few more thousands of dollars would be required. I do not wish the minister to make any promise not only to the men who have been transferred but to those men who have lost their jobs, their residences and property, unless he believes sincerely that something can be done. I do not wish him to promise that they will be compensated for the loss of that property, unless he can do something.

Mr. MANION: I know the towns of Sioux Lookout and Rainy River as well as does the hon. member, because we both come from that section of the country. As a matter of fact I do not believe there is any likelihood of either point being abandoned. But should they be abandoned I submit under the act the men will be protected, and I think the hon. member agrees with that statement. At any rate I submit that is so because section 179 distinctly states that in case of abandoning a station or divisional point or creating a new divisional point the men will be compensated. So in case of an abandonment the men will be compensated by virtue of that amendment.

If I understood the hon. member correctly he wishes to go further and say that if in this divisional point men should lose their positions they should be compensated because of loss of employment. We could not have a law to look after employees at Sioux Lookout and Rainy River and not have a law to look after employees at Winnipeg and Port Arthur. I have said that the hon. member's suggestion is similar to that made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. I do not believe in promising what I do not intend to do.

There is no use promising something which I cannot carry out.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has placed himself on record as wishing to go farther than the legislation provides. I appeal to him to let the bill go through as it is.

Mr. HEENAN: I suppose it is an Irishman's privilege to keep on talking until he is understood.

Mr. MARCIL: There are two Irishmen here.

Mr. HEENAN: I point out to the minister that I was not asking for a special consideration for employees at Rainy River or Sioux Lookout, but was merely stating their case as an example. I should hope the measure I suggest would apply to all railroad employees in Canada. Again I point out that my proposal was entirely different from that moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. The hon. member asked for compensation for all those who lost their positions. I am asking not only for compensation for loss of positions, but I am asking this: If a railroad company abandons a station because of the merging of services, and some of the men who are not required are dismissed, then we should compensate those people for loss of residence. They are as much entitled to compensation as those who are transferred to another point. Let me give the example again. Supposing the Canadian Pacific wanted to change their terminal from Ottawa to a point five or six miles out. Under the act they compensate me for the loss of my property rights, so that employees may go and build a home at the other terminal point. That is what is contemplated under section 179. But under the new bill the Canadian Pacific Railway may abandon Ottawa entirely. Under the present regulations the railway companies and the men will get together to negotiate how many men in Ottawa are entitled to move to another point to secure work. In those circumstances the men transferred will come under section 179 of the Railway Act and receive compensation for loss of property. But if half a dozen men owning property in Ottawa are dismissed because of this economy I suggest they are entitled to compensation for loss of property. I do not wish to delay the committee, but I should like the minister to take this matter into consideration. I suggest to the minister that instead of accepting or rejecting the amendment now before us he just insert the words "under section 179 of the Railway Act."

[Mr. Manion.]

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member cannot move an amendment to his own amendment before we dispose of this one.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The minister said a few moments ago that he had discussed with various officers concerned, the matter of embodying in this bill the whole of section 179 of the Railway Act. A number of hon. members are very much interested in that point, quite apart from the protection it will afford the employees from a financial point of view. It will be recognized by the minister and by the committee, I believe, that in the case of an abandonment of a terminal point, people other than employees are, in a financial sense, vitally interested. I can perhaps do no better than give a concrete illustration of just what can happen under such circumstances. This particular case, although relating to a comparatively small point, was pretty well advertised at the time, it may be in the recollection of the minister although he was not minister then. In my riding at that time, although not now, was a small divisional point, termed Big Valley. It was largely a railway point, depending almost entirely on the fact that it was a terminal point. Based upon the fact that a large proportion of the population were railway men the village erected a fair sized schoolhouse, sold debentures and generally obligated itself for a very large sum considering its population, in order to take care of the railway men's families. When a point of that character is abandoned, a small point where a large proportion of the inhabitants were railway men and their families, they of course suffer very severely. Many of their houses are standing abandoned, some were purchased for a song by the farmers and hauled out on the farms thereabouts. They lost all value in fact. The men suffered severe financial loss, and I am in full sympathy with what has been said with respect to protecting those men. But I understand they were protected by the particular provision in the act referred to, whatever that protection is worth.

Mr. MANION: As far as they were concerned.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, they have been dealt with as far as that section goes. But I want to point out to the minister and to the committee that no protection is provided in this bill—in fact protection is precluded by the fact that part of the section only is referred to—no protection is provided for the village itself and others who suffer, although not employees. Under the entire section 179 such people were given some slight protection; at least to this extent, that they did receive notice and were entitled to lay their case before the railways and before the railway commission before the transfer took place, and to endeavour at least to get some recompense. I think it will be recognized by every one that under those circumstances, where a small community has erected public utilities, schoolhouses and so on far beyond its normal needs and sold debentures based on the railway property and the railway men as taxpayers, and then those men are removed because of a change of policy on the part of the railway, the village itself and the rest of the inhabitants suffer almost as much as the railway men, and by this bill no protection whatever is given them. I am not going to labour that point, but I had hoped that when the question arose as to reference being made to the entire section, that point of view would have been given consideration, and those interested, the municipal authorities and others, given notice of the contemplated action and a right to appear and lay their case before the board with the possibility of receiving compensation.

As I recollect, neither the men nor the village in this case received any compensation. There seemed to be some loophole, through the abandonment not being an entire abandonment. The abandonment was practically speaking complete, but some half dozen men or less were left with a caretaker's job, and technically the abandonment had not taken place although in actual effect it had. The place is not in my riding, and the matter has not been brought to my attention for some years, but as I remember it, not one dollar of compensation was received by the men or the municipality. But the section did contemplate that protection should be given, and under this bill; by the reference being limited to that part of section 179 which deals only with compensation to the men, any possibility of compensation being awarded to or representations heard from the municipal authorities and others affected is completely eliminated. I recognize of course that the mere fact that section 179 is not specifically referred to does not necessarily mean that it will not govern, it simply says that the act will prevail over all inconsistent provisions with the exception of certain specified sections. If that part of section 179 proves to be inconsistent that part would still prevail. It does not say that the rest of section 179 will necessarily be inconsistent, but by the fact that one part is picked out and referred to and provision made that even if it prove inconsistent it will still prevail, I think we may fairly take it for granted that the balance that is not referred to will be considered as inconsistent and so will be eliminated. I do not know whether that particular aspect, and the conditions I have referred to and the position of others than employees has been given consideration. If not I do hope the minister even at this late hour will consider that viewpoint and will see to it by the inclusion of the entire section if possible that this amount of reasonable protection will be afforded to those interested.

Mr. GEARY: I happen to know the Big Valley case, and I am free to say it was not a satisfactory decision. The finding of fact by the railway board was that the divisional point at Big Valley had not been abandoned, and therefore the section did not take effect. Subsequently the railway employees strove to get an amendment to section 179, I think it was at the last session, to cover such a case. That amendment was refused. But my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) is a little in error I think in his construction of section 179. I know of nothing in the section as it now stands that enables any compensation to be paid to other than employees. It is simply protection for employees. The Big Valley case was heard in the west, and doubtless the municipal authorities of Big Valley itself appeared and made representations.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is what I said, it at least gave them notice, and opportunity to be heard.

Mr. GEARY: There will be no difference under this proposed act. The railway board could either hold its sessions in private, or could give notice and let representations be made by the municipality; there is no change in this bill in that regard, so that whatever benefit there may have been in the forepart of section 179 is not interfered with by the present bill.

In regard to the section the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) dealt with, complaint is made that by pooling services between, say, Toronto and Montreal, some men are left without work. That pooling has not taken place under this bill. It might have taken place any time within the last fifteen or twenty years. It would be governed, if at all, by section 179 of the Railway Act. Pooling may take place under this bill, but only by arrangement, such as can be made now. My friend wants to amend section 179. I submit his proposition is not in order at this time, because we are not discussing the Railway Act. If he seeks to amend section 179 by including in it some provision that every man who is deprived of work through an arrangement between the railways is to be given some sort of compensation, that is a very drastic change. Without seeking to stop my hon. friend—it would be rather late to stop him—I think his amendment deals with a matter that is not before the committee. His speech in terms suggested that the minister consider an amendment to the Railway Act. The minister says he will, but it has nothing to do with what we are now discussing.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. GEARY: I do raise a point of order, namely, that we shall get nowhere in the consideration of this bill if we discuss a proposed amendment to an entirely different act.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. member seems to be familiar with the Railway Act. May I ask him whether under the new system authorization will be given to abandon any divisional point or junction at the sweet will of those who may have charge of the matter, as happened at Matapedia in my own constituency, which had been a divisional point for forty years, connecting Gaspe with the Intercolonial. The change was made overnight from Matapedia to Campbellton, New Brunswick, in another province. The railway leaving Gaspe runs two hundred miles to Matapedia, and that has been the divisional point for the last forty years. Now the Canadian National has shifted the terminus from that point to Campbellton, thirteen miles away, involving the dismissal of all officials, because they say it is cheaper for them to go to Campbellton than to keep the terminus at Matapedia.

Mr. GEARY: Has that been done?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: But not under the proposed act.

Mr. MARCIL: No, but I am asking whether there will be any change in this regard. Matapedia was the terminal point fixed by the Quebec legislature when it incorporated the road. At that time it gave subsidies, fixing the terminal there, and now it has been removed to another province, adding thirteen miles to the run. Surely that is ridiculous. A man reaches Matapedia and he has to go on to Campbellton and then come back to Matapedia on his way to Montreal. Is there any sense in that?

[Mr. Geary.]

The CHAIRMAN: As I understand the point of order raised by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), the case cited by the hon. member for Bonaventure would not fall under the amendment which is being considered and which deals only with employees. I cannot see anything in the rules to prevent an hon. member seeking to repeat in a bill under consideration a principle embodied in another statute. The amendment would therefore be in order. Is the committee disposed to vote on the amendment?

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) brought up a question which has been answered by one of my hon. friends from Toronto. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman something that he has forgotten. At the previous sitting of the committee an amendment was moved to section 16 under part II of the bill dealing with co-operation. The amendment was as follows:

> Where the execution or carrying out of such a measure, plan or arrangement involves the doing of any act which by any statute requires the leave, sanction, assent or approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, no such measure, plan or arrangement shall be effective without the approval of the said board.

So that we made it absolutely subject to the approval of the board, where it would have been in the ordinary course of events so subject. So far as the rest of the act is concerned, it is in the same position as before.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the matter to which I have referred been brought to the attention of the minister? I refer to the moving of the terminus from Matapedia to Campbellton. It is a grave injustice.

Mr. MANION: I do not remember who drew it to my attention but someone did because I am familiar with it. The matter is entirely in the hands of the management, and if they were required to go before the board I presume they did. At any rate I had no power over them. Every abandonment, whether of a station or a ticket or freight agency, is a matter that is dealt with by the management, and though protests did come from that section of the country, I had no jurisdiction any more than I should have in connection with the Canadian Pacific, if they decided to change some routing or terminus. I would point out to the hon. gentleman, however, that in so far as they had to appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners under the existing Railway Act there will be no change in this legislation.

Mr. MARCIL: I am sorry to hear the minister say that because certainly a grave injustice has been done the locality in question, and I was wondering whether the minister would have allowed such a thing to happen.

Mr. MANION: I had no power to stop it.

Mr. MARCIL: We are now dealing with the economy program, and I want to put this to the minister. Why should twenty-six miles be added to the service between Gaspe and Montreal? The train reaches Matapedia and then runs back eastward over the same ground another thirteen miles.

Mr. MANION: As the hon. member explains it, it does sound most illogical, and that argument was advanced by those residents of the district who wrote to me. As I usually do in all such matters, I submitted their representations to the management of the Canadian National and they made a reply which I must say was satisfactory to them. I do not say it was satisfactory to me, because I am not competent to pass on the technical side of railway questions; but from their point of view, from the point of view of the economy which would be effected, they claimed that the change was to their advantage. I saw the difficulties which my hon. friend points out, and there were also political disadvantages which I should have been glad to have them appreciate, in moving the terminus from one province to another; I knew it would cause considerable difficulty. But they stood by their guns, they maintained that their position was sound, and they explained to me to their own satisfaction that the change was better for them. I had no power to alter their decision.

Mr. MARCIL: I would point out to the minister that the employees were not compensated. The place was simply torn down and Campbellton made the terminal point. A grave injustice has been done not only to the employees but to the locality itself, and I submit that there should be in this legislation or in the Railway Act some provision that would prevent the recurrence of such a change. I know that if the terminus had been removed from Campbellton, New Brunswick, to Matapedia, Quebec, we should have heard from the New Brunswick members; but as a rule we are peaceable and law-abiding in Quebec and we allowed the government to deal with the matter. I impress upon the minister that a grave injustice was done, because the road was built originally with subsidies from Quebec and the terminus was fixed at Matapedia. It remained there for forty years, and suddenly one day the Canadian National Railways step in and remove the terminus to a point in New Brunswick thirteen miles away, notwithstanding that there is no advantage to be gained from the change; for any railway man will inform the minister that the addition of twenty-six miles, running up and down, morning and night, is an absolute loss which is not compensated by the dismissal of the officials. There is another objection. The train leaves Gaspe and runs two hundred miles through rough country and it must reach Campbellton one hour ahead of the time it reaches Matapedia if it is to connect with the Ocean Limited westbound. If it does not reach Campbellton an hour earlier it cannot connect with the Ocean Limited, and that means that it must leave Gaspe very early in the morning. The result is that the people in that district are put to considerable inconvenience having to take the train at the earlier hour. His Lordship Bishop Ross objected to this and Sir Henry Thornton, when he had the management of the Canadian National Railways, fixed the departure of the train from Gaspe at eight o'clock in order to have it meet the Ocean Limited westbound at Matapedia.

Let me point out to the minister that the Gaspe railway is the best feeder which the Canadian National Railways have east of Montreal. This has been conceded. When Sir Henry Thornton went away the change was made and now the train reaches Campbellton too late. Fresh fish in the fishing season and general merchandise are consequently held up for twenty-four hours. As I say, there is no advantage whatever from the change but on the contrary an additional mileage of twenty-six miles. The passenger has to get off at Matapedia and wait an hour or an hour and a half or run up to Campbellton, covering a distance of thirteen miles each way. I repeat, this is a grave injustice to that section of the country, and I think the minister should amend the act to provide that in the future no such radical change shall be made before the people of the locality are heard by the board.

Mr. MANION: I will take the remarks of the hon. gentleman into consideration.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When we were discussing this section before, the minister referred to a matter that had been brought up with regard to pensions of those who were under sixty-five years of age and had been forty years in the service. As the law now stands he would not get a pension until he had reached the age of sixty-five years. If a man is laid off because of a duplication of services, the suggestion is made that his pension could be calculated even though he has not reached the age of sixty-five. The advantage in this would be that the pension paid would not be as large as if he had waited until he had reached the age of sixty-five, and should an opening occur he would be out of the way to make a place for someone who was unemployed. When this matter was being discussed before the minister said he would take it under consideration.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I cannot suggest a solution of this problem at the moment. It is something which the management will have to take into account when dealing with pension arrangements. As I pointed out the other day, this whole question of pensions is very complicated. I have a memorandum outlining the different schemes and the closest compass in which an explanation could be given was three closely typewritten pages. I shall be very glad to submit the hon. gentleman's remarks to the management but I do not think we could include anything in this bill to deal with pensions. That is an arrangement which has been altered at times by the railways and it dates back to the old days of the Grand Trunk. There are at present three systems of pensions, the Grand Trunk railway provident fund, the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway employees' provident fund and the present Canadian National pension plan. I believe it is the intention of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific officials to deal with all pension matters as affecting railway employees. I understand that the railway employees themselves have suggested that the pension schemes be made contributory. I have no doubt that when these matters are being considered, the men's unions will see that they are not lost sight of.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope the minister means that he will recommend to whatever tribunal is dealing with this matter allowance of pensions to those who have been deprived of their positions before reaching the age of sixty-five years.

Mr. MANION: Speaking from memory and not wanting to be too definite, I understand that where a man has been working for the company for fifteen years, he is entitled to pension when retired.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I happen to have the pension regulations before me and I should be very glad if the minister would point out that provision. I should like to quote from the rules and regulations which were passed under the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Pension Act, chapter 4, 19-20, George V (1929). Section 8 reads as follows:

Subject to confirmation as provided in rule 4, such pension may be granted by the pension committee to employees on their retirement from the company's service in the following cases:—

(a) To an employee retiring at the age of 65 years or over, with 15 or more years of service to his credit.

In that case he has to be sixty-five years or over.

(b) To an employee of the age of sixty and under sixty-five years with 20 or more years of service to his credit retired by reason of permanent physical or mental disability upon the certificate of the company's chief medical officer that for such reason the employee is unfitted to follow his usual or any other suitable employment in the company's service.

(c) To an employee who, after 10 or more years of service to his credit, becomes incapable of continuing his service by reason of injuries received whilst actually at work in the employment of the company, but only for so long as his incapacity shall continue.

(d) To an employee of the age of 50 years and upwards with 15 or more years of service to his credit who is discharged from the company's service otherwise than for misconduct.

Mr. MANION: That covers the point I was making.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If he is fifty years and upwards and is discharged from the company's service otherwise than for misconduct. There would be a very few who would come under that clause after having been in the employ of the company for forty years; they would have to have started work at a very early age.

The CHAIRMAN: Before proceeding with this question would the committee first dispose of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think we would save time by discussing both matters together.

Mr. MANION: I think there are many cases where an employee under the age of sixty-five years receives a pension upon being retired. I have under my hand the memorandum to which I referred a moment ago, and I think it would save time to put on record the particulars of the different schemes. The first scheme is the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund, which provides for pension in the following cases:

(a) Those who have attained the age of 70 years after being 15 years in the service.

(b) Those who after 15 years in service become physically or mentally incapacitated from following their usual occupation in the service.

That would be at any age.

(c) Those who have attained the age of sixty after being 15 years in service and request to be retired.
(d) Those who are permanently disabled as a result of injuries received whilst on duty and actually at work in the service.
(e) Those who prior to the coming into force of this act entered the service at such advanced age as to cause them to reach the age of 70 before being 15 years in the service; provided that on attaining the age of 70 they have been at least 10 years in the service.

The Canadian National Railways Pension Act provides for pension in the following cases:

(a) To an employee retiring at the age of 65 or over, with 15 or more years service to his credit.
(b) To an employee of 60 and under 65 years with 20 or more years service retired by reason of permanent physical or mental disability on certificate of company's chief medical officer that employee is unfitted to follow his usual or other suitable employment in the company's service.
(c) To an employee who after 10 or more years service becomes incapable of continuing by reason of injuries received while actually at work in the company's employ, but only for so long as his incapacity continues.
(d) To an employee of 50 years and upwards with 15 or more years service who is discharged otherwise than for misconduct.

I think that is a pretty wide range and I think quite a few of the points mentioned by my hon. friend are covered. Apparently he has given a good deal of study to this question and if he will advance any of his ideas to me I shall be very glad to pass them on to the railway company. I shall bless them on their way, if he wishes.

Mr. HEENAN: As regards the amendment which stands in my name, I want to point out to the minister that I was trying to be helpful, and I still want to be. It is true that when I spoke on the amendment, I pointed out to the minister that I did not think my own amendment would really fill the bill under the new plan. I asked that he would consider bringing in an amendment to the Railway Act and so far he has not felt disposed to accede to that request; in fact, I think he has finally decided that he will not bring in the amendment that I requested.

There are several reasons why the amendment I have before the committee at the moment should be incorporated in this measure. One is that the minister himself brought in an amendment which changes this bill; in other words, he is amending it so that instead of the railway companies having power to do all these things that were enumerated several days ago, those matters would be put under the railway commission. I think the minister will recall that he brought in an amendment the other night—I do not know whether it was carried—putting many of these operations, such as abandonment of lines and so forth, under the railway board instead of the arbitral tribunal. If we adopt this bill now, we say, and I want the minister to pay attention to this:

The provisions of this act shall bind His Majesty and shall prevail over all inconsistent provisions of all other acts, but so that

And then follows "that part of section 179." Does he see what we are doing? We are putting these matters under the railway commission and we are giving them only "that part of section 179." I think the minister could cut out all that. I cannot move an amendment to my amendment in order to add anything—

Mr. ERNST: Oh, oh!

Mr. HEENAN: Of course some hon. members coming from behind the curtain have to laugh because they do not know what is being discussed.

Mr. ERNST: I am not behind the curtain.

Mr. HEENAN: About the only time I get annoyed is when some hon. member who is not taking an interest in the welfare of the railway workers of Canada comes from behind the curtains and laughs.

Mr. ERNST: I have taken far more interest in the railway workers of Canada than my hon. friend has done.

Mr. HEENAN: I have the floor.

Mr. ERNST: I have not been behind the curtain. I have been sitting right here.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member ought to be behind the curtain.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has the floor.

Mr. ERNST: I should not be described as being behind the curtain and I ask the hon. member to retract that particular statement which is false.

Mr. HEENAN: It is surprising to me how the hon. member thinks I was alluding to him.

Mr. ERNST: I am quite sure the hon. member was.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must admit that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has the floor.

Mr. ERNST: But he must not make allusions which are obviously directed to me and which are not in accordance with the fact.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member said that he was not speaking of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg.

Mr. HEENAN: I did not accuse any specific member of being behind the curtain, but any hon. member who interjects these "smart Aleck" remarks should be behind the curtain.

Mr. ERNST: I am sorry I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. HEENAN: I shall not continue until these "smart Aleck" remarks from the Tory party stop.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must use parliamentary language. That expression is not parliamentary.

Mr. HEENAN: I mean these gentlemen on the Tory benches.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has the floor and he has had it all afternoon on this amendment. He knows he should not address personal remarks to his colleagues.

Mr. HEENAN: I object to the Chairman's remarks, because he sits in this chair listening to these "smart Aleck" remarks and does not take note of them.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman has to sit in his chair, but once in a while he listens to remarks that cheer him up.

Mr. HEENAN: I say again that the minister has now brought in an amendment which gives to the railway commissioners powers that he had formerly given to the arbitral tribunal. I am not suggesting that this is entirely wrong; it is just a change of conditions. Now with the change of conditions, we have only one part of section 179 exempt from the provisions of the bill. All I want to do is what I think the minister intends and ought to do, namely, to provide for the whole of section 179. In my amendment I have moved the whole of the words of that section and I submit that we could very well include a further provision here. Somebody else might do it. I should like the minister to accept section 179 of the Railway Act. That is all I want done.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Mr. MANION: This is the hon. gentleman's amendment. I have explained, not once but a number of times, why this cannot be done. I have given reasons and I do not wish to go over the ground again.

Mr. HEAPS: Section 179 has not been very satisfactory to the railway employees. I do not think there is much doubt as to that. The statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Red Deer gave one very concrete illustration as to how the section worked in the past. In addition to that we have had the spectacle this year of the railway employees appearing before a committee of the house asking that section 179 of the Railway Act be changed in order to give it a fairer interpretation so far as they are concerned, than it has had. That was turned down by the railway committee and I presume the section as it stands will remain in operation.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know that the hon. member can criticize a law unless he wants to ask that it be repealed.

Mr. HEAPS: I can discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN: I am trying to do my duty the best I can. I do not want to be discourteous. The rule is clear that one cannot discuss a law unless one wants to ask for its repeal. This amendment deals with the bill before the committee, not with the Railway Act. The hon. member is quite in order to discuss the amendment, but I do not think he would be in order to discuss the Railway Act.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not discussing the Railway Act in its entirety; I am discussing section 179 which is specifically referred to in both the resolution and the amendment now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Then the hon. member is in order.

Mr. HEAPS: Section 179 has proved to be very unsatisfactory to the railway employees. Further, if the bill now before the committee becomes law, the effect will be that under section 179 there may have to be many more appeals to the railway commission. The Minister of Railways this afternoon gave an interpretation of the act, but I do not think he had an opportunity of consulting with his legal adviser before he made the statement on the floor of the house. If the railway commission were hearing any appeal under that section, I do not know whether they would take the same broad view of the question which the minister has taken here, because in the past they have followed a very strict and narrow interpretation of the act, and that is what we are complaining about. Furthermore, what may happen under this new measure for cooperation is that the lines may have to be abandoned, and before that abandonment takes place the men in the railway service will have to be dispensed with. A week or two after they have been dispensed with, the lines will be abandoned. The men's employment has been done away with, and they are left with their little properties in these towns with absolutely no redress under section 179 of the Railway Act or under this measure. If the minister will not give me one hundred per cent of what I ask, he might give me a small portion. He seems to be in rather a generous mood this afternoon, and I would ask him to take into serious consideration, not simply throw the suggestion into the waste paper basket, the enactment of a provision that will give to these men compensation even to a limited degree, especially when they have put their life savings into a home in some railway town and find not only their work gone but the value of their property wiped out; because when lines are abandoned, either wholly or in part, the value of the property disappears. I appeal to the minister to include in this act or in an amendment to the Railway Act a provision if not to compensate the men for losing their jobs, at least that they shall receive some compensation for the property they may lose.

Mr. HEENAN: Let me put it to the minister in another way. First let me ask him, does he intend to deprive the railroad men of the rights which they now have under section 179 of the Railway Act? I take it that the minister would immediately say no, and I see he nods his head. What I fear is this, now that we are putting all these things back under the railway commission. As we refer to only part of section 179 of the Railway Act, then by inference the other part of section 179 is inconsistent with the provisions of this act. I fear that the government unintentionally is taking away the privileges which the employees now have. I do not want to go into another lengthy discussion on this thing. I feel that I am making a fair and reasonable appeal to the minister. If there is any delay I am willing to take the blame for it on the ground that I have not been able to make myself understood, but the more I look into it the more plainly I see that when you mention only part of section 179 of the Railway Act, then by inference you say that the other part of section 179 is inconsistent with the provisions of this act. Although section 179 does not satisfy me, as the minister knows by now, I think that the least we can do in order to preserve for the employees the protection which they now have, and not take anything away from them, is to include the whole of section 179.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to go into a lot of detail. The reason I object to section 179 going in in toto is that it refers to section 178. The beginning of section 179 has nothing to do with the employees. Reference is made in section 179 to section 178, and 178 deals with such matters as deviations, changes and alterations; plan, profile, and so forth; sanction; the depositing of plan, profile and book of reference; it provides that the company may execute works, and that the board may dispense with proceedings. A lot of matters are dealt with in section 178, to which section 179 refers, which have nothing whatever to do with the employees of the railway.

I take it that the attitude of the hon. gentleman is to protect the interests of the employees. I submit—I shall not repeat it again whether we vote on this or not—that that part of section 179 which is included in this bill protects the employees so far as they can be protected under section 179. If you put in the whole section you deal with a lot of matters that would interefere to a certain extent with cooperation, and would have no effect on the employees at all but would only complicate matters. To show how the hon. gentleman must be wrong, he says that because we refer to a portion of section 179 then by inference the rest of section 179 is put out of court. If his contention is right, then because we mention the Maritime Freight Rates Act, all other acts must be out of court. That cannot be right because this act prevails over any other act except where the provisions of this act are inconsistent with the provisions of some other act.

I do not intend to argue the matter any further. The hon. gentleman has put himself on record, and certainly I have. I submit in conclusion that section 179, so far as it protects the men, is incorporated in this act. With all due respect, and I say this with no disrespect whatsoever for my hon. friend, I prefer to take the opinion of the Justice department and of my own legal advisers as to the interpretation of the act rather than the word of my hon. friend. I must accept the word of the Justice department and of my legal advisers because neither my friend nor I is a lawyer.

Mr. HEENAN: I wish that I were arguing against the Justice department or against the minister's legal adviser because I might be able to convince him that he was wrong. The argument which the minister has just put up convinces me that I am right. Section 2 provides:

> The provisions of this act shall bind His Majesty and shall prevail over all inconsistent provisions of all other acts, but so that,— > (b) the provisions of the Maritime Freight Rates Act; and . . .
> shall not be deemed to be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or to be in any manner affected thereby.

Why do we say that?

Mr. MANION: Just to emphasize it.

Mr. HEENAN: That is the point. The minister and I are agreed. It is just to make sure that the Maritime Freight Rates Act is not disturbed. The next paragraph alludes to the Crowsnest pass rates, not in so many words, but that is what it means. It is necessary to emphasize it. What I want the minister to do in the few sections that relate to labour is to emphasize the fact that labour is protected.

Mr. MANION: We have done that by putting in that part of section 179 of the Railway Act.

Mr. HEENAN: Why put in just a portion of section 179? I admit that the minister is right in saying that section 178 relates to other matters, but we have left out entirely the first portion of section 179 which says:

> The company shall not, at any time, make any change, alteration or deviation in the railway, or any portion thereof . . . nor remove, close, or abandon any station, or divisional point nor create a new divisional point which would involve the removal of employees, without leave of the board.

Are we going to leave that out?

Mr. STEVENS: It also says, "until the provisions of the last preceding section are fully complied with." My hon. friend did not read that.

Mr. HEENAN: That means section 178. I admit that the thing is complicated because of the fact that it has not been considered.

Mr. ERNST: As an engineer put your hand in your own pocket.

Mr. HEENAN: Is that coming up again? I want the minister to give this matter serious consideration because so far as I am concerned this bill cannot go through this house in this way. We have only asked the Minister of Railways to protect the labour men in this country. We are not getting that; we are not even getting consideration, nothing but "ya-ha's" from the Tory benches.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman blew up a filibuster the other day, and got a lot of headlines in the newspapers. I object to the statement he has just made, and I would ask him to retract it. He says all he gets from the Tory benches is a lot of "ya-ha." What it means, I do not know. The Tory benches are giving as much consideration to the working men as is the hon. member. I object to the statement, and I want it retracted.

Mr. HEENAN: That does not worry me a bit.

Mr. MANION: I want a ruling.

Mr. HEENAN: I will withdraw it, right now, and substitute for it anything else that will stand for the same thing. The Minister of Railways has a bill before us which means the amalgamation of the railroads of Canada.

Mr. MANION: It means nothing of the sort, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. HEENAN: It means harm to 40,000 railway men of Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member to keep to the terms of the section, and the amendment thereto.

Mr. HEENAN: I am asking for the protection we had under section 179, before this bill was drafted. Part of that protection is being taken away from us.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no.

Mr. HEENAN: I say, yes, yes. If you do not want to take it away from them, include it in the measure and accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must abuse the chair, if he wishes to abuse anybody.

Mr. HEENAN: It is hard to do it when hon. members are interrupting so much.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to keep the hon. member within decent bounds.

Mr. HEENAN: Why worry about it?

The CHAIRMAN: I am here to have the rules of the house respected.

Mr. HEENAN: It is a funny thing that if anybody rises to talk about labour matters he is the only man who is ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: That remark was absolutely uncalled for, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it, otherwise I shall have to take the necessary measures. I have to do my duty, and I shall do it. I ask the hon. member to withdraw the statement.

Mr. HEENAN: What statement?

The CHAIRMAN: The statement the hon. member has just made.

Mr. HEENAN: I will withdraw the statement I have just made. What was it?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member does not know what he is talking about, it is not my fault.

Mr. HEENAN: We have before us a bill which means more to the railway men of Canada than any other measure which has been introduced into this House of Commons. Instead of the government considering my amendment there is presented the spectacle which we see every time one of us gets up.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): You are making a spectacle all right.

Mr. HEENAN: Every time hon. members on this side of the house rise to try to protect the railway men we get just what we are receiving now from the Tory benches. When I spoke before I did not refer to the Minister of Railways or to the government, but to the speeches of hon. members sitting behind the government. However, that is past, and I am still appealing to the minister to give the protection to the railway men of Canada that they had prior to the initiation of the bill.

Mr. MANION: They have it in this legislation.

Mr. HEENAN: They have no such thing, and you cannot tell me that they have it. If they have it in the bill, be as specific in this measure as you were with the maritime freight rates legislation. Include the whole of section 179 of the Railway Act, and not only one part of that section. If the minister is content that he is taking nothing away from the railway men, and that they will still receive the benefits of section 179, I suggest that in the measure he use the words "section 179", not "that part of section 179." The Minister of Trade and Commerce shakes his head, as much as to say that it cannot be done.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not that.

Mr. HEENAN: I know that section 179 of the Railway Act contains the words "until the provisions of the last preceding section are fully complied with." I know that it is all mixed up. But in eliminating those words you also eliminate the words "the company shall not, at any time, make any change, alteration or deviation in the railway, or any portion thereof"—until the railways submit to profiles, plans, and other things enumerated, and so on.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. member permit me to say a few words? We have listened this afternoon to a full discussion of this matter, and have gone over the whole field a number of times. In his desire to meet the wishes of the hon. member the Minister of Railways has violated the rules of the house, due to the fact that he has had to indulge in tedious repetition; to my knowledge he has repeated his explanation at least four or five times. May I appeal to the hon. member to be just to the government and those who are seeking to pass the measure. We have carried into the new bill all that portion of section 179 which refers to the compensation of employees.

Following the explanations made by my colleague the Minister of Railways, let me explain the whole matter again. There is another part of section 179 which deals with the deviation of lines, and deals particularly with terminals and railway stations. The details of that part of section 179 are set forth in section 178. There are some portions of the section which, if carried into the bill in toto, would disturb the whole structure of it. That would be easily understood if anybody were to read section 178 carefully. The government have considered the matter with great care, have submitted it to the law officers of the Department of Justice and the Department of Railways, and we have been advised that it would be legally unwise to carry the whole section into the bill. The hon. member will observe that we have specifically and definitely carried into the measure, the provision concerning compensation to employees. I ask the hon. member and the committee if they have not discussed this clause long enough. We regret we cannot satisfy the hon. member's wish but we have explained to him the extent to which we have gone. We ask that the committee help us to make a little more progress with the bill, and we do not ask it in any spirit of bitter, specious or captious opposition to the hon. member's views. It is our earnest desire to meet him, but we cannot meet him in the extreme view he takes in regard to section 179.

I think we have been reasonable. Certainly the Minister of Railways has been patient, not only to-day, but during the long and tedious discussion which has taken place throughout the progress of the bill, a discussion which has spread over many, many days. After all, some consideration should be given to anyone piloting a bill such as this through the House of Commons. We are anxious to meet the views of hon. members opposite. In fact, the minister has in his hand some other amendments which he is anxious to move, and which will meet the views of hon. members opposite. Already two of those amendments have been carried. We are not seeking to be objectionable, we are trying to be reasonable, but we cannot meet the hon. member in this respect. As his amendment is before us, surely we can take the sense of the committee in regard to it.

Mr. HEENAN: I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will give me credit at least for trying to be considerate. I have been patient, as long as hon. members on the government benches allowed me to be so. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not yet convinced me; it may be because I cannot be convinced. I admit that as far as the compensation is concerned we have it included in paragraph (a) of section 2; but I want the Minister of Trade and Commerce to look at this point; the first part of section 179 says that "the company shall not at any time make any change..." except by leave of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It is only after they get that leave that compensation is effective, so it is really necessary to get the first part in, in order to make the second part effective. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Railways can convince me in this respect I shall be satisfied.

Mr. MANION: I do not think it is possible to convince the hon. member, but we are convinced ourselves.

Mr. STEVENS: That portion which relates to compensation of employees, every part of section 179 that has to do with compensation, is preserved in this bill. If the whole of it applies, then the whole of it is preserved. That is clear.

Mr. HEENAN: All I can say is that the railroad men do not believe so.

Mr. MANION: This was put in in the other chamber at the request of the railroad men.

Mr. HEENAN: No, Mr. Chairman, it was not. This is what the Senate gave the railroad men out of what they asked, which is an entirely different thing. The railroad men asked for more than this, but this is all they got.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MANION: My legal adviser was present at those meetings, and he tells me that the railroad men expressed themselves as satisfied with this. That is what the gentleman who is sitting in front of me and who was present at those meetings says. And it is a very strange thing if these railroad men are not satisfied and have not so advised me. I come from a bigger railroad centre than my hon. friend—

Mr. HEENAN: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. MANION: No, but if they are not satisfied it is strange that they have not given me some intimation of their dissatisfaction. I have never heard a word from them to that effect, and they do not hesitate to approach me. According to my best information it satisfied them when they appeared before the committee in the Senate.

Mr. HEENAN: Probably the minister will admit that I know something about what the representatives of railroad unions think about the whole measure. But I do not want to discuss that. Do you think I would stand here and talk as I have talked if I thought this was satisfactory to the representatives of railroad labour in Canada? Not for a moment. I will go this far right now; if the minister will make the statement on behalf of the government that if this is not interpreted the way he now says it will be interpreted, he will bring in an amendment at a future session, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPENCE: Of course you would if you got all you wanted.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: The very fact that the Minister of Railways will not go so far as to say that if it is not interpreted the way he says it is intended to be he will amend the bill—

Mr. MANION: I did not say how it was going to work out. I say it will protect the men to the same extent that the Railway Act does.

Mr. HEENAN: But there is a difference of opinion between us as to the provision. I contend that the railway men of this country are not protected; they have not under this bill the whole of section 179, but only part of it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Railways say—and I believe they think they are right—that we have not had anything taken away from us whatever.

With that difference of opinion between us surely the government ought to go so far as to say that if it is not interpreted the way the government says it is going to be they will amend the act at a future session. Is that unreasonable? I point out again that all we ask in this whole controversy is protection of the railroad men of this country even to the extent they had before this bill was presented. It is bad enough taking work from 20,000 to 40,000 of them, without trying to take away some of the privileges they have at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN: I will draw the hon. member's attention to standing order No. 41 (i); that a member shall not:

Use his right of speech for the purpose of obstructing the business of the house.

The hon. member has spoken all afternoon, I think obstructing his own amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not think that is a fair reading of the rule. I am not obstructing.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. member is only blowing off steam.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee desires to have the amendment put, but the hon. member has risen time after time and has obstructed his own amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: I am only trying to answer the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Railways. They take the position that this measure does not detract—

The CHAIRMAN: I call the hon. member's attention to the rule.

Mr. HEENAN: I appeal against the ruling of the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is alone in his appeal. Therefore it is of no use.

Mr. HEAPS: The point I raised is somewhat different from that raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I am not going to argue about the legal aspects of section 179, as to its definition or even its application, because I am always afraid to jump in where lawyers are concerned. I recall that a couple of years ago I had one of the best lawyers around this building draft an amendment which I thought was too difficult for a layman to draft, and after I submitted the amendment to the house every lawyer in the house jumped on me and said that I should have gone to a lawyer to have it drafted. It is possible that the definition given by the Minister of Railways is quite correct, and I am prepared to accept that viewpoint. At the same time I desire to testify to the fairness of the minister during the whole course of the discussion of this measure. Now having said these nice things about him I hope he will treat me with a little more consideration than when I suggested a little earlier this afternoon—

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member want to move an amendment?

Mr. HEAPS: Well, it arises out of the same things.

The CHAIRMAN: Because we could dispose first of the amendment now before the committee, and then the hon. member could proceed.

Mr. HEAPS: In speaking to the point I raised earlier I will not repeat what I said if I get satisfaction from the minister. I claim that under the provisions of this bill the necessity for proposing an amendment to section 179 will be apparent to everyone. It is almost certain that a large number of railway employees who have put their savings into a little piece of property in a railway centre will as a result of the operation of this bill find they have no further use for the property which they have purchased.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: Just before the adjournment I was making an appeal to the minister on behalf of those railway men who are likely to lose their homes, which no doubt they have worked a great many years to acquire. As regards section 179 of the Railway Act, I do not think it is important whether that provision goes into this legislation because in my opinion the men would still come under the Railway Act. But the important part is the effect which in past years the actual operation of section 179 has had; it has given very little satisfaction to the men affected, and its interpretation, as respects the Big Valley situation, for example, which was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Red Deer, simply meant that although the men had lived in the town for many years and had bought homes, they found, when the time came for a change to be made in connection with that divisional point, that they were entitled to nothing in the way of compensation for their removal. It seems to me it is not a question whether section 179 is incorporated in this legislation; the important point is that the spirit and intent of that section shall be observed in the operation of the bill now before us when it becomes law.

I think it will be generally agreed that in consequence of this bill many hundreds and even thousands of men who have sunk all their savings into homes in small railway divisional points will probably lose everything they possess. I am now pleading for the small man who has invested his all in a home and is now likely, as a result of the operation of the legislation now before us, to find himself utterly dispossessed. I submit that we shall have to have an amendment to the Railway Act, either in section 179 or by way of a special clause in the act, to meet this situation, because there will probably be thousands of such cases throughout Canada; men will lose not only their jobs but their life savings. Is the minister not prepared to consider favourably the insertion of a clause which will provide for such men some compensation to be determined by the railway board?

Mr. MANION: In the first place I should not care to admit the accuracy of my hon. friend's statement that so many men will find themselves in the position he suggests. I think it would be wiser for us to wait until we have seen some of the effects of the legislation before taking action in this regard. If any injustice is done I do not think there is any member of this house who would wish to see the railway men suffer; I do not think anyone wants to see them suffer injustice in consequence of any act of parliament or of the railway companies. If therefore it should prove that men are being unjustly treated, we shall be in a fair position to deal with the matter as and when such injustice occurs. At that time we could discuss the matter on its merits. If it is found after the act goes into operation that there are just grounds for complaint, the question can be considered next session, if we are all here at that time.

I understand and respect my hon. friend's position in this matter, but the government does not accept the premise he lays down, and we are not anxious to include in the legislation any provisions which may not be necessary.

Mr. HEAPS: In the Big Valley affair discussed this afternoon, it was shown that men had been actually moved from one place to another and that through a technicality in the law they were not entitled to compensation; yet parliament took no action; indeed, when the matter was brought to the attention of the committee this year it was turned down and the men could get no redress. However, I am glad the minister makes the admission that if one year from now it is found that men have lost their homes through process of this legislation, he will take into consideration the suggestion I am now making.

Mr. MANION: On its merits.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. But I would remind the minister that it is rather dangerous to leave legislation in such a form as to make retroactive measures necessary. Personally, I would rather have parliament take a proper view of the situation now, to anticipate any difficulties that may arise and to make the necessary provision to take care of them.

Mr. MITCHELL: When this house passes legislation that has for its object the dismissal of thousands of men, I believe that a responsibility rests on the government of the country at least to make some provision for those who will suffer in consequence. I advanced this argument the other day. This question came up in Great Britain when the different railway systems, one hundred and twenty in number, were consolidated into four large systems. There ample protection was provided for the railway workers. I know that in a young country like this, with such a background as ours, it is difficult for us to appreciate action of that sort. In connection with the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg, take the railway towns in northern Ontario; when a man loses employment there he loses everything, because his home depreciates in value. Such men are more or less cut off from civilization as we know it in the larger centres. There is not the remotest possibility therefore of their receiving anything approaching the value of the property they own. There is really only one thing that they can do, and that is to leave their homes and swell the ranks of the unemployed in the large cities of Ontario.

In its practical application, whether we like it or not, this legislation will throw many railway workers on the streets. We need not deceive ourselves in this matter. In my judgment, no consideration at all was given by the framers of this bill to the human element in the railway industry. Section 179 of the Railway Act is to all intents and purposes a dead letter in the application of this legislation. An example was cited by the previous speaker. It was necessary in western Canada to shut down a divisional point, and all that had to be done was to leave one crew there and section 179 did not apply.

I believe the responsibility rests upon the government at this time to make some provision for the railway men who are going to lose their jobs. I do not want to labour the point, but after all these men are making a greater sacrifice than the people who invested in the industry. Surely it is not beyond the wisdom of any government to deal with such a situation. I think it could very well be done before the final passage of this bill, and that would be far better than waiting a year. I appreciate the position of the minister, but it is not a question of waiting to see how the legislation will work, because the displacement of labour through the consolidation of the two railways is an actual problem. A good deal has been said about amalgamation. It is not beyond the realm of possibility that we shall have amalgamation within eighteen months of the passing of this legislation, and this by sheer force of economics. It seems to me the government could quite easily make provision, small as it might be, to take care of the men, because we might as well sign the death warrant of those who are being laid off in the railway industry as leave the act in its present shape. These men have absolutely no hope of finding employment in any of the centres of the dominion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At the risk of delaying the committee, I should like to make a few observations. It is not admitted as an accepted premise that the legislation now before the house will have the effect which hon. gentlemen opposite are insisting upon. Be that as it may, what help will it give to the men who are out of employment to-day? They will continue to be out of employment if some measure such as this is not passed by parliament. I would refer the hon. member for East Hamilton to the speech made by Mr. Beatty in Winnipeg. He was dealing with this very question and as an argument for amalgamation he stated that no doubt there would be some cases where employment would be lost but that those who are still employed would have steady employment. He stated that that would be much better than a continuance of the intermittent employment now prevalent.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a moment; you are on your feet pretty often while I am on mine very seldom. The argument adduced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg has many ramifications and implications. He is arguing that the state should be an insurer—that is what it amounts to—of employment for men who because of economic reasons find themselves out of employment. Let me put this case to hon. gentlemen opposite. If they come into power and the hon. member for Weyburn has his way, the tariff on cottons will be taken off. If the hon. member is a member of that government, which I do not think is likely to happen—

Mr. YOUNG: Not at all likely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my constituency there is a town of 1,800 people wholly dependent upon the cotton industry. What would he say if as an argument against the proposal to take off the tariff on cottons I said that because of its fiscal policy, the government of this country should ensure to those people compensation for their loss of employment and property. That argument is just as sound as the one advanced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. I could make just as strong a plea for those people as he makes for the railway workers, and from the standpoint of the nation my argument would be just as unsound as his. I put that to hon. gentlemen opposite as a complete answer to the case put forward by the hon. member for North Winnipeg.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the fiscal policy of the government throws a large number of men upon the streets—

Mr. YOUNG: Which it has done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —I see no reason why the government should not be held responsible for the cost of readjustment to the new situation. That is what is coming in this country; that is what has already been recognized in other countries. We may very well have to do the same thing in the not distant future. This action may have to be taken in the town of Fernie where the policies of this government have forced the closing down of the whole town with a possible throwing of thousands upon the streets. There is no earthly reason why their care should not be a charge upon the government since their policy has made the town useless. Compensating adjustments ought to be made. I submit that we have not before us a hypothetical case such as has been mentioned by the hon. member for York-Sunbury; we have a concrete case in which the employees of a so-called government owned railway, as well as a privately owned railway, are affected. If this bill is to be worth anything, it will have the effect of throwing a large number of men out of employment. We all know that a large part of the cost of railway operation is made up of wages and if there is to be any gain made by the bill now before us, it will mean that a considerable number of men will be thrown out of work. That fact is tacitly admitted by the hon. member for York-Sunbury when he suggests that those who will be left will have steady employment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said that was Mr. Beatty's argument. The hon. member can twist things about just as well as anybody I know.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not trying to twist anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is your usual method.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I submit that if I am to be subjected to this kind of thing I shall have to call upon you to ask the hon. member to withdraw his statement.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is quite right; he has the floor and he should not be interrupted without leave.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not my practice to try to twist things. I submit it is not fair that an hon. member should make such a statement in this committee. Mr. Beatty is quoted by the hon. member for York-Sunbury to the effect that a large part of the savings would be in the fact that a smaller number of men would have steady employment. I submit that that statement indicates that men are to be laid off. I think we must admit that that will be the inevitable consequence of the passing of this legislation.

We in this corner have taken the ground that we ought to effect whatever economies we can, but we say that in effecting those economies we should not disregard the rights and the needs of the men who are to be displaced by such action. Apparently the government refuses to recognize the rights of the men to their jobs; they are willing to turn them off. It is a curious thing that we in this corner should be driven to asking for the protection of property rights. We say that the rights of the men to their jobs should be safeguarded, and we ask also that certain property rights should be protected. The purpose of this bill is to protect the rights of the bondholders; apparently it is one thing to protect the rights of the big people but an altogether different thing when it comes to protecting the rights of the little people.

An hon. MEMBER: The old story.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. member opposite suggests it is the old, old story; it is the old story but it is none the less the true story.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A democratic appeal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If we are protecting the so-called rights of the bondholders by this legislation, I submit there would be nothing out of the way in our protecting the rights and property which may be involved by this action.

Mr. GOBEIL: What property?

An hon. MEMBER: What rights?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The property rights of the employees which will be destroyed by this legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: While I was going home at Easter a man related to me the situation in which he had been placed by the taking off of the train between Toronto and Montreal. Formerly he had been a resident of Winnipeg but had been transferred to Toronto in order to take a run out of that city. As he expected to be in Toronto indefinitely, he bought a house. With the taking off of his train, he has lost his run and his house is now valueless. That is not a hypothetical case, it is something that has actually happened. When we are dealing with the property rights of the big people I suggest that it is quite proper to deal with the property rights of the smaller people. I do not think the minister is taking the correct attitude when he says that we may deal with such questions a year hence. We are dealing with the whole situation to-day; we are dealing with property rights as they will be affected by this legislation and it seems to me that some provision should be included in the bill to take care of the situation to which I have referred. As my colleague has pointed out, there is such a measure in the Railway Act. The principle was conceded in that act and this bill to a considerable extent supersedes that act.

Mr. MANION: Not so far as compensation is concerned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I stand corrected; perhaps I am wrong, but if these men are laid off, lose their positions through the economies that are contemplated, will they have the rights that they were supposed to have under the Railway Act?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Their property rights?

Mr. MANION: May I suggest this to my hon. friend: I doubt if he was present this afternoon, but we spent the whole afternoon trying to convince the committee that that was the case, and I think we convinced everybody but one in the committee that the rights of the railwaymen to compensation as protected in the Railway Act were protected to the same extent in this measure. I am trying to save my breath by not putting up the same argument again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I accept the correction, but as my colleague said before, while technically there are certain rights, in practice, as was shown by the illustration given this afternoon, the men are not able to take advantage of what was evidently the spirit of the act. So my suggestion now is that since the principle is conceded in the Railway Act, we should strive to put the same principle into this measure. I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to beat the carpet over again although I have been doing so all afternoon. Our attitude on this side —and I think it was the attitude even of the hon. member for North Winnipeg—is that so far as the men's rights were protected in the Railway Act, they are protected in this.

The other question as to whether that is sufficient protection for the men is an entirely different matter. That is a question for consideration as it affects the Railway Act as a whole. The question of unemployment insurance, which my hon. friend has been discussing, is also one to be considered from now on, because I think all hon. members realize that men who have suffered through idleness, unemployment, throughout this depression have had thrust upon them something which our type of civilization should not have permitted. I believe the whole question of unemployment insurance must be dealt with in the near future, although not necessarily in that form. I say frankly—and I have said this many times publicly—that this type of economic civilization which we have cannot endure if we do not properly look after unemployed men in times of depression. I say that sincerely, but that has nothing to do at the moment with this measure. What my hon. friend and some of his friends are suggesting, and, I believe, in good faith, is that we should constitute the railwaymen a special group. That is what I say and what the hon. member for York-Sunbury has said, cannot be done; we cannot do that. It would be discriminating even among the railwaymen themselves, because if we put into this measure a provision that men who in the future are laid off must get some compensation, what about men who in the past have been laid off from the railways? In this way we would be discriminating even as between the railwaymen themselves. This bill is not for the purpose, as set forth by the hon. gentleman, of protecting the rights of the bondholders—I wrote down the words he used —I do not think it is fair to suggest that, nor for the hon. member for East Hamilton to say that the purpose of the bill is to lay off railwaymen. That is not the purpose, nor is it to protect the rights of the bondholders.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is happening just the same.

Mr. MANION: That is a different matter. To say that it is the purpose and to say that it is happening are two different things. Let me finish my argument; I did not interrupt my hon. friend. The principle of the bill is neither to lay off men nor to protect the interest of the bondholders. It is so to regulate the economies of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific that the latter will not go into bankruptcy and the former will not bankrupt this country. As expressed by the hon. member for York-Sunbury quoting Mr. Beatty, this bill is for the purpose of endeavouring to get the railways into such operating shape that when a revival of business comes, they will operate so fairly and economically that the men who are employed on the railways will be ensured a reasonable amount of steady employment instead of an uncertainty as at present. It may be that some hardships will occur; that cannot be avoided, but at the moment I submit we cannot put into this measure a provision that protects one group of men to the discrimination of another or that protects one portion of a group of men to the discrimination of another portion of the same group.

All of us having expressed our viewpoints, three on the other side and two on this, may I say that the whole discussion is out of order. I am saying this now because I wanted to set forth my own arguments before I was ruled out of order. I think it was fair I should do this because my hon. friends made their arguments. The other day the hon. member for North Winnipeg moved an amendment which had for its purpose the compensation of all men laid off. That was voted down by the committee and therefore to discuss again the same matter—

Mr. HEAPS: It was not voted down; the vote was upon a point of order.

Mr. MANION: All right; that may be true, but at any rate, the amendment was ruled out of order, and if it was out of order then it is out of order now.

Mr. HEAPS: What was out of order was this introduction by a private member of a motion that could be introduced, according to the ruling, only by a member of the government.

Mr. MANION: I believe the hon. member is correct. We have put ourselves on record. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that the government will have to take the responsibility. We will take the responsibility. I quite admit there are in this bill clauses that will not be popular, particularly in view of the fact that some hon. gentlemen have been making wild statements that this will mean putting 40,000 men out of employment. Nothing like 40,000 or even 20,000 men will be put out of employment; in fact, I doubt if very many will lose their positions. I believe with a decent revival of business, thousands of men will be taken on instead of further employees being laid off. I do not wish to rehash the whole question. I respect my hon. friends' viewpoint. They have put themselves on record; they have stated their attitude. The government takes the responsibility of saying that at the present time we cannot admit into this bill clauses to protect one group or a portion of one group as against others and as we have all expressed our viewpoints, I think we might make a little further progress with the bill than we have done so far to-day, although I am not blaming my hon. friend for lack of progress this afternoon

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Did I understand the minister a few moments ago to say that if this amendment which he has before the committee does not work out satisfactorily, he will be ready to submit amendments another year?

Mr. MANION: No; I said that if it worked out so that unfair hardships were imposed upon the railwaymen, we would be ready at the next session of parliament to consider on its merits any proposal to deal with the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is near enough for the purpose I had in view. Might I call the attention of the committee to this point: when the various amendments were submitted by the opposition, wherever those amendments all came from, the Prime Minister about the middle of last week said that they would all be submitted to council and given the most careful consideration before he left for Washington. I presume that has been done.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no question it has been done. Whatever decision has been arrived at, my hon. friends and his colleagues, in the absence of their leader, cannot depart from such decision on any major question.

As regards this hammering, I have done my share of it and maybe I will do it again on the third reading, but to do it now is futile. The minister cannot depart from, even to modify materially the cabinet decision, which has been reached. His statement is satisfactory to me, at all events, in the absence of his leader. I recall quite clearly that the Prime Minister made some rather fair comment at that time that he was going to give all these amendments the fullest possible consideration before he left. I have no brief for the government in all conscience; I think everybody knows that. I am speaking in our own interests, and in my own behalf I want to get home out of here. I have business to do out in the west. I have never been at home for years during the seeding time, and that is the most important time of the year to the farmer. While my public duties keep me here, they do not keep me here to talk ineffectively on this question at this time as important as it is.

While I am on my feet I want to remind the ministry now that I make two reservations: I am reserving the right to speak on any of these amendments on the third reading, because it is evident, in view of the facts I have recited, that it is useless to discuss them further now. Furthermore, I do not want anybody to assume, if I do not speak in committee on any of these amendments, that therefore I agree to them because I may take the opportunity on the third reading of the bill of seeking to have them referred back to the committee to be dealt with when the Prime Minister returns. But in view of these facts which I have attempted to recite I appeal to my good friend from Kenora-Rainy River, would it not facilitate matters if he took a similar position and reserved all his rights until the third reading of the bill when he could move to have it referred back to committee? I understand that the hon. member has an amendment to the minister's amendment. Well, of course, he is master of his own affairs, but it looks to me as if it would expedite matters and that we would get just as much satisfaction if we postponed this discussion until later on when, on the Prime Minister's return from Washington with the laurels that he may bring, he may feel generous and give us all we want.

Mr. FACTOR: Just one word before my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River gets up. May I ask the Minister of Railways this simple question? Does this section as drafted in this bill give the right of compensation to a displaced railway employee in the same manner that he has that right under section 179 of the Railway Act?

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes. I have stated that, not once, but I should think from six to ten times this afternoon. The act as now drafted gives exactly the same protection, such as that protection is, as is given under section 179 of the Railway Act.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Along these lines of railway going out to the northwest other industries have been built up, such as the lumber industry, which have been pretty hard hit during the last few years, and I would ask if any compensation is contemplated for the men in those industries who are now out of work just as much as the railway workers.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for Melville who is now leading the opposition forces —I do not know who appointed him—will not get my vote any more to be leader of this party. He has put me in a rather peculiar position because he has requested that I withdraw my amendment in view of the statement made by the Minister of Railways. I hope he meant the statement which the minister made in answer to the hon. member for North Winnipeg, and not the last statement of the minister because his last one could be argued on the floor of this house for many, many hours. To suggest that this bill is not designed to throw hundreds and thousands of railway men out of work is beside the mark because the bill will be of no avail if it does not do that very thing. The pooled services which we have been discussing recently—the trains from Ottawa to Toronto, and Montreal to Toronto—have thrown out of work over a hundred men on both the roads.

I trust that the committee will observe that all I have been trying to do this afternoon is to have included the provisions of section 179 of the Railway Act as it now stands. Though that section as it stands is by no means satisfactory to me, I have been trying this afternoon to have the complete section 179 included in the measure now before us. The first part of that section providing that the companies may do thus and so without leave of the board is entirely eliminated from this bill, to my way of thinking, and in the view of a great many railroad men throughout this country. But I did make a suggestion to the minister before supper which, taken with the remarks of the hon. member for Melville, practically nail me to the cross. I suggested that if the minister, speaking on behalf of the government, would assure me that if the working out of this does not conform to the statements made by the minister this afternoon, he will consider amending the bill at a future session, and the minister practically agreed to that suggestion in answering the hon. member for North Winnipeg.

Mr. MANION: Do not put anything into my mouth that I did not agree to. I do not desire that there should be any misunderstanding. I did not say that if the bill did not work out as I expected I would deal with it. I did agree that if it was shown that section 179 as incorporated in this bill was different from section 179 as in the Railway Act, we would deal with it. That is a different thing. I wish to keep the record straight so that my hon. friend will not misunderstand me.

Mr. HEENAN: That is all I wanted, and I appreciate the minister's attitude.

Mr. SPENCE: You got that long ago.

Mr. HEENAN: When we are trying to help the minister perhaps he would try and keep his supporters quiet behind him. In view of the very fair statement of the minister, and in view of the minister's nod when the hon. member for Melville stated that evidently the Prime Minister before he left for Washington discussed this thing with his colleagues and decided that no major amendment could now be made to the act—I hate to think that that is so because if it is we might just as well adjourn the house to-day before the Prime Minister comes back—

Mr. MANION: May I say in regard to that also that the Prime Minister no more deserves to be blamed for any part of this bill than I or any other member of the government. We have taken our position as a body, and we speak as a body. I speak for the government, not for the Prime Minister, and whatever I say here to-night in regard to these amendments I say on behalf of the government. I do not wish to have put on the shoulders of the Prime Minister any more than on any other member of the government, blame or credit for this bill, because we stand as a body in regard to it.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the minister has misunderstood me. The hon. member for Melville suggested, indeed, I think he stated, that the Prime Minister had said on the floor of the house that these amendments which have been suggested in committee would be considered in the cabinet before he left for Washington, and the hon. member for Melville suggested that that had evidently been done, and that the government had arrived at a conclusion in regard to them and had decided that no further amendments of a major character could be accepted, and I understood the Minister of Railways to nod his head to that.

Mr. MANION: We certainly discussed the amendments in council.

Mr. HEENAN: I am very glad to know that we can consider amendments in the absence of the Prime Minister. In view of the very fair statement which has been made by the Minister of Railways, practically complying with the suggestion that I made before supper, as I understand it, and in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Melville, I ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member shall be granted leave, under standing order 53, to withdraw his amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Heenan) withdrawn.

Mr. MANION: The next amendment with which we have to deal was moved by the hon. member for West Lambton. He is not in the house now, but I should like to point out to the hon. member for Melville, who at the moment is leading the opposition, that the hon. member suggested that section 23 of the Canadian National Railways Act should be included in section 2 of this act. The intention was to protect against abandonment without the consent of the governor in council and the Board of Railway Commissioners. We offered as a compromise the provision that no abandonment may be made by any railway concerned in the legislation, which meant the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways, without its being approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners. Our suggestion was accepted by the hon. member, and I am quite sure if he were in his seat he would agree. Under the circumstances I believe the amendment of the hon. member for West Lambton should be withdrawn.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not familiar with the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Lambton; probably we would not disrupt the procedure if it were allowed to stand. The hon. member no doubt will be in at any moment. I should not like to commit myself in his absence.

Mr. MANION: Very well; I shall deal with the other amendment. I did not wish to get away from clause 2, because, as I said this afternoon, I should like to clear up the outstanding matters as we go along. The next amendment I have before me is sponsored by the leader of the opposition. He is not in his seat.

Mr. HEENAN: He will be here in a minute.

Mr. MANION: I shall see what the next one is. I do not wish to deal with the right hon. gentleman's amendment in his absence; I should not like to be discourteous to him.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members must be here to look after their amendments.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but I do not like to be discourteous to the leader of the opposition or to the hon. member for West Lambton. At the same time I believe I could convince the right hon. gentleman that his amendment is not necessary.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are there no other sections standing?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but I had hoped to clear them up as we went along.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the desirable thing to do, but it would not be fair to go on with the amendments in the absence of the right hon. leader of the opposition and the other hon. member. I appreciate the minister's attitude.

Mr. MANION: The next amendment concerns the hon. member for West Middlesex, and he is not in his seat.

Mr. NEILL: Go ahead.

Mr. MANION: The amendment following that also concerns that hon. member. Then, following that is one in which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is interested; he is not here. I am sure the hon. member for Melville cannot accuse us of hurrying with this bill.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. members for West Middlesex and Vancouver Centre will be here in a few minutes. They are on their way now.

Mr. REID: In the meantime would the minister entertain an amendment I have to offer? I am sorry I have not been able to present it sooner. It is an amendment which in my opinion should be adopted, or some definite assurance given in regard to the matter with which it deals. In the discussion of clause 2 of the bill much doubt seemed to exist in the minds of the legal fraternity as to the exact meaning of the words, "inconsistent provisions of all other acts." Those of us who are not lawyers cannot be blamed if we do not understand the meaning of that expression. The minister did not give a satisfactory answer as to why clause (b) and (c) were put in the bill, that is, the provisions concerning the Maritime Freight Rates Act and "the provisions of any statute of Canada which confirm any contract or enact or provide for any specific or special freight rate, toll or tariff or for the ascertainment of any one freight rate."

If I remember correctly, when the minister was asked regarding these subsections, he confessed he was at a loss to understand why they were put in. The minister will agree that if this act becomes law all the arguments which have been advanced in committee will be more or less forgotten. Three trustees will be administering the Canadian National Railways, and those trustees will have their own solicitors to interpret this legislation. Therefore all the pious wishes and suggestions entertained by hon. members, in regard to what this or other sections may mean, will be discarded. The legal men employed will interpret the act. In view of the fact that these two provisions have been put in the bill under section 2, to take care of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the Crowsnest pass rates, I am led to the decision that some doubt existed as to the manner in which this legislation would affect freight rates. With that in mind I move:

That after the word "thereby" in the twenty-third line of clause 2 the following words be added: "But nothing in this act shall be deemed to take away from the Board of Railway Commissioners the right to hear and decide all appeals made to that board in connection with freight rates and tolls."

I suggest that proviso should be put in, and I therefore hand it to the chairman for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. MANION: Before dealing with the amendment may I suggest that the lawyers of the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific will not interpret the laws; that is a function of the courts. In the event of lawyers connected with the Canadian National or Canadian Pacific lines interpreting any of these clauses in a way which is not in accordance with the intentions of the act, it would be the duty of the court to correct such interpretation.

In regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member which deals with freight rates and tolls, may I suggest that from one end of the bill to the other we find freight rates and tolls mentioned only twice, namely in two subclauses of section 2. They were not mentioned because it was felt that the legislation interfered in no way with freight rates and tolls in general, but in order to emphasize that at least they were not interfered with the Maritime Freight Rates Act was mentioned. The same applies to subclause (a) of section 2 which deals with compensation to employees who were affected financially by the movement of terminals. Because they are put in does not imply that others not put in are interfered with. With all due respect I submit that there is nothing in the legislation in any shape or form which will interfere with the board of Railway Commissioners dealing with freight rates or tolls in the future as they have in the past. For those reasons I cannot accept the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. REID: Under the provisions of the legislation I understand that if the two railway companies decided to charge a certain fee for tickets they would have to go before the board.

Mr. MANION: That will not change.

Mr. REID: And in the matter of freight one railroad will be taking all the freight over the one line; in those circumstances the railways will agree.

Mr. MANION: May I add one thought that I had forgotten? I read it this afternoon in regard to another matter. In section 16 of part II of the bill we have added:

Where the execution or carrying out of such a measure, plan or arrangement involves the doing of any act which by any statute requires the leave, sanction, assent or approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, no such measure, plan or arrangement shall be effective without the approval of the said board.

So that applies, and I hope my hon. friend will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. REID: On that understanding I will withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to hurry the matter at all, but every amendment I have, with one exception, is an amendment proposed by an hon. gentleman opposite who is not in the house at the moment.

Mr. YOUNG: I am ready to go on now with a matter I was going to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it would be more in order to deal with an amendment.

Mr. MANION: Then we are discussing the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Lambton.

Mr. YOUNG: Some time ago I wrote asking the minister of Railways for certain information which I wished to discuss under section 14. When we came to discuss the section the information was not available, so it was agreed that I could discuss it under any section. I now have the information, and, with your consent, Mr. Chairman, will proceed with the discussion.

The minister referred the other day to some figures put out by one R. J. Deachman which he said were misleading if not inaccurate. I can quite understand that, because there are so many sets of railroad statistics available that confusion may well arise. For instance, the minister the other night gave figures showing the percentage of the total traffic that each railway has been getting. I do not for a moment doubt that the figures are accurate, but I cannot find what they are based on. I have before me a considerable amount of information received from the bureau of statistics covering the operations of both railway systems for the past ten years. For the year 1923 I find that the total operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways were some $216,000,000. Only to-day I saw another set of figures, issued also from the bureau of statistics, citing the operating revenues of the Canadian National for that same year at $218,000,000, a difference of some $2,000,000. Both sets of figures are accurate. A footnote relating to the latter figure reveals that it includes certain telegraph earnings not included in the other. Then the annual report of the Canadian National Railways shows the purchases of freight cars in the year 1931 as some 4,300, but the figure I got from the minister in regard to the same purchases for the same year was 3,800. I have no doubt both sets of figures are accurate, but there has been some different basis of calculation.

In regard to the purchase of coal, I asked the minister what imported coal had been displaced by Canadian coal on the Canadian National lines, and at what additional cost to the country. I have no doubt the figures he has given me are accurate, but I cannot understand them or their significance. Again the other night the minister quoted figures which to me were astounding; he stated that on what he called the luxury trains, such as those between Toronto and Montreal, the loss last year to the Canadian National system was $25,000,000. When I looked into it I found that the total passenger earnings for that year were only $16,000,000.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that was the loss on those particular trains; I said the loss on the entire passenger service was over $25,000,000. The only authority I have for it is the railway itself. The hon. gentleman refers to revenues only.

Mr. YOUNG: I am glad the minister has made the correction, because Hansard took him up wrongly. What I want to point out is that it is very difficult for a man who is not a railway accountant, or skilled in the use of figures, to arrive at any accurate estimate of the position of the railways and what they are doing. I would suggest to the minister that one of the best thing he could do would be to call in the officers of his department and have them prepare a standard system of accounting and reporting to this house, so that when we come to consider the railway estimates each year, even members of our intelligence, may know exactly what the position is, what the financial structure is, what its operations are, where the expenditure is going, and if there is any leak, where it is. That I think should be submitted not only for the Canadian National but also for the Canadian Pacific, so that we would be in a position to compare the efficiency of operation of both lines of railway. I offer that suggestion to the minister in good faith, I hope he will consider it.

Another matter I wish to deal with is the operating ratios and the money spent in purchase of equipment and maintenance of way on the two systems. I find from the reports I have from the bureau that the operating ratios were:

	1930	1931	Increase
Canadian National. .	92.06	100.	7.94
Canadian Pacific. . .	76.95	80.40	3.45

When we look at the transportation ratio, that is the percentage of earning required simply to operate the trains, we find the following:

	1930	1931	Increase
Canadian National. .	45.04	47.89	2.85
Canadian Pacific. . .	37.21	40.83	3.62

It will be noted that the increase in the operating ratio is not reflected in the increase in transportation ratio; that additional expenditure must have occured somewhere else.

Looking at the ratio of maintenance of equipment we find:

	1930	1931	Increase	Decrease
C.N.R. . . .	19.34	21.91	2.57
C.P.R. . . .	16.68	14.11		2.57

Here, while the Canadian Pacific made a better showing in 1931 than in 1930, the Canadian National made a worse showing. Before we go on to maintenance of way and structures I would like to turn for a moment to this matter of equipment. In the Duff report, page 46 we find these words:

During the period under review—

That is the period 1923 to 1931.

—the Canadian National did not lack rolling stock or motive power necessary to efficient operation.

That was the situation from 1923 to 1931 according to the Duff report. But turning to the annual report of the Canadian National Railways for 1931, on page 29 we find that at the beginning of that year the Canadian National had 126,129 freight cars of all kinds, eliminating conductors' vans. That year they purchased 4,304 new cars. The minister however gives the figure as 3,800, so we will accept that figure. Those cars, according to the figure given to me by the minister, cost the railway company $10,355,000, so that there was an investment of that amount in equipment which according to the Duff report was not necessary. We find that in the same period the Canadian Pacific had only 87,539 cars. Dividing the total freight ton miles by the number of cars it appears that that year the Canadian Pacific got 115,000 ton miles out of each car it possessed while the Canadian National got only 88,920. We find also that the average load per car on the Canadian Pacific was 23·45 tons and on the Canadian National 22·39. Here we find an expenditure of over $10,000,000 on what, according to the Duff report, was an altogether unnecessary investment. Now, why was that done? I do not believe it is the fault of the Minister of Railways; I believe it was done as a measure of unemployment relief. I think the minister told us on one occasion that the railways were persuaded to advance their program and buy more of this equipment than they actually needed at the time in order to relieve the unemployment situation. That is the only explanation that has been forthcoming so far as I can see. That is to say, they invested this $10,000,000 not as a railway operating scheme but as a means of relieving unemployment.

I do not think it is fair to the national railways that all this additional expenditure, which should be the business of government as a whole, should be charged to the system. I think the minister's colleague behind him put something over him. Possibly that may have been the best way of relieving unemployment, and I am not discussing that point at the moment. Whether it was or not, however, I submit that it is not fair to charge all that expenditure to the Canadian National Railways while the Canadian Pacific Railway was not exposed to any such expenditure.

Let us turn to the expenditure on maintenance of way. We find that in the year 1931 the Canadian Pacific expended $1,350 per mile on maintenance of way while the Canadian National Railways spent $1,695; in other words, the Canadian National spent $345 per mile more than the Canadian Pacific. They were operating 21,941 miles of road and that represented therefore a total expenditure of over $7,500,000 on maintenance of way in excess of what was spent by the Canadian Pacific. Here again I do not think it was done at the instance of the railway management; I believe it was done as a measure of unemployment relief at the instance of the government. I am trying to show that the trouble with the railways is largely, so to speak, backseat driving. They have not been altogether free from governmental influence.

Mr. MANION: So that my hon. friend will not send that out without correction, may I say right here that his conclusions are entirely wrong. I will explain it when he gets through, but this interjection will appear in the middle of his speech if he is sending it out.

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister can prove that my conclusions are inaccurate, well and good. But when he explains that it was not done as a measure of unemployment relief, I hope he will explain also why, when the Canadian National system was well equipped with rolling stock, they invested $10,000,000 in needless freight cars while the Canadian Pacific was exposed to no such expenditure. Again, in the matter of fuel, as I said a moment ago, I could not determine from the figures I received exactly what additional cost the policy of forcing the railways to use Canadian fuel had imposed upon them. The statement was made however that on a certain number of tons of coal used the additional cost was $1.40 per ton, part of it paid by the railways and part by others. But when I look up the trade returns I find that the steam coal imported into the country averaged in value $1.50 per ton, so that if either through the railways or through some other agency we are paying an extra $1.40 per ton for steam coal, it is obvious that we have doubled the cost of coal to the railways.

The total purchases of the railway company last year amounted to $70,000,000, according to the figures of the minister. Most of these purchases were dutiable at about thirty per cent. It is contended that they did not pay the whole thirty per cent additional cost. Well, suppose the sellers of these goods which they purchased did not take the full advantage of the duty but only one-third of it; suppose that instead of an additional cost as represented by a duty of thirty per cent which the tariff would permit, the sellers took only ten per cent. That means an added $7,000,000 to the operating costs of the railway. Here we have, then, $10,000,000 for equipment, $7,500,000 for maintenance of way, and $7,000,000 additional cost in purchases for the operation of the railways. In other words, we have $24,000,000 expended by the railways which could just as well have been saved.

The minister not long ago referred to the fact that he had saved the country an enormous expenditure by closing down the work of the Montreal terminals. I have here a book entitled The American Transportation Problem, and I would read one paragraph from it, dealing with terminals.

Mr. MANION: What is the date of the book?

Mr. YOUNG: It is just off the press, 1933. The paragraph in question reads thus:

> Terminals exert a controlling influence over the character and cost of transportation service. They have contributed on many occasions to seriously delayed and irregular transportation service. A large number of the delinquencies charged against the railroads in the last two decades or so have really had their origin in faulty terminal situations. The congestion, particularly at the eastern port terminals, during the recent war will long be remembered. Here equipment, badly needed in other parts of the country, was piled up and rendered practically useless. What is not so obvious is that, even under the best of conditions, terminals constantly put a brake on the rapidity with which traffic moves and cause irregularities which shippers or receivers of freight find it difficult to contend with. As Mr. Loree has well expressed it, "the large terminal stations and the large terminal yards are the graveyard of cars." His calculations indicate that considerably more than two-thirds of the 14·9 days involved in a typical completed car movement is spent in terminals. If such items as surplus cars, Sunday and holiday delays, and delays due to repairs be eliminated from the calculations, 86 per cent of the time is chargeable to terminal operations and only 14 per cent to the line haul. There has been improvement in recent years, but this has been general and it is doubtful whether the proportions indicated have undergone much change. More expeditious and regular movement of freight is, therefore, conditioned very largely by the adequacy of terminal facilities and the effectiveness shown in their use.

I have read that paragraph to impress upon the committee the importance of terminal facilities. Some years ago the government undertook to improve the terminals at Montreal. Now, as everyone knows, the condition in Montreal, so far as terminals are concerned, was deplorable. In his speech introducing the bill at the time Mr. Dunning pointed out that the Canadian National Railways have in Montreal three different stations, all disconnected. When it was desired to transfer a car from one to the other they had to take it out of the city and around the mountain a distance of eighteen miles in order to bring it to another part of the city. The expense was enormous and the delay considerable, and this perhaps will account for the necessity of ordering new cars. The plan was to spend $50,000,000 in improving the terminals at Montreal, not more than $10,000,000 in any one year. When the present government came in, however, they said, "We cannot afford that expenditure; we will discontinue the development of these terminals." They did so; they laid off men; they saved that $10,000,000 a year which would have been spent in Montreal for that purpose. But what did they do? They turned around and spent $10,000,000 buying new cars.

Mr. MANION: We did not; the management did, and not at our request either.

Mr. YOUNG: The management bought new cars. Did the management find it necessary to buy new cars because they had not adequate terminal facilities? The Canadian Pacific had better facilities; evidently they could get better results from their cars. It was demonstrated, before the terminals were started, that that investment, large as it was, was the most profitable investment then presented in connection with the Canadian National Railways, much more profitable than any branch lines they could build. The government abandoned the project, though it was necessary to the railways and would have given employment to thousands of people, because it was costing $10,000,000 a year; and for some reason or other an additional $10,000,000 was spent on equipment which, according to the Duff report, was not necessary.

I am not criticizing the minister for this; perhaps it was the best thing to do to relieve unemployment. But I would point out that when you are making savings it is well to call in your engineers and find out what savings you can make with the best economy. With a million dollars to be spent on unemployment, it would have been better to spend it where the engineers recommended it could be spent with profit than to spend it on rolling equipment which, according to the Duff report, was not at all necessary. I hope the minister will clear up that situation when he replies.

Mr. MANION: I hope my hon. friend will forgive me if I do not deal very lengthily with his remarks. First, let me congratulate him upon his great industry in searching out statistics and putting them before the committee. There is this to say for him, he always puts his case good-naturedly; he is never unpleasant no matter how fallacious his argument may be. As far as railway statistics are concerned. I hope my hon. friend does not think that I imagine myself to be an expert. I doubt if any hon. member of this committee, or even anyone outside the house can fully understand railway statistics.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even those in the railways themselves.

Mr. MANION: I will admit even that statement.

Mr. YOUNG: What about the suggestion of using a uniform system?

Mr. MANION: As a matter of fact my hon. friend's suggestion was carried out about ten or twenty years ago. They are given according to the Inter-state Commerce Commission yet it takes a statistician of a very eminent character to understand these statistics. I do not intend to waste the time of my hon. friend by trying to explain his statistics, nor shall I waste my own time in trying to explain mine.

Mr. YOUNG: I have a Canadian Pacific and a Canadian National report before me and I cannot find anything uniform in them.

Mr. MANION: I quite understand that but I cannot give understanding to my hon. friend. I have given three years to the study of the railway situation and I think I understand it in a general way. However, I am learning every day I continue to occupy this position. If my hon. friend spares only a moment or two from his study of tariffs in order to study railway matters, he must not expect to understand them fully in that short a time.

My hon. friend pointed out that the operating ratio of the Canadian Pacific was considerably lower than that of the Canadian National. That is largely explained by the fact that the Canadian National has something like 5,000 more miles of line and consequently a larger overhead and more extended services. In the case of lines such as the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, there are hauls which are not very remunerative. I think my hon. friend's contention can be explained without going into details.

My hon. friend stated that when we stopped work upon the Montreal terminals we insisted that the Canadian National build railway cars. I might say to him that the cars built were not ordered by this government. I think 1931 was the year quoted by my hon. friend. The management of the railways believed they needed these cars and while we were endeavouring to cut down the budget as much as possible we did not feel that we had the right to interfere with their requirements. They ordered the cars; we had nothing whatsoever to do with that. My hon. friend's conclusion in that connection is entirely wrong. I might mention that in that same year we purchased something like two million ties as an unemployment relief measure. These were made available to the Canadian National without any cost to the railways. That was one thing that was done to relieve unemployment, and it was not done at the cost of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that what the minister meant when he said that he asked the Canadian National Railways to advance their program?

Mr. MANION: We spoke to both railways; I discussed that point with Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty. I asked them to advance their program because we all felt that the depression would be over before this. They agreed to do so in order to fill in the bottom of the gully, so to speak, or the bottom of the depression. Both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific did advance their programs. Other than the interest upon the money, neither railway lost anything. They simply filled some of their necessities a little ahead of time. Both railways were treated in exactly the same way. My recollection is that the two companies spent well up to $20,000,000. This amount was spent six months or a year in advance of the time in which it would ordinarily have been spent, but it did not cost the railways anything to build these appliances, or to fill their requirements ahead of time. I do not wish to go into this matter in detail, but in both cases the government carried the interest charges, I think for a year and a half.

My hon. friend pointed out that according to the figures he was given the Canadian National Railways spent $300 more per mile than the Canadian Pacific on maintenance.

Mr. YOUNG: $345.

Mr. MANION: I was just taking the round figure, but the correct figure is even better for my argument. I hope that he or any other hon. gentleman in this committee will remember that the Canadian National Railways having spent $345 per mile more on maintenance than the Canadian Pacific, apparently have not been strangled as far as maintenance is concerned. They were able to keep their maintenance upon a better basis than the Canadian Pacific. I might say to my hon. friend that not one cent was spent in this way at the request of the government. I am glad my hon. friend has proved that the Canadian National did spend more than the Canadian Pacific upon maintenance, because it answers a lot of the charges which have been made throughout the country by my hon. friend's friend, Mr. Deachman. I think my hon. friend has answered his friend rather well.

I have no desire to go into the Deachman matter in any detail as I do not wish to waste the time of the committee. I do not wish to suggest to-night—I did it the other day, and perhaps correctly—that Mr. Deachman did it intentionally, but Mr. Deachman instituted comparisons of ton miles of freight carried by both railways to the disadvantage of Canadian National Railways, largely by reason of a fallacious index which he himself established. However, it is revenues, not ton miles that count. Let me illustrate what I mean, and I think even my hon. friend will understand this. The distance from Winnipeg to Fort William is 426 miles. If one railway carries a ton of wheat to Fort William it receives $2.80 in revenue. One ton would be carried 426 miles, which would make 426 ton miles. If the other railway carried a ton of first class freight over the same route it would receive $25.60 or 9·1 times as much revenue. Yet the ton miles would be exactly the same. That shows the futility of trying to work comparisons as to revenues from ton mileages, and that is what Mr. Deachman did. Let me give another illustration. Halifax is about 300 miles farther from Montreal than Saint John, and yet the export freight rate to both places is the same. One port is competing with the other. If the Canadian National carries a ton of wheat from Montreal to Halifax, it would be able to show 300 more ton miles than the Canadian Pacific could show in carrying a ton of wheat to Saint John, but the revenues would be the same.

Mr. EULER: The same would apply to Portland.

Mr. MANION: That would also illustrate the same point. It is futile for the ordinary member like my hon. friend or myself, or for a man like Mr. Deachman who is not even a member of this house, to take a few isolated statistics from the Canadian Pacific and try to demonstrate that the Canadian National Railways is being subjected to sabotage by this government. That is what Mr. Deachman did. That is all the point I wanted to make and it illustrates the futility of my hon. friend attempting to demonstrate one thing or the other by statistics.

In regard to the Montreal Terminals, I do not wish to go into that discussion again, but I am as fully convinced as that I am standing here to-night that those terminals were not required. I am not criticizing anybody; it was the idea of the management at that time that this was a very fine investment. They came forward with a $50,000,000 proposition, which it was admitted might run to $75,000,000. They convinced the government of the day—and I do not wish to discuss that point—that this was probably a good investment, and if business conditions had remained as they were at that time, it might have been. But nobody can convince me to-day that it would be wise to go on with those terminals at that vast expense. To expose the fallacy of the point raised a little while ago that the railway spent $10,000,000 on those terminals and this government stopped employment to the extent of $10,000,000, may I say that in the first two years about $8,000,000 of that $10,000,000 was spent in buying land, so that unemployment was not relieved by land purchases.

The hon. member referred to the question of the use by the railways of Canadian materials. He and I argued that out the other day; we take different attitudes with regard to it. He takes the free trade attitude that the government or the railways or the people must buy in the cheapest market no matter where it is. I believe we can go crazy on tariffs, and the world generally has been doing so—I am speaking generally. The tariffs of the world have to come down, but one country alone cannot lower its tariffs without doing harm to itself. The whole world must bring down tariffs.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are part of the world.

Mr. MANION: But our hon. friends are arguing for just our part alone. My hon. friend's leader and I listened to Sir Arthur Salter to-day and he takes the attitude that general world tariffs must come down. I believed that even before I heard Sir Arthur Salter say it, but the tariffs of one country alone cannot be lowered without harm being done to itself.

But getting away from tariffs, I am one of those who believe that as far as possible the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and all other institutions and individuals should buy Canadian goods if they can get anything like as good an article at anything like as fair a price. I do not say that we should buy goods for double the price. To-day I had before me two tenders for an order for my department, one for Canadian and the other for United States goods. The Canadian goods were unfortunately about one-third higher in price and I thought the difference was too great; I said I did not think there was any justification for that and we would have to take the United States goods. It is possible to go so far in buying Canadian goods that it is uneconomical, but I have never asked the Canadian National to go as far as that. I believe, however, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific should, so far as they can, buy Canadian goods as long as they can get a similar article at a reasonable price. Let me point this out: I am quite sure this was not known to the government of that day. In the building of the Montreal terminals and the hotels at Vancouver and Saskatoon the specifications put out by the architects some four or five years ago showed 40 per cent of United States goods. This was the report given to me by Sir Henry Thornton and it was a surprise to him as well as to me. Most of those goods could have been produced in Canada at the same price. Of course the order went forth then and it has obtained ever since, that so far as possible Canadian goods should be purchased so long as they did not have to pay excessive prices for them. That is a reasonable attitude and one I am willing to stand for before any audience at any time. I think I have dealt with all the points brought up by the hon. member.

Mr. YOUNG: In regard to the purchasing of Canadian coal I have under my hand figures from the bureau of statistics showing the amount of coal used per 1,000 gross ton miles and I find the Canadian Pacific, which is able to buy its coal in the open market to a greater extent than is the case with the Canadian National, gets better results from its coal. The figures are as follows:

	Tons
Canadian Pacific..	·0598
Canadian National..	·0607

About two per cent more coal is required to do a given amount of work on the Canadian National than is required on the Canadian Pacific in spite of the fact that I understand the former has better grades.

In regard to the statement of the minister that we cannot understand these figures, that is true; that was the reason I spoke. We are here to oversee the management of the Canadian National and it is important that we should understand the figures. That is why I am asking the minister to have his officers devise a system of reporting that will be so simple that even we with our limited understanding can follow it. I notice he has said that the government did not ask the Canadian National to spend the $10,000,000 additional on equipment or the $7,000,000 additional on maintenance of way. He did not explain why it was spent, and it is his duty as minister to inquire further into this matter of expenditure and report to the house.

Mr. MANION: I have been making inquiries of that sort for many years and that is not the only thing about which I am inquiring.

I am glad to see the leader of the opposition is in his seat. I was sorry to take him away from his pleasant dinner, but from the standpoint of his health I have no doubt done him a favour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been sitting here for an hour waiting for the hon. member to finish his speech.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry my right hon. friend has found it as tedious as that. If I had known he was in a hurry to get back to the dinner, I should have finished my remarks more quickly.

I was trying to deal with these amendments in order as we went along. The right hon. gentleman will remember that the hon. member for West Lambton made a proposal—the hon. member for Melville did not remember it—that we adopt into this bill section 23 of the Canadian National Railways Act providing that they must submit to the governor in council and the Board of Railway Commissioners the abandonment of any lines. The right hon. gentleman will remember that we made a proposal that was a compromise, I will admit, that no railway in Canada may be permitted to abandon lines without submitting the matter to the railway board and the right hon. gentleman accepted that. If the hon. member for West Lambton were here, I am sure he would withdraw his amendment. I think the right hon. gentleman will agree that was the understanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My impression was that we had withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. MANION: If that is the case, all right. That will clear that up.

The next is an amendment which the right hon. gentleman himself proposed. He suggested that in clause 2, on page one, line 15, the word "and" be struck out and the following paragraph be added, "the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act." That will recall the matter to the right hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Paragraph (d) is what I proposed.

Mr. MANION: Yes, my right hon. friend suggested that we add paragraph (d) to except the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I took the attitude that that was not interfered with by this measure; the provisions of this bill do not prevail over the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act for the reason that they do not conflict at all. In order to satisfy my right hon. friend in regard to that, I took the opinion of the Justice department and perhaps the reply would state the position in better words than I could use. I will read the letter from the Department of Justice which is signed by W. Stuart Edwards, Deputy Minister of Justice and dated April 22, 1933:

Dear Mr. Manion,—

I understand from Mr. P. M. Anderson of your department that you desire to be advised upon the question whether there is anything in Bill A, "an Act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway System, and for other purposes," which will override the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, revised statutes of 1927, chapter 112.

I have carefully examined the provisions of the bill, and am of opinion that none of its provisions will have the effect mentioned. I do not overlook the broad provisions of section 16 whereby the railway companies are authorized to agree upon such cooperative measures, plans and arrangements as are fair and reasonable and best adapted to attain the purposes of effecting economies and providing for more remunerative operation. I am clearly of opinion that these broad general powers do not authorize the doing of anything inconsistent with the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and I am satisfied also that none of the more specific provisions of the bill can be interpreted as having such effect.

In view of that opinion I trust that my right hon. friend will not press his amendment. If at all possible we do not wish to clutter up the bill with unnecessary amendments or unnecessary exceptions. It has been argued two or three times here to-day, in regard to one or two exceptions, that because a certain exception was mentioned it made something else applicable. The more exceptions we make the more danger there is of misunderstandings in the interpretation of the bill. I appeal therefore to the right hon. gentleman not to press his amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no formal motion made. The proposal I made at the time was partly to bring to a termination a long discussion that we had been having, and I suggested means that I thought would probably meet the situation from both sides. I think that if section 2 were differently worded from what it is there probably would not be the same need for the suggested amendment. The section starts out with the words:

The provisions of this act shall bind His Majesty and shall prevail over all inconsistent provisions of all other acts.

That is a very involved sentence, and this suggestion of provisions inconsistent with the provisions of other acts raises at once the question of provisions of acts which have been passed especially with a view to protecting railway labour, and the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act had that as well as the public interest as a primary purpose of its existence. It was for that reason that I made the suggestion. It would not clutter up the act; it would not increase its length beyond the extent of a single line to add a paragraph (d) reading, "the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act." It might not make any actual difference in the effect of the act, but it would, I believe, make a great difference in the attitude of labour towards the act, and I think that is well worth while in dealing with a question that involves the attitude of employees towards a particular measure. I would hope that the minister would see the advantage from a public point of view of inserting just that one clause in that way for that reason.

As I see it, the railway employees to-day are suspicious of this act. They fear that it is going to throw many of them out of employment, and that a lot of them will suffer serious loss, and what they fear most is the arbitrary methods that may be invoked in administering some of the provisions of the act. They look upon the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act as a protection against summary and arbitrary action. I believe that the opinion which the minister was given by the Justice department is correct. I believe that the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act are not overridden by this act, and I would personally be prepared to accept the minister's word for it, but I still think that on grounds of public policy there is a very strong reason for including that one subsection. I believe that it will make railway labour much more prepared to accept this act in the spirit in which the government would like to have it accepted. It will help to remove some suspicion of the act, and to the extent that it does that, it will lend an added sense of security to those in the employ of the roads and serve a highly useful purpose in so doing.

Mr. GEARY: I wonder if the right hon. gentleman will not think that he has achieved his purpose by the discussion thus far, and by having had read into the record the opinion of the legal department, with which he agrees. I see a great deal of danger in putting anything that is unnecessary into legislation. It is quite possible that the insertion of the clause my right hon. friend suggests would hold out to the men hopes that may not be realized. I cannot recall from memory any provision of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act that would apply to the situation raised by section 16 to which my right hon. friend adverted. True it is that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act provides for a conciliation board as between an employer and one man only, but a reading of the interpretation clauses of that act I think will convince my right hon. friend that such things as are occurring now and will occur under this bill have no place under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. For instance, reference has already been made to the displacement of labour in connection with the pooled services between here and Toronto, and between here and Montreal. That was not done under this act, but it has had the effect, so it was claimed in the house this afternoon, of releasing some men from work or of destroying the work which might otherwise have been obtained by some men. But I do not think that it has ever occurred to the labour bodies that this was a matter for settlement under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. If you were to insert such a clause as has been suggested it might be holding out to the men a false hope that perhaps the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was being interpreted in a manner that would allow matters affected by the tribunal, for instance, to come within its ambit when actually they did not come within it at all.

My strong objection really is to putting into legislation anything that is unnecessary, to cluttering up legislation. We have had too much experience of the difficulties of construing a statute. It should be construed within its four corners, and if within its four corners you find an exception which, according to my right hon. friend and the minister, will if put in there serve no useful purpose at all, then possibly the railway men will forget this discussion or refer to the insertion of the exception as indicating that in some way or other the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was being widened so as to embrace something which it does not embrace at all. If there was any good object to be served, if there was any doubt in the minds of the legal advisers, if they could suggest that this might cure a difficulty that could reasonably be foreseen, I would have no objection; but as a lawyer, as one who has had to do with statutes in the courts, I do object very seriously to any statute having in it anything that by common consent has no effect whatever in the statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The argument of my hon. friend seems to me to constitute the real reason why the clause should be inserted. He says that the insertion of it might hold out a false hope. I submit that the unwillingness of the government to insert anything so obviously fair creates a suspicion which may or may not be false. I think an object in all legislation should be to make absolutely clear and above suspicion its purpose and intention. I do not think that we can get away from the fact that this act in one or two particulars is going to bear very hard upon some of the labour employed. None of us likes to see these drastic economies. I think the minister himself is quite sincere when he says that it is a painful business to put through a measure which is going to mean, because it is necessary to make economies, that a number of men are going to be thrown out of employment. If that is the case let us, as I said the other evening, seek to make the condition created by the measure as little grievous as we can possibly make it. If by inserting some clause which gives to the great body of railway employees the feeling that at least if this nightmare of unemployment is coming upon them it will not come upon them in an arbitrary and unjust way, if that be the effect of the insertion of the clause, it seems to me the government ought to jump at it and insert such a clause immediately.

Speaking of the cluttering up of statutes, this bill is full of cluttering clauses. I could show the minister a dozen, and I would be agreeable to striking out ten or twelve lines which I am prepared to cite for the substitution of this one, if the minister should deem that necessary in order to insert a clause such as I suggest. This statute is full of unnecessary verbiage, as most statutes are. Just why one paragraph, "(d) the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act," referring to an act passed over twenty-five years ago and which has come to be recognized by labour as something that is a protection to its members as well as to the public, should not be inserted. I cannot for the life of me understand. The fact that the government is at all hesitant about it, and that any of its supporters should uphold them in their desire to keep the provision out, creates in my mind just the very feeling that after all there may be something here which hon. members are a little afraid labour will take advantage of to protect itself. I believe in this legislation we ought to try to protect labour as much as we can.

Mr. MANION: During this debate the right hon. gentleman has been exceedingly courteous, and because we have objected to the clause proposed by the hon. member for West Lambton I do not think he should suggest it must necessarily involve some insidious attack upon labour. Generally speaking the right hon. gentleman has been reasonably fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have presented the point of view as I think labour will see it.

Mr. MANION: I do not think the right hon. gentleman is quite fair, as I believe he will admit that he has not the interests of labour at heart any more than the rest of us have. He has said that if anything could be put into the legislation which would convince labour that it was being fairly treated, it should be put in. I admit that. But at the same time is it fair to put into the act something which has no effect upon labour, but gives them a false sense of security?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why a false sense?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MANION: That is the point raised by the hon. member for Toronto South. I do not think it is fair to give labour a sense of security which does not exist. The Department of Justice is not prejudiced in this matter, and its attitude is that the provisions of this legislation do not in any way affect the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The other evening when we were discussing this matter I made that statement, and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre nodded his assent to it. The lawyer attached to my department, who was appointed by the late government, takes exactly the same attitude as is taken by the Department of Justice. The hon. member for Toronto South is of the same opinion. I have no intention of being arbitrary in the matter. But there is still another attitude which both railway companies have submitted to me. I was not going to argue the matter, but probably in the circumstances I should speak fully. I was anxious not to clutter up the bill. I agree with the leader of the opposition that there are a number of clauses which the bill could do without. That statement would apply to most of the subclauses of clause 2, and if they were left out the bill would be better for it. But after lengthy discussions with various interests, including labour, those sections were placed in the bill. Very often legislation is not interpreted by courts, but by laymen. For instance, while the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners was a well known judge, there are men on the board who have not had legal training. The possibility pointed out is that if you include unnecessary clauses in bills those clauses are brought to the attention of the laymen on the board, and because something has been put in which should have had no effect upon the legislation, there is the possibility of misinterpretation. I am laying the facts before the right hon. gentleman and am still willing to listen to argument. I should like however to leave the bill as clear cut as possible although I admit even now it is not as clear cut as it might be.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand the hon. member for Toronto South and the minister are desirous of having a clear understanding as to the necessity for the insertion of this clause. Let me point out, as the leader of the opposition has done, that the provisions of this section shall bind His Majesty and shall prevail over all inconsistent provisions of all other acts. Then, if we turn to section 16 we will find that the railroad companies in conjunction with the heads of the organizations will divide their work proportionately. I have no doubt that the minister can imagine the many disagreements there will be throughout Canada in connection with the merging of these men. Someone will have to be called in to arrange settlements. And then in view of the fact that this bill provides that the railroad companies together with the heads of the organizations will endeavour to do so and so, we read into it that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act would be inconsistent with the provisions of this legislation. In other words the suggestion is that this act would prevail over the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. GEARY: There is nothing of the kind in it.

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. HEENAN: Hon. members opposite may be right, but the men who have spent their lives in railway work and meet these conditions every day believe that the bill does prevail over the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. There is a direction in the bill to do thus and so. There is no doubt that there will be disagreement hundreds of times. There will not be an adjustment in the next ten years of all the disputes which will arise. The men want to be assured that they can use the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act as in connection with any other dispute. Apart from that I wish to point out to the minister this: Last Thursday there was a long discussion which, I believe, might have been much shorter. One of the conditions upon which I withdrew my amendment was that the government would accept the amendment of the hon. member for East Algoma. At that time the government promised the leader of the opposition that they would consider the provision for which we are now asking, namely the insertion of the safeguard of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I do not wish to repeat—and I do wish the minister would pay attention to me, so that we may understand each other; if he would listen I would not have to repeat myself. The men contend that under section 16, which authorizes the railway companies together with the men to agree on the merging of the men into several seniority districts, they should be able to resort to the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I am sure that notwithstanding what our lawyer friends say, any court would interpret this measure to mean that its provisions would prevail over the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

I should like to point out to the minister a few examples which I am sure, would not draw much on his imagination. Let us suppose that the Canadian National shops in Montreal were closed. In order to balance that we give the representatives of the railroad organizations the right to merge the men into shops in some other parts say of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In the first place these men have no rights now to work at other points under the seniority rules. That will have to be a new right created through negotiations between the companies and the men. I could give as another example the Canadian National, the old Grank Trunk and the Canadian Pacific being concerned in a merger of services. Under present conditions the Canadian National men have no rights whatever on the Grand Trunk proper, and vice versa; and the men on neither of these roads have any rights to employment on the Canadian Pacific. Yet it will be necessary in the case of all such mergers for them to get together with their employers as to these seniority rights. I am satisfied that all the disputes that will arise between the men and the companies will not be adjusted in the next ten years.

Mr. GEARY: Would the hon. member permit a question?—because I want to get at his argument. Is such a case covered by the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act? Is that his point?

Mr. HEENAN: No, that is not my point. My point is that this bill we are now discussing provides that these mergers will take place, and while it does not say so, the railroad companies together with their organizations will endeavour to arrive at an apportionment of the work. If they do not agree then the men will want to resort to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act to settle it. If the government do not insert this provision. I think they ought to be willing to appoint a board of adjustment and pay them full time to settle all these disputes until they are all finally cleared away.

Mr. GEARY: But the opinion of the law officers is that that is all covered, that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is not interfered with, and that all the remedies given under that act remain in effect. That is my point—that there is nothing in this measure to disturb the application of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I would be among the last to say that the men's rights under the existing act should be destroyed. But the opinion of the law officers of the crown is that that act remains undisturbed.

Mr. HEENAN: I agree that my hon. friend thinks so, and that the Justice department think so and that the government think so, but the men do not think so. What harm, then, would it do to insert a safeguard making it perfectly clear? We argued here all day Thursday on this very point, and it was because the government agreed to consider this, practically agreed to insert such a provision, that I relinquished the floor and withdrew my amendment. I withdrew it in good faith, feeling sure that the minister, after what he said last Thursday, would take care of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition. It cannot do any harm; the men want it; the minister says it is covered anyway, the Justice department say it is covered. What then is the objection to inserting these few words safeguarding the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman certainly misinterpreted me if he thinks I said I was going to adopt this. The right hon. gentleman did suggest it and I said we would give it every consideration. I have given my answer in regard to it; the Justice department say it is not necessary. However, I do not know any particular reason why we should fight all night, we have been all day on this section, and as far as I am concerned I am a bit tired of arguing it. I am absolutely convinced, on the opinion of every lawyer whom I have consulted on both sides of the house, as well as of the Justice department, that the suggested amendment is not necessary. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour, looking it over a minute ago, endorsed the opinion that the men are amply protected without any amendment, as far as the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is concerned; that the provisions of this bill do not interfere with the provisions of that act; that it is not the case, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said, that this act prevails over the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. There is no provision in this act that interferes with any provision of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. However, I do not wish to take any arbitrary stand and if the leader of the opposition feels as he says he does, I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of Labour to move this amendment to this bill.

[Mr. Geary.]

Mr. GORDON: I have reviewed the provisions of the bill in the light of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and I do not think it was the intention of anyone on either side of the house to defeat the right of the workmen on the railways to have resort to the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. There is, as has been pointed out by one of the members for Toronto, a danger in the drafting of any statute that the inclusion of something in that statute may by inference imperil the rights of those who seek remedies that the statute without such inclusion already gives them. That is the only danger. But I cannot see that that danger seriously arises here. Of course one may be wrong, but from my experience in the interpretation of statutes I think the inclusion of such a provision as this does not add anything to it, nor is it likely to subtract anything from it, although I would not be so sure that by inference it might not. It would be too bad if the position of the railway workers were in any way imperilled. I do not think it is. It seems to be the opinion of some, particularly of the right hon. leader of the opposition, that the proposed change would add some clearness to the bill, so I would defer to his view. It does not change at all what I believe to be the proper legal construction and interpretation of the act itself. We all know that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has provided the machinery for the disposition of what otherwise might be contests between employers and employees that would be most difficult to adjust. Certainly it never was in the mind of the government, and I doubt if it was in the mind of any member of this chamber, that any right of the workmen should be imperilled one iota by the passage of this legislation, as far as the right to resort to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is concerned.

Therefore I move:

That section 2, subsection 1, line 15, be amended by striking out the word "and" and adding the following after paragraph (c):

(d) the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to thank the minister for having accepted in the spirit he has the suggestion that I made, and may I repeat to him what I said as to the genuineness of his belief as to the opinion of the Justice department being a strictly legal one and as such meeting the point from a legal point of view. But I do think nevertheless that the minister has acted wisely in inserting this provision, especially because of the involved nature of the first clause of section 2. If that clause were differently worded there would not be the same reason for this amendment; but with the clause worded as it is, talking about inconsistent provisions of other statutes, it is very desirable that this clarity should be given the section, and I am sure the results will more than repay the minister for what he has done.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: I have before me an amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Lambton. The hon. gentleman is not present.

Mr. MANION: I understood it was to be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: It cannot be withdrawn in the absence of the hon. member who proposes it.

Mr. MANION: If it is not withdrawn I will ask for a vote. I have played the game and I think it is about time we made progress.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was going to suggest a method of getting around this difficulty. Let the amendment stand until the hon. member comes back—

Mr. MANION: I will not agree to that. I have agreed to most everything on earth for the sake of peace and quiet in the family. We have made compromises and agreed with hon. gentlemen opposite on everything possible. We put in that provision with regard to the Board of Railway Commissioners to satisfy them and now they want us to hold up the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the chairman who is pointing out that the hon. member for West Lambton is absent and that the amendment cannot be withdrawn under the circumstances. I agree with the Minister of Railways. We had an understanding and I asked that this particular amendment should not be brought forward in view of the proposal which the minister himself made. The minister introduced a section which I said I was sure would satisfy the hon. member for West Lambton, and I am still of that view. If it cannot be withdrawn—

The CHAIRMAN: Under the rules it cannot be withdrawn in the absence of the hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, in the circumstances we might all vote against the amendment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps the leader of the opposition would take the responsibility of withdrawing the amendment on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The chairman says it cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. MANION: May I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to read the rule that prevents our having a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: There is nothing to prevent the committee voting on the amendment, but the amendment cannot be withdrawn ir the absence of the hon. member who proposed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely anything can be done by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN: No; there is a special rule in this regard.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the chairman be good enough to put the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Neither a motion nor an amendment can be withdrawn in the absence of the member who moved it.

Mr. REID: Put the amendment and we will vote it down.

Amendment negatived.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4, subsection (2)—Chairman. To devote all his time.

Mr. MANION: In connection with this provision there was a proposal by the hon. member for West Middlesex. The hon. gentleman brought up the question of full time on the part of the three trustees as opposed to the chairman devoting full time and the other two members being part time. In this connection the Prime Minister and the members of the government are of the opinion that perhaps it would be wise for the government to have power to provide for three full time men for one, two or three years as might be deemed desirable, in order that they might become thoroughly familiar with the whole railway situation. The problems are quite complicated and difficult, and no one knows better than I do how long it takes one to become thoroughly familiar with them. Indeed, I am not yet entirely conversant with the whole situation although I have devoted three years of concentrated study to it. The hon. the member for West Middlesex in his amendment proposed that each trustee should devote his whole time. He suggested: "One of such trustees shall be their chairman. Each shall devote his whole time," the word "each" being substituted for "he." That would make all three full time men. The amendment which I shall propose will read:

(3) The trustees, other than the chairman, first appointed under the provisions of this act shall from time to time during the terms of their appointments devote to performance of the duties of their office their whole or part time as may be determined from time to time by the governor in council, and the salaries to be paid to such trustees for whole and/or part time service shall be fixed at the time of their appointments.

This may sound complicated, but if we appointed three men on full time and with full salary it would require an act of parliament to make any change in their status. In this regard I would direct the attention of the committee to section 7, which provides:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

In view of that provision, which we do not agree to withdraw, we could not appoint a trustee on full time for any period and later place him on part time at a reduced salary or remove him from office without assigning a cause and securing an address of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada. We therefore deem it best to leave the bill in such a form as to enable the government to deal with the matter as it sees fit.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the minister shortening the term of appointment?

The CHAIRMAN: Is that under section 4?

Mr. MANION: Yes, subsection 2.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister, I understand, intends to leave subsection 2 as it is.

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is to say, one of the trustees shall be chairman and he shall devote his whole time. That settles the matter so far as he is concerned.

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then following subsection 2 there will be the new subsection which the minister proposes. It provides for the trustees other than the chairman and requires them to devote their full time—that is, the first set appointed.

Mr. MANION: No, my hon. friend is wrong; if the government so decides, and that is the thought of the government at the present time. The government at the moment feels that it would be better to put them in for full time; so that in all probability, if the section is amended as proposed, that will be done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They shall, during the terms of their first appointment, devote to the performance of their duties their whole or part time as determined from time to time by the governor in council.

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is surely a step in the right direction. I really think that these three trustees, conducting a business as large as this, should devote their full time to it, and I am glad the minister has seen fit to go that far.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment will be subsection 3.

Mr. MANION: I was just reading that. Before we submit that, I would like to change the wording of subclause 2 in order to make it a little clearer. It has been thought that this subclause is not clear enough. I shall read the amendment first and then have my colleague move it. It reads:

One of such trustees shall be their chairman. He shall devote his whole time to performance of the duties of his office and shall not be an officer nor after his appointment as trustee become otherwise than by reelection a director of any company other than a company which is comprised in National railways.

I think that makes the meaning a little clearer without changing the sense.

Mr. SPENCER: Do I understand the minister to say that all the trustees will give their full time for the first three years, after which the two trustees other than the chairman will be put on part time?

Mr. MANION: I cannot see that far ahead. If these amendments are accepted by the committee, as I hope they will be, the government will have the power to appoint the three trustees on full time for as long a period as they choose, up to the length of the period of appointment. The intention is to appoint the three trustees for full time for one, two or three years, or until they become thoroughly familiar with the work. After that time, it is possible that the trustees other than the chairman will be put on part time, but that is something that would be decided in the future according to circumstances.

Mr. SPENCER: It strikes me that if these trustees are kept on such important business as the railway business for two or three years it would be very difficult for them to find ways and means of giving up their work. They will be needed to carry on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I trust the minister understands that this amendment does not remove our objection to section 7 as it now stands.

Mr. MANION: We are not dealing with section 7.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not see that this amendment makes very much change in the bill as it stands. This amendment will give to the governor in council the power to say whether the two trustees other than the chairman are to work full or part time for a period of two or three years. The question whether they are going to work full or part time is not so important; it is to section 7 which deals with the selection from a panel that I object most strenuously.

Mr. MANION: That is section 6.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There will remain what I and a good many other members of this committee consider to be the most objectionable features of this bill. This amendment is a mere bagatelle if the rest of the objectionable features are not to be removed. Full control should be taken by the governor in council. That is the serious feature of the whole bill.

Mr. MANION: We will be there in a minute.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not look upon this amendment as effecting anything—

Mr. GEARY: It is a small piece of mercy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is a very small piece of mercy if the balance of this section and section 7 are to stand.

Mr. GORDON: I move that subclause 2 of section 4 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

One of such trustees shall be their chairman. He shall devote his whole time to performance of the duties of his office and shall not be an officer nor after his appointment as trustee become otherwise than by reelection a director of any company other than a company which is comprised in national railways.

Mr. MANION: I understand that the hon. member for West Middlesex is withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Amendment (Mr. Elliott) withdrawn.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do I understand the amendment to mean that the chairman may not hold the office of director of any company other than one connected with the Canadian National Railways except by reelection? In other words, he can hold directorships in concerns other than the Canadian National Railways if he holds such office at the time of his appointment and is reelected.

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not like that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In another company?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but not another railway company.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Other business concerns?

Mr. MANION: Just the same as Mr. Beatty is the director of a number of other companies, such as the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He should not be.

Mr. MANION: Suppose it is decided to take a man from the business world to take charge of these railways from a business standpoint. If he has been the president of companies which he has helped to build up over a period of years, it would be very difficult to get him to drop all contact with those companies. Acting as a director of a company does not take very much time. As long as he was only connected with companies which did not conflict with the railway company, it would be to the advantage of the railway company. The hon. member for West Edmonton is a director of a number of companies and he knows it does not take much time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): One only.

Mr. MANION: It does not take much time to attend a meeting once a month. Mr.

Beatty, the president of the Canadian Pacific railway, is a director in a number of companies. Sir Henry Thornton was a director in a number of companies, including the Royal Bank. If the chairman of this board is not permitted to be a director in any other company, possibly one with which he has been closely associated for a number of years and has helped to build up, I submit it will be very difficult to get a man of the type we may desire to take the position. I think that statement is unanswerable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not introducing and recognizing the factor of interlocking directorates, which factor is likely to become one of the biggest questions to be faced by governments in dealing with the financial and industrial world? I do not think we ought to countenance, let alone invite, that sort of thing by legislation. There is no doubt in the world that much of the evil which exists to-day in the industrial and financial world has grown up largely because of interlocking directorates. If the chairman of this board is to be permitted to be on the directorates of banks and financial and business corporations, it simply means that the Canadian National Railways will be supplying patronage to all these different concerns.

Mr. MANION: Or those concerns will be supplying patronage to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The orders for what is needed by the Canadian National Railways will be placed with the different concerns which the gentleman happens to be representing. If the chairman of this board is to be the important personage indicated here, he should be absolutely divorced from relationship with other businesses so that he can be perfectly impartial when dealing with national railway affairs as they relate to other financial, commercial and industrial concerns in the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I agree entirely with the analysis made by the leader of the opposition of the point to which I just directed the attention of the Minister of Railways. I understand that this point was raised in previous discussions of this particular clause. It is possible that this czar, as he has been called, may be a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway. As I understand it, this man is to be the directing head of a publicly owned railway system and presumably he will be in sympathy with the conception of the principle of public ownership. I submit that no man who is so shackled to the present competitive system as to be a powerful director of other big corporations can sever his conception of a social order from those entanglements in which he is privately interested. I would suggest that any person who is selected for this important position should at least be required to sever his directorships in other great corporations; this is the least we can ask of him. We all know that in the past we have had great difficulty in finding men of talent and capability who were not born in and ingrained with, yes, the evils, if you like, of the present system. The greatest problem this administration has is to find just such men, men who are not only pledged to the principle of public ownership, but prepared, if necessary, to make some sacrifices in order to render effective their administration of this enormous enterprise. I do not think the minister is well advised in providing as he has done in this clause.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman said that we could appoint even a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no doubt that within the four corners of that clause we could, but I can easily imagine what would happen to this or any other government if it chose to appoint a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway as president of the Canadian National, so I think that answers itself. A government would have to be entirely out of its head to do any such thing, so I think any government can be trusted not to appoint a director of the Canadian Pacific as president of the Canadian National.

Mr. REID: Is it not the case that one of the other trustees could in due course of time become president? This is provided for in case of death.

Mr. MANION: It is just as unlikely as anything could be for this or any other government to appoint directors of the Canadian Pacific as trustees. I do not think we need argue that feature of the matter. For a government to appoint a director of the Canadian Pacific as trustee of the Canadian National would be too obvious an attempt to bring about amalgamation and absorption, so that no government would dare to do it. The thing is so remote from possibility we do not need to argue the question.

Mr. REID: Then leave the old clause in so as to make sure.

Mr. MANION: We have not changed the sense of the old clause; the wording is different.

In regard to directors in general, I cannot agree with the hon. member for Bow River that because a man is a director of some company, for instance, a flour milling, packing, mining or oil company, any one of which would be in a position to give business to the Canadian National Railways, it would be injurious to the national railway to have such a man. I have no doubt in the world that if we had inserted a provision that he must not be a director of any other company, we would immediately have been attacked —and I am not saying that we would be by my hon. friend—on the ground that Mr. Beatty is a director of a number of companies and we would be putting this man at a disadvantage.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister would not be criticized by me.

Mr. MANION: I am not saying that, but we would be criticized. The fact that a man is a director of a company does not condemn him unless he is a director of an opposing company.

Mr. POWER: Could he not be got to resign if he were?

Mr. MANION: Yes, that might be done, as the present Prime Minister did when he came into the government; he resigned from all his directorships. It may be that we shall find in the dominion some man who is willing to do as the Prime Minister did. But we might pick out a man—I have one in mind at the moment; I do not wish to name him because I do not think anyone knows we have him in mind, an outstanding, successful man, who is not only a director, but president of a number of companies which he has built up—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is not Sir Charles Gordon?

Mr. MANION: No. This man has built up a number of companies upon which he is to-day one of the officers. Supposing that man said: Here is a company—we will imagine it is a flour milling company—that I have been associated with for twenty years; I have helped to build it up; I wish to keep an eye on it, to have some right to look into its affairs, and I would not consider taking a position like this without that privilege. If the government were up against a situation of this kind, it might be eminently fair and just for such a man to be chosen. If we can get a man who is not a director of any other company or who will resign from such positions, so much the better, but the hands of the government should not be tied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where in the clause as now drafted does it permit what my hon. friend says it does? As I read the clause, it distinctly prevents the chairman from being a member of the board of directors of any other company than those comprised by the Canadian National.

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me read the clause:

> One of such trustees shall be their chairman. He shall devote his whole time to performance of the duties of his office and shall not be an officer of any company other than a company which is comprised in National railways.

Mr. MANION: But a director is not an officer. The clause refers to an officer of any other company.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I see.

Mr. MANION: A president is an officer of a company. A man could not remain president of some company because that is an office. Supposing we chose the president of some flour milling company—and by the way, I am not thinking of anybody, so do not connect anyone with that—and we wanted to appoint him. He might say: I would like to do this public service and I think I could do it well, but for twenty years I have been president of this company; I have helped to build it up; I do not wish to give it up entirely; as director of that company I can give a certain amount of traffic to the Canadian National. Surely it is of advantage to the Canadian National to have a man who would have connections of that kind. It is argued, and I think rightly, that out of the seventeen directors of the Canadian Pacific, many are put on as directors because of their business connections. For instance, take Mr. McLaughlin of General Motors, Oshawa, who is one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific: it is stated quite openly and I think correctly—and this is to his credit—that he gives business to the Canadian Pacific. There is Mr. James Stewart, who used to be in the flour milling business and who was formerly a director of the Canadian Pacific. I have no doubt many men were made directors of the Canadian Pacific because they could give business to it. Surely we should not absolutely tie our hands to prevent us from appointing a suitable man if he happened to be a director of some company which might give business to the Canadian National.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we were appointing a number of directors who as such were each receiving a nominal fee, there might be something in what my hon. friend is saying. But the point is that this gentleman, I assume, will receive a very high salary, one comparable at least with that given to the governor general of this country. If the gentleman to be appointed as chief trustee of the national railway is to be placed in that position, he ought to be obliged to divest himself of his relationship with other concerns. The minister has referred to the position of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister apparently felt for public reasons he should not in the discharge of his public office as prime minister retain his position on boards of directors of different concerns. Exactly the same argument would apply to the position of the gentleman who is to be chairman of the trustees of the Canadian National, and even more so because he will have it in his power immediately to direct business to individual concerns in a way that the Prime Minister himself in all probability would not have. It is a very wrong principle to encourage, and certainly to encourage by legislation; because I venture to say that before very long this parliament will legislate to prevent the interlocking of directorates which exists in a great many concerns at the present time.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to prolong the argument, but there are one or two points worthy of remembrance. To mention Mr. Beatty again, surely it does not interfere with his capacity as president of the Canadian Pacific Railway that he is also a director of the Bank of Montreal and a director I believe of a number of companies. Surely it did not interfere with Sir Henry Thornton, who was president and on a salary not equal to the governor-general's, but three times as much if you include his expense account—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It has been alleged that it did interfere.

Mr. MANION: I have never heard that alleged. Sir Henry Thornton was a director of the Royal Bank for many years, and I did not know that that interfered at all—I never heard it alleged. Other men are in the same position. I submit that a man might be a director of three or four companies in addition to being president of this road, and those three or four directorates might well not take five per cent of his time, leaving him free to devote the other ninety-five per cent of his time to the road, which would be doing pretty well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Sir Henry Thornton is not here to speak for himself. I was told by Sir Henry Thornton that word had been sent to him that he was to resign his position with the Royal bank at the instance of this government.

Mr. MANION: I can tell the right hon. gentleman that no such word was ever sent to Sir Henry Thornton by this government or by any member of this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend speaks as if he knew what the Prime Minister may have said as well as himself, but I say that Sir Henry Thornton said to me personally that word had been sent that he was to resign from the board of directors of the Royal bank because he was president of the Canadian National Railways, and that the two positions were not compatible. He thought it was an extraordinary action on the part of the government to take. Word was sent to him from the Royal bank to resign, and he did resign. I make that statement with full knowledge of what I am saying. If it were thought necessary by the government of the day through the Royal Bank of Canada to tell Sir Henry Thornton as president that he was to resign from that directorate, the same argument applies to anyone who is to be appointed as trustee and chairman of the Canadian National Railways with respect to his continuing to hold other directorships.

Mr. MANION: I think I know the orders that were given to Sir Henry Thornton when president of the Canadian National Railways. I gave most of them myself so far as this government is concerned. I do not think the Prime Minister gave him any such order because if he had I think he would have advised me of it, and he never advised me. I do not believe he gave any such order. I did not, and no one else had any right to give any such order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister say that the Royal bank did not ask Sir Henry Thornton to resign his directorship at the instance of the government of Canada?

Mr. MANION: So far as I know I absolutely deny it. The Royal bank may have asked him to resign; I know nothing about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that Sir Henry Thornton so advised me, and I believe he was telling the truth when he told it to me.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to question the word of a dead man. I am speaking for a live man, and I make the statement that he did not get that order; he was not told to retire from the Royal bank because of any order of this government, and so far as I know—I cannot speak positively for what the Prime Minister may have done, but I am convinced that the Prime Minister gave no such order, irrespective of what the right hon. gentleman heard from Sir Henry Thornton. I might quote Sir Henry Thornton too on a number of different things that perhaps would not be creditable to a number of members of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish my hon. friend would not make general threats. I ask him to quote Sir Henry Thornton on anything.

Mr. MANION: Sir Henry Thornton told me, not once but many times, that he was forced by the right hon. gentleman to spend the money of this country on all kinds of expenditures for this railway that he personally did not feel it was wise for the Canadian National Railways to expend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my word is as good as my hon. friend's, and I venture to say that Sir Henry Thornton never said such a thing to him in his life, never used the expression about being forced to do anything by the government, and I say more, that all the time he was president of the Canadian National Railways I never asked Sir Henry Thornton to do anything that involved public expenditure. I make that statement on my honour as a member of this house.

Mr. MANION: I am not accusing the right hon. gentleman of having done it. I did not quote Sir Henry Thornton until he dared me to. I quoted what Sir Henry Thornton stated to me. I never stated that I charged the right hon. gentleman with anything, but he dared me to quote Sir Henry Thornton on anything, and I quoted him, and I say again not once but a number of times Sir Henry Thornton told me that he was practically forced to build branch lines and do other things for political purposes which he did not wish to do, and which were not good for the Canadian National Railways. I took that attitude, and I repeat it, and my word is as good as that of the right hon. gentleman. I was not questioning that Sir Henry Thornton made the statement he is alleged to have made to the right hon. gentleman. I was saying that this government did not give Sir Henry Thornton that order, and I think I would know if it had. I cannot answer positively for the Prime Minister, but I do not believe that the Prime Minister ever gave any such order to Sir Henry Thornton. I do not believe that the Royal bank was ever instructed by this government or by any member of it to ask Sir Henry Thornton to resign his directorship of the Royal bank.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Hansard will show that my hon. friend's original remarks were that Sir Henry Thornton had been forced by me. He now says that he was "practically" forced; he introduces the word practically, and he then goes on to say, "by the government" to build branch lines and matters of that kind—a very different statement from the one he made first.

Mr. MANION: I stand by the one I made first.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then my hon. friend contradicts himself. I repeat, on my honour as a member of this house, that Sir Henry Thornton is on record himself to the effect that he was never interfered with politically by the administration of which I was the head. He made the statement publicly that the Canadian National Railways had not been interfered with by the administration, and he attributed the success he had had with the railway until my hon. friends came into office to that fact, but political interference began the minute hon. gentlemen opposite took office.

Mr. MANION: Political interference never began and never was begun by this government with the Canadian National Railways. It began under the right hon. gentleman, and I am ready to debate it in this house any time, and to prove it—to prove it, I repeat, and I have got the proof right here in this portfolio. I have tried to avoid political discussions. The right hon. gentleman says, "I am speaking on my honour as a member of this house." His honour is no greater than mine. I am speaking on my honour also. I did not question the right hon. gentleman's statement as to what Sir Henry Thornton had said to him, nor do I question that Sir Henry Thornton made it. I had no desire to get into a political discussion of any kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I do not know why the hon. member for Vancouver Centre laughs. I have discussed this bill for three weeks, and I have not brought in politics until tonight. I have discussed it on as high a plane as any man could although I have been egged on a number of times by hon. gentlemen to bring in political issues because they have brought them in themselves, not many of them, but one or two. I do not wish to get into political discussions about the matter at all. I simply took the attitude that we did not instruct Sir Henry Thornton, and anyway what has that got to do with the question before us? Sir Henry Thornton was a director of the Royal bank for years under the regime of the right hon. gentleman, and if it was wrong to have a director of the Royal bank or of any other company as president of the Canadian National Railway, why did not the right hon. gentleman stop Sir Henry Thornton from being a director? I am advised that he was a director of other companies. I do not know that I could name them, and I am not saying that to his discredit at all; but if it is wrong now for a trustee to be a director of other companies, it was wrong for Sir Henry Thornton to be a director of the Royal bank under the regime of the right hon. gentleman. I do not know where the consistency comes in.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wonder if the minister, now that we are talking on the subject of Sir Henry Thornton, would be good enough to tell the house whether he asked Sir Henry Thornton to resign from his position as president of the Canadian National Railways or was he just merely frozen out?

Mr. MANION: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that it will be for the good of Sir Henry Thornton's memory to discuss him any further than we have already discussed him in this house. It might be wise for both sides of the house to leave him out of the picture. The only reference I made to him, and I did this incidentally only by way of illustration, was to say that he had been a director of the Royal bank. Unfortunately a few heated words led to a few more, but I think it would be well to leave Sir Henry Thornton out of the picture altogether. I am quite agreeable to doing so, but on the other hand, if it is forced upon me, I am quite ready to discuss the matter fully.

The CHAIRMAN: I suggest that the committee get back to the clause under consideration.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I shall have to get new batteries on my earphones. I did not hear an answer to the question I put.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister would meet us half way. It may be true that he cannot get a man of high standing who is not acting as a director of other companies. Would he remove the fear some of us have that a trustee or chairman could be appointed who may or could be a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Would he not go half way and place in the bill a proviso that the chairman cannot be a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. MANION: I will not accept that suggestion. To do so would be a reflection upon the intelligence of the government, and I do not intend to do that. Any government with an atom of intelligence would not appoint a director of the Canadian Pacific to act in a high office on the national system.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment is a substitution for paragraph 2.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph 2 of clause 4.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Mr. GORDON: I beg to move to add after subclause 2 of clause 4 a new subclause as follows:

(3) The trustees, other than the chairman, first appointed under the provisions of this act shall from time to time during the terms of their appointments devote to performance of the duties of their office their whole or part time as may be determined from time to time by the governor in council, and the salaries to be paid to such trustees for whole and/or part time service shall be fixed at the time of their appointments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I repeat that the amendment does not mean a blessed thing, except that the governor in council may or may not employ trustees whole or part time for the first two or three years of their appointment. It does not mean anything. My hon. friend is moving for full time employment during the tenure of their office. Without referring to the discussion which has taken place may I say that the gentleman who undertakes to manage this business will undoubtedly have to be a full time employee. We are now substituting a very small board of trustees for a large board of directors. Personally I object to the term "trustees"; I do not like it. I do not like the suggestion that these gentlemen are managing a bankrupt institution; that is the only implication which can be placed upon the term. However, the government is determined to call them trustees, and that there shall be three on the board. This reference to the fact that they may or may not for the first year or two of their appointments devote their full time to the management of the board appears to me as so much eyewash. I want the governor in council, or the government through the governor in council, to take full responsibility for the appointment and control of these gentlemen, and also to have power to discharge them; otherwise we shall have a board of three gentlemen with power to spend the money of this country. The minister has pointed out that because we have to vote the annual deficits on operations, the income account and such capital accounts as the trustees deem wise to expend, we will have control. We will have no control whatever. We are just handing over to the appointees of this or any other government complete control of the biggest institution in Canada. Then we are binding ourselves to vote money to those gentlemen to spend willy-nilly, as they see fit, in the operation of the road. True, as outlined in the minister's amendments of to-day, there will be some control in connection with the disposal of property. I believe that this is a step in the right direction, and so far as I am concerned it is quite satisfactory. But if the government refuses to take the responsibility for hiring and firing these trustees they are going to fasten a serious handicap upon this road, this national enterprise and the biggest business in Canada to-day. They are divesting themselves of authority which they should retain, and which rightfully belongs to them, and are passing it over to three gentlemen whom they will select but whose actions they will not be able to control one year after they are appointed. Then, except by vote of the House of Commons and Senate combined, the government will be helpless. Why refer this matter to the Senate? We do not refer to the Senate financial matters in connection with the operation of the road. No accounts are referred to that body; they pass them as a matter of course, but they can do nothing with them. But here are three men who are going to spend sums of money as large as this government are spending. The government finds it necessary to have eight or ten ministers to administer the affairs of the country, and yet the trustees will be responsible for expenditures comparable to the expenditures by the government.

The government are tying their hands; they are handing money to the trustees, willy-nilly, without any control except the right of the House of Commons and the Senate to dismiss. I believe I do not use language too strong when I say it is ridiculous, and of the many ridiculous things this government has done this is the crowning event. So far as I am concerned, I will oppose the measure as vigorously as I can.

Mr. EULER: Speaking on the second reading of the bill I stated it was my opinion that the three trustees should give full time to their work. Their task is so colossal that it seems to me there is plenty of work to which each of the three trustees could give his full time. I am pleased that the government has offered an amendment which at least in part meets that difficulty. I rise to say however that since the government recognizes the necessity for full time employment of the three trustees, upon that should follow when we come to another clause an amendment to the effect that if the three trustees give all their time to the work of their respective offices the chairman alone should not have the complete say as to any action which could be taken by the board of trustees, and that the majority should rule. If the three men give all their time it seems to me it follows that the majority vote should govern the proceedings of the board.

Mr. MANION: We will deal with that matter later.

Mr. EULER: I believe the two matters are related. I can see that if two men gave only a small fraction of their time practically all the work of the board of trustees would be done by the chairman. For my part if the two men gave only part of their time, we might as well have one general manager, and be done with it. But if the full board are on full time the majority should govern.

Mr. MANION: May I repeat that the expectation of the government at the moment is that they will give their full time to begin with at any rate. As far as I know at the moment that is what probably will be done. But there are reasons why we do not wish that it should be mandatory that the three must be full time. There is in addition the question of salary; it had to be rearranged because of that. I think if the committee will permit the governor in council to take that responsibility, in all probability when the appointments are made the three men will be for full time to begin with at any rate.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is another amendment I moved which is closely connected with the amendment we are now considering, namely, as to giving equality of voting power to the three trustees. That is an amendment to section 11, subsection 2.

Mr. EULER: That is what I was referring to.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the trustees have the full voting power I think it gives them a standing. But since this discussion arose it has occurred to me that perhaps we should discuss the two together, if the minister would not object.

Mr. MANION: We have got only one clause through, and we have spent days on this bill. I should like to get section 4 through. The point the hon. gentleman raises comes up under section 11. The hon. member for North Waterloo took the same attitude; he thought it was fair to discuss the clauses as we come to them. We are giving in to the hon. gentleman; we will probably do as he suggests in regard to full time, although we are leaving it open. Having done that let us dispose of clause 4.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps it would be better to leave this until we consider section 11, because I may say very frankly that after being rather disposed to appreciate what was being done as a step in the right direction, I now feel that if the minister still intends to handicap the trustees by not allowing them to carry any resolution except with the vote of the chairman, this does not help us at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister was kind enough to let me see a copy of the amendment proposed. I would like to ask him to explain why he requires the words "from time to time" in it. As it reads now the trustees other than the chairman shall devote whole or part time. I should imagine that that would be sufficient, whole or part time as determined by the governor in council. But he adds, "as may be determined from time to time by the governor in council."

Mr. MANION: I have had the opinion of a number of outstanding railway men that they did not think the men should be full time appointments. It is possible that three full time men might be a case of too many cooks spoiling the broth; it might not be satisfactory for the railway. The reason the amendment is drawn in what may appear to be somewhat loose terms is to give power to the governor in council to alter it if the matter did not work out as hoped. It is not put in for any other purpose, except that and the question of salary. I do not want to go over that again, but the salary question comes in in section 7. If we should carry that section we could not change their salaries without an address of the Senate and the House of Commons, or new legislation. Therefore this clause was drawn by the Justice department and my legal officers with the object of giving the governor in council some power in the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish the minister had drawn it himself. I think he could have made it a lot more intelligible.

Mr. MANION: Carried.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let this stand until we deal with section 11 and consider the two together; because this is not satisfactory to me, if it is the intention of the minister that these men will be what I have already described as crippled trustees.

Mr. MANION: All right. But may I point out with all respect that my hon. friend and his group are a little difficult to satisfy. We have now brought in at least three important amendments, showing a desire to reach satisfactory agreements between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves, and the result after nearly three weeks of discussion is that we have now two sections passed, the name of the bill and section 2. Now my hon. friends ask me to hold up section 4. I am not quarrelling, but I would like to put it on record that hon. gentlemen opposite certainly are not easy to satisfy.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am as anxious as my hon. friend to get this matter disposed of in a reasonable time. When we get along to section 11 we will be able to discuss the question of who is reasonable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. minister ought to leave on record the statement that we have been three weeks on this bill. It is true that it is three weeks since the bill was introduced, but we have spent only a day or two each week on it.

And it is also true that practically all the clauses are through now with the exception of a few that the minister himself asked to stand.

Mr. MANION: All the uncontentious parts are through, but practically none that were contentious. I will admit that three weeks is a slight exaggeration, but it is nearer three than two. On the second reading we took a full week, and took the better part of a week on some clauses.

Mr. YOUNG: All the better for the bill.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Ramsay, Isaac B. Lewis, Norman Thompson, James C. Palmer, J. J. Moran and two hundred and fifteen others, asking that no leases of oyster areas be granted in the bays or rivers on the northeast side of Prince county, Prince Edward Island; also, a memorandum in connection with the same, addressed to the members of the House of Commons and the Department of Fisheries, protesting against the leasing of these oyster areas, signed by: G. Ellsworth Gills, of Ellerslie, Prince Edward Island, on behalf of the fishermen's committee, and: Isaac B. Lewis, Richard Murphy, Norman Thompson, Chas. McFadyen, all of Conway, Prince Edward Island.

THOUSAND ISLANDS BRIDGE COMPANY

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPORTED STATEMENT OF MR. HECTOR CHARLESWORTH, CHAIRMAN OF RADIO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) based upon a report of a meeting held in the city of Toronto on Tuesday, April 25. I do not suppose Your Honour will permit me to read this report, but I shall refer to its contents. Mr. Hector Charlesworth, the chairman of the radio commission is reported to have said at this meeting that the commission would not deviate from the policy which it had formulated and that anyone was a liar or a fool who said that radio in Canada was not in a better position to-day than it was a year ago. He then got very dramatic and said, "My head is bloody but unbowed." I ask the minister if he has read this report; if he has not will he read it and after he has read it will he endeavour to discipline the chairman of the radio commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I have not read the article in question nor has my attention been drawn to it. If it comes to my knowledge, I will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister now has knowledge of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

ISSUANCE OF LICENCE FOR LONDON STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of a question I asked the minister the other day in connection with the application for a licence for a radio station at London. The minister said that he would reply the next day, but I have not had this reply.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The information which I received this morning is that no licence has been granted. An application was received two or three days ago by the radio commission asking for a hundred watt station to provide local service in London.

Mr. EULER: Could the minister say from whom that application was received:

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think it is the London Free Press. I understand the demand is made on behalf of the Western Ontario Broadcasting Company, but I have no official report or advice from the radio commission. All I have received is some verbal information.

Mr. EULER: Are two licences ever issued to the same party? I understand that these people have a licence for operation at Windsor.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The matter will be considered when I have the report of the radio commission. The radio commission, according to law, when a wave length and a certain power for a new station are asked for, have to make their recommendation to the minister, so I shall wait for the recommendation before I give an answer.

COAL INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): About three weeks ago, during the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Mines, I asked when the report of the investigation being held with reference to the importation of anthracite from Great Britain, would be brought down. The minister said: Possibly within a week. I asked this question because the price of anthracite had been reduced by $1 a ton, the reason being given that this was due to a reduction in freight rates. I would like to ask the minister whether that report will be in the hands of parliament before the end of the session and whether a copy of the evidence will be laid upon the table for the perusal of members.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Mines): The inquiry that was made at my instance, under the Combines Act, into the question whether there was a combine within the meaning of the statute in connection with the importation and distribution of British coal, was one made by the registrar, not by a royal commissioner. It has not been the practice in the past nor is it contemplated by the statute that a report of the registrar be tabled in the House of Commons and the evidence made available to the public generally. The practice followed is, I think, sound, because much of the evidence given and much of the information that the registrar receives on an inquiry of that character has to do with the business of private individuals who are not immediately concerned with the question into which inquiry is being made.

The report of the registrar was delievered to me on Tuesday of this week. It is quite voluminous and I have not yet had an opportunity to examine it in its entirety. I have, however, proceeded with a review of it and I hope to be able to go through it before Monday or Tuesday of next week. Then I shall have some observations to make to the house with respect to the inquiry of the registrar.

MONTREAL TERMINAL POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is it true that tenders have been asked for in connection with the construction of the new terminal post office in the city of Montreal?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Tenders have not been invited for that work this year.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Thursday, April 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway system and for other purposes—Mr. Manion—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 4—Nominations and appointments to board of directors to be vacated and three substituted for original incorporators.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to clause 4.

Mr. MANION: On clause 4 last evening a general discussion arose and a statement was made by the leader of the opposition to the effect that Sir Henry Thornton had been forced out of his directorship in the Royal Bank by the action of this government. That, in brief, was the gist of the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman. I denied the statement at the time and he persisted in it, saying that he had been so informed by Sir Henry Thornton and believed him. This morning I made some inquiries, the result of which I wish to put on record merely to keep the record reasonably straight. I find that Sir Henry Thornton was appointed a Royal Bank director on December 10, 1929, when the right hon. gentleman still had some considerable time to go before he went out of power. Sir Henry was reelected a director of the Royal Bank on January 9, 1930, again on January 8, 1931, and again on January 14, 1932. He remained a director until the annual meeting of January 12, 1933, at which meeting he was not reelected. However, he had resigned the presidency of the Canadian National Railways on July 19, 1932, so that he was a director of the Royal Bank for six months after he had resigned from the presidency of the Canadian National Railways. May I suggest, without going any further, that these facts constitute a complete answer to the right hon. gentleman's charge that this government in some way influenced the Royal Bank to make Sir Henry Thornton withdraw from the directorate of that institution. That in itself is proof enough without anything further, although I have a little further proof if I need it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that Sir Henry Thornton was certainly under the impression—and he so informed me—that the reason he was not reappointed on the board of directors of the Royal Bank was due to the action of the Dominion government. I assumed at the time that this was because of his being also president of the road. In that I may have misunderstood the significance of his not being retained as a director. This, however, would only make the situation more aggravating, because it would indicate that the government was interfering with a purely private business in the appointment of a director of a private corporation. But Sir Henry Thornton certainly had the impression that the reason he was not reappointed was that the bank had intimated to him that he must resign and the intimation conveyed with it the impression that the government of the day had considered that advisable.

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman's remarks to-day are a good deal milder than his observations of last night. He said then that Sir Henry Thornton had told him that and he believed what Sir Henry Thornton had said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do.

Mr. MANION: I shall give my right hon. friend still further proof that the statement is not true. I have under my hand a telegram from Mr. M. W. Wilson, general manager, and, I think, vice-president of the Royal Bank of Canada. I telegraphed to him, asking about the matter, and this is his reply:

> Your telegram received. When Sir Henry Thornton retired from the Canadian National Railways he offered to resign from the board of this bank but it was suggested that he allow the matter to stand until his future plans became more definite. As you are aware he subsequently removed to New York and shortly before our annual meeting in January he intimated that as he was no longer a resident of Canada he did not wish to offer himself for reelection. His wishes were carried out. At no time was the question of his directorship discussed with us by any member of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister whether he can and will say that Sir Henry Thornton's intimation that he was not to be renominated was not due to a message which was sent by Mr. Wilson himself to his manager in New York who conveyed it to Sir Henry and that when it was conveyed to him, he intimated that under the circumstances he would not expect to be reappointed?

Mr. MANION: I do not know anything about any private messages of Mr. Wilson to Sir Henry Thornton. I have given a public message from Mr. Wilson to the people of Canada. I accept Mr. Wilson's word. Furthermore, last night I made the statement—and I repeat it to-day—that the government had nothing whatever to do with Sir Henry Thornton's retiring from the board of directors of the Royal Bank. Moreover, if the right hon. gentleman were fair, which he is not, he would accept that statement and withdraw his own.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have given to my hon. friend the reasons why Sir Henry Thornton believed that he was being asked to retire from that board at the instance of the government.

Mr. MANION: He was making excuses for the fact that he was dropped, probably.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we had perhaps better come back to the question. The question is on the amendment to clause 4. An amendment has also been moved by Mr. Elliott and withdrawn for the time being. Does the hon. member wish to press his amendment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I thought the arrangement last night was that it would be considered with the amendment to section 11, as the two relate to practically the same thing.

Mr. MANION: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no doubt that we shall not get through this bill to-day because the acting leader of the government stated last evening that we should not go on with it probably beyond five o'clock, and it is not at all likely that we shall get through with it before then because there are still quite a number of clauses to consider, but I will make this statement now with respect to clauses 11 and 7, both of which are in dispute, that we shall not deal with them to-day. I should like, however, to go on and make progress with some of the other clauses. The passage of the amendment which has been moved by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not interfere with section 11 at all in so far as the hon. gentleman desires to amend section 11.

I made the statement last night that we had been three weeks on this bill, and I was corrected by the leader of the opposition. I have made inquiries to-day and had the record searched, and I find that we have spent fifteen actual working days on the bill, or exactly three full weeks of five days a week, and it is seven weeks since we introduced the bill. I should like to make some progress to-day and go on with section 4. We are quite agreeable to allowing sections 7 and 11 to stand until next week.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the minister contemplate any amendment to section 7?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister will have to shorten his speeches to make headway.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman might take a little of that himself.

The CHAIRMAN: In order to put the question clearly before the committee I might state that the hon. member for West Middlesex moved an amendment to clause 4 which was withdrawn to allow the committee to discuss the new subclause 2. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has moved an amendment which will be subclause 3 of clause 4 if adopted. Does the hon. member for West Middlesex wish to press his amendment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid that the minister is not shortening the debate by separating this clause from the proposed amendment to section 11.

Mr. MANION: I do not quite follow. Would the hon. member explain the connection between the two, and why we cannot proceed to pass clause 4?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amendment deals with the question whether or not all the trustees shall be full-time men. The amendment proposed to section 11 deals with the question of whether all the trustees shall have equal voting power. I say that the two affect so vitally the effectiveness of the board of trustees, and are so closely connected, that I think it would save time to consider them both together, and that was the understanding given.

Mr. MANION: I just want to get straight what my hon. friend means. I do not quite see what difference it would make to proceed now with section 4. I have met my hon. friend's wishes to a large extent in the amendment which we have moved. We have now moved two amendments, one about the chairman and directorships and so on, and the other in regard to the other two trustees. These other two trustees at the discretion of the governor in council may also be full-time men, so I think I have practically met my hon. friend's wishes so far as full-time trustees go. In regard to the question of a majority vote, that is a separate question altogether, and I suggest with all respect that we can deal with that when we come to it. Here is the government's submission in regard to section 4. I think we might pass that, and I am quite ready to hold sections 7 and 11 over till next week. It seems to me that the two questions are separate and distinct.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As I explained to my hon. friend last night, the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce will not, I submit, be of any great benefit if the vote of the other two trustees can only be counted when the chairman votes with either one of them. I do not want to be disrespectful with regard to the amendment that has been proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I realize that it is a step in the right direction, but it is only a step, I submit, providing that the trustees are what I would call real trustees, operative trustees, having a vote of equal weight on the board with the chairman. I do submit that we will save time by considering them together, and that was agreed to last night.

Mr. MANION: I am very anxious to oblige, although it has not done me very much good so far. At the same time I do not yet see any connection between the two. I know what the hon. gentleman has in mind, but so far as section 4 is concerned we are taking this attitude irrespective of what we do with section 11. I think my hon. friend might therefore concede that we have gone a long way with him on this. So now let us dispose of it, and then when we come to section 11 we can argue the question whether there should be a majority vote or not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not going to occupy more of the time of the committee in arguing whether we should consider this amendment now or later. Unless we can follow the arrangement that was made last night I must submit the amendment which I moved before.

Mr. MANION: That is all right; go ahead and submit the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Elliott moves that all the words after the word "that" in the proposed amendment to be known as subsection 3 of clause 4 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

> One of such trustees shall be their chairman. Each trustee shall devote his whole time to the performance of the duties of his office and shall not be an officer of any company other than a company which is comprised in National railways and shall not, during his tenure of office as trustee, become a director of any company other than a company which is comprised in National railways of which he was not a director at the time of his appointment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before the vote is taken may I call the attention of the committee to what that means. I assume that they have it pretty well in their minds. This is a very, very important board. They have to administer a property of the people of this country which has cost and is worth many millions of dollars. It will be perhaps the most important board functioning in the dominion, and I submit that what was formerly done by a board of seventeen on the Canadian National Railways, and by a board of about an equal number on the Canadian Pacific Railway, is of sufficient importance and sufficiently onerous to demand the whole time of three of the very best men that can be obtained. That is the object of the amendment. I do not think that this great national asset should be entrusted to three men any one of whom should be permitted to give only part of his time to that work.

Mr. MANION: I agree with the hon. gentleman. He has explained his amendment quite correctly, but we have made an amendment whereby the governor in council may, at discretion, make all three trustees full-time men. I stated last night, and I repeat now, that as far as I know it is the intention of the government to do that for a time at least, so I am sorry to have to refuse to accept the hon. gentleman's amendment. I shall have to vote against it.

Mr. MacLEAN: This is a very important question. When the bill was before the house before the Easter recess, I had intended moving an amendment that the board of trustees be enlarged from three to five members. I wish to protest against the board being limited to three members. The maritime provinces claim that under the British North America Act they have certain rights which they look to this and all governments to protect. We feel that if a board of trustees consisting of only three members is chosen from central Canada the claims of the maritime provinces may be overlooked. Under the terms of the legislation the trustees have great powers. They may scrap lines or cut down services. In the report of the Duncan commission there is the following finding regarding the old Intercolonial railway:

> That to the extent that commercial considerations were subordinate to national, imperial and strategic considerations, the cost would be borne by the dominion and not by the traffic that might pass over the line.

If the trustees put that line on a strictly paying basis, and curtail services until that object is reached, I claim that they will not be playing fair with the maritime provinces, and will not be adhering to the terms set out at confederation. I do not know whether there are to be three or five members, but if I were in order I should feel very much like moving an amendment to the effect that there should be five trustees, one of whom should come from the maritime provinces.

Mr. SPENCE: You have a great chance of getting it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the subamendment.

Subamendment (Mr. Elliott) negatived on division.

Mr. MacLEAN moved:

> That section 4 of part I of the bill be amended by striking out the word "three" in the fifth line thereof and substituting therefor the word "five."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the committee that subsections 1 and 2 of section 4 have been adopted. We are now dealing with a new subsection, No. 3. Therefore it must be by general consent that we continue.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. Surely any amendment to any portion of the general section may be moved before that section as a whole has been passed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member would be quite right, as usual, were it not for the fact that when discussion on the bill began it was decided by the committee that the subsections would be considered one by one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was a matter of convenience. But before any general section is passed any hon. member has the right to move an amendment.

Mr. MANION: On the point of order, may I say that under ordinary circumstances I believe the hon. member would be right, and he would have made a very good case. But the chief, and practically the only important point in subsection (1) of clause 4 has been carried by the committee; that subsection states that there shall be three trustees. Therefore I submit that if we vote upon the possibility of their being five we will be acting contrary to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN: My decision is this, subject to the view of the committee, that general consent of the house to an agreement in connection with procedure on the bill supersedes the rules and regulations, and binds me as if it were a rule written in the book. Therefore at this stage I must declare the subamendment out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled, and the hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But I can speak twice to a point of order. With all respect to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that you do not carry a section of a bill until the section is carried completely. For the purposes of convenience and, as you say, by mutual arrangement, we did agree to deal with it by subsections. But certainly according to the rules, before section 4 in toto has been passed by this committee, any hon. member has the right to move an amendment to any of the subsections.

The CHAIRMAN: Apparently I have not made myself clear. The general consent of the committee has the force of a ruling set down in the book. Unless there is general consent of the committee to supersede that ruling, I am bound by it. For those reasons I must deal with subsections as if they were individual sections. I decide that in this instance the amendment is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that before a final decision is given on the section, after we have gone through the subsections, you ask the committee whether or not it is prepared to adopt the section as amended. That means that the entire section is before the committee either for acceptance or rejection.

The CHAIRMAN: Not in this case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The right hon. gentleman is mistaken. Under the agreement we have taken each subsection of the bill as an individual section; that is what we have been doing so far.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never have so understood it.

The CHAIRMAN: Therefore I never put the question, "Is section 4 adopted as amended?", because we have considered each subsection as an individual section. I am in the hands of the committee, of course, but I am ruling that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I explain this point.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand perfectly the position taken by the right hon. member but I cannot allow hon. members to speak twice on the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not finished speaking; you, Mr. Chairman, interrupted me and I sat down.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I wish to make is this, that if the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex had been adopted, the trustees would have had to give their entire time to the work. Under those circumstances I submit the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince probably would not have been deemed necessary. But the subamendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex having been voted down, it is only proper that in those circumstances the committee should have a right to say whether there should be five rather than three trustees. That is a perfectly proper subamendment, as it has not been definitely decided that the three trustees are to give all their time to their work. We have taken subsections, one after the other for the sake of convenience, and the avoidance of unnecessary discussion. But there has always been the right so far as I have understood, to move any amendments we wished to the section as a whole.

Mr. MANION: Since we have all spoken twice, may I say another word?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why not? You can speak as often as you like in committee.

Mr. MANION: In regard to section 6 we carried subsections 3, 5, 6, 7, and 8. The only parts left for discussion are subsections 1, 2 and 4. The same is true in a number of other clauses. The only provision in subsection 1 of section 4, with which we are now dealing, is for the appointment of three trustees, and their replacement of the directors. If we can pass a subclause then deal with another subclause, then go back and discuss again the original clause, I do not know where we will get.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member who moved the subamendment could have moved it on subsection 1, but he did not do so. I am bound by the agreement of the committee, which to me is a ruling of the house, to rule that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. MacLEAN: The committee is dealing in a very arbitrary manner with my subamendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is quite in order.

Mr. MacLEAN: When I was speaking to the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex—

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I draw to your attention the fact that the hon. member, according to your ruling, is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I must be tolerant. Some hon. members have spoken twice or three times to the point of order although I have decided they should not. Under those circumstances I believe I should hear the hon. member.

Mr. MacLEAN: This is the first time I spoke. I was speaking to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). I stated that I wished to move an amendment to this clause, that there should be five trustees instead of three. The chairman said that if I would wait until the subamendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex was disposed of then I would have the opportunity of presenting my amendment. I waited. Now I am treated in this way, saying that my amendment is out of order and is not going to be presented to the committee. I think under the circumstances I am being treated very unfairly. Therefore I feel like appealing.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the ruling of the chair is correct. I certainly understood that in dealing with this bill we are not following ordinary rules, passing it section by section, but subsection by subsection. But we are only wasting time on this, we might have had a vote. I submit to the right hon. leader of the opposition that we did distinctly agree that on this bill we would vary the ordinary practice. But I would not like the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) to suffer from a misunderstanding, and if he wishes to move his amendment now I would be disposed to let him do so, but not to treat it as a precedent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with the acting Prime Minister as to our having agreed to vary the ordinary practice, but the ordinary practice is to discuss a whole section, including all subsections at one and the same time. We are varying the practice in this respect, that for the sake of precision we discuss each subsection by itself; but it was not understood that we would not have the right to amend a section as a whole in the light of any change made in a subsection.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understood that when we passed a subsection it was passed, not that we could go back and amend it afterward. But we would like to make some progress, and as far as I am concerned we are willing to deal with it.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my decision that the subamendment is out of order.

Mr. POWER: We can get around to the same thing later. I propose to move an amendment to subsection (5) that if at any time the trustees are not employed full time there shall be five of them instead of three. I am serving notice.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment of Mr. Stevens. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to on division.

Subsection as amended agreed to on division.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if we have not already passed some clause which commits the house to three trustees?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I submit that any amendment of that would now be out of order.

Mr. POWER: Are we now in order to speak of three or five?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which clause have we passed?

Mr. MANION: We have passed clause 4.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No we are discussing 4.

Mr. POWER: I beg to submit the following amendment:

If at any time the trustees appointed are not employed during full time then instead of three trustees the number of trustees shall be five.

I think I am quite in order, because the status of these trustees has been materially changed by the amendment of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It makes these trustees part time or full time trustees at the discretion of the governor in council. That being the case, I believe it is quite competent for us to move now that if they are not engaged for full time we will perhaps require more of them to attend to the business of the railway. Not only would such an amendment be in order but it would be logical and reasonable.

The CHAIRMAN: Having heard the proposed amendment, although I have some sympathy with it I must rule it out of order, under standing order 48, commentary 399:

After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended. In like manner where an amendment of any part of a question has been proposed from the chair an earlier part cannot be amended unless the amendment so proposed be withdrawn.

In this case it has been voted upon by the house—

Mr. POWER: Would the chairman be good enough to explain the application of 399 to this matter?

The CHAIRMAN: I will try to explain. I do not know if my hon. friend will understand me—through no fault of his. I understand this question has been decided before.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, this is an entirely new question.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been decided that there shall be three trustees. Now the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) proposes an amendment that there shall be five trustees. If I understand the English of commentary 399—I am not so sure of that part—that point has already been decided by the house. Therefore I have to rule the proposed amendment out of order.

Mr. POWER: It is quite true that the section dealing with three trustees has been passed. But I submit that the status of these trustees is entirely changed by the amendment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that trustees may or may not be part time according as the governor in council thinks fit. The original idea of the bill as presented to us that there should be three trustees has been departed from. There were to be three, appointed for seven years; now we have three men who are to be appointed practically during pleasure, who may be removed from time to time, and may be employed for part time or full time or any time at all. I am not quarrelling with the amendment, but I say that if you have entirely changed the duties of the trustees then it is competent for any member to propose that there shall be five instead of three.

The CHAIRMAN: I must maintain my position.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before you give your decision may I point out that the argument of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) does not apply to this subsection (1), which defines the manner in which the trustees may be appointed. There might be something in my hon. friend's point if the subsection said that there shall be only three trustees, but it does not say that. Then the next subsection says that two of them may be part time or full time. The third subsection, now proposed to be amended by the hon. member for Quebec South, provides that in case two of the trustees, that is those other than the chairman, shall be part time men then there shall be five trustees. I submit that is not inconsistent with subsection (1) which speaks of three.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that if you had given the same ruling with regard to the amendment moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce it could not have been considered, on account of what was done under subsection (2). The house passed subsection (2), which provides that:

One of such trustees shall be their chairman. He shall devote his whole time to performance of the duties of his office . . .

The house decided that one should give his whole time, and therefor by inference that the others should be part time. But you allowed an amendment which said that in some cases they may give full time.

The CHAIRMAN: The right hon. member is quite right, but the amendment moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was received the other day by the unanimous consent of the committee. Now I must decide that the hon. member for Quebec South is out of order. His grievance is not without redress; on the motion for third reading he can move that the bill be sent back to committee.

Section as amended agreed to on division.

On section 6 (1)—Appointment from panel.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsections 1 and 2 remain to be dealt with; the others have been passed.

Mr. DUFF: There is one matter on which I am not very clear, which I think can be brought up under any section in part I, which refers to the national railways. According to section 3 (d) "National company" means the Canadian National Railway Company. Then in subsection (e) I find the following:

"National railways" means the National company, as owner, operator, manager or otherwise, and its transportation, communication and hotel system, which system shall be deemed to comprise all companies which are elements of the Canadian National Railways as defined in the National act—

I should like to know if this act is sufficiently broad to include the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National Steamship Company. If it is I have nothing more to say, but if it is not I think some clause should be included providing that the three trustees who are to take over the Canadian National Railways shall take over the merchant marine and national steamships as well. If that is not done it will mean that the minister or the government will have to retain the present directors, or others, to look after the affairs of those two companies. So I think we might as well arrange that the trustees to be appointed under this act should also look after the affairs of these two companies instead of having two separate companies looking after the business of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National Steamship Company.

Mr. MANION: I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman, but that provision is not in the bill because it is not necessary. The Canadian National steamships and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are entrusted to the same directorate by order in council. I confess that the matter has not been discussed, but I am quite sure it is the intention of the government to have these companies looked after in future as they have been looked after in the past. I quite agree that there would be no reason for having a separate board of directors, but that matter can be dealt with by order in council, so it need not form part of the act.

Mr. DUFF: Unless it is in the act I do not see how the governor in council can decide that these two companies do come under this act. This bill is very specific; it deals with certain matters, and according to the definition in subsection (e) of section 3 it would not include the two companies I have mentioned. It seems to me that I have a strong argument, and I think the minister agrees that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National steamships should be handled by the trustees who are to be appointed under this bill. I think before we pass this bill an amendment should be moved, or a new clause added, so that the trustees appointed under this act will manage not only the railway company but the merchant marine and the National steamships as well. I cannot agree with the minister that in some way the governor in council can arrange to place the merchant marine and the National steamships under this act, by order in council, giving the three trustees power to manage those companies. It would be a very simple matter to make that provision; for instance, the definition contained in subsection (e) of section 3 might be enlarged to include the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National Steamship Company. I think the minister agrees that there should be only one management for the three companies, and I think it would be an easy matter to make that clear now.

Mr. MANION: I very largely agree with the idea that the management of the merchant marine and the steamship company should be as the hon. member suggests, but in the past these companies were not entrusted to the directors of the Canadian National. By order in council the directors of the National railways were simply made directors of these two companies as well; they were not so appointed under any act, and I submit that it is not necessary to put them under this act. However, I hardly think we will finish this bill to-day, and I will agree that before we do so I will give a fuller explanation to my hon. friend than I have given at the moment, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. DUFF: That will be quite satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN: The first question to be dealt with by the committee is the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec South, who moved that the section be amended by striking out all the words after the word "occurring" in the fourteenth line.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. gentleman just explain what he has in mind?

Mr. POWER: The effect would be that in future the appointments would be made by order in council, and we would do away with this panel system. I think the minister agreed to a certain extent that if the original trustees were to be appointed by order in council there was no reason why those succeeding them should not be appointed in the same way. The panel system seems a rather cumbersome method of going about it.

Mr. MANION: I agree that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member, but at the same time after a good deal of discussion the government thought this was the better way to leave it, on the ground that, speaking broadly, the panel system is a more non-political method of dealing with the question than appointment by order in council, whether under this or another government. It is true that at the present time the government is appointing the three trustees but for the future it is recommended that if one trustee disappears, the president of the Exchequer court and the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and the remaining trustees may submit a panel of eight names. I do not know that there is every protection against political manoeuvring, if whatever government happens to be in power chooses to manoeuvre, but it is considered that it would be better to leave the panel proposal in the bill.

Mr. POWER: I submit that the argument just advanced by the minister is not very strong. This government will appoint three trustees and under the panel system those trustees may be self-perpetuating. There is no question but that they can arrange for their own reappointment. The three men will be able to run this railroad for eternity, if it lasts that long. There is another viewpoint which perhaps should be considered when considering the amendment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Under that amendment, these trustees need not be appointed for a definite term. They can be appointed for part time service and then for full time service if the governor in council deems it advisable. It might very well happen that these appointments would not be made definite or permanent until this government was about to go out of office, at which time the trustees would have had five, six or seven years of service, as the case may be. It seems to me that if the government wished to be fair it would say that the original appointments shall be made from a panel. I think they should either say that or say that all future appointments will be made by the governor in council. I cannot see any force in the minister's argument that we are getting away from politics.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. MANION: I shall touch upon only one point raised by the hon. gentleman. When we reach the clause covering that matter, it is the intention of the government to move an amendment in order to make the appointments definite as to years. We would not be able to put through the rather "slick" game the hon. gentleman suggests. We intend to make the appointment for seven, six and five years or five, four and three as may be decided by the committee.

Mr. POWER: I would like to get an interpretation of the new clause number three to section 4, which reads:

> The trustees, other than the chairman, first appointed under the provisions of this act shall from time to time during the terms of their appointments devote to performance of the duties of their office their whole or part time as may be determined from time to time by the governor in council, and the salaries to be paid to such trustees for whole and/or part time service shall be fixed at the time of their appointments.

I see nothing in that clause to prevent the government making these part time appointments to date from the date of appointment and then some fine day making them full time appointments, say for a period of five years.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend is putting a fairly loose interpretation upon that clause. The reason this clause was drawn up by the legal officers of the Department of Justice and my department was in order—

Mr. POWER: I know why it was drawn up.

Mr. MANION: It was not drawn up for the purpose suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POWER: I am not imputing motives.

Mr. MANION: The first appointments might be made for seven years for the chairman, six years for one of the trustees and five for the other, but if we decided to put them in for full time, say for the first three years, under clause 7 we could not interfere with them without an address of both houses of parliament. We could not undo the work we had done, that is, we could not change their salaries or anything of that sort without an address of both houses of parliament. I may say quite frankly that when we get to the next clause and decide upon the term of the appointment, we will not be able to go outside of that provision by making them part time for a portion of their term and full time for another portion.

Mr. EULER: I suppose it is pretty much wasting time to make any suggestions in view of the fact that the minister has stated that the government intends to stand by this clause as it is now worded. Apparently it is the intention of the government to provide for the panel method of selection in the case of vacancies, and it is stated that this is done to avoid the possibility of political appointments. It does not seem to me that this provision meets the case at all. As I pointed out on the second reading of the bill, if this is an efficient method of guarding against political appointments to fill future vacancies, the same plan should be followed in appointing the original board. We should be consistent. Let us assume that it is the desire of the government to control this board politically. It will appoint three men who are amenable to government influence. I am presupposing and not charging this. Should a vacancy occur, the two trustees remaining will no doubt renominate themselves upon the panel, while the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the railway board will make certain other selections for the same panel.

Mr. MANION: Eight names.

Mr. EULER: There will be eight names altogether. The point I want to make is that the two men left on that board, being politicians—the committee knows the sense in which I use that word—will no doubt select four other politicians for their portion of the panel. The president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the railway board may select four men whom they think are not tarnished with political feeling, but if the government wants to do so they can ignore entirely those four nominees. If the first appointments are political—they certainly can be although I do not say they will be—this board will be able to perpetuate itself as a political organization. It seems to me that the provision of having the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the railway board submit four names to the panel is absolutely useless because the government could ignore those names entirely. If I am wrong in this assumption, I should like to be placed right. The government is not enjoined or compelled to select any name from those submitted by the president of the court and the chairman of the board; if they wish they can fill the vacancy from the trustees who are still left on the board. I suppose it would be more than human nature to expect that these two men would not put their own names upon the panel and be again selected. If this method is to be adopted at all, I would like to see it adopted right from the beginning. If the panel principle is going to get rid of politics, then I think it ought to be applied in the first instance. If we start out on a political basis—I am assuming that in order to make my argument—the thing will perpetuate itself.

Mr. MANION: Supposing the government was the same one that appointed the three; then a panel of eight names was submitted, if the government wished to replace two or three of them, irrespective of the other five or six, the government could do so. But supposing in the meantime the government had changed, the trustees could not submit their own names in any way I know of, where the new government would not have the opportunity of replacing them if it so desired.

Mr. EULER: If the government changed, they might take the selections submitted by the two trustees.

Mr. MANION: But they could refuse them altogether; after all, parliament is supreme.

Mr. EULER: The whole thing, it seems to me, is imperfect.

Mr. MANION: I am not arguing its perfection, I will admit. It was suggested by the royal commission that in the case of a vacancy a panel be submitted by the two remaining trustees. That was their reason for the "stagger" system in the appointments, so that one at a time would drop out and the other two would submit a panel. But in order that there might be a broader basis for the selection of a panel, there were added to the selectors, if I may use that word, the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I may say quite frankly that the question was discussed whether the government of the day could not put on a representative, but that would make the matter still more political. The general recommendation of the royal commission being as I have said, the government decided to insert it in the bill.

Mr. EULER: Does the government not think it is a most remarkable principle to ask men who are already on the board to make selections for the panel? It seems to me that they are prejudiced and self-interested, that is if they wish to act in that way, and it would be better to have the selections made by others than those who are already on the board. What is the principle that governs that provision?

Mr. MANION: Is that not provided for in the fact that the chairman of the railway commission and the president of the exchequer court can also submit names? It is not possible for the two trustees to submit eight names. They would probably submit four and the others would submit four, so that the government would probably have a voice, and the selection would not really prejudice whichever party happened to be in power.

Mr. EULER: Why should the two surviving trustees be selected to submit the four names? Are they the proper persons to do that sort of work? If they are prejudiced, as they well might be, why not somebody else instead of those two?

Mr. MANION: An argument may be advanced in this regard, but there is this to be said for the two remaining trustees; they would understand the railway business to a certain extent and they would know the type of men who should be selected. We will take it for granted that they are honest and true men, and they will probably submit names of men that will be of a suitable type. They might desire to be selected themselves, but the two men submitting the names are not in the panel to be selected. They remain. The submission of a panel is only in the case of one trustee dropping out, because they drop out according to the "stagger" system. They do not submit their own names, and, having had some understanding of the railway business, they should be able to select the right type of men for the position.

Mr. MacLEAN: The minister is on extremely weak ground in the action he is taking. The government say that the first three trustees are to be appointed by the governor in council and there should be some reason for taking away from it the power to appoint in the case of a vacancy. If the governor in council is good enough to appoint the first board, when the time comes for these men to be replaced, the governor in council should be equally competent to appoint their successors. I do not see why the government should want to get away from this practice which has always been followed in making appointments. In this case I think the government is trying to put over the house this bill which is extreme in many ways, and then to appoint a self-selecting board of trustees to carry on in defiance of another party that may happen to be in power is most unfair. The minister is on weak ground in presenting such an argument.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it in the minister's mind—it may be a question of legal interpretation—that the nominating board, so-called, should be unanimous in selecting a panel, or is a majority sufficient? Possibly the remaining trustees might make certain selections and the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the railway board might act as if they were making individual nominations. I take it that the nominations are by a board and I am wondering whether a majority of the board is sufficient or whether it must be unanimous.

Mr. MANION: I do not think that has been discussed, but the government takes it for granted that the two trustees remaining, the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the board of railway commissioners would unanimously submit a panel of eight. The clause says that if any such panel of eight is not submitted within ten days in the case of a vacancy, the governor in council may appoint as he may be advised. I am quite frank in saying that it would be difficult for a panel to be submitted in ten days, so that whatever government might be in power, it would likely find itself forced to make the appointments anyway.

Mr. EULER: Does the minister think the period of ten days might be increased to twenty or thirty?

Mr. MANION: If the hon. member does not like the way in which the panel is appointed, why not move to wipe out the ten day provision?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend states that this is the recommendation of the royal commission and that for this reason it has been inserted. The royal commission have made several recommendations that have not been inserted. Its members have given their recommendations from their point of view, but we are here as parliament to legislate from our point of view. I should not like to be a party to a reflection by legislation on the government of the day, no matter what government it might be. I am speaking to my political opponents, and I say that I have much more faith in their judgment in making appointments to this board than in the judgment of the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the board of railway commissioners, however able those gentlemen may be. Ministerial responsibility is the basis of security so far as the public is concerned. Whatever the royal commission may recommend, I do not think it is fitting for parliament impliedly to reflect upon any present or future administration, and this is what is being done by the section as it stands. The intention is good no doubt. There is nothing to prevent the government, if it so wishes, from calling in the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the board of railway commissioners and consulting them; in fact, that is exactly what the government would do if it believed they were in a position to advise, but security in the matter of appointments rests in keeping them under ministerial responsibility, not in getting away from it. Surely if the government can appoint the judges of the country; if it can appoint these very gentlemen, the president of the exchequer court and the chairman of the railway commission, if it can appoint the personnel of all the other commissions, it can make equally fair and good appointments in the case of the trustees? Why, just because we have in the case of the Canadian National Railways a commercial enterprise that has been subjected to all kinds of examination and criticism, we should as regards government control go back on the fundamental doctrine of ministerial responsibility, I cannot understand. I believe the public will be infinitely more secure by holding the ministry responsible for whatever is done and not restricting or freeing the ministry in its responsibility.

Mr. MANION: In view of the very strong feelings of my hon. friends, and in view, I think, of the fairness of the remarks made on all sides, I suggest that we let this subclause stand and, with the consent of the committee, take up subclause 2 of the same clause.

The CHAIRMAN: Then the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec South will stand.

Mr. POWER: Of course I think my amendment was to strike out the whole of clause 6.

Mr. MANION: I misunderstood.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, it must be that, because subsections 1, 2 and 4 all stand. The others are carried.

Mr. POWER: My amendment was to strike out all the words after the word "occurring," but I am not going to ask for a vote.

Amendment (Mr. Power) stands.

Subsection 1 of section 6 stands.

On section 6, subsection 2.

Mr. MANION: There was an amendment suggested by somebody that the term might be five years instead of seven. I think five years probably ought to be a reasonably satisfactory term. I give the committee my word that the government has made no clear-cut decision on the point and that it is quite open to conviction, but with a feeling rather favourable to five years. I shall be glad to hear the views of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I had an amendment to that effect prepared, but I do not believe it was moved. I now move to amend subsection 2 by striking out the word "seven" and substituting therefor the word "five," wherever it appears in the section.

Mr. MANION: I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will not that amendment necessitate a change also in subsection 4?

Mr. MANION: Yes. The necessary changes can be made by the legal officers in order that the term may be five years.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie) agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Mr. MANION: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 3 carry? Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before you leave the chair, you put the question, Mr. Chairman, "Shall the section carry"? Is it carried?

The CHAIRMAN: I understand it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Part of it is standing. The point I was directing attention to was that I understood you to put the question, Shall the whole section carry? Each time you have been saying section, and I understood that you meant what you said.

The CHAIRMAN: When I say clause it is the whole section, and when I say section it is the subsection.

Mr. MANION: Subsection 1 of section 6 stands.

Progress reported.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 59, to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the nature of the amendment?

Mr. DUPRE: By virtue of the Government Employees Compensation Act, any officer who is injured receives compensation. By virtue of Bill No. 59 he will also receive a gratuity, so in the case of an officer injured while handling a convict, for instance, he might receive a double gratuity, plus compensation. The object of the amendment is to ensure that an officer who is injured while handling a convict, for instance, will receive, not a double gratuity, but simply a gratuity plus compensation if he is eligible to compensation in virtue of provincial law.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister read the amendment if he has it available?

Mr. DUPRE: With pleasure. The amendment, which appears at page 412 of the votes and proceedings, reads as follows:

Subsection one of section thirty-two of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following proviso:—

"Provided that the retiring allowance authorized by this subsection shall not be paid to any officer if he is eligible to receive compensation in respect of the infirmity or injury which has compelled his retirement from the service under and in virtue of the provisions of the Government Employees Compensation Act."

Mr. ELLIOTT: The idea is that he shall not receive two compensations at the one time?

Mr. DUPRE: Yes. But for this amendment he would receive double gratuity plus compensation. With this amendment he will receive simply his gratuity, plus compensation.

Mr. LAVERGNE: In this bill we seem to be legislating on a matter which is entirely provincial. The contract covering a man's services is a civil and provincial matter, and I do not know that this parliament has the power to legislate on a civil contract and determine questions of compensation, or how services shall be terminated, and under what conditions. A man may be dismissed for cause or without cause, and in our province the man may be open to receive compensation even if he is dismissed for cause, or even if his services were not definitely limited to a certain term. Under the French law, compensation has been awarded to a man who has lost his position although there was no fault either on his part or on the part of the company because a civil contract which has no term fixed is binding on the two parties and one party cannot terminate it without paying compensation to the other party. We are here legislating on what I think is a civil matter.

Mr. DUPRE: Answering my hon. friend, I do not think that we are in the least infringing upon provincial rights because by virtue of chapter 30 of the statutes of 1927, the Government Employees Compensation Act, any federal employee is entitled to the benefit of the provisions of any provincial act. At the present time there is a compensation act in every province, if I am not mistaken, therefore, the right to receive a pension is not taken away by the present measure. As heretofore the officer in charge will continue to receive compensation by virtue of the provincial legislation. All we enact is that in addition to that he will be entitled to receive a gratuity from the federal government. Any officer compelled to retire from the service on account of some mental or physical infirmity or injury will receive one gratuity. Any officer who has been hurt or injured by handling a convict or trying to prevent disturbances and so on, will receive double gratuity. We do not want a man who has been hurt while handling a convict or quelling a disturbance to be put on an inferior footing. If he is entitled to double gratuity he will not receive that double gratuity if he already receives compensation by virtue of provincial legislation. He will be entitled only to the gratuity, plus the compensation to which he is entitled by virtue of provincial legislation.

Mr. LAVERGNE: What about the men who are dismissed?

Mr. SPEAKER: The house is not in committee. The hon. member may speak only once.

Mr. BURY: I understand that the only right which is interfered with is the right created by the federal act. The amendment reads: "Provided the retiring allowance authorized by this subsection shall not be paid.." It does not take away any other right, but simply deprives him of the right under the federal act to a retiring allowance where, under the provincial act, he would be getting compensation.

Mr. LAVERGNE: What about employees who are dismissed?

Mr. BURY: There is no interference with his provincial rights.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 58, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain, please.

Mr. DUPRE: With pleasure. By virtue of this amendment sections 5 and 7 of the bill as carried by this house are deleted. It simply means that the clauses which enacted that the officer or constable would benefit for the time served in South Africa are stricken out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Section 5 does not deal with South Africa, does it?

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 53, to amend the criminal code (Offensive weapons).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are the amendments?

Mr. DUPRE: The first, and most important amendment is that to section 1 of the bill. The section, as adopted by this house, enacted that everyone carrying a concealed weapon without a permit is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment "for not less than one year and not more than five." This has been changed to read that everyone guilty of an indictable offence will be liable to imprisonment "for a term not exceeding five years." In other words we delete the words "not less than one year and not more than five" and replace them by the words "for a term not exceeding five years." That is the first point.

However I must call the attention of the house to the drafting of the clause, which is different from the drafting we accepted in this house. In order to be clear probably I should read the clause as adopted here, and then as corrected. As adopted the clause read:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for not less than one year and not more than five years who, not having a permit in Form 76 has upon his person elsewhere than his own dwelling house, shop, warehouse, counting house, or premises, or is carrying concealed upon his person or in any vehicle under his control or of which he is an occupant a pistol, revolver or other fire arm capable of being concealed upon the person.

This was corrected and the new clause as suggested reads as follows:

> "118. Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, who, not having a permit in Form 76,—
> (a) has upon his person elsewhere than in his own dwelling house, shop, warehouse, counting house, or premises, a pistol, revolver, or other fire arm capable of being concealed upon the person;
> or who not having such permit,
> (b) is carrying in any vehicle under his control, or of which he is an occupant, a pistol, revolver, or other fire arm capable of being concealed upon the person."

Mr. BURY: What is the idea of adding "or who not having such permit"? That is included in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 119. I believe it is simply repetition.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not think it is repetition.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: The second amendment is to section 119, subsection (b) which first read as follows: "Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction to a penalty" and so on who:

> (b) being an alien, has in his possession any shot-gun, rifle or other such fire-arm or any ammunition for any such fire-arm without having a permit in Form 76B.

Here is the amendment as it reads:

> Provided however that any bona fide sportsman and hunter shall be permitted to enter or pass through Canada having in his possession any shot-gun, rifle or other such fire-arm, or any ammunition therefor, on condition that he pass continuously through and out of Canada or if not that he apply for a permit in Form 76B without undue delay after entering Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The other changes are merely verbal.

Mr. DUPRE: Section 120, subsection 1 is amended by adding the following words:

> or for target practice in a regularly organized shooting club approved by the attorney-general of the province in which such club is organized.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the purpose?

Mr. DUPRE: The section gives the right to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or any officer thereof duly authorized, to issue a permit in form 76b to any person, upon being satisfied that such person requires a pistol or revolver for the protection of life or of property, and also for target practice and so forth.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: The other is not of great importance. In subsection 3 the word "in" is replaced by the word "for," to make it clear. It will read:

3. Any permit issued hereunder shall remain in force only during the calendar year for which it is issued. . . .

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: Subsection (b) reads as follows: Whenever the governor in council deems it in the public interest, he may by proclamation:

(b) forbid for such period as he deems fit any person except such persons as may be expressly exempted . . .

And we add "or classes of persons" after the word "persons." Just verbal.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 3—New forms enacted.

Mr. DUPRE: The last is verbal, an amendment to form 76. By this form permission is given to Mr. Blank to carry a revolver, for instance, for the protection of life or property, and we add the following words:

Or for target practice.

In order to make it consistent with the preceding.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 79 to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Regulations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that the purpose of this bill is to carry out recommendations of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I have a good deal of confidence in those gentlemen. Looking over the bill I feel that I can with safety support it. I was wondering who drafted it.

[Mr. Dupré.]

Mr. STEVENS: It was drafted by the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners in conjunction with Mr. Sweatman. It was then submitted to the law officers of the house and to the Justice department, so they all had a finger in it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is what I understood. I was wondering why it was necessary to engage Mr. Sweatman when we have already a regular lawyer, of six month's standing at least. This is not a difficult bill to draw. I would imagine that the law officers knowing exactly what the board wanted, it would not be necessary to pay special fees to Mr. Sweatman when we had Mr. Taylor available. Maybe the minister has an explanation.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a very full explanation, but I would prefer that we continue that discussion under our estimates.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Discharge of grain if not owner.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do I understand that this is to allow terminal elevators at the seaports to discharge or ship grain which is not their own property?

Mr. STEVENS: It is really to do the opposite. It is to bring that practice under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Separate elevator receipts.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a typographical error on line 20. The word "is" should be "in."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As some of the miscellaneous items are not contentious I thought we might consider them.

To provide for the arbitration costs—"I'm Alone" case, $8,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the acting Prime Minister tell us where the I'm Alone is now?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The right hon. gentleman must be a little kind to me to-day, for I'm alone myself. The matter is still pending; recently I saw some further papers with regard to it, which I have not had time to read.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the administration of the Royal Canadian Mint, including salaries, contingencies, retiring and other allowances, and general expenses, $180,000.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Under this item I should like to know whether the government is going to conform with section 133 of the British North America Act, which provides that all acts of parliament should be bilingual. The other day I heard the hon. member for Regina say that we should not go beyond the British North America Act in respect of the minority in this country, and my own opinion is that we should conform to that act and follow its spirit. I was rather surprised to hear that statement come from the hon. member, but this is another story and probably Saskatchewan should put its house in order first. Section 133 of the British North America Act is very clear; all acts of parliament should be published in English and in French, the two official languages of the country, and I believe that should apply to our money as well.

Mr. MARCIL: In the absence of the Minister of Justice I should like to ask the Solicitor General for his view with regard to the section referred to by the hon. member for Montmagny. Is it a question of right or what is it?

Mr. DUPRE: I have no objection to answering that question; my views were expressed in this house during the discussion of the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse, and I would refer my hon. friend to my remarks on that occasion.

Mr. MARCIL: Could the hon. gentleman say in a word what were his views?

Mr. DUPRE: I think it would be better to read the whole speech; then my hon. friend will get the right idea.

Mr. TOTZKE: Would the hon. gentleman say whether he is in accord with the views expressed by the hon. member for Montmagny?

Item agreed to.

To provide for the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, $50,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I spoke to the Minister of Finance when his estimates were under consideration, asking whether he had received from the superintendent of bankruptcy any general statement as to what had taken place in regard to bankruptcies during the calendar year 1932. Members of the committee will remember that when the amendments to the Bankruptcy Act were before the committee attention was directed to the very small amount of money that reached the creditors of bankrupt estates. I think of some $58,000,000 in claims in 1931 about $14,000,000 was realized and something less than $4,000,000 went to the creditors. It was thought that by strict supervision over the administration of bankrupt estates by the superintendent, expenses might be reduced and the proportion reaching the creditors increased. I spoke to the Minister of Finance the other evening, and I thought he intended to get in touch with the superintendent of bankruptcy to see if we could have a statement covering the year 1932. That gentleman is in a better position to furnish such a statement than anyone else, and I think it would show whether we are getting any real results from the changes we made, including the appointment of the superintendent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would it answer the purpose of the hon. gentleman if I asked the Minister of Finance to prepare a statement as soon as possible?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Minister of Finance stated that he would get in touch with the superintendent.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses of work in the interests of fire prevention to be carried on by the Department of Insurance, $9,300.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe some report was made recently by an official of the Finance department with regard to a disastrous fire that took place in Hull. Would the minister state who the official was and what his particular functions are?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. J. Grove Smith is the fire protection commissioner. The work he performs is almost entirely of an advisory, educational and consulting nature, maintaining records of fire losses, preparing reports upon fire prevention legislation and fire protection methods in Canada and foreign countries and so on, with a view to establishing reasonable standards of fire prevention and fire safety in Canada. I have had no official contact with the fire in question or the investigation which I believe was conducted with respect to it, but my impression is that this investigation was carried on by provincial authorities. At all events I shall institute inquiries and ascertain the facts and give them to my right hon. friend before we rise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be well to let the item stand until we get those particulars. It was somewhat of a surprise to discover that the Department of Finance had an obligation in the matter to the extent reported in the press.

Item stands.

Office of the Prime Minister—salaries, $25,830.

Mr. POULIOT: I know the Prime Minister is a very hard worker but I should like to relate an instance which came to my notice. One of the officials of the Kiwanis club of the district of Washington wrote to the Secretary of State of the United States to ask if it would be possible to obtain a bottle of water from the House of Commons in Ottawa. There was a celebration to be held in Washington and the club wanted this water in order to drink a toast to Canada. The Secretary of State of the United States very gravely wrote to the Canadian minister in Washington to ask him if he could supply this sparkling fluid. The Canadian minister wrote to the Department of External Affairs, and I was just wondering if the department communicated with the office of the Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh yes.

Mr. POULIOT: If they did not communicate direct with the office of the Prime Minister, the subsequent actions were taken under the supervision of the Prime Minister himself. He gave instructions that his department should communicate with the Sergeant at Arms. The Sergeant at Arms gave instructions to the chief messenger to fill a clean bottle with water taken from a tap in the House of Commons. The chief messenger filled a bottle with water and returned it to the Sergeant at Arms. It was then turned over to the Department of External Affairs which sent it by special mail or express, I am not sure which—

Mr. POWER: Diplomatic courier.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Quebec South suggests that it probably went by diplomatic courier. However, the bottle was sent to the Secretary of State of the United States who forwarded it to the Canadian minister, who in turn had it conveyed to the president of the club.

Mr. MALCOLM: It did not turn out to be anything else, did it?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. POULIOT: This was during prohibition and probably the president of the Kiwanis club thought that there was something pleasant to the taste in the water drunk by the members of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister may be very busy with matters of state, but if his time is taken up with such things as sending a bottle of water from Ottawa to Washington, he might better stay here and listen to the speeches delivered by hon. members.

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry the Prime Minister is not present as there was a matter I wanted to take up with him. However, as no other opportunity will be afforded, I will take up this matter under this item. On June 22, 1931, upon going into supply, I raised the question of the need of reopening the matter of compensation for the pelagic sealers on the Pacific coast. There was considerable debate at that time in which the Prime Minister took part at some length. He concluded with these words:

> However, now that the opportunity presents itself I shall make inquiry and ascertain from a study of the documents whatever may be necessary to aid my somewhat fautly memory upon some of these points.

If that means anything, I take it to mean that he would look into the situation to see whether action was justified. It is quite a burning question out there. There are a number of people who feel they have been very hardly used in the matter. This is a complicated question with which I am not going to delay the committee now. There are three or four different classes of applicants who consider they have not received justice, and my suggestion was that the government should take into consideration the question whether they should not reopen the whole investigation. Judge Audette was sent out there a number of years ago. To prove that the matter is still a live one in the city of Victoria, I see by a newspaper paragraph that the city council is proposing to seek compensation under the pelagic sealing treaty for three old sealers who are now at the old men's home and it is proposed to ask the Dominion government to investigate the claims of the men, et cetera. It certainly is a question which, if there is any force in the argument that a thing is never settled until it is settled right, should be revived. As I say, I do not want to delay the committee by going into the merits of the matter, because it is too complicated, but I am strongly convinced and many men who are more conversant with the matter than I am are also convinced that certain classes of men are not getting a fair deal.

In regard to the tentative promise of the Prime Minister, I may say that I have been from time to time making attempts through his private secretary to find out whether anything has been done in the matter. I wrote to the private secretary first on December 27, 1931, again on May 10, 1932, again on August 25, 1932, and again on February 9, 1933. Not having received any reply, my only recourse is to bring the matter up in parliament. We are voting, I think, a substantial addition to some secretary's salary. I do not know whether it is this particular gentleman or not, but when a member writes to the secretary of the Prime Minister on a matter that has taken place in the house, he is entitled to a reply. On two occasions I did meet the gentleman and he told me orally that the matter was going to be dealt with or at any rate I would receive a reply, but that has not been forthcoming. I hope the Prime Minister will take notice of this and see that the matter is attended to. This is not a question as to whether I get an answer or not. I am quite indifferent to that. It is a question in respect to which a very substantial wrong has been done to a number of Canadian citizens. The money was appropriated to compensate them and they were not compensated. The money went into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. I hope whoever is in charge for the moment of the item will bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I shall certainly take steps to see that it is brought to his attention.

Item agreed to.

External Affairs — London — salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $1,800 additional to that authorized for the High Commissioner by chap. 15, R.S.C., $123,660.

Mr. RHODES: Inasmuch as the Prime Minister is absent, would it be agreeable to take up the items of the Department of External affairs and leave one item standing with the understanding that any matter may be discussed on it? The first would be number 213, the item now called.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is satisfactory so far as the opposition is concerned, on the understanding that on the item left over we may discuss anything.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would be better to allow the item for the office of the High Commissioner in London to stand.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I understand any discussion will take place on item 213.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes.

Item stands.

Maritime Freight Rates Act — amount required to provide for the payment from time to time to the Canadian National Railway Company of the deficit in receipts and revenues, occurring in the year 1933, of the eastern lines, as provided by the Maritime Freight Rates Act:

(a) Amount of the deficit (less that amount thereof as in the next following paragraph specifically provided for) in the receipts and revenues, $6,611,000.

(b) Amount of the deficit in receipts and revenues occurring on account of the reduction in tolls under the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, $1,404,270.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it not proposed to leave one of these items in the supplementaries, upon which any matter can be discussed?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly, if the hon. gentleman wishes one to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And we shall be free to discuss any supplementary matter upon it?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes.

Item stands.

Public Works—Miscellaneous—Architectural branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draftsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $63,700.

Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, clerks, etc., of outside service, $419,000.

For operation and maintenance of inspection boats, $10,000.

Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, surveys and settlement of land damages, $25,000.

National Gallery of Canada, $35,000.

National monument on Connaught place. $75,000.

Surveys and inspections, $55,000.

Balance of expenditure for works already authorized, provided amount for any one does not exceed $200, $5,000.

Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $3,000 to be expended upon any one work, $50,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Would it not be possible to allow one of the items in the public works estimates to stand? One of my colleagues wishes to discuss the matter of dredging.

Mr. RHODES: There are still two items remaining, if that would suit the purposes of the hon. gentleman. There will be no curtailment of discussion.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Items 270 and 271 still remain.

Mr. POWER: I would like this item to stand because I want to ask for certain information respecting the war pictures that are supposed to be in the cellar of the National Gallery. I want to know if they are still there.

Item stands.

Trade and Commerce—Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and also to provide for the appointment of James Muir as Compiler of "Daily Bulletin," Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Department of Trade and Commerce, at $2,520, per annum, effective April 1, 1933, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, $549,300.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us whether the advertisement I have under my hand, dealing with what the minister expects Canada to do, comes from the bureau of statistics or from the bureau in the department?

Mr. STEVENS: That is under publicity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That comes a little later, does it?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Item agreed to.

National Research Council, $404,500.

Mr. MALCOLM: I want to make one observation on this vote. I am not criticizing the size of the vote, but I want to point out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Finance that in all the expressions which they have received from chambers of commerce all over Canada as to what might be done to reduce the expenditure of the administration not one has referred to this item.

I think that in this item lies the greatest opportunity for economy that might be practised by the government of Canada. I am informed that although the Dominion of Canada has built one of the finest research buildings to be found anywhere, with the definite intention of coordinating the research work of the various departments of government, there still remain thirty-four separate laboratories operating outside the research council building. I quite appreciate the difficulty that faces the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or whoever is the minister in charge of the estimates for the research council. I realize the desire of every deputy minister to retain within his department as many services as he can, and yet in these days when economy should be the watchword, and coordination of services should be resorted to in every way possible, it does seem to me a perfect disgrace that we should be maintaining laboratories in so many different departments, and should not be coordinating the work of research when we have the facilities to do it.

I know perfectly well the attitude of the Prime Minister. I know that when he was leader of the opposition he felt at the time the research council was started that there would be difficulty in having the various departments release their research work so that it might all be coordinated. But I submit to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there is no more effective way of practising economy at the present time than by compelling the deputy ministers who are retaining research departments of their own to help coordinate the work of research. These deputy ministers are all members of the research council, and there should be no rivalry. Research can be done better through coordination of effort in one building than by separate effort in scattered laboratories. Duplication would be avoided, and money would be saved. The research council building was erected for that purpose and I urge upon the Minister of Finance that he bring this matter to the attention of council, and that this duplication be done away with. The vote itself is not large enough. It is in the votes of other departments that savings could be effected.

Mr. STEVENS: I might in a word or two explain the situation. With much that the hon. member has said I am entirely in accord. The development or growth of these separate research laboratories in different departments is, I think, a matter for regret. We have had the matter under study for some time. Only a few weeks ago the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues were discussing the whole situation, and it is intended as soon as parliament prorogues to give the matter very careful study and do the utmost possible to coordinate these services.

Mr. MALCOLM: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: There are a few of them that are necessary in other parts of the country; I shall not go into detail, but coordination can be carried on under the direction and general aegis of the research council and its main central laboratories.

Mr. MALCOLM: I rise only to assure the minister that what he does in that regard will have the full cooperation of those who sit to the left of the Speaker; that was the very purpose for which these laboratories were built by the former government.

Item agreed to.

Printing of parliamentary and departmental publications, including the "Canada Year Book," $139,325.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know what is included in this item, but there are certain publications coming to members of the house which I think a great many of us would be glad not to receive. I have in mind two publications which are distributed to members each year, but for which no payment is made. I refer to the Canadian Annual Review and the Parliamentary Guide. I wonder which department pays for these publications?

Mr. STEVENS: The Parliamentary Guide is prepared privately by officers of the house. There may be a grant, although I am not certain that there is. However it does not come under this vote. I do not think the Canadian Annual Review is published by a department.

Mr. YOUNG: There is a special item dealing with it.

Mr. REID: That is a private book. Are there no grants made to either of these publications?

Sir EUGENE FISET: No; a number of copies are bought by the House of Commons and the Senate.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the same thing.

Mr. STEVENS: The Parliamentary Guide is entirely a private enterprise.

Mr. HEAPS: Is any grant made by the government for the printing of it?

Mr. STEVENS: So far as I know there is not. I make that statement subject to verification.

Mr. NEILL: There is an item in the estimates.

Mr. STEVENS: For the Guide?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think there is.

Mr. YOUNG: There is an item in the estimates for the Canadian Annual Review at $8 a copy.

Mr. STEVENS: We are talking about the Parliamentary Guide.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I believe a certain number of copies are bought and distributed free to the members.

Mr. STEVENS: Probably that is right.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to have this matter settled. Personally I am in favour of cutting both out.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am quite sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated the true facts. So far as I know, no money is voted for purchase of the Parliamentary Guide. Usually however the Senate and House of Commons buy a number of copies for distribution among the members.

Mr. NEILL: That is the same thing.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, that is the same thing. If five hundred books are purchased by the government it is the same thing as giving a grant. I would be in favour of cutting out those purchases. If the members want them, let them buy them from the publishers. I should like to know if the minister or any other member of the government can inform the committee as to the number of books purchased, and the price paid?

Mr. STEVENS: I can state definitely that it does not come under this item. However I shall make inquiries and ascertain what is done. I am under the impression that at the present time no public money is granted to the Parliamentary Guide. However I make that statement with the reservation that I shall look into the matter.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it possible, as has been stated by the acting Prime Minister, that a large number of these books are purchased, and that they are distributed free to the members?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not speaking with any degree of certainty, but my impression is that that used to be the case, but that the practice was discontinued two or three years ago.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister in a position to tell the committee whether the Canadian Annual Review is purchased by the government and then distributed to the members?

Mr. POWER: May I tell the hon. member that at page 18 of the estimates under the heading "Contingencies" the following item appears:

To purchase, for the use of senators and members of parliament, 360 copies of the Canadian Annual Review, edition of 1932-33, $2,340.

Mr. NEILL: I think we will find a similar item for the Parliamentary Guide.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think so.

Mr. HEAPS: Probably this discussion is not relevant to item 285, but my personal opinion is that it would not be a bad idea for the government to discontinue the purchase of these publications for the members of both houses of parliament. I should be happy to have the government take that matter under advisement, and consider discontinuation of purchases of the Canadian Annual Review. If the same practice is followed in connection with the Parliamentary Guide they might—

Mr. QUINN: Include Hansard as well.

Mr. HEAPS: I would not object.

Mr. QUINN: Cut off some of the speeches.

Item agreed to.

Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, including the sum of $100,000 for publicity and advertising in the United Kingdom and Europe to be administered by the High Commissioner for Canada, $173,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have some observations to make concerning the item for publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, including the United Kingdom and Europe. This afternoon we passed rapidly a good many items. I should like to state that in passing those items we would not wish the committee to assume that we do not think there is room for a good deal more in the way of economy in regard to some expenditures of the departments. We realize, however, that at this stage of the session it is probably desirable to hasten matters along, and for that reason we have been content to refer only to one or two items which serve as illustrations of how further economies and avoidance of waste might be effected.

I have in my hand a full page advertisement which appeared in a great many Canadian newspapers. I shall ask the minister to tell the committee how many papers carried the advertisement, their names, and the amounts paid to each. The paper I hold in my hand is the Hamilton Spectator of Thursday, January 5, 1933. Before reading the advertisement I just wish to remind the house of what the Prime Minister himself said, namely, that in the last analysis, exports can be paid for only by imports. In that connection I should like the committee to keep in mind the effect of the government's restrictive tariff policies upon the possibility of extensive importations into Canada.

I believe this advertisement represents a waste of public money; money is simply being thrown away on this type of advertising. It cannot possibly bring in a return to any extent worthy of mention. The advertisement reads:

Canada expects that every producer, every business man, this year will do his duty. And under present conditions his supreme duty is to export, as much as possible, whenever, wherever possible.

Canada never needed more export trade as urgently as she needs it to-day.

She needs it because of the employment it would provide for thousands of those who are now out of work.

She needs it because of the added production it would give her with little or no increase in her overhead, thus improving her competitive position both at home and abroad.

She needs it because of the important part it would play in the solution of the international exchange problem.

Help to bring about a substantial increase in Canada's export trade, and better times will automatically follow.

New Opportunities Beckon

The new trade agreements now in effect with other parts of the British Empire create wonderful opportunities for increasing Canada's trade abroad. But to take full advantage of these new opportunities you must supply commodities which meet the requirements of overseas purchasers.

Price, quality, continuity of supply, these are the prime requisites in securing and maintaining overseas markets. Competition is keen. Purchasers are discriminating in their tastes and preferences. Study their needs and give them what they want, when they want it, and how they want it.

Help Canada by accepting Canada's offer to help you!

H. H. Stevens,
Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Chairman, that sort of lecture or exhortation to the commercial interests of Canada, paid for as advertising matter, is as good an example as could possibly be given of sheer waste of public money. What is needed for a furtherance of export trade is a change of policy on the part of hon. members opposite. Instead of telling Canadian exporters to do the impossible under conditions for which the government itself is largely responsible, let the government by its policies make it possible for the producers of this country to export. Will the minister explain the last sentence in the advertisement—"Give them what they want, when they want it, and how they want it"? What does that mean under present opportunities?

Mr. STEVENS: It means precisely what it says. That is one of the things which is necessary more than anything else in Canada. The Canadian exporter must study the requirements of foreign markets, and must give them the articles they want in line as nearly as possible with their demands. He must study the markets abroad and time his exportations to suit the requirements of those markets. The right hon. gentleman has on several occasions, in fact ever since I took charge of this office, criticized me very bitterly for anything that I have done at any time in connection with publicity. This particular publicity was the subject of so many favourable comments that I was satisfied it was a timely and proper note to sound in regard to our export business. I quite admit that the right hon. gentleman will differ from me in this respect, but this advertising is done with an earnest desire to stimulate the interest of Canadians in our export business. I am not desirous of entering into a lengthy discussion of the matter, but may I say briefly, that our exports, as far as quantity is concerned, leaving aside price, have been kept up remarkably well. I have been proud of what Canada has achieved in this respect, particularly in the last year of serious depression. We are simply doing our utmost to extend that.

The right hon. gentleman referred also to the amount allocated for advertising in Great Britain. That includes the regular campaign in respect to Canadian apples, instituted before I came into office, which has been perhaps one of the most successful pieces of advertising that the people of Canada have ever undertaken. It was carried on under the officials who were in charge of it before we came into power. The cost is some $10,000 to $20,000 a year; I think last year we expended $20,000 on that account.

We are also carrying on advertising in Great Britain in connection with maple products, canned goods and other Canadian products. The amount allocated there has been materially cut down. But I feel quite satisfied with the efforts we have made in that respect. I recognize that the right hon. gentleman disagrees with me; he has sought on many occasions to refer humourously to these things and if that gives him any satisfaction it does not hurt me. But I want to assure him that these things are done with the definite object and desire to assist in the expansion of Canadian business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has not told me in how many papers he has inserted these advertisements and what was the expenditure involved.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid I have not under my hand the detailed information in that respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is important that the committee should have that information before the item carries. Perhaps the minister would make a note of it and give the committee a list of the Canadian papers that have received this advertising.

Mr. STEVENS: If the right hon. gentleman will let me have the advertisement I will attend to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to know how much has been spent in connection with this advertisement. The minister might also inform the committee whether he has given similar advertisements to other papers, and how much has been spent on government advertisements of the kind mentioned in Canadian publications.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall be glad to get that information.

Item stands.

Weights and measures inspection service, including international bureau of weights and measures, $311,620.

Mr. REID: What item of revenue does this come under?

Mr. STEVENS: Under weights and measures. My hon. friend wants the revenue for last year, I presume. The revenue for 1930-31 was $420,000; for 1931-32, $406,000. At the time this statement was made the end of the year had not arrived, so I have not the precise figures for 1932-33.

Mr. MALCOLM: That branch of the service is more than self-sustaining, and has been.

Mr. STEVENS: It shows a balance every year.

Mr. REID: I should like to make a suggestion. I understand that a charge is made of $2.50 for inspecting gas pumps. I had a complaint from Vancouver the other day. It is well known that some gasoline stations now have eight or ten different pumps, and the inspector comes along and charges the owner of the station $2.50 for every gasoline pump he has. I suggest that the minister take that under advisement, because it does not take long when the inspector is there to go over all the pumps. Many stations are complaining that it is too much to charge $2.50 for every pump they own.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already gone into the matter with care, and I cannot find that there are any hardships. The inspection is once a year. It is a protection to the seller of the gasoline as well as the public; particularly of course is it a protection to the public. It is a good service, well organized and carried on in an excellent manner, and while we have had a few complaints regarding fees—very few—I have gone into that phase carefully and I see no reason to lower the fees. I can assure my hon. friend that the question has not been treated lightly.

Mr. GARDINER: May I call the minister's attention to the dissatisfaction that is prevalent concerning the manner in which coal is weighed. I think it has been brought to the minister's attention on several occasions within the last twelve months. The complaint is that the weighing of coal in the railway cars by the railway companies is not accurately done; very often the cars are short two, three or four tons. We think a more accurate method should be devised. Has the minister given the matter any consideration?

Mr. STEVENS: There may be isolated cases that I have not heard of. If the hon. gentleman has any information and would let me have it confidentially we will follow it up at once. But it must be apparent that there is a double check on this. The railways will weigh these cars to the maximum weight they hold for the purpose of getting the maximum revenue; for the charge is according to weight. There may be occasional inaccuracies, but they are rare. I think the business is now on a very excellent basis. But I shall be glad to have any information of that character, and to look into it at once.

Mr. GARDINER: I think information was sent to the minister some twelve months ago.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not charge my mind with it at the moment.

Mr. GARDINER: I will make inquiries, and if the situation is as it was twelve months ago I will give it to the minister.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Atlantic ocean—Pacific ocean—local services, $2,172,930.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is a very large increase in the Canada-United Kingdom and Canada-South Africa services, also in the Pacific service, Canada-China and Japan, over what was granted a few years ago. I wish the minister would explain those increases.

Mr. STEVENS: The increases arise out of this situation; the steamship lines of competing countries are subsidized very heavily, to the extent of at least three times what we are paying. Our steamship service in these waters is of vital interest to the maintenance of our trade routes. The matter was very carefully considered, and we decided that in order to keep these splendid mail, passenger and freight services going it was absolutely essential that very substantial subsidies should be granted, and as my hon. friend knows these subsidies were adopted two or three years ago.

Then with regard to the item for South Africa, there is a splendid opportunity at the present time for an expansion of our trade from the Pacific coast with South Africa, touching also the easterly coast of that country. While that service has not been allocated or tenders called for, later on it is intended to have that done. The object is to establish a continuity of service on the Pacific between Canada and South Africa. At present our goods are carried there by lines operating directly from San Francisco and Seattle. Briefly this is the explanation for these two items.

Mr. MALCOLM: I have no objection to the old-established subsidy with regard to the service on the Atlantic between Canada and South Africa, nor have I any objection to the new service which the minister proposes to establish between Canada and South Africa on the Pacific. This subsidy for service between Canada, China and Japan, however, is a very large item, and I should like to know to whom it is paid.

Mr. STEVENS: The Canadian Pacific.

Mr. MALCOLM: I submit to the minister that this is another case of an abnormally large subsidy being paid to encourage trade, while the purpose is defeated by one of his own colleagues. Some time ago I pointed out to the Minister of National Revenue that raw silk could be imported into New York without the application of any dumping duty at all, whereas in Canada the Customs department applied a currency valuation which allows a dumping duty on this article. A man buying a hundred thousand yen worth of silk, which would be about $25,000 worth, could save $1,400 by buying that silk in New York instead of buying it in Tokyo and importing it by Canadian steamships through a Canadian port. Here we have the Minister of National Revenue making it easier for the silk to be taken via the Panama canal to New York than to be brought directly to Vancouver, and yet in the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce we have this very substantial sum of $659,000 being voted which is paid the Canadian Pacific in order to encourage trade with Japan. I submit to the minister that this is a very large subsidy. Some years ago the British government wanted to secure the flagship of the Atlantic, and subsidized the Cunard line to construct the Lusitania and the Mauritania. The subsidy granted amounted to $364,000 per year per ship. The British government got two fast transatlantic transports, which they could and did use for troop ships in time of war; they had the flagship of the Atlantic, and all this for a sum not much greater than the amount we here ask for one service. In my opinion $659,000 is a very substantial amount, and is quite out of line with the volume of tonnage being carried on the route. I believe this first item of $535,000 to subsidize the line between Canada and the United Kingdom on the Atlantic is justifiable to some extent because it includes the former subsidies for mail service.

Mr. STEVENS: The Pacific subsidy includes mail service also.

Mr. MALCOLM: But these two items, totalling practically $1,200,000 a year, at 5 per cent would represent a capital investment of $24,000,000. In consideration of the volume of trade that is moving at present I consider them very generous subsidies.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has not been quite fair in his analysis. Previously we paid the cost of carrying the mails, but that is included in this service.

Mr. EULER: How much was that?

Mr. STEVENS: I was looking for that information, but I do not seem to have it here. It is a very substantial amount. On the Canada-Australia service the cost of carrying the mail is greater than the subsidy we give, and we may have to bring that back to where it was formerly in the supplementary estimates. Then there is another point: On the Pacific coast the United States pay a subsidy of $5,000,000 for the China-Japan service.

Mr. MALCOLM: But they have a large volume of business.

Mr. STEVENS: We have a very substantial business also with both China and Japan, and our trade with those countries is increasing. On the Atlantic these subsidies ensure a service which could not be maintained otherwise, at least in these days. We thus provide for the carrying of the mails and we have a fast, all-Canadian route. My conviction, after going into the matter with great care, is that we are justified in paying these subsidies.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has the minister any figures that would indicate the percentage of the total trade passing over this route which would be represented by this subsidy?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I do not think so; the figures never have been segregated in that way. There is no question as to the remarkably fine service given by this company with regard to high class freight going from Canada to the orient. Our high class package freight moves with very great dispatch.

Mr. MALCOLM: But the volume is small.

Mr. STEVENS: It is very considerable.

Mr. NEILL: Was not the China vote cut by a third last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Previously it was $988,000?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The business under the heading of private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will now revert to committee of supply.

Trade and Commerce—Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions—Atlantic ocean—Pacific ocean—local services, $2,172,930.

Mr. REID: The committee will remember that last year I discussed the matter of the employment of orientals on subsidized Canadian ships. At that time I pointed out that while it was true that we had no control over the employment of seamen on ships operated by private owners, we as a country should give a lead in seeing that something is done to have more Canadians employed at least on our subsidized ships. At the present time there are 2,573 orientals engaged on ships running out of the Pacific coast while over 2,000 white seamen are without employment.

Mr. HEAPS: Where do those ships ply to?

Mr. REID: The Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited operates a line between Vancouver and the orient. The steamship Empress of Asia employs 500 orientals; the Empress of Canada employs 500; the Empress of Japan, 495, and the Empress of Russia, 500, while each ship has a personnel, including the captain and engineer, of only 60 to 65 white Canadian seamen. In the coastwise service, 107 orientals are employed by the Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited while the Union Steamships Limited employs 90. Large subsidies are paid to these companies. I believe I am correct in stating that a subsidy of $4,950 per outward trip per ship is paid to the British Canadian Steamships Limited which employs approximately 300 orientals.

Mr. HEAPS: Does Japan pay any subsidies to these companies?

Mr. REID: My information is that they do not. I understand, and the minister can correct me if I am wrong, that this company sometimes charter other ships, and that they receive the same subsidy for each outward journey, and this is money which they obtain for very little outlay. After investigating this matter, I have come to the conclusion that these subsidies do not help the lumbering industry of British Columbia. I think it was last year that the minister pointed out that they were given in order to encourage this industry, but I do not think they help at all.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the hon. gentleman please explain himself a little further?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You might object to the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) who started these.

Mr. REID: If they were given to companies employing orientals I would have taken exactly the stand I am taking right now. I understand that a Mr. MacMillan is in charge of lumber sales for British Columbia. When he receives an order the rates are quoted to various parts of the world, to China, to Australia, to New Zealand or some other country. I maintain that the lumber would be shipped just as cheaply to these particular countries even though no subsidies were paid. At the present moment ships come to the Fraser river to load lumber for Great Britain and other parts of the world. Although they are not subsidized by their respective governments, they carry the lumber at as reasonable rates as this subsidized company.

I think it is about time that we in Canada began to look after our own people a little bit. Every other country is giving encouragement to the employment of its own nationals as seamen. When a Norwegian ship comes to Vancouver or New Westminster it is manned by Norwegian seamen; British ships are manned by British seamen, the Australian ships by Australian seamen, but when it comes to our own ships, no encouragement whatever is given to the employment of Canadian seamen. When subsidies are paid by the people of Canada, Canadian seamen should be employed. There is another matter to which I would like to refer but it is one for which perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce has no responsibility. Ships of British registry entering the ports of British Columbia will not engage Canadian seamen. I should like to read a sworn statement by one Paul Bailey. It reads:

He says regarding his application for a position on the steamship Janeta, which I believe is a British vessel:

That I produced my discharge certificate numbered 10094 as aforesaid, and opened the same showing the entries covering my periods of employment from the year 1925 to date.

That after perusing the same, the said master informed me that I could not obtain employment unless I had a British Board of Trade discharge book, and was domiciled in England.

That I was born in Canada and have always lived in Canada, and I explained this to the master, but he still refused to give me employment for the reasons aforesaid.

That the assistant shipping master who was present did not inform the master of the vessel that Canadian born seamen who have resided in Canada are unable to obtain British board certificates in Canada, and that my certificate of discharge book is the proper certificate for me to have, and is the certificate that is generally accepted, at the port of Vancouver by British masters seeking to employ firemen or trimmers.

That I am informed and verily believe that the said ss. Janeta—

That is the ship the master of which refused to hire this Canadian seaman because he was not domiciled in England and did not have a British board of trade certificate.

—is subsidized by the Canadian government, and that the said vessel is trading between Canada and the orient and that I am advised and verily believe that the refusal of the said master to employ me, by reason of my failure to possess a British Board of Trade certificate was improper.

That suitable regulations covering cases of this kind should be forthwith made to prevent repetition of these occurrences affecting myself and other seamen.

And I solemnly make this declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and knowing it to be of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

He signed this before a justice of the peace. It was sent to me by the Canadian Seamen's Institute of Vancouver, along with one or two other affidavits to the effect that Canadian seamen could not obtain employment on British ships coming to the ports of New Westminster and Vancouver.

It is high time that we in this country take serious note of the fact that no encouragement whatever is given to our seamen and young men to follow the calling of the sea. It is annoying to think we would have that number of orientals employed on ships on the Pacific trading between foreign ports or carrying on coastwise trade, when there are in the ports of New Westminster and Vancouver more than 3,000 Canadian seamen who are willing to work and who are just as competent as, if not more competent than, the orientals, but who cannot obtain positions or employment on those ships on account of the fact that orientals are given the preference.

It has been stated before that if we commenced to curtail the employment of orientals, Japan or some other foreign country might take note of the fact. It might be interesting to the committee to know that Australia, which has gone very far in that sort of legislation and which does not allow ships with oriental crews to unload in her ports, a move which one might consider very drastic, has been doing far more trade during the past three or four years with Japan and China than Canada has. But I come back to the point that every country is giving encouragement to its own nationals while we in Canada ignore this entirely, although we have on the entrance to the parliament buildings the words:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): North should have been added to that.

Mr. REID: I am willing to add that, only I hope when the north is added, the unwholesome conditions that we have on the Pacific coast will not be found there also.

The situation in the east is different from that on the Pacific, because ships from eastern Canadian ports are employing Canadians.

Mr. LAVERGNE: No.

Mr. REID: Two days ago the question was asked in the railway committee and I was informed that boats belonging to the Canadian National and plying between Atlantic ports and the West Indies were employing Canadian citizens. If that is the case, I am pleased to hear it.

Mr. LAVERGNE: They are not.

Mr. REID: That was my information. I am sorry to hear they are not. That makes the situation all the worse.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Whom are they employing?

Mr. LAVERGNE: Englishmen, Scotchmen or Welshmen, but not Canadians.

Mr. REID: It has been stated that many of these orientals are British subjects, and I believe if they come from some Chinese ports, they claim to be British subjects, but no one can be sure whether they are or not. Personally I doubt their statements. But what I want is that we employ our own people, because the Asiatic, whether he calls himself or actually is a British subject, is of a non-assimilable race. I could point out the danger that might arise, if war broke out in the Pacific, with all these orientals on board these ships. Take, for example, ships with a crew of 600 orientals and only a few whites. It may be said that orientals are necessary in carrying oriental passengers. We are not objecting to a few orientals being carried on these ships, but we are objecting to the employment of hundreds of orientals as against a very few whites. I urge upon the minister and the committee that we show the way to the others by inserting in the contracts for our subsidized lines some provision that on a mail subsidized ship or one subsidized for the carrying of cargo, greater consideration be given to our own Canadian citizens.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a brief reply to my hon. friend. In the first place it must be borne in mind that these ships are running from a Canadian port to two oriental countries, China and Japan, and in the question of international trade one must respect the rights of one country just as much as those of another.

In regard to the Canadian Pacific ships which make Hongkong their terminal port in China and Vancouver their terminal port on this side, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out many of the crews are British subjects taken on at Hongkong. I tell him very candidly now as I told the house last year, that we certainly cannot suggest a discrimination agaist British subjects from any part of the British Empire, whatever their race, colour or creed may be.

My hon. friend says that the British-Canadian steamship service is of no use to British Columbia.

Mr. REID: I said to the lumber industry.

Mr. STEVENS: I was going to say that he had better address that observation to the lumber interests of British Columbia.

Mr. REID: I certainly shall.

Mr. STEVENS: As a matter of fact, it has been of very great assistance to the lumber trade of British Columbia, particularly in the last year or so. This service was started several years ago. The first contract was with Mr. H. R. MacMillan, who, if not a shipowner, was a ship charterer and carried on his business in that way. He had a three year contract entered into with my predecessor in office. At that time he ran to Australia, but the last two years or thereabouts he ran to China. I have before me the figure as to the lumber carried and it runs into a very considerable amount. The main reason for the granting of that subsidy was to assist in the moving of lumber freely from British Columbia. It was considered to have been a good service and profitable to that province in its results. Last June or thereabouts this contract ran out and we called for tenders for another one. While under the previous contract we paid $7,700 a trip, the British Canadian Steamship Company made a tender at $4,950 a trip, a very greatly reduced amount, and they were given the business. They have two ships not only wholly Canadian owned but built in the city of Vancouver during the latter part of the war by the Coughlan shipyard, and those ships have been operated by them ever since. In addition to those two ships, on one or two occasions they have had additional lumber offering to what they were able to carry and they asked for the privilege of an extra voyage; they chartered a ship and they got that privilege. I would not stand in their way and they moved the lumber and moved it quickly. These chartered ships in practically every instance were British bottoms. Obviously it would be unwise for this government to dictate to the shipping interests of Canada or Great Britain just what type of crew they should carry.

I can tell the committee frankly that we have gone into this matter with considerable care, and there is no way, apart from abandoning the contract altogether, in which we could dictate to them what crews they should carry. It is true we could put in a clause that they must carry only Canadian crews. That could be done, but the service would cost a tremendous amount more. I am not desirous of entering into any argument or discussion over this matter; I am merely stating the facts as they exist. Take, for instance, the Canadian Pacific boats. A very large proportion of their passengers carried in the second class and in the steerage are orientals, and it is quite obvious, without desiring to make any invidious comparisons, that white crews would not serve oriental passengers of the steerage and second class on board those ships. That is the experience of these shipping concerns in oriental waters. Besides, there is an element of fairness in this, because we are seeking to develop trade between Canada and China and Japan, and I think it would ill become Canada through its parliament to discriminate against the citizens of the countries with which we are seeking to develop trade. There is an element of fairness and common sense in this case which must be recognized.

The hon. gentleman also stated that the trade was no good for Canada. I happen to have under my hand a letter dated March 6 last which I shall quote in part to indicate the value of this British-Canadian Steamship Service in carrying lumber freight from the province of British Columbia to the orient. It is addressed to myself by Mr. Day of the Federal Lumber Company, and reads in part:

> When you appointed the Ocean Shipping Company Limited of Vancouver, B.C., to receive the subsidy to China, we were greatly encouraged, as this is solely a shipping company. Our company immediately took steps to form a connection in China, as we were thus assured that we would get equal freight rates with all competitors. The result has been very gratifying. In February we shipped 400,000 feet of lumber to Shanghai, and will ship 700,000 feet of cottonwood logs in March. We are negotiating to-day on a yearly contract for 8,000,000 feet if our present shipments on arrival are satisfactory, as we are sure they will be. Further, one of our principal customers in Shanghai has never had a British Columbia source of supply, so that his shipments are a straight gain for Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which Mr. Day is that?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. E. S. Day, president of the Federal Lumber Company. We have abundance of evidence that this service is highly appreciated by the lumber interests of British Columbia. I may tell the committee very frankly that I am not prepared at this time to say that we should attempt to dictate to the steamship companies the ratings that they should carry on their ships. This is a matter that has been well worked out among the shipping interests of the world. We do endeavour to limit the vessels to British ships when British ships are available. It is true that in previous years Swedish or Norwegian ships have occasionally been chartered, but not many. The ships were largely British bottoms chartered by MacMillan, who held the previous three-year contract, and by the present contractors. There are two British Columbia built boats, and one or two other ships which were British bottoms have been chartered. That is virtually all there is to say on the matter, Mr. Chairman. Personally I am very well pleased with the results of these subsidies so far as the Pacific coast is concerned.

One observation I should like to add, and that is that the freight services from Seattle and San Francisco competing with the services from British Columbia are all heavily subsidized by the United States government, and I say frankly that Canada cannot compete unless a subvention is paid that will enable us to do so by a reduction of the freight on lumber—I am speaking of lumber now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where does the item for the British-Canadian Steamship Company appear in the estimates.

Mr. STEVENS: It appears on page 37 of the estimates, the first item under the heading "Pacific Ocean," and the amount is $66,000.

Mr. NEILL: Is not that the subsidized service of the British-Canadian Steamship Company?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I thought the minister gave a different name when quoting from the letter a moment ago. I thought he quoted the name of the company which had the contract as the Ocean Shipping Company.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister be good enough to go through the list of services appearing under the heading "Pacific ocean", and indicate the company that receives the subsidy in each case?

Mr. STEVENS: With regard to the first one, the British Columbia-Australian service, the word "Australia" might as well not be there, but that was the original contract made about five or six years ago when the service included Australia. My predecessor came to parliament in 1929, if I recall aright, and asked that it be changed to "Australia and/or China," but since then the service has been run exclusively to China. That is the British-Canadian Steamship Company, known to those familiar with shipping in Vancouver as the Coughlan Company.

With regard to the next item, $100,000 for the British Columbia and South Africa service, there is no subsidy contract outstanding, but there is a very excellent prospect for vastly increasing our business with South Africa. We have been tremendously encouraged with the outlook in South Africa and in west and east Africa.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No contract has yet been awarded for that service?

Mr. STEVENS: No. We will call for tenders later. The next is the Canada, China and Japan service, $659,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How much of that subsidy is for mail service?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not segregated but last year from April 1 to December 31 this line carried 62,000 bags of mail. A very substantial portion of the subsidy would be for the carriage of mail.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does the company receive any other subsidy for the carrying of mail besides this sum granted by Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Not from Canada.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: This covers the entire cost to the Canadian government of carrying the mail?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. It includes our mail service and the maintenance of this very important communication with the orient. I have under my hand a list of the steamship lines subsidized by the United States government, and the subsidies amount in all to $5,000,000 a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the Pacific coast?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, for services running from San Francisco and Seattle to Japan and China.

Mr. HEAPS: How many subsidized vessels are there on the United States side?

Mr. STEVENS: It is difficult to say. I imagine it takes about six or seven weeks for a round trip, depending upon what the trip is. There are nine different lines subsidized; I have not the ships.

The next item is for the Canada New Zealand service. That is the regular Canadian-Australian-New Zealand service run by the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand as distinct from the Union Steamship Company of British Columbia. In regard to this subsidy may I say that the value of carrying mail exceeds the $75,000. We cut this to $75,000 last year, but I intend later to bring in a supplementary estimate to meet the actual cost of carrying the mail. Then we have the Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte Islands service; that is Canadian National. Then the Vancouver and British West Indies service is handled by the Canadian Transport Company. That is a freight service which has done excellent service. It carries, chiefly, lumber, oats, hay and other produce, and some fish. Then we have the Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia service at a cost of $18,600, credited to the Union Steamship Company. That is a local coastwise service. Then there is the Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway service, $12,500, a Canadian Pacific service to the north, including the carriage of mail. Then we have the Victoria and West coast Vancouver Island service, operated by the Canadian Pacific from Victoria around the west coast of Vancouver Island.

Mr. MALCOLM: At six o'clock, the minister promised to bring in some figures showing the amount of freight carried on the Canadian Pacific steamship lines, which receive a subsidy of $659,000 per annum. In 1928, 1929 and 1930, when we were doing business with Japan amounting to $44,000,000 a year, no subsidy was paid.

Mr. STEVENS: In 1932 the total was 18,000 tons measurement and 69,000 tons weight to a value of $6,383,000. In 1931 it was $7,495,000 for a period of nine months only, from April 1 to December 31. That is on the whole service.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has the minister any knowledge of what was formerly paid the Canadian Pacific for the carriage of mail before he put both services under one subsidy?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not the total amount, but I know one dollar a cubic foot was paid.

Mr. MALCOLM: It would be interesting to have that information.

Mr. REID: I should like to say one or two words more before the item passes. I cannot agree with the minister when he states that we in Canada cannot dictate who shall be employed on subsidized ships. It seems strange that Canada should take the stand that she cannot do it when other countries of no greater importance do it. Yet we seem to be afraid; the minister says that it would interfere with trade and that any interference would be dangerous to Canada. We know that no ships carrying oriental crews can unload in Australia; yet Australia has prospered as much as Canada. Before the depreciation of the yen and the general depreciation in exchange currencies, in the years 1928, 1929, 1930 and 1931, she did more business than Canada did with Japan and China, yet Australia excludes the Oriental entirely. They have a law under which they allow no Chinamen or Japanese into their country. Despite those facts their trade has not been harmed. From the Canadian Association of Seamen I have a letter, part of which is as follows:

> Our investigation committee discovered that Italian ships, Norwegian, Swedish or Danish, German, French, Chinese and Japanese all carried their own nationals aboard their ships, but when it came to the examination of vessels flying the British flag and sailing under Canadian registry, to our amazement they reported that there were 2,573 orientals on Canadian registered vessels, and on rechecking these figures we discovered that number if anything was a conservative estimate.

I cannot agree with the minister when he states that we cannot dictate, and I believe it is about time we did dictate, on behalf of our own people, and especially when we are paying over a million dollars in subsidies to ships and plying on the Pacific out of New Westminster or Vancouver. The item before us is for $995,540, and I think that figure is further augmented by a subsidy of $4,950 per month. Before I sit down I should like to ask if the Empress liners are being overhauled at Esquimalt dock. Last year some arrangements were made I believe for overhauling in Esquimalt and I believe the Canadian Pacific did consider overhauling at that point. Are they having their ships overhauled at Esquimalt?

Mr. STEVENS: Generally speaking they have been overhauling at Hongkong; I believe that has been the practice for about thirty years. One ship was overhauled at Esquimalt last year.

Mr. NEILL: You gave way on some of the docking charges.

Mr. REID: The largest dock in Canada is situated at Esquimalt; it could take care of the largest liner. Yet this company, receiving so much money from the people of Canada and flying a Canadian or British flag, according to the point of registration—because some of the ships are registered in London, England, and some in Canada—and carrying oriental crews, are not willing to spend any money in Canada; when they want any overhauling done they go to Hongkong and leave our own yards idle. That condition should not obtain. I had hopes when the minister made arrangements last year that all repairing would be done at Esquimalt dock, and that all Canadian Pacific ships would be overhauled at that point. Apparently, however, they continue to have that work done in China or Japan. I object very much to the Canadian Pacific or any other company using oriental crews and having their work done at other points, especially when that company is subsidized and assisted by Canadian funds.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should like to consolidate as briefly as I can my criticism of two items in the estimates. The people of Canada are asked to vote $659,000 for service between Canada and China and Japan, a vote which did not exist in the year 1930 when this government came into power. They are also being asked to vote subsidies between Canada and the United Kingdom on the Atlantic for $535,000, another vote which did not exist in 1930 when this government took office.

The minister points out that part of this service is the carriage of mail. In the estimates for the Post Office Department for the year 1930, at page 73, we find that the total amount of money paid by the Post Office Department of the Dominion of Canada for the carriage of mail by steamship, on all services, Atlantic, Pacific and internal, amounted to only $530,000. Therefore, if we allowed all the money which the Post Office Department paid for these two services we find that we still have an increase on these two services alone of well on to $700,000. I submit to the minister that the trade of Canada at the present time does not justify any such increase in the amounts paid to steamship companies. In 1928 our trade with Japan was $32,000,000 export and $12,000,000 import, and no subsidy of $659,000 was paid to carry that trade. True the American government do give subsidies, but they give a less rate per capita or per ton of freight than Canada. This trade would move without any such substantial subsidy.

As to the other items in the estimates, I have very little complaint. I believe they are the ordinary subsidies which have been granted for many years. The subsidies to New Zealand and Australia are quite in line with the volume of business carried; they amount to only $60,000 or $70,000. But these other amounts are very substantial. One of these subsidies is as large as the British government paid for the building of the Mauretania and the Lusitania, the two ships of the Cunard line which gave Great Britain the blue ribbon of the Atlantic, and two of the finest troopships for use in time of emergency. I submit that the minister should reduce these estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How long has this $659,000 item been in the estimates?

Mr. STEVENS: This is the third year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I in a word support what has been said by the hon. member for North Bruce and the hon. member for New Westminster. The minister rather suggested, although he was not very definite, that the company which is getting this tremendous subsidy could not compete if it employed none but white seamen. He also suggested, I gather, that international complications might result from excluding from employment on ships in this trade the subjects of other nations across the Pacific. I suggest that that argument does not apply. Especially in a service subsidized by the Canadian government we should insist that at least a substantial majority, say seventy-five per cent, of all ranks on the ships should be Canadian seamen. The minister knows as well as I do that the feeling on the Pacific coast, especially in Vancouver and New Westminster, in regard to this matter is becoming very acute. I suggest that in a time of unemployment and emergency over 3,000 of our Canadian unemployed in these ports, men well qualified for all grades of service, could be given work on these ships. When we are giving such a tremendous subsidy to one company it should be on the condition that at least a substantial majority of those employed should be our own Canadian seamen.

I agree with the hon. member for North Bruce in regard to the major portion of the 84 subsidies; I think they serve a good purpose and help to develop the trade of the Pacific coast, but I am sure the minister himself would like to see our Canadian seamen employed. The day will soon come when we must insist on this or cease paying the subsidy. It would be of tremendous help in solving our unemployment problem; it would remove two or three thousand unemployed from the coast cities of British Columbia, and the same thing might apply on the Atlantic. Now that Canada has assumed all the obligations of nationhood, I do not see why we should not restrict this employment to our own sailors, to the exclusion of others, including those of other countries of the empire. I think our own men are as well qualified as any, possibly not as engineers, but in most grades of service. I think an administration elected on the cry of "Canada first" should carry that policy to its logical conclusion and restrict employment on lines subsidized or controlled by Canada to Canadian seamen.

Mr. DUFF: I was very interested in what the hon. member for North Bruce said in reference to the difference between the amount of trade done from Pacific coast ports to China and Japan this year and last compared with the trade done three or four years ago. He argued that because of the reduction in trade there should not be such a large subsidy paid. I think the reason this large subsidy has to be paid is that there has been such a large decrease in trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DUFF: It is due entirely to the policies of this government. The foreign trade of this country has decreased more than fifty per cent. In 1929-30 the trade was $2,600,000,000, but due to the policies of this government it has decreased until now it is only something like $800,000,000.

Mr. HACKETT: All the fault of the government!

Mr. DUFF: And the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett)! The reason the government is compelled to pay these larger subsidies is that if the subsidies were not increased these steamers could not continue to operate on the small amount of cargo which is now being carried.

I notice that the minister has been rather generous to his own province. Of course he represents a constituency in British Columbia, yet he is Minister of Trade and Commerce for the whole of Canada. I am not going to object at the moment to the fact that a very large part of the several subsidies under the heading of the Pacific coast is paid in order to encourage the export of lumber from British Columbia ports. If the minister in his capacity as Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks it is in the interest of Canada that subsidies should be granted for the carriage of lumber from Pacific coast ports, then I say that as Minister of Trade and Commerce for the whole of Canada he should also have provided that the same treatment be given to the ports on the Atlantic ocean. We on the Atlantic coast are just as much entitled to have ships subsidized and encouragement given as they are in the province of British Columbia. Perhaps after I sit down the minister will give the committee reasons why he has picked out one province and ignored the Atlantic ports, because as far as the lumber industry is concerned that is what he has done; there is no money voted in these estimates to encourage the lumber trade from Atlantic ports.

There is another matter to which I want to refer. I notice that while the minister has been giving these large subsidies to British Columbia, and has voted a new item of $100,000 for one service alone, in respect to the small local services in the maritime provinces, he has not only reduced the amounts previously paid but has cut several of them out altogether. There is a very important service between the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, and the town of Digby, Nova Scotia. It is not only a convenient service to local travellers between those ports, but also to passengers travelling between Montreal and Nova Scotia using the bay of Fundy route. Yet I notice that the minister proposes, in order to provide this $100,000 for the shipping interests in British Columbia, to cut out entirely the subsidy given for the steamship service between Saint John and Digby. On that route there is one of the best steamers running on a coastal route in Canada. I am sure the Minister of Pensions and National Health will agree with me that it is necessary that that important service be kept up, not only for the ports of Saint John and Digby, but in the interests of the maritime provinces generally. I notice there is another service cut out. This is not in my own constituency but in the province of Nova Scotia, so it shows I am not selfish about it at all. The taxpayers and citizens of that province have helped to pay their share of large amounts for the Canadian National railways, for the Canadian National steamships services and other matters. The people of the districts to which I refer have no railway connections; their only connections are by means of the small steamers plying from the city of Halifax to different ports along the Nova Scotia coast. But I notice that this government, which in this case is penny wise and pound foolish, in order to save a little money has discontinued a subsidy for the service between the city of Halifax and the port of LaHave, in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg. The port of LaHave is some fifteen or tweny miles from a railway station. This steamship called at three or four ports which had no railway connections, and it seems to me that it is not fair to these people, who have paid their share of our railway costs, to cut out this subsidy and cut off their communication with the rest of the province except by sailing schooners. It would cost only a small sum of money to maintain this service, and I believe these people are entitled to some consideration from this government.

Now I am going to get a little more selfish. I notice that there are two services in my constituency, one of which is from the town of Mulgrave, which is a railway centre, to the town of Guysborough, the shire town of the county. I notice that for this service the sum of $10,500 is allotted.

Mr. SANDERSON: It is not enough.

Mr. DUFF: No, it is not; that is what I am coming to. This amount was formerly $14,000. If this service was discontinued these people would have to drive sixty miles to a railway station, but with this reduction the company which has the contract must use a boat less suitable for the service than otherwise would be the case. So far as I am concerned, if they are necessary in order to help business on the Pacific coast or anywhere else I do not object to these large subsidies, but I say it is just as important that the small services, which perform a very good work in looking after the people who have no railway communication, should be continued. I say it is not fair for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to reduce or eliminate these items, in order to save a few thousand dollars.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I notice that the sum of $33,750 is to be voted for the service between Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso. The minister will tell me, no doubt, that the late government also paid a very substantial sum for this service. That is quite true, but then the service was direct from Mulgrave to Canso, which is not the case now. The boat leaves Mulgrave and goes to Arichat, which is in the constituency of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance; then, after unloading its freight and passengers, it has to go across to Canso, usually arriving there some time after dark. The towns of Canso and Hazel Hill are sufficiently important to have a direct service from Mulgrave to Canso, and the passengers and freight should not have to wait while the boat calls at Arichat. I suggest to the minister—and I think I wrote him in this connection—that the department should arrange to continue the practice followed in the past and have two services, one from Mulgrave to Arichat, and the other direct from Mulgrave to Canso. The boat used on that service is fairly good, but I think it would be much better if the minister would arrange to split this subsidy and have those two services carried on.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member has covered a good deal of ground, and with much that he has said of course I am more or less familiar. Certainly I will take into consideration some of his very reasonable and moderately worded requests. I am not prepared to tell my hon. friend now that I will do all that he asks, but certainly I will look into the matter very carefully. As a matter of fact we are making a very close study of these matters and it may be that some adjustments will have to be made. On the other hand, however, with regard to my hon. friend's comparison of the subsidies on the Atlantic with those on the Pacific, we must bear in mind that there are some services being given at government expense. For instance there is a service between the eastern ports, Montreal in the summer, and Halifax and Saint John in the winter, and New Zealand and Australia, both carried on by the Canadian National steamships. While they do not receive a subsidy from this department they receive more or less of a subsidy by way of payment of their losses, under another department. If we check off one against the other we will find that there are only the China and Australian services from the Pacific, while on the Atlantic we have the South African service, the Australian service and the New Zealand service, not given under direct subsidies but carried on by the Canadian National steamships. There are also a number of coastwise services in British Columbia which correspond to the long list of coastwise services on the Atlantic. I merely mention this in passing, because I think there is a fairly good division.

I was rather surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for North Bruce. It is true that the value of the trade has fallen, but I should like to give the figures of the ton weights carried by these ships on the Pacific, for instance. From April 1 to December 31, 1931, this service carried 52,900 tons weight and 1,330 tons measurement. During 1932 it carried 69,364 tons weight and 18,373 tons measurement. From these figures it will be observed that the volume of cargo is being well kept up, but of course the value is down. Commodity values are exceedingly low, but the service for which these ships are subsidized is being carried on in a manner most helpful to Canadian trade. I submit to the hon. gentleman—and I am certain that if he had been in my place during the last two or three years he would take the same view—that without subsidies we cannot expect to maintain these mail, passenger and fast freight services, with these splendid liners on the Pacific and on the Atlantic, in competition with the highly subsidized lines of the United States. It cannot be done. I know that last year there was a heavy loss on this service; I know the company was very seriously embarrassed in maintaining the service even with this subsidy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which service?

Mr. STEVENS: On both the Atlantic and the Pacific. It would be a calamity to Canada, and I should not like to take the responsibility for bringing it about, if the magnificent service which has been maintained for so long should be dropped at this time. As times improve and travel once more develops, in all probability there will be no need for the payment of this subvention but at present I believe parliament and the country is justified in assisting to maintain these services.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough sought to draw a comparison between the Atlantic and the Pacific in regard to subsidies granted. I do not think the subject is one in connection with which a comparison should be drawn, but while the hon. member was talking I added up the subsidies on both the Atlantic and the Pacific. The subsidies paid on the Atlantic amount to about $200,000 more than those paid on the Pacific. As I say, that comparison should not be made. The hon. member gave the impression, unwittingly no doubt, that the greater part of the money paid on the Pacific was concentrated towards helping the lumbering industry. I would point out that out of a total vote of $999,450, only $66,000 goes to subsidize a line devoted to the carrying of lumber. The comparison is made still more unfair when it is remembered that boats running from British Columbia carry not only the products of that province but the manufactured goods from the east and even from the maritime provinces. They carry on a nationwide trade. I would be very sorry to see this first item, which covers service between British Columbia and Australia and/or China, interfered with. This service has been of very substantial value to the lumber interests in the district I represent. I had something to do with the service which was inaugurated under the late government. I accompanied a delegation of lumbermen from British Columbia who interviewed the Minister of Finance. That service was a success under the former government and although changed to include the China trade it has been a success and I believe will be more of a success in the future. I hope no attempt will be made to interfere with this item. Does the minister happen to know the names of the ships operated by the British Canadian Steamships Limited?

Mr. STEVENS: The steamships City of Victoria and City of Vancouver. There are one or two other ships under charter, the steamship Bosworth and the steamship Janeta.

Mr. NEILL: A complaint has been made by the hon. member for New Westminster against Canadian seamen being refused employment upon ships receiving subsides.

Mr. STEVENS: We are looking into that matter.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member cited a case referring particularly to the steamship Janeta, but in connection with the steamship Bosworth, I should like to read part of a letter received from the Canadian Association of Seamen. I have no way of checking up the statements made in this letter, but I direct it to the attention of the minister. It reads:

> I have further evidence, secured only a few hours ago, on the ss. Bosworth, a vessel chartered by the British Canadian steamship company and subsidized also by the government, that this ship has been trading on the China service for some considerable time but has not once purchased any fuel in Canada. The last time she fueled on her way to British Columbia was at the Japanese port of Mauran, when she took 2,500 tons of bunker coal aboard.

The minister was thoughtful enough to put a clause in the contract, a copy of which I have before me, that this company should use Canadian coal. If this vessel has not been using Canadian coal, it is a breach of the contract.

Mr. STEVENS: I understand that that vessel was chartered only for one voyage. I assume she came in with her bunkers full and did not require any coal. The request for permission to charter this vessel was made because there was a pressure of lumber for export.

Mr. NEILL: Did she make only one trip?

Mr. STEVENS: My information is she was chartered only for the one trip.

Mr. NEILL: This letter states that she has been trading in the China service for some considerable time but has not once purchased any fuel in Canada. I quote this letter for what it is worth.

Mr. STEVENS: My information is that it was chartered for only one trip.

Mr. NEILL: It is stated also that the steamships City of Victoria and City of Vancouver are using oil for fuel.

Mr. STEVENS: My information is that they are using coal.

Mr. NEILL: If that is the information of the department, there is nothing further to say.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot dogmatically contradict my hon. friend, but that is my information.

Mr. NEILL: You cannot switch from coal to oil in twenty-four hours; if the boats have oil burning machinery, they are using oil. Will the minister look into this?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I wish to couple certain representations of my own with those made by the hon. members for Vancouver Centre and New Westminster. It is absolutely impossible for a Canadian seaman to obtain employment on the Canadian National ships operating on the St. Lawrence river and the Atlantic ocean. Their crews are foreign or at least English, Scotch, Welsh or Irish, and it is absolutely impossible for a Canadian to get employment.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order; I object to a Scotchman or Englishman being termed a foreigner.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I mean foreign to Canada, not Canadian born. I will try to satisfy the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but I must say that I am in favour of employing Canadian born.

Mr. MITCHELL: What category would the hon. member put me in as a member of this house—a foreigner?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I hope the hon. member will not ask me to give him a character because that would be beyond my capacity.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think that is a slur on many hon. members of this House of Commons.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The hon. member is entirely mistaken; I was referring to Canadians living in Canada, whether they are of Scotch, Irish, French, Gaelic or Welsh descent. I claim a preference should be given to Canadians who live in Canada and who were born in Canada. If that does not satisfy the hon. gentleman, I am very sorry but that is my policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all very well, but the attitude is taken by the deputy speaker of this house that British citizens should be denied the right to earn a living. That is an impossible situation.

Mr. STEVENS: Do not worry; we are doing pretty well.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I might say to the hon. member that he is still at sea. I am talking of Canadians living in Canada, citizens of Canada. I claim that preference should be given to Canadians in making up the crews of the ships of the Canadian National steamship company. In order to qualify as a pilot a man has to put in so many thousands of miles upon the sea. There are many young men who are trying to qualify for these positions who cannot obtain employment on Canadian National steamships. That company goes to Newfoundland, to England, to Scotland and to Ireland to obtain their crews. That is not a Canada first policy, and as far as I am concerned I protest against it.

Mr. DUFF: I am sorry the hon. member for Comox-Alberni misunderstood my previous remarks. I made no comparison between the subsidies paid to steamers plying from Pacific ports and those plying from Atlantic ports.

Mr. NEILL: I accept the hon. gentleman's apology.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member also left the impression that I objected to the payment of these subsidies. I do not object to the payment of subsidies to steamers plying from British Columbia ports. What I said was that this government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are asking parliament to vote large sums of money to help the shippers of lumber from British Columbia ports, and I asked the same consideration for the shippers of lumber from Atlantic ports. I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give the same treatment to the lumbermen on the Atlantic coast that he gives to those in British Columbia. I am sure the Minister of Finance and also the Minister of National Health will agree with what I am saying.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that I had covered a great deal of ground. That may be true. The trouble I find with the Minister of Trade and Commerce is that he did not cover as much ground as I did; he stuck to British Columbia and I am trying to treat all parts of the country alike. He replies that he considers he is justified in asking parliament to vote these large subsidies for carrying lumber from British Columbia ports, because certain steamers belonging to the Canadian National steamships leave Montreal with cargo for New Zealand and Australia; that those steamers are operating at a deficit to the country and we are paying that deficit. He considered that the one would offset the other. If he will inquire into the matter of the ships operating between Montreal and New Zealand and Australia, he will find that very little lumber is carried; that they are cargo boats, carrying all kinds of freight. Consequently it is not fair to compare those boats with the tramp steamers which are carrying lumber out of British Columbia ports.

As regards the service between Mulgrave and Canso, the minister said that he would look into the matter. I might say that I took this matter up with him six months or more ago, and it is time now that he change the present service and put on two boats, one to the constituency of the Minister of Finance and one to mine, instead of having one boat cover the two services. I want to say to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it is not fair to the people in Arichat and Petite de Grat, Canso, Hazel Hill, that one steamer should be subsidized to perform this service. In the old days there were two boats which left Mulgrave, one going to Arichat in the county of Richmond and the other to Canso, with the result that mails and passengers were carried much more quickly. The minister should decide now to make this change. I understand that the present contract either expired a few days ago or is expiring in a few days, and consequently, in the interest of the Minister of Finance and myself, I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to arrange for two boats instead of one to cover those services.

Mr. STEVENS: We amalgamated those services last year and it has worked very satisfactorily. We have had no complaints whatever, except one letter received from my hon. friend. I will promise to review the situation with care, but I could not say now, in the light of our present information, that it would be wise to change the existing arrangement, which we think is an improvement on the two services. My hon. friend knows the situation so intimately and speaks with such earnestness that I shall certainly look into the matter as he has suggested. I cannot, however, at the moment give him any assurance.

Mr. DUFF: Then, when I object so strongly to this service the minister should not say that it is satisfactory. This service is most unsatisfactory. There was never any reason why the two services should have been combined. There was a good service with two boats, one going directly from Mulgrave to Arichat and Petite de Grat in the constituency of the Minister of Finance and the other going directly from Mulgrave to Canso. Those services were quite satisfactory, and when the minister now says that there has been no complaint, he does not know as much about the matter as I do.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree that my hon. friend knows more about the service than I do.

Mr. DUFF: Then why does he say that it is satisfactory?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is mistaken; I said that we had received no complaints whatever except the one letter I got from my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: Who would make the complaints except myself? I am the member for the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough. The board of trade of Canso and the people in that section have written me perhaps hundreds of letters in regard to that service and of course, as is my duty, I pass the information on to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When the minister says that the service is satisfactory, I say that it is not, and in the interest of that important part of the country he should immediately cancel that contract and call for new tenders for the service. I do not care what the minister does so far as the constituency of the Minister of Finance is concerned; if the latter is satisfied, all right, but the boat leaving Mulgrave should go directly to Canso instead of to Petite de Grat.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not know why the hon. member is complaining so much. He at least has received an answer; I have been ignored altogether. I should like to know whether it is the policy of the government not to employ Canadians on Canadian National steamships.

Mr. STEVENS: If I might make the suggestion to my hon. friend, that is out of order.

Mr. LAVERGNE: No.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will, I am sure, appreciate this point. The question he is discussing comes under the estimates of my colleague and deskmate, the Minister of Railways.

Mr. LAVERGNE: If I am out of order, I will accept a ruling of the chair to that effect; but the hon. member for New Westminster has been discussing the employment on these ships of Chinese, Japanese and other orientals.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And under these estimates.

Mr. LAVERGNE: So that I am in order to discuss the matter in connection with a ship subsidized by the Canadian government to go to the West Indies.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not in this vote at all.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Well, I shall seek a better opportunity.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member had better rule himself out of order.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I shall rule myself out of order, accept the ruling not of the chair, but of the committee, and give the committee an opportunity to reflect upon what I have said. What about companies which trade on the north shore of the St. Lawrence and for which items appear in this estimate? Have tenders been asked for from those companies?

Mr. STEVENS: Most of those contracts are long-term ones entered into some six, seven or eight years ago. I think they expire in 1935—ten year contracts.

Mr. LAVERGNE: None has been renewed this year?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. LAVERGNE: None with the Clarke Steamship Company?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. DUFF: They can be cancelled.

Mr. STEVENS: They can be cancelled only for cause.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right.

Mr. STEVENS: Or by parliament refusing to vote supply.

Mr. DUFF: But the government have cancelled some.

Mr. STEVENS: Not these that were current for ten years. Most of them are one-year contracts and they expire from year to year. The ones about which the hon. member asks are ten year contracts.

Mr. LAVERGNE: If they are ten year contracts, I suppose they cannot be cancelled except for cause, but there is plenty of cause because there has been no greater exploitation of the settlers on the north shore than by the Clarke Steamship Company. That is a well known fact. No one can accuse this government of not granting favours to Liberals, because when they are entering into contracts with that company, they are helping no friends of theirs, and they know that or should know it.

Mr. YOUNG: I have before me the estimates for 1930 and I notice under this item of Pacific ocean services, the subsidies that year totalled $226,000. Now they are over $900,000. In the four years they have been multiplied by four. What is the reason for this increase? Has the trade increased in proportion?

Mr. STEVENS: We have spent about two hours and a half largely on that point. I am sorry my hon. friend has not been in his seat.

Mr. YOUNG: If it has been explained, never mind.

Mr. STEVENS: It has, I think, been fully exhausted.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to say a few words in regard to the position taken by the hon. members for Vancouver Centre and New Westminster with regard to subsidies on ships on the Pacific coast. I am not so much concerned whether Canadians or foreigners are employed, but I am concerned as to the conditions under which they have to work. I believe, if the government would do in this respect as they do in others where they give assistance or where government grants are made, that is, lay down certain rules and regulations as regards conditions of work and wages paid, the problem of the nationality of the sailors or others engaged on those ships would be solved. I am quite sure that when the Canadian Pacific or any other company employ orientals instead of Canadian or British seamen they do so because they find it is cheaper. The number of orientals engaged on these boats is exceedinyly large, aggregating on the four Empress boats some two thousand orientals I believe, as against some 260 white men. This is quite a large subsidy, and I believe the government should carry out in this matter what has been its policy in respect to other grants in aid, namely lay down rules and regulations as to the conditions of employment and the wages paid. If they did so I am convinced that the wishes of the hon. member for Montmagny and others concerned as to the nationality of these seamen would be met. I would ask the minister if he will take this into consideration. Otherwise I think the committee should seriously consider before passing an item of this kind.

Mr. STEVENS: I will examine into the whole matter.

Item agreed to.

Marine—Lighthouse and Coast Service—construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $1,860,000.

Mr. REID: On this item I would like to say a few words regarding lighting conditions on the Fraser river. Last year when I brought this matter up the minister was kind enough to say that consideration would be taken of my observations, and later on instructions were issued by his department for the conducting of an investigation into the lighting on the Fraser river. I must thank the minister for having caused that investigation to be made last year. I think he will agree with me that the remarks which I made last year as to what was wrong with the lighting on the Fraser river have been proved to be substantially correct by the report which has been made to the minister. I shall deal later with that report. What I rise to complain of now is that the letter which I received from the Acting Minister of Marine would indicate that no action is to be taken on that report, although the report stated that the lighting on the Fraser river was inadequate and very much out of date. The letter which was sent to me by the Acting Minister of Marine in answer to mine is dated September 8, 1932, and reads as follows:

> I beg to refer to letter addressed to you on the 19th May last by Mr. Duranleau, in reply to your letter of the 17th, in the matter of aids to navigation on the Fraser river.
> As no doubt you are aware, the matter has been the subject of conferences between the New Westminster harbour commissioners, the Fraser river pilots, representatives of this department and the Department of Public Works, and certain other individuals interested in shipping there.
> Recommendations have been submitted involving an expenditure of over $60,000 for certain changes and additional aids to navigation which would involve an annual expenditure of over $5,000 to maintain them. It seems that any part of the whole scheme would be of little or no value, and, according to the pilots, even if the recommendations put forward should be carried into effect deep draught vessels could not be navigated by night owing to the restricted width and acute turns in the channel from buoy No. 26 to No. 16. The pilots do say that additional aids to navigation would be of assistance to vessels of light draught navigating at night.
> While present financial conditions will not permit of taking any action in this matter the report will be useful when further consideration is being given to it.

I would point out to the minister and the committee that from the point at which a vessel leaves the gulf to come up the Fraser river there are fourteen different courses or changes in course covering a distance of some fifteen miles. I claim that the report which was made by the representative of the department in charge in Victoria, Colonel Wilby, should be noted seriously by the minister. I wish to complain particularly of some of the paragraphs in that report.

But first I would point out to the minister that the port of New Westminster is one of the few ports in Canada where shipping has increased during the present economic distress. I believe that in the amount of shiping it is the second highest port in British Columbia. In the month of October last at least 37 ships called there, and the wharfage accommodation was taxed. During September, 32 deep sea ships called at that port. It was expected that October last would prove a record month both in the number of vessels and in tonnage, and that by the end of the year the tonnage for the twelve months period would run to approximately 500,000 tons.

The diversity of export shipments may be seen in the cargoes that are being loaded in the harbour to-day. I am quoting from the shipping record appearing in one of our papers:

> M.S. Hikawa Maru is taking on 1,000 tons of lead for Japan; ss. Golden Court 1,200,000 feet of lumber for Australia; ss. Benclouch 1,000 tons of wheat and 1,000,000 feet of lumber for the United Kingdom, and ss. City of Victoria is loading 1,500,000 feet of lumber for Shanghai. Two ships, ss. Turaneentes and Viking Star are loading large consignments of apples for the United Kingdom.
> Four Hundred Steady Jobs
> During September and this month approximately 400 longshoremen have been given fairly steady employment and on several occasions crews had to be called from Vancouver.

I have quoted that to indicate to the minister that the port has reached remarkable proportions. On February 16 of this year fifteen deep sea ships arrived at New Westminster, and the report of the harbour commissioners shows:

> For three months since January 1 this year (1933) 86 ships of 500,000 gross tonnage came into port compared with 82 ships of 455,000 gross tonnage for the same period in 1932. Cargo exported amounted to 110,000 tons, a slight increase over last year.

It is also reported that a feature of shipping for the month of April will be a heavy export of fertilizer from the big plant of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, Limited, at Trail. The S.S. Mala of the Matson Line was booked to take 3,100 tons of fertilizer on April 3, and S.S. Mana of the same line, 2,500 tons on April 17. So the minister will see that the business of the port is greatly increasing in volume, and as I said before it is one of the few ports in Canada where in the last few years there has been an increase in tonnage and shipping, during which most of our ports have experienced a falling off in trade.

A comprehensive report was made by Colonel Wilby, of Victoria, upon the lighting requirements on the Fraser river. That report fully substantiated the representations I made to the minister in the house last year. I think that certain statements that are made in Colonel Wilby's report had a bearing on the letter which was sent to me in September last by the Acting Minister of Marine, in which he stated that the department could not see its way clear to improving the lighting at the present time. I claim that the situation is a very serious one. This report is in the hands of the department, and it might be used as a reason why navigation lights will not be installed on the Fraser river. Colonel Wilby states in the report that either the present pilots are not qualified to say what is required by way of aids for safe navigation on the Fraser river during hours of darkness, or if they are qualified it would be only a waste of money to grant the present request in any modified form whatsoever. If for any reason this or that aid asked for were not installed the pilots will still be able to say that they are unable safely to navigate vessels on the river at night.

At a meeting which was held at New Westminster, which Colonel Wilby, the board of trade, the harbour commissioners, the council and myself attended, it was pointed out by Colonel Wilby that until such time as 9,000 feet of dredging had been done the ships could not come up during the night. May I point out to the minister the fact that the tides vary. In the winter the high tides are during the day, and in the summer they are at night. Ships must therefore navigate during the night time if they are to take advantage of the high tide period. So the statement that ships have to come up in the day time is not correct by any manner of means. Last year I pointed out to the house that quite a number of ships were turned away on account of inadequate lighting.

In another report Colonel Wilby repeats that statement, because I find he states:

> In conclusion I would ask for your attention to the statement on page 7 of my report of June 10, 1932, namely, that it will be a waste of money to grant the present request in any modified form whatsoever, as if for any reason this or that aid asked for is not installed the pilots will still be able to say they are unable to safely navigate vessels in the Fraser river at night for want of adequate aids to navigation and also to the points raised in the first two paragraphs on page 4 of the same report.

In all seriousness I take exception to Colonel Wilby making such damning statements and reiterating them in further communications, because they are not correct. He states that the pilots are bucking the idea of having lights installed because if lights are installed—so Colonel Wilby states—they will find some excuse for not bringing up their ships at night.

The minister has no doubt received communications from the council and board of trade stating that if lights were installed 80 per cent of the shipping could use the river twenty-four hours of the day. But, 20 per cent of the shipping could not use the river until a certain portion of the river had been dredged. Only a few moments ago I said that that percentage of shipping could only use the river when the tides are right. In the summer time the tides are at night, and for that reason all shipping would have to go up the river at night. I believe the following letter from the city council and board of trade fully explains the situation:

> An application has been submitted to your department for improving existing range lights and for additional lights on the Fraser river. It was brought out at the meeting of the New Westminster board of trade that 80 per cent of Fraser river shipping would be benefitted and enabled to navigate at night by the installation of lights applied. This opinion is approved by the Fraser river pilots, and when the channel is straightened from King Edward cut buoy to a point opposite Scottish Canadian cannery as recommended by district engineer of the Department of Public Works 100 per cent benefit would result. It was represented by shippers that considerable loss of business, some of which has been diverted to United States ports, and delay to ships has resulted through lack of these aids to navigation. The New Westminster board of trade strongly and respectfully endorse applications and improvements and additions to Fraser River lights also the recommendation of the district engineer, Department of Public Works, in connection with channel improvements.

I am appealing to the minister. There is no reason why this program of navigation lights should not be proceeded with. Even if the government is cutting down expenditures, and cannot see its way clear to spend the whole of $60,000 in one year, certainly something considerable should be spent each year, and the expenditures should not be spread over too long a period. The port of New Westminster is growing, and anything in the way of insufficient aids to navigation will certainly have a serious effect on its future growth. The board of trade also take exception to the present conditions. Then, the secretary of the New Westminster harbour commissioners write as follows on October 14, 1932:

> Replying, I would state that you are correct in assuming that when it is stated that 80 per cent of shipping would be benefitted at the present time if these aids were installed, the remaining 20 per cent would be deep draught vessels, which could not, with safety, be navigated after dark, owing to the acute turn and narrowness of that stretch of the channel from the King Edward cut buoy to a point opposite the Scottish Canadian cannery—some 9,000 feet—which it is proposed to have straightened by dredging. This does not mean however that these deep draught vessels would not also derive some benefit at once, as with the exception of this one stretch of channel, the rest of the channel would be navigable by them at night. For instance, a vessel entering the river in the late afternoon might conceivably be able to pass through this stretch before dark, and be able to proceed the rest of the way after dark. Going out she could leave before daylight so as to reach this stretch of channel by daylight. A saving of about two hours time could thus be made.

I should be happy if the minister would take this matter into consideration. Is it his intention to do anything this year in regard to those lights, and if so what? The lights need the repairs Colonel Wilby said they needed, because his report deals with the matter exhaustively; every light was considered. It is just as important that the port of New Westminster have these navigation aids asked for in the report as it is for any other port on the Pacific or Atlantic. Shipping is growing from that port, especially deep sea shipping. As I have said, ships can go up only at night during the summer months, because the tides come at night time during that period. I am asking the minister what he will do this year, and what we may expect by way of help so as to facilitate shipping.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I have been deeply interested in the observations of the hon. member concerning the harbour of New Westminster. My department is well posted on the progress which has been made at that port. As a matter of fact we consider today that the port of New Westminster is a very important fresh water harbour, and we are prepared to do all we can in order to help it. As a matter of fact in the amount for which we are asking this year the sum of $10,000 is set aside for that very purpose, namely, to improve the lights on the Fraser river. I cannot say more at the moment. We have planned to send this year two or three of the best experts from my department on the west coast to meet the shipping interests of New Westminster harbour and see what can be done to improve the aids to navigation in that river. The works to be done this year under the $10,000 vote are only preliminary works, and they will be continued next year if the finances of the country permit.

Mr. REID: I appreciate very much what the minister has said, and I am sure it will be appreciated by all interested parties. I hope however the minister will see his way to increase the amount, because if only $10,000 is spent, although that may seem quite an amount at present, it would take six years to carry out the recommendations made regarding the lights. I hope the minister will keep the port of New Westminster in mind, because I believe it is as important a port as there is in Canada.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I would like to call the attention of the minister to a matter which has been brought to his attention by boards of trade and shipping interests in regard to the harbour of Prince Rupert. It was surveyed a few years ago by representatives of Lloyds, and it was found that in order that it should enjoy equal insurance and freight rates it was necessary to have two lights, one at Bonilla island, and a small light at a place called Butterworth Rocks. It was taken up with the department and I think looked into, but nothing has been done so far. I wonder if, now that the minister is sending experts to look into the situation at New Westminster and other places, he would have them at the same time see what could be done in regard to those two lights. I know the minister has full particulars before him and I would be glad if he could give me some information.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not in a position to give a definite statement at the present time, but I will give this matter immediate consideration.

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice this vote has to do with the construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation. In view of the fact that last year a boat loaded with wheat went down in Hudson strait I would like to ask the minister what the government has done during the past year in the way of building lighthouses and aids to navigation for boats going into and out of Hudson bay.

Mr. DURANLEAU: During the 1932 season of navigation the department installed six lights in Hudson strait, and we intend this year to build a direction-finding station at Chesterfield inlet, and probably instal more lights, according to the need.

Mr. NEILL: Might I congratulate you, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo), on your promotion to your present office? As a British Columbian I know you are well qualified to adorn it even if the appointment were made permanent.

I would like to suggest to the minister, when I see $10,000 being thrown around here and there—

Mr. REID: It is not being thrown around.

Mr. NEILL: Well, in the past year or two I have been very modest, as I always am, in my demands for lights on the west coast, knowing the financial condition of the country. But I would remind the minister that there is a hymn that says "Let us also come." If this vote is going to be continued at its present size we shall want to see some of the necessary improvements on the west coast supplied. I may also mention for the benefit of my hon. friend from New Westminster that the port of Port Alberni is running New Westminster very close for second place in lumber exports from British Columbia. Then I would ask—not by way of criticism, because I know the department has it in hand, but only for information—whether they carried out the details of lighting Courtenay river, which they had in hand at one time? The cost would be very slight.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand the department is trying to arrange for the installation of an electric range light, the maintenance of which would cost about $180 a year. I think this will be sufficient for the time being.

Mr. NEILL: It has not been settled yet?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, but we are arranging for that.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services, $1,022,000.

Mr. REID: When this item was called the other day I was speaking to it when six o'clock was called. I was referring to the oriental problem. I would point out that it is really getting very serious, especially with the fishermen on the Fraser river. The Japanese are practically getting control there. Last spring, although the cannery men had certain boats of their own operating on the Fraser river, the Japanese told the cannery men just how many fish they would get each morning and also dictated the terms to them. I have that on the best authority, that of two cannery men on the Fraser river. My own observation is that the issuing of licences to Japanese is practically allowing the Japanese to build up a part of Japan on the Canadian Pacific coast. It is a well known fact that many of the Japanese who obtained fishing licences were naval officers and were here acquiring knowledge of the British Columbia coast before going back to their country with the knowledge thus acquired. That is generally recognized and well known. They were spying, really, and I am not afraid to say so. Another point, Mr. Chairman, is that when licences are issued to white fishermen they cannot swap them around, so to speak, as the Japanese do, because the Japanese are not so easily recognized as are the white men. Last year I complained to the department in Vancouver that the Japanese boats fished during the whole twenty-four hours; there are two and sometimes three different crews on each boat. If that were attempted by the white fishermen they would be jacked up and a charge laid against them or the licence cancelled, but the Japanese can carry on that practice. They have one licence to a boat, but they simply pass the licence from one to another and once the boats get out they stay out, while other boats come around and collect the fish. I went into this matter rather exhaustively the other day, but since I had no reply from the minister I rose on this occasion to ask if he would take this matter into very serious consideration. The New Westminster Fishermen's Protective Association went on record unanimously in this regard; I attended a meeting where about one hundred fishermen took a standing vote asking that the licences to Japanese be reduced. They realize how serious this question is becoming, especially on the Fraser river where so many Japanese are operating, and where in large measure they are obtaining control of the industry. Last year when orders were received from Japan for salted and smoked fish, which were plentiful at the time, no orders were given the white fishermen; they were all spread around among their own nationals. I should like to ask the minister if he will give this matter serious consideration with a view of curtailing the number of these licences by at least ten per cent each year. This was proposed a few years ago, but it was discontinued because the courts at that time declared that we had no power to do so. Since then, however, the statute of Westminster has been passed and I believe we have now all the power necessary to prohibit anyone we may desire from securing a licence.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We shall be very glad to look into the matter, Mr. Chairman. I know the reduction of licences to Japanese was suspended for two or three years because the matter was before the courts, but if we have a free hand now we will see that the number of licences is reduced. As to the use of forged naturalization papers, my hon. friend is well aware that my department has done everything possible to stop that practice by having inspectors follow the operations of these fishermen and prosecute everyone caught using false papers. As a matter of fact I am told that this practice has ceased.

Mr. REID: Not entirely.

Mr. STEVENS: Practically.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be glad to have my officials on the western coast have an eye on what is going on there, and we will prosecute everyone who is found to be breaking the law.

Mr. REID: There is another serious matter with regard to fish; I refer to the embargo on sockeye salmon, which prohibits fishermen from exporting the raw fish. This embargo was put on at the instigation of the canners, who complained that if the British Columbia fishermen were allowed to sell their fish in the best market it might curtail the activities of the canners. That was the argument advanced by the canneries association to the minister and his deputy in favour of this embargo. I do not know of any other branch of industry that is prohibited from selling its products in the best market available. Up to last year the United States fishermen were receiving from 15 cents to 35 cents more for each salmon than was being paid in British Columbia. Last year, however, the prices across the line dropped for some reason, and what did the canners do? They immediately forsook the white fishermen and went across the line to purchase salmon; at one time they brought in 27,000 sockeye salmon from Puget sound. It was all very well for the canners to say, "We will not allow you fishermen to sell across the line," but when it suited them they practically told the fishermen to do whatever they liked with their fish because they could buy salmon across the line for less. The British Columbia Packers, Limited, the Canadian Fishing Company, Limited, the Colonial Packers, Limited and two other firms, I understand, went across the line to purchase large quantities of salmon because they could get them for a little less. In view of this I appeal to the minister to have the embargo lifted entirely in order to allow the fishermen to sell their fish wherever they like. Can you imagine the situation that would be created if a farmer who had wheat or potatoes to sell should be told that he could not sell those products in the best market? A fisherman buys a boat and a net, but when he brings in the fish he is told that he cannot take sockeye salmon out of the country. He cannot ship it fresh, although as I say in past years the fishermen across the line received from 15 cents to 35 cents per fish more than the Canadian fishermen received. In view of the fact that the canners broke their own bargain, so to speak, and last year purchased large quantities of salmon in the United States, I ask the minister to lift this embargo.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: Now that my hon. friend has brought this matter to my attention it will be seriously considered.

Mr. NEILL: For a few moments I should like to bring up a matter that was discussed at some length previously; I refer to order in council 206, but to-night I will approach this question from another angle. With all due respect to the legal ability of the minister and his associates I submit that this order in council is ultra vires; there is no question about it. It is rotten with regard to the question of fairness and equity, and apparently it is equally rotten in law. Section 92 of the British North America Act sets out the jurisdiction of the dominion and provincial governments respectively, and subsection 13 states that all matters pertaining to property and civil rights shall come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Of course there is a way in which that can be evaded in a sense; I think it was done by the former Minister of Agriculture, under somewhat similar circumstances, with regard to the grading of eggs. He got the provincial governments to pass what is called concurrent legislation. The minister got the government of British Columbia to do something similar in connection with these regulations, and on April 13 of last year they passed chapter IV of the statutes of British Columbia, 1932, which was a bill containing three sections. Section 1 made valid any act or regulations made thereunder passed by the Dominion government before that date. The original inspection regulations were passed on April 4 of last year, I think, so they just came within the scope of that section. Section 2, however, sets out what is to happen in future, that is, as from April 13, 1932; it states very plainly and simply—I need not read the section—that any other regulations passed by the Dominion government will not be valid in British Columbia unless proclaimed by the lieutenant-governor in council. This order in council 206, bad cess to it, has not been so proclaimed, and the chances are a thousand to one against its being proclaimed, because the British Columbia legislature unanimously passed a resolution emphatically objecting to it, so I very much doubt if the government would have the courage—or perhaps the gall—to proclaim it now. That being the case, where does this government get authority to come into British Columbia and interfere with the property and civil rights of the people of that province? If I catch fish, I must do it under dominion jurisdiction because they have control over the fisheries, but under the decision of the privy council made several years ago, once the fish were caught they come under the jurisdiction of the province. We amended the fisheries act last year in order to have it accord with those views. Once the fish are caught, they come under the jurisdiction of the province and the dominion can exercise no control. But they now come along and say that they are going to have control. I know the argument that will be used; it will be said that the dominion has control as far as exports are concerned. There is no doubt the dominion can make regulations to deal with the packaging, the marketing or branding of anything to be exported, but I do not think the dominion should attempt to go beyond that and wrest jurisdiction away from a province. Subsection 26a of the original inspection regulation states that "all salmon shall be inspected." It is not salmon that is to be exported, or this or that, but all salmon. That is amplified in subsequent subsections which state where it shall be inspected. When a shipment of canned salmon is destined outside of Canada, it must be inspected at a certain place, and if it is destined inside of Canada, it must be inspected at another place. I ask the committee to note the words "inside of Canada." The argument of interprovincial trade cannot be used, because that clause would cover salmon to be shipped from one part of the province to another. That is provincial trade and I claim that any dominion legislation which attempts to interfere with such trade is ultra vires.

It may be said: We will exercise our jurisdiction as far as we can on export stuff and leave out the provincial trade. Ordinary regulations to cover branding, packing and so forth would be reasonable enough, but this order in council 206 begins to operate before the fish are caught, or at least immediately after. It states that the fish must be landed at the cannery wharf within twenty-four hours after being caught. Let me give a definite illustration. Suppose I catch some salmon according to the laws of British Columbia. I go ahead and can them and ignore order in council 206. I claim I am operating in British Columbia and I have nothing to do with that order in council. Having got my salmon canned, a situation arises where I find it desirable to export them. What can I do with them? I cannot do anything with them; I cannot sell them in British Columbia and I cannot export them. I would have to go back and take them out of the cans and deliver them at the wharf twenty-four hours after being caught. That is not a condition subsequent to inspection or subsequent to the determination to export, it is a condition antecedent. Whether or not I am going to export my salmon, even though I intend to sell them within the province, I will be compelled to can the salmon in accordance with this order in council. That would be depriving me of my right to carry on my business according to the laws of British Columbia, and it would be depriving the province of its jurisdiction. It might be said: You could sell your salmon to a broker. But no broker would have anything to do with them because he would not be able to export them if needed. I am advised by able lawyers that this is ultra vires. If the government attempts to enforce it it will be laying itself open to litigation.

There is another point I intend to bring up, but before I do so I should like the minister to make a reply. I have no doubt this matter has been engaging the attention of his officials.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have listened with much interest to the argument of my hon. friend as to the legality of order in council 206. Let me say to him, however, that no action was taken without first submitting the whole thing to the Department of Justice. As a matter of fact, the order in council was drafted by the officials of that department. I would not think of having such an order in council prepared without the advice of the Department of Justice. My hon. friend may be quite correct in his statement of the law, but my duty is to rely upon the advice of the Department of Justice.

As far as the question of the proclamation of the regulation by the provincial authorities is concerned, I may say that a request was sent some time ago to the provincial government asking that this be done. I cannot say that it has been done up to date. My hon. friend says that it will not be done because the legislature has unanimously repudiated the regulation. As yet we have had no report from the Premier of British Columbia but I hope that if the department insists upon this regulation being put into force, the provincial authorities will issue the necessary proclamation. If they do not do so, it will apply to goods to be exported.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that the order in council was drawn by the Department of Justice. I have no doubt that they were cognizant of the British Columbia legislation and that they naturally assumed that a proclamation would be issued in the ordinary course of events. However, the fact is that there is now every possibility of its not being proclaimed. The question then arises whether this government has the right under this excuse—it is nothing more than an excuse—of helping the export trade to compel that the same method be adopted with fish to be sold within the province. The minister says that he hopes the provincial government will proclaim the regulation, but I most sincerely hope that they will not. I doubt very much if it would be legal to do it. Surely the whole legislature is superior to the cabinet, and that legislature passed the resolution which I read the other night stating that they emphatically protested against the resolution. I cannot conceive of any government with a sense of its responsibility acting in defiance of the unanimous wish of the legislature. However, some weird things have been done by the present government of British Columbia and it is just possible that they will take that action.

If they do not proclaim the regulation, I think the government would be well advised to drop the whole matter. I am sure it will prove utterly unworkable and will offer every opportunity for litigation. The government has no right to insist that all canned salmon must be inpected without having concurrent provincial legislation. If they had said, "all canned salmon destined for export," it would have been a different thing, but we are dealing with the regulation as it now stands. It is so easy to start litigation and so difficult to end it, with all the cost that is involved. Why not ask for a reference to the supreme court and get a ruling on the matter before the government upsets the whole industry and gets into serious trouble through litigation?

There is another objection I should like to point out. The minister says that the Department of Justice drew up this order in council. Well, perhaps a lawyer did so, but I do not think it was somebody familiar with the fishing industry of British Columbia. It will be noticed that the order in council was passed on February 3. There are two objections to it. The first is that the government passed it on February 3, and although this is almost the end of April, the government has not yet put into effect the method by which it may be ascertained whether those fish were caught within twenty-four hours before being canned. The minister says that somebody is to take an oath. But that is not specified by the order in council and it is not in effect until this is done. This half-baked order in council had been put into force and it will be necessary to pass another order in council to make it effective. This order in council was passed on February 3 and I suppose anyone will agree that it took effect when it was passed. Consequently on February 3, the law was that all canned salmon thereafter examined that are found by the board of inspection to be so-and-so shall get a certificate, but provided that no such certificate shall be issued for canned salmon that had not been landed fresh at a cannery for canning twenty-four hours after being caught. That is in force now; that is the law. If to-morrow I take 10,000 cases to be inspected, I have to prove that last June or July the salmon were landed on a wharf twenty-four hours after being caught. This order in council came into effect on February 3, 1933. Canning begins some time in June and lasts until about the end of October, and I think I am safe in saying that not half of the canners can get their fish inspected by February 3. The matter of course depends upon the season. A year or two ago—and the deputy minister can corroborate me—in the month of June, right at the beginning of the next season there were 450,000 cases of one variety of salmon on hand. We have evidence of that. That might have been an exceptional pack, but that was only one variety. I have, however, no hesitation in saying that on February 3 the larger portion of the salman pack of 1932 was on hand and had not been inspected. Therefore it was subject to P.C. 206. The minister shakes his head. He will prove to me that I am a case and a half out. Well, I will say that a great portion of the pack was not inspected, P.C. 206 is now in effect and it will be illegal to inspect that salmon unless somebody has taken an oath that they were landed at the wharf last August or September within twenty-four hours after being caught. See how absurd this is! Talk of being advised by the Justice department! That may have been so, but the advice was not according to common sense, because it is not common sense to say in February: you must, not on fish canned hereafter, but on fish inspected hereafter, produce a certificate in regard to something that happened six months previously. That cannot be done. What are you going to do—to break the law or ignore it? Admit the whole thing is a joke and drop it? Are you going to refuse perhaps 10,000, 50,000 or 100,000 cases a certificate altogether because this is the law? The law says that an inspector shall not give a certificate unless the fish have been landed within twenty-four hours after having been caught. This provision was not even dreamed of in January and the fish were packed long before that. I should like the minister to explain how he gets around that situation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend is not very well posted on the inspection which was practically completed before the regulation came into force. The catch last year totalled 1,081,031 cases and the inspection has been completed of 1,072,984 cases. That means that almost everything has been inspected up to date.

Mr. NEILL: Up to what date?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That was on April 24.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but what happened between February 3 and April 24?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They were inspected according to law.

Mr. NEILL: They were inspected not according to law.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The pack was all in the warehouse.

Mr. NEILL: If they were inspected after February 3, the packers would have to produce this certificate and they could not do so. The law has been flagrantly broken, and quite properly so, because it is no good and should not be in existence.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member knows quite well that the regulation has no retroactive effect.

Mr. NEILL: The order in council was passed on February 3 and on that date the pack was not inspected in full. What was done about that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The regulation was not intended to apply to the catch of last year.

Mr. NEILL: Why did it not say so, then? This regulation, involving the whole genius of the Justice department and the Fisheries department, was rushed through in a week and there was not time to consider it properly. It is a blot on the record of the Fisheries department.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): This item affords an opportunity for a few general observations on this question of fisheries. We have so far heard a great deal from British Columbia and it might be in order if we gave our attention for a short time to the Atlantic coast fisheries. No other natural resource is capable of greater development than the Atlantic coast fisheries, and it is about time the government took active measures to develop it. We now find, in going over the Atlantic coast, scenes of pitiful destitution among the fishermen. During the last forty or fifty years the fishing population of Nova Scotia has declined almost one-half, and the one-half that is left is living in the direst poverty. The causes of this condition are many. Many people wish to make the steam trawler responsible for the situation and to ascribe to its use all the ills that now affect the fishing population there. On that question I have a perfectly open mind. I am not interested one way or the other, but I doubt whether under the circumstances the present condition of those shore fishermen can be fairly attributed to the activities of the trawler. I do not think they can. As a matter of fact a great many trawlers from other countries fish in our waters outside the three mile limit, while I understand that our regulations call for our trawlers to fish outside the twelve mile limit. So that from any point of view I do not think that the present condition of the fishermen can at any rate be wholly attributed to the operations of the trawler.

Those fishermen of ours are in a pitiable position. Their very desperate conditions have forced them to take some cooperative measures to try to make a living for themselves. They are forming little cooperative societies, but so far they have not been able to do very much along that line, because, to start with they are very poor; they have no capital, and the storms that frequently ravage that coast clean up all their little plant, their boats and their nets.

There is now over four million dollars in the treasury of this country to the credit of the fishermen of the maritime provinces and Quebec. That money has been there for over fifty years. It was put there as a result of the Washington award. The money was paid as compensation for the privileges obtained by the American fishermen in our waters. The government of that day did not know what to do with the money. They got $4,500,000, and they kept half a million dollars for their costs and put $4,000,000 into the consolidated fund. It had no business ever to go there. That was a trust fund for the fishermen of the maritime provinces and Quebec. The government did not know what to do with it, and no government from that day to this has had wit enough to grapple with that question and deal justly with those fishermen. For fifty years now we have seen the spectacle of one government following another, and the Department of Fisheries never in charge of a man who had wit enough to do justice to the fishermen of the maritime provinces and Quebec. The time has arrived when justice should be done. The fishermen need help and they must have it.

Some four or five years ago the late government appointed a commission headed by the present president of the exchequer court, and that commission made a study of conditions in the maritime provinces and made a report and certain recommendations. In one recommendation they deal with this money that is to the credit of those fishermen in the dominion treasury, and which has been parcelled out by means of measly little fishing bounties, which was the only method which ever suggested itself to the government of that day, some fifty years ago. From that day to this we have never had in charge of the Fisheries department a man who could grapple with this question and settle it. I may say that we did have a serious hope when the present Minister of Finance took charge of that department, and during the short time he was there I am bound to say that a considerable improvement was made. So far the department has been under the administration of an acting minister who certainly has not been able to give it the attention which its importance deserves.

I have said that this $4,000,000 was placed in the consolidated fund, and the interest on it at four per cent, amounting to $160,000 a year, was parcelled out in the form of small bounty cheques to the fishermen according to the size of their boat—little cheques of five or six or seven dollars. The money was simply frittered away. The time has arrived now, after fifty years, when there must be some change made in that respect. As I have said, the fishermen down there are making valiant efforts for themselves to improve their conditions. Why cannot this money be devoted to helping them in their cooperative efforts, to enabling them to secure plant and bait and storage facilities for their fish? Surely the time has come to carry out the recommendation made by this commission some four or five years ago. Speaking of that $4,000,000, the commission said:

> We recommend, however, that it is not applied to any of the purposes mentioned in the Deep Sea Fisheries Act, that is for bounties to boats, vessels and fishermen, but that it be specially devoted to such productive uses as assistance in the construction of brine freezing plants, fish meal plants, driers, bait and cold storage plants for organized groups of fishermen, or others engaged in any phase of the industry, upon proper terms and conditions, and to such other substantial purposes as may appear desirable; the amount apportioned to Quebec and the maritime provinces should be in the proportions in which the Fishing Bounties were distributed in 1928.

There is a clear-cut recommendation from the commission appointed by the late government, but that recommendation has remained in abeyance from that day to this. In the meantime the fishermen have gone down from one strata of poverty to another, and neither this nor any other government has seen fit to adopt proper measures for dealing with this question. We need storage facilities. There was a cold storage plant at North Sydney, but it was destroyed by fire a few years ago. It now stands in need of repairs. It affords storage facilities for perhaps two or three hundred fishermen all along the coast of Victoria county and the county of Cape Breton, but it remains there in a state of dispair, having been destroyed by fire. Why? Simply because we cannot get $6,000 from this government to help repair it. It requires $18,000 to repair it and put it in shape, and fit it for storage. The town will give $6,000, the provincial government will give $6,000, and we are after this government to give the other $6,000. But so far we have not succeeded. The fishermen also require some assistance in the transporting of fresh lobsters to Boston. That transportation has been afforded to certain districts, but it has not been afforded to the districts in the county that I represent.

The fishermen down there also want certain changes made in the regulations governing lobster fishing. They are told by the department that they do not know what they are talking about, that the officials here know more about lobster fishing than the fishermen themselves do.

I submit to the government with all the earnestness of which I am capable that this year should see an earnest effort made by the department to put into effect the recommendation made by the royal commission on fisheries to which I have referred. I know that the fishermen of the maritime provinces would be inspired with a great hope if the minister to-night would give us any reason to believe that the matter to which I have referred will receive consideration in the coming summer, and that active steps will be taken to carry out the report of the commission headed by the president of the exchequer court.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I have only one more matter to bring before the committee, and then the minister may requiescat in pace. I wish to repeat the protest I made about eleven months ago to-day concerning the Vancouver offices of the minister's department. I shall not repeat what I said on the former occasion; it appears in Hansard of May 21, 1932. In these days of excessive economy, when taxation is so severe, it is doubly necessary to be very careful to avoid unnecessary expenditures. A new psychology is growing up. People used to think: "Oh well, Bill has a job with the government; it is all right. It does not matter very much whether he does anything or not." But now they are thinking differently. Men stop me on the street and say: "Why is so and so paid for doing so and so? The expenditure is not justified; it is only a half time job" —and so on. For those reasons we must review these matters.

On the Pacific coast in the last two or three years there has been a tremendous falling off in the salmon industry. There has been a big drop in the number of plants, in the boats employed and in the catch. I have records before me which show that last year only thirty-five canneries were operating, but that two years before, seventy-five were operating, or more than double the number. Last year there were 2,180 fewer fishing licences issued than were issued in 1930. A bulletin issued by the minister's department in the month of March contains the information that for the month of February forty tons of fish were caught in British Columbia waters while in the February two years earlier one hundred and thirty-three tons were caught. Forty tons is not a very large quantity—only about one and a half tons a day. But to take out that forty tons of fish the services of eleven clerical officials were required in the head office. I am not referring to the numerous minor officials, but to the clerical staff at head office. Eleven officials were required to superintend the catching of a ton and a half of fish each day.

No doubt the chief supervisor out there got his instructions, as everyone did two years ago, to cut down expenses. He did cut them down, but he cut them at the wrong end. Expenses divide themselves into two heads, one overhead and the other the work actually done on the ground. One would naturally expect, with so many fewer canneries, boats, and fishermen, that the clerical staff would be greatly decreased. However, it was not. The work actually done on the ground is done by the air force, which was cut thirty per cent, the patrol boats, which were cut twenty-seven per cent—and I am not talking about the protective service, which consists of two big steamers, but am directing my remarks to the small patrol boats on the ground—and the guardians, which were cut down forty-three per cent. Those are the services for which we spend $400,000.

As I have said, the air force, the patrol boats and the guardians were cut down in the manner I have indicated. But what was done with the overhead? A few days ago I obtained a return from the government. While it is somewhat obscure it indicates that there are thirteen officials in the office, and that there were thirteen in 1930. The report shows fifteen, but two held temporary positions. We see therefore that the staff is the same size. I look at the Ottawa office of the Department of Fisheries and I find that they have been cut down from eighty-nine to sixty-five or about twenty-four per cent. But the Vancouver office numbers were not cut down. In fact, some of the salaries were raised; the chief supervisor gets $180 more than he did before. He now gets $720 a year more than the same officer in the maritimes, despite the fact that the maritimes officer has three provinces to take care of. I see other increases in salaries also—not decreases, but increases. I see that there are seven officials and six stenographers, or practically a stenographer for each official. I know of no office in Canada where that principle prevails. I glanced over the figures for a number of departments which have been before us in the last few weeks, and I find that the number of officials for each stenographer runs from four to twenty. I cannot find any instance where there were less than four officials to one stenographer, but in British Columbia we have a stenographer for each official. I suppose she puts her lily-white hand on his fevered brow and gets him a glass of water occasionally.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: That is disgraceful.

Mr. NEILL: I see that the district supervisor and chief supervisor are in the same office. There is another supervisor thirteen miles away. There are five supervisors in British Columbia, two of whom are in the head office and one thirteen miles away. Then we come to the principal statistical clerk. What do we want a statistical clerk out there for? I do not believe there is one in the Department of Fisheries here in Ottawa, at least he is not so recorded in the report of the Auditor General. There are sixty-five officials in Ottawa operating without a statistical clerk, but it seems that at Vancouver we must have one.

I say without a doubt that there is no need for this expensive service, especially in these days when expenses have to be reduced to the limit. We must always remember that we are dealing with a service to preserve the fishing industry, and to prevent poaching. That is, we have to prevent people from taking fish from places where they should not get them, namely, inside the mouths of rivers or in the weekly closed season.

A guardian will live in a district, and know practically everybody in that community. Over him is an inspector, also a permanent resident of the district. He will have a certain number of guardians under him on the ground. Over the inspector there is a supervisor, of whom there are five in the province. The supervisors are fully acquainted with the territory under their jurisdiction. Why do we need this fifth wheel; this circumlocution office in Vancouver? It is only adding to the expense and to delay in getting action. Why not give the men in the field, namely the supervisors or inspectors, a little more responsibility. They are competent men, and worthy of a little more pay, because they are not paid as much as men holding similar positions in the maritimes. Let them communicate directly with Ottawa. The deputy minister has men under him here who are thoroughly familiar with local conditions. He himself has quite an extensive knowledge of conditions in British Columbia. Such a change would mean that there would be quicker results in the case of doubt or dispute, and speed is very important in the fishing industry. It is worth a lot to canneries and fishermen to get quick action, because such action means cheapness and efficiency.

Although there should be a saving, I would not suggest doing away with the whole staff. The chief supervisor should probably be retained, and a stenographer to assist him in the work occasioned by investigations. The saving in rentals alone would be a large sum. It will be said we do not pay rentals, but we are paying a very large sum every year for interest on a mortgage on the building. The other day the Minister of Finance in introducing his budget said he would have to cut I think $14,000,000 off the estimates as they appeared. Later he said he was not going to take it off the individual salaries. Very well; what will be the situation in British Columbia? If we are not going to cut down the salaries —and that is quite right—what will be cut? It will be the work. There will be fewer guardians, fewer patrol boats, but not fewer in the head office, because those are salaries. Why not cut off this superfluous office altogether, except to the extent I have indicated, maintaining the chief supervisor and one office assistant? There is a new psychology growing up. People are looking at these things in a new way. They used to say: "Oh, it is a government office," and they did not care much. But now when people who never expected they would have to pay it are paying income tax; when a man getting $2.80 a day is docked one per cent on that miserable wage, they are more interested in these things. Every time the poultry man draws a cheque for $1.80 or any person draws a cheque for a small sum he has to to put a three-cent stamp on it; and when the housewife has to pay two cents a pound on sugar, as was said of Mary, she pondered all these things in her heart. These people who are feeling the pinch are pondering all these things; they are not satisfied to see the government incurring unnecessary expense. I would like the minister to explain why, if it was right—and I do not say it was not, with the reduced canneries in operation—to cut down the air patrol 40 per cent, the patrol boats 27 per cent and the guardians 43 per cent, is it not appropriate to cut down in some measure—although my suggestion would be to cut it out entirely—this office in Vancouver with its extensive overhead? I took this matter up last year and will continue to do so in future. It will not down, because it is so obvious that it is attracting a great deal of attention out there.

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, after listening to the discussion which took place in connection with the Atlantic and Pacific coast fisheries, I think it pertinent to now refer to those of central Canada. Two years ago the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) practically promised that the inquiry begun in 1930, would be continued in 1931 and 1932. I am alluding to the fisheries of Hudson bay and James bay. We are satisfied that it is possible to develop the fisheries of that part of the country. Both the inquiry and survey or patrolling carried on in 1930 and 1931 did not prove satisfactory and I have already complained of the fact. The Department of Fisheries is no doubt aware that companies were formed last year and started fishing operations. These will further develop this year. I would therefore request that the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) assure me that the inquiry begun two or three years ago will be continued, and if possible, completed this year. We are far from being satisfied with the report of the inquiry stating that no sea fish inhabit the waters of Hudson bay or James bay. The Ontario provincial government has extended its railway from Cochrane to Moose Factory or Moosonee. As recently as last year the provincial government inaugurated this new service. This proves that the provincial government intends to give a good railway service to central Canada.

As I intimated two years ago to the hon. Minister of Finance, there are people in our section of the country, under the impression that some prejudice exists against developing the fisheries of central Canada, because it is feared that an unfair competition will result against the fisheries existing in eastern and western Canada. I do not believe in such fears. However, if the government persists in its attitude and does not hold a more thorough inquiry so as to bring out the facts as regards the fisheries of central Canada, I shall be led to believe that there is some truth in such an assertion. I have faith in the progressive spirit which animates the Minister of Fisheries; I hope he realizes what the development of these fisheries means to New Ontario, and to that section of the country, and that he will continue the inquiry so auspiciously started three years ago.

As it was stated by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) and the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt), who so well represent their constituents in the house, we are convinced, having personal knowledge of the facts, that sea fish actually thrive in that vast interior sea. Nature certainly did not create such a large body of water without providing for potential fisheries, capable of being exploited with profit by those who might wish to invest their capital in such an enterprise. I may inform the minister that a large number of people are willing to invest considerable amounts to develop such fisheries. Previous to closing my remarks, may I state that, knowing the spirit of initiative of the minister of fisheries, I trust he will fully acquiesce in the wish of the people of that section of the country and that the study of this question will be carried out more efficiently than in the past. I regret to state that within the last two years, nothing was done in this connection. However, I hope that next summer the government will find it possible to continue this inquiry which, I have no doubt, will amply prove, as we contend in our section of the country, that our fisheries can compete, both as to quantity and quality, with those of other parts of Canada.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I listened to my hon. friend with much interest and I wish to congratulate him on the optimism he displays as regards the fisheries of his section of the country. As to the inquiry held in 1931, I understand that it was completed. I do not wish to state that we shall not make further inquiry in this matter in order to meet the wishes of my hon. friend; however I cannot make any promise for this year. All are aware that the department must practise economy; should we decide that further inquiry must be carried out, we shall have the necessary appropriation placed in the estimates next year; however, for the present, I cannot pledge the department to any definite action in the matter.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As we have a few moments left before it is time to wind up the clock and put out the cat I would ask the minister if he has ready for me the information regarding the sinking of the Bright Fan. If he has it he can give it in a few minutes. If he has not it will be all right to table it on Monday.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the information with me now, but I shall be pleased to table it on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In order to be quite clear, may I say that what I am referring to is the answer to the first question in the little folder issued by my hon. friend's department:

> When and for what sum was the ss. Bright Fan purchased by her owners; what was her value at the time of her loss? What insurances were effected upon and in connection with the ship?

The answer given in the report is as follows:

> As to the first question we have not the material under the evidence upon which an answer can be given.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I received the information from the insurance company, from Lloyds themselves. I will table what we have received.

Item agreed to.

Department of Railways and Canals—canals, staff and repairs, $2,738,720.

Mr. REID: Is this the only item left in the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. RHODES: No, item 300 in the supplementaries is standing.

Mr. COOTE: There is a question I should like to ask the minister, and I do not know whether or not there will be another item under which I can do so.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. gentleman will put his question in a letter I am sure the information will be given him.

Mr. COOTE: It is a question of great interest to very many people, and I think it should appear in Hansard. It is with regard to the amount of traffic which has been diverted from the Canadian National railways, and possibly also from the Canadian Pacific, by the construction of the new Welland canal. I have tried to get the information from the government; I wrote the Department of Railways and Canals, but they referred me to the bureau of statistics. I think this is a very important matter, and I should like an opportunity of getting the question and the reply of the minister on Hansard.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It will be understood that under item 300 anything can be discussed in regard to railways and canals, and I will direct the minister's attention to what my hon. friend has said.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir George Perley the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the second report of the select standing committe on standing orders.

He said: By leave of the house I beg to move:

That the second report of the select standing committee on standing orders relative to the suspension of standing order 92 be concurred in.

Mr. BENNETT: We shall take that as a notice of motion and deal with it to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands as notice of motion to be considered at the next sitting.

(Mr. Duranleau.)

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I beg to lay on the table a number of orders in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAY TO BE APPROVED BY RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No 80, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MANION: This bill is an amendment to the Railway Act to require the railway companies, before abandoning the operation of any line of railway, to get the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It puts the matter in accord with the measure with which we are dealing at the present time, Bill No. 37.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 81, to amend the Interest Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. COOTE: Under the British North America Act the matter of interest rates was left in the jurisdiction of this parliament. The present Interest Act states:

Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other act of the parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount which is agreed upon.

I think it is desirable, under present financial conditions, that a maximum rate of 5 per cent should be established by this parliament, and that is the purpose of the bill which I am now introducing.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82, to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This bill is to make the form of the oath of allegiance as contained in the revised statutes of Canada conform with the recent developments and more particularly with the Westminster statute. The form is the same as was used under the old colonial status. The main change is to strike out the words referring to the Dominion of Canada:

Dependent on and belonging to the said kingdom.

Of course Canada does not belong to and is not dependent on any other part of the British Commonwealth.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): This is not the time to discuss the matter, but I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he has considered the question that arises in connection with the act relating to allegiance, because we have a common oath that was established by arrangement. This matter has engaged the attention of some of the law officers of the crown and it is thought we should have a conference with respect to the whole situation of the nations affected because in 1911 we agreed, in connection with naturalization, to accept a certain form. I quite appreciate the point the hon. gentleman has made, but I ask him to consider the matter from that angle.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no objection to the mode by which the change is to be effected, but I for one would not desire to have this form maintained in the revised statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WASHINGTON CONFERENCE

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING CONVERSATIONS WITH PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, it is perhaps desirable that I should make a short statement. The President of the United States invited the dominion to send a representative to the conference which is being held at Washington with many of the nations of the world. I arrived in Washington on Monday and I left on Saturday. Before leaving, the following joint statement was agreed upon between the president and myself and given to the press:

Our conversations have been eminently satisfactory in establishing a common ground of approach to the principal problems of the world monetary and economic conference. We are agreed that our primary need is to ensure an increase in the general level of commodity prices. To this end simultaneous action must be taken both in the economic and in the monetary fields. Economic and monetary policies must be adjusted to permit a freer international exchange of commodities.

It is recognized that as soon as practicable an international monetary standard must be restored, with arrangements which will ensure a more satisfactory operation of monetary relationships. We have examined a series of proposals for the more effective employment of silver.

No one of these problems can be profitably dealt with in isolation from the others, nor can any single country accomplish a satisfactory solution. We therefore recognize the vital importance to mankind of the world economic conference and the necessity of reaching, in the weeks which remain before it is convened, as great a measure of mutual understanding as possible.

We have also discussed the problems peculiar to the United States and Canada. We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions.

I can only say further that on behalf of this dominion I thanked the President of the United States with great sincerity for his courtesy and kindness extended to the Canadian representative. I might read to this chamber the words that I uttered over the radio on Saturday at a quarter to three as I was leaving Washington:

I have come to speak a few words of farewell this afternoon before I return to Canada. We Canadians do not feel that we are strangers in your hospitable country, nor I hope do the people of the United States feel themselves to be strangers when they come as welcome visitors to Canada. We are friendly neighbours and speak to one another as such. This is natural and proper. But I am nevertheless deeply impressed with the warm welcome and generous hospitality which I have received from your president, your secretary of state and his assistants, and from all those with whom I have come in contact. I will carry with me many pleasant memories which I shall long cherish.

I concluded my observations as to the future attitude of this dominion with respect to the matters under consideration with these words:

Acknowledging your president's wide vision and unselfish purpose, his steady courage and sincerity, his rare patience and determination, I promise that Canada will play its part in the task of seeking world recovery through cooperation with the United States and all the other nations of the world.

Mr. POULIOT: I promise you action and not only consideration.

PRIVATE BILL

SARNIA-PORT HURON VEHICULAR TUNNEL COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 41, to incorporate the Sarnia-Port Huron Vehicular Tunnel Company—Mr. Gray—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 19—R.S. c. 170, to apply to the company.

Mr. GRAY: Sections 19 and 22 were allowed to stand, Mr. Chairman, section 19 at the instance of the right hon. the Prime Minister, and section 22 at the instance of the Minister of Labour. Section 19 has been amended with the help of the Justice department in order to meet two objections, first that raised by the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) that instead of "value" the word "cost" of the undertaking should be substituted, and that raised by the right hon. the Prime Minister that we could only deal with that part of the undertaking lying within the Dominion of Canada, so that the arbitrators appointed to consider the cost of the undertaking and the price at which it might be taken over by the municipalities should deal only with that part of the undertaking lying within this dominion. Section 19 as now amended provides for that, and at the same time does away with some of what were deemed unnecessary provisions with respect to the property being taken over at the end of twenty years, forty years and so forth, at a certain price. I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that section 19 as before the committee be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

19. Immediately after the said subway or tunnel has been in operation for a period of two years, a board of arbitration shall determine the cost of that part of the said subway or tunnel situate in the Dominion of Canada. Such determination shall be filed with the department of the Secretary of State. The board shall consist of three members; one to be nominated by the municipality or municipalities within the Dominion of Canada in which the said subway or tunnel is located, the second by the company and the third by the governor in council. The municipality or municipalities within which the said subway or tunnel is located shall be entitled to acquire that portion of the same which is situate within the Dominion of Canada at any time after the expiration of the two year period of operation hereinbefore referred to at the cost hereinbefore mentioned, less such allowance for depreciation as a board of arbitration constituted as aforesaid shall then determine. Provided, however, that when the said subway or tunnel has been in operation for a period of sixty years, the municipality or municipalities within which the said subway or tunnel is located shall be entitled to acquire that portion of the same which is situate within the Dominion of Canada without payment of any consideration therefor.

(2) The company shall not commence construction until the governor in council has been satisfied that the competent authority in the United States has made provision similar to that contained in subsection one of this section, for the acquisition of the American section of the subway or tunnel by the municipalities within which the same is situate.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I am sending a copy of the amendment over to the Prime Minister although I believe he has already received it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has fairly met the difficulties that I pointed out, that the municipalities would be compelled to pay far too large a sum in the event of taking over the property, except that the period of time at which the property shall be vested in the municipalities is rather long. If they take it over at any time after the expiration of two years they have to pay the cost less depreciation. I think that meets the difficulty except that sixty years seems to be a long period of time, because at the end of sixty years the property by any known method of depreciation would stand on the books at nothing. That is the purpose to be aimed at, of course, that the depreciation reserves will have exhausted the capital cost of the property. As to the depreciation allowance one cannot tell without knowing exactly the kind of structure to be created but if it followed the ordinary rule the depreciation would be somewhere between two and a half and three per cent per year. Then, sixty years on a three per cent basis would mean 180 per cent of the cost that had been returned to the owners by reason of the operation of depreciation funds and sinking funds, and they would have had their interest also. I am just suggesting to the hon. member that sixty years seems to be a very long period. I should think half of that would be sufficient.

Mr. GRAY: I was going to suggest forty.

Mr. BENNETT: I think forty would not be too long.

Mr. GRAY: Then, if the chairman would substitute forty for sixty I would move that it be amended accordingly.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 22— Labour and materials.

Mr. GRAY: Objection has been raised by the Minister of Labour that we could not properly deal with other than the Canadian section of the subway or tunnel. That objection has been met by redrafting the section. I understand the minister has seen the change and it has met with his approval. I therefore move seconded by Mr. Young that section 22 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

The employment of labour in the construction, maintenance and supervision of that portion of the said subway or tunnel so far as the same is situate within the Dominion of Canada, shall for the purpose of this act, be deemed to be subject to the terms and conditions of the Fair Wages and Eight Hour Day Act, 1930, and amendments thereto. And so far as the said subway or tunnel is situate within the Dominion of Canada, so far as it may be practicable to do so, Canadian labour and materials shall be used in the construction of the said subway or tunnel and a certified statement shall be sent weekly to the Department of Labour giving the names and addresses of firms supplying materials and the quantity thereof.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it might be well to add after the word "materials" the words "specifying the addresses of firms supplying." The word "materials" does not indicate that there would be any necessity of stating what materials were supplied and the quantities thereof. We should have not only the names and addresses of firms supplying materials, but the material should be specified and quantities named. As the word materials is in the plural probably the plural form of the word "quantity" should be used. Then, after the word "materials" should be the words "specifying same" so as to indicate whether stone, gravel, cement or some other material was supplied. There is nothing in the amendment as it now stands calling for such information.

Mr. GRAY: I should be happy to accede to the suggestion of the Prime Minister and add after the word "materials" in the last line the words "specifying same." I so move.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and the word "quantity" should be "quantities."

Mr. GRAY: I believe that is correct, and would be content to accept that suggestion, making the necessary motion.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to say a few words concerning the general character of this particular bill. A few evenings ago when the hon. member introduced the bill for the purpose of moving it into committee the Prime Minister took exception to some of the clauses, and asked the hon. member if he would be good enough to let the matter stand over in order that some arrangements might be made. The remarks of the Prime Minister at that time had to do more particularly with the common stock or financing of this concern. I cannot see that in the reprinted bill any improvement has been made, from that standpoint. I can see no greater protection than there was before for the public who have invested their money in the enterprise. I wish merely to call the attention of the committee to clause 6 of the bill which provides for capital stock and which states:

The capital stock of the company shall consist of one hundred thousand shares without nominal or par value.

Mr. GRAY: I should like to interrupt the hon. member by stating that he is reading from the bill before it was amended. A protecting clause has been inserted.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the reprinted bill before me.

Mr. BENNETT: That was again amended.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know the nature of the amendment, so far as that is concerned, but I have on my file what purports to be a reprinted bill. Naturally, I am speaking from the information I have before me. The point I emphasize is this, that there is no specified amount of capital, so far as this company is concerned. So many shares of no par-value stock can be issued. There is no statement as to the amount for which it may be sold. There is provision however for the borrowing powers. It is stated that the company may borrow up to an amount not exceeding $5,000,000.

In my judgment the objection raised by the Prime Minister the other evening was quite proper. Particularly so when we take into consideration what has happened in Canada during the last few years in connection with the financing of companies such as the one now under consideration. I submit that after our experience the capital stock of the company should be specified in the bill. There should be no no-par-value stock, but stock of a certain nominal value. Other than that I submit that in order to protect the bondholders who may be induced to invest their money in this concern, the borrowing powers of the company should not be more than forty per cent as against sixty per cent of the capital stock invested. If the shareholders who expect to profit from this concern have money in it to an amount greater than the bondholders, then I am satisfied that under those conditions the bondholders would have at least a reasonable security for their investment.

The bill before me does not make the situation better than it was prior to the amendment. I take this opportunity of stating that so far as I am concerned I am going to oppose every piece of legislation of this type until such time as the house makes up its mind that the capital stock of a company must be properly stated, and furthermore that the borrowing powers will not exceed the total capital stock paid up.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a limitation imposed. It is not my purpose in any way to defend this matter, but first, the par value is fixed for the shares, and secondly, there is a provision that the securities cannot be sold unless they have been approved by the authority administering the Security Frauds Prevention Act of the province of Ontario. And that applies equally to securities on the other end that may be sold in Ontario. As our other provinces have the same statute in like terms I think the public is reasonably safeguarded. I am bound to say that I did not think the protection was sufficient at first. But the promoter of the bill has been perfectly reasonable in the matter, and says he has no desire to put through parliament a bill that does not protect those who may put their money in the project, because of the difficulties that arose at Detroit. If the statute, which has been held to be constitutional by the privy council on the appeal of the province of Alberta, provides the safeguards which I think it does, I can see little opportunity for difficulties, because in order to secure approval of the sale of securities they have to satisfy the authorities of the province that the issue bears a proper relation to the cost.

Mr. GARDINER: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that the shares were to be of par value? In this bill that the hon. member has sent across to me they are without nominal or par value.

Mr. BENNETT: My recollection is that they shall be not less than $5.

Mr. GRAY: Fifty thousand shares, par value of $10.

Bill as amended reported.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

EXTENSION OF CHARTERS FOR ONE YEAR—POSTPONEMENT OF REVISION

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Bank Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to postpone for a year the obligation which is placed upon parliament by statute to revise the Bank Act once in every ten years. There must be very strong reasons for taking a course such as this.

At this stage of the session I am not going to take exception to postponement of the revision of the Bank Act until next session, but I wish to take very strong exception to the government having decided at the outset to postpone the revision for another year. I do not think that the reasons given by the administration in the speech from the throne and by the Prime Minister at the time of the debate on the address, are sufficient to justify the action which the government decided at the outset to take of postponing the revision for another year. There are no more important questions at the present time facing this country in common with other countries than those arising out of matters pertaining to banking, credit and currency. It is a misfortune that members of this parliament have not had opportunity, in the banking committee, to discuss these questions very fully and to make at this present session, if thought advisable as a result of the discussion, the amendments that should be made to the Bank Act at this time. I am inclined to think that the government's action was merely a failure to grapple concretely and immediately with this most urgent and pressing of our problems.

I know the reason given has been that there is to be a world monetary and economic conference which will have to consider these matters. May I point out to my hon. friends opposite that while the same conference is going to be equally concerned with currency and credit problems of other countries, the fact that the conference was in contemplation did not in anyway prevent the United States congress, even immediately following a general election, with many very pressing problems before it, from taking immediate action with respect to certain features of its banking legislation. If it were possible for that country in so short a time to meet to consider what was necessary in the way of revision of its banking laws, there was equally strong reason why we in Canada should have taken a similar course especially where the obligation was imposed upon us by statute.

May I say also that I think the government was under a misaprehension as to what had taken place with respect to previous revisions. Speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne the Prime Minister stated that there had been several postponements of the revision of the Bank Act, and that on the last occasion there had been two if not three such postponements. I do not think in making that statement that my right hon. friend, speaking from memory, had any intention of in any way misrepresenting the situation, but certainly he was quite wide of the mark in what he said. I should like to read the remarks of the Prime Minister, which appear in Hansard for October 10, 1932:

> . . . several times in the past bank charters have been renewed for a year only. When was the last revision? After the war they were extended because the chaotic conditions had not yet righted themselves and in the light of the additional knowledge obtained and secured by reason of what was going on in the world at the time it was believed that our domestic problems would be best dealt with by such an extension. The present Bank Act was not passed when the previous act had reached the end of its ten year period. My memory does not serve me at the moment but I think two, if not three extensions were granted before the final revision was made.

I know that sometimes, in speaking from memory and on the spur of the moment, one is apt to have in his mind, and unintentionally to convey, an impression which may be inaccurate. The Prime Minister quite evidently had in mind that there had been a postponement at one time, but he was mistaken in assuming it was the last time the Bank Act was revised. As a matter of fact there was very strong opposition to any postponement of the 1923 revision. An effort was made by some hon. members in the far corner of the house to bring about such a postponement. The Right Hon. W. S. Fielding was Minister of Finance at the time. He strongly opposed any postponement. Hon. A. K. Maclean, now a judge of the exchequer court, was chairman of the banking and commerce committee at that time, and during the meetings of that committee he took an equally strong stand against any postponement. Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who at the time was leading the opposition, took the same position. I shall not take up the time of the house to give the reasons advanced by those hon. gentlemen as to why there should be no postponement, but those reasons would be equally applicable at the present time. The main reason was the importance of settling, at the time contemplated by parliament, all questions that might arise with respect to the banking situation.

The first complete Bank Act was enacted in 1871. It was revised in 1881, again in 1891 and again in 1901. It was with regard to the 1911 revision that a postponement was made, for the reason that 1911 was the year of the coronation of His Majesty King George, and an imperial conference was being held in London which Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister, was expected to attend. It was found necessary to adjourn parliament for a couple of months in order to permit Sir Wilfrid Laurier to go to London to attend the conference and be present at the coronation, and in those circumstances, it being doubtful whether after the coronation there would be time to have the revision effected, Mr. Fielding arranged for a postponement for a year. Before the end of the year the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was defeated, and a new administration headed by Sir Robert Borden came into office. That government asked for a further postponement of a year on the ground that they had just come into office and that there were some important matters in connection with the banking situation in Canada which the Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, wished to consider. So a postponement was made for another year. That was the only other time at which a postponement was made. The reasons, in both instances, were quite exceptional, but so far as I can see no such reasons exist at the present time.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government is simply postponing grappling with this among a good many other important questions. Last session we had every reason to hope that there would be a full consideration of the currency question by some committee of this house, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) pleaded very eloquently for a postponement of that consideration until after the Imperial conference had been held in Canada; he said that the question would be taken up at that conference, and that in the light of the discussion there we would be in a better position to act than by going ahead at the time. When the conference was held this matter received very little discussion, and as a result there was nothing to report afterwards to this parliament. Then there was the question of unemployment insurance. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggested that it would be well to postpone consideration of that question until a dominion-provincial conference was held, but when that conference was held the matter was not discussed at any length, and again there was nothing to report to the house. Again, a few days ago we were discussing the all-important question of reciprocity. We were asked to drop that discussion again because of a pending world conference though an opportunity it was said would be given a little later to discuss it more fully. In the meantime, however, the government received an invitation from the United States, and apparently at the instance of the United States they have begun to take up that question.

It seems to me that here again we have very much the same thing, an effort to get away from dealing with the question at the instance of or by our own parliament, by postponing it to another session. Since the speech from the throne was delivered the government has announced to parliament that it intends to appoint a royal commission to deal with monetary questions, evidently to sit between now and the next session of parliament. I have no doubt that this will be urged as an additional reason why we should not proceed at the present time with this matter, though that was not one of the reasons advanced at the outset.

I should like to make just one remark with reference to that royal commission and what its relation to this revision of the Bank Act may be. Undoubtedly the house will be pleased to see such full consideration of montetary and banking questions as a well qualified royal commission may be prepared to give, but I think it should be distinctly understood that the royal commission in no sense will be a substitute for parliament, and in particular for this House of Commons, in the discussion and ultimate decision on what may be best in banking, currency and other financial matters. Let the commission obtain as much as possible in the way of relevant information to be placed at the disposal of hon. members, but let it be distinctly understood that when it comes to the revision of the Bank Act itself it will be the judgment of hon. members of this house, in the light of all the information that can be placed before them, rather than the recommendations of any royal commission that will govern parliament in dealing with the matter.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): This is another case of the government shifting responsibility. If the government has a policy on banking we should know it, but they have no policy and that is why they want to postpone the revision of the Bank Act. I strongly object to their lack of policy. All we have is words. I have here a copy of the Border Cities Star of Saturday last, containing the report of a speech delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in Washington.

Mr. GOTT: Where did you get that?

Mr. POULIOT: That newspaper, which comes from Essex, is better than the hon. member who represents that constituency. During his remarks the right hon. gentleman made some reference to lack of confidence. We have a lack of confidence because he is the leader of the government; as soon as he leaves his job confidence will return. Now we hear about another conference, the world economic conference. This afternoon the right hon. gentleman made a statement with regard to his trip to Washington. During the election he said, "Mr. King promises conferences; I promise action. Which do you like best." He has shown no signs of action since he has been Prime Minister. He goes to Washington for a conference; he returns and says a few words in this house; a few of his supporters cheer him, but people still suffer.

Mr. GOTT: The people cheer him.

Mr. POULIOT: When my hon. friend says that he does not represent his constituents. When he does not say what he thinks he should not interrupt those who do. Here we have another conference. We hear members on the other side speaking of supermen—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: On a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply or of ways and means, the hon. member would be in order, but I would ask him now to confine his remarks to the motion.

Mr. POULIOT: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I shall have something to say when the bill comes down.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): This bill deals with one of the most important matters affecting the Dominion of Canada, and I naturally expected that the Minister of Finance would have had something to say in support of it. Seeing, however, that apparently he is not going to speak, or has not spoken so far, I shall have to precede him.

I was quite interested in the account given by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) of the various revisions of the Bank Act since confederation, particularly with respect to the investigation which was held in 1923, with the revision that took place at that time; and I was also interested in what the right hon. gentleman had to say regarding the attempt made by members in this corner on that occasion to have the revision postponed for a year. The reason we asked for a postponement was that we felt that no adequate investigation had been held into the needs of Canada so far as the banking system was concerned, or as to what reforms might be brought about in that system to make it more adaptable to our requirements at that time. That was the reason we asked for a postponement for a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was it not on the score of legislation with respect to rural credits, which my hon. friends wished to have considered first?

Mr. COOTE: I do not think it was with regard to legislation affecting rural credits particularly, because that was a separate matter. The experience of Canada during the last ten years has proved, I think, that it would have been a very good step for the government in 1923 to have had a thorough investigation into the question of credits, banking and currency, foreign exchange and all related matters. The result might have been beneficial to us at this time. During the last two or three years we have been drifting along in financial and monetary difficulties. I do not think the world has ever, at least in modern times, experienced such a severe economic depression as we have had in the last few years. It has affected Canada much more seriously than it has some other countries—much more seriously, for example, than it has affected Sweden or Australia or some other places I could name.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Prime Minister gave us this afternoon an account of his recent visit to Washington. He told us that monetary as well as economic action is contemplated by the President of the United States, and, as I understood him, he seemed to be in agreement with the president that these two questions must be grappled with together. I suppose that if we are to have any benefit from monetary action with a view to raising price levels it will be granted by every hon. member that this means a measure of inflation, controlled inflation it is true, which is something we in this corner of the house have been advocating for a number of years. So far we have not received very much support from the Prime Minister or his followers, and only a year ago the leader of the opposition suggested, with respect to our amendment along this line, that we should wait and see. Well, we have waited and the President of the United States has finally taken action. It seems to me that Canada should be quite prepared to back up the President of the United States and to take the same sort of action here as has been taken in that country.

If we are to have controlled inflation to raise price levels, that certainly suggests some instrument of control. Now, what instrument has Canada whereby to control inflation? I have discussed this matter with economists during the last few years on more than one occasion and have been told that Canada has no proper machinery for controlling inflation to raise price levels to the desired point. It can be done, they said, through controlled inflation, but we have not the proper machinery. If that is true it is not the fault of members in this corner, because in 1924 we endeavoured to have an investigation made into the question of a central bank for Canada. The matter was brought up in 1926 on a motion made from this corner, again in 1928, and in 1931 I myself placed before the house a resolution asking for a central bank in this country. The Prime Minister, if I remember rightly, said in 1931, that the time might come when Canada would need a central bank but that that time had not yet arrived. In my opinion the time had arrived in 1931, and I believed the Prime Minister should then have set to work to establish a central bank. Had this been done we should now have the proper machinery to give us inflation and to control it, in order to raise price levels. It is essential that someone should control it.

I regret that we have not before this established a central bank in this country, but I do not want to be understood now as opposing measures for controlled inflation to raise price levels, even though we have not a central bank; I think we should embark upon that program even in the absence of such a bank. We should not however wait any longer. We should establish a central bank now. We can of course have a measure of inflation through the further issue of dominion notes, but this is difficult because of the provisions of the Dominion Notes Act under which we should be obliged to place an additional dollar of gold in the treasury for every additional dollar's worth of notes issued, unless they were issued under the Finance Act which would permit such issue without more gold behind the notes. If, however, we are to have inflation through the Finance Act it can be done only through the chartered banks, and our banks, according to their public statements, do not approve of inflation. I have not yet seen a public utterance of one of our bankers in favour of it, but I have seen a great many public utterances in which they are absolutely opposed to inflation, whether controlled or uncontrolled. Of course, they may change their minds as they have done before.

All through this depression I have been struck by this fact, that our banks have not suggested any way out of the difficulty, at least so far as I know. I am in hearty agreement with the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand), who is reported as having said at Windsor last winter:

> A number of our guardians of wealth—for that is what they really are—have made statements in the last few months, and in the last few weeks especially, and I have searched in vain through all their statements, whether of banks or individuals, for one single positive lead. They have simply taken upon themselves the task of giving negative information. They have told us. "Don't do this," and "Don't do that," but I have not been able to find in a single instance a ray of hope that they were trying to work out some solution of our problem.
> Inasmuch as our financial leaders are apparently sterile of thought, the some of us who are not financial leaders will have to try and evolve for ourselves some means of getting out of this morass.
> One is not entitled to call another man's medicine nostrums and quackery if one hasn't a remedy of his own. It looks to me that our financial leaders are devoting their efforts to finding fault.

I thank the minister for the statement he made on that occasion—or rather the hon. member; I think he is a minister too. Has he not been a minister at some time?

An hon. MEMBER: He should be.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, indeed, and if it were not for the high regard in which I hold the present Minister of Finance I would suggest that the hon. member for East Essex should not have been overlooked.

Mr. MORAND: Speak for yourself.

Mr. COOTE: I do not wish to indict the bankers; it would not be fair. There are some bankers who do not agree with what I might call the orthodox attitude of the banks towards the depression, but the great majority of them have not come forward with any solution, nor have they given any reason why this depression should continue for three or four years. I remember reading two years ago a report of the proceedings of the annual meeting of one of the Canadian banks. As near as I can remember the matter, the first official who spoke attributed the depression to over-production. The gentleman who followed him said that the way out was to work harder. It is no wonder, if that is the advice we have followed, we have not succeeded in getting out of the depression, and if we follow the advice of orthodox bankers, we shall never get out of it. The bankers want us to pay our debts, but they do not realize that unless they keep on making loans to some people, the public will not have any money with which to pay their debts. Whether debts can be paid depends upon price levels; debts must be paid out of production and, as I say, whether they can be paid depends on the price which the producers receive for their products. That is simply common sense. The amount of money available in Canada is the chief determining factor in fixing price levels. I know some bankers will not agree with me when I say that the amount of money we have available depends on the action of the banks, but in this regard I shall quote the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, former Chancellor of the Exchequer and at present chairman of the Midland Bank of London. He says:

> The amount of money varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan and every bank purchase of securities creates a deposit and every repayment of a bank loan and every bank sale destroys one. . . . Bank loans and their repayment, bank purchases and sales are in substance the sole causes of variation in the amount of our money.

I find that opinion corroborated by a writer in the financial—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that this is a motion for the second reading of a bill to continue bank charters for a year, and as such it does not permit a general discussion of banking or how banks should be run.

Mr. COOTE: With all due respect, sir, we are now considering a bill to continue bank charters for a period of one year, and I am discussing the attitude and actions of the banks during the past ten years. Surely that should be a determining factor whether this bill should be passed renewing bank charters for another year. I cannot see that I am out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is out of order to quote opinions from various people as to whether the Canadian system of banking is correct or not, as the question is whether this bill should be passed extending for one year the charters of the banks.

Mr. COOTE: The gentleman whom I quoted was not criticising the banks, but even if he were, I think I should be quite in order in quoting him in a debate as to whether bank charters should be renewed for a year. If that is not in order, what would be in order in discussing this bill?

The point I want to make is that the amount of money which we have in Canada determines price levels and the amount of money which we are going to have depends upon the action of the banks. Surely that is a point which may be discussed when we are deciding whether we shall renew bank charters for a year. If that is out of order, I shall not have anything further to say, because I cannot see that anything else has any more bearing on the matter of whether the charters should be renewed.

A writer in the financial section of the New York Times—and I shall quote only two sentences from him—says in regard to the question where the amount of money comes from and bank deposits:

> These include the sums in the ordinary checking accounts of individuals and firms and also include deposits of municipalities, states and counties. They are in part created by making loans; when a bank makes a loan to a customer it does not ordinarily pass out cash, but rather credits the customer with a deposit equal to the loan. In brief, contrary to the common understanding, the bank does not loan out deposits; it loans them in.

I would say that that is contrary to the opinion of many of our leading Canadian bankers and that is one reason I might be justified in expressing concern about renewing their charters for a year, when they do not know any more about the system they are running than is shown by some of their statements on this matter.

The money available for the people of Canada to transact their business with, which money, as I say, is the main factor in determining price levels in this country, has been reduced in the last three years; in other words, bank loans have been reduced from $1,856,000,000 to $1,278,000,000. That shows a reduction of approximately one-third. The reason I am bringing this to the attention of the house is that the bankers themselves—and I think I could quote some of their statements if I had them at hand—claim that has nothing to do with prices. In fact, one writer, in criticizing me, says that the drop in prices is responsible for the deflation of money in Canada. Scarcely a week passes but some outstanding banker takes it upon himself to deliver a lecture to our statesmen, our politicians, our various governments, to tell them that they should practise economy, balance their budgets and reduce their expenditures to where it is within their income. It is too bad that the expenditures of our banks are not given the same publicity as are those of our governments. We do not know what happens in Canada, but we have recently had an illustration of what happens in the United States and we are accustomed nowadays to go there for a number of our ideas. I noticed in the New York Times yesterday a dispatch from New York which states:

> The income tax authorities in the United States claim that Mr. Mitchell, the ex-president of the National City Bank of New York had a gross income of $3,649,623 in 1929, of which $1,872,861 was in salaries from the National City Bank and the National City Company.

Surely no one man can earn that amount of money from his services to one institution. It is too bad that some of our banks do not practise economy in their head offices and that some of them do not tell us the salaries they are paying there.

The Bank Act should be considered in conjunction with the Finance Act, because our banks rely very largely upon the operations of the Finance Act. All hon. members are, I think, familiar with the fact that the government may advance to the banks without limit against almost any class of security, making the advance in the form of dominion notes. The trustees of the central gold reserve may make a valuation of those securities for the treasury board and the trustees are the three big banks plus the Royal Trust Company which is a subsidiary of one of the banks. In this way the banks have a very powerful influence in the matter of monetary policy and for that reason I am rather concerned that the Bank Act should be renewed for one year without our knowing whether the banks are willing to cooperate with the government in bringing in a measure of controlled inflation to raise price levels, a thing which the Prime Minister told us this afternoon was so necessary.

I have not time to go into the question of a central bank. I do not want to delay the house too long, because the question has been discussed here before. We should have a central bank to enable us to control inflation for the definite purpose of raising and then stabilizing price levels. Presidents of the Bankers' Association on two occasioans admitted before our committee that they never took that matter into consideration when they were granting credits. To-day it is generally admitted that the amount of credit available is the greatest determining factor in raising or lowering price levels. I would suggest that anyone who is interested should read the evidence given before the banking committee and particularly in 1928 when the president of the Bankers' Association made a very frank admission that they had given no consideration to the effect of their credit policy on price levels.

Just before I sit down, I should like to point out to the house that Mr. Roosevelt's action at Washington stands out, I think, in very broad contrast to the action and the attitude which this government has exhibited during the last two years. He has swung his country off the gold standard; he has come out frankly for a policy of controlled inflation. It is worth noting that the main measure under which this inflation is imposed is an amendment to the farm relief bill. We have suggested for two or three years that the way to help the farmer is to have a measure of controlled inflation, and we have been told that that would not conform to this country's policy of sound money. How is the sound money policy of this government going to be affected by this policy of the United States? Is our money still going to be sound, or may we not now frankly adopt the same measures which have been proposed by President Roosevelt in the United States. The president has been authorized to issue three billions of new currency, printing press money, and the people of the United States will be glad to get it. The Canadian people during the last two or three years would also have been glad to use two or three hundred million of printing press money, just as the people of the United States will be glad to use this printing press money in that country.

It is proposed under another bill in the United States to issue three billion dollars of government bonds to finance public works, and under another measure to grant five hundred million dollars direct to the different states for unemployment relief, those funds to be an outright federal donation to the various states. There is a complete justification, I submit, of the financial measures which we have been suggesting from this corner of the house during the last two years for the relief of agriculture and for dealing with the problem of unemployment.

I am not going to take up the time of the house any longer except to say that I do regret that the government has not held an investigation during either of the last two years and by now it could have been prepared to bring down a Bank Act in conformity with the needs of Canada. We brought in a resolution last year asking for an investigation by the banking committee of this house. That committee might very well have been set to work last year and have brought in a report to the house upon which a new act could have been based and introduced this year, or a commission might very well have been appointed last year.

I am very glad that the government has annnounced that they will appoint a royal commission. I hope that when that commission is appointed it will be composed of men who will make a thorough study of the question, that it will not be composed, as I said before, of orthodox Canadian bankers or of some of their hired economists because, if it is, the money spent on it will be thrown away. It is time that we had an investigation by men who, so far as the money and banking end of it is concerned, are free and not directly interested. I should like to see on that commission persons who really represent the people who are most affected by our banking policy. In Canada unfortunately we have left all financial policy in the hands of the banks. If they decide to create more money and more credit we shall have more to do our business with, and there will be more business and better prices. On the other hand if they decide to contract, it is just too bad for the people, but it will happen nevertheless. I do hope that when the commission is appointed men will be chosen who are independent in the sense I have mentioned, and that the government will appoint some men who are outstanding in the field of economics in the old country and in Canada as well.

I am not going to oppose this bill in any way. At this late stage I suppose we must pass the bill as it is presented, but I do hope that the commission which the government will appoint will be such that their work will be of real value and will enable us to improve our banking system and to provide purchasing power sufficient to enable us to make better use of our resources and thereby improve our standard of living. That is the great problem of business to-day, and it is not going to be solved by the world economic conference, because that is a domestic problem. The work of the banks is chiefly domestic. The matter of controlling foreign exchange I submit should be in the hands of a central bank, and I was very glad to notice that in the speech which the Prime Minister made in Toronto some time ago he rather indicated that the time had arrived when we should at least consider the establishment of a central bank in Canada. I hope that he is favourably inclined to that suggestion, and that he will give to the appointment of this royal commission the very greatest care.

Just one other thought which comes to me, and which I should like to express before I sit down. I hope the rumour which I have heard is not correct, that after this commission has done its work and presented its report it is the intention of the government to have the new Bank Act brought in by way of the Senate and referred to a Senate committee, so that it will not be necessary to refer it to a committee of the House of Commons. That is a practice which is becoming altogether too common. I do not like it at all. It was done last year in connection with the Insurance Act. It was done this year in connection with the Railway Act and the Shipping Act, all very important bills. I do not think the House of Commons should allow that practice to grow, and especially when it comes to the Bank Act the elected representatives of the people should compose the committee to which the bill will be referred before it comes up for consideration by this house.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I should like to say a word before the second reading carries by way of concurring in the observations made by the last speaker (Mr. Coote).

An hon. MEMBER: Are you joining up?

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to joining up on that particular principle, whatever objections I might have on other principles. It appears to me that there is nothing more important to the people of this country than the postponement of the revision of the Bank Act. The operations of the banks are so mixed up with business generally that I do not believe there is any possibility of our business rising from the depressed state in which it is unless there is some reform of the abuses with which our Bank Act teems. Every business in Canada directly or indirectly is connected with the banks. In fact, I have heard it stated with some degree of authority that from fifty to seventy-five per cent of our business enterprises and our commerce are in the hands of the banks; so that if we propose to revive business the first step should be taken by going to the fountainhead, the banks themselves. The workers, the farmers and the business men of this country are all concerned in the Bank Act of Canada to a greater or less degree because owing to the ramifications of this act or to the manoeuvres of those who operate it they may be face to face with starvation or with a loss of their employment. I do not think it is going too far to say that a great deal of the distress which exists in Canada to-day is due to the harsh and ruthless policy of deflation which has been followed by the banks. I would suggest that the policy of governments to-day should be to reverse the process which we have been undergoing, and instead of carrying on the inflation of the banks and the deflation of the public, we should inflate the public and deflate the banks just as the public have been deflated.

The Bank Act was instituted and certain privileges were given to the banks in order that they might be of service to the people. But the contrary has been the case. Instead of becoming the servants of the people the banks have become their masters. There is hardly anyone in this country who is not in some way or other working for the banks. I leave it to any business man in this house, to any professional man, almost to any labour man, if he is not working for the banks, and I might almost add that the government and the House of Commons are working for the banks.

An hon. MEMBER: And getting paid nothing for it.

Mr. POWER: At the present time we are working for nothing, and may quite possibly thank the banks who will not let the government pay us any money. I suggest that a great many matters which come before us for ratification, such as orders in council, are passed directly in the interests of the banks. I suggest that if the government, through orders in council, has guaranteed certain loans to the wheat pools it was in the interests of the banks. I suggest that if the Manitoba savings office losses were guaranteed, it was in the interest of the banks. I suggest that if at the present time we find ourselves in an unfortunate position, so far as our railway companies are concerned, it is because this country went into the railway business in order to save the credit of the banks. I suggest we have gone to the assistance of the dominion of Newfoundland—which was none of our business—in order to assist two or three Canadian banks. I am not sufficiently familiar with banking and its ramifications to be able to say, as has been said, that we have the finest banking system in the world. I am not attacking the soundness of our banks, because I do not know whether or not they are sound. I believe that under our legislation it would be impossible in any case for the banks to fail and, that at the present time they have their coffers filled with documents, which the Prime Minister called promissory notes, of municipalities, provinces and possibly of the dominion.

Not very long ago the attention of hon. members was directed to the monthly commercial letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce dated May, 1932. Since that time may I add that the situation has changed, not for the better but for the worse. The following table will serve to show the composition of loans in Canada of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in the autumn of 1929 and at February 1932:

	Percentage of increase or decrease
Governments and municipalities.. ..	28.0*
Public utilities, insurance companies, trust companies, automobile finance companies, et cetera..	8.3†
Farmers and ranchers..	18.7†
Grain, flour, meats, et cetera..	52.6†
Manufacturers—Agricultural implements, iron and steel, mining, automobiles, textiles, wearing apparel, et cetera..	26.8†
General stores and sundry wholesalers and retailers..	51.4†
Lumbering industry, including pulp and paper..	30.8†
Contractors, builders, et cetera.. ..	28.6†
Call loans, loans on securities to security houses, underwriters, et cetera..	40.0†
Sundry dealers and traders, and individual customers of the bank throughout the dominion..	33.3†
Trade paper discounted, sterling and foreign bills of exchange purchased	52.4†

* Increase. † Decrease.

Hon. members will note that the loans to general stores, sundry wholesalers and retailers, those people who carry on the business which represents the life blood of Canadian commerce, have been decreased by 51·5 per cent. Those are the figures as of February 1932. Since that time I say the situation has been greatly aggravated. I have not the figures before me, and I do not know whether or not as yet they have been analyzed. The statement I have read deals only with the Canadian Bank of Commerce. But I would say that the loans to public institutions must have increased by May 1933 by at least thirty-five or forty per cent, and the decrease in loans to ordinary businesses, to traders, to the lumbering industry and to every other primary industry of Canada must have been enormous.

For those reasons I believe there should have been initiated at this session a complete study of our whole banking situation. I have no objection to the appointment of a royal commission. Such a commission could have supplemented the efforts of a committee of the house, and no doubt would have been of great assistance in giving technical advice. I fear, however, as does the hon. member who has just spoken, that in the composition of the royal commission those people most vitally interested in the banking situation will not be represented. The farmers, the small merchants, the workers—all these have suffered through a policy of excessive deflation carried on by Canadian banks. I fear that those people will not be represented, and further, that they will be unable to make their representations to the commission. It is very difficult for a man, who has hanging over his neck the threat that the bank can close him up next day, to appear before a commission and explain the situation as he sees it. I fear that the commission may tour the country from one end to the other and that those who are really in need of assistance through a revision of the Bank Act will not be heard, will be unable to have their views placed before and dealt with by the commission. Having made this statement, with the reservation that when the report comes in next year I hope hon. members will be permitted to use their own judgment and discretion as to the manner in which they will deal with it, and as to whether or not they will accept its recommendations, I desire to protest again against the postponement of the revision of the Bank Act.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply interested in the remarks of the hon. members for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and Quebec South (Mr. Power). I do not rise at this time to object to the bill, because I believe we have gone too far in the session to be in a position to take any action whatsoever with regard to the revision of the Bank Act.

I should like to remind the house, however, that in 1923 when the present member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) introduced a resolution asking for an investigation into the basis of credit, its function and control and its relation to trade, we had a very interesting and valuable investigation. After the investigation had taken place many hon. members from this corner of the house together with other hon. members who sat on the committee, did their best to have the revision of the Bank Act postponed for one year, so that we would have an opportunity of going into the evidence which had been submitted not only by important witnesses from different parts of Canada, but by witnesses from the United States and Great Britain. We tried to secure a postponement at that time because we realized that a great deal of valuable information had been given, and that we would not be in a position to make proper use of it unless we had an opportunity for study. We were not given that opportunity. The committee was forced to go on with the revision of the Bank Act, and to say the least that revision was forced through as fast as possible.

Now that the government has decided to have a royal commission to investigate the problem of banking and finance I hope the same condition will not arise. I trust we will not be asked to go on with the revision of the Bank Act as soon as the report is presented. I hope the commission will get to work at an early date, that they will do their work thoroughly and that the report will be in the hands of the members in time to give ample opportunity to study it before we take up the revision of the Bank Act in 1934. If it is possible to have the report in our hands before parliament meets, all the better. If not I submit we should have it very early in the session, and that members of the banking and commerce committee at least will be given an opportunity to study that report before we go on to the next part of our business in connection with the Bank Act.

In studying the Bank Act next year I think not only should particular consideration be given to the problems of financing railways, fisheries, forestry, mining and industries generally, but I would point out that as far as the basic industry of this country is concerned, agriculture; the present banking system is about the poorest form of financing that industry could possibly have. I do not particularly blame these private institutions for not wanting to have much to do with agriculture, at the present time particularly, but the fact remains that the industry has to be financed. If we have a banking system that prides itself on making only short term loans for two, three and four months, when agriculture needs loans for at least six to twelve months and sometimes two or three years, and as the private banking system charges that industry the highest rate of interest, eight or nine per cent and sometimes more, it stands to reason that the industry has no chance to succeed. Therefore when the Bank Act comes up for revision we should see that arrangements are made that the banking system will finance agriculture suitably, or if it cannot we should find other ways and means of financing it. It is not necessary for me to go over the wide field covered so well by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I would only repeat in regard to deflation that whenever we deflate by a certain amount we increase debts to an equal amount. Otherwise, in halving prices we double debts.

Banks to-day are too inflexible. We had some very interesting information given us in 1928 when we had an investigation in the banking and commerce committee on that point. Banks may inflate or deflate against the interests of the country. We have to recognize that our monetary system is made up of three parts largely; the minted money, the printed money and the written money. We all recognize to-day that the written money, that based on ledger entries, and drawable by cheque, is over 90 per cent of the money we use. As the hon. member for Macleod reminded us, this money is brought into being through the action of the banks in making loans, which in turn increase deposits. I have in my hand a statement showing that deposits in 1922 amounted to $1,192,000,000. The actual cash at that time in subsidiary coin and notes was $229,000,000. In a speech made by Mr. Jackson Dodds, general manager of the Bank of Montreal before the board of trade in Winnipeg in March last, he stated that they made their loans from pre-existing savings deposits, I wonder how he got that understanding. We find that, although we only had $1,192,000,000 in 1922, we increased that by 1929 to $1,480,000,000, and we also increased the amount of notes and subsidiary cash from $229,000,000 to $247,000,000 in the same time. Apparently he has another guess coming. We all know that in good times the banks compete in making loans; in bad times they compete in forcing collections and destroying purchasing power. Yet they say competition is the life of trade. I would remind hon. members of the truth we all know so well, that directly we start to curtail credit, which curtailment is brought about by the banking system, we at once have a crash in prices, and that at once reacts on unemployment and the army of the unemployed begins to grow.

It is not necessary I think for me to refer at length to the Finance Act, that also has been touched upon. However, I would like to remind hon. members that the Finance Act is more or less like a slot machine. When a bank brings securities to it, it gets dominion notes on a safe margin, and I have yet to find any limitation. We have been told until we are tired of hearing it that Canada's banking system is the soundest in the world. If it is not it ought to be, when it has the government of Canada behind it. If the banks of this country, being private institutions, can at any time bring securities to the treasury board under the Finance Act and get dominion notes for them, surely the country supports the banks. Therefore if the country is sound the banking system ought to be sound also.

If, when the commission does sit, inquiry is made of it as to the advisability of starting a central bank, it will recommend that a central bank be formed, as has been suggested so many times from different parts of this house. I see no reason why a central bank should not do a great deal of good in taking care of all government business. Why should it not take over the work carried on to-day by the treasury board? Why should it not take over the work of the central gold reserve? Why should it not buy and sell securities and so help to regulate the price level? Why should it not buy and sell foreign exchange? Why should it not have a monopoly of note issue? Is there any other business in Canada that as soon as it is given a licence to live has the huge privilege of being able to double its capital at the cost of printing and paper, a privilege we give the banking institutions? Lastly why should not the central bank be a depository for the total amount of money in our post office savings offices? These are some things that it seems to me that a central bank might do. Therefore in saying these few words in regard to this bill I hope that when investigation is made into this whole problem the members of this parliament, and particularly the members of the banking and commerce committee, will be given full opportunity and plenty of time to study the report before being asked to review the Bank Act in 1934.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one has to go away from home to realize fully the value of the institutions of one's own country. As I listened this afternoon I did not intend to participate in this debate. But when I heard the attack made on our institutions, heard them held up to scorn as they were, I recalled a conversation of, I think, five days ago in which I was assured that if the banking institutions of the great republic beside us had been similar to our own they would not have experienced the difficulties that they have.

I was rather surprised at the statement of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that we as a government had not taken the initiative in connection with these matters as had been done by the President of the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, the United States had no option. Their banks all closed; they had to, because the system was defective for this reason: They could lend money without limitation as to the character of the security upon which it was loaned. Having loaned money upon real estate in large amounts these depositors—who were not paper depositors or transfer ledger depositors, to whom the hon. gentleman has referred so often that it would be amusing if it were not so tragic—wanted their money, but when they drew their cheques for the money the banks could not meet those cheques because they had put the money into real estate mortgages. It became so serious that in the end every bank in the United States was closed.

I confess to being one of those who did not think the time would ever come when all the banks in the city of New York would close. When the governor of Michigan closed the banks in that state it became inevitable that the banks in the central west would close also, because in a general way we knew the character of the securities they held for their deposits, but I did not think the banks in New York would close. However, they did close. Who will compare for a moment at this time and under those circumstances the financial institutions of our country with those of the richest country in the world? I can assure this house—and I agree with the hon. gentleman who made the statement—that while one does not desire to talk about Canada having the finest banking institutions in the world, I do say that we have come thus far through a great crisis with singular credit to Canadian banking institutions. I will go that far. I may say also in reply to the right hon. gentleman, who suggested that we have been dilatory in dealing with these questions of banking, credit and currency, that in the early fall, when the session was to be called to deal with the agreements, the government discussed the matter very carefully not only among its members but with others as well, trying in a large sense to gather some idea of world conditions. I am still convinced in my own mind, and I must accept much responsibility in that regard, that in view of world conditions as we saw them it was unwise for us to undertake a revision of the Bank Act during this session of parliament. My right hon. friend is correct when he says that when I spoke of two or three bank extensions I had forgotten for the moment that there were only two, one of which took place while I was still in the house. When I came to the house in 1911 the first one year extension had been granted; I just verified that by looking at the records. In 1912, as the right hon. gentleman has said, a further extension was made for one year. I was under the impression, though now I see that I was in error, that there was an extension in 1923. As a matter of fact such an extension was asked for but not granted; I think that is the correct way to put it.

At all events the government considered the matter, and I have no hesitation in saying to this house that the government did not decide to postpone that revision in any desire to escape responsibility or in an attempt to avoid grappling with the problem. That action was taken, as it would be taken again to-day under similar conditions, having in mind a fixed purpose. With respect to our banks and financial institutions some day I shall take the trouble to tell this country, and I hope this house, just exactly what actuated the government in dealing with these problems during the crisis through which we have passed. I can say to this house, however, that the broad general principle governing us was to maintain the integrity of our financial institutions. That also was the broad and general principle of the government of the United States, but conditions became such that they could no longer control them for the reasons I have indicated, not only with regard to real estate but with regard to loans on other securities as well. As a result the banks closed.

I think there is no way an individual could become more convinced of the wisdom of the course we took than by listening to the observations of great world financiers. I use that word in the broad sense, not with regard to bankers particularly but with regard to the men who have to do with the great currents of the world's exchange. We have not yet emerged from our troubles, but we have maintained the integrity of our institutions as well as, if not better than, any country in the world. That we can say. Our banks and financial institutions of all kinds have withstood the stress and strain of circumstances better than those in most countries. If anyone will take the trouble to look up the records he will find that I have never said we had a perfect banking system in Canada. Its weaknesses are apparent to every man, but its strength lies in the mobility of its credit, its credit structure and the ease with which deposits can be moved for the purpose of meeting difficulties at particular points. That always has been the great value of our branch banking system. Within the last week I heard one who is regarded as among the leading financiers of the United States say that sooner or later they would have to adopt that general principle. All the small state banks have fallen by the wayside, for reasons that are so obvious that I need not discuss them. I suppose most members of this house are familiar with the small banks in the different states of the union. I remember that the late Governor Leddy of Kansas, who settled in northern Alberta, gave me the benefit of his experience during the crisis in Kansas; he thought that small banks in different communities, with a capital of $25,000, would be able to effect great advantages to our new and developing country. As a matter of fact in times of prosperity that is largely true, but in days of adversity when the mobilization of credit becomes of very great importance it is not true. Results that have followed in the United States have proven the unsoundness of that faith he expressed. When you have four or five thousand banks failing to meet the cheques of their depositors you have a situation which not only brings sorrow and suffering to the people but which also strikes a tremendous blow to the national credit. The other day the United States prohibited the export of gold and stopped the redemption of its notes in gold. Some people fancy that this was a deliberate act; I heard an observation somewhat to this effect made in this house. That step was taken because of cold necessity and nothing else. The representatives of the republic of France and of the United Kingdom, who were at sea at the moment, of course were staggered by this happening, as naturally would be expected, but when the facts were disclosed to them they understood that there was nothing else to be done for the moment.

In this country, Mr. Speaker, we had a system in operation when the crisis developed. Speaking for the government, we had a deliberate policy, which I have indicated in a single sentence, and every action that has been taken and every step that we have advanced since the crisis came upon us, with its responsibility, was for the purpose of maintaining that principle. There is no lack of credit in Canada; there never has been during the last two years. That statement may sound strange, but if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the bank returns they will see that the banks have more liquid assets than they usually have or than they desire to have. Then I may be met with the statement, which has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon, that the banks are unwilling to lend money. It has been solemnly suggested in this house this afternoon that these deposits that we speak of are not real deposits at all, that they consist of the transfer of an entry in the books, by means of which credit is given to John Smith, thereby establishing a deposit for the amount of $1,000. Of course that is so. The bank marks down on the credit side of the ledger to my account, $1,000. It is true it does not make a direct appropriation against the deposit which the hon. member from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) may have standing there to his credit, a free balance of $2,000. The truth is that his free balance, to the extend of $1,000, has been loaned to me; and it is true it does not show that there has been a direct appropriation against his surplus or his balance of the credit which has been advanced to me. But it is true that against the surplus credits or deposits in the bank there is, as is indicated at once on the other side of the ledger, the liability to the depositors, it being shown clearly that there has been created, of course, what Mr. McKenna spoke of as a deposit. Every loan creates a deposit. Of course it does, if it is done through the banks, but it does not unless you go through the bank. He is speaking solely of banks. There is no deposit created unless the business is done through the bank, and because the bank—using the illustration used by Major Douglas—has ten accounts, each of £1,000, making a total of £10,000, when someone borrows £1,000 you have credits for £11,000, and so on. But he overlooks one fact which is vital, namely, that any one of the first ten may come to the bank and withdraw his £1,000, because that is what it is there for. That factor in the equation is not dealt with; no one seems to think it worth while to deal with it; yet that is a factor that determines the solvency or insolvency of the banks. That was the trouble with the banks to which I referred a few moments ago. The factor that must always be kept in mind in connection with these problems is the factor that arises out of the depositor writing his cheques and being able on demand to secure the amount he has on deposit in the bank; and that factor we have endeavoured to keep before us—some might say, perhaps, too meticulously. Possibly we have gone too far, it may be said, in our effort to protect the institutions of this country from disaster. But I say to my colleagues in this house: Difficult as our times are, and onerous as are our responsibilities, could anyone contemplate what those difficulties and responsibilities would be if the banks failed in this country? Yet an hon. gentleman will say, "There is no difficulty; all they have to do is to go and deposit securities under the Finance Act." But who bought the securities? They were bought with the money of the depositors; it is the investment which the banker made of his depositors' money in securities. Strange as it may sound, of the Liberty loans of the United States, fifty per cent and over are held in the portfolios of the banks, exclusively of the securities which they hold of states, cities and municipalities.

It is overlooked that the whole business of banking in Canada consists in the maintenance of an equilibrium between time loans and time deposits and demand loans and demand deposits, and if there is disturbance of that equilibrium, by which you lend overmuch on demand and you are unable to meet a situation that arises by reason of depositors requiring their money, you are in difficulties. That is the whole story, and our branch system has worked admirably in enabling the mobile use of funds from one part of the country to another.

I should like to make one further observation which is vital in a matter of this kind. Why should we postpone the renewal of bank charters at this time? I said a moment ago that we carefully considered the question and having regard to the chaotic condition of the world, we came to the conclusion, as is now being admitted by the very conferences that are being held in Washington to prepare for the economic conference in London—the conferences at Washington making no agreement but only coming to understandings—that the whole fabric of credit must now be sustained by world action. It cannot be done by the action of a single country. Now, I am one of those who have a considerable amount of confidence and pride in this country, but I am intelligent enough to realize that with ten million people, and with our accumulated wealth, we cannot go out and start a system on our own. That is the difficulty of my hon. friends opposite, to the right. One would think, to hear some of them talk about price levels, that all we had to do was to walk out and start a system of our own and up would go price levels. I heard an amazing thing this afternoon from the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), who made the statement that after all price levels and matters of that kind were largely domestic problems. Why, sir, all you have to do is to pause and consider what the situation is to realize that no such observation as that could carefully or thoughtfully be made.

This country, in consequence of the great stimulation that came during the war to industrial and agricultural development, found itself after the war producing a tremendous surplus of agricultural products, so tremendous in fact that the carryover in Canada menaced the world's wheat prices and was a very great factor in bringing about the present disastrous condition. That was the situation with respect to one surplus product of this dominion, wheat. Industrially we became equipped to do justice to the demands of twenty-five million people rather than ten million. That is the reason I have always taken it that the right hon. gentleman opposite very properly directed attention to the continued importance of our export trade because, with the limitations imposed upon our consumptive power by reason of our relatively small population and by reason of our production being out of all proportion to that population, owing to the fertility of our soil and the resourcefulness of our people, and applying these facts equally to agriculture and industry, the maintenance of our export business becomes of the utmost importance. But does anyone suggest in this house that we can pull ourselves up by the bootstraps by issuing paper money in order to raise price levels in Canada?

What settles the price of wheat in Canada? World supply and demand, world requirements, not the requirements of Canada. What settles the prices of most of the commodities produced in this country? Notwithstanding the fact that we ourselves are very large users relatively, the truth is that prices are set in that way. But we do assist of course. The whole theory of the protected market—using the word protection in the broad sense and not in the narrow sense of party politics—the whole application of that principle is that we may be able to raise price levels to our own people and maintain them at a reasonable rate.

The other day some hon. gentleman raised a question in this house with respect to importations of New Zealand butter. Under the provisions of the treaty we made we were able to prevent that butter from being placed on the market, with the destruction of the price which the Canadian producer has been able to obtain for himself, and successfully, in this protected market. I mention that not in any narrow party sense as indicating division of opinion, because on that question there really is no division of opinion. Successive governments in this country, with the vast development that has taken place agriculturally and industrially, have had to find a way of ensuring that those who produce in Canada, whether agricultural or other commodities, should not be in any less favoured position than the people with whom they have to compete.

I agree that the banking system has much to do with credit facilities and the currency question, but what can these ten million people do unless through cooperation with the rest of the world? The whole purpose of the world movement at the moment is to bring about cooperation in that problem. I am disclosing nothing that has not been read in the newspapers when I point out, as every hon. member who has been reading knows, that the action taken by the United States is not what the hon. member for Macleod referred to at all. The printing press is to work, of course, but coupled with it is the provision that there must be retired every year four per cent of the issue. Even then, the matter has not been put into operation, and I hope to introduce into this house, before it rises, not a long measure to give effect to the principle in connection with a matter I mentioned the other day. But that is beside the question.

I only desire to point out that we arrived at our conclusion from our understanding—and naturally it is a limited one—of world problems. In the northern half of this continent, looking out upon the world, we can arrive at the best conclusions possible, only by applying the intelligence we have to the information we receive. But we were of opinion that a disturbance of the banking system, in view of what was taking place in the world, would not be advisable in the interests of what we had in mind, namely, the preservation of the integrity of our institutions and the preservation and, shall I say, harmonious development of our whole financial operations until we pass through this crisis. Events have justified us at least in part; I shall go that far. Thus far we have not been compelled to close our banks, nor have we seen any depositor in this dominion unable to have his cheque met by the paying bank when he presented it. This inability to pay is what caused the difficulties in other countries. When I hear an hon. gentleman say that there are other countries better off than we are and give an illustration—and I shall not give names, because it is unfair to do so, as he has done—one country has a floating debt of £90,000,000 and it is concerned, of course, about what it is going to do in regard to the matter. A floating debt of £90,000,000 has been the net result of the financial operations of that country. It is unnecessary to refer to the other.

The next point we had to consider was this. We had arrived at the conclusion that it was desirable for the purpose of stability and the maintenance of our institutions, to proceed, shall I say, with as little disturbance as possible. Every hon. member knows exactly what I mean by that. There is an old saying: Don't rock the boat. Our position was to endeavour to maintain a measure of stability that would ensure the harmonious and ordered continuance of our institutions without having every man that had to do with the administration of them picked out as a thief or rogue or liar. Of course there have been abuses. But I disagree entirely with the statement that every man is working for the bank. All you have to do is to look at the great diminution in bank earnings to realize what I mean by that. All you have to do is to look at the provision that has to be made for bad and doubtful debts. Even in western Canada where I am privileged to live, do hon. members realize what the measure of loss has been between the lakes and the mountains in the past few years? If they did, they would not talk so glibly about some things. The loss is measured, not by a few hundred thousand dollars, but by millions and the money that is lost was depositors' money which had to be made up by appropriations from reserves, from the recovery of bad debts, over long years, in one or two cases over a century, the accumulation of money held in reserve for just such contingencies.

The second point is, that having regard to all these things, we decided to appoint a commission to investigate. We came to that decision last fall and it was intended that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) would make the announcement in his budget speech. Circumstances perhaps compelled an earlier statement to be made. It will be within the memory of the house that one evening I adjourned the debate and said that if the Minister of Finance did not continue it, I would. The statement that we would appoint a commission was made by the Minister of Finance and we came to that decision because in England, where banks are joint stock corporations operating under the provisions of the general law and there is no renewal of charter as there is in this country, their Prime Minister, Mr. MacDonald, appointed a commission headed by Lord Macmillan as chairman for the purpose of inquiring into many of those questions. This is neither the time nor the place to consider in detail the recommendations of that commission. I think some extracts were given here that were taken from their context and I had the recommendations brought into the house for the purpose of indicating what they were. The matter is not important now.

We shall endeavour to give this country a commission of which it may have as just cause to be proud as the people of Great Britain were of the commission that was appointed there. It is not possible to appoint on a commission the representative of every person who does business with a bank, but it is important that there should be afforded an opportunity to present the viewpoint of every person that is affected and every person in this country is, as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has said, affected vitally. Every man who has a savings bank account is affected, and I wonder whether the house realizes just how many people have such accounts. The real truth is that savings bank deposits are the great artery which carries to their banks their life blood and I am told by those who, I believe, know, that if the savings bank depositors disturbed their deposits in the banks, the banks would have to curtail their business to a point where it would be quite impossible to carry on as they now do.

Keeping that in mind, I can only say to the house in general that we propose that the commission shall consider the Bank Act as such, the question of a central bank. I indicated that, as the hon. member said, in Toronto, and I indicate it again in the house. Much may be said against the central bank idea and much has been and will continue to be said for it. The question of the finding of capital for such a bank and the administration of it would have to be considered in the light of the experience, for instance, in the United States, with their central reserve banks during the period of this crisis. It is the considered opinion of many in the United States that had they had in their country the provisions of our Finance Act, their difficulties would not have occurred. I do not know; I express no opinion; I only say that that is the opinion given to me by fairly important persons in the banking business. But I promise you that I shall give this country a commission of which, as I say, it will have every reason to be proud. The point of first importance to me is that every interest in Canada should have an opportunity to make a statement and I trust hon. gentlemen in the far corner opposite will have an opportunity to make their statement. It is no use quoting what Reginald McKenna or somebody else in London says about conditions in Canada. This country has peculiar problems, questions that are quite different from those of most countries. Here we have half a continent inhabited by about 10,000,000 people, and when you think they are carrying on operations so that they ocupy the fifth or sixth trading position in the world, you begin to realize the magnitude of the problem with which we have to deal. It is important too—and I trust every member of parliament will see to this—that the representations made to that commission will be made by those who have an intimate knowledge of the concrete working of our banking system. It is no use saying that banks charge 8 per cent when they should charge only 7 per cent. That only shows that this is a departure from the provisions of the statute. That is not the point. The point is whether or not we have taken by our legislation appropriate steps, shall I say, to safeguard, not only the interests of the depositors—and the shareholders—they of course have little or no stake in that phase of the matter because their money is locked up in bank premises and the specie that is held by the bank; if you will take the trouble to ascertain, you will see that—but the business of Canada. Banking in a large way is the business of Canadians. I have given much attention myself and so have my colleagues as to the personnel of that commission. If I were in a position to announce it to the house now, when we are seeking an extension of the Bank Act for another year, I would do so. It is perfectly clear that we must not confine it entirely to Canadians; that is obvious. On the other hand, it is important that its personnel should be such as would ensure knowledge on the part of the commission as a whole of the practical workings of our banking system. In other words, I think the banking interests should be represented at least for that purpose. Then you must have representation for those who are concerned in the working of the banking system as the users of it, not the makers of it, and above all we must endeavour, and shall endeavour, to ensure that those who direct the commission will see to it that an opportunity is given to everybody who so desires to speak with respect to banking from the standpoint of the country as a whole.

I think perhaps it is not fair to say that in any sense have we endeavoured to escape the responsibility that rests upon us because, barring accidents, in all probability the same government would be here in 1934, and they would have to accept the responsibility. So it was not for the purpose of escaping responsibility at all that the revision of the Bank Act was postponed but for the reasons that I have given to the house—an earnest desire to do what we conceived might be the best for the purposes of this country as a whole.

When the hon. gentleman referred to the assistance that was given by the dominion to enable the wheat pools and the savings banks of Manitoba or Newfoundland to function, when an hon. gentleman said, for instance, that when we gave our guarantee in connection with the savings bank of Manitoba we gave it in the interests of the banks, may I hasten to assure him that we declined absolutely to consider the proposition until there were 40,000 depositors who had in their possession books under which they were entitled, by custom rather than by the strict word of the contract, to write a cheque against that savings bank in Manitoba and against which there was not a single thing left in the till except the rattle of the I.O.U's. That was the position that induced us to take the step we did.

I am not going to go over the ground again with respect to the wheat pool operations. On Friday last the United States farm board, which had been dealing with the wheat problem, closed out their business after they had made a loss of $160,000,000, and had given twenty-eight million bushels of wheat to the Red Cross for distribution. Their loss on cotton is well known to this house. I shall not do more than say, with respect to our loans to provinces, that on Friday last the state of New York received from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $9,000,000, bringing its total loans to $29,000,000, and Missouri and California were in the same position. What we have been doing the United States is only just beginning to do. With respect to the $500,000,000, to which the hon. member for Macleod referred, I do not think it has yet been settled that that is to be a gift, but just for the purpose of aiding employment in the states. That is the method that is to be pursued for the purpose of maintaining the autonomous position of the states, just as we have done of the provinces. Such assistance is being given by reason of the national character of the disaster in order to ensure that all shall be in some small way protected.

I trust that in giving the second reading to this bill to extend the period within which the bank charters will operate for another year the house will realize that the government does it with a full sense of the responsibility that rests upon it and with an earnest desire on the part of the administration to provide facilities by which the Canadian people, speaking as a whole through the commission, may have an opportunity upon the evidence there adduced to report to those best able, best able I say, to make such recommendations to this house as will clothe the members of this house with that knowledge which is essential to arrive at a sound judgment or conclusion with respect to this matter.

May I, without being offensive, suggest that moderation in matters of this kind is desirable. When sometimes our statements made in this house with respect to our institutions are carried abroad, and our people are denounced in the terms in which they sometimes are, it must be remembered that the banks of this country are controlled in the end by the people who deposit their moneys with them. In other words, it is confidence that is entirely behind the maintenance of the structure of our banks. I said the other evening something about confidence plus being the important thing. The real fact is that since then the nations of the world are endeavouring to discover how they may be able to establish some method for controlling international exchange, using the word in the broadest possible sense, including moneys and commodities, and with respect to the one, when the hon. gentleman referred to the history of the United States in connection with its so-called inflation, the truth is that that republic is so rich, holding nearly half the gold of the world, that no method so far yet practised has reduced the value of its paper below one hundred cents on the dollar, nor is it apt to. You cannot quite say that with respect to anything else except perhaps the gold franc at something less than four cents. You have there an illustration of the value of confidence. They have the backbone of assets, real assets, assets of gold, which is the international medium or measure. On the other hand you have other communities, strong, vigorous, with great futures before them, but they have not the same assets immediately available for the purpose of giving that confidence which is essential in international transactions.

I can only ask this house and every member of it to look upon this measure for the revision of the Bank Act as something far greater than any mere party question. Any suggestion that may be made for permitting the representations of various members to be heard before that commission in order that every school of thought may find adequate expression will certainly not only be favourably considered by the administration but every effort will be made to see that those views are thus expressed.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to make a very few observations and to bring the house back to what is after all the question before the chair, and that is whether the charters of the banks shall be renewed for another year, notwithstanding the provision of the Bank Act which requires that every ten years there shall be a revision.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has wandered a considerable distance, but I have no doubt he was dealing with what has been said from different parts of the house this afternoon. We want to discuss this matter in moderation, and to meet his suggestion that the discussion be without party bias. But after all the real question is whether or not the government are justified in proposing at this time that the charters of the banks shall be extended for another year notwithstanding the provisions of the Bank Act. Searching my right hon. friend's speech for arguments in support of the proposition I for one, Mr. Speaker, find that he has almost overproved his case; in other words, that he has shown that the banking situation is so sound in this country and the integrity of the banks so unimpeachable, compared with the United States, that there should be no difficulty whatever in proceeding as usual with a revision of the Bank Act instead of postponing it for another year. I am not speaking in a sarcastic manner at all; I mean what I say. The Prime Minister has given every evidence that during his visit to the United States last week he heard such testimonials with respect to our banking system that we would be led to expect there would be no reason in the world why a revision should not be proceeded with in the ordinary way. No reason has been given by the Minister of Finance, and the only reason given by the Prime Minister was the statement at the close of his address that the government—and he took full personal responsibility—having regard to the chaotic conditions in the world, and the disturbance which would be created in our banking institutions, felt it would be inadvisable to revise the Bank Act this year. He did not tell us—and so far as I know it is not so,—that the banks have asked that the postponement be made. This is purely a move on the part of the government, because they feel a little timorous, if I may express it that way, as to the results, the effects or the possibilities of an inquiry such as would be had before the banking and commerce committee. I do not suggest that the government feel these institutions would not come out quite all right, but at the same time they feel conditions are so distressing that such an inquiry should not be launched. I wish to present the other side of the shield, and to say to the Prime Minister that if the banks of Canada are in the position he suggests—and I have no reason to believe they are not; I would be the last to question the standing of our banking institutions—if the banking institutions are in this position, is it not the part of reason, wisdom, common sense and orderly administration to go ahead and do business as usual with regard to the Bank Act, and have the revision at the time and in the manner prescribed as has been regularly done in the past. Is it not better to do that, than to postpone revision for another year, on the ground that chaotic conditions and possible dislocations or disturbances to the banking institutions make it unwise to proceed. That is the point which appeals to some hon. members on this side of the house. When the Prime Minister suggests that a royal commission is to be appointed, I remind him, as my right hon. leader has already done, that a royal commission cannot take the place of an inquiry by representatives sent here by the people of Canada, men representing all shades of opinion and all classes. They should examine the monetary, financial and currency questions facing the country.

I say this to my right hon. friend and his government, that if there were no other reason for proceeding with a revision this year, than to afford a forum where members of this house and where the public could get information and could come face to face with the business leaders, financial men and bankers, a revision of the Bank Act would be justified. At a time like this, when economic conferences are being held in every club and every smoking car, every place where men congregate, when economic questions are constantly under discussion, a revision of the Bank Act would have been very proper and very useful. A great deal of information exchanged is, undoubtedly, misinformation; men are very much misinformed. I believe the world is reaching the point where nobody will boast of having much understanding in connection with these problems, but by meeting men who are expert in these matters and discussing with them economic questions, much good would be gained.

Just at this time, when the revision of the Bank Act is due, in accordance with the ten year provision, economists the world over are saying that even tariffs and debt settlements must take secondary place to a revision of monetary systems, in order that conditions may be stabilized. The Prime Minister speaks of the situation in the United States and the inflational or reflational action taken by the government of that country. He knows such action has not been taken only because of the situation which arose in connection with banking institutions. He knows it has been taken because of an international situation as well, and because of the position in which the United States found herself on account of her unit of currency being so different from and out of line with the parities in the rest of the world.

Monetary and currency questions are coming to be regarded as an important first step towards a revival of world trade. I submit there could have been no better place for a discussion of those problems, the presentation of all views with respect to them and for the crystallization of ideas and the possible emerging of some definite policies, than in the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons, assisted, as it would be, by experts who would come before it to give evidence. I submit that by not having that done, the government is losing a great opportunity.

My complaint about the royal commission, outside of the fact that it is not as representative as would be a committee of the House of Commons, is that it is about a year too late. This matter has been before the countries of the world for some time. Men have begun to realize that monetary problems are very important so far as the rehabilitation of the world is concerned. Yet at this time the government does not propose to revise the Bank Act or to take any definite action with respect to the monetary situation; it only proposes to appoint a commission before which people may appear. This, in spite of the fact that in the country to the south of us most drastic and far-reaching action is being taken. I quite admit that those measures may not actually be put into effect, but at least the president of the republic is given power to act along the broadest lines, by way of deflation, or degradation of the gold dollar; by way of the issue, if necessary, of paper currency; by way of the redemption of treasury notes, and so on. Those are measures which would have shocked the world twelve months ago but are being provided for in the country to the south of us at the present time.

At this time therefore I rise to join with other hon. members on this side of the house in protesting against the attitude of the government with regard to the Bank Act. We take our position not because we are criticizing these institutions, but because we believe that by proceeding with the revision there would have been an opportunity for this House of Commons to do real work in connection with education and information, and perhaps evolving policies which would have been for the benefit of Canada in the crisis through which she is passing.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two observations on the second reading of the bill. I agree with previous speakers who have said that this is one of the most important measures we have had before us during the present session of parliament. This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) repeated practically in detail an address which he delivered in this House of Commons in February, 1932. Having a somewhat tenacious memory, during the right hon. gentleman's observations I had the pleasure of reviewing what occurred upon that occasion. To-day we heard the same old shibboleths, the same old time-worn theories as we heard then. We have heard the defence of sound money outlined once again, and the gold mentality, which is absolutely inseparable from the right hon. gentleman, was once more apparent, as it was in February, 1932. The golden calf was once more trotted out for exhibition before the wondering gaze of the Canadian people.

What were the two objections of the Prime Minister to our daring to criticize the Canadian banking system? He told us in the first place that had the United States had the system Canada has had during the last few years she would not have had the same financial troubles.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that opinion was expressed to me. I did not say what my opinion was.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad to understand that the opinion of the right hon. gentleman may be different from that expressed to him. We would not proclaim that our system as a system is not good; it is of course much superior to that of the United States of America—hon. members of this house I think all agree on that. But what we say is that our system is far from perfect. The right hon. gentleman speaks time after time in this house of maintaining the integrity and solidarity of our institutions, but we want something bigger than that; we want to maintain the integrity of our Canadian people, who to-day in my humble judgment are being driven to the wall, many of them made bankrupt, municipalities and provinces as well as individuals, by the ruthless policies pursued by the biggest monopoly we have in Canada, the Canadian banking system.

When the Prime Minister states in this house that the deposits in banks are the money of the people, may I, as one who has given some little study to our banking system, refer to what was said by the Macmillan committee in England in regard to how bank credit is created there. At page 34 of that report we find the following:

> It is not unnatural to think of the deposits of a bank as being created by the public through the deposit of cash representing either savings or amounts which are not for the time being required to meet expenditure. But the bulk of the deposits arise out of the action of the banks themselves, for by granting loans, allowing money to be drawn on an overdraft or purchasing securities a bank creates a credit in its books, which is the equivalent of a deposit.

I read this because it is the considered finding of a body of financial experts as to how bank credit is created under a modern banking system.

> A simple illustration, in which it will be convenient to assume that all banking is concentrated in one bank, will make this clear. Let us suppose that a customer has paid into the bank £1,000 in cash and that it is judged from experience that only the equivalent of 10 per cent of the bank deposit need be held actually in cash to meet the demands of customers; then the £1,000 cash received will obviously support deposits amounting to £10,000. Suppose that the bank then grants a loan of £900; it will open a credit of £900 for its customer, and when the customer draws a cheque for £900 upon the credit so opened that cheque will, on our hypothesis, be paid into the account of another of the bank's customers. The bank now holds both the original deposit of £1,000 and the £900 paid in by the second customer. Deposits have thus increased to £1,900 and the bank holds against its liability to pay out this sum (a) the original £1,000 of cash deposited and (b) the obligation of a customer to repay the loan of £900. The same result follows if the bank, instead of lending £900 to a customer, purchases an investment of that amount. The cheque which it draws upon itself in payment for the investment is paid into the seller's bank account and creates a deposit of that amount in his name. The bank, in this latter case, holds against its total liability for £1,900 (a) the original £1,000 of cash and (b) the investment which it has purchased. The bank can carry on the process of lending, or purchasing investments, until such time as the credits created, or investments purchased represent nine times the amount of the original deposit of £1,000 in cash.

Where, then, is the argument adduced by the right hon. gentleman that the deposits in the banks to-day under our banking system are actual money placed there by the Canadian public? They are nothing of the kind; they are a structure of credit raised up under the greatest monopoly ever given to financial institutions in this or any other country.

Mr. YOUNG: Will my hon. friend permit a question? In the case just mentioned, what would the bank do if the original depositor drew out his £1,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question does not apply. There would be no bank. If my hon. friend had followed the quotation I read from the Macmillan report he would have heard the answer to his question. I would advise my hon. friend to confine his activities to the tariff, on which his views are much more lucid.

In regard to the proposed national fact-finding commission on banking and currency I desire in all sincerity to congratulate the government upon its establishment. I recall this afternoon that at the very first session of this house that I attended I advocated the establishment of a national fact-finding committee to deal with the entire basis of banking, currency and credit in Canada. I repeated that in the debate of February, 1932, and I agree with my hon. colleague to my left that the government should have taken action a year ago when we on this side of the house asked for the establishment of the commission which the government now says is to be appointed; I am afraid a year too late. Speaking in this house on the 29th of February, 1932, as reported at page 642 of Hansard, I used these words:

> I wish, therefore, that the hon. member had asked the administration to institute a great national committee along lines similar to the Macmillan committee in England, for it would have six or possibly nine months in which to deliberate. It would be a committee consisting of all those who represent banking and financial institutions, agriculture, labour and industry, and so on, so that we could have presented to parliament, if not during the present session, at any rate very early in the next session, a comprehensive report on the entire Canadian monetary and financial structure.

Then I think there was an interpolation by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), and I used these words:

> Apart from agreeing with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in his contention that the high tariff barriers should be knocked down, I contend that one of the great necessities at the present time of the Canadian people is a real system of controlled inflation in regard to our currency and monetary system. The other day someone said something about a managed currency. In my opinion Canada has the best machinery in the world for a managed currency.

Under the provisions of our Finance Act. Then if I may be pardoned for one further quotation:

> Personally I agree we need in Canada more credit.

I disagree entirely with the observations made in this debate in February, 1932, that there was no lack of credit in the Dominion of Canada. This afternoon the Prime Minister asked if there was any shortage of credit to-day. To that question my answer would be this; I think every single individual, at least in my experience, would agree that there is a shortage of credit. Every municipality throughout Canada, and throughout the west in particular, is being throttled by the restriction of credit. The same is true of the four great provinces of western Canada which have been obliged to depend upon the federal treasury through failure of the ordinary processes of financing.

I have given these quotations to show that my personal attitude has always been consistent in regard to this question of establishing a national fact-finding commission. It is interesting, when comparing the banking systems of Canada and the United States, to recall that in 1869 the first currency committee of this house introduced a comprehensive report advocating the establishment in Canada of a banking system based upon the National Bank Act of the United States of America. That resolution was supported by the then manager of the Bank of Montreal and endorsed by the Minister of Finance. Public opinion throughout Canada became alarmed, resolutions poured into the house, the Minister of Finance was changed, and we had established under our first Bank Act of 1871 the principle of the branch banking system as against the unit system of the United States.

My fundamental objection to the Canadian banking system as such is this; I am convinced that the day has come in our present civilization that we must dissociate the two great fundamental functions of banking, that of the ordinary mercantile banker and that of control over national credit and national currency. The day has now arrived—and if this government will not see it done other governments will arise to do it—that we must have a central national bank, whether an independent bank or organized by the enlargement and development of the present system, a national bank to control national credit and national currency. That control is going to be taken away from the money lenders of this dominion and all other countries in the world. As far as I am concerned I agree with my colleague to my left when he said that all the leading economists of the world are of the opinion that the monetary question is even more important than the tariff question. I believe the two dovetail to a certain extent, but monetary problems are the real problems to-day in this and other countries. I very largely agree with the statement of the Prime Minister that much must be done by international action, but a very great deal can be done by national action in Canada at the present time. I wonder how the right hon. gentleman, who is to represent this Canadian nation at an international conference on June 12 which is to deal with financial, monetary and economic problems, is going to represent the economic mentality of the Canadian nation by upholding a strict adherence to gold, which he illustrated by his speech this afternoon. I venture to say that if he went to the country to-morrow on a question dealing with financial reform the opinion of Canada would be five to one against remaining on the gold basis. That gold basis has been proved to be nothing but a sham and a myth, and it is so termed to-day by the leading economists of the world. I say to my right hon. friend that when he says gold coverage for internal currency must be tied up with gold for meeting external obligations he is going against the Macmillan report, the consensus of which was strongly against that theory. We must base our national financing upon our national credit; our national credit must be strictly under the control of our national government, which in turn is under the control of the people; we must not have our monetary system under the control of private individuals, no matter how sound our banking institutions may be or how strongly they may be entrenched or anchored in the vaults of the national treasury.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I do not wish for a moment to be a party to the needless delay of the passage of the measure in which I am interested; in the ordinary course, following the remarks of my right hon. leader I should not have said a word. I do so now merely to deal with one point. Before proceeding, however, I must say that it was rather refreshing to hear my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), who presents his views with such vehemence, give his opinion with regard to the merits of our banking system, the gold standard, money lenders, money changers and so on immediately after his associate to his left said that the debate had been more or less out of order and that we should get down to the question whether or not we should continue the bank charters for one year.

In his objection to this procedure my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) took as his first point the ground that the government ought not to have brought down a measure to extend bank charters for one year. I could not quite see the force of his objection. Of necessity it is incumbent upon the government to initiate a measure of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The statute has placed on parliament the duty of revising the act every ten years.

Mr. RHODES: The duty was upon parliament to revise the act in 1911, but the Liberal government of that day brought down a measure to extend bank charters for one year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For the reasons I mentioned.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. My right hon. friend thought it was quite fit and proper to extend the bank charters then, since the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister were going to an imperial conference in London, but he thinks that we should not ask that the bank charters be continued for one year now in view of the fact that this year during the most interesting economic and financial period in the history of the world, a great monetary conference is to be held in London.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the difference is this, that in 1911 parliament had to adjourn in order to permit the Canadian ministers to attend the conference in London, and there was no opportunity to take up the question.

Mr. RHODES: I am quite ready to admit that what my right hon. friend has said is true, but he says that it was quite all right for a Liberal government to bring down a measure to extend bank charters for one year because they wanted Canada to be represented at an imperial conference, but it is quite another thing when a Conservative administration brings down a similar proposal with regard to world conference during the worst crisis in the history of the world. The speech from the throne made the situation very clear; it said:

> You will be invited to extend Canadian bank charters for one year in order that parliament may be informed of the results of the proposed world economic and financial conference, to be called to consider financial, economic and monetary problems, before undertaking the decennial revision of the Bank Act.

Mr. VALLANCE: What date was that?

Mr. RHODES: That was in the speech from the throne. I have only this to say, Mr. Speaker: I do not profess for a moment to be competent to give an expert or even a fair, average opinion as to what ought or ought not to be done with this or that phase of the proposals with regard to banking and monetary questions. I do submit, however, what has been pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that we have in Canada, whatever imperfections it may have, a banking system that has stood the test of the greatest financial storms known in the history of the world. We must not forget that fact.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that all he is now saying is that Canada stood the storm and the shocks. All Canada is now behind the banks; we are in the banking business but we have no direct control.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has succeeded in having his opinion placed upon Hansard in the form of a question. I do not object; if he wishes to insert the word Canada I will agree. Canada and its financial and banking institutions have weathered the storm. However, I am not going to attempt to discuss the merits of the question. I venture to say that if the government had proceeded in the ordinary course and revised the Bank Act we would have been subjected to very great criticism for dashing into that revision at a time when we did not have the advantage of the findings of the world economic conference. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre said he pointed out last year that we should have a royal commission; he agrees that this should be done, but the point he makes is that it is a year late. I will meet that argument by saying to my hon. friend that we have had the benefit of a year's experience, and we are in a much better position to deal with financial affairs in the light of that experience than we would have been a year ago. I am sure the people in the great republic to our south will approach these subjects in a much more chastened frame of mind than would have been the case twelve months ago.

In closing this debate, Mr. Speaker, I merely rose for the purpose of dealing with the question of the propriety of our asking that bank charters should be renewed for a period of one year. I am in perfect accord with the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that this is the sole subject that should be discussed on the motion for second reading. Having said that much I do not propose to be responsible for delaying the second reading of this bill a moment longer.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 1—Bank charters continued to July 1, 1934.

Mr. POULIOT: I have only a few words to say, Mr. Chairman, because my hon. friend from Quebec South expressed in much better language than my own some of the thoughts I had entertained in regard to this matter. The right hon. Prime Minister spoke of moderation, and I think this is the first time I have heard him mention that word in this house. He spoke also about attacks made by the opposition on our financial institutions. May I point out that in the House of Commons members of the opposition may not attack members of the government and vice versa, but regarding matters outside the house any member is at liberty to pass judgment on individuals who have served the government in any capacity, or on institutions, and in doing so he is not attacking anyone but merely exercising his right as a member of parliament to express his views conscientiously on all questions that come before the house.

There are two questions to be considered under this bill; first there is the postponement of the revision of the Bank Act, and secondly the manner in which the whole subject is to be investigated in the interval. As regards the postponement of the revision of the act, it seems to me that if the govenment had a strong policy on banking it could very well submit that policy right now. There are two ways of studying this matter; there is a regular way and an irregular. I thank the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) for his support of my view, which is the view of many other hon. members. I think that the whole question should be submitted to a special committee of the house who could hear witnesses and pass judgment on their evidence. That is the regular course, which I think should be adopted. The irregular course is to appoint a royal commission. Who will be appointed no one knows. As my hon. friend from Quebec South has pointed out, it is difficult to select representatives from among the farmers and the small town and village merchants.

Mention has been made to-day of conferences. We have heard that the leader of the government is a superman. Now, those who will meet at the conference in London will be mere men, so that the superman will be very much above them. I remember that after the hon. member for Renfrew had said that Mr. Ferguson was so admirable the hon.

member for St. Ann observed that it was an honour for Mussolini to be compared with the Prime Minister. Well, if the Prime Minister is such an outstanding figure I do not see why he will take the trouble to cross the ocean to attend the world conference; he will meet only pygmies there. It reminds me of the Big Enders and the Little Enders; he is the Big Ender and he will meet the Little Enders. If he is the superman what is the use of his spending the money of this country to cross the ocean merely in order to meet narrow-minded people in London? He can give his views right now from Ottawa. I am sure they would be accepted the world over, and they would not only reflect great credit on himself but would establish his supremacy as the superman.

As regards inflation, I was much interested in the discussion that took place between the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I believe these gentlemen should settle their difficulties between themselves. May I say once more, however, in the presence of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) who is an expert on inflation, that the statement was made by him, in answer to a question I asked some time ago, that if the tariff barriers were lowered there would be no use for inflation. So that if the difficulties in connection with our present monetary and currency system are due to the tariff policy that has been adopted everywhere, it would seem to me that the moment every nation came to its senses and lowered its tariff barriers we ought to hear no more about inflation. If that were brought about I am sure my hon. friend from Macleod would realize how right he was when he answered so conscientiously the question I put to him on that occasion to which I have referred.

Mr. COOTE: I do not think my hon. friend has quoted me correctly. Although we might have free trade, I think this country has been deflated to such a point that we must have inflation to correct the situation. I was in error if I gave the answer which the hon. gentleman attributes to me.

Mr. POULIOT: Hansard is there and can be referred to at any time to show what the hon. gentleman said. I asked the question whether, if tariffs were lowered, there was any necessity for inflation, and the hon. member replied that there would be no necessity for it. The statement was made during the discussion on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. He said, "I believe that as soon as tariffs are lowered reasonably there will be no necessity for inflation." We have the proof of that in the fact that when trade was normal owing to a normal tariff we never heard a word about inflation.

Mr. COOTE: I am sure that before we get free trade in Canada we shall have inflation.

Mr. POULIOT: That may be so, but I have quoted what the hon. gentleman said a month ago as found in Hansard.

Mr. COOTE: The Prime Minister spoke of the terrific losses of the banks in western Canada. I am sorry to hear that. If it is true, I would lay the responsibility directly on the shoulders of the administration who, by their monetary policy, have endeavoured to keep us as near to world gold prices as possible. Their policy has kept prices of the products of the west to the point where the farmers are unable to pay back the loans made by the banks. Had the debt-paying power of wheat been as great in the west during the last two years as in Australia, the farmers would have been able to pay back to the banks a great many millions of dollars which they have been unable to return.

Mr. RHODES: I must raise a point of order. I regret to have to do so in the case of my hon. friend for Macleod, but I would have done it in the case of the hon. member for Temiscouata, who was entirely out of order. I must point out that the hon. gentleman is not in order, now that the committee is considering the bill, in replying to anything said in the debate on the second reading. I must raise the point of order if we are not to have a second, third or fourth debate in committee of the whole. The discussion must be confined strictly to the question before us, which has nothing whatever to do with the gold standard.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The point raised by the minister is well taken. It is now six o'clock and I trust that when the committee resumes hon. members will endeavour to be in order.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight oclock.

Mr. COOTE: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister in regard to this bill which is to renew the Bank Act for a period of a year. Section 91 of the present act sets a limit of 7 per cent on the rate of interest which a bank may charge.

I just wanted to ask the minister whether he is aware that on many bank loans rates much in excess of 7 per cent are being charged, whether the inspector general of banks ever reports to him in connection with that matter, whether he has heard anything about it and, whether he does not think, before this bill is passed out of committee, some amendment should be made to section 91 so that banks will be compelled to comply with what is admittedly the intention of that section.

Mr. RHODES: Whatever merits the suggestion of my hon. friend may have—and I am not for a moment intimating that there are no merits in it—the fact remains that in a renewal of bank charters for a period of a year we are not attempting in any way to revise the Bank Act. If we started in on the question of amending this, that or the other section of the Bank Act, we would be attempting in committee of the whole house to revise the act without the matter going to the banking and commerce committee; so that his suggestion is not one which we could properly entertain in connection with a bill of this kind.

Mr. COOTE: When this matter was before the house either last year or the year before—and I think it was last year—the statement was made on more than one occasion by more than one member that the Bank Act would be up for revision this year. Many members admitted that section 91 should be revised so that banks would be compelled to remain within the limit of 7 per cent on loans made by them. Perhaps if I brought to the attention of the minister some of the rates they are charging, he might take more interest in the matter. The rates which I am going to mention are contained in a return which was recently brought down, a return which the banks make under a certain section of the act. In this return the banks are required to show the maximum rates of interest charged on the different classes of loans. They divide these loans into four classes: A, B, C and D. As I remember the matter, class A loans are for any amount up to $250; class B, for amounts from $250 to $1,000; class C, loans from $1,000 to $25,000, and class D, loans over $25,000.

On page 15 of the return brought down there is a class C loan, that is a loan between $1,000 and $25,000, which shows 10 per cent interest being charged on an overdraft. On page 16 of the return, the discount rate charged on a class B loan, that is on an amount between $250 and $1,000, for a period of one month, is shown at 9 per cent. On page 17 of the return a rate of 12 per cent is shown on a class B loan, a rate of 10 per cent on a class C loan and a rate of 8 per cent on a class D, that is for an amount over $25,000. On page 18, the return shows a discount rate of 10 per cent on a class B loan, that is an amount between $250 and $1,000, for a period of ninety days and a rate of 10 per cent on a class C loan, that is an amount between $1,000 and $25,000, for a period of ninety-one days. The rates which are shown in this return show clearly the need for revising that section of the act at this session of parliament. The business men and farmers of Canada cannot stand such rates of interest. The banks are taking an unfair advantage of their customers in charging such rates and that is the reason I am bringing the matter to the attention of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the return show whether those rates were for loans made in Canada?

Mr. COOTE. I am speaking from memory and I shall have to speak subject to correction, but so far as I remember all the loans I have mentioned were in Canada. I would like to ask the minister whether these rates have been brought to his attention and now that I have brought them to his notice, whether he will not consider amending this one section of the act. Many members, if not a majority of the house, felt last year that a general revision of the act would take place at this session and accordingly the matter was allowed to go over for a year.

Mr. RHODES: I can only point out again to my hon. friend that we are not amending the Bank Act except to renew the charters for a period of one year. I know quite well that on perusal of the return which my hon. friend received, he would be able to find instances showing a much higher percentage than those he has mentioned, but in most cases they have reference to loans for only a short period, some for only a few days, and the service charge, which is a proper one, I believe, in most cases at least, is included in the rate, thus making it a figure which, without examination, would appear almost fantastic. But I do not think this is the place or the time to enter into a discussion of that or any other aspect of the merits of the Bank Act as such.

Mr. COOTE: Surely this cannot be referred to in any way as a service charge, nor can it be regarded as fantastic, the rate is 10 per cent on a class B loan, that is a loan from $250 to $1,000, for ninety days. That is a fair sized loan and for as long a period of time as most banks, according to their own statement, will lend money, yet they are charging 10 per cent when they should be charging only 7 per cent. Something should be done about this matter.

Let me draw the minister's attention to another one. On a loan of over $25,000, a rate of 8 per cent is being charged. On a demand loan of over $1,000 ten per cent is being charged. The instances which I have cited should convince the minister that, in spite of what he says about this not being a revision of the Bank Act but simply an extension, when we are in committee would be a good time to revise section 91. These rates are very unfair. If the minister will not do anything about the matter, I can only express my regret and assure him that I believe a majority of the people of Canada feel he should do something about it.

Mr. SPENCER: Supporting the hon. member for Macleod, I should like to remind the Minister of Finance that is 1932 I introduced into this house a bill to penalize banks which were charging more than the legal rate of interest of 7 per cent. At that time the committee turned it down with the excuse that the Bank Act was coming up for revision in 1933 and therefore the matter could be dealt with this year. The revision has now been put off for another year and I think the hon. member for Macleod is quite in order in bringing the matter up on the floor of the house at this time.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he can give us a definite answer with respect to the question asked him by the hon. member for Macleod; that is, does the inspector general of banks draw his attention to bank charges where there are those exorbitant figures above 7 per cent quoted by the hon. member?

Mr. RHODES: When the reply was made last year that the Bank Act would come up for revision this year, that was the ordinary expectation, and but for unusual conditions prevailing at the moment the Bank Act would no doubt now be up for revision. The representations made by the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for Battle River would very properly be considered at such a time. I may say to my hon. friend that while nothing can be done so far as amendment is concerned until the Bank Act itself is up for revision, I shall be very happy to draw the attention of the banks to the remarks of my hon. friends.

Mr. COOTE: I am sorry if that is all the minister is going to do about the matter. I have of course no doubt the banks will be duly advised by their friends in the house or the press gallery of the House of Commons of any remarks which I may make. The minister will not do anything about the rate of interest. I would draw the minister's attention to subsection 4 of section 91 of the Bank Act, which says:

> No bank shall directly or indirectly charge or receive any sum whatsoever for the keeping of any account unless such charge is made by express agreement between the bank and the customer.

It has been drawn to my attention that a great many banks in western Canada—I do not know about the east—are insisting that the great majority of their customers should sign such a form. I have recently received a communication from a gentleman in Banff in which he says that the bank manager presented to him the following form and asked him to sign it. The form is addressed to the Imperial Bank of Canada, and reads:

> In consideration of your keeping (at your discretion) a current account in your books in name of the undersigned, I-We hereby authorize you to debit such account with a monthly charge of $..... See schedule below. Dated at Banff this 10th day of March, 1933.

Then it says:

> Balance under $100 allowed 5 cheques per month.
> Balance under $200 allowed 10 cheques per month.
> Balance under $300 allowed 15 cheques per month.
> Over that number 5 cents per cheque with minimum of 50 cents.

That makes a very heavy charge against an account, five cents for the cheque and three cents for the government stamp, or eight cents for every cheque that is drawn. The customer is compelled to sign that form or have his account discontinued. It might fairly be said that this is a matter to be settled between the bank and the customer. I have no objection to that statement except that the banks on every occasion on which they have been before our committee have said: We are giving to the people in many parts of Canada a good many services, and for those services we should be allowed the privilege of note issue. They also say that they should be allowed to exceed the rate of seven per cent, which is stipulated in section 91. The banks are certainly not giving to the people any very great privileges at the present time. They are lending so little money that they find it difficult to make their branches pay, and a great many of their customers are forced to pay this charge which I have mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman say that that is general?

Mr. COOTE: I have seen enough of it to say it is general in the particular province in which I live.

Mr. BENNETT: I have evidence of it in only one place.

Mr. COOTE: I have had dozens of men protest to me against it, mostly small retailers in the town who are issuing a great many cheques. They have drafts coming due which they cannot meet, a good many of them, and they will pay $25 or $30 on these drafts, and the draft is sent back to the head office in Toronto or wherever it may be. The firm in Toronto makes out a new draft for another month, and the customer accepts it and when it becomes due pays off another $25 or $30. That process goes on every month, and these business men feel it a very considerable burden. One man told me, "I have discontinued my account at the bank, and I am keeping my cash, what I have, in the safe, and as my bills come due I go down to the bank and pay them." The banks are not fulfilling the function which they were intended to fulfil, and which I believe the majority of the members think they are fulfilling. They are making the customers pay these charges which they have put on in an endeavour to make their country branches pay their way. It seems to me that if the banks are going to continue to have the privilege of note issue and be allowed to charge rates in excess of seven per cent, and apparently they are for at least this year, they are not treating their customers fairly when they insist on this very high charge for keeping a current account. The result will be that they will educate the people to do without banks after a while. They have closed many banks in western Canada. A case in point is at Lundbreck. Some farmers who were dealing with the bank at Lundbreck will now have to go to Pincher Creek, which will be in a few cases as much as thirty-five miles from their home. When I took up this matter with the general manger of the bank in question he said, "These men have nearly all got automobiles, and it will not take them very long to go to Pincher Creek and see their banker once in a while, to renew their notes." But other bankers have told me that many farmers could not afford to run their cars any longer. Few of them have buggies in these days, and if they have to make a trip of thirty-five miles in a lumber wagon to their bank to renew their notes once a month, they are going to spend quite a lot of time on the road. I do not want to be unfair to the banks, but some of the banks are not very fair to the people in what I think are very small matters. The banks in a sense are semi-public institutions and should perform a public service; if they wish to do that, there are one or two things in which they might be a little more liberal in their treatment of the general public, particularly in the rate of interest charged, the service charges they are making, and the branches which they are closing.

Mr. BENNETT: I took the matter up with the banks as soon as the circular to which the hon. gentleman refers was brought to my attention. I am told it is not of general circulation, and that in fact it has been withdrawn. I do not know whether that is so in all cases or not, but certainly it came as a surprise to me, and I took the steps that I have indicated.

So far as the closing of branches is concerned, I just put this question to the hon. gentleman: Does he not believe that in the province in which we both live there have been entirely too many branch banks opened and that there has been nothing to warrant the continuance of many of them? The fact is that many of them have lost money, some of them substantial sums, because there were too many banks in the same community. If they make an arrangement by which they leave a particular territory to one bank, the bank is then charged with having a monopoly. The result is that no bank makes any money and all in the end get out, and if the service is to be given some arrangement has to be arrived at.

I share the views of the hon. member for Macleod in this: I have expressed myself very clearly and plainly that there is no warrant for banks in these days of depression doing other than making the greatest possible effort to serve the communities in which they are; I have personally taken such action as I could on several occasions to try to ensure that, and I shall continue to do so. You cannot, however, prevent freedom of contract, and sometimes the instances to which the hon. gentleman refers in which high rates of interest have been charged have reference to transactions outside of Canada altogether, as he knows. I had a case in mind the other day in which I had been told that a very high rate of interest had been paid. I found that $1 had been charged for the use of $50 for one month.

Obviously the rate of interest in that case would be $12 per annum on $50, or 24 per cent. That looks to be a scandalous transaction, but in point of fact $1 did not pay the bank. I took the trouble to investigate just what was involved. A promissory note was provided by the bank. The office was maintained at which the note was signed. Then an entry was made in the ledger by the discount clerk; cheques were provided free, and if the measurement of service can be approximated, as was done by the late H. C. McLeod of the Bank of Nova Scotia by a method that he himself established, it will be found that the bank made no profit on that transaction, leaving out any profit that might arise from circulation. I mean that the exact cost of the services rendered did not represent a profit, and the minimum charge of $1 is not regarded I believe as an unreasonable charge under those circumstances, although it shows a rate which I agree with the hon. gentleman is one that is calculated to bring distrust to many people. But you could not expect any bank to lend $50 at the rate of seven per cent for thirty days. That would amount to only thirty cents for the service which, of course, would mean a great loss.

Mr. COOTE: I was very careful, in selecting the few examples I gave to the committee, not to take any of the minimum charges which the Prime Minister has mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Mr. COOTE: If he would just allow me to repeat one or two of the illustrations he would see that I was very careful—

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance himself said that there were cases worse than the ones to which he referred. I agree he did not take minimum service charges, but I merely used those figures as an illustration which is sometimes used upon public platforms and elsewhere.

Mr. COOTE: I remember that ten years ago I found it very difficult to convince the chairman of the banking and commerce committee that banks were charging rates of 10 per cent and upwards. At that time I asked for a copy of a return under the section I now have before me, and we found where one bank was charging 15 per cent on a ninety day loan of an amount over $250. I dare say there are worse cases than the ones I have mentioned. But I was very careful to take the illustrations from the returns actually brought down in the house, so that no one would question the rate I was quoting. To the best of my recollection I would say these were all cases of loans in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Following up the matter of interest may I ask the Prime Minister a question regarding two notes I now have in my possession? I am sure they will cause him the same concern they have caused everybody who has seen them. The Royal Bank entered upon an agreement with a man named Anderberg for the loan to him of the sum of $20. The original note was made out on June 16, was payable October 19, and had on the face of it provision for 8 per cent. At the end of the three months the man was still unable to pay and asked for an extension. Seventy-five cents was marked under the $20, and was carried forward in the new note. Another one was made out on October 19 running to December 5, and the account was paid in full on December 11. Seventy-five cents was charged in each case, or $1.50 for five months on a $20 loan, the note bearing 8 per cent interest. If hon. members will take the trouble to figure out the $1.50 for five months on $20 they will find that the rate was between 16 per cent and 18 per cent, despite the fact that the note was carrying 8 per cent. That is the sort of thing which people are suffering under certain conditions, at the hands of our banks in the west.

I have in mind another instance where a man had consigned 6,000 pounds of alfalfa seed to an association. He had a loan at the bank, and was unable to pay it in full. Finally, when the sale of the seed was completed the payment money was deposited in the bank, whereupon the manager simply seized the moneys without even consulting the person on whose behalf payment had been made. A protest was registered, but the customer was told that under the Bank Act the manager had a perfect right to take that course. Those are two illustrations which must indicate to the Prime Minister that his opinion with regard to some transactions is more than well founded.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has already said that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, I know.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to reply to the Prime Minister concerning a question he directed to me about general practice in regard to charging customers on cheques. In the town from which I come at least twenty-five or thirty men mentioned this matter to me when I was home during the Christmas holidays. I am quite satisfied that at least in that part of the province the practice is general, and so far as I know practically everybody who does not keep a balance over $300 is being asked to sign these forms.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe the Prime Minister stated, if I heard him correctly, that he did not think banks generally had adopted the practice of making charges for operating accounts. I have had several complaints from the city from which I come about this matter. I believe the situation in Vancouver in reference to charges is worse than that outlined by the hon. member for Macleod. A statement before me from one of the banks in Vancouver discloses the following charges:

Balances—	Cheques free	Charge for each additional cheque
Below $200	..	7 cents
$200 to $299	10	7 cents
$300 to $399	20	7 cents
$400 to $499	30	7 cents

I am told these charges have been made for the past two years, and in many cases without any express agreement between banker and client. It seems to me that banks should not expect a profit on every account. During the last two or three years, despite the depression, bank statements show profitable business. Further than that, in their charters they have received very substantial privileges for which they are supposed to give public service. At this time when their business is much better than other lines of business I do not believe it is proper to oppress the people further by these charges.

Mr. NEILL: I have had complaints similar to those mentioned by other hon. members. May I ask the Prime Minister if it was only recently that the banks indicated to him they would discontinue the practice?

Mr. BENNETT: If my memory serves me correctly the matter was first brought to my attention just before the turn of the year. I did communicate with the representative of the bankers' association, and my understanding was that steps were being taken to accommodate the situation to existing conditions. I believe that would be some time since the middle of January, but I cannot fix the exact date.

Mr. COOTE: I do not wish to delay the committee, and will take only two or three more minutes. One reason why some of my constituents feel the minister should exercise greater control over the banks, and bring them down to a rate of seven per cent is that financially the banks seem to be doing much better than any other concerns in Canada. Until very recently their dividends have been high. Some of our bigger banks have been paying all the way from twelve per cent to sixteen per cent during the last year. And when customers who are driven to the most extraordinary limits to keep themselves solvent at all find that banks are still able to pay these handsome dividends, they do object. Again I wish to say that the minister is making a mistake in not taking some action, particularly in regard to interest rates under section 91. It is quite within the competence of parliament to change that section of the act, and this is the year when it should be changed. I do not believe the banks would really have any reason to object to a change in that section.

Mr. RHODES: If we were reviewing the act the request of the hon. member for Macleod would be worthy of consideration. But we are continuing the charters of the banks for one year, not reviewing the act at all. If my hon. friend says the banks are earning 12 and 14 and 16 per cent, his statement is in effect not accurate. I am quite prepared to admit that it appears in the press that certain banks declared dividends at the rate of 10 and 12 per cent, but as a matter of fact I think it is unfortunate that the banks give publicity to statements of that character, because such rates relate only to the capital stock, without reference to reserve. A great portion of the reserves of the banks has been paid in in actual cash by shareholders, who also are subject at all times to the double liability clause, which is a real limiting factor on the rise in value of bank shares. As a matter of fact most of the banks make less than 6 per cent, even the banks which are reputed to be paying dividends at the rate of 12 per cent. I am dealing of course, with the dividend rates of some years ago; since that time they have been much less. I rise merely to correct the impression which seems to be more or less widespread throughout the country that the banks are making inordinate profits. They certainly are not as far as their total capital is concerned.

Mr. SPENCER: If there is a misunderstanding in regard to what the banks pay I think they themselves are to blame, because they take great care to advertise to the public how strong they are by being able to pay these rates of 12 and 16 per cent. I rise merely to remind the Finance minister that in his very polite way he did not answer the question that the hon. member for Macleod and myself asked a short time ago, but talked around the point. We would like to know if it is the duty of the inspector general of banks, who was appointed, I think, in 1924, to bring it to the attention of the Finance minister when he finds the banks charging exorbitant rates above the legal rate.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the minister would kindly answer?

Mr. RHODES: I did not mean to be impolite to my hon. friends; I did not purposely avoid answering the question, but the acoustic properties here are no better than my hon. friend finds them down there, because we are equal distances apart. I may say that the inspector general of banks has not specifically directed my attention to anything of that character. It is true I have discussed with him the return as submitted to the house at the instance of my hon. friend for Macleod, but there has never been any report to me as Minister of Finance of inordinate charges in that respect.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In view of the recent announcement that the banks are reducing their rate of interest on savings deposits, would it not be well for the government to take into consideration the use of moral suasion to induce the banks to reduce the rate of interest on loans? It would surely be in keeping with an intelligent monetary policy, and not a departure in any degree from the statement this afternoon in connection with the general world monetary situation as described by the Prime Minister. Section 1 of this bill, in spite of the thought in the mind of the Minister of Finance, gives power to parliament to consider and review the whole act. There is no question that we can review the entire act under this bill. I think the government owes it to the Canadian people to give at this time some definite assurance that it will do more than merely mention to the banks what has been said in this house about the question of interest and service charges.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will realize that the reduction in the interest rate takes effect only as of to-day; he will find that a corresponding reduction in interest charges will be made in keeping with the reduction in interest on deposits. It will obtain in practically all cases immediately. I can quite understand that the banks in connection with certain accounts which would be expensive even at any reasonable rate of interest might have some hesitancy in reducing the rate. But on all provincial, municipal and other accounts where the conditions warrant it, comparable and even greater reductions will be made as of May 1.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister intimating that the reduction will take place on an account carrying say five per cent, and that the reduction will be one half per cent?

Mr. RHODES: I am not in a position to go into details as to individual rates. I said a comparable reduction would be made, in line with the reduction in interest on deposits.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will it apply on personal accounts?

Mr. RHODES: I have already said it will apply where these accounts are of a class on which reduction is warranted. I have intimated that there would be some accounts that would be expensive even at a very high rate of interest.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask what authority is going to see that these reductions are made?

Mr. RHODES: The banks themselves.

Mr. COOTE: I suggest that it would be much more effective and satisfactory if a slight amendment were to be made to section 91 imposing some penalty on the banks when they charge in excess of 7 per cent, except, if you like, in the case of small loans where a service charge might be allowed. From past experience, not only with banks but with other institutions, I think it would be much more effective to make an amendment in the act than to depend on moral suasion.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to take up time, but the hon. member knows that the late Minister of Finance, Hon. Mr. Robb, endeavoured to deal with this matter, and he knows the result. The question of contract is governed by provincial laws; where the individual makes a contract for payment of a higher rate than that provided for by the statute it is held not necessarily to be illegal, and that the money could not be recovered by the borrower if it had been paid. That was the decision of the privy council in the Union bank case. Since then successive ministers have endeavoured to grapple with the question. The dual jurisdiction in connection with interest is a matter hon. gentlemen will have to deal with in connection with the bill introduced to-day. The question of contract is not within the jurisdiction of this house. The fixing of a rate beyond which a further charge cannot be made is. The opening words of the section to which he directed attention are placed there because of very definite constitutional inhibitions with respect to which I think the hon. gentleman is fully aware.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask a question on that? Seeing that the banks operate under a charter granted by the dominion, would it not be possible to insert in the act a provision which would in effect make it necessary for the banks to comply with any rate of interest which parliament in its wisdom might set?

Mr. BENNETT: I am only speaking offhand. In the case of the Union bank versus Tennant the privy council held that this parliament had the authority to do everything that might be incidental to the exercise of its paramount authority over banks and banking, and therefore could provide for security in form E of the Bank Act instead of taking chattel mortgages. Since then it will be remembered the house has provided that there must be registration books kept for that purpose. My answer to the inquiry would be that it is a legal question; my personal view—I am only giving it for what it may be worth—would be that this parliament has authority as incidental to the exercise of its control under the specific subsection of section 91 under which we legislate, to make such declaration as might be necessary in the premises.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: One point in connection with interest. I am sorry I had not known that this question would arise or I would have brought down with me to the chamber the report I have in mind. But in connection with the inquiry being carried on by the banking and commerce committee—and I shall make no further reference to it than this—we found it necessary to establish as definitely as possible the relative jurisdictions of the two governments, federal and provincial, in relation to the question of interest. So far as we could ascertain from every authority with whom we could consult in the matter we found that the federal parliament had almost complete jurisdiction over matters of interest. That seemed to be agreed upon by practically every legal authority whom we consulted. It was felt that we had almost complete authority over such matters as the rate of interest to be charged, the conditions under which interest could be paid and the times and places at which interest payments should be made. It seemed the consensus of opinion among those authorities that the authority of this parliament in that regard extended even to contracts made in the past under provincial law, whether mortgages or other forms of obligations. So far as we have gone—and I am not prepared to say that the final word has been uttered—there seems almost complete agreement with the idea that the entire jurisdiction rests with the federal parliament in relation to all matters of interest. If the committee can only succeed in having that one point established perhaps the inquiry might be of some value.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a very extraordinary thing that we cannot get very far in any of these matters without coming up against this constitutional difficulty. Might I suggest that it is comparatively easy to get around legal and constitutional questions when the government so desires, and I think we would be on much better ground if we confessed frankly that economic power is a great deal stronger in this country than legally constituted authority. For example, when we came to the question of the savings bank in Manitoba we found it was quite possible for the banks to dictate the terms under which they would loan money to the government. We find that the banks actually told the premier of Manitoba when he was to summon parliament. According to the constitution, as I understand it, the calling of parliament is a royal prerogative, but in practice in this country it is within the power of the banks.

So I do not think we need worry very much about purely constitutional questions under circumstances such as those. Further than that, in regard to that very incident only this afternoon the Prime Minister said that he gave this help to Manitoba because of the desperate position in which the depositors found themselves. It is quite true that the depositors could not have gone in a body and secured their deposits, but on the other hand it is also true that the Prime Minister could have guaranteed the province, which he refused to do though he gave the same guarantee to the banks. Constitutional difficulties did not enter there at all, or if they did were seemingly swept aside.

Take the situation we face in my own province at the present time. The Prime Minister has warned, or threatened—I am not quite sure which word I should use—the provincial government that unless it balances its budget no further aid will be granted. He does not take into account all the sacrifices that this may involve, which may include the closing of our university or even our public schools, and possibly the cutting down of the old age pensions, which I thought was a matter fixed by statute some years ago. Whatever the sacrifices, however, it seems that we must balance our budget, and the threat is that a comptroller will be put in if that is not done. From my standpoint that is clearly an invasion of provincial rights as guaranteed by our constitution, and I think this is most serious. If in effect we are to be told by the Dominion government whether or not we may have schools, whether or not we may continue to keep our hospitals open, whether or not we can provide for various charitable institutions, whether we are to have highways and all that kind of thing, it is very serious. Constitutionally all that sort of thing comes within the range of provincial authority, but practically the provincial government is told what it must do.

The Prime Minister may say in reply that it is the creditor who is in a position to determine under what conditions loans may continue to be extended, and in that way he may shield himself behind the banks. I do not see why we should permit that situation to continue indefinitely. It seems to me that if we had a Prime Miinster who had at heart the interests of the great masses of the people he would be able to tell the banks very definitely what they should do in such matters, and I do not think the constitutional question would enter very much. So I say it seems in this country that economic power is much more fundamental than legal or constitutional power, which can be readily swept aside when it is desired that this should be done.

I do not see how the Minister of Finance can very well dissociate the revision of the Bank Act and the granting of these charters; the two go together. The charters are exercised under certain conditions. A few years ago when we introduced amendments to the Bank Act we were told that we should postpone any such amendments until the decennial revision, that this was only two or three years away and that then we would be given a chance to go into the Bank Act. Now we are told that for another year we must continue to suffer under the present act, with all that it involves. I know the Prime Minister can say, and I have no doubt he sincerely thinks, that we must maintain what he calls our Canadian institutions for fear of disastrous consequences, but I submit that these institutions were set up to serve the people, and I do not think it can be said that they are serving the masses of the people to-day. If the banks had been doing the right thing we would not have had all these speculative disasters; we would not have had all the losses on the part of thousands of people through certain investment houses, through speculative enterprises, through the overcapitalization of certain pulp and paper companies and other corporations, the failure of which has taken place in the last few years. Now the banks are to be continued in a position in which they may exploit the people in this way; they have that power. The Prime Minister seems to think things should continue as at present, that only a few cranks venture to criticize the banks. As a matter of fact a great many people across this country, business people as well as those so called cranks, are criticizing the banks to-day in private at least, and they would criticize them in public if they dared do so. We are all acquainted with the fact that many business men, indeed men in all walks of life, are so tied up with the banks that they hardly dare come out and criticize them as they would like. In spite of this we are asked to continue this sort of thing for another year.

It is very easy for the Prime Minister to tell us that our banks are in a sounder position than the banks of the United States. I am not sure that the Canadian people generally are so much better off than the people in that country, and even if we are better off it is admitted that conditions to-day are anything but satisfactory. As a matter of fact the banks have a monopoly of the most important functions existing in our country. The bankers are entirely irresponsible, and I use that word in its correct sense: they are not responsible to the people. They can do as they please, and apparently this government refuses to exercise any coercive power over the banks. I think it is pretty generally recognized that the government itself, in financial matters, very largely founds it policies on the recommendations of the banks. It has been so for years, and I am not blaming this administration for it. That this has been the situation anyone will recognize who has followed the various banking committees we have had in the past and the various government policies in so far as they have related to finance. I take it then that, under the Bank Act, by means of these charters we have placed the financial system, which is fundamental to the whole business life of the country, under the control of an irresponsible group of people. They have not even the traditional ideals of responsibility as the Bank of England.

And I come now to another point. These bankers are not dissociated from particular business enterprises, as we in this corner have again and again pointed out; we have shown something of the interlocking directorates that prevail to-day. I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the committee going over this again, but we all know that the men who are in control have their own personal interests at stake. The outstanding example is Sir Herbert Holt. I remember putting on the record years ago about one hundred and fifty companies, of each of which he was a director; and I say that a man who is a director of a large number of corporations, or even of a smaller number, cannot act distinterestedly when it comes to a question of banking policies. It is impossible for him to do so. Yet we are continuing to allow men, who before ten years are over will be regarded as little less than financial pirates, to maintain their monopoly. That is what in effect is being done by the extension of these charters.

There is another matter which I would point out. Although the bankers are in one sense irresponsible, and although they are interested individuals, we have given them a semi-public position. They have very great powers. The other day, when the Prime Minister was talking about gold coverage, he said nothing with regard to the powers that might be exercised under the Finance Act. I do not think he was in his place when subsequently I spoke about the power that was given under the Finance Act to loan money upon certain securities. The people who determine how much money shall be loaned, what the value of the securities shall be, are the trustees of the gold reserve, and the trustees of the gold reserve, I would point out, are the Royal Trust, the Bank of Montreal and the Royal bank. I think that if that one fact could get across to the people of Canada there would be something very much like a revolution among the business men of the country. Hon. gentlemen have talked frequently about the danger of a revolution among the labouring classes, the people who are down and out, the unemployed, but I take it that one of these days there will be something of that kind among the business men of the country when they realize that certain people are privileged to go to the government and obtain money from them on loan at a very low rate of interest, and that the value of securities as well as the amount that can be given out is determined by the bankers, who themselves are interested parties in this matter.

That situation is out of keeping with the fundamental principles of justice and good government as generally recognized. It is permitted to continue simply because we have two or three different acts that are not directly related to one another, or do not appear to be directly related, so that in this way it is not quite apparent what is going on. It is a very serious thing when the government asks us to delay for another year this much needed reform in monetary control, leaving in the meantime a particular group in the community in the saddle.

It may be said, and it has been said, that on account of the extraordinary world situation this policy is necessary. I would point out that the extraordinary world situation has brought this country to the verge of bankruptcy. The extraordinary world situation has put 1,357,000 people on public relief and I do not know how many more under private charity. It is all very well to talk about tiding things over, but think of the price we are paying in order that we may do so! And why all this sacrifice? In the hope that the institutions as now established may be continued indefinitely. Well, about the only consolation we have is that this one year of delay may give us fuller opportunity to rally the forces so that that there may be a protest from one end of the country to the other, a protest that possibly may result in more far-reaching changes than would be possible if the Bank Act were revised this year. That is about the only satisfaction I can find in the present situation.

It seems to me that the situation in Canada, although it may have been very good for the banks, is disastrous for the country. I cannot think that the resolutions that may be passed at the world economic conference will be likely to change that situation materially so far as Canada is concerned. I cannot see why, as my colleagues have suggested with regard to certain matters that are pressing upon us very definitely, local matters such as the rate of interest, we should delay another year before having these things rectified. The fact that the government is standing pat is for me—this is an opinion if you like—another indication of how closely the government and the bankers are associated and how necessary it is that we should put up a strong fight right across the country in order that the common people might be delivered from what I regard as a tyranny, a tyranny not of some governmental body, not by one particular party, but a tyranny of financial interests. Unless there are modifications in the very near future I fear that the overthrowing of the tyranny may be disastrous to the welfare of the country for years to come.

Again I urge that the house should consider very seriously the consequences of permitting to continue for another year a policy which we know very well has already come near to the wrecking of the business life of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: I must correct one or two misstatements on the part of the hon. member, whether deliberate or not I cannot say. He must have read the correspondence that took place between the federal government and the government of Manitoba. It was distinctly pointed out in the letter that if the province balanced the budget within a million dollars it would be thought that it was doing satisfactory work.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not hear the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: The letter dispatched to Manitoba provided that if the budget was balanced within a million dollars it was regarded as being a fairly good result. The situation is not as it was put to the house a moment ago. In the second place, with respect to the appointment of a comptroller, it was pointed out that the province would have to appoint a comptroller and not the dominion. The legislature must take steps and not this parliament. There was no interference with the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. NEILL: It has to be satisfactory to the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly; the hon. gentleman quite appreciates the point. I merely desired to make that correction, because it would be very injurious to the country as a whole that a statement of that kind should be made which is so wholly at variance with the facts. The other statement with regard to the placing of value upon the securities under the Finance Act I am also compelled to correct. The market price of securities that are available for that purpose is established. It is something that is established in the markets of the world. It is only the limited classes of security that are available. That part of the matter is not important. The question of commercial paper—and there is a limit upon the kind that may be used—may be open always to discussion and that is to be settled by the authorities set up under the act. That is a matter of very great importance, and that this country should be led to believe the statement just made is correct, would do, I suppose, just what the hon. gentleman has suggested, that is, arouse great indignation on the part of the Canadian people. I correct that statement also.

I am not going to traverse what has been said with respect to the other matters except to refer to the Manitoba savings bank. In the first place the law does not permit it to be called a bank; neither can the province of Ontario call its savings institution a bank. I am not responsible for the constitution which in 1867 divided the jurisdiction between parliament on the one hand and the provincial legislatures on the other. The constitution says that the legislature shall deal with property and civil rights exclusively, but the parliament of Canada, under section 91 of the British North America Act, has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with banks and banking as well as with interest. It has not been decided by any case of which I know, despite what the hon. member for Red Deer has just said, that it would be competent for this parliament to declare that a man living in Alberta could not make a contract to pay to anyone who would lend him money, a rate of 8 or 10 per cent. There have been made by statute inhibitions with which the courts have had to deal, but the constitutional position to which the hon. gentleman so scoffingly refers is one that, I think, it is always well for us to keep in mind. Whether or not the federal system is good or bad is, as an hon. gentleman opposite said some weeks ago, not the issue. Whether you can nationalize everything and destroy by one stroke of the pen the federal jurisdiction and merge those of the provinces in a new body, is not for me to say, beyond this: that all domestic problems and questions, including contracts and the making of them and the instance of contractual relationships, are under our constitution vested in the provincial legislatures, and under the federal powers we make laws with respect to large matters affecting the nation as a whole.

I am not for a moment seeking to escape the question that was asked, whether constitutional considerations should be permitted to have importance when one is dealing with matters of this kind. My answer to that is: No consent on our part nor that of others can make invalid that which by our constitution is valid, and no consent on our part can make valid that which under our constitution is invalid. The question of validity or invalidity is one not for this parliament but for the courts, and when I indicate that the courts have decided that the real issue in a case of this kind is whether, in the exercise of its powers, the province has its exclusive authority encroached upon by a dominion statute or whether our exclusive dominion jurisdiction has been impugned by a provincial statute, the question always is, in the first analysis, as Lord Haldane once said, one of fact. After you have settled the character and type of legislation, you must determine the other questions that are involved, the extent to which there has been impinging upon provincial powers by the dominion parliament beyond the extent that may be necessary for the purpose of validly exercising exclusive federal powers. I am not going to traverse that, but I desire only to make these corrections of what has been said in order that revolution may not be predicated upon an improper conception of the fact.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very glad to accept those very mild corrections which do not in the least touch the main phases of my argument. May I venture, just in order that side by side with the Prime Minister's statement, there may be the wording of the act itself, to quote from section 6, part II of the Finance Act, as follows:

Such securities shall be deposited with the minister or with an assistant receiver general; and the minister may request the trustees of the central gold reserves to make a valuation of and recommendation as to the amount which in the judgment of the trustees may properly be advanced on any securities offered in pledge under this part.

I think that is quite in keeping with the statement that I made. Let me further quote a statement made by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen before the Bankers' Educational Association in Toronto on January 21, 1931:

Under the Finance Act of later years, our government was authorized to advance to banks against specially named classes of collateral government notes by way of temporary loans and no provision was made for a gold reserve against these notes. . . . As to the money advanced under the Finance Act it is indefinite, consequently loans of unstated amounts, without limit, depending wholly upon the discretion of the Finance department, can be made without a gold reserve.

I think those words of Mr. Meighen are very clear.

As to the money advanced under the Finance Act it is indefinite, consequently loans of unstated amounts, without limit, depending wholly upon the discretion—

And so forth. Who are the trustees of the gold reserve? The other day the Prime Minister, as reported on page 3511 of Hansard, said:

The trustees are the Royal Trust Company, the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank of Canada.

With regard to the situation in Manitoba, it is true that the government was to be allowed a leeway of $1,000,000, but I think I am not very far wrong in saying that this is practically the balancing of the budget. May I call the attention of the committee to what anything like balancing a budget really involves? I would like to read two or three paragraphs from the letter of Mr. Bracken:

The three provinces are therefore temporary victims of the demoralized revenues, almost wholly due to world conditions, but more serious in certain areas by other abnormal circumstances already fully recognized by your government.

Again:

At the same time the provinces are simply customers of our banking institutions, with distinct and definite credit limitations, at a time when we are advised that our provincial securities can probably not be sold at all, but if so only at prices which will impose abnormally large increases in public debt charges.

There is the situation to which I was was referring. We are existing under a monopoly and under conditions which are not due to the provincial authorities, but which are, at least in my judgment, greatly exaggerated by the policies of the Dominion government. There is the position in which we as a province find ourselves at the present time. Mr. Bracken goes on to refer particularly to the past immigration policies of the federal government. He says:

We definitely face the following alternatives:
(a) To very seriously reduce our expenditures for schools, health institutions, old age pensions and mothers' allowance, or
(b) To default on exchange payments of either exchange premiums, or interest, or both.
We respectfully suggest that the adoption of the first alternative to any substantial extent would involve not only grave social disturbances but disastrously affect the morale of our people, already at a low level. As the total capital debts of the provincial governments and urban municipalities total over six hundred millions of dollars, the latter alternative should be avoided if at all possible.

This was the request:

(a) That the federal government advance us against treasury bills, the money required by municipalities and provincial governments, to meet expenditures for unemployment relief, at least until such time as our securities can be sold on a reasonable basis.
(b) That the dominion proportion of direct relief costs should be at least 50 per cent rather than 33⅓ per cent as at present.

This seems to me to be an eminently reasonable request. Later on in another letter there is given some indication as to what the extreme economies insisted upon by the Dominion government would mean:

Realizing the necessity of maintaining our relief services and since the bank has advised that it will not extend further credit, there is at present no other alternative but to accept your conditions. We shall therefore, put into effect the further reductions in the estimates tabled in the house, as follows:

Road maintenance.. .. .. (Already reduced $450,000)	$ 100,000
University grant..	50,000
(Already reduced $200,000)
Vocational training..	36,000
Members' indemnities..	7,000
(A second reduction)
Agricultural fairs..	37,000
(A second reduction)
Old age pensions..	314,000
School for the deaf..	40,000
(A second reduction)
Mothers' allowances..	25,000
(Already reduced $80,000)
Miscellaneous reductions including the following items: aids to municipalities, agricultural representatives, employment service, costs of government house, forest protection and reductions in staffs of natural resources and attorney-general's departments..	41,000
Total..	$ 650,000

It does seem extraordinary that the Dominion government is standing behind the banks in forcing Manitoba to retrench even in mothers' allowances. We are taking it out of the very food bill of the mothers and their children. That is an intolerable situation. Surely the province has the right to decide how we are to take care of the mothers and the families in our own community. But under these conditions we are handed over to the tender mercies of the banks, and the government conceives it to be its duty to stand behing the banks. In this way I urged that the provisions of the British North America Act are being practically ignored. I have no doubt that the Prime Minister would take very good care to see that the provisions of the British North American Act were technically and legally adhered to, but I say that practically he is ignoring the provisions of the British North America Act, and this government is interfering with the interests of the most helpless part of our population.

I do not quite know how the Prime Minister is going to account constitutionally for the reduction of old age pensions. I had thought that in this house we passed and Old Age Pensions Act with certain definite provisions, and that following the passing of that act agreements were entered into by the dominion government with the various provinces. I cannot quite see how it is constitutional for a province to alter the terms of that agreement, or even for this government to permit the variation of the terms of that agreement. Again I may point out in passing that at the last election the present Prime Minister promised that the Dominion government would take over 100 per cent of the cost of old age pensions.

Mr. BURY: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. For an hour and a half the members of this committee have been listening to a discussion that was absolutely out of order at the commencement. There is surely a limit. The members of the committee have rights that should be protected. I rise to protest that the hon. gentleman has been out of order almost since he commenced to speak, and that he is outrageously out of order now.

The CHAIRMAN: On what ground?

Mr. BURY: Not merely is he not discussing the Bank Act, but still less is he discussing clause 1 which is before the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit that I am in order, Mr. Chairman. I am trying to discuss the present Bank Act and its results. I would point out that Manitoba is paying six or seven million dollars in interest rates, and that it can no longer continue to pay those rates. I think I have a right to protest against the extension of the bank charters until such time as we have some understanding in regard to these matters. I think therefore I am perfectly in order.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a bill to amend the Bank Act. Clause 1 is very wide in its scope. Its purpose is that the bank charters shall be continued to July 1, 1934. As I read the clause it is very wide, and I think all the provisions of the Bank Act could be discussed upon this clause.

Mr. BURY: Does the chairman hold that old age pensions, the attitude of the government on old age pensions and its present policy on old age pensions come properly under a discussion of the Bank Act?

The CHAIRMAN: That is going pretty far. Certainly old age pensions would not be covered by section 1 of this bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I am not discussing the Old Age Pensions Act as such.

Mr. BURY: You were a few minutes ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not discussing it as such. I am referring to the present policies of the banks as they affect the government of Manitoba, and I think I have a right to give these illustrations. If the present conditions continue even for another year a large section of our population will find themselves in a desperate plight. It was in that connection that I mentioned old age pensions.

If I might be permitted to finish what I was saying, I do not see how the Prime Minister can defend the position into which he is forcing the provincial government in regard to old age pensions. We passed an Old Age Pensions Act, and subsequently the Dominion government made certain regulations and entered into certain agreements with the provinces. At the time of the election a few years ago the Prime Minister promised that the Dominion government would pay 100 per cent of the cost of the old age pensions.

Mr. BURY: Do I understand that that is in order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: I am just waiting for the hon. member to finish his idea.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This government refused to implement that promise; the burden being on the provincial government it has to borrow from the banks; the banks refuse to continue to lend, and when the province makes an appeal to the Dominion government the Dominion government practically says to the province: You have to balance your budget or come within a certain distance of doing it, or we will put in a comptroller; or technically, as the Prime Minister says, we will ask you to put in a comptroller but he must be persona grata to us. That is the situation. Hence I say that we are facing a desperate situation if we continue the present banking policies.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must confine himself to a discussion of the provisions of the Bank Act, and bank charters.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister has suggested that I was not accurate in stating the position of the government. In that connection I should like to read one or two paragraphs from the Prime Minister's letter of March 9 to Mr. Bracken:

> It becomes my absolute duty to say to you in the plainest terms, and I do so with all respect, that in case you anticipate making further requests for financial aid, either by loan or by guarantee or in any other form, favourable consideration cannot be given to such request unless your government is prepared to pledge itself to present a balanced budget by further reductions in proposed expenditures or by increased taxation, or by both; or if convincing evidence is adduced that under existing conditions such balanced budget is impossible—

May I state in passing that the Prime Minister used the term "balanced budget."

> —then your government must adopt a definite prescribed plan whereby the maximum estimated deficit under your proposed budget shall be well under $1,000,000.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that is relevant at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the attitude taken by the Prime Minister. All this simply means that the ordinary safeguards which were supposed to be provided by the British North America Act are set aside, and the provincial government is brought under the control of the Dominion government even in connection with matters which are supposed to come entirely within provincial jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN: But that cannot be the subject of discussion here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes it is. This whole matter is forced by the banks, and I submit that only the Dominion government can alter the Bank Act. If the Dominion government is serious it is quite within its power to revise the Bank Act when the renewal of charters is suggested. We have power to determine the conditions under which charters may be renewed, even for one year. So far as I can see, nothing which has been said by the Prime Minister in any way changes that position. As some of my colleagues have suggested, I believe we should proceed definitely to decrease interest rates, and in other ways to limit the powers of banks before renewing their charters.

Mr. NEILL: I listened with great interest to the Prime Minister's clear cut definition of the respective jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces. He drew a very clear line between the two jurisdictions, and said it was not even possible for one or the other body to divest itself of its responsibilities. No doubt in that statement he was quite correct. Unfortunately, however, we have established precedents to the contrary. I wish the Prime Minister had been here on Friday night and could have heard his colleague the Minister of Marine trying to defend order in council No. 206 which seeks deliberately to take away provincial jurisdiction. The only possible way in which a remedy could have been effected, namely, by concurrent legislation, had been definitely refused by the legislature of British Columbia. I wish I could interest the Prime Minister in the matter to the point where he would look into the situation. If he did so I believe he would take the proper steps to cancel the order in council.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to say a word concerning the jurisdiction of this parliament over interest rates. I do not purpose making quotations from reports of committees which have not yet concluded their work.

But in an endeavour to ascertain the jurisdiction of this parliament in relation to interest a questionnaire was prepared and sent to certain legal authorities. The matter was considered under three heads, the first question being:

Has the dominion parliament the power to fix a maximum rate of interest which may be charged on loans et cetera, granted by corporations created by dominion statute or letters patent where such corporations were (a) previously incorporated; (b) to be incorporated?

The answer from each of the bodies to which this questionnaire was submitted was, yes. The second question was:

Has the dominion parliament any power to prescribe the maximum rate of interest chargeable on loans generally made by (a) persons; (b) corporations—created by statute or letters patent other than dominion?

Again the answer was, yes. The third question was:

Has the dominion parliament the power (a) to fix; (b) to alter rates of interest in respect of bills of exchange and promissory notes?

Again the answer was, yes. The opinion of these legal authorities may not be conclusive; they may be incorrect. Yet they include the Department of Justice, and various provincial departments of attorneys general. In each case the answer was yes.

The questionnaire went on to deal with matters of reductions of principal. In this connection the answer was no—in other words that we had no power. But with respect to interest there was agreement amongst all the legal bodies and the departments of attorneys general. I submit that certainly a bank is a corporation incorporated under a dominion statute, and as such comes directly under the term of this reference. Naturally I am not posing as an authority. It was because I was not and others were not that we sought the opinions of authorities, and those opinions I have quoted.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to ask a question with regard to the reduction of interest rates. The minister has informed us that the banks are going to look after a reduction of interest on their loans. Personally I think that is hardly the proper agency to be doing that work. The banks are no more honest or dishonest than other people, and I should think that the inspector general of banks should see that such reductions are carried out. Will the reduction of interest refer to loans already made, or only to loans to be made in the future?

Mr. RHODES: To loans already in existence.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Act continues to apply for purposes of winding up.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move to this section. The law officers of the crown gave it a meaning entirely different from that which should have been given. Section 7 of chapter 12 of the revised statutes of 1927 reads as follows:

The provisions of this act shall continue to apply to the banks named in the schedule to chapter 9 of the acts of the year one thousand nine hundred and thirteen, intituled an Act respecting banks and banking, and not named in schedule A to this act, but only in so far as may be necessary to wind up the business of said banks respectively.

As this reads it would make the section applicable to the list of banks contained in the schedule of the revised statutes, which is the list of banks intended to be continued for a period of ten years. I move therefore:

That the words "chapter 12 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927," in lines two and three of section 2 be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "chapter 9 of the acts of the year one thousand nine hundred and thirteen."

The effect of this amendment if carried will be to continue the present position, namely to renew the charters of the ten banks whose names appear in the schedule attached to this bill, and to make applicable the provisions of the act only for the purpose of winding up the banks whose names do not appear on the list.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if I might have leave for a moment. The remarks I have to make could be made on the motion for third reading, but I prefer to make them now.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member would be more in order on the third reading.

Bill reported.

Mr. RHODES moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): There are two or three remarks that I would like to make, because of statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) this afternoon with reference to the question whether there is any shortage of credit in Canada. I have no doubt that the banks can advance credit to borrowers if they find borrowers who can offer them what the banks feel is a proper amount of collateral. This naturally brings me to the case of Australia to which the Prime Minister referred this afternoon. I find that bank loans in Canada are 31 per cent less than three years ago, but in Australia, according to a chart which I saw in the Melbourne Herald recently, bank loans are down only 7 per cent compared with three years ago. The reason for that, I think, is the different money policy that has been followed in Australia . The Australian wholesale price level stood at an index figure of 80 in December, 1932. As a matter of fact it has stood at approximately that figure for the years 1931 and 1932. During those two years the wholesale price index in Canada had dropped from about 80 at the beginning of 1931 to approximately 63 at the end of 1932. I think this shows how much better off the producers in Australia are than those in Canada. It is true that the producers in Canada and Australia were selling their wheat for practically the same price in the old country, but when the Australian producer converted his proceeds into Australian funds he got more per bushel for his wheat than the Canadian producer got when he converted sterling into Canadian funds. That is one reason why conditions in Australia to-day are much better than they are in Canada. That is one reason why a great many people in western Canada feel that the money policy of the Dominion government is responsible for the very difficult financial position that the western provinces and cities are in to-day. They are unable to collect enough taxes to balance their budgets because the price level in Canadian currency of the products exported by their producers is so low. I want that statement to appear in the same issue of Hansard as the statement the Prime Minister made this afternoon.

Then the Prime Minister said that a country of 10,000,000 people could not do certain things in a financial way, that we have to be governed by international action of international financiers. That is rather a strange attitude for the Prime Minister to take, he being the head of the red-blooded Canadian party. I cannot understand why this nation of 10,000,000 people dare not take as adventurous action as the Australian nation, which I think has a population of six or seven million people. Canada has lost a great deal in the last two years by sticking to the sound money policy of the United States rather than maintaining her currency in the markets of the world at a level more in line with Australian currency and more in keeping with our own internal needs. Although the bankers may not be responsible for this money policy, they certainly have sponsored it almost one hundred per cent; it has resulted in many frozen bank loans and I think is responsible for some of the losses which the Prime Minister said the banks had suffered in the provinces between Winnipeg and the Rockies when he referred to them this afternoon. I think it is only fair that that statement should be made before the bill is passed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the Quebec Savings Bank Act.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time on division and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

TAX RETURNS TO BE VERIFIED BY DECLARATION

On the order for the second reading of Bill No. 70, respecting the Income War Tax Act (declarations on returns):

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not proposed to proceed with this bill. It is not in the form in which it would appear finally in any event, and it is too late now to be dealt with in connection with the returns of this year. Therefore I would move that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

GRADING OF HAY AND STRAW

The house in committee on Bill No. 22, regarding the inspection and grading of hay and straw—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Ross in the chair.

On the preamble:

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask the minister to explain why section 2 is necessary.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): In case anyone wishes his hay inspected or graded.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross): Section 2 has been carried.

Mr. NEILL: No, it has not been carried.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross): Yes, all the sections were carried previously. We are now on the preamble.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

9. That schedule II to the said act be amended by adding thereto the following articles and imposing thereon an excise tax at the rate set opposite the respective article:—

(i) Sugar, as enumerated in customs tariff item No. 134, 2 cents per pound.

(ii) Unfermented wort (sweet wort), 25 cents per gallon.

(iii) Malt syrup, or malt syrup powder, extracts of malt, fluid or not, or any other malt product intended for the brewing of beer, 50 cents per pound.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): There is an amendment before the committee and I have an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG: Is this a third amendment or the second? Is it to be found in Wednesday's Hansard?

Mr. RHODES: The amendment to the amendment reads:

Provided that the tax hereby imposed under subclause (i) shall not apply to the materials enumerated in customs tariff items 139 and 140, when sold in packages containing not more than five pounds each.

That is to say, there would be no tax imposed upon articles enumerated in items 139 and 140 of the Customs Tariff Act, namely: Glucose, or grape sugar, glucose syrup and corn syrup, or any syrups containing an admixture thereof; syrups and molasses of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane or beet, and all imitations thereof or substitutes therefor. In other words, none of these commodities if put up in packages of five pounds or less shall be subject to the tax; it is only the bulk commodity that will be subject.

Mr. YOUNG: Does that mean that a man who buys a can of molasses will pay no tax, while a man who buys a barrel will?

Mr. RHODES: Molasses is exempt.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is included.

Mr. RHODES: If a man buys a larger quantity of corn syrup or glucose or any of these syrups he will pay the tax of 2 cents per pound.

Mr. BROWN: That does not mean that the consumer escapes the tax; the tax is already paid by the man who buys wholesale.

Mr. RHODES: Not on the small packages; packages of five pounds or less are exempt.

Mr. YOUNG: Item 140 of the tariff reads:

Syrups and molasses of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane or beet.

That is to be exempt if sold in packages of five pounds or less. If a man buys a tin containing two, three or four pounds, he does not pay the tax, but if he buys a barrel for cattle feed he has to pay 2 cents per pound, because it says molasses of all kinds.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member should keep before him the amendment of Wednesday last, which exempts molasses.

Mr. YOUNG: The original amendment applied only to sugar described in item 134 of the tariff, which reads:

All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, not covered by tariff item No. 135. . . .

That is the consumers' item, refined sugar. Now you take in item 135, which reads:

Sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour when imported or purchased in bond in Canada by a recognized sugar refiner, for refining purposes only, under regulations by the minister; and sugar, n.o.p., not above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit—

And so on. In addition to that, No. 139 is taken in. Will the minister explain how this will operate? Raw sugar comes under 135, which is taxable under the amendment, and it is taxable again when refined under 134. Is the tax to be imposed twice?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. YOUNG: At what stage will it be imposed?

Mr. RHODES: In the finished form, when the refiner disposes of it as refined sugar.

Mr. YOUNG: How will it apply to 135, then? That is included in the amendment of Wednesday last.

Mr. RHODES: If it were imported by a person other than the refiner it would be subject to the duty, but this provides that when it is imported by the refiner he pays the duty only when he sells in the form of refined sugar.

Mr. YOUNG: Where does beet sugar from Canadian beets come in? Where will it be taxed?

Mr. RHODES: The same relative position with respect to beets is maintained.

Mr. YOUNG: It will pay 2 cents?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Is not the effect of including 135, and therefore imposing an excise duty on raw sugar, to give further substantial protection to the refiners? It is imposing exactly the same duty on raw sugar as on refined sugar. Representations have been made to me recently to the effect that raw sugar could be used to a considerable extent by manufacturers, and indeed would be used in preference to refined sugar, if it were free from the tax, and this would result in a substantial reduction to the consumer on articles in which raw sugar could be used. As it stands now, by the amendment, raw sugar will have the same excise tax as refined sugar, with the result that anyone who might use raw sugar, not being able to afford refined sugar, will pay the same penalty, so that the refiners get the benefit by having equal taxation imposed on raw sugar.

Mr. RHODES: Let us put the argument the other way about. If the refiner had to pay 2 cents per pound on refined sugar and raw sugar could be brought in duty free, and if the use of it were permitted to such an extent that it could replace any considerable quantity of refined sugar in various forms of the manufacturing process, the net result of course would be that the refiner would do less business. But inasmuch as this is a taxation measure, the great loss would be to the treasury, anad the method now adopted by the amendment is to ensure that the full return is brought into the treasury. The object of the tax will not be defeated by the use of substitutes to the detriment of the treasury, although there is incidentally the question, not of protection to the refiner but of maintaining his relative position, as though there were no excise tax on sugar at all. That is the intention and, I think, the effect of the amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: I think it is the effect, but it goes further. At the present time there is no excise tax on either refined or raw. The refiner therefore has no advantage and if raws can be used by the manufacturer they will be used. But the moment a man has to pay 2 cents on raw sugar and only 2 cents on refined sugar, the obvious result will be that the refiner will increase his business while the man who has been using raw sugar will use less. Incidentally, if you like, but inevitably there is a substantial protection with an increased benefit to the refiner as a result of the amendment which is now proposed, and I am wondering whether this amendment has not been promoted, if I may use that word, just as much by the refining interests as by the taxation authorities, because I do not think my hon. friend will find that there is a great increase of revenue from the 2 cents excise on raw sugar.

Mr. RHODES: But conversely there would be a considerable loss of revenue to the extent that raw sugar might be substituted for refined sugar. If 100 pounds of raw sugar made 100 pounds of refined sugar, there would be nothing in the argument of my hon. friend, but the difference between raw and refined sugar is very slight, in fact so much so that it would be impossible to devise a fraction which we could impose upon raw sugar to make it exactly comparable with refined sugar, because 107 pounds of the raw makes 100 pounds of the refined. There is that fraction.

Mr. MALCOLM: The value of the refined sugar is more than would be indicated by the fractional difference in weight.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but practically all the raw sugar is to-day imported by refiners and they will continue to import it. Nobody else is affected. If we permitted raw sugar to be imported by others, it could be imported in very large quantities by them and converted to uses which at present are supplied by the refined sugar. If that condition were allowed to be brought about, we would lose a tremendous amount of revenue.

Mr. RALSTON: When my hon. friend speaks about not being able to devise a fraction, may I point out that the proportion about which I am speaking is that which two cents bears to the actual value of refined sugar as compared with the proportion which two cents bears to the actual value of raw sugar. That is not measured just by the difference between 107 and 100 pounds. In addition to that, there are the refining costs. Therefore the ad valorem excise tax on refined sugar is considerably less than the ad valorem excise tax on raw sugar. What is the proportion of raw sugar that is not imported by refiners?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not those figures before me, nor can I obtain them at the moment, but I shall get them before the committee rises; they should be here.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend understands that they are material in deciding whether section 135 should come under the Excise Act, and what the effect will be.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: Might I ask the minister a question with regard to the point brought up the other night by the hon. member for Sherbrooke? Has he taken steps towards a rigid investigation of the circumstances under which the news of the proposed excise tax on sugar leaked out, in order to ascertain whether it is possible to recoup to the treasury a substantial amount of money which was made by people who speculated on that advance news?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can enlarge on the reply I made to the hon. member for Sherbrooke when we were in committee at the last sitting. I have yet to have submitted to me any evidence that there was a leak, so far as the application of the sugar tax was concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure the minister will not have it submitted to him.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps so, but I asked the hon. member for Sherbrooke and I have asked all members; I have inquired widely and beyond the confines of this house. I shall welcome any evidence which can be given to me that there was anything in the nature of a leak. I have yet to find the slightest evidence that such was the case. It is true that there was the situation which arose at Vancouver and I referred to that the other day, but to the statement that there has been a leak my answer that, in my judgment, there has been none, will be found in Hansard and I do not know that I can enlarge upon it. I instanced the case of tea and coffee where precisely the same procedure took place as in the case of sugar, and for two reasons. In the first place the press had been for some considerable period of time forecasting that there would be sugar taxes and taxes upon tea and coffee, and in the second place there was the usual shrewd guess of those in the trade, and perhaps some who were not in the trade, that the government would be compelled to resort to new forms of taxation. Certainly the man who took advantage of the situation with respect to sugar was the gainer, but the man who endeavoured to anticipate the budget and took delivery from bond of large quantities of tea and coffee, was the loser. I do not know that there is anything more I can say. If some method could be devised whereby in the first place forestalling could be prevented and whereby, in the second place, if it did occur, we could recoup to the treasury the amount that it had lost thereby, I should be delighted; but up to this moment I have yet to learn of a device of that character.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure the minister would welcome any evidence that might be submitted to him, but who can submit such evidence? The public would be better satisfied if my hon. friend would take steps to investigate the conditions under which the information seems to have leaked out. This tax on sugar is obnoxious, very unpopular; it bears heavily on the poor people, and the fact is that the labouring class in my city of Quebec believe some persons have made vast sums of money because they took the precaution to accumulate large quantities of sugar just before the budget was announced. They mention names of firms there. Of course you cannot expect those people to make any investigation, but surely the government, which is able to appoint investigators to find out whether public employees have been committing acts of offensive partisanship and to dismiss them, could appoint some commissioner to discover the real situation as to how that leak occurred. Certainly the public is not satisfied with the way in which some individuals have used the misfortunes of the people to make money.

Mr. SANDERSON: When this item was up last week, I mentioned to the minister a rumour in conection with a certain brokerage firm in the city of Toronto which had apparently, according to the rumour, purchased large quantities of sugar and had obtained a line of credit from their bank by making to it certain commitments based on what they said was inside information from Ottawa. Has the minister done anything in regard to trying to find out whether that rumour was correct or not? Is the minister listening to me?

Mr. RHODES: I hope so.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have an idea that if he would diligently attempt to run down that rumour in Toronto, he would get the facts without very much trouble. When an old brokerage firm—and when I say "brokerage", I mean stock brokers—went into sugar buying and borrowed money from a bank under conditions such as we have at present in Canada, they must have known what they were doing and must have had information which was authentic. I do not see why the minister cannot find out something about the matter. The government have many officials; they have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the secret service, any number of officials who evidently could find out something about it. If the rumour is not correct; if it is only a rumour, well and good; but I think the people of Canada would like to know whether the minister will do his duty throughly in attempting to discover whether this is a fact.

Mr. RHODES: I would not have any hesitancy in saying to my hon. friend that we are quite prepared to take any step that may be suggested as reasonable which would enable us to trace an act at all similar to the one to which he refers. The investigations hitherto made departmentally have not disclosed that there was any transaction of that character, but I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that the government is quite prepared to take all necessary steps to investigate the matter and to ascertain whether there is any ground for an assertion of that kind. The only point upon which I can see that an investigation might be of any value would be to determine whether information was given in advance to certain individuals. That I do not believe was the case; nevertheless I am prepared to undertake that there will be an investigation to disclose if there was any information of that kind to be obtained. Even if there had been no leak, no information given in an underground or in any other manner, hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that in view of the publicity which was given to this matter and the statement which was made in the press there certainly would have been a certain amount of buying of sugar as was the case with tea and coffee.

Mr. BROWN: No doubt the matter we have been discussing has caused a good deal of anxiety in the mind of the public. For my part I am not prepared to mete out any censure to the government because this thing happened. I am quite prepared to believe that in the temper of the public mind people might have acted on what has been described as a hunch. But if the minister can do anything to throw further light upon the subject and secure a return to the treasury of the revenue that was lost I am sure that the public would welcome such action. While we may not be able to criticize the government on that score, I think we can criticize it because nothing was done to prevent the purchases of sugar that were made after the budget was delivered. The difference in time between here and the Pacific coast allowed a good many hours in which the people could take advantage of the opportunity to purchase sugar, and on that score I think the government is open to censure. I think we can accept the statement made by the Minister of Finance a few days ago that it would be in the public interest that such a situation should never occur again.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

I do not think the minister strengthened his case in regard to the sugar duty and its effect upon the people when he compared the prices that prevail to-day for sugar with the prices that have prevailed during past years. He seemed to resent the remarks that were made from this side of the house that we were not as well able to buy now as we were then.

Mr. RHODES: No, I did not.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps I misunderstood. I think the comparison was not in place anyway. The fact is that the tax is a very heavy burden on the people of Canada, and the magnitude of that burden can be to some extent appreciated when I recall the fact I mentioned in the budget debate that about fifty million bushels is the amount of wheat that is consumed by the people of Canada. At fifty cents a bushel that would mean $25,000,000, and I believe the estimated revenue from the sugar tax is $20,000,000, or only $5,000,000 short of the total value of the wheat consumed by the people of Canada. That comparison shows the magnitude of the burden that is imposed upon the consumer by this sugar tax. It may be true that in times past we were paying very high prices for sugar as compared with the price to-day, but for my part I would rather pay 25 cents a pound for sugar, as we were paying in war time, when I could sell hides for about 25 cents a pound and wheat for $2.50 a bushel, than pay six or seven cents a pound for sugar to-day when I can hardly give away a beef hide and wheat is netting the farmer even at present prices not more than forty or forty-five cents a bushel. After all, these things are relative, and in estimating the burden that is thrown upon the people by this tax we must of necessity take into consideration the ability of the people to bear it. I can only repeat that this is a tremendously heavy burden upon the people.

While I shall not be disposed to criticize the government in the matter I first mentioned, there is another matter upon which I promise the minister and all his supporters that I shall criticize the government before the electors, and that is that while the government has seen fit to impose a tax of two cents a pound on sugar it has reduced the duty on intoxicating liquor, on whisky, by $2 a gallon. I can promise hon. gentlemen opposite that one of the heaviest burdens they will have to bear is that fact which I shall proclaim from every platform throughout the country, and I know that it will make an appeal to the poor people all through the western provinces.

Mr. MORAND: Come into my county.

Mr. BROWN: I know that it will appeal to the poor people of the western provinces when I point out that $2 a gallon has been taken off the excise tax on whisky while the poor people are called upon to bear a tax of two cents a pound on sugar.

Mr. DONNELLY: When this sugar tax was under discussion the other night the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that through this supposed leakage the government had lost in revenue somewhere about ten per cent, or two million dollars.

Mr. RHODES: Not more than that.

Mr. DONNELLY: I wonder if the committee realizes just what that means. Two million dollars represents one million bags of sugar of one hundred pounds each. That means that thirty trainloads of sugar went out before the sugar tax came into effect. This thirty trainloads of sugar it should be able to trace in some way. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken of a trainload of sugar going out from Toronto or Montreal. But there must have been more than one trainload. There must have been several trainloads, for thirty trainloads of sugar got out into the hands of the ordinary consumer. That is what one million bags of sugar amount to, thirty trainloads. There should be some method of tracing such a large shipment as that.

Let me refer to another incident that happened in the house the other day. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay put this question to the minister, at page 4260 of Hansard:

> I noticed in the Montreal Star that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) was reported to have said, at a meeting in Toronto, that the tax on malt extract used in making home brew would be withdrawn or drastically reduced. Is there any foundation for that statement?

The Minister of Finance replied:

> So far as I am concerned the statement is without warrant whatever.

Then the very next day the Minister of Finance got up and said that the duty on malt syrup, or malt syrup powder, extracts of malt, fluid or not, or any other malt product intended for the brewing of beer would be 20 cents a pound instead of 50 cents a pound as originally proposed. The hon. member for West York was quite correct. The excise tax on malt extract was reduced from 50 cents to 20 cents. The minister can very easily find out from the hon. member for West York where he got that information, or whether he was guessing at it. Was he doing the same as the public was doing, or did he have some inside information? Surely it would not be difficult to find out from him where he got it. There seems to have been some leakage there also; can we blame the public for saying that there has been leakage? When we suspect it with regard to sugar, and with regard to the excise tax on malt, can we blame the public for saying that there has been a leakage? In some way information was gained that the tax was going to be put on sugar and reduced on malt extract.

I should like to join with the hon. member for Lisgar in his remarks with regard to the reduction of $2 a gallon on spirits. Then, last year the government reduced the excise tax on cigarettes to something like $2 a thousand. This year to make up the loss they have placed the tax at two cents a pound on sugar. I should like to learn from the minister how much less alcohol has come into the country since he has reduced the excise tax; has any less come in? Has there been an appreciable increase in it? We were told that the excise taxes on alcohol and on cigarettes were so great that they were prevented from coming into the country. We were told that if we would reduce those taxes more would come into the country and that we would receive a greater amount in taxation. Are we receiving more alcohol and more cigarettes or have receipts from importations of that type gone down the same as they have in connection with a great many other imports? I suggest again to the minister that he should look into the matter of the reduction of the tax on malt extract mentioned by the hon. member for West York.

Mr. RHODES: May I say the hon. member for Lisgar was in error when he assumed that I resented any statements made by hon. members opposite. I did nothing of the kind. Hon. gentlemen were perfectly within their rights, and if I gave the slightest indication that I felt any resentment, I am exceedingly sorry. I had no feelings of that kind whatsoever.

Mr. BROWN: I think your words in Hansard will show you did.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry if the hon. member feels that way, because I can assure the committee that that is not right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear; we have no grounds for complaint.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Lisgar has put in a very attractive political juxtaposition, shall I say, owing to the fact that on one hand we tax sugar and on the other we lower the tax on alcohol.

Mr. POWER: On the poor man's liquor.

Mr. RHODES: I was going to say on the rich man's liquor. There would be a point in the argument of the hon. member for Lisgar if he made it appear that by reducing the tax by $2 per gallon upon liquor we thereby lost one-fifth of the receipts we would otherwise have received. But the hon. member knows very well there is a point beyond which if you tax you will receive far less revenue.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Weyburn was delighted to hear me make that statement the other day. He immediately spoke about tariffs, and I was not prepared to quarrel with him. I say to my hon. friend that it is just a question in my mind as to whether or not the whisky tax ought not to be lower still; probably the hon. member will be glad to carry my remarks to his constituents. When I say that, of course I am speaking entirely as Minister of Finance, and from the viewpoint of revenue.

Mr. POWER: I thought you were being sympathetic towards the consumer.

Mr. RHODES: Because undoubtedly there is a point where we can obtain a far greater return to the treasury by a lower tax than by a higher. The hon. member for Willow Bunch referred to cigarettes. We had the classic example under Mr. Fielding—and I am not criticizing. He had the idea he could enhance the revenue by increasing the duty on cigarettes, but he soon found out that by increasing the duty he obtained far less return than when the duty was lower. It is a question in my mind, I may say to my hon. friend, whether the tax on cigarettes is not yet too high, despite the fact that it has been reduced—and I speak solely from the viewpoint of revenue. To the hon. member for Lisgar I would say that if I had any criticism to offer from the standpoint of taxation it would be that we ought to have made the tax upon liquor still lower.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry the textile schedules have been passed.

Mr. RHODES: If there is anything to be said in favour of that viewpoint—and I submit there is—the hon. member cannot take any political comfort from the fact that we are placing two cents per pound upon sugar. The government is under no illusion as to the character of the tax, or as to its popularity. As I said the other day we have a duty to perform, we have certain revenues to raise, and under unusual conditions we have to resort to unusual methods of taxation.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

The hon. member for Willow Bunch has referred to a statement which appeared in a Toronto newspaper and which was attributed to an hon. member of this house, who, I regret to say, is not in his seat to-night. He will say that the report which appeared in the press is not a proper report of what he said on that occasion. I say to the hon. member that so far as the tax upon malt is concerned, I would be in a position to have particular knowledge. Representations in plenty were made to me, but on no occasion either to deputations or to hon. members was anything stated other than that representations would be taken into careful consideration. I have every confidence in my staff and in the efficiency of the excise department. I should be very much surprised if there had been anything in the nature of a leakage concerning the reduction of the taxation upon malt, or the placing of a tax upon sugar. How that could be alleged, when the press of the country forecast, days before any definite decision had been reached, that there would be a tax upon sugar, is more than I can understand. I can only say to the committee that I should be very glad to probe the matter from every possible angle to ascertain whether there is any shadow of accuracy in the suggestion that there was an improper leakage with respect to these forms of taxation.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to discuss at length the tax on sugar because I believe the ground has been fairly well covered. I must say, however, that it represents a taxation upon every man, woman and child in Canada, and places a further burden upon the 1,300,000 people drawing relief. Sugar is one of the major items of consumption which go to make up the diet of the average family. When the hon. member for Willow Bunch spoke concerning a profit of $2,000,000 which some people were able to make on sugar transactions prior to the delivery of the budget, he stated that he had a hunch. Recently when we were discussing the sweepstakes bill, for hours at a time hon. members stood and spoke in righteous indignation about the legalization of sweepstakes for the benefit of hospitals, but any sweepstake that we might have in this country would pale into insignificance compared with the gamble that took place in sugar in this connection. You cannot have two codes of morality, one for the chap who is willing to gamble fifty cents on a lottery ticket and another for a group of individuals who will clean up two million dollars on the anticipation of sugar being taxed in the budget. In my judgment that $2,000,000 belongs either to the treasury of this country or to the consumers of sugar. I believe it is the absolute duty of the ministry to see to it that if possible and practicable that money shall go where it rightfully belongs. The minister said that you could tax a thing until the revenue decreases, and he mentioned malt. I would say, and this is from my own practical experience, that the end in view will be defeated by the one hundred per cent tax that has been placed on malt. As long as the sun shines and grass grows and water flows you can always get a substitute for malt.

An hon. MEMBER: Dandelions!

Mr. MITCHELL: You will find that people who have been in the habit of making this home brew will find some substitute. It is no great problem to sprout your own barley.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How do you do it?

Mr. MITCHELL: Come outside and I will give you the recipe; I have been long in the business. But what I want to point out is the impracticability of that tax. I think the position taken by the Minister of Finance is absolutely sound. I believe the tax that was first imposed was for the purpose of preventing the brewing of beer in the homes of the people. The present tax, doubling the average price of malt, will have the effect of driving the people to the use of substitutes for the malt they used previously.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I would just like to say one word on this question, but instead of using my own language I will give you the words of a farm woman with a family of seven. She wrote me in the French language and I had it translated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Unfortunately I had to because I do not understand that beautiful language myself. She first described the farm, going into some detail as to the income, and she summed up the farm income after balancing costs against receipts by saying:

After all our only means of subsistence comes from a few cows which bring us about $1 weekly; from this sum we someimes deduct the repair cost of an indispensable tool. This will show on what we have lived for a long time—seven persons with less than $1 weekly.

They have five children under seven years old. Then she comes to sugar:

Sugar is taxed two cents per pound, while at the same time cream is lowered one cent. This is the way they are tightening the screw-vice. I protest against this overtax on sugar. Instead of that, they should impose taxes on moving pictures and other amusements; pianos, radios, sport materials and luxuries, etc., because these things are not indispensable to life, while sugar is a first necessity. Why do they not add a little tax to bachelors in addition to the revenue tax? It is always fathers and mothers who are obliged to carry the heavy burden. It is logical to think that it requires more sugar for a family of seven persons than for one alone.

There is a lot of truth in that that bachelor premiers and leaders of the opposition sometimes forget.

Then, Mr. Bennett believes without doubt that he is doing something marvellous for the government. We were consuming very little sugar, and we shall consume still less for we would not find the money to buy it. If we were the only unhappy ones, the government would not lose much, but how many people will be obliged to do as we? The sugar sellers will see their profit diminish; this will probably cause the loss of many positions which will add as many to the unemployed. How much more will the government receive? Surely less than he expects. This is the way the government is going more and more to the bottom.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I cannot express the situation better than that French woman has done, speaking as the mother of five little children. That is the point of view taken by the people who will feel it most. I am not going to read the rest of the letter; it is a very moving letter. It does not require another word from me. That puts the situation as the mothers of large families with small incomes view it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Didn't you vote for the budget?

Mr. BROWN: I cannot allow it to appear on Hansard that the Finance minister has been giving us a lecture on these very simple facts of taxation of which he assumes we are ignorant—

Mr. RHODES: Oh no, no.

Mr. BROWN: I am happy to have emphasized now what I have been emphasizing all these years, that it is possible to obtain more revenue from a lower scale of taxation. At different times I have appeared before tariff commissions touring the country and when I would plead for a lower tariff they would say: But where will you get the revenue? Invariably we would answer that lower taxation would probably produce more revenue. Let there be no mistake, we are perfectly familiar with that very sound argument advanced by the Minister of Finance, that the revenue may be adversely affected by unduly raising the tariff.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member must remember that I was referring to taxation. The other day I was referring to the tariff which is an entirely different matter.

Mr. BROWN: No, the same principle holds.

Mr. RHODES: Provided your tariff is for revenue. There are other purposes for which tariffs are imposed.

Mr BROWN: But as far as revenue is concerned the same principle holds, no matter what form the taxation may assume. So we are agreed on that. I referred to the fact that the taxation on liquors had been reduced. Looking at it only from the standpoint of revenue—and that for the moment is the only standpoint I am going to consider, though there are others—we might gain by further reducing the tariff and excise. But it will be recalled that last fall when the conference agreements were being considered it was stated that the revenue would be adversely affected I think to the amount of $7,000,000, by the reduction in liquor taxes.

Mr. RHODES: That was as a matter of mathematics only.

Mr. BROWN: Well, I do not understand the reference. If it is simply a matter of mathematics it is the same in regard to this $20,000,000 we are going to get from sugar. However that was the statement made, that there would be a reduction in revenue to the amount of about $7,000,000. Whether that included both customs tariff and excise I am not in a position to say at the moment. But I would like to know now, in view of the statement of the minister that he thinks we might further reduce customs tariff and excise with advantage to the revenue, whether since last fall he has obtained new information or whether the trade returns warrant the statement he has made.

Mr. RHODES: I do not for one moment subscribe to the point of view that the statement made last year by the Minister of National Revenue was that the revenue was actually diminished to the extent of $7,000,000. It was that on a basis of mathematics, having regard to the amount of liquor brought in the year before, the reduction would be about that figure. That was the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue. My hon. friend has put the question as to how it has worked out in practice. I submit that the figures would mean nothing, because we are living in abnormal times. If business were approaching normal a very accurate answer could be given, but to-day the people cannot afford to buy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But there is less revenue.

Mr. RHODES: Without looking into the figures at all I would assume that to be unquestionably so, but the point I am endeavouring to make is that it does not necessarily follow that this is so because we have reduced the customs and excise duties upon liquor. In normal times the answer to my hon. friend's question would be accurate, but at the moment the answer would be no answer at all.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not share the views of the hon. member opposite; with the exception of Vancouver, where they may have had three or four hours because of the difference in time, I do not think anyone obtained an advantage. Men in the business world are looking for every opportunity to make an honest dollar; for years they have watched the budget in an endeavour to anticipate what it might contain. The small profits being made to-day are not sufficient to keep firms in business, and if they do not get a chance to make a few dollars extra they cannot remain in business. Anyone who knows anything about the sugar business knows that sugar was a very low commodity, lower than it has been for many years. For a long period the average cost of sugar ran from 9 cents to 11 cents, and anyone with ordinary judgment would assume that sugar would bear a duty of at least a half cent a pound. That induced many people to buy that commodity before the budget was brought down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: It is all very well for hon. members to laugh and suggest nothing; that is all they are good for. There is always an incentive to a man in business to gamble, and let me say that if you do not gamble you do not make any money, and sometimes when you do gamble you lose. Some people—and particularly those with a suspicious mind—are always ridiculing the other fellow and saying he is doing wrong. I wonder how many hon. gentlemen opposite would not have taken an opportunity to make some money on sugar if they had known what was going to happen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: I say none of you had sufficient judgment to gamble in sugar.

Mr. VALLANCE: How much did you make?

Mr. SPENCE: I did not make anything; I am not in the sugar business, but if I had been I would have expected some duty to be put on sugar. If the hon. member will just keep quiet a moment I will tell him something more. Just a few days before the budget came down there were twelve carloads of bulk tea delivered to the city of Toronto; dealers figured that there would be a duty of 10 cents a pound on tea. They missed out, however. You do not pity them at all; you ridicule the man who happened to have sufficient judgment to buy sugar. That is the whole trouble with hon. gentleman opposite. They are sore if a man makes money and they say he is no good if he does not make it, so what is a man to do? I think the people in the Department of Finance are just as honourable as other men in this country, and I am satisfied that there has not been a leak. You cannot stop men from using their brains, however; if we do not use our brains in this house those in the outside world must do so or we cannot exist.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to reiterate what has been said previously, to bring to a head the matter in connection with which the minister has promised an investigation. The attitude of those on this side who have been referring to this matter in which we fear there has been a leak is this: We feel that there is a duty on the part of the minister and the department to investigate the whole situation. We feel that the minister should not take the attitude which he took in the beginning of the discussion this evening, namely that no evidence had been laid before him. We feel that he should be and is as anxious as anyone may be to ascertain whether there has been any leakage and whether any money which properly belongs to the treasury of Canada has not been paid in. The minister has said that he will make this investigation, and we accept his assurance in that regard.

The minister said he would investigate to see whether any leakage had occurred. If I may say so, that sounds as though he has in mind calling in the officers of his department and asking whether any information was given out. May I suggest what I am sure is obvious to him, that a much better way would be to start at the other end and ascertain whether or not there were abnormal sales by the refineries, shortly before the budget was brought down, and to whom those sales were made. Then the minister might extend that investigation to the jobbers, to find out whether any information was received by them, and from whom it was received. I quite agree that it is possible that there was a wave of speculation and that people may have guessed correctly with respect to the market, but it does seem a little difficult to believe that men would guess to the extent of fifty thousand tons, and that is the amount of sugar involved.

Mr. SPENCE: That is nothing in the sugar business.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the figure given by the Minister of Finance as the amount that must have changed hands in order to make the loss to the treasury $2,000,000. That represents twenty-five pounds for every family in this country; that is a substantial amount, and it does not seem like a normal trade guess as to the probabilities of the budget. We have not had this situation in Canada very often; I believe the minister will realize that it is abnormal, and the very size of the transaction makes us feel that something is wrong with regard to this particular item in the budget. So I believe if the minister makes an investigation in the way suggested we would be even more satisfied than we are with the assurance of the hon. member for Parkdale that there has been no leakage. I know the hon. member is quite sincere in that assurance, but at the same time we would rather see the investigation conducted and have the finding made by someone having the facts actually before him.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think my hon. friend could have been here when we dealt with this matter the last time we were in committee. If he had been here he would have heard me say that already we have investigated the sales made by every refinery in Canada for the month prior to the delivery of the budget. We know just how large they were and to whom they were made. They were not so great as the figure mentioned by my hon. friend, though even that is a fantastic figure. Let me point out that even that huge figure means less than five weeks consumption for the Canadian people.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a pretty large amount.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so; I am just trying to give the figure its relative place. We know each transaction, and the amount of each transaction. Undoubtedly large purchases were made, but they were made by those who hitherto have been regular purchasers of sugar, in all cases. When my hon. friend referred to the suggestion I made that I would welcome any information which would give me any knowledge as to there having been a leak he rather took the point of view that I was imposing an obligation on hon. gentlemen opposite. I wish to assure my hon. friend and the committee that I meant nothing of the kind. I merely meant that I would welcome all information. That had reference solely to the question of there being a leak, and that is what I meant so far as an investigation at this time is concerned, because we have already full data with respect to the amount of sales made for the full period of a month in every refinery in Canada. I do not know of any method short of retroactive legislation, which we should have difficulty in administering, whereby we could recover to the treasury the amount of the profit gained by those who were fortunate enough to guess rightly.

Mr. YOUNG: Syrups of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane or beet, and all imitations thereof and substitutes therefor, if put up in small containers, pay no tax but if put up in large containers they do pay the tax. If an individual or merchant brings in these commodities from the United States, he does not pay a tax on them, but if a wholesaler brings them in in bulk and cans them in the country he has to pay the tax. That is my understanding of the amendment brought in to-night.

Mr. RHODES: The effect of the amendment brought in to-night is to exempt this food product when in packages of five pounds or less, and place it on the same basis as molasses. Surely my hon. friend does not take exception to that exemption.

Mr. YOUNG: No, I do not take exception to it, but the minister is placing it in the same class as molasses, while he is striking molasses out. He is striking out molasses and leaving syrups in. If they are brought in in small containers they escape the 2 cent tax but if in bulk, if in barrels and so on, the tax is paid. In other words, only a portion of it is being exempted.

Mr. MORAND: It is made in Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: I am talking about importations.

Mr. MORAND: But it is made in Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: There are lots of things made in Canada which we import.

Mr. MORAND: You should not.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister, speaking about the excise tax on liquor, said that last fall when the statement was made with regard to the figure of $7,000,000, that was only an estimate. When speaking a little while ago I asked him whether there had been any falling off in the quantity of liquor that had gone out and on which the excise tax had been paid and I gathered that there had been a falling off between last fall and the present time. Surely the minister is not suggesting that times are worse now than they were last fall, for we have been told that conditions have been improving. Does he suggest that conditions are so bad that between last fall and the present time less liquor has been used? Another thing I want to refer to is the opportunity which this tax on sugar affords for the exploitation of the public in so many ways. Sugar enters into the manufacture of a good many articles, and the manufacturers are taking advantage of this 2 cents a pound to increase their prices. They are increasing the tax manyfold. This was brought to my attention strikingly the other day. I went into a grocery store where I saw on sale, at 39 cents a pound, certain biscuits known as Creamo. These biscuits had been selling at 35 cents a pound and after the budget, owing to the tax of 2 cents on sugar, the price was raised to 39 cents. There might have been one-eighth of a pound of sugar in the biscuits, and yet the manufacturers were taking advantage of the tax to put on an extra 4 cents per pound. I noticed another variety called chocolate fig bars. These biscuits sold at 27 cents per pound before the budget came down and afterwards the price was increased to 29 cents. I suppose there would be less than one-eighth of a pound of sugar in each pound of this variety. Here we find the manufacturers taking advantage of the tax to increase the price to the consumer by 4 cents per pound in one instance and 2 cents in the other. All along the line you will find the same thing prevailing; the manufacturers are taking advantage of the tax to exploit the consumer to the extent of two or three times the amount of the imposition on sugar.

Mr. McINTOSH: I shall not take more than a minute because I do not want to delay the committee. The minister made the statement that the reduction in connection with liquor was $2 a gallon and that in future there would be a greater reduction.

Mr. RHODES: No, I did not.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, then, further reductions.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, you anticipated that there would be a reduction.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, you said there should be.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then what did you say?

Mr. RHODES: Hansard will disclose that I said none of the things which my hon. friend has attributed to me.

Mr. McINTOSH: I wouldn't want to hurt the minister for a moment.

Mr. RHODES: What I was discussing was the yield of tax and in connection with the objection taken by my hon. friend from Lisgar I said that, speaking from the point of view of revenue, a still lower reduction would give a greater return.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then if the minister wants more revenue he will have to bring about a reduction.

The minister made another statement in regard to certain daily newspapers, that they made a bullseye in connection with the tax —that they diagnosed government opinion quite accurately, so much so that they were able to tell beforehand that there would be a tax on sugar.

Mr. RHODES: They made a miss about tea and coffee.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am talking about sugar. I am glad that the minister has a good word to say for the daily newspapers of Canada. He is in a different category from the Prime Minister—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: We are not discussing that to-night.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am. We will finish it some other time.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 2, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Matthews.

PETITION

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I beg to move:

That the petition of the Genter Thickener Company praying for the passing of an act to revive and restore patent No. 209,565, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

GRADING OF HAY AND STRAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to draw attention to an error that occurred in yesterday's proceedings. It will be found at page 4474 of Hansard. Bill No. 22, respecting the inspection and grading of hay and straw, was in committee and I endeavoured to speak on the second and third sections but was told by the chairman that that was out of order because everything had been passed previously except the preamble. The preamble was agreed to and that is all that was done, but the bill went through third reading and was passed. I now find that yesterday was the first occasion on which this bill was in committee, so not only was I deprived of the opportunity of speaking on it but this house was put in the position of passing a bill consisting of only half a dozen formal words in the preamble. If ever litigation arises or prosecutions occur under the act it will produce a rather interesting situation.

WORLD'S FAIR CHICAGO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the government has received an invitation to take part in the so-called world's fair in Chicago, and if so whether the invitation was accepted, and if not why not.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The two railways in Canada in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Commerce, under which exhibitions come, are taking a reasonable economic part in that fair.

WAYS AND MEANS

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT—REORGANIZATION OF CORPORATION

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is voted on, I desire once more to raise a question of supreme importance to the people of Canada, and particularly to the people of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I wish for a short time to discuss the Beauharnois situation with particular reference to the proposed reorganization, the effect of which unquestionably will be to turn over to the Holt interests this tremendously valuable project.

If hon. members have had the opportunity of studying the proposed reorganization they will doubtless have been as surprised and astounded as I have been that the government has permitted the matter to go to the point which it has now reached. I say surprised and astounded because on a previous occasion when an even better proposal was submitted this government would not approve of it and the proposal fell through.

The present capitalization of the Beauharnois Power Corporation is briefly as follows:

First mortgage bonds, none of them publicly issued but used for the purpose of collateral security with the banks and to secure this government for its guarantee of advances and to secure the banks for their advances, amounting in all to $22,495,000.

Collateral trust six per cent bonds, the original issue due October 1, 1959, amount $30,000,000. These were subscribed for by the public generally but principally by large interests in eastern Canada. Common stock was issued at that time of no par value to the amount of 1,720,000 shares.

The proposed new capitalization of the whole set-up is as follows:

First mortgage 5½ per cent bonds due 1973, $39,332,000.

General mortgage five per cent bonds which are to replace the present collateral trust bonds, $36,000,000. Hon. members will there notice an increase of $6,000,000, which I shall explain in a moment.

Common stock of no par value, 762,000 shares.

It should be kept in mind that the possessors of the new shares will control the whole concern. Up to the present time the bondholders are the people whose money has contributed to the construction of the project to date, and that is practically the only money that has been used by the concern other than the amounts advanced by the banks and guaranteed by the government, amounting to $16,000,000 and the $6,000,000 advanced by the banks direct, or a total of about $22,000,000. The banks are apparently to be asked, and I presume may already have agreed to accept, $24,000,000 of the new issue of first mortgage 5½ per cent bonds for their $22,000,000 of advances. As to whether transactions of that kind are permissible under the Bank Act or not I am not going to discuss at the moment, but I do submit that it is quite improper under ordinary conditions for the banks to advance money on long term bonds of the character of which these bonds will be. Secondly, I have referred already to the replacement of the original collateral trust 6 per cent bonds of $30,000,000, by the issue of $36,000,000 bearing 5 per cent. The $36,000,000 is to enable the original bondholders to receive for each thousand dollar bond a new bond of $1,200. This of course has been held out to them as a most attractive feature, but the facts are that there goes with the new bond an agreement that all interests will be waived for over four years. And presumably the $200 increase over their equity is for the purpose of reimbursing them for interest not paid up to this date,—for no interest has been paid on the bond.

With regard to the stock, it is interesting to notice that there is a provision made for the replacement of the entire original stock issue, roughly 1,720,000 shares. The actual issue was 1,800,000 shares, but the difference of 80,000 shares is that which ex-Senator McDougald was recommended, advised, instructed or coerced into returning for cancellation. Personally I have no objection to the transaction. I think it was quite proper that they have been restored, because they had been used for the purpose of paying for that quite worthless concern known as the Sterling Corporation. That leaves 1,720,000 shares. The new share issue is as follows: 172,000 shares to replace the 1,720,000. That is on the basis of one for ten, and should dispose of the matter. It might be all right if it did, but the fact is that it does not. There is an additional issue as follows: 150,000 shares to go to the present debenture holders. This 150,000 shares does not reflect to any fair degree the investment which they have made in the concern. In addition to that there is a straight grant of 200,000 shares to the Holt interests, to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company. For what? For agreeing to underwrite an issue of $13,500,000. For that they are to receive 200,000 shares of the new stock issue. On top of that there is to be a bonus issue of 240,000 shares to accompany the sale of the $13,500,000 of bonds which the Holt interests are to underwrite. At the present time the debenture holders and the stockholders will find considerable difficulty in being able to finance the new issue directly. So, sales of debentures to the public are not likely to be very large—that is, of the new debenture issue. The result will be that of the new $13,500,000, most of it will be subscribed, probably, by the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, in return for which they will receive the proportionate amount of shares. At the present time, because of their holdings in the Jacques

Cartier Company they will have a complete set up right at the start of over 270,000 of the 700,000 shares. And with their other holdings, and those of their associates, will have complete control of the company.

At this stage I wish to register my unalterable opposition to the Holt interests being permitted to secure control of this corporation. Let me suggest to the Prime Minister and to hon. members that when Mr. Taschereau and his government introduced the charter for the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, and put it through the house he urged as one of the reasons to justify his action that it was necessary to create a competing factor in the power market. Now, with the acquiescence of this administration and with more than the approval of that same Quebec government to which I have just referred, this competitive factor is being completely eliminated, and the Holt interests are being made supreme. If hon. members will recollect the debate on the Beauharnois power project they will remember that it is the largest power development known at the present time in North America. It has a potential development of something like two million horsepower; it exceeds either the Muscle shoals or Boulder dam projects in its importance and the extent of power capable of being developed therefrom. The owners or possessers of that power development will become, with their collective holdings, the greatest power trust in North America. Let that sink in. I ask hon. members if that does not imply the biggest power trust in the world. Are members of this house, who represent the people, to sit quiescent while the governments, provincial and federal, permit the creation of so powerful a trust in connection with a natural resource which is so essential to public welfare, as hydro electric energy? I for one do not purpose remaining silent.

At the outset I mentioned that this is not the first proposed agreement or reorganization that has been submitted. Mr. White, vice-president of the company, announced to a meeting of bondholders on June 10, last, that Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated had made an offer some time in July of 1931. In his report he states that:

> Under these conditions we felt it would be possible during August and early September to sell first mortgage bonds. No stipulations were proposed affecting the standing of holders of either the debentures or shares.

In other words the original set up in respect of the debenture holders and shares would remain unaffected. He continued:

> We were, however, unable to make headway in this direction as the proposal did not commend itself at that time to the Dominion government.

What has brought about the change of heart on the part of this government? If the proposal at that time was not acceptable, why was it not acceptable? And, on the other hand, why is the proposal now offered acceptable? That implies two things, by the way. It implies, first of all, that the government has been exercising, as I can show, a very powerful directional interest in the Beauharnois development. It has gone to a point which implies, in their action, the right to direct, the right to control, the right to effect. I ask if they are going to remain quiescent in this matter. Are they going to permit the formation of this huge power trust in the hands of a group of people, whose records stand clearer before the people of Canada to-day than they have at any other time, as a pirating group of unscrupulous promoters and financiers, whose transactions involved the people of Canada in losses, it has been estimated, running into sums which would approximate the national debt.

Then, going back to the question of reorganization, may I submit to the government that even the debenture holders are not being fairly treated. On investment, they have up to this date, contributed by far the greatest share of funds for development. Under the new proposal they are now asked not only to forego their interest for four and a half years, without compensation, but without any enhancement at the end of that time for the contributions they have made to the concern. Of course, even in the beginning, as is clear to any student of this concern, these debenture bonds were not as represented. Just about as slick a deal as you can imagine was put over on the people. They were not as powerful, even, as the common stock, for these bonds bear less than the common stock, receiving only a portion of the income pledged which the common stock might receive. So, looking at it from the point of view of the debenture holders I submit the following, namely, that there has been subscribed to date roughly $30,000,000. We have to make an allowance for the commission paid, making the actual cash subscription $27,000,000. No income is to be received for four and a half years, or until October, 1937—if then. The interest, therefore, will amount to, it is estimated, about $2,700,000, which is never to be paid. The interest that the debenture holders must forego amounts to about $8,100,000 which, again, may never be paid. Five per cent compound interest on the interest losses amounts to about $1,926,000; or the debenture holders' contribution at the time of completion of the first stage of this project will have amounted on paper to $42,726,000 or 54·7 per cent of the total capital investment.

The common stock that under the new proposal is to be allotted to these people who have contributed 54·7 per cent is only 19 per cent—to be accurate, 19·69 per cent. The Dominion government has contributed to date a guarantee amounting to $16,000,000 or about 20·23 per cent of the total capitalization. They are to receive none of the common stock. The banks have contributed approximately $6,500,000 or about 8·22 per cent, also they are to receive none of the common stock. The province of Quebec has contributed $1,352,000 or 1·71 per cent; they too will receive none of the common stock. But Montreal Light, Heat and Power, if they purchase all the new issue will have contributed by the end of that period $12,480,000 or 15·77 per cent and will receive in shares a controlling interest. The common shareholders' contribution at this time is approximately nothing, the proceeds of sales of these shares were not funds that came to the treasury of the Beauharnois. Any cash transactions that took place were purely open market transactions as between individuals. The common shares to be allotted are 172,000. So collectively the common shareholders at the present time plus Montreal Light, Heat and Power control together 80·31 per cent of the total share issue.

It has been alleged that $13,500,000 will be required to complete the project to the point of production of 500,000 horse-power. I have consulted others on this matter, I have even taken the trouble to have inquiries made of Mr. Sweezey himself. It is contended that that is a gross overestimate, that it will not cost over $9,000,000 to complete the contract. So there is an overissue of bonds authorized amounting to somewhere about $5,000,000. Attention was drawn to that in a public statement made by H. G. Pepall in Toronto the other day, as published in the Globe of Friday, April 28. I do not wish to refer to it at greater length than simply to quote the following:

> The official figures therefore show that some $5,000,000 more than is actually required is being raised, or the official estimates of construction of $14,446,000 are in error to the extent of 33 per cent.

The Prime Minister on one occasion in this house gave voice to sentiments that were very close to the views held by hon. gentlemen in this corner. I ask him once more to remember them. I ask the house to listen to them. Speaking on May 18, 1932, the Prime Minister said:

> I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret to-day that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people.

That outstanding statement of his—I would say it was the most brilliant and accurate statement he made last year—while it may be charged by some people to verge on socialism, nevertheless is in my opinion absolutely accurate, and enunciates a principle which should be applied to such projects as the one which I am discussing. This project is not one which concerns merely the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario; it concerns the whole Dominion of Canada. It is a project involving construction on a river which is not a provincial river, or merely an interprovincial river, but an international river. The government has power over it in connection with navigation rights, it has power over it under the British North America Act in connection with the power that results from the development of a canal, and it also has the further power of doing what it did last year in respect to the canal, declaring it to be a work to the general advantage of Canada. There is no difficulty with regard to the government recognizing its rights to take over a project so enormously important to the people. No one knows better than the Prime Minister the tremendous influence of electrical energy on our industrial development, on domestic facilities, and on the scientific building up of the nation. He has himself on a previous occasion referred eloquently and fervently to the immense importance of power to a nation such as ours. We may well be proud of it, for as far as I can find out we have if not the first, the second greatest power resources of any nation, having at the present time a power development already established approximating 6,300,000 horse-power, the last figures I could secure. By the way, each horse-power of electrical energy it is estimated can do the work of ten human beings. We therefore have in hydro-electrical energy, just one source of artificial power, the equivalent of 63,000,000 human beings, artificial human beings, it is true, ready to go to work for us, provided that power can be reserved for the people, to do their work for them effectively and efficiently, without overloading them with costs as a result of private development.

I would ask the government if they do not think it is high time to make either a private investigation on behalf of the government itself, or once more a public investigation, to uncover the truth, all the truth, with regard to certain matters which have become known in the last two years, or better still in the last year. A new concern has been discovered that apparently has been interested in this Beauharnois business from the beginning or shortly after the beginning. It is called the Jacques Cartier Company. This company was created apparently by the group who held shares in the original company. The Jacques Cartier Company consists approximately of the following: Dominion Securities Limited; Wood, Gundy and Company, Limited; Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated; McDougald and Henry, and Newman, Sweezey and Company. Their holdings in the pool are reported to be approximately as follows:

	Shares
Dominion Securities..	115,000
Wood, Gundy & Co..	175,000

That 175,000 has since been transferred to Montreal Light, Heat and Power.

	Shares
Montreal Light, Heat and Power.	320,000

These were secured as a result of purchasing the interests of F. P. Jones.

	Shares
McDougald and Henry..	220,000
Newman, Sweezey & Co..	120,000

So that is clear that the Montreal Light, Heat and Power have the controlling interest, possessing well over 51 per cent of the stock.

This concern has a peculiar history in two respects; first, in respect of Senator McDougald's payment on behalf of the Sterling Corporation. Perhaps that is not the correct way to put it, but it seems that when the government instructed Doctor McDougald to return the moneys paid—or would you call it the equity given for the securities?—he had 30,000 shares in the pool. The balance had to be found. The balance was found in the pool, I think—that is something I want the government to tell us. Has Doctor McDougald paid back the 80,000 shares, and have they been cancelled? I cannot get the information on that. The only information I have in regard to the matter is from the Financial Post of March 18, 1933, which brought to my attention for the first time the existence of this Jacques Cartier Company. The Financial Post relates that there was some trouble in regard to this question of transfer of the 80,000 shares of Beauharnois A stock to be surrendered and cancelled. I do not want to refer to it at length, but I hope that when the government replies, a statement will be made as to whether this block of shares has been cancelled, because until the 80,000 shares of class A stock issued have been cancelled it is held to be unlikely that any plan or reorganization will meet with approval at Ottawa.

But there is a further fact in connection with this company that is of concern. It seems that the Holt interests, anticipating a development sooner or later on the Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river, made application for and received a charter from the Quebec government for the construction of a canal. This was well known to the late government; the matter was discussed at an inquiry held in Ottawa on the application of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company on January 30, 1929. Mention was made of this Soulanges charter, and at page 119 of the report on the application of the Beauharnois company this evidence appears:

Mr. McCarthy rose apparently with the idea that he owned the Soulanges canal.

Mr. McCarthy: No, no.

Mr. Geoffrion: He said, "We own a canal." The canal he owns is in his clients' dreams. The position of these particular clients of my learned friend is an extraordinary one. They have no grant from Quebec. They have a charter. Anybody can get a charter; charters go floating around. They have nothing but a charter; they own nothing, and they are asking you to refuse us an approval from the navigation point of view of plans for the development of whatever that is ours for seventy-five years, your jurisdiction being only over navigation, simply because they have a man who would like to develop our property himself. I suggest it is the same as if when I am asked for a building permit in order to build on my own land another member of the municipality, one of my neighbours, were to say, "No, I want you to permit me to build on that man's land instead of himself." It is about the same thing.

I direct attention to that evidence simply to indicate that this Soulanges interest possessed, as Mr. Geoffrion said, absolutely nothing but a charter. Yet I am informed that they were able to transfer that for apparently its nuisance value, for one hundred thousand shares of class A stock in Beauharnois, or its equivalent, held by the Jacques Cartier company. I submit to the government, Mr. Speaker, that if it was right—as I contend it was—to request Doctor McDougald to return the eighty thousand shares that he was coerced into paying out to the Sterling corporation, it would be right for this government to insist that this block of shares that was transferred for property that did not even have the appearance of right that the Sterling corporation possessed, should be returned to the company also. This Soulanges canal and power project, this Holt project, which now is a factor in giving them control of the stock, in effect had no value or rights whatever beyond the possession of a charter, and as Mr. Geoffrion said charters were floating around, I might say, like thistledown on a summer day.

Mr. NEILL: Floating on water.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, or floating on water, as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) suggests. The chief reasons why I urge upon the government serious consideration of the advisability of declaring this to be a work in the national interest and expropriating it for the people of Canada are not only because of the enormous power development and the control over industry and people that this entails but also because of the gigantic profits that can be made out of it under its present financial set-up, and further because it concerns the whole question of the waterways. I submit that if the government permits the private development of the Beauharnois section, which is the richest section of the whole river for power purposes, first because of the engineering features and secondly because of the quantity of power that can be developed there, they are going to leave the Lachine section, in which the development of power is not economically profitable, requiring an enormous capital in comparison to the amount of power involved, to the government to develop. It will mean that sooner or later, in carrying out the waterways project, this government will have to undertake the development of the Lachine section itself at the expense of the taxpayers, while the Montreal crowd, the private interests, get away with gigantic profits, which would be more than sufficient to finance the entire Canadian share of the waterways project.

Let us consider that for just a moment. It is estimated by some that it will cost about $13,000,000 to complete this power project, though as I have said, well known engineers have suggested that it will not cost more than $9,500,000 at most. It has been estimated also that the completion of the entire power project will cost in all about $70,000,000. The earnings on contracts already entered into will amount to about $6,000,000 a year as soon as the power is available. The actual operating costs, on the basis of about $2.50 per horse power, will amount to about $750,000 a year, so there will be a net operating revenue of $5,250,000. It is also expected, as we might have suspected from our experience with the hydro-electric in Ontario, that there will be a surplus of power over and above the estimate made on the water flow, and in this case the surplus is estimated at about 100,000 horse-power. At present there is in existence in the province of Quebec a measure which permits the exportation of part or all of this power. It will be seen that this additional 100,000 horse-power is clear velvet, and the prospective earnings on which are estimated at $1,100,000, making a total net operating income of $6,350,000 per year. Interest charges will amount to $2,800,000, so the net profits may be estimated at $3,550,000 per annum.

Now let us take the other side of the case. Let us suppose that it costs $18,700,000 to complete the canal for navigation, and remember that work is not to be done by the Beauharnois power corporation at all. It must be done now by this government, which has taken over the canal; it has the deed in its hands and the agreement has been signed. That $18,700,000 must be contributed by the Dominion government for the construction of locks, lights, services and so on in connection with navigation. A new development has taken place, however, and this is most extraordinary. The canal which was taken over last year amid such applause is now worthless; you cannot move a boat up it. You can barely float a light barge on that canal. Why? That is so because it has been found necessary to put in a dam, and at the present time in the Beauharnois canal, about three and a half miles from its inlet at lake St. Francis, near the location of the first railway bridge, there is a dam which cost about $200,000, a permanent dam that cannot be removed. Let us understand the significance of that fact. It means that when the time comes for this canal to become a part of the great waterways project this government will have to build a new spur canal in order to get around this dam. A few days ago I had a conversation on this subject with one of the chief engineers of the department, and he told me that it will cost at least $4,000,000 to build this new canal, with a check gate for the purpose of creating still water on the upper side. With regard to the feasibility of the project from this point of view, those who have studied canal propositions know that there must be a certain radius of curvature. This canal is built on the basis of a five thousand foot curvature, and if that is not maintained seagoing vessels of considerable length and weight will have difficulty negotiating the necessary turns or curves. If, therefore, the inlet or outlet of the new canal required as a result of the building of this dam does not fit in with the needs of vessels of this kind the entire canal may be ruined forever. I am really convinced that the engineer's estimates in connection with what will be required to make it navigable are conservative. I believe that the cost will not be $4,000,000 but in excess of that sum, but for the sake of our discussion we will take the figure he suggests, namely, $4,000,000. You must then add the $4,000,000 to the $18,700,000 already required.

I come now to the Lachine section. The report of the joint board of engineers, which I have under my hand, and other documents as well, have indicated an estimated cost of the Lachine section of $53,000,000—that is, simply to make it part of the great waterways scheme—or a grand total cost of $75,000,000 in order to make this part of the river navigable under the waterways scheme. I submit that if the Dominion government would expropriate this concern and issue bonds required for the construction of the rest of the canal, at the same rate of interest, they would make sufficient profit on the present contracts alone, plus this 100,000 horse power, to pay for the entire construction, and on top of that have a net profit of $750,000, which by the way might be applied to the deficits in connection with the Montreal harbour project or something of that kind. These figures are based on the completion of the power project up to the first stage of 500,000 horse power.

I have already intimated that under private ownership there is no security for the people of the province of Quebec. There is no guarantee any longer of even competitive rates, for they are left at the mercy of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company and its associates—an inhuman position, I contend, in face of the rates they are charging in comparison with those that obtain under the provincially owned hydro electric project of Ontario. Remember, I am not proposing that the government should go into the business of distributing power, but I am urging that it should take over this enterprise, which is the natural heritage of the people, and develop it as part of the great waterway system, and it should then undertake to sell power to whoever may distribute it in the province, exactly on the principle of the hydro electric of Ontario. Private interests are developing and selling power at $15 per horse power and I am satisfied that it could be sold, as I am informed it is now about to be sold to United States interests, at $12 per horse power or less. I have no doubt that is possible under public ownership; I am absolutely convinced of it from information I have secured in the matter.

I am definitely and unalterably opposed to the export of power. When a few years ago this question came up first, Mr. Taschereau accepted the idea of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company coming into existence. I have already stated two reasons why, and I wish now to refer once again to one of those reasons; it was to supply the power requirements in the province of Quebec. In other words, it was urged that there was not at that time sufficient power and apparently Mr. Taschereau wanted this done. Now note that before this power becomes fully available—only a small part of it is now available—Mr. Taschereau comes forward and urges that they should be permitted to export power because they have too much. Surely that is perfectly absurd. I submit further that once Canada exports power it can never get it back again. You can never permit the establishment of municipalities, industries, plants, homes and so on on a natural resource upon which people will depend so utterly, and hope eventually to recover that resource. You cannot do it short of war, and I protest most vigorously against the proposal that the provincial government of Quebec, apparently with the acquiescence of this government, should permit the export of power.

I am not alone in my opinions in this regard, or at least I hope I am not. Certainly at one time I was not, for in this house the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen himself, in the year 1925, when this question of the export of power came up in connection with Carillon, used language which I should be very proud to use in this matter. He said:

> The asset that Canada has in its water-power could not be appreciated by any man however gifted, even four years ago, to say nothing of sixteen or twenty years ago, as it can be appreciated to-day. . . . There may be American capitalists who will sign agreements that the power is withdrawable; but if they do, they know it is withdrawable on paper, but that never in actual fact can it be withdrawn.

He had some other trenchant things to say about it:

> Now the fact is that an application as astounding in its audacity as any ever presented has been before the government for months, lying in the government files, and lying there without repudiation, without one negative word going to those who are behind the application.

I should like to know whether those words are not absolutely applicable to-day, whether this government has not had in its hands for weeks a permit for the export of power. In answer to my question some weeks past there was a clear evasion of the matter so far as I could see, and I hope the Prime Minister will reply to that point. I submit to him that he has no right to consent to the export of power from this dominion, not even on the yearly basis.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Isn't the hydro electric of Ontario exporting power?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, it is exporting power because it took over a concern which was under contract to export power before the hydro took it over; that is all; it does not export power itself.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, it does.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My information is that it does not.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, it does.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In any case, that does not detract from my argument, because I contend that it should not be done. Ontario should not be allowed to do it any more than Quebec, and this government has a right to prevent it in either case. There is a definite responsibility on the government to prevent this being done.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was done previously by companies which the hydro bought out.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): It is the same thing.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The information given by the hon. member for Lincoln is the information I have, namely, that in every case where power is exported by the hydro electric of Ontario it was agreed upon by the companies before they were taken over by the hydro electric commission.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but the hydro electric of Ontario is exporting, under the guise of off-peak power, substantial quantities to the United States, which were not exported at the time the power companies were taken over.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then I am opposed to it definitely, just as I am opposed to this. I suggest with all deference to the government that the remainder of this Beauharnois development should now be declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. Secondly I suggest that this government should create a federal hydro commission to supervise and complete this power development and any other that may be required as a result of the creation of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. EULER: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sorry, I have not time in my forty minutes. Thirdly, I suggest that when the time comes the whole project should fit in as a proper part of the waterway system. In support of that position, in case anyone raises the constitutional question in this matter, let me say this. If hon. members will turn to subsection 10c of section 92 of the British North America Act they will find the following as coming within Dominion jurisdiction:

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

I submit that there is power under that clause to declare this work to be the national advantage. I refer hon. members also to section 108, which reads:

> The public works and property of each province, enumerated in the third schedule to this act, shall be the property of Canada.

Clause 1 of the third schedule reads as follows:

> Canals, with lands and water-power connected therewith.

These are within the control of this government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then existing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I submit that this canal should be declared to be in the national interests and that the power incidental or ancillary to the construction of the canal should be taken over by the government in the public interests of Canada. A federal hydro commission should be created and the government should undertake the further development of this project in the public interests.

The matter of power is enormously important because of the reasons I have just suggested. It should be taken over and made use of, not only for the benefit of the people by means of lower rates but in order that the profits obtained thereby shall not go into the private pockets of Sir Herbert Holt and his associates but be used for the construction of a deep waterway which will prove to be a national asset. If hon. members will read some of the documents which have been issued in connection with this waterway they will find that practically every engineer has suggested that the power developed should be used for the purpose of defraying the great cost of canalization. I should like to refer to the report of the Canadian national advisory committee. I quote from the majority report which appears on page 19 of a white paper published by the government in 1928, entitled St. Lawrence Waterway Project, as follows:

> We believe that the first concern of this committee should be, and of the government will be, the national aspects of the proposed undertaking.

It continues:

We believe that if a reasonable time were permitted in which to enable the resultant power to be economically absorbed the development of this national section would be undertaken by private agencies able and willing to finance the entire work, including the necessary canalization, in return for the right to develop the power.

That statement implies that private interests will be allowed to develop the waterways upon the understanding that they construct the canal. No agreement to that effect is to be found in connection with the development of the Lachine section by the Beauharnois interests. The minority report, signed by Mr. Beaudry Leman and Mr. Adelard Turgeon, two eminent French Canadians, contains the following:

It would appear of great importance that the crown retain permanently its proprietory rights in all the improvements connected with this vast undertaking and pertaining to both navigation and power development. It is not difficult to visualize the immense value to Canada of retaining the control and disposal of such a large amount of hydro-electric energy admirably situated and which may be advantageously developed. In respect of an undertaking of this magnitude, which may insure the prosperity of many generations of Canadian citizens, the permanent ownership of this great Canadian heritage should not be surrendered to private interests but the operation of the power works developed by such a project could be leased or farmed out, under conditions to be studied and determined.

I submit that the conditions as they now exist are not in the public interest and I urge the government to again take into consideration this whole matter but in the meantime express its disapproval of the proposal or proposals which are to be put before the bondholders in Montreal, I believe to-morrow. After having made further adequate investigation of the matter, the government should seriously devote itself to the task of taking over this project in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion I should like to say a few words in regard to this matter. The question of the development of this particular section of the deep waterway scheme by the Beauharnois Power Corporation was first discussed in this house on May 22, 1930. At that time I had the privilege of introducing the matter. On that occasion the house was given such information as was available but further information has come to us from time to time. May I say that I heartily approve of the presentation of the subject matter made this afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), and I support him in his contention. It is not my purpose to take up much time of the house, but I should like to bring forward one phase of this important question which the hon. member for Bow River did not touch upon to any great extent. I refer to the control of the price or the charges which this company may make for power when it is once developed and being delivered to the people. Most hon. members will remember that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), then leader of the opposition, took part in the debate on May 22, 1930. I well remember how he castigated the government of that day because it had not taken proper precaution to see that once power was developed the people of Canada would be able to obtain it at reasonable rates. I have searched all the orders in council I have been able to find which have been passed by the present government with reference to this Beauharnois project and I must confess that I have failed to find one sentence which purports to do that which the present Prime Minister said in 1930 the then government was delinquent in not doing. I submit that as far as the protection of the public is concerned, the present government has not done any more than the former government did to protect the people from the payment of high rates to the company. The present Prime Minister is reported on page 2418 of Hansard of May 22, 1930, as follows:

When the government of this country had the opportunity to exercise control; when they granted permission to this corporation to carry on its operations—for, mark you, it could not function for one day and could not market a kilowatt of power without approval by the government of its plans to divert water from the lakes and stream above to the lakes and stream below—it should have exercised that control. In the face of the story we heard to-day the present situation constitutes an outrageous proposition.

In my professional career I have had to do with a great many such enterprises, and I have an idea what would be just compensation for men who promote, foresee, and have vision.

Then he goes on to say:

In the light of what was stated this afternoon, will any member stand in his place and say that the promoter's compensation is just when we begin to talk about a hundred million dollars? It staggers our imagination.

On the next page, page 2419, the Prime Minister made this statement:

But what position are we in? The power that once belonged to Canada and to all the people—and I have a very strong conviction when I use those words—has now passed irrevocably out of our hands. The price at which that power is to be sold for Canadian development is to be passed upon by three managers for the next ten years. That is what it means.

The Prime Minister went on in the same strain and I could turn over another page and find similar quotations to those I have just read, castigating the government of that day because they had not taken proper steps to see that the people would be protected in the sale of this power. I quite admit that the Prime Minister was correct at that time, but if he was correct then, is he not just as correct to-day in taking action having for its purpose the control of prices which the people will have to pay for the power developed from this project. In my judgment the government, because of the legislation that was passed late in the session of 1931, has had all the opportunity and all the power necessary to see that the prices charged for the use of this power shall be within reason; but what have they done? They are in exactly the same position as was the former government. As far as the present government is concerned it has done nothing whatsoever to protect the people in that regard; it is in exactly the same position as the former government, and I might refer to the words of the Prime Minister when he dealt with that subject. If the former government was delinquent, as it was according to the Prime Minister's statement, then I submit that the present government is equally delinquent, more particularly in the light of the declaration which the Prime Minister made on May 22, 1930. I could quote for the benefit of the house several very admirable remarks which were made by the Prime Minister at that particular time in support of the contention I am now making, but I do not wish to weary the house to that extent.

I wish to call the attention of the house to another phase of some importance. Speaking in the House of Commons on April 18, 1932, the Prime Minister made a statement with regard to the position of the Beauharnois undertaking and the policy of the government. This had been asked for some time previously, I think, by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), and on April 18, 1932, the Prime Minister said, at page 2105 of Hansard:

> The government by every means in its power will endeavour to do the following: (a) secure continuance of the enterprise; (b) secure the rights of those who bona fide have put their money in that enterprise; (c) secure proper control and management; (d) take such other steps as may be necessary when terms and conditions are fixed, as will ensure the greatest possible benefit to this dominion as a whole by reason of the undertaking now being declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

It is well known to members of this house that because of the inability of the company to find sufficient funds the government finally decided to guarantee the banks for advances to complete the work. The money advanced to the company under this guarantee amounts I understand to something like $16,000,000. Prior to that the banks had advanced to the company something like $6,500,000.

What is the position to-day? As far as the canal and as far as the power works are concerned, they are practically completed, although there may be some slight expenditures necessary actually to complete the canal and the power plant. The largest amount of expenditure still to be made is for the control works in the St. Lawrence river, and it is estimated that these improvements which are necessary to control the water in the St. Lawrence through canalization in the Beauharnois section will cost from $9,500,000 to $13,000,000. There is some difference of opinion between engineers as to what the total amount will be, but whether it is $9,000,000 or $13,000,000 is not the significant point at the moment. The fact remains that this expenditure will take place over three or four or five years inasmuch as this kind of work can be proceeded with only very slowly.

The point to which I wish to direct the attention of the house is that the government in order to ensure the completion of this work put the credit of Canada behind the undertaking. They guaranteed the borrowings from the banks to the extent of $16,000,000. At the same time I think it is only fair to the Prime Minister and the government to say that they extracted from the company mortgage guarantees in the proportion of two dollars for every one dollar advanced under that guarantee, the mortgage guarantee being held by the banks. Now the point is this: The government as far as I understand it have stopped the financing of this company. If in the Prime Minister's opinion on April 18 of last year it was necessary to see to it that this work was completed and that the government would ensure its completion, may I ask the Prime Minister in all seriousness why it is that the government have stopped short in supplying the necessary guarantees for advances from the banks at this particular time? Why did the government stop when the canal and the power house were practically completed? Is it because of the fact that the Prime Minister realizing the importance of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, desires to see that company get control of this particular development? Has the government stopped the supply of funds for the completion of this project at a point where the collateral trust bondholders will be forced to accept the proposals of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company? That is the question which I think is uppermost in the minds of those who have been following this transaction.

I have already quoted the statement which the Prime Minister made last year, and I shall quote again from the same page, from the Prime Minister, what is necessary to my argument. It would appear that on the sixteenth day of September, 1931, the premier of Quebec saw the Prime Minister of Canada, and the premier of Quebec and a cabinet colleague suggested that it might be advisable to permit the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company to secure control of this project because of the fact that they were in a position both to manage and to finance its completion. What does the Prime Minister say?

I intimated that that proposal did not commend itself to the government at that time. Within a week Great Britain went off the gold standard, and financing by any body or group of men became impossible. The government continued, however, to take the responsibility—

And so on. If it did not commend itself to the government at that particular time to permit the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, namely the Holt interests, to secure control of this valuable project, what is the opinion of the government to-day? Have they changed their mind in that regard? Are they willing to-day to permit the Holt interests to get control of this project? What is the answer of the government to that question? If they have changed their minds, what has made them change? If they have not changed their minds, what is the government going to do about the situation? What action are they going to take to see that the project will continue to develop? I believe it is important enough for the Prime Minister to make some statement in regard to the possibility of what will take place to-morrow. Hon. members must bear in mind that the collateral trust bonds were sold not only in Canada but in other countries as well. They were sold in small denominations, as well as in large. What hope has a small bondholder against a crowd like the Holt interests to secure justice? So far as I am concerned I shall say this, Mr. Speaker, that I believe these collateral trust bondholders should be protected. I believe any person who has put actual money into this concern, any person who has real money in it, should be protected. I hove no objection to that. But we are considering the situation in so far as the capital stock of the company is concerned. There is practically no capital invested at all,—the whole transaction has been carried out on borrowed money. Yet those who control the common stock of this company are going to determine what shall be the fate of these bondholders. I submit the government could very well, and with justice, take over this project as part of the great seaway enterprise which we intend to build, and probably will build in the near future. It gives me a great deal of concern, when I contemplate the possible cost to the people of Canada of a deep seaway. More particularly is that so if the government, when through canalization they create a head of water, do not take advantage of the opportunity to make the best use of that head of water in the interests of the Canadian people. I have no objection to the government securing to the province of Quebec the rentals to which, under agreement, she is entitled, until such time as the question has been decided by the court of final jurisdiction as to who has the rights or as to how these rights are to be distributed. To that extent I would keep faith with Quebec; I think that would be justified.

But the point I wish to emphasize more particularly is that if we are going on to develop this seaway we must see to it that so far as proper development is concerned the Canadian people secure the benefit of such development, not only through facilities for navigation but through the development of power. I would withhold consent to the development of the seaway until such time as the government had placed before this parliament a policy which will take care of that particular situation. I believe the seaway will come. but unless it is properly handled it is going to be an expensive affair for the people of Canada.

Now, may I add my word to those of the hon. member for Bow River in asking the government to do its duty by the Canadian people by taking over this project, and making it a national concern. Pay to the province of Quebec the rentals which are due under agreement until such time, as I have already stated, as final decision has been made. By that means the Prime Minister will have done something really worth while for the people of Canada. These two great provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where most of our manufacturing is done, have no coal. But they have something to-day which is much better than coal, namely the energy derived from the waterpower,—white coal or white power, as it is termed. To-day that is far more important than coal. The cost to manufacture goods by means of this energy will depend to a great extent upon what the manufacturers will have to pay for the use of it. That is a matter which not only concerns the central provinces but the maritimes and western provinces as well. I believe the people of western Canada are getting tired of carrying the burden which they are carrying. May I point out to the Prime Minister that only recently there took place in Australia something which should be of great concern to the government of this country, namely the decision of the people of western Australia to withdraw from confederation. How long can this country expect the western and the maritime provinces to carry the load they are carrying? If the government would take advantage of every opportunity to reduce costs of production so that lower prices may be secured, then I think probably the rest of Canada would be satisfied. But if we throw away this heritage and permit it to be exploited by a set of gangsters for which the people of Canada have no use and who have probably done more harm to Canada than any other class of people I can think of—if the government is going to permit that kind of thing to go on, then I am not very much impressed as to the future unity of Canada.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on two previous occasions I have attempted to back up, as well as I could, the presentations made with regard to Beauharnois by the hon. members for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and Bow River (Mr. Garland). I feel I cannot do other than add my observations again to-day. I know that in one of the editorials of a recent edition of a western newspaper it was pointed out that the net results of the efforts of the hon. member for Acadia, leading the group in this corner in his presentation of the case had been simply to take away a certain enterprise from a small corporation, and turn it over to a large one. I think perhaps that is not altogether an unfair criticism. But I should like to say that this is not the fault of hon. members in this corner of the house. Several years ago we did our best to expose something which we believed was inimical to public welfare, and which involved a very serious graft and a very considerable amount of political corruption. We did our best to present our point of view to the public, and there is no doubt at all that certain individuals were exposed. The public were aroused. As everyone knows a committee of this house investigated the matter up to a certain point; then it was dropped. However certain members of the Senate were found guilty of practices which made it necessary that they should be dealt with.

All that was done. Public attention was called to the matter, and the whole question was then placed squarely before the present government. If we in this corner have failed to secure what we set out to accomplish, namely the nationalization of this great power scheme, or the bringing it in some way under the control of the public and making the power developed available for the use of the public at the lowest rates possible, it is not the fault of the members in this corner. The government itself must be held accountable for the situation.

It seems to me almost incredible that the government to-day can sit silent, refusing to give any statement with regard to a matter of this importance. Some of us may be regarded as cranks, we may not be taken very seriously from the political standpoint, because of the smallness of our numbers, but let me say that this is a matter that arouses tremendous interest throughout the entire dominion. We were blamed a few years ago because we had not carried the matter further. We had not the political weight to carry it further at that time. We could simply put it up to the country and the government. The government had full power to deal with the question, and to a certain extent the government did deal with the question. It realized that the enterprise must not fail, and it came to the assistance of the bondholders. It gave certain guarantees to the banks. But there it stopped.

Now I cannot see that at this stage of this session any useful purpose would be served by covering again the ground that we so thoroughly covered on previous occasions, but I would suggest very briefly one or two points. As has been urged by previous speakers, the rights of the collateral trust bondholders do not seem to be protected. They are protesting against this, they are calling upon the members of this house to do something to protect their rights. It seems to me that we as members have a duty to voice these protests and call upon the government to take some action. The government apparently believes itself so firmly entrenched that it can well afford to disregard not only public opinion on general questions but actually the cases brought before it by members of other parties. I say that the rights of the collateral trust bondholders are apparently not protected. Further than that I think it is obvious from the statements made by the hon. member for Bow River that the navigation rights on the St. Lawrence are not protected. We have perhaps certain safeguards in the fact that we now technically own the canal, but it is going to cost us a great deal more than necessary to develop it, and our rights in that regard do not seem to be protected under the present arrangements.

Of course the real difficulty is that we and the public generally cannot find out exactly what the present arrangements are. The government in this and some other matters is preserving a secrecy which has hitherto been unknown in public affairs in Canada. They think themselves free to give information or withhold it, and justify their position on the ground that information is not in the public interest. We are not willing to admit that this policy is in the public interest. When the bondholders come to us begging for protection, when we are told that the government itself is constructing a dam which may mean ultimately a very heavy expenditure for a branch canal, it seems as if we are entitled to some statement from the government as to what is going on.

Further than that, it would not seem that the public are protected. There is no indication that the public will be safeguarded in the rates that may be charged in days to come. That protection is taken care of in many affairs, but apparently it is not being given in this case. This great power development would in effect be turned over to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, which for years has so successfully exploited the city of Montreal.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did the hon. gentleman say that the government was constructing this dam?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understood from the hon. member for Bow River that a dam had been found necessary and had been constructed under the direction of the department and that this action would make necessary on the part of the government a spur canal in order to make the canal available for navigation purposes.

Further the dominion claims have not been pressed. When this matter was discussed before the supreme court several years ago an excellent case was made out for the right of the dominion to control the canal. I cannot see why this matter could not and should not have been carried further, before handing over the whole enterprise to the province of Quebec. I can remember some years ago reading rather carefully that document, or parts of it, and I found that Hon. Lucien Cannon acting at that time for the dominion, presented what to me as a layman seemed a very effective case. I cannot see why the present Conservative government should let Quebec have its own way in a matter of that kind. It seems to me the case might have been referred—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Did my hon. friend also read the judgment, which was really the authority?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I read the judgment, and as I was about to say I cannot see why the case should not have been carried to the privy council, as is done in a great many other cases. Again and again the judgments of our courts have been reversed. I do not think we can take the judgment of the supreme court as final.

Still further, as regards power being exported to the United States, it seems to me that Canadian interests have not been carefully considered. A few years ago it was very generally considered that it was rather a dangerous thing to permit the export of power to the United States. I do not quite see why that export should now be permitted, without careful consideration by the people of Canada. Here again is where I as a layman am somewhat confused. Has the Quebec legislature or the government of Quebec the authority to permit the export of that power?

Mr. CAHAN: It has never assumed that right, nor has it ever suggested it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then that power lies here with the Dominion government. Am I right?

Mr. CAHAN: Undoubtedly.

Mr. BENNETT: He has already made a statement on that point, why continue?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may have been careless, but it has not come to my knowledge that this government has taken a clear cut line in that regard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A licence has to be issued by this government for the export of any power.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well I think a statement of government policy should have been made in that regard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is in the statute.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But what is the government doing about it? Are the interests of Canada adequately protected? These are points I want to know something about; I have no knowledge, and I think the public has no knowledge. It seems to me that this is an issue of sufficient importance to be brought to the attention of this house. I know that it is the government that in the last analysis decides such matters, but at least there can be some public discussion of the matter, and some opportunity for the public at large to express itself. At the present time we are not granted that opportunity, in fact this is simply another instance in which, rightly or wrongly, we are getting away from the idea that parliament is the body that has authority with regard to the most important matters that concern this country. Apparently the house is to be sidetracked, neglected, ignored, the government claiming absolute right to decide these most important matters of public policy with scant regard to the wishes of the people as expressed through their chosen representatives. I do think the Prime Minister should make a statement to this house, even if for no other reason than to enlighten our ignorance and clear up any misconceptions that may generally prevail. I think we should have a statement from the Prime Minister with regard to the points we have raised to-day. I do not think it is too much to ask that the public should be informed very definitely with regard to the protection being given Canada in the matter of power export, the protection being given the bondholders, any action that is being taken by the government to reserve for Canada its fundamental rights in connection with this canal and any action that is being taken to safeguard the financial interests of this country. I know that some years ago my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), for whom in common with all hon. members of this house I have a very high regard, took the position that we must concede that this was entirely a provincial matter. I cannot concede that point, and it does not seem to me that the country is willing to concede it. I would rather take the position, as I did in the house two or three years ago, that the St. Lawrence river is on a different basis from many other streams and that the power developed there is also on a different basis from the power developed locally in other areas. I take it that the St. Lawrence is essentially a national and an international stream, and that under those circumstances we cannot deal with this matter in a provincial fashion. I think that unless we are careful this administration may surrender claims which ought not to be surrendered with regard to the effective control of this great river.

Mr. DUPUIS: Upon what authority is my hon. friend basing this opinion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have given my authorities at some length in previous discussions, and I cannot see that there is any very useful purpose to be served by citing those authorities again. The hon. member will find them in the speeches of the hon. members who presented the case previously.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is not in the British North America Act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it is in those portions of that act read only to-day by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland).

Mr. DUPUIS: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the British North America Act makes a difference between the St. Lawrence and other rivers?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it does. It is all very well for the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to shake his head; I heard him suggest a little while ago that these clauses in the British North America Act applied only to canals already in existence when the British North America Act was passed, but I do not think that position can be successfully maintained.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would my hon. friend apply the same theory to the Niagara river, which is also navigable, and would he claim the developments which have been carried on there instead of leaving them under the control of the hydro commission of Ontario?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Ultimately that claim may be made, but the Niagara river is in a different position.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where does the hon. gentleman find that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are two points I might mention, Mr. Speaker. One is that I think a very good case could be made out for the continuity of ownership of the canal, ever since the original grants were made to the Roberts. This canal has been changed; its location has been somewhat altered; certainly it has been enlarged and it has assumed an altogether different position in the public life of this country, but there were certain grants made in the very beginning which have continued through the years in one form or another, which it seems to me would offer a very strong presumption in favour of the rights of the dominion in connection with that canal. There is a recognition of this in the fact that certain rental payments are being made to the Dominion government to the present day.

Then there is the other aspect of the question. The St. Lawrence river is a navigable stream; it is proposed to make it part of an international waterway, and again and again the engineers have asserted that there seemed to be no reason why the cost of the canalization should not be borne by the water power developed. If the late government had been a little more energetic and forward looking they would have started the development of the canal, and almost automatically the control of the power would have come into the hands of the dominion. Unfortunately the federal government was slow in acting and the power development was started first. The province of Quebec claimed certain rights because of that power development, and later on the Dominion government considered that we had to fall in line and that the canal had to be carried on as an independent enterprise, with the cost borne by the Dominion government. But even though that action was taken in the past it seems to me that we still have the power of asserting our control over this enterprise. As the hon. member for Bow River urged, it is quite within the power of the present administration to declare this a work for the general advantage of Canada, and I think under those powers, which are undoubtedly under the British North America Act, we might control the whole situation, both as to canalization and water power, and thus save this enterprise for the people of Canada. In another connection last night I directed attention to the tremendous control which, through the years, had been secured by Sir Herbert Holt over various financial and industrial enterprises in this country. To-day it seems as though we are playing into the hands of Sir Herbert Holt and adding still more power to that possessed by a great corporation that has already almost strangled the industrial and financial life of this country.

Once more, Mr. Speaker, I would urge that if we have not been stating the facts correctly to-day the government should set us right, for some of us are honestly perturbed about the whole situation. We feel that in our speeches to-day we have represented the fears and the hopes of a large number of people in Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when a discussion of this kind is contemplated in the house it has been customary for notice to be given to the leader of the government or some minister concerned with the matter in question. No notice was given and therefore I do not propose to traverse the matter at length, though I may do so later. This discussion indicates at once that it is not always desirable to rely upon briefs prepared outside and given hon. members of this house to read in this chamber. I make that statement very carefully and I know exactly what I am saying.

Mr. GARDINER: Just what does the Prime Minister mean by that statement?

Mr. BENNETT: I mean exactly what I have said, and just that; the hon. gentleman can read it in Hansard, and he will know what I mean. I read some of the speeches delivered in previous years before they were made. Let us have no misunderstanding about the position of affairs. This afternoon in this house three hon. members charged that power was to be exported from Canada, that an arrangement had been made to export power from this country. Three hon. members made that statement, one after the other, in this chamber.

Mr. GARDINER: Who were the three members?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. GARDINER: I did not make that statement during the course of my remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: Then if my hon. friend's words did not mean that they meant nothing; they were simply an endeavour to fasten on the government some responsibility which does not belong there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member for Bow River referred to the bill passed by the Quebec legislature.

Mr. BENNETT: And he made statements about this government. It is not as though the hon. member were an ignorant man; he is a gentleman of culture and education, and he knew perfectly well that there was a law on the statute books of the dominion stating very definitely that no power can be exported without the consent of the governor in council; he knew perfectly well that no such consent or licence had been given.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: Then that settles it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I referred to licences that might be granted.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement was made the other day that no licences had been issued.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wanted to know if licences were going to be issued.

Mr. BENNETT: That illustrates the course that has been continuously and persistently pursued by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon. There have been no licences issued for the export of power from this dominion. What is more, if the hon. gentlemen had been as industrious as they might have been they would have found that the principle asserted by Mr. Meighen as to the danger and the difficulties which would follow the granting of licences for the export of power and the building up of communities was known to every member of this administration and of this house. None of the licences that are outstanding is new; every member of this house knows that they are not new licences. The only new licence issued under that statute, so far as I know at present, is one with respect to natural gas in western Canada, and if my memory serves me, it was issued by the late government, with the consent of the attorney general of Alberta, and renewed by this government.

Now, there is no foundation in fact or otherwise for the assertion that any licence for the export of power has been granted by or asked for from this government in connection with Beauharnois—not any. And, secondly, the statements that have been made with respect to the bondholders and their position are questions that involve a long and tedious reading of the facts for which no opportunity has been afforded any member of this government in order that the matter might be dealt with this afternoon. At the appropriate time, if it is thought desirable, a statement will be made; but to spring a discussion of this kind upon this house and then expect that any member of the administration is going to follow with a detailed analysis and, failing that, to be charged with not having dealt with every factor that has been presented is something unheard of in the previous practice of this house. Moreover, it is something that will not conduce to the orderly discussion of public matters. When the opportunity arises, if it is thought desirable, a statement will be made.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): I have not received any invitation to speak on this occasion, but sometimes I speak without invitation. I am not going to enter into the differences between the government and our friends to our left, but if the stand consistently taken by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) throughout the west last year is right, that this property, this water power, belongs to the Dominion of Canada—that was the report that appeared in the press—I would point out that no expropriation proceedings would be necessary because the property would be ours without having recourse to such proceedings. And that impression was left on my mind by my good friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon) in the speech which he made as chairman of the Beauharnois investigation committee. He gave a very good speech on that occasion, from his standpoint, and one statement appears to have been overlooked by the house and the country. After stating that campaign funds were quite necessary, he said—

Mr. BENNETT: That was the Jacques Cartier company he was talking about there; that was what the issue was about.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We shall see when we read his statement. After making that remark in regard to campaign funds, he put in the usual "but":

> But those who contribute to a party's coffers, inspired only by the hope—and in time something more than hope—that they will, by reason thereof, be able through the influence of that party to alienate from the people of the country the resources that belong to them—those contributions, I say, and those who make them cannot be too strongly condemned.

So that if there is not a direct statement, at any rate there is a very direct implication there, on the part of my good friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, that this property which we were talking about belonged to the people of Canada, and that anyone who dared to alienate it for political purposes was worthy of severe condemnation. Now that was what the whole blessed report was based upon, and it is no wonder the hon. member for Acadia took up the same refrain all through the west and pleaded that everyone should come and help to save this great property of ours. The cry was, "Let us nationalize it like the hydro in Ontario." And who was the one that stood in the way? Well, that is the situation. I am not going to quarrel with the government just now over this question because I have other fish to fry of more importance to me; that is to say, the gentlemen to our left. Let me turn to the interesting speech delivered on that occasion, the discussion of the Beauharnois report, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) after the report was submitted by the Minister of Immigration. In the course of his remarks he was interrupted by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), who deserves my thanks because he brought out some interesting information. I quote from Hansard:

> Mr. Chaplin: Did you not do something last year to change the law?
> Mr. Woodsworth: Yes.
> Mr. Chaplin: Why did you do it?

This is what I want to call attention to:

Mr. Woodsworth: There was on the statute books a law which prevented corporations from contributing to campaign funds. We all know that this law was very largely a dead letter; it had never amounted to very much.

He is apparently an authority on it.

But that legislation had the effect of prohibiting labour unions from contributing to campaign funds. We had tried our best to introduce an amendment to exempt labour unions from this clause as they contributed openly. That amendment was turned down on one or two occasions, but last year on the third reading, when there was no opportunity to go into the matter in detail, I introduced an amendment removing that particular clause from the criminal code, and the house accepted the amendment. I will not discuss the question whether, in view of the present situation that was a good thing or not; but I do know that campaign funds came from corporations long before that amendment was adopted.

Mr. Chaplin: It was not in the criminal code but in the election act.

Mr. Woodsworth: I accept the correction; it was in the election act.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): You weakened the law.

Mr. Woodsworth: Possibly.

This is the new breed of reformers we have to-day, and they are actually trying to justify themselves for taking away the prohibition to corporations, giving campaign funds, opening up the door in order to make it lawful and proper to receive contributions. The hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) admits on the previous page that he received a contribution himself from the central committee. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said they got only $100 from the central labour committee. Well, it is very much like saying, "Don't do as I do but do as I tell you."

Let us see whether I have put a proper interpretation on the conduct of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. His excuse was that he moved to have that prohibition discontinued and removed from the statutes because it was not carried out, because the law was broken. I wonder how many laws would be left on the statute books if all those that were broken were abolished. The law against stealing would certainly be soon rescinded; the law against murder would only have had time to dry on the books before it would have had to be removed, according to the principle laid down by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I say therefore that the excuse he gave was no justification for the removal of this particular law, because that principle carried to its logical conclusion would leave destitute the shelves that contain the statute books of the country, because the laws are all broken as far as I know.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest that penalties are attached to most laws.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right, that will be taken care of; the electors will prescribe some of the penalties probably. For fear I am too severe in my interpretation of what my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre has done with respect to this matter, let me say I do not attach all the blame to him. He took the initiative in passing that legislation. But he was not satisfied with having been turned down twice by the government of that day, for in the face of an agreement not to bring the matter up a third time—according to a statement made by the then solicitor general, it was agreed not to bring it up in the house—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did bring it up in committee of the whole and did prevail upon the house to accept his amendment to the Election Act. That is why to-day campaign funds may be made legally and properly; it is because of the initiative he took on that occasion in that direction. The parliament of Canada of course must all be held responsible. Had the hon. member not however taken the initiative, that law I believe would not have been changed as it was changed on that occasion. I hold the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre more responsible than any other hon. member in this house for having made legal and proper campaign funds donated by corporations. How will I support this view? I would like in support of my contention on this subject, to direct the attention of the house to some remarks made by the Prime Minister in 1931 and on the following day when speaking on the same subject. I desire to take this opportunity of thanking the Prime Minister for his candor on that occasion. The Prime Minister is reported on page 4409 of Hansard of 1931 as follows:

The law as amended at the last session permitted corporations to make contributions, and that amendment was made at the instance of the gentleman from Winnipeg who has spoken to-day.

The only member from Winnipeg who spoke that day was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The Prime Minister continued:

That is the position. Contributions were made legal and proper, but in preceding elections that was not so.

The Prime Minister then went on to discuss another matter with which I will not deal. According to my interpretation of those remarks, the conduct of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as I have just described it was supported in toto by the Prime Minister. He held the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as being primarily responsible for making legal and proper contributions made by corporations. If they are legal and proper what then is all the rip and row about, especially from the far C.C.F. corner?

An hon. MEMBER: They are not coming in very fast.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Earlier in the session I had occasion to make painful reference to the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asking for the setting up of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. At that time nobody seemed disposed to set them up. I was very sorry that the government thought it advisable to adjourn the debate upon that interesting motion. I am almost of the opinion that they were culpable and working in collusion with the C.C.F'ers. Had there been a vote at that time it looks as if our friends over there the modern reformers, would have been divided. Rather than have that calamity befall them so early in their career, the government moved the adjournment of the debate before a vote could be taken. I may be doing my hon. friends on the government side an injustice in saying that was their purpose, but it is up to them to give a better explanation of their actions at that time.

I have had occasion to quote certain statements made by Mr. Williams who is ripping around the country calling the Liberals and Tories such terrible names. I do not intend to deal with him at this time as I have done so formerly, but I will refer to a Mr. Coldwell. This gentleman is a labour follower of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and is the head of the farmer-labour aggregation in Saskatchewan which have affiliated with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. He is the first lieutenant and right bower in Saskatchewan of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and is promulgating these governmental nostrums which we hear from time to time. He spoke in Saskatoon at the birth of this organization. He did not say anything very nice about the Conservatives but my hon. friends will have to take it. In fact, he did not say anything very nice of us either. Here are his words:

> The Liberal party by that action—

That was the action of voting against Senator Meighen's motion against Senator McDougald and Senator Haydon. Hon. members will recall that famous speech about screaming; the Liberals had an opportunity of screaming with the screamer but they did not take it. Mr. Coldwell continues:

> —stood self-condemned and the farmer-labour groups must not accept any part of that stigma by uniting with the Liberal party.

How can they expect to be united with the Liberal party?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can remember when you were after them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Once bitten, five times shy. The quotation continues:

> But, said Mr. Coldwell, the Liberal party was not the only one that had accepted bribes. The Conservative party, also, was "born in sin and nurtured in corruption." In 1874 in the House of Commons, Sir John A. Macdonald, founder of the Conservative party, was accused of receiving money from the forerunner of the Canadian Pacific railway and resigned on that account.

He is not quite correct historically.

Mr. HACKETT: The sentiment is all right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the man who is going to bring us a new heaven and a new earth if we will just set him up. The report continues:

> There was nothing to choose between the two old parties. Farmers and Labourites must work for a new policy that would banish a system that had clogged the wheels of industry and which had proved itself to be a debt creating system.

He then goes on to the usual Russian stunt on collectivism and production. I am sorry to take up so much time of the house but for the last week or so I have been sitting here as tight as a knot on a log. If there is anyone to be blamed for my taking up time, it is our friends to my left. While they did not give me an invitation to join in, I have availed myself of the opportunity.

Hon. friends to my left have been posing as the saviours of the country and have been introducing a new social order which they promise will put us on easy street. If they could do that, we should give them an inning but they are the last ones on earth who can do it. I am not willing to experiment with a try.

I shall come back now more particularly to Beauharnois. I am not an authority upon power matters but I have looked upon this project as being one of the finest and soundest on the North American continent. I sat around the council table for days helping to place restrictions around this project when it first came to the Dominion government for approval. We surrounded it with so many safeguards in the interests of the public that some of us feared that it could never operate. Our restrictions had to do with navigation and with the administration and carrying out of the provisions of the Navigable Waters' Protection Act. We had nothing to do with the licensing or ownership of the water power as that was Quebec's do. Had we taken any other stand than we did take, we would have been derelict in our duty in the premises.

Now let us see what were the results of our hon. friends to the left taking the initiative in respect to that Beauharnois inquiry. I concede to them the right to do that if they wanted to. I was connected with investigations in my younger days, and I took both the responsibility and some of the odium that always go with it, but the occasions were not anything like this. What has been the effect of hon. members to my left breaking in at that time, the most critical time in the history of the Beauharnois project, and having an investigation, when that action, justified or not, almost put the whole project on the rocks. It, of course, gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre an opportunity to explain why he took the initiative to make campaign funds legal and proper.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was not made proper.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Either say it a little louder please or keep quiet. The effect of that investigation was that this big project which otherwise might have been completed before the depression struck it was held up because of the great hullabaloo set up all over the country, the government of to-day taking a very pronounced part therein. That was when they did snuggle up to the C. C. F., and make no mistake about it, and it was done for the purpose of injuring and misrepresenting the Liberal party. The result was that in dollars and cents the project went more or less to pieces. It could not get funds to complete the work, and the government had to give guarantees for something like $16,000,000, if the work was to be proceeded with. I do not know how much more the government will have to guarantee. I think they are pretty well through, but $16,000,000 is a pretty snug sum to pay for the privilege of having these gentlemen in the "haw" corner of this house, and now these hon. gentlemen, after preaching all over the west that this was Canada's Beauharnois property, this was also our power, and this was our water too, call on the government to expropriate the property which they wrongly claimed belonged to Canada. The Acting Minister of Immigration will have to take some responsibility in that connection, for he too said that it was our property and our power. That was his whole argument. I have read his speech in Hansard, and I can put no other interpretation upon it. If my hon. friend himself can explain it any differently I will be the first one to acknowledge that I was wrong because I am rather disposed not to believe wrong of my hon. friend. He got some notoriety when he was chairman of the Beauharnois committee, and he certainly pulled it in great style his way. But he was wrong there. He founded his whole argument on a wrong assumption. That is neither here nor there, for as I said before I have other fish to fry, and I want to fry them properly this time. I say that we are out already to the tune of $16,000,000 as the result of that inquiry. How much are we in?

Mr. CHAPLIN: In the valley of humiliation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister has said that campaign funds are necessary in connection with our governmental institutions. I could quote some of his statements, but I have not the time just now. In addition to being out $16,000,000 already, it is going to be a difficult matter to raise funds to complete the enterprise, for so far we have only developed one-quarter of the power. I am sure the Acting Minister of Immigration will excuse me if I just go on a little bit further with the quotation which I gave a few moments ago because it is very interesting in the light of what has transpired since. It is well put and I want all the house to hearken unto it. At page 4355 of the Hansard which I have already quoted he says:

> In connection with this project I must confess that I am unable to divorce myself from the view that the contributions to campaign funds that were made from the company's funds—

Mr. Sweezey subsequently swore in the Senate committee that that was not the case:

> —which came from the sale of bonds to the people, were made for the purpose of influencing those who might be returned to power.

"Those who might be returned to power." Who were returned to power? Those hon. gentlemen opposite are the ones who were meant. Admittedly. I take the words of the minister himself, "those who might be returned to power." The quotation goes on:

> —and those who took them, those who collected them, receive in the committee's report the condemnation they deserve.

Before the power development can be properly completed, and three-quarters of the power development still remains to be done, it will be necessary to go to the Quebec government to get a further charter and licence; and to get the use of the whole water of the St. Lawrence it will be necessary to come to this government for such protective precautions and provisions as were provided for before, or better if possible. Well, you know what is stated here, that the contributions were given because of the expectation of getting certain things from the government which happened to be elected.

Mr. GORDON: From now on they will have to go to the parliament of Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If hon. members then talked in innuendos and implications I cannot help it. Let anyone else put any other interpretation upon it if he wants to. I put my own interpretation upon it, and I will go further and say that if we had been returned to power, if Quebec had given the charter, they would have presumably sought to get the balance of the water. I do not know that they would have got it. I do not think, speaking for myself, that they would have, except on very good terms in connection with the locks that would be and had been necessary. But that did not happen anyway, and we do not need to speculate on that. My hon. friends opposite are sitting on the government benches, and the problem is up to them. The Prime Minister has said very little about it this afternoon, but he is going to say more on some more appropriate occasion. That is what he has been doing for the last two or three years; it is always, something is going to be done for Canada to put us on our feet.

That pretty nearly covers, Mr. Speaker, the hurried notes that I made while hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. were speaking. I did not know any more than the Prime Minister did that this matter was coming up this afternoon. Referring to the request of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that the government should expropriate the Beauharnois property, I want to compliment the Secretary of State upon his reply last year to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who invoked the government to seize—seize, mind you—this Beauharnois property, and then create an issue of the matter and let the case go to the privy council and be decided on its merits. The Secretary of State got up and bluntly stated in reply that he did not see any difference between that and any other kind of banditry. He took the ground that the government was not justified in committing an act of despoliation and burglary just to create a specific issue to go before the privy council. Besides, our own supreme court, so far as the case went before them, showed a decided inclination to the view that both the power and the water belonged to the province of Quebec. Do not make any mistake about that. Nobody has challenged that view in court and nobody is likely to. That was also the view held, and is so stated, by the present Prime Minister of Canada, that the water and power do belong to Quebec. After preaching wrongly for a year that this power did belong to the people of Canada, what is the use of hon. members to my left now coming along and saying that Canada should now expropriate something which we already have? That shows the hypocrisy of my hon. friends, the duplicity of them, the humbug of them—trying to fool and exploit the people. Their political war material is running short. They are parading around the country and are not receiving, apparently, the response they expected. They are boiling up again with some alleged new dope. They take a great deal of credit, and are the only ones, according to their views, who stand up in public and protect the inalienable rights of the people of Canada. They are running short of new ammunition and they want to warm Beauharnois over again. That is what they are trying to do, and I am going to raise my voice, supposing I never say another word in this parliament, against that kind of humbug and duplicity on the part of hon. members who pretend, without justification, to be better than anybody else. Instead of that they are, in my experience, a good many degrees worse.

However, I will make some exceptions to that statement. I have always taken the ground that there were two or three over in that corner to whom my remarks would not apply. Then hon. members in the corner have complained that guarantees were given by the government to save the project from ruin. What would have happened to it if they had not done so? I do not wish to be understood as taking the brief for the government —God forbid that anybody should do that. But what would have happened to the project? Hon. gentlemen in the corner of the house have raised such a row throughout Canada that you could not sell a Beauharnois bond if you gave it away. Either the project had to become a piece of wreckage or the government of the day had to step in.

I do not like to think that I am saying anything which pleases the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), but I have to be fair.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Do not let me stop you.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have to state the facts. Because of that I must point out that in my view they could do nothing but what they did. And if a loss ultimately falls upon the Dominion of Canada here are the birds, over here in this left hand corner, who will be largely responsible.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), I have not received any invitation to express my views either on behalf of the government or on behalf of those who have engineered the debate. Like my hon. friend, also, I think it is rather interesting, in view of recent developments, to read the statements and allegations which on different occasions in the past were made by the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) and some of his associates. However at this time I do not wish to refer to those statements. I do not wish, either, to express any view as to which interest should control the Beauharnois company in its present difficulties. I do not believe that this is the proper tribunal before which the matter should be discussed, until a decision is reached.

My purpose in rising however is to refer to one or two matters to which allusions were made by the hon. members for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and, to a lesser degree, by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner). They referred to the advisability and advantages of public ownership of public utilities. In some respects I would agree with them. I have had the privilege of representing the Quebec city council before the legislature on two occasions with regard to the municipalization of electricity. And after the consideration of that matter and the studies connected therewith I do not hesitate to state that compared with the rates paid by people in Ontario the people of my province pay too high a rate for electric lighting and electricity for different uses.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The people in Montreal say they get it cheaper than we do in Ontario.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are wrong about it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, they are very wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree with the hon. member that they are wrong.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I think that is a matter which should be discussed in the province of Quebec by the province of Quebec. And no matter how pleased I may be that some of my friends in the corner share my views in regard to certain matters, I really do not invite their collaboration on something which is really a provincial matter of the province of Quebec. I do not believe that by intruding themselves in the discussion of this matter they will help at all its solution.

Hon. members say that the development of the St. Lawrence river is national in its scope, and that as a result of that line of reasoning the power belongs to the people of Canada. I should like to refer to one mistake which was certainly made by the hon. member for Bow River, who in this was supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Let me tell those hon. gentlemen that at the time of confederation the legislative powers were divided, and set out in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, the residue of powers being left with the Dominion of Canada. But not only were the legislative powers divided at that time, but assets and properties were divided. In that instance, instead of the residue being left to the dominion it remained in the hands of the provinces. Properties which were transferred to the Dominion government are all enumerated in the British North America Act. And when hon. members mention canals and waterpowers connected with them, they must bear in mind that the expression applies to canals then existing and to waterpowers then existing. Nobody can contradict that statement before the courts, and it is a principle accepted by all authorities. The same applies to harbour and lake improvements. In connection with a case only a few years ago in which the harbour commission of Montreal was involved, the privy council decided that the bed of the river, which was not then part of the harbour of Montreal, had not been transferred, was still provincial property, belonged to the grantee of the property, and had to be paid for by the harbour commissioners of Montreal in the event of their wanting to use it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Was not the contrary position taken by Mr. Cannon and others who represented the Dominion government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Could my hon. friend expect otherwise? Mr. Cannon was presenting the case for the federal authorities and against the provincial authorities. He had to argue the best he could on the side of the federal government, but what creates the authority is not the argument of Mr. Cannon, nor that of Mr. Geoffrion, or Mr. Lafleur who were on the other side, but the decision given by the supreme court of Canada. I would be willing to accept the view of my hon. friend that possibly this case should be sent to the privy council in order that a final adjudication should be made on it. Perhaps so. But surely my hon. friends have no right to consider this property as being owned by the Dominion of Canada, in view of the decision given by the supreme court in that instance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But surely the case is arguable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friends make another mistake; that is to consider the St. Lawrence as in a different position from that of other navigable rivers. There is nothing either in the British North America Act or in any law of the land that makes a special case with regard to the St. Lawrence river. It is a navigable river. As I told my hon. friend in the course of his speech, if his argument is good in regard to the St. Lawrence it would be just as good in regard to the Niagara river, which is also a navigable water. But no one ever claimed that the dominion had any ownership of the water power in that case.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Exactly the same as on the Niagara.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly as on the Niagara. The banks of the St. Lawrence river are the property of the province of Quebec. My hon. friends should take that into consideration when they discuss the matter of rates. One of them said that no care had been taken as to rates which should be charged there. The Beauharnois company or the Montreal Light, Heat and Power or whatever company is in control of that property is a provincial company, subject to the laws of the province of Quebec. Their rates have to be controlled by that province. There is a public utilities commission there. Perhaps I do not like some of the decisions of that commission, but if the tribunal is not what it should be it is for the Quebec legislature to change it or strengthen it; it is not a question to be settled by this parliament. In spite of the good intentions and good will and kindness of my hon. friends I appeal to them to let the people of the province of Quebec settle their own business.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question before he sits down? Is it not true that this government did expropriate the private property of the Beauharnois company in the case of the canal? If they had the power to do that in the case of the land and appurtenances of the canal, have they not the same authority in regard to power?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: They had the power in regard to the canal because it relates to navigation, there is no doubt that this government have control of navigation and have the right to take over any necessary property for that purpose. But that would not justify them taking over the property for the purpose of generating electricity.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Since our friends from the west and others from the province of Quebec have taken part in this debate, perhaps it might be fair for one from the province of Ontario to say a few words, although I will say at the outset that I am speaking for myself alone and not for the province of Ontario. I speak because I have some sympathy with the thought that it is regrettable that a great natural resource such as this, capable of developing some 2,000,000 horse-power, should pass into the hands of private interests.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: I had that thought at the time when I happened to be a member of the government which had to pass upon the question of giving permission for the diversion of 50,000 cubic feet of water from the St. Lawrence river. As far as I was concerned I had some hesitation—I am betraying no confidence in saying so—in giving the permission as long as there was any hope that that water power belonged to the Dominion of Canada. But not being a lawyer or an expert in these matters, and having before me, as other members of the government had, the definite opinion of those supposed to know, that the power belonged to the province of Quebec, it seemed to me that there was no other course to take than that which was taken.

Later on the Beauharnois company got into difficulties as we all know—

Mr. LAVERGNE: It belongs to Quebec because Quebec took it.

Mr. EULER: Before I leave that point I would like to make a reference to a suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). He seems to think it is competent for the government of Canada merely by a declaration of this house to acquire water powers which otherwise belong to the province of Quebec. If it were possible without prejudicing the vested rights of the province of Quebec, I think I would be inclined to vote for such a declaration. But I do not believe it is possible for us to acquire the power in that way. I said before that I felt it was regrettable that this great natural resource should pass into the hands of private interests, especially into the hands of so colossal a monopoly as now has its grip upon the water powers of the province of Quebec. I have no brief to speak for the province of Quebec, but I believe the time will come, if it has not already come, when the people of that province will regret that these powers were allowed to pass into the hands of these great private interests and monopolies. On their behalf as well as on behalf of the people of Canada generally I do not like to see the power of these interests still further increased by allowing them to get control of the Beauharnois. At the time the matter was under discussion in the house I had a few words to say. The Prime Minister then said—I have not his exact words, but they were to the effect that the power belonged to the province. I made the suggestion that the dominion might develop the power. He said that that was impossible except by agreement with the province of Quebec. I suggested that the federal government might, by purchase if you like, acquire the interests of the then shareholders of the Beauharnois corporation. In that case the government would not be infringing on provincial powers. They would merely as shareholders be in the position which the then shareholders of the Beauharnois company occupied. The Prime Minister did not take kindly to that suggestion. He said in so many words that the government had no intention of so doing. With that I am not finding any fault at the moment, but I say that the situation has changed very substantially since that time. The company fell into difficulties and in the opinion of the government it became necessary to assist the further development of the Beauharnois corporation by a guarantee of loans made by the banks of Canada to the extent of some $16,000,000. So to-day the Dominion of Canada has that substantial financial interest in the Beauharnois project.

I make now a suggestion, which I know will not be received with favour by some, and will perhaps be regarded as a far-reaching socialistic idea, but it is in line with my ideas in regard to public ownership. I make the suggestion because of the fact that we are now in a position that it seems difficult to get out of. We have two contesting interests, two contesting groups of financiers, trying to get control of the Beauharnois corporation, and in the fight that is going on between them the interests of the Canadian people, and the interests of the bondholders in this concern I imagine are not being very well served. If we have already $16,000,000 in this enterprise, and they need something like $13,000,000 more to complete the project—perhaps less than that—besides which the claims of the banks amounting to some $6,500,000 may have to be protected, why should not this government in the general public interest, and perhaps finally in the interests of the people of the province of Quebec, take over the whole project by acquiring all the common stock and owning the concern? I am not saying they should go into the business of distribution of power, but they could generate the power, and then we would have a project that at least would be self-sustaining; then we could absolutely ensure that the people of the province of Ontario, as well as the people of the province of Quebec, would not be paying through the nose as they will have to do if these natural resources remain under private control.

Now I am going to make perhaps the most socialistic suggestion of all. Not long ago some of us, I think my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) and myself, had a little discussion with the Prime Minister with regard to what some might call inflation. I am not an unconditional inflationist, but on a previous occasion I did say that I would not be afraid to experiment a bit with controlled inflation. We made the suggestion a few weeks ago that we might at least try out the issuance to a moderate degree of federal currency, without gold backing, for such purposes as the construction of public buildings and other works of a public nature. It just occurs to me now that the Beauharnois project might be an enterprise in connection with which we might very well conduct that experiment. Personally I should not be afraid, though of course I have not the responsibility that must be assumed by the members of the government, to duplicate if necessary the inflation that was practised by this government last fall to the extent of some $35,000,000, in order to complete this project. I think we might retain this natural resource in the hands of the Canadian people by the issuance of federal currency in that manner. Then you would have a concern owned by the people of Canada and bringing in a revenue which ultimately would take care of the whole cost of the undertaking, at the same time preserving for the Canadian people—and that is more particularly in my mind—this great natural resource, which should no tbe allowed to fall into the hands of private interests.

Mr. MORAND: Has the hon. member in mind the redemption of those notes over a period of time?

Mr. EULER: Certainly; I think that is one of the merits of the suggestion. Out of the revenues obtained from the development and sale of this power you could retire all those federal notes in a reasonable time.

Mr. HACKETT: With or without interest?

Mr. EULER: Without interest.

Mr. ARMAND R. LAVERGNE (Montmagny): I had not intended to speak on this question, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to put myself on record, coming from the province of Quebec, in favour of the suggestion just made by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I listened to the arguments presented by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and while it may be a controversial question my opinion, for what it is worth—

Mr. LAPOINTE: We never agreed on this.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I think we have agreed quite often lately, but I think it is a very controversial question as to whether the Beauharnois water power belongs to the province of Quebec or to the Dominion of Canada, though I think there is no doubt with regard to the canal. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has admitted that as yet the question is not settled. Very often a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada meets with a sad fate at the hands of the privy council, and until we are masters of our own destiny and the day comes when the king has his own privy council in Canada it is possible that the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada may continue to fare badly when they come before the imperial privy council.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) does not believe in appeals to the privy council.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Neither do I believe in appeals to the privy council in England. Being a monarchist, as is very well known, I believe in the right of the subject to appeal to the king, but I believe appeals to the king should lie in appeals to the Canadian privy council.

Mr. POULIOT: When the Prime Minister is away.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not care to discuss personalities on this question, because I think the matter is far too important. In my opinion, however, taking the very letter of the British North America Act it is not so very certain that the Beauharnois water power belongs to the province of Quebec, and when I say that I do not think that, with my bad past, I shall be suspected of betraying the narrowest interests of the province of Quebec or the minority in this country. How does it happen that in this case the province of Quebec claims ownership of the water power? It happens simply because they put their hands on it and took it, and in no other way. One day the government of Quebec decided that they owned that water power, which until then had been acknowledged to belong to the dominion; the provincial government took it and sold it to a private company by an act of filibustering, which has been quite a common practice with the government of that province in the last thirty years. To-day the people of Quebec are in the grasp of the greatest octopus that ever spread its tentacles over that province; I refer to the electricity trust in Quebec, and we may say that this has happened with the complicity of the premier and the government of Quebec. There is no doubt about that; no one knows it better than my hon. friend from Quebec East, who, not more than a month ago, was fighting for the rights of the citizens of the city of Quebec with that very electricity trust which to-day is laying another of its tentacles on the parliament of Canada.

I think there is a higher point of view in regard to this question. The suggestion of the hon. member for North Waterloo is very interesting. It would give the people of Quebec a chance to have electricity not at the exorbitant rate they are paying now but at an acceptable or manageable rate. Look at the city of Montreal. When you cross over the street to the city of Westmount you find that the price of electricity is only one-fifth the price in the city of Montreal, though they occupy the same geographical territory. So I think if nothing else offers, and if we cannot prevent that company from falling into the hands of Sir Herbert Holt, to call him by name, the suggestion of the hon. member for North Waterloo should be accepted.

There is still another point of view, however. Speaking as a man with the reputation of being a narrow nationalist, I think the St. Lawrence is not an asset of Quebec; I believe it is an asset which belongs to the whole dominion, and I think the rights of the dominion with regard to navigation and other matters should be safeguarded not only for the people of Quebec but for the people of Canada as a whole. I am a Canadian from the province of Quebec. In the past I have never hesitated to go against my party or any other party, and I have never considered what my future party might be, when I have felt it necessary to defend the rights I thought were sacred to the minority in this country. At the same time I want to see built up in Canada a national spirit and a national unity, and that will not be done by claiming what we might call the crumbs of rights which do not exist and at the same time letting go our most sacred, guaranteed constitutional rights. We can never build up Canadian unity in that way. I have always claimed, and still claim, that the English speaking people of this country are willing to treat us as partners, even if they have not gone so far as we have gone so that they may treat us as brothers. If we are partners we on our part must play the game if we expect them to do so. As a citizen of Quebec, as a Canadian of French descent and as a nationalist, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the St. Lawrence is a national asset in which the people from the far west are just as much interested as we are in the province of Quebec. I think the government has a great part to play in saving that national asset for the people of Canada, and at the same time it can do a great deal for the province of Quebec by saving that province from the octopus which is controlled by the financiers of St. James street, Montreal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I ask the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) how the Dominion of Canada can acquire this property by purchase or otherwise without the consent of the Quebec government? If it can be done I am almost disposed to agree with my good friend to my left in the remarks he made.

Mr. LAVERGNE: It could be taken to the privy council.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The CHAIRMAN: There is before the committee the following amendment:

Provided that the tax hereby imposed under subclause (i) shall not apply to the materials enumerated in customs tariff items 139 and 140, when sold in packages containing not more than five pounds each.

Mr. RHODES: I wish to withdraw that amendment, or rather to amend it by substituting for the word "five" the word "ten."

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister explain the reason for this?

Mr. RHODES: I find that the householder can purchase one ten pound tin at a lower rate per pound than two five pound tins, and it is for the purpose of making the commodity cheaper to the householder that I have increased the limit from five to ten.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not so far said anything with regard to the sugar duties and I do not see how I can allow this to go by without protesting. After hearing some of the letters read yesterday on behalf of the women and children of the country, and listening to the protests that came from every quarter on this side of the house, yes, and the silent protest of the rear-guard supporting the government—because I know they entertain such protests—I am wondering whether the minister is not considering the advisability of abandoning this tax. Before I go any further I would ask him whether he has seriously considered this matter.

Mr. RHODES: We gave the proposal every consideration before bringing it down. The government is under no illusion either as to the burden the tax imposes or as to the absolute necessity for it. Had it not been for the dire need of securing much-needed revenue the proposal would not have been brought down. We simply must have the revenue, and it is because of that absolute necessity that we have brought it down. We did our considering before these proposals were introduced.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I take it then that all precautions were taken and that every thought was given the matter from every angle before the tax was imposed. Well, that is all the worse for my hon. friends; their blood will have to be on their own heads, because they have brought in this tax deliberately, and after hearing the protests that have been made on all sides they are not prepared to yield one iota. They need not be surprised then if events should prove that this was really an act of self destruction on their part. If there was one bit of evidence lacking that this government intended to commit political suicide that evidence is furnished in this tax, because I cannot imagine anything more destructive to them throughout the constituencies than putting into the hands of their opponents a weapon like this to flay them with—and it will be used to the limit; make no mistake about that. The government, through the Minister of Finance, declare their intention of going ahead with this tax and they will have to take the full responsibility for it.

If I rightly understood the minister the other day, the first attempt to impose this tax resulted in a loss of some $2,000,000 out of an estimated revenue of $20,000,000. That is not a good start, and when the officers of the government, after due investigation, suggest a loss of $2,000,000 to the treasury, you may be perfectly sure that it will not be less than that but rather a great deal more. You will find on further investigation that it is likely to be another million. But suppose we put it at $2,000,000; I predict now, notwithstanding that apparently we are approaching the time when we shall have better commodity prices and when people will be able to buy this very necessary foodstuff, sugar, that less sugar will be sold during the next twelve months than has been sold in the past year. Why? Because the commodity has been made artificially dearer. A great many people will not take half a teaspoonful in their cup, and a great many will do without it altogether. I predict a loss not of $2,000,000 but of many more millions in this estimated revenue of $20,000,000 because of the inability of tens of thousands of people to put even a little nibble of sugar in their tea. The hon. member for Red Deer read a communication and I too have received one. It is not under my hand at the moment but I can recite the substance of it. The writer is a lady and she says, "We have been in the habit of having two iced cakes per week, and now we will have only one." There is one instance where the revenue is cut in two, and there are, I believe, tens of thousands such.

Mr. McINTOSH: Following up the remarks of the hon. member for Melville, may I say that the government is creating a piece of fiscal machinery in this sugar tax which will help to grind it to pieces from coast to coast. "The mills of the gods grind slowly but they grind exceeding small," and the government will be exceeding small by the time they meet the opposition which a tax of this kind will arouse from one ocean to the other.

Mr. MORAND: Rather a sweet way of going out.

Mr. McINTOSH: Perhaps so, but bitter for the people taxed. Last night I was making an observation in connection with the sugar tax when the house rose. I said that the liquor tax had been reduced $2 per gallon and the Minister of Finance, in putting forward his point of view with regard to this reduction, said it was made from the standpoint of revenue. He said that a still lower reduction would give a greater return. May I impress upon the Minister of Finance that when the question of reduction is in his mind —I am referring to the reduction of $2 per gallon upon liquor—when he has fiscally dealt with liquor he ought to carry his reductions a little further and cancel this sugar tax. By taking that action I believe the minister would bring credit to his government and to his department. It is a most obnoxious tax and even though the government may be in need of revenue, I, for one, do not believe it is necessary to tax sugar.

Last night I was making an observation in connection with the argument used by the minister to support his two million leakage statement that certain daily newspapers had interpreted ministerial opinion to the extent of saying that a tax would be levied on sugar, tea and coffee, when the budget was brought down. The minister said that the newspapers had not been correct in their prediction with regard to tea and coffee although they had guessed successfully with regard to sugar. The minister referred to the predictions made by the Canadian press with regard to budget taxation and used these to support his argument that the government was not responsible for the leakage. That is one point of view taken by the government with regard to the daily newspapers of Canada. When we were discussing the radio estimates the other night we had an example of another point of view. At that time we were told that as far as the criticism of the daily press in connection with radio estimates was concerned, the press did not know what it was talking about. There we have two points of view, one to the right and one to the left. More than likely the government will be soon taking a third position, a compromise position in regard to the functions of the daily press.

However, I do not imagine it makes much difference to the press whether or not it satisfies the viewpoint of the government in regard to this sugar tax, or whether its constructive criticisms against the radio estimates have been upheld. May I add that it is my deliberate opinion that the daily press is complementary to good government in Canada. We need to have not only the best news service from the press, but we need also editorial opinions. An editorial opinion will help to complete and safeguard the work of self government in Canada. It will make it more efficient and help democracy as we have it in Canada to function more successfully from coast to coast. As far as the government supporting or not supporting the daily press in its opinions is concerned, it matters not. As we said the government will next be occupying a compromise position, a kind of half and half position, a milk and water position or, as has been whispered to me, a mugwump attitude. Whether or not this or any other position is taken, as a newspaper man I say that it does not make very much difference. The press will go on doing its constructive and development work by giving a lead to public opinion thus building up a power throughout the country which will be conducive to good and sound government.

In making this protest against this tax I am supported by practically all the organized bodies of public opinion in my riding. I have received protests from the organized farmers, the organized farm women and other bodies in the Turtleford district, in the Jackfish district, in the North Battleford district in the far north, in Redberry, and other districts throughout my constituency. North Battleford constituency has a population of 53,000, and this tax will mean a tax burden of over $100,000 to that constituency. The city of North Battleford has a population of 6,000, and its sugar tax will represent a payment of $12,000. This is a very heavy tax, and, as I say, the organized men and women of my riding are opposed to it. The mothers in my riding are out and out opposed to this tax. I have had letters from many of them protesting against it. To illustrate, may I state I had a letter from Mrs. Woodward who lives just outside the city of North Battleford. She represents a number of the rural women and she and those associated with her unhesitatingly oppose this tax and asked me to do my part in parliament to have it withdrawn by the government. I therefore protest against the imposition of this sugar tax. The idea of these men and women is that the government could find other means of raising the $20,000,000 required. Luxuries could be taxed more easily than sugar which plays a part in every home in my riding as well as throughout the country.

Further, a depressed period is a very poor period in which to bring forward a tax of this kind. Every family is taxed to its utmost, every mother, father and child is suffering in the depression through which we are passing and they will have to suffer more from day to day because of this tax. As a member from western Canada I again protest against it and I do hope the government will see fit to change the tax.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

THIRD READING

Bill No. 41, to incorporate the Sarnia-Port Huron Vehicular Tunnel Company—Mr. Gray.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. GIROUARD: The Minister of Finance stated last night that his department had investigated the sales of sugar made by every refinery in Canada for the month prior to the delivery of the budget. Would he have any objection to stating to the committee the quantities of sugar that were involved, by which refineries the sugar was sold, and to whom?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry that at the moment I have not the figures here, and whether or not it would be wise to give them to the committee I could not say. They disclose that the amount of purchases of sugar were not as great as popularly supposed. As a matter of fact the estimate which was given to me by the officials of the department was that something less than ten per cent of the yearly consumption was the result of the acceleration of sugar purchases for the month prior to the delivery of the budget. The estimated loss of revenue was something under $2,000,000, and the exact figure now is something less than one and three-quarter million dollars. I could obtain the information for my hon. friend if he so desires.

Mr. DONNELLY: There seems to be an impression that most of these purchases of sugar took place in British Columbia. Was it confined to one district or was it more or less universal throughout the dominion?

Mr. RHODES: I have not the figures before me but I may say that the purchases in the west, in British Columbia, were larger in proportion to those in other portions of the country, and the percentage diminished until it came to the east where the purchases showed the smallest percentage of all.

Mr. MacLEAN: Can the minister state the total amount of money that it is estimated these new taxes will bring in? I do not think any estimate has yet been given except as to the sugar tax.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering the sugar tax.

Mr. MacLEAN: My objection to the sugar tax is that it is an exorbitant tax on the farmer and consumer. Possibly the people were prepared to pay a tax of a quarter or half a cent a pound on their sugar, but when it comes to taxing this one article two cents a pound it is a very heavy tax indeed. Personally I would have not so much objection to these taxes if hon. gentlemen opposite were making what could be reasonably considered a good use of the revenue they collect. Last year and the year before they made an estimate of the amount of revenue to be derived from the new taxes that were imposed, and I think that for the last two years their estimate was that the new taxes would bring in something like $133,000,000. On account of the business of the country falling off the revenue fell short of their estimate. Nevertheless those new taxes were imposed with the idea that they would bring in that much increased revenue. When our friends opposite were on this side of the house they criticized the Liberal government of the day for their expenditures, but if you will look over the expenditures under the present government you will find that notwithstanding that they are not carrying on any public works throughout the country but are allowing wharves and breakwaters, lighthouses and other public works throughout the country to fall into decay, they are still spending more money yearly than the Liberal government spent when they were in power. If you will look over the estimates when the Liberal government were in power you will find that only in one year did they exceed $400,000,000. Their expenditures ran from $370,000,000 to $381,000,000, $351,000,000, $355,000,000, $358,000,000 $378,000,000, $388,000,000, $398,000,000. But what about 1931 and 1932, after this government came into power? In 1931 the expenditures under this government were $440,000,000 and in 1932 $454,000,000, or an increase of $42,000,000 in 1931 under this government over the $398,000,000 spent by the Liberal government, and an increase in 1932 of $56,000,000.

As I said, we would not object to these taxes so much if our friends opposite could show that this extra revenue was being put to a good use. It is true that the government is carrying on some relief work but that cannot account for the tremendous increase in the expenditures especially when public works throughout the country are being neglected to the extent they are.

I wish to protest, Mr. Chairman, as vigorously as I can against this exorbitant tax on sugar. I said at the beginning of my remarks that a tax of a quarter or half a cent, or even one cent a pound, might have been tolerated by the country, but here you are imposing a tax of two cents a pound on a commodity which is the chief article in the manufacture of the products of two or three industries of this country, the candy industry, the biscuit manufacturing industry and the bakeries. It is really singling out these industries for special taxation, as well as the householder, and it is absolutely unfair. I know that the Minister of Finance wants to get revenue, but I think that some other way could have been found, and when that revenue is going to entail the sacrifices that this sugar tax will impose upon the people of this country I hope that our friends opposite will be able to show us next year a better record of expenditure than they have been able to do in the past.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I must express my surprise at some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Prince. He says he would be content that increased taxation should be imposed if he were satisfied that the government were exercising economy, and he goes back to conditions of a few years ago. In the first place let me say to my hon. friend that so far as the estimates of the yield of taxation are concerned they are made under the most hazardous circumstances, so far as regards our being able to predict conditions twelve months ahead, conditions so hazardous as to be without precedent in the history of the world. There is not a single country in the world, not one, in which a chancellor of the exchequer or a minister of finance has been able to make with any degree of accuracy an estimate of the probable yield of a certain set of taxes over a period of twelve months, because of conditions which everybody realizes are abnormal. Our estimates of taxation last year were based upon the best assumption and best hypothesis we could set up at the moment. Nobody could foresee the tremendous shrinkage in business that took place not only in this country but throughout the world, not so much a shrinkage in the volume of business as a shrinkage in the value of commodities.

In his references to expenditures my hon. friend entirely overlooks several factors. In the first place we have to provide deficits and capital moneys for the Canadian National Railways which run into something like $70,000,000 a year. That is a condition which we have to face, not a theory; it is an actual set of facts. If the Canadian National Railways were able to carry on within themselves we would not have to impose one additional cent of taxation this year—not one. My hon. friend overlooks the fact that there are certain statutory increases, for example in the case of old age pensions, which so long as the present legislation remains as it is must be made without any reference whatsoever to the government. We have to meet this year increases of nearly a million dollars—I am using round figures and speaking without notes —because of the increased subsidies due to the provinces arising out of the increased population shown by the last census. We have to meet the interest charges upon the increase in the debt due to the fact that we are not able to pay out of current account not only for unemployment relief but for deficits on the Canadian National Railways. And every time we add to the national debt we add to the interest charge, which is fixed and inescapable.

The hon. member has spoken of possible reduction of expenditure. Again I am compelled to resort to making a statement without having notes before me, but let me say to him that during the last three years this government has reduced controllable expenditures, if in that sum is included the $14,000,000 by which we expect to reduce expenditures this year, by no less a sum than $81,000,000. Furthermore we have been at great pains, so far as the civil service is concerned, without placing any undue strain upon it, to save every possible penny we could. As a result of an order in council passed two years ago we provided that there should be no increases, that statutory salary increases should be abolished, that all positions then vacant should be abolished, that no post would be filled unless cause were shown in the individual case, and that as the attrition took place, which is natural in a civil service numbering at that time about 60,000 people, the vacancies arising through natural causes should not be filled, with the net result that we have reduced the civil service in the past two years by upwards of 4,000 employees, with a consequent saving to the public treasury of some millions of dollars. It may be urged that by more drastic economy we might be able to effect further savings, so far as so-called controllable expenditures are concerned. Let me point out, however, that if we reduced every cent of controllable expenditure, closed up our civil service, dismissed 56,000 employees, paid no members of parliament, judges, or lighthouse keepers, dismissed the mounted police, dismissed the penitentiary staffs—in other words, if we closed up the business of the country, with the commitments which we have undertaken we would still have a deficit this year of $26,000,000. That is to say, if our revenues were equal to those which would be received upon the basis of the taxation imposed by the budget prior to this one, the deficit would be as I have mentioned.

The government would welcome any suggestions my hon. friend cares to offer as to how we might effect further savings. If I were to add together the accumulated demands which are made upon the treasury, not only from outside sources, but by those who are the first to criticize the government because it does not reduce expenditures—and in that I include hon. members of this House of Commons—we would have added each year many millions to national expenditures. The best evidence we can obtain as to what the yield from a given form of taxation may be is from those who have been in the public service for years and have served the country faithfully, men who have had a background of many years of experience; but even the best intentioned officer or the best intentioned Minister of Finance is not a seer. He cannot project his mind into the future and tell exactly what conditions will be. My hon. friend wants to know what these taxations will yield. Our estimate is that altogether they will yield $57,000,000, but that figure will be subject to change, because there have been some variations.

Mr. McINTOSH: That includes $20,000,000 from sugar?

Mr. RHODES: I have given the figure that was in our minds at the time the budget was brought down.

I shall now direct my remarks to the tax on sugar. I know it is not popular; no tax is popular. If there is one thing more than another which strikes me daily it is this, that the people of the country at large have a realization that the government must have additional revenue. Invariably, however, the attitude is this: "We realize you must have additional taxation, but you must get it from somebody else—not from us." The bulk of telegrams I receive, and many of the letters, begin this way—I could read them, almost, with my eyes closed: "We realize that the government must have increased revenue, but you must get it from somebody else." The sugar tax will not be popular; I realize that. It may not be popular even from a political point of view; in fact, we may as well admit frankly that it will not be. But it will have one wholesome effect: It will serve to bring home to the people of this country the fact that the only money the government has to expend is the people's money, and the only money which comes into the treasury is that provided by the people. There are only two sources of revenue for any treasury; one is from the taxes which the people themselves pay, and the other is from borrowings upon which the people themselves must provide the interest through increased taxation. I believe one wholesome and beneficent result of the sugar tax will be to bring home to our people the realization that if they are going to insist upon the government embarking upon expenditures, they must be prepared to pay the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Quebec East realizes it, yes—but the people of the country do not. That is the amazing thing. I have in my mind two resolutions which I received from a board of trade in one of our Canadian towns. The first endorsed the suggestion of the Canadian chamber of commerce to the effect that we should reduce expenditures. The next, if you please, asked us to add a list of commodities to the stabilization fund which would cost Canada several millions of dollars each year. That attitude is more or less common not only in the minds of individuals but throughout organizations. They seem to have the idea—at least some of them—that the government is a thing apart, that we have some sort of golden cornucopia that we can turn over, and from which dollars will spill out. They are now coming to the realization through the sugar tax that the money we spend is the money they provide. I believe in the last analysis this same tax will have a wholesome and beneficent effect upon our people, because it will bring home to them the fact that we spend only their money. As a result of this taxation, and having that fact brought home to them, I am sure they will minimize their requests not only from the federal government—and I speak not of the government of the day but of all governments—but from provincial and municipal bodies. We will not be asked to embark upon such great expenditures, and our people will cooperate to the point where we shall be able to live within our means. The sooner that condition is brought about the better for all concerned.

Mr. MacLEAN: Just a word in reply to my hon. friend; his remarks seemed to be directed to this corner of the house. He started off by telling us that the government's difficulties are due largely to the condition of the Canadian railways. No one should realize more than the Minister of Finance that the policy of the present government has been largely instrumental in bringing about that condition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Rot.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. MacLEAN: Those who listened to Sir Arthur Salter's address to-day heard him say that one of the conditions that made for increasing revenue was the expansion of trade between different countries. The moment you put tariffs up to a prohibitive point you stop importations and lose revenue.

Mr. SPENCE: That is the old line.

Mr. MacLEAN: I know our friends do not like that; they did not like to hear it in the parliamentary restaurant to-day and they do not like it now, because it is such a vital truth and they realize it. But that is one of the factors that brought about the situation that made it necessary to increase taxation. The hon. minister says that the estimate is that this year's new taxes will bring in $57,000,000 of new money. Add that to the $133,000,000 estimated for the two preceding years, and you have a total of $190,000,000 of new taxation that the people of this country have been forced to pay under the present administration.

My hon. friend says: Show me where we can reduce expenditures. I say to the minister, let him show us where the extra $56,000,000 of expenditure went last year.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think we are on resolution No. 9.

Mr. MacLEAN: Yes, we are dealing with the sugar question. It involves the whole question of the revenue of this country. Taxation is what we are dealing with.

The CHAIRMAN: No, a special article of taxation; otherwise we could discuss the whole budget.

Mr. CASGRAIN: So we can.

Mr. MacLEAN: My hon. friend referred to old age pensions. He is an astute politician; he knows very well that the previous government had to carry those same burdens. They had the old age pensions; they had the railway situation; they had subsidies for the different provinces; they had the civil service situation to deal with. Let me say to my hon. friend that they are creating a situation in the civil service of Canada that is going to be very difficult for themselves or any other government to adjust. The matter of the yearly increases is going to be left in a dreadful position for some government to deal with when the time arrives. It will not be long before the civil service will demand some settlement of that question; either that they are not to get the increases, or that the increases are to be paid.

My hon. friend says that vacancies are not being filled. I will tell you what they are doing; I had personal contact with the matter in my own county. The commission told me that a position had been abolished, but the department proceeded to appoint a man temporarily to the position, without reference to the commission.

The CHAIRMAN: I must call the hon. member to order. He is not discussing the resolution before the committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That seems to hurt hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MacLEAN: Well, Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that I feel that this sugar tax is striking at particular industries which are singled out for attack. In 1930 it was a case of "I will;" now my hon. friend says he hopes and hopes and hopes. We can call this a "we hope" government. They have been hoping and hoping that this and that is going to happen to pull them out of their difficulties for the last number of years. I hope their faith will continue, but they will go down in history as the "we hope" government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just a word in answer to the statement of my hon. friend the minister that this tax would impress upon the people of this country the fact that the burden of taxation rested upon them. I think on mature consideration he will realize that that statement was unnecessary. Coming from a section of the country in which the people have been accustomed to bear their fair share of the burden of taxation, I want to say that it was not necessary to impose any further taxes to impress upon them that they are bearing a great burden of taxation at the present time. In the last couple of years particularly it has become so great that many of the best people in various walks of life, people who were comparatively independent a few years ago, are now considering very seriously the question whether or not they will be able to continue.

Mr. SHORT: That was caused not by taxation but by speculation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Your government speculated on the good faith of the people.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend chooses to speak of something with which he is perhaps more familiar than are some other hon. members of this house. Speculation is something about which I know very little, and I would not attempt to set my opinion against that of my hon. friend in that respect. But in regard to the burden of taxation resting upon the people of this country I regret to say I know altogether too much. In the last three years I have had more people than ever before come to discuss with me the question how they are going to get money to pay their taxes, to pay perhaps a small judgment that has been obtained against them, people who never knew before what it was to be sued. To-day a large percentage of the people of this country are considering very seriously whether or not they shall go into bankruptcy, a much larger percentage than was ever before so situated. It is obvious, therefore, that the people need no additional taxation to impress upon them the fact that it is they who pay the taxes.

This tax on sugar should not have been made as heavy as it is. Two cents a pound on a commodity that has to be used in substantial quantities in every home in the country is an enormous burden upon the people, many of whom are now suffering under burdens greater than they can bear. Many of the best farmers in this country will have to go out of business within the next year because of their inability to pay the taxes that have been imposed upon them.

Mr. BOWMAN: Not by this government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think, in common with my hon. friend the member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), that the government should still consider whether it is fair to the common people to impose this heavy tax upon them. The minister should seriously consider reducing it by half. I do not think the minister realizes how great a burden it is. I thought he realized it until he said what he did a short time ago about its being necessary to school the people to the fact that they are having to bear heavy taxation. I would say to the minister that during the past two years the people have been sufficiently schooled and tried in the fire of affliction to need no further demonstration of that fact.

Mr. RHODES: Just a word in reply to my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). He comes from a very beautiful district, populated by people who in normal times are prosperous. It is a highly developed portion of the country, and what he says with respect to his knowledge of the people in his district I accept without reserve. When I made the statement that this tax would bring home to the people at large the fact that they were the taxpayers I did not for a moment wish my hon. friend to assume that this was the only reason for the imposition of the tax. Not at all; I merely referred to that in passing as an incidental benefit which ultimately might become a very great benefit not only to the people themselves but to the governments of Canada, provincial and municipal as well as federal. Let me say to my hon. friend that while I know he can speak for those whom he represents there are thousands and tens of thousands of people in Canada who have never properly come to the realization of the fact that government money is their money. Even to this day my correspondence discloses that fact, and it only supports what has been my experience in public affairs for the last twenty-five years. But when I made that statement I do not want the thought to prevail upon the committee that this was the reason for the imposition of the tax.

My hon. friend has suggested that the tax should be reduced. If we reduce this tax we must make up an additional sum by some other form of taxation, so ultimately it comes back to the people themselves. If we realize the full yield of all the taxes we are imposing we will barely meet our expenditures upon current account alone. We cannot possibly do less and preserve our national credit. I realize just as well as my hon. friend does how hard conditions are to-day and how dire is the necessity with respect not only to families but also individuals, and I repeat what I have said on other occasions, that it is to be regretted that during a period in our history when people can least afford to pay taxes, because of the very conditions existing at the moment they are called upon to bear a heavier burden. That is a tragedy, but any government so weak as not to face the situation and maintain the national credit would bring about a condition which ultimately would result in a cost to the people themselves far greater than is involved even in this sugar tax.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not want to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily, but in answer to my hon. friend might I suggest that the class of people to whom he refers, who do not yet realize that all taxation bears upon the people themselves, are those to whom he should look for the additional revenue which he now requires. I have no doubt that in this country there are many people to whom that fact has not come home as intimately as it has come home to the great masses of the people upon whom this tax will bear. So I say to the minister that if this is the fact—and the minister knows it better perhaps than anyone else in this house—then I suggest that he should cut off half this tax on sugar and make up that amount by a further tax upon the people who have not yet realized that there is heavy taxation in this country. I believe there is a class of people who could stand the burden better, while the people upon whom this tax will bear cannot stand further taxation than they have been carrying during the last few years.

I hope the committee will not think for a moment that I do not realize the difficulties confronting the Minister of Finance; I do believe that we must endeavour to balance the budget as nearly as possible. I agree with the hon. member for Prince that every expenditure that can be avoided should be avoided at the present time, but I urge this suggestion upon the minister, particularly in view of what he has said because I believe he knows and has studied conditions very seriously. I believe there are many people in this country, the people to whom he has referred, upon whom the burden of taxation has not rested as heavily as this taxation will rest upon the great mass of the people, and I suggest that the minister see if he cannot impose additional taxation upon those people and so relieve those upon whom this tax on sugar will bear most heavily.

Mr. EULER: I think anyone who wishes to be reasonable must appreciate the plight in which the Minister of Finance finds himself in trying to raise revenue. I have a good deal of sympathy with what he says in regard to the demands made by boards of trade and others that he balance his budget by eliminating further expenditures. I quite agree with the minister when he says that even if he should cut out all the so-called controllable expenditures he would still have a deficit of from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000; I think that is quite true. I believe it is also true that some further savings could be made in what are known as our controllable expenditures, but those savings would not be sufficient to balance the budget. I have no doubt that even the present budget will result in a deficit next year of perhaps from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000. The lesson I think we might learn from that—and I think the government, parliament and the country will have to learn it—is that some or at least one of the large items which we now regard as uncontrollable must be made controllable. I am now referring to the national debt, and the interest we must pay upon it. Perhaps I am uttering a heresy when I make that statement, but I believe that by some means or other, legislative or otherwise, we will have to come to the point where interest, not only upon the national debt but upon municipal and provincial and perhaps other debts will have to be reduced.

Now I come to the question of sugar. I think by this time the minister is convinced that this is not a popular tax; it strikes at everyone in the country.

Mr. RHODES: Can my hon. friend name a popular tax?

Mr. EULER: No, and I shall not attempt to do so, but I think I can suggest how this may be made a little less unpopular. The Minister of Finance gave as practically the only reason for imposing this heavy tax on sugar the fact that he needs money, and that is a very good reason. But I do not think the hon. gentleman was quite fair to himself or to the people when he rather made the suggestion that it was also a good thing in that it would impress upon people the fact that taxes must be paid. I particularly disliked the veiled reference—I think that is what it was—to the effect that this tax on sugar must be imposed because of the deficits on the national railways and the disadvantages of public ownership. If I am wrong in my understanding I am ready to accept the minister's denial, but it did seem to me that this suggestion ran through his remarks in that connection. While it is necessary for the minister to impose heavy taxes I think the principle must appeal to him and to everyone else that while they must be heavy they should be made as equitable and fair as possible, and that they should not rest too heavily upon any particular class in the community. This tax of two cents on sugar amounts to practically fifty per cent of the value of the article, a very heavy tax indeed; it strikes at everybody, and this is an article of food. I think it is very regrettable, though perhaps in some degree necessary, that we should have taxation on food. Perhaps the minister is right when he says that if we suggest that this tax should be cut out we should make some suggestion as to how that money should be made up, and the minister intimated that it would be necessary to impose some other tax. There is still another possibility, and perhaps when I make this suggestion I may incur the displeasure of some of my hon. friends on this side of the house. I would suggest to the minister that it would be fairer to cut this sugar tax in half and wipe out what is known as the stabilization fund, which I consider absolutely wrong in principle and discriminating in favour of only a few commodities and a few people. I think if we took off one cent of the tax on sugar, leaving it at one cent a pound, and did away with the stabilization fund it would be more popular and more just and equitable to the people of this country.

That is my criticism of the sugar tax, Mr. Chairman. Now I should like to say a word or two on behalf of some industries to which the hon. member for Prince referred. Let us take for instance confectioners, those who make candies and so on. These may be regarded as luxuries, and perhaps those who manufacture them will not therefore receive much sympathy with regard to the tax on sugar. But this represents a very heavy item of expense to them; I think they have made certain representations to the government and perhaps to the minister with regard to this tax. I have some sympathy with them. They have a pretty difficult situation to deal with just now because they are practically all in the red. But what concerns me particularly now is this. The minister originally placed a tax of two cents a pound on sugar and by his amendment he has put the tax on another raw material in the form of glucose. I wonder whether he is trying to punish people for having the temerity to come and plead for a reduction in the sugar tax. Is he going to punish them by placing a tax on glucose, adding another burden to an industry which is already overburdened?

Mr. RHODES: Whatever my weaknesses may be, and I am the first to admit that I have many, vindictiveness is not one of them

Mr. EULER: I don't believe it is either; I do not seriously attribute vindictiveness to him.

Mr. RHODES: Taking the confectionery business by and large, two cents a pound on sugar will have a comparatively trifling effect on the cost of confectionery. The difficulty in which that industry finds itself to-day is the difficulty that faces many other industries. It is not a question of the amount of tax imposed on sugar or on some other commodity which the industry uses, but the fact that the purchasing power of the people has been very much reduced, and naturally the first commodity to be affected is what may be termed a luxury. It is true that confectionery is in a sense a food; nevertheless it is classed, and I think properly so, amongst the luxuries. We all know that in more prosperous times, when people have plenty of money, industries such as the manufacture of confectionery flourish. While it may be true that the confectionery industry is, as my hon. friend observes, operating in the red to-day, I can point to industry after industry not only in this but in other countries—essential, basic industries, not including agriculture but purely manufacturing industries—which are also operating in the red. But they, along with everyone else, as a result of taxation imposed in various forms, will be called upon to bear an additional burden. One would imagine that this tax was going to be paid by the individual householder. One of the advantages of the sugar tax, however, is this, that its cost of collection is nil. It is paid by six refineries in Canada, and the amount of sugar which goes into household consumption is only a fraction of the total quantity of the commodity used. The bulk of the sugar used goes into industry and will be absorbed in the cost of commodities manufactured from sugar. It is true that in households where there are large numbers of mouths to be fed, the tax will be an appreciable one; but I submit that as conditions improve it will be found to be a tax which can be borne more easily by the mass of the people than any similar tax I know of. This type of tax is perhaps new in Canada, but not in other countries, where there have been comparable taxes for years. In the mother country for example they tax essentials highly. Tea, throughout the years, has paid enormous taxation, and it may be considered almost as essential a commodity as sugar. The tax is purely a revenue tax, and I know of no other tax that can be borne more equitably by the people as a whole than this one.

With regard to the remarks of my hon. friend opposite who referred to what I had said about bringing home to the people the fact that they are taxpayers, I am afraid he had in mind something entirely different from what I intended. I did not refer to that mythical individual who is supposed to be the rich man; I am prepared to discuss the question of taxation as applicable to him so far as income tax is concerned. That, however, was not the class of people to whom I referred, but the great bulk of the people who heretofore have paid no taxes at all so far as thy knew. Their taxes have been in the great majority of cases indirect, and this is the first time that direct taxation at the instance of the federal government has been brought home to the individual. The individual I had in mind was not the really wealthy man or the man of reputed wealth, but the common, everyday citizen of the country.

Miss MACPHAIL: I felt like speaking on the budget if for no other reason than to protest against this tax on sugar, and as I did not say anything then I will discuss the matter now. Sugar, it seems to me, is one of the last things that should be taxed, and particularly so steeply. Two dollars on a hundredweight is a very high tax to poor people. It is not much to people in good circumstances, I admit, and I am not concerned about them; but it undoubtedly is a severe tax to people who are struggling to make ends meet. I am thinking now of the country woman—the woman who goes out with her children, assisted on rainy days by her husband, and with great labour gathers berries and fruit, either wild or growing in her own garden, and preserves them to carry the family through the winter. I fancy the Minister of Finance has little idea how hard this tax will hit such people.

From the point of view of general business, the tax will also be quite injurious in my opinion. I belive I am safe in saying that infifty per cent of the homes in Canada, and possibly a larger number than that, the two dollars that will go to pay this tax would have been spent on some article very much needed for the family. People of moderate means have only a certain amount of money to spend, and the money that will be withdrawn from other purchases in order to pay this tax will mean that the retailer will sell less, the manufacturer will not manufacture, and the labourer will not work to the extent represented by that two dollars. Multiply the two by the fifty or sixty per cent of the homes in Canada that will be affected, and I think it is fair to say that this tax will definitely aggravate the depression and result in increased unemployment.

Most of the sugar used in the country, the Minister of Finance said, is used in industry. Let me point out to him, however, that even if it is used in industry it means an added cost to the consumer; it increases the cost of every article in which sugar is used and the general public will pay the difference. There is little doubt about that. It therefore makes little difference whether the bulk of the sugar is used in the homes of the country or in industry; the result will be the same to the consumer: he will pay the tax.

There are two or three ways in which the amount which it is expected that this tax will bring into the treasury might be secured. One method would be to continue the increase in the income tax, carrying the increase on into the higher income. I see no reason why people with very large incomes should be let off easily; I do not see why they should be treated better than those who have moderate incomes. Again, the agricultural stabilization fund will cost the government a good deal of money, although in my opinion it is one of the most needless things suggested. I say this because, had the government inflated Canadian currency sufficiently to bring the Canadian dollar on a parity with the pound sterling, the agricultural stabilization fund would not have been found necessary and we could have thus avoided the tax on sugar.

In my opinion the whole business of taxing consumption more and more must cease, because the problem to-day is to increase consumption. The more goods that are consumed the better from every point of view. Obviously therefore this tax is in every sense unwise. It taxes one of the most essential articles in every household. It is a tax that will bear heavily on the mothers of this nation, who are trying to give their children nourishing food. I think it is more to be condemned than any tax which has been brought down, and I oppose it entirely.

Mr. DONNELLY: The Minister of Finance, in referring to this tax, said that it would have a salutary effect upon the people of the country in teaching them that the money which the government spends is their money and must be collected from them. He said that the people throughout the country had the idea that the government had an unknown source of revenue. If the people do think that, the government have no one to blame but themselves. Before the last elections the present Prime Minister went from coast to coast and told the people that if unemployment existed it was due to the Liberal government; that if they were getting small prices for their wheat, their butter, their bacon and a hundred and one other things, it was the fault of the Liberal government. He asked the people to put him in power and then there would be no more hard times. The people cannot be blamed if they think that this government have all sorts of money, and they cannot understand why it is necessary to tax them.

Let me say to the government that the people of this country know full well what it is to be taxed. The price of gasoline throughout the world is in the same position to-day as the price of sugar, the price of wheat and the price of other commodities—it is cheaper than it ever has been. In spite of this, the government has made the people of Canada pay from five to six cents per gallon more than they should have to pay. In 1931 the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, along with all other gasoline companies, had a loss on their operations while the Imperial Oil Company, which handled about 300,000,000 gallons, made a profit of $18,000,000. The other oil companies in Canada must have handled about 300,000,000 more gallons of gasoline and must have made another $18,000,000. Thirty-six million dollars were taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada. Why does not the government take off the duty on gasoline and put on a sales tax of about three or four cents per gallon? They could make $20,000,000 and the people would not have to pay as much for their gasoline. The government will be making the money instead of the oil companies which send it down to the shareholders in the United States. The Imperial Oil Company sent $12,800,000 to the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. That is not red-blooded Canadianism. The Canadian people were taxed in order that the American shareholders in Imperial Oil might be paid. Why not tax gasoline and collect the money instead of having it go to the shareholders of the Imperial Oil Company and other oil companies throughout the country?

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Prince and referred to by the Minister of Finance. Apparently for the moment the minister lost his usual suavity; he seemed to be nettled by what had been said, particularly with regard to expenditures. The minister repeated the argument which he made in his reply a short time ago to the Canadian chambers of commerce when he indicated that the government had practised all possible economy. I shall not go into this to-night except to remind the minister and the committee that a very important and well recognized organ, a supporter of this government, took distinct issue with the minister on the very figures he mentioned to-night and on the argument he made. The Montreal Gazette of April 26 has an editorial headed, Finance Minister's Reply. After discussing what the minister had said, the editorial continued:

> With all due respect to the minister, this conclusion is not justified by the facts which he presents. The substance of the case as presented in this circular letter had already been published in one or two newspapers. The Gazette discussed them at the time. It was stated then, and is no less true now, that no critic of the government desires to withhold credit for economies actually effected. The government has gone a considerable distance in this direction and the taxpayer has not been indifferent to the results achieved. Unfortunately, however, all this is very much beside the point. The representations made by the Canadian chamber of commerce, by boards of trade, and others, have to do, not with what the government has accomplished, but with what it has left undone. The fact that notwithstanding the reductions in expenditures already made the government has presented a bill to the people for another $70,000,000 has had the very natural effect of directing attention to the possibilities of further retrenchment and the opportunities in this respect have been indicated specifically.

The editorial concludes:

It is apparent that the additional sum which the public are being required to supply could be reduced very substantially, and so long as this condition exists there is bound to be a great deal of public dissatisfaction and resentment, particularly when the taxpayer comes to realize that he is bearing a considerable part of this new taxation in order that the government may enjoy a peaceful administrative environment.

I think that is answer enough to the Minister of Finance on the matter of economy. A very important supporter of this government considers that the government has not gone as far as it might have gone in the matter of economy. My hon. friend referred to controllable and uncontrollable expenditures. I find that in 1930 the expenditures outside of railways were $357,000,000 while in 1934, with export trade down by half, the expenditures were $355,000,000. The expenditures are but $2,000,000 less when the only additional items are interest and relief.

Mr. RHODES: Canadian National.

Mr. RALSTON: The Canadian National was included—

Mr. RHODES: Subsidies and pensions.

Mr. RALSTON: —in 1930 as well as 1934. It seems to me that the minister can hardly say that he has practised all the economy he should have practised in these hard times. He now proposes to impose this tax. My hon. friend referred to controllable expenditure but I direct his attention to the fact that between 1930 and 1934 interest charges increased by $20,000,000 because of the deficits incurred by this government. Last year this government showed a deficit of $102,000,000 on accounts outside of Canadian National. During the past three years there has been a total deficit of over $400,000,000 and yet this government has had the temerity to write to the province of Manitoba to tell them that they had better balance their budget, or come within $1,000,000 of doing so, or they would get no assistance. With all due respect to the government, that seems to be to be like satan rebuking sin. I submit that there is yet much to be done in the way of economies.

My hon. friend may speak of economies, but I contend that there is nothing in the estimates which have been placed before us to indicate that the government are properly seized of the seriousness of the situation and of the necessity for retrenchment. The government apparently finds it much easier to impose a two cent tax on sugar, a tax upon people who are not here to speak for themselves and who have not asked this government for anything. The people in the most humble and ordinary circumstances are having it brought home to them with a vengeance. It is on behalf of these people that hon. members are speaking to-night. They are not necessarily speaking on behalf of the well to do, who are getting some benefit from government and are able to bear the burden of taxation; they are speaking on behalf of the people who have not asked this government for anything but who are now being asked to contribute by means of this particular tax an average of something like $2 per head. I say to my hon. friend that he would be well advised to canvass the situation and to endeavour to see if it is not possible to produce further economies. If a tax of this kind is to be imposed on the poor people of this country I submit that the suggestion made by my hon. friend from West Middlesex is worth while considering, namely, that the tax should be cut in half.

While I am on my feet let me say that this is not the only tax that strikes at the masses of the people, because when we come to the sales tax the food of the people, which is now exempt from the sales tax, has to bear a six per cent tax which the masses of the people have never paid before.

One thing further. My hon. friend says that some people have never paid taxes before, but everybody has at least paid the one cent tax on postage. Everybody who posts a letter has done that, and it does not require any two cent tax on sugar to convince the people of this country that times are hard and that they are having to pay the piper.

Mr. RHODES: If only for old times sake I must say a word in reply to my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth. If one thing more than another characterizes him it is his ability as a special pleader. He can spin a longer thread out of less material than any man I know of. If I were to pick a flaw in what he has just said, I would say that he must find himself sadly in need of material when he has to found his argument upon an editorial contained in the Montreal Gazette. I have heard of scrapbook oratory and scrapbook orators, but never did I think my hon. friend would resort to basing his argument upon an editorial in the Montreal Gazette. When he refers to the Montreal Gazette as a supporter of this government I can only say to him; God deliver us from our friends. I am willing to have the accuracy and the value of that editorial judged by an analysis of the statements of facts which it contains, one of which was quoted by my hon. friend. Quoting the editorial he says that the government has presented the people with a bill of $70,000,000, and my hon. friend says yes to that. He is wrong to the extent of $14,000,000. We are taxing the people only $57,000,000. The other $14,000,000 deficit was to be made up by a further reduction in the estimates already voted by this house.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said that it was only an estimate.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is back now at his special pleading.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. RHODES: Oh yes, he is.

Mr. RALSTON: Be fair.

Mr. RHODES: The $14,000,000 is the amount we reduced the expenditures by as contained in the votes in the estimates. The tax bills are $57,000,000. So my hon. friend in quoting the editorial was wrong only by a matter of some $14,000,000.

Mr. SPOTTON: That is not much!

Mr. RALSTON: Did I not understand my hon. friend to say that the $57,000,000 was purely an estimate and that he was not able to say just what the taxes would produce?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is quibbling again.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend say that?

Mr. RHODES: I listened to my hon. friend without a single interruption and he will have an opportunity to reply to me if he so desires. I hope he will at least do me the courtesy to hear me for a few minutes. I was dealing with his citation of a bill for $70,000,000, and I said that $57,000,000 was the bill and $14,000,000 was the savings, and both were estimates, of course. They could not be anything else because there are twelve months in the fiscal year and we are only in the second month of the fiscal year, and so my hon. friend must be patient for ten months more.

My hon. friend ought to know me well enough to know that I did not show any petulance in replying to my hon. friend from Prince. If I speak sometimes with earnestness, possibly with vehemence, I hope that he will not for one moment think I was imparting any degree of acrimony to the discussion. That is furthest from my thoughts. I say that one of the features that caused me to speak with more earnestness than usual was this fact, that it does not help the taxpayer of this country who is called upon to pay taxes, sometimes under extreme difficulty, to be told that he is called upon to pay taxes because the government has been extravagant. When my hon. friend speaks of satan rebuking sin, let me say to him that that citation comes home to him and his associates with singular appropriateness when I point out to him that the major expenditures which have been made by this government have been on account of obligations inherited from the government of which he was a member. At a later stage, if not at this session, at an early stage of the next, I shall give figures to the people of this country indicating that we inherited obligations incurred by our predecessors to no less a sum than upwards of $200,000,000, and we are now called upon as a government to meet these obligations lightly incurred by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is only a day or so ago that we had to meet an obligation in connection with the guarantee of the Montreal harbour bridge, which cost approximately $200,000, and in the last year and a half between one and two million dollars on that account alone this government has been obligated to expend. I could cite case after case, and when we do meet a bill on account of an obligation incurred by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, they blame the extravagance of this government. I have used an illustration before but never in this house, but I cannot resist the temptation to do so now. When hon. gentlemen find fault with this administration for their expenditures they remind me of the young man who murdered his father and mother and who pleaded for the clemency of the court on the ground that he was an orphan. As a government we meet the obligations incurred by our predecessors, and then when we pay the bills we are accused of being spendthrifts. This is hardly the time or place to enter into a prolonged discussion of that character, but my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth certainly gave me cause to depart a little from the estimate before us, and I must apologize to you, Mr. Chairman, but I do think that the committee will admit that I had at least some provocation.

Mr. RALSTON: I just want to give the committee and my hon. friend this one citation. He speaks of the $70,000,000. I know he does not intend to mislead the committee, notwithstanding that he is both vehement and a little petulant, if he will permit me to say so.

Mr. RHODES: Not a bit.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, not quite so suave as usual. My hon. friend says that the $70,000,000 was $14,000,000 out. I read from my hon. friend's budget speech to find out how much money he was going to raise by taxation, how much the bill was which he was presenting to the people of Canada. This is what he says in his budget speech, at page 3223 of Hansard:

After making allowance for this estimated reduction of $14,000,000—

That is what he spoke of a moment ago:

—ordinary expenditures will be approximately $68,000,000 in excess of revenues estimated on present rates and yield. Accordingly it is proposed to recommend measures which will, it is anticipated, produce at least $70,000,000 on the basis of present business conditions, leaving a surplus of $2,000,000.

I leave it to the judgment of the house and the country which is correct, my hon. friend or the Montreal Gazette and myself in saying that my hon. friend is presenting a bill for $70,000,000.

Mr. RHODES: And one of the measures proposed was a saving of $14,000,000. That is the answer.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no. You say in your budget speech, "after making allowance" for that.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, as representative of the thickly populated riding of St. Denis, I wish, on behalf of my constituents, to protest against the two cents sugar tax. By levying this impost the government has once more given proof that it has greater consideration for the wealthy than for the poor. The time is ill chosen to levy such a tax when there are 1,300,000 unemployed in this country, who find it impossible to earn a livelihood or obtain sufficient fuel to keep themselves warm during the cold winter season.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) replied to the hon. member for Shelbourne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that the government had levied this tax to meet the extravagant expenditure of the late regime. To illustrate his point, he mentioned the construction of the Montreal harbour bridge. It would have been more to the point had he alluded to the $2,000,000 that the government expended to complete the Welland canal, and this without authorization, unless it be that of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

I think that under the circumstances, the hon. minister should have sought eleswhere the funds necessary to balance the deficits of the present administration. The tax on numerous articles of luxury could have been increased without unnecessarily burdening the poorer classes of ratepayers. I therefore wish to strongly protest against such taxation because it affects the unemployed who cannot afford at present to pay 2 cents more on the sugar they need. Those who still possess wealth could well afford a tax increase on articles of luxury such, for instance, as diamonds, jewels of all kinds, pianos, expensive furniture and chocolates. The tax could have been increased on numerous manufactured products such as aeroplanes and automobiles without ever affecting the consumer or the unemployed. I thought that in view of the many protests coming from all parts of the country, especially from the humble, the small wage earners and unemployed, the government would have acquiesced in the view of these people and dropped this tax. Such an act would have gained for them new followers; and they need them, because the government have given proof to-day that their policy is to destroy rather than construct.

Mr. MALCOLM: I had not intended to make any further observations concerning the two cent tax on sugar, but I cannot let the remarks of the Minister of Finance in reply to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth go without a word in reply. Undoubtedly the minister deserves the sympathy of the people of Canada. He states he is a victim of a set of world conditions; he is also the victim of a mistaken policy. The minister said that we did not help the taxpayer by saying the government was extravagant. I say to the minister we are not telling the public that the government is extravagant; we are telling the government. By making such demands on the government to reduce their budget we are trying to help the taxpayer. Any references from this side of the house to the extravagance of the present administration are made for one definite purpose, namely to have the government realize that in this time of stress, whether it be due to world conditions or to mistaken policy, the government has exactly the same obligations as those which rest upon every business in Canada, namely to trim its sails according to the wind it is facing. The government cannot ride the gale with the amount of canvas they are carrying, they will flounder in the trough in the sea and be lost.

I know the Minister of Finance would not dare to say, nor would any hon. member in the house, that the cost of the administration of any government in Canada, whether it be municipal, provincial or federal, has been reduced to one-quarter the extent that costs in private business have been reduced. There is nothing comparable in the history of this dominion to the reductions in overhead costs which have been practised in private business in Canada. The reduction in the cost of administering the federal government has been so slight as to be almost unobservable.

Only a few evenings ago when the estimates for the Department of Trade and Commerce were before the committee I pointed out that on steamship services for the carriage of mail which in 1929 used to cost this dominion $530,000 a year, this government is deliberately paying on the Atlantic and Pacific services $1,200,000 a year, or an excess cost of $700,000, an increased expenditure which is absolutely unjustifiable and for which no excuse can be offered, with the exception that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that a very superior type of service was given and that the boats could not maintain the service without government help. I say to the Minister of Finance that if he will search his estimates he will find very little evidence of a sincere desire on the part of his colleagues substantially to reduce expenditures.

May I refer to another item which appeared in the estimates. The research council, which was started some years ago, was given a building in which to carry on and to coordinate all research activities of federal departments. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce supported the idea of consolidating research work. The Prime Minister took a similar attitude. Yet to-day in this city of Ottawa, with the research building completed and with every opportunity to consolidate research activities we have deputy ministers refusing to get together for the purposes of consolidation when by such action they could save millions of dollars. I defy any man in the house to tell me that there has been a sincere effort to coordinate the research of the various departments of government. There are thirty-four separate laboratories in the city of Ottawa which should all be consolidated, now that the premises are available. The Minister of Finance knows this, as does the Prime Minister. All along the line in departmental work the deputy ministers are controlling the situation, and are not allowing the government to reduce expenditures as is being done in private business. We have come to the point in Canada where we ought to listen to the remarks of the senior member of the house, the hon. member for Bonaventure. We have come to the point where ministers of the crown do not control the situation. Between the Civil Service Commission and other organizations we are fast becoming the victims of a bureaucracy. Unless we give the ministers the right to control their departments and to reduce expenditures as they think they should be reduced, the Minister of Finance will have a mighty sorry task trying to meet the fixed expenditures of the country.

We quite admit that $20,000,000 taken from the pockets of the people by a tax on sugar is a very unpopular tax. The minister says he knows it, but that it is done from necessity. I want to join with my hon. friend from North Waterloo in saying that a man who received five dollars from the Minister of Finance in 1926, 1927 or 1928 for interest on a $100 bond could buy with that five dollars about four bushels of wheat. He could not then buy 120 pounds of sugar or ten bushels of wheat as he can to-day. If the minister and the government present the argument that they are facing the worst economic condition the world has ever seen and that because of that widespread condition they are obliged to take this course, then I say that the very seriousness of the situation demands serious remedies. I do not think it is right to ask the common people of this country, whose earnings have been reduced, to pay a tax on sugar to the extent of $8 or $10 a family. I do not think it is right to ask industries, practically all of which are in the red and have lost their reserves, to pay higher corporation taxes which they cannot earn, while at the same time men who never at any time expected to get such enormous returns in purchasing power from interest on their bonds are permitted to get those returns at the expense of people who have no money. The time has come when I believe some very drastic step has to be taken to produce what my friend from Vancouver Centre calls equality of sacrifice. The biggest load we have to carry is our bond interest. Wages, pensions, interest on public debt—all these things if they have to be reduced should be reduced together. It is not good enough to cut pensions and cut wages and at the same time allow the holders of $2,500,000,000 in bonds to get a return on their money altogether out of proportion in value to that received in 1928.

I want to say another word to the Minister of Finance in connection with his claim that he has reduced expenditure. So long as this rate of expenditure is maintained, without the large revenues which we had in 1928-29 when times were good, so long will the minister have to face intense criticism on account of the fact that some of the wealthiest people in this country—not ordinary business men but men of great wealth—have gathered in tax free bonds which were not originally bought with the idea of evading income taxes. When this nation was appealed to by Sir Thomas White, the then Minister of Finance, for money to carry on the war, it responded patriotically. These bonds were purchased and held widely by the people of Canada. They are not held widely to-day, as the Minister of Finance knows. They are held within very narrow limits, by banks, insurance companies, bond companies, trust companies, and by a few very wealthy individuals.

Mr. POULIOT: Lord Bacon!

Mr. MALCOLM: The treasury is losing by the tax free provision on these bonds a great deal more money per year in income tax than will be taken from the people by the tax on sugar. The Prime Minister has spoken of the sacredness of contracts. I do not know how sacred a contract is that exempts a man from paying his fair share of taxation in a time of national crisis—

Mr. POULIOT: It is immoral.

Mr. MALCOLM: Personally it is not sacred to me at all.

I notice a big change in the attitude of the government, if the Ottawa Citizen is to be believed. A few days ago in this house I suggested to the Minister of Finance that so far as our internal currency is concerned, if properly controlled it would have no bearing whatever upon our exchange; that if by statutory enactment the government wished to issue on a redeemable plan a given quantity of currency for the construction of public buildings, it could do so, and in ten years' time pay for the building at just half the cost that would have to be paid if bonds were issued at five per cent. My friend from North Waterloo supported the idea. Then we listened to a long lecture from the Prime Minister to prove that it would destroy the stability of our money. I want to be helpful to the Minister of Finance, and if I may be pardoned for taking the time of the committee I would like to say this: there should be two kinds of currency. The rate of exchange on Canadian money is affected by every demand for Canadian dollars that comes from the outside and every demand for American dollars which comes from within. Our exchange is not affected one particle if we have an adverse balance of $200,000,000 a year with the United States provided we have against that a favourable balance with some other country which pays its debts through New York. In considering foreign exchange one has to take into consideration every item that is cleared through New York banks. We are debited with the interest we owe on our bonds and with everything we owe there. We are credited with the money we borrow, with the returns from our trade, whether it be from Japan, Peru, Bolivia or Spain; the sum total of our favourable trade balance clears through New York because New York is our banking centre and our exchange is governed, as a commodity would be, by the demand for Canadian dollars and the demand for American dollars. We have at the moment a favourable trade balance, but we are not borrowing money in New York. If we were our exchange would improve. Apart from that, however, I submit to the Minister of Finance that although bankers will tell him that any issue of currency within this dominion will adversely affect exchange, there is no logical reason why it should. When the Prime Minister inflated last year to the extent of $35,000,000 it did temporarily affect the rate of exchange. But when it becomes understood that this currency is issued on a solid basis of statutory enactment, with provision for the redemption and cancellation of that currency, just the same as if a sinking fund were created to retire bonds, there should be no influence whatever upon our exchange in the New York market. By such an issue of currency the Minister of Finance will take from the people of the country in taxes just half the amount of money that he would take if he issued bonds and paid five per cent on them for a period of twenty years. The thing that amazes me is that in the Citizen to-night I see a headline indicating that the suggestion which we made a few days ago and which the Prime Minister characterized as so impossible has actually been adopted. If that drastic step is being taken I say to the Minister of Finance and to the government that I admire them for taking it. I admire them for accepting a broader policy, probably a little more liberal policy, in order to try to correct the situation from which the taxpayers suffer.

I appeal to the Finance minister to take a strong stand with regard to the enormous interest charges which we are paying on the tax free bonds; to take the strongest position possible in regard to reducing internal expenditure. The ministers should have authority to do with their departments what private business is doing with its overhead. Then it will not be called upon to bear the criticism to which it is now subject from the common people of the country of taxing the sugar of the children. I look on the taxation of sugar as a very inequitable tax. It falls heavily on those with large families to feed; it falls heavily on the people least able to bear it. It means nothing to the average man who has a substantial income, but to the farmers, referred to by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), who buy 400 or 500 pounds of sugar in the fall to put up their own fruit, it is a substantial tax, a tax these people have never had to bear before. It probably will not affect the average member of parliament or the average business man or salaried man; they probably will not feel it. It will not hurt the families with only two mouths to feed, but it will bear very heavily on the man with a large family.

The minister referred to a tea tax. Very well; why not distribute this tax? Why put it all on sugar? It would be infinitely better, I suggest to the minister, to put a tax of 5 cents a pound on coffee or of 2 cents a pound on tea and make the tax on sugar one cent a pound, because after all tea and coffee are not so necessary to the everyday lives of the community as is sugar. It would be far better to put a direct sales tax of 20 cents per pound on candy, which to a large extent is a luxury, or 10 cents a pound or whatever the minister thinks fit, than to put all the tax on sugar, the basic commodity. If the minister says he has no way out other than to tax necessities I have no objection, provided he spreads the tax over a sufficient number of necessities so that it does not fall heavily on those least able to bear it, but I do object to picking out an item so vital to the average workingman and the average farmer, who are not on relief but who are just getting by. We may have eight hundred thousand people on relief at the present time, but certainly we have two or three million who are barely getting by, and those are the men for whom I plead.

As a man who has employed some labour; as a man who knows something about the grief through which industry is passing—and in this house there are dozens of men who know this situation as well as I do—I say to the minister that it is useless for us on this side of the house to argue that his policy is wrong. I have not a particle of criticism to offer with regard to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance or any other member of the government. This has been the most consistent government Canada has ever known. As the hon. member for Willow Bunch said, the Prime Minister appealed for the suffrage of the people claiming that if there was unemployment it was the fault of the government and that the responsibility for good or bad times was squarely on the shoulders of the administration. Not only did he do that; he also prescribed the remedy by means of which the cure was to be effected. The Prime Minister cannot be accused of inconsistency. He said that by a high tariff policy he would create industrial employment, increase our markets and bring about a return of prosperity. Well, we cannot blame the doctor because he has administered mighty large doses of the medicine he promised the patient, but what has been the result? Unemployment has increased; industrial production has decreased, and practically everything that was promised has failed to materialize. I am not going to say that world conditions have not been a great influence; I want to be fair, but I want to say to the minister that in being fair I want him to be fair also.

Just here, Mr. Chairman, I am going to bring up again one of the restrictive measures I mentioned to the minister in private and which I have discussed on the floor of the house on two occasions. Why should it be necessary for a silk manufacturer in the province of Ontario to buy his silk in New York? I am glad the Minister of National Revenue is in his seat; probably he will be able to reply. Why should it be necessary for our Canadian railways to lose all the silk tonnage coming from Tokyo to Canada? Why should it be necessary to have a commodity which is duty free in Canada and the United States driven through United States channels, causing the Canadian railway systems to lose that tonnage, simply because the Department of National Revenue insists on putting a dumping duty on the exchange? I have not had an answer to that question, though I have directed it to the Minister of National Revenue twice. That is the sort of restrictive measure that is being applied in this country, and I think it has gone past the point of sanity. It is little wonder that the Minister of Finance suffers from want of revenue. Let him maintain his policy of high tariffs; that is the policy of the government, and they have a perfect right to apply the policy which they advocated. But let the Minister of Finance see to it that his colleagues do not so completely defeat his purpose as to make it necessary for him to bring in this sort of taxation. Our import trade with the United States has dropped by $600,000,000. I do not know whether we needed the cotton or the other commodities we bought from the United States, but with an average duty of 15 per cent that $600,000,000 in trade would give the minister just $90,000,000, and he would not be faced with the problem confronting him to-day.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I have never advocated free trade; I have always been an advocate of a revenue tariff which gives incidental protection. I do not believe the Canadian people want a tariff so high or so low that it produces no revenue, as a result of which they will have to submit to such taxation as the minister is suggesting to-night. The public must finance the government; the public must find the money. If they do not find it through indirect taxation, through the customs tariff and so on, they must find it through direct taxation on necessities. In this budget we have an illustration of what a high tariff which keeps out commodities and brings in no revenue may cost. Let me say to my low tariff friends that we would have exactly the same illustration if we had a free trade tariff; the revenue would have to be found by direct taxation.

Mr. DUFF: But it would not cost the taxpayers so much.

Mr. MALCOLM: Probably not. I appeal to the minister on this point; he cannot possibly change the policy of the government, but there are some things he can do. Without any blare of trumpets he can trim the cost of administration here, perhaps not so much as would be done in private business but still to a substantial extent. Without any legislation he can clean up a lot of nuisance regulations in the Department of National Revenue, which will be a great help to the business community of this country and will increase his revenue. Without any abandonment of policy at all he can revise some of the items in his customs tariff which will bring in a very much more substantial revenue than he enjoys to-day. I say to the minister in all sincerity that I do not even want to retort to what he said about the load the government inherited from the previous administration. I came into this house in 1921, together with a number of hon. gentlemen I see about me this evening. Then the deficit on the national railways was $60,000,000 a year; then there seemed no possible chance of balancing the budget; then the clouds, while not quite so dark as they are to-day on the political horizon, were so dark as to cause hon. gentlemen then on this side of the house severely to criticize the government for everything they did. I sat in this house in 1929, when our trade had expanded to a proportion we had never dreamed of, and when we had a little unemployment. I heard hon. gentlemen opposite utter the most violent criticisms of the government then in power. I heard them criticize our whole tariff policy; I heard them say it was a complete failure and that ours was the worst government Canada had ever seen. I think the Minister of Finance can say truthfully that in comparison with the violent criticism to which the late government was subjected during the session of 1930 anything we have said in criticism of this government might be termed soft words indeed. We have tried to be fair; personally I want to be fair. I realize the responsibility of government and I understand the difficulty of running departments, but I say to the Minister of Finance that nothing in the way of nibbling taxation is going to cure the situation. The Prime Minister used the expression that the surgery has to be deep, and it certainly has. These are unusual conditions, and unusual methods must be adopted. I believe that at the moment the people of Canada are ready for unusual happenings; I do not believe they are going to criticize the government of the day but will rather compliment them if drastic measures are taken to reduce the cost of administering this country. Many people talk about the cost of government in Great Britain. The taxes the British people pay are not, if at all, very much higher per capita than in this dominion. When we take our municipal, provincial and federal taxes and divide them by ten million we find that the Canadian taxpayer is to-day paying taxation equal to that paid in Great Britain, or at any rate nearly so, and it is a load which he cannot continue to pay out of his present revenue.

Now, where lies the future? It is always very easy for a member in opposition or on the government side to demand expenditures when money is coming into the treasury freely; we have all done it. Hon. members sitting opposite, when they were to the left of the Speaker, were just as anxious for estimates in connection with public works as were members behind the government. Well, if we failed to be cautious enough in those days, certainly we should be courageous to-day. The ordinary business man is courageous. We are not closing down our mills. We are cutting down expenses to the bone and reducing salaries to the vanishing point. Our men are taking low wages and buckling in, trying to save the business ships of the dominion. That is going on to-day from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Then how do the people feel about the cost of government? There certainly is a realization on the part of the Canadian people, greater than ever existed before, that governments have only such money as they take from the people with which to administer their affairs. Any delusion that ever existed that the government has some way of obtaining money other than by taxation has been amply dispelled in the last two or three years. I venture to say that there never was a year in which a smaller percentage of the income tax was paid on the first day than there has been in the last two or three days. More men are asking the government to carry a part of their taxes, for the simple reason that their interest charges have eaten up their incomes and they are not in a position to pay the taxes levied in cash. I do not hold with some people in this house who think that income taxes in Canada are not high; I think they are at the breaking point. I do not think they can be made any higher if business is to survive. When it comes to taking one dollar out of every two which a man earns, a man with undoubted obligations, a man who must face the necessity of keeping reserves for times of stress, I think it comes about as close to confiscation as it is advisable to go. I contend therefore—I know that I shall not be complimented by many hon. members on this side of the house for saying so—that the Minister of Finance was not wrong in lowering the brackets. There are young bachelors in this country earning eight hundred and a thousand dollars a year who are much better able to pay income tax than married men receiving three thousand and with four or five children to keep. The increase in income tax was very heavy in the middle brackets, but those are the brackets in which the minister can get revenue.

I do not think the minister intends to modify this sugar tax, but I do say to him that he should. If he would reduce it and place a tax on tea and coffee and other commodities he would get a far more equitable distribution of the burden. The tax would fall more evenly on the people of the country, and though he may not like to do so, I suggest to him that he should give the matter further consideration. Had he given it fuller consideration I do not think he would have brought in the tax as it is now.

Mr. RHODES: I do not propose to take the same attitude towards the remarks of my hon. friend from North Bruce as apparently my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth took with respect to my own observations. I think the remarks of my hon. friend were made in the tone in which we heard them because of the hon. gentleman's sincerity and because he felt what he was saying.

Mr. MALCOLM: I certainly did.

Mr. RHODES: I am prepared to say that I am thoroughly convinced that this was the purpose that animated the vehemence with which he spoke. I know of no hon. gentleman in this house who speaks more temperately than does my hon. friend from North Bruce and who in the main approaches problems in a fairer or more constructive manner.

Mr. MALCOLM: Thank you.

Mr. RHODES: With a great deal of what the hon. gentleman said I was in agreement, although I must take exception to some of his remarks. He repeated, what so many hon. gentlemen opposite have repeated from time to time, the statement that this is a high tariff party. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said this so frequently that I know they thoroughly believe it, and I should find it difficult to dissuade them from that conviction. As a matter of fact, I have been a consistent follower of this party and I have never subscribed to the point of view that we were a high tariff party. We have been frank enough to admit that we believe in the policy of protection, in the policy of adequate protection, and this government has not hesitated, any more than preceding Conservative governments have hesitated on occasion, to reduce tariffs substantially and indeed, in many instances, to wipe them out altogether. In fact, in the very budget before the house there are numerous items which have been placed on the free list.

I do not agree with my hon. friend in his contention, which seems to be shared by many hon. gentlemen opposite, that if we revised the tariff we should not be obliged to resort to taxation. If there is anything in the statement made by hon. gentlemen it means that more goods would be brought into this country and that we should have more revenue from the tariff.

Mr. YOUNG: Precisely.

Mr. MALCOLM: No doubt.

Mr. RHODES: Well, who pays the tariff? The people in this country pay. Hon. gentlemen discuss that phase of the question as if they were going to relieve the people of the country of the burden of taxation.

Mr. MALCOLM: The tariff is paid by those who are able to pay.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Don't we still pay the same price to our own manufacturers?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will not think me discourteous if I decline to be deflected by a question of that kind, because it has no bearing on the point raised by the hon. member for North Bruce, who was dealing with the question of tariff qua revenue. I am not dealing with the question of protection as such, in all its ramifications. The fact remains that the customs duty is paid by the people of the country, and there may be an argument as to whether, in the incidence of taxation, the burden by that method is more evenly distributed than it would be with respect, for example, to such a tax as the proposed tax on sugar, paid directly by the people. The fact of the matter is, however, taking any form of taxation, that a given sum of money which goes into the treasury, it matters not whether it comes out of a sugar tax or a tariff or what not, must come out of the people of the country. That fact, I submit, should be borne in mind.

Mr. MALCOLM: Is my hon. friend going to ignore the selling value of imports to this dominion?

Mr. RHODES: I was dealing with the question entirely from the point of view of revenue, which was the point under discussion, because otherwise the discussion is not germane to the question of the necessity for raising revenue by means of a tax on sugar.

Mr. RALSTON: We pay for it in goods; that is all.

Mr. MALCOLM: It has to be paid for.

Mr. RHODES: I quite understand that argument. If hon. gentlemen will take the trade of the country, both imports and exports, they will find that we are the fifth trading country of the world. They will find that, having regard to relative trade conditions in other parts of the world, our trade stands just as high in volume as that of any other country in the world and just as high relatively as it has ever stood in the history of Canada.

Coming back to my hon. friend, while I do not want him to think that I wish to answer his argument by the "you are another" method, I feel I must check him up in one or two respects. He referred to the fact that private business had reduced salaries to the vanishing point, and stated that while he recognized the government was not in a position to make the same drastic cuts as those made in private business, he felt nevertheless that there could be a still further reduction. May I point out to my hon. friend that when we asked the civil servants of Canada to make a modest contribution by way of a salary deduction of ten per cent, hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the time of this house for three solid weeks. That contribution amounts only to some $8,000,000, or less than one half what we hope to realize from the tax upon sugar.

I commend my hon. friend for the constructive character of his suggestions. I know he makes them not as criticisms but as patriotic suggestions in view of the seriousness of the condition of this country. I grant him that very freely, but when he suggests that we might take one cent off the sugar tax and put a four cent a pound tax upon tea and a five cent per pound upon coffee in substitution thereof, I must point out what we might expect from such a substitution. Last year we imported into Canada 42,000,000 pounds of tea. With a tax of four cents per pound, which would be double the duty under the British preferential, we would obtain in revenue $1,680,000. Last year we imported into Canada 38,000,000 pounds of coffee. A five cent tax would bring in a revenue of $1,900,000. There would be a total revenue on these two taxes of $3,580,000.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. member suggested two cents per pound on tea.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Stanstead says that the hon. member for North Bruce suggested a tax on tea of only two cents per pound. That makes my argument just twice as strong. However, taking the tax at four cents per pound, the total revenue would be $3,580,000 or just one-third of what it is anticipated a one cent tax on sugar would bring in.

Mr. YOUNG: It would help a little.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, but it would not offer a substitute for a one cent tax upon sugar.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister could broaden the list to include other luxuries.

Mr. RHODES: That is quite true. My hon. friend did something else for which I commend him. He had the courage to make succinct and substantial suggestions by way of economy. We get much of this, more particularly from the press. I do not object to criticism, in fact I welcome it especially when it is based upon fair motives and is not captious or small political criticism—I use the "p" in the small party sense. Let me say to my hon. friend that I think he was fair in his criticism in respect to the national research council. During an earlier stage of the committee I made reference to certain economies which had been made, and I pointed these out in the letters which were written to certain chambers of commerce. I did not then nor do I now suggest for one moment that the government has made as many economies as it should or as it could. I believe we will have to make still further economies, and the suggestions made by my hon. friend are sound. I may say to him that for some considerable time past the preliminary steps have been taken which will lead up to the very economy he has in mind. You cannot prune a tree with an axe; you must use a more delicate instrument if you wish it to survive. You cannot use rough instruments upon the delicate machinery of governmental service, and you cannot make the same drastic reductions as can be made in private enterprises. It is altogether different in the service. I may say to my hon. friend that the object of the government will be to continue to effect economies wherever they may be possible without impairing unnecessarily the public service. The suggestion he made is practicable and sensible and is one which will be and should be followed by the government.

Even if I felt competent to do so, I would not propose to follow my hon. friend in his broad discussion of inflation. I do want to say to him that when he speaks of equal contribution, having in mind the fact that those who hold the bonds and securities of this country are because of living conditions to-day receiving a far higher yield than they did when they purchased them, he must not overlook the fact that Canada is a debtor country. Canada is a borrowing country and if we are to have lower rates of interest, a thing highly desirable, we must maintain the integrity of the credit of Canada. If we attempted to violate or repudiate our obligations to those who have purchased the securities of Canada, I believe that the amount saved at the moment would be lost manyfold through the increased sums we would have to pay by way of interest on future borrowings. We would narrow the field within which we could borrow to such an extent that we would have to pay very high terms for our money. There is no way, short of repudiation, in which you can effect a sacrifice with respect to securities which are out as a matter of contract and in the hands of the public.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister knows perfectly well that England refinanced her largest loan at three and a half per cent. The British people took it up and there was no repudiation.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but my hon. friend must admit that England is a creditor country. She had a plethora of stored capital—

Mr. HEAPS: What about Australia?

Mr. RHODES: —available for conversion. That conversion was a voluntary one.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite so, and so it would be in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: Nearly two years ago we made a very substantial conversion in Canada as a result of which we improved the financial position of this country to a marked degree.

Mr. MALCOLM: And the bonds were sold—

Mr. RHODES: And the bonds were sold.

Mr. MALCOLM: —in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: In Canada, quite so. My hon. friend will realize that in respect of this conversion tax exemptions with respect to certain bonds had to be continued until the due date. The net result after November 1 of this year will be a very substantial saving in interest charges through the tax exempt feature being obliterated from the 1933 issue.

I have taken more time than I intended to take. I hope the example of the hon. member for North Bruce will be followed by other hon. gentlemen opposite should they care to discuss the subject of sugar. We welcome constructive suggestions and I hope that after certain economies along a certain line have been effected my hon. friend will have occasion to say "I told you so."

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am very sorry to take up any of the time of the committee at this stage, but in view of the fact that the hon. member for North Bruce has made a reference to me I think it necessary that I should at least reply. I heard no two references from my hon. friend as to why silk could be bought in New York at an advantage as compared with purchasing it in Japan and bringing it overland through Canada to Toronto and Montreal. I did hear a reference to it once and I made no reply because I certainly thought that the hon. member knew enough about the trade to know exactly how it did happen, but seeing that I was mistaken as to his knowledge I will tell him in a word or two. It is caused by the difference in exchange and by our special excise tax, and we are not going to forego our special excise tax —we need it, and the hon. member ought to know it—simply because we can let in a carload of silk at a cheaper price. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that that is over now, and to-day you can buy silk that has its origin in Japan as cheap in Canada as you can buy it from New York.

Mr. MALCOLM: Good.

Mr. RYCKMAN: In the next place my hon. friend referred to the nuisance regulations of the National Revenue department. All I can say is that the government of which he was a member put them there. I do not know to what else he refers. I am sure that the action that has been taken by the National Revenue department, perhaps not under the heading of regulations, has resulted in benefit to the country. There was something that was done when my hon. friend's government was in power, and while I would not for one moment detract from the encomiums heaped upon his head this afternoon and evening, I must say that when I took charge of this department I found that the first time what is known as section 43 was used by the Liberal government as applied to other than natural products, was in aid of an industry in which my hon. friend was interested and still is interested. The Liberal government were pleased to confine their operation of what is known as section 43 to natural products, but then furniture crept in. A heavy duty was put on furniture, and my hon. friend got the benefit of that.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, sir.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The records of the department show it; that is all I can say.

I want to say that I align myself with the Finance minister and those on this side of the house in seeing that this government, so far as its efforts can accomplish it, shall not default upon its obligations upon any specious excuse. The hon. member for North Bruce I think allowed us to measure him to-night when he said that it really hurt him that this country kept its obligations and paid the interest on these tax free bonds. The country has entered into that obligation. It is a hard thing to carry it out; it is done with grief and worry, but yet Canada has done it and will do it so long as this government is in power, and if the people of Canada determine that they want some other treatment, they can get it by voting for it in the majority.

Mr. MALCOLM: They are liable to do it.

Mr. EULER: Just a word with regard to the remarks made by the Minister of National Revenue. He made reference to action that was taken by the former government, perhaps by myself, with regard to furniture. The statement to which I absolutely take exception is the one to the effect that we placed a much higher duty upon furniture.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I did not say a much higher duty; I said a high duty.

Mr. EULER: I will take the minister's words. He says that we placed a high duty on furniture, intimating that we raised the tariff on furniture. We did nothing of the sort. The rate remained exactly as it was, and the department proceeded entirely on the old dumping regulation that goods should not be imported into this country valued at less than they were in the country of origin. We had reason to believe that furniture was being dumped into Canada. An investigation was made, and a higher valuation was placed upon furniture exactly in accordance with the law. I might say to the Minister of National Revenue that the late government did not apply that regulation to anything like the extent it has been applied in the years since he has been in office. I think it has been more or less of an outrage the extent to which the minister has imposed on the business people of this country, arbitrary regulations which have been much worse than the tariff itself. In fact, the minister and the government have taken power, and have exercised it, actually to place a valuation on goods for purposes of customs duties from two to four times the actual value, thereby multiplying the rate of duty two or three or four times, and not by reason of the fact that there was real dumping in the sense that goods were coming into this country and selling at less cost than in the country of origin. The minister's action was taken without reference to what the goods sold for in the country of origin.

Mr. POULIOT: The treasury benches unfortunately disagree as to the merits of the speech of my hon. friend from North Bruce. The Minister of Finance was very complimentary to him, and rightly so, but the Minister of National Revenue did not feel that way about it. One of the most constructive suggestions, or if I might use the words of the Minister of Finance, one of the most patriotic suggestions made by the member for North Bruce, was to convert the tax free bonds. The hon. Minister of Finance did not indicate his views in that regard, but the hon. Minister of National Revenue said that Canada was not going to repudiate its obligations. The Minister of Finance did, however, say that the credit of this country should not be imperilled. Would it imperil the credit of this country for this government to show that it has a real business spirit?—and I do not say that, Mr. Chairman, in any mean or offensive way. I was thinking of the poor people of this country, of the feeling of relief it would give to the mind of the poor man who pays a $2 tax on one hundred pounds of sugar while at the same time he sees the millionaire who has twenty million dollars worth of tax free bonds not paying a cent of taxation to the government upon that immense amount of money. There is discrimination. The hon. Minister of National Revenue, who is an able lawyer, knows very well that contracts can be declared void when they are illegal and when they are immoral. Our expenditures during the war could have been divided under three heads; money usefully expended; money that was wasted; money that was stolen. A large proportion of these tax free bonds was purchased from the dominion exchequer by those thieves who stole the money of this country by profiteering, and that they are escaping taxation to-day I say is a national crime.

We hear complaints about unemployment. People have no money now. Even farmers with real property and assets have no money. You can go to any farmer and ask him if he has five or ten or fifteen dollars in his house, and he will answer: "You know very well I have not." Why? Because he may have mortgages on his neighbour's farm or may have his money invested elsewhere, and it is not bringing in a cent of revenue. I make this very simple suggestion to the government in all earnestness, and I want them to try to understand that there is no petty political motive in the suggestion: I urge them to tax at once those tax free bonds, to convert them in order that the rich may pay as well as the poor. Those who hold such bonds are better able to pay than the man who has not a cent. Is it fair, or is there not discrimination, when the millionaire with $20,000,000 worth of tax free bonds pays nothing, while on the other hand a poor fellow has to work five days in the year at $2 a day to pay the $10 tax on sugar. If he gets only a dollar a day he has to work ten days, and if he gets only fifty cents a day he has to work twenty days to pay this $10 tax for five hundred pounds of sugar for himself and his family. I cannot understand it.

The Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue have my respect. They are both able men. I would ask them to concentrate for five minutes, and at the end of that time they will admit that the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Bruce is a kindly one and should at once be considered favourably by the government.

Mr. HEAPS: The Minister of Finance referred to a conversion loan made by his own government, and also a conversion loan put through last year by the British government. He left the impression, at least on my mind, that one of the reasons why the present government could not put through a conversion loan at a considerably reduced rate of interest while Great Britain could, was that Canada was a debtor country and Great Britain was a creditor country. That may be perfectly so. May I, however, cite to him the case of Australia, a country which I believe is in a position somewhat similar to that occupied by Canada. Just about two years ago in Australia they put through an internal conversion loan at a considerably reduced rate of interest. As Australia is in much the same position as we are, and it was possible to put through an internal loan in that country reducing the rate of interest, can the minister tell the committee why it was not possible for Canada to follow her example?

Mr. RHODES: Conditions in Australia are entirely different from those obtaining in Canada. They put through their conversion loan solely with respect to Australian holders of Australian securities. I may point out further that there were other conditions which I do not wish to discuss with any degree of frankness, but which, if they were present in Canada, might call for far different treatment from those warranted by conditions obtaining here. Short of compulsion there is only one way in which you can convert, and that is to have the holder of a security exchange it for one which he is disposed to accept. The government of Canada is, I submit, taking the logical course by lending every possible assistance it can towards the lowering of interest rates. We have not trumpeted from the housetops the circumstance that it took considerable time and effort to bring about concerted action in the lowering of interest rates upon savings banks deposits and the general interest rate on savings. That is being reflected, as of May 1, in a corresponding reduction in interest charges. It will have its effect, in turn, in improving general conditions preparatory to our approaching the people here, as we will before a great while, with a conversion loan. If our securities were held only in Canada, and the tax exemption feature was free from all our securities, we might put through a major operation with a certain amount of compulsion, accelerated by conditions which have obtained in other countries. But inasmuch as those conditions do not obtain in Canada we have to proceed in an orderly way, and the best contribution we can make towards clearing the ground for a conversion loan is to maintain our credit, maintain confidence in our securities and assist towards a general lowering of interest rates, hoping that these conditions will be reflected when the next conversion comes along.

Mr. HEAPS: I appreciate the position taken by the minister. May I say, however, that the percentage of federal bonds owned in Canada is fairly high; I believe it must be about seventy-five per cent. I do not believe the difficulties outlined by the minister would be as great in Canada as they were in Australia, because I understand that a far greater amount of the bonds of the federal government of Australia were held outside of Australia than were held within the country. Our percentage is much higher than obtained there. Our interest charges have become such a tremendous burden that I think a major operation will be necessary in the near future.

Not only is that so as far as the federal government is concerned, but it is increasingly so in regard to our provincial governments. The costs in the western provinces are such that they find it almost impossible to bear interest charges on their indebtedness. In Manitoba more than fifty per cent of the total revenue of the province goes to meet interest obligations. So far as federal obligations are concerned, I do not think I am far off when I say that approximately thirty-five per cent of the total revenue of the federal government is utilized in meeting interest obligations. Sooner or later I believe something will have to be done in the way of cutting down our interest charges in order that federal, provincial and municipal governments may be able to meet the obligations with which they are faced.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if the minister is prepared to answer two questions I asked. First he was going to ascertain the amount of raw sugar imported for manufacturers, and not for refiners.

Mr. RHODES: I am glad the hon. member reminded me, because I have the figures, as accurately as we can get them. The best estimate the department can make is that importations of raw sugar by other than refiners for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1932, amounted to 129,312 hundredweight, valued at $234,000. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1933, the figure is 128,785 hundredweight valued at $227,492. After comparing those figures the hon. member will realize they represent a very small fraction as compared with the total import.

Mr. RALSTON: The total import is about a billion pounds?

Mr. RHODES: About a thousand million pounds, yes. So that the figures I have given represent a comparatively small fraction of the sugar importations.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister consider the representations I made as to the possibility of not imposing the excise tax on raw sugar used by canners, and people other than refiners?

Mr. RHODES: No. To do that would be to deflect from the treasury a substantial amount of revenue. For the purpose of maintaining the balance the tax has been imposed in the manner in which it appears.

Mr. RALSTON: I would say if they could use raw sugar, they would. The difference in the price would make it desirable to use raw sugar if possible, therefore I do not believe there would be any great incentive to use raw sugar on account of dropping the tax.

Mr. RHODES: I am informed that the tendency is to use the cheaper commodity purely from the economic point of view. That tendency would be accelerated by a difference of two cents a pound, and that is a very real danger, speaking solely from the viewpoint of revenue.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister received any representations from beverage manufacturers?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I say that because I had a telegram from a manufacturer in my own constituency pointing out the very serious effect of this tax, and also that it could not be passed on. I will read it to the minister; he may have had one too:

> We are candidates for the poorhouse if sugar will keep on $2 extra on a bag. Conditions are so that it is impossible to advance prices on beverages. Please ask the finance minister to have mercy with the poor beverage men.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have had numerous representations of the kind. I met a deputation of the soft drink manufacturers. I put this question to one of them who was pleading for the remission of the tax on the ground that it would do great injury to his business: "What did you do when you paid 20 cents a pound for your sugar"? He did not come to for some minutes, because it was not in his little written statement, but he came back a second time and said: "We did not make any money that year." As a matter of fact, while I sympathize with any industry to-day I must say there are other industries which will be affected to an extent at least as great as, if not greater than, the soft drink manufacturers. My information is that it bears such a relatively small proportion to the cost of the finished commodity that they ought not to complain any more than any other industry which has to use sugar.

Mr. DUFF: They make the drinks too sweet anyway.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend is probably correct. And it is open to them to use other forms of sweetening if they desire.

Mr. YOUNG: Substitutes!

Mr. RHODES: As far as protests are concerned I may say to my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth that I doubt if there is any industry that has failed to make representations not only against the sugar tax but against every tax that has been proposed, without exception.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend give an answer to the delegation?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; the answer I gave was that I would take their representations into most careful consideration, which I did.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have had references this evening to demands made upon the government for economy, and we have heard the reasons given by the Minister of Finance why, although he was quite willing, these demands could not be acceded to at the present time. I am wondering where economies are going to get us. From my reading I believe that the world is beginning to realize that we have had about as much economy during the last three years as we can stand, and that now if we are going to get anywhere we must do it by spending. I would much rather see this government try to find ways and means of spending so as to make our natural resources available to the people. As we were told to-day, governments are having to meet changed conditions. They are faced with the necessity of doing what private enterprise was supposed to do in the past. Many of us, perhaps all of us, have received letters during the last few weeks from boards of trade and chambers of commerce asking us to use our influence to have the government effect further economies. To these letters I have replied pointing out that private enterprises, as represented by these boards of trade and chambers of commerce, have restricted activities, turned their employees out on the street, and asked the government to look after them; do they suppose that the government can look after them without any expenditure? I would like my friends on this side of the house to point out where funds are coming from if the government did not take steps to provide them. I was connected with municipal government for some years before coming here, and for years before 1930 we were raising money in order to keep the unemployed of the city working during the winter months. Many of the municipal and provincial expenditures that now burden the country were spent for the very purpose of providing employment. That is a condition that confronts us to-day, and if private enterprise will not deal with it then the responsibility for doing so will rest on this or some other government.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I add a few remarks to this debate, as representative of two classes of society mostly affected by this unpopular sugar tax, namely, the farming and working classes. Our country comprises farmers—they play the most important part—workmen, industrialists and financiers, better known as capitalists. I wish to state, at the outset, that I do not wish to appeal to class prejudice. In order that the economic organization of a country be as perfect as possible, I really believe that a complete co-operation is necessary between workmen and capitalists, producers and consumers. It is, however, necessary to draw the line when the administration, as in the present case, is so short sighted as to levy a tax which so heavily burdens the two most important classes of our country and which can the least afford it. Hon. members present will recall the attitude taken by our opponents, during the election of 1930, towards the farming and labour classes. Their arguments have been a hundred times alluded to, in the house. They may seem time-worn, however, under the circumstances, it is necessary to again refer to them. The farming class was then told: the sale price of your products is not sufficiently high to permit you to save, rear a family and live comfortably. While the workmen were told: your wages are not high enough. Workmen, who are unemployed, return us and, within three weeks, we shall have found you work. Quite the contrary happened. Not only does the farmer receive less for his products than in 1930, but prices have dropped 100, 200 and even 300 per cent. Workmen as well as farmers find it impossible to meet their liabilities.

How did this all happen? In 1930, both the farmer and workman earned sufficient to permit them to save. After the advent to power of the present administration, the workman did not earn enough to meet his expenses, and the farmer, not receiving as high a price as previously, had to depend on his savings. When these were exhausted, he had to borrow and, to-day, unable to borrow any more, having exhausted his credit, he is on the point of starvation. And it is exactly at a time when the farmer and workman can no further borrow, when they are deprived of their savings, when their credit is exhausted, that this government takes advantage of this critical moment to levy on them such taxes as the one under discussion. It is our duty, we, representatives of these classes of society, to strongly protest against such imposts.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, Hear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): How many other taxes could the government have resorted to, without encumbering the other classes of society? It is quite certain that capitalists and industrialists have still large incomes notwithstanding the fact that their income is less than in 1930, under the Liberal regime, or even under the Conservative rule, previous to 1921. A great number of them still receive dividends from the numerous companies in which they have invested their money. Without appealing to class prejudice, would it not be more equitable if these capitalists, whether they are liberals or tories, would frankly state: We are ready to sacrifice a large portion of our income and dividends to cover the deficits of the government.

Would it not be more equitable if these capitalists or companies agreed to hand over to the treasury the large profits they make out of the people? And should those capitalists, industrialists, and corporations refuse to do so, the government should force them to bear these taxes, because they are practically the only class which can afford to pay them. That is the rational attitude the government should take, and I repeat it, after so many members on this side of the house have done so.

In my opinion, we should, for instance, tax commercial companies dealing in public utilities.

They make enormous profits, distribute large dividends and, notwithstanding the fact that wages have been reduced to their minimum, notwithstanding the fact that raw material is bought at ridiculous low prices, they exact from the consumer the same prices as in the days which preceded the crisis. With all due deference to capitalists and notwithstanding the consequences which my statement might have for me, may I mention, for instance, the Bell Telephone Co. of Canada. According to the British North America Act, this company comes under the jurisdiction of the Dominion government, which, thereby, controls it. Notwithstanding the fact that the Bell Telephone Co. has reduced the salaries of its employees, that it has thrown on the street a great number of them, that it can purchase raw material at ridiculously low prices, has this company lowered its service prices, reduced the rent of its telephones? No, sir. Just recently, the government taxed long distance telephone calls. Do you, for a moment, think that the company pays this tax? No, it is the public that pays. The government taxed the company but the public pays. The government should, as it has the power, tax directly these public utility companies, when they do not lower their rates and it should prevent them from exacting this tax from the public. The government is aware that a large number of these companies, —I need not enumerate the whole list—exploit the public and are accumulating wealth at the expense of the two important classes of our society which can the least afford it.

I wish to draw the attention of the house, as representative of these two classes of society—the farmers and the workmen—on the unwise act committed by the government when it discreetly informed its political friends of this tax on sugar, a few days previously to its being announced, with the result that numerous followers of this government ordered not only thousands of bags but hundreds of thousands of bags of sugar.

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): Give us their names, that was alluded to twice this afternoon.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The hon. member is fully aware that what I state is the truth and he knows a number of friends who purchased sugar a few days previously to the tax being announced—

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): That is untrue.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): —and who, at present, have it stored, without having paid the tax.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): Were there no friends of the opposition included?

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Name them! name them!

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): This interjection of my hon. friend opposite is an argument which does not hold in this house.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Name them! name them!

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): It reminds me of the old story of the speaker who stated he knew some Chinamen and to whom an interrupter called out: Name them! Name them! This old saw should not be used in this house composed of eminent men such as my hon. friends opposite are supposed to be. Name them! But your own conscience should prick you to rise and give their names, because you are better acquainted with them than we are: they are your friends. I am inclined to think that those who interrupt me to-day are exactly those who told their friends, the wholesale dealers, what were the taxes to be levied, and thus afforded them the opportunity of storing in advance hundreds of thousands of bags of sugar.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Will my hon. friend permit me a question?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): My hon. friend will have an opportunity of speaking in his turn; he should then take advantage of it because he has not long to sit in this house. When the day comes for the people to give their verdict, the constituents of Lake St. John will ask him to remain at home.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I may fall but I shall fall on my feet.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): It is an anomaly, something like a square circle.

I state that this government—I do not charge it with deliberately betraying its secrets—showed a lack of wisdom in imparting to some of its friends—perhaps those who are interrupting at this moment—that a tax of two cents per pound would be levied on sugar. The burden of this tax falls upon the poor, the farmer, the workman of my constituency who can ill afford it. They have been suffering hardships for the last two years; they depend on public charity and live at the expense of the government. All farmers and workmen in this country will be called upon to pay two cents more per pound of sugar; they will purchase this commodity from the retail dealer, the latter having purchased it from a wholesale dealer who has not paid the tax, nevertheless the people, the workmen in distress, will have to pay it.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear! Hear! Carry on!

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, this impost is most unpopular and the hon. Minister of Finance should reconsider his decision. I ask him in all earnestness to do so, together with numerous members who have already made the same request. If he wishes the Conservatives to remain in power, he should suppress this tax which burdens the people and will deprive them of a necessity of life, especially to infants. In order to prove my contention and assure hon. members opposite that I harbour no ill feelings towards the government, I state that the enforcement of this tax will prove the strongest argument against their party and will be the cause of their downfall. I repeat it: Representatives of the Conservative party, even if the people had no other grievances against your administration, if you enforce this sugar tax of two cents per pound which is directly levied on the people and paid by them, you will be defeated and, thereby, permit the Liberal party to assume power.

Mr. Chairman, I have fulfilled my duty by expressing my views on this question and, contrary to what certain hon. members on this side have stated, I think that the hon. Minister of Finance will reconsider his decision. He is intelligent, broad-minded, whom I admire, he has proved by his budget statement that he was worthy of occupying the post of Minister of Finance. I am convinced that this very able man will have the good sense, the wisdom of suppressing this sugar tax of two cents per pound and levy on the classes which can afford to pay, sufficient taxes to balance the deficit and thus allow the government to carry on the administration of the country.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Before this item carries I feel it my duty to lodge a complaint against the tax of two cents a pound on sugar. I am not one of those, Mr. Chairman, who can be accused of having been very critical of the government during their term of office, but I do feel that this tax is very unfair to the poor people of our country, those who are at this time struggling for an existence. The minister says this tax was applied because of the need for increased revenue. In reply to that I would say this is one of the last commodities that should be taxed under present conditions. People cannot even buy sugar at present prices let alone at the increased prices as a result of this tax. This matter was brought home to me last summer because of the fact that in the part of the country from which I come wild fruit was very plentiful. People travelled for miles over the hills and valleys to gather this wild fruit of all kinds, and they obtained enormous quantities. The complaint that many of these people made to me was that while they could get plenty of fruit the difficulty was to get sugar. What are they to do if fruit is plentiful again this summer? They will not be able to buy the sugar to preserve that fruit, as they wish to do.

The minister stated that since this government have been in power they have reduced the expenditures of the country by $81,000,000. I contend that even though they have made some decreases they have not grappled with the problem of the expenditures of the country to the extent they should be grappled with. Truth of that statement can be found in the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance in this house on March 21 of this year, and I particularly refer to pages 3211 and 3212 of Hansard, where the minister gave a summary of the revenues and expenditures by departments. I have analyzed those figures, and this is the result of my analysis In 1928-29, for every dollar that was collected we spent 76 cents. In 1929-30, for every dollar that was collected we spent 80 cents. In 1930-31, for every dollar that was collected we spent $1.09, and in 1931-32, we spent $1.11. It is estimated that for every dollar we collect during the coming year we will spend $1.15. That is why I say the government have not really grappled with the financial situation existing in this country.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I contend that this tax is unfair and unnecessary, and my reason for making that statement is the very fact that we are spending far more than we are collecting. How much better it would have been for the average taxpayer and the average citizen of this country if this government, instead of placing a tax on sugar, had withheld the appointment of this useless tariff board. Everyone in the country is convinced that tariffs must come down, so why do they need a tariff board, which is only an added expense? Ask any radio user what good the radio commission is doing and see what you will be told. That is another useless commission. Why not reduce expenditures instead of increasing them, thus making it necessary to tax a commodity such as sugar?

Then we have some increased salaries, one of which was referred to the other night by an hon. member on this side of the house. The salary of a gentleman in the National Defence department was increased from $8,000 to $10,000. According to my information he was not nearly earning the $8,000, and I do not understand why his salary is being increased when we have to tax sugar out of the mouths of the poor people of the country in order to make up that increase. The minister said he would welcome any suggestions that might be made which would remove the necessity for this tax. In response to that invitation I would urge the adoption of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Willow Bunch. Why not take up the question of gasoline, the price of which is very high in this country? Why does not the government grapple with that question? We have plenty of evidence to show that we are paying altogether too much for gasoline, and the needed revenue could be obtained very easily if the suggestion of the hon. member for Willow Bunch were followed. Then the hon. member for North Bruce mentioned the matter of bond interest. I remember that a year ago when I was speaking on the budget in this house I stated that if the interest on the $220,000,000 borrowed some time ago had been reduced by even one per cent we would have saved over $2,000,000 a year. Why, as the hon. member for North Bruce asked, should the people who are clipping coupons find it possible to escape the full effects of the depression as they are felt by other people throughout the country? I think that is another question with which the government should grapple.

I just wanted to bring these few points to the attention of the government, Mr. Chairman, and let me repeat that the question in the minds of people all over Canada is how long a government, any more than an individual, can continue to spend $1.15 for every dollar collected. The government must deal with the question of expenditures, and in spite of what the Minister of Finance has said I contend that they have not really done so. We are continually asked by hon. gentlemen opposite why we do not make suggestions. My suggestion to the government is that they cut down on expenditures. It must be done, if not this year then very soon; and in addition to that interest on bonded indebtedness must be reduced.

Item as amended agreed to.
