However, the kinds of information kept in those files are those required by banking practices, rather than those that would indeed point to typical money-laundering transactions.

The Act includes no disclosure provisions, and under the current legislation, financial institutions that would disclose information would be in violation of banking confidentiality or other such rules concerning the disclosure of personal financial information.

This means that existing provisions serve to protect the banks rather than help law enforcement.

Mr. Speaker, over these last 15 years, studies on organized crime done mainly in United States but also in Canada, the United Kingdom and the Australia by those who are seeking ways to control the power and wealth of criminal organizations have emphasized the important role of financial institutions in this regard.

In order to make use of the enormous sums of money they earn illegally, criminals must go through financial services, and in fact they have turned to financial institutions that also serve legitimate businesses.

It is extremely difficult to differentiate legal funds from illegal funds when a series of financial transactions are quickly processed through international financial networks.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the tradition of bank secrecy which surrounds financial transactions contributes to the problem, especially when funds arrive in countries where their identity is protected by strict laws on bank secrecy.

In 1970, the U.S. Congress passed a law obliging financial institutions to keep certain files and to declare certain financial transactions, namely monetary transactions of over $10,000 and the entry into or exit from the United States of amounts of $5,000 or more.

As you know, there are civil and criminal penalties for violations.

Bill C-61 contains measures to fight the laundering of the proceeds of organized crime as well as serious drug offences and the possession of goods obtained as a result of such offences.

The decision to criminalize the laundering of drug money and seize the bank assets of persons suspected of drug trafficking has made it possible to reduce the flood of hundreds of millions of dollars that were going through banks in Toronto and Montreal but, as you know, implementation of these control measures remains inadequate.

According to a recent report tabled in the U.S. Senate, last October American banks pointed to a surprising difference between the outflow of funds to Canada, estimated at $1.5 billion and the inflow of Canadian funds into the United States, which totalled over $4.5 billion.

This Bill does not oblige banks or other financial institutions to register and report to the authorities all major cash or foreign currency transactions.

Without ways to detect transactions involving major sums of illicit money, it is difficult to implement legislation against money laundering.

According to a report from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, corruption in the banking system is not unusual.

An unscrupulous bank manager even helped a major group of heroin traffickers buy bank drafts for a value exceeding $40 million. These drafts where then deposited in various financial institutions abroad.

In other cases, lower-ranked employees open and manage bank accounts at their place of work in order to launder drug money. The city of Drummondville even seconded a member of its police force to the RCMP to protect a mafia informant who testified on Canadian and Quebec television that it was very easy to transfer money between American and Canadian banks.

Consequently, whatever the means used, once drug money gets in the banking system, it can be tranferred almost immediately, anywhere in the world by the sophisticated electronic equipment used by financial institutions. The police is aware of such transactions, but has no power to act. As for the financial institutions, they prefer to turn a blind eye than to risk loosing a client to a competitor. So, the minister announced on January 18 the establishment of a joint government and private sector advisory committee on money laundering. Such initiative certainly is a step forward in the battle against traffickers. In Switzerland, as you know, they have what they call the "Convention de diligence", a kind of gentleman's agreement between bankers. By virtue of that agreement, they are required to ascertain that their client is truly the holder of his capital and to know its origin.

However, to work around the agreement it only takes a lawyer or a trust company to open an account on behalf of their client using the protection provided by professional secrecy.

So, flaws still exist in spite of measures put in place. Mr. Speaker, my question to the Hon. Minister of State for Finance is this: to engage a real fight against the power and the wealth of criminal organizations, what action will Canada consider with regards to regulated and non regulated financial institutions, the small cashing services and currency exchange facilities insceasingly used by those organizations, along with international electronic fund tranfers?

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government believes that money laundering constitutes a very serious problem. I can assure the hon. member that we will continue to use the most recent technology and the most efficient methods to fight this curse.

The government already took some initiatives. For example, Bill C-61, concerning proceeds of crime, recently came into force. This new law makes it illegal to launder the proceeds of crime, it allows duly authorized police officers to search and seize any property suspected of being illegally obtained, and it relieves the banks of all responsibility when disclosing information on activities they believe to be related to money laundering. Also in accordance with this Act, criminal assets can be confiscated.

Our government has also passed a law concerning the implementation of cooperation treaties in criminal matters in order to further cooperation between Canadian judicial authorities and their foreign counterparts. The Treaty on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between Canada and the United States was concluded, ratified and came into effect on January 24, 1990. We have signed similar agreements with Australia and the United Kingdom, and negociations with other countries, including the Group of Seven, except Japan, are going very well.

In December 1988, Canada signed the UN Convention of Illicit Drug and Psychotropic Substance Trafficking, which puts great emphasis on international cooperation for tracking down and confiscating revenues from such trafficking.

The Bank for International Settlements has also examined the question of money laundering. In January 1989, Canada and other countries represented on the Cooke Committee of the Bank for International Settlements signed a document entitled "Prevention of the use of the banking system for the laundering of proceeds of crime". This agreement provides for a better identification of clients, a greater compliance with foreign laws, cooperation with judicial authorities and adequate training of people involved in the financial system.

At the Economic Summit held in Paris in July 1989, heads of states vowed to fight against drug trafficking, insisting that financial measures would be a concrete and encouraging approach towards this goal. They decided to create a financial task force composed of representatives of countries participating in the summit and of other industrialized countries. Canada has taken an active part in the work of this task force, whose mandate is to evaluate the results of the cooperation measures already taken in the fight against the use of the banking system for the laundering of money and to examine other preventive measures in this area. Members of the task force have met several times and their recommendations will be made public soon.

On February 9, 1990, the Advisory Committee on money laundering created under the National Anti-Drug Strategy held its first meeting. This committee's mandate is to review our mechanism to prevent money laundering, to identify areas where improvements could be made and to inform the government on the benefits of the different alternatives to deal with money laundering. Another mandate of the Committee is to act as an advisory link between industry and governement in technical matters and to publicize the steps taken by Canadian financial institutions.

At its first meeting, committee members took the opportunity to unanimously endorse a statement affirming their complete support for the fight against money laundering and undertook to keep all the accounting records on financial transactions needed by the RCMP and other police forces to investigate and take money-laundering cases to court. In its coming meetings, the Committee will be asked to deal with various ways to fight money laundering. The decisions on solutions to the problem of money laundering and their implementation will be made in the light of the Committee's recommendations.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to speak on behalf of veterans with respect to the recent budget. I am speaking on behalf of veterans not just because I am the veterans' affairs critic or because I am associate defence critic or because I have spent most of a lifetime in uniform myself but because I want to put on the record the concerns that have been expressed to me.

I do not want to mince words and I do not want to play politics with this particular issue, but the fact is that some veterans will have to pay more and some veterans will lose specific benefits as a result of the over-all budget. I appreciate what the hon. minister has said in that regard. He should also know that tremendous representation is being made to me as the critic. It is very important to represent the views of those veterans who are concerned about what is happening.

I said I served in uniform, Mr. Speaker, but I did not serve in war and I was pleased that I did not have to. Shortly after I was born, in September, 1939, World War II was upon us and our country was passing through what was described by many to be the shadow and the storm of war. This dark hour was illuminated by the white light of human courage. The bitterness of suffering was alleviated by the inspiration of patriotism, and the dark cloud overhead carried a silver lining that foretold the brightness of a coming dawn. That brightness was the 1.75 million Canadian men and women who saw service in wars in this country.

I use the beginning of World War II as an example. I can also use World War I as an example and I think I can do no better than to refer to a veteran who happens to be in my riding. I know him very well. He is 93 years of age and he served in Gallipoli and at Beaumont-Hamel. This gentleman's name is Mr. Ronald Dunn. He has just written a letter in which he points out that he is 93 and that he is paying $240 a month but expects that is going to change before too long. He goes on to say that: "you are now trying to save money by raising our rent to $420 a month."

There is a rationale, if you look at it as a chartered accountant or as a financial expert, which I suppose could make sense. I am not too sure it makes a lot of sense to Mr. Dunn who has a limited income and who now sees his rent being doubled with, to my understanding at this point, not much of a chance of phasing in.

To add to the feeling that is behind this, I want to quote some of the things that Mr. Dunn described from when he was serving as a young boy in Beaumont-Hamel, where as many people remember most of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment was wiped out, and in Gallipoli. I have only seen movies of Gallipoli and Mr. Dunn's description is very vivid.

He said: "We had a hard time of it, no question about it. You had to be iron to stand it. In the trenches were millions of black flies and crawlers swarming over the men's bodies. There was very little to eat. Toward the latter part of November, the rain came and filled the trenches. Following this, the snow fell and the freezing temperatures came. The men suffered from dysentery, diarrhea and lice. Some men died while others had to be taken from service to recuperate. These are the things the men had to face, besides fighting the Turks".

I could go on. I hope I have left a vivid thought of what our veterans went through. I am sure the minister will be happy to know I am not going to go into a long dissertation about how heartless and callous this particular cut was. I appreciate the position the minister must have been in when he had to give up his share of the budget because I understand that everybody was told they had to give something.

That is fair enough. But I think you draw a line at a certain point in time where you cannot give up something. In the case of veterans who are not represented except by politicians in the House of Commons, they cannot defend themselves. Thus it is up to the opposition to make the point that this was not a smart move. Morally, it was not a smart move in the sense of care. Quite frankly, I do not think it was even a politically smart move.

I want to quote now from a song or a verse. The members in the House may recall there was a song with the chorus: "And the band played Marching Matilda. I remember it. It is a very striking song and a very striking poem about a young boy who served at Gallipoli and who came back home to live. He had no legs when he got home. When he sat in his house and remembered all these things, he wished he had not lived. But he did write the song in which he talked about his joining as a boy and the hardships such as those which Mr. Dunn went through.

The last verse is very vivid. He talks about his memories now, as an old man. The last verse goes something like this: "And now every year I sit on my porch and I watch the parade pass before me. I watch my old comrades, how proudly they march, reliving their deeds of past glories. I watch my old comrades, tired, stiff and sore. They are forgotten heroes of a forgotten war. And the young people ask, 'What are they marching for'? And I ask myself the same question".

Mr. Speaker, they are marching to remind us that we have had peace, liberty and freedom for so long that we may forget that the price of that was blood. It is not any accident that the colour of the poppy is red. They are marching to remind us of their comrades who did not come home. They are marching to remind us, I suppose more than anything, to pay attention to letters like the one that we got from Mr. Ronald Dunn from Bonavista, who served at Gallipoli and Beaumont–Hamel. He ends up his letter by saying: "You are going to charge now $420 a month. Is this not a strange way of showing your appreciation for what we did? The money you save, will it be worth hurting us again? Haven't we suffered enough during and since the war? It seems to me as if we have to pay our debt all over again".

That is what we are marching for. I am quoting what the man himself said.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to thank the opposition critic for, once again, allowing me the opportunity to put some facts on the table for the public and to get the facts on the record as I did in the House on Friday.

I am finding that the more the veterans hear of the reasons for the changes, the more they understand why the changes were made. The Dominion President of the Royal Canadian Legion and the Chairman of the National Council of Veterans Association consider the charges we will be making for board and lodging to be fair and reasonable. They know the facts. I think it is important that we try to explain that tonight.

The changes in the charges for room and board are in the interest of ensuring equality of treatment among our veterans. More than 70 per cent of all non-pensioned veterans are presently paying $8 a day for room and board. The other 30 per cent are paying nothing because of inconsistent regulations. A lot of veterans have objected to this unequal treatment, and rightly so.

On April 1, 1990, everyone will pay the $240 a month. Every veteran will be treated the same in every province of Canada. I think the veterans would appreciate that. Once more, I must emphasize that all those in an institution because of war-related disabilities pay nothing now and are going to pay nothing after April 1, 1990, or in the future.

When the rates rise in April, 1991, they will be the lowest rates in any jurisdiction in Canada; $14 a day for room, meals, laundry, recreation and nursing care, and all the rest that they receive. That is nothing close to the $130 a day it really costs on average to maintain a veteran in a chronic care bed in Canada. That is $4,000 a month, or almost $50,000 a year.

I repeat the promise that veterans will not be worse off financially should they have to move out of their own homes and into an institution. Our income protection features will take care of that.

With regard to the Veterans Independence Program, I again appreciate the opportunity to tell the House with pride that our VIP payments have increased by 60 per cent this year alone. They will double in another four years. That is hardly what I call scrimping on our veterans.

I also want again to put to rest any fears veterans might have over the consequences of the removal of heavy housekeeping from our lengthy list of services under VIP. Should there be any legitimate health and safety requirement on the part of an individual for the provision of a service presently available under heavy housekeeping, we will make sure that particular service in reinstated.

I believe that even the hon. critic for the opposition will agree that no veteran need be alarmed by the removal of this one item from an extremely generous and far-sighted catalogue of services. I certainly hope he realizes that the changes which have been made are in the interest of fairness, equity and justice for our veteran community.

As Doug Fisher, who was a member of Parliament in this House and a noted columnist now, himself a veteran put it: "No nation has treated those who served in its wars more generously than Canada". That was true yesterday, it is true now and will be true in the future.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to elaborate on my question of February 7 to the Prime Minister. My question, which the minister responsible for ACOA addressed on the Prime Minister's behalf, dealt with the so-called rescue plan worked out by the federal and Nova Scotia governments with National Sea Products for the fish plant in Canso.

This agreement, which was made without consultation with the people of Canso or the fish plant workers there, essentially contributed some $3 million to National Sea Products, in return for which the company was going to keep the plant open at a bare minimum, employing some 150 workers for four months of the year, after which they would give up their work for another 150 for four months of the year and then they would all go on unemployment insurance. This is a reduction from an 800-person workforce.

The trawler port was to be closed and fish was to be trucked in to Canso. One element of the plan was to allow the company to not pay the severance benefits which were to be paid to workers, because previously the plant was to be shut down. The bail-out essentially allowed National Sea Products to improve its assets in Canso and to allow a certain portion of the workers to draw unemployment insurance benefits. As one of the local commentators described it: "If this is a rescue plan, heaven help the town they decide to abandon".

The deal was rejected by the labour unions, the representatives of the fish plant workers and the trawlermen, and it has been rejected as a cruel hoax by the people of Canso. More recently it has been repudiated publicly by none other than the Premier of Nova Scotia himself, which led many to wonder after reading the comments he made to the press two weeks ago if he was, in fact, awake when the so-called rescue plan was being worked out.

Now we have a new Minister of Fisheries, who began in a promising way by visiting Canso and who won high praise in the local press for doing so. He has since become, however, infected with the disease of his predecessor which is touting the company line and saying: "The problem is too many fishermen chasing too few fish, and there is nothing more that the government can do about it".

The implied message, of course, is: "Sorry, Canso, but this government does not believe that you have a future in the fishery. You will simply have to go the way of Schefferville." That is not good enough. It is not good enough for the fish plant workers in Canso. It is certainly not good enough for the trawler workers in Canso whose port will be closed as a result of this deal. That is the point that I want to address in the remainder of these remarks.

The minister for ACOA replied to my supplementary on February 7 by saying that I was advocating what he called an entirely new concept to fisheries port quotas. This is a good place to set the record straight on what I was advocating.

In fact, it is quite unnecessary to institute a whole new concept of fisheries management in order to satisfy the simple basic requirement that Canso trawlermen be allowed to land their fish in Canso. It merely requires that the Minister of Fisheries exercise his responsibilities under the Fisheries Act.

Section 7 of the Fisheries Act states subject to Section 2 the Minister of Fisheries may, in his absolute discretion, wherever the exclusive right of fishing does not already exist by law, issue or authorize to be issued leases or licences for fisheries or fishing wherever situated or carried on.

Under the enterprise allocation program, which is one of the components of the allocation of fish and fish licensing and which determines the allocation for offshore vessels, the minister can and in fact does attach conditions to the issuance of enterprise allocations.

In fact, he specifies the kinds of vessels and the number of vessels which can be fished under the licences. He can and does specify the fish that can be caught and where they can be caught, and the fishing gear.

He specifies a number of other matters. In the time remaining, the point I want to come to is that what is required of this Minister of Fisheries is simply that he attach a condition to the enterprise allocation which would oblige the fishing trawlers that fish out of Canso to land their fish in Canso, rather than land their fish somewhere else and truck it into Canso. That is entirely consistent with the Enterprise Allocation Program. The minister can do it. It is one of the simple recommendations which would preserve the Canso plant. It is the form of leadership which has been conspicuously lacking in this government.

We should not forget that when the Liberal government restructured the fishery back in 1982 it had a lot to say about National Sea Products and helped that company out in order to allow a fish plant in Canso to be maintained viable. What we need from this government is a commitment to communities such as Canso and to use a little bit of imagination in coming up with a program to save communities which have no other alternative but to remain in the fishery. That is what I am counting on the new Minister of Fisheries to provide.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by responding to the remarks the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso made with respect to the closing of the plant at Canso in the province of Nova Scotia.

I want to remind him and the people of Canso that when National Sea Products Limited announced the closure of the plant in December of 1989, there were to be no jobs at all. As a result of negotiations by the federal government, by the government of Nova Scotia with National Sea, a new arrangement was made whereby 150 jobs to be shared by 300 plant workers were created and were to be continued on a long-term basis.

Nobody suggested that this was an ultimate solution, but what it did was breathe hope and some life into what otherwise would have been a closed fish plant.

• (1950)

I want to remind the member, too, that in 1970 this same difficulty occurred when Acadia Fisheries closed down in Canso and the plant was left unoperated. It was only when the Government of Nova Scotia and other governments intervened to again breathe some life into the fish plant that a new life was created and the fish plant continued until this latest crisis.

I want to remind the member that there is some passage of time that has to be taken into account when one is being so critical of these attempts to revive what is obviously, by all agreement, a difficult situation.

Everyone has said since the beginning of this difficulty that there are no magic solutions. You do not need to take my word for that. That was the subject of a column in the Toronto Globe and Mail by Jeffrey Simpson who commented on the emergency debate on the Atlantic fisheries held in December of 1989. He pointed out that rhetoric provides no solution. He said:

> Rhetoric aside, the opposition's major alternative seemed to be to force National Sea Products—to spare the closed plants by spreading fish supplies around. How that could and should be done with a 1990 catch 45,000 tonnes below that of 1989 remained unaddressed, for the good reason that there is no answer.

That is the problem. There are no magic solutions. Do not take my word for it. It has been confirmed by a great many experts.

Let me deal very briefly with the matter of community quotas, or port quotas as the member called them. This arrangement has been dismissed by his own colleague in the Senate, Senator Michael Kirby, who was the author of the task force on Atlantic fisheries back in 1982. He said:

> The community quota scheme is completely irrational from an economic point of view since it implies, first, that all plants must be subsidized, and second, that capacity adjustment would not take place anywhere.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is not the government that is turning down community quotas or port quotas, it is his own colleague in the Senate of Canada advising against it. Notwithstanding that, the government is looking at this as it is looking at all solutions.

Let me end on a positive note. The Prime Minister of Canada was in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on March 6, 1990, and he reiterated his promise that there would be an assistance package for the Atlantic fishery. It will not just help Canso, it will help Lockeport and all the other areas that are suffering under this current plight in the Atlantic fisheries.

Let us get positive about this thing. Let us come to the House of Commons with solutions, not with empty rhetoric.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.53 p.m.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENT

TABLING AND REFERENCE OF APPOINTMENT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in both official languages an Order in Council appointment which was made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), this Order in Council is deemed referred to the appropriate standing committee.

FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

TABLING OF FIRST REPORT

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries, in both official languages.

This report refers to the Fisheries Committee and to the report on aquaculture in Canada prepared by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans which was tabled in the House in July 1988. The report asked the government to respond pursuant to the Standing Orders but the House dissolved before a reply was tabled.

Believing that this report on agriculture in Canada is still current, the committee asks the government to table a comprehensive response to this report, pursuant to Standing Order 109.

PETITIONS

PRAIRIE DROUGHT

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour on behalf of more than 2,000 farmers in southwestern Manitoba, most of them residing in my constituency of Brandon—Souris, to present a petition to the House of Commons noting that the crops in southwestern Manitoba were actually worse in 1989 than they were in 1988, the year in which the drought assistance program was available.

My petitioners very appropriately call for assistance either from the provincial or federal levels of government or preferably jointly, and they note that if this assistance is not forthcoming many farmers in our area will not survive. This, in turn, will have a very drastic impact of the whole of southwestern Manitoba.

In closing, I would like to add my very strong personal words of support to this very appropriate petition.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am today tabling a petition from Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Quebec, further to the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

Lebel-sur-Quévillon is undoubtedly an isolated community and for that reason, the signers of this petition consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inappropriate to the purpose of the northern tax benefit plan. It does not encourage settlement of the North and resource development there.

POST SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to present to this House 10 new petitions signed by students from Ottawa University who simply point out that overcrowded lecture halls, deteriorating laboratory equipment, a lack of library resources, the student-teacher ratio, the elimination of some curriculums as well as deteriorating buildings and facilities are a typical feature of Canada's postsecondary education system today.

Mr. Speaker, these students put forward a number of other arguments. On this basis, these citizens call upon Parliament and government to commit to holding a top level federal-provincial conference in order to establish the financial responsibilities of both levels of government with respect to postsecondary education and to put an end to the shameful neglect higher education has been subjected to in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by Canadians who are strongly opposed to the goods and services tax proposed by the Conservative government. They say that this tax is totally unfair and unjustified; that it will impose an extra burden on poor and lower income families; that it will raise inflation; that it will create serious difficulties for small business. Therefore, they humbly ask Parliament to reject this proposal to impose a 7 per cent goods and services tax on Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present several petitions from areas throughout the Algoma riding, including communities in Blind River and Elliot Lake, Espanola, Mindemoya, Tehkummah, and a number of other communities throughout the Manitoulin district of northern Ontario, in which they call on the government to withdraw the goods and services tax, even though it has been reduced from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. They point out that this will be very hard on senior citizens. It will increase the cost of goods and services in northern Ontario. It will be especially onerous to the tourist industry.

I hope the government will take these humble petitions from my constituents into account in its policy with regard to this tax.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions related to the northern tax benefit. They have different wordings, and I will be giving information to the House on the issue.

The first petition is from a number of people in the communities of Thompson, Pikwitonei, Snow Lake, Cross Lake, Ilford, York Landing, Norway House, Pukatawagan and Princess Harbour. In this particular petition they call upon the federal government to reject the recommendations of the task force on northern and isolated areas. They believe that we should develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program which recognizes the financial needs of people in northern and isolated areas.

I also have a petition strictly from the people of Thompson, Manitoba, expressing their concern with the situation that Thompson and Wabowden and Paint Lake have been left out of the northern tax benefit, even though they are definitely northern communities. They have been prescribed, as have communities in other northern areas like northern Alberta, northern Quebec, northern B.C.. They believe that the federal government has not paid attention to the northerness of their communities and that it is time these communities receive the full northern tax benefit as their neighbouring communities do.

In addition to that, after the task force on northern benefits made its report, we have another 772 names from The Pas, Flin Flon, Cranberry Portage, Cormorant, Moose Lake and Gillam. The people in these communities say that the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas, released Friday, October 27, fails to address the realities of the north, the high cost of living and working in these areas—the whole cost of isolation. They call upon Parliament to reject the recommendations of the report and to develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program which recognizes the financial needs of people in northern and isolated areas.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, there are people from The Pas, Manitoba who also set out a petition rejecting the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas. They again talk about the need for real tax benefits for people living in northern and isolated areas.

They call upon Parliament to reject the proposal of the task force and call upon the government to act in this area.

I wish Tory Conservative MPs would get up with their petitions on this issue and express their concern and outrage with what the task force on isolated areas has recommended, which is basically denying thousands of communities in northern Canada from receiving this benefit.

I have another petition from The Pas. I will not bore the Speaker by reading it, but it is along the same lines. The petitioners point out that the federal government task force is ignoring the north and it is time that we had action from the government to reinstate the full tax benefit for people in northern Canada.

I do not want to go through all my petitions today, but I do want to indicate that certainly in northern Manitoba there is a drastic reaction to the federal government and the task force proposals. I would expect the Parliamentary Secretary for the Government House Leader to get up with his petitions on the northern tax benefit as well.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to introduce petitions from two groups of people regarding child care. They are from the Canadian University Teachers. They represent 25,000 university faculty, professional librarians and researchers across Canada. They recognize the importance of child care for employment equity and accessibility to university programs and have a policy in their organization supportive of quality, accessible and affordable child care.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers has pleaded with this government to urge the minister to live up to the commitments of child care and to provide comprehensive, quality, accessible and affordable child care programs for Canadians.

These professionals are from New Brunswick to British Columbia. I am pleased to table this petition on their behalf.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of my constituents. They are concerned about the goods and services tax and all the ills of this particular initiative by the government.

Their main concern is that the imposition of this new general goods and services tax at any per cent will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. Also many small businessmen and women in my communities are very concerned that the imposition of this tax will create an administrative burden and an over-all burden on small business so that many of them, in fact, will have to go out of business.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36, certified as correct. One of them asks the Parliament of Canada and the House of Commons to take immediate and effective measures to secure Mr. Leo's release from jail. Mr. Wih-Sheh Leo, is a Canadian citizen who was arrested unlawfully and sentenced to ten months imprisonment for exercising his right to return to his native land and is currently under indictment on sedition charges, facing a minimum term of ten years imprisonment.

These petitioners humbly ask this Parliament to issue a public statement expressing Canada's concern over a Canadian citizen's rights being violated and to instruct the Canadian embassy in Japan and the High Commissioner's office in Hong Kong to send a representative to Taiwan, to appoint a lawyer to handle the case, and to request Canada's allies which have representatives in Taiwan to assist with the case.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on behalf of many residents in Toronto in my riding of Eglinton—Lawrence who add their petitions to those I submitted to the Minister of Finance from Katz's Deli in my riding.

• (1120)

They, too, object vehemently to the imposition of the 7 per cent GST, and they join with many other Canadians across the nation today and the rest of this week in calling 1-900-720-6052 to register their protest to the imposition of this most unjust of tax.

Mr. Allmand: What is that number?

Mr. Volpe: It is 1-900-720-6052.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. government House leader.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 57, I move:

> That debate on the motion of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons in relation to amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, and on any amendment proposed thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House resumed from Monday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and the amendment of Mr. Gauthier (p.9099).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls. The hon. member has 12 minutes left for debate.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, in moving closure, the Government of Canada has just moved closure on 1,090,000 Canadians who are now collecting unemployment insurance benefits that average $215.88 a week. The government has just moved closure on perhaps the poorest group of people in Canada, who cannot make ends meet, and this government, supported by these Tory members here today, has just approved of a bill that not only will increase the qualifying periods but will decrease the period of time that these people can collect unemployment insurance.

Just imagine, $215.88 a week, Canadian average, and the big bully Government of Canada is going ahead with this bill and moving closure in this Chamber. The government claims that it is going to streamline the unemployment insurance scheme and it is going to increase the training component. On the one hand, the government is out of touch and on the other hand it is out of mind.

The government, in moving closure, is saying that people throughout Canada will need to be living in an area of less than 15 per cent unemployment in order to maintain the repeater provision of 10 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance. The present law is for 11.5 per cent unemployment. This means that now, with the drawing of all these lines, it will depend upon which side of the line you live on. That is what will determine whether you will collect unemployment insurance or not.

Just imagine the discrimination involved in that. The majority of the people who live in rural areas, in the case of Newfoundland and Labrador, do not work where they live. If they work as a group, either on the ocean, in a mine or in the forest, when they go to register for unemployment insurance the question that will be asked is "Where do you live?" because where they live will determine whether they collect unemployment insurance.

Prior to this bill, 11.5 per cent was the cut-off point. Now, under this Tory government, it is 15 per cent and that is going to mean three different rates in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Then the government says it is going to increase the money for training. What a silly proposal this government brought in in 1984. Since 1984 this group of Tories approved training programs that say that if you are an unemployed logger living in a logging community and there is a job-creation project in your community which has to do with cutting wood, you cannot go to work on it because you are already trained to cut wood. If you are laying a pipe under the ground that is a part of the water system in your community, as dozens of communities are in Newfoundland, you put in a part of the water system and you apply next year for this so-called training program of the federal government. The government says: "Oh, no. They have already been trained as ditch diggers. You can't go to work two years in a row training to be a ditch digger, so your project does not qualify anymore."

In various places in Newfoundland and Labrador we have communities with half a waterline under the ground. Just imagine half a waterline under the ground. The pipe is half in in the community. It was put there prior to this government coming to office. I can name the communities for you, Mr. Speaker. The pipe is half under the ground in Whale's Gulch, Valleypond and Hillgrade.

This government came into office and said: "Every single job creation program funded by the federal government of Canada from this moment on has to be a training program. We can't train you again to dig a ditch so therefore you can't have any more money to put in your waterline." Shame on the Government of Canada for making a decision like that. Shame on the Minister of Employment and Immigration who stands in the Chamber and says: "We want more money to put into a program."

The government says to these communities which have part of a waterline underground: "If you want to build a building, you can build a building." The communities want to finish their waterlines, but they cannot do that. The Government of Canada says: "No. That waterline is half done under the ground. You already trained the workforce in the area to dig the ditches. Therefore we will now give you money to train them to be carpenters but you are not allowed to hire any carpenters."

Just imagine the upheaval in that particular community. Imagine the group of working people in that community for whom, under this new legislation, whether they will qualify or not for unemployment insurance depends upon which side of the line they live on. If they do not qualify, a fellow will say that he now needs 16, meaning 16 weeks. If he does not have enough for the 16 then he will have to go on a 26, which is a training program. If he does qualify, he will go on a 25. That is the Government of Canada today: If you need an extra two or three, you can go on a 26, and if you qualify, you can go on a 25.

When the Government of Canada came into power in 1984, under a Tory principle it said to every community in rural Canada that was developing its water system: "You can't get any more money for that, but we'll give you money to waste. We'll give you money to do anything else, but you can't do it two years in a row." That is the training program the government promised in 1984. It promised that under its training component it was going to give unemployment insurance to everybody who was in a registered school of instruction for a vocation. In other words, everybody who was in a post-secondary institution who qualified for unemployment insurance under the Tory plan in 1984 was going to be able to collect unemployment insurance.

What do we see today? Today we see one of the most discriminatory systems of payment for training ever in effect in the country. Two individuals sit in a vocational school. They worked together and both are laid off. One is receiving unemployment insurance and the other does not qualify. A full 50 per cent of those people who applied for unemployment insurance under a promise of this government in 1984 do not qualify for that unemployment insurance.

The Government of Canada now comes along and says: "Now we have got a new system. It is now going to depend on what side of the line you live on," because it is now 15 per cent unemployment in effect and not 11.5 per cent.

Mr. Reid: Tell that to the people of Goobies.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member across is saying: "Say that to the people of Goobies". It just so happens that the line is at a community called Goobies. People who live in rural areas are walking into unemployment insurance offices and being asked what side of the line they live on. I would suggest that with such a program the Government of Canada is encouraging people to buy mobile homes. This bill should not see the light of day.

Under Standing Order 26(1) I move:

That the House continue to sit during the lunch hour today for the purpose of continuing debate on this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Fifteen members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2) the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on April 11, 1989, I rose in this House to introduce this government's labour force development strategy.

I rise now, almost one year later, to underline the continued commitment of this government, and of the people of Canada, to that strategy. I will not reiterate the extensive procedural views expressed by the government House leader yesterday, but I would urge all members to review his very clear statement outlining how the other place has transgressed all of its traditional constitutional powers with this message.

Liberal senators claim that they cannot pass Bill C-21 which the House sent them. They claim they have serious reservations about what the government proposes to do in the fields of training and unemployment insurance. What is it that we want to do as a government which so unsettles them? We want to improve the social benefits available through UI.

We want to ensure that unemployment insurance provides incentives for claimants to work. We want to adjust the financing of the programs so that those who benefit also pay a fair share and we want to increase the training available to Canadian workers. Those are our goals. What are their goals? Their goal is political theatrics.

[Translation]

The Liberal senators will say to whoever wants to listen that the government drafted this bill in the conviction that the unemployed are lazy and should be punished. Nothing could be further from the truth. This bill is based on the assumption that people really want to work and that they must acquire new skills to play a worthwhile role in a fast-changing economy.

[English]

Bill C-21 is based on the assumption that the strategy of throwing money at the unemployed denies them the chance to break out of a cycle of UI dependence that has gone on in this country through generations of Liberal governments. In a climate characterized by the sorts of political games which Liberal senators seem to favour, it is difficult to see their amendments as sincere attempts to improve this bill. Indeed, most of their recommendations are not even new.

However, the government has reviewed the message offered by the Senate and as stated by the leader of the government in this House, and we can support the intent of some of the recommendations. Identification of literacy as a training need, more detail in our development plan, more explicit protection for the system of benefits for self-employed fishermen are all amendments that we can support.

However, I think that hon. members will agree with me that many of the recommendations of the Liberal senators represent an assault on the taxpayer and an assault on the rights of this elected House. By their own admission, Liberal senators suggest that the most significant recommendations are those related to the funding of UI by the federal government.

Recommendations 7 and 9 would cost taxpayers at least $1.5 billion each and every year. Is this not an assault on the rights of the House? Of course it is. And I should not have to remind members that we simply do not have that kind of money as a government and as taxpayers and as the people of Canada. It is an affront to the rights of this House to have appointed senators attempt to dictate spending to us. Senators have no right to force us to raise taxes or increase the deficit.

[Translation]

While we must improve the skills of Canadian workers in order to compete effectively with other countries, we must also continue to put our financial house in order. The Liberal senators, however, want us to finance a major part of regular unemployment insurance benefits and the majority of benefits paid to self-employed fishermen, realizing all the while that this will only increase the deficit.

[English]

Now perhaps that understanding is lost on Liberal senators who only remember how to spend other people's money. It is not lost on this government that has proposed many improvements to UI within a context of fiscal reality. That is the reason we are asking employers and workers to fund the insurance system from which they benefit. It is not the unemployed who pay, it is the employed and their employers, and it is the latter who pay the lion's share.

I must also reject the scare stories spread by the Liberals that we are privatizing UI, whatever that may mean. The federal government will continue to play a key role in managing this vital program. As we consult with employers and workers on UI policies we will ensure that UI continues to reflect the legitimate needs of workers and employees, but we will also seek their input into the solutions. In short, recommendations from Liberal senators on these topics are completely unacceptable.

Let me now turn to the issue of increasing penalties for workers who quit jobs without just cause. Liberal senators have directly contradicted a basic aspect of this bill with their recommendation on this issue. Senators seem to have decided that anybody who quits a job probably had no choice. Let me quote Senator Norbert Thériault on this issue. He said:

> Those are personal decisions and decisions that would only be made with good reason.

But that is not why previous Liberal governments felt it necessary to impose harsher penalties on those who quit without good reason. It was a Liberal government that initiated this principle. However, members of this House understand that while some workers do have good reason to quit, others do not. That was the purpose for improving the just cause provisions in Bill C–21.

Strengthening the law to ensure that people who quit jobs without just cause cannot as quickly get unemployment insurance was a change which this House approved. That change alone will save $450 million per year, money which could be put to better use within the UI system.

But Liberal senators seem to believe that spending $1.1 billion a year in benefits to people who are fired for misconduct or who quit their jobs without just cause is an appropriate use of UI funds. I may point out that we are almost the only country in the world that would tolerate such a thing.

The impact of this incentive and the general tightening of entrance requirements and benefit duration was best summarized by a witness before the Senate committee, Mr. Patrick Grady of Global Economics. He estimated that passage of Bill C–21 would result in reduction of the unemployment rate by up to 1 per cent. Now, is the other side not interested in lower unemployment rates in this country?

The next group of recommendations from the Senate that I want to discuss does three things. First, it rejects the decision made by this House to invest UI funds in developmental uses for people. Second, it rejects the decision of this House to recognize the difference between counselling decisions and financial or legal decisions. Third, it restricts our ability to be innovative within the UI program. Some senators think that everything that has been done in the past should be frozen there forever.

None of these recommendations is acceptable and I will explain why. A critical component of the Labour Force Development Strategy is the counselling of UI claimants that takes place in Canada Employment Centres. Employment counsellors work with claimants as partners to determine the best approach to meet individual employment needs. It is counselling that helps people find jobs, as I would point out to some of the shouting voices over there, who are not even prepared to listen.

Among the tools claimants and counsellors will use in this process are the developmental programs such as training and relocation and entrepreneurship that this bill would allow; training, relocation and entrepreneurship being things the other side is against. These are designed to use UI funds to give people a break, to give them the skills and opportunities to break out of the UI cycle. We believe that a small investment now is better for the individual and will save years of future UI costs.

The costs of training courses, the ability to capitalize benefits and the ability to help claimants move to areas of greater employment opportunities are all aspects of an active employment policy. That does not necessarily mean moving to another province. It does mean moving within one's own region when there are opportunities available.

Our original decision to pay for support costs like these from the UI account was based on the understanding that these are costs that represent a short run cost and a long term saving to the UI account, and are a far greater benefit to the individual UI claimant. For that reason, we cannot accept the recommendations which would eliminate many of these investments from the UI account.

[Translation]

As far as the second question is concerned, the decisions made at the time of counselling are not legal ones. Counselling is a complex process which consists in helping a claimant make the right decisions about his future.

Referral to a training course is a major decision which costs taxpayers thousands of dollars. It is not like a routine purchase at the corner store.

The House showed it understood this when it agreed to simplify the Unempoyment Insurance Act and establish clearly that claimants cannot appeal decisions relating to training or other developmental uses.

• (1230)

This House also realizes that an arbitration board cannot possibly assess, during a 30-minute hearing, all the complexities involved in many hours of counselling, trial runs and reflection on the part of the claimant and the counsellor with whom he or she works.

[English]

The third flaw in this group of recommendations is the desire of Liberal senators to restrict our ability to develop new approaches in aiding the unemployed.

The UI Act is quite precise in its definitions and 50 years of jurisprudence have made that even more exact. However, if we want to encourage innovative and active programming, a basic belief in this bill, then we need some latitude for special cases, and that is what the senators want to restrict.

Let me give an example. Under the current law a claimant who loses her job and decides to start a business to use her skills would be cut off UI automatically. This bill gives us the flexibility that we need to implement new uses for UI funds which our trading partners are finding so successful now and which is happening in other imaginative systems around the world.

The last group of recommendations should give all members of this House cause for concern. This is a very important matter.

Need I remind hon. members that in recent years, the Liberal senators have constantly sought ways to obstruct the work of the elected House. This message is a brazen attempt to increase their powers.

The Liberal senators want the power to impose changes in regulations and plans on the elected government. The Liberal senators sent us a series of recommendations that in effect would allow them to turn down the proposed amendments to the regulations on fishermen's benefits. They also worded their message in such a way that, with some clever parliamentary manoeuvring, they would be able to reject the government's plan to use unemployment insurance funds for training purposes.

This House cannot accept amendments that would give non-elected senators the power constantly to obstruct the wishes of the elected House.

[English]

The more pernicious action can be found inherent in recommendations 7 and 9 of the Liberals in the Senate. Members will know the parliamentary rule that the Senate may not increase taxes or expenditures, but the recommendation from the Senate seeks to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. Liberal Senators have decided that they have the right to stop the elected government from controlling the deficit by controlling government spending. Liberal Senators have decided that they can say and that they have the right to say that the government must continue every program, every legal obligation it has ever had but, if taxes have to go up to pay for it, it is not their problem.

Let me quote Senator Thériault again: "If the GST has to be 10 per cent then they must tell the people it has to be 10 per cent. They should not destroy a fundamental program."

This House must tell Senator Thériault and his unelected colleagues that the government, democratically elected, is accountable to the Canadian people and nobody knows that better than we do. It is accountable for the taxes it levies and for the programs it administers and that government elected must have the ability to control its spending.

Let us be clear on one thing. Real leadership implies accountability, and accountability is what is at issue here. Canadians know the economic reality facing this government and this country. They have no patience for political games. Even The Toronto Star, my neighbourhood newspaper, recognizes the tactics of the senators for what they are. It stated: "To hog tie the government with billion dollar amendments that would wreak havoc on its deficit fighting strategy is little more than political grandstanding and obstructionism."

Unlike the Liberal senators, this government has made real decisions. It has chosen to consolidate the safety net that unemployment insurance provides and to improve the system, in recognition of the fact that Canada must do what all industrialized countries are doing.

I may remind hon. members that during all this time we have spent considering the bill, our economic partners have spent billions of dollars to increase the skills of their workers. If we accept this message, Canada will surely fall behind even more, compared with its competitors.

[English]

Let me conclude by reminding the House that 50 years ago unemployment insurance was developed to provide income to workers who had lost their jobs. The bill which is again before us continues that role. UI will still be there to provide income to workers who lose their jobs, but we wanted to do much, much more.

This government is well aware of the important challenges facing Canada in the international economy and facing the future of Canadian workers. It knows that a well trained workforce is a critical part of meeting that challenge and providing stability and security for Canadian workers.

We believe that the principles behind the proposed changes to unemployment insurance are sound. The changes themselves are moderate ones. I firmly believe that this House should reply to the message from the Senate by saying that if it agrees that UI should become a more effective program which provides better benefits to parents and older workers, which increases incentives to work, which responds to the fiscal realities of today and which, above all, helps train and retrain Canadian workers to provide them with a better future, then pass the original bill which this House sent to you and let this government make those improvements now, nearly one year after we began this exercise.

I urge all hon. members to vote in favour of this motion by the government House leader.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the amendments proposed here by the other place to Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

During the 1988 election campaign the Conservatives promised Canadians that the unemployment insurance system was a sacred trust and that there were absolutely no plans to change it. Scarcely six months later the Minister of Employment and Immigration confessed that yes the government would be making major changes to the system. Indeed the changes proposed were so major as to alter the face of the system altogether and divert it from its original purpose.

When Canadians appeared before the committee they pointed out the numerous flaws of the proposed new system. They tried to explain to the government how devastating the changes would be to unemployed workers all across the country, and they conveyed the sense of betrayal that Canadians felt knowing that the government had broken yet another promise but also that the government was not listening.

We have before us today the amendments proposed by members in the other place, changes that recognize the government's stated intention of deficit reduction but which also recognize the needs and the dignity of unemployed Canadians. Many of those Canadians who have special needs reside in Atlantic Canada, and it is on behalf of those people in particular that I speak today.

My colleagues and I have risen in this House countless times to voice the concerns of Atlantic Canadians, and I will do so once again because I hope that by dogged persistence we can finally make the government understand what it proposes to do to these people as nothing else seems to be working.

• (1240)

Times have never been easy on Canada's Atlantic coast. The region has always depended on an overwhelmingly seasonal resource based economy. For instance, the economy of my province of Prince Edward Island is dependent upon fishing, farming and tourism. Because our economy is seasonal unemployment insurance is an integral part of that economy. We do not like it but that is the way it is.

For example, in 1988 Prince Edward Island received over $138 million in unemployment insurance benefits. That is approximately $1,076 for every man, woman and child in that province. Compare that to the $422 per capita on the average in Canada.

Approximately one out of every five Islanders in the labour force relied on UI benefits at some point during the year. As a matter of fact, the UI program contributes more money to the provincial economy than many of our industries. That gives some idea of the vital role that unemployment insurance plays in the lives of Islanders and indeed of all Atlantic Canadians. That is why, when the government announced its intention to stop its contribution to the fund as of January 1990, Atlantic Canada went into shock. That is why such a decision can be viewed only as yet another step in the federal government's gradual abandonment of Atlantic Canada. By cutting out some $2 billion from the program and by diverting remaining funds to vague "training programs", the government is removing a major pillar of the regional economy.

Members of the other place realized the devastation that the passage of this legislation as is would wreak. That is why they proposed in their report that the government continue to ensure regionally extended benefits. One-half of the value of those weeks of benefits paid when the regional unemployment rate is over 6 per cent would continue to be funded from general revenues, and not from the UI account which will consist of employer and employee contributions only. In this way the government will not be able to avoid its responsibility for high regional unemployment.

Bill C-21 proposes to divert funds intended for income maintenance to training programs. This is a praiseworthy goal; no one would deny that. However Canadians want to see some substance behind those lofty words. They want proof that the government has devoted a great deal of thought to what achieving this goal really means. They want to see that the government understands how the Canadian economy is developing before they trust it to divert these funds for developmental uses.

What kind of economy is emerging in Canada? Last month the Economic Council of Canada released a study entitled "Good Jobs, Bad Jobs: Employment in the Service Economy". This respected organization concluded that Canada will experience a continued trend toward service industry jobs. The services which have the most potential to stimulate regional economies are called "dynamic services" that include transportation infrastructures, telecommunication systems, municipal infrastructures, financial services and business consulting services. These are the areas which will see the greatest job creation and the most growth.

However the council concludes that these dynamic services are overwhelmingly located in the large centres such as Toronto, Vancouver and Calgary. Perhaps jobs are being created every day in Canada. We know they are. but what the government does not like to admit when reeling off impressive statistics is that these jobs are located in just a very few centres.

For example, in Prince Edward Island unemployment has continued to soar. We currently have a rate of 16.2 per cent, the same as our neighbouring province of Newfoundland. We want to know: Where are the jobs that the Prime Minister loves to boast about?

The council goes on to state in its report that it expects that the good, well paying jobs will continue to be concentrated in large cities, a trend which will widen regional disparities.

Job creation tends toward the high skill, high paying jobs which we have already stated are concentrated in large cities. The low skill, low paying jobs, if we get them, these are the ones that the regions have. Are Atlantic Canadians supposed to be happy with the crumbs from central Canada's table? That is the message from a government which gears its fiscal policy toward the overheated economy of southern Ontario at the expense of the rest of the country.

Since the government has not yet proven itself capable of developing and managing a realistic, effective, full employment strategy, it will be understood why unemployed Canadians are skeptical and nervous when the government sings the praises of training.

Another sign that the government seems to have forgotten how the Atlantic Canada works is the changes it would make to the entrance requirements and the duration of benefits. Once again the seasonal economy dictates that it is almost impossible for many Atlantic Canadians to find full-time year-round work. This government's ministers should spend some time on the east coast, and then they would find out that it is virtually impossible to fish in the wintertime, to grow crops in the wintertime, and that the tourists cannot enjoy our beaches at that time of year. We did not plan it that way, but it is that way nonetheless.

As a result, many workers barely scrape together the number of weeks of insurable earnings they need to qualify for the benefits. When they have qualified they need all of the weeks of benefits they can get to see them through. This money does not go toward vacations in Florida or fancy cars, as the government's blame the victim mentality would suggest. No, no. Instead, this money goes to pay the rent, to buy food, to buy clothing, and to educate their family.

Almost as important is the vital role that UI benefits play in local economies. When central industries such as fishing, farming and tourism shut down for a great part of the year, individual workers are not the only ones who face lean times. Local businesses and service industries need the stimulation that the UI benefits provide in order to survive, much less thrive. If these businesses falter not only do the owners and managers and their families suffer; so do the people whose employment depends directly or indirectly on these industries.

I am saying all of this in an effort to make the government realize what an integral, essential role UI funds play in every aspect of Atlantic Canadian life. UI moneys are a vital link in our economy simply because of the nature of that economy. If that link weakens or disappears the whole chain will weaken or even disintegrate.

The government's proposed new structure for eligibility and benefit duration provides damning evidence that the government fails to understand the facts I have just outlined or, even worse and hopefully not true, it just does not care. The proposed changes make little or no sense.

Under Bill C-21 the maximum duration of benefits would be reduced in most instances, except in cases where claimants have acquired a very large number of weeks work and reside in an area of very high unemployment. What are the chances of that combination? Virtually none. This totally unrealistic picture of the economy is further reflected in the relationship between benefit duration and regional unemployment rates which the government would impose. Three weeks of benefits would be paid for each percentage point interval of unemployment between 6 per cent and 8 per cent. This would increase to four weeks for each point interval between 8 per cent and 12 per cent. It would decrease to two weeks for each point interval between 12 per cent and 16 per cent.

What it boils down to—and I really wonder if the people who designed this new system bothered to test their model at all—is that the region of St. John's, Newfoundland with an unemployment rate of 12.4 per cent will lose up to 11 weeks of benefits, while the region of Toronto with a rate below 4 per cent will lose a maximum of three weeks. This makes absolutely no sense, and that is the bottom line.

The government must follow the recommendation of the other place and moderate these changes. As well benefits in regions with very high unemployment, which means most of the Atlantic region, must not be reduced.

One group of Atlantic Canadians who are especially concerned about the government's confusing plans are the fishermen. I should not have to remind any member of the House of the severe crisis that industry is already in. We need only think of Canso, Lockeport, Gaultois, Grand Bank, and Trepassey to call up images of the trauma afflicting the people who depend on the fishery for their livelihoods and for the life-blood of their communities.

Now more than ever fishermen and their families need the support of the unemployment insurance program. In 1956 the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended to extend coverage to self-employed fishermen. In fact fishermen's premiums are paid directly into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and not into the unemployment insurance fund. This means that they are not actually protected by the program. Rather, the government is responsible for making up the difference between the premiums paid and the benefits collected.

Every unemployed person in Canada is fearing the loss of the UI support system, but no one has more reason to be worried than the fishermen. Bill C–21 would place the full cost of fishermen's benefits on the UI fund. By withdrawing its contribution to this fund, the government is placing the future of the fishermen's benefit at great risk. The government has promised that these benefits are safe. Well we all know how the government keeps its promises. If it truly wants to reassure the fishermen of Atlantic Canada, the government will not balk at taking concrete steps to protect the benefits as recommended by the amendments here today.

For that matter, if this government's true goal is positive reform of unemployment insurance, it will not balk at any of the amendments proposed here today. They are moderate, sensible and sensitive to both the government's professed goal of deficit reduction and to the needs and the dignity of unemployed Canadians.

It is for this reason that I fully support these amendments and I urge the government to support them as well.

I move:

That the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of the motion now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the hon. member. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Fifteen or more members have risen. Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the motion by our hon. House leader. The amendments to Bill C–21 contained in the message from the other place with very few exceptions are fundamentally in conflict with the intention of the government's bill.

It is the duty of the government to review old legislation and programs and revise others to make them current and responsive to the needs of the times. To do anything less would be to abrogate or ignore our responsibilities and the trust placed in us through the democratic process.

When in November 1988 Canadians cast a ballot, they cast a very decisive ballot in favour of the Progressive Conservative Party. This was not a timid or a tentative vote. The voters gave the Prime Minister's Tories a definite majority, and that majority decision carried with it a compelling message: exercise the franchise that you have been given and exercise it with leadership to get this country's economy back in order. Every member of this government caucus has taken that message to heart. We have all pledged to pursue the action asked for by Canadians when they so resoundingly endorsed a second Conservative majority.

No one in this House has been more conscientious in following that dictate than the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration. She was one of the very first off the mark last April 11, 1989 with new legislation designed to improve the unemployment insurance system vastly and to make it more responsive and better serve the needs of Canadians in the 1990s.

Bill C–21 is responsive to regional disparities while it reflects the need to make the system more self–sufficient. Bill C–21 recognizes that life in the 1990s will require new skills as our use of technology gains momentum. Bill C–21 also responds to the fact that there are changing roles in family life where both spouses play an active role in raising the children as well as in earning a living.

All these measures and many others were carefully devised by a caring and a conscientious minister who was anxious, as I said before, to respond to today's needs in today's society. We cannot continue with old programs simply because they are in place and expect them to be responsive to the needs of people in the 1990s. She worked swiftly and acted decisively in the interests of Canadians who were vulnerable to the changing employment patterns.

On November 6, 1989 this House passed Bill C–21, and it did so in plenty of time for its benefits to begin flowing during the depths of winter when traditionally those benefits are needed the most.

What happened? Did the unemployed receive their benefits when they needed them most in the depths of winter when things were tough? I wish I could say that was true, but sadly I must report that the answer is no and it seems that the answer is no because some Liberal members in the other place decided to make a mockery of the democratic process and delay the bill to embarrass, harass and intimidate this government.

At any rate this is certainly the perception and regrettably the facts surrounding the circumstances testify to the idea that that perception is indeed true.

We were told by the people in the other place that they were setting up a special committee to hear from Canadians who had not testified before the government's legislative committee. Apparently these are going to be brand new people with brand new ideas, but what happened? We learned that the special committee consulted 54 witnesses whose views had already been made known to the House legislative committee.

What was the point of that? Why go through the exercise, not to mention the expense of hearing all those witnesses? Why do this if the Senate was really committed and really interested in hearing this testimony and hoping to find something of value in it? It was on the record already and they could simply have gone through the records. Added to this the 54 people in question were well–known opponents of the government's bill. They certainly were not experts on unemployment insurance management and they were not experts on the topic of re–employment strategy, so what was the point?

As the minister pointed out when she met the committee a short time later, the records show that these efforts did not identify a single issue of any substance in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have 15 minutes left in her debate when we come back after question period.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the recent decision by the National Gallery of Canada to spend $1.8 million—nearly two–thirds of the Gallery's $3 million annual acquisition budget—to purchase a canvas by an American painter has left Canadian artists somewhat disenchanted and greatly discouraged. Canadian people in general are wondering.

With everything that has traditionally drawn Canada together, such as VIA Rail, the CBC, and language tolerance, being under great strain, would it not have been an appropriate time for an institution of national cultural expression to have promoted the works of Canadian artists? Would the government give Canadians some assurance that it will intercede in this ill–timed purchase and stop payment on the $1.8 million cheque, if that is necessary?

TRIBUTE TO PETER STASTNY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, a major event occurred in the area of professional sports which resulted in Quebecers being separated, temporarily I hope, from a great Canadian, a great Quebecer and a great star.

Mr. Peter Stastny, this highly skillful hockey player, has dominated his sport for nearly 10 years and has been recognized as one of the greatest in the world.

Today, on behalf of the people of the Greater Quebec City area, I wish to thank this exemplary athlete for the great times we had because of him. I also wish to emphasize his qualities as a dedicated man and a good citizen who spent much time and energy representing several charitable organizations.

As soon as he arrived in this country, he made up his mind that he would learn French and English, both languages he now speaks fluently. Mr. Stastny realized what a great many politicians and former politicians are unwilling or fail to understand, namely, Quebec's special identity within Canada.

I salute this remarkable citizen and wish him, on behalf of the people of Quebec and the rest of Canada, many more years of tremendous success.

REPUBLIC OF HAITI

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, today a new president takes office in the Republic of Haiti, the fifth in four years. Not only must we wish her well, we must urge and support her in any efforts to bring democratic elections and government to a country whose government has been at best anarchic for the past four years.

Last week, as a private citizen, I visited Haiti. It is a beautiful country populated by warm and hospitable people. It is a country that shows what absence of effective government can mean: inadequate services and infrastructure, roads in a state of utter disrepair, high prices, under-utilized though relatively abundant resources, and excessive dependence on imports.

Canadians have natural cultural and democratic ties with the people of Haiti. Today, our Haitian friends very much need our help and our support.

Canada must send a clear sign that it is prepared to support the development of democratic government in Haiti and to support and encourage it tangibly with an indication of our willingness to restore bilateral agreement aid as soon as the new government demonstrates its commitment to democracy through tangible action.

CANADIAN VETERANS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the recent budget chose as one of its targets our Canadian veterans. The government has cut $35 million to a group of Canadians who have already paid their dues.

As a result of the budget thousands of our veterans will pay more than $3,000 each for lodging. This is a result of the government's update of board and lodging charges for veterans in long-term care.

Cuts to the Veterans Independence Program mean that thousands of veterans who are still living at home will lose assistance for heavy housecleaning.

It is ironic that when Canada needed the service of brave and courageous Canadians our veterans were there. Now, when our veterans need the services of the Canadian government, it turns around and cuts assistance to them.

Remembrance Day is the day that we pay respect to those who died in battle and for those who will always bear the scars of wartime. We wear the poppy as a symbol of remembrance, respect and endless thanks for our veterans. Given the recent cuts to our veterans the Minister of Finance does not deserve the right to wear a poppy on Remembrance Day when he so quickly forgets what it really means.

CHILE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, this past Sunday marked an historic occasion in Chile as an elected civilian government headed by President Patricio Aylwin took over power from the military dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet. The Pinochet government came to power in 1973 as a result of a violent coup overthrowing and murdering President Salvador Allende. For the past 16 years the Chilean people have been subjected to the murder, torture and jailing of thousands of Chileans at the hands of the dictatorship.

With this change in government the brutality and abuses of the Pinochet regime are hopefully at an end. Already we see the fruits of liberalization as President Aylwin has granted pardon to prisoners of conscience and pledged to dismantle the repressive elements of Pinochet's rule.

Events in Chile also further the trend towards democracy in Latin America, a trend that will not be complete, however, until we can be assured that the military men of these new democracies are truly under civilian control.

I am sure all Canadians join together in congratulating the Aylwin government upon assuming power. We must lend it our support as it works to stabilize the democratic process and to control the military still led by General Pinochet.

This can be done, in part, by contributing to the new social solidarity fund established by the government, designed to support the poorest in Chile and provide essential health, education and housing needs. The Canadian government should consider such a contribution.

TAX REFORM

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, all three parties and most Canadians agree that the federal manufacturers' sales tax is a bad tax that has to go.

Indeed, some two years ago the all-party Commons finance committee recommended a multi-stage sales tax to be imposed on the broadest possible base. Yet today those in opposition are falling all over each other in their lust to be seen as the party most against the GST.

Canadians want more than criticism. They want choices. Canadians are asking: Where do the opposition parties stand? What alternatives do they have?

The Liberals want to study the matter some more. Forty years of study is not enough for them. In opposition, just as in government, they cannot take a decision.

Procrastination is not an alternative. Keeping the old FMST is not good enough. It is time to go forward with the GST as the only practicable, workable sales tax reform for Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, the Mulroney government collected about $8 billion from Canadians with the manufacturers' sales tax. In 1991, if the goods and services tax replaces the manufacturers' sales tax, the government will collect not $8 billion, not $18 billion, but $23 billion on this tax alone—three times the amount collected in 1984 when this Tory government came to power.

The GST is the largest tax grab in Canadian history. The people of Canada realize this. Seventy-one per cent of Canadians are opposed to the GST, and still this government insists on implementing this unfair regressive tax. When will this government listen?

The Liberal party will not turn its back on the people of Canada. The Liberal party wants the voices of Canadians to be heard. This week throughout the country Canadians can dial 1-900-720-6052 to register their opposition to the goods and services tax.

The people of Canada will not sit idly by while the over consumption of this government shrinks the pocket books of all Canadians. Canadians from east to west will dial 1-900-720-6052 and register their "No" vote for the goods and services tax.

Scrap the tax. Dial 1-900-720-6052.

TRIBUTE TO GÉRALDINE DOUCET

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): For many people, Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Géraldine Doucet is the kind of person who is always involved in a great number of activities such as the Jerry Lewis Telethon as well as the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation and Canadian Cancer Society fund raising campaigns.

Because of her participation in Quebec's entertainment industry and her involvement in various voluntary organizations such as Big Brothers and Big Sisters, she was recently appointed president of the Quebec Canada Day Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I know that Mrs. Doucet has all the necessary qualities and a solid experience of community involvement, and which in my opinion make her the ideal choice. I extend my congratulations to Mrs. Doucet and I wish her well.

CROP INSURANCE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Premier of Saskatchewan today announced that Saskatchewan farmers who participated in crop insurance will receive an additional $58 million in mid-April. The payment is the result of the multi-year disaster benefit program. The program provides cash to areas of Saskatchewan that have suffered two consecutive crop failures. This is an important part of the farm safety net program that will provide money to farmers when they need it most.

Over 12,000 farmers will receive an average of close to $5,000 each. This is an important first step in ensuring that Saskatchewan farmers can get this year's crop in the ground.

On behalf of our members of Parliament and farm related business in Saskatchewan, I congratulate our Deputy Prime Minister and the Premier of Saskatchewan for concluding the details of this much needed program.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, the arrogance of the Mulroney government is absolutely astounding. While it is telling Canadians they must do their part to fight the deficit, this government is spending $111 million to sell a regressive, merciless tax on a population that does not want it. This tax, after 31 other increases, is the largest tax grab in the history of Canada.

The Liberal party is giving Canadians a chance to be counted in the fight against the GST. This is anti-GST week. Canadians can register their disapproval by picking up the phone and calling 1-900-720-6052. That registers their "No" vote to the GST.

Yesterday, the finance committee chairman stated that this electronic petition means nothing. That is yet another example of this government's arrogance. Every Canadian voice should be heard

For my colleague over here who wants to know the number so that he can also call, it is 1-900-720-6052 to say "No" to the GST.

REPUBLIC OF SOUTH KOREA

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, on March 3, 1990, the defence ministry of the Republic of South Korea announced that a joint Korea-United States team of engineers had discovered a fourth infiltration tunnel constructed by the North Koreans to serve as a potential means of mounting a surprise military invasion of the south by passing underneath the demilitarized zone.

Unlike the other three tunnels found in the western and central areas of the front line in 1974, 1975 and 1978, the recently discovered tunnel is located in the mountainous eastern portion of the demilitarized zone, 105 kilometres northeast of Seoul.

It was regrettable to hear of this particular discovery because of the current global détente between east and west. Tension on the Korean Peninsula can only be heightened by such clear indications of unabated aggression and militance on the part of the North Koreans.

ELECTORAL EXPENSES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing will be discovering during its cross country hearings, the issue of third party expenditures during an election period must be confronted.

This clause in the Canada Elections Act is not enforced today because of an Alberta Court of Queen's Bench ruling in 1984. Yet a similar Quebec ruling went in the exact opposite direction as that of the Alberta case.

The former Chief Electoral Officer of Canada has urged the commission to deal with what he refers to as the phenomenon of advertising by special interest groups. Although there was relatively little involvement by single issue groups in the 1984 campaign, their impact and activity in the 1988 campaign was extensive and profound. As much as $4 million is thought to have been spent promoting free trade. This amount is two-thirds of what a federal party can spend on all expenses during that same campaign period.

While the legitimate political process of the political parties is regulated by the Canada Elections Act, well-funded advocacy groups are free to promote and oppose candidates and registered parties without restriction or limitation.

The House of Commons should demand that the government refer the present Section 70.1 of the Canada Elections Act to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling as to its force and effect under the Charter.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, Canadians shopping around for a position to take on any issue can enter the Liberal party supermarket. There you can find every position taken on every issue. All you have to do is shop around.

On free trade, walk down one aisle and you will find the member for Winnipeg South saying he will rip up the free trade deal if the Liberals come to power. Walk down another aisle and you hear the member for Etobicoke North saying the trade deal is not such a bad deal after all.

Are you looking for a position on the GST? The Liberal party supermarket is offering all sorts of positions. Some members stand up in the supermarket and tell Canadians that they have a position on the GST. If you call a certain number they will give a scrap-the-tax position.

The Liberal party caters to all customers. Jean Chrétien in one aisle says he is not sure what he would do about the GST. Walk down another aisle and you will find leadership hopeful, Tom Wappel, saying that he would keep the GST.

Telemarketing has become a booming business in this country. All Canadians should do their shopping on the GST by phone. They should call the Leader of the Opposition, known as Herbie the Grocer, at 613-996-5084, to find out what positions on the GST the Liberal party is offering today.

At the Liberal party supermarket the motto is: We aim to please. We never say no to anyone.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, as we all know, he received the Weizmann Award in the Science and Humanities.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will demonstrate today that the award in question and the applause he just received is justified by moving immediately to double R and D spending in Canada, as he promised before he was elected but which he has not achieved in spite of being in office for five years. Will he keep his promise?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leaders of the Israeli Government who were there last evening, and all the distinguished leaders of the Jewish community in Canada who were present, expressed absolute astonishment at the action of the opposition for not recognizing, which they all recognized, the tremendous work being done by the Government of Canada to advance the cause of science.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the opposition members are all so offended by the fact that I was given this award. Mr. Pearson was given the award, as were Margaret Thatcher, Jacques Chirac and Danny Kaye.

Mr. Fontana: You're a song and dance man, too.

Mr. Mulroney: In point of fact, total federal spending on science and technology, including research and development, will be about $5.1 billion this year, compared to $4.1 billion when we came into office in 1984.

There has been an increase of some 20 per cent since this government was sworn in. About 90 per cent of all the government funded research and development that is done in the Province of Ontario is paid by the federal government. There is, as well, the fact that Canada has the most attractive R and D incentives—as brought forward by the Minister of Finance—with the exception of Australia.

That is why we are going to continue to make very substantial progress in leading in world-class ventures in the field of science and technology.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not clear whether the Prime Minister got the award for emulating Mike Pearson or Danny Kaye.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Yesterday, Gerhardt Hertzberg, a world famous Canadian scientist who received the Nobel Prize after he heard the Prime Minister had received the Weizmann Award said:

> I don't think the Prime Minister could expect to get an award for his contribution to science and technology in Canada.
> Sweden, The Netherlands, the United States, West Germany; all these countries spend just about twice as much as Canada does on research and development.

That is what Mr. Hertzberg says. I think he knows as much about research and development in Canada as does anybody else in this country.

Why will the Prime Minister not live up to his promise to ensure that Canada spends at least 2.5 per cent of its economy on research and development? Why will he not keep a promise that he himself said was necessary for the future competitiveness of this country? It is time the Prime Minister kept his promise.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to quarrel with the remarks of my hon. friend. He would be happy to know that the President of the Weizmann Institute, one of the leading nuclear physicists in the entire world who heads up one of the finest and most outstanding research centres in the world, said last night that as Prime Minister of Canada he could think of no one more deserving of this particular award than your humble servant.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I know it breaks the hearts of the Grits to see a Conservative receive international recognition, but that is just starting.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I had the honour of creating the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology which I have the pleasure of chairing, the first Prime Minister in Canada to do this.

I had the honour of establishing the Canada Scholarships Program, with $80 million over five years which will provide 10,000 young Canadians with full scholarships in science and technology.

I had the pleasure of bringing forward the Centres of Excellence program which puts $240 million into establishing 14 new Centres of Excellence at Canadian universities across the country.

We have increased research and development very substantially since 1984. The problem is that the Liberals were so disgraceful in their neglect of science and technology that the Leader of the Opposition should never rise in his seat again.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious why the Prime Minister is seeking international recognition. He knows that outside Canada they do not take public opinion polls showing how badly his government and himself are doing in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister is so determined to keep his commitments to science and technology, why did his finance minister cut $39 million from the funds for science and technology over the next five years? Why does the Prime Minister not make a commitment today to restore this funding and to stop threatening the future of our economy? Why?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to let the Liberals lead in the polls for three years. We will lead on election night.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Even the NDP is breathing down their necks, and that is going a long way.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is pitiful to see the Liberals denigrate the Canadian government's efforts in science and technology, when we established the National Advisory Council on Science and Technology, when we increased the federal government's contribution to this important area by 20 per cent, when we raised the national resources spent on science and technology from $4.1 to $5.1 billion in the last five years, when we started the networks of centres of excellence for science and technology, and more scholarships in this area for 10,000 young students throughout Canada. It is true that we have done all this, but we still have a long way to go. It is true that Canada has been lagging behind for 25 years in what it should contribute to this critical area of our national life. It is true that we had an enormous task, but you must start to admit that we have taken important steps to promote research and development in Canada, something absolutely historic.

Let me explain: When Bill C-22, which would have resulted in $700 million of spending in Montreal for pharmaceutical research and created 3,000 jobs, was before the House, the Liberals were against it and their friends in the Senate blocked it! You are against research and development, you are against science and technology!

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister for Science in reply to my questions refused to accept the assessment made by the National Consortium of Educational and Scientific Societies that science research and education in Canada are in a precarious situation. Just a minute ago the Prime Minister also appeared to reject this assessment.

This morning, the Fields Institute for Research in Mathematics, appearing before the committee on science and technology, confirmed the assessment made by the national consortium.

Who can best assess the state of science research and education in Canada, the scientists and science teachers who are in the forefront of practice or the Minister for Science and the Prime Minister who ignore the recommendations of their own Canadian National Advisory Board on Science and Technology?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this Prime Minister has ignored the recommendations of that board. It was that board which recommended to the Prime Minister the Canada Scholarship program. It was that board which recommended to the Prime Minister the Centres of Excellence program, and we can go on.

Some hon. members: Go on!

Mr. Winegard: The Prime Minister works very closely with that particular board—

Some hon. members: Go on!

Mr. Winegard: They want me to go on, Mr. Speaker. All right, I will. There is the matching grant policy. It was that board which spoke about the new technologies, the strategic technologies—$200 million in strategic technologies.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Winegard: As the Prime Minister said, there is no question but that we would all like to do more in terms of science and technology. The answer is the area you want to put it is in the industrial structure of this country. In many ways that structure is not ready to receive the kind of money that is needed, and you know it.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when the Prime Minister was in Toronto receiving his award—and I must say I feel somewhat better about it knowing that he has it in common with Danny Kaye—he was linking environmental issues to research and development.

The same day we had two stunning revelations in Ottawa. First, that the President of the National Research Council is willing to gut that institution as a performer of basic research. Second, that the Minister for Science opposes the matching grants program.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House how Canada will ever become a world leader in environmental technologies when neither the NRC nor the universities are receiving the funding that they need in order to do basic research?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, no one has ever said that the National Research Council is not going to be involved in basic research.

What I hope it will do in its five-year plan is to concentrate that basic research in priority areas and to do even better than it has in the past. I want it to do the pre-competitive research that this country really needs. No organization is in a better position to do that than the National Research Council.

The NRC is one of the few organizations that can bring together the universities and industry to form the kind of pre-competitive consortia that this country needs. NRC will do that. You will see more of it in its five-year plan.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I want to switch back to the GST, Mr. Speaker.

I want to ask the Minister of National Revenue why his government is already spending thousands of dollars placing ads in daily newspapers, with more to come, advertising for GST tax collectors when the GST is still before a committee of this House.

I want to know this from the Minister of National Revenue. Why spend these thousands of dollars asking for tax collectors when there is opposition coming from over 80 per cent of the Canadian people? There is opposition growing in the back-benches of the Conservative party. There is opposition from every single provincial government in this country.

Why does the government jump the gun and advertise for GST collectors when the bill has not passed the House?

• (1430)

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at that coming from this hon. member who has been here for so many years and should know better. It is parliamentary and legal precedent that any government has not only the right but the obligation to prepare for any major forthcoming changes which are proposed and planned by the government of the day.

That was confirmed by the Auditor General in his latest report, who recommended very strongly that the government speed up its preparation process.

Since I will be before the finance committee immediately following the Question Period, on this very subject, I would be very happy to answer any specific questions the hon. member may have in that committee.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to know from the Minister of National Revenue why it was wrong a few years ago when the Liberals did exactly the same thing. Why did that minister, when he sat in Opposition, criticize a government for doing this kind of advertising before a bill passed the House? I want to know that from the Minister of National Revenue. If it was wrong then, it is surely wrong now. Why advertise for thousands and thousands of tax collectors before a bill has even passed the finance committee? Why was it wrong then, if it is not wrong now?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the member who has just asked the question is a member of the committee which unanimously concluded, and I will read the quote from the committee report, "That if the government proceeds with the tax—" the GST, "—it establish a private-sector advisory committee to develop practical rules for the new tax and to publicize the details of the new tax and the relevant social policy transfers". That is a recommendation of the committee of which the hon. member was a part and certainly if we did otherwise, it would be irresponsible on the part of this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, five or six months ago, the government estimated administration costs for the GST would be about $200 million annually. However, in the Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, the government's estimate is no longer an annual $200 million but $380 million. Why has the budget for administration costs almost doubled? Is it because the Government of Canada now intends to hire about 7,000 people to collect the tax instead of 4,000?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since those figures were put out in the course of the budget, I would be quite happy to answer that. The $380 million is the bulge during the transition period. The amount on an ongoing basis will be of the order of $300 million, which is about 1.5 per cent of the total revenues that will be collected. That is at the low end of the range for industrialized countries which have this type of tax.

We will do everything we can to try to reduce the number of people who will be used to administer the GST. As the hon. member knows, we have entered into discussions with the provinces with a view of doing everything we can to reduce the number of people who will administer the tax. If we did not have the proper administration, the hon. member would be the first to jump up on his feet to demand that we put in place the resources to provide that administration.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this government is paralysed on the matter of official languages. I want to direct a question of the President of the Treasury Board. It has been 20 months and an election since this House adopted Bill C-72, an act respecting official languages.

The President of the Treasury Board has promised many times in this House to come forth with these regulations. We know the public servants have done their jobs. The regulations are ready. Will the President of the Treasury Board give us an undertaking today that the regulations will be tabled in the House forthwith?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. colleague that the process that we are following is the process we outlined at the time that Bill C-72 was before this House. The regulations were prepared by officials, reviewed by the government and then there were extensive consultations throughout the country. Those consultations are still ongoing. As soon as the consultations are completed, we will be tabling the regulations in the House, as we have undertaken to do and are asked to do under Bill C-72.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have asked those groups that were consulted if the consultation was terminated. I am told they have terminated their comments on the regulations. So you are ready to go.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this country is going through a difficult time as far as language is concerned. Today, racist groups are attacking official language minority groups. I want the government to understand that by doing nothing, it may be seen as a willing accomplice.

Mr. Mulroney: This is terrible!

Mr. Gauthier: And I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board to put some teeth in the legislation so that people in this country will know where we are headed with the Official Languages Act. Do something! Stop dragging your feet!

Mr. Blais: Don't tell us what to do!

Some hon. members: You did nothing for 20 years.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier seems conveniently to forget the fact that for 19 years, his government did nothing to change the official languages legislation.

Mr. Mulroney: You did nothing.

An hon. member: It's true, you did nothing.

Mr. Gauthier: There is a major backlash today.

Mr. de Cotret: This government has not only changed the legislation, it will table the regulations in the House as soon as we have consulted all interested individuals and groups across this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. All of the GST that corporations pay is refunded. Therefore a corporation that buys a sofa for an executive or calls in a plumber does not pay any GST at all. Yet a single parent, a senior citizen, or an unemployed person in Canada has to pay a 7 per cent GST. I want to know why the Minister of Finance thinks that is fair. Why is he taking $5 billion to $6 billion away from the corporations in taxation and putting it on the backs of the consumer?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's party is the first to stand up and say they want a visible tax. The hon. member is saying now to tax businesses on the things that they buy for their businesses, to bury that in the price of the tax and then apply another tax on top of that and another tax on top of that. That is precisely what the GST is designed to avoid.

When we say it is a 7 per cent tax, it is not an 8, 9, 10, 11, or 12 per cent tax. It is a 7 per cent tax. All the tax is credited out of the system so there is no hidden tax and there is no tax on tax. It is 7 per cent. That is what the consumer pays. It is very visible and up front, unlike the approach that the hon. member would like to follow.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, what the minister is saying then is that visibility can be an excuse to gouge the consumer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Come on Russ, you can do better than that.

Mr. MacLellan: The consumer has to pay the GST for the most expensive furniture an executive could have but for a place for a family to sit they have to pay 7 per cent GST. I want to know why the minister thinks that is fair. Why is he gouging the consumer to supplement the increased profits of the corporations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what my friend opposite is saying is hide it and then gouge the consumer. That is the approach the Liberal party would follow. Let me take my colleague through the basis on which this tax is levied one more time. I will do it slowly for him.

The taxes levied today in the federal sales tax are paid by every consumer in this country. However, the consumer has absolutely no idea how much sales tax is in the price of a pad, in the price of a pen, in the price of food, but it is in the price of everything that we buy today.

With the GST we are recognizing that a consumption tax is paid by the consumer. We believe that the consumption tax paid by the consumer should be paid up front and be very visible. That is why all tax on business inputs on the costs of production is credited out so that the consumer only pays 7 per cent and not some multiple of 7 per cent which is the case under the existing tax.

INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Again a major Canadian company—Federal Pioneer is a leading electrical equipment manufacturer—is to be sold to a foreign multinational.

[English]

This comes on top of such take-overs this past year as Consolidated Bathurst, Mitel, Connaught, Consumers' Gas last week, and now Federal Pioneer.

Is the minister prepared to take action now to safeguard Canadian industrial independence. Is he prepared to establish a national industrial bank which will see to it that funds are available here in Canada to help keep Canadian firms Canadian.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the government I represent never did hide its interest in foreign investments and we are not about to clamp down on them if they do not serve the interests of Canada. We do have an agency called Investment Canada in which I have full confidence and whose responsibility it is to control foreign investment, in keeping with the interest of our country. For five years now Investment Canada has been doing that very efficiently and I do not see the need to set up yet another agency. Mr. Speaker, the existing procedure is good and we will continue to monitor the situation, just as we have done in the past.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. There is an important group in town from British Columbia to try to encourage the government to reconsider its decision on the Polar 8, a decision which is in breach of the solemn commitment which the Prime Minister gave to the people of British Columbia and to Canada during the election campaign.

Will the Prime Minister assure the House, given his personal commitment, that he will in fact direct a reconsideration of this decision, or will he stand in this House and explain to the people of Canada what alternative the government has in mind to protect our sovereignty in the Arctic, to open the north and to ensure that the people of British Columbia get their fair share of jobs in the shipbuilding industry?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the decision to act as we did in the budget with respect to the Polar 8 ice-breaker was one which was reached after great difficulty by the Government of Canada. We looked at a number of factors. One of those factors, of course, was that there had been a very substantial escalation in the cost estimates of the Polar 8. I see the hon. member shaking his head as if he dismisses those. Unfortunately, one cannot dismiss those realities. That was a factor of which we had to take account.

Second, there are a range of other devices available to us in our north that can help us assert and assure Canadian sovereignty.

Finally, as the hon. member will know that in the period since the decision was announced to go forward with the Polar 8 there has been a very important agreement between Canada and the United States by which the United States is required, and has indicated that it accepts, the requirement to seek the prior consent of Canada before any of its vessels traverse the Northwest Passage.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow through with the Secretary of State on that same line of questioning.

Back in 1987 he stated in the House that the decision to build the ice-breaker is a clear sign to the world of our firm resolve to exercise our sovereignty in the Arctic. Can we now conclude the decision not to build the ice-breaker is a clear indication to the world that we are no longer interested in exercising our sovereignty in our Arctic?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for years there was in this country a government that was not interested in asserting the sovereign claims of Canada in the north, and the member for Winnipeg South Centre was a minister in that government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): He will know that Liberal governments refused to agree that we had enough confidence in our claims to submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the International Court. He knows that the Liberal government refused time after time to establish the baselines that would establish clearly the jurisdiction of Canada in the north.

He knows that because of a dislike of the Americans that sometimes becomes, in his case, almost pathological, his government backed away from the kind of practical agreement that has assured Canadian sovereignty in the north and has yielded a situation in which the United States now seeks the prior consent of Canada before any voyage to traverse the Northwest Passage.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the only person in this House who is pathological is the minister, who refuses to recognize when he has made a serious mistake.

Is it not this government, not Liberals, that decided to cancel the ice-breaker? Is it not this minister who said the ice-breaker is essential to our sovereignty? We simply want to know. You cancelled the ice-breaker, you have no other policy, what are you going to do to defend our sovereignty that you think is so important?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, what we have done is first, our actions with regard to the International Court; second, with regard to the establishment of baselines; third, with regard to the establishment in the north of aircraft and other surveillance features; fourth, by the conclusion of an agreement with the United States by which for the first time in history the Americans agree that they must—

An hon. member: Notify you.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, not notify; they must seek the prior consent of this sovereign country before their nation traverses the Northwest Passage.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women.

When meeting today with the Canadian Advisory Council for the Status of Women representatives at its conference, the minister said, "I will fight for what the women of this country need and want". Will the minister outline to this House and to the women of Canada specifically what she intends to do to fight for women? Will she fight to reverse the budget cuts to women's programs? Will she fight for a safe, affordable national child care program? Will she fight against Bill C–43 and the recriminalization of abortion?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but perhaps if the hon. member had attended the session this morning she would have heard some of the proposals which I put forward and some of the issues that I believe are important to help ensure the attainment of economic equality and social justice for all women in Canada.

Those are the issues that we have started to work on; family violence, working family responsibilities, and working toward a child care program with my colleagues. All of these are initiatives building on the record of this government to ensure that we achieve those objectives.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this hon. member did not have to be there to know that the women of Canada heckled the minister this morning because of her refusal to respond about the very programs that she outlined, and to respond to the kinds of questions that I am putting in the House.

The minister said this morning that we would have to learn to treat each other with respect. Does she not agree that respect is earned and that she is likely to receive the same kind of respect she gives the women of Canada when she steps out in front and starts leading the fight for their programs?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I did say it is important that we all learn to respect each other in this House of Commons, and as we work on the very difficult issues that we are facing in this country, dealing with the issues of the deficit and at the same time working toward building programs for economic equality and social justice for women.

Those are the programs I will be working on, in co–operation with my colleagues, conveying the concerns and listening to the concerns right across the country so that we can fully understand what those concerns are as we develop our policies and programs to meet the needs of the women of the country.

GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In 1982, the current Minister of Finance said that the reductions to federal funding of health and education, "could have disastrous effects on the universities and on the colleges, on hospital funding and on the operation of the hospitals." He added: "Let us solve these problems not on the backs of the hospitals and universities. Let us solve those problems outside of that arena." When and why did the Minister of Finance reverse his position?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that I have reversed my position. We have seen a number of things change since 1982. One of those was a substantial deficit and debt problem which we inherited in 1984 that we must work very hard to get under control. Part of getting that problem under control is working with the provinces to get the debt down.

The transfers to the provinces in this coming year will be $34 billion. That is equivalent to about one–third of program spending of the government of Canada. We have asked the provinces to be about a one–third part of the expenditure control program. Program spending of the government of Canada will increase 3 per cent next year. These transfers to the provinces will also increase by 3 per cent on average this year.

I believe that in a fair and upfront way we have told the provinces to be part of this program. It is a national problem. We all have to participate in getting that national problem under control.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Last week he said that education and health expenditures have gone up considerably. This increase is almost entirely due to tax point transfers made ten years ago. Cash payments have gone up only 2 per cent a year since 1985.

Will the Prime Minister finally tell us just what is going on.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is displaying quite an unsettling ignorance of what the facts are.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Duhamel: Listen! I told you we could debate that any time. You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The transfers to the provinces—

Mr. Duhamel: Chicken! Big chicken! Why don't you come and debate like a man?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, when we arrive in the House our skins sometimes get a little thicker than the hon. member's skin has.

Mr. Duhamel: If you knew what you were talking about—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the transfers to the provinces come in two ways: one is a transfer of tax points and the other is a cash transfer. The tax points and cash transfer are equally important to the provinces because in an equal way they provide cash to the provinces. The provinces can then spend the money on whatever they want to spend it on. Those transfers have increased by about $25 billion over the last five years and they will continue to increase into the future.

As I indicated in my first answer, the government of Canada has a serious financial problem. We are increasing the transfer by 3 per cent. It is a reduction in the rate of growth in the transfer to help with the deficit problem, but as I indicated, I do not believe that we have asked the provinces to accept in any way a greater burden than we have been prepared to accept ourselves as the government of Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment. Yesterday, Canada's largest trade unions came to Ottawa to express their strong disagreement with Bill C–21, the government's bill to cut the unemployment insurance program. Well in advance they had asked to meet the minister and members of the Conservative caucus but this request was refused.

Would the minister explain to this House and to the Canadian people why neither she nor any member of the Conservative caucus would meet with these representatives of millions of Canadian workers on a matter that seriously affects our income security. Would she explain that?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important for the hon. member to remember that over the past year this bill has been studied by both a committee of this House and a committee of the Senate.

Among the presentations to those committees, and particularly to the House of Commons committee, was a number by representatives of different unions, most of them affiliated. In many cases the same representation was heard any number of times.

I have been in correspondence with a number of unions, as with other Canadians, and I would like to point out to the hon. member that the information that we have, and according to some of the surveys that we have done across Canada, a majority of Canadians approve of what we are doing with this bill. I would suggest to the hon. member that he help us get on with it.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, here we have a bill which cuts $1.3 billion from the unemployment insurance benefit fund and the government has no mandate to proceed. This was not part of their platform at the last election.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: We got elected, Warren, just in case you are wondering.

Mr. Allmand: As a matter of fact, during the—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Allmand: They did not make this part of their platform during the last election—

Mr. Mulroney: What about the mandate for the Liberal Senators?

Some hon. members: Time.

Mr. Allmand: —when, by the way, they only got 48 per cent of the vote.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I have asked the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Allmand: Now they are in third place at 19 per cent in the polls—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. The federal Court of Appeal has just handed down its decision on the Old Man River dam in Alberta. The court has ruled that the federal government must subject the project to the Environmental Assessment Review process and that construction of the dam must cease.

Will the minister undertake to immediately launch a full environmental assessment and will he assure the House that construction will stop immediately?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I heard that the judgment had been delivered just at noon today, so I have not had time to read it. The lawyers are currently reviewing the judgment. I will be provided with recommendations and will be pleased to make a decision at the appropriate time.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure why the minister would not commit himself immediately to respect and to implement the judgment of the court.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Catterall: What is really disturbing is that once again the courts have had to step in to protect the environment and to remind the government and the minister what its responsibilities are for the environment of this country. When will the minister start doing his job and stop waiting to be told to do it by the courts?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when you become a minister there are a few things to learn. One of them is to read the commitments before making them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

SPORTS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). Many national sporting organizations receive approximately $64 million from the Canadian government and have a dual vocation, namely, recreation and competition. Could the Minister confirm today that all these Canadian organizations will be able to function in both official languages, whatever the city holding these competitions which are financed in part by the Canadian government?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact my department has a bilingualism program and we constantly work closely with the organizing committees of major national and international events. The purpose of this program is to provide bilingual services to various games, such as the Commonwealth Games which will be held in Victoria in 1994, the Arctic Games which are taking place this very week, the Canada Games 1991 on Prince Edward Island, and the Canada Games 1993 in Kamloops. I should like to tell my hon. friends that the bilingual services provided during the Canada Games 1989 in Saskatoon have been rated by the press as outstanding.

I thank the hon. member for Abitibi for the interest he is showing in the cause of bilingualism in this country.

MEASURE TO AMEND—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and on the amendment of Mr. Gauthier (p.9099).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Winnipeg South had the floor.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With regard to the debate on the motion before the House, I believe that the position should have been given to the New Democratic Party before the lunch break.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That has now been arranged. We will make sure that the NDP get their right position. Right now the hon. member for Winnipeg South has the floor for another 15 minutes, then we will go to the NDP.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise again to complete the remarks that I began before the break.

When we broke for lunch I was pointing out that, as the minister pointed out when she met with the committee, the records show that the efforts of the members from the other place who interviewed some 54 representatives of various groups and organizations, who had already made representations to the House committee, did not identify one single new issue of substance.

It is very difficult to understand why they went through this exercise in the first place. I would have to say that we can only conclude from this that there was a determined and premeditated plan to delay the bill so as to frustrate the government. I cannot think of any other explanation.

This House passed the bill on November 6, 1989. The Senate special committee then waited a whole three weeks, 21 days, before even bothering to convene its first meeting. Another 10 weeks passed before the report was presented in mid-February. That is more than three months after the bill was passed by the duly elected representatives of this House. Another 10 weeks delay, and for what?

The bill was tabled in the House in April 1989 by the hon. minister. That is almost a full year ago. Surely it is unacceptable to the people of Canada to have the government that they chose with such a resounding majority so frustrated. What possible excuse can there be for these constant delays of government business by a non-elected body? I think it is unforgivable.

Canadians have been led to understand that the venerable upper House was put in place and charged with, among other things, the weighty responsibility to provide some kind of a safety valve in the event that some harmful or pernicious legislation somehow slipped passed the hon. members of this House. In the past, senators were chosen for a whole number of reasons. They were chosen for their wisdom, they were chosen for their experience and they were chosen for their ability to accept the great burden of trust that was placed on them.

They were chosen for these things in case, in some unpredictable way, the pillars of democracy be threatened for a moment or two. The senators were put in place to ensure that there was a safety valve. But senators were not to view themselves as legislators. They were never appointed to act as legislators. That duty is vested in the elected members of this House alone. We are the ones who make the legislation.

It seems to me that even my colleagues opposite would want to understand and appreciate that that concept is at the very heart of the democratic system that we have in place in this country. This is exactly what they are going through in the East Bloc countries right now. They are searching for opportunities to let the people speak, to let the people say what they want.

In Canada, we have been doing that for 120 odd years. The people have been speaking and when they spoke in 1988 they said they wanted the Progressive Conservative party to lead this country into the 21st century. That means that they endorse our policies, the policies of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and they do not want those policies frustrated by a body which is not elected.

Senators were appointed as guardians of the trust, that special and sacred bond that exists between those who are elected to govern and those subjecting themselves to be governed. Shockingly, what we appear to see today is the denial of that trust by some Liberal members of the other House who appear more interested in making political points than in tending to their weighty responsibilities. There is striking evidence to back up this shocking denial of trust about which I have been speaking.

One of the amendments would create a tangle of legal conditions around the government's annual developmental plan for the system. We are willing to accept these amendments. We are willing to accept this, but the government is not prepared to accept the fact—and I know you are going to have a difficult time believing this, Mr. Speaker—that the Senate actually wants the power to approve or reject that plan. Can you believe that?

I would like to read that amendment because it is a striking example of what is contained in this plan. It reads:

> If, within 10 sitting days after the day on which the plan is laid before either House of Parliament, a notice is given in either House of a motion to the effect that the plan is unacceptable signed by not less than 15 members of the Senate, in case of a notice given in the Senate, and by not less than 30 members of the House of Commons, in the case of a notice given in that House, and the question on the motion itself is not decided within 10 sitting days after the notice was given, the plan shall, upon the expiry of that period of 10 days, be deemed to have been rejected.

Mr. Milliken: What's wrong with that?

Mrs. Dobbie: My hon. friend asks what is wrong with that. My hon. friend surely would agree with me that no Parliament would ever seriously consider giving such a new power to the Senate. To do something like that would be to deny the responsibility, the authority, the trust that was vested in us as elected members of this House by the Canadian people.

My hon. friend surely does not want to deny his responsibilities as an elected member of this House any more than do any of the government members. I cannot believe that Parliament would ever seriously consider giving the Senate such a new power.

I am not going to go into detail on every single recommended amendment, but there are one or two more that Canadians really should be aware of so they can get a clear understanding of just exactly what is going on here.

In one amendment the Liberal senators would reverse a decision of this House, a decision taken here in this House by the elected members of the people. This decision was that unemployment insurance costs would be paid for by those who stand to benefit. Surely that is a sensible thing. Those who stand to benefit are the workers and their employers. But the senators would have these premiums reduced and let the shortfall come out of general revenues, the taxpayers' pockets, which would contribute more to the deficit.

If we were to accept the entire range of amendments that have been proposed, it would raise our deficit by $1.6 billion. What are the senators thinking of? Do they not know how hard it is to raise $1.6 billion? If the senators have forgotten about this, I can say that the people of Canada have not. They know how tough it is to raise $1.6 billion. To accept these irresponsible changes would be to put a burden on everyday working people which is unfair, unwarranted and certainly irresponsible, as I said.

Another of the amendments would cut back on the basic principles behind this bill by relaxing penalties for people who quit their jobs without just cause or for those who are fired for misconduct. The Liberal senators want to change this decision. They would like to send a signal to people that it is all right to quit their jobs, it is all right to live off the public purse.

The people of Canada are not saying that to us. They are saying that they do not want welfare, they want work and they do not want people living off the system when they can work. If people voluntarily quit their jobs or get fired for cause, I think most people would agree that it is quite right that they be penalized in some way.

In view of these facts we really must ask ourselves why these constant delays and threats of delays are happening and what they are all about. Why was Bill C-21 held up for three months by the Senate? Was it because the senators had concerns for the welfare of Canadians? Was it because the House has acted without due consideration of the bill or with a lack of responsibility? Indeed, was it to protect the interests of democracy, perhaps?

Sadly, the evidence does not bear this out. It does not support any of these contentions.

Instead, unfortunately, the evidence leads inevitably to the only conclusion to which I can possibly come, and that is that some Liberals in the Senate have abandoned their trust and their responsibility in the pursuit of political points and inappropriate power. I do not want to believe this and I know that Canadians do not want to believe this either, but each time a bill is frivolously delayed, each time legislation is blocked, the conviction must grow stronger that political power games are being played, and by people who do not have an elected mandate over the fate of Canadians.

This must not happen. If it is happening, it has to stop. It cannot continue. We live in a democracy and we should live by the democratic rules. That means that the laws are made by the elected members of this Parliament and not by those who are appointed.

I do not hesitate to make clear the government's attitude toward any political posturing on behalf of some members of the other place. I also do not hesitate to commend those members who have exercised their trust in a responsible and reliable manner, and many have. In fact, there are some suggestions by the Senate that do demand praise and affirmative response. The minister has listened to the wiser counsel and the more reasonable recommendations with interest and with a commendable quick willingness to respond to those suggestions that improve upon the spirit of her bill. I think that that is most commendable.

For example, the Senate has made certain suggestions regarding literacy and we are pleased to recognize and accept these suggestions regarding this very important provision. I know that the minister would want me to acknowledge and commend the senators who suggested this improvement to her bill.

Even though we resist the effort of some Liberal members to subject the government to inordinate strictures regarding the annual plan showing how unemployment insurance funds will be spent in training and developing worker skills, we do recognize fairness and we have proposed a compromise which responds to this.

Finally, we also recognize and share the concerns of the Canadian fishery and the government is willing to amend the act to better protect fishermen. By the way, it must be noted that the benefits for fishermen were never, never touched by Bill C–21.

However, these accommodations have nothing at all to do with tactics that smack of intimidation or power plays by certain members of the upper House. These accommodations, rather, speak of the reasonable and fair attitude of the government and its commitment to do the right thing. We urge the Liberal senators to take the same fair view on behalf of Canadians and we believe that most would like to do so if given the opportunity to follow the dictates of their conscience.

It is a fact that the Liberals do have a majority in the Senate, but they must learn to resist the temptation to abuse the power that this gives them and to respect the trust that we have vested in their office. Canadians must not have their democratic prerogatives so comtemptuously ignored. The Senate must pass Bill C–21 with only the three amendments to which the minister has agreed.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech just given by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. It is interesting that she indicated that the people of this country are behind the PC government because they elected it in November 1988 and in fact support its policies.

It is no wonder that people have found it necessary to go to the Senate because this government has itself abrogated its responsibility. It has no mandate to change UI. In fact, the Secretary of State for External Affairs promised people in Atlantic Canada during the campaign that there would be no changes made to the UI bill. That was a promise made by this government, one more promise that it simply has not kept.

The hon. member criticizes the Senate for what she calls improprieties. Certainly this government is as guilty, if not guiltier, because it made a promise to the Canadian people and it has not kept that promise, like many, many other promises that this government has not kept over the years of its two mandates.

This morning the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration was in the House and I listened with great interest to her speech. She indicated that this bill is a benefit to Canadians. She indicated that not only was the government benefiting Canadians but that it had Canadians' interest at heart. She pointed out two achievements which the government hopes to accomplish. One was to improve social benefits and the second was to give incentives to encourage work.

My home province of Saskatchewan is a good example of PC governments providing opportunities to work. In that province we have had a provincial PC government since 1982 and we have had a federal PC government since 1984. In 1981, the last year that the New Democratic Party was in power provincially, we had a budget with a surplus of $140 million. That was the eleventh straight year that the New Democratic government, under Premier Allan Blakeney, had brought in a surplus budget. The very next year, when the Tories took power under Premier Devine, they had a deficit budget and they have had one ever since. They went from a $140 million surplus in 1981 to a $3.5 billion deficit last year and this year it is going to go up another $350 million.

That is with a population of less than 1 million. That is an awful lot of debt from a government that is so-called business oriented, that is going to create businesses and jobs throughout the province and the country. This government has run the province of Saskatchewan right into the ground.

The whole effect that this government has had on Saskatchewan is extraordinary. In Saskatchewan this year farm incomes are expected to drop by 101 per cent. That means that people are going to go in the hole. They are going to be worse off this year, after putting in all their labour, time and effort, than they were at the beginning of the year. That is incredible.

In Saskatchewan rural communities are losing over 1,000 farms a year. Rural dwellers are losing jobs and are forced increasingly to move into urban centres. People are forced to leave the province. Last year some 23,000 people left the province of Saskatchewan, that is a net loss of 23,000 people that was not replaced. Over the past four years it has been close to 50,000 people.

Under the free enterprise governments of Grant Devine and the right hon. Prime Minister we have had a net loss of some 50,000 people in the province of Saskatchewan and we have a deficit of $3.5 billion. Now this government is going to be cutting the unemployment insurance benefits that these people should have a right to receive.

In addition to that, record numbers of people are living below the poverty line in Saskatchewan. We used to be a have province in Saskatchewan. We used to look with some sympathy upon other regions of the country which were have nots. We are a have not province now. We have gone from being the bread basket of Canada to being a basket case. Fourteen per cent of people in Saskatchewan are living below the poverty line. The only province that has a higher percentage is Newfoundland. This has happened under right wing free enterprise governments that have done nothing for the average people in Saskatchewan.

At a time like this, this government brings in a bill that is going to cut $1.3 billion from unemployment insurance, at a time when people in Saskatchewan and various regions of the country need that program desperately and have a right to receive it.

This government talks about improving the social benefits of Canadians. If government members really had the interest of Canadians at heart and wanted to improve social benefits, I wonder why they did not introduce the variable entrance rates last year when they knew that time was running out. That has been passed each year but last year the government refused to pass it.

Government members talk about the Liberals playing games. Well the Liberals do play games but they have nothing on the Tories, nothing at all. In fact, the hon. minister can stand in her place and talk about the social benefits and at the same time talk about delays in the legislation. Yet when this side of the House would have been co-operative in passing the variable entrance rates, they simply refused.

Who is playing politics at the expense of the people in this country who are suffering the most from the policies of this government? It is very clear who is playing politics in this House and who plays it very well.

If the government wished to bring forth a package that included variable entrance requirements, that talked about literacy training, that would look at benefits to the fishing industry and would increase paternity and paternal benefits, New Democrats would be happy to support it. We would be happy to help draft such legislation. It is in our interests and the interests of Canada to have such matters passed in this House. But we do not want to be tied to a piece of legislation that is itself corrupt and rotten. It is not good to put a sugar coating over a bill that is simply rotten. This is the game the government is playing.

If the government had the interests of Canadians at heart, it would be introducing such legislation. The government wants to provide incentives and encourage work. I find it insulting that the minister would say that the government is providing incentives for Canadians to work. Canadians want to work, Canadians want to work very hard.

I know many constituents in Saskatchewan who are having difficulties with employment who want to work. They do not want to go on welfare. They do not want to be on unemployment insurance. They do not want to be just existing. They want to have their pride. They want to have a job that is meaningful and in which they can take some pride. It is hypocrisy for the minister to stand in her place and say that they are going to create incentives for Canadians to work. It is this government that has been creating disincentives for Canadians.

The regional development program is astounding. It is outrageous. We have heard members from the government side indicate that there can be no more regional programs unless the bottom line economics are there. This country was created, developed and has matured on regional development, on a concern for creating employment and wealth in all areas of the country.

We have a problem of geography and concentrated populations in this country. We have small pockets of people in various regions and unless we have a government committed to maintaining viable employment in those regions, they will suffer. It is contrary to the history of this country to have a government that has a bottom line mentality. This is certainly a different Tory party than we had even 30 years ago. This is a neo-conservatism party. It is a new right-wing mentality. John Diefenbaker would roll over in his grave if he had heard this type of talk.

The bottom line is that this economic mentality is not benefiting the country. Business is suffering. There is no commitment to small business by this government. There is a commitment to large business because it provides the funds for this government, but a real commitment to small business does not exist. There is no commitment to agriculture or the fishing industry in this country.

This party has been calling for a permanent agricultural program for years. The government has been promising one since 1985 and it has not materialized yet. Now there are some rumblings. We will have a bottom line economic agricultural program which is going to mean the death of many rural communities, the loss of many family farms and increased unemployment. Yet, the minister is going to create incentives for people to work at the same time as taking away their very livelihood. This is hypocrisy. It is unfair and it is unjust.

In my area, in Saskatchewan, and other regions such as the Maritimes, there are many rural communities that are suffering. Their economic base is in real trouble. In the west it is agriculture. In the maritimes it is largely the fishing industry. They need some assistance. They need some compassion. They need some real solutions from this government, but they are not getting them. Instead, the minister is creating a bill that will encourage people to work. It is fine to encourage people to work, but we had better have the opportunities for people to work at.

The Prime Minister and other members of the government have stood in this House many times and talked about job creation and their record of job creation. However, according to the Economic Council, something like 90 per cent of these jobs have been created in the service sector. Many of them are very low paying, part time or temporary.

This is not the kind of job creation that Canadians deserve. This is not the kind of employment that Canadians want. It is a credit to the many Canadians who want to work and who are willing to take these jobs. They take these jobs which provide them with a survival existence rate. I have forgotten the exact figures, but there are 500,000 or 800,000 families in this country where both parents are working because they are so poor and they are trying to keep themselves above the poverty line.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Laporte: That is a fact. Hon. members opposite may laugh. They think it is funny. These are the facts. Actually I believe that my figures are low.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Laporte: How many single parent families do we have in this country? Do members opposite know? It is well over one million single parent families who are working, trying to make a living, and trying to survive.

This is the government that promised child care legislation. This government made it a commitment. In the summer of 1987 the Minister of Finance said that it was not a promise but a commitment. This was one of the Tory commitments. The government has misled the Canadian public, and members opposite know it.

Mr. Redway: That was the legislation the Senate would not pass.

Mr. Laporte: The government should introduce some proper legislation on child care, which was a commitment of the government. When is that to happen?

The government is going to put money into training programs and that is great. I think we should have more training programs. Everybody in this House believes we should have training programs. A little closer look should be taken at them. The one program with which I have had some direct involvement is the Canadian Futures Program. Last year I was looking at this program to see how it could benefit many communities in my riding. I found out that the Canadian Futures Program had no money, yet it was part of the employment and immigration package which was being flaunted around the country.

The Canadian Futures Program in many ways has had some problems to which the government has so far refused to listen. For example, trade unions, women, native people and persons with disabilities are seldom represented on the Canadian Futures committee.

The current federal training programs are deemed by many to be misdirected, inflexible, centrally managed, and inadequate. Simply to pour more money into programs which are not working is really not going to accomplish very much. Surely members opposite realize that.

Money is being put into training programs which need to be redirected and re-evaluated, and the government is saying it is doing a lot for training. It is great to put the money into training, but let us have some proper programs. Let us have a bit of thought in developing these training programs and don't put the money into training programs at the expense of the unemployed of this country, which is what this government is doing.

What should this government do? First of all it should withdraw this bill. The government has no mandate to introduce this bill and, given what is happening across the country, there is even more reason now not to proceed with it.

Second, it should introduce variable entrance requirements. With rising unemployment this government has no excuse for not introducing a variable entrance requirement amendment right now. That would be a benefit.

Third, the government should accept the Federal Court ruling on parental benefits. One of the jokes of this is that it is saying that it is doing a lot of good for this country. It is the Schacter case, a decision of the Federal Court which indicated that the government should be extending parental benefits. The government is only implementing the Federal Court decision.

I would just like to close with a couple of comments on the Senate. This is a government that can talk about the injustice of the Senate and, as the last member said, the outrageous behaviour of the Senate. The outrageous behaviour is on that side of the House. The government has invoked closure at every stage of this bill. It has used closure more often than any other government in the history of our country. The disrespect for Parliament is sitting on the other side of the House. It is these people and this government that are showing disrespect for this institution and to all people of this country. They should be ashamed of themselves. I know some members opposite are ashamed but are not saying very much. It is a sad situation.

In closing, I cannot support this bill for the reasons that I have outlined. I call upon this government to withdraw this bill and bring in something that is more humane, more acceptable, and will benefit all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, unemployment is a very serious problem to which our government devotes a great deal of attention. Obviously, the best solution to the unemployment problem is job creation, and on this score, our government has no lesson to learn from anyone. Mr. Speaker, since 1984, our government has created over 1.5 million jobs. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in his recent Budget Speech said:

> The economy has expanded for seven consecutive years. Employment has grown strongly. After-tax incomes have risen. Economic opportunities have been increased. Poverty has been reduced by the best kind of social policy—more jobs.

Upgrading the labour force is thus part of job creation and that is precisely the purpose of Bill C-21.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 involves a labour force development strategy, a dynamic strategy compared to the present unemployment insurance plan.

Bill C-21 seeks to encourage the private sector to provide workers with more and better training. Bill C-21 will also permit use of the Unemployment Insurance Fund to create new job opportunities; it will make unemployment insurance more proactive. That is an innovative feature, Mr. Speaker, that will give workers new opportunities.

Of course, the Liberal senators have been repeating for months that Bill C-21 will lead to the destruction of the unemployment insurance system. Do not believe a word of it. It is the worst kind of fear-mongering and the Liberal senators should stop spreading such falsehoods once and for all.

Contrary to what the Liberal senators are saying, Bill C-21 contains measures that substantially improve the present legislation. I may add that these improvements are most welcome if we are to provide solutions adapted to the reality of a changing economy in the 90s.

Under the present legislation, the UI system is merely a set of passive measures that come into play after the fact. Under the present legislation we react, while the new measures in Bill C-21 will enable us to act. That is what the Liberal senators will not see and will not say.

We must adapt the UI system to new circumstances, and that is exactly what Bill C-21 does. I think this is a very important point, because the provisions of the present legislation fail to consider the real needs of Canadian families at the beginning of the 90s.

Changing values in our society have led to new attitudes. Today, bringing up children is a task shared by both parents. Both parents play an increasingly active role in the lives of their children. If the bill is passed, this fact will be reflected in the UI system. The bill also contains more generous provisions for special benefits, making them more readily accessible to claimants than is the case under the existing legislation.

By making parental benefits available to both the father and the mother, to both natural and adoptive parents, the government reflects in its new legislation the changes that are taking place in Canadian families. Today, women who have given birth are entitled to benefits for a maximum of 15 weeks, and only during the first part of their benefit period. The fathers are not entitled to any benefits at all. That is the kind of situation Bill C-21 seeks to remedy, and that is what the Liberal senators are rejecting.

Another important change in this bill that will make the UI system more equitable concerns workers who are 65 and over. Many of these workers want to keep on working and deserve to have the same rights as younger workers. Bill C-21 extends income protection to workers 65 and over. However, the bill is more than just a few changes in a number of unemployment insurance rules. It allows the government to implement its Labour Force Development Strategy. This strategy is a major government initiative that will make Canada increasingly competitive on world markets.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, an active of income protection program is more than just distributing cheques to people who have lost their jobs. An active income protection program offers workers a chance to acquire new skills and explore new ways of finding better jobs and keeping those jobs. In this perspective, the government will work with the private sector to help employers offer workers more and better training. We want to align the level of training in the private sector with the levels existing among our main trading partners.

The government will spend more on human resource planning and training new entrants, which will involve the apprenticeship programs, the Industrial Adjustment Service and the Community Futures Program.

With the additional funds, the government will be able to work together with employers, workers and communities to help them adapt to changes in the workplace and to increasingly competitive world markets.

Thanks to the Labour Force Development Strategy, there will be more money to train those receiving unemployment insurance benefits. They will be able to acquire the skills they need to find better and more stable employment.

The Labour Force Development Strategy will also give us a chance to try new and innovative approaches in responding to the needs of Canadian workers, by providing financial assistance to unemployment insurance claimants so that they can establish their own businesses or move to areas where there are more jobs. Bill C-21 will have a positive impact on workers, communities and the entire country.

Contrary to what is being said by the Liberal senators, the government is firmly resolved to do what is necessary to ensure that Canadians have all the skills they need to adapt and become part of a changing economy. Thanks to Bill C-21, we will certainly be in a better position to meet their needs.

Mr. Speaker, there is another aspect of this bill that deserves to be highlighted. Thanks to the proposed changes, the UI system will be able to respond to the varying employment needs of communities across Canada. This means the government has ensured that the UI system is adapted to regional needs. In regions with high unemployment, most claimants will continue to receive the same benefits. This is another aspect of the bill that demonstrates the flexibility of the new UI system in adjusting to today's and tomorrow's economic realities.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to comment on the role of the Senate in the legislative process involving Bill C-21. It has always been said that the Senate's role consisted in providing "sober second thought" on legislation. Recently, however, it has become the scene of political manoeuvring, with certain people using their position to wreck bills passed by democratically elected members of Parliament.

The senators said they established a special committee of the Senate so that people who did not appear before our legislative comittee could express their views. One wonders why 54 of the witnesses selected to appear before the special committee of the Senate represented groups or individuals who had already appeared before the legislative committee.

One also wonders why the special committee of the Senate decided to hear representatives of groups that had already voiced their objections to practically all government proposals. And why did the special committee refuse to consider the views of acknowledged experts on unemployment?

It just proves the Liberal senators only want to show one side of the question, that they want to try and scare the public and are not interested in seriously considering the real and positive impact of the bill before the House today.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) also told members of the Senate Committee that their deliberations had raised no major new points on the bill. The Special Committee was also determined to delay the process for as long as possible. The facts speak for themselves, Mr. Speaker. The House passed Bill C-21 on November 6. The Special Committee met for the first time three weeks later. It only reported to the Senate on February 14. Such a performance is quite deplorable.

As I said before, the provisions of Bill C-21 take account of the needs of regions where unemployment is high by setting a scale that makes the system simpler and fair for all beneficiaries. But instead of adopting Bill C-21 and the variable entrance requirement, the Liberals in the Senate have decided to wait. This means that many people who would be eligible for unemployment insurance today cannot benefit from it. Canadians well know that the Liberal senators are to blame for this. Canadians also know that the Liberal senators are preventing many people, including mothers and fathers of newborn children, from receiving the improved benefits provided by Bill C-21. People are counting on these benefits and part of the Senate is happy to drag things out. Canadians must also remember that it is the same group of people who prevented the passage of several bills for political reasons.

Let me remind you in particular of the long battle that preceded the adoption of Bill C-21 by which the government sought to improve patent protection for inventors of pharmaceutical products. Obstruction tactics like those of the Liberal senators had not been seen for a long time. The senators invoked the same arguments then as they do now, namely that the people would suffer, that the government was not interested in the problems of the old and the sick, and that the cost of medication would rise astronomically.

We are now sure of what we already knew. The senators' demands were unjustified and were only intended to frighten the public and harass the government. We cannot let ourselves be dragged into such a situation again and I am convinced that the Canadian people disapprove of the Liberal senators' strategy.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, once again we are debating Bill C–21, which is the government's bill to cut back on the unemployment insurance program.

This bill will make it more difficult for Canadian employees to qualify for unemployment insurance. This bill will shorten the benefit period for which they will qualify if they are collecting unemployment insurance. This bill will terminate the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, which last year was $2.5 billion.

For many years the unemployment insurance program fund has been contributed to by three sources: employees when they are working contribute to the fund, employers contribute to the fund, and the government contributed to the fund. Last year its contribution was $2.5 billion.

However, through Bill C–21 the government is terminating its contribution to the fund. That means that from now on, once this bill passes, only workers and employers will maintain the fund, which means that the contributions that they must make will increase but they are going to receive less in benefits. It is going to be more difficult to qualify, and they are going to get a shorter benefit period.

As a result of this bill, 155,000 Canadians will lose their benefits altogether, that is 155,000 Canadians who would have received benefits under the law as it stands now will no longer get benefits, and 775,000 Canadians will have their benefits reduced as a result of this bill.

In effect, what we are discussing here today are amendments that have been proposed to the bill by the Senate. I want to make it absolutely clear that if we were talking about amendments that were conceived in the minds of the senators, that were born on the floor of the Senate, then I would have some concern about them because as has been stated by Conservative members in this House the Senate is not an elected body.

The amendments we are dealing with today from the Senate were not conceived in the Senate. The amendments that the Senate is proposing to the House are amendments that have come forward from trade unions in Canada, from churches, from social action groups, from legal aid clinics, and so on. The Senate's amendments are virtually the same in principle as the amendments that we in the opposition proposed when the bill was in the House. The only thing is that the Senate's amendments do not go as far as our amendments. They are a little milder than our amendments, but they are based on the same principles. Those amendments that the Senate is proposing have a wide consensus in this country and, in proposing the amendments, the Senate better represents the feelings in the country than the government does.

I must point out that the government, at the time of the election in 1988, did not make it part of its platform that it was going to change the unemployment insurance system. It did not make it part of its platform that it was going to cut back on the unemployment insurance system. As a matter of fact, when the Minister for International Trade, who is the principal spokesman for Newfoundland, the province with the highest number of unemployed in this country, was asked during the election campaign if the government had any idea to cut back or change the unemployment insurance system, he said: "Absolutely not!". He then went on to say that he consulted with the Prime Minister and there was no way they were going to touch the unemployment insurance system.

This government has no mandate to do what it is doing, and in many respects the Senate is speaking for the Canadian people more than the government is.

I want to remind the government that although it has by far the greatest number of seats, at the time of the election it only got 48 per cent of the votes. The combined opposition parties, the Liberals and the New Democrats, got 52 per cent of the votes. Therefore, at that time the government did not even get the majority of votes of the Canadian people, and it is putting forward some serious cuts to a major program for which it has no mandate.

If we look at the situation today, the government got 48 per cent of the votes at the time of the election but in the recent Gallup poll it had 19 per cent and was in third place. That is the kind of support it has among the Canadian people. In another poll, it had 21 per cent of the support of the Canadian people, still in third place, even behind the NDP.

Using closure at every stage, the government is trying to ram through a bill for which it has no mandate. Closure was used at second reading, at third reading and report stage and now, after one day of debate on the Senate's amendments, the government is using closure again. At one time in this country closure was an exception to the rule, but with this government it is used as a matter of fact on every bill because it does not believe in democratic discussion and debate.

I want to point out that we in the Opposition do not delude ourselves. We know that with extended debate we are never going to convince those Conservatives on the other side to vote our way. They would not vote our way no matter what we did, even if we debated it for 100 years. But the purpose of extended debate in this House with a free press and with the proceedings televised is to get the message across to the Canadian people outside this House so that public opinion will know what the government is doing. However, the government does not want the public to know what it is doing. It applies closure immediately after one day of debate so that the public is confused and it does not know what is happening.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of approach that you get from a totalitarian attitude in government and that is what we have over there. They use closure on every bill that has any kind of controversy to it and they do it immediately after a very short debate.

We have to return to the very principles of unemployment insurance when we discuss a bill like this. One must remember that unemployment insurance was introduced in this country in 1940 after the great depression of the 1930s, because in the great depression of the 1930s when people were laid off they had no income whatsoever. There was no unemployment insurance. All there was were soup kitchens, bread lines and voluntary relief. What that meant was not only did families and individuals suffer as a result of unemployment—they could not feed their children, they could not buy their clothing, they could not pay their rents—but the whole community suffered. What started off as one plant closing, soon snowballed into damage to the entire community. With unemployment insurance, not only can the unemployed person pay his rent, buy his groceries, and pay for the essentials of life, but he keeps the community going.

We had House of Commons committee hearings in Sudbury. The people there pointed out that in 1982, when the world nickel prices went down, nearly 10,000 people were unemployed in Sudbury. It was because of the UI system that nearly 10,000 people were still able to pay their rent, buy their groceries, and pay for the gasoline for their cars, that the community stayed alive. The whole community did not go down the drain. The community was able to survive for over a year until the nickel prices went up again and a lot of those people were brought back on the job. The unemployment insurance program kept those individuals, those families, and that city surviving during that hard period.

The government is cutting back on the benefits to the unemployment insurance program. It is trying to pretend that it is not doing that. On the one hand the government it is going to put $800 million into training yet we all know that the government is taking money away from unemployment insurance benefits. The government tries to pretend that that sort of sleight of hand operation is really not going to hurt the unemployed. Where the unemployed person used to have so much money to pay for the essentials of life, he is going to suffer a cut back on those payments, but somebody is going to get money for training. We in the opposition believe 100 per cent in training. We believe the government should train and it should have been training for a long time. But one does not reduce the benefits that go to the unemployed individual, benefits he needs to pay for the essentials of life. One does not reduce those to pay for the training. For years and years in the country, training was paid out of general income tax revenue that goes into the government and that is how it should be paid for. Training and education benefits the whole community.

The government, in supporting this bill, pretends that nothing wrong is happening to the unemployed. The government is introducing and passing this bill because it believes so strongly in training. I want to remind the House that from 1984 to 1988 the government cut back training programs at the federal level by 32 per cent. In 1984, training programs were $2.2 billion and they were cut back to $1.5 billion over that period of time.

All of a sudden, following the free trade agreement, the government started to get criticism from the de Grandpré Commission and other commissions that there was not enough training in the country. This great Conservative government sat back and said: "Gee, we have cut back too far on training. We have to do something about it. Where are we going to get the money for training? We also believe the highest priority in this country is the deficit". The government looked around at different places to find money and found it in the unemployment insurance fund. It plucked $1.3 billion out of that fund and put it into training.

Where does that lead us? That brings us back exactly to where we were in real dollars in 1984. In 1984 we had $2.2 billion for training. Now, because it is taking money away from the unemployed, we will again have approximately the same amount of money. That is a great commitment to training. When the government's back is up against the wall after it has reduced the fund by 32 per cent over five years the government is going to put the money back, but take it away from the unemployed because it does not have the guts to raise the money through taxation as it should be done.

What is the result of these government amendments? These government amendments are going to cut back on unemployment insurance. It is another type of shell game like the budget which was produced a couple of weeks ago. The government is cutting back benefits to the unemployed. As I pointed out, 775 Canadians are going to have their benefits reduced and 155,000 are going to lose their benefits altogether. What will happen to these unemployed? What are they going to do if there is no job to go to? They are going to be shifted onto the provincial welfare rolls. In Ontario, they will go onto the municipal welfare rolls. Somebody has got to pick up the tab. If you do not have unemployment insurance in this country, it is the welfare system. It is a social assistance system.

Again, in the House of Commons committee hearings, the cities of Vancouver, Toronto, Ottawa, and Sudbury all said that as a result of this bill their welfare costs will go up. If people are without money, jobs, or unemployment insurance, we are not going to let them starve on the street. We are not going to allow them to rely totally on soup kitchens and breadlines. They will come under the welfare system. Somebody, be it the same Canadian taxpayer, will have to pay for it, but instead of it being done through a rational system such as the unemployment insurance system which has served this country well for years, it will be done through the welfare systems. That is one of the results of this legislation.

In addressing the bill government members have said that the purpose of the bill is to take away the disincentives in the unemployment insurance system so that Canadians will work rather than rely on the dole. In other words, Conservative members are implying that the unemployment insurance system we have had for years is an incentive not to work, an incentive to laziness.

We have the same unemployment insurance system throughout the whole country. It is the same system in Newfoundland as in Toronto. In Toronto the unemployment rate is around 4 per cent. In Newfoundland it is around 20 per cent or 18 per cent. If it is a disincentive to work, why are all those lazy bums in Toronto not working? It is not a different system in Ontario, Alberta or Newfoundland. It is the same system in every province, yet there is a low rate of unemployment in Toronto and a very high rate of unemployment in Newfoundland, Cape Breton and in the Gaspe. The reason is not the unemployment insurance system, the reason is there are no jobs.

An hon. member: That is Tory logic. So much for Tory logic.

Mr. Allmand: Yes, that is Tory logic. The Tories blame the unemployed for unemployment. They put the blame for unemployment on the people who cannot find jobs. If the real cause of unemployment was the unemployment insurance system, then you would see uniform unemployment across the country. I do not think anybody can argue that Newfoundlanders are any more lazy than anyone else. You will find, as a matter of fact, that half of Toronto is filled with Newfoundlanders, Prince Edward Islanders and New Brunswickers, and so on. They are not lazy. They want to work. What they need are jobs.

They do not need cut-backs in their unemployment insurance system.

In many parts of Canada, not the big cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver or Calgary, many places are one-industry towns based on resources. They are lumber towns, oil towns, mining towns, fishing towns and farming towns. In the wintertime their employment is very seasonal in nature. When the fishery closes down in the winter there is no work. If it is a town based on tourism where tourism stops in the winter such as an ocean resort located in Prince Edward Island and the beaches are closed, there is no work.

It is not that the people are lazy, they need something to keep them going until the spring comes, until the fishery opens, until the forestry industry gets going or until the logging gets going again, or until the prices go up as they did in Sudbury. They need something to keep them going and the unemployment insurance system is what has kept them going in the past.

In most progressive countries in Europe, in West Germany, France, or Sweden, they have very efficient unemployment insurance systems yet they have low rates of unemployment. Unemployment insurance systems are not the cause of unemployment. The people that are unemployed are unemployed because there are no jobs.

The minister tries to justify this bill and tries to justify the cuts in the bill by saying: "Yes, I am cutting back on benefits to the unemployed but I am going to provide them with training". I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you are an unemployed fish worker in Canso, Nova Scotia, what are you going to train these people for? Are you going to train them for a job in Toronto? Are you going to train them for a job in Calgary, in Vancouver? If you are going to train them in something new and they live in Canso, you first have to do something about getting jobs in Canso so they can use that training there. The same thing for Sydney and Glace Bay and northern Ontario, and so on. You just do not train people without any ideas as to where they are going to go once they get that training. Training is a good thing. Education is a good thing. But you also have to have jobs once they are trained to fill those jobs.

We have had many examples of people who were trained over and over again in certain parts of the country but had no jobs to go to. It is great to train people but you have to have side by side with your training program a program for regional development and job-creation so that those people who get training will find jobs. It is not enough to say that we are going to move everybody to Toronto. Toronto is too big as it is. The rents are too high. The costs are too high. There is a high standard of living in Toronto. You have to go about 10 miles to get to work each day.

In conclusion, I want to say that the Senate amendments do not go far enough. They are mild compared to the amendments we introduced in the House of Commons. They are based on the same principles as the amendments introduced in the House of Commons, but they are mild. The Senate is trying to make a compromise with the Conservative government.

I point out again that as far as I am concerned the Senate has more of a mandate to present amendments before this House and this government. I say that because the government did not make these amendments part of its platform in the 1988 election. As a matter of fact, it denied there would be any change to the unemployment insurance system. The Tories did not make it part of its mandate. At that time the government did not win a majority of Canadian votes and now it is at 19 per cent and 21 per cent in the polls. It has no support whatsoever in the country and here, with the use of closure, it is trying ram through amendments which are not supported by the churches in Canada, the trade unions, nor the legal aid clinics. None of the social bodies support these amendments. Even the chambers of commerce are divided on them because they do not want to pay higher premiums. They know that when the government terminates its contribution which was $2.5 billion last year, that their contribution will increase. It is another form of taxation.

I ask the government to stop this nonsense of trying to pretend that what the Senate is proposing is something that was conceived in the minds of the senators. The senators are acting as a conduit for the strong feelings of millions and millions of Canadians. If the government had any sense it would wake up and send this bill back to the drawing-board to come forward with something that is more reasonable and more humane.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to listen with great interest to my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who spoke forcefully about Bill C-21 and the situation today whereby Parliament is again considering—for the second time—a bill that we thought had been passed democratically, according to the customary rules of Parliament, Mr. Speaker. We thought that we had debated this bill, but here we are again together today debating this Bill C-21 because the Canadian Senate has sent it back to us. I regret that my colleague could not stay with us a few minutes more because I would like to respond, to make some comments on his speech.

Among other things, I found his statement that the Senate of Canada had a mandate pretty far-fetched, to put it bluntly, Mr. Speaker, but right at the end of his speech, he told us that the Senate had a mandate to change Bill C-21. Mr. Speaker, I think that we must not let such statements pass. We must come right out and say that it is false. The Canadian Senate has no mandate from anyone to change Bill C-21. From the outset, I think that we must denounce the fact that the Senate, largely dominated by federal Liberals, Mr. Speaker, senators appointed by Mr. Trudeau, today is usurping the democratic authority not only of the Canadian Parliament but, more than that, of all Canadians who ever voted in their life. To put it bluntly, by so doing, they are literally restricting every Canadian's power to decide democratically who will govern them. That is the ultimate result of their action. I wanted to mention it, and it is important to establish that fact at the outset because, if we start allowing the Senate to come and encroach upon the powers of the Canadian Parliament, well, it is the whole of our democracy that will ultimately suffer. I really want to make that clear, Mr. Speaker, and to point out that the Senate of Canada has been given absolutely no mandate to act in that way.

I was also puzzled, Mr. Speaker, by my honorable colleague taking the trouble of mentioning in his comments that the Senate had not gone far enough. It is as though he had been telling us at the same time: "Here are the amendments from the Senate of Canada, but I personally think that they have not gone far enough, that this is not enough."

We on this side of the House find this rather strange, all the more so since the Senate and the federal Liberals had proposed changing the entrance requirements from 15 to 18 weeks, whereas Bill C-21 provides for a variable entrance requirement of 10 to 20 weeks. In other words the Liberal senators were in favour of a requirement which is stricter yet than what the Canadian government, the Progressive Conservative government proposes through Bill C-21. And today the Liberal member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce complained that the Canadian Senate did not go far enough. It certainly goes to show, first that contradiction does not faze them and second, that they ought to be talking to one another. I should think that they have caucuses, like all political parties in the House of Commons. Hopefully they will take every opportunity to sit down together and discuss the bills they are expected to debate in either House, because it seems to me their contradictions are rather flagrant.

Basically we are witness to something on the part of the opposition, and this goes for the NDP as well because I would not want to discriminate. As much on the NDP side as on the Liberal side we are witnessing a rather simple phenomenon, and that is a monumental failure in terms of fresh ideas, a monumental failure in terms of an alternative for a political party for the whole country. What they have been doing through this exercise—because the federal Liberal members sitting here are accomplices in this exercise—what they have been doing is to let unelected federal Liberal senators take over their parliamentary responsibilities. That is what we are witnessing here. Indeed, that is the issue of this debate. Let us not kid ourselves and suggest it is anything else but. That is exactly what it is. We are dealing here with an opposition which has completely shifted its responsibilities to a group of people who do not have to face the electorate at regular intervals, as elected representatives normally have to do in a democratic system. That is exactly what we are witnessing now. We are therefore compelled today to take up the time of the House to debate once more a bill which we have already debated.

We are forced today to resume this debate and reconsider decisions already made, and this, at the expense of Canadian taxpayers. That is exactly what the debate people are watching today is all about. Which does not mean that the government is altogether unreasonable. Because we have at heart first and foremost to uphold the interests of our constituents, we are prepared to go to any length to make progress with this bill which is very important for our country. Although reluctantly believe me, we are prepared to accept certain amendments to accommodate the Senate. I emphasize this point, because we want to show that, in fact, we are not totally insensitive to what the Senate may say nor to the message it may want to convey to us. We do not believe either that we know better than anybody else in this country what is good for the Canadian people.

It is true that once in a while, a member of the opposition, whether a NDP or a liberal, or even a minister or an individual member of the Ontario or British Columbia legislature may come and say: "Well, back home, things are different. Here is a significant amendment to the bill." This may happen. In this case, I can tell you frankly that there are a few amendments proposed by the Canadian Senate which the government has decided to accept. I mention this because it is important to let people know that we are always ready for a compromise. We are prepared to bend over backward, as we say in Quebec, to make progress with this bill.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I think it is also important to see what Bill C-21 is all about. First of all, we must tell Canadians frankly what they will have to face in the 1990s. Training will become an essential component in peoples' lives. We will have to make sure that in the forthcoming years, there is increased training in the labour force if we want Canadian men and women to keep their jobs and adjust to the new technologies which will appear on the market place.

Bill C-21 attempts to prepare them to face these big changes.

Mr. Speaker, we know that our unemployment insurance system was designed in another era, the 1950s and 1960s—things move so fast in our world that we can now call that another era. The system was designed at a time when Canada's economic requirements were quite different from what they are today. What has changed dramatically in the last 20 years in Canada is that to enter and remain in the labour market, you need a minimum level of training. Bill C-21 recognizes this need. It makes an unemployment insurance system, which is largely passive, more active. We take a pool of money of about $10 billion a year all told, paid for by employers and employees and by the government when it contributed and when it will be called upon to contribute from time to time as required. We are taking about $10 billion that was paid out passively to Canadians and we are making it more productive so that those who receive benefits can at the same time get the help they need to re-enter the labour market. That is what Bill C-21 is about, Mr. Speaker.

If you take a look around, and my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce mentioned it when he spoke of chambers of commerce, if you take a look at the chambers of commerce in Canada and the Canadian Manufacturers Association, if you look at the economic development corporations, in Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia or elsewhere, they will all give you the same message: Training is the key to making the Canadian economy competitive. If it is a key element, we must adjust our systems to recognize the importance of training. That is the purpose of Bill C-21.

I hear a New Democratic colleague, I hear noises from that side, someone saying that we are making the poor pay. That is absolutely false, Mr. Speaker.

Basically, what you say seems to confirm that you have a poor understanding of the Canadian economy, of Bill C-21, and of the needs of Canadian men and women in the years to come.

Basically, what he is saying today is: Don't change a thing. Don't change the Unemployment Insurance Act and don't change anything in this country. As if Canada could continue unchanged in a world that is perpetually changing, Mr. Speaker. It cannot!

Canadians listening to us today know perfectly well we can't. We cannot stay put and stand pat and do nothing, like the New Democrats and the federal Liberals, and pretend everything will work out fine. It just isn't true. We must have the guts to change the system we have, and that is exactly what Bill C-21 sets out to do. Its purpose is to help those who need training, who need to acquire skills, and who need practical training to get back into the labour market. That is what this is all about, Mr. Speaker.

Unfortunately, we on this side of the House face an opposition that suffers from hardening of the arteries, that has no idea and is unable to come up with alternatives. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the alternatives they do suggest always boil down to the same thing.

I have been in the House since 1984, and to every government bill, the opposition has responded with the same alternative: spend more money!

We ask them: What would you do if you were running the show? No problem, they would spend more money. Our national debt has now reached $350 billion. Makes no difference! Spend more money! Always the same naïve answer.

Basically, what they are saying is, they don't want to choose. They don't want to suggest an alternative.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take just a few minutes to talk about the situation of young people in this country, a subject in which I was very much involved. I had the privilege of occupying a cabinet position in which I was directly responsible for young people. If there is any group in our society that so obviously needs training and education, it is our young Canadians. Canada has a very serious problem today with respect to training and education. For instance, we have a very high drop-out rate at the secondary level. About 30 per cent of students in Canada do not finish highschool. I am sure this will surprise many of our listeners. Thirty per cent! I see a number of young people here today, our pages here in the House of Commons, who provide a truly exceptional service. They are at university, but these young men and women who work for us in the House of Commons represent 13, 14 or 15 per cent of the population in their age group. That is quite impressive. To me this must mean something.

What is even more surprising is that the highschool drop-out rate is not going down, it is going up. It is increasing in British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec, and the only province where the school drop-out rate is stable and going down is, as far as I know, Saskatchewan.

Another thing we know, Mr. Speaker, is that the more training or education a person has the better his or her chances to find gainful employment in our society. That was true 20 years ago, that was true 30 years ago, and it is still true today in 1990. It is important that we pinpoint these problems and make an attempt to solve them. It is an important problem for the following reasons. The people who are likely to benefit from training are those who already have had a minimum of education, people who have at least Grade 5. Statistics indicate quite clearly that people who take advantage of these training opportunities, attend night school or enrol for three- or four-week courses when drawing unemployment insurance are those who in most cases already have a minimum of education or have finished Grade 5 at least. But let us not worry about those who did not complete their studies, let us face it, they are not going to go knocking on doors to show that they do not have the minimum education required to enrol for other courses. This is why we have to be aware of these new problems, Mr. Speaker.

Bill C-21 fits in that context because the government acknowledges the importance of all—

Mrs. Langan: They have to pay for it themselves!

Mr. Charest: Pardon me! Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I thought I heard something, but obviously it was just a bit of noise from the NDP side.

In any event, we should strive to identify quickly the new challenges we will have to meet in the 1990s, challenges of which we had no idea some 30 or 40 years ago, because frankly, what is new in this country, is the fact that we have somehow become the victims of our own success. Some 30 or 40 years ago, we lived in a resource based economy and an individual did not need much education to get and keep a well- paying job. But this situation has changed dramatically over the past 20 years.

Today, we know for instance that within the next ten years, 67 per cent of the new jobs will require at least 12 years of schooling and of that number half will require at least 17 years.

I suggest, therefore, that the message is clear and easy to understand. At least, the members on this side of the House have succeeded in understanding it very quickly. That is the reason why the government has introduced

Bill C-21 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, to make sure that Canadian men and women can take advantage of the employment opportunities which will be created for them on the labour market, provided we have the courage to implement the major changes which are necessary.

• (1630)

That is what Bill C-21 is all about. Unfortunately, this is an issue of secondary importance, because the real problem, as far as I am concerned, is the fact that this Parliament is being robbed of its authority by non-elected people who, by their actions, are trying to whittle down the democratic power of each and every citizen in this country. Through their action today, Mr. Speaker—I urge you to reflect upon it, because what I am saying is very important—the Liberals are telling the Canadian people who took part in the last election that their votes do not mean anything. They are trying to undermine the basic power of each individual who voted in the 1988 election. And that, Mr. Speaker, is a sham which we must denounce today and again tomorrow, and for which the Liberal Party of Canada will eventually pay a very high price.

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it does not give me any great pleasure to speak again this afternoon. It seems every time I speak in this House it is in response to a government act of closure. It becomes the rule rather than the exception.

We wish the government would kick the habit. I think the people of Canada are probably not aware of the kinds of actions that this government gets involved in day after day, week after week, year after year. In fact, it is setting all-time records for closure. It is almost like a Gestapo kind of tactic. It is the same thing in committee hearings.

Committee members come out and say: "They don't listen. They don't want to listen. They don't want witnesses". They are so callous as to indicate: "Why listen to them? They will all cry the same song anyway". This is the kind of attitude that the members opposite have. The minister is in some sort of "never never land" that is not the reality of the situation.

The reality is in the constituency offices of this country. I do not think you are listening to the people who come into your offices. Ask them what they are talking about. They are talking about the UI bill. They are saying that this is another Draconian measure, in a whole host of measures that to me are very remindful of December with the clawback provision.

Clawback is obviously a term created by the Tory government. Bryce Mackasey put it very well when speaking of the UI program, specifically since 1980. He said: "Any tinkering with this program has been well orchestrated, a well orchestrated campaign based on the alleged abuse of the plan". I think that it is a carefully worked out plot that "everybody is abusing the plan and therefore we are going to have to fix it".

You indeed fixed it, but at the expense of the people who can least afford to pay for the changes, by preparing and conditioning people for the amendment, supposedly aimed at reducing the abuse when in fact the main purpose was to shift the financial burden. You have done that.

You throw in the occasional amendment. We call them sweeteners, artificial, synthetic, something which is very apropos from this government. I think it is also very uniform action in that the things you do are unimaginative and not creative. Both budgets have been that way. It is just an act of cut, cut, cut, cut. There is not one positive aspect in either one of those budgets, nor is there anything positive in this UI program.

Mr. Reid: Very depressing.

Mr. Butland: Very depressing, indeed.

In my constituency the Conservatives said: "You must vote for free trade because it will create thousands of jobs. It will be good for the Canadian steel industry." I am here to tell you that it is not doing us any good. I know the hon. member from Hamilton will understand this. You may not agree with me, but it has been bad for the steel industry. We had a visit from some American Congressmen and they said: "Don't bite the hand that feeds you, Canadians. You're not getting any more of our steel market. Don't kid yourself into thinking that". So this free trade agreement that was supposedly good for us is in fact hurting us. The American steel industry has not stopped harassing us. As a result there is unemployment in my riding. We have a state of the art seamless tube mill which is almost nonp–operational.

The unemployment rate continues to escalate. The answer to this is change the unemployment system, make it more difficult to get into it and you will qualify for a shorter period of time. To boot, you will pay for it. That is the ultimate insult.

As far as the training provided for by the government goes, it is recognized that the government's proposals have been abysmal failures, not only public, but private. The figures show that the federal government has been back–pedalling in this area. Statistics indicate that the federal government has been cutting back on job training outlays since fiscal 1984–85. The expenditure cut–backs would appear even sharper if the figures were adjusted for inflation.

While Japan and the U.S. allocate considerably less public sector money to adult job training, their private sectors more than make up for this seeming imbalance. According to the Department of Employment and Immigration the private sector in Canada spends about $1.4 billion on formal training, less than half that of the U.S. on per employee basis. I worry whether Canadian governments truly grasp the gravity of the situation. Long–term training should be the responsibility of government, particularly the federal government. In this regard governments have been letting the Canadian labour force down.

When it comes to governments discussing in their budgets the have provinces, Ontario is always mentioned. Ontario is wealthy. But they fail to break down Ontario into northern Ontario and southern Ontario. Northern Ontario is not doing well, thanks to this government and its free trade agreement and cuts in regional development programs.

We are put into an unemployment boundary with other areas. I am glad that Sudbury is doing so well, but we are not doing so well. The rates are askew. As a result the people in Sault Ste. Marie who are presently unemployed, supposedly at the rate of 9 something per cent, which I suspect is 13 or 14 per cent, are the ones who are going to be hurt by this, and will continue to be hurt.

I do not want to be a doom and gloom kind of individual because I am not that kind of person, but dealing with this kind of government makes one a very pessimistic individual. I think you must realize that this whole country has gone into a state of pessimism because you offer them very little hope in any positive way whatsoever.

I would like to get on to a tender issue that indirectly relates to unemployment insurance. It is border cities. Once again this government has said: "Free trade will benefit border cities the most". It has benefited us the least. The GST will drive them across the border as fast as they can go. You leave Canadians at the borders absolutely no choice, and when you give them no choice they shop on the American side.

Constituents are telling me: "We want to be like the Americans". Is this a plot that the government has devised? I find this depressing because they are shopping over there to the detriment of the businesses on the Canadian side. I think I can safely say that as a direct result of this, a new IGA store will not open in my constituency, something which will cost us jobs. I do not blame the people for shopping in the States. I blame the government for forcing them to go there. It will create unemployment, and they will turn to this new plan by this government which will make it even harder for them to qualify for it.

I turn to a magazine that I hesitate to read from, nevertheless, the cynicism that I exude as I read it really tells me what this is all about. "Privatization in Canada is being seen as an opportunity for Joe or Jill Average to enjoy the benefits of capitalism first hand". Who is kidding whom? There is a beautiful picture on the front of this magazine of the minister responsible for privatization. That is some indication as to the contents of the magazine.

The article I am reading from is called: "Back to Basics". The more you read the more cynical you become about the government and the people who support the government so strongly.

Once again, we get into this being an orchestrated campaign. They are talking about the UI system. A gentleman from Dupont said: "The system of regional subsidies encourages people in Atlantic Canada to be more dependent on collecting UI, encouraging them to stay where there are no jobs rather than to move to where the jobs are". So they are saying to the people in Atlantic Canada: "You don't like it here. There is no work. Move. Don't stay in Atlantic Canada. Don't stay in Saskatchewan. Don't stay in northern Ontario. Move to where the jobs are because this system was not meant to protect you for all year round".

This gentleman from Dupont went on to say: "Many people in Atlantic Canada are 10–40 workers. They work for 10 weeks so that they can collect UI for 40". How cynical a statement can we get? It is just a way of life for these people, as if they want to work for 10 and be unemployed for 40 and collect unemployment insurance. It is like this is their dream, this is the all–Canadian dream for northern Ontario citizens, for eastern Canadian citizens and for citizens of Saskatchewan. That is not the Canadian dream. It appears that this government is in a dream, and it is creating a nightmare for these people and these regions.

"The move to tighten up UI is a step in the right direction because it more closely reflects this return to insurance principles. Business agrees that the labour force development strategy objective to move the UI system from passive income support to more active training in skills upgrading sounds good, but of course there is a catch—they have to pay for the course costs".

There is an indication in this article that big business wants it both ways, and that is just not possible.

In summary, I think that this government is abdicating its responsibility to the people of the country, in particular the people who must be cared for. There seems to be a general policy direction to cut back on the social programs of the country that we have so long been accustomed to and appreciated, but now you are breeding this sense of cynicism into the people of Canada. I am sorry to say that some people are starting to accept some of your philosophies in this area, people whom I never anticipated would accept them. Perhaps your propaganda campaign is working on some, but I am sure that it is not on the majority.

I believe the government should be responsible for its people. You people are getting more and more out of the business of dealing with the people, and caring for them. You are cutting them adrift. You are cutting that safety net. You are getting more and more into survival of the fittest, the Thatcherite kind of economic policy, the Reaganite economic policy where the fittest will survive and the others will fall by the wayside.

This country is too vast and too sparsely populated to operate in that kind of milieu, in contrast with the American state and its 300 million people. We have always had a history of caring for those who need to be cared for. We have always looked after the disadvantaged regions of the country. We are quickly moving away from that. We believe that this UI legislation is part and parcel of that. It saddens me to speak to this bill because each and every bill that seems to come forward is one full of great pessimism for just about everybody in this country.

I suspect that Canadians are waking up and will remain awake for the next three years. They will punish you for some of these policies. I sincerely believe that. Hopefully, there will be a change of government for the better and we can turn this country around and head in the direction that we should be going and to which Canadians want to get back. That is obvious. If you have checked the polls lately, you are in dire straits. I am sure this legislation is one of the reasons that you are in these dire straits and likely will remain there.

Mr. Jean–Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I was reading the speeches by members who took part in this debate, and I realized this would be my third speech on this particular bill. My first was on October 24, my second was on November 2, and today, here we are again, talking about Bill C–21.

When we talk about tolerance in this country, I think there is quite a bit. We are talking about C–21 again, although a group of parliamentarians crisscrossed this country for three weeks to hear various intervenors on the subject. We heard nearly 150 different groups, all of whom expressed their positions. We tabled a report in the House. We reported back to the House with an excellent bill to reform the unemployment insurance system, under which $1.3 billion of the $12 billion in the Unemployment Insurance Fund is to be reallocated. We will put $600 million into new services. For instance, maternity leave will be doubled, people over 65 will now also be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and furthermore, $800 million, still part of the same $1.3 billion, will be taken to provide more training for workers, at a time when in Canada, 50 per cent of the private sector tells us it has trouble finding qualified manpower and when many young people drop out of high school to enter the labour market. The consequences are well known. In a year or two these people are out of work, and then what happens? Unemployment and welfare, if they don't take the trouble to get training. And that is what our government proposes to do in this legislation.

We want to train our workers in order to have a qualified workforce that can enter the labour market with confidence and is able to get ahead. So what happens? We have a Senate, this dictatorship of princes, that is abusing its powers and which today again is thumbing its nose at the decisions of our elected representatives, those who were duly elected by Canadians to introduce legislation. It thumbs its nose at all that and sends the bill back to us with a message: We cannot accept this, and you will have to go so far as to change the very substance of the bill.

They agree with training for workers, Mr. Speaker, but they say we should get the $800 million from the taxpayers.

I would like to see whether they would be so favourable to the GST, because that is another way to get money. But we see how people do not accept it easily.

The Senate again wants to add to the taxpayers' burden. Tax them and train them! But what kind of people are they? What kind of management courses have they taken, Mr. Speaker, to say such things? As if we could go on taxing people indefinitely.

People's ability to pay is limited and I think that it is much more sensible administratively to take the same amount of money and apply it more innovatively where the real needs are. That is what we are doing. We take the same $12-billion fund and allocate $1.3 billion of it differently.

Besides, look at the people in that same party and see where they took our country in the 16 years preceding 1984. The debt went from practically nil to $200 billion. We now see how difficult it is to reduce that debt which costs us over $100 million a day in interest.

Mr. Speaker, I even think that we should put ourselves in the situation of Canadians who see what is going on now: a bill comes back to the House of Commons although the elected representatives had decided that it was the way to go and in their interest.

Imagine that you were a pregnant woman calling her MP's office and finding out that the legislation is still blocked. Pregnant women cannot benefit from the parental leave in the bill; maternity leave is going from 15 to 25 weeks, and even 30 weeks in case of illness. Imagine yourself in their situation!

Imagine the situation of people in Newfoundland, where the unemployment rate is over 15 per cent, who are now penalized. They have to work 14 weeks because the Senate is abusing its powers.

Imagine how all those people feel. Canadians are getting fed up, Mr. Speaker. I don't like to say it, but that is the situation we are in when we, the elected representatives, the lawmakers, are paralyzed by an institution that is no longer in tune with the needs of the Canadian federation.

I was just talking to you about tolerance in our country, because I am a French-speaking Quebecer. I was listening to the news last night and I saw a representative of APEC, the Association for the Preservation of English Canada, comparing us francophones, French-speakers, to AIDS.

How do think we like it, us Quebecers, to hear such things? On the subject of tolerance, have we not reached our limit yet, Mr. Speaker? How much more must we tolerate? How much longer must Quebecers and francophones accept to be treated the way they are being treated?

Mr. Speaker, I also noticed that Mr. Clyde Wells, the Premier of Newfoundland, a province of 500,000, is trying to drive Quebec out of the Confederation, while we are 6 million strong. Does he speak on behalf of Newfoundlanders or on his own, Mr. Speaker? How can that individual dare put the very survival of Canada in jeopardy by his revolting and uncompromising attitude towards francophones? "Sure, sure, you French-speaking people are distinct. We are not going to say so in the constitution, but only in the preamble." Who do they take us for, Mr. Speaker?

How can we accept indefinitely seeing another Premier, Mr. McKenna from New-Brunswick, who set the "whoops, I disagree with that bit of the Meech Lake Accord" ball rolling, reject Quebecers? He is the one who bears the heaviest responsibility, Mr. Speaker, and it is imperative that he acts quickly in order to defuse an increasingly explosive situation which has Quebecers now saying: "We would almost prefer that the Meech Lake Accord not go through, just to show them who we are."

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken), on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: I wonder what the connection is between the hon. member's comments and Bill C–21, which happens to be the subject before the House today, not Meech Lake or anything like that. I would therefore ask the hon. member to speak to the bill before the House.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know the hon. member was getting to Bill C–21. The hon. member for Jonquière.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I realize this may bother some hon. members, but when we are discussing a bill like Bill C–21, it is part and parcel of what is happening in Canada today. We have to see the whole picture, including a Senate that abuses its powers, this dictatorship of princes, this senator who went on a hunger strike. Now that was something to impress Canadians! Senator Jacques Hébert, outside the Senate Chamber on a hunger strike for Katimavik! Has anyone mentioned Katimavik to you lately Mr. Speaker? I haven't heard the word since the Senator ended his hunger strike. It seemed to be vitally important at the time, so much so that he was prepared to die in the attempt. Incredible! Today, all that energy would be channelled into worrying about what is going to happen on June 24.

It is all part of the same general picture, Mr. Speaker, of a word I would rather not use, the feeling of despair prevalent among Quebecers and Canadians who see that their elected representatives are no longer able to act on their behalf and pass the kind of legislation that protects the interests of Canadian men and women.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, some people have an enormous responsibility in this respect. There are only so many weeks left. I know I will have to stop my comments at five o'clock, since we must make way for Private Member's Business. Earlier, you suggested that I could go on after Private Member's Business, to finish my speech on Bill C–21. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept your offer since this evening we Quebecers will be meeting at Meech Lake to discuss the present situation, which is a very serious one, and I certainly intend to defend my people. The hon. member opposite can shout as much as he likes. I am a francophone and I am in Ottawa as an elected representative from Quebec. I also have to defend the interests of my province and the people in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C–21 is an excellent piece of legislation, which, as I said earlier, will allocate $800 million to training for workers; $600 million in new social benefits will go to various groups of claimants, and this legislation will also consider regional needs and regional unemployment rates. Instead of having to work for 20 weeks because the current unemployment rate is high, an employee in Newfoudland will need only ten week's employment. Elsewhere like in Toronto where jobs are more plentiful, they will have to work longer so that regional disparities will be lessened throughout the country. This is a good way to keep abreast of what is going on from one region to the next.

That is what this bill seeks to accomplish, and that is the bill about which the senators are digging in their heels, the same senators who sat on Bill C–22 on drugs, the same senators who said: Don't do that, it does not make sense, drug prices will skyrocket. Don't do that, it is not true, companies will cut down on research.

Look at the figures, Mr. Speaker. It is a fact that drug prices have not been rising as fast since Bill C–22 has become law.

Additional funds have been earmarked for research, hundreds of millions of dollars more than was spent before Bill C–22. That is just one example of what that institution has been doing. For partisan and political considerations, they are blocking the whole system. And when we talk about reform, constitutional evolution and changes, that is the kind of thing which must be changed. One thing I can tell my colleague is that after June 24 you will find it difficult to change things if ever Quebec does not become a full-fledged member of the Canadian federation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

LABELLING REGULATIONS

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should establish labelling regulations that would require the labelling of farm-reared salmon and steelhead prior to marketing, and regulations that would require labelling in restaurant menus, to permit consumers to select between wild stock and farm-reared salmon and steelhead in the market-place.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to rise in the House to debate this motion this afternoon. It is a motion which I think is extremely important not only to Canadians but to anyone purchasing and consuming farm-reared salmon.

The rationale behind this is that a consumer should have the right to information and to informed choices about the type of food that is consumed. Another aspect of the rationale is that there is considerable reaction to the farm rearing of salmon and to the specific methods in which salmon have been reared, particularly on the coast of British Columbia.

By our requiring the labelling of these fish as to whether it is farm-reared salmon or wild stocks, it will allow the consumer to make a political choice. They can make a statement about their approval of government regulation and how the product that they are to consume is going to be available in the market-place. The bottom line is that I think every member of this House has an obligation to ensure that the consumer has the right to obtain the information about food which they are consuming. Without proper labelling that cannot happen and it basically deprives consumers of their rights.

The first issue is the quality of the product. There is a great deal of concern. In my own area and wherever I travel, people like to eat seafood products, particularly salmon and steelhead. Yet people are concerned in many quarters about the quality of farm-reared salmon.

Disease is a major concern. On the coast of British Columbia, salmon are raised in a very warm area in the Gulf of Georgia, in areas such as the Sechelt Inlet, where tidal exchange is very low and where the opportunity to cleanse the area and remove waste and detrimental chemicals which develop in it is very low.

Another concern about quality is the way net pens and farm-rearing operations are put in place. The large accumulation of waste beneath the pens is a matter of serious concern to people who live in the area, as well as people who consume the product. Net pens held in the same area in a very low tidal exchange accumulate large amounts of food and excrement from the fish held in captivity, as well as wastes from the rearing operation under those pens, and there is a great deal of concern that it can affect the quality of fish, both by removal of oxygen and by encouraging the growth of other organisms in the area.

Another concern as far as quality is concerned in the net pen method of rearing is that very large populations of fish are held, within a very close, confined area, constantly moving, and constantly under stress. That stress leads to greater disease and deterioration of the fish and anyone who has looked into a salmon net pen can obviously see the kind of reaction that is occurring with those fish. There is discoloration and various levels of activity in the fish. Generally there is an appearance of a deteriorated quality of fish in many of those areas because of the close, confining nature of net pens and the high stress levels.

Fish farmers are struggling basically with two major diseases; the kidney disease and vibriosis, which are fairly rampant in some quarters and cause a great deal of concern for fish farmers. In addition to the basic diseases that occur in the rearing environment, there is a concern about diseased eggs coming into the country, particularly with the Atlantic salmon that have been brought into areas on the west coast.

There is strong concern that eventually those diseased eggs from Atlantic salmon drawn out of Norway and Scotland will be transmitted to wild stocks and that the wild stocks will be decimated by the transmittal of those diseases. There is serious concern about both diseases in the fish that are developed in the rearing environment and diseases that are brought into Canada via the eggs that are used in the Atlantic salmon from Norway, Scotland and the east coast.

The next matter in terms of quality is the use of antibiotics in the treatment of common diseases in fish. The antibiotics placed in the food are basically broadcast into the populations of all farm reared salmon. The most prominent antibiotics are oxytetracycline of which about five tonnes is used annually and is growing every year as more and more fish farms come on, and sulfamerazine which, again, is a great concern among people who are consuming that. There are indications that the oxytetracycline can last up to 100 days in the stock and there is no guarantee that the fish from the last point of kill to the table is going to be free of antibiotics in the flesh.

Consumers have a right to know. There are people with allergies to antibiotics and if the farm-reared fish are being treated for diseases with antibiotics, they should have the right to know that they are eating farm-reared fish and they run the risk of being exposed to these antibiotics.

Another concern about the use of these antibiotics is that as the food drops to the water bottom it is eaten by the creatures that live there and it seems that antibiotic resistance disease strains are developing. These disease strains, whether they are eaten by wild stocks in the area, or are transmitted from the farm fish to the bottom life and into the wild stocks, combined with the antibiotics, result in the decimation of the wild stocks.

The next element of quality is the chemicals that are used in and around the rearing operations where the farmers are concerned about the build-up in the nets of seaweed and barnacles and other foulants in those nets. They treat those nets with chemicals in order to remove the fouling agent. What we have had in the tributyltin issue is a very dangerous, cancer causing chemical that can be transmitted into the flesh of the fish. Luckily that one has been identified and removed, but there is still a great deal of concern about anti-fouling chemicals that are still being used in the net.

Government regulation of this industry is viewed as being hopelessly inadequate. People at the policy level of the department are assigned second and third priority levels for policy formulation. If they finish their first area of responsibility and their second area of responsibility, they can then move into giving serious time to aquaculture.

The government does not provide the agencies with the resources to do an extensive study of the regulation, particularly when it gets down to the field level for such things as imposing regulations on the development of fish farms. Three years ago there were about 70 fish farms on the coast of British Columbia. By the end of 1989 there were 210 fish farms on the coast of British Columbia with 200 more licences under application and review. The growth of this has been like a gold rush operation and the government, instead of attempting to provide some direction through regulation, policy and enforcement—

Mr. Epp: What have you got against gold rushes?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): The former Minister of Health stands up in the House and asks what have I got against gold rushes. Of course, nothing. But ultimately when the finished product runs the risk of poisoning you, the more there is, the greater the concern in the population.

I know his concern will result in the minister and the government pressing on for this motion which simply gives rights to consumers by requiring a label for farm fish in a restaurant or in any other area where it is to be consumed so that consumers could have the right to make an informed choice about the type of product they eat and the quality. I am certain that the former Minister of Health in this Parliament would be one of the leading spokespersons to advocate that.

At any rate, we were talking about basically the quality of farm-reared fish. We have discussed the problem of disease, antibiotics, the effect of stress on close confinement, the build-up of detritus under these pens that contaminate the bottom life with antibiotics and poisonous chemicals, which can then be transmitted to the population of reared fish as well as wild stocks.

The issue of quality is a serious one. As we move away from the rearing environment to looking at the quality of fish itself, there are a number of schools of thought.

Some say any fish is a good fish. But there are people who are very concerned that the quality of farm-reared fish may in fact be substantially less due to no examination of the product. There is no attempt to impose quality control by government regulation. There is no attempt to systematically check it for content of antibiotics or diseases. The government must look at that seriously if farm-reared product is going to enjoy the same credibility in the market-place as wild stocks.

There has to be an initiative by the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia or other provincial governments in terms of a partnership arrangement where these kinds of standards can be developed and the testing facilities can be brought to bear in a way that will give the consumer confidence.

Another serious concern is with what the industry refers to as morts, and the possibility that a fish dying in the pen can end up in the production process. This has been documented on a number of occasions, where individuals who have been less than scrupulous in the business have wound up putting through dead fish into the production process.

Again, it may only happen very rarely but it gives the entire industry a black eye. Ultimately there is no guarantee that that will not happen. There is no indication of how broadly based it is.

Perhaps an indication of the extensiveness of this problem of dead fish being removed from the pen due to disease and the stress in the environment in which they are reared is the landfill site on the Sechelt Peninsula. It has had a constant struggle with the volume of dead fish being loaded into their landfill site. At various times they have risen up in arms against the producer saying that they are going to have to deal with it themselves because the site will not handle the volume of dead fish that is going in there.

The possibility that some percentage of those dead fish are not going into a landfill site when they are removed from the rearing pens but go into the production process and wind up on somebody's plate becomes quite frightening. This raises the whole problem of control through a credible inspection process so that type of thing does not happen.

The rationale behind this proposal is that quality is of primary importance. People should have an opportunity to make an informed choice about what goes on their plates and into their bodies. There is enough skepticism in the business about the quality that people would like to know in order to make the choice. If that product were labelled, it would put a market-place constraint on the industry so that they would attempt to upgrade all the members in it and the entire process, to assure the customer they were getting the finest product available.

The second point in the rationale was the opportunity of a consumer to make a political choice in the market-place. The government in power believes in the sanctity of the market-place to choose the nature of production and consumption. Why does the government not give the market-place the opportunity to determine the quality and the nature of production and consumption of aquaculture or farm-reared fish?

The mechanism might be simply by labelling farm-reared fish. It would allow people to choose between wild stock and the farm-reared fish. If people have confidence in the industry and they see developing quality controls, they would then begin to choose farm-reared fish, or at least give it equal billing with wild stock. In the absence of that, certainly they are not able to choose in an informed way and the rights of the consumer are being violated as are, to some degree, the rights of the fishing industry.

There is the political aspect of the choices. The way in which this industry has developed has raised serious questions with the people who live along the coast of British Columbia and certainly those who consume the fish in other areas.

The first one is the abuse of the rights of upland owners. On the Sechelt Peninsula we have seen situations where people who live along the beachfront woke up one morning to find a fish farm right smack in front of their homes and their upland operations, denying them basic access to the ocean and affecting the basic quality of the property they paid good money and high taxes for over the years.

In many cases, this is not even the dilemma of the fish farmer. The fish farmer simply took an opportunity provided by lack of government regulation to drop his fish farm right smack in front of an upland owner's operation. People along the coast of British Columbia are absolutely incensed at where fish farms have been located or proposed on prime recreational land. They were talking about Tree Island off of Denman Island, Sechelt Inlet or Wood Bay. The upland owner's rights have been violated. If we label farm-reared fish, the consumer would be able to make a political choice, by saying "I do not approve of this, and I will not buy the product".

I see that there is a minute left. The gold rush mentality of the government is to refuse to regulate in a rational way the development of these fish farms. It has taken a great deal of trial and error and still has a long way to go. The government's unwillingness to provide decent, fair and equitable regulation to this industry to protect consumers and protect upland owners could certainly be compensated for if the consumer could make a choice and say: "I would prefer not to eat that fish because I am uncertain of its quality and because I do not like the way that industry is operating".

• (1720)

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to talk on this subject with the hon. member's introduction of the situation. I only wonder whether it is a desire to limit the labelling of the fish or whether it is an attack on the aquaculture industry. I think that we need to recognize, when we are talking about this industry, that it is not just a new industry but one that has been around in the world for a long time. There are fish farms in the Orient and in Scandinavian countries and recently, in the last few years they have been coming into Canada and now spreading to the east coast of Canada. Aquaculture has become a very significant factor in our Canadian economy.

I think it is regrettable that we have to discuss this whole matter in such a negative manner. I am sure that the hon. member for North Island—Powell River has a lot more in mind than this simple request to establish labelling regulations for farm-reared salmon and steelhead prior to marketing.

The motion also states that the regulations should be established to require labelling in restaurant menus to permit consumers to select between wild stock and farm-reared salmon and steelhead in the market-place. I am sure that he has been in many small restaurants throughout Canada and recognizes that they just cannot afford to carry two types of salmon and a couple of types of trout or steelhead to give the customers choices. Rather, they are going to select the one which they feel is the best quality. Labelling menus will have no value and no effect whatsoever on this.

There is just no rationale at this stage for the government to introduce regulations of this type. We believe that the fewer regulations that governments impose upon industry and business the better off it is. If they are necessary, fine, but to establish regulations just for the sake of having a regulation and more red tape is of no value to the industry, to the public or to the government.

Of course, why should we request that the aquaculturists have labels while not traditional fishermen? If the member is concerned about quality, we need to recognize that all of the fish that are produced for the market are inspected. They all go through the same inspection process. They are graded according to quality and size. Certainly any diseased product is not allowed on the fresh market. I believe that in many cases the farm-reared fish have some advantages in quality.

Also, we need to recognize that many of the species that are sold on the market, such as shrimps, can be of mixed stock. They can be of wild stock, or they can be of cultured stock, this has never presented a problem anywhere that we are aware of in Canada.

I would suggest that the motion to label the cultured salmon and steelhead is really out of touch with reality. If the hon. member felt it was that important, why would he limit it to steelhead and to salmon. We have other trout, for example, that are raised commercially. We have oysters, for example, that can be raised by farmers, as well as the wild stock. If we were going to consider labelling the salmon and steelhead then we should, of course, do it to all fish products.

Again, why force the aquaculturists to label their products when we do not make the same request of the traditional producers? For example, the difference between a seine caught fish that has been in the bottom of the seine net for some time or a gill-net fish compared to the trawl caught fish off the west coast is probably more significant than the difference between a freshly harvested salmon from the fish farm.

We also recognize that the time between when it is caught and brought in to the processing plant is very significant in the quality of the fish as well as how long it has been in the freezer. We can talk about the quality of fish and how it deteriorates after being in the freezer over a long period of time.

The fact is that labelling would not help the consumer because the label indicating whether it is a farm fish or a wild stock fish will not accompany the product to the table in the restaurant. My understanding is that the federal government cannot require restaurants to establish this type of labelling on the products.

We did talk about the choice of fish and even now in many fish stores there is a choice of farm fish or wild stock fish. We already have the opportunity, in many instances, to choose what type of fish we buy.

Since the health and safety of fish and fish products are insured by the government's excellent inspection system, the consumers of Canadian-bought fish can be confident that any fish product they do buy is of high quality. The industry itself has a quality assurance program and maintains standards of excellence. It would be a disaster for them to have a bad product put on the market in their formative years.

Speakers have mentioned the fact that large quantities of these fish have been put in landfill sites. This would indicate that they are maintaining that quality and not marketing fish of inferior quality.

The aquaculture industry in Canada is a rapidly growing dynamic industry. It has been adding millions of dollars to the Canadian economy each year and is providing thousands of jobs for Canadians. It has been suggested that the total annual production from the aquaculture industry will soon exceed $100 million, and much of that in British Columbia from where the proponent comes. Aquaculture is becoming a more and more important component of Canadian fisheries.

When we consider some of the significant problems that many of our fishing communities are facing, we see that aquaculture development could soon become a very interesting avenue to enhance our fisheries and to provide employment in these areas which, during the winter months, have very severe unemployment problems. With the wild stocks declining as a result of any number of causes, aquaculture can certainly provide an alternative for the economic activity and for the job creation which we require.

It has been shown that it is only with a great deal of difficulty that we can increase those wild stocks, yet there is an increasing demand for the salmon and the trout that we produce. Therefore, I believe that the aquaculture industry does have a real place in the market and it has a significant potential for further development if it is allowed to develop. We do not want to put any unnecessary obstacles in its way.

The Food and Agricultural Organization estimates that the world aquaculture production will more than double its present level of 10.2 million tonnes by the year 2000. That is a tremendous source of food in this world that is rapidly running out of food. The aquaculture share of the total world supply for fish, crustaceans, molluscs and marine plants will increase from about 15 per cent in this year to about 25 per cent in the next 10 years. I think that is a very significant increase providing valuable protein to our world's diet. In many countries fish are the only source of protein available.

As Canada is a major exporter of fish products, with something like 80 per cent of all our fish being exported from British Columbia, we must develop the aquaculture sector and not impose further unnecessary regulations upon it. We must pursue already existing programs to support this young and healthy industry.

I believe that the best control is a free market in which, if you have a superior quality product, you can advertise it, whether it is the troll-caught salmon off the west coast or the fresh farm-raised salmon that you are going to have for Christmas dinner. I believe that these are the types of things that are going to create a healthy industry. We must not saddle it with unnecessary regulations. Therefore I cannot support the motion as presented at this time.

• (1730)

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, as associate fisheries critic, I should like to take this opportunity to support the motion presented by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River. As the House is aware, the Liberal Party founded the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In our present ranks we have five former ministers of the department, the first of which was the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. The main right that the Liberal Party strives to uphold in these matters is the right of the consumer to make an informed choice.

We believe that this issue deserves to be studied to determine what benefits can be derived from separate labelling for the consumer.

My support for the motion stems from the fact that there are many things in the aquaculture industry of which we are unsure. This pertains to all parts of the industry, not the least being salmon farming. The following are some of the reasons we in this party endorse further study.

We believe that the consumer should have a choice between two types of salmon. Wild salmon and domestic salmon are different as surely as geese both wild and domestic are different. A consumer has the right to know what the product really is and what effect it will have on him or her.

Regulating the aquaculture industry has also been inconsistent throughout the country. The rules vary from province to province, ranging from stringent to lax standards and regulation enforcement. Perhaps it would be in all consumers best interests that labelling be as precise as possible, given that standards vary widely within the aquaculture industry itself.

The use in antibiotics in the salmon farming industry is another reason for supporting the further study of different labelling. In 1987 it was reported that British Columbia salmon farmers lost between 20 per cent and 60 per cent of their stock to bacterial kidney disease. Antibiotics were used to treat the disease which scientists say is caused by overcrowding in the pens. In Europe scientists have discovered that antibiotics can remain in fish flesh for up to 100 days. No studies have been conducted to determine what effect aquacultural antibiotics can have on humans. Regulations for the use of antibiotics have also been spotty at the best of times. This is probably due to the fact that their use is primarily experimental. Furthermore, the impact of antibiotic treatment of disease is poorly documented and the results are questionable.

If indeed these antibiotics remain in the fish, they could easily pass on to the consumer. The non-farmed salmon are drug free. Proper labelling may be important to those people who have reactions to these drugs. It was with this in mind that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans concluded in its report of July 1988 the following recommendations:

Recommendation 6(A), to conduct research in support of regulatory requirements regarding residues in aquacultural products, with the objective of assessing the potential effect on human health and that of the marine organisms.

Recommendation 15, that the federal government in co-operation with all industrial sectors involved in producing salmonid species for the consumer markets develop labelling standards.

Concerns have also been raised regarding the fish excrements which accumulate in and around the fish pens. Further study should be given to the potential effect this could have on the health and quality of the fish. Wild salmon migrate to different areas during their life span and therefore this is not a factor in their health. It is known, however, that diseases are present in fish excrements, but it is not known if these diseases can be transmitted from it. Clearly this issue needs more study.

With respect to nutrition it has been shown that the fat content of farmed salmon is higher than non-farm salmon, while the nutritional value of non-farm salmon is slightly higher. Consumers who are diet conscious will certainly appreciate a distinction between the two types.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, as I have clearly demonstrated, many areas need further research to ensure the protection of all Canadian consumers. Furthermore, we believe that all Canadians have the right to make an informed choice. Consequently I support the motion that further study into the labelling of salmon is required.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to deal with the motion moved by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River (Mr. Skelly), and I hope that my comments will reassure Canadian consumers about the close watch the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is keeping on the fish farm industry, as well as the industry's responsibility and the quality of its products.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has jurisdiction over coastal fishing, certain in-shore fishing, public harbours as well as off-shore and in-shore navigation. These powers, defined in the Constitution, are the responsibility of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. This is the only federal department whose activities deal mainly with our waters and their resources.

[English]

Through its ongoing programs the Department of Fisheries and Oceans provides support to the aquacultural industry in a number of areas. For example, the science sector of Fisheries and Oceans conducts research and experimental development, undertakes collaborative research with industry, provides disease diagnostic services, operates fish hatcheries and fish culture facilities, and develops protocols for safe interprovincial and international stock movement and for the introduction of new genetic resources. The degree of assistance varies by region.

In the area of fishery management the department conducts habitat reviews and, in some instances, supplies a limited numbers of eggs and smolts to the industry. The department also supports aquacultural development projects in eastern Canada, particularly under regional development programs, and undertakes licensing in some areas of Canada.

Other services that Fisheries and Oceans conducts for the benefit of the aquaculture industry include implementation of the national fish inspection program, provision of relevant market intelligence and analysis to other governments and to industry, and the promotion of Canada's interest in the fisheries trade throughout the international community.

Some other federal departments implement a whole slew of programs most of which are national in scope and are accessible to fish farmers. The purpose of most of these initiatives is to promote research and development, economic and business expansion. These may also benefit from tax incentives.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is recognized as the federal department responsible for fish farming. It has developed a two-pronged strategy to assume its responsibilities. Firstly, in co-operation with provincial governments, to take steps with a view to ensuring the orderly development of the industry, and secondly to carry out programs and activities in support thereof.

In response to representations made by the industry, the various ministers of fisheries in Canada have agreed to intensify the federal-provincial coordination to ensure the orderly development of the fish farm industry in Canada. They agreed, and their proposals were adopted by the first ministers in 1986, that memoranda of understanding on the development of fish farming should be negotiated between the federal government and each individual provincial government.

[English]

A memorandum of understanding is meant to serve two purposes. First, it establishes a joint agreement and understanding of federal and provincial administrative responsibilities for regulation, while reducing the overall administrative and legal burden on the industry. Of particular interest is the move to establish one stop licensing and leasing of commercial aquaculture ventures.

Second, it sets out a co-ordinated and co-operative approach to government support for the industry. This approach is important, given the concern of certain interests with respect to aquacultural development. A memorandum of understanding outlines the respective roles of the federal and provincial governments in areas such as research and development, education, training, leasing and licensing, fish health, stocks and statistics.

The federal government has to date signed memoranda of understanding with the Northwest Territories, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, British Columbia and New Brunswick. Negotiations are under way with other provinces and the Yukon.

This bilateral approach also serves to recognize the particularities of each region and its fish farm industry.

By supporting this industry, the two levels of government are seeking the same objectives, namely, to diversify the production and improve the quality of fish products in Canada, as well as improve the regularity of commercial fish supply both in Canada and abroad.

[English]

All our goals in support of the aquaculture industry are based on a number of principles, and the principle of first order must be a clear and comprehensive regulatory framework. This implies joint responsibility, in fact co-operation to ensure that we maintain a balance between regulation and development. Over-regulating this industry would only lead to limiting its potential in a very competitive market.

Aquaculture is a young and dynamic industry which needs government support. This support is already in place. Fisheries and Oceans is working to develop a positive environment conducive to the evolution of a world-class aquaculture industry.

The Canadian aquaculture industry has made considerable progress in establishing a widespread reputation for high quality seafood products. Fisheries and Oceans is working with the industry and the other levels of government to meet the challenges and opportunities for this industry to become a world leading nation in aquaculture.

Compulsory labelling of the aquaculture product is not required; furthermore, it probably would not work out as too many loopholes would inevitably occur. Because of its critical self-interests, the aquaculture industry is doing its utmost to guarantee the quality of its products. With one of the finest inspection programs in the world, Canada is assuring consumers that the products of all our fisheries meet some of the highest standards of health and safety in our country and abroad.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed and somewhat surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Delta. I wondered whether he was reading the same resolution that I was and that the hon. member for North Island—Powell River introduced. He seemed to be talking about a different subject entirely.

The resolution introduced by my colleague from North Island—Powell River clearly states:

> —should establish labelling regulations that would require the labelling of farm-reared salmon and steelhead prior to marketing, and regulations that would require labelling in restaurant menus, to permit consumers to select between wild stock and farm-reared salmon and steelhead—

In his remarks the hon. member said that this was over-regulating the industry, that we should depend on the market, and that we should let consumers make the decision as to whether they want the wild stock or farm reared.

That is precisely what the resolution asks for. It is exactly what he wants. He wants consumers to know what they are buying. They make the choice. They may decide they want farm reared or they may decide they want wild. The reasons may be totally ill informed or uninformed, but nevertheless the argument is that they should have that choice.

I suspect all members have had people in their offices as I have who have argued that the flavour of the wild stock is so much better than the flavour of the farm reared. There may be others who would argue the other way. I do not know if it has something to do with my age or the way in which I have conducted myself in the past, but frankly I cannot tell the difference. Nevertheless, there are consumers who say that they can tell the difference.

All the resolution is asking is that they know which one they are actually paying for when they buy it and whether they are getting the one they are paying for. There are some who will argue that the nutritive value of the farm reared as opposed to the wild stock is better, and others will argue that the wild stock is better.

I have heard these same arguments and participated in similar arguments with respect to organically grown food and food grown with inorganic fertilizers. I know enough about it to be satisfied in my own mind that there is no difference from the point of view of nutrition.

However, we do not tell people that they are not going to know what they are buying. Certainly organic food is clearly labelled in most instances as such, and consumers pay more for it because they believe that it tastes better or that it is better from a quality point of view. They have the right to make that choice. They have the right to pay for the difference if they want to. That is all that my hon. friend is asking for: the right for people to know what they are buying when they buy it.

The hon. member for North Island—Powell River mentioned that the environment is quite different. Wild stock is raised and spends a good deal of its life in much colder water. It selects the food that it eats. It ranges over thousands of miles in its growing process, so there is quite a difference in the food that it is getting. I do not say that that makes it any better or any worse. I am simply saying there is that difference.

They do get a lot more exercise. Because of the cold water and the exercise the flesh should be firmer. Again, I do not know whether that makes any difference but you and I, Mr. Speaker, should have the right to know when we are buying salmon or steelhead whether it was raised in a little puddle of water in a pen or whether it was raised in and allowed to range the wild ocean.

There is a lot of talk about disease. Certainly Canada is doing everything it can to maintain the quality of farm reared fish and animals alike. We do not know whether we are doing everything that has to be done but we are working at it. We do not know the stress factor. Certainly we know that with 295 of us in this House sometimes the stress is much greater than when there are not quite as many of us here. When those salmon and steelhead are crowded, as I say, in relatively small puddles of water, there is a great stress factor. Does this make any difference? I do not know, but again the consumer should have the right to know what he or she is paying for.

Farm reared fish should be cheaper to produce. They are not because of a lot of problems they are having in the industry in many cases. Nevertheless, they should be cheaper. Farm reared fish should not be sold at the same price as the wild stock. If consumers are getting a product that is being produced more cheaply, they should pay less for it and know what they are getting. They should not be paying top prices for fish that are produced more cheaply when they think they are getting wild stock fish.

The hon. member for Delta was concerned about over-regulating and about the imposition on the industry of having to label. All we are saying is that it is a different product. Whether it is nutritionally different, I do not know. Whether the flavour is different, I do not know. I do not know in what ways it is different, but there is no question but that it is raised in a totally different environment under totally different conditions. There may be questions of flavour and nutrition. If this resolution is supported by the House and acted upon, individuals will know exactly what they are paying for.

I agree with most of what the member for Delta said. Let the consumers make the choice, but they can only make it if the product is labelled so that they know what they are buying.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and participate in this discussion today about the very dynamic and young Canadian industry of aquaculture. I compliment my colleague, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River, for bringing this important subject before the House with his motion M-546. I suppose I should apologize for my voice. Hopefully it will hold out to the end.

At a time when the global market-place is posing challenges for most resource based nations, Canada is in a very exciting position with its new resource which has enormous potential. We have seen tremendous growth in aquaculture in Canada over the last 15 years. Indeed from 1984 to 1987 we saw a 17 per cent increase in the industry representing today a $50 million industry in Canada. Forecasts suggest another 1,000 per cent increase by the end of the decade which we have just begun.

A combination of factors has fuelled this expansion: the growth of world-wide demand for seafood, the need to meet this demand with production from new sources such as cultured fish, the increasing reliance by fish processors on aquaculture products which they see as a dependable year-round source of quality seafood, and a widespread recognition of the high quality of Canadian cultured seafood products already regarded as a major source of increased domestic and international supply.

Atlantic Canada plays a very full part in this well established aquaculture industry. We have salmon, trout, mussels and oysters, and we are now diversifying into scallops. Nova Scotia is a leader in the area of aquaculture having as well developed Irish moss as an area within aquaculture.

As of 1988 aquaculture has directly produced some 1,500 jobs in Canada and it is anticipated that by the year 2000, 5,000 Canadians will be directly employed in the aquaculture industry. This is a part of the tremendous work in job creation that has gone on in the last five years in this country. Not only is direct employment significant in aquaculture but indeed indirect employment has come through related industries and the production of the necessary equipment.

We need to make more progress toward producing all the necessary fishing equipment here in Canada. That can have a tremendous impact on job creation as well. I speak of building cages, equipment, netting manufacturing, feed processing and services in the area of marketing distribution and fish health just as some examples.

There is also a potential down side in aquaculture and we must be very careful in its further development. A number of public concerns have been brought to my attention as a member of Parliament from an area in which there is considerable aquaculture development. People owning adjacent properties have a very active concern in whether or not an aquaculture site is located just off their properties.

Indeed there has to be approval under the Navigable Water Protection Act, but at the same time it seems to me that people who own properties adjacent to the ocean should have a somewhat more significant say in whether or not licences are approved to develop aquaculture right off their own properties. I can relate to this as I live on the ocean myself. There is definitely a need for public consultation on every single aquaculture application that takes place.

There is concern with respect to the impact of aquaculture developments on traditional fishing. For example, earlier this past fall there were applications to develop some aquaculture sites for mussel development near the town of Lockeport in Nova Scotia. This would potentially interfere with the lobster fishery in that area and very legitimate concerns were articulated by the fishermen who have fished there for many years.

We have to be very careful in the development of this industry which at a time when our fishery is facing difficulty has tremendous potential for job creation and the creation of wealth.

One thing that I think is highly significant about aquaculture is that it is an industry that is resource driven. We find out what the market wants and then we develop a means to produce what is required.

It seems to me that this is one of the areas in which we have been falling down in the development of the fishery in Canada. We tend to go out and catch what is there and worry later about whether or not anybody actually wants to buy it, or indeed whether it is commercially viable. We hear much talk in the House about fish allocations that are either left in the water or made available to foreign nations whilst ignoring the fact that we cannot force Canadians to go out and catch fish for which there is no market, or for which they cannot make a reasonable profit or return on the investment that they have made in order to harvest those fish.

We have to continue to look to the future in terms of market development, and aquaculture provides a marvellous opportunity for developing new sources of fish as well as the development of secondary processing of it.

My hon. friend's motion deals specifically with salmon. Aquaculture has been one means whereby we have rekindled the trout industry and the salmon industry in southern Nova Scotia, the area which I have the privilege to represent in this place. We have seen some very successful experiments taking place. My hon. friend from Nanaimo—Cowichan spoke earlier of the differences in the flavour of the meat and the environmental factors that can come into play.

While on the one hand there is the potential for a response to market demand, at the same time we have to recognize that we have a better opportunity of assessing the possibilities for future harvesting because it is a bit more like farming: you know what you are planting and you know what you are going to harvest.

However, we are still subject to vagaries of the environment. That is why environmental protection is so important. The Environmental Protection Act brought forward by this government during the previous Parliament will play a very important role in allowing us to develop an aquaculture industry. We are safeguarding our coastlines and ensuring as best as possible that our oceans will remain clean so that they can produce as much as they can. I am very encouraged to see this Parliament discussing the subject of aquaculture and its potential.

With respect to the specific motion brought forward by my hon. friend, while there is a certain inclination on my part to agree with the sentiment implied in his motion, I have, with all due respect, some reservations as to the wisdom and potential benefits of further regulating an industry that some would suggest is already over-regulated to an extraordinary degree. I believe—and I think that it is consistent with the philosophy of this government—that government's role is to support and to assist but not unnecessarily to intervene in the carrying on of business and in the exploitation of our Canadian resources.

It seems to me that to do as this motion suggests, to impose mandatory labelling of cultured fin fish, is unwarranted for a number of reasons. First, I think it is clear that the quality of the product that we are producing through aquaculture is very high.

For example, in Nova Scotia mussels have become a very big industry. When I was a child in Hubbards we did not even use mussels for bait and yet today they have become one of the delicacies of the Atlantic fisheries. I would suggest that a lot of the people who eat mussels cannot tell the difference in taste between a cultured mussel and a wild mussel, though the cultured ones tend to be of a more consistent size.

The industry is also already highly regulated. Goodness gracious, everybody involved in the fishery knows how highly regulated it is. I am not sure we need to add to that. Enforced labelling would be an administrative nightmare, I would suggest. I do not think we really need this sort of thing, not to mention an added cost with no value added benefit from the point of view of the consumer. I am not sure people wish to have prices added on to things that are already very costly.

While I can respect the sentiment put forward by my hon. colleague opposite, I would much prefer to see the money that would go into administering the bureaucratic system which would have to be set up put toward research. We know the outstanding record of this government and this Prime Minister with respect to research.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I cannot follow that up in that I have such a little time, it is such an important issue and there are so many things I would like to say.

The motion points out one of the real challenges we have and will have in the next number of years as we manage the fishery, as we deal with fisheries development, as we deal with economic development in the fishery, and as we deal with the questions of markets and developing new species and new products. That is the problem that we face, perhaps being victims of our own success potentially in the longer term, as we have to compensate for and balance the success of aquaculture and the success of farm reared, or ranched as some call it, fish as compared to the wild fish that we catch and that our fishermen have traditionally depended so much upon to earn their living.

As I am sure my hon. friend from South Shore is well aware, we face competition from ourselves. We face competition from our own success. As we look at aquaculture as a secure, predictable, dependable way to produce fish of size, of consistency and of some purity, we will come in competition with the people in the fishing industry who depend on the wild animal, who have traditionally had to go out and catch, bring back, produce, develop our markets and sell.

My hon. friend's motion comes directly to that point. We are beginning to see the products of aquaculture. Mr. Speaker, I am just getting started.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt. I would love to hear the hon. member's speech, but the time provided for the consideration of private members' business is now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the order paper.

MEASURE TO AMEND—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Andre, in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and on the amendment of Mr. Gauthier (p. 9099).

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to enter the debate on Bill C-21. I would like to spend the majority of my time talking about the government's contributions, the variable entrance requirements and, if time allows, the penalties that are being imposed on those who are unfortunate enough to have to quit their job.

I listened to some of the members opposite speak on Bill C-21. They did not talk about bill itself. What they talked about is that dreaded Senate, that other place, and the fact that it has no right to be sending amendments to this House for us to consider. It would not have been necessary for the Senate to send amendments if this particular government had the courtesy to allow us to debate this issue more fully and, therefore, the time to propose our own amendments.

One of the things that this government has continually said is that this legislation is better than the one we have presently in place. That is something that I take exception to, for the simple reason that if $2.9 billion is removed from the system and the government itself states that by the year 1992 it will be in a deficit position of $3 billion, what does that tell you? It can tell you only one thing: there are other objectives and other reasons for this particular piece of legislation.

This legislation is there for one reason and for one reason only, and that is for this government to get out of the business of supplying this particular social safety net for the workers of Canada. There are no other reasons that a government would put a particular program of this magnitude in jeopardy by the year 1992.

Perhaps it would be interesting for the people at home to note that in 1992 there will be another election. The people on this side will likely have the mess of trying to do something with this particular bill, if it is so unfortunate that it be passed.

If this piece of legislation goes into effect, there are going to be some ramifications for the working men and women of this country. The most important one, the variable entrance requirement, relates more specifically to the have-not regions of Canada. The variable entrance requirements were put there simply because this country has a difference in economics. Not all regions of the country are the same. My hon. friend across the way would say that Newfoundland has greater economic difficulties than northern Ontario. Those residents of northern Ontario say to me on a regular basis that their economic situation is much different from that of Toronto. Those in southern Ontario would say that their situation is a lot different from that of Montreal, Vancouver or Halifax.

One of the largest cornerstones of this particular social safety net is the variable entrance requirement. The variable entrance requirements are something that Canadians and governments in the past have put in place because there are different regional unemployment conditions due to economic situations in the various regions.

For example, northern Ontario, is considered to be a resource-based part of the country. Forestry, tourism and mining are the three important resource-based industries that make our economy grow. What happens if you take one of these large pieces of the puzzle out of the picture, Mr. Speaker? You get mass unemployment. There are no other jobs to go to. In Montreal, if a plant closes down, a worker with the correct training can go down the street and find the opportunity to get another job. In northern Ontario, as in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, when you lose your job in a single-industry town, you are stuck. You need a social safety net, the type of program which will allow people to keep their pride as Canadians, which will allow them to get by that cyclical problem which occurs in regions where resource-based industries are located. Those are called seasonal jobs. We all have them in our areas.

The issue is that there are those who do not accept the fact that Canada is the same no matter where you live and that these variable entrance requirements have to be maintained and remain in place.

Let us take a look at what is going to happen with this particular bill as it relates to the variable entrance requirements. Under Bill C-21, instead of a requirement of 10 to 14 weeks, it would be 10 to 20 weeks. Regions of 6 per cent or less require 20 weeks, while regions of more than 15 per cent would retain a minimum entrance requirement of 10 weeks.

The regional benefits, under Bill C-21, would affect northern Ontario claimants in that every time they make a claim for unemployment insurance they would lose 13 weeks of benefits. When you take that into a small, unpopulated area like northern Ontario, and in particular, the riding of Kenora—Rainy River, that simply takes $3 million out of the economy. That is a quick figure of $3 million. When you do that, there are some ramifications. I think that members opposite who are not fortunate enough to live in areas with the beauty and magnitude of northern Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, should think twice before they vote in favour of Bill C-21, because it will change the way people in the regions of Canada look at themselves. Let us take a look at what the situation is.

One of the things to consider is the effect of this particular change in the unemployment insurance program. Under the proposed 62-regions system, which would go into effect under Bill C-21, claimants in 45 regions would require more than 14 weeks of insurable earnings based on seasonally-adjusted three-month average of unemployment rates for the month ending November, 1989. Only in eight regions would the minimum 10-week entrance requirement apply. Under the old VER rules, the minimum would have applied in 32 of these regions. Therefore, this particular bill will affect 150,000 of our constituents in a short period of time. That is an enormous change from the old bill.

One of the effects of that will be the shift to welfare. We talk about the fact that once people cannot collect unemployment insurance, they have certain alternatives. They can either move or look for other means of having dollars to support their family. If they cannot get employment in their particular region, or because of their economic situation as an individual cannot afford to wander off to Toronto or Montreal or some other area where perhaps the unemployment rate is not as high, what choice do they have? Their choice is welfare.

They will go to the municipality and the province and simply say: "You'll have to look after me". I say that that is not acceptable. I say to the Government of Canada that we have an obligation to the people we represent to maintain a system where people feel comfortable as Canadians. Therefore, when times are hard, we will be a caring and loving society and look after them.

We cannot simply say: "Move to Toronto". People in northern Ontario do not want to live in Toronto. We cannot afford to live in Toronto. Housing is so expensive that no one would want to move there at this time to try to make a fresh start with a young family. For all intents and purposes, perhaps they do not even have a job to go to at first and have to hunt for a job. The rent is so high, a move is not feasible. So what choice do they have?

For the government to state that the changes in the unemployment insurance system, the variable entrance requirements, are an improvement to the old bill and therefore putting forward this new legislation is going to be an improvement, is rubbish. We all realize in this House that there are other reasons for this particular piece of legislation being put in place.

I find it very difficult to go back to my constituents and say that we have revamped and improved the unemployment insurance program. It is very difficult for me to say to my constituents that it is improved when I know that on average a person in northern Ontario will have 13 weeks less of insurance that he or she so badly needs in those areas where you find natural, resource-based industries which in certain periods of the year cut back and put people out of work.

There is another area of importance in northern Ontario. I am speaking of the unemployment situation of the native people there. Native people, historically, have a much higher unemployment rate than people in the non-native communities. In my riding, I represent roughly 14,000 aboriginal people. Those people have rates of unemployment ranging from 40 per cent to 90 per cent, depending on the community.

The government makes it more difficult to collect unemployment insurance in those regions. Once, if a person was lucky enough to be a guide for a particular tourist camp for 10 weeks or worked in the forests for 10 weeks, then he or she could collect unemployment insurance. As some members have indicated, they could even get involved in a training program or a make-work program under the old Liberal government which allowed them to accumulate sufficient weeks so that they would not be on the welfare rolls. This gave them a sense of achievement, belonging, the sense of having something to offer Canadians. Now what you give them is welfare. Where would 14,000 aboriginals go for a job in northern Ontario where roughly 10,000 of those 14,000 live in isolated communities to which you have to fly. What do I tell them? Move to Toronto, you have no choice. That is ridiculous. We know it, they know it, but the government seems to think that is fine. Do not worry about them, the government of Ontario will look after them.

That brings me to the other area which the citizens of Canada should be aware of. This bill is just a disguise to pass programs that the federal government historically has been responsible for and is now passing on to the provinces. The government tells the province: "You look after it. They are your citizens. We are getting out of the program".

When I read something that states that by the year 1992, if this bill passes, this program will be $3 billion in deficit. When I read that, it made me think that there are no choices available to the worker when he or she gets laid off in this country. If this government is not prepared to put certain dollars into this program, then it is saying to the employer and employee that they have to.

We all know that employers feel that they pay to the UI program to the extent that enough is enough. We have heard that on numerous occasions and I think all members of Parliament would say that they have listened to the small business person and the large business person say that one of the reasons Canadians cannot compete with the Americans is because the amount of dollars we pump into these extra programs and the hidden costs of keeping these employees is too high.

What we are hearing from the government is that sooner or later in 1992–93 when it becomes evident under the new program that there is a deficiency as far as the dollars put into it are concerned, the employer and the employee will either have to kick in more or we will have to reduce the amount of funds we pay to an already small amount. If you were ever so unlucky as to collect unemployment, Madam Speaker, then you will know that it is very difficult to raise a family of two or three, or even look after yourself, pay the rent and feed yourself with the amount of dollars paid through that program.

If we cut the program even more because the government no longer has any responsibility in the program then the workers will be forced into a position of having to stay on welfare, or also something which is very sad in this bill, possibly having to stay in a job where the working relationship between the employer and the employee is so bad that psychologically it would be better for that individual to quit. This government has stated that in this country you do not quit a job. You stay there whether or not you like it, even though there are situations when at times you have no choice but to quit.

The changes in the penalties in this particular legislation change from six weeks disqualification to a minimum of seven weeks to a maximum of 12 weeks plus two weeks waiting period; a reduced rate of benefit from 60 per cent of insurable earnings to 50 per cent. We do not give criminals sentences that long. I cannot understand why someone who has to quit a job because of situations not of his or her making would be put in a situation where they cannot collect for three months. Not only that, but this can be carried over for six years. I would like to see them give penalties and longer sentences than that to people who steal in stores. A person who happens to quit his or her job is given a six-year penalty. I think that is shameful. Canadians know what this government is up to and when it comes to 1992–93 they will remember, if this government has the audacity to pass this legislation in its present form.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have listened to the debate on this amendment to Bill C–21 with great interest. One of the speeches that I found most striking was yesterday when the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration said that she and this government listened to the workers.

When they listened to the workers did they hear the workers tell the government to dump the burden of paying for unemployment insurance on their backs? Did the workers say to this government: "We need training, but we don't need government, our own tax money, to pay for it?" Did the workers tell this government that they want to have shorter eligibility for unemployment insurance that they have paid for? Did they tell this government that they want their unemployment insurance program decimated? I think not.

When I was on the tour with many members who sit in this House, group after group and individual after individual Canadian told us over and over again how important any changes to unemployment insurance are to them. They believed and hoped that the government would care enough to enhance the program, not decimate it. One should not be surprised, however, that the government does not listen. People should not be surprised at the level of disdain at which this government holds working people. Consistently during the hearings and in the debate we have heard these terms from the government: relocation, re-education, behaviour modification. Those words coming from this government with the mandate it has and the commitment it made are shocking, disgusting and, in my view, unacceptable. If

George Orwell had a vision when he wrote 1984 the vision was of the government on that side of the House.

Yesterday, we met with the labour coalition that has been referred to a number of times during this debate. The people we met included Shirley Carr, president of the Canadian Labour Congress; Louis Laberge, president of the Quebec Federation of Labour; Jim McCambley, president of the Canadian Federation of Labour; Gerald Larose, president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions; Kitty O'Callaghan, president of the Canadian Teachers Federation, Lorraine Page, president of the Quebec Teaching Congress; Kathleen Connors, president of the National Federation of Nurses' Unions and Louis Lacroix, president of the Canadian Conference of Teamsters.

This group represents 4 million dues–paying workers, both employed workers and unemployed workers. If that is multiplied by 3.6, which is the average family in this country, that is 14.5 million Canadians. Up until Friday, the coalition tried to have a meeting with the minister and this government. They were denied the opportunity to meet with them.

I would like to put what those labour centrals had to say on behalf of working people on the record. Kitty O'Callaghan, president of the Canadian Teachers Federation, talked about kids who are disadvantaged because of unemployment in our communities. She talked about kids who come to school hungry and ill–equipped. As a result of that, they are unable to fully participate in school activities. Not only that, they are unable to perform at full potential. Her concern is that today one in six kids in Canada is already living in poverty, and that coupled with the UI cuts, the transfer payment cuts in the budget, the claw–back of family allowance, and education cuts, kids today are out selling candy bars and other things to buy needed equipment for their schools. Not only are they disadvantaged, not only are they finding it difficult to reach—

Mr. McDermid: I did that when I went to school. What nonsense. They have been doing that for years.

Ms. Langan: It will be your turn soon. I am sure the Speaker will recognize you.

It is evident that members on the other side of the House also hold poor children in disdain and that is the tragedy of what this government is putting before us.

Kathleen Connors, president of the National Federation of Nurses' Unions, talked about the front–line deliverers of health care, the nurses. She said that they see the direct impact of unemployment on the local health care system. They see when there is not sufficient income for appropriate food, when there is not sufficient income for appropriate health care, and when unemployment causes family stress, family violence and suicide. She said that between the EPF transfer cuts and the unemployment insurance cuts that we are seeing in this bill, the impact will be devastating.

Lorraine Pagé, president of the Quebec Teaching Congress, said that we need to invest in professional training, but that must not be done by asking the unemployed to pay for the training fund. She said that we need to enhance financing of the education sector, not privatize it as shown in this bill, and not cut it in the budget for education. She said that women, in particular, who are in precarious jobs are unemployed first and unemployed longest. She talked about eligibility and the fact that the increased demands in this bill would make it much more difficult for women to become eligible. She said, and it is very true, that of the one in six kids in this country who is poor, usually, statistically, they come from single–parent, women–led families. Those are the ones who will be affected first and the ones who will be affected most by these cuts.

Gerald Larose, president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, said unemployment insurance is the main mechanism to reallocate riches from the well off to the more fragile, and that when you weaken the system, as this bill is going to be weakening it, you weaken the regional areas even more. He said that this is a system designed to privatize unemployment insurance, that this government clearly no longer wants to fund unemployment insurance and is copying the American model.

Despite statements during the election campaign and in the free trade agreement itself that governments have to interfere less in the free market, and despite statements by this government that that is not really true, we are finding ourselves again and again with legislation that is tailored to the American model to accommodate the free trade agreement. Bill C–21 is an example of the big lie that took place to get votes in the last federal election.

Louis Laberge, president of the Quebec Federation of Labour, said that this government is responsible for plant shutdowns, one after the other. Instead of helping workers, the government is reducing the time available for unemployment insurance and increasing the time it takes to become eligible. He said that workers are aware of how far Bill C–21 is going, but it will take time for workers to really appreciate the impact on them and to become angry enough to revolt. He said that this bill is so bad it is hard to find words to explain it.

Jim McCambly of the Canadian Federation of Labour said the removal of $4.2 billion for general revenue responsible for this funding may destroy the unemployment insurance program, one of the better systems in the world. When talking to people from other parts of the world, they are impressed, or were impressed, with our unemployment insurance system. The fact is, after this bill is finished with Canadian workers, it will not be something to be proud of, but something to be very worried about.

Mr. McCambly talked about the impact of unemployment on seasonal, cyclical, and disadvantaged workers. He feels that this legislation is going to hurt very badly those workers. He said that for the first year it may not be too bad, but wait until the second year. The government is banking on those people who are working not being able to visualize being unemployed so that it can get through this bill. Once it does, it will be too late.

Louis Lacroix, President of the Canadian Conference of Teamsters, said that this is more than a bad bill, this is a philosophical debate. The government is no longer participating in the unemployment insurance program. It is the privatization of social benefits in the country and this is one of the very clear steps in the government's plans.

Shirley Carr, President of the Canadian Labour Congress, unequivocally stated that she would be going to the wire fighting this bill. The CLC pointed out that unemployment insurance is fundamental to the economic and social security of all workers, unionized and non–unionized, full–time and part–time, private sector and public sector. Bill C–21 destroys many of the principles on which the unemployment insurance system has been built. Its most basic purpose of insuring workers against the loss of earnings is seriously undermined. The tripartite financing of UI by employers, workers, and government, developed over the past 50 years, is destroyed by this bill.

Government contributions of $2.5 billion for UI extended benefits resulting from high regional unemployment will be withdrawn. About $300 million of government subsidies for UI fishery benefits will be transferred to premium payers. Fifteen per cent of UI premiums, about $2 billion a year, will be used to finance the purchase of training courses, resettlement, business start–up, wage subsidies and other labour adjustment programs now financed from general government revenues.

Bill C–21 is not good for working people in Canada. Bill C–21 is not good for employers in Canada. The only people the government has heard say that Bill C–21 is good is themselves.

The government is abandoning the social contract—I think it is important to note, the sacred trust—that was made with Canadian workers and employers. It is evident now that the government has never had the intention of listening to Canadian workers.

I would like to tell the government that the impact of Bill C–21 is so bad that time will prove our opposition. We will not let up in that opposition. It may pass the bill, but the opposition will not let up. We will target the government and we will remind workers over and over again of who destroyed the system to which they contributed for a working lifetime and on which they depend. We will remind the 520,000 Canadians who will be affected. I will certainly work with my colleagues to remind the 60,000 British Columbians who will be affected, and I will certainly make it my mission in life to remind the 37,500 workers in my region of Vancouver and the lower Fraser Valley who will be affected. We will be reminding them of the $144 million that will be lost to the B.C. economy, that the safety net that gives them the opportunity to go out and look for other work has been removed, and that the burden is being shifted on to their backs and the backs of the provinces. We will not let up. The men and women working in this country deserve better.

I would ask that we consider the people who do not sit in nice surroundings such as these. We should consider the people who work on the shop floors or shift work, which occasionally this House has an opportunity to try. At least we get an afternoon shift to one o'clock in the morning.

I would ask the members to think about working in the dirt and grime in the mines and in the unsafe working conditions. Think about giving your life to that labour and then having someone come along and snatch it out from under you, like one could snatch a carpet, saying that what they are doing is good for you.

It is time that government members spent a little bit of time on the shop floors with working people hearing the kinds of concerns they truly have. They should hear the kinds of fears they have about where the economy of this country is going, where their future is, where the future is of their children and how they are going to survive the clawbacks, the UI cuts, the GST, this budget, and free trade. What is going to be left by the time we get to the next general election?

Mr. McDermid: A stronger country, a competitive country.

An hon. member: A banana republic.

Ms. Langan: Someone said we are going to have a competitive country. We are going to have the workers on their knees. We are going to have a banana republic. That is exactly where the government wants them, on their knees, so it can just put it to them.

Mr. MacDougall: That is what the socialists would do.

Ms. Langan: That is not what the New Democrats would do. We are committed to bringing those concerns here. This is a government that would not meet with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women last year; a government that has refused this year to meet with the Canadian Labour Congress and with the Coalition of Unions on the unemployment insurance bill. Today, we heard the Minister of Employment and Immigration say that the government listens to women and the workers in the country. If the government is listening, then I suspect it is not hearing because the women and the workers in the country are not satisfied, are not happy with this legislation, and certainly do not feel that they are being listened to.

I want to close my remarks by saying that government members sit there in righteous indignation because we should be so forthright as to get up to criticize their legislation. I would suggest that at the time of the next election they will have to go out and face those folks whom they pulled the rug out from under. I suspect at that time they will perhaps drop their disdain a tiny bit, throw out a few cookies, and hope that they will be re-elected.

This legislation is despicable and unacceptable to Canadian workers. I plead on behalf of those workers that government members listen to what they have to say.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today to speak to the motion moved by the government House leader on the Senate message on Bill C-21.

The legislative initiative undertaken by the Minister of Employment and Immigration represents very tangible progress in the area of employment reform. I would like to congratulate her for it.

First, I would like to take a few moments to remind hon. members of the provisions in Bill C-21 that I support, and why. To me, Bill C-21 represents part of an approach, a reasoned strategy, well thought-out and carefully designed. As a major reform of public policy it is the right way to go.

I have always thought that for far too long in this country, social and economic policy were piecemeal, a bandage here and some ointment there. The result of this rather haphazard approach was policies absent of direction, devoid of parity and often, in the end, ineffective. Today, more and more Canadians are calling out for social and economic leadership as we move towards 2000.

This is no more true than in the area of labour force development. The Minister of Employment and Immigration clearly understands that when it comes to unemployment insurance, for example, what may have been appropriate for a resource-based economy of the sixties and seventies is no longer adequate. Today, we see that, thanks in part to initiatives by this government such as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Western Diversification Office and others, we have an economic base that is increasingly well-rounded and, indeed, quite vital and diverse.

I know all members and all Canadians share with me a sense of great pride when we speak of economic prosperity. It seems to me that the creation of a broad economic base is only part of the story. If we achieve through our economic policies a certain measure of success in diversifying our nation's means of production, then does it not stand to reason that our social, labour force, and workforce policies should operate in tandem?

We know, for example, that our resource-based economy of 20 years ago demanded very little by way of skills development. Technology changed slowly and workers easily kept pace with workplace demands. But training has assumed a critical role in today's high technology era. A skilled workforce is essential for our businesses to compete successfully in the global market-place of the year 2000.

To turn our backs on the challenges of the next millennium is foolish. To be paralyzed by the dogma of the status quo is hardly economic leadership. This bill represents a very sensible and thoughtful approach to labour force development. It is an approach very much in keeping with the Canadian way. These proposed changes to our unemployment insurance system represent a flexible and balanced response to changing times. It is consistent with the commitment to contribute to economic prosperity. Equally, it ensures that those in our society who are disadvantaged are helped and encouraged to be full participants in our society's economic activity.

As one of my constituents in Barrie said to me the other day: "Edna, what we have is unemployment insurance, but what we need is employment insurance." It is understood that these reforms, by their very nature, are designed to help workers and to assist those who require special assistance to play a full and satisfactory role in the workforce. After all, that is the very essence of the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

I want to discuss for a moment some of the particular initiatives designed to meet the specific circumstances of women, older workers and the employment disadvantaged. For example, the strategy is providing a financial boost to a training program for social assistance recipients that already has a proven track record in helping them to become economically self-reliant.

Through this program, the federal government works in tandem with the provincial governments to help social assistance recipients acquire the skills and the work experience they need to find good jobs at good pay. We, on this side of the House, are prepared to support an additional $50 million under the strategy. That, combined with the $50 million spent through the Canada Assistance Plan and matching funds from the provinces, promises an additional $200 million to prepare an estimated 20,000 additional social assistance recipients for productive employment.

I am particularly pleased to note that the strategy addresses the needs of older workers for whom the job search is often a long and frustrating process. We will be injecting an extra $40 million into the continuing employment option which provides financial support for up to three years to employers who hire and retrain displaced workers.

In addition, we will be doubling the budget of the Industrial Adjustment Service which works with companies to deal with the problems of obsolete skills, the challenges of changing technologies, and finding alternative employment for laid-off workers. Its total budget will now be $30 million.

Bill C-21 contains another very important change that older workers will welcome with open arms. It enables workers over the age of 65 to collect benefits if they otherwise meet the unemployment insurance criteria. With more and more Canadians choosing to extend their working lives, this change is an idea whose time has come.

The strategy also opens the door of opportunity for more women. For example, we are allocating an additional $65 million for promoting human resource planning programs in the private sector. These plans will include employment equity components which will broaden prospects for women.

It is my personal hope that details being worked out now at private sector consultations under the auspices of the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre will enable us to improve the apprenticeship program and train more women in non-traditional occupations. In conjunction with the private sector, we hope to develop an entry level training program for jobs in growing industries, particularly in areas in which women already have a large stake.

Bill C–21 also proposes changes in special unemployment insurance benefits that will not only help women but also make the program more relevant to the needs of today's workforce. These changes include, in addition to the current 15 weeks of maternity benefits, 10 weeks of parental benefits for natural and adoptive parents, shared between the mother and the father as they deem fit, and the proposal for more flexibility and access to 15 weeks of sickness benefits.

I would like to say that I have received a lot of correspondence from my constituents who are young mothers–to–be. They know that if Bill C–21 is not passed before the birth of their children, they will not be able to take advantage of its generous provisions for maternity leave.

The strategy has also taken into account the concerns of women's groups in another matter, the question of what exactly constitutes just cause for quitting one's employment. Under Bill C–21, people who quit their jobs without just cause stand to lose between seven and 12 weeks of benefits. However, anyone who has justifiable reason for quitting, such as being the victim of hazardous working conditions or because a spouse has found employment in another city, will not face these penalties.

In response to appeals from women across Canada, myself included, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has added an amendment to Bill C–21 which provides legislative expression of just cause. When the government introduced the labour force development strategy, it did so to help both the unemployed and Canadian businesses by creating a better match between skills employers need and skills workers have. We know this is just a start, but it focuses our attention on the education and the training which are needed to equip people for the demanding requirements of a modern, global economy, and that will enable them to participate fully in our society. More and more of us who have witnessed the massive changes brought about by the technological revolution appreciate that skills training remains a key means of preparing our workforce for the constantly evolving complexities of the job market.

All of us understand that if we are ever to compete effectively in the global economy, we must ensure that the labour force of the 1990s is not only highly skilled, but capable of adapting to an evolving work environment brought on by technological and demographic change. This challenge requires the co–operation of the public sector, the private sector, professional associations and, yes, unions to pool skills and experience and get involved for the good of our country. Government cannot do it alone. It is essential to establish links between the schools, industry and the community to provide invaluable insights for our youth into the world of work and its demands.

The government has listened seriously to the recommendations offered by the Senate regarding Bill C–21. While there are many concerns which all members should have about many of the suggestions in the message before us, some recommendations are worth including in Bill C–21. For example, we recognize the impact which illiteracy has on Canadian workers and on employers. The lack of basic skills is an impediment to further training. For that reason, the idea in recommendation one is worth including in this bill.

Senators have said that they welcome the commitment of the government to producing an annual plan which will show members how unemployment insurance funds will be spent to train and develop people. In recommendation four, they have asked us to amend the bill to ensure that the minister will provide specific details in this plan. It will do no one good to create centralized plans which are too rigid or detailed to respond to changing times. At the same time, a reasonable level of detail should be provided. Therefore, the response which the government proposes to the Senate's suggestion is a fair one.

The Liberals in the Senate seem to believe that the only purpose of unemployment insurance is to pay people to wait for their old jobs to come back. We believe that unemployment insurance needs to become an active program which invests in people. Training courses, financial help to move to a place where there are more jobs, and assisting claimants to start businesses, are wise investments. This government wants to let people get out of the unemployment trap.

In closing, let me say how proud I am to have played a role as a member of the legislative committee which travelled the land studying this bill. I now know with certainty that the proposals contained herein respond to the needs and the aspirations of Canadians entering and participating in the workforce as we move towards 2000.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I am duty-bound to rise tonight on closure at third reading of Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

An hon. member: It's not third reading.

Mr. Keyes: The legislation before us, referred back to this House by the other place, would fundamentally alter one of the basic aspects of universality in Canada. The bill would remove the federal government from funding the unemployment insurance program, dramatically restructuring our social safety system. It is a Conservative assault on the Canadian way of life.

The legislation would increase the required number of weeks needed to collect unemployment insurance and lessen the actual number of weeks a person will receive entitlements. The legislation would alter the minimum entrance requirements for workers seeking financial support from the current 10 to 14 weeks of employment to an incredible 10 to 20 weeks of employment. This means that, even though the federal government has removed itself from paying into the program, the Tories are still calling the shots and making it tougher on Canadians, saying: "You have no choice. You will have to contribute more and receive less."

The changes in the legislation before us mean that over 150,000 Canadians will lose their entitlements and over 750,000 working Canadians will have their entitlements reduced. Under this government, the same case is being repeated time and time again. Canadians are paying more and more in taxes, and are receiving less and less in entitlements and services.

The government is removing itself from contributing to the UI system. The government intends to replace its $2.9 billion contribution with increased employee-employer payments. Under the proposed legislation contributions by employers will rise to $3.15 for every $100 of earnings, a total of $3.48 more per week than what employers presently pay, or $180 more per year.

Contributions by employees will also rise. As if the hardworking Canadian was not already paying enough, under the new legislation employees would pay $2.49 more per week than at present, an increase of $129 more per year. Add to this the additional cost of at least $1,000 a year which Canadians will pay towards the proposed goods and services tax. All this is at the worst possible time, when one considers our poor economic outlook, not to mention the condition of our east coast fishery.

The qualification period for receiving entitlements, or the eligibility period, as the government likes to call it, for employees who in many cases lose their jobs through no fault of their own will rise dramatically. The new scale will be based on the average rate of unemployment in a given area, as was the case under the old rules. The difference is the amount of weeks required in order to qualify for entitlements.

In my own city of Hamilton, Ontario the unemployment rate for February, 1990 was 5.3 per cent. This means that under the proposed rules a person needs 20 weeks of work to qualify for entitlements, whereas under the old rules the worker needs only 14 weeks to qualify. The new rules would also mean that the same worker would receive fewer weeks of entitlements. In Hamilton, the same worker who is laid off and who would fortunately have 20 weeks of work under his belt would receive only 17 weeks of compensation. Under the old rules the worker would have received at least 20 weeks. This would only be the case if the person was successful in gaining employment and was able to hold the job without his job moving south of the border.

In the hard pressed regions of our country, people will find it increasingly difficult to receive entitlements, let alone find a secure job. On the east coast where the government has sold out the Atlantic fishery, workers will now be required to have 14 weeks of employment compared to only 10 weeks under the previous rules. The Conservative government members opposite ask the question: What is so wrong with these changes?

The Senate has made it all very clear. In its amendments the Senate proposes that Ottawa continue to guarantee the annual $2.4 billion federal subsidy to the system rather than allow the cost to be put on to the backs of the Canadian workers and their employers. The amendments would also stop the government from making it harder to obtain entitlements in areas of high unemployment and from cutting the time that make recipients eligible.

The government House leader said: "The Senate is acting as if it forgets who won the 1984 and 1988 elections." I ask this: Who gave this government the mandate to carry out this system of injustice? I also ask this: Why has the unemployment rate in St. John's, Newfoundland risen from 10.4 per cent last year to 13.2 per cent this year? Because the Conservative government has abandoned the east coast.

Out west in the prairies the government has abandoned the family farm. In some cases workers there will now need 18 weeks of employment to qualify for entitlements, instead of only 12 weeks which is presently the case. Clearly, under the Conservative government Canadians end up paying more and getting less.

Let there be no mistake, we are not talking about hand-outs here. We are talking about payments from insurance premiums. Canadian workers pay into the system with their own money. As we know, the system would be sustained by workers and employers under the new system. So when a person is laid off in St. John's, Newfoundland or Victoria or Hamilton they expect to be covered until they find a new job. This legislation changes the system of redistribution of wealth in this country.

For example, let us take the present crisis in Atlantic Canada. What happens to the young couple with two children when both parents have finally succeeded in getting a job in the local fish plant but suddenly find themselves out of a job after five weeks of work? Because of Conservative government mismanagement this family of four would be in jeopardy because the two parents would not have had enough weeks to qualify for the entitlements for which they had paid.

There is one person from Newfoundland with a terrific job, but whom voters would certainly like to forget. I am speaking of the Minister for International Trade. It was he who, during the 1988 election campaign, promised that no new changes were planned for the unemployment insurance program.

Mr. Milliken: Did he say that?

Mr. Keyes: I have the exact quote. He said: "No one is planning any changes in the UIC program. There has not been any change proposed to us since we dealt with the Forget commission. We are not contemplating any changes."

Mr. Milliken: I can't believe he said that.

Mr. Keyes: What deception. What deceit. The truth is that the government is using the pretext of "adjustment" to finance its deficit reduction plan, which is not really a plan at all since it cannot control it all at the expense of unemployed Canadians.

The government claims that the solution to unemployment will be training programs for the unemployed. Are the unemployed supposed to be thrilled and excited about this? The Conservative government's much talked about training programs are a sham if there are no jobs to be filled. The Conservative government's programs rank sixth in terms of content and effectiveness when compared to programs of OECD countries.

Hard working Canadians will pay for training without any assurance that they will benefit from that training. The idea of training workers is also tied into the concept of education, research and development. The more basic education a person has the easier he or she is to train. The more research and development there is in the country the more spin-offs and jobs are likely to be created. However, under successive Conservative budgets these two important features of growth in our society have been curtailed, slashed, cut by this government.

Under the Conservative government funding for research and development has decreased. Prior to the 1984 election campaign the Prime Minister made all kinds of spending commitments and promises. He said that, if elected, he would double Canada's R and D effort by the end of his first mandate.

However, the percentage of Canada's Gross Domestic Product spent on R and D fell from 1.37 per cent in 1984 to 1.32 per cent in 1988, and is expected to be lower still in 1989 figures. In fact, Canada's R and D efforts now rank well below the efforts of OECD industrialized nations.

Other countries know the value of research and development and know that R and D plays a great part in the strength of economies. The Canadian government could and should play a much more active role in the promotion of research and development, as well as education.

The government likes to boast about its commitment to education. Frankly, its commitment is negligible at best. This year the Conservative government introduced massive cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, making it harder for them to finance education, among other things.

How can the government hope that Canada can have a system of full employment when it is not creating the type of national infrastructure needed to promote increased growth in our country? The cumulative effect of Conservative government cuts to the provinces for post-secondary education, including R and D, up to 1989, totals $8.9 billion. In addition, the government hopes to cut over $7.4 billion to the provinces over the next five years, bringing the grand total of cuts to the provinces to over $16 billion.

I would like to return to some of the more substantive aspects of the bill and the amendments and the reason why there is all this criticism in the House tonight. Canadians should know that the amendments we are speaking about tonight were not conceived by the Senate. They are the focus, they are the pinnacle of all the information provided to it by groups and individuals with whom the Senate consulted.

But what does this government know about consultation? Labour groups from across this country have combined forces against this particular legislation. These groups representing no less than four million working Canadians believe that unemployment insurance is fundamental to the economic and social security of all Canadian workers. They believe that because of the new changes to the act workers do not have the same amount of insurance they once had. This government, if it has been able to do anything with this bill, it is to unify labour organizations against it.

Labour organizations have repeatedly tried to meet with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but without success. The minister turns her back on millions of Canadian workers, not only by altering the system of federalism, as one labour official put it, but by refusing Canadians the democratic right to be heard. We do not have to go into that again tonight when we are dealing with this motion of closure, when we are forced to have our say within just a few hours when the government lowers the boom and that is all there is to be said.

Once again the Conservative government is proceeding blindly toward a dark future for the Canadian worker. The labour movement is also questioning, and rightly so, the restructuring of our social fabric, the very system of redistributing wealth in this country.

Not only does this legislation alter the concept of universality, but it could have the effect of physically breaking apart communities in this nation. By placing such rigid and strict conditions on Canadian workers, the government is effectively saying to them: "If you can't find work in your community where you may be a boy scout leader, where you may be a ball team coach, where you may be teaching kids ballet, then you have to move to Toronto, or you have got to move to Montreal. You have got to move to where the jobs are".

A healthy country, a country that shares in understanding of redistributing the wealth from central Canada to those regions that need our support, through no fault of their own—they are unemployed because of work being seasonal by nature—must depend on a strong local economy, wherever that may be in this country. They have got to remain healthy.

Bill C-21 all but destroys what is left of small town Canada. What is to become of our country? Thank God for the other place, that House of sober second thought.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak tonight. The government has listened seriously to the recommendations offered by the Senate with regard to Bill C-21. While there are many concerns which all members should have about many of the suggestions in the message that is before us, some recommendations are worth including in Bill C-21.

For example, we recognize the impact which illiteracy has on Canadian workers and employers. The lack of basic skills is an impediment to further training.

I would like to take a moment to review the region of the country that I represent, an area where the resource base industries are the backbone of the community. It is an area where we have good times and bad times. In fact it is an area where we are going through some very difficult times. The reason for that is that northern Ontario and regions such as northern Ontario rely heavily on mining, forestry and agriculture. In these three areas families in my riding have grown up. They have been part of the mining community, part of the forestry community and part of the agricultural community. Their grandfather, their father and now their son have had the opportunity to work in these areas.

In areas such as mine the opportunity of being paid well is recognized. The pay in these areas is usually substantial. The opportunity is there to work in the mines for a very healthy wage as long as you are 16 or 17 years old. The thoughts and the feelings of individuals over that timeframe is that they never have to worry, that they will have a job in the mine until they retire. This has been the feeling for the last 50 years in my area. The same is true in the forestry sector.

But times have changed, and in changing times technology changes. One of the greatest problems we face with the adjustment of the unemployed in northern Ontario and across the country is that the technologies that they have learned, whether it was 20 years in a mine or 25 years in a sawmill, have changed. A lot of these workers dropped out of school with very little education. Their only skills were acquired in the job that they are doing. The unfortunate part for them in terms of training is that there was never an opportunity for them to take part in it.

For that reason the idea in the first recommendation is worth including in this bill.

The senators have said that they welcome the commitment of the government to produce an annual plan which will show members how UI funds will be spent to train and develop people. That is what we are looking at in the riding of Timiskaming where individuals have worked in the mining community where technology is now changing and advancing. We are in a competitive world. We are no longer looking just at northern Ontario having a gold mine. We are working on an international basis where we have to be competitive. Because technology changes are before us we have to be able to spend money in training and developing people for that. The same is true for the agriculture or the forestry side of things.

In recommendation 4 senators have asked us to amend the bill to ensure that the minister will provide specific details in this plan.

It will do no one good to create centralized plans which are too rigid or detailed to respond to changing needs. It will do no good in a country this size, whether we are looking at British Columbia, Yukon, Newfoundland or northern Ontario, to have a rigid, centralized plan. That is not what we should be looking at. At the same time a reasonable level of detail should be provided. Therefore the response the government proposes to the Senate's suggestion is a fair one.

In the eighth recommendation the Senate has also asked the House to consider removing a subsection of the UI act which has been in place for almost 20 years. That subsection would allow the Governor in Council to remove benefits for self-employed fishermen from the UI act at any time.

With the concern shared by all Canadians for the problems in the fishing industry, the request for added protection for these benefits is understandable. The message which the House will send to the Senate should accommodate these improvements in Bill C-21.

But much of what is in the message from the Senate cannot be accepted. We have been given a set of recommendations by a Senate which is dominated by Liberals which do nothing more than tie the hands of the government. These amendments would force us to spend money which we do not have, in ways which may not be the best for the working people who will be helped by Bill C-21.

The second recommendation would make the government use money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to pay for training courses for unemployed people and for new measures like allowing claimants to use funds to start businesses.

The Senate seems to believe that the only purpose for UI is to pay people to wait for their old jobs to come back.

I have been here since 1982. I have had the opportunity in that number of years to deal with unemployment problems in my riding. Between 1982 and 1984, I sat in opposition. I had the opportunity to see the government of the day giving out job-creation programs. These programs back then applied, as long as you cut grass, cut trees, painted fences or shovelled snow. That was the policy of the day. It gave you a period of time in which to collect these benefits, so that maybe if you were fortunate enough you could go back to work at your old job.

We believe that UI needs to become an active program which invests in people. Training courses, financial help to move to a place where there are more jobs and assisting claimants to start businesses are wise investments.

When this government took power in 1984 we were concerned with giving people the opportunity to get out of that unemployment trap.

Prior to the Conservative government taking power in 1984, 89 per cent of the jobs created by the then Liberal government were part-time jobs. That means that individuals had to work for three months or six months, and in that time frame they may have had the opportunity to go back to their old job, or maybe they did not. Maybe they were unemployed and looking for another program that they could get involved with again.

Since 1984, 85 per cent of the jobs that this government has created are full-time jobs. That involves 1.5 million people who are working today, more than had been working in 1984. Some 948,000, or 60 per cent of them, are women. When Flora MacDonald was the Minister of Employment and Immigration, she set out the guidelines for this government for what we believe is the way that we should be going. She set up the Canadian Jobs Strategy, giving the opportunity to Canadians who wanted to work to be retrained. Under that program we developed Communities Futures where it is the local people who are involved. They know what the concerns of the regions are, whether it is in Timiskaming, St. John's, Newfoundland or Whitehorse. Those are the individuals who know what adjustments should be made. In my area I have four of them and they work very, very well.

We are looking at retraining so that those individuals who happen to be laid off, unfortunately, have the opportunity to be retrained for a full-time job. We also look into job development, a program that works very, very well to ensure that individuals will have that opportunity for whatever areas they are looking at. Industrial adjustment programs give the opportunity to the employer, the employee and government to work together.

I think that Bill C-21 does an awful lot to adjust. One area that I look at which is of great concern in regions such as mine is in regard to those who are unemployed. A region such as mine stretches over a vast area with a very low population but ties it to cities such as North Bay and Timmins where the unemployment numbers under the old bill have us tied to the good economic times there. So they are not really sound figures in terms of those who may be unemployed in the area.

Bill C-21 gives us the opportunity to ensure that exact numbers will be shown and that those who require the unemployment insurance plan will have it there.

The third recommendation stops the government from developing innovative approaches to getting people back to work. It also offers new appeal rights to claimants which will make the system more complicated. There are just two more examples of how the Liberals in the Senate are willing to play games with the unemployed.

What we are dealing with is individuals who are in really hard times, individuals who do need help.

When the government introduced the Labour Force Development Strategy it did so to help both the unemployed and Canadian business by creating a better match between skills employers need skills workers have.

Sometimes, the things which will produce the best results do not fit all the demands of the UI act. For example, if a person is starting a business they are not eligible for UI. Bill C-21 gives us the flexibility to make UI more responsive to today's needs by experimenting with new and better ways of helping the unemployed.

While much of what the Senate wants to do in its fourth recommendation on the government's annual developmental plan for UI can be supported, one aspect certainly cannot. The Senate wants the power to approve or reject the plan. No one in this House can seriously accept the need for such a new power.

The fifth amendment cuts back one of the basic principles behind the bill by relaxing the penalties for people who quit their jobs without just cause or who are fired for misconduct. In response to sincere concerns about the definition of just cause for quitting a job, the House approved the amendments of the Minister of Employment and Immigration to Bill C–21 to ensure that people would not be penalized unfairly. The Liberal dominated Senate wants to change this House's decision to strengthen the penalties for people who quit. They want to send a signal to people that it is all right to quit jobs because UI will pay. In my mind that is like looking for cash for life. We must reject this type of thinking.

The sixth recommendation from the Senate demands that payments made to groups who manage programs for unemployed people be paid from the developmental uses budget of the UI. This government has been steadily improving the responsiveness of training programs ever since it was elected. We have many partners in designing and delivering these programs, such as community training groups which include employers and educators.

In my own area we have taken training programs with regard to miners in order to give them the opportunity to upgrade their skills so that with the new technology out there they are able to go to new modern mines where they can get full–time employment. A lot of mines have been open for 35 or 40 years and use old technology. Once they close down individuals do not have that new technology. The same can be said about a waferboard plant in my area. We are looking at developing a program with the company, the employees and government to ensure that with the new technology that is now available these employees will have an opportunity to retrain.

We can look at heavy equipment operators of which there is always a shortage. I could on with a long list of opportunities in which the government is working with community training groups to ensure that the opportunity of full–time stable jobs will be there.

When these groups perform services on our behalf, it is only fair to charge those costs to the UI account in the same way. That is all the clause that we are talking about was designed to do.

Recommendation 7 would do one thing, but one thing with a major impact on the country's deficit. It would force the government to pay a large share of the costs of the unemployment insurance with money that we do not have. No one can seriously suggest that the government should spend money on a program just because it used to do so. Yet the Liberals in the Senate are willing to see the deficit rise by more than $1.5 billion a year for a range of amendments in its message to this House.

What we are dealing with is fairness. We are dealing with a major problem that faces this country. This is a problem which causes us to adjust our entire workforce, a problem which which is causing us to adjust to the climate around the world. This is nothing new. It is happening in other parts of the country and around the world. The old mentality of spending money to get out of the problem will not work. The Liberal–dominated Senate is willing to spend money but it is not recommending what the proposals should be.

With recommendation 8 we return to the grab for power which the Liberal senators are making. This government is willing to amend the UI act to better protect fishermen, a group whose benefits have not been touched by this bill. It cannot be willing to go along with a scheme to play political games with the government's ability to make regulations.

The House of Commons cannot permit the Senate to expand its powers.

The ninth recommendation would reverse a decision of this House. We agreed in this place that the cost of UI should be borne by those who benefit, workers and employers. The Liberal–dominated Senate again disagrees. When everyone in Canada seems to understand the deficit must be controlled, they are willing to spend and see it go up and up.

The bill which this House passed was a sincere attempt to balance many different interests in order to improve UI in a realistic way. The amendments which the government is offering in response to the message from the Senate are part of that improvement.

However, we must reject amendments from the Liberal senators who are content to act irresponsibly to increase the deficit, remove innovation from the program and delay needed changes. This House must say no to these games.

Bill C–21 is designed to encourage more and better training of working people by the private sector. C–21 is designed to use UI funds to create new opportunities for jobs and to make UI a more active program. This is a major improvement over confining UI to passive, reactive measures. But UI is still a program which is responsive to the different employment needs of communities across this country.

• (1930)

The government has ensured that UIC is a response to the regions needs. In areas where unemployment is high the vast majority of claimants will not see any changes in their benefits. We recognize that many of the jobs in areas such as Cape Breton, my homeland, western Newfoundland and northern Ontario, where I live, are important to the people of the communities. UIC is another important form of income support. For this reason people in these areas with higher levels of unemployment will still need and will be able to get unemployment qualification benefits.

I am honoured to have had the opportunity to speak tonight. I think it is vital that we pass this bill, that we deal with the opportunities for stability in this country in retraining, and that we give Canadians the much needed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on this bill and in particular on the amendments proposed by the upper House to Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

I should like to begin by addressing the amendments very specifically. Amendment 1 seeks to include literacy instruction in the training programs provided for under this bill. I fully support this amendment. Illiteracy creates a great obstacle to those who need a higher level of training to adjust successfully to economic changes in Canada. As the world advances toward a highly technological state, workers will need to be able to read and write if they are to meet the challenges that lie ahead.

Thus workers on unemployment insurance who need basic skills must be allowed access to this type of training while receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

Amendment 2, dealing with the development uses provisions, seeks to ensure that the government finds a better way of financing an increased training level of the Canadian workforce than by redirecting moneys away from the unemployed. Using funds from the unemployment insurance program to purchase training courses, to start a business or to provide income support to those who are temporarily unemployed undermines the program's basic role.

Amendment 3 also deals with the developmental assistance provisions. These provisions are the primary benefits that the unemployed would be paying for through drastic cuts to their benefits. The bill gives the commission great latitude on the details of the developmental assistance programs and hence the commission in the future might be able to do things contrary to requirements generally set out in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Amendment 4 deals with clause 20 of the bill. This deals with the preparation of an annual plan to provide an estimate of total unemployment insurance expenditures and of total expenditures on developmental uses.

Because the reporting requirements are lax, there is the possibility that money used for training might be reallocated from one region to another. The amendment calls for more detail in the plan so that expenditures will be shown for each province and for each unemployment insurance region and that distribution of funds can be monitored.

Further, the amendment includes a provision ensuring that members of Parliament and senators have an opportunity to approve the plan.

Amendment 5 seeks to keep the disqualification period for people who leave their jobs without just cause to a maximum of six weeks rather than have a disqualification period of seven to twelve weeks as proposed in Bill C–21.

By imposing a minimum disqualification period higher than the present maximum, the government is telling workers that they must remain tied to their jobs regardless of the circumstances. This is unacceptably restrictive and could lead those employees who suffer some form of harassment to remain on the job despite intolerable circumstances because they fear losing all income support for up to three months.

Amendment 6 seeks to ensure that the costs of contracting out, as allowed for under Bill C–21, be charged to the new "developmental uses" portion of the unemployment insurance fund. This is to ensure that such contracting out would fall inside the 15 per cent limit for developmental uses so as not to further erode the proportion of the unemployment insurance fund reserved for direct income maintenance payments to the unemployed. It would also prevent too much privatization of the program.

Amendment 7 seeks to prevent the government from obtaining financial immunity contained in Bill C–21. The government has been a financial contributor to the unemployment insurance fund since it began in 1940. In the 1980s the government paid approximately 23 per cent of total program costs per year. Yet, in the 1990 budget the government announced that effective January 1, 1990 all unemployment insurance expenditures would be financed by premiums alone.

Yet the requirement for federal government contributions is the key to the success of our present unemployment insurance program. The withdrawal of government financing would move us closer to the inferior American model.

The federal government has a responsibility to address regional disparities and to help bear the costs of increases in unemployment which often results from government policies. Thus federal fundings must be maintained.

Amendment 8 seeks to ensure that steps are taken to protect benefits now provided to self–employed fishermen and to ensure that the government is committed to maintaining this vital program.

The Unemployment Insurance Act was amended in 1956 to extend coverage to self–employed fishermen and to provide that the government, not the unemployment insurance fund, was responsible for making up the difference between premiums collected and benefits paid to self–employed fishermen. Bill C–21 proposes to place the full cost of fishermen's benefits on the UI fund which, as I have already pointed out, is to be financed by employee–employer premium contributions alone. Thus the full cost of the fishermen's benefits would be borne by all other contributors to the fund.

I would like to quote the following statement of the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union: "Business groups will be fighting tooth and nail in the years to come to take the position that since the government is out they regard themselves as having to subsidize fishermen's unemployment insurance and they will say this is not fair and we want out".

At a time when the Atlantic fisheries are in crisis the government should be furthering its support, not withdrawing it. Hence I fully support amendment 8.

Amendment 9, the last amendment, deals with variable entrance requirement. It was introduced to the unemployment insurance program to link regional unemployment conditions to the number of weeks of insurable employment required to qualify for benefits. As the unemployment rate of a region increased, the number of weeks of insurable employment necessary to qualify for benefits decreased. But this variable entrance requirement has been allowed to lapse by this government and so, since January 6, 1990, a uniform 14–week entrance requirement is in effect for all regions of the country irrespective of their levels of unemployment. That is definitely unfair.

Bill C–21 proposes a 62–region system and in only 8 of these regions would the 10–week minimum apply. Under the old rules the minimum would have applied in 32 regions.

The proposed changes to the number of weeks a claimant may receive unemployment insurance would reduce the maximum duration of benefit entitlement in most cases. For example, in the region of southern Manitoba, in my home province, claimants would lose up to 13 weeks of benefits.

• (1940)

The government is implying that unemployed people are in a position of their own making and with proper incentives could find jobs. Such thinking misses the point. It is not incentives that are necessary but jobs themselves.

Thus I agree with Amendment 9 that Table 1 and Table 2 of Bill C–21 be modified so that the highest unemployment regions would escape the ill effects of these new government proposals.

Before the federal election in November 1988 members of this government dismissed as nonsense suggestions that the Tories had a hidden agenda to cut unemployment insurance or other social programs after the election. The government broke its promise.

During the election the government also promised to develop high quality programs to help the many people who will lose their jobs because of free trade and other economic changes. However, rather than using funds from general revenues as is normally the case, the government will take the money away from the unemployed. That is its solution. All workers will pay for training without any assurance that they themselves will benefit from the training. Training is the responsibility of government and must be funded.

It is the poor and disadvantaged people who already have difficulties in finding secure jobs that will be hardest hit by these changes to the UI program. It is because these people are "last hired and first fired". It will be seasonal workers, young people, natives, new immigrants, new citizens, visible minorities and the disabled people who stand to suffer the most from these proposed changes. Many people in these groups unfortunately are poor and the most vulnerable.

These changes to the unemployment insurance program will also adversely affect not only the economic status but the psychological health of many Canadians. The stress of unemployment compounded by absence of benefits can lead to physical illness. Thus reductions in regular UI benefits would lead to increases in health care costs and, more important, would make more Canadians ill. This is happening at a time of reductions in financial transfer payments to the provinces for health care costs. Where is the heart of this government? How will these new costs due to the ill effects of reductions in the unemployment insurance program be absorbed?

The government has estimated that $3 million will be cut from current UI regular benefits. Since it is known that changes to the UI program will cause illnesses linked to general economic distress, there will be increases in health care costs.

This government should admit that its decision to change the UI program is not only harmful to the health of Canadians but is counterproductive economically.

I should like at this juncture to respond to the response given by the government House leader in reply to the message from the Senate respecting this Bill C–21.

I submit that the government committed some flaws and errors in logic in its analysis. I would like to point these out. First, I submit that the government is wrong in its interpretation of the application of various Standing Orders it has cited to sustain its position. There is nothing in Standing Orders 79(1), 79(2) and 79(3) and Standing Orders 80(1) and 80(2) that prohibit the Senate from making amendments.

It is clear from the intent of these Standing Orders that only the House of Commons has the right to decide on matters of expenditure.

The Senate proposed certain amendments that this House may decide upon. The Senate never intended to take away from the House the power to decide. The House could decide and should decide. There is a difference between the power to propose amendments and the power to decide on the substance of those amendments.

I therefore ask the House to pass judgment on the merits of these amendments to which I have alluded earlier. Whether the proposed amendment is to get funding from the Consolidated Revenue Fund and whether it is in the best interests of Canadians and the program are the questions that this government must answer. This government can decide if it wants to; the government cannot hide behind a technicality. The government's interpretation of the Standing Orders on the application of these amendments is also wrong.

Second, the government is attempting to camouflage its difficulties to be accountable to the people respecting the absence of heart with which it has produced this bill. It tries to deflect this uncaring attitude by discussing the accountability of the other place to the people.

The government appears to say that because members of the other place are not elected they are therefore not accountable to anyone for their actions. The other place, whether or not the government likes it, is responsible to the people of Canada to exercise sober and serious thought on bills sent to it by this House. This is a constitutional requirement.

Would the government try to insinuate that the Supreme Court of Canada, because it is also an appointed body, is not accountable to the people? Surely no one would make that suggestion. We should debunk once and for all the fallacy of using the non–elective nature of the constitutional Senate as the basis for saying that it is not accountable to the people.

If I may add, if there is really no place for the Senate why has the Prime Minister continued to appoint members to the Senate? The House and the government must not continue to sing the song and dance the dance about the Senate. It must address the real issues that the amendments bring to this House.

I submit that the sentiments echoed by the proposed amendments coming from the other place are the sentiments coming from the people of our country.

I would like to ask the following question: Which should prevail—the heartless principle of the bill where the government abdicates its responsibility for funding, or the caring principle for Canadians who deserve in moments of difficulties due to unemployment which is not of their own making direct funding benefits from this government? You will agree, Madam Speaker, that a heartless principle must at once surrender itself to a principle that cares.

Bill C-21, if not amended, is fundamentally unsound. It is basically unkind and fails to echo the conscience of Canadians. The proposed amendments from the other place restore the kindness and reflect the sentiments of many Canadians. We heard submissions from a coalition of union movements and from church organizations, telling us what to do or what to tell the government to do. Those sentiments are embodied in the proposed amendments coming from the other place. We should thank the Senate for its boldness and sensitivity.

Perhaps I may conclude with a quotation from the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. Monsignor Charles Valois appeared before the Senate committee and said:

> The federal proposals contained in Bill C-21 are based on a disturbing hypothesis. Human labour and workers are viewed as a commodity to be bought and sold, recycled, moved or removed from the market—Emasculating the unemployment insurance plan at the very time when it is most needed is unacceptable morally and politically.

That is the challenge to this government: accept the amendments from the Senate and the government will be doing what Canadians want it to do.

• (1950)

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on Bill C-21, a piece of legislation that has attracted a lot of attention in this country. Needless to say, it has attracted a lot of attention in my own province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Questions have arisen about what the government has done with this legislation. I note that the questions have risen as to whether or not the government had what some call a mandate.

There are certainly lots of quotations floating around about who said what and when. This government has made a commitment and I think most governments have probably shared the commitment. This government before the last election made a very clear commitment that it would move to improve social programs, that programs which needed to be made better to help Canadians in a more effective way for the benefit of as many Canadians as possible would be part of the agenda of this government.

I believe Bill C-21 addresses that. Bill C-21 looks at some of the fundamental differences between this government and my friends opposite. My friends opposite would have us say to Canadians: "You have what you have now and, despite all that is happening in the world, despite the changes in the world, we are not going to make it any better. We are going to leave you where you are now". Everyone tells me that the unemployment insurance system should be changed.

I would like to see much broader changes in the unemployment insurance system. I would like to see a whole different system. I recognize that that day is not here right now. I do not think this House is ready for that. I do not think this country is ready for that, but it will come with time. The essence is to keep moving, keep changing and keep evolving because that is what will lead to develop of social programs for Canadians that in the long run are the programs we need to meet their needs.

My friend for Gander—Grand Falls this afternoon was very good as usual, erudite and certainly on occasion came close to fact and dealt with realities. He said a number of things that unfortunately had been said repeatedly in my province and bear some correction. There have been a number of things said in a number of places. I just want to touch on a couple of them just to make sure we are talking about the same thing. This is not a judgment question particularly. This is what is happening.

For most of the people in my province, if the government can have this legislation passed, if the will of this House is respected and Bill C-21 becomes law, we will have a variable entrance requirement which recognizes that in certain parts of the country people are more disadvantaged and there are less opportunities to work. If the legislation can be passed into law, the people in my province for the most part will need 10 weeks to qualify, which is what it is today.

I would be dishonest if I said we have not changed the benefit period. The benefit period has been affected. If you add up in the standard way the qualifying period, the penalty period and the benefit period, you arrive at 51 weeks. The average period on benefit in Newfoundland and Labrador is something less than 30 weeks. A remarkably few number of people go straight through the system and a surprising number who do requalify. Let us be sensible; 51 weeks is what we are talking about.

We heard today about the line with great expression and movement of arms and hands. It depends on what side of the line you live. The law says it is where you live, not where you work.

It has always been that way. To suggest that this legislation changes that is ridiculous, but we get this great expanse of toing and froing and moaning about how the line changes and you have to qualify where you live. It has always been that way. Nothing has changed.

I appeared with the committee when it was in St. John's, and one thing we were consistently told was that you have to change the economic regions. What is happening is that with the three economic regions in Newfoundland and Labrador, we had the city of St. John's with its unacceptably high but relatively low unemployment rate affecting the rest of the Avalon Peninsula. Therefore the people on Bell Island where the unemployment rate is tragically at 75 per cent were having to qualify with the same conditions as the people of St. John's where the unemployment rate was somewhat under 10 per cent for a while. Under the old regulations you would go from 10 weeks needed to qualify all of a sudden to 16 weeks. I cannot call that fair. That is not responsible. That does not let people plan. That does not let people know what is happening in their lives, so we changed the boundaries.

No constituency in Newfoundland was affected more than mine. No people were more divided than those in my riding. I will say that I supported what the unions, the labour councils and many others said to the committee in St. John's, which was change the line, because we have to recognize the economic realities. People have the opportunity to get employment.

The response of the government was to address the needs of those who needed it the most. When my friend talks about the line and and moving things around, we must be clear that it has always been that way and nothing has changed.

We talk about the repeater provision. We have removed the repeater provision which said if you wanted to qualify twice in a year you needed 16 weeks wherever you live. Now all you need, if we can get this piece of legislation through, is the same as you qualified with before. There is an equity there. There is not this huge gap people have to deal with which is particularly difficult on our fish plant workers.

We face some very difficult economic challenges with the crisis in our fishery. We see one-industry towns come under attack. We see the nature of our economies particularly in Atlantic Canada evolve as the nature of our communities change. As the world moves very quickly, as we move to take advantage of things like free trade, we are affected by a number of very different economic forces that impact on our communities.

We must have flexibility for our workers, options for people to deal with, options before us so that we can put together packages. More and more we are seeing government departments combining their resources and combining their programs. More and more we are seeing federal and provincial governments able to put different pieces together to come up with solutions to our problems.

Community Futures is a terrific example. Community Futures has worked very well across Canada but no better than in Newfoundland and Labrador. It says to the people of the community that we want them to come together on a regional basis and address the challenges and the opportunities.

People have their problems, but the people who sit on the Community Futures committee in my riding look on it as a challenge. They are looking for opportunities, not only provided through employment and immigration and not only provided through the extra money if we get this legislation through for Community Futures, but also for training and mobility.

But we seem to be able to bring together the programs of a variety of departments, the resources and the ideas of a number of people to develop solutions that are based in the community and come from the people in the community.

We cannot say to people there are no choices. We cannot keep telling people that they must stay where they are, that they will be fine the way things are. We have got to be able to tell people that we will help make their lives better. If it is training, if it is an ability to learn a skill, if it is an industrial adjustment strategy which has been so successful in many places, then that is something to think about. We have to deal with the reality where we have lost an industry where we put the employer, the employee and the government together and say, "How do we deal with the short term problem and what is it we bring together to deal with the longer term problem?". We must be able to do that.

With Bill C–21 we have those opportunities. We must be able to say to people: "We are going to support what you are doing". In my province we continue to take care of the people with the greatest need and we continue to be able to deal with the programs. Most of the people in Newfoundland and Labrador will be completely unaffected in a negative way and will only find the benefit through the changes to Bill C–21.

Mr. Tobin: What happened to that young idealistic fellow in the youth parliament? He would never stand up for a piece of legislation like this.

Mr. Reid: He joined the Liberal Party, Mr. Speaker. I was a Liberal once and I saw the errors of my ways. That is all right. I used to vote for your crowd before I voted for anybody.

I want to talk about the training programs. We have all heard a lot about the training programs since the 1970s when they were brought in. We have heard a tremendous amount of negative things and we have had some pretty rough things said about Newfoundlanders and Labradorians through a variety of media.

As these programs have evolved we have seen some interesting things happen. One of my friends across the way this afternoon was talking about the fact that all of a sudden Employment and Immigration demanded that in its training programs there be a training component. He was absolutely horrified by this. There is no question that we have used these programs to do other things. These employment programs have been used definitely to get people over a hump. They have been used to provide municipal infrastructure for the community, support for community groups, and they have been used for training.

But we are not completely isolated and completely restricted to one particular program. My friend opposite talks about a plumber not being able to get a job as a plumber or cannot get trained as a plumber because he is already a plumber. What about Section 25 of the act which quite specifically is designed to help those people who are unemployed keep their skills in tune? We have been able to use those programs quite efficiently and quite effectively. He talks about water lines. I have five or six communities in my constituency that are well under way to providing water to every house in that community in an efficient and effective manner. How have we done it? We have provided the labour through—

Mr. Milliken: Overground.

Mr. Reid: No, Mr. Speaker, underground. In the winter too. The people in Newfoundland and Labrador are not like the people of southern Ontario and eastern Ontario. We can work in the hard weather and we can work in what little heat we have too. What we have is the ability of a provincial government to provide some of the resources while we provide some of the labour.

I look at the Basilica of St. John the Baptist, a photograph of which appeared on the front cover of the annual report of the Department of Employment and Immigration. We took people off the street and put them in a program that I must say was started by my predecessor who represented the party opposite. This program was designed to help the parish deal with one of the most famous historic buildings in Newfoundland and Labrador, an old church that was built over a period of time in the 19th century. It is beautiful inside but was falling down.

We trained masons. We trained people to work with stone, people who had no knowledge of stone or working with their hands in that way. Do you know what they are doing now, Mr. Speaker? They are travelling around Newfoundland and Labrador providing advice.

They are acting as consultants to people who have the same problems. These are little successes that we have had but little successes that are so important.

There is a professor at Memorial University in the genetics department who applies for this program whom we support. Because the people whom she has taught and given training have gone on to enter university themselves. I believe one of them is in law school. This is the sort of success that we have.

I look at Bell Island where we have very difficult situations, but we are working with the community council, we are working with the people of the development association, we are working with the people of ACOA. We have been able to move ahead with projects that not only help the people of the community but help the community themselves.

We talk about training and the inequities of a person in one seat being on unemployment and the person next perhaps not being on unemployment. It is an inequity, I do not like it, but it happens. But do you know that because we can purchase seats in these community colleges and because those community colleges have become so important for some of our communities that they in themselves take on a bit of a role of economic development.

I look at Bell Island again because there the people use the programs that we have. There we have recognized their special need and there we have worked together. We still have not anywhere near begun to solve the problems, but if we could provide another program in that community college that brings another 30 people in on a course, we are bringing 30 people into that community that would not normally be there. That is the movement here, that is the evolution of this program, that is what will make our social programs better which was the commitment of the Prime Minister and the government. That is what Bill C-21 would be doing right now if the House down the corridor would pass this piece of legislation.

Now I have but three short minutes left and I thought I should, out of respect, have a few words for our unelected friends down the corridor, our unelected friends who we were told wanted to go talk to Canadians, who are not driven by politics. Have you read this thing?

Where did they go after wanting to go across Canada? They went to St. John's and they went to Canso, two places in the scheme of things, they should have gone. But they are the only two places they went, and I would suggest they exploited the hardship that those people have been facing in the fishery and the hardship that they face in the future. Except we are there trying to help them through the use of legislation like this, not exploit them like our friends down the corridor.

We talk about politics and talk about our hon. friends moving. In 1978 when the government of our friends opposite moved Bill C-14, reducing the benefit rate from two-thirds to 60 per cent recovering through the income tax system a portion of claimants under UI. At the committee stage, at the time, the government estimated—and this is 1978 dollars—that the cost would result in a savings to the government of $885 million in changes to the UI benefits.

That piece of legislation went through the Senate with no amendment in all three stages in one day. It got Royal Assent the same day. This is the same group down the hall that is so concerned about Canadians today, that when it was their friends in the government it took one day and they did not bat an eyelash, but they are willing to put the people of this country who need the help that Bill C-21 provides behind them and put the politics on their backs for their own great glorification.

My constituents cannot qualify for the variable entrance requirement for their political aggrandizement and benefit, despite the fact that 12 years ago they did not bat an eyelash. That is outlandish and despicable in this country.

• (2010)

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I hope my friend from St. John's East will stay a minute. My colleague from Nickel Belt in the New Democratic Party has given me the opportunity to speak behind my friend from St. John's East. Let me say to my friend from St. John's East and say to the House that I first met this gentleman when he was still at a young and tender and unsullied age. He was but a young 15 or 16-year old. He was sitting across the floor from me in the Colonial Building in the youth Parliament of Newfoundland and Labrador.

In those days when passion burned in his veins, when his blood ran hot, when the salt-water boiled up and demanded to be heard, it was not as a defender of a corrupt and bankrupt regime that he spoke but as a Newfoundlander who believed in his people and demanded to be heard. The fundamental change that has occurred, and he bears a heavy burden—it is a heavy cross that he carries now—is that once as a young and sullied Newfoundlander he was a voice for Newfoundland wherever he would be heard. He has now become the apologist of Ottawa to Newfoundland in the House of Commons. I want to tell him the apology just expressed will not be accepted by the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

What are the facts? This member rises up to his full height, an inch or two shorter than me, and with his greatest of indignation tells Parliament and through Parliament the people of Canada what a great and wonderful thing is being done for the people of Newfoundland. They are being trained. How wonderful. He cited two examples of four fellows fixing up a church and a couple of other people going through a genetic lab at Memorial University.

Not a word was heard from the member for St. John's East about the people on the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland and the historic community of Port au Choix who cling to the rocks with their fingernails on the edge of the ocean trying to scrape a living from the land and the sea. Not a word for them.

Not a word for the people who live on the south coast of Newfoundland, not the city of St. John's, but the south coast of Newfoundland where there is not even a road connection. St. John's is but a blast they have to endure nightly on the local news.

Not a word for them nor a word for the people on Twillingate Island on the northeast coast, nor a word for the people of Lock Harbour and the Bay of Islands, nor a single uttered word for the people of La Scie on the Baie Verte peninsula. He has got two examples in St. John's of training programs. Of course what is good enough for St. John's is good enough for all of Newfoundland. I am here to tell him that Newfoundland is not our echo of what is good for St. John's.

I want to tell the member for St. John's East that if he wants to deal in fact, deal in fact. When it comes to rhetoric those of us from Newfoundland are quite capable of matching the rhetoric that has been heaved across this floor.

What are the facts? A $51 million cut to the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. That is the fact. Fifty-one million dollars. The member opposite wants us to get so caught up in his emotion that we will allow, happily, $51 million to slip out of the pockets, not of those who have in Newfoundland, not out of the pockets of the merchants of Newfoundland, not out of the pockets of the academics at university with their sinecure, safe and secure jobs, good people that they are, not out of the pockets of the bureaucracy of Newfoundland, the people who administer these wonderful training programs, not out of the pockets of the Crosbies of the world, but out of the pockets of the poorest of the poor in Newfoundland.

And there is not a word from the member for St. John's East for the poorest of the poor. We have just heard from a member whom I instinctively and intrinsically generally have some empathy for, because I think he is in a hell of spot, defending this regime. The tragedy is that his own area, the Avalon Peninsula, is that part of Newfoundland most devastated by Bill C-21. It is the area which sees the greatest increase in the requirements for qualification for UI, and there is not a word from that member.

Let us talk about these training programs. You have rural communities where unemployment, seasonally, is 50 per cent. And some bespectacled young fellow, well intentioned, shows up from the local CEIC office because he has a mandate from Ottawa. God knows, he knows it is a fool's errand but, nevertheless, it is his mandate and he must carry it out. He walks up onto the local wharf and he says: "Boys, we are going to train you. And if you can develop a training program, we are going to give you some financial support. And if you cannot develop a training program, we cannot help you".

Well, what has happened? With very rare exceptions, and there are a couple of rare exceptions, we have either seen areas that traditionally have shared in a national program and played a role in a useful national program, being cut out of it entirely, because they do not happen to have a technical college on their doorstep, or we have seen farcical training programs designed merely to qualify and to get access to some community development funds. That is what has happened all too often, in rural Newfoundland.

It takes the nerve of a severe toothache to stand in this House, to be from Newfoundland, and be engaged in the political life of the province, to have a degree of awareness about the political life of the province, and to suggest that there are some great and wondrous training programs going on in Newfoundland today. That is a farce. That is not true. That is a false representation of the facts. That is a distortion of reality. It is a disservice to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, to make that kind of suggestion in this House.

I know my colleague opposite from St. John's East must be severely out of touch, must have breathed too much of the rarefied air, must have been so moved by the splendour of this Chamber and the stained glass windows that reality has become distorted for him, as he looks at these programs with rose-tinted glasses. I know that in a serious, sober and honest moment, having been exposed to the light of day, the member for St. John's East could never make such a foolish and wanton declaration of nonsense in this House of Commons. I know that for a fact, Mr. Speaker. I am hoping he goes home soon and stands on the leeside of Bell Island, in a strong wind and clears his brain of these foolish notions.

So what is the reality? What is happening is that an otherwise fine human being, an otherwise decent individual whose instincts, although they have been absolutely repressed, are otherwise right, has been corrupted by the necessity of defending the indefensible. That is what has happened. Members opposite are being forced to stand on their hind legs—and when they are from the opposite side it is their hind legs that they stand on, whereas for most of us it is just two—and defend the indefensible.

This is a government that is being driven by budget considerations to slash spending. There is no over-all economic policy here. There is no over-all social plan here. There is no over-all determination to train people and make them more employable here. There is merely a Minister of Finance who said, "I need $2 billion". And having declared he is going to cut $2 billion, he then left it to the Minister of Employment and Immigration to impose those cuts.

The Government of Canada is getting out of the business of unemployment insurance.

That is important to me because as a Newfoundlander I recall the words of the Minister for International Trade, the member for St. John's West, the mentor of the member for St. John's East, who said in advance of the election campaign that the government had no plan whatsoever, not the slightest notion of changing the unemployment insurance program. It would not happen.

It is the same gentleman who was trotted out to say that there was going to be no change and no cuts to education spending, who also said that there was going to be no cuts to health care. He told us there would be no cuts to Canada's social programs. It would not happen. None of this was part and parcel of the free trade deal. There would be no cuts to transportation subsidies. Yet the Atlantic at and east program has been wiped out.

What do we have? We have here the completion of the free trade pact. We have a Minister for International Trade who does not want to be seen to be negotiating away unemployment insurance at the negotiating table. So he cut it unilaterally. He does not want to be seen to be negotiating away health care so the government cut it unilaterally. He did not wish to be seen negotiating away education so he cut it unilaterally. Nobody will ever accuse the Minister for International Trade of having negotiated away our social programs at the table with the Americans in definition of subsidy because we gave it all away in advance. We destroyed those programs.

It is a transparent and desperate measure. This government knows that the people of Canada will rise in literal rebellion as they see the nature and the collective values of this nation, that which distinguishes us from our neighbours to the south, being destroyed at a negotiating table. The way to avoid that spectacle is to give all of those programs away and destroy them in the name of budget cuts. The government can then tell the Americans that we don't need to negotiate UIC, we're out of the business. We don't need to talk about regional development programs because we are out of the business. We don't need to worry about tourism development because we are out of the business. We are now imposing cuts so that within a few years we will have a privatized health care system.

Do you know what else? Universities cannot afford to function any more because we have cut them too. I will bet you they will be privatized in short order. So you do not need to negotiate away our so-called intervention in the economy because we got out of our participation as a government in the economy. The job is done.

Now that is what is going on in every walk of Canadian life. It is not the disappearance of government initiatives that we have seen. It is not a reduction in the bottom line deficit that we are seeing. Although in individual terms it is, it is not even the disappearance of necessary dollars from the pockets of those most poor amongst us that we are seeing.

What we are seeing is the evaporation of what makes Canada a country, what distinguishes us from every other nation of the world and in particular our neighbour to the south. We are seeing the evaporation of the kind of mentality and values that make me as a Newfoundlander proud to say that as proud as I am to be a Newfoundlander, I am prouder still to be a Canadian because I share some values with people from every province and every region of Canada. I have them in common and I know that together, collectively, we build a better country.

Those values are being eroded. No amount of rhetoric by members opposite, no amount of smoke and mirrors, no attempt to try and sell this as a training program, and no attempt to try and convince those who are being affected that somehow their lot is being improved will change that. This government has given up on Canada. It sees this nation merely as so many bits and pieces on a monopoly board to be manipulated to suit the bottom line.

We in the province of Newfoundland, and I know all of my colleagues in this party and those with some better sense in this place, reject that kind of vision for Canada because that is no vision for Canada.

There has been a lot of debate in this place about the role of the Senate with respect to Bill C-21. There has been a lot of debate about whether or not the Senate should supersede the rights of Parliament and so on.

Let me say that I accept, embrace and endorse the notion, unquestionably, that the elected member, those who are directly accountable to the people, have a role in the government of this land that cannot be shared in equal measure by those who are appointed to the Senate. I do not dispute that.

Let me say that when you see your country, not slowly, not bit by bit, but in giant leaps being dissipated, when you see the glue that holds us together being melted, when you see the pieces that make a whole beginning become askew, when you see neighbour turn against neighbour—and that is what has happened in Canada—because there is such profound frustration with the government that people have exercised that frustration and have made it felt by turning on their neighbours—and when you hear communities say: "We are English only" others say: "We are French only" others taking up petitions protesting by the tens of thousands our visible minorities in this nation, it represents a profound sense of fear in the land, profound frustration. Canadians know they do not have the opportunity to cast judgment on this government for two and a half years, and in their anger and frustration and, yes, in their fear, neighbour has turned against neighbour.

If we in our party have a message for this government and for the people of Canada it is this: That we will use every legitimate means at our disposal as a party and we make no apologies to stopping this kind of legislation, to amending this kind of legislation, to reforming this kind of legislation. We know there are Canadians out there who are frustrated, feeling abandoned by their national government, who we know have a sense that that which they have held dear, and those values that we have collectively embraced are disappearing. We say to them: Do not despair. Do not turn neighbour against neighbour. Do not become intolerant of those who are different. Maintain that sense of what you want your community and your province and your country to be. Join with us in fighting this policy not only in Bill C-21 but, in fact, right across the board to rewrite the values of Canada, to reduce this nation to nothing other than a piece of real estate on a monopoly board, to reduce our values to dollars and cents, to reduce this nation to a piece of merchandise, to be marketed, sold and where every program, every group and every region has a financial value attached.

No country can survive if we measure those who make a contribution to it purely in financial terms. No country can prosper if we attach a miniscule value to those who live in the last outpost and the farthest outreaches of the land. The citizens who live on the bill of Cape St. George, the citizens who live on Cape Spear, that piece of Canadian real estate reaching farthest out into the Atlantic Ocean, for those who live in Prince Rupert or Smithers on the other side, those who live in Chimo in Quebec or in Iqaluit on Baffin Island, the value they bring to this country and the contribution they make to this country is every bit as important as that contribution of any citizen who has the privilege to occupy a seat in this place.

When we make national programs we must make those programs bearing in mind that Canadians live in communities from sea to sea, and that the flag of Canada must be raised and raised with pride in every one of those communities and that when the Government of Canada makes policy, it must reach out to people in every part of this land. We must understand always that the inherent wisdom, the native intelligence, wit and brilliance of those people who live in our rural economies and rural communities are not fooled by this defence of Bill C–21 by the member for St. John's East. That native wit and intelligence is insulted by it.

So I conclude my remarks with the words of Gordon Bradley who chaired the great convention in Newfoundland in 1947–48 on the future of Newfoundland, on whether it would seek union with Canada or union with the United States. And when there was squabbling, fighting, trickery and chicanery going on at the convention he rose and he called upon those assembled to seek a greater goal and a greater good. He said, "I warn you, the eyes and the ears of the people of Newfoundland are on us. They are watching us. They are weighing our every word. They want us to chart a new course for this country together. Let us not fail them. Let us fasten a new sail for this nation."

Those words are appropriate again today. Let us put aside the chicanery. Let us put aside the double talk. Let us put aside the insulting rationalization for an abandonment of rural peoples right across this country, indeed the abandonment of our urban poor. Let us reject this bill intelligently, or let us at least amend this bill intelligently. Let us begin to restore this tattered and broken Canada, broken and tattered at the hands of a government that has forgotten its primary responsibility; to build a nation.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–21 does more than change some of the rules of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It will implement the Labour Force Development Strategy. This strategy, as announced on April 11, 1989, is an important initiative of this government and will make a real improvement in Canada's ability to compete in the world economy.

The projected expenditures under the current UI program are estimated to be $12.7 billion for 1990. There will be no change in the over–all size of the UI program once the changes have been implemented. Spending reductions within the UI will occur primarily in three areas; changes to the program entrance requirements, benefit duration and penalties for voluntary quitters without just cause.

Additional spending will be made in more generous benefits for new parents, expanded coverage to workers over age 65 and an increased use of the UI program for development purposes such as skills training.

As a former businessman and an employer, I applaud the changes that have been proposed. As an employer I was often disappointed by employees who worked only long enough to qualify for the benefits of the UIC. These changes in program entrance requirements should weed out the lazy from the system and gear it more for those for whom it was intended. Second, as an employer I was concerned by the lack of skills training available to many employees. The additional emphasis on this area through UIC will greatly address this concern.

The primary responsibility for the skills training of the employed people should rest with the employers and their workers. This government intends to stimulate their commitment by promoting and reinforcing private sector training, thereby strengthening the competitiveness of the Canadian industry.

A total of $230 million is available in the Labour Force Development Strategy to increase training activity by the private sector through co–operative programs. The government's objective is to stimulate an additional private sector training effort of $1.5 billion a year by 1994 to bring the total to approximately $3 billion per year.

This increase is needed is needed to raise the relative level of Canadian private sector training to that of the United States. We are placing greater emphasis, through new UI development uses, to help the unemployed improve their job prospects through skills training, self-employment and relocation assistance. The support for training and other developmental uses will be increased from the present 2 per cent to about 10 per cent or $1.4 billion in total UI expenditures. Developmental uses of UI funds will also include such things as relocation assistance, self-employment, entrepreneurship assistance and re-employment assistance.

As I stated earlier, I have in the past been discouraged with the incentive to not work which exists in the UIC. There have been changes to the minimum requirements for qualifying for benefits which should greatly address this concern. In addition, a greater flexibility has been added to the system to compensate for regional differences in the unemployment rate. For a government which is often labelled as uncaring and unfeeling, this is a very sensitive approach to the needs of Canadians. In my province of Manitoba, the minimum requirements for receiving benefits will vary from 10 weeks in the north to about 18 weeks in the south where jobs are more plentiful.

According to the 1987 data, this would affect less than 1 per cent of the claimants. On total, the average number of weeks benefits that will be paid to claimants will be 35. This amounts to four months more than the average claimant uses. That is, those who are using unemployment insurance as a temporary source of income until they find a new job will see no change to the benefits available to them. However, those individuals who have taken advantage of the system will suddenly find themselves receiving fewer benefits.

I do not believe the majority of my constituents, or Canadians in general for that matter, would be offended by such a change. We have stiffened the penalty to those who quit jobs simply because life is easier on unemployment benefits. Reduction in benefits to people who voluntarily quit jobs had to happen.

However, the Liberal Senators want to change this decision. They would like to send a signal to people that it is all right to quit jobs because UI will pay. As an employer, a taxpayer, and as a member of the House of Commons, I reject that way of thinking.

Unemployment insurance exists in this country because the citizens of this nation have strongly held beliefs in the work ethic and in a sense of fair play. A person should have the right to find a job and earn a living to support a family. When that right is taken away from them, they should be provided with a temporary source of income until they can find a new job. This is the only fair and just thing to do.

However, Canadians are like-minded in their opinion of individuals who take advantage of this belief for their own personal desire to avoid working for a living. In my opinion, the changes to the UI bill are a step in the right direction, returning the UI system to its original purpose of providing income support between two jobs.

I support Bill C-21 because of this. I find myself deeply troubled by the actions being taken by the members of the other House. The Liberal has-beens in that place feel they have some inexplicable authority to override the elected House of Commons concerning the legislation of what are constitutionally referred to as money bills. I, for one, can find only two reasons for their position. It is either a question of legal authority or moral authority. On both counts, I find their reasoning lacking.

First of all, with respect to legal authority, I believe my colleague the hon. Minister of State, has clearly enunciated the weaknesses of their position. As he stated, Section 53 prohibits the Senate from amending money bills. In this regard, he noted that Standing Order 80 of the House of Commons states that only the House of Commons has the right to direct, to limit and to appoint such bills which are not alterable by the Senate. I believe that this is just too clear to even debate.

There is no doubt that Bill C-21 qualifies as a money bill as it is responsible for the collection of money from individuals for the express intent of distributing said moneys to citizens through the offices of the Receiver General. In this area the authority of the Senate would seem to be quite clear.

The Senate has argued that the Monarch and the Governor General have the right, regardless of Section 53 of the Constitution and Standing Order 80, to override all legislation from the House of Commons. In the strictest sense, they are probably correct. However, the Monarch and the Governor General no longer have the role in legislation they may have had a few centuries ago.

Obviously, the reason for this change is the democratic principle which dominates the functioning and beliefs of the society we live in today. The Senators, regardless of their misguided belief, are not elected representatives of the people of this country. Any powers they may think they have via the Constitution, are based less on sound constitutional principle and convention than they are on delusions of long–departed power.

Allowing the Senate to override the House of Commons at any time, and particularly with regard to a money bill, would set a most dangerous precedent. The principles of democracy would be completely undermined by such an action.

• (2040)

In this particular case, the Senate has recommended the government spend an additional $2 billion on unemployment insurance. This kind of expenditure is absolutely unacceptable in a day and age when spending restraint is essential to help this country recover from the legacy of Liberal over–spending which created our outrageous national debt.

This fiscal unacceptability of their recommendations, however, are overshadowed by their desire to exercise powers for which they have no mandate from the people of Canada. The consequences of allowing the Senate to proceed on its course unchallenged shake the very foundations of democratic principles.

As elected representatives of the people of Canada, we in this House, from all parties, cannot allow them the luxury of this one transgression. The senators believe that changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act are too significant to be rolled through Parliament. However, changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1977 and 1978 were only debated for one day when the Liberal government was in power. Those bills made significant changes to the act.

Let us not mislead ourselves. They are wrangling and obstructing this legislation because they are Liberals and this government is Conservative, and for no other reason. This sudden concern arising from the Senate smells so much of political bias that any arguments they make on a legal basis are absolutely shameful.

Some Senators have argued that, regardless of their legal rights interfere, they somehow possess this moral high ground on this issue and therefore have every reason to follow their present course of action. This, of course, is absolute rubbish.

As I have already stated, they are elected by absolutely no one. Their utter lack of constituents gives them absolutely no authority. However, some of these individuals have been members of Parliament in the past and they no doubt believe they still have the same rights which once belonged to them.

However, let me address the past record of this group. This is the same group of Liberals which practised the habit of annual government overspending with a reckless disregard for the taxpayers of this country. As a result of their habits, the citizens of this country have been saddled with an absolutely discouraging national debt. Programs spending was way out of control by 1984 when this government came to power. By that stage, the Liberals were spending $16 billion more than they were taking in in revenue.

I think we often forget how much a billion dollars actually is. The bottom line, however, is that the government was spending 25 per cent more on programs than it took in. Who did they figure was going to pay this bill? Their current recommendations indicate that they have not figured that out yet. Our government, however, has figured it out. The bill is to be paid by you, by me, and by all the citizens of this country.

Since 1984, we have taken drastic measures to correct the utter lack of respect for the taxpayers of this nation. We have turned a $16 billion annual deficit in program spending into a $9 billion surplus. While we were doing that, however, the $200 billion debt we inherited from the government gathered an extra $120 billion in interest. The program spending surplus did not occur until recently and the old spending habits of the government and its departments provided the remaining $30 billion of debt.

Interest payments on the $350 billion are keeping this government in an annual deficit. Yet, the same Liberal Senators seem completely oblivious to the urgency to curb spending with their latest protest over Bill C–21 and their recommendations that the government spend an additional $2 billion on the program. This program is already accountable for over $12 billion of public money. I fail to see how people who have such a poor grasp of the reality of the situation we are in can claim to have moral authority on this issue. Their previous and current disregard for fiscal responsibility completely negates their argument.

As I mentioned, this government's changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act will not decrease the funds available to unemployment insurance but will make more necessary changes to the system to return it to its original purpose. We have acted legally through our legislative mandate and morally by being fiscally responsible. The Senators can make neither claim.

As a representative from Manitoba I am not one who wishes to abolish the Senate. The Senate should be reformed, but until such time that changes have been made, I am completely unwilling to yield to the Senate for the reasons I have stated.

The Senate was intended to be a House of sober second thought and in this regard it has fulfilled this mandate. The Senate has had the bill for several months and its committee has heard from many witnesses. It has analysed the bill, brought attention to perceived weaknesses and submitted its amendments. The government has recognized the strengths of one of the Senate's amendments and accepted it, and rejected all the other recommendations. The Senate has fulfilled its mandate. It is now time for the legislators in the House of Commons to continue to legislate. The time for further debate has been stretched to the limit. Bill C–21 has been thoroughly debated and examined.

In addition to the Senate's examination, this House has debated the bill for at least 145 hours, through second reading, committee and third reading. It is now time for the Senate to provide sober second thought to other issues of concern to the people of this great country. It is about time the Liberal Senators stopped pursuing their own agenda by grandstanding on issues which can garner the greatest public attention. They are about as concerned with the public good as they are that the sky will fall tomorrow.

The issue before us is a political one and has nothing whatsoever to do with proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Liberal Senators have yet to accept their defeat of 1984 and 1988. It is about time they woke up to reality.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have listened all afternoon to the debate. My friend and colleague for Gander—Grand Falls entitled his speech on Bill C–21 and the proposed amendments from the Senate, "Which Side of the Line Do You Live On". I want to make my comments in terms of "Breaking the Faith with Canadians".

The speeches this afternoon started with the government House leader. He attacked the Senate, he attacked the constitutionality of the Senate. He waxed the most eloquent I have ever heard him wax. He made a very good speech attacking the Senate. Canadians watching will think that the Senate is really the issue in this debate. I want to say at the outset very clearly that it is not the Senate. Up in northern Ontario when we are hunting moose we do not get distracted with rabbit droppings. The Senate is not the issue here, although the government would like Canadians to think it is.

The issue here is C–21; breaking the faith with the Canadian people. Why have I focused on Bill C–21? The New Democratic Party, in its criticism of C–21, correctly said that the provisions were Draconian. First of all, the government removes itself from participating in the unemployment insurance program. It is breaking the social contract, a contract which was entered into in the 1940s between government, employers and the working force of this nation. It saw its flowering, as it were, in 1971 when the then Minister of Employment and Immigration, Bryce Mackasey, introduced an amended unemployment insurance program, which is the one we have today, or had if C–21 gets passed.

In that Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 the coverage was broadened, the contract expanded. We included school teachers, the armed forces and fishermen, and we expanded the coverage. We introduced sick benefits and maternity benefits. The government picked up the cost of the unemployment insurance program if the national unemployment level went above 4 per cent. That was the contract, a contract that said to the workforce, the working men and women of the country:

"If you become unemployed through no fault of your own, here is the safety net." The government participated.

Along the way, because of government's inability to achieve full employment, the unemployment rate in the country rose and the government found itself putting more and more bucks into the unemployment insurance program. From about 1975 or 1976 right through the period of 1980 to 1984, the Liberal governments of the day consistently moved further and further away from the social contract.

It was a principle of gradualism. Gradually, more and more of the cost of carrying the unemployment insurance program was sloughed on to the shoulders of the employers and the employees.

From the principle of gradualism, we have this quantum leap which is Bill C–21. The Tories have done in one fell swoop what it took the Liberals some 15 years to accomplish. In Bill C–21, the government removes itself completely from any responsibility, from any participation in the contract for unemployment insurance.

Now the Tory government can say: "Well, we don't have any more interest in what the unemployment rate is because the government now doesn't have a financial finger in the pie." One of the greatest arguments for having government participate with employers and employees is that whenever the cost to the government goes up, it makes it stop to think about its programs, particularly the whole question of full employment. This government has kissed any dream of full employment good–bye. There is no opportunity anymore for that.

Mr. Boyer: That's too cynical.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, it is not cynical. I want to tell the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore that it is not cynical. That is Conservative thinking. They believe you have got to leave it all to the market–place. It is a selfish, atavistic mentality that can produce Bill C–21. It is cruel and heartless. And now they come and make the Senate the bogeyman.

The saddest part of this whole scenario has been the role of the Liberals. The Liberal for whom I have a great deal of respect in terms of his knowledge of the unemployment insurance program is the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. This afternoon he made a very convincing argument that all of the proposals from the Senate, even the ones the government has accepted, really do not do anything to restore the unemployment insurance program pre–Bill C–21. It is just window–dressing.

Let us say, for example, hypothetically, that the government said: "We will accept everything that the Senate has recommended." The government accepts it all, goes back to the Senate to get its approval, and Bill C–21 becomes law. Has it changed anything for the regions of the country? Not one thing. How can any self–respecting Liberal in the House of Commons support the recommendations from the Senate? They cannot support them because they do nothing to deal with the glaring flaws of Bill C–21. We said we were opposed to C–21 because it contained Draconian changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Those recommendations from the Senate do not improve C–21 to anywhere near the point where we could support it. The only way you can improve C–21 is to squash it and go back to square one. That is the only improvement. We want to make it crystal clear, we are not hung up on these proposals from the Senate because of our longstanding view of the Senate. I do not deal with these issues in the way I would like the world to be. I deal with these recommendations and with the Senate as a reality.

If the Senate had said "no" to Bill C–21 and sent that recommendation back to us, I would be supporting it, but I will not. I will not beforehand be saying, "Oh, if we lose here, I will ask the Senate to fight it for me". I am not chicken feathers. If I cannot do it in here, I am not going to ask my big brother over there, or my old uncle who sits two days a week, to do it for me. I am not going to do that.

The Liberals have used that other card called the Senate. We are all going to see the proof of that if and when the GST goes to the Senate. We will see how tough those old businessmen, those old boardroom types over there, are going to be with the GST. They have to do what they have to do. They have to do what they constitutionally are entitled to do. I have to examine what they send back, if they send back anything to this House.

What they sent back on C–21 is not worth the paper it is written on and the Liberals know it. Yet they are going to get up here and play that card. The Liberal critic for unemployment insurance said it does nothing to improve the bill. Yet he is going to stand up and vote for it. That is breaking faith with all the people who appeared, not only before the legislative committee as it travelled around the country, but all the folks who appeared before the Senate committee as it travelled around the country. That is breaking faith with them.

The coalition of labour unions that met with us and the Liberals and tried to meet with the Tories but could not, told the Senate to scrap the bill. They said that the changes the Senate was proposing are not enough to make them accept it. They said the same thing to the Liberals over here. So that is breaking faith.

Who gets affected adversely by Bill C–21? Well, the Canadian Labour Congress, using figures from StatsCanada, put together the impact of C–21 on the country. Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, C–21 shortens the period of collecting benefits and it lengthens the period to qualify. That has disastrous effects in terms of the numbers of people and the amounts of money in various economic regions of the country.

Take, for example, the effect of C–21 on the Avalon Peninsula. Under C–21, 10,000 would not qualify and 5,440 would be losing weeks. So at the front end we have 10,000 and at the back end we have 5,440 people, for a total of 15,500. There are only 45,000 people collecting unemployment insurance benefits on the Avalon Peninsula. This includes Bell Island and St. John's.

For all of Newfoundland, 24,180 people would be adversely affected. One–third of all of the people collecting unemployment insurance right now will be adversely affected. In Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie, two communities that I am familiar with, there are a total of 9,220 people who will be adversely affected out of a total of 45,600 people collecting unemployment insurance.

Let us go to British Columbia. In northern British Columbia, the number of people who will be adversely affected is 6,760, and a total of 59,710 British Columbians will be adversely affected. For all of Canada, half a million people collecting unemployment insurance will be adversely affected by the changes in Bill C–21.

When these were raised with the minister, all she could say was that she did not believe the figures. Well, if she does not believe the figures, what are her figures? We have not seen the figures from the department. Where are the figures? They have broken faith with the people of Canada, broken faith with those who worked and contributed to the unemployment insurance fund.

Here is an example of heartlessness incarnate. The Minister of Employment and Immigration appeared before the Senate committee and this is what she had to say: "The worst misconception of all is that there are no jobs available. The fact is that studies, surveys and our own experiences tell us that there are jobs available, that jobs are available across Canada and if given active rather than simple passive support the unemployed are better able and more likely to take advantage of these opportunities." That was stated by the minister before the Senate.

What does the minister mean? Do you know what it means when she says: "and if given active rather than simply passive support", Mr. Speaker? "Active" means you kick them off the rolls. You force them to move out of their communities. That is what that means. "Passive support" means paying them the benefits for which they paid premiums to get coverage. That is what passive support means in the minister's words.

There is not a more heartless comment, but what do you expect from a minister who was born and raised in Rosedale in Toronto. Does the minister understand what it is to have worked for 35 or 40 years in the fishing industry in Newfoundland and then suddenly the fisheries close down and there is no work? What do you do with a 49 year old person?

Mr. Stupich: Retrain him.

Mr. Rodriguez: To do what?

Mr. Stupich: To be a lawyer.

Mr. Rodriguez: To be Tory and to get elected on the Tory side? I do not think there will be any Tories elected for the next 100 years in this country.

Talk about breaking faith. Here was a fellow who said of Fisheries Products International when it closed the plant in Trepassey: "I was led down the garden path by the vice-president of Fisheries Products." He was led down the garden path. Who is doing the leading down the garden path with this? The Minister for International Trade, the member for St. John's West said in October 1988 during the election campaign, when asked about changes to the Unemployment Insurance Program: "That is nonsense. We will be looking at it in a couple of years presumably to see what improvements can be made, but there are no changes planned to the UI."

Now who has led whom down the garden path? Barely two months after they won the election we have Bill C-21. Breaking faith with Canadians. Promising them one thing and then violating the promise and breaking the faith. That is what it means.

What has happened here over Bill C-21 is that we have had the Senate and the House of Commons, with the Senate being pitted against the House of Commons. In this pitting match, who are caught? The unemployed. They have not been able to enjoy the benefits that should flow from an unemployment insurance program that is geared for them.

If the government was really listening, who did they listen to to come up with Bill C-21? They certainly did not listen to the standing committee in the previous Parliament that looked at the unemployment insurance program and came up with 90 recommendations, 89 of them unanimous, ways in which we could improve the unemployment insurance program. Instead, this government has seen fit to divorce itself completely from the social contract. They have broken the social contract. They have turned the unemployment insurance program over to the employers and the employees. Not only that, but by doing that they have increased the premiums because they have removed themselves from any responsibility for variable entrance requirements and for fishermen's benefits.

What else did they turn around and do? They say to the same people who are paying into the program: "Now you have got to pay for the training, upgrading and the basic education of the unemployed". A total abdication of responsibility. This government has broken faith with the Canadian people. They have broken the social contract. I want to tell them that there is a big political price they are going to have to pay.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to a lot of debate today and yesterday. There are really two issues here. One is regarding the substantive provisions of Bill C-21. The second is related to the constitutional process involving the Senate and revision of bills passed in this House.

I would like to deal primarily with that second concern, because I think both require some addressing here in this Chamber. Frankly, when I hear the impassioned and eloquent speech from the hon. member representing Nickel Belt and the answers that have been given to many of the points he has raised in this House, it makes me reflect again on why we even need in our Parliamentary system any other chamber to be busy with the kind of legislation that is coming here when the issues are represented by this legislation are receiving very full debate right here in the Chamber of popularly elected representatives.

Mr. Speaker, it has always been said that the Senate's role is to study legislation dispassionately. Recently, however, it has become a place for political dealings where people use their position to defeat bills that were passed democratically by the elected members.

The Liberal senators said that they had established a special committee to give those who had not appeared before our legislative committee a chance to express their opinion. Then why did the 54 witnesses chosen to appear before the special Senate committee represent groups or individuals who had already appeared before the legislative committee of the House?

Why did the special Senate committee decide to hear the representatives of groups who had already opposed almost all the government's proposals?

• (2110)

And why didn't the special committee of the Senate consider the views of recognized experts on unemployment? Because the Liberal senators want to show only one side of the question. They want to scare the public and have no interest in taking a serious look at the real, positive impact of this bill.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration told the committee that its findings indicated it had failed to raise a single new point of any substance in the bill.

The special committee of the Senate is also determined to delay the process for as long as possible. The provisions of Bill C–21 consider regional needs in areas of higher unemployment according to a scale that makes the system more straightforward and more equitable for all claimants. Instead of passing Bill C–21, however, with its variable entrance requirement, the Senate Liberals decided to wait. This means that many people who would otherwise be eligible for unemployment insurance today cannot receive those benefits. Canadians know perfectly well that the Liberal senators who represent the majority in the Senate are the only ones to blame.

Canadians also know that Senate Liberals are preventing many people, including mothers and fathers of newborn children, from taking advantage of expanded benefits under this legislation. There are people who depend on these benefits, and the Senate is quite content to let things drag on.

Canadians will recall this is the same group of Liberal senators that prevented the passage of other bills for political reasons.

We are now certain of what we already knew. The demands of the Senate Liberals had no reasonable basis and were meant only to scare the public and needle the government. We cannot afford to let ourselves be manoeuvered into this kind of position again, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Yesterday, the government House leader, also speaking largely about the Senate and its role in a democratic state like Canada, referred to a book entitled The Modern Senate of Canada written by F. A. Kunz. From that book, the minister quoted many extracts but the one which I would like to refer to and pick up on is the following. For anyone who wants to compare, this appears at page 9093 of yesterday's Hansard:

> But these arguments and counter–arguments respecting the Senate's financial powers, although theoretically interesting, are now–a–days little more than examples of academic pedantry and to discuss the Senate's right to revise the Government's financial program in terms of conflict is really to present a very misleading picture of its functions in the modern state. On the contrary, the Senate has acted in full understanding of the meaning and implications of responsible government and accepted as binding upon itself the proposition that it should not unduly disturb what has come to be called "the balance of ways and means"; or, as Hopkins says, "that it would be inadmissible to tamper with the overall financial program submitted by the Government in its budgetary proposals in such a way as to effect a material change in the budgetary surplus or deficit envisaged therein."

The key part of that, in my view, is this reference to the modern Senate of Canada having acted in full understanding of the meaning and implications of responsible government.

The country has, somewhere on our public agenda, and have had for decades, the issue of Senate reform. It is currently in abeyance, pending the outcome of the Meech Lake Accord. One of the things that this whole debate is doing is raising to a much greater prominence before Canadians this enduring, unfinished bit of Canadian business, this hold over from an entirely different era representing a totally different perspective on government, the Canadian Senate.

By its most recent actions, when you take them in the same flow as we have seen with Bill C–22 previously, or borrowing bills that were held up costing Canadians some $14 million a day every day they were delayed in the Senate, and many other things that have happened in the other place since 1984 where the majority is of a different political persuasion from the popularly elected majority in this Chamber, it has brought into very sharp focus the fact that we Canadians have been unduly long in making the right final decision with respect to how constitutional government shall be structured in this country.

The origins of the Senate, if I could just go back to that, really come from what could only be called archaic conservativism. Way back prior to Confederation, the whole time when the family compact was in power, the pre–eminent position of the church and the conduct of affairs of state, the garrison mentality, the colonial economy, there was an effort to replicate here in Canada the social order of pre–revolutionary Europe. That archaic conservativism was supplanted not by really radical ideas. The rebellions of 1837 both in Upper and Lower Canada were repelled and replaced by Confederation conservatism. It was another idea.

There were places where this primitive conservativism lingered for a while, most particularly in the province of Quebec, supported by the doctrines of ultramontanism. It continued for a long time where the women only received the right to vote in 1940, where a department of education was not established until the early 1960s, and where finally the role of the modern state swept aside even those last remaining remnants of an archaic conservatism.

The one lingering vestige of that pre-Confederation, early 19th century thinking, can only be found today on the banks of the Ottawa River here in Ottawa, the Senate of Canada. This idea that there has to be an appointed Upper House that can supervise and control the actions of the tempestuous, popularly elected, democratic assembly is a notion that may have fitted a much earlier Canada, but it no longer fits this country.

The example we have with Bill C-21 typifies that, but it is only one example. In fact, all the provinces that had appointed upper Houses have abolished them. Some of the provinces, for example, the province of Ontario where politics is always seen in very pragmatic terms, opted for an elected upper House. Under our Constitution of 1841, the province of Ontario or Canada West at that time, had an elected upper House. We continued with that until 1867 when again the pragmatic Conservatives and pragmatic Ontarians decided no, let us be done with this; it makes no sense to have an upper House either elected or appointed, and it was dropped from the constitution of the province when Ontario came into Confederation in 1867.

Prince Edward Islanders are known to be contrary-minded from time to time. When the Liberals are in power in Ottawa they elect Tories to come here. When the Tories are in power in Ottawa, Islanders elect Liberals to come here. Islanders have always displayed a healthy degree of independent-mindedness. They too, in the mid-nineteenth century, decided if an upper House we are to have, let us have an elected upper House. In the Constitution of Prince Edward Island they changed it in order to have an elected Upper House. Again, Prince Edward Islanders, having found out that an Upper House of whatever kind, elected or appointed, fit very poorly in our system of representative democracy and simply was not needed, wisely decided to reform their Constitution and let the Upper House slip into the mists of history where it rightly deserved to be obscured.

Only at the federal level have we still with us an appointed Upper House.

We have seen this question of reforming the Senate as an agenda on the political debates of this country for decades. The understanding that Kunz refers to in the other place is that those who have been appointed to the Senate will always act within the very narrow tolerances of a truly parliamentary democracy. They have largely enjoyed office by not disturbing.

It has been an irony that people have pointed to the Upper House and have said that while it serves a good role, we want it to do more. Whenever the Upper House does something and exercises power, there is an outcry. This is not only something when the Progressive Conservatives form the government of Canada, as is currently the case, but I recall this having been a cry that was heard at various times back through the 20th century in Canadian political history.

The point is that we are only happy when the Senate is docile. The moment that it begins to get involved politically in legislation and begins to take these initiatives, people in this country, who are all democrats whatever party they are in, quite rightly resent this development as being most untoward.

One can only characterize the nine amendments which have come back to us from the other place emanating from a Liberal-dominated majority in that place and on that committee, and the political activity that has gone on with that, as a good reason to reject these amendments and to work to rejecting the continuing role of the Senate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows the deep respect that I have for him. However, I do not believe that this debate tonight is about the Senate of Canada. This debate is about the conscience of the country and—

Mr. Boyer: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will listen to the hon. member's point of privilege and then I will listen to the hon. member's point of order again.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I had the floor. I was speaking on debate within the time allocated to me. The hon. member purported to raise a point of order which was in fact a point of debate. He has been here long enough to understand the distinction between a point of order and a point of debate. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that my point of personal privilege is that members rising on a purported point of order in order to disrupt a Member of Parliament who has the floor and who is speaking is out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think it is necessary for us to carry on in this regard. I know the hon. member was coming to the end of his speech and he ended up speaking about the Senate. I do not think there is a reason for it, but I will listen to the hon. member's point of order if there is one.

Mr. Mills: I accept that, Mr. Speaker. I just think we should focus on the fact that there are unemployment insurance offices across the country right now which are the real essence of this problem and that is where I wish we could focus.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will give the hon. member one minute to close off his debate.

Mr. Boyer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will address my remarks directly to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, because at the beginning of my remarks I said that there are two issues raised by the matter that is before the House now. One is the specific subject—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will raise the question through me.

Mr. Boyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, through you, I would remind all hon. members, including those who seem to think that I was not talking about the subject matter, that I stated that there were very clearly two issues raised by this. One, the substantive provisions of Bill C-21, and I did direct remarks to those. Second, I said there is the whole role of the Senate in the country. If the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood wishes to go on record as supporting an unelected, an appointed Upper House having the final say in matters like this, I would very much welcome that being part of the public record of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member's time is over. I do not think we require any more points of order or points of privilege. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon has the floor on debate.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader stated yesterday that his government cannot accept the Senate amendments to Bill C-21, a bill to change the unemployment insurance benefits to the workers of the country.

By rejecting all the amendments but one, the government is saying that all Canadians must accept Bill C-21 in its original form. Before getting into the substance of what I want to say with respect to this, along with my friend and colleague who was trying to raise a point of order, I would like to compliment and thank the Senate for having the strength to take this bold move to reject this legislation. I compliment it for using the wisdom of its years of experience in this very important social area. I thank the Senate, instead of chastising it, for its belief in the institutions of the country that have made Canada great, and particularly the social policies which it is trying to protect in this legislation.

Bill C-21 is wrong. It is wrong in principle, wrong in what it proposes, and wrong in its philosophy. This bill will change the insurance of the income of our workers in the country. It will change what they have come to expect and deserve. This is a bill the government promised it would not pass in the House.

The Prime Minister said in 1984 that social programs in our country are a sacred trust. He told Canadians during the last federal election in October 1988 that there was absolutely nothing that would prevent the government of Canada from maintaining all of its social programs. The Minister for International Trade told The Evening Telegram of St. John's on October 14 that after consulting with the Prime Minister, he could confirm and assure Canadians that "no one is planning any changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act of this country".

My colleague from Hamilton in his comments earlier outlined more of the substance of the speech of the Minister for International Trade on that particular date. The minister assured the country and Canadians on many occasions that nothing would happen with unemployment insurance. That was before the election.

The fact that we are debating this issue points to the contradictions in the words of the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade.

I said the word "contradiction" and, Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I that we both come from areas where a more explicit word would be used to say what happened prior to the election in terms of what the Prime Minister promised to the people of this country and in terms of what the Minister for International Trade promised the people of Newfoundland. We could be more expressive. I would like to use that word tonight, but I am sure that you would think it unparliamentary, so I will just say that those words were contradictory to what they are doing here today.

We on this side of the House are once again compelled to bring to the attention of Canadians the inconsistencies and the contradictions between what this government promised during the last election and what it is delivering here today.

The government will no longer contribute to the unemployment insurance fund of Canada. Instead, the financing burden will be placed on the shoulders of all Canadian workers and all Canadian employers.

The estimated government cost of unemployment insurance expenditures is $2.9 billion. By abdicating its responsibility to pay unemployment insurance contributions this government will force employees to pay an additional $1.2 billion in their premiums, and employers will be forced to pay $1.7 billion in additional contributions. This government will pay nothing. This is an abdication of responsibility for a fundamental and basic social program that Canadians have earned and deserve and have come to expect.

Not only will workers be paying more; they will be paying more and getting less. The changes to the unemployment insurance system will shrink the safety net by making more stringent the qualifications to receive unemployment insurance and the period for which benefits are paid. Obviously it appears that the workers in our country need protection.

Under the present system, total entitlements include initial benefits, that is, one week of benefits for every week worked, plus regional benefits. Under the new legislation there is only one set of benefits calculated using the regional rate of unemployment and the minimum entrance requirements.

Let us look at what this does to the regions of this country, and particularly the people in the region that I represent, the people of northwestern Ontario. With an average unemployment rate of 7.6 per cent, they will witness an increase in the minimum entrance requirement from 12 weeks to 18 weeks under this new system. That is an increase of 50 per cent.

Northwestern Ontario will see the duration of entitlements reduced from a minimum of 26 weeks to 18 weeks, and a decreased maximum of 50 weeks to 41 weeks in benefits. In other words, workers in northwestern Ontario will be paying much more and, as I said earlier, be getting much less.

Like so many other policies of this government, for example its GST proposals, its new taxes which have been implemented over the years, what it has done to the passenger rail service in the country, what it is doing with the rural post offices and now the changes to the unemployment insurance program, they show a complete disregard for northern Ontario, a complete disregard for rural Canada and a complete disregard for the small cities in this country.

Did this government consider what sort of an impact such changes would have on the rural Canadian economy? Many local industries and firms are set up to employ seasonal workers long enough so that they can apply for UI benefits. Under the new system these firms will have to make the choice of laying off workers without enough weeks to qualify or retain those workers for a few additional weeks increasing their costs. Most firms could not afford the latter option and remain competitive, which again shows that our workers need protection.

Further evidence of this government's ignorance of northern Ontario can be found in its plan to put $800 million back into the job training program. The government failed to mention that between 1984 and 1989 it cut training programs in this country from $2.2 billion in 1984 to $1.5 billion in 1989, a decrease of over $700 million. Yet now it is putting back $800 million by taking the money out of the unemployment insurance fund. This will be paid by the employers and employees of this country. Using simple arithmetic, the government takes out $700 million in 1984 and puts back $800 million in 1989. It does not even respect the cost of inflation in this program. This is just another issue like the goods and services tax issue. It is trying to mesmerize all Canadian workers with its use of figures.

This government claims that by offering training programs through this system it will allow the unemployed to use UI as a trampoline, not as a safety net, that it is a springboard to do greater and better things than the job that they have lost. Supposedly the unemployed would be launched into new productive careers by taking advantage of these fantastic training programs.

How will residents in a single-industry town in northern Ontario and other sections of Canada use this springboard of opportunity to advance themselves? How can they expect to train someone for a job that does not exist in these single-industry towns? When the single industry closes down there are no jobs left to be trained for.

What it causes and what we have been talking about in all smaller communities is the loss of our young people to the bigger centres. This new, improved Unemployment Insurance Act is just going to augment this system. It will move our families out of the small towns into Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and other large centres. They cannot find a job, the training program, or the job the training program will provide other than by moving into these large centres.

Moreover, how can you realistically expect to retrain older people such as our grain elevator workers and ship workers who have little or no other experience? What I am talking about here are people who are going to be losing their benefits and are just over the ages of 40, 41 and 42 and up to about 50. What are they going to do for the balance of their careers, the 15 productive years after they are laid off? Can you train these people for jobs? Can you offer them something that would make their lives more independent than they are today?

What about sawmill workers? This government can remedy the problems that exist in the sawmill industries of Canada, especially northern Ontario, by eliminating the export tax of 15 per cent, thereby ensuring that there will be no unemployment in these fundamental industries. Yet, it refuses to invoke clause 9 of the memorandum of understanding signed and embedded in the free trade agreement which causes distress among sawmill workers not only in northern Ontario but in British Columbia, Alberta and the Atlantic provinces. All it has to do is invoke clause 9 and get rid of that memorandum of understanding.

What about our new Canadian citizens or older immigrants who may have some difficulty in speaking either the English or French language well? What sort of retraining will we be able to offer them? It is obvious that these workers will now be paying into a system from which they have no guarantee or receive any benefits or qualify for these training programs.

I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that northern Ontario as well as other parts of Canada is not renowned for its high tech industries. This policy encourages those who are able to be retrained to move away from rural and small town areas in pursuit of further training and better job opportunities in large cities. It will encourage the youth in small town Canada and in rural Canada to leave their homes, their parents, their loved ones, their grandfathers and grandmothers to seek employment in the large centres where they may not want to go.

I had the privilege of attending a conference on this matter in Timmins, Ontario just a short while ago at the invitation of the Premier of the Province of Ontario and his ministers. The subject of the three-day conference was the losses in our communities of our young people.

Did this government take into full consideration the implications of adopting such an unemployment insurance system? Did it calculate the impact it will have on the seasonal workers in Canada who rely so heavily on UI payments though through no fault of their own? Was any thought given to the impact these measures will have in small communities where students will be driven to leave to seek employment elsewhere in this country?

What will happen to the small businesses in these communities which are dependent for their livelihood on the existence of that community? How will these small businesses absorb the extra costs of UI? Many of these questions and more obviously have not been addressed by this government, nor does this government want to answer them.

In closing, I just want to re-emphasize that this government is negligent in this area. It imposes its will on the Canadian people again. We realize more each day that this government does not care about our small cities, about rural Canada, nor does it care about our single industry towns. It certainly does not care about the north. It certainly does not care about small business. This government, by this legislation, certainly does not care about the workers.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak tonight on the revisiting of Bill C–21 to the House.

I did have an opportunity as a member of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration to spend some time dealing with the bill in its original form. As part of the legislative committee I travelled with the committee and had the opportunity to hear about Bill C–21, to hear from the people across Canada, from nearly 200 different groups that made representations.

We have also had the opportunity to hear some very eloquent and sincere arguments both for and against Bill C–21. The problem I have with many of the approaches taken by some of my colleagues is like trying to paint a picture. It is easy to do it if all the paint you have is black or white, but there is no issue facing the government today that is that simple. We are not looking at black or white. Surely these members have recognized that there is a need for all shades of grey. When we are faced with difficult choices and decisions to be made, there has to be a balanced approach. We cannot just advocate black or white. We cannot just advocate the simple answers.

First, I should like to cover some of the reasons I think that there is a need for the changes the government is proposing. Second, I should like to say why these changes are not only reasonable but in fact very wise.

Most people would recognize and agree that the need for changes to the UI act is readily apparent. Let us look at the demographics in the workforce in Canada. They have not stayed the same. If we think back even to when I was younger and starting out in the workforce, we see that the numbers of people who were in the workforce and the kinds of jobs and training required have changed dramatically.

Let us take a couple of examples. First let us look at the women in the workforce. Who would have thought 30 years ago that more than 60 per cent of the women in Canada would be active participants in today's workforce? Women's participation in the workforce has more than doubled in the last 20 years.

Who would have thought we would be approaching a time when the seniors of this country would be not just a minority, but in fact approaching the point where they could be a major segment of the population in Canada? What is surprising is that more and more of those seniors actually want to work. They want to work longer than our parents did in the past. Any system that we in this Government of Canada adopt has to be able to suit these changing demographics.

For the past 20 years we have seen a dire shortage of jobs for our youths. One of the most heart–rending situations you could face in Canada over the last 10 or 15 years was seeing well trained young people who wanted to work but who were having a very, very difficult time finding suitable jobs. Those times are changing. We are going to be reaching a point in time in the next few years where there will again be a shortage of young people qualified for the jobs required of them.

We have had changes on the job scene itself. Everyone recognizes that we have far more service jobs now than ever before. We have jobs that require high training. Some people have even suggested that there will be in excess of 30 per cent of the workforce requiring education past high school. Some 20 years ago this would have been unthought of. It would have appeared ridiculous.

The fact in our workforce today is that there is not just a need for training for high technology jobs. There is a need for retraining. Many of these workers are going to be re–entering the workforce in different ways which require different training. There is a requirement for this government to address those changing needs.

Then there is the recognition across Canada by a high percentage of the population. In fact in excess of 75 per cent of the people in Canada has indicated that the government has to reform the unemployment insurance system. They recognize that there are misuses and unfortunately even abuses in the system. These misuses and abuses require a reformed system. As a government we have to hear what the people are saying. We have to see what is happening to the system, and we have to make some of those changes.

The biggest message we have heard in this regard coming from industry, people in the workforce who are dealing with it on a day to day basis, is that we have to reintroduce into our unemployment insurance system an incentive to work. Many people who know the workforce and know the jobs are there are saying that we are getting dangerously close to motivating or encouraging people not to work rather than the reverse.

In talking about Bill C–21, unemployment insurance and any changes to it we must go back and recognize the primary reason for the unemployment insurance system of today. It is geared to those workers who are out of work but who are willing, available and anxious to work.

I think another point has to be discussed before we can reach any solutions in the reform of the UI scheme as seen in Bill C–21, that is the recognition by the House and by people across Canada of the need for restraint.

When the Conservatives took office the Government of Canada was using 32 cents of every tax dollar to pay the interest on the debt. If this government had not exercised restraint or had not taken the actions that it has, the interest on the debt would now be taking 50 cents on each dollar and would be fast approaching the point where it would be 60 cents and 70 cents. Nobody in Canada wants that situation to occur. It is not only necessary, but it is essential that we recognize the need for restraint and we exercise it.

Several speakers today have talked about the hardships we are imposing on our workers. I should like to make the point that the real hardship we could impose on the workers of Canada is if we do not get our debt under control, if we let the interest payment on the debt rise to the point where we do not have the dollars to exercise sovereignty in Canada or continue to pay the benefits to which the people of Canada should be able to look forward.

In achieving restraint in Bill C–21 there was the need by the government to recognize that it is possible to achieve more and spend less. Some people say that is ridiculous, that of course you cannot do that. Companies across Canada and the United States for the past 15 years have been finding out that in fact you can. Our search for excellence has taught us that not only corporations but also government should find it possible to be able to achieve some of the things that we need to achieve and still exercise the restraint that we know we should be exercising.

We cannot necessarily afford any more to do everything we want. We have to be able to make tough decisions. It is time for choices. It is time for us as the government to try to achieve a balance between the changes and improvements we want to see in the program and what we can afford, what the dollars will allow us to select.

The original design of the UI system was for short-term protection of workers who were unfortunate enough to find themselves out of work, out of the workforce and needing protection and some form of guaranteed income until they could get back on their feet. We still need that protection, and any balanced program will ensure that it is retained.

The more innovative part of Bill C–21 involves the choice between passive and active programs, programs that are going to address the real needs of the workers who find themselves out of work. Those workers do not just want their unemployment insurance cheque every week. Workers who are truly searching for and wanting a job would like to be able to find that job. They would like to have an unemployment system that will respond to whatever their needs are to ensure that they get that job.

The people who will require this are people my age, and in some cases younger, who have found themselves out of the work that they have done since they were young. They do not want unemployment insurance; they want jobs. They want their dignity back. They want their pride. That entails assistance. This government must be in a position to provide that assistance. Bill C–21 puts that flexibility in the system so that we can respond.

There are women, as I mentioned earlier, entering and re–entering the workforce in record numbers. In many cases they also require special assistance, orientation and in some cases special training.

We have all seen the tragedy of an industry that has had to shut down. There are unemployed people requiring special assistance. Whether it be training, relocation assistance, you name it, this government should be in a position to help them find work, not just provide the unemployment insurance dollars.

Finally, in making choices we have to recognize that there are regional differences in Canada. Not every one of our areas in Canada has the same job opportunities. This government recognizes that the differences between the various regions should be recognized in Bill C–21. Those who have more opportunities, those who are able to find work, should not expect the same levels of support as those people in areas of Canada where jobs are not as readily available.

The government has put together in Bill C–21 a good package, a balanced package, and a package that contains a lot of wisdom, for not only does it provide all the flexibility, all these improvements to the system, it recognizes that it cannot do it all alone. We all know the government cannot administer these programs totally on its own and do it successfully. It has brought in a good balance of private consultants or private firms that have a role to play in the employment scene created by Bill C–21.

Industry is going to be motivated and encouraged to play a bigger role. The communities are going to find that they are essential in the decision-making process under Bill C–21. Colleges, local as well as regional, will become involved in this process.

The bill has been put together wisely. We have travelled. We have heard what Canadians have had to say. We amended the bill. Now the Senate, which is supposed to be providing the wisdom and sagacity that we would expect from a senior House, has tried to destroy this delicate balance created in Bill C–21. That we cannot allow.

This bill was designed to provide work for people. We want a nation of working people, not a nation of people who lose their jobs and do not know how or have a government prepared to give them the assistance they need to get back on their feet and into jobs.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I think the member who just spoke described the government accurately as a government that does not know how to get people back to work.

I am standing to oppose the motion of the Liberal Party which is to amend the message to the Senate. We will be strongly opposing the message the government wants to send to the Senate, which is to get on with the passage of this very bad piece of legislation.

In the debate so far we have heard a number of extraneous points, a number of points which may have some bearing if we were examining a reasonably good piece of legislation, but we are not. We are looking here tonight at legislation which is bad for the people of Canada and which must be defeated before it leaves this Parliament.

An analysis has been done of the effect of this legislation region by region. I should like to draw the attention of the House to the effects on Victoria and Vancouver Island.

First, the average unemployment rate on Vancouver Island and in Victoria was 11.9 per cent in 1988. The number of persons receiving benefits under UI was 51,270. The number who will not qualify as a result of this bill would be 3,070. The number who will lose significant weeks due to the higher entrance qualifications is 4,430.

Accordingly, the total number of Canadians living in Victoria or on Vancouver Island who will be affected by this legislation is over 7,000; some 7,500 residents in our area will be affected by this bill. Across Canada, 519,877 Canadians will be adversely affected by this bill.

These are not the Canadians who are driving the third family BMW in Toronto or who are paying $300,000 or $400,000 for houses or condominiums in South Oak Bay. These are Canadians who already live for the most part on the borderline of poverty in this country. Most often it will be single women, single parents or teen-aged children trying to get their first jobs, or working Canadians trying to support a family and live on the edge of economic survival in the country. Or, it will be those in Atlantic Canada whose centre of economy has been ground down by the policies of this government and of the Liberal governments that have preceded it. We have a bill which attacks those on the margins of economic survival in the country.

It has been suggested by speaker after speaker on the government side that this debate is really about the Senate. I do not owe any brief for the Senate. In fact, I know a close relative of mine whose lifelong ambition is to be appointed to the Senate so that he could rise in that place and move its abolition, a sentiment with which I entirely agree.

In this case, the Senate is doing a service to the people of Canada by turning this bill back. It gives the people of Canada another opportunity to understand where this legislation fits in the economy policies of the government.

There are already 1.6 million Canadian youngsters who live below the poverty line. There are over four million Canadians living below the poverty line. This bill goes to the heart of the Tory agenda because it will add, not subtract, to those numbers.

We have to see this bill in the context of Conservative economic and social policy. We have now had almost six years of Conservative government since 1984.

Mr. Kempling: You never had it so good!

Mr. Brewin: My friend says we never had so good. If he would come with me to talk to the people of Victoria, or go around the country and ask people whether they have ever had it so good, he will get his answer.

The fact of the matter is that the economic and social policies of this country are a disgrace. As I sit and watch the Minister of Finance as he stands in his place virtually every day to answer questions about the country's economic policy, it is interesting to reflect on a book written in the late 1960s or early 1970s by David Halberstam entitled, The Best and the Brightest. This book described how the best-educated and best-trained people in the United States managed to get that country into the Vietnam disaster.

As I reflect on the government and those behind it, the financial wizards and the best brains in our corporate sector who persist in pushing the government along the economic and social path that it has taken, I must say that "the best and the brightest" in this country are leading us into a dangerous, economic situation. The complacency of the government, when it says that we never had it so good, in the face of the clear facts of housing shortages, unemployment, abuse, poverty, and cutbacks in social programs, is a disgrace. Let us look at what its agenda is.

First, reduce social programs. That is part of its agenda. Second, weaken the progressive tax system and change the balance in our tax system so that it favours the rich as against the poor and the middle income groups. It is a clear fact. Just ask the middle income earners how much tax they are paying now compared to the taxes they paid in 1984. Look at the facts of cutbacks in the tax rates and the opening of further loopholes in the tax system that this government has brought in. Now we have the GST, and it will not explain to a single person in the country how the GST is going to help the middle income earners. In fact, the Conservative chairman of the finance committee boasted that the only people left in the country to tax are the middle income earners. As for the rest, it does not make any difference.

The third element of its economic policy is the privatization of the economy. Fourth, it wants to set about the integration of our economy with the United States. Also, it wants to maintain unemployment. The previous member spoke about trying to reduce unemployment. It is a clear, systematic, intentional policy of the government to maintain unemployment at higher and higher levels. That is its economic intention. An article recently in The Economist magazine made that very clear.

Finally, it is part of the government's agenda to strengthen the position of the multinational companies in the Canadian economy. That has very clearly been part of the Conservative agenda and that is what it has put in legislation which it put through the previous Parliament.

Let us look at the effect and how the government done this with the particular steps it has taken. It had a so-called tax reform package in the previous Parliament which reduced the total number of tax brackets and particularly reduced the rate payable in the upper brackets. It reduced corporate taxation in the country. It eliminated elements of capital gains tax and the government has completed the Tory tax reform, or is in the process of completing the Tory tax reform, with the GST.

The second part of the steps the government has taken to implement its agenda is the free trade legislation. Over the last couple of years—certainly the last year-and-a-half— the government has maintained a high dollar which has had a bad effect out my way, for example, because a high dollar hurts tourism and exports. It has maintained high interest rates. That high interest rate policy is beginning to have a negative effect on small business, potential house purchasers, and unemployment levels. The high interest rate policy is not a mechanical policy that it is following, but an intentional policy of the Bank of Canada, supported in this House by the Minister of Finance and the government. The clear intention is to increase unemployment levels in this country so that, in their terminology, the economy cools off. When saying that, the government is speaking of the economy of southern Ontario and it is finally getting its wish in that.

Mrs. Browes: What would you do?

Mr. Brewin: What would we do, the hon. member asks. I guess the government is so bankrupt it now has to turn to the opposition and ask us what we would do. I will be advising the hon. member in a minute exactly what we would do about it.

Let me continue with the step-by-step Conservative agenda and how the government is proceeding with it. It has in fact instituted a systematic set of cut-backs on social policy and social programs in the country, of which this bill is a very important part.

It has placed no limits on private debt while attacking the social programs which are developed in the public sector. I can speak with some feeling on this. I am one of those Canadians who found himself in private debt, and debt more than I could handle. There are millions of Canadians who, without a qualm, get talked into additional debt by the various institutions in the country. There has been no Conservative control on private debt because the Conservative philosophy accepts the idea that increased private consumption is a good and systematic economic policy. The effect of that kind of overheated private consumption is to drive up house prices, to fuel inflation, to devastate our environment and to knock our economy out of balance. What do the Conservatives do in response to this? They turn around and cut public programs and social programs. That has been part of their intentional agenda.

The Conservatives really believe that a good society rewards the rich and penalizes those who are less fortunate than themselves. That is the Conservative philosophy. I give them at least this much, they understand what they are doing. It would probably be worse if they really believed that they were doing something for the good of the country. What they know they are doing is changing the face of Canada. They are changing it into a country which is even more beset with inequality. They are increasing the poverty levels in the country. I have here the figures of Canadians who use food banks. There are 378,000 different people per month use food banks in the country. That is an absolute disgrace in a country with our wealth. If the government had any sense of responsibility to the people, it would be focusing its attention on those problems, not on making the rich richer, as it has done persistently in every policy it has introduced since it took office.

We are faced as well, with an economy in which the wage levels have increasingly gone down in real terms for most Canadians. The kinds of jobs that the government has visited on the people are not the jobs which a Polar 8 project would introduce. I am pleased to see the Minister of Justice enter the House. She is now the senior political member from British Columbia. I hope she will take an opportunity this evening to encourage the House to believe that maybe the government is going to do something either to revive the Polar 8 project or at least to put in its place a shipbuilding program on the west coast that would provide the kinds of jobs Canadians need and are entitled to. That is jobs with some kind of economic future, which pay a decent wage, and which permit the possibility of a pension and of purchasing a home of their own. Instead what the government has done so often is to cut out those kinds of jobs letting them be replaced with part-time, poor-paying jobs in the service industry. That is the face of Canada for millions of Canadians.

The government has, in fact, continued and added to the public debt of the country and to the deficit. That too is part of the Conservative agenda. To say the government has not done it intentionally is to simply fly in the face of the facts. Not only has it maintained high interest rates which are a major burden on the taxpayers of this country, but in addition the government has failed to tackle some of the highest spending areas in the budget. In defence spending, for example, over $1 billion is spent in maintaining troops in Europe, long after they have served any useful military purpose. Now they provide, clearly, even no diplomatic purpose.

If the government would seriously attack the debt problem it would begin attacking those kinds of useless expenditures. Instead, it is maintaining those expenditures, not because they contribute in any way to peace, but because when it comes to the crunch, the government will do whatever is necessary to please the government of the United States. It has done so in its economic, social and external policies. We just have to look at the way in which the government caved in to the United States on Panama. It was the only government in the western world outside of Margaret Thatcher's government that had the nerve to support the breach of international law involved in the invasion of Panama. Soon we are going to be getting the renewal of NORAD. That is going to be coming before the House. Any bets on what the government is going to do about that? Of course, it will supinely reinforce the NORAD agreement and just put it through for another five years, without any consideration or debate in the House.

A few minutes ago an hon. member asked what our policies were. What we call for is a completely different direction in economic and social policy for the country. What we say first of all is that the underpinnings and purpose of economic policy must be fourfold.

First, we must ensure that our economy is environmentally sustainable. Everything must become secondary to that. We must now begin a serious, planned, comprehensive transition to an economically sustainable environment. We cannot afford to wait any longer to fulfil that objective and that must become the primary objective of government economic policy.

Second, and in keeping with that, social equality must be the objective of our economy. We can no longer accept poverty in the midst of plenty. We must ensure that every step we take makes this a better, fairer society, that the spending and economy we have will be addressed to that problem.

Let me finish by outlining the other two points very briefly. Third, we must ensure that our economy provides a decent living for all Canadians in which they have some worth and some ability to participate in the economy. And, fourth, everything we do must contribute toward the ending of poverty around the world. This is our program and we urge it on the House.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity, even at this late hour, to debate once again in the House the provisions of Bill C–21. I am glad to be able to speak to the very excellent work of the Senate in its review of these changes to Canada's unemployment insurance system.

I am glad too to be able to explain here and for the unemployed in my constituency who, since January, knew they required four more weeks to qualify for UI but could not understand why. I am glad to explain to them the purposes of the stand that we, in the Liberal Party in the House and in the Senate, have been taking in opposing this legislation.

On several occasions during the last two months I have been confronted by constituents who found themselves with 10 weeks but without the 14 weeks they suddenly needed after Christmas to qualify for UI benefits. Why could they not get benefits? They were told it was because the UI bill was in the Senate and they had to wait until it was passed. They would ask: "What is the hold up?" I would have to say that there was a principle involved. The principle had to do with the fact that this government was no longer going to be contributing to the UI program and that was going to weaken the program in the future.

They would give me a puzzled look and say okay and that they would be patient. But I never thought I was able to explain properly the consequences of the thrust of this legislation. In particular, the decision by the government to withdraw entirely its financial contribution to the UI Program and to transfer the financial burden of this program entirely to the fee payers. I never felt I could adequately explain why this particular change, which appears to many to be nothing more than a bookkeeping change, so dramatically altered the character of the UI program, why it is so dangerous to this most vital component of our social safety net and why I should prevail upon the indulgence of those unemployed in my constituency to be patient.

I am glad to have one more chance because the changes contained in this bill, in particular the changes embodied in the Archaean phrases of clauses 52, 53 and 56 of Bill C–21, in essence knock out one of the pillars of the UI program. They are the first step, I think, to the dismantling of a national social insurance program in the country. Bill C–21 is the thin edge of the wedge, to coin a popular expression. It is the first step down the slippery slope of privatizing, decentralizing and, eventually,

Americanizing the unemployment insurance system, of undoing one more strand in the subtle garment of national social insurance programs, national infrastructure, and equalization payments which hold the country together. It is philosophically linked with the free trade agreement, the abandonment of VIA Rail, other changes that have weakened our regions and weakened the country from one end to the other.

The current UI program, which has been in place since 1940, is financed by three partners: employers through their premium contributions; employees through their premium contributions; and the federal government through the Consolidated Revenue Fund which itself is financed by our taxes.

In 1989, for example, the government contribution was $2.9 billion out of a total UI expenditure for Canada of some $12.3 billion. The government contribution is more important than this share would suggest. It pays for UI benefits which arise from conditions of higher than average unemployment rates. When unemployment rates rise across the country, as they did during the 1981 recession, the share of UI benefit costs paid for out of government revenues rises substantially.

As well, in regions of high unemployment like Newfoundland, Cape Breton and other parts of Atlantic Canada, large portions of Quebec and northern Ontario, the west, and northern Canada, a large part of UI benefits comes from government contributions. This is because the weeks of so-called regional extended benefits—weeks of UI benefits which are related to high unemployment rates—are paid for from government general revenues. That means that for an unemployed worker from Inverness in my constituency, the first 10 weeks of his UI benefits are paid for out of premium revenues; the second portion, if he has enough weeks, is paid for out of premium revenues; and the third portion, often involving the largest share of his benefits, are paid for out of government revenues under the current program.

This feature of the UI program allows the federal government to stabilize the national economy by directing money through UI benefits to individuals in communities that need it most when it is most needed. This keeps our regions alive and it keeps our communities alive. It allows the federal government to contribute quite naturally to stabilizing the economy of the country. It is one of the pillars of our macro-economic policy and it is one of the pillars our our social policy.

In addition, the federal government finances UI benefits to self-employed fishermen. It finances these out of general revenues to the tune in 1989 of some $261 million. Why? Because the situation of seasonal fishermen and the communities they live in is regarded as unique. Again, the UI program is how the federal government is able to support a way of life in many parts of Atlantic Canada.

I would urge the members opposite to read the transcript of the Senate committee hearings in Canso. They should read the testimony of Claude Sangster, an inshore fisherman from New Harbour in Guysborough County, or Edison Lumsden from Canso, or Keith Lettington from Drum Head. They should read their testimony to see if they have any doubts about the importance of this feature of the UI program to our east coast fishery.

One of the fundamental thrusts of Bill C-21 acknowledged by the Government House Leader yesterday is, and I quote:

This thrust is embodied, first, in clause 52 of Bill C-21 which, by replacing Section 118 of the current UI act, ends all federal government contributions to the UI program including in particular the contribution to regional extended benefits. In fact, the concept of regional extended benefits and the financial stake of the federal government to lower unemployment rates through contributions to UI benefit payments related to high unemployment is ended with Bill C-21.

Second, with the passage of Bill C-21, the government no longer contributes to the financing of special UI benefits to self-employed fishermen. Henceforth, these benefits will be financed out of general UI premiums. In addition, as the Senate discovered, this entire component of the UI program which is hived off from the rest of the UI Act can be altered and, for all intents and purposes, abolished by a simple Order in Council. That is without even consulting Parliament. The government accepted the Senate's suggestion for not eliminating fishermen's benefits without consulting Parliament, but we can see the handwriting on the wall.

What will happen if Bill C-21 is adopted without the Senate amendments? Before saying this, I should say that one of the key Senate amendments which the government refuses to accept would bring back the principle of government contribution to the UI program, at least in part. This is one of the recommendations which would prevent the erosion of the program that we are going to see if Bill C-21 is adopted. Let me explain.

If Bill C-21 is adopted without amendment, the entire cost of the UI program will be funded by premiums. Employee premiums will rise from $1.95 to $2.25 per $100 and employer premiums will rise from $2.73 to $3.15 per $100. The Minister of Finance has fixed this rate for the next three years in the last budget in 1989. With the changes on the benefit side, it will be harder for many unemployed to qualify for benefits. They will qualify for fewer weeks and face higher penalties for quitting and a whole series of other changes related to the cut-backs in the unemployment insurance benefits amounting to some $1.3 billion.

I want to focus the attention of members on the evolution of the UI account. This is something which has received very little attention. At the current premium rate, the government has admitted that the UI fund, which is now in surplus, will move into a deficit position by the end of 1992 to the tune of some $3 billion, according to the Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration. Three billion dollars is more than one-quarter of the total UI expenditures for 1989.

How will this deficit be financed? Either premiums will have to rise or benefits will have to be cut further. It will be that or the government will have to kick in out of general revenues. But we already know the orientation of the government, so we can pretty well rule out the third option.

What should we expect? It would be a simple matter to jack up premiums for fishermen's benefits or cut down drastically on the benefits paid to them. The government has said it would not do this, but it can easily be done without even consulting Parliament over the summer holidays when there is no one around to oppose it.

Next, how about cutting drastically benefits that go into high unemployment regions like Atlantic Canada? That will save some money. We know that the government's business friends, who as employers will pay the majority of the UI fund, want to cut back on UI benefits. They want to make UI more like insurance and they can legitimately say: "Since our premiums pay the majority of the funds in the account, why should we not decide?" Can you blame them? Indeed, they might well ask: "Why does the government have any say in the management of the UI account at all?" After all, he who pays the piper calls the tune. This government has stopped paying the piper, so why should it call the tune?

Anyway, since UI is becoming more like private insurance, why not go the next step? How about turning it into a Crown corporation, or maybe privatizing it completely? Then we can start to see what happens. With no financial stake in holding a strong national unemployment insurance program together, one which stabilizes incomes, supports regions, and provides benefits to the hinterland regions of the country during periods of high unemployment, the federal government has abandoned one of the roles which it has had since the thirties as a principal feature of its economic management. It will enable the government to abandon the regions completely. That is the thrust of this legislation.

The next step is to let the quality of the unemployment insurance program benefits drop in order to have a level playing field with the United States. That is what we said all along was the ultimate aim as a result of the free trade agreement.

This is the agenda under Bill C-21. This is the agenda we have been trying to expose and which the government is moving towards with these changes as surely as night follows day. It is time that Canadians wake up and realize what is happening to them. It is time for this government to wake up and realize that it is dismantling the very essence and fabric of this country. That is what is happening with the changes to Bill C-21.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C–21.

The subject in a broad perspective, as I see it, breaks down into the following general areas of discussion. First is the role of the Senate in the rejection and delivery of this bill back to the House from the other place.

Second is the subject of premium changes and the withdrawal of the federal government subsidy to the unemployment insurance program.

Third is the area of increased training and the shift from support to preparation for re–employment.

Fourth is the increased maternity benefits, the inclusion for the first time of workers over 65 and the introduction of disincentives to abuses, misconducts and failure to be employed. Last is the general philosophy of the government in its approach to employment and unemployment and the introduction of the intensification of the work ethic in our country.

First, let us consider the role of the Senate. As has been said already this evening on more than one occasion, it was on November 6, 1989 that this House passed Bill C–21 and sent it to the Senate. It was February 14, better than three months later, when the Senate finally did report this bill back to the House.

It is not a very cogent demonstration of urgency, serious intent or concern for those who have suffered the loss of significant benefits from Bill C–21 which would have become effective during the first week of January.

The Senate heard 60 witnesses in 11 weeks, 54 of whom had appeared before the House of Commons legislative committee. The legislative committee heard 200 witnesses in four weeks. The serious intent and the sense of urgency and dispatch with which the subject has been addressed by the Senate left a great deal to be desired.

I think some of the amendments from the Senate being debated indicates that there has been some room for sober second thought. In the area of illiteracy, it is the kind of recommendation one would expect from a responsible Senate. I certainly speak with respect for the members in the Senate individually, although as a body I believe that their motives and their actions in blocking the bill is absolutely intolerable and unacceptable in our parliamentary system.

The Senate plan to more specifically identify the proposed training program is a reasonable proposition and one which the government indicates it is willing to consider and accept. The suggestion that the Senate would be empowered to rule on the efficacy and appropriateness of this annual plan is again absolutely intolerable and unacceptable in a responsible parliamentary system.

The suggestion concerning Recommendation No. 8 that there be a specific alteration to the bill with respect to self–employed fishermen is a reasonable and sensitive suggestion. It is also a reasonable and sensitive response by government that self–employed fishermen are not specifically alienated by the provisions of Bill C–21. In fact, it improved the original Unemployment Insurance Act in that respect.

I refer to the Senate and its penchant for seizing on issues such as this and on the free trade agreement. Fortunately, it caused a general election which the people of Canada took in stride and delivered a very profound message of support for free trade much to the surprise of the Liberal Senate. To confront legislation from this House in the manner as was done with the substance of Bill C–21 is unacceptable.

There is general support in many quarters for a Triple E Senate, elected, equal and effective. I think many more activities of the nature of the confrontation with Bill C–21 might cast a new meaning to triple E in being excessive, expensive and extinct.

The actions of the Senate in what appears to be an outright obstruction of a major bill benefiting those unemployed Canadians most in need, has been seen by many Canadians to be superfluous to the responsibilities and functions of the Senate in the exercise of a power that, while technically appropriate and technically legal, is traditionally inappropriate.

With respect to premiums, the federal government has been paying approximately $3 billion per year to the unemployment insurance fund, $2 billion of which is a subsidy and $1 billion as an employer on behalf of federal government employees. The termination of that subsidy in this day and age of relatively sound and buoyant economic times in Canada with a deficit of $30 billion constitutes an act of not only fiscal soundness and financial good management, but one that is sensitive to the realities of a self-sustaining fund which is doing very well and operates on a principle of regional equality.

The premiums used to replace the federal subsidy will come from those workers and companies who are in a buoyant condition, employed and active. The benefits of that program will continue to go to those areas of the country where unemployment is high and where workers need support and training. I believe that that is consistent with the philosophy of the government to turn Canada in the direction of paying its own way and of living within parameters that we can afford.

I certainly do support the withdrawal of the federal subsidy to the premium account and I believe the citizens of Canada will also support that initiative. Hopefully, the Senate will support it even though it is beyond their terms of reference because it is a financial matter. The variable weeks of qualification and duration of benefits are very significant. The transfer of a portion of the unemployment insurance fund from a total of $13 billion in support systems to a total of about $1.3 billion in training and re-employment initiatives and a remaining fund of about $11.7 billion for support, the variable requirements, while significant, are relatively reasonable. After all, it takes 10 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance. The difference between 10 weeks and 14 weeks in the course of a 52 week year is not a major stretch of the work ethic in this country. I believe we will see that this stretching of the parameters will stimulate initiative and will be demonstrated to have little consequence at all because the average unemployment is far below the extreme parameters contained in the old program.

The variable entrance requirement will result in about $800 million being available for transfer to the training and re-employment fund. I believe that the combination of the stretch to a higher work ethic and the provision of increased funds for training and re-employment to help achieve that work ethic is a balance that any reasonable Canadian will find very significant.

I would like to review the range of training and re-employment initiatives that those variable entrance requirements help to fund. The other portion of that $1.3 billion for training and re-employment comes from the elimination, reduction and moderation of abuses to the system. Many Canadians never use the unemployment insurance fund and fortunately never have to seek its benefits. Their only criticism is that the system is abused, that people have adopted it as a way of life and have found ways to live within it and that the raison d'être for it are ignored and misused.

The correction of these abuses will generate almost a half billion dollars to be added to the training and re-employment initiatives, going with the variable entrance requirements, totals $1.3 billion. I believe any reasonable Canadian will say that is a very acceptable and commendable change in the focus of the unemployment insurance program, to the modern ethic and vision that Canadians have today of our country.

I would like to review the list of training initiatives that this $1.3 billion will provide. It will add $65 million to human resources planning for work with industry and with non-governmental organizations. One of the areas I have heard mentioned is a commission on human resource development, one which would address the educational aspects of Canadian life and delve into one of the most profound areas of human resource development in addressing the future of our Canadian society.

Another is the addition of $100 million to the Entry Level Skills Development Program where the combination of private sector participation and federal issues such as employment equity would go together to improve the skills and capabilities of a great many Canadians. The Industrial Adjustment Service will receive an additional $15 million, doubling it to a total of $30 million. Employees will work together in terms of new technology in the replacement of obsolete skills and in retraining.

The Community Futures Program will receive an additional $50 million under the Canadian Jobs Strategy budget. This will help communities such as those we have heard of in the very tragic fisheries difficulties in eastern Canada. It will help communities to cope with their problems and will give substance and credibility to the Prime Minister's commitment during the last election campaign when the mandate for this entire program was put on the table. The Prime Minister said that Canada will have the best employment industrial adjustment program in the world. The direction of the initiatives contained in Bill C-21 are in pursuit of that promise and that supporting mandate that was delivered in the 1988 election.

Under Section 26, the unemployment insurance training program will receive an additional $350 million, the continuing employment option and training for displaced older workers will total $100 million. There will be benefits amounting to $40 million for people over 65 years of age who up until now have been denied unemployment insurance eligibility.

Consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in which men and women are eligible to work to the age that they desire and to the age they can satisfactorily perform, they will be eligible in future for unemployment insurance benefits and can participate in the program, both from a benefit and a premium participation viewpoint.

In terms of self-employment and entrepreneurship characteristics of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, there will an additional $45 million; $20 million to promote new entrepreneurial activity and $25 million for mobility assistance. The very significant improvements to the maternity and parental benefits portion of the unemployment insurance program under Bill C-21 will introduce new benefits worth $450 million, almost half a billion dollars in new support for maternity and parental benefits. How the Senate could hold up this bill for three months and let those benefits lay idle, I certainly do not understand.

If you total all of these initiatives along with some others I have not mentioned, we have a program worth $1.3 billion which is paid for from changes that improve the spirit and the substance of the program in terms of the work ethic and in terms of abuses and disincentives under the old program.

In conclusion, I would like to say that Canada needs to revitalize its approach to employment, enterprise, the changing realities of new technology, the environmental imperative, the developing world and to the more intense trading competition we face as a nation throughout the world. In Canada we have in our unemployment insurance program a safety net that is second to none in the world. Bill C-21 continues to keep it that way. That is important. It is something in which we all believe.

We want to ensure that that safety net does not become a way of life. We want to ensure that Canadians do not get locked into that trap and get captured by the ethic of unemployment. I believe that Bill C-21 accomplishes that. It points us in the direction of new work ethic initiatives, discourages abuse, provides for increased training and re-employment initiatives and provides the best safety net in the world, while at the same time, casting a spirit that does not make that safety net a habit of unemployment and perpetual dependence upon the dole which I believe all Canadians would abhor.

I believe in Bill C-21, particularly as it is introduced and as people begin to experience the qualities and the values of it. Hopefully the Senate, commencing tomorrow, will take their responsibilities seriously and approve the speedy passage of this bill to which all Canadians will give their full-fledged support.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-21. I would like to voice my opposition on behalf of many Canadians to the vast majority of the bill's provisions and in support of the Senate's proposed amendments.

This bill represents a beginning of privatization of our unemployment insurance system. It represents the undermining of the basic principle of the unemployment insurance system. The fact that most Canadians are not aware of the government's true intentions with respect to the dismantling of our system is unfortunate. The Mulroney government has taken a page from a book authored by other governments that act not for, but against the wishes and interests of those who put them there, the majority of the people they purport to represent.

This government rules by attempting to mislead the public. It attempts to obscure its real motives. In fact, it hires advertisers at millions of dollars to misrepresent the truth. The government actually justifies every action by painting it as an attempt to cut the deficit. What this government does not understand is that it can no longer take the economic ills that it created out on the backs of the low and the middle income earners and the backs of the unemployed.

This government is uncomfortable with debate and intolerant of dissent. It used closure at second reading and time allocation at report stage and third reading of this bill. Once again it has invoked closure to stop, to stifle debate.

Hearings were held across this country at a whirlwind pace, one that guaranteed that many informed Canadians, that many concerned individuals and groups could not voice their objections to this bill. We all know that the government feels such discomfort at the mention, much less the exercise of debate, of public hearings and consultation. It is because it is breaking promises, the sacred trust that it talked about so much during the past election. The government stifled debate because it does not want to be reminded of those promises.

The members opposite do not want to be reminded that in October, 1988 the Minister for International Trade called the suggestion that the government was planning to change the UI system as "complete nonsense". He called it complete nonsense that the government was going to change the UI system. Well, we have seen what the government has done today. It does not like to consult. It does not like to consult because it knows that people will say things like "You promised you would not do this and now you are doing it". People would ask tough questions such as why, why does the government continue to break its promises?

We all know that if the Canadian public had known during the last election what this government had in store for them, the majority of members opposite would not be here. We know this and this is why the government continues to break these promises.

If Canadians had known the Conservative rallying cry of unfettered access to the U.S. market was a hoax which would mean the undermining of our social programs and the principles of social justice which we hold dear, they would have turned their backs on the Conservatives as they will in 1992 for breaking these promises, or hopefully sooner.

If Canadians had known that the Mulroney government had planned to sell out Canadian farmers and to undermine our supply marketing systems, they would have turned the Conservatives out on their ears. If they had known that the Mulroney government would prove incapable of managing our economy, of protecting the Canadian fish stocks and the Canadian fisheries, they would have shuddered at the mere thought of putting these Conservatives back in power. If the Canadian people had known that the Conservative agenda for the country was devoid of respect for social equality and economic fairness, unable or unwilling to combat growing racial intolerance and regional strife, then the Canadian public would have ensured that the Conservative members opposite would not be sitting where they are today.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has stated that Bill C–21 will, and I quote "ensure that Canada is poised to take advantage of the future of unprecedented opportunity and to meet the objectives of competition, confidence, strength, sovereignty and compassion". I find it interesting to say the least that the minister would assert that one of her objectives for Canada was sovereignty and that somehow Bill C–21 met that objective. This bill provides for the elimination of the tripartite financing of our unemployment system.

In withdrawing the government's contribution to the fund, we would be eliminating from our system a practice which is used practically in every other country in the western industrialized world with the notable exception of course of the United States. What a coincidence that in fact the only country in the western world that does not have a system like this is the United States.

Bill C–21 is not about protecting Canadian sovereignty. It is about many other things, such as bringing about a social system that is in line with that of the United States, a social system that was promised to the Americans during the free trade debate. In fact, the real reason for this bill is because of the free trade deal. A commitment was made during the free trade debate to bring our social systems in line with the Americans.

When I hear the Minister of Employment and Immigration defend this bill, it is clear that this bill fits hand in hand with other legislative endeavours undertaken by this government, such as the free trade deal, GST, budget cuts to education, health care, social assistance, women's groups, native publications, the list goes on. Why? I do not think members of this side of the House have to ask that question. I do not think Canadians today have to ask that question. They know. It is because of the free trade agreement.

It is not that the Conservatives have no vision for this country, as we are sometimes tempted to think on this side. It is that the Conservative vision of the country, of what is right and good, is just so isolated from reality and from the minds and the hearts of ordinary Canadians that it is barely incomprehensible.

The Conservative vision of this country is shared by only a handful of Canadians. At election time the Conservatives get together and decide what will they say this year to get elected? They decide what is in their best interests to tell the Canadian public in order to get elected. So they tell Canadians, "We respect the UI system". They tell Canadians all sorts of other things and by golly, just after the election is over they say, "We changed our minds", or "We did not really promise you this".

Bill C–21 is a perfect example. After promising Canadians that they would not change the system and then breaking their promise, after cutting off public hearings and ramming the bill through second and third reading, then crying foul when the Senate insisted on hearing what Canadians had to say about this bill, people who wanted to speak on the bill. Do you know that there was only one group besides the government who voiced support for the quick passage of this bill? That was the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

As the special committee of the Senate on Bill C–21 has pointed out, the overwhelming majority of those who appeared before the committee disagreed with the government's contention that the bill would be good for Canadians. In fact, the overwhelming majority of people who appeared before the committee said that Bill C–21 is an attack on the working people of this country. It is an attack on small communities, an attack on underdeveloped regions and an attack on the basic decent foundations of our country.

I think Earl McCurdy from the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union put it well when he said that Bill C–21 is a classic case of blaming the victim.

The unemployment insurance program has been a cornerstone of Canadian social policies since 1940.

Since the beginning, government contributions have formed an integral part of this program. By contributing to the unemployment insurance program, the Government of Canada is acknowledging its commitment to the creation of full employment.

This is a government which is not comfortable with committing itself to the pursuit of full employment. It is no wonder that, with the free trade agreement, the fisheries mismanagement, the farming crisis we see in Canada today, this government is putting thousands of Canadians out of work. It is no wonder that the government wants nothing to do with accepting a financial incentive in the form of contributions to UI, creating stable, quality employment.

The government must know that its attempt to pass responsibility off to someone else is unacceptable to Canadians.

The government is attempting to pull out of the unemployment insurance program. Who has the government designated to make up for the $2.9 billion a year in shortfall? Employees, employers and the unemployed will have to pay this price.

Premiums paid by employers and employees will rise under Bill C–21.

Unemployment insurance will be harder to qualify for and benefit periods will be shorter.

As witnesses to the special Senate committee pointed out, once the responsibility for UI funding begins to rest solely on employer–employee contributions, there will be pressure to cut the program even further. The government has given up control over the unemployment insurance program. It is giving up the control it promised Canadians, a promise that it said it would keep and a promise, as with other promises, it has failed to keep.

The government is telling Canadians that they will have to pay more for less.

Try telling that to the workers in my riding who are losing their jobs because of this government's policies. The Prime Minister promised them during the election campaign that he would create the best adjustment programs in the world because of free trade.

Where are these adjustment programs? We are still waiting. This was another broken promise. He said there would be the best adjustment programs in the world after free trade. Nowhere have we seen them.

Not only has the government not introduced these programs, now it is backing out of the one program that is supposed to represent the government's commitment to the creation of employment.

How can it expect Canadians to believe it when it says that this legislation is good for them? They know better than to believe the Conservative government now.

In closing, I urge this government to accept, not just three of the Senate's proposed amendments, but to accept all these amendments.

These amendments represent the suggestions and the beliefs of many Canadians who were left out of the system, who were not heard by this Conservative government which cut off debate. I respectfully submit that the government should withdraw this bill and should come back again with something much better.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion that was put forward by the government House leader. While there are some ideas with which we can agree in the message from the other place, there is a basic conflict between some of these amendments and the total intent of the Bill C–21.

Our government is determined to do more than passively accept unemployment. We must and we will help unemployed people get back to work and make it possible for them to contribute to the growth of this country. Bill C–21 has been held up long enough. The needs it addresses are too important to justify prolonged arguments over some of the detail and some of the recommendations that have come forward from the other place.

The government has listened seriously to the recommendations offered by the Senate regarding this Bill C–21. And, while there are many concerns which all members should have about many of the suggestions in the message before us, some of the recommendations are worth including in the bill.

For example, we recognize the impact which illiteracy has on Canadian workers and on Canadian employers. The lack of basic skills is an impediment to further training. For that reason the idea in recommendation No. 1 is worth including in the bill.

Senators have said they welcome the commitment of the government to producing an annual plan which will show members how UI funds will be spent to train and to develop people.

In recommendation No. 4, they have asked us to amend the bill to ensure that the minister will provide specific details in this plan. It will do no one any good to create centralized plans which are too rigid or too detailed to respond to the changing needs. At the same time a reasonable level of detail should be provided. Therefore, the response which this government proposes to the Senate suggestion is a fair one.

In recommendation No. 8, the Senate has also asked this House to consider removing a subsection in the Unemployment Insurance Act which has been in place for almost 20 years. That subsection would allow the Governor in Council to remove benefits for self–employed fishermen from the UI Act at any time.

With the concern shared by all Canadians for the problems in the fishing industry, the request for added protection for these benefits is understandable. I think I share with all my colleagues on this side of the House, and indeed with all my colleagues in the House the difficulties that our fellow Canadians in Atlantic Canada are having. The message which this House will send to the Senate should accommodate improvements in this particular area. But much of the message that we are receiving back from that other House cannot be accepted.

We have been given a set of recommendations by the Liberal senators which do nothing more than tie the hands of the government. These amendments would force us to spend money we do not have in ways which may not be the best for the working people who are going to be helped by the bill.

The Liberals in the Senate seem to believe that the only purpose for UI is to pay people to wait for their old job to come back. UI is not a guaranteed income plan. We on this side of the House believe that UI needs to become an active program which invests in people's lives. Training courses, financial help to move to a place where there are more jobs and assisting claimants to start businesses are wise investments. This government wants to let the people get out of that unemployment trap.

The third recommendation from the other place stops the government from developing innovative approaches to getting people back into the workforce. It also offers new appeal rights to claimants which make the system far more complicated. These are examples of how the Liberals in the Senate are willing to play games with the unemployed.

When this government introduced the Labour Force Development Strategy, it did it to help both the unemployed and Canadian businesses by creating a better match between skilled workers, skilled employers and the skills that workers have.

Sometimes the things which will produce the best results do not fit all the demands of the UI Act. For example, if a person is starting a business, they are not eligible for UI. Bill C–21 gives this flexibility to make UI more responsive to today's needs by experimenting with new and better ways of helping the unemployed. That is what this bill is all about, being responsive to today's needs.

While much of what the Senate wants to do in its fourth recommendation on the government's annual development plan for UI can be supported, one aspect certainly cannot. The Senate wants the power to approve or reject that plan. No one in this House can seriously accept the need for such a new power to that place.

Their fifth amendment cuts back one of the basic principles behind this bill. It cuts back by relaxing penalties for people who quit their jobs without just cause, or who are fired for misconduct. In response to sincere concerns about the definition of just cause for quitting a job, this House approved the Minister of Employment and Immigration's amendments to C–21, to ensure that people would not be penalized unfairly.

Now the Liberal senators want to change our decision to strengthen the penalties for people who quit. The Liberal senators in the other House want to to send a signal to people that it is all right to quit their job because UI pays. We must reject this type of thinking. Enough is enough.

Recommendation No. 7 from the Senate would do one thing, but it would have a major impact on this country's deficit. Members will know the one message that has come clear from coast to coast, is: "Government cut your deficit and cut your debt".

Recommendation No. 7 would force the government to pay a large share of the cost of the unemployment insurance program with money that we simply do not have. No one can seriously suggest that the government should spend money on a program just because they used to do it. Yet the Liberals in the Senate are willing to see all the government's deficit raised by more than $1.5 billion a year for the range of amendments in their message to this House. Well I say, no way.

This government is willing to amend the UI Act to better protect fishermen, a group whose benefits have not been touched by this bill. It cannot be willing to go along with a scheme to play political games with the government's ability to make regulations.

The bill which this House passed was a sincere attempt to balance many different interests in order to improve UI in a realistic way. The amendment which the government is offering here tonight, in response to the message from the other place, is part of that improvement. However, we must reject amendments that increase the deficit. We must reject amendments that remove innovation from the program, and we must reject amendments that delay needed changes.

Let us talk now about improving training and improving unemployment insurance protection. The Liberals in the Senate have spent months claiming that C–21 will lead to destruction of the unemployment insurance program.

This is absolute nonsense and it is not true. Bill C–21 is designed to encourage more and better training of working people by the private sector. Bill C–21 is designed to use UI funds to create new opportunities for jobs and make UI a more active program. This is a major improvement over confining UI to passive reactive measures. But UI is still a program which is responsive to the different employment needs of different communities across this country.

The government has ensured that UI is responsive to regional needs. In areas where unemployment is high, the vast majority of claimants will not see any change in their benefits. We recognize that many of the jobs in areas such as Cape Breton and western Newfoundland are seasonal. For these people and for their communities UI is an important form of income support. For that reason people in these particular areas and in others with higher levels of unemployment will still need only 10 weeks of work to qualify for benefits.

The government has also recognized the special situation of self-employed fishermen. While Liberals suggest that the government is ready to abandon these people the reality is very different.

Another important change the minister has made will make UI fairer by extending UI protection to workers who are 65 years of age and older. Many of these people want to keep working and deserve the same rights as younger workers. That is exactly what this bill is going to do.

But C-21 does more than change some of the UI rules. It will implement labour force development strategy. Labour force development strategy is an important initiative of this government and will make a real improvement in Canada's ability to compete in the world economy.

An active UI program is one which does more than mail out the cheques to people who have lost their jobs. An active UI program provides chances for people to gain new skills. It provides chances for people to explore new opportunities which will help them get and keep better jobs.

The government will work with the private sector to improve the amount and quality of training which employers provide. We want to bring the level of training up to that of our major trading partners.

The government will devote more funds to human resource planning, skills needed by new workers such as improved apprentice training, and the Industrial Adjustment Service and Community Futures. With this money, the government can work with employers, workers, communities and help them better meet the challenges of a changing workplace and a more competitive world economy.

The Labour Force Development Strategy will increase the money available to train people collecting UI so that they can get skills needed for better and more permanent jobs. The strategy will also allow Canada to experiment with new and innovative approaches to meet the needs of the working people. By providing funds to UI claimants to become entrepreneurs or to move to places where more jobs are available, Bill C-21 will assist individuals and communities all across the country.

It is not always possible and nor is it simple to take the jobs to the people. People need to have the ability to go to where the jobs are. Unlike the Liberal senators, this government is committed to ensuring that Canadians have all the skills they need to be active players in a changing economy. Bill C-21 will make UI a more effective tool in meeting those needs.

People have always been told that the Senate was a place for sober second thought. Recently it has become a place for political games by people who can use their appointed status to frustrate legislation passed by a democratically elected House.

The senators said that they would set up a special committee to let people speak who had not testified before a legislative committee. Why was it that 54 of the witnesses represented affiliated groups and individuals who had already testified before the legislative committee? Why did the special committee in that other House decide to hear from the same list of groups who had opposed virtually everything that this government had opposed? Why did the special committee in the Senate ignore respected experts in the field of unemployment? I guess it is because they wanted to present one side of the story. They did not want an unbiased opinion. They wanted to spread scare stories because they are not really interested in a serious review of the real, positive impact of this particular bill.

The special Senate committee was also determined to delay this process as long as possible. This House passed Bill C-21 last November 6. The special committee of the Senate did not meet for three weeks after that. It did not present its report to the Senate until February 14. That is uncalled for.

Our Bill C-21 recognizes the needs of areas with higher unemployment rates by creating a table which makes the system simpler and fairer for claimants. But instead of passing Bill C-21, and our permanent variable entrance requirements, the Liberals in the Senate decided to delay the bill. The delay of this bill in that other House means that many people who would be eligible today cannot qualify. Canadians know that Liberal senators are the ones to blame for this. It is too bad because those people who do need the support, who do need the training, who do need the assistance and maybe the portability to go elsewhere and get jobs have been held back, absolutely held back.

It has been a pleasure to speak in the House because the UI bill has needed to be reviewed and it has needed to be amended for quite some time. What we are doing is giving flexibility, recognizing the needs of high unemployment regions. We are recognizing the concerns of our fishermen in the Atlantic provinces especially, who are going through some very difficult times, and this government will support them, absolutely.

The one thing that this bill recognizes is the changing needs and that this country has to compete with international global trade. If we are going to have the people in place who can meet our trading partners head on we have got to train them. We have to give them the skills and the tools that allow them to go out there and compete because I will tell you that this country is only as economically healthy as the goods and services we produce and the goods and services that we sell.

In conclusion, we want to modernize the system to meet the current needs and, indeed, our future needs. We want to make a more flexible system. We want to remove disincentives from the system. We want the UI system to function both as a bridge back to employment and an important income support system. We want to address the urgent national need to develop our human resources, including the young, the middle-aged and the elderly, to meet the needs and the challenges in the decade that lies ahead of us. These amendments simply do not address these specific issues.

I want to add my support for the motion that was put forth by the hon. government House leader yesterday and I urge my fellow members to do the same thing.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I sat here on Monday and listened to a speech from the new government House leader. He ranted and raved about the inequities of the Senate and he almost got apoplectic as he ranted about the subject. It was unbelievable. It was one of those performances one expects to see on the stage where one of the actors got carried away, but he got carried away with his own rhetoric.

Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to concentrate with all this yelling across the way. Anyway, what he did do, with all the ranting and raving, was to display what I can only describe as a profound ignorance of constitutional law and practice.

I think it is time that he listened to some of the reasoned arguments that we, on this side of the House, have put forward in respect of this particular series of amendments. In my view, the government House leader should have studied a little bit before he came into the House and started speaking about constitutional practice.

We know, however, that he is new, and we can forget and forgive. But I want to point out for my hon. friend across the way that this party got a new House leader about a month ago and a month later the former government House leader got transferred. He was turned into mincemeat by our House leader and I can only warn the new House leader for the government that he soon may be mincemeat as well. After listening to the arguments he advanced yesterday it is clear that he has a lot of learning to do.

I would like to turn to what he said. I could quote extensively from him but I would not want to bore any hon. members. I know it was one of the most tedious speeches we have listened to for a long time except that the government House leader went into orbit. What he said was some stuff and nonsense here on page 9093 of Hansard for yesterday. He said:

> If I may I will quote from a book by Mr. F. A. Kunz entitled The Modern Senate of Canada which deals with the period up to 1963. We have not had any political scientist look at the Senate since then and I can understand why not.

Those are the words from the government House leader. What an incredible speech, Mr. Speaker.

Let me read from R. MacGregor Dawson and W. F. Dawson's book, Democratic Government of Canada, Fifth Edition, revised by Norman Ward. This is the 1989 edition, by the way, so the government House leader will know that there are political scientists still writing about the Upper House, the other place in this Parliament. I would suggest he get them out and read them. He is the government House leader, he is supposed to know something about this. Anyway, it says at page 63:

> Whether or not the Senate has the constitutional power to amend a money bill has long been a matter of unsettled dispute between the two Houses.

If the hon. member had been paying attention, I said it was MacGregor Dawson.

> The House of Commons, relying on the British parallel of the House of Lords, has always insisted that the Senate possessed no such power. The Senate, on the other hand, has never accepted this in theory, and in practice has repeatedly made its point, even amending bills which have dealt exclusively with matters of finance.

This one does not, I point out.

> In these cases the House has often accepted the amendments, but has added the futile proviso that they were not to be considered as constituting a precedent.
> In summary, it may be said that the Senate, although severely handicapped, has been able to do some genuinely useful work. It revises and checks legislation sent up from the Commons—

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but there is a second book. I would like to read from Professor C.E.S. Franks' book—these are my own copies I should inform the minister—entitled The Parliament of Canada, published by the University of Toronto Press in 1987, another recent work by a political scientist of repute. I quote from page 193 of this work which reads:

> The activities of the Senate in its investigative studies and in its revision of legislation are a useful complement to the work of the House of Commons. In both of these spheres of activity the experience and competence of the senators and the freedom they enjoy from the partisan and other pressures of the Commons add a valuable dimension to their work. The Senate has been criticized for being a lobby within government for big business but it would be more accurate to describe it as a defender of the rights of property, a function which it was intended to perform by the Fathers of Confederation.

I could go on again to read further from this learned work, but if the government House leader would like to borrow my copy he would be welcome to have it at any time.

I would like to go on to the rules of the House because that is really where the minister had difficulty. Page 45 of the new Standing Orders deals with this Business of Supply. Standing Order 79(1) provides:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

From a simple reading of this rule, I suggest that if the bill in question proposes an increase in the charge on the public revenue, the royal recommendation is required.

All through the day we have listened to speeches from hon. members opposite saying how this bill saves money, it helps the government reduce its deficit; in other words, it reduces the charges on the public purse, on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada. If it reduces the charges then it does not need a royal recommendation, and yet it had one. Who put it on? I suggest that probably the government House leader had something to do with it and, if he did, I suggest he was wrong and he had better go and check the precedents again.

Second, he relied on Section 53 of the Constitution Act which reads:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

It does not say they cannot be amended in the Senate. It says they "shall originate in the House of Commons". Bill C-21 originated in this House; it has been to the Senate; and now it is back. It does not say anything in there about the Senate's power to amend a money bill.

The only place where the minister was able to point out something about the Senate's power to amend money bills was in Standing Order 80 of the House of Commons. He read it and he read it as though it were the Constitution. If you turn to page 9096 of Hansard you will see that the minister was clearly getting very, very confused. I think it is safe to say this minister is so far in over his head he is completely lost. After quoting Standing Order 80 he had the gall to say this:

> It would be in contempt of this House for hon. members to stand up and say that they do not care what Standing Order 80 says, they intend to agree with the Senate's butchering of this Standing Order.

Imagine a government House leader making a statement like that. It is unbelievable. As I say, his whole speech was unbelievable. Standing Order 80(1) reads:

> All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons—

We agree with that statement. This bill is not "aids and supplies". This bill is slash; cut, cut, cut. This is taking money out of the pockets of the poor in Canada, of the unemployed in Canada, of the people who deserve better from this government. This bill is a contempt of the people of Canada, not just of this House. In condemning the Senate for trying to help these people, the government House leader is showing Tory arrogance on an impressive scale.

Nevertheless, I want to turn to the rules relating to this issue because there has been a clear misunderstanding of them. I have here May's twenty-first edition and I would like to read some citations from it.

If the government House leader had been so concerned that these amendments from the Senate were out of order, why would he propose a message sending them back? If they were contrary to Standing Order 80(1), why did he not get up on his feet and instead argue that they were out of order and ask Your Honour to so rule?

I will tell you why he did not. He knew they were in order, yet he tried to pretend in his speech that they were out of order without actually saying so. He went through all this stuff and nonsense, saying that the Standing Order did not properly apply, that somehow it was tied in with the Constitution. He read every section he could find.

He got completely confused and obviously he completely befuddled every other member of the government who spoke on this subject because they have all agreed with the nonsense he spouted out yesterday, saying that the Senate was somehow acting improperly. The Senate has acted within its constitutional rights.

I suggest that any member of this House could have moved any of the amendments that have come down to this House from the Senate. We could have moved them at any stage on this bill, and they would have been in order. The government House leader knows that full well.

In support of that I would like to cite May's twenty-first edition. At page 713 Erskine May describes how it is that Parliament gets control of the public expenditure. It is sanctioned in two ways. I quote:

> (1) It is initiated by a money resolution imposing a charge payable "out of moneys to be provided by Parliament" which receives confirmation by specific enactment;
> (2) It is subsequently presented to the House of Commons in the form of an estimate which receives final sanction in the Appropriation Act.

It is our submission that the normal practice with Estimates is that they be presented with a message from His Excellency which recommend those Estimates to the House. Based on those Estimates, we grant aids and supplies to Her Majesty.

This bill, the Unemployment Insurance Act, constitutes a charge on the public revenue of Canada, a statutory charge. It is not granted. The moneys for payment are not granted as aids and supplies as defined in Standing Order 80(1) of this House. It is completely in accordance with British constitutional practice.

The Minister of Justice should be listening. She may need this lesson some day, in case within another two weeks she becomes government House leader because the previous one is going to be mincemeat when our House Leader get through with him.

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask for some order. I cannot hear myself think.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like to hear the hon. member speak. It is getting awfully close to the end of the day. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

Mr. Milliken: I will continue reading from May's twenty-first edition. It continues:

> Instances of charges imposed upon moneys to be provided by Parliament occur in abundance every session. The following examples may be given—Any proposal whereby the Crown would incur a liability or a contingent liability payable out of money to be voted by Parliament—Another type of expenditure, initiated by money resolutions, examples of which occur in the legislation of every session, is the imposition of charges to be paid directly out of the Consolidated Fund.

I could read plenty more on this. There is one other paragraph I think is very important and most instructive for this bill. On page 716, we see the following:

> No special form of procedure applies to proposals to reduce existing charges, and they may be moved in the House or in Committee without the royal recommendation.

Now that is a message that had clearly not sunk in for the government House leader. To continue:

A proposed reduction of a charge may consist in reducing its amount, or restricting its objects, or inserting limiting conditions, or shortening the period of its operation. The transference of a charge from the Consolidated Fund to "moneys to be provided by Parliament", i.e. its transformation from an indefinitely continuing to an annually renewable charge—may be regarded as an instance of reducing the duration of a charge.

The same principle applies in the case of amendments moved to a bill which abolishes or reduces a charge authorized by existing law. Amendments to such a bill, which are designed to restore a portion or the whole of the charge which the bill proposes to reduce or abolish, are in order without the need of a preliminary financial resolution.

In other words, we did not need a resolution on this one. The minister said yesterday that he had a resolution on it and therefore the Senate could not change it. I say that is utter rubbish. It is quite clear from the authority of Erskine May that one was not required on this bill in the first place, except for one possible argument. The one possible argument is that this bill in fact increased the charges to employers and employees while it reduced the benefits. A typical Tory tactic if I may say so: hike the charge and lower the service.

Tory times are hard times and everybody in Canada knows it. They are trying to cover it up by saying the Senate is to blame but in fact this government, by this bill, has reduced the benefits payable to the unemployed and it has increased the charges to the people contributing to the fund. It is a scandal and an outrageous charge to the people of Canada.

I want to turn to another point. If the Senate amendments to the bill were out of order, why did the minister not argue that they were out of order and ask Your Honour to say so under Standing Order 80(1)? Instead, he decided to lambaste the good people in the other place, distinguished men and women who have served their country and who have been appointed there to continue to give sober second thought to the ridiculous legislation introduced in this House by the government. I suggest that in this case they are trying to save the unemployed people in Canada from this mean-spirited government.

To help the minister further in this learning process which I think he has clearly demonstrated he needs to undergo, I should like to refer him to the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It will be found at Appendix A of the Senate Debates for February 13, 1990, at page 1101. In there the Senate committee did a very detailed study of the use of royal recommendations in this House and in Parliament in general.

I recommend that the minister have a good long look at that particular report because it explains very clearly how the royal recommendation should be used and it suggests improvements for its use in this House. Perhaps if the minister used it more often he would not tack it on to bills that he does not need to.

I want to give him notice that in the future I will be raising this point because I think there are bills on the Order Paper from time to time that do not need a royal recommendation. He is sticking it on there so he can argue that we cannot touch it or change it. That argument will not hold water because we now have the goods on royal recommendations. It is all contained in this report.

I could not leave the subject without dealing with my friends on my left. I heard the hon. member for Nickel Belt say that he was going to oppose these amendments. I had trouble following his logic, but he said that he thought the bill should be killed. Therefore he was going to vote against this motion because somehow he thought that might help kill the bill. I suppose it might, but frankly I think it is quite a useless gesture. If that is really his intention he should take the best he can get, and that is to get these improvements into this bill and vote for these amendments.

I think I know what happened. I know he has grave concern because of the feeling in the New Democratic Party that the Senate should be abolished. They do not like to be seen to be supporting the Senate. Of course in this case that is exactly what they should be doing, because the Senate is the one chance of salvation for the unemployed in Canada in face of government intransigence.

I should like to invite the New Democratic Party to join us in this regard. The trouble is that in listening to the hon. member for Nickel Belt one would have thought that there no other party had ever done anything for the unemployed in Canada except the New Democratic Party. He forgot that they have never been in office. We are the only ones that have ever done anything for the unemployed in Canada. This government cuts them back. The Liberal Party has always championed the unemployed. It has always done everything for the unemployed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milliken: The New Democratic Party has never lifted a finger for the unemployed. It sits here and bleats and yells every day and makes it sound as though it is their sole champion when it is the Liberal Party which, for over 100 years in Canada, has provided relief for people in need. The Conservative Party has never introduced one major social policy of any value. When it gets into office all it does is cut, cut, cut; slash, slash, slash. Social programs are destroyed in Canada by this government. We are here to defend the sensible policies introduced by previous Liberal governments.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say it is a pleasure to rise to speak on this bill, but frankly it seems, as I reflect over the last several months, that not only I but many other members in this House time and time again have risen to speak on it.

I must say I envy the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who has just spoken, not so much because of the profoundness or the wisdom of what he had to say, but because of the fact that he had a voice with which to say it. Nevertheless, I shall do my best to make a few observations which I trust will be helpful to this House in trying to make a decision on how best to vote on this very important measure once again before us tonight.

I look back over the history of this bill and I am simply amazed at the litany of times it has come before this House for discussion. Are we to discuss this bill interminably and never get on with any other business of the nation? I do not know what my hon. friends opposite are up to or what their aspirations are, but indeed I do have some thoughts which I will share, if my voice holds out tonight, as to what our friends down the hall are up to.

This bill has been before this House since June 1, and I hope that this is the last time that it is here for our consideration. I must ask: Who are these people down the hall who send this bill back to us so many times? Who are these people who have given themselves a mandate to disrupt the business of this country, who have given themselves a mandate to ignore and have fun with democracy?

We are told in the history books that when this country was created and the British North America Act was brought in 1867, the Senate was to be a place for sober second thought. I understood that the intention was that they would seek out some outstanding citizens, perhaps some elder statesmen, that these people would sit in the Senate, and that they would review the decisions and the legislation brought forward by the elected representatives of the people. This was some 125 years ago, before we had the same commitment to democracy that we have in this country today. The idea was that what would come from the other place would be wisdom, and not simply the Machiavellian actions of a bunch of hacks.

I regret to say that what we are getting is not contribution to legislation but disruption. I regret to say that they are trying to break the legislative process, and not build and contribute to it. What is happening in the other place is a travesty of democracy. I regret to say that I am one of those few who believes that the Senate could have a very useful role to play in contributing to the democratic process. I believe it should be, as my hon. friend from Calgary has just said, a place of important contributions. Unfortunately, I think they could well lead to the demise, the destruction, and ultimately the abandonment of that other place.

When the senators set up their special committee they said they wanted to hear the people who had not been heard on this issue. We heard from members opposite today about how the legislative committee heard witnesses in a hasty manner across the country.

I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I was one of the members of that legislative committee. We heard many, many witnesses. It is interesting to note that 54 of the witnesses that we heard also appeared before the Senate committee. "Had they not been heard the first time", I ask hon. members opposite who were there, some of whom are in this chamber tonight. Of course they were heard. Why did that committee from the other place choose to hear from the same people from whom we had already heard?

I submit—and it is with great regret that I have to pass along this observation—that there were Machiavellian tactics being thought up in the other place. I suggest that the objective in the other place was not to participate, to contribute and to hear what Canadians have said. Canadians in my part of the country are telling me that they want to see an overhaul and a reform of the unemployment insurance system. They want to see an end to the cheating and a discouragement of the cheating. They want to see incentives for people to seek out and take advantage of employment opportunities. They want to see an unemployment insurance system that is active rather than passive in the way it helps people find themselves useful and fair employment in society.

I regret to say that the exercise we are engaged in here tonight is not one that is necessarily useful and helpful but is a redundant exercise forced upon this place by the people in the other place in a highly improper and irresponsible manner. It is interesting to note that we have had other precedents where the other place has dealt with legislation on the unemployment insurance system. It is interesting just for the record to review the track record of the other place with respect to legislation.

I am reminded, for example, that in 1977 there was Bill C–27. The minister of the day was the hon. Bud Cullen. The government was of a political stripe somewhat different from that of the incumbent government in this country today. It is interesting to review the provisions of that legislative back in 1977.

We had, for example, a change from a flat entrance requirement to a variable entrance requirement. We had a reduction in benefit duration for some claimants, a reduction perpetrated by the people on the other side. We had authorization of developmental uses for unemployment insurance funds. What an interesting concept. They should read Bill C–21. They would find the same idea there, including the idea and the use of funds as income maintenance for claimants on approved training courses. What an interesting idea.

The entrance requirement was hotly disputed at a House of Commons committee. Time allocation was used. Imagine that, Mr. Speaker, time allocation used by the Liberal government of the day to effect speedy passage of the bill through the House at that time.

On it went to the Senate, this contentious piece of legislation presenting a lot of the same principles that are quoted in Bill C–21. I know you can guess what happened in the Senate, Mr. Speaker. I know that you expect that the Senate set up a special committee and toured Canada. It went to little towns like Canso, Nova Scotia to hear what the people thought.

Let me tell you what the record is, Mr. Speaker. It just so happens that the Senate received Bill C–27 on August 2, 1977 and reported the bill without amendment the following day, on August 3, 1977. Is that not a remarkable record to observe?

The following year we had Bill C–14 brought before the House of Commons, again by the hon. Bud Cullen as minister. This was a time when Prime Minister Trudeau wanted restraint measures brought in. What did the bill contain at that time? It is interesting to review the record. It contained higher entrance requirements for repeaters. Say it isn't not so. It contained higher entrance requirements for new entrants. Surely not in a bill introduced by a government of members opposite. It contained a reduction of benefit rate from two–thirds to 60 per cent. Surely they were not suggesting that the unemployed people on benefits should be drawing less money than they were before.

You are not going to believe this one. It contained recovery through the income tax system of a portion of UI benefits of high income claimants. Can you believe it, Mr. Speaker? This was in a bill introduced by a government of the people who now sit on the other side of this chamber.

At committee stage the government estimated that Bill C–14 would result in savings of $885 million in UI benefit payments. Is that not that a remarkable achievement? Now what happened to that bill? They did not wait until it left this place. It was pre–studied for three weeks by the Senate at that time, but rushed through the Senate, all stages with no amendment, on the same day as it received passage in the House, December 22, 1978. By the way, Royal Assent was achieved on that very same day.

What does one conclude, Mr. Speaker, about this history of behaviour with unemployment insurance legislation by those people in that other place? One can conclude but one thing, and that is that legislation in the other place is treated one way if it comes from a Liberal government and another way if it comes from a government headed by the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. It is an appalling and shocking form of behaviour. This question can be put: Does this government listen to the people? Does it listen to sound advice?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. McCreath: I hear my colleagues saying "yes", and they are absolutely, unequivocally correct about this.

This government has listened. It has reviewed with great care all of the recommendations from the other place. I am pleased to say that some good recommendations came from the other place. Because this government listens, some of those recommendations have been incorporated and are accepted in the motion that we put forward tonight. For example, we recognize the impact which illiteracy has on Canadian workers and on employers. The lack of basic skills is an impediment to further training for that reason. Recommendation 1 is worth including in this bill.

One could go on and speak about other changes that are there. For example, one that is of particular interest to me is the one that affects fishermen. In the eighth recommendation the Senate has also asked this House to consider removing a subsection in the UI act which has been in place for almost 20 years. That subsection would allow the Governor in Council to remove benefits for self-employed fishermen from the UI act at any time. With the concerns shared by all Canadians in the fishery, I think it is very appropriate that this recommendation should be accepted because there is no question that fishermen are in a very unique position with respect to unemployment insurance.

As a member who represents some 8,000 people employed in the fishing industry, I have some familiarity with the impact of unemployment insurance on fishermen. I find that people quite often ask me: "How come fishermen are treated differently from everybody else?"

The answer is quite simple and it cannot be repeated often enough. How come farmers and people in the forest industry are not in the same situation? It is for a very simple reason. It is because fishermen are self-employed. They are the only self-employed people included in the unemployment insurance scheme. The reason they are included is that unlike every other industry theirs is regulated directly by the government, and therefore fishermen are told that they cannot go and fish from time to time. That is why they have the special provision. It is properly there. It should continue to be there, and I am delighted to see that among many things this government has maintained that provision.

I could go on and speak on more of the recommendations, most of which quite frankly are nonsense and most of which quite frankly are clearly and unequivocally intended to do nothing but disrupt the business of the country, nothing but try to destroy the piece of legislation that has been brought before us. It would simply tie up the government and the country and continue to do what those people over there are doing right now, that is, deny the benefits of Bill C-21 to the people of this country.

I think this is an outrageous thing, coming from an area as I do where we are suffering fish plant closures, that plants are closing down and people are being put out of employment. What is the Senate of Canada doing for them? It is forcing them to have to meet 20 weeks in order to qualify for unemployment insurance. That is the concern that those people over there have for the people of Atlantic Canada and the people of the fishing communities. I for one think that it is absolutely and utterly outrageous.

What is their approach to unemployment insurance? What is it they are looking to have done? They seem to think that the only thing unemployment insurance should do is put people on a payout and leave them there until such time as their job comes back again. What happens if you are in an industry where your job is not going to come back again? What happens if you are in a fishing community and there is not enough fish and the plant has to close? The job is never going to come back. Do you just subsidize people forever? No. You have an active program that is going to help them find another approach. The whole thrust of this legislation is to shift from a passive to an active approach in unemployment insurance.

There are many points I have been wanting to make, but I will make only one last point and then I will conclude my remarks. There have been suggestions that this government does not have a mandate to do what is being done in Bill C–21. Nothing could be further from the truth or greater nonsense. Check the record.

Do we have a mandate? They say it was not a part of our 1988 platform. If they check the record they will see that the Prime Minister of this country promised the best adjustment programs in the world. I would like to say that with Bill C–21, together with other measures from the Labour Force Development Strategy, the Prime Minister and the government of Canada have in fact delivered on that program as best they can.

They have allowed us to move our UI system from passive to active, which is something that Canadians support. Interestingly enough, it is something Mr. Turner, the former leader of the opposition, supported when he was running for office in 1984. We have forgotten that and he forgot that. Do we have a mandate? Did Mr. Trudeau have a mandate for wage and price controls in 1974? I do not recall that he did. I remember him saying: "Zap, you are frozen" to Mr. Stanfield and I remember in 1985 that he imposed wage and price controls.

This government has a mandate. It came on November 21, 1988. That is the mandate that counts. That is the mandate that will be renewed in 1993.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a lot of pain to have to address this subject tonight and the rehashing of the worst attempt at setting back the working people and the unemployed in Canada that we have witnessed in Canadian history for a long, long time.

Yesterday, we had a delegation that met both with the NDP caucus and also with the Liberal caucus, representing not only the Canadian Labour Congress but a number of other organizations, most of them unaffiliated with that Congress. The delegation included Shirley Carr, president of the CLC; Louis Laberge, president of the Quebec Federation of Labour; Jim McCambley, president of the Canadian Federation of Labour; Gérald Larose, president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions; Kitty O'Callaghan, president of the Canadian Teachers Federation; Lorraine Pagé, president of the Quebec Teaching Congress; Kathleen Connors, president of the National Federation of Nurses' Unions; and Louis Lacroix, president of the Canadian Conference of Teamsters. This delegation represented in all close to 4 million dues–paying working Canadians.

Their message was very clear to both ourselves and the other opposition party, but that government that pretends to represent the majority of Canadians or the plurality of Canadians, did not even have the decency to agree to meet with the representatives of 4 million working Canadians. That is absolutely shameful, particularly when the subject at hand has to do with one of the most important parts of the Canadian social safety net that this government seems intent on putting the axe to.

Because the government did not see fit to meet and to listen, for the record I want to read part of the statement of those representatives, not all of whom have any strong connection with the New Democratic Party by the way. There are a number of organizations here representing a pretty broad cross–section of working people.

The leaders of this labour coalition opposed to Bill C–21 were meeting with the Liberal and NDP parliamentary caucuses to reiterate their opposition to this legislation. The coalition made every effort to meet with the employment minister and the Conservative caucus but their request was denied. They stated:

> Unemployment insurance is fundamental to the economic and social security of all workers; unionized and non–unionized, full–time and part–time, private sector and public sector.

In saying this, they were playing the traditional role of working people under the labour movement in Canada, of organized workers, in speaking not only for themselves but for unorganized workers from one end of Canada to the other, because who else has ever spoken for them?

We had challenges from the other side of the House today saying: "You are only speaking for the labour bosses, you are only speaking for those unions that are in the NDP's pocket", or vice versa as they like to put it. That is simply not true, because if you look back through the social and economic history of Canada, virtually no one outside of the democratic organized working trade union movement of Canada has spoken up for unorganized workers in every part of this nation.

They went on to state:

> Bill C-21 destroys many of the principles upon which the unemployment insurance system has been built.

That is true.

> Its most basic purpose—insuring workers against the loss of earnings—is seriously undermined. And the tripartite financing of UI by employers, workers and government developed over the past fifty years is destroyed by this Bill.

I suggest that the government knows that, despite all its prattling, because this bill is just the latest in a long series of economic measures that this government has taken, as did in many ways the Trudeau government before it, to try to push Canadian workers further to the back of the bus. It started with the wage and price controls in October, 1976. Real incomes of Canadian workers have dropped ever since then. There has been a continuous attack ever since that time by successive federal governments to put workers back in what those people over there and sometimes these people to our right seem to think is "their place".

Canadian workers have a right to expect something better of their governments whether or not they vote for them, because any government in a democratic society is supposedly elected to serve the interests of all of the people. To ignore the legitimate needs, aspirations and demands of some 4 million people, to give proper accordance to the security of their members and the people they are elected to represent, is fundamentally wrong in a democratic society.

The delegation went on to state:

> In addition to the $1.3 billion of cuts in benefits to unemployed workers, Bill C-21 will shift $5 billion of government financial responsibilities to worker and employer UI premium payers.

In doing that, the government paid no attention whatsoever to ability to pay, neither of working people nor of the business community. Not much has been said about that part of it, but a number of employers have objected to this bill for precisely that reason, especially employers in the small business community.

The entire cost of what is a social program and a social insurance program is now being shifted out of general revenue, that portion of it that used to be properly charged to general revenue of the nation, and being put solely on employer and employee premiums. Those premiums do not make any distinction as to whether an employer is running a profitable enterprise, an unprofitable enterprise, or a marginal enterprise. It is just one other shift away from progressive taxation, whether in the corporate sector or in the area of individual income tax.

The $5 billion of government financial responsibilities have been shifted to worker and employer UI premium payers. What constitutes that $5 billion? An amount of $2.5 billion of government contributions for UI extended benefits resulting from high regional unemployment will be withdrawn. This is an end to regional equity. How much of this entire attack on the unemployment insurance system and in a sense privatizing it by putting it solely into the contributions of employers and employees is a result of the whole strategy behind the free trade agreement? The exact promises that the Prime Minister made in the last federal election that free trade would not mean a destruction of the Canadian social safety net is obviously false. This is the first major attack in line with that philosophy and commitment obviously made at the time of the free trade agreement that we have seen.

Included also in this $5 billion is about $300 million of government subsidies for UI fishery benefits which will be transferred to premium payers. Fifteen per cent of UI premiums, about $2 billion a year, will be used to finance the purchase of training courses, resettlement, business start-ups, wage subsidies and other labour adjustment programs now financed from general government revenues.

What does some of that financing have to do with income maintenance or unemployment insurance? Training people is fine. It is laudable. We need better and expanded training programs in a wide variety of areas in Canada. But it is a totally improper charge on employers and employees to pay for education. That is something that ought to come out of general revenue, whether through the provinces or through the federal government. There is no excuse. There is no legitimate argument that can be made to have that financed totally out of employer and employee premiums. It simply does not belong there. It is bad social cost accounting.

The delegation went on to state:

> Bill C-21 will negatively affect a million unemployed workers. Tens of thousands who would have previously qualified will not even qualify for benefits because of the higher entrance requirement. And hundreds of thousands will exhaust their benefits months before they find a job because of reduced duration.
> The proposal to significantly reduce benefit levels and restrict the opportunity to qualify for UI will hit hardest lower income groups, people with short term or part-time employment and disadvantaged regions. It does not provide flexibility for individuals and specific occupation groups to qualify where employment opportunities are periodically weak for cyclical, sectoral, seasonal or regional reasons.

To those of us who come from resource areas of this country like the east and west Kootenays in the province of British Columbia, we particularly understand, and the people we represent especially understand, just how this bill particularly hits and hurts them and hurts the communities in which they live.

The delegation further stated:

The primary purpose of unemployment insurance has been and must continue to be the insurance of workers' earnings while unemployed or on training. The use of UI premiums to finance non-income support programs is a back-door tax on workers to finance programs which should be financed from general government revenues. Several employer organizations have publicly expressed their opposition to this misuse of UI premiums.

That simply reinforces the comments I made earlier and it is correct.

The withdrawal of government funding will also place the pooled-risk unemployment insurance fund in a cumulative deficit position.

We find it totally unacceptable that labour adjustment programs should be financed by cuts in benefits and benefit entitlements to unemployed workers who have paid premiums for insurance against the interruption of earnings.

With this Bill, the government has significantly weakened the principal labour adjustment program in Canada. As the major stakeholder we ask the government to withdraw this Bill. This Bill in no way represents the promises the government made in the last election with respect to unemployment insurance or labour adjustment programs.

That was not a long message that that delegation had to bring to Parliament yesterday and attempted to bring to the government yesterday and to the Conservative caucus. Surely, it is not asking too much that that caucus over there and the government that it supports should have taken the time to listen. Sure the members can say: "We have heard this song before". But it is like the Bourbons in post-revolutionary France. They forgot nothing and they learned nothing. If they have to listen to the same message over and over again in order to learn something, perhaps that is what they should have done. It is not too late.

We have heard a number of contributions to this debate that seem to suggest that when the Liberal party was in power with Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Pearson and Mr. King before that, and God knows how far back it goes, everything was hunky-dory for Canadian workers. We know, and anybody who knows anything about Canadian history, realizes that that was not the case either. Politics is about bargaining power.

It is interesting to note even though this party and its predecessor, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, have never held federal power, it has only been in those times when either we or our predecessor have been high in the polls or have come close to winning a major province such as Ontario, or held the balance of power in this federal Parliament, that we have had any significant progress in any major field of social legislation in the history of Canada. That goes back, Mr. Speaker as you well know, to 1926 when Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps with only two members held the balance of power. At that time they had a promise from Mackenzie King, the gentleman who said, "Do nothing by halves that can be done by quarters", and God did he ever prove it.

Somebody over there suggests that that is what it is all about. Yes, that is what politics is about to people who do not directly represent ordinary working people across this country, or if they do represent them, do not understand them and do not understand the kinds of problems they have.

There were two commitments made in an exchange of correspondence between Mr. King and Mr. Woodsworth at that time. One was that the government would immediately move to bring in a system of old age pensions. That promise was acted upon rather quickly. We then had to wait from 1926 until the end of World War II, some 20 years until, coincidentally, the CCF was leading the polls nationally across Canada and came within four seats of winning the Government of Ontario, when the Liberal Government finally decided they had better listen to the voice of some political bargaining power and finally act on a promise made in 1926 to bring in unemployment insurance.

There is nothing wrong in responding to the voice of the people as expressed in elections, as expressed in polls or however they want to express them. There is nothing wrong with that. But when you have governments that only seem to respond to threat and never attempt to lead public opinion because they want to do something that is right for ordinary working people, then there is something wrong with the democratic process. There is a time that politicians ought to lead, not just follow and not just buckle to pressure, even when that pressure is good pressure.

We then had another dearth after the immediate post-war era. There was bit of a lull, except that there were things happening in the provinces across Canada, particularly in the province of Saskatchewan, when despite fierce opposition, hysterical opposition from both Liberals and Conservatives, hospital insurance was established in 1947-1948. We were Bolsheviks, we were Commies, we were pinkos and we were Nazis. Anything that could have been a bad term was hurled at us by both Liberals and Tories right across the country, because we wanted to bring in hospital insurance, old age pensions, and these other things.

Now we have a Conservative government and the Prime Minister has stated: "If we get a second term, you will never recognize this country". Well, they got their second term. If they continue to get through measures like the one that is now before us and other ones that we have seen in the last four or five years, particularly in the last year and a half, this country will be unrecognizable, but it will not be the better for it.

After that period, we then moved on into the period of Mr. Diefenbaker. He did some worthwhile things. Much more than a Conservative, Mr. Diefenbaker was a western populist. All you have to do is look at the record and see how much time the best known Conservatives across the country spent in trying to shove a knife into his back. But he did listen and he did manage to implement and put in place nationally what the province of Saskatchewan had pioneered earlier.

We then had the minority Pearson years. We had medicare then again established, which was pioneered by Tommy Douglas and the NDP in the province of Saskatchewan, despite Liberal attempts to kick down the door of the legislatures, and fierce opposition from the Conservatives. Everybody got into the name-calling phase again.

Now we have a Conservative government in its second term that seems determined to try to move working people once again to the back of the bus, and entrench in a free trade agreement and in other ways, a right-wing reactionary agenda, which if it is successful, will put this country on the back roads for a long, long time. We do not intend to support that kind of action and we will do everything we can to stop it.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to address Bill C-21 again, and I hope for the last time. First, to give you some advance notice, I want to speak rather briefly on this so as to allow my hon. colleague from Wetaskiwin some time before the vote this evening, I will not be taking the full 20 minutes and I hope those who are following me will extend the same courtesy to my colleague.

The delay in the Senate, which I am sure you have heard referred to many times before as being an unelected and unaccountable body, has resulted in this matter being placed before us in a most unacceptable fashion. At the risk of breaking the heart of someone who might be listening, I might tell you that I have had many mothers-to-be calling me and asking: "When is this bill going to be passed? I am currently employed outside of the home. I am looking for some help that this bill will give me. I know it is a positive thing; it will provide me with an opportunity to raise my family for the length of time that is required as an appropriate period and one that will get our children off and running to a good start and one that will not require institutionalized care at an early stage when children require love, affection and have the desire to be held".

Therefore, there are many people out there who are non-politically aligned and who are looking at this bill with a great deal of anticipation. I encourage all members in this House to respect their wishes, to respect the wish to the natural mother and to respect the fact that this is a matter that is being placed in our hands and subsequently in the hands of the public in the form of a bill that requires only the understanding and good common sense of that other body and I hope that it does respond in a positive sense.

In taking the time to prepare a few comments about the subject before us, I could not help but observe that perhaps an understanding of what unemployment insurance is might be of some benefit to those who are debating the bill, some benefit to those who have questions with respect to some of the garbage that has been floating aloft in an attempt to grasp the inattentive with the thought that they might succumb to perhaps a distorted view of some in this House. I want to say that unemployment insurance is very simply a scheme, a plan, an endeavour whereby the employer and the employee get together, by way of an agreement, and insure the fact that once the employee's labour should no longer be made available to the employer, that the employee would be the recipient of some funds that would provide a lifestyle which is deemed by society to be generally acceptable, given the circumstances.

Beyond that, and this bill does provide, and the government has said many times, that should there ever be the necessity to have the government step in and fill in the void caused by an emergency situation which has caused the unemployment insurance pool to dry up, the government will be there. I think that that is the role of the government. The government is there to ensure that if you slip and fall, it is there to pick you up. But, I do not think it is a government's role to tie a leash around your neck and drag it behind you to suit its own political agenda. I cannot concur with that at all. Government should be there to encourage people to be self-motivated rather than having the government pour its own agenda into the mind of humanity and expect humanity to follow it.

The government's responsibilities indeed go as far as Bill C-21. In fact, they go much further than that. Many of my colleagues have made reference not only to the two or three amendments to which the other place has made reference that are deemed to be acceptable but it also goes beyond the simple up-front issues to the more gut-wrenching issues of trying to run a country with a social conscience on one hand, and with a budget on the other hand. There is a mentality which suggests that one can ignore what programs cost, just be up front, be first to commit yourself as a government body or as a political body in the pursuit of a social good, and damn the financial consequences.

Sooner or later you get to a point where future generations are faced with the consequences that I think are placed before us right now. There have been some political parties which have said that they were the first in developing a medicare plan. I understand that medicare has progressed rather rapidly to the point where the city of Regina, some very few short years ago possessed not one CAT-scan machine. We did find that our citizens had to go to Edmonton and to Saskatoon. Finally, the city of Regina obtained a CAT-scan machine. One CAT-scan machine was not good enough. We now have three CAT-scan machines. Three times as many CAT-scan machines as we need, but nevertheless because they are available now, in order to get a proper physical in the city of Regina, you must go and get a complete CAT-scan. If you do not like that doctor's opinion you simply go to another doctor and get another CAT-scan. I do not know how much these machines cost but I am told they are in the millions of dollars. Where is the logic attached to this? Who would dare run on the political platform that we have got too many CAT-scan machines. The simple truth of the matter is that in consultation with specialists in our city we have simply oversupplied in that particular medical commodity. I am not being a medical specialist. I do not know where that all ends.

Yes, socialism running rampant at election time is likely to get you some public support. But on the other hand, once in power how does one pay for all these things? How does one pay for all these so-called benefits that simply take a nod of the head and it is there— we can afford anything. We have this magical machine in the basement of this building that not only pumps out brand new dollar bills, but it pumps out more gold than you and I could ever spend.

The bill before us does address some specific issues that I would like to make reference to, if I have time. They do enter into the area of youth and as well social assistance recipients, just to pick out two of the items of the bill because the bill is rather lengthy and I know others have spoken to it. Given the series of facts, and there are some three or four pages of facts that deal with the plight of youth in our system and deal with the fact that we have a high school drop-out situation that is not tolerable, given the fact that youth are currently entering into the market-place and not properly trained and equipped for a lot of the jobs that the industrial sector requires of them, it is our goal, through the funding that we hope to raise through this bill, to provide for some additional training.

The same thing holds true for social assistance recipients. I have to relate a fact to you, Mr. Speaker. When I was the Mayor of Regina—you may not believe this but this actually happened—we and the provincial government plotted in an attempt to exploit the funds available to us through the unemployment insurance program. We took some city money, some provincial money, took someone off the welfare roll and said we are going to make work for you so that you can work long enough so you can go on unemployment insurance and collect pogey and rip off the federal system. We are in this governmental system to make sure that those kinds of slippages, or those attempts to rip the system off in fact deplete themselves. We are responsible to the Canadian taxpayer and to the tax dollar to ensure that the benefits that Canadians have elected us to provide for them remain to be a goal that they can attain.

I would like to conclude at an early time to allow my friend from Wetaskiwin to have the floor. I know he has worked many long minutes in preparing a full 20 minute dissertation that I am sure you and the House of Commons would dearly like to listen to. I will conclude by thanking you for the opportunity that I have had to address Bill C-21.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to review this bill in the sense of its stand with the Canadian constitution. Our friends opposite and the government are calling this a finance bill. It is not. My hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands made that abundantly clear earlier this evening.

In 1937, the Rowell commission report outlined the of fairness of the division of financial responsibility between the federal government and the provinces. They did that because during the depression years of the thirties some provincial governments went broke because they were incapable of looking after the unemployed and those who required social payments.

When this report was brought in, an amendment to the BNA was necessary. It is very interesting to note that that amendment was brought in in the summer of 1940 and passed through this House of Commons. At that time, the amendment became 2(A) of the BNA of 1940. It was added on to Section 91 of the BNA and Section 1 was amended by inserting thereafter Item 2 following the regulation of trade and commerce and 2(a) simply became unemployment insurance.

Let us look at what that really meant. In the distribution of those powers it meant the prevention and relief of unemployment. This is a section from the Rowell-Sirois Commission report. They were two very distinguished judges, and there were others working on it. This was one of the most intensive studies ever undertaken by any royal commission that we have had in this country on financial divisions between the provinces and the federal government.

I want you to realize that this report encompassed the whole country in those days. The provinces were in terrible financial straits because they carried the burden of the unemployed. They carried the burden of those who needed assistance during those Depression years, without having the financial capability to pay for it.

In the introduction of the Rowell-Sirois Commission report, under the heading "Prevention and Relief of Unemployment as a Federal Responsibility" this is what those esteemed judges said: "The assumption of responsibility by the Dominion of Canada for relief or aid of unemployed employables would entail: (1) Complete financial responsibility."

I repeat for the members on the government side that in 1940 this meant complete financial responsibility by the federal government of this country. Under the second item they were to take over full control of its administration. For efficient administration, it would also be essential to do the following: that the Dominion define employability for purposes of administering unemployment aid.

I maintain that what this government is saying to the employers of this country and to the workers of this country is this: "We are no longer going to pay one red cent towards unemployment insurance programs in this country; you are going to pay your own. You small businessmen out there, you are going to have to pay more to keep up the unemployment insurance fund. You people who are working daily are employed and you are going to have to pay more to help out the others. This is a federal government of cheap skates. We are not going to put up a single red cent towards the program". The government calls that efficient administration.

Here are some of the other recommendations: that the Dominion have full control of administration of employment aid; that a national employment service be established and administered by the Dominion without prejudice to the right of the province to continue or develop an employment service of its own; and that the Dominion be empowered to establish a system of compulsory unemployment insurance. Again, that refers to the federal government. I want to repeat that this was done in order to take some of the financial burden off the provinces which, obviously, could not afford it.

There is another thing that is very realistic in this whole deal. In the same Rowell–Sirois Commission report one of the recommendations and one of the understandings was that the provinces of this country would have the field of direct taxation to themselves. What is this federal government doing to the provinces today? It is entering into the direct taxation field. That is why you have double taxation.

The GST is going to become double taxation. The GST is a form of direct taxation. The government is robbing the provinces of this country of their basic constitutional right.

The Minister of Justice should listen to this because she is going to be reading it in the days ahead. In fact, she will be reading the history of how the government that she belongs to right now tore down the unemployment insurance system in this country and dumped the burden on to the provinces of this country. Even the Minister for Privatization before a legislative committee one day said to me that the provinces are getting off too light. He said that they should have some debt, too. Because you have good administration, because you are basing your government on the division of financial powers given to you by a royal commission in this country, you must see that this constitutional responsibility has been in the hands of the federal government for 50 years this coming July.

You are giving up that constitutional responsibility. You are backing away. You are not going to accept your responsibility. You did the same thing in the field of medicare. What did you do? You dumped on to the provinces post–secondary education. Then you had the gall as the government to come forward and say that you are going to train people for another job. Is that not wonderful? You are going to train people for another job but you are taking money away from the provinces when it comes to post–secondary education, which simply proves that you are not all that committed to education at all. What reason do the workers of this country have to think that you are going to deal with them any better under this legislation?

Let us get from the provincial governments down to the municipalities and what effect this bill will have on them. You are going to have the welfare system in full tow at the provincial level because people are not going to get unemployment insurance for the periods that they need it. They are going to have that long waiting period for it. What if someone quits his job? Who is going to clarify why they quit and whether they were justified in doing it? Are you going to force them to work under cruel conditions, under mean conditions, and if they decide to quit their job you are going to take away their unemployment insurance? You are going to put those people on the doorsteps of every municipality across this country.

Here is something else that the royal commission report said 50 years ago. It should benefit this government today. "Nothing in the history of Canadian government has contributed more to the breakdown of public finance, or has been productive of greater waste in the economy than the attempt to hold local governments primarily responsible for unemployment as well as for relief". That was said just a little over 50 years ago.

This government belongs back in the early thirties. At the rate it is going it will put this country back into a recession. You are going to have this same situation all over again where provincial governments and municipalities are not going to be able to afford this.

If the municipalities are loaded with that financial burden, who is going to pay the tax bill? It is going to be the real estate people right in that municipality, the home dwellers, the small businesses, the factories, John Q. Public who buys a new home. They are going to be charged extra taxes. Your local taxes will go sky high to pay your welfare bills. That will be the inheritance of this government, and that will be the inheritance of you also.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hopkins: You can shout. You are always much better at speaking from the seat of your pants than you are from the soles of your feet—much better.

The province or the municipality is not a convenient authority for spreading the risks of unemployment over a term of years by insurance methods or otherwise. This is another quotation from the Rowell–Sirois Commission report: "It leads to debt of the provinces. It leads to debt of the municipality and the loss of financial independence, becoming in effect a ward of the Dominion". Who would ever want to become a ward of this government?

• (0040)

Their Honours went on to say: "So long as the responsibility for unemployment rests with the provinces, Canada will be unable to eliminate the unavoidable economic wastes and social consequences of mass unemployment".

This government thinks that it is going to get away with this. It is not. There is going to come a time when the chickens are going to come home to roost.

This government has the fantastic idea that it is going to train everybody, and it is going to put them back to work. That is great. We have training programs in this country right now that are working extremely well. It is not to the credit of this government that they are working.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I cannot hear the hon. member, and I would like to hear what he has to say. The hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I have known you for a number of years, and I never wanted to let on that these people were bothering me at all because I do not want this group across the way to leave this House at 1.30 this morning as uninformed as they were when they came into it this morning. They have to learn something, but they are not open to learning.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I knew that you would be very fair–minded and that you would come into play here and try to quiet this gang down because it is not very often I get them upset. They certainly are upset today.

The Minister for International Trade has done nothing about the softwood lumber problem in this country. There is a 15 per cent export tax in place. You are destroying one–industry towns in this country. Yet the government is going to train those people. What is it going to train them for? There is no other industry there. This is the price that people across this country paid for free trade. The government brought this in so it could get a deal, that is precisely what it did. As a result, it is creating unemployment in the lumber industry in this country.

The government is destroying one–industry towns. What it is actually saying to those people is: "We are going to train you". But the government cannot train them because there is no other job left there. What it is telling them is: "Leave your community. Leave your home that you have paid for. Move away. There is nothing there for you. Go into Toronto where you cannot afford to pay rent. Maybe you will get a place 80 miles outside Toronto". That is what is happening with this government today. There are people driving 150 miles a day to work because they cannot afford to live in the city. Are these the people that the government is going to train? Why does it not give some support to small town Canada, for example, and keep people living in places where they can afford to live?

I know I just have a few minutes left. I think that these people have not listened too well along the way. What we are seeing on the floor of the House today is the downgrading of a very important measure that was put in place to bring stability to the financial structure of federal–provincial relations in this country.

This government, in this bill, by reneging on $2.9 billion to support the fund, by reneging on the very Constitution of this country, is destroying federal–provincial financial relations. It is doing it another way. It is doing it by passing the debt on to the provinces of this country. Imagine a minister of the Crown saying: "The provinces do not have enough debt in this country. They have to share a bigger part of the burden". Imagine a minister of the Crown saying that within the last few months.

He said that after the Minister of Finance stated in August, 1984: "We are not going to cut the deficit by raising taxes. We are going to cut the deficit by cutting government programs". We know the Prime Minister's promises. We have heard them for the last number of years. The Prime Minister promised the poor Minister for International Trade that he was not going to touch the unemployment insurance fund. That is exactly what he said.

Not only is this government destroying the financial fabric of federal-provincial relations in this country—and you can include the municipal doorsteps in that as well since that is where this problem of the unemployed is going to end up—it is also destroying trust and integrity in government. I say that because the government is making promises that it has no intention of keeping. The government just keeps on telling people what it is going to do and then turns around and does the very opposite. John Q. Public in this country will have an accurate reading of what the Prime Minister says, if he listens to him carefully, and then realizes he is going to do the opposite.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your patience and I want to thank you for the opportunity to try on behalf of the opposition to give the people across the way something useful to take home, instead of the prejudiced, downgrading, penny-pinching ideas that they put before this House today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House this evening to support the motion put forward by the government House leader.

Bill C-21 has been held up unnecessarily at the cost of the economically deprived, unemployed citizens of Canada. We must not delay this any further. I urge this House to support the motion.

Bill C-21 as presented in this motion will improve aspects which are fundamental to deal with the problem of unemployment in this country. It provides provisions for youth, provisions for training, provisions for older workers, provisions against abuse and other initiatives.

I wish to concentrate my comments on these very salient aspects which must be addressed in order to get the unemployment situation under control.

Bill C-21 does more than just change the rules, as other members have said tonight. It is an active program which provides opportunities for people to gain new and more permanent employment.

We support the minister's Labour Force Development Strategy that will be implemented by Bill C-21. Indeed, an important element in any employment strategy is to aim to train non-workers for the jobs available today and tomorrow. This is the initiative of this government. It will make a strong improvement in Canada's ability to compete in the world economy.

The Labour Force Development Strategy includes the examination of the private sector to improve the amount and quality of training which employers provide. More funds will be devoted to human resource planning skills needed by new workers, such as improved apprentice training, the industrial adjustment service and community futures.

With this money the government can work with employers, workers and communities to help them better meet the challenges of today and to predict the needs of the workplace for tomorrow. All in all, this will result in nothing less than a positive step to make Canadians more competitive in a global setting by securing permanent jobs for Canadians.

On youth, the Labour Force Development Strategy incorporates key labour market facts, and this is seen in its approach toward youth. Studies show that the demand for highly skilled workers will rise dramatically. Of all jobs created between 1986 and the year 2000 it is projected that 64 per cent will require more than 12 years of education and training. Almost half of these new jobs will require more than 17 years of education. Occupations which require lower levels of education and training will represent a declining share of employment growth. To address these facts, the government is proposing an entry-level training program. At maturity it will benefit 40,000 to 50,000 participants a year. Many of the beneficiaries will be young people making the transition from school to work occupations outside of those currently covered by apprenticeship training. For example, financial and business management, computer programming, child care, hospitality and other service sector job areas are possible candidates for this program. Furthermore, there will be extensive consultations with industry, business, labour and interest groups, prior to any decisions regarding the design of entry-level training programs.

Another area of concern to be addressed is the apprenticeship program. Although it is a good model for providing many necessary skills, there are problems with the present system. First, women are not getting a chance under the present arrangements. Only 3 per cent of apprentices are women and they are concentrated in such traditional trades as hairdressing and cooking. Outside those trades, the figure is a mere 1 per cent.

Second, there is as high dropout rate of 50 per cent. These are clearly unacceptable statistics and there must be action taken to rectify the problem. Through the implementation of Bill C–21, we can address this situation. Industry, labour and provinces will be consulted to get a plan of action accepted to remedy the problems with current apprenticeship systems.

It is imperative that governments and industry work together to ensure that this large investment in skills training is relevant to today's needs and is delivered in a cost–effective and efficient manner.

With respect to older workers, the recent demographic study by Health and Welfare Canada clearly indicates that there is a definite age shift and more and more seniors are staying in the workforce. Government programs must reflect society and Bill C–21 aims to do this. Under Bill C–21, the UI protection will be extended to cover all workers, regardless of age. As other members have said tonight, it is also clear from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that workers cannot be discriminated against on the basis of age. Furthermore, these individuals have much to contribute to business in Canada. Bill C–21 eliminates this discrimination in UI.

In addition, the newly targeted income support and training funds will provide increased training opportunities, essential to ensuring the adjustment of displaced older workers. The stable employment and long job tenure of displaced older workers means that they often have skills unique to the firms in which they have worked. The new Labour Force Development Strategy complements the program for older worker adjustment by providing additional options. UI coverage will be available to all who want to work past age 65 and we wish to encourage those who do.

I would like to turn now to the issue of abuse in the UI system. In my riding I have received complaints from many small businesses, who note the abuse of the present system. One small business owner from Wetaskiwin writes: "Possible workers would rather stay on unemployment insurance. Are these people reporting the fact that they have been offered full–time jobs at a reasonable rate of pay"?

The strategy incorporated in Bill C–21 is designed to protect unemployed workers, and at the same time strongly encourage re–entry into the workforce. There will be counselling provided to ensure the government can communicate its full range of services and programs that might be available and also on the way in which a client's special needs might be identified. It will be through better communication and more opportunities leading to brighter futures for the unemployed, that we shall be able to control abuse.

Before I conclude, I am pleased to note the initiatives this government has taken in respect to native unemployment. There has been several comments on native unemployment in this chamber. Native unemployment is a serious issue and demands attention. To this end and to ensure that program changes reflect the needs of native Canadians, the government has established a task force specifically to analyse the unemployment situation in this sector. If I may quote from their paper:

> The demands for change have evolved for a variety of reasons. Increasing numbers of young aboriginal people are reaching labour force age without the skills or training to participate. Aboriginal unemployment rates remain double that of the national average. Aboriginal skill and education levels remain much lower than the national average. Aboriginal people have the highest illiteracy rates and the lowest income levels of any group in Canada. These problems will worsen unless economic, social and human resource development policies and programs get better results.
> Now more than ever, it is appropriate to review employment and training programs and services for aboriginal people and explore where improvements can be made to better address their serious labour market needs and to more effectively utilize resources.

In the government's analysis of Canada's workforce, aboriginal people are clearly shown to have substantial barriers in access to the labour market and to be a largely undeveloped and underutilized component. Out of these concerns a native employment and training work group was established. The working group consists of aboriginal representatives from six national aboriginal organizations and from all regions of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to list very quickly some of the representatives. The organizations represented include the Métis National Council, the Union of Ontario Indian Chiefs, Assembly of First Nations, the Métis National Council, Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, Native Women's Association of Canada, Native Council of Canada, National Association of Friendship Centres, Inuvialuit Regional Corporation, Council for Yukon Indians, Native Employment Advisory Committee, First Nations Technical Institute. Some of the individuals involved were Ray Ahenakew from the Meadow Lake Tribal Council; Richard Arcan, Yellowhead Tribal Council; representatives from St. Thomas University; from the University of Manitoba, Raoul McKay; and Germain Paul from the Native Training Institute of Quebec.

Their first meeting was held last month. I am happy to say that the program has begun positively and with definite practical direction. I welcome this initiative by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

To conclude, I feel strongly that it is imperative that this motion must be passed. We can no longer deprive Canadians who are presently in the unfortunate position of unemployment from these fundamental steps to secure futures that are offered in Bill C–21. As Maureen Baker stated in her report:

> Planning for the future must take into consideration changing trends in education, family formation, labour force participation, and ideology, as well as demography.

Bill C–21 has considered all of the above. I strongly urge once again its support in this House.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak tonight. I suppose I am going to be the last speaker on Bill C–21.

During my five years in Parliament under both Liberal and Conservative governments I can honestly say that the convergence of opinion generated by Bill C–21 and much of the other legislation that this government has been putting forward has been really creating hardships and divisions across my riding and across Canada. The kinds of divisions that we are seeing are very unfortunate.

It is unfortunate that the government would change programs that have been established for many, many years and have served the people in the best interests across all parts of Canada, especially in areas such as mine where we have regional disparities. There was a lay–off in my riding less than a month ago which involved 800 employees. We are trying to get these people employed. Yet at the same time as we are doing that, the government is bringing in Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The government is also attempting to introduce its GST bill which will impose extra taxation on people.

We have a government that has no care for what it is doing. It has a mandate. It says that it has an agenda. I want to say to the people of my riding and to the people of Canada that it has an agenda to destroy the very fabric that we have put together across Canada. It is time we put a stop to it. We have had enough.

Some hon. members: Time!

Mr. Parker: Never mind the time. I will take the time. The Speaker will make the decision about the time, not the members of the government. I know you do not want to hear what I have to say.

I want to speak for a few moments, if I may, Mr. Speaker, about the British Columbia perspective.

• (0100)

An independent analysis of the impact of changes to the UI system on the province of British Columbia was undertaken by Global Economics earlier this year. Their findings confirm the worst fears of the province of British Columbia.

Global estimates that 16,200 workers in the province, who would be eligible under the existing guidelines, will not qualify for benefits when the new legislation takes effect. A further 89,400 British Columbians will see a decrease in their benefits after January 1. What type of people are we talking about?

According to an analyst, 82 per cent of the people affected will earn less than $25,000 a year. This will clearly—

Some hon. members: Shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like to advise the House that the hon. member has 20 minutes.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to make sure that the 20 minutes you alluded to will be starting at 12.55 p.m. therefore, there are 15 minutes left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are 15 minutes left.

Mr. Parker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

This will clearly impact disproportionately on women who continue to earn much less than men, unskilled workers, service sector workers who continue to be the fastest growing segment of the labour force, seasonal workers and young families. The existing economic base of the East Kootenay makes it a particularly vulnerable region vis-à-vis the introduction of Bill C-21.

There are four factors that back up the claim. Over 11 per cent of the workforce is engaged in seasonal occupations in the forestry and tourist industries. The economy of the region is resource based and is thus vulnerable to major fluctuations in unemployment. Structural unemployment in the region is high relative to many other regions regardless of the peaks and valleys associated with resource based economies.

The employment rate has seldom fallen below 10 per cent. The best prospects for future economic development lay in the continued development of the tourist industry, an economic sector that emphasizes seasonal and service jobs. It is unlikely that the economic assumptions in the East Kootenays will change in the foreseeable future.

As I have mentioned, 800 workers who have worked continuously in the mines in the East Kootenays have lost their jobs. It is a direct result of the free trade agreement. Whether anyone will admit it the fact remains that Cominco is the main mining company there. It is taking the ore from the Red Dog Mine in Alaska down the west coast of British Columbia on a barge and unloading it at the North Vancouver shore with a $22 million federal-provincial subsidy to help rebuild the facilities on the north shore. Then, according to the reports, it is going to be loaded onto an American railway and transported down through the American states and up into Trail, British Columbia. Those are the kinds of policies that the government is adopting.

Is it any wonder the people of Canada are upset? Is it any wonder that the people in my riding are upset and want some help, and that we have asked for that help and are receiving nothing? To hear the back-benchers talk about the training policies, I want to ask those members and the government: How are you going to train these 800 workers, get them back into positions and save that one industry town? A one industry town depends very much on that mine, yet there is no action taken to assist them.

During my first term as a member of Parliament, I attended an economic meeting in Paris with a Canadian delegation. I want to tell you that they have some initiative programs that have come about. They have suggested the possibility of what is done in other countries. When someone becomes unemployed, they have a program that is proven to be 65 per cent effective whereby, if the member or the applicant can qualify, he can receive his full amount of unemployment insurance invested in a business. The government will supply them a loan to match that business. They have found that those businesses in which they have participated have had a 65 per cent success rate.

These are the kind of policies we should be talking about. These are the kind of programs that we could bring about to bring some good jobs and some initiative to help people out.

In Preston there is a small apple packing group where people come together to pack apples in the fall. Their normal work time was from October to the end of November. I attended a meeting in Preston. These people were laid off and they were not able to pack apples. When I checked into why they were unable to pack their apples, it was because they found that the American apples were coming across the border at $1 a box less than our Canadian apples. The free trade agreement had created this sort of problem for our people in the West Kootenays. Bill C-21 is not going to address the problems that these people have.

This bill should be scrapped. It should be scrapped now and we should be getting on with trying to bring about some legislation that will help people and not take away from them.

The government has a responsibility to participate in the unemployment insurance program along with the workers and the employers and that is the kind of system that we have been used to. The labour organizations are saying so, small businesses are saying so, and the people of Canada are saying so. The only one saying no is the government, and it is time the government changed its policies.

It is unfortunate that the government is creating the kind of animosity that it is creating across Canada. I represent 14 different small municipal areas and, as I travel throughout my riding, they contact me on a daily basis complaining about this government and what it is doing to them. They complain that they are being called racist. They complain that they are being called uncaring. They complain that they are not given any opportunities for input on what the government is doing. I want to say to the government that it had better start listening to the people of Canada. The people of Canada want some say on the kind of changes that are taking place.

When I see the Deputy Prime Minister on television talking about the agenda that the government has laid down, I think it is time that the government started to let the people know about the hidden agenda that this government has. We have an attack on our social programs. First, we had the clawback on our old age pensions. Now we have the Unemployment Insurance Act being taken away from us. We have a goods and services tax that it is trying to implement across Canada, against the wishes of over 80 per cent of the people of Canada. Yet it continues to push forward with its agenda. I want to say that the people of Canada do not want that agenda. They want some changes and they want those changes to take place now.

Another concern regarding Bill C–21 is that the federal government will no longer contribute to the unemployment insurance system. Unemployment insurance is no longer a standing basic component of the social welfare system throughout the western world. Bill C–21 has in fact privatized the cornerstone of Canada's social welfare system, a move which has many Canadians asking what next. If the government will no longer contribute to UI, is it not reasonable to wonder if health insurance or pensions are next?

The government is also adding to the costs for businesses. While corporate Canada may be in the position to absorb this direct increase in production costs, the burden on smaller-sized businesses will be relatively greater. Bill C–21 serves as an indirect tax on the average worker who will help pay for the government's former share of the program.

With regard to Bill C–21 and deficit reduction, under Bill C–21 the federal government will no longer contribute to the program, as we have already discussed. This increases the burden on the worker and employer. The worker already faces large tax increases and will lose more purchasing power and this will impact negatively on the local business. For the employer, increases in UI premiums will add to the cost of production, which will in turn add to the price of the goods. This will also have a negative effect on the purchasing power throughout society and with the corresponding impact on local businesses. The point being made is that this cycle is brought on by the reduction. The government's getting out of the program undermines the defaced reduction objective of the government in the same manner as the high interest rates and taxes.

In closing, as my colleague from Kootenay West identified very clearly, the government is not prepared to talk to people, organized labour, businesses or the opposition. For goodness sake, get into your caucus and talk to each other and bring about some sense of what you are doing to the people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 57, at this time it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the motion in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C–21 now before the House.

Accordingly, the question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, it is evident that a number of members of Parliament did not get here because of the five-minute bell. Normally it is a fifteen-minute bell, and I understand why members could not be here.

I think it would have been courteous if the two Chief Whips had given notice that that was their intent. However, that being the case, I really object when the Minister of National Revenue came in after the voting had started and still voted. He has not that right. I wish he would get up as a man of honour and denounce and retract his vote.

Other members who were denied the vote because of the five-minute rush stayed outside and waited until the vote was finished.

The Minister of National Revenue knew the vote had started. He came into the House and deliberately disobeyed the rules of the House and voted. He should retract that vote now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, because the bells were cut short I was denied the right to vote. However, I know that this can be done according to our Standing Orders. I just request that my vote be recorded with my party.

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point. I too was caught when the bells were cut short. I was not here. Had I been here I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Whips chose to cut the bells short without notice. Had I been allowed to be here, I would have voted with my caucus.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, since the practice is that only two Whips walk in and no notice is given to other parties, I want to record that I would have voted with my colleagues on this motion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I suggest that the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, since my name was brought up I want to tell you that I was not aware that the Speaker had begun the roll call. Had I known, I naturally would not have participated in the vote.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I too was in my office and was watching the television proceedings of the vote.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention—

Some hon. members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I can hear the hon. member if he will just go ahead with his point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We might as well stay here until two o'clock and have Question Period. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway has the floor.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I did want to draw to the attention of the Chair a problem for members who were in their offices watching the proceedings of the vote. There was an indication that the vote would in fact be 15 minutes. The television proceedings did indicate that the vote would be 15 minutes, and I did want to draw that to the attention of members of this House.

Had I been here, Mr. Speaker, I would certainly have voted with my caucus against the amendment.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind members that the indication on the television sets is the maximum time for bells, not the minimum time.

Having said that, I think Your Honour will find a disposition, now that we have heard all the members who were late and missed the vote, to apply the next vote in reverse.

I take it the NDP will vote again with the government.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, that proposal is not acceptable to the New Democratic Party. It is only appropriate that we have the opportunity to vote against this heinous legislation tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Therefore the question is on the main motion.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Andre), which was agreed to on the following division:

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. 0. 31

[English]

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, March 12, in this House we passed a resolution which was enthusiastically supported by all three parties, recognizing the Republic of Lithuania as an independent sovereign state.

Although the initial reaction from the Soviet Union was cautious and somewhat negative, I am sure that Canada and other members of the international community had hoped that the democratically arrived at decision for independence would eventually be respected by the Supreme Soviet. Unfortunately, within less than 24 hours of the passing of our resolution, President Gorbachev stated unequivocally that he considers the declaration of independence by Lithuania illegitimate and invalid.

I want to urge the Prime Minister of Canada to convey to the Soviet Union, either directly or within an international forum, that we are shocked at this turn of events and that we would hope, in keeping with the spirit of the democratization of eastern Europe, that President Gorbachev will demonstrate his commitment to perestroika and glasnost by respecting the will of the people of Lithuania.

NATIONAL GALLERY

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians from coast to coast were angered and annoyed to learn that the National Gallery of Canada recently paid $1.8 million for an American painting by Barnett Newman. This painting may well be a fine piece of art. However, such a lavish expenditure in a time of restraint does not make much sense.

Canadians called for deficit reduction. The government responded by bringing down a tough but fair budget, and now the National Gallery shows no regard for prudent spending by laying out $1.8 million on one painting.

I call on the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture to have officials of the National Gallery appear before the committee to explain the reasons behind this preposterous expenditure of taxpayers' money. Canadians have a right to know.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the crisis in agriculture is escalating. Saskatchewan's grain industry has called for an immediate $500 million federal government payment just to get the seed in the ground this spring. Without the federal government's commitment to compensate for recent droughts and low grain prices, an even greater number of farmers will be forced from the land this year.

The international grain war is continuing and our government has an obligation to support our farmers, our troops in that war, a war where the Europeans and Americans are unfairly forcing down the price in the world market-place.

In this fierce international war, the government opposite is doing something it would never do in any other battle. With cutbacks in agriculture programs and its lack of commitment to ongoing support programs, this government is disarming our troops and the industry is dying.

Saskatchewan farmers need that $500 million payment now. The Minister of Agriculture has an obligation to provide it now.

DEMOCRATIC PROCESS IN HAITI

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, on January 20, after a number of undemocratic measures had been taken by the Haitian government, I expressed my concern about the fate of the democratic process in that country.

For four years, a people, proud of its history as the first free Black nation in the world, has been trying to find its way back to democracy. A country that produced men like Toussaint Louverture, Dessalines and Pétion, created the Panamerican concept, took part in the American Revolutionary war at Savannah and helped Simon Bolivar liberate Venezuela, can look forward to more such inspiring pages in its history.

Canada, as a friend of Haiti, must support its desire to "live free or die", the motto of all its heroes.

I wish the new president good luck, and I want to ask my government to help Haiti in every respect, both politically and economically, so that it can once again join the ranks of free and democratic nations.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, considering that the goods and services tax is the harshest tax scheme in our history; that it is the most controversial tax ever imposed on Canadians; that it contains many regressive elements that will affect needy Canadians and the working middle-class; and that the Conservatives have a majority in this House, it is therefore resolved that only the Canadian people can make this government change its mind. You can help by calling 1-900-720-6052 or 6051, before midnight Friday evening. This is an appeal for fiscal justice!

NOVA SCOTIA BARRISTERS SOCIETY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am shaken by the news today concerning the women's issues critic of the Liberal party who is also the national policy co-chair for the Liberal convention. The Nova Scotia Barristers Society has found the member guilty of four counts of professional misconduct, three involving the handling—

Mr. Speaker: We really must not use statements as a personal attack on any member here. There may be another place to raise it, but it would not be appropriate to do it here.

NATIONAL GALLERY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the National Gallery has purchased an American painting for $1.8 million, which could have been produced in this country by any design or graphic artist for under $200.

The people of Delta have requested that their objection be added to those of the speakers yesterday and today, denouncing this purchase in this time of restraint. If the money was to be spent, it makes a lot more sense to support our Canadian artists.

I am asking the National Gallery to cancel the purchase now, to demonstrate to all Canadians that common sense will prevail in this country.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, in February 1985, Canada launched an all-out offensive against acid rain in order to achieve a 50 per cent reduction in emissions produced in Eastern Canada by 1994. The result: emissions have already dropped by nearly 40 per cent.

Thanks to the perseverance and hard work of our Prime Minister in his meeting with U.S. government officials, our representations aimed at achieving a 50 per cent reduction in transboundary emissions affecting Eastern Canada have been successful.

Last June, President Bush introduced a legislative measure to that effect. More recently, after satisfactory negotiations, the United States said it was prepared to ratify this measure.

It is the most positive initiative ever taken by a U.S. administration in this area in more than ten years, and it was largely instigated by Canada.

Mr. Speaker, implementation of the U.S. initiative, combined with the Canadian plan, will make it possible to reverse the acidification process, and we will have a cleaner and healthier environment.

ENERGY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to set the record straight on statements made last week by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

On March 7, I asked the minister about a $246 million cut in alternative energy and conservation found in this year's Estimates. The following day during Question Period the minister told this House that the figures I used the day before were incorrect, that I was wrong to use that figure. In addition, he suggested I would find the correct figures in the Estimates.

As I told the House on March 8, our research was very thorough and, indeed, it was not in error. In fact, page 31 of the Estimates supports the figure, $246 million, that I quoted. The error, therefore, lies within the Estimates themselves and not with our research.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the nominees for this week's corporate welfare bum are: Alcan Aluminum Limited. Alcan paid only $39 million in income taxes after registering a net income of $433 million in 1987. In 1986 Alcan received a $6 million tax credit on a net income of $270 million.

The second nominee is Power Corporation. It received an income tax credit of $2.1 million in 1988 and paid only $2.6 million in taxes in 1987. Its total net income from the two years is close to $400 million.

The third nominee is Gulf Resources which recovered $18 million in income taxes in 1988 and $29 million in 1987 after a net income totalling over $100 million in the two years.

The envelope, please. The winner is Gulf Resources. The Reichmann brothers plan to sell Consumers' Gas to British Gas and get all sorts of tax benefits from companies like Gulf Resources to finance their real estate development in London and Moscow. Actions like that have earned Gulf Resources the corporate welfare bum of the week award.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, with today's announcement that the GST will cost an estimated $1.4 billion to implement, I have to say that this thing is getting out of hand. The government has made several miscalculations as to how much the GST is going to cost Canadians. One day the government adds $300 million to the cost then, "Whoops, sorry folks, we miscalculated, add another $300 million to that bill".

Miscalculations of this kind have spurred Canadians into writing or calling their MPs to express their outrage. You may ask just how outraged Canadians are? To give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, the 900 number we set up so Canadians can electronically petition against the GST has been so busy that we have had to add another phone call.

Now Canadians can call either 1-900-720-6052 or 1-900-720-6051, 24 hours a day until March 16. In case you missed it, I will repeat the number: Call 1-900-720-6052 or 1-900-720-6051 to add your vote to the 40,000 Canadians who have already called to oppose the GST.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, when a boatload of 173 Sikhs and one Sri Lankan came ashore at Nova Scotia in 1987 claiming refugee status, this government went into a frenzy of fear mongering. It talked about an invasion, kept the refugees incognito and hinted that they might be terrorists. The government even blew 12 million tax dollars sending the navy and air force to scour our coast for another boat that was tied up empty near England. The refugees' pictures were sent to the Indian government asking if they were terrorists. The government succeeded in raising such fear of these dark-skinned people that Parliament was recalled to pass anti-refugee legislation.

Well, the dark-skinned people were not terrorists. Canada's refugee board on Monday ruled, after 18 months, that two of them are refugees because sending their pictures to India so embarrassed that government as to put them in danger.

I call on the Minister of Employment and Immigration to land the rest of that boatload immediately and stop this time wasting horse play that slanders refugees and embitters race relations in Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. You will recall that three months ago his government allowed the takeover of Connaught BioSciences, one of Canada's premier high technology companies, by Institut Mérieux, a company controlled by the French government.

I have with me a document released by Investment Canada summarizing the undertakings that Institut Mérieux gave to the government as a condition of the government allowing its acquisition of Connaught Bio Sciences.

In the document Mérieux undertook to "submit within six months a medium-term operating plan and a longer term strategic plan for government advice and input".

Has the government received these plans?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I obtained the information. I was also informed of the decision taken by the company. The information we have suggests that the owners of Mérieux will fill the positions that were occupied by Canadians with Canadians and thus respect the company's commitments.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer my clear and direct question. Has he received the plans which Institut Mérieux promised the government?

Mr. Speaker, if he did not receive these plans, how can the minister assure this House that the key positions in this company which is vital to our science and technology will be held by Canadians?

[English]

If the government does not have the operating plan from Institut Mérieux, how can we be sure that Mérieux will live up to its undertaking to the government, and I quote from the Investment Canada document, that Connaught will "retain a strong Canadian identity"? Or is the government simply going to lie down as it has on every issue of Canadian ownership and identity since it has been in power?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question before and I will repeat what I said.

I said that the guarantee which has been given by the company is that all, or at least most, of the jobs which have been touched by the decision will be filled again by Canadians. In any event, we have the power to enforce that decision and, of course, we will look very carefully at exactly the way the company will work.

If there is any necessity, I will intervene through Investment Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the minister's answer. All he could say was he had an indication that Mérieux will fill the top Canadian management positions, all or most of them, with Canadians.

How can Institut Mérieux carry out its undertaking that the company will retain a strong Canadian identity if there is a lower Canadian level of top management after it fills the posts from which it has fired the Canadian led management?

How can the minister be sure of that if all the company is saying is that all or most of the positions will be filled by Canadians? How can he state this with any assurance, if the government has not been able to get Mérieux, three months after it took over Connaught, to fulfil its undertaking to give the government its plans for this key Canadian high technology firm?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said. I said that we have the capacity to enforce the decision which has been made. When Investment Canada considered the proposal by Mérieux, it considered all benefits that Canada could get.

I assure the House and the hon. Leader of the Opposition that everything will be done to ensure that the commitments which have been made by Connaught are respected. We have the authority and we will exert the authority to do that.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who is also the political minister for Alberta.

The Premier of Alberta has said that the province will go ahead with construction of the Oldman River dam despite the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal quashing the federal construction permit for the dam and ordering a full environmental assessment of the project.

• (1420)

Has the government sought an injunction or taken any other action to ensure construction of the dam is stopped now so the required environmental assessment can take place?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, based on very preliminary information, this decision of the Federal Court of Appeal appears to have very far–reaching implications. It must be considered very seriously. We think that it must be reviewed very carefully. I will certainly have to discuss this with my colleagues in the cabinet.

As a matter of fact, there will be an interdepartmental meeting at the end of the day with officials of Environment Canada, Justice Canada, Fisheries and Oceans and Transport Canada. The government will look very carefully at the situation and the judgment and will abide with all its obligations.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the order of the court was absolutely clear. It took less than that amount of paper.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. The decision of the court shows absolutely that not one but four ministers knew before construction started the environmental risks of diversion, flooding, sedimentation, toxic spills, mercury contamination, the use of explosives, the destruction of fish habitats and damage to an Indian band and its reserve lands, and they refused to carry out their responsibilities to conduct environmental impact assessments.

Has the Prime Minister directed his minister, in the strongest possible terms, to immediately begin those environmental assessments that are required under the act of this government?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to show indignation today, but the member should remind the House that the licence was issued in 1987, before the delivery of the first Rafferty–Alameda judgment, at a time when it was felt all over the country, by Justice and all people, that the environmental assessment could be delegated to the provinces.

In those times we did not know what we know now. The courts have been very active on the environmental assessment sector. Now we know more and we have to live with the effects of this, but we must do it in a very reasonable manner.

This is not a case to use scare tactics or play partisan politics. This is very serious. It deals with the very fundamental policy of assessment of environmental impacts before any project is begun.

As the House knows, we are very actively working on the drafting of a very important piece of legislation on assessment. The country is certainly expecting this government to be serious, and responsible and to take the time required to make the right decision.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my first question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the Federal Court of Appeal unanimously quashed the 1987 approval of the Minister of Transport—not the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Transport—which gave Alberta permission to construct the Oldman River Dam.

Since construction of any dam in Canada, whether it is in Saskatchewan, Alberta or Quebec, requires approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for which the Minister of Transport alone is responsible, and since the approval yesterday was removed by the courts, will the minister invoke today, along with his cabinet colleagues, Section 12 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, terminating the work at site so that a fair and achievable environmental impact assessment and review can take place without more damage being done on the site?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend, the Minister of the Environment, indicated, the government is reviewing the implications of this judgment. They are far-reaching and we think that we should move after consideration of all the implications and not in haste.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, who understands full well what the spirit of the law and what the spirit of the ruling by the Federal Court of Appeal was yesterday.

In order to have a proper environmental assessment and review, the construction at the site must stop. We would have hoped that Premier Getty would have realized that yesterday.

Since Section 12 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act makes it very clear that the Governor in Council, the cabinet, can invoke that section to terminate the work at the site, in the spirit of a very important landmark environmental ruling of yesterday, will the Prime Minister take this to cabinet today and make use of Section 12 of the act to halt the work at the site?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this is a judgement rendered yesterday by a very important court in our country, a little over 24 hours ago. The opposition would like the government to make a hasty, ill-considered decision, while we are dealing with something fundamental for the future of environmental assessments in this country. This government intends to fulfil all its responsibilities, including the responsibility to make a reasonable decision in the light of the advice given by its legal advisers.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also for the Prime Minister. Canadians know you cannot drive a car unless you get a licence; you cannot build a house unless you get a permit; you cannot build a dam on any river in Canada unless you have an approval.

The Federal Court of Appeal has unanimously struck down the approval to build that dam on the Oldman in Alberta. It affects federal jurisdiction.

Will the Prime Minister rise in his place and stand up for the spirit of the law in this country and say it applies in Alberta, just like it does in Saskatchewan, just like it does in Quebec, and halt it so that we can find out what the impact on the environment really is?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a leader on this issue. We are the most advanced country when it comes to environmental assessments. And now, in this very advanced country which we are, a decision has been rendered in a brand-new area; this judgement has created an extremely important legal precedent. It is most important, a little more than 24 hours after the judgement was rendered, to take the time required so that the decision will comply with environmental obligations and give due consideration to the consequences, because preliminary analyses suggest that this judgement will affect not only this project but all projects, whatever they are, throughout the country.

Caution, reflection and responsibility are therefore in order.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment. Manitoba Hydro, right now, is beginning an environmental assessment process on the proposed Conawapa hydroelectric dam. This dam will likely be the biggest dam in the Manitoba region.

What strategy is the minister following to ensure the protection of the Manitoba environment? Will he be dragged through the courts again, as he was with the Rafferty-Alameda dam and the Oldman River dam project, or has he learned his lesson? Will he save Manitobans time, money and aggravation by immediately setting up an environmental assessment, as called for under the guidelines order?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that the member should recognize that this government, in every circumstance, has assumed its responsibility to comply with the requirements of the federal guidelines. We do that all the time.

The main problem we have is that the judgment which we have spoken about a few minutes ago concerns something actually in the process of being built. This is a transition problem which is very complex. We must admit that. But, in the case of new projects, it is very simple as of now. We will apply EARP in any situation.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is going to commit himself to an EARP process, can he now tell us that he has in fact set up an expert panel, that open hearings are going to be set up, that he has developed a program, and that he is going to announce this in public, or are we going to wait and are we going to end up in the courts again? Will the minister please tell us exactly what he intends to do?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not blame the member, but it appears that he should know more about the process. This process has two steps. The first step is the initial impact assessment and then, in the light of the conclusions of the initial assessment, the proponent minister has to make a decision as to whether or not he will need a full panel review.

We will apply the full process, but beginning with the first step, and then the decision will be made accordingly.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In August 1989, when the technical paper on the GST was released, the Minister of Finance estimated that administration costs would be about $200 million. In the last Budget, in February 1990, the cost was estimated at $260 million. Yesterday, his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, said before the Finance Committee that it would cost $300 million. Will the Minister of Finance, tell the House once and for all how much this administrative nightmare is going to cost?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, since some statements were attributed to me yesterday, the hon. member will know that many of the headlines in the papers today about $670 million, $1.4 billion and $1.1 billion are incorrect, if not mischievous.

The fact of the matter is that the estimates which came out not too many weeks ago stated quite clearly that the cost this year was going to be $110 million. During the transition period, it will be $260 million up to $365 per year, and when the tax becomes mature, it will be at $300 million per year.

Let me point out to the member that this is one of the lowest costs for collecting this sort of tax in the whole world. In fact, it will cost approximately 1.5 cents for every dollar collected, which is far better than any other country in the industrialized world because of the efficient systems, because of the innovative methods and because of the technology that we will be using to administer the GST.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I did not refer to a newspaper but to an official document.

From $200 million to $300 million is $100 million more, and that is a lot of money for Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have a brochure that was sent to 1.2 million Canadians and small businesses. On page 8, for instance, it says that the GST is due on the date the tax is paid, while in the legislation it is the other way around. My question for the Minister of Finance is: Why does he keep spending millions of dollars to confuse Canadians, since this brochure for small business costs in the millions? Does he realize that the example given on page 8 of the brochure does not say exactly what it says in the bill?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure I understand the specific question that the hon. member is asking.

There are differences, I will acknowledge, between the amounts that were put in the technical paper and the amounts that were put in the December 19 paper. That represents the result of further work that has been done on the part of the government in deciding precisely what the administration costs would be. As my colleague, the Minister of Revenue has pointed out, the cost to collect this tax on an on-going basis will be 1.5 cents for every dollar of tax. That represents a very efficient system of tax collection.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Yesterday, at the finance committee the minister informed the people of this country that he has now recruited the banks and the financial institutions to help collect the GST. Yesterday, before the finance committee he could not tell us how much the banks would be getting to help collect the GST.

I wonder if the minister has done his homework today, and can he confirm to the House that the government has made a deal with the banks that every time a business makes a deposit to collect the GST, the banks will be paid a service charge of $1 per deposit on each and every single deposit that businesses make at the banks of this country. Can he confirm that today in the House?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that this experienced member is as misinformed as he is today, and yesterday. He should know, as most hon. members are aware, that Canadians today are utilizing for efficiency's sake and for convenience banking institutions to pay through the banks to the federal government, whether it is CPP payments, the current federal sales tax—

Mr. MacKay: Ontario Hydro.

Mr. Crosbie: Newfoundland Light and Power, Newfoundland Telephone.

Mr. Jelinek: —various provincial payments, unemployment insurance—

Mr. Rodriguez: How much?

Mr. Jelinek: I would like to know if the New Democratic Party is suggesting that we not use the banking and financial institutions and make the system more complex for small business. Is that what they are saying?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question. The answer is $1 per deposit made by businesses for every deposit in a bank.

In the first ten months of this fiscal year, before the GST is even in effect, Canadians businesses made some 6.5 million deposits in Canadian banks on their taxes. Can the minister tell us now how many more millions of dollars taxpayers will have to fork out to the banks in service charges when a business makes a deposit at a bank when the bank helps to collect the GST? Will it be an extra $15 million, an extra $20 million, or an extra $30 million? How much more will the banks get in service charges to help collect the GST from the taxpayers of the country?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is barking up the wrong tree. To be specific to his particular question, the Department of Supply and Services is currently negotiating with the banks in regard to the GST.

The fact of the matter is, and I repeat what I have said in my first answer, that this is asked for by the business community.

Mr. Rodriguez: That's not the question. How much?

Mr. Jelinek: This is asked for by the small business community. This is a request on behalf of the small business people across Canada, and it is for sake of convenience, efficiency and saving tax dollars both to business and government. That is the answer.

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. In last week's U.S. Business Week magazine, the Ontario government spent close to $500,000 for an advertisement to explain why Americans should invest in Ontario. One of the key Ontario advantages, as explained by the Premier of Ontario, is the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement.

In this week's U.S. Business Week magazine, the Ontario government again advertises the advantage of investing and locating in Ontario. Among other things, there is the free trade agreement and lower comparative wage rates and benefits.

How did the Minister for International Trade succeed in bringing Ontario onside and in total agreement with the free trade agreement, and what long-term benefits does he foresee, not just for Ontario, but also Canada, now that we have Ontario's wholehearted support for the free trade agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is correct. There is an eight-page advertisement which states:

> In the tough new world of the '90s, it isn't enough to survive. You want to succeed.

Right by Premier Peterson's red tie, it states:

> The Ontario advantage
> Under the Free Trade Agreement, most goods move between Ontario and the U.S. without tariffs.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. minister would only want to read from the advertisement and not display it. I would ask him to co-operate.

Mr. Crosbie: Well, I certainly do not want to embarrass the hon. gentlemen opposite, but the advantage of Ontario is that most goods move between Ontario and the U.S. without tariffs under the free trade agreement. That is the purport of this eight-page, $500,000 advertisement, paid for by Ontario taxpayers, boosting the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: As to the reasons for the Premier's conversion, apart from my own persuasive powers, yesterday there was a Japanese report, a glowing report, from the Ministry of International Trade and Industry on the attractions of investment in Canada under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Perhaps he was given an early copy of that report. The report paints Canada as a country of new found importance for Japanese companies planning a continental strategy. For all of these reasons Premier Peterson has had a $500,000 conversion.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Mr. John L. Murray, Attorney General and Chief Legal Adviser for Ireland.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, if there is one point on which all fishermen in eastern Canada agree, it is that squid and capelin are vital to the rebuilding of our cod stocks because they are the food stock of our codfish. Wherever squid and capelin go, the codfish will follow.

I want to ask the Minister of Fisheries why, for the year 1990, this crisis year in the fishery, the Government of Canada has decided to issue licences to east bloc countries such as Poland, Bulgaria and the U.S.S.R., and to Cuba and Japan, to fish 72 million pounds of squid all along the coast of Newfoundland. Eight factory-freezer trawler licences this week have been awarded to Cuba and the U.S.S.R. Will the minister now cancel these licences and lift this aquatic Iron Curtain that is preventing our squid from reaching our shores in Newfoundland?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, this is hard to believe coming from that member. What he forgot to mention in his question was that this is a NAFO-managed stock. Maybe we are guilty of following what Liberal members of Parliament and Liberal ministers introduced in our fishery because the Grits started that a long time ago.

The fact is that we catch in Canada about 1,000 tonnes of squid a year over an allocation to Canada of 109,000 tonnes, so please get out of the water and put your two feet on the land.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this minister and this government have also agreed to an increase in foreign quotas for capelin, just east of St. John's in area 3NO, an increase to the U.S.S.R. up to 15,000 tonnes and an increase to Norway up to 9,000 tonnes. There are large quotas for Poland and Japan with the smallest quota going to Canada with 800 tonnes. I have the document here in which this minister is negotiating with the Soviet Union to give a capelin quota to the U.S.S.R. right in the middle of our northern codstocks.

Will the minister now cancel this eco-interception? Does he not realize that if he had told the fishermen of eastern Canada when he was there two weeks ago what he told this House today, that foreigners would get capelin and squid as under utilized species, he would have been declared an endangered species, and if he awards these licences he is going to wish he were an extinct species?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Again, Mr. Speaker—George, you surprise me!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Valcourt: This capelin stock, especially in 3NO which the member is talking about, is again managed by NAFO.

Is the hon. member telling me today that we should not follow the rules of the Law of the Sea? Because he is the first member to yell at the world about the Spanish and Portuguese who are not following the Law of the Sea. And today he would not want me to follow the Law of the Sea? He does not want me to reallocate the fish which Canadians do not want to catch?

By the way the member forgot to mention our allowable catch of this fish to feed cod. We could take 250,000 tonnes of them without endangering our cod stock at all. Last year we took about 50,000 tonnes. He may talk about the eco-interception but he has a problem and it is ego-interception. That is what he needs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FORESTRY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Forestry or in his absence, to the Acting Minister. The minister knows perfectly well that four of the forestry development agreements that expired last year have not been renegotiated and that three other agreements are due to expire at the end of this month. Does the minister intend to renew these agreements? Where will he find the money, and how much does he intend to spend on these agreements?

[English]

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister who is at a major conference in the western part of our country, I can tell that hon. member that we have signed agreements with P.E.I., Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. The two largest agreements with Quebec and British Columbia are still in effect. In the other three provinces, they are under negotiation now and when these negotiations are completed the announcements will be made.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The Prime Minister told delegates at the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association's annual convention that his government would renew its $1.1 billion reforestation program. However, the Estimates tabled at the end of that month confirm that Forestry Canada's budget has been slashed by 31 per cent over last year's, and that regional development funds for subagreements have also been cut.

Where is the $1.1 billion promised by the Prime Minister and when will the new forestry agreements be renewed?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely correct, there was $1.15 billion in agreements in the last four years. That, incidentally, was about three or four times as much as the Liberals had.

It was mentioned that there is a process, and that process is being followed. When the negotiations are completed, the funds will be found and will be put into the budget of Forestry Canada. It is very simple.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries.

On March 9, the minister released regulations which allowed direct U.S. access to salmon and herring caught off the B.C. coast. The official backgrounder released on that date would: "Make 100 per cent of the salmon and herring catches available to be counted, weighed and sampled prior to export".

Within 24 hours, External Affairs responded to industry lobbying by issuing 107 export exemptions which permitted the export of round herring for freezing, the first stage of processing. What consultations with the minister's department preceded the granting of these 107 export exemptions?

• (1450)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the B.C. salmon and herring dispute happily has been resolved. The regulations in order to carry out that settlement have now been promulgated and the system has been put in place.

As to whether there have been any export permits given with respect to frozen herring, if there are any such given, it is at the request of the Canadian industry, which states that they do not have sufficient freezing capacity themselves.

Ms. Langan: Not true!

Mr. Benjamin: That's wrong!

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): If you do not mind me giving the explanation, then the hon. gentleman can jeer, sneer and do what he likes.

There is a request from the industry that they be permitted to freeze herring in the U.S. and bring it back to Canada for processing so it will be processed in Canada.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask you the question, but I will go back to the Minister of Fisheries. His department knows that never before in history has there been any shortage of freezer capacity on the B.C. coast for herring. It seems more than a coincidence that within 24 hours of this agreement being signed we find it necessary to issue 107 export exemptions.

To go back to the Minister for International Trade, what guarantee can the minister give B.C. shoreworkers that these fish will be returned to B.C. for further processing and not just shipped as round herring direct to Japan?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one of the successes of the agreement we reached with the United States was that as a result of our agreement with the Americans, we could put into effect the Export and Import Permits Act and that the only exports permitted of roe herring from Canada will be herring that is exported to the United States to be consumed in the United States or processed in the United States to the same degree as it is processed in Canada. Since they have never processed herring there, it not too likely that will happen.

There will be no raw roe herring exported to Japan by this means or any other. That is one of the strengths of this agreement that was reached. If we had not reached an agreement with the United States, we would not have been able to put this into effect. The hon. gentleman should be supporting and shouting the virtues of this settlement throughout British Columbia.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Telecom Canada fused a new link of unity for the country when it completed a fibre optic chain from coast to coast, and the Prime Minister oversaw the last splice.

Let me remind him of what he said to First Ministers last fall: "Just as the railroad made it possible to create links between east and west 100 years ago, so telecommunications can do the same today, strengthening the unity and the sovereignty of the country. We simply cannot allow our system of communications to be fragmented and broken up by different regulations."

Will the Prime Minister follow these words, take the necessary leadership, ensuring that federal jurisdiction is upheld in this field, as the Supreme Court dictated?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed, I was happy to point out the presence of my hon. friend yesterday at the very important Telecom ceremony, along with the Minister for Communications whose department played such a vital role in bringing this major achievement about. The government will of course proceed in such a way as to uphold the rights of Parliament in this very vital area of our national life.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): I am glad to hear the Prime Minister affirm the ruling of the Supreme Court. I am pleased that the fate of the last spike and the last splice will perhaps be the same thing—or I am not so pleased. I had better be careful about that.

Considering the economic and social impact that information and technological advances in telecommunications will have throughout the world during the next 20 years, could the minister give the House the assurance that no stumbling blocks along the way will prevent regulation of this advanced technology sector by a federal regulatory agency?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government has already announced what its policy will be. We are continuing discussions with the provinces, consumers and users. This morning I had the pleasure of meeting another minister from one of the provinces and received a number of counter proposals from another province.

I can give the House the assurance that discussions are in a very active stage and we hope to be able to release the conclusions of these negotiations as soon as possible.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture and relates to Canada's agricultural producers and the three basic principles of the Canadian supply management program concerning dairy products, poultry, yogurt, ice cream as well as the review of the national farm policy and external trade.

Since success depends on the position upheld by Canada during the current GATT negotiations, can the minister give some assurance, particularly about yogurt and ice cream which recently have been the subject of a controversial decision by the GATT panel?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises a very interesting issue. In Geneva this morning our team of negotiators finally tabled Canada's position concerning Article XI. The team is under the able direction of my colleague the Minister for International Trade. After lengthy consultations with farm organizations throughout Canada, including producers, processors and various parties interested in the agri-food sector, it has been agreed that a Canadian position be developed, Mr. Speaker.

I am sure that in the coming months and with the support of all interest groups we will be able to tell the rest of the world what our position is, particularly with respect to clarifying and reinforcing Article XI. That is the promise we made to the producers and the farm community, Mr. Speaker, and we have delivered the goods.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES CANADA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. The Weir report was initiated by Correctional Services Canada to investigate the escape in Alberta of a dangerous offender while on an escorted temporary absence, an escape that had very tragic results.

This partially censored report was critical of Correctional Services Canada personnel and procedures.

When will the Solicitor General tell Canadians, and particularly Albertans who have been most affected by this, what steps have been taken to ensure public safety in Alberta? Will he undertake to provide, either himself or through Correctional Services Canada, a full public and honest response to the Weir report?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague has indicated, the Weir report was made public four days after it was given to us. Some recommendations have already been implemented, others have been referred to task forces, and some still have to be considered. I can assure this House that I will be looking into it very closely.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, Canadians and Albertans are looking for a bit crisper response than that. It has been three months since the report was made public and one more sequence of mistakes like those which occurred in the Gingras escape could well cost another Canadian his or her life.

When will the minister complete and fulfil his obligations to Canadians and honestly address the problems and potential solutions that were raised by the Gingras escape? When?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think it is an acknowledged fact that the Weir report indicated some mistakes that have been made by people, not by the system or process that was in place.

I am more interested in bringing in some correct answers than crisp answers.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Agriculture who has already notified the House that Canada's position to amend Article 11 of the GATT Round has been tabled today. It shows that for those products produced under the supply management, a processed product can be controlled coming into the country if it is totally or mostly a primary or fresh product.

What was the response from our partners in the Cairns Group and, particularly, what was the response of the U.S.A. to this particular position when it was laid down at the GATT round this morning?

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are attempting to strengthen Article 11 by proposing that processed agricultural products could be covered by Article 11, import quotas, if they are made "wholly or mainly" from a fresh product under effective supply control.

An Hon. Member: We already knew that.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. gentleman did not know that, because he did not use the words "wholly or mainly", so do not embarrass him, please.

This proposal that we have made is a proposal made by Canada. The Cairns group understands—I made it clear to the Cairns group last November—what our position was with respect to supply management and the attitude that we were taking. The Cairns group does not agree with us on this particular point, but they know that generally our objectives are the same. They welcome Canada as a valuable member.

The United States has its own position, but while the United States may dictate to the NDP what position they should take, they do not dictate to us what positions we are going to take.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, if this proposal becomes the rule under the GATT, will the guaranteed access provisions of the Canada–U.S. trade agreement become invalid, particularly those sections which guarantee access to poultry under the CUSTA. Will this now become invalid because the GATT would overrule it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we will have to see first whether these provisions become an accepted part of the GATT. There will be a long and arduous negotiation. We are going to require that there be major changes on behalf of the United States, for example.

The hon. gentleman mentioned the United States. There are very objectionable features of law in the United States that we would like to see removed, particularly with respect to import controls. All these matters will be dealt with. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will be getting the best possible deal for Canada in this multi-faceted and difficult international negotiation.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General in both official languages.

This report refers to the report "Taking Responsibility", which was prepared by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General and tabled in this House in August, 1988, with a request that the government table a comprehensive response. However, Parliament was dissolved before a response could be tabled.

Believing that "Taking Responsibility" is still valid, the committee request pursuant to Standing Order 109 the government tabled a comprehensive response to that report.

BILL C-56—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-56, an Act to amend the Small Business Loans Act (with amendments).

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, there has been a meeting of the striking committee. I have a report to present to the House. Unfortunately, I do not have it in my hands at the moment. I will have it to the table in a minute or two from the striking committee.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bob Kaplan moved for leave to introduce Bill C-291, an act to amend the Criminal Code (duty to give assistance).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment to the Criminal Code to establish what is known in civil law as a rescuer's duty within Canadian law.

The idea comes from incidents like the situation in Calgary, and also in other cities, where victims of rape or other crimes are left and passers-by ignore them. There is a sense in the community that this is improper and that to the extent that a person can help someone else out without putting themselves in danger, they should do so.

I have taken a recommendation of the Law Reform Commission of Canada to this effect, based on the practice in many other civilized countries of the world. Judging from public reaction to these incidents, I believe it would enjoy great public support.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

REFERRAL OF COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That, notwithstanding any Order or practice of this House, the report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1989, which was deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs on January 31, 1990, (Sessional Paper No. 342-1/13A), be deemed referred as well to the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development.

I believe there would be unanimous consent for that at this point in time.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. government House leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REVIEW OF THE CSIS ACT AND THE SECURITY OFFENCES ACT—AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is also unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

That the Special Committee on the Review of the CSIS Act and the Security Offences Act be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C. for the period from Tuesday, March 20, 1990 to Thursday, March 22, 1990 for the purpose of holding discussions respecting security intelligence administration and structure, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee; and that the committee be authorized to travel to Vancouver for the period from March 25, 1990 to March 28, 1990 for the purpose of hearing evidence related to the committee's order of reference and of visiting regional police and security facilities, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, REGIONAL AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, again with unanimous consent, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development be authorized to travel to Montreal on Monday, March 19, 1990 to visit the laboratories of Hydro-Québec in relation to its study of a science and technology strategy, and that the necessary staff accompany the committee.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have yet another petition which comes from my constituents, certified by the House, containing 160 names from one community, La Salle, within my constituency, indicating that the petitioners object to the government's plans to go forward with the goods and services tax.

• (1510)

They feel that the government has not addressed the unfair tax system in this country and therefore call upon the House to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that there are effective minimum taxes on wealthy individuals and corporations and the tax burden will be shifted away from ordinary Canadians.

FISHERIES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of almost 3,500 people mostly from the greater Victoria area who have asked me to submit a petition on their behalf. The petition deals with the use of drift-net fishing in the north Pacific Ocean.

It has been pulled together by the group AWARE that is based in Victoria. Drift-net fishing, the petition notes, is leading to an ecological disaster in the north Pacific. There is a requirement for very clear, firm measures by the Canadian government including the institution of economic sanctions and the placing of prohibitive tariffs and duties on imports to Canada from these countries unless they cease and desist from this very wrong and difficult practice.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to submit to the House two sets of petitions from constituents in my riding of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. They are residents of the town of Meadow Lake, Rapid View, Pierceland, Loon Lake, Goodsoil, Green Lake, Dorintosh and other communities.

These are communities affected by the northern tax allowance program and the petitioners, as have others that I have presented in this House, recognize that the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas released in late October fails to address the realities of living in the north and it calls on Parliament to reject the recommendations contained in that report and in turn, develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program that recognizes the financial needs of the people of the northern and isolated areas.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present another petition added to the thousands of names and many petitions I have already presented to the House against the goods and services tax that this government proposes.

People will not be fooled by this government's attempts at selling them on a lower rate and they have asked that this government cease with its present proposal which shifts the tax burden to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform. They ask the government to get on with real tax reform and get away from this regressive tax.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have the pleasure to present a petition signed by several hundred constituents concerning a Canadian citizen and taxpayer, Mr. Wih-Sheh Leo, who was arrested unlawfully and sentenced to 10 months imprisonment for exercising his right to return to his native land and is currently under indictment on sedition charges, facing a minimum term of 10 years imprisonment. These charges are the result of political persecution by the authorities in Taiwan.

The petitioners ask the Canadian government to issue a public statement expressing Canada's concern over a Canadian citizen's rights being violated, instruct the Canadian Embassy in Japan or the High Commissioner's office in Hong Kong to send a representative to Taiwan, appoint a lawyer to handle the case and request Canada's allies which have representatives in Taiwan to assist in this case.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting in this Chamber five petitions signed by members of my community in my riding of York West. Essentially they are petitioners against the goods and services tax and we urge through these petitions and by calling 1-900-720-6052 for Canadians to demonstrate the frustration and the anger that Canadians from coast to coast feel against—

Mr. Speaker: I have to remind the hon. member that he is to present his petition, but to try as much as possible to stay away from entering into debate.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and privilege today to table a petition regarding the rights of the unborn child.

This petition has been signed by the residents of my constituency in Thunder Bay—Nipigon. It has been certified by the Clerk to be correct. The petitioners pray that the legislation be changed to effectively protect the life of the pre-born child without distinction as to stages of development.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and pleasure of presenting a thick sheaf of petitions signed by well over 2,000 western Canadians, 800 of whom signed these petitions attended an anti-GST rally in Brandon last month and took the opportunity of expressing their displeasure and their opposition to the GST.

These petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36, have been certified as correct as to form and content. They simply point out that this GST is unwarranted, unfair, regressive, and they have asked us in the Liberal party to do all we can to oppose the tax and ask the government to come to its senses and withdraw the tax as soon as possible.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty on behalf of a number of constituents of Saskatoon, Waldheim, and Rosthern to put before the House a petition which calls upon the government to reject the current proposed goods and services tax and put in place an effective tax which is broad in base and does not harm the middle class Canadian.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have six petitions here, duly certified by the Clerk of Petitions, from a total of 210 constituents who are concerned about the goods and services tax.

They are concerned that it will be hidden and will be applied to virtually all goods and all services that they are involved in, particularly for the low and middle income Canadians that I largely represent and another group, the group of small businessmen who really feel that this is going to be the straw that breaks the camel's back.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by hundreds of students from the University of Prince Edward Island.

The students call upon their elected representatives to stop the erosion of quality and accessibility in our universities, colleges and other post-secondary educational institutions of Canada.

They also call upon Parliament and the Government of Canada to commit to arranging a federal-provincial conference of the highest political representatives to establish obligations of the two levels of government in the financing of Canadian post-secondary education and to ensure an end to the shameful neglect of higher education in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition with over 3,500 names on behalf of my constituents in Nipissing and also on behalf of the people of the Timiskaming riding who are against the goods and services tax.

These people feel that this tax is unfair and will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians. It is also an unfair burden to small business.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present three more petitions to add to the hundreds of petitions that I have presented from my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings from people who are concerned and fearful of what the goods and services tax is going to do to them as individuals and to their small businesses.

They are asking the government to withdraw this unfair and unwarranted tax, go back to the drawing board, and put something in place that is more fair and more equal to the taxpayers of this country.

• (1520)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by numerous taxpayers and residents of Canada who object to the goods and services tax. They recite how unfair this tax is for them and for all Canadians and call upon Parliament to reject any bill based on such an inequitable measure.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 209 and 221.

[Text]

CANDU REACTOR TECHONOLOGY

Question No. 209—Mr. Caccia:

1. With reference to the sale of Candu nuclear reactor technology by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (AECL) (a) have AECL officials visited or worked at the Cernavoda site in Romania and, if so (i) on what dates (ii) what number of officials (iii) what were and are their job titles and descriptions (b) was AECL aware of the use of army conscripts and forced labour on the Cernavoda project and, if so, did AECL take any action to protest this practice (c) has AECL given Romania the right to sell Candu technology to third parties (d) has AECL been paid for the Candu technology installed in the Cernavoda power plant and, if so (i) what sums (ii) by what persons?

2. Is AECL currently negotiating with other countries for the sale of Candu reactor technology and, if so (a) which ones (b) in each case, what stage have the negotiations reached?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. (a) Yes, AECL officials have both visited and worked at the Cernavoda site in Romania.

1. (a) (i) & (ii) The first AECL assignments to the Cernavoda site started in September, 1980. The average staff levels at this site were:

1980	2
1982	2
1984	2

1986	3
1988	14
1989	15

1. (a) (iii) As of February 2, 1990, AECL has the following staff of 15 technical assistants assigned to the site:

-Construction Manager
-Civil Superintendent
-Quality Assurance Representative
-Nuclear Steam Plant Mechanical Superintendent
-Mechanical Quality Assurance Representative
-Nuclear Pipe Supervisor
-Process Engineer
-Instrumentation Superintendent
-Electrical Quality Assurance Representative
-Reactivity Mechanisms Specialist
-Maintenance Equipment Clean-up Superintendent
-Commissioning Manager
-Unit 2 Construction Quality Assurance Manager
-Unit 2 Mechanical Quality Assurance Representative
-Unit 2 Mechanical Engineer

The duties of these technical assistants, for their respective areas of expertise and responsibility, are:

To provide technical assistance to the client in the observance of AECL design requirements, including assistance with:

-technical guidance and planning
-quality assurance manuals
-corrective actions for construction errors
-training of certain workers
-inspection of procedures, test results, etc.
-correction of errors or shortages in the design.

1. (b) AECL was aware that the army provided some manual (unskilled) labour to the Project, in addition to its security duties, but AECL was not aware of "forced labour" at Cernavoda.

(c) Romania cannot sell CANDU technology to third countries without AECL's and the Government of Canada's prior written consent.

(d) ROMENERGO is current on all payments due to AECL for CANDU technology. Pursuant to section 20 (1) (d) of the Access to Information Act, the amount of such payments is confidential commercial information.

2. AECL is not currently negotiating the sale of CANDU reactor technology to other countries. However, in late January 1990, AECL received from South Korea an Invitation to Bid on engineering services for the construction of a second CANDU reactor in that country, that could eventually involve the sale of CANDU reactor technology. Negotiations for this unit are expected to begin later this year.

STUDIES CONCERNING SEISMIC ACTIVITY OR EARTHQUAKES OCURRING AROUND THE CERNADOVA SITE IN ROMANIA

Question No. 221—Mr. Blaikie:

Has Atomic Energy of Canada Limited conducted any studies as to the likelihood of seismic activity or earthquakes occurring around the Cernadova reactor site in Romania, and if so, what were the major findings?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

Studies as to likelihood of seismic activity or earthquakes ocurring around the Cernadova site in Romania were conducted by the Romanians. Therefore, under the terms of the agreement with Romenergo and pursuant to section 20(1) (b) of the Access to Information Act, AECL cannot release the requested information.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-18 in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands is acceptable to the government with the reservation stated in the reply and the documents are tabled immediately.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the current list of lawyers and notaries in Canada approved to perform legal services for the Federal Business Development Bank.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, if you would be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P–22 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all studies conducted by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited as to the likelihood of seismic activity of earthquakes occurring around the Cernadova reactor site in Romania.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports that the requested studies were conducted by the Romanians. Therefore, under the terms of the agreements with Romanergo and pursuant to Section 21(b) of the Access to Information Act AECL cannot release the information contained in the reference document. In view of the above information I would ask that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Gauthier: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: There are 10 motions and amendments set down on the Notice Paper at the report stage of Bill C–48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

I have reviewed the motions.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the honourable, the Minister of Agriculture, seeks to extend the application of the crop insurance program to honey. This particular motion has caused the Chair a great deal of concern because of the history surrounding the whole issue. Nervertheless, the Chair cannot ignore the fact that the Minister is seeking to make a substantive amendment to the Bill by amending an interpretation section in the Bill. He is also introducing a new proposition into the Clause. This is against our pratice and I would refer the House to Citation 773, subsection 10, of Beauchesne's 5th Edition and to paragraph one, at page 555 of May's Parliamentary Practice, 20th Edition.

It is with regret but I must rule the motion out of order.

[English]

Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma also causes the Chair problems because it seeks to extend compensation for crop damage caused by water fowl to coverage of crop damage caused by wildlife. This, of course, is not procedurally acceptable because not only does it go beyond the scope of the clause but it also infringes on the royal recommendation.

Citation 540 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition stipulates that an amendment infringes on the financial initiatives of the Crown not only if it increases the amount but also extends the objects and purposes set out in the communication by which the Crown has recommended a charge. I might also add that this motion was moved in the legislative committee and ruled out of order.

I have no choice therefore but to rule motion No. 2 out of order.

Since the hon. member is seeking to do the same thing with respect to compensation for crop damage in motions Nos. 3, 6, 7 and 8 as he tried to do in motion No. 2, he will know that I must also, rule those motions out of order for the same reasons.

[English]

Motion No. 4 also stands in the name of the hon. member for Algoma. This motion in amendment would increase the amounts paid by the Government of Canada to the government of a province. As I have pointed out above, increasing a burden or charge on the Treasury infringes on the royal recommendation and is contrary to our practices as found and set out in Citation 540 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. For this reason I have no choice but to rule the motion out of order.

[Translation]

Motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mackenzie caused the Chair to reflect because it was dealt with in the Committee. However, the Chair has received representations from the member and is prepared to accept the arguments that the amendment is significant enough to warrant consideration at this stage.

For this reason, I will allow the motion to be put to the House. It will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 9, standing in the name of the hon. member for McKenzie is also acceptable. It will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma caused the Chair to reflect. However, other instances were found where similar advisory, consultative and other similar types of committees were created without any charge on the federal treasury being necessary. Therefore, the motion is acceptable and it will also be debated and voted on separately.

To recapitulate, motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7 and 8 are out of order and will not be selected for debate.

[English]

Motion Nos. 5, 9 and 10 are acceptable and each will be debated and voted on separately.

I want to thank all hon. members for their co-operation in discussions on these matters with the Chair.

The House will proceed first with motion no. 5, which I will now propose to the House.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I respect your ruling and certainly do not want to take issue with it. Your ruling with respect to motion No. 1 does put us in a bit of a dilemma, inasmuch as the amendment was being put in place with a view to satisfying a requirement that was proposed by the Standing Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. This has been an ongoing issue for quite a number of years. The purpose of this amendment was to resolve that particular issue and to clarify the definition of crop consistent with the recommendations of this committee.

Just to recap, the purpose of the amendment was to revise the definition of crop. It really does not change in a major way the thrust of the bill. In effect, what we are doing here is adding the words "including honey"—because honey has been included as a crop under the provisions of this legislation in the past—to the end of the present definition, both the French and English versions. The French version would be amended to replace the word agricole on line 19, page 1, with the word vegetal. The change to the French text would ensure that the English and French versions are more consistent. That also would include the reference to the words "including honey".

As a matter of fact, on February 22, 1990, I received a letter from the Joint Committee indicating that there should be an amendment to ensure that the definition of crop would permit honey to be considered as a crop for the purposes of this act. It went on to state that between 1985 and 1988, the Standing Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations of the Department of Justice had expressed differences of opinion as to whether the definition of crop in the existing Crop Insurance Act sufficiently provided authority to allow honey as an insurable crop.

I would like to clarify this, if it is possible. I suspect that one way of clarifying it would be seeking unanimous consent of the House. If that unanimous consent was granted, it would seem to me that we would do two things. We would make it very clear that honey was included and it would clarify that issue, plus I think that it would satisfy the requirement of the Standing Joint Committee.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. minister. I very much regret that my ruling on procedural grounds is causing him difficulty on such a substantive matter. The Minister has asked for consent. I wonder if the hon. member for Mackenzie and the hon. member for Algoma could assist the Chair. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

• (1530)

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think the minister has stated the situation quite clearly. The regulations and the practice have included honey. The law as it would have come before this House failed to mention it. I think it was an oversight. I also think we should give unanimous consent to include it, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and with the permission of the other parties in the House.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I think we would like to see honey included. It is an important crop. Although it may not be as large in dollar volumes as some others, I think we would want to see it included.

That way it clarifies that it is covered by the crop insurance legislation, and especially by Bill C–148. Because it is a clarification of what is covered under the term crop, it seems to me that it does not require a change in the royal recommendation. It simply clarifies an existing situation which has been ongoing for a number of years.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. We have to give the minister credit for bringing forth this amendment. He obviously is trying to sweeten up this bill. Of course other parts of it were ruled out of order which we thought would have made it much more palatable, but because he has introduced this particular amendment we know what he is trying to do and we will go along with it on behalf of the honey producers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I take it there is consent for the minister to move the motion. Again I thank the hon. minister for bringing the matter to the attention of the Chair. Of course I am bound by the rules, but the House can make its own rules and in this case it certainly has done so.

Government Orders

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–48 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 20 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"criteria contained in the regulations, and includes honey;".

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C–48 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 3 to 8 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) an amount equal to twenty–five per cent of all premiums paid in the province under the insurance scheme in that year."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have proposed this amendment because I think the words of the act would reflect more clearly the speeches and the public announcements that have been made on this particular area of the cost sharing arrangement. We have been given to understand that the federal government will pay 25 per cent of the premium costs, the provincial governments will pay 25 per cent, and the producers will pay 50 per cent of the total cost of premiums for crop insurance.

This particular amendment would state that quite clearly. In its original form before my amendment it would simply provide for a share of up to a maximum of 25 per cent of all premiums paid in the insurance year by the federal government and by the province, which by simple logic means that the producers would be paying much more than 50 per cent on those particular years. I think this makes the formula clearer and more consistent from year to year. I would hope that all members in the House would support it.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise and congratulate the hon. member on the amendment he has put forward. A similar amendment was proposed in the standing committee. It ensures that the government is not going to welsh on its commitment of 25 per cent.

This bill does some very good things. It provides for greater benefits to be paid under the crop insurance legislation, but the percentage of the premium is the problem. It does not provide for tripartite participation. It does not even provide for 25 per cent participation. It is not guaranteed, and that is what the hon. member is seeking to do in this amendment.

There is great concern in the country that historically Canada has paid 50 per cent of the premium, farmers have paid 50 per cent, and the provincial governments outside Newfoundland and Quebec where this particular arrangement has been in effect have paid only the administrative costs.

In this bill we not only have the government reducing its share of the premium from 50 per cent to 25 per cent. We do not even have a guarantee that it is going to pay 25 per cent, and that is what the amendment attempts to do. Practically every farm organization in this country from the prairie pools to the Ontario government, to corn producers, to soybean producers have asked that the percentages be 33, 33 and 33.

For the life of me I do not understand why the government did not accept those amendments, or why it brought in a bill like this one. The government and every farm organization would like very much to get away from ad hoc programs such as the Special Canadian Grains Program and the drought program. They would have cost the government some $850 million in the case of drought and, in the case of the special grains program, $1 billion two or three years in a row.

Yet we bring in a crop insurance program that goes to the higher percentage of coverage, from 70 per cent to 90 per cent and in some cases from 80 per cent to 90 per cent coverage. It makes a number of other improvements, yet the premium is increased so dramatically that the question is whether farmers will take out the coverage.

At the same time we see the government chiselling away and deciding whether it is going to provide 33 per cent or 25 per cent. In the case of this amendment, it is not even going to guarantee that they will provide 25 per cent. It may be less at some time in the future. This would leave the provinces in a desperate situation.

In provinces like Prince Edward Island just switching from administrative costs to 25 per cent puts them in an impossible situation. Nobody knows exactly how in the world they are going to meet their share because it goes from about $150,000 a year to $650,000 a year. That is half a million dollars, which for larger provinces might not be a big cost but for provinces like Prince Edward Island with 130,000 people is a major cost.

We have pleaded with the government. Our amendments have been ruled out of order. I think the government is nickeling and diming and cutting the thing tight for producers and small provinces. A bill which theoretically would work will not work because premiums are so much higher. I do not have all the figures, but for corn the premium rose from something like $5.70 to $10 an acre. That is almost a 50 per cent or 60 per cent increased cost per acre to move from an 80 per cent coverage to a 90 per cent coverage.

Besides that increased cost for those producers, provinces like Prince Edward Island are going to have great difficulty. They are hoping that through cost shared arrangements or some other deal the government can slip them $500,000 under the table rather than cost sharing it on a proper basis up front.

When the ministers of agriculture met last year in Saskatoon, it is interesting that provinces like Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Ontario and British Columbia opposed it. There was no change in the existing legislation as far as Newfoundland and Quebec were concerned. Producers across the country opposed it. Yet we ended up with this cost sharing arrangement which will only mean that we will have to bring in special drought assistance programs whenever there is a national disaster such as we had in 1988 and in 1989. Provinces like Saskatchewan, Manitoba and southwestern Ontario have already demanded crop assistance for 1989 as well as 1988. We can understand it in the case of corn producers. If we look at their net margin and the volume, their returns as a group are almost the same in 1989 as they were in 1988.

The Minister of Finance can come into the House as he did in April 1989 and say that he is going to save $200 million in crop insurance because he is going to off load on to the provinces. We see provinces like P.E.I. facing an increase of almost 400 per cent in the cost of its premiums.

That is a serious problem for those provinces, but equally serious is the fact that many responsible farm organizations—the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Corn Producers, and many other groups—are saying that the problem with this bill is that we will not get the same kind of coverage because the premium costs will be so high.

We are not even guaranteed as is in the existing bill that the government will provide even 25 per cent. If the government drops that on some whim to 20 per cent or lower, provincial governments or farmers will end up with a major new cost as a percentage of the total premiums to be paid.

The amendment we have before us would at least ensure that the federal government is to provide 25 per cent of the costs. This is a good amendment. I hope that the government will accept it. It does not require any change in the royal recommendation because it provides up to 25 per cent now. All the minister has to do is accept the amendment and farmers will at least be assured that the federal government is making a commitment to ensure that at least 25 per cent will be paid under the cost sharing arrangements with the provinces and the producers under this legislation. I hope that the government will accept this amendment.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly appreciate the intent of hon. members, both the hon. member who proposed the amendment and my hon. friend across the way from Algoma.

What is important to remember is that the wording has been chosen very carefully because it has to be consistent with the provisions contained within the clause itself. It preserves the very important principle of equal sharing between the federal and the provincial government.

Bearing in mind that crop insurance programs fall within provincial jurisdiction, the federal government actually reimburses moneys to the provinces that have advanced the federal share of premiums to their respective insurance agency. In order to get a full appreciation of this, Mr. Speaker, you have to go back and read the beginning of Clause 4 which talks about contributions. It really reflects my earlier statement when it states:

> The contribution payable to the government of a province in respect of a year in relation to an insurance scheme shall be an amount equal to the aggregate of (a) 50 per cent of the expenses incurred by the province in that year in the administration of the insurance scheme—

That is 50 per cent of the cost of administration and it continues:

> —and (b) an amount equal to the share of the premiums paid by the province under the insurance scheme in that year, up to a maximum of 25 per cent of all premiums paid under the insurance scheme in that year.

What we are enshrining in here is the principle of 50 per cent of the cost of administration and up to 25 per cent of the share of the premium paid by the province under the insurance scheme in that particular year. The words in this clause have been chosen very carefully to reflect the fact that we must have the flexibility to match the amount paid by the province in the event a province were to elect to pay less than 25 per cent.

We have no intention of reducing our share, but if in the event a province did, we would have to comply consistent with that principle of equal sharing. This is a matter of upholding a principle and of maintaining consistency. We have to be consistent with the principle that underlines the program and is contained earlier in the clause I just quoted.

I should say as well that at our request the Department of Justice has reviewed the clause. It has pointed out that subparagraph 4(1)(a)(ix) at page 3 sets out the elements that are to form part of an insurance scheme established in the province in order for the scheme to qualify for contributions. This is driven by the provincial government and these are the conditions that have to be set out for the federal government to participate.

If we look at subparagraph 4(1)(a)(ix), at the top of page 4, we find that it outlines the manner of determining the premiums to be paid under an insurance contract and the share of those premiums to be paid by the province. Under that particular provision of the bill it provides that the share of premiums can be spelled out in the federal–provincial crop insurance agreements.

I want to assure all hon. members in the House and the country that we will be ensuring that a clause is put into each agreement with our provincial counterparts to the effect that both levels of government will be contributing 25 per cent. I have no difficulty with that whatsoever.

What we want to do is ensure that the province contributes 25 per cent and we will contribute 25 per cent, and that will be enshrined in each of the respective agreements. I think that in itself should give hon. members comfort and assurance that we will fulfil and uphold our obligation.

Therefore this particular clause would be inconsistent and it could have the effect of violating a fundamental principle that is enshrined in the bill.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow on the minister's comments. For the last year and a half that we have been discussing this particular bill, the federal government has been making a good point that it is 50 per cent, 25 per cent and 25 per cent.

However, if there is a reduction by the provinces under the present structure of that particular clause, there will be an equal counter-reduction by the federal government and the information that we have been passing out around the country will be wrong. Instead of producers being 50 per cent, the producers will be 80 per cent or whatever is the decision. If they go down to 10 per cent or 15 per cent, then we would have a situation which would no longer be the situation with which we have been dealing for a considerable length of time.

The minister made the point that they can put into the contract an assurance that it would stay at 25 per cent. All this particular amendment does is make sure that the federal government in its contract with the province will put it in at 25 per cent because if it does not the cost sharing will break down.

Consequently, it seems to me that all we are doing by passing this particular amendment is making sure that the 50, 25, 25 and 50 per cent of the administration costs will happen. In other words, we are fulfilling the promises we have made to the producers across the country.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have just a brief comment. I do not know whether it is in order for me to ask the minister to make a clarification.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, it is.

Mr. Vanclief: Following on the comments of the previous speaker, what the minister said in his comments a minute ago if I understood him correctly was that the wording of the bill at the present time is up to 25 per cent. If a province were to make a decision for whatever reason to back off to 15 per cent, then this legislation would allow the federal government to back off to 15 per cent. This would be a total contribution to the premium cost of 30 per cent, leaving 70 per cent to be picked up by the producer.

I would like to stress to the minister that this is a concern I have heard from many producers. Given the criticism that many of our agricultural programs are coming under in the world and given the trading situation at the present time, this may very well be an action that could be taken by a government in order to quell concerns and to satisfy people. That is the concern of producers.

If we take this to the extreme, it could go down to zero and zero, and the federal and provincial governments would simply split the administrative costs fifty-fifty while the producers would have to pay 100 per cent of the premiums. I am not saying that is the intention of this government or of any government, but the way I understand the legislation it is not an impossibility for that to happen legally or for it to go down to 1 per cent. What is the guarantee that it will not go down, down and down?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be indifferent because I know what the hon. member is driving at. The principle he outlines in terms of the federal government's share is pretty clear in our own mind. These are set out in the respective agreements that we negotiate with each of the provinces. Each of the agreements varies in some detail. We lay out here the terms and conditions under which we reimburse and refund, bearing in mind that crop insurance is a provincial responsibility and a provincial program.

What we are defining here are the criteria under which the federal government shares in the cost. The principle of equal sharing is inherent throughout this particular piece of legislation. It is based upon the premise that 25 per cent of the funding will be paid by the province and 25 per cent of the funding paid by the federal government. I have indicated that that is our commitment. It stands on that basis.

On the basis of the legal requirement and the review of the Department of Justice, in order to be consistent and in order to maintain the principle of equal sharing it has to be provided for in the bill in the manner in which it is described at the present time.

I sympathize with the hon. member. I know what he is driving at. I can only reiterate that our firm commitment is there. On the basis of the negotiations that will take place, we will ensure that the 25 per cent is a fundamental part of the agreements that are negotiated with the provinces.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, when the minister was responding to my comments he did not deal with the question of provinces like Prince Edward Island which are facing a massive increase in their premiums. Their administrative costs in the past have been about $150,000. Their premiums and the premiums provided under this proposed legislation will be something like $650,000 plus the administrative costs or cost sharing. Prince Edward Island is facing a $500,000 increase in cost. Since that province did not agree I just wonder if any special arrangement or system is to be provided by the federal government for those smaller provinces.

I ask this question in view of the fact that under the existing legislation Prince Edward Island is not even guaranteed that it will get 25 per cent. The federal government may provide it. It should provide it and we hope that it will, but it is not guaranteed. I assume that there are similar figures for New Brunswick and British Columbia since they are both opposing this legislation. I wonder what arrangement there will be for such a massive increase in premium costs for smaller provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before recognizing the hon. minister, I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members that particularly right now when debate is permitted no member shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes during proceedings of any amendment at this particular stage.

Motions Nos. 5, 9 and 10 will be moved and we will have 10-minute speeches. Perhaps we can deal with this motion and begin consideration of the next one.

I will allow the minister to answer the question this time, but I think we should follow the Standing Orders.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I was going to rise on a point of order to seek unanimous consent to respond to the very legitimate question of the hon. member. With your permission I will try to respond as briefly as I possibly can.

In his earlier remarks the hon. member left the impression that the whole country, all provinces, wanted a sharing arrangement of a third, a third and a third. He is absolutely wrong, and he should not leave that impression because he was not at Prince Albert. This happens to be a provincial program. I want to remind him, once again, that the provinces that utilize crop insurance to the fullest wanted no part of the one-third/one-third/one-third arrangement. He should know that. Ontario was there and it reluctantly accepted it.

They would have preferred the one-third/one-third/one-third sharing arrangement, but it was something like dealing with the Constitution. One will not get unanimous agreement on everything one does, in spite of one's best efforts. We did try to work out a solution to the problem and try to bring forth a piece of legislation that would reflect in a genuine way the best interests of all the producers and the participating provinces. I want to make sure that that impression is clarified.

The hon. member says that British Columbia is against this piece of legislation. That province has had some reservations but it is on board. New Brunswick has had some reservations, but we were working out an accommodation for them. It was not objecting to the principle as much as it was objecting to the fact that it needed some time to phase in the new sharing arrangement. We said that we were prepared to work with them in helping them ease into the new sharing arrangement. Those discussions are ongoing. We are prepared to do the same thing with Prince Edward Island.

This is not the perfect piece of legislation, but there are many players who are involved. We believe that it is a good starting point from which we can build a better crop insurance program on the basis of improvements that may be brought forth from time to time. When the hon. member suggests that this is more off-loading on the part of the federal government on to the provinces, I want to remind him that the share of the federal government's participation is not going down. It is going up. It is up to around $300 million odd this year, and it will be back to that level in the 1994–1995 crop year again.

The suggestion that this is an attempt to off-load is certainly not accurate. Whatever burden that has been shifted on to the provinces has been taken up by the improvements and the enhancements to the program. We firmly believe that, because crop insurance is a provincial responsibility, they should be sharing more than just simply the cost of administration. They should be sharing at least a part of the premium and equal to, if not more, than what the federal government is providing. I think that that is fair and that is what we have tried to achieve. We have tried to achieve a balance that will provide improvements.

As a matter of fact, the multi-year disaster benefit program, which has just unleashed an additional $100 million or so to those who have had successive crop failures as a result of drought or other weather related disasters, is an add on and an enhancement. We are going to see more of that in this particular program.

The urgency of this is such that we should get along with it and move it ahead. It has had a great deal of public discussion. It does have a great amount of support from the provinces. We have tried to work together with the provinces and the producers, in designing this legislation as best we can.

I know that it is the job of hon. members opposite to try to get more and to identify weaknesses, and I am attempting to respond to them. I can assure them that this is the best possible solution that we can come up with at this time, and I urge their co-operation and understanding. If improvements are needed as we go along, I am sure that we can attend to them in the due course of time. This is a very major step forward and I commend it to all hon. members.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With regard to the rules, I believe that what we should have been doing is having 10-minute speeches with no questions and comment period. I believe that is correct.

As a matter of fairness, however, the agriculture critic from the Liberal party has had a question. I know that the member for Mackenzie has a short question and I would ask the Chair to allow the member to put that question, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is report stage today, and it is not committee of the whole. Each member should speak for 10 minutes, then we can go on to the next motion. There are two other motions, so it is not that we are going to delete any debate here today.

The hon. Member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it is report stage. I just note that we had diverged from the rules and, since the minister was taking questions, I wondered if I could ask one.

We listened with great care to his explanations as to why he had to reject my amendment. I believe he said that he had to do this because he had no way of making certain that the share that the province paid would be the same as the share that the federal government paid. I think that he and all future ministers—and we always have to think of future ministers when we are putting bills before Parliament because the bills will last a long time—still have that power under Clause 4(1)(a)(ix) of the act, which he quoted today himself. It permits the minister to set out the elements that are to form part of an insurance scheme established in the province, in order for the scheme to qualify for contributions, including the manner of determining the premiums to be paid under an insurance contract, and the share of those premiums to be paid by the province.

I submit to the minister that his or any future minister's ability to determine what share of those total premiums the province pays is still well protected with my wording. I would ask him again to consider that, since it is in effect guaranteeing that the federal government will be contributing 25 per cent, and since this other clause that I just quoted permits him to extract an equal share from each of the provinces, is it not what we are really trying to do with this amendment that I have proposed? Are we not trying to guarantee that the producers will never be stuck with more than 50 per cent of the premiums?

He has been addressing the equality between the federal and the provincial governments, but the whole reasoning behind this change to the crop insurance legislation was to ensure that producers also had a certain amount of protection. I would like his response as to how he sees the producer being protected if an amendment such as mine is defeated by his members and if the governments, federal and provincial together, choose to pay less than 50 per cent. Where then is the protection for the producer? The producer will have to pay more than 50 per cent. That was the whole reasoning behind the amendment in the first place.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, in part answered his own question, inasmuch as the precise share is technically spelled out in the agreements that are negotiated between the federal government and the province. That is what that whole clause outlines.

As far as we are concerned, we ensure that we are going to be incorporating the sharing arrangement of 25–25–50. That will be reflected in each of the agreements that are negotiated. My legal people tell me that that flexibility has to remain within the context of this particular bill to preserve the principles and to maintain the consistency of the act.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at the comments just made by the hon. minister. It is very clear that the government is doing nothing more than simply playing politics with the producers in western Canada, at a time when they are in a crisis situation. They need some stability and some certainty from the government. What the government said before is not what it is doing now. In the promotional material that it sent across the country, it is very clear. I have a copy of one of these promotions right here. It states that the federal government will pay 25 per cent of the premiums.

The minister is simply playing political games. There is no assurance for the producers of the country that down the road the federal government will continue to pay 25 per cent. The motion moved by the member for Mackenzie would clarify that. It clearly states that it will be "an amount equal to 25 per cent of all premiums paid". That is very clear. It clarifies and makes certain the position that was put forth by the government earlier. To have this motion defeated will put the producers in a very risky situation. Who knows what will happen in the future?

If the government decides to reduce the premiums to 20 per cent or 15 per cent, who is going to pay the extra amount? It may well be the producers. In fact, until recently, the federal government was paying 50 per cent of the premiums. Now it is down to 25 per cent. The government said it was 25 per cent, but now this bill states "up to 25 per cent". It could be reduced below 25 per cent in the future. The government is doing nothing more than playing politics with the producers across the country. The minister and the government know that.

An Hon. Member: It is shameful.

Mr. Laporte: Yes, it is shameful.

The producers need some assurance. They need the assurance of the government that it is looking after their interests and the needs of agriculture.

The whole rural infrastructure of the country is in a very sorry state these days. The economic infrastructure in western Canada, which is agriculture, is in a very shaky situation. The infrastructure in Atlantic Canada, which is the fishing industry, is in a very shaky situation. What people need in western Canada is some assurances, commitment and leadership from the government. They are not getting it. They are getting games and double-talk from the government. This is not what the producers in western Canada deserve. Furthermore, when producers in western Canada are in difficulty, the whole infrastructure of western Canada is in difficulty too.

In the last few years in the province of Saskatchewan we have seen a falling out of the bottom of agriculture. As a result, we have 14 per cent of people in that province living below the poverty line. That is 14 per cent, which is the second highest number of people living below the poverty line of any province in the country. Only Newfoundland exceeds that. In addition to that, we have lost 28,000 people from of the province last year, a direct loss of population. A lot of that can be attributed to the agriculture economy.

What people need in Saskatchewan and in western Canada is some commitment by the government that it is doing something to help the agricultural economy of western Canada. When the agricultural economy is in crisis, small businesses are in crisis. The general store owner in small towns is in difficulty. The people who sell fertilizer, gasoline, and fuel are in difficulty. The government has not provided the leadership that people in western Canada need. This is just one more example of double-talk and politics. There is one thing the government is very good at and that is playing politics and political strategy. It is not very good when it comes to helping ordinary Canadians. That is the real failing of the government.

As the member for Mackenzie pointed out, Clause 4 of the bill allows this government and future federal governments to negotiate with the provinces with respect to cost sharing. There is nothing that hinders that ability in the amendment put forth by the member for Mackenzie. His motion simply gives some assurances to farmers and producers of western Canada and across the country that the government is going to commit itself to paying 25 per cent of the crop insurance premiums. It is not asking too much for the government to put its legislation where its mouth is. That is all we are asking. For the minister to stand up and make those comments is an outrage, and it is an insult to western Canadians.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I was in the House listening to the member from Moose Jaw. He kept using the word "politics", and said we are playing politics.

I wish the member would read the wording of the bill under which crop insurance is presently enacted. It is the bill that provides the details and the administrative and legal framework for the agreements which the federal government signs with the provinces. He would see that the wording is very similar to that of the present bill. If he saying that we are playing politics with the bill that is before the House, he is, by implication, saying that we have been doing the same thing for the last 20 or 25 years during which crop insurance has operated.

With regard to politics, it may be useful to look at how various political stripes of governments have treated farmers. My province had an NDP government until two years ago. One can look at the amount of money we spent federally in the province of Manitoba and the amount of money that was spent provincially. I am sure that producers would be interested to know that for the last year in which the NDP was in power in Manitoba, it contributed something like 8 per cent of all the money spent directly to support agriculture, as opposed to the federal government spending 92 per cent.

If the hon. member wants to talk politics, first of all I would suggest that he read the legislation that crop insurance presently operates under and compare it to the wording we have in front of us in the amendment. He would have to admit that it is very similar and that this bill is going to provide considerable advantage to producers that they do not have now under the present legislation. If he would go back and examine again the record of the last NDP government in the province, he would see who was playing politics and who was there for the farmers in terms of support. I will back our Minister of Agriculture's word and commitment to agriculture to anybody and any NDP government from coast to coast in the country.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the minister admonish the member for Algoma by saying that he had not been in Prince Albert when the discussions on this took place.

I was in Prince Albert, that being my home town. I was not party to the closed door discussions, but I was at the press conference and heard the explanations to the media and other interested parties when the minister announced the agreement which had been reached. There was no hint in the words of the minister at that time that there might be anything less than a 50 per cent contribution from the two combined levels of government or that a possibility existed in the legal framework that by some action of some government, farmers could end up picking up 60, 70 or 80 per cent of the cost of premiums. That was no part of the discussions at all.

The minister knows that he very clearly left the impression that the federal share would be 25 percent, the provincial share would be 25 per cent, and the farmer's share would be 50 per cent. That is very important to hammer home. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre so clearly said, what the farming community needs is some certainty and security and it needs to get away from ad hoc programming. Helpful as it may be from time to time, certainly it does not encourage somebody to go the bank another year to get another loan or young people to get into farming. There has to be security for the farmer.

I am afraid that the government, by rejecting this amendment, creates the impression among farmers that, yes, indeed, agriculture programming is highly political.

The previous member who spoke wanted to make some partisan comparisons. Some may be valid and some may not be. The farming community is becoming cynical about politicians and the basic willingness and good faith of governments to come to their assistance.

• (1620)

I think if the farming community was to become aware of what is happening, it would again reinforce the cynicism that farmers have about governments because what they see is the provincial governments and federal government protecting themselves but nobody protecting the farmer.

The minister might reconsider Section 4 which allows him to set the terms and conditions. If a particular province does not want to contribute 25 per cent, the minister can say under this legislation that, no, we are not going to be part of this agreement and thereby force every province to contribute 25 per cent. The ability to do that is there even if the minister accepts the hon. member's motion.

The minister makes the point that it is his intention, as long as this government is in power and he is the minister to sign 50 per cent agreements, but he might not always be the minister and government priorities change. When you talk to members privately, there are a lot of decisions not made by ministers. For example, the Minister of Forestry has made commitments all over this country about his commitment to reforestation. The Minister of Finance says, "Well, that is not possible. There is not that kind of money".

In future years the Minister of Finance might say to the Minister of Agriculture, "Sorry, buddy, there is not this kind of money available, we are cutting back on the federal share of crop insurance". There is not much that minister could do about it.

If the polls persist and the Conservative's arch enemies, the Liberals, came to power and decided to make some amendments, that could result in a change. You never know. If farmers are going to feel protected through this and the government is keeping faith with them, there has to be a statutory provision. It just cannot be an agreement. It cannot just be "take my word for it today". Farmers need a statutory provision.

It is possible to meet the minister's objectives by accepting this motion. I urge him to reconsider it and have his members support Motion No. 5, the motion put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am not an agricultural or constitutional expert, but I want to say that the minister brought up the word "Constitution". He talked about the fact that we try to make constitutional agreements. I think what is concerning not only the farmers of this country but people in general is that over the last period the government has basically been on a retreat from national governance, whether it is VIA Rail, unemployment insurance or the Post Office, it has been unloading everything.

As a result, this is a situation here where farmers could face the same exposure. The minister said, "We want to have a 25–25 split with the provinces. But, technically speaking, he is exposing a disadvantaged province because if it cuts back by 5 per cent, then basically what he is saying is that the federal government is going to take its lead from that province. If that is not the case, I stand to be corrected.

When we have so many youths leaving the farms, with bankruptcies and bank managers refusing lines of credit day in and day out, I do not think this is a time for the federal Minister of Agriculture to be in any position where he will have to retreat on something as fundamental as crop insurance.

So I follow other members in this House and ask the minister to make this a statutory requirement.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, just to reiterate what my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds said, the wording in this particular piece of legislation is really the same as it was in the existing legislation. The hon. member asked me to keep faith with the farmers. I am keeping faith with the farmers consistent with the legislation that has been in place for the last 20 years; the same principle, same wording, same thrust. What is so different about the wording today compared to the previous legislation? That is what this debate is all about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: The government should just say clearly and specifically that if a disadvantaged province which may not be able to put its full complement of funds on the table has to cut back 20 per cent, it will not follow that provincial contribution in a matched way and fall back as well. That is what I cannot seem to understand. If it would just say that will not happen, then I personally would be satisfied.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow the hon. minister to answer, but we are getting into a debate again on this report stage. We are not going to get past Motion No. 5 today. The hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member, the record clearly speaks for itself. I appreciate his sincerity and his concern. But when we talk about equality and what the federal government's commitment is to those provinces who have difficulty in meeting some of the challenges in agriculture, my hon. colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, pointed to these facts. In the province of Manitoba in 1988–89, some $551 million worth of federal assistance went into the agri-food industry for 91.72 per cent of the total assistance in agriculture to that province. The province provided $107 million for 8.28 per cent. That was 1988–89.

In 1987–88, it was a similar figure of $782 million for the federal government, and $70 million for the provincial government. In 1986–87, it was $521 million provided by the federal government, and $67.9 million by the provincial government. If that does not demonstrate the sincerity and consideration of the federal government in dealing with agriculture crises as they occur, I do not know what is.

Furthermore, let me just point this out once again. He is a constitutional expert and he probably understands legislation as well. We are using essentially the same wording in this bill as has been used in the past. There is no difference. The contracts, the arrangements, and the agreements that have to be negotiated between the provinces and the federal government still have to be negotiated in the same manner. We contribute consistent with the criteria that has been established here. Our bottom line is, we are there for 25 per cent of the action. We have been there for 50 per cent of the action before and there were no questions asked about it. We are here for 25 per cent of the action now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

An Hon. Member: On division.

Motion No. 5 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 9.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-48 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out line 42 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"Minister, who may for that purpose consult with representatives of such producer organizations as the Minister considers appropriate, and the Minister shall cause a".

He said: Mr. Speaker, during the course of the discussions on this bill in committee, there was a series of amendments which were aimed at providing the minister with the power to strike a consultative or advisory committee to get feedback from farmers and their organizations as to the operations of the crop insurance legislation.

• (1630)

This is, in effect, the most watered down version that we got to. At the committee level most of the members on the government side decided that they had better vote against it until they found out what the government's thinking was. My understanding is that the government now sees that it would, in fact, enhance the legislation, would not harm it at all, and is, I understand, prepared to accept it.

I will not say any more than that. It is simply a matter of permitting the Minister of Agriculture in the future to strike a committee of producers and users of crop insurance across the country so that he or she can better gauge the effectiveness of the program.

I think it is a necessary adjunct to the act. I hope that my understanding that the government will be providing its assent to this motion is correct. I thank the Minister of Agriculture for having accepted it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. I think that it is a reasonable proposal that makes sense when conducting a review of the act that producers be given an opportunity to provide input, guidance and advice with respect to future changes.

We assume that this motion provides sufficient flexibility for the Minister of Agriculture responsible to conduct such an evaluation. Certainly we, on this side, will support the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate my support for this motion. As the minister indicated, I was not at the Prince Albert meeting of ministers last July. The problem was that many groups, like the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which represents Prairie Pools and other groups, were not there either.

Essentially what we had was a carving up of the pie, with the federal government reducing its input by 50 per cent from 50 per cent of premium to 25 per cent of premium. The province is assuming a 25 per cent premium and the farmer is left with the same percentage, 50 per cent of the premium.

The problem with that is that this legislation is very good in some ways. It brings in the waterfowl coverage and more flexibility. Most of all, it increases coverage in many areas of the country from 70 per cent to 90 per cent. That is very important. The problem is that the premiums go up. For instance, in Ontario the premium rate for a car going from 70 per cent to 90 per cent increases from 2.4 per cent of whatever your coverage is to 6.9 per cent. That is almost a 300 per cent increase to gain a 20 per cent improvement in coverage.

The same applies in Saskatchewan where hard red spring wheat goes from 12.5 per cent to 19.5 per cent. That is why I am delighted, because that represents at least a 50 per cent increase of the premium.

Perhaps, since the minister has indicated that he is willing to have this consultation, we will not have this backroom deal taking place in Prince Albert where the three partners—the provincial government, the federal government and the producers— will be at the table so that there will be more consultation. Although the objectives of the bill are laudable because they are going to provide up to 90 per cent coverage, the premiums are going to go up by 50 per cent to go from that 70 per cent coverage which is typical in the west to a 90 per cent coverage which is what we are seeking to achieve.

In many cases, it is even more dramatic than that. In Ontario, for instance, in winter wheat just to go from 80 per cent to 90 per cent, you have an increase of 63 per cent in the premiums. In corn, just to go from 80 per cent to 90 per cent, you have a 64 per cent increase in the premiums. You end up with a good program, but will farmers take it? Mostly, across the country, farmers are saying that they like the program but the premiums are too high to get that maximum coverage. That is why our proposal to have a tripartite arrangement, as we have for pork, beef and other commodities, would be so much more improved. But perhaps with this consultation mechanism proposed in Motion No. 9, there will not be this kind of backroom deal, with the federal and provincial governments, two parts in the tripartite arrangement, cutting a deal with the farmer left out in the cold and still paying 50 per cent of the premium and ending up with a premium so high and so unfairly cost shared that farmers will not be able to afford the additional coverage.

That is made so clear in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief which supports the Prairie Pools. It was made clear by the Canadian corn producers and the Ontario soybean producers. The problem of the whole bill is whether or not we are going to get the adequate coverage.

I want to indicate support from our caucus for this amendment. We have a more formal proposal in Motion No. 10 which would establish a much more formal arrangement for an advisory committee, but I will wait to speak on that a little later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 9 agreed to.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-48 be amended in Clause 8 by adding immediately after line 44 at page 7 the following:

"13.1(1) The Minister may constitute an advisory committee on any terms and conditions determined by the Minister.

(2) The advisory committee may be composed of persons designated by the producers to whom this Act applies, of such persons responsible for the implementation of this Act as are appointed by the Minister and of such persons responsible for the implementation of any insurance scheme and waterfowl crop damage compensation program as are appointed by provincial governments.

(3) The function of the advisory committee is to monitor the efficiency and performance of every insurance scheme and waterfowl crop damage compensation program as well as any matter deemed relevant by the advisory committee.

(4) No terms or conditions determined under subsection (1) shall provide for any remuneration to be payable to any of the persons acting on the advisory committee."

He said: Mr. Speaker, Motion No., 10, standing in my name, is designed to put in place a national advisory committee. We were told in the committee hearings that that was not possible to do, that there were drafting difficulties in this. I have been very careful in drafting this motion to not make it compulsory. It says that "the Minister may constitute an advisory committee on any terms and conditions determined by the Minister". It also sets out those terms and conditions.

We believe that there has to be a better system of safety nets. Crop insurance is one way to get better safety nets. When it comes to agriculture, Canada is not one country, it is at least four or five countries because the types of agriculture that we see in southwestern Ontario are very different from those that we see in northern Ontario, in western Canada, in British Columbia, in Quebec and in the Atlantic provinces. We believe that if you had a national advisory committee on crop insurance that it could lend a great deal of support and assistance to those producers across the country.

We have been very careful in drafting this legislation that it does not infringe on the Royal recommendation, that it does not involve remuneration or other matters which might infringe. A national advisory group could sit down with the minister from time to time throughout the year and would be able to say: "Look, crop insurance nationally is not working because the premium costs are too high". This would have to be canvassed by the various members of the advisory group. If you had a tripartite way of funding, where the farmer would be paying the same amount as the federal and provincial governments instead of the 50 per cent that is proposed in this bill now, it may be that we would get much better coverage.

For instance in the drought year, 1988, corn producers' coverage was something like 30 per cent, or perhaps even lower. Yet they were facing a disaster of tremendous proportions throughout those hot, dry days of June and July 1988.

I believe that this amendment would make this available to the minister. It does not require him to do it because that involves infringing on the royal recommendation. It simply provides a formal arrangement for an advisory group that could meet from time to time.

The minister constituted a task force this winter which is looking at safety net mechanisms. This would put in place a safety net mechanism for consultation on an ongoing basis for crop insurance. Clearly, this is an ongoing demand, an ongoing need, where hundreds of millions of dollars at the federal and provincial levels are spent every year.

There has been some criticism that the administration of crop insurance is sometimes too loose, or that the system is not sensitive enough. This would give us a national perspective where the minister would be able to have representatives from all across the country.

We have known since last November that we have had a demand. Groups like the Prairie Pools have been demanding in the strongest possible terms since last November that the minister bring in a special support program, over and above crop insurance. If he had this advisory board, perhaps he would realize how urgent this is.

The fact that the Premier of Saskatchewan wrote to the Prime Minister last November does not seem to have had any effect. The fact that the Premier of Saskatachewan, a week ago Monday night, went on province-wide television calling for a program of hundreds of millions of dollars of cash flow support, does not seem to have had much impact.

Perhaps if the minister would constitute this advisory group he would see how urgent it is that the government make a cash payment like those that are recommended by the Saskatchewan Pool. We are talking in terms of $500 million. They have been making this request for about four months now. It is essential that payment be made in the next few weeks.

Yet, when officials came here a week or two ago to meet with the Department of Agriculture, they said: "We have not made the decision but if we did make the decision it would be about four months until funds come". That is simply too late. The assistance is needed before seeding. It should already have been committed and made now. Surely, the minister should move even more rapidly now that we are nearing spring seeding and farmers are trying to put a decision in place.

Last week I met with a group of young farmers who are on the Advanced Agriculture Farm Leadership Program. That was the argument that they put to those of us from the three caucuses, that there is so much uncertainty. Is there going to be a special grains program? Nobody knows. In 1986 it depended on whether there was an election in Saskatchewan and on how that election was going. It depended on whether Grant Devine was doing well in the polls or not doing well in the polls.

Clearly that kind of thing, the total uncertainty as to whether or not there are going to be special payments, is extremely discouraging to young people going into farming. Perhaps if we had an advisory committee to the Wheat Board we would have more certainty that there would be a commitment.

American farm producers have a target price which they get if it is below the world price. They have a loan rate that guarantees them a certain percentage of the value of the crop.

We had something like that until the budget of 1989 when the government took away the Prairie Grain Advance Payment Program which had provided a very minimal kind of arrangement. It was based on something like 50 per cent of the crop value. In other words, for every two bushels of grain you had in the bin you could get a loan on one bushel of grain.

There is tremendous uncertainty in the Canadian agriculture scene today. There is uncertainty in our fruit and vegetable industry. There is uncertainty in the pork industry. There is uncertainty in the dairy industry because of concerns with what is happening with American countervail, with GATT and with access by the U.S. to our markets. We need to have more certainty. I think that this crop insurance legislation could give more certainty if cash flows were not so tight, if commodity prices were not so low. This advisory group is simply to try to pull that together to make the crop insurance system work better across the country.

I would hope that the government and other members in the House might support Motion No. 10, which proposes to provide the mechanism or the legal authority for the Minister of Agriculture to constitute an advisory committee on the Crop Insurance Act.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I wish that my hon. friend could have spent a little more time on the amendment speaking about wildlife crop damage.

As the minister well knows, I have some reputation for liking to go out duck and goose hunting, and I have seen what has happened in a field of grain swaths when about 5,000 sandhill cranes and 10,000 or 12,000 geese get into those swaths. There is not much left to even bother with.

I was under the impression that part of my migratory game bird licence and part of my upland game bird licence, which is under the provincial authority, went into the wildlife crop insurance fund for wildlife damage. I hope that is still the case. I wish the minister would tell us what the situation is at the moment. Is some portion of my $15 or $20 migratory game bird licence going into crop insurance for wildlife damage? It used to years ago and it should be now. I hope it is. I would appreciate if the minister would bring me up to date.

I do not have any problem with the amendment. We can support it, it is not anything mandatory. I suspect that we already have advisory committees from Ducks Unlimited, the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the farm community. I would like to hear whether the minister thinks this amendment is acceptable.

Could the minister tell me what the situation is now on the contributions made by various and sundry wildlife associations or the individual hunters from their hunting fees? Is a portion of that earmarked for crop insurance to cover wildlife damage? It used to be years ago.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly to the amendment that is proposed by the hon. member for Algoma. He was talking about all the things that the United States has for its farmers. He failed to mention that the American federal government is proposing to withdraw support of all crop insurance programs. Canada is moving in another direction on that, we are moving to improve crop insurance.

His proposal certainly has merit and I sympathize with it. The difficulty with his motion is that it encroaches on provincial jurisdiction. It goes beyond evaluating the federal act and indeed encroaches into an area of provincial jurisdiction. Such an advisory committee, which would have as its mandate the responsibility of monitoring the efficiency, effectiveness and the administration of provincial legislation, would certainly require the consent of the respective provincial government.

Having regard, however, to the merit that is enshrined within the thrust of the hon. member's motion, I think it would be good use of such a federal-provincial producer advisory committee for fostering a better exchange of ideas, for communication, for sharing information and for looking at the administration and management of the program.

While we cannot, as a federal government, encroach into that provincial jurisdiction, I would be prepared and undertake, as a condition of the agreements, to negotiate with the provinces the establishment of such a committee which could serve the purpose which the hon. member has outlined. In only that way can we avoid the consequence of encroaching into provincial jurisdiction at this particular time. The mandate that the member is proposing would clearly involve provincial legislation as well as federal legislation.

I would be prepared to give the House that undertaking and therefore accept the spirit and thrust of it. However, I do not think we can incorporate it into the legislation itself.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments and sentiments. What he is proposing is exactly what I had in mind when I moved this motion. Essentially it gives the minister legal authority to establish an advisory committee on crop insurance, especially the federal government expenditures in that regard. I have envisaged that he would only establish this advisory committee if and when he had negotiated this arrangement with all the provincial governments. It does not require him to establish this advisory committee, only that he would have the legal authority to establish it after he had negotiated those agreements which provided for that. So if there was one province that did not have crop insurance or did not want to participate, it was not incorporated in its agreement, then of course there would not be a representative from that province in the advisory group.

So just to clarify, I certainly did not want to infringe on provincial legislation. It is simply permissive legislation that would allow the minister to establish this advisory group if and when he negotiated such an arrangement as a combined arrangement from all those 10 provincial crop insurance agreements. I hope that under those circumstances the minister would be able to see his way clear to agree to the amendment.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the minister say that he accepts the spirit of the amendment. I would just like to reiterate what my colleague from Algoma stated, that this is permissive legislation. It says the minister may do this.

We have had somewhat peculiar circumstances in the past years where, under certain circumstances, crop insurance was not able to cover isolated examples of very significant crop losses. I refer here to a few years ago in the northeast section of Saskatchewan, for example, where they were flooded out. The farmers were not able to plant their crops, and because they were not able to plant their crops they did not qualify for crop insurance. So I think that we have to take a look at that in detail. Also in that same year, at the other end of the province, we had a drought and those farmers did qualify for the insurance program.

I would also like to point out that in my own constituency we had a unique situation in Lambton County a few years ago. We had severe rains during the fall of the year and a bad storm along with it. The lake backed up into the Thedford Marsh. On the other hand, they had to open the dam at Parkhill and a lot of the potato growers were literally wiped out. We have one of them in the gallery with us today from the Wiltse family. He is up here listening to this debate.

They know what it is like when they do not have access to crop insurance through some quirk of the legislation or quirk of nature. I suggest that if we have the advisory committee available to us to co-ordinate the input from the provinces and their various crop insurance commissions, we would be able to alleviate a lot of these problems that arise from time to time.

I also think that the government was wrong, when it had the meeting in Prince Albert, that it did not involve the key players. It is easy for a couple of groups to get together and decide: "We will divide up that 50 per cent of the premium. You take half and I will take half and everything is fine." But I look across this country and see the hardships that those farmers are having this year trying not only to cash flow their crops, whether it is in western Canada or Ontario, be it potato producers or corn producers or wheat producers. They simply do not cash flow and they are being turned down by their banks for their input needs.

Surely if there was ever a need for an advisory committee to look at this and to see how we are going to cover these people if they can get their crops in somehow, it is now. If they do not have the financing from the banks, where are they going to get the money to pay for these premiums?

Witness after witness appeared before the legislative committee that was dealing with this bill. Time after time after time we heard the same thing. They were all requesting a three-way split. But obviously the government did not see fit to go that way because it cut a deal where the farmers and the producers were not involved. That must never be allowed to happen again.

It is for this reason that I strongly support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Algoma who put a lot of thought into this amendment. This is an amendment that will make sure that the minister has that authority to go ahead and set up a committee. I think he would be sadly remiss if he did not do that.

There are a lot of improvements in this crop insurance bill. Certainly I agreed with the amendment put forward by the minister at the start of the debate today. It helps to sweeten up the bill by including honey in it, but there are a lot of other things that should be improved.

My colleague already pointed out that with the added cost of the initial coverage, in many instances it is going to almost double the cost of premiums. Many of those farmers are simply not going to be able to afford that added cost when they have to pay 50 per cent of the premiums.

It is a good plan but it has to be improved. Those improvements can only be brought about by the direct involvement of the producers themselves through their advisory committees and in consultation with each other and the provinces.

I suggest that there is another area here where that advisory committee would play a very important role. That is to bring about a better understanding between the provinces of the individual conditions which exist, whether it is in western Canada, Ontario, central Canada, Quebec, or in Atlantic Canada where the conditions are entirely different, and different crops are covered. It would bring about a better understanding between the producers of Canada and be able to make this legislation work far more effectively.

Above all, we have to make sure that the consultative process is adhered to before we have any more major changes in this legislation that affect the cost to the producer and that we do not have any more carving up of the premiums between the federal government and the provinces without that full consultation on the process that is suggested in this amendment by my colleague for Algoma.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the thought that was given to motion No. 10. I point out to the minister again that as it has been stated, it is the word "may" that is in there.

As the minister has pointed out to us many times, and I recognize, this is an enabling piece of legislation. If this government could see fit, and I trust that it will, to put this amendment in the bill, what it says to me, and I think I understand correctly, is that if the provinces agree it gives the minister the opportunity to appoint this type of committee.

This type of committee can do many things. We address what it can do in the amendment. We address the make-up of the committee, that it be made up of those who administrate it, those who purchase the program, in other words those who benefit, and those that look after the program in total.

The purpose of any farm program or any program such as this is as a management tool for the food producers in Canada. What this type of committee can do from time to time, without any obligation by the minister to do anything more than to listen to what they have to say, is to point out the types of things that the witnesses at the legislative committee pointed out.

A program has to be effective. It has to be affordable. Had this committee been in place to review the legislation as we did in the legislative committee, without the confines of the party politics involved, then they would have pointed out to the minister some of the problems of the changes that are being made at the present time. They would also have pointed out some of the good things in the changes in the bill at the present.

However, they would have pointed out that, yes, this bill does give enabling legislation for coverage to go from 70 per cent to 80 per cent, or 80 per cent to 90 per cent. What they would have pointed out is that even though it allows that to happen, when you look at the figures and the reality of what that allows to happen, it is not affordable for the potential purchasers of that insurance program. It is too expensive.

We recognize that when you increase a risk another 10 per cent on the top end, the premiums are going to go up. What the producers asked for in order to compensate for that was that there be a different distribution in the premiums.

I know the minister gets a little upset when we discuss with him the consensus that he talks about that took place in Prince Albert. I will repeat to him how I could see very easily how he got a consensus in Prince Albert.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about that book, too? It was distributed widely.

Mr. Vanclief: It was very easy to get a consensus. There were two out of three parties present at Prince Albert meetings. One was the federal government that was paying 50 per cent of the premium, and it they had a choice to go down to 33 1/3 or down to 25 per cent. Since it was paying, I could see why it wanted to go down to 25 per cent.

I can understand why the minister wanted to do that. They had another party at the table, the provincial governments that were not paying any portion of the premium and they had a choice of going to 25 per cent or 33 1/3 per cent. I can understand why they wanted to stop at 25 per cent rather than going up to 33 1/3 per cent.

However, I point out that there was a third party and they were the producers who had been paying 50 per cent of the premium, but they did not happen to be at the table that day.

Mr. Ferguson: They were not invited.

Mr. Vanclief: No, they were not invited to that meeting. I agree that they had some meetings across Canada. I am sure they were listened to, but they were not heard.

When the minister says that they had a consensus, it is not too hard to get a consensus of two out of three when only two are at the table and the two both agreed to the situation. Rather than being told that there was a consensus, I think he might better come right out and say that there was a unanimous decision. It just so happened that everybody was not there. It is back to the situation, the best committee is a committee of three with two absent. This time the objectors were absent and it was not too hard.

If this type of committee were put in place these types of things could be pointed out to the minister from time to time. The minister said a minute ago that the United States is talking about withdrawing support to any crop insurance program federally in the United States. That may be true. I know that this present government takes a tremendous amount of direction from the United States.

Mr. Mazankowski: Only when you tell us to.

Mr. Vanclief: No, no, not only when we tell you. You take a tremendous amount of direction from south of the border. That is quite obvious and it is becoming more obvious to the farm community every day.

Mr. Mazankowski: So does your premier.

Mr. Vanclief: I would like to point out to the minister that just because it is done south of the border does not make it right. I hope he listens to that and realizes it.

This type of committee could point out to the minister the responses that they gave to us at the legislative committee. We had a group there from the province of Saskatchewan. We all know the problems that the province of Saskatchewan is going through right now. Unfortunately, in the agricultural field they are suffering greater than any other province at the present time because of the weather and the grain price situations, and everything added to it. It does not matter what the price is. If you have nothing in the bin to sell, it is difficult to make money.

When I asked them in the legislative committee if the changes in this piece of legislation were going to improve the situation, they said that the potential was there to make some improvements. I asked if the producers and the farmers in Saskatchewan could afford this program, and they said no. I spoke to a producer from Saskatchewan last night who advised that in order to go up to the level of coverage that this legislation allows them to go to and which they want, it will increase the premium on their farm from $11,000 to $23,000 a year. This producer said that he cannot spend the $23,000 and he is going to have to take that risk.

The purpose of the Crop Insurance Program is to take some of that risk out. It has to be an equitable program. It has to be an affordable program. It has to give adequate coverage. Some of those criteria have been met.

• (1710)

If there was such a committee put in place, I feel that it would give the minister the opportunity to feel out the sense of what is there and hopefully avoid some of the pitfalls that can occur from time to time, whether intentional or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

On a point of order, the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that when you called the question on Motion No. 5, I was involved in a bit of an exchange with the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and that there may have been a misinterpretation on the position that was expressed on this side of the House in that we were opposed to this particular motion. I wonder if you would seek the unanimous consent of the House to go back to the consideration of Motion No. 5 so that the question might be more appropriately put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Mazankowski: Since opposition members have won that round, because they have refused to give unanimous consent to go back, perhaps we could agree to move on to third reading. I think that that is a very major concession that has been granted and it might help us in facilitating the passage of this bill.

I want to repeat to hon. members the points that have been made across the way on the motion that has been proposed by the hon. member for Algoma. I say again that I have a lot of sympathy and it has a lot of merit. Again, I went out to make doubly sure and our Justice officials have indicated and advised us that there clearly would be jurisdictional problems with the motion that is being proposed as it relates to the relationship between the federal and provincial governments.

I want to make it very clear that the only reason that we on this side of the House are taking that position is strictly on the advice of our Justice officials. I think that we will be able to achieve the ultimate objective and really put into effect what the hon. member is proposing here in a different way. I wanted to make that clearly understood by all hon. members. Perhaps with those kind words, we could proceed to third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Shall I call in the members?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, while I was interested in the hon. minister's comments on the point of order that he raised, the consultations that have been taking place are along the line that we would defer the division with regard to motion No. 10 and the report stage vote until tomorrow afternoon. I believe the consultations that have taken place are along that line.

In view of that, I understand that the government is disposed to call it six o'clock. If that were the decision, that would save calling in the members today, because I understand there will be an opposition motion tomorrow which would involve an agreement. The House Leaders have been discussing this and have been expecting that third reading would be debated next Monday. I may be wrong. There may be other consultations, but that is my understanding of the arrangement.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, part of the problem we are having here is that this has erupted in the last couple of minutes. I have had conversations with members on the other side of the House. I have not been able to have conversations with my own party Whip to confirm his understanding of votes. I would think that with the accommodation that has existed within the House today, perhaps we could pass report stage on division and go from there.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the arrangement was that we would defer the division until tomorrow on report stage and that we would go to third reading next Monday on this bill.

Mr. Cooper: I am sorry to cause confusion and difficulty for the Chair. Perhaps the Chair could give us a couple of minutes because we do want to make sure that there is co–operation between the three parties, which is clearly the intention at this moment. We just had to get the right players together. If we could have a couple of minutes that will allow us to resolve it.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between the parties and I think you will find there is agreement that the questions would be put and we will deal with them when they are put. I understand the questions will be disposed of without the necessity of a vote. Assuming report stage of the bill is adopted, as I am sure it will be, we will then adjourn.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we do not want you to put the yeas and nays on the division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would you like me to put the question on Motion No. 10 again?

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Motion No. 10 negatived.

Mr. Mazankowski moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members on all sides of the House for their co–operation this afternoon. May we call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 5.21 p.m.

TABLING OF 1988-89 ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister for External Relations, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the 1988-89 annual report for CIDA.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

WEARING OF DISTINCTIVE UNIFORM

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I said shortly after my appointment as Solicitor General that I would be examining as a priority possible modifications to RCMP regulations governing the wearing of the Force's distinctive, or red tunic, uniform.

I again said in the Commons last Friday that I was reviewing this complex issue and that I would be making an early decision when I had verified the facts.

[English]

Madam Speaker, today I wish to inform the House that I have completed my study of this issue and am now responding to the recommendation of the RCMP Commissioner to amend the RCMP regulations governing the wearing of the red tunic uniform.

First, the amended regulations under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act will state that female members will now wear the same red tunic uniform as male members of the force. The design of this uniform will remain the same.

A second amendment permits the Commissioner to exempt individual RCMP members from wearing items of the force's official uniform on the basis of the member's religious beliefs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cadieux: The modifications to the regulations to accommodate religious beliefs squares with Canadian human rights legislation and reflects this government's strong commitment to a multicultural society.

[Translation]

But the changes will also encourage Canadians from visible minorities to seek a career in our national police force so that it reflects more clearly Canada's varied ethnic and cultural composition.

[English]

Debate about RCMP uniforms has been comprehensive, intense and lengthy. Many strongly held and strongly expressed views had to be considered before a decision was possible. A decision has now been taken. I believe that the decision is not only correct in law but that it is also the right decision to make.

I encourage all Canadians to support the RCMP, not only in these changes but in the leadership it is showing in making policing as a career open to all Canadians.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal caucus and the Liberal party, I want to congratulate the Solicitor General for taking a decision that most believe was long overdue, a decision that deals with the RCMP dress code regulations, not just in connection with the Sikh turban but deals also with the uniform worn by female members of the force. In fact, it deals radically with the uniform worn by female members of the force.

I cannot proceed further without noting that it took eight months for the previous Solicitor General to make no decision. It took this Solicitor General two weeks to make a decision. I do not know why this Solicitor General is so speedy, but we do congratulate him for making this decision at this time.

Although it is not the most important issue surrounding that decision, I cannot help but point out that as a result of the procrastination of the Solicitor General, and not of the RCMP because they put in their views last June, there have been many things said and done that we in the House would rather not have heard said and done over the last few months.

I should state that there was really a leadership vacuum and instead of leadership we had a debate which hopefully in the long run will be seen as healthy, although in the short run there was certainly some downside. I want to suggest that there may even be a continuing leadership vacuum in other areas here in this Parliament on the part of the government in dealing with bilingualism, minority language rights, and efforts to ensure progress in the objectives of the Meech Lake Accord.

In any event, without overstating that, I want to point out that we have not changed the stetson as part of the uniform. We have only exempted the wearing of the stetson for religious reasons. That particular exemption is completely consistent with our Charter and I believe with the views of Canadians.

We should not confuse that exemption with multiculturalism. Yes, there is a connection, but I do not think this is the same thing. I apologize to any Dutch Canadians for stereotyping them, but this is not the same as allowing Dutch Canadians to wear wooden shoes as part of the uniform in the RCMP. This is a much different situation; this is a religious exemption.

In conclusion, my party is very pleased to support the decision of the Solicitor General and we look forward to all the benefits that will accrue as a result of that decision.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, this decision, for which we congratulate the minister, has our complete, firm and unqualified support. It is a correct decision and we are very pleased that the minister has made it and announced as quickly as he has.

I know there are many Canadians who are concerned about this and I want to say to them that I hope they will give this change a chance. It is very important for this country that this step be taken.

It should be understood that the change announced by the minister, as he has referred to it, was required by law. Commissioner Inkster, when he appeared before the justice committee last year, explained the rationale for his recommendation. He said that when he was first asked about this in 1984, he stated that it was not a requirement or that it was not even permitted under the RCMP rules. But when he looked at the law, and particularly the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Canadian Charter of Rights, he came to the conclusion that there was no choice, this was a requirement of our law and it must be understood by Canadians to be so.

It is also a tribute to the Sikh community in Canada and to the potential for Sikh Canadians to play a very strong role in our police force and in our armed services. The Sikhs have a long tradition of public service in this area and it is in recognition of this as well that this decision has our support.

Thirdly, this is a very important statement in respect of the government's views and of Parliament's views against racism in this country. I want to pay tribute to the statement made last week by the Prime Minister. I do not often get a chance to do that, but his statement on this issue was a very good statement and one which I know reflected the feeling of the overwhelming number of members of Parliament and of the overwhelming number of Canadians, and that should be understood.

Those who appeared in certain aspects of last night program on The Journal do not reflect the views of Canadians and I applaud the decision that the minister has taken. It is important that he has made this as his first statement of policy in this House. It is a progressive step. He has a big agenda ahead of him and I hope that this will be the first of many progressive statements that he will be making in his new role as Solicitor General of Canada.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN STATUTES TO ENABLE RESTRAINT OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce a bill entitled an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the hon. minister have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

The hon. member for Louis-Hébert, on a point of order.

Mrs. Duplessis: Madam Speaker, I would like it to be read into the record that if I had been present, I would have voted for the government.

[English]

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the first time and printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? On a point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the bill before us is one to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures. In other words, without having seen the bill, it sounds as though it is one to reduce the government expenditures, yet attached to the bill is a royal recommendation.

I want to give notice today that once I have seen the bill and been able to see how it restrains expenditures, I will object to the attachment of this royal recommendation to the bill as an improper use of the royal recommendation.

I think, frankly, the government House Leader has not studied the bill, unless it happens to be one of these Tory tactics of saving money by spending like the GST where we have spent $300 million to collect the tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I think there would be unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on the just completed vote to this one.

Mr. Gauthier: As long, Madam Speaker, as we do not get into an extended period of members wanting it to be shown on the record that they just walked in. I know members who were not here at the first vote; if they would be given the chance to record their vote, I would agree to that.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do not have unanimous consent. All those in favour of the motion will please rise.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

SUBCOMMITTEE ON FISHERIES—AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Madam Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent in the House for the following motion:

[English]

That the subcommittee on fisheries of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries, and the necessary staff be authorized to travel to Boston to attend an international seafood show on March 20 to 24, 1990.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the hon. minister have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Routine Proceedings

PETITIONS

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to present to the House of Commons today a petition under Standing Order 36.

This concerns an environmental issue in the Rouge Valley, 10,000 acres of very precious wilderness area. The petitioners are calling on the Parliament to work with the government of Ontario to establish the Rouge River Valley as a Canadian heritage land or provincial park.

This is a very important issue because of the imminent announcement—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

It is very difficult for the Chair to hear what is going on. I am glad to see the hon. member is now leaving the House, because he was totally blocking the aisle so that the Chair could not even see the member who had the floor.

Had the hon. member concluded her remarks?

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, this is a particularly important issue, because the provincial government owns about 80 per cent of this land. The national Minister of the Environment has visited the area. The Speaker of the House of Commons has visited this particular area, and it is very important that this petition is heard by the members of the House of Commons because of the importance of the timing of this issue.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have the duty to table 10 petitions today from people who want to tell this Parliament how they feel about the Conservative government's proposal to impose upon Canadians an additional tax on everything they buy, every service they obtain.

This 7 per cent tax proposal is objectionable to many Canadians. These particular petitioners would like to make it known to the House of Commons that they strongly oppose the goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians that will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. In these people's opinion, they would like to see this proposal rejected by the Parliament of Canada.

REUNIFICATION OF GERMANY

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. I think you will find that all parties in the House of Commons agree with this petition.

The undersigned are residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.

Whereas, the unification of Germany is a concern not only of the two existing German states, France, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States, but also a concern of neighbouring states, Poland in particular; and,

Whereas, history has shown that agreements affecting a given country concluded without its participation lead to instability, and are a source of potential danger; and,

Whereas Canada is looked upon by many countries as the champion of their rights, we are confident that the House desires not only to preserve Canada's good repute among nations, but also to enhance it by supporting the inalienable rights of each country to be an active participant in any gathering resolving matters affecting its interests.

Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to (a) recognize the present borders between Poland and the German Democratic Republic as the boundary between Poland and any future unified German state as final and inviolable; and, (b) support the demand of the Polish government to be an active participant in any gathering in deliberation where any matters affecting Poland's interest's will be discussed and resolved. As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from Chibougamau, Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the Tax Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Chibougamau is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient as it concerns the Northern tax benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the North and offers no incentive to develop northern resources.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I have a petition under Standing Order 36 approved as to form. It is petition from 510 of my constituents with respect to the proposed goods and services tax. It states that "the proposed law would be inflationary, regressive and would reduce the standard of living of Canadians generally."

It is my honour to present that petition.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition signed by many Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax. They regard this tax as inequitable, unjust, unfair, mean, and completely contrary to their wishes. They call upon Parliament to reject this tax.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition to this honourable House.

Once again, the petition is against the goods and services tax and, again, added to the thousands of names from throughout my riding and the rest of Canada which I have presented to the House. This particular petition is from various places in British Columbia, including Kitimat and Kelowna.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax, reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and ensure, if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, that this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax-grab.

They ask that the government cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 208, 215, and 216.

[Text]

MONEY RAISED BY PROCAN

Question No. 208—Mr. Hughes:

1. In each of the past five fiscal years, has PROCAN raised money from (a) licence fees (b) royalty fees and, if so (i) what amount (ii) is there a projected amount for the current year and, if so, what amount (iii) what amount of the sums collected goes to administration (iv) in what way are the other funds expended or to be expended in each of the above six fiscal years, including such details as the number of employees and location of employment?

2. In the past two fiscal years (a) what number of sources are there paying licence and royalty fees (b) what percentage of the total fees collected are collected from volunteer or charitable organizations?

3. What amount is raised by the assessment of the basic minimum licence fee?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): 1. i) PROCAN's raison d'être is to collect royalties and licence fees on behalf of copyright owners, for public performance of musical works.

Licence fees and royalty fees collected in fiscal years 1984–88 (December 31) were as follows:

1988: $27.5 M
1987: $25.2 M
1986: $24.1 M
1985: $20.5 M
1984: $19.7 M

These include fees, charges and royalties collected in respect or domestic broadcasting and other public performances, and income from foreign royalties and rights. This information is directly extracted from PROCAN's financial statements, that the organization is required to file annually with CCAC. Such information for the year ended on December 31, 1989 is not yet available.

ii) No projection for the fiscal year 1990 is available.

iii) During the fiscal years 1984–88, administrative and general expenses have represented between 19.4% and 22.2% of the total income (which consists almost exclusively of amounts collected plus interest). The percentages for each year are the following:

1988:—19.4% ($5.3 M)
1987:—21.7% ($5.5 M)
1986:—20.5% ($4.9 M)
1985:—22.2% ($4.6 M)
1984:—21.8% ($4.2 M)

iv) No breakdown of PROCAN's administration and general expenses reported above is available. PROCAN has approximately 90 employees located in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Halifax, Edmonton.

2. a) The Department does not have specific information about the "number of sources" nor does it have any information for example on the number of individuals and organizations that remit fees to PROCAN. However, the tariffs in compensation for the right to perform in Canada dramatico-musical or musical works, in respect of which PROCAN is authorized to grant performing licences, must be approved annually by the Copyright Board and are published in the Canada Gazette. In 1989, there were 20 tariffs applicable to various user categories such as television and radio stations, cabarets, clubs, etc.

About 10 per cent of PROCAN's income is from foreign sources.

b) PROCAN does not collect any fees from charitable organizations as this is not permitted under s. 27(3) of the Copyright Act, which reads as follows:

> "No church, college, or school and no religious, charitable or fraternal organization shall be held liable to pay any compensation to the owner of any musical work or to any person claiming through that author by reason of the public performance of any musical work in furtherance of a religious, educational or charitable object".

3. There is no basic minimum fee. There are 20 different tariffs each providing for different minimum amounts.

THE PURCHASE OF TWO VESSELS FOR MARITIME COMMAND

Question No. 215—Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth):

Did the government purchase two vessels for the Canadian Forces Maritime Command from Tidewater Inc. or its subsidiary Tidex and, if so (a) what was the total acquisition cost (b) did the vessels contain any limpet-sprayed asbestos and, if so (i) was it completely removed (ii) did the government pay for the removal and, if so, at what cost (c) did the electrical systems of the vessels require any conversion and, if so, did the government pay the cost (d) were the vessels renamed and, if so, with what names (e) have the vessels had any breakdowns or malfunctions during their operation by Canadian Forces Maritime Command and, if so (i) of what nature (ii) have they been corrected (iii) what amount did the repairs cost (iv) who paid for them?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): The Government purchased two vessels for the Canadian Forces Maritime Command from Tidewater Inc.

a) $2.75M.

b) No.

c) No.

d) The vessels were renamed: HMCS MORESBY and HMCS ANTICOSTI.

e) Yes.

i) HMCS MORESBY's auxiliary diesel engine burned out due to lack of lubrification oil.

ii) Yes.

iii) The repairs cost $268,819.88.

iv) DND.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOUR INFRASTRUCTURE

Question No. 216—Mr. Mifflin:

1. For the calendar year 1989, was capital funding allocated by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for small craft and harbour infrastructure in each of the seven federal ridings in the province of Newfoundland, and, if so, what amount?

2. Is such funding planned for the calendar year 1990, and, if so, what amounts?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. The Department operates on a fiscal year basis (April to March 31) and data is available on this basis only. Attached are the projected capital expenditures by constituency in Newfoundland for the fiscal year 1989/90.

2. The Small Craft Harbours Capital Works Program for 1990/91 has not been finalized to date. It is anticipated that it will be several months before a final decision can be made on budget allocation and project selection, because assessment of winter damage has not been completed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—REGIONAL DISPARITIES

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved:

That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect, support and promote the regional economies of Canada, in order to eliminate regional disparities in the Atlantic provinces, Northern Ontario and Western and Northern Canada.

• (1200)

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, there have been consultations among the Whips of the three parties. I think there is a predisposition that the vote which is asked for under Government Orders today on the Supply day proceedings be deferred to the close of government business on Monday next. If you were to ask that question, I think you would find unanimous consent in the Chamber for that deferral.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I confirm there have been consultations between all parties. We are agreeable to the vote on today's opposition motion, presented by the Liberal caucus, being deferred until Monday. I would like to ask the government, and perhaps the third party's whip, whether they would agree, considering it is now twelve noon, to let the House sit during lunch time, so that more members will have a chance to take part in the important debate that is taking place today. I give you my word we will not engage in parliamentary tactics that would undermine the harmonious operations of this House.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, as long as the third party in the Chamber, the New Democrats, are willing to proceed on the same understanding, we would like to see the debate on this very important issue take place over as many hours as possible. I think members are entitled to a lunch hour. If there are to be no dilatory motions or anything of that kind during the lunch hour, I can see no difficulty in sitting through the lunch hour and allowing more members an opportunity to speak on this very important topic.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, we would agree to that with the understanding that members would have 20-minute speeches to be divided as agreed among the speakers.

Mr. Gauthier: I concur in that, too, Madam, Speaker, except that I think it would be appropriate that members who are splitting their time tell the Speaker before they start their speeches in the interest of good understanding and good debate.

Ms. Langan: We would, of course, Madam Speaker, agree to that wholeheartedly.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, just in summary, we are deferring the vote until conclusion of government business on Monday, we are sitting through the lunch hour without dilatory motions or parliamentary tactics during that lunch period and members can split their 20 minutes into 10-minute segments provided they notify the Chair. I think we are in accord on all of those principles. We are happy to go along with those suggestions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair agrees that there is a lot of co-operation and the Chair will try to figure out a way to get lunch.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, today, although it is not a great pleasure, I have the opportunity to explain to Canadians what is happening in the regions. I do not think I have to stand here today and explain to people from northern Ontario, the Atlantic region or western Canada what is happening in their regions. My intent today is to talk to the people who do not live in the regions, the larger populations of Canada that live in the large urban centres. I want to explain to them what is taking place in regions like northern Ontario and the Atlantic provinces.

My reasons for doing that are simple. Because we are a small population base in the regions in comparison to the urban centres, we are not paid as much attention to as we would like. The reasons for that are very obvious. Mostly it boils down to politics. When you look at the numbers of seats that are involved in rural Canada versus urban Canada, you can understand why, when election time rolls around, when promises are made, urban Canada tends to get the larger piece of the pie.

There is a bit of a problem with that theme and that is that it is not only unfair but it also causes a difficulty as it relates to what we have seen in the last few months and years in relation to national unity. More and more Canadians are coming forward and saying to us: "We will be damned if we are going to sit here and put up with this any longer. We are going to start to speak out. Our members of Parliament do not seem to be doing anything for us, so we will do it for them".

That is why, Madam Speaker, you have seen certain things take place in the last few months that all Canadians can feel ashamed of, but we can also understand why they are happening.

Let us take a look at some of the things that have happened in the last few years. This is by no means the complete list. I will give just a short list to show Canadians the tremendous difficulties we experience in rural Canada, in northern Ontario, northern Quebec, western Canada and the Atlantic provinces. Because of our lack of infrastructure and lack of development we need and expect that extra bit of help from the government.

In the last while we have seen cuts to VIA Rail and unemployment insurance, we have seen the imposition of the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber which has greatly affected the forestry industry, we have seen the elimination of the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program for our mining industry, cuts in transfer payments which affect our health services and education in the regions, and the threats of cancellation by a particular task force of the northern residents deduction. They have basically recommended a complete elimination of this tax incentive. This deduction improves our ability to encourage skilled labour to move from the southern portions of Ontario to the north to work in areas where there are shortages of skilled labour.

Further, there is the dismantling of regional development programs like FEDNOR and the Western Diversification Fund. When I say dismantling, I mean changes. The programs are still in place. Members across the way talk about FEDNOR or Western Diversification or ACOA or all these great things that relate to the government in power today. But these particular programs have proven, in the short term, not to work.

For example, let me tell you about what FEDNOR has done. I am not opposed to FEDNOR giving grants to businesses, but FEDNOR or regional development programs should be set up for one particular reason, that is to diversify the economy of the regions of Canada that have difficulty competing.

A perfect example of that is FEDNOR. The lion's share of the grants it has given have gone to the tourist industry, which is a very important industry in northern Ontario. One example of the way it distributes money is to give grants to tourist outfitters to add another cabin to their tourist camp. That is not the important mandate of FEDNOR. The mandate of FEDNOR was to help different businesses get involved in the northern economy so we would diversify our economy, not to give handouts so that politicians and northerners would say: "We're happy now. They're appeased. They're all looked after. We are getting what we believe is our share."

Speaking of our share, the amount of dollars that come out of northern Ontario into the pockets of the federal government is enormous. Billions of dollars a year in royalties have come out of the forestry industry and the mining industry. When you look at that in comparison to what we have in development grants and programs, or even infrastructure, it would be an embarrassment for me, as a northerner and as a member of Parliament who represents that area, to say that I think the Government of Canada is doing a good job to improve long-term viability, expansion and the dream of northerners to play an important role in this country.

I will also mention in passing the effects of the goods and services tax that is going to be implemented by this government if it has its way.

Tourism is one of the biggest industries in northern Ontario and the other regions of Canada. Glorified ads are being placed in the United States saying "Come to the regions, come take a look at how beautiful it is in northern Canada." On the other hand, we make it so expensive for those poor tourists that they do not want to come. We have basically priced ourselves out of the market. What a joke that is, Madam Speaker. We in the north have the highest transportation costs because of the price of our gas. The price of gas in the United States and Canada used to be almost equal, but since this government has come into power it has got to the point where even our citizens go across the border to purchase gas because the price is out of sight here.

We have priced ourselves out of the market. For this government to say that it understands tourism is really, for lack of a better word, somebody's cruel way of passing on a joke.

We, as parliamentarians, have to start to look at what effects the programs we are putting in place will have on the regions of Canada as a whole.

I would like to speak on one subject that is dear to me and to all regions of Canada that understand what transportation really means. Our history books taught us that Canada was united by the rail system. This government has taken a perfectly capable and viable means of transportation for the regions outside of the urban areas and dismantled it completely. A perfect example of that is what was known as The Canadian. It used to run through northern Ontario. I tried to explain to the Minister of Transport that that particular run was the third most efficient run in the whole system, and it was cut.

I asked the minister a simple question. If we consider priorities, and this was one of the most efficient runs we had, why was it cut? I suggest it was for political reasons. Because of the small population base through northern Ontario there are only two ridings, besides the two in Thunder Bay, that run all through northern Ontario, which is one-fifth of Ontario. It is much more politically wise to cut that than to cut something in downtown Montreal or downtown Toronto. The fact is that votes add up to election, and I think it is a shame for a government to run a country based on what is most politically expedient.

If the regions of Canada are to survive and to grow, we have to do something about our infrastructure. I have spoken about VIA Rail but I want to talk about transportation in general. The government takes billions of dollars out of our economies through the royalties that we give to all of Canada for development. We have heard that in New Brunswick there is a difficulty with the road system. Well, if you have ever been to northern Ontario you will know we have the worst road system in Canada. In some cases we do not have a road at all. Two-thirds of my riding has no road. A phenomenal amount of development could take place. If we were interested in creating unity, creating economic development, creating a future for Canada, the opportunity lies in those great regions of northern Canada, northern Ontario.

Yes, it costs money in the short term, but so did the railroads. We lived through that and we watched our country grow. Step two of that agenda is to move to the north. Two-thirds of our country is not even developed yet and we continue to cut and cut instead of looking with a vision of Canada to build that road to the Northwest Territories from northern Ontario in order to start to develop the mining communities and native communities up there that are isolated and have 80 per cent to 90 per cent unemployment and suicide rates seven times the national average because they cannot envision any future.

That is what we are talking about here. We are not talking about dollars and cents. We are talking about vision. The members who represent these regions are getting a little fed up. The Reform Party is a perfect example of that. They are getting fed up in western Canada. They have created another party because the party opposite which said for years and years that it was going to give western Canada a voice in government has become a joke. They have had to create another party and look elsewhere.

As a member of the Liberal party I am not pleased with that either, but I still think there is something wrong. People from the regions realize that we are getting short-changed.

It is time to start talking about fairness and equality. I would like to read something from the Constitution that is important to all Canadians. It says: "We, as Canadians, are in charge of promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of all Canadians and furthering economic development to reduce disparities and opportunities across our country."

I do not think anyone has read that statement in the Constitution lately, especially those members who are supposed to be in charge of representing the regions outside of the urban centres of Canada. I know it is difficult. The minister opposite is probably sitting there thinking that he has really fought hard in cabinet to try to make them understand what goes on in Atlantic Canada.

It is time, if we are true to our electorate and true to our hearts, that we do a little more than scream and yell, that we put some action into play. If it means we have to do something drastic like resign our position or sit somewhere else, then maybe we have to do that. It is high time that the regions of Canada and the potential in them begin to have more attention paid to them.

Let us take a look at the unemployment insurance changes. Nobody is particularly against changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, when the changes affect regional disparities, then we have removed our mandate. We have taken away the part of the Constitution we have just discussed.

One of the biggest problems we face in this country is lay-offs in northern and Atlantic Canada, in these single industry towns with cycles of high and low unemployment because of a dependence on resource based industries. This situation results from cyclical, seasonal employment. Where do you go? The joke of it all is that they say they are going to train the living heck out of us. That is nice. It is great to be trained for something that you know you cannot get a job in because there is no industry in northern Ontario, the Maritimes and western Canada that relates to that particular training.

If you want to change the system and tell people in Toronto that they can go out and get another job, I could probably understand that. They do have an opportunity, when a plant closes, to walk across the street and at least have a fighting chance. When we lose a job because a mine shuts down or because a mill is gearing down because the price of pulp is no longer the same, as we are seeing in northern Ontario now, where do they go? I am not advocating that they move to Toronto or anywhere else because their families are there. That is where we live and that is where we want to stay. Some of the programs that were put in place by the previous government were there for a reason. They were not a handout as some of the people opposite would say, they were not a disincentive to work.

I would like to see those people across the way who said that in the last few days in the discussion over UI, go to their constituents and say: "You are a bunch of lazy bums and you do not want to work". He or she will not be in their seat very long, I can guarantee that. We want to work just like everybody else. The problem is that we have a lack of jobs, a lack of diversification of our economy. That is what regional development was supposed to provide.

Enter regional development programs. Before I was elected in 1988 I thought it was great that FEDNOR had been created, that the government finally realized that northern Ontario was a region with a problem, that it needed some economic help in order to diversify.

I will not talk in great length about the regional development programs in Atlantic Canada because I know the speakers following me on this side will speak in more detail and with more authority than I on that subject.

A subject that I know a lot about is FEDNOR. The chairman of FEDNOR happens to be a good friend. He is a man in whom I have a lot of faith. He must feel awfully down in the dumps because of what is happening with this particular program.

In the last budget the government decided to play with words. It decided to say that grants were now going to be repayable. Have you ever heard such a ridiculous statement? Repayable grants? If it is a grant, it is a grant. If it is a loan, then it is repayable. Those are the types of words that the members opposite are allowing bureaucrats to use to make it sound like there have been no changes to the regional development programs.

Let's get real. We can read. We may have a lack of diversification, but we do know how to read and we believe the government has given up on us again. It is going to cut those programs to a point where they will have no effect at all. I would have liked FEDNOR to be a tool for bringing secondary industry into northern Ontario, industry that has nothing to do with the resource base we have.

Tourism will be there. Forestry, if we are lucky enough to continue to plant trees, will still be there. Mining will still be there. We need diversification through secondary industry. That is what these regional development programs were supposed to be for, not to give Tory friends $50,000 to add another cabin to their tourist camps. That is ridiculous.

Time never seems to be long enough when I get involved in something that means so much to me. I want to tell you why there has been a lot of disunity and intolerance, especially in places very close to home. These particular communities are just fed up. They have had it up to here. They have elected members of Parliament and that does not seem to work. They have kicked out members of Parliament on the opposite side because they did not do their job and it still does not work. So now they have started to take other measures that are unacceptable.

If members opposite want this country to stay together and be united, they have to start treating all regions of this country equally, they cannot just look at the bottom line of how many votes they can get in the next election.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the presentation of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River. I certainly understand, being a new member in the House only having been elected in 1988, that he has concerns. However, I must remind him that prior to 1984 his party was in power for about 20 years and I cannot remember when, between 1982 and 1984, it ever once recognized northern Ontario in the manner in which this government has.

The member commented on FEDNOR and the tourism side of it. The hon. member comes from the area of Kenora—Rainy River which is involved heavily in tourism. The member's area received $1.8 million last year and $2.9 million previous to that from the FEDNOR program, but yet he criticizes it. I see where an individual with a machinery company in Thunder Bay states that FEDNOR was of great assistance in supporting him to diversify his operations.

I think this government has recognized the needs and the requirements of northern Ontario. Can he tell this House, in a sincere way, what the policies of the Liberal Party are with regard to diversification in the employment side of Community Futures and the diversification in FEDNOR? During 20 years in government the Liberal party never recognized northern Ontario. Have they all of a sudden seen the light and realized that there is a northern Ontario?

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the member opposite has had enough nerve to stand up and ask me a question today, after the speech he gave the other night, to which I listened with great interest. Unfortunately, his speech was made under the strictures of closure and I had no opportunity to ask him a question.

I am really pleased that he defended the unemployment insurance cuts to his region when he knows that every person who loses unemployment insurance benefits in northern Ontario will lose an average of 13 weeks. He told me and Canadians in northern Ontario that that is good, that that is an improvement.

He talked about tourism. Let us talk about how exceptional this government is at twisting words around as it relates to understanding what is going on. Here is an article entitled "Tourism suspends support of the GST". This does not come from me, this comes from the tourism industry. This member should know, if he has been listening and watching what is happening, that we in northern Ontario have a big tourist industry.

This article says that another 7 per cent added to the cost of our tourism services will encourage many more Canadians to travel in the U.S. and will discourage foreign visitors. I do not think the government fully appreciates the impact of the GST on the tourist industry and its 60,000 mostly small businesses. Tourism is a trade in visitors and, in fact, is Canada's second leading export industry. We are already running at a $3 billion deficit and this will only make it worse.

The article goes on to say that the association is currently developing a new strategic plan to be more responsive to needs and to provide a stronger voice on Parliament Hill.

There is a perfect example of what is taking place, as it relates to the government opposite. The government does not even know what it is doing to the tourism industry in Canada. The article goes on to say that one has to wonder how business travel is going to help the tourist outfitter in northern Ontario or the attraction operator in Edmonton or Cape Breton. What about the resort sector?

I say scrap the GST, because otherwise northern Ontario will be hurt. That member is the last Tory in northern Ontario. We have noticed that there are no Tories left in northern Ontario. Mr. Trudeau is getting to be a more pleasant man than he ever was before because of what has happened with this government.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank my colleague for a passionate, caring speech, not only about his constituency but all the disadvantaged regions of this country.

I would like to ask him a very specific question. We have now seen that the government across the floor has a design, and the design is to retreat from national governance. It is the greatest retreat from national governance that we have seen in this century.

Professor Harold T. Wilson has recently published a book called Retreat from Governance. He makes the point, after listing all the Conservative cuts—cuts to VIA Rail, unemployment insurance and the programs in the regions—that Canada is doing this at precisely a time when it has become increasingly necessary for a central public authority to govern affirmatively in the interests of international competitiveness as well as national sovereignty.

My question to my colleague is: Does he feel that this approach of Professor Wilson's is valid, and how does it apply to his region?

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, my belief is that what this man has said is a true fact. This government has just changed the meaning of the term laissez-faire, a term that we used in our history books, to a different type of term which basically means the same thing, that is, getting out of governing and leave the running of the country completely to private enterprise. That will not do much good in northern Ontario because we do not have a lot of companies and a lot of different businesses that can do something to try to get the dollars, the research and development needed or the diversification of the economy in place.

I think the members opposite who do not live in urban Canada but in rural Canada know what I am talking about. If we continue on the route that we are headed, Quebec will not be the only one saying that it is ready to separate. There will be other provinces and parts of provinces starting to say the same thing. If we are not going to be treated equally in this country, if we are not going to be treated as if we belong, and if we are not made to feel like we belong, sooner or later that movement will start not just in Quebec but in the maritimes, in northern Ontario and in western Canada.

What keeps this country together is the fact that past governments believed in national programs, in the equality of all regions. I say to the members opposite that I know there is a lot more work to do, but to ask what did the Liberal government do 20 years ago is not good enough. I say to the members opposite that I was not here 20 years ago. I say to them that they are in their second term now and nothing has happened. I think it is time to change the government and give me a shot at it because I was not here 20 years ago. I am sure I can do a better job than they can because they have not done anything; nothing, except dismantle everything.

Mr. Keyes: They doubled the deficit.

Mr. Nault: They have doubled the deficit, yes. Now they are going to put in place the goods and services tax which again hurts the regions the most.

Mr. Milliken: They cut VIA Rail.

Mr. Nault: They cut VIA Rail, a pet project of ours. I say this has to stop somewhere. This is something that I hear all the time when I am back in my riding. There is already less tolerance in this country, less feeling of being a Canadian. Now it is the dog eat dog attitude of the Conservative government.

If you are doing all right, that is fine, but do not come and bother me and do not expect to collect unemployment. My God, don't do that because that is not acceptable any more. You go out and move somewhere and get a job. Half of Newfoundland is somewhere else now. Do you want the other half to go somewhere else?

Mr. Mills: There is not an ounce of creativity over there.

Mr. Nault: I think what is needed, as my colleague has so aptly put it, is a little creativity and a bit of guts. With that I think we could put this country back together again.

I hope that people will realize that those in the regions that have a small population base are just as important to Canada. That is why previous governments put in place these national policies and national programs. If you are going to start to dismantle them, then we will have to look elsewhere for someone to look after us. We are sure that this particular country called Canada is not worth saving if we cannot treat each other with a little decency and equality.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I listened with a lot of attention to my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River. I concur with my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who said that he gave a very impassioned speech. However, I should like to remind him that a lot of the policies this government has brought in has been as a direct result of a couple of poison pills we inherited from his party—a flawed constitution and a crippling deficit.

Mr. Mills: Name one poison pill.

Mr. MacKay: I just named two fundamental ones—a flawed constitution that left one-third of the country out of the mainstream and a crippling deficit that has caused us to take extraordinary measures to try to cure.

Mr. Keyes: Which you've doubled.

Mr. MacKay: We have doubled the deficit simply because we could not, without taking gradual and careful economic measures, cope with this crippling deficit.

Mr. Keyes: Like the expenditure of billions of dollars during the election campaign.

Mr. MacKay: My colleague opposite should just remember that if he were here as long as some of us he would have watched some of the policies evolve. I remember his present House leader, now the Leader of the Opposition, standing up dripping with sincerity at a time in the 1980s when interest rates were going right through the roof—they were in the 20 per cent range—and saying: "I tell you, if the interest rates don't come down as a result of our policies, I will resign". That is on the record.

I remember the then member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Allan J. MacEachen, saying in 1979: "Vote for Allan J. and the price of gasoline will come down and stay down". As everyone now knows, this was followed by the greatest leap in the price of gasoline that ever happened. This is one of the reasons why we are faced with high energy costs.

Mr. Keyes: Do you want us to start listening to election promises?

Mr. MacKay: We have learned all about election promises from the party opposite, the party that has left this country with terrible, terrible scars which will take probably another generation to heal. What Juan Peron did for Argentina, Pierre Trudeau did for Canada, and history will record this.

I would have thought that my colleague opposite would have come out with a more constructive and a more, shall we say, thoughtful resolution asking us perhaps to reconsider our regional development policies, modify them, even put more resources into them, or perhaps work more closely with certain other agencies. Instead we get a blanket condemnation. Unfortunately that is the style that has been typical of the gentlemen opposite. They have short attention spans. They think that the Canadian people have equally short attention spans and short memories.

My colleague opposite with sincerity talks about a central economic policy for regional development. We had that. We had DREE which was created by Prime Minister Trudeau. Jean Marchand, a very distinguished former member of this House, was put in charge. It did not work.

Then we had DRIE, which particularly in Atlantic Canada became known as the department of ridiculous industrial expectations. It was dry all right because it took about 14 different processes to get anything done.

Then we had other policies which showed everyone that a centralist policy in a country like ours will not work. The tier system that was brought in under DRIE favoured industries to move into southern Ontario, places like Windsor, not into northern Ontario where they were needed.

What has this government done? What we have done is we have brought in regional development agencies, regionally managed and regionally sensitive, so that people across this country who have different economic priorities and different ideas for development can realize them.

Mr. Nault: You cut VIA.

Mr. MacKay: He talks about VIA. You know, it costs hundreds of dollars per passenger to run VIA. If this is the way that the gentlemen opposite want to spend taxpayers' money, that is fine. We think that regional development funds can best be spent on policies that will create work.

Down in Cape Breton we had a white elephant that was costing tens of millions of dollars to make heavy water which nobody could use. There was a lot of fuss when we terminated this particular agency, but at the same time it was not needed and it was a needless drain on the resources of this country.

In Atlantic Canada the Liberal opposition members—and I will speak about Atlantic Canada if I may—refused even to support the existence of this government's vehicle to promote and to foster regional economic development. They voted against it in the House and then they criticized the agency for not doing enough. Some members opposite even criticized ACOA for spending too much money too quickly. That is a switch. Lately we have been hearing some very strange utterances.

I see my friend from Essex—Windsor in the House. When he was campaigning for the leadership of his party—and I want to congratulate him for he did very well up to the third ballot I believe—he was in Atlantic Canada campaigning and I believe that he was advocating that we dismantle ACOA and replace it with some sort of regional banking system. I do not know what he meant by that. I did not think that the New Democrats liked banks. I will listen to him speak later.

We have the former member for St. Maurice who is now the front runner in the Liberal leadership race talking about going back to the future. He wants to bring DRIE back. When I heard this I went back and looked at an interview he did on The Journal with Barbara Frum in 1984. I remembered his rather peculiar ideas on finance and economic development. I am going to read this into the record. I invite members to look it up, as Casey Stengel would say. He was asked: "What about the deficit?" And this was his answer: "If you don't have a deficit to recycle savings, what happens to the money? The money is flowing out of the country. I just want to tell you that the deficit is a very complex instrument in economic development".

• (1240)

This is a gentleman who links economic development to deficits and says that if you do not have a deficit you have no place to put your money, no place to save. This is on the record.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: I invite members opposite to look it up and study it.

I wish to give another example of the somewhat negative response that we have been getting on this side of the House when we are trying to do something for a sector of the economy in Atlantic Canada which is having difficulty. I refer to the fishing sector.

We brought forward $130 million as an interim measure, which we announced in December, to deal with this very serious situation. What we got was a diatribe of condemnation from a party which, from 1980 to 1984, only spent an average of $185 million in total for economic development through DRIE. Yet it pours scorn on $130 million as an interim measure for one sector.

There is an awful lot of insincerity and a lot of rhetoric instead of some constructive suggestions and some thoughtful moves that perhaps could be put forward by our colleagues opposite which I certainly would appreciate and listen to and, if appropriate, act upon.

When the Prime Minister correctly noted that the economy of Atlantic Canada was performing better than expected, and that the over-all economy had improved considerably—and this is an undeniable fact—despite the serious problems in the fishery sector, again the Liberals ridiculed this particular statement. This type of reaction only contributes to the perpetuation of the negative image about the economy of our region. It really does not deserve this; it deserves better. Statements like this one have the potential to impact negatively on investors who are about to expand their present enterprises or come there with new initiatives to start. I would urge members opposite not to be so vitriolic in condemning the efforts of this government to help their particular regions through these regional agencies. It does not do anyone any good. It impacts on the public image of the region, and it is counterproductive.

Thankfully investors have not been listening to this kind of diatribe and this kind of negative publicity. As a matter of fact my colleague opposite, the member for Kenora—Rainy River, spoke about national unity. It was interesting to me to see a Gallup poll featured—and I think my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso may have seen it—in the Halifax Herald. It was a front page story last week stating that the Gallup poll taken in Atlantic Canada sampling Atlantic Canadian's feelings about the economy, the future and so on was the most positive in any area of Canada, which left the pundits rather puzzled.

Mr. Arseneault: Because there are more Liberals in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. MacKay: If there are more Liberals in Atlantic Canada, perhaps they have greater reason to be thankful for what this government has done and they feel better as a result of the new policies that are being brought in. That probably does account for it. Now I have the answer, and I am very grateful for that.

Mr. Arseneault: There is hope for the future. They know we are going to form the government.

Mr. MacKay: They are going to form the government some time after the year 2000, perhaps.

New Brunswick headed this country last year in the number of new businesses created. I am sure that my colleagues opposite and on this side of the House will applaud those statistics.

Nova Scotia business surveys indicate that a third of the businesses interviewed said that they intend to increase their capital investment in hiring this year. More than half of them were optimistic about economic prospects in the future.

Furthermore, unlike what members opposite would like us to believe, as I mentioned to my colleagues opposite, this recent Gallup poll reveals that Atlantic Canadians are the most optimistic of all Canadians about economic prospects for their region. Obviously there is a high degree of approval for what ACOA has been doing.

I could list a great many of the positive things that ACOA has been doing. I do not intend in so doing to say that ACOA is perfect, that it is a panacea for what we need in Atlantic Canada.

Recently in Prince Edward Island I noted in the announcements of two large potato plants the optimism and the enthusiasm that is permeating the economy there. I also attended the recent official opening of the P.E.I. Food Technology Centre which will place Prince Edward Island at the forefront of food science and technology in the country. I saw a lot of happy people on this occasion who realize that this government, working with their government, is doing a great deal through ACOA, through regional development, to give Prince Edward Island a leading place in technology.

Like most Atlantic Canadians I am also optimistic about the future. However the size and strength of the private sector in that part of the country are smaller, as my colleague opposite has pointed out. That means that the national government in the name of national equality must provide some special support to areas like ours. There are regions in this country that need special attention. Putting a monolithic economic development policy in place with all the attendant encumbrances and bureaucratic delays has been tried by the Liberals. It just did not work. The results are there.

It was a recognition of precisely this sort of fact which led our government to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency with a mandate to assist small and medium sized businesses. Since its creation less than three years ago this agency has approved over 8,500 projects. It is approving them at a rate 10 times more efficiently and quickly than DRIE did, this central agency that was run out of Ottawa by the bureaucrats.

Over $600 million has flowed into Atlantic Canada through the action side of ACOA and leveraged nearly $2 billion worth of investment from the private sector. Projects assisted by ACOA have created nearly 20,000 jobs and maintained another 20,000. Some 800 new businesses have been started, and half of these have been by first time entrepreneurs.

ACOA has made a decent and reasonable impact on the problems of Atlantic Canada. It is not perfect, but it is doing an awful lot better than its predecessor did, which was the brain child of my colleagues opposite. It is not a panacea for this region, but what would the opposition parties do? Many of them would dismantle ACOA. What are they going to do with it? It is like the GST. They are against it, but what are they going to put in its place? Is it back to the future, back to old DRIE and DREE, or will we have a new one called DRIFT? That is what Atlantic Canada was doing under the Liberals; it was drifting and drifting badly.

I wanted to put some of these numbers on the record because I am getting weary of the small minds and big mouths of political opponents with nothing but bad things to say about what is going on in Atlantic Canada. Nothing could be further from the truth than this resolution that our government does not care about the regions of this country. Nothing could be further from the truth.

When we came to office federal spending in regional development was averaging only $185 million a year in Atlantic Canada through DRIE. Our government has increased that to a current average of $400 million and more per year.

Mr. Mills: How about special recovery programs?

Mr. MacKay: That was SCRAP, a Liberal program, and it was scrapped all right. It became a great big boondoggle. Let me tell you about one of the Liberal initiatives that I remember very well, and my colleague from Halifax will remember it even better.

It was called MAGI, Metropolitan Area Growth Investments. It was touted as a great example of Liberal ingenuity—seed money.

An hon. member: It was ingenuous.

Mr. MacKay: It was ingenuous because the then Premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Gerald Augustine Regan, could not agree with his colleague who was then the Minister of DRIE, the late Don Jamieson, about who should become the chairman of this great new Liberal agency. There was a defeated Liberal cabinet minister named Scott McNutt who I believe is still alive. This held up the use of this agency for years.

Finally, Madam Speaker, do you know what the Liberals did with the millions of dollars that was put in there to help develop the economy? They bought a German cruise ship, the Mercator, which became one of the biggest scandals in Nova Scotia. That was economic development as practised by the Liberals in Nova Scotia. Naturally the ship sank just as their government sank. It will be a long time before we see regional economic development Liberal policies in Nova Scotia again.

ACOA while not perfect is doing exactly what it was designed to do: to promote entrepreneurship and co–operation with provincial governments and other institutions, to foster regional economic development, to work closely with other federal departments to ensure that their policies and programs assist our own efforts and, finally, to advocate the regions best interest here in Ottawa and elsewhere in the country on activities such as federal procurement.

• (1250)

For example, ACOA was recently instrumental in getting the Sea Sell promotional campaign sailing again for tourism. It successfully lobbied in favour of Cape Breton's Micronav project which landed a huge contract to manufacture microwave landing systems for Canadian airports.

We are also presently actively involved in finding solutions to difficult economic conditions in regions such as the Summerside area, northern New Brunswick and the numerous towns and villages affected by fish plant closures in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

A few weeks ago I announced the new elements of ACOA's action program and changes to the levels of assistance provided. These modifications were based on consultations with business organizations last fall and in response to recommendations from numerous sources, including the ACOA advisory board and officials at all levels of government and business communities.

Under a new supplier development element, ACOA will pay up to 75 per cent of eligible costs associated with bid preparation and 50 per cent of eligible costs of other related activities. In the area of marketing development, which is so important in Atlantic Canada, ACOA will provide up to 50 per cent of the cost of such items as design, new package development and promotional material. Assistance will also be available for up to three years toward the salary of qualified marketing personnel to implement a marketing plan.

To enable ACOA to invest in larger projects, the agency can now make direct contributions to projects up to $10 million in eligible costs. The previous ceiling was $200,000 in eligible costs. We had to do this, as my friends opposite know, in response to our share of deficit reduction last year.

These contributions and other modifications are aimed at easing the burden of project financing for businesses and for other innovative enterprises. ACOA has assisted, I believe, practically every university in Atlantic Canada. I have a list here. It would probably take me 20 minutes to put them all on the record. My friends from Atlantic Canada know that is true. Whether it is St. Francis Xavier, Memorial, Acadia, or University of Moncton, all these universities have benefited from funds for research and development and other causes that ACOA made available.

I want to respond to my colleague opposite in a spirit of charity and understanding. Like me, he comes from an area where there are tough times. He knows that there are certain industries that need help and certain industries that are doing very well, but as Abraham Lincoln said: "You don't strengthen the weak by weakening the strong". Those industries that are doing well in our regions are providing a lot of spin–off jobs and an inspiration to others to emulate.

I believe the Prime Minister summed up the situation, at least in so far as it applies to Atlantic Canada, in Halifax last week when he said that ACOA is an integral part of our blueprint to increase economic prosperity in the country and to enhance Canada's international economic competitiveness.

With the extraordinary economic opportunities the free trade agreement now offers to Atlantic entrepreneurs, ACOA will continue to play a strategic role. I believe that ACOA, along with FEDNOR and western development will provide a very special and much needed role in the country. It is an improvement over an old centrally dominated economic development policy.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to what my hon. colleague from Nova Scotia had to say. As usual he is emulating the example of his colleagues on that side of the House by blaming the troubles they face in government on the Liberals that preceded them. They still have not taken responsibility for the difficulties the country is experiencing after six years of their government, particularly in Atlantic Canada. While Atlantic Canadians may be optimistic about the future, they are not terrible optimistic about the present, particularly with the decisions this government is providing them.

I should like to ask the minister about the changes he recently announced under ACOA, the agency that is supposedly delivering the federal government's program for regional development in Atlantic Canada. As we know, it got a flying start in 1987, just before the election, with the Prime Minister announcing a $1 billion program over five years. We were told it would create all kinds of jobs in Atlantic Canada. The government spent the money very quickly, up until the election. After the election there was suddenly a new parameter which was the deficit and ACOA had to be reprofiled.

Since the election the rules were tightened very fast. Recently, the minister again changed the rules. I should like to ask him whether there is going to be any new money to allow businesses to take advantage of the more flexible rules for business assistance in ACOA. Or, is the reason for increasing the project limits and making the other changes in the rules really because with the changes made in 1989 the rules were so tight that businesses could not take advantage of them? Therefore, this opening up of the rules that we heard about following the budget was merely an opportunity to spend. It would be terribly embarrassing for the government if the rules were so tight that Atlantic Canadians could not spend the money available to them.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I am glad to respond to that very constructive question. I want to tell my colleague opposite, as he probably knows being a keen student of regional development, that about 80 per cent of the assistance or grants, if you will, for small business entrepreneurs in Atlantic Canada were for amounts under $100,000. There were some very large projects that took up, however, quite a large percentage of the total amount of moneys available.

We reassessed this situation and decided that we were able to bring up the levels of the assistance for some larger projects to about $10 million. However, the original $20 million level was always there for projects of exceptional merit, innovation and so on.

What I want my colleague to understand—and this gives me a chance to put it on the record—is that when ACOA was created and when the action program was announced, there was an important element often forgotten in the aftermath, that is, that we still proceed to sign co-operation agreements, which is a sobriquet for ERDA agreements, with the provinces. We have signed over 20 of them. I believe a larger amount of money has flowed out, although it is approximately the same in macro terms, under these kinds of economic assistance options for the provinces than there has under the action side.

We have a double approach here. As he knows, over $100 million has flowed into the tourism sector in Atlantic Canada, but this is without prejudice to signing co-operation agreements with the provinces for tourism projects, if they so wish.

I want to assure him that we do not need any new money at this time. The original amount of money that was allocated is ample for our needs under present circumstances. There is over $600 million committed on the action side and more than that on the co-operation side. Over the next few years the money is flowing out as projected.

I realize that some people have suggested that there was too much money allocated too quickly, but how else were we going to get this money into the economy where it could start having an effect on Atlantic Canada? It has had an effect. I think the member will concede that it has had an effect. There are many, many more thousands of people working in Atlantic Canada today than there were in 1984. This is true all across the country.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, first, I should like to congratulate my colleague from the Liberal Party, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, for introducing this resolution. I whole-heartedly agree with it. I heard his speech and I think he was very sincere in what he said.

• (1300)

Nevertheless, we in northern Ontario have been waiting 25 or 30 years for direct assistance from both Tory and Liberal governments. We believe that DRIE, MAGI, ACOA and FEDNOR are just acronyms and euphemisms for doing nothing. That is what the people from northern Ontario feel about both governments that have been in power. It is a forgotten area, along with eastern Canada and sections of western Canada.

We talk about the Community Futures Program, grandiose announcements, and its millions of dollars. After investigation, there are so many hoops to go through with community futures that most applicants—and 10 per cent of them are approved eventually—get so frustrated with the various hoops of getting approval in northern Ontario, getting approval in Toronto, and getting approval in Ottawa, and then, with a snap of a finger, the application may be turned down. As a result, people become frustrated. I am glad to say that we got the people together in Ottawa and asked if the government understands what is going on. We have had to restructure the whole program.

The minister is a good man, and I think he cares. But he is lost as to what is happening out there. The minister has to get out there into these areas to see the reality of the situation. It is best to cite a current example as to what is going on.

We all remember the FBDB scare with the funding of strip clubs across the country in the amount of $17 million going to 38 strip clubs. The reaction of the government to that is that it has to be extremely careful. It has reacted on the radical side of things. There was one application to FEDNOR and FBDB to have moneys for reconstruction and renovation of a hotel or motel in my constituency. Last year the hotel had one program which might have been called, perhaps, not appropriate. Both funding agencies state that their programs are being reviewed and anything sexually explicit or exploitive will no longer be considered. It is another way of saying that they are cutting off funds. I have been asked to write letters stating that this particular application will not endanger the moral fabric of my community. It is absolutely laughable. I am wondering if the agency should be concerned about impure thoughts.

I want to ask the minister if there is one positive thing he feels his government is going to do for northern Ontario that does not have all these strings attached and all these hoops that we have to go through? Is there one positive initiative about which he can say: "Here you are, here are some funds, deal with it"?

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I gather what my colleague opposite is asking for is a heavier emphasis on grants, outright contributions. We are doing this to some extent in Atlantic Canada in recognition of the fact that in some cases it is appropriate to do so. It may be appropriate to look at this policy in northern Ontario, but that is something that my colleague responsible for that agency can consider. The member can make those representations to him.

The member makes the point which I tried to make, however, that there is that kind of flexibility. If, in fact, that is a good thing to do, then it is possible to do it. Should the Western Diversification Agency decide that it wishes to take a different approach in developing their economy, it can do that too.

I know that there is a temptation—and those of us from disadvantaged regions are often subject to it—to give as much money as one can to every possible enterprise that seems to have merit. Again I hate to resort to cliches, but any government that is big enough to give you all you want, eventually is big enough to take all you have. There has to be a happy medium.

The most positive thing we have done in regional development policy is to bring in that element of flexibility so that members opposite, like my hon. friend, can make their voices heard and the possibility is there to give effect to what they wish to do.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have to first thank the minister for his kind words of what is becoming a dim memory for me, the leadership campaign of last year. It is a memory which undoubtedly will grow rosier as it grows dimmer.

The minister talked about white elephants. I think that the approach of the government to regional development is based, not on white elephants, but pink elephants. There is an expectation and belief that somewhere over the rainbow there is going to come this great solution and explosion of benefits for poorer parts of our country.

It is a pink elephant approach which has been there in, for instance, the discussions about the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement was going to tremendously benefit the regions of the country. Try telling that now to western fishermen who have seen the consequences of that deal for their access to the fish.

It is there even in the context of the GST, believe it or not. There are ministers who said before the finance committee, of which I am a member, that the GST is going to even things out so tremendously across the country, that this will benefit the Sault Ste. Marie's and the parts of Atlantic Canada and western Canada that are feeling the inequalities at this stage.

I do not think that any of these pink elephants are any more real than they were in the dreams that we might have had as kids. Instead, we have to look at the realities. The realities are, first, a tremendous lack of consistency in government policy on regional development; second, a serious set of cutbacks in support for regional development right across the country; and third, a series of economic attacks which are taking place—some of which the government is not responsible for and some of which they are—across the country which are making the regional development crisis in Canada much more serious.

Let me talk about a few of these things before trying to suggest some of the solutions that we as a party would put forward. In talking about lack of consistency, the minister himself in his answer to my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie has demonstrated the lack of consistency that we have to regional development across the country.

In the case of Atlantic Canada, for instance, there are grants, as the minister knows. In the case of western Canada, under the Western Diversification Fund, there are no grants. In the case of FEDNOR, it is not entirely clear what the situation is. It continues to be extremely ambiguous.

The consequence is that any company attempting to make choices on the basis of regional development incentives as to where it will invest is faced with a patchwork quilt across the country where one part of Canada which is regionally hurting has a different set of benefits than another part of Canada which is hurting just as badly. That is a lack of consistency which I do not think can be justified. The minister makes a good case for the flexibility of separate agencies, and it is a case with which I agree, but those separate agencies have to be in some sense consistent in the application of the criteria which they apply. There can be flexibility to take account of local circumstances but, if the flexibility is so great that this patchwork quilt exists, then the disadvantages for certain poorer parts of Canada are simply not fair.

I suggested secondly that, in fact, we are talking about some significant cutbacks which have hit regional development in the country. In looking at the most recent budget and the estimates for the coming year, we can see at least one element of consistency in the government's approach to regional development: the consistent cutbacks which have taken place from agency to agency.

Look, for instance, at the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I have their estimates in front of me. There is a net decrease of $39.3 million of a total budget of just over $300 million. So, in fact, we are looking at a decrease in that case of over 10 per cent. It is the second straight decrease which has occurred in the allocations to this particular agency, despite the problems that are so evident to everybody in Atlantic Canada today.

There are all sorts of bookkeeping shifts which are taking place, such as shifts of some sets of grants from ACOA to other departments, which make it difficult to determine whether we are talking about a 10 per cent decrease, or a 15 per cent decrease or a 5 per cent decrease, but there is no question that we are talking about cutbacks—

Mr. MacKay: Not this year.

Mr. Langdon: —and that is not fair to people in Atlantic Canada and it is not fair to our country. Our country needs the sense that we are working together.

Look at the estimates of the Western Economic Diversification Program. We again see in the case of those estimates a net decrease of $1.4 million. We also see that the stretching out of the timetable for allocation of the $1.2 billion that was originally given to western diversification is itself being stretched out from five years originally to seven years now. We are talking about far less per year in the context of western diversification. Of course, the actual expenditures which are taking place are significantly less yet.

In looking at the various ERDAs, the Economic and Regional Development Agreements, massive cuts are occurring with respect to them. There is a whole set of ERDAs which is expiring across the country. There are two in Nova Scotia. Again, there has been no commitment to renewing these. There is one in New Brunswick for industrial development with no commitment to renewal. There are three in the case of Newfoundland and no commitment to renewal. There is one in the case of P.E.I. and no commitment to renewal. There are two in the case of Ontario, one for mineral development which is important in northern Ontario and again no commitment to renewal. In the case of Quebec, there is a total of 10 of these ERDAs for hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. They are expiring this year and again there is no commitment to renewal. Similarly with Manitoba and Alberta. In the case of British Columbia, again, there is a total of eight ERDAs, some of them massive. One is for $300 million for instance for forest resource development which is absolutely crucial not just to British Columbia but crucial to conservation in the country. It is absolutely crucial to dealing with things like the greenhouse effect around the world and there is no commitment to renewal of this $300 million ERDA.

In Ontario and Quebec, we see that again there is a total decrease in regional development assistance of just over $10 million in those areas. So, as I said, there is consistency, but consistency in terms of cutbacks.

As we look across the country, it is not just the activities of these agencies and the fact that there are cutbacks which is causing the crisis in regional development. It is a fact that in the Atlantic fishery we are seeing massive destruction of opportunities for people and communities right across Atlantic Canada. In the western fisheries, we are seeing a set of developments which will severely damage, if not destroy, the processing industry right up the western B.C. coast. In northern Ontario, we see tax changes with respect to mineral development and the potential for fast write-offs which will hit mineral development in every constituency in northern Ontario.

In the western farm crisis, even Conservatives admit that real incomes in the province of Saskatchewan this year are going to be cut to a negative level in the farm sector. We are not talking about penny ante reductions and squeezes. We are talking about devastation. We are talking about crises that could wipe out western agriculture.

In the constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River, which my colleague represents, for instance, farmers are desperate to look at the whole question of planting for this farm season. There is absolutely no commitment from this government to assist with those planting costs.

It is absolutely shameful that those kinds of inequities and inequalities should exist and that the government has not moved on them by this stage. It is as if in my community the entire auto industry were to shut down or, in your community, Mr. Speaker, the entire steel industry were to shut down. We are talking about absolutely massive devastation to which the government is not responding.

That is at the heart of what should be serious regional development action on the part of this government. Instead, what do we see? We see UI changes which are hurting the regions, not helping. We see VIA Rail cutbacks which the minister now defends when, if my memory does not serve me wrongly, he in fact was one of the leading proponents of saving VIA and electing a Conservative government in 1984 that would see to it that there would never be a cutback in Atlantic Canada for VIA ever again. This has taken place right across the country.

We see air deregulation which again is hitting regions. We have seen parts of northern Ontario in the past few weeks which have had their air service severely cut back. That is thanks to deregulation. It is true there are many more flights between Ottawa and Toronto and between Toronto and Montreal. But where there are not more flights is in the regions of this country.

Mr. Butland: The fares are up.

Mr. Langdon: In fact, the fares are up. The expenses people have to pay to travel are up.

So we have to take a different approach. We have to take an approach which does not try to blame the Liberals for the failures of the past, as the minister has done, and somehow imply that therefore they are responsible as well for the failures of the present. It is almost six years after the election of this government.

I am sure when the minister campaigned in 1984 he would never have said: "Give us six years and I am afraid we won't be able to have put things right". I am certain he would never have said: "Elect us, and I am sorry we won't be able to do anything for you because of Pierre Trudeau". I am sure he told people: "We have ideas. We have solutions". They have not come forward.

Our regional development and equities in the country are greater than they were in 1984. I say it with sadness as somebody from Ontario, because even in my region of southwestern Ontario I see that the regional development problems we face are starting to get worse. That is thanks to the actions of the government.

What do we have to change? We have to change the interest rate policy in this country. We cannot have interest rates running at 13.5 per cent, when right across the border from us in the United States, as the Minister of Finance himself admitted last week, the interest rates are almost five percentage points less.

At the very least, we have to see to it that in poorer regions of this country we bring interest rates down to a competitive level so that small businesses can make a go of their ideas and initiatives. We can do that. That is why I suggested, as the minister noted, setting up regional development banks in the different poorer parts of this country. They would have as their goal offering low interest loans and working with entrepreneurs and small business people to see to it that those small business people themselves could take an initiative, create jobs, and establish opportunities for their areas. Establishing those kinds of regional development banks should lead us to a joint initiative on the part of government and business within the regions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired, but if he can wrap it up in about 30 seconds, then we can go to questions and comments.

Mr. Langdon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will wrap it up very quickly.

As well as these regional development banks, we need community development funds that will provide support for communities themselves to take action and support that is much great than the Community Futures Program. That program is very small and very difficult to access. We have to stop giving our grants and our support in poorer parts of this country to foreign-controlled businesses that are attracted just by the gravy and then leave. We should see that at least half of all of the support we give goes to local small businesses. If we did this, I think we would provide hope to our regions and, by providing hope to our regions, we would give tremendous hope to the country, which is just as important.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague opposite for taking a very wide-ranging approach to this particular debate. I am sure it comes as no surprise to him that I do not agree with most of what he said, but I would like to ask him a brief question and maybe make a couple of comments.

Among the positive elements that he sees in regional development is the headquartering of the agency in the region that it is designed to help so that decisions can be made locally, by local people, with input from local businesses. I would like him respond to that.

Very briefly, I would like to say to him that, (a), regional development assistance, as far as Atlantic Canada is concerned, is not cut this year. It may appear to be the case because of some bookkeeping, as he describes it, where funds are transferred from one department to another, but I assure him that it is not. And, (b), he made reference to macro-economic affairs such as employment and interest rates. He knows, if he is fair, and I know he is, that considerably more than 1.5 million jobs are in existence now than were in existence when we came into office.

He spoke about assistance to large companies. I know that he is very fortunate to represent a constituency where General Motors, Ford, and some very large American multinationals have decided that they should set up their headquarters in Canada. I am sure that he recognizes, if he is fair, the importance of foreign investment and foreign participation in Canada's economy by large foreign corporations. After all, they provide jobs. If they are good corporate citizens, it is difficult for them to take their factories home with them.

He made reference to economic development agreements not having any commitment for renewal in Atlantic Canada. That is simply not true. I want to assure him that we have signed economic development agreements of various types with every Atlantic province. I have two full pages here that I can show him, detailing them. In forestry, every Atlantic province, for example, has a sectoral forestry agreement. My colleague, the Minister of Forestry—and this government is the first government to recognize the importance of forestry by making it a full ministry—is working very closely to make sure that these elements that my colleague talks about for long-term development, silviculture, forest management and a better approach to preserving this resource, is taken.

I just want to say that really what we have here, I guess, is an agreement to disagree. My colleague represents a party of democratic socialism which believes in ever-increasing government involvement in management. We agree that there is a place for government involvement, but we prefer to let Canadians operate on their own initiative and to supply help to those who need it, and to get out of areas where it is no longer required.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is quite correct that there is a basic disagreement. The basic disagreement though is over the question of equality. We, in this party, coming from the kind of philosophic beliefs that move us, believe very strongly in equality, not in complete equality for everybody but in equality of opportunity and in equality of essential condition which should exist within our country. That is why, for us, regional development is such a fundamental, basic, touchstone issue because we see the inequality that exists among regions as so subversive of what this country could be, of how grand and magnificent a community we could build in this country.

I hope the minister from his region which historically has been so unequally dealt with by the rest of the country, will ultimately see the light and recognize that that commitment to equality is crucial and he will start to take some movements toward that.

On the specific points that the minister made, I agree with him quite strongly that decentralization of our regional development efforts is important and local headquarters are important to do that. That is why my suggestion of regional development banks would see those located within the regions that they are meant to serve. It would see those banks being much more activist, making much more effort to make things happen and to make things change rather than just sitting back and waiting for grant applications.

With respect to whether or not there are cuts to ACOA, we can talk about this in committee; I am sure we will. The crucial issue is that there has not been, as there should have been, given the problems of Atlantic Canada, a massive increase in support through ACOA.

In terms of macro-economic effects, I simply make the point that the job expansion record in recent months is quite poor and as interest rates persist at their high level, we are going to see those job-creation rates squeezed just as we have seen the jobless figures in this country go up.

With respect to foreign investment, of course the minister is correct. Foreign investment has played an important role in the development of this country, certainly in the development of my constituency. The point about my constituency is that the great bulk of that foreign investment came in without the financial support of the taxpayers of Canada. That is what I think we have to stop. Our support should be going to Canadians.

Finally, I too have two pages with respect to economic and regional development agreements. I am sure the minister's pages refer to those which are continuing this year. Mine refer, and that is the crucial issue, to those which run out this year.

Mr. MacKay: We are going to renew them.

Mr. Langdon: It is those to which the government must make a commitment. If the minister is prepared to stand up and make a commitment that the money in those regional development agreements will be completely replaced, I certainly would be pleased to hear it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)): The Hon. Minister of Public Works for no more than two minutes, Sir, in this question and answer period.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make the point to my colleague opposite that the number of regional development agreements we have signed are commensurate with the desires of the provinces. As I indicated to my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, we have ample funds to go to the provinces and discuss renewal on their terms for all the new agreements the provinces wish renewed. We have those resources. In some cases, as the member knows, with the consent of the provinces, we have signed agreements involving more money than the ones they replaced. In others, with the consent of the provinces, they have involved less money. These co-operation agreements are designed not like the old ERDAs for the most part to be five-year agreements, but the new ones can be implemented for two or three or four years. They can be topped up or changed. Again, there is more flexibility there. I want to assure the hon. member that there is no lack of resources from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to meet the legitimate aims of the provinces that wish to develop certain sectoral agreements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)): I am sorry, the period for questions and comments has expired. Perhaps the hon. member for Essex—Windsor could come back with another question after we hear our next speaker. Continuing debate. The Hon. Member for South West Nova.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I believe that the rules do require that in the case of a comment or question, there is at least a chance to respond to that comment or question. I certainly intend to do so very briefly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)): We will give the hon. member for Essex—Windsor 30 seconds more.

Mr. MacKay: That's flexibility.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I am glad we are all so flexible today.

While the minister may be able to make these commitments for Atlantic Canada—and I will hold him to them in committee and elsewhere—we cannot get similar commitments from him for some of the massive agreements now running out, such as the $300 million forestry agreement in British Columbia, to which despite prodding from various colleagues, the Minister of Forestry has not yet been prepared to make any commitment.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister is going to stay to listen. I listened to him at least on television.

I want to reread the motion today because I think it needs rereading. It is an Official Opposition motion presented by our side. It states:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect, support and promote the regional economies of Canada, in order to eliminate regional disparities in the Atlantic provinces, Northern Ontario and Western and Northern Canada.

I think the direction this government has given to Canadians is bringing on and will continue to bring on regional disparities. I think we have seen this in the free trade agreement where across Canada the primary industries will be the ones to suffer. We see it in agriculture with hog retaliation in the United States. We see it in the fisheries where we must give some west coast fish to the U.S. to process and we see it in forestry across Canada.

As we have to give up our primary industries, it will mean that they will become service industries for the United States under the free trade agreement. Look at the fisheries on the west coast. I can see it on the east coast because the government is taking the fisheries—and later I will deal with the fisheries as an alienating problem—more towards confusion on the east coast. You will probably see Americans take up the licences to fish our fish and eventually land the fish in the United States, as can be done on the west coast.

I also want to say that the free trade agreement should have had a clause that protected our primary resources, our primary industries, which were the economic basis of rural Canada. This is one area in which I feel our regional economies are going to suffer and are already suffering.

The other aspect is the goods and services tax presently before the House. In eastern Canada, I see it affecting our tourism industry. Every person who comes to visit, even though he or she can have a rebate, will be deterred by a 7 per cent tax in addition to the tax already in place. It will affect, I think initially, and probably for a long time, our tourism industry. Certainly, we are hearing that from the tourism operators on the east coast.

It will also affect lower income people, and by that, I am not assuming those people who will not get rebates. I am assuming that on the east coast there are people with incomes below the average of Canada. Because of the GST there will be less to spend in our local economies than there would be if there were no GST.

I can give several areas where I feel the government should have come up with alternatives. The goods and services tax is certainly one area where there will be an inflationary aspect and will particularly hurt the east coast as well as rural Canada. I just do not limit it to the east coast because I think it will have the same effect in rural Quebec as it will have in any rural area in Canada.

We heard from small businesses that it is a disincentive and heaven only knows that we cannot lose any more small businesses in the east.

We heard from the Atlantic Transportation Commission when they appeared before the transportation committee that the 7 per cent rate is a deterrent to people looking to buy goods from the east coast. It is also a negative in the sense that when people on the east coast have to order goods made in Ontario, they will look somewhere else to get the goods without the 7 per cent tax. Even though it can be rebated, it is this burden that is imposed on businesses.

At the same time that we are seeing two major government policies affecting rural Canada—and this motion today is directed to the rural economies of Canada and when I say two major policies, I mean the free trade agreement as it affects our primary resources, and the goods and services tax as it will affect our tourism industry, small business, the transportation of goods from the east coast, and the inflationary impact of the GST on lower income earners.

At the same time that we have these two major policies, we have a government that is hitting at the infrastructure. I heard the Minister of Public Works say that there was no crisis in the economy on the east coast. Thank goodness, if that is the way the government interprets it, that there is no crisis on the east coast. But there is a crisis. I can tell you that from the point of view of the fishing community, and representing a constituency directly dependent on the fishery. If the government wants to say there is no crisis on the east coast, I can only say that the way the government has cut at the infrastructure, there soon will be a crisis. What infrastructure am I talking about? I am talking about the Established Programs Financing. The government has a well known history of cutting it back in the Atlantic region as well as in other provinces.

I should clarify that Established Programs Financing is the program funded federally with the provinces for health services and secondary education. But since 1986, when the government proposed the reduction by two percentage points of the Established Programs Financing, and again in the 1989 budget, with a cut that was a further percentage point, the cost of these two measures alone to the Atlantic region for the financial year 1986–87 to 1994–95, will be $779.4 million.

In 1990, in this budget, the government did not just go along with the established cuts that it had put in, it further froze the Established Programs Financing at the 1989 level for two years which will cost the Atlantic a further $655 million for the financial years 1990–91 to the 1994–95 years. That is over $1.4 billion that the Atlantic provinces will not have from the Established Programs Financing that they will have to find somewhere else. Why? I did not see any ministers of state get cut. I did not see any of their budgets reduced. I did not even see the Prime Minister reduce his cabinet. I would have accepted some of these if he had shown some restraint within the cabinet itself to spend money that we can ill-afford. We do not need those ministers of state. Surely the ministers there could be doing a more thorough job of their own department.

In fact, it is so bad that when you write to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, you get a letter back saying "I am sorry you wrote to the wrong person, it goes to this minister". Then sometimes you even get a letter back saying it has gone back to that minister because the Minister of Employment and Immigration sent it to the wrong minister. I have become so confused as to who you deal with because there are so many ministers of state in the Employment and Immigration Department.

I think at last count there was a minister of state for youth unemployment, a minister of state for immigration—I am not sure, I lose track, but I know that there are at least three ministers doing the job that I think she should be doing. She is not going to have as many problems because of the cut-backs under the Unemployment Insurance Program. There are a lot of people who should be cut in that department.

I want to deal with that as a cost to the infrastructure on the east coast. Going back to the Established Programs Financing, there are areas affecting everybody on the east coast concerning health care and university education. At the same time, this government, as I said, has cut again at another infrastructure and that is the Unemployment Insurance Program.

The Unemployment Insurance Program in rural Canada has provided a supplementary income. There isn't anyone who would not agree with me on that. It has provided seasonal employment with the additional help to stay for the jobs when they are available. In some rural areas it is not much because seasonal jobs are almost full-time jobs. In other areas it has allowed people to have that extra income.

This government is privatizing the unemployment insurance fund. That means it will only be funded by the employee who contributes and the employer who contributes as well. That is fine if you want it to be privatized, but I question how this government will replace the additional income that was there for Canadians across Canada. I do think that most Canadians would agree that we want people in rural areas of Canada, whether they be in Newfoundland, British Columbia, in our north, even in some of the rural areas of southern Ontario or the golden triangle between Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa doing without.

I cannot believe that the government can bring in legislation like this and not provide people with something as they try to find longer lasting jobs and more income from what is available. The government is removing this income. There is no income there.

The minister says she is going to use the funds in the UI fund that will pay for itself for retraining. Well you cannot do that. If you wanted to retrain everybody, the fund could not do it because the amount of money required would be too great. Second, there are no jobs in the retraining programs for those people in rural areas. We are supposed to pass a bill incorporating changes to the Unemployment Insurance program that will cost Atlantic Canadians $309 million, according to the Canadian Labour Congress. I heard the debate this week and I heard some people say: "Yes, the Liberals made cuts or made changes to the Unemployment Insurance. Yes, I was here when they made those changes, but they never did what this government is doing. If they reduced some aspects of the Unemployment Insurance Commission they at least put in job-creation money that would give people the dignity to have a job and find the necessary additional weeks, and it worked. If the community has to find the jobs, they will find them if you allow them some job-creation money to keep the people there for when the jobs return to the point that they can sustain them. This government is not doing that. It says it is going to retrain you. Retrain you where? In southern Ontario? From rural Nova Scotia? From rural Newfoundland? That is not what I consider a direction that is going to help regional economies.

On unemployment insurance just in the fisheries fund, in 1988, the government had to put in $251 million to cover the shortfall because fishermen have not been able to contribute the total amount because there is no employer for the most part to contribute the total amount to the fisheries unemployment scheme. That is going. Who is going to replace that? Who is going to say to the fishermen that they will help in terms of the Unemployment Insurance Program? There is no consideration. There is no hope. Maybe it is all part of this government's attitude to the east coast fishery that will let the chips fall where they may. The big will survive, the foreigners will stay, the Americans can fish, but we are not going to intervene in the process to allow those thousands of people living in inshore communities to survive in those communities. There are no directed programs by this government for that.

The other area we have seen for what I consider infrastructure, has been cuts to defence. I have appreciated the facilities of defence being on the east coast. They were established there because there were wars going on and supplies were going across the Atlantic.

You build an infrastructure around these defence bases. I am sure that many Canadians have great memories of having lived on the Atlantic coast. Maybe some of them would never have had that opportunity had it not be for the defence establishments. I will say that the cuts to the six established communities with bases will affect 500 civilian positions, $90 million in salaries in the economy and all the infrastructure that went with those six bases.

I have not heard what will replace it, even on an interim basis. I challenge the government. You cannot keep taking from economies and expect them to survive. Maybe you want them to go to the middle part of Canada. But Canada is Canadians helping Canadians. There are other areas in the tax system that I would rather have seen affected; the capital cost allowance, the capital gains that better off Canadians still have. There are many areas that this government has not even touched because it shows it is leaning towards upper income Canadians, the big companies and the United States under the free trade agreement at the expense of what I consider rural Canada and the primary industries.

When the minister was here, he in his speech talked only of ACOA. I do not want to argue with him on the cuts for ACOA. I would think while we are cutting infrastructure that he would perhaps take another look at what his ACOA is funding because there is no point in funding tourism if there is no tourism next year. Why not fund infrastructures that municipalities have been asking for? Why not go after areas where it helps more people than individual people under ACOA? It is only a thought, but I have seen programs that ACOA or DRIE has funded or MAGI. I think it developed Halifax. It gave a rejuvenation to downtown Halifax at that time. There may have been some things wrong with it, but anyone who goes to Halifax would say that it started the development of Halifax and an interest in the downtown waterfront.

At the same time that I talked about ACOA, the minister wanted to aim at different people and he aimed at one of the leadership contenders. The leadership contender he aimed at has formed a new policy which the minister might like to read on regional development that gives a new attitude. If there are tight restrictions let us look at the money as examples of regional needs. He cited better transportation and communication systems, education and training programs, energy supplies, health care and public administration services. He also said—I do not want name him but I will—the leadership contender he was talking about was Mr. Chrétien. He also said at the time that he would work closely with provincial governments in slow growth regions to increase better public investments in necessary infrastructure.

In all my experience in Parliament as a back-bencher over there and as an opposition member here, I have never seen a government more directed to destroying the infrastructure and economies of the regions. This motion today is timely. We should be debating this in committees and we should be talking about the direction that this government is taking Canada, whether it is with the free trade agreement, the GST or the cuts to VIA. There is no replacement. We do not see that our roads are going to be any better. We do not see Air Canada servicing more people. In fact, Air Canada is going to cut back in Saint John and Sydney. It is going to cut back in other areas of Canada.

The government thinks things have to to be run like a business. There is nothing in here that we want to touch. We are going to sell it all. Forget Canadians. Look at the post office. I sat in committee today with the minister responsible for the Canada Post. He said to one of my colleagues that you do not want uneconomic things. I would have liked to have asked him to define uneconomic things. Are we talking about the rural post offices that are closing? Are we talking about the fact that Canadians, when they hear of their post office closing, would like to know how much it costs for that single post office? We don't know. We cannot even know what it costs to lease the post office in a community versus the cost of putting it into a business. And yet we are supposed to say this is all a standard of service that this government is giving Canadians.

The problem is this is all the infrastructure across rural Canada. I do not think—and I think I share this with my colleagues here—that the parts can be weakened without weakening the whole. As I see this government directing policies towards the big centres and towards centres away from the rural areas, you will find more and more that we are slowly losing Canada and it is becoming an area of regional disparities. This motion today shows that. I hope that the government and the ministers who are responsible will start looking at programs directed towards the regions. We need infrastructure. If you take from our area we need to have at least access to that money for a while to find new infrastructures to keep the people there.

In tough times we need infrastructures such as water and sewer. We need roads. If the government is taking trains away or looking at other areas of cutting back, I say I do not see that.

INTERNATIONAL CONSUMERS' RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today is international consumer rights day, organized by the international organization of consumer associations. Throughout the world, consumers are taking part in activities to stress their impact on the market place in our society.

The international organization is a non-governmental, non- profit organization that today links the activities of 173 consumer groups in 63 countries and initiates action on consumer problems that are international in scope, such as medical products, pesticides, tobacco and baby food.

The right to consumer education was selected as the organization's theme this year.

In this country, Mr. Speaker, consumers are protected by general legislation and especially by a market that is responsive to consumer needs and acknowledges the fact that consumers, business and governments must work together.

INTERNATIONAL CENTRE ON SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, those with long memories will recall that way back in September, 1988, the Prime Minister announced at the United Nations the establishment in Winnipeg of an international centre on sustainable development. Since then, his government does not appear to be in a hurry to implement the Prime Minister's promise.

In a column in the Winnipeg Free Press, Val Werier quotes one Manitoba official as saying: "The political map of eastern Europe is being rearranged faster than it takes the government to act on the centre."

Why the snail's pace? Is the Prime Minister still serious about his commitment to establish the centre? Actually, is he serious about implementing sustainable development at all? His government's lack of action so far forces Canadians to think that he is green by way of words, but not by way of actions.

ONTARIO YOUTH PARLIAMENT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, this week at Woodstock, the Ontario Youth Parliament concluded its successful twenty-second annual meeting. The youth parliament is a successor to the Ontario Older Boy's Parliament which began in 1912.

Over a quarter century has passed since I was first elected to Ontario Older Boy's Parliament, and this weekend at Woodstock I noticed important differences that reflect the progressive evolution of our society.

Females are now equal participants in the process, whereas once they were excluded. Indeed, the premier this year is Christine Kennedy. The parliament is now interfaith, whereas once it was for Protestants only. Issues of health care services and the environment were among those debated, also reflecting contemporary concerns.

Finally, four youth representatives from the U.S.S.R. were present, yet another sign of the changing times, and hopeful signs, as Canadian youth learn the ways of parliamentary debate and procedure and prepare themselves for future leadership in a more democratic Canada.

ARCTIC WINTER GAMES

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the twentieth Arctic Winter Games are under way this week in Yellowknife. The four circumpolar nations, Canada, the United States, Greenland and the Soviet Union are represented. Canadian athletes from northern Alberta, the Yukon and, of course, the Northwest Territories, are participating. Northern Quebec, unfortunately, was unable to come. We hope that they will be there the next time.

These games are unique for their circumpolar and aboriginal spirit. Traditional Dene and Inuit games such as the snow-snake and the high kick are prominent. Performing groups from the different nations provide fascinating entertainment.

Congratulations are due to the organizers, the many volunteers, and the athletes. The presence of the delegation from the Soviet Union is a real high point of this year's games.

The games are truly a celebration of northern culture, characterized by friendly competition and dedicated to just having fun. These games are a model for all international competitions and for harmonious relations among nations.

Canadians should rejoice that the north has opened, in friendly spirits, the means to have good international relations with the other three circumpolar nations.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, the decision by the Public Service Staff Relations Board determining that the government violated its collective agreement with the Public Service Alliance of Canada is good news for Canadian civil servants and the Canadian public.

It is good news for civil servants because the jobs of permanent employees will now be more secure, not threatened by the whims of this government. It is good news for the Canadian public because the truth is out. It proves what New Democrats have been saying all along, that the government has contracted out public service jobs, privatized them.

Public Service Alliance President Daryl Bean said it well: "This is a landmark decision for all public sector workers who have lost their jobs and had their careers disrupted as a result of contracting out by the federal government".

The Conservative agenda of increased contracting out and privatization has effectively been dealt a major blow by this decision. Let us hope that this is a lesson learned by all levels of government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard on the news that VIA Rail intends to sell by tender its surplus rail cars in the international market.

The Rocky Mountain Rail Society has requested of the minister that these cars be made available to them. This volunteer society has already rebuilt a large steam engine and has arranged the running rights for a tourist run within central Alberta.

I implore the minister to instruct VIA Rail to reconsider this action and to keep these rail cars Canadian.

1990 BRIER

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, Canada's roaring game, the 1990 Brier Men's Curling Championship, produced an unusually exciting climax to a long winter season last Sunday when the seasoned Ontario rink won the event on the very last rock over a determined young team from New Brunswick.

Congratulations certainly go to skip Ed (the Wrench) Werenich and his Ontario team for winning their second national championship, and sincere best wishes to them for further success in pursuit of world honours.

There is also understandable pride on my part for the Jim Sullivan rink from Fredericton's Capital Winter Club, with an average age of just 21 years, which indeed did provide a spectacular performance by winning two critical play-off games to reach the final and then losing only by a whisker. These curlers, all students of the University of New Brunswick, distinguished themselves in the best of Canadian competition and received a well deserved hero's welcome upon their return home.

As with all forms of excellence in national endeavours, athletic achievements—in this case curling— help to develop the spirit and the character of our country, and even more so help to preserve its unity. To all those who have participated in the 1990 Brier should go our recognition and appreciation for such an important contribution to Canada's way of life.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on March 12, the Liberal Party set up a telephone line for Canadians to express their views about the GST. Since then, more than 50,000 Canadians have spoken out against this new tax.

We hope that many more Canadians will call before Sunday night to voice their opposition to this unfair tax by calling 1-900-720-6051 or 1-900-720-6052.

TIEM CANADA

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this government prides itself in its business acumen. This government makes much of its ability to manage and manage it has.

The government has managed to blow $17 million over three years on TIEM Canada through innovations programs and a program to assist small business. The government, after its original interest-free loan of $12 million, was to pay TIEM Canada $14,000 for every entrepreneur TIEM had as a client and $14,000 for every job TIEM created. TIEM Canada claimed 1,000 jobs were created. Its entrepreneur clients said "Not so". Some said that they were told to lie.

Last spring the government woke up and amended its contract with the now non-existent TIEM Canada. Auditors believe TIEM Canada owes the government $12 million.

• (1410)

That $12 million would have gone a long way in this year's budget. It would have almost covered the $1.6 million cuts to women's programs, $8 million cuts to native programs, $8.6 million cuts to veteran's board and lodging.

The government claims to be investigating, but I wonder how many other management disasters this government has hidden away and where they have hidden them, and if there will be a formal audit of TIEM Canada.

THE FRENCH FACT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, March 14, 1990, the Quebec Minister of Education, Postsecondary Education and Science, Mr. Claude Ryan, said: "If these manifestations of hostility to the French fact were to continue and increase, if they were to be seen as a true reflection of the attitudes of the majority of English-speaking Canadians, we would certainly have to take a very serious look at our place in this country".

LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the issue of linguistic duality and the Canadian government's emphasis on this fact, as demonstrated by the Secretary of State in his letter of February 7 to Mr. David Peterson. The present government has repeatedly demonstrated its firm and unequivocal commitment to this important dimension of our national reality.

Whether it was passing the new Official Languages Act, proposing the Meech Lake Accord in its present form, or signing agreements with the ten provinces and the two territories on minority language education and second official language teaching, the Conservative Government has demonstrated, in no uncertain terms, its commitment to the rights of official language minorities, wherever they happen to be in this country. A great deal has been done in this respect in recent years. Our government's commitment testifies to and confirms our appreciation of this country's linguistic duality.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the anti-GST phone-in petition sponsored by the Liberal party is receiving a tremendous response from Canadians across this country. Over 50,000 calls have been received thus far. In fact, the demand has been so intense that we have had to add another line to register the calls and we have extended the phone-in campaign to 11 p.m. EST on Sunday night.

The people of Canada are certainly taking advantage of this opportunity to reach out and touch an out of touch government and ring their bell so that they will know that the GST is totally unacceptable.

Canadians dialing 1-900-720-6051 or 1-900-720-6052 know that the Liberals care about the views of the people.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans knows that the fishing industry has no confidence in that department's policies. If he wants to restore some lost confidence, I recommend the following actions.

Commit the department to a complete reassessment of traditional stocks in the Scotia-Fundy region. As it now stands, the department's data does not correspond with what the fishermen are seeing in the waters, since they cannot catch it.

Second, he should institute the mesh size recommendations made by the inshore for all sectors of the fishery: inshore, offshore and foreigners. That would allow the escapement of juvenile fish and it would be an automatic conservation method.

He should further reassert the department's traditional role in market development, substantially increasing the government's marketing budget from the $1.9 million spent in 1989. He would then have some funds to go into the under-utilized species as incentives for the offshore trawlers and for all those empty fish plants, rather than letting the foreigners catch it.

As well, as a matter of good faith, he should review the practice of allowing the Cape North to fish the traditional stock of pollock in our waters. That contract is up in January and he should give notice to the owners that it should not be within our inshore.

I believe these actions would certainly improve the confidence the inshore would have in the minister.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): When the First Ministers Conference on aboriginal matters fell apart in 1987 the Prime Minister said: "There shall be a price to be paid for our failure. Unfortunately, those called upon to pay the larger share of that price shall be those least equipped to pay it, namely the aboriginal peoples".

Those words have a bitter ring to them today since it is the Prime Minister's own government that is extracting that price. This morning the Assembly of First Nations released an analysis of the recent budget they labelled: "The Budget in Grief".

It shows that per capita expenditures for Indian people in this country have actually dropped 11 per cent over the last five years. It shows that the incomes of Indian people are a pitiful 54 per cent of those of other Canadians. Yet, at the same time the Prime Minister's own government has treated Indian governments as if they were like the wealthy provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario and capped their budgets.

Maybe the Prime Minister needs to be reminded of the rest of his 1987 statement when he said: "The aboriginal people have paid an unfair price for an unfair share of time".

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, to paraphrase one of the founders of this nation: "A Canadian I was born and as a Canadian I wish to die". I am also a Nova Scotian and an Atlantic Canadian.

There are forces at work in this country today that naively think that although fostering inter-regional, inter-linguistic and inter-cultural misunderstanding, they will not fracture or otherwise harm Canada, not to mention themselves. They cynically feel that where they failed others should not be permitted to succeed, notwithstanding the national interest.

A Canada without Quebec more imperils Atlantic Canada than a Newfoundland without the codfish.

Without Quebec in Canada, what becomes of the maritimes? Clearly, Quebec can make it no its own economically. Can we? Outside of Confederation, how will Newfoundland export its power to the United States? Will the maritimes become the East Pakistan of North America?

Let us say yes to Canada, a Canada with Ontario, with the west, with the north, with Atlantic Canada, and with Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In her absence, perhaps I can direct the question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

On October 18, 1989, in announcing her 1990 immigration plan, the minister said:

> Family reunification remains the cornerstone of the current immigration program..Immigrants make a valuable contribution to Canada,—enrich our society and our economy and—they help us maintain our tradition of tolerance which is envied by all.

Today, we are dismayed to learn that the government has backed down on this commitment. Only last month in a directive the government sent to all immigration posts abroad, it said:

> Global targets have been set to produce 173,000 landings from abroad. Posts must/must adhere to within 5/5 per cent of their targets.

Surely this amounts to a new quota system, and I ask the Deputy Prime Minister why this reversal of our longstanding policy against quotas? Why are we no longer concerned with family reunification and encouraging immigrants to this country with needed skills?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, our policy favours all the components of our program and of our immigration level. As you know, we had to make up for lost time due to the backlog resulting from previous policies. We are respecting our timetable and especially the major components of this immigration level which show that Canada is a welcoming country. The Family Reunification Program has been greatly improved in recent years. We definitely intend to continue to reunite families and improve this program as part of our immigration.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister is attempting to say that the government has not introduced a new quota system. How can she say this when the directive, sent only last month to all our overseas immigration posts, says:

> Management should be exercised at the front end by managing the number of cases scheduled for interview or otherwise put into active processing.

What this means is that the minister's department will be turning away potential immigrants with needed skills and people who want to be reunited with their families before they can even get into the front door of our immigration posts.

Why has the government abandoned our longstanding policy against quotas for this new type of quota system, as made clear by the government's own directive to its immigration posts?

• (1420)

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, it is completely wrong to suggest to this House that we decided to reduce immigration quotas and I especially want to say that our policy is open and known. We respect the quotas and certainly have no hidden quotas.

Mr. Marchi: That is false!

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not has she reduced what even the minister calls "quotas", but has a directive been given that numbers above what we consider to be new quotas cannot be allowed in through her department?

For example, this same document states:

> Globally, increased immigrant output at the expense of other priorities can no/no longer be seen as an appropriate response to excessive demand..it would result in a significant over filling of the annual level thus rendering the levels exercise, and its consultation process, a less meaningful endeavour."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if this document does not describe a new quota mechanism, why does the directive also say that for Canada, this means that the number of eligible immigrants far exceeds the number the government plans to admit?

So I ask the minister why she does not simply provide the additional resources to process all the eligible immigrants efficiently and equally. Why not, Madam Minister?

[English]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the processing of the backlog will continue and it is in the interest of all claimants that it should do so.

[Translation]

We are trying to provide our claimants with the services to which they are entitled and all the applications for sponsorship, family reunification and the various components of our immigration level will be treated with the services, compassion and humanitarianism that characterize us as a government and as a country.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the same minister and it concerns the other backlog in her department, namely, the refugee backlog.

It has now been 10 days since the Federal Court ruled that the minister's refugee backlog clearing system is illegal for the 125,000 refugee claimants and to date there has been no response from the minister or the government.

In light of the ruling, whereby claimants have been waiting for three, four and five years, the system is costing hundreds of millions of dollars, can the minister inform the House what action the government will take in view of this ruling so that this large, onerous cloud of indecision and uncertainty may finally, once and for all, be lifted?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the judgement referred to in no way affects the legality of the system. We have implemented a process to clear up the backlog and we will see it through. We are trying as much as possible to speed up the process by always keeping in mind humanitarian considerations, which guide and, I would even say, characterize our department. So I repeat, the judgement does not call the legality of the system into question. On the contrary, what we are trying to do with these new measures is to guarantee our protection to those who ask for it.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister has read the decision. Today, if she is categorically saying that the legality of the system is not being called into question, then clearly not only has the government not given us a solution, they have not even read the decision from the Federal Court.

My supplementary question is to the same minister. She is aware that a number of claimants have been denied status or have been deported under the system that has been ruled on as illegal by the court.

In light of the court's ruling, what does the minister plan to do about those who have been denied or deported? Will they get a second opportunity and a second fair hearing, something that they were denied the first time around?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): My colleague in Immigration is reviewing the judgement and we will make the decisions required to speed up the process of clearing the backlog. It is in the interest of all Canadians that we in the government and the department take rational, well-considered measures, which is what we are working on.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Prime Minister.

I would like to make a reasonable suggestion to the Deputy Prime Minister this afternoon. For some time, his government has been calling for alternatives to the GST, and our party and riding have given an alternative to the government in terms of tax fairness for individuals and corporations.

This morning we heard a very well spoken alternative from Neil Brooks, a professor from Osgoode Law School in Toronto, to the GST. In his alternative, Mr. Brooks proposed something that is less inflationary, has less impact on interest rates, better in terms of job creation, an alternative that is far less costly.

When the Deputy Prime Minister considers the tremendous opposition to the GST, when he considers the fact that there is a revolt brewing on the back-benches of the government party, I wonder whether or not the government would consider suspending the process of the GST. Would he put the GST on the back burner for a few months and consider an alternative to the GST, in light of the fact that the population of this country does not want this new tax?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell our hon. friend in very clear terms that there is no question that this government will go back on the GST, because the GST, as we have proposed it, is the fairest of the value added taxes and the most equitable system of all VAT country taxes. Forty-eight countries have a GST and ours is the most equitable.

The reasons why so many Canadians fail to understand it is that the opposition, instead of being responsible and co-operating in the improvement of the finances of this country, is doing everything it can to describe it in terms that are most unfair.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, in addition to the unfairness of the GST and the opposition to the GST, the minister knows very well that over the next 10 years, according to the Minister of National Revenue, the administration of the tax will cost the Canadian taxpayers billions and billions of dollars. The compliance costs in terms of business will be billions and billions of dollars. In fact, over the next decade if you put the two of them together it will cost administration and compliance costs of over $15 billion.

Is that figure alone not enough to convince the government to withdraw the GST, to listen to the Canadian people, to hear what they are saying, be a bit democratic, withdraw the GST, or at least suspend it and look at alternatives.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): I would like to remind the hon. member that, at committee stage, his own party supported the introduction of a value-added tax. It so happens that as part of my responsibilities I travel around this country and I meet people. When we tell them what this reform is all about, they support it.

We will continue our job of explaining and introducing this new tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the minister is aware that our party has proposed an alternative to the GST. He is aware of it.

Mr. Speaker, in Mr. Brooks' proposal this morning, an average family that earns $35,000 to $40,000 a year would be $300 ahead compared to the GST, according to Mr. Brooks' figures. Does the minister now agree that the government's proposal is worse than Mr. Brooks'? And if he agrees, will he finally listen to the Canadian people and withdraw the GST?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I tell our friend again that there is no question of withdrawing this tax proposal. We have presented it to the House and will see it through because it is a modern reform. When we explain it to Canadians and tell them about its advantages, particularly for families of modest means, they will understand.

Once the opposition stops doing everything to misrepresent this proposal, things will improve and gradually— From the phone calls we receive, we sense that people accept it. They do not like taxes, neither do I, but they accept this reform more and more.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Candians have reason to rejoice. The Supreme Court of Canada has handed down an historic judgment, which confirms that language minorities have the right to manage and control education in the minority language and the institutions that dispense that education.

Mr. Speaker, minority groups now have a decision by the Supreme Court that confirms they have rights. However, these rights will be more or less respected depending always on the generosity of the provinces.

Considering the reluctance of certain provinces, including Alberta, to recognize the rights of the francophone language minority, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the federal government intends to do to ensure that these provinces are generous, open and obliging towards their language minorities. What will the government do?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, two years ago, the government promised to raise the question of minority language rights in general at the first constitutional conference after the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord.

This commitment was repeated several times, in the Speech from the Throne, for instance, which identified language rights and strengthening the Charter as the government's constitutional priorities, once Meech Lake was ratified.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for her answer. The Supreme Court of Canada has confirmed today that minority language parents should be granted management and control over minority language instructions and facilities.

Many provinces have still to accept minority language groups and their right to educate their children in their language. As spokesperson for the Government of Canada, will the minister tell us whether the Government of Canada will convene a federal-provincial conference to which all premiers will be invited to discuss this question which is very important to Canadian unity?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I answered the hon. member, the government is committed to dealing with this issue on a constitutional basis. I would also point out that I would expect that the governments of the provinces of Canada will abide by the law as it has been articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I have not had a chance to examine the decision in its details, as it was just released today at noon, but the Government of Canada is ready to collaborate with the provinces and territories so that they can give effect to the decision of Supreme Court of Canada in the most appropriate way.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, recently, the Minister of National Revenue stated that businesses that will have to collect the GST should start registering next month with his department.

Could the Minister of National Revenue explain why businesses in Canada have to register to collect the goods and services tax, although the bill has yet to receive the approval of the Parliament of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member should know, the Auditor General on numerous occasions, including in his last report, stated that the GST must receive the priority and resources required to ensure the successful delivery of this major government initiative prior to the implementation of such legislation.

We would be irresponsible if we were not moving forward and giving Canadians the opportunity to register early because there are numerous benefits. Registration will be done on a voluntary basis up until Royal Assent is given some time later in the year, hopefully.

In the meantime, those companies which we are urging to register will be able personally to begin to claim for federal sales tax credits and will get information on how to collect the GST, keep records, file returns, obtain refunds of federal sales tax including the inventory of resale of December 31, 1990, what options are available to get GST procedures, and all the other positive elements that we are beginning to put in place now for the benefit of each and every business in Canada, particularly the small business community.

As I have said in the past, if we did not do that, if we did not prepare, we would be irresponsible. We are preparing.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the small business community to which the minister refers has been very outspoken in its opposition to the goods and services tax. The minister has been talking about the efficiency of the program he is putting in place. That program includes the hiring of 4,000 to 7,000 tax collectors and so-called tax police.

Since the Minister of National Revenue is debating the amount it is going to cost taxpayers to implement the GST, can he tell us how much it is going to cost small businesses which are going to be forced to collect the goods and services tax? How much is it going to cost them?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of elements in that question that have to be corrected.

The hon. member is wrong in the number of employees that are required to be hired to implement and administer the GST. The hon. member is wrong when he says that the small businesses we talked to are opposed to this. We know that John Bulloch wants a national sales tax. He is opposed to this system, but the majority of small businesses we are talking to are not opposed to it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milliken: Give me a break.

Mr. Fontana: Your nose is growing. Pick up the phone line; you'll find out.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could complete his answer.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, they get a little antsy when they start hearing the truth and the facts.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. minister does not answer the question, they will never hear the truth.

Mr. Jelinek: To answer my hon. friend specifically, the compliance costs to small business are going to be minimal. That is why we are offering the advance of up to $1,000 to small businesses to be able to adjust to the new, better, fairer and simpler tax.

CONSUMERS GAS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister about the takeover of Consumers Gas by British Gas. The British Office of Gas Supply, a government watch-dog agency in the U.K., has accused British Gas of encouraging energy waste in Britain with pricing policies which offer discounts to high volume purchasers.

Will the minister see to it that this environmentally damaging approach to pricing, which has been identified by this British watch-dog agency as an environmentally dangerous approach, is brought to the attention of both Investment Canada and other agencies that have to make decisions with respect to this sale so that they will make decisions to keep Consumers Gas in Canadian hands?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that Investment Canada does not make decisions. It makes recommendations.

Its recommendations are based in takeovers of this sort on proving that there is net benefit to Canada from any such takeover. If that case is not made and the minister does not accept it, the takeover would not go through.

The hon. member should know, too, that the Ontario Energy Board plays a key role in this decision, as do the energy authorities in the province of Quebec.

• (1440)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, that is why I suggested the variety of different agencies with which this government, if it takes environmental considerations seriously, should be communicating to see to it that Consumers Gas is not simply sold out to a company with this kind of poor record.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is as follows: More than 20,000 consumers filed complaints with British Gas last year. Will the government consider these problems when it makes its decision on the sale of Consumers Gas?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this will be part of the calculation of net benefit to the people of Canada.

Large discounts occur now with Consumers Gas in Canada. They are not necessarily right just because they are Canadian. The British applicants will have to prove that their application is of net benefit to Canada, including environmental considerations.

MOLI ENERGY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the minister responsible for western diversification.

The high tech company Moli Energy Limited went into receivership on February 26 of this year. The company leaves considerable debts behind, including $33 million to the B.C. government and approximately $6 million to the federal government.

Last week it was announced that a consortium of three Japanese companies have taken over the assets and operations of the firm while the B.C. government is licensing the technology to them. There have been suggestions in British Columbia that other Canadian companies did not have the opportunity to bid for the assets of the company.

First, will the technology that has been developed at the University of British Columbia stay in Canada? Second, were Canadian firms allowed to bid on the assets of this company?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, Moli Energy, as the hon. member will know, is a 10-year old company which has been experiencing some financial difficulties for about six months. During that period of time it has been unable to find Canadian funding to keep itself in operation. The answer to the hon. member's first question is that there was opportunity for Canadian investors to become involved in Moli. Second, the technology as I understand it will remain in Canada. It is a very good technology. As important, there are over 100 jobs involved which will remain in Canada.

While the financial difficulties are not something that we like, the end result is the fact that the technology will stay in Canada and that there will be over 100 jobs maintained as a result of the restructuring that has just been announced.

TIEM CANADA

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In 1986 the department of regional expansion and the department of employment funded a private company known as TIEM Canada in the amount of approximately $18 million, which company was supposed to help small business in a formative period. However, it was soon discovered that this company did not deliver on its promises, did not meet its targets, was incompetent, was inefficient, and was not able to account for the government funds provided to it.

What criteria were used to select this company for funding, and what evaluation was done of its business plan before funds were provided to the company?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, there was an evaluation done, but what is important here is that very serious allegations have been raised recently concerning TIEM Canada's operations and they are currently being examined.

Until it has been determined whether legal investigation is required in this case, further comment would be inappropriate.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the government has known about this situation for more than a year now and has done nothing about it.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister prepared to establish an independent inquiry to look into this matter and to provide the Canadian public with all the facts about this sad affair?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is quite inaccurate to say that the government has done nothing about it.

In May 1989 this organization, TIEM Canada, closed its doors but it did not go into either bankruptcy or receivership. The Department of Industry, Science and Technology and CEIC have monitored the winding up of TIEM and have assisted TIEM clients to get alternative support.

This the government has been doing, plus the investigation I mentioned in my first answer.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The government makes two assumptions: first, that the value of the MST will be removed from manufactured goods and passed on to the consumer and, second, that Canadians when faced with a rise in the cost of living will not demand higher wages.

Experience has shown that prices will not fall even when old taxes are removed. At a recent national renovators' conference only 44 per cent said that suppliers would pass on some savings.

Given these examples and substantiated studies, why will the government not admit to Canadians that there are no guarantees to protect consumers and that the inflationary assumptions predicted by the government are not even remotely realistic?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we are very confident that our evaluations are right.

I agree with the hon. member—and we have said so from the outset—that during the transition period we would all, both on the business side and on the labour force side, have to be careful to manage the transition. If everybody were to try to make the best out of it for himself it would create pressures.

Nevertheless, with the disposition we have in this GST reform to protect fully the buying capacity of lower income people and the vast majority of our citizens, we are confident that there is no need for these pressures to arise if we behave in a responsible manner.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I find that answer absolutely incredible.

Last week in Montreal it was shown that the Canadian consumer when faced with a rise in the cost of living will demand higher wages. Some 4,200 members of Canadian Auto Workers employed by Pratt and Whitney Incorporated settled for a three-year contract that provides for an unlimited cost of living allowance designed to protect them from the effects of the GST on consumer prices.

Will the minister admit that his prediction of a bump of 1.25 per cent in the inflation rate when the GST goes into effect does not even include the inflationary effect of wage settlement pressures?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member keeps forgetting that the prices of many items will go down considerably. Food prices, for example, will go down.

This is part of the problem: they tell us that Canadians do not support the GST but they go around describing it in a way that would make it unacceptable.

The truth of the matter is that our GST reform is precisely designed to tackle this issue to make sure that the lower income people are fully protected and better off after.

Indeed, with people behaving in a responsible manner, I am fully confident that our provisions will prove themselves to be right.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Yesterday the Minister for International Trade told the House that any export permits issued to B.C. herring processors would have been due to our shortage of freezer capacity.

Local DFO officials were telling processors in the days immediately prior to March 10 that export permits would not be issued. They knew we had adequate freezer capacity.

Will the minister explain to the House what role his department played in the discussions, whether or not he was consulted by the Department of External Affairs and, if so, what recommendations were made by his ministry?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, indeed we were consulted by the Department of External Affairs on this issue. We were made aware that there was a need to allow for the export of roe herring to the United States because of the freezing capacity.

• (1450)

This is the condition. The condition of all export licences granted is that the fish be brought back to Canada for processing and we have the undertaking of the processors, the exporters, in that regard.

I do not see where the member sees a problem with this.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, those assurances from the processing companies with 80 cents will get you a cup of coffee in the cafeteria. Right now employees of the B.C. Packers plant in Victoria are receiving their lay-off notices, and that freezer plant could have handled a lot of the pounds that are being shipped.

Regulations were issued late on Friday evening; 107 permits were issued early Saturday morning to ship 3,400 tonnes, 7.5 million pounds or 11 per cent of our total expected catch for 1990.

The trucks are rolling. The fish are leaving. The jobs are reappearing in Washington State.

The previous Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the former Minister for International Trade assured us that no jobs historically held in the B.C. fish processing industry would be lost. What assurances will the present minister give to the B.C. shore workers that he will make sure B.C. fish processing jobs will be secured for Canadians?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the position is quite clear. In order to handle the herring it has to go through an individual quick freezing method, and there is a limited capacity in B.C. to freeze herring.

There is a TAC of about 30,000 tonnes of herring which may be caught very quickly. There is a limited number of export permits being issued on the condition that the herring will be shipped to the U.S. for freezing only and returned to Canada for processing. Each time an export under a valid permit is made it has to be reported to External Affairs. When the fish is returned to Canada the reimportation must be reported to External Affairs and verified with documentation. This is to ensure that roe herring caught will not lie on a dock and rot because the freezing capacity is not there.

Finally, the B.C. Packers plant that is being closed is being closed because of high costs, a shorter trolling season and the shifting of the fishery to the north. That is the reason for the closure, not the specious and false reasons just given by the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday the government revealed its proposal for Article XI negotiations at the GATT in the multilateral trade negotiations this year. It is a rather vague document, although we are glad to see the government finally reveal its position with regard to Article XI and the support it will provide to dairy farmers of Canada.

Is the minister willing to make a commitment here this afternoon that the government will not allow imports larger than those recommended by dairy farmers of Canada and the almost 40,000 families who depend on those import controls to have a viable industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on occasion after occasion we have given our commitments to the farmers of Canada who were interested in this issue and to other interested people that we are going to be fighting, as we did with the presentation we made yesterday, for a clear and effective Article XI(2)(1)(c), and that is just what we are doing.

We are glad to see the support that we are getting from dairy farmers. Richard Doyle of the Dairy Farmers of Canada said: 'It is the first detailed proposal on Article XI by any country, that they came out with this is a big step".

If the Dairy Farmers of Canada think it is a big step, why does the hon. gentleman not accept the fact that it is a big step.

Canadian Federation of Agriculture President, Don Knoerr, said that our proposal is close to the position worked out at its annual meeting and that it offers a good balance between domestic and export interest groups.

The dairy farmers of Quebec are taking the same position, so I think we can say there is just about unanimous approval.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, you will note that the Minister for International Trade did not respond to my question.

Richard Doyle and the 40,000 dairy farmers he represents have recommended to the government that the volumes of imports be limited on a value basis to 5 per cent or on a volume basis to 3 per cent of the Canadian dairy industry.

Is the minister willing to make that the bottom line, or is the government going to sell out the farmers of Canada? That is all I want to know.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has just lately come to an intense interest in this issue. He did not want Canada to put a proposal forward on Article XI at all until there was a GATT panel decision that he did not like.

They do not like the GATT when there is a panel decision they do not like. They do not like the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, and now he apparently does not like our presentation on Article XI. Everybody else likes it.

The hon. gentleman will have to wait until negotiations are completed. We will only agree to what is in the best interest of our supply management system and Canadian agriculture generally.

CURRENCY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

Nova Scotians were honoured a few years ago when the beautiful beach at Lockeport graced our $50 bill. When we found it was not going to happen we were disappointed, but we felt we were moving up in the world when they put the historic town of Lunenburg on the $100 bill.

Now we are told that that is to be no more. It seems our goose is cooked, because they are going to put the Canada goose on the $100 bill. All Nova Scotians are outraged.

Given that the geese will not be offended if they are not on the bill but Nova Scotians will, given that the geese do not vote in Canadian elections but Lunenburgers do—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would like to respond quickly.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member that the Bank of Canada did not have any intention of reflecting negatively on the good people of Lunenburg. However, in 1986 the Bank of Canada indicated that it wanted to change the design and go to a more simple design for two reasons, basically.

The first is for new security features against counterfeiting, and the second is to assist the blind and the visually impaired to distinguish among denominations. These are the reasons for the changes.

TRANSPORTATION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

As he knows another day has gone by since the Federal Court quashed the licence to build a dam on the Oldman River. To make things worse, the Government of Alberta maintains that it does not intend to stop the work on the dam on the Oldman River.

Could the minister give assurance to the House that he intends to proceed and inform the Government of Alberta that all the work on the dam on the Oldman River must be stopped, using the powers he has under the Navigable Waters Protections Act?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as all members of the House know, the decision with respect to the Oldman River if it is upheld in the court, should it be appealed—the province of Alberta has indicated its intention to request leave to appeal—would certainly have very widespread ramifications not only for this project but for others.

Consequently, representatives of the Departments of Transport, Fisheries and Oceans, Environment and Justice have been meeting and will continue to meet in order to study the judgment and its ramifications on this and other projects.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the ramifications of this decision were known to this government a long time ago when the Prime Minister, the Minister of the Environment and other ministers of the Crown subscribed to the notion of sustainable development at home and abroad. This is no excuse to give us in the House today.

My supplementary question is again for the Minister of Transport. He has received a request from an organization in Alberta called The Friends of the Oldman River. They are urging him to take action and to stop the construction of the dam.

• (1500)

Will the minister be a friend of this organization and inform the Alberta government that the work must be halted immediately? Or does he want to let the organization do the work for him?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has answered the question. This is a decision with far-ranging implications. I think that the people of Canada—all those interested, such as the people of Alberta and environmentalists would want us to take every look at it that we can in order to come up with the best decision as to how to proceed. We have no difficulty with doing that and explaining to the people of Canada that we are taking that kind of a look at it.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Premier Devine and the minister have been leading western Canada to believe that a cash program will be forthcoming to assist producers in putting in the crop this spring. However, no program has yet been announced.

Tonight, the minister and the premier are meeting with bankers in Toronto to discuss the agricultural debt. How does this meeting affect the expected cash pay-out? When can western Canada expect this promised pay-out to materialize?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have received the report of the federal-provincial committee that has assessed the current situation. We are evaluating it and looking at various options that might be considered.

The meeting tonight with bankers and Premier Devine is to discuss some of the long-term farm credit problems that exist within the province of Saskatchewan and to look at some options there as well.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, western Canada needs stability, not political gamesmanship. The agricultural industry is clearly in crisis. Prairie cities, towns and villages are in a desperate situation. The net-out migration from Saskatchewan alone is some—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time I would like the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Laporte: My question, Mr. Speaker, is this. Given the fact that there has been a tremendous out-migration from western Canada, will the minister be telling Canadian banks today that they should be treating western Canada with the same compassion that they are treating Third World debtors with the restructuring program that is taking place there?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and other hon. members of the House that we are working on this very serious problem at the present time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, and now for the customary Thursday question: we would like to know what the government's order of business will be in the days to come, and I would like to ask the minister whether he could inform the House what the business of the House will be during the next few days, until next Wednesday or Thursday?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will be an allotted day.

Next week on Monday and Tuesday we will start with third reading on Bill C–48, the crop insurance bill, followed by report stage on C–56, the Small Businesses Loans Act.

I will then call second reading of Bill C–65, the borrowing bill. Wednesday next week will be an allotted day.

POINT OF ORDER

DEMONSTRATIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have given notice of this issue to both parties. It involves house business and relates to the new regulations with regard to demonstrations on the grounds of Parliament Hill.

I would ask the government House leader recognizing, first, that the request for new regulations came from the Hill, and the need for safety and to ensure that there is unimpeded access to the buildings by MPs, their staff and, more important, emergency vehicles. In view of the concern that a number of people in this House from all parties have with regard to demonstrations and the ability of Canadians to come to Parliament to express their views, and considering the fact that the regulations which were produced have not been the result of a thorough consultation among the parties, will the minister refer this matter to a standing committee?

I ask this to make sure that the regulations meet the needs of the safety of the people working here, but also to ensure that the public has a legitimate right to demonstrate on the Hill, specifically that they have the right to demonstrate on the outside far central staircase, something which is not very clear if you read the regulations.

The central staircase is outside the building. It has been used for public demonstrations, for speeches by the Leader of the Opposition, as well as other political figures. I would like to ensure that we have a thorough review of these regulations so that the public is protected.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this decision preceded my assuming my present position on the Board of Internal Economy.

According to the minutes of a meeting of the Board of Internal Economy of November 22, 1989, there was in attendance the House leader of the New Democratic Party. The member for Kamloops was there, as well as the then House leader for the Liberal party, the current Leader of the Official Opposition. There was as well representatives from our party, of course.

A request was made that the Speaker on behalf of the Board of Internal Economy write a letter to the Minister of Public Works requesting that the Public Works nuisance regulations be amended to permit the Minister of Public Works to designate specific areas on Parliament Hill for holding demonstrations and other activities, and to allow the minister or a peace officer to prohibit or evict any persons not complying with the order.

Clearly, the message from the Board of Internal Economy indicates that there is the desire to provide a space on Parliament Hill for demonstrations. There is a legitimate desire to provide space for those demonstrations. The Department of Public Works has done that. There is a process for regulations that takes into account public input, public reaction. There is that opportunity.

What is being done is to deal with the public's obvious right to come and express their views, but also with the clear nuisance factor as well as safety factor that arises from persons, in my opinion, exceeding in some cases what is reasonable and appropriate. Having an office on that side of the building, I am sometimes unable to open my window. In fact, I am sometimes unable to work with the window closed because of the volume of noise. After a year and a half the message, if there is one, is heard.

I do not think it is a terrible intrusion. It was unanimously agreed to by all parties, including the hon. member's party, to say that perhaps these demonstrations should not be so as to make it impossible for other people to perform their equally legitimate duties.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on the same point—

Mr. Speaker: I will listen to the hon. member for Churchill, but very briefly. This is going well beyond a point of order. It is getting into debate. Perhaps the hon. member has a very brief point. I am bound by the rules, as are we all.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, my further comments are going to be very short and very brief as you requested.

I understand that it was a Board of Internal Economy request that there be some regulations. I understand that there was a request that there be some area guaranteed for demonstrations.

My concern is that the actual regulation that came out, first, allows too much discretion by the minister on this issue. Second, the traditional area—

Mr. Speaker: I have been very patient here. The hon. member for Churchill has raised a matter concerning some regulations with respect to demonstrations on the Hill. There has been at least some response from the hon. minister, the House leader of the government.

I am going to ask hon. members to discuss this matter among themselves. If it cannot be settled, then of course I will hear hon. members again. This is no longer a point of order. This is a debate. I must be bound by the rules as we all are.

CORRECTION TO HANSARD

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is rare that I rise in this House to make a correction to Hansard, but there was an error made in the debates as reported at page 9247. In the column on the left side of the page, about the third paragraph down I was speaking about the government House leader in the course of my speech the other evening. The sentence was seriously misunderstood.

I would like to read the corrected sentence. It should be: "He got completely confused and obviously he completely befuddled every other member of the government who spoke on this subject because they have all agreed with the nonsense he spouted out yesterday, saying that the Senate was somehow acting improperly".

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Could I ask the hon. member if that is what the hon. member said?

Mr. Milliken: I may have said that, Mr. Speaker. What Hansard reported was the word "opposition" instead of the word "government". Of course the government House leader did not befuddle the opposition; he befuddled his own members.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milliken: The difficulty I am in is that if I said it it was because of the braying that was going on at the time and I was getting confused.

Mr. Speaker: Given the sentence that the hon. member read out, I have heard exactly the same sentence used on both sides of the House within minutes of each other.

Mr. Milliken: I just wanted to get the record straight.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that somebody will do the very best they can to straighten up the record. I thank the hon. member for his intervention.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—REGIONAL DISPARITIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nault:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect, support and promote the regional economies of Canada, in order to eliminate regional disparities in the Atlantic provinces, northern Ontario and western and northern Canada.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would like to enter this debate to speak on the supply motion before the House today. We have a unique opportunity this afternoon to correct the record on economic development programs put forward by the federal government in northern Ontario. That is what I would like to concentrate on in my remarks this afternoon.

I want to take as a text for making these remarks a very erroneous statement make by the member of Parliament for Kenora—Rainy River who slammed the federal budget, as the Kenora Daily Miner states. The member said that the budget will seriously erode business opportunities in northwestern Ontario. He implied that the future of FEDNOR was bleak. There were even some comments from members of his party to the effect that FEDNOR was going to cease operations.

Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, FEDNOR has gone from success to success. It has made an immense contribution in northern Ontario, a contribution which is micro by micro as opposed to just a big macro splash. It has affected dozens and dozens of different communities by helping the small business sector in those communities.

I have some numbers which I really think I should introduce before I take a few minutes to explain what the program is doing. I will have to do that because of what I have heard this morning when there was a lot of erroneous information about what FEDNOR ought to do.

There have been 323 projects approved by FEDNOR since its inception. There has been over $22 million in federal assistance and almost 2,000 jobs have been created. This is an expenditure which in a city, for example, of 10 million people might not be noticed. But in northern Ontario where the population is a little over 800,000, the vast majority of enterprise is small business, this is a very significant contribution.

This program has been chaired by the king of northern Ontario, Leo Bernier, a former minister in the provincial government of Ontario for many years, who understands the north very well and who is sitting beside the clock up here, Madam Speaker. He might even wave to you.

He has worked very, very hard for northern Ontario for decades. He has done a careful, perceptive job in making sure that FEDNOR is understood and that it is accessible to the small business community in northern Ontario.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hockin: Before I go to just any kind of dry description of what FEDNOR is, I have to tell you one of the proudest moments I have had as a minister was going to North Bay just a few months ago to announce the opening, with the very significant help of FEDNOR, of Mirolin Industries. Let me just tell you something about that announcement.

Mr. Mills: Was it a joint announcement with the member?

Mr. Hockin: Yes, the member was there, and he was delighted. Instead of sitting behind the hon. member opposite he was with me that day in North Bay. This announcement was typical of what we are trying to do in northern Ontario.

There was a company operating in the suburbs of Toronto and it had to expand. It had three or four problems with expanding there. One was the cost of property. Another was getting clearance on a railway siding which was absolutely crucial for the success of this company. The other was to get expertise and labour with a good work ethic and prompt response to the company's ads for labour. Of course, the company had to build the facility in good time at a good price.

It found that it was very difficult to accomplish that in its existing location. It placed an advertisement in the North Bay newspaper, advertising these jobs that might be available. It received over 600 excellent responses from educated, hardworking people who wanted to work for this company. It found a good property on the railway and together with help from FEDNOR and the province, which helped with a loan guarantee, we suddenly were able to make an announcement of 319 new jobs being created in North Bay.

I want to say something else which is very important to my hon. friends opposite. That particular program is typical of most of the programs that FEDNOR has pursued. We did it in co-operation with the provincial government of Ontario. This has not been a program where there has been tremendous rivalry between the provincial government of Ontario and the federal government of Canada. In fact, it has been very co-operative. There have not been games played.

I am frequently with the ministers René Fontaine or David Ramsay making these announcements. It is the same taxpayer that is paying for this. It is the same taxpayer in northern Ontario who will benefit from it, and we have worked together. I say this to the member for Kenora—Rainy River. We have worked together very well with the provinces. It is not right to overlook that, because that is the kind of federalism I am sure he would like to see.

We have had some successes from which I think the provincial government could learn. First, the "Buy North" program announced by the provincial government two years ago in northern Ontario has had a sluggish beginning and still is having some difficulty in getting under way.

The federal government has a procurement program that has been working very well. Officials from the Government of Canada have been going through northern Ontario trying to find people to bid on federal government work. In fact, there will be a special symposium for this in May to be held in Ottawa. We will bring suppliers from northern Ontario to Ottawa to show their skills and wares here. We have been off the mark very quickly and very intensively to make sure that FEDNOR works from the point of view of procurement.

The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River will be very interested to know that the chairman of FEDNOR is not somebody from London, Ontario, or Ottawa. He is from Hudson, Ontario, which is just outside Kenora. The chairman of FEDNOR has an understanding of northern Ontario, and an understanding of working with provincial governments, something which has helped this program immensely.

We have tried not only to deal with the hundreds of applications, we have also tried to make FEDNOR adaptable and supple when a crisis occurs. There is no way that FEDNOR can answer the whole problems of a mine closing in Elliott Lake when over 1,000 people are put out of work. There is no way a small business agency like this can totally answer that problem.

We have moved, for example, with considerable despatch in Timiskaming. The hon. member for Timiskaming has spoken often in the House of the problems they face, such as the closing of sawmills and mines. It has been really quite acute in the Timiskaming region which has been suffering unemployment of over 15 per cent in the last few years. We have put a special FEDNOR task force in place there. We have tried to speed up applications from that region to make sure that the Timiskaming region can be dealt with. We have put dozens of projects in there in the last two years. We have created hundreds of jobs. Just a month ago I announced a very important contribution to the Pyrok Company and the Diamond Lake Company. There are also certain offices of Veterans Affairs moving to Kirkland Lake. FEDNOR has sort of helped be a catalyst for this.

I would like to say to my hon. friend, the member for Algoma, that we are going to try to do the same thing with Elliot Lake. Next week we are going to have a special subcommittee of the FEDNOR board chaired by my hon. friend, Leo Bernier, who is going into the Elliot Lake region to see what we can do there.

Ordinarily, Madam Speaker, one might think that this is window dressing. But when you see how that particular approach worked in the Timiskaming area, you have to believe that it holds promise as well for Elliot Lake.

When I take a look at the Elliot Lake infrastructure, it is a magnificent one. It was really built to be a larger city and to house an even larger population than it has now. I think it has potential if we look at it carefully. We will do studies, together with entertaining small business proposals for that area.

I know the member for Kenora—Rainy River who spoke on this motion this morning is interested in tourism. He is somewhat negative about tourism. He does not think that we should put an emphasis on tourism in the FEDNOR program.

In fact, I announced over $8 million to the new tourism additional program before the end of the year. It has been very well received. He should speak to the northern Ontario tourist outfitters, for example, which has been very much in favour of this program.

The reason why we have added a special program for tourism to FEDNOR is this. We find in northern Ontario, northern Quebec and northern Manitoba—the northern part of this great country of ours—that we have to diversify the economy. It is absolutely overlooking an immense potential of Canada to overlook the great opportunities for tourism.

We want not just to develop another fishing lodge, or another golf course. We want to have a comprehensive approach to this and, of course, we have announced it.

FEDNOR, which was established in 1987, has been an immense success. I see its reputation for effectiveness is growing. We have recent public opinion surveys that indicate a large number of people in northern Ontario know about FEDNOR now. We want to see it grow from strength to strength.

No other province has a special federal program designed for the northern tier of the province. We have that for northern Ontario. Northern Ontario has that economic board, FEDNOR. It is doing a tremendous job. That is an indication of the importance in which the federal government holds northern Ontario in the life of our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is a five-minute question and comment period.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear from the minister this afternoon and to know of the plans with regard to FEDNOR. I just have a couple of questions. I know that we have a limited amount of time. I concur with his desire to assist in the difficulties that communities such as Elliot Lake face in providing special assistance with regard to incentive grants for small business. I wonder if he could clarify a couple of points in that regard.

In communities like Elliot Lake we are not talking about 200 or 300 jobs being lost or trying to create a couple of hundred jobs. We are actually talking about over 2,000 jobs in a community with a workforce of 3,600. Will the FEDNOR board and the chairman, Leo Bernier, be empowered not only to expedite grants under the FEDNOR small business incentive, or the other programs that are now there, but also to have a co-ordinating role with regard to major federal-provincial agreements? Ministers from the province of Ontario such as René Fontaine are saying to us: "You know, we are facing the loss of 2,000 jobs here in the next 12 months, what are the feds going to do? " That is what I have been trying to determine. For instance, I have suggested that we have not only a special allocation under the community initiatives fund of the Community Futures Program but, as well, if there are major economic developments that we can suggest, will the federal government and will the FEDNOR board act as the co-ordinating agency to put together larger projects? We have a very capable board and chairman there.

I appreciate the comments the minister has made with regard to incentive grants, but I think it is hard for most people to imagine that a program like FEDNOR which has to deal with an area that represents 88 per cent of the land mass of northern Ontario, has created only 2,000 jobs. We are appreciative of those but we are talking about the loss in Elliot Lake of 2,000 jobs in one community. I wonder if the minister could clarify that. That would be really useful.

The other matter that I wonder if he could clarify relates to page 12 of the budget where it states:

> We are taking a more businesslike approach to assistance to business. With limited exceptions, grants will be eliminated and financial assistance will be repayable on more rigorous terms.

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding concerning this. Most of us believe that the grants are being eliminated by FEDNOR. Will grants still be available?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If the hon. member wishes some answers to those questions, he may want to leave time for the hon. minister.

Mr. Hockin: Madam Speaker, I would be very happy to respond to my friend's questions. The first thing I should do is reiterate what I said before. FEDNOR itself cannot through countless grants to small enterprises ever absorb the 2,000 jobs directly, and he knows that.

What we could do is play a co-ordinating role, and I like his suggestion. That is one reason why we are sending this subcommittee of the FEDNOR board there next week. It is to take a look at what we may be able to do in terms of giving leadership comprehensively.

The federal government in the past, and you saw this in Sudbury just a few weeks ago, has taken a major initiative to build a world class science facility, the Neutrino Observatory in Sudbury. We have been able to take these lunges of leadership right into the heart of new opportunities internationally and put them in northern Ontario.

The funds through FEDNOR are of course limited. There would have to be a new agreement with the provincial government if we were going to do something in northern Ontario of a great bulky or megaproject nature. I would encourage the province to respond if we were able to come up with a proposal.

Let me just answer with a couple of caveats here. With respect to the money that the Northern Ontario Development Corporation, NODC, and the provincial government's Heritage Fund, is getting instead of stumpage on lumber, quite frankly, there does not seem to be a co-ordinated approach to those funds. I am disappointed with that. NODC has been very co-operative with us in terms of FEDNOR, but most of their contributions are loan guarantees or repayable loans. That, I have to say to my hon. friend, is not the answer to 2,000 jobs.

We have to get the provincial government—and I wonder what my friend the member for Kenora—Rainy River would say—to take a more comprehensive, rather than just a loan guarantee approach to what it is doing in northern Ontario. I would urge that we have an intensive discussion of that after we get our subcommittee from the FEDNOR board back from its visit to Elliot Lake.

I should not let the hon. member forget all of the things we have been able to do in that region. I have listed here absolutely dozens of investments that FEDNOR has made for small businesses ranging from $14,000 for a small food and beverage operation to $250,000 for a retail store. These add up to jobs. We must not give up on this either.

In the interim we must target Elliot Lake if we can through FEDNOR, as well as do what we can to come up with a comprehensive plan.

• (1530)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Madam Speaker, let me do as my colleague just did and speak on regional development as it relates to western Canada.

I want to read the motion. It states:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect, support and promote the regional economies of Canada, in order to eliminate regional disparities in the Atlantic provinces, Northern Ontario and Western and Northern Canada.

The motion itself does not contain any suggestion as to what, in fact, the opposition would do differently or, presumably, do better. I have listened to the debate and the comments coming from the opposition side of the House and have not heard any suggestions as to what we have been doing right or what the opposition members would do differently if they were in the position of government.

Let me also point out what we are dealing with. In western Canada, we have been dealing with largely a resource-based economy. Roughly 50 per cent of our exports go to the United States. Something like 85 per cent of our exports out of western Canada are resource-based, exported in relatively a primary form without a lot of value-added. We have been dealing with some very difficult market situations. I would like to point out how difficult they are so that we do not underestimate the problem.

I have had a chance to be in touch, on a regular basis, with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act people who are located in Regina. In looking at the weather statistics, they tell us that of the six worst years in western Canada as far as weather is concerned—going back to when we first started to keep records in the country—that five out of the six worst years have been in the 1980s, 1937 being the exception. Take 1937 and five years out of the 1980s and those were the six worst years that we have had weather-wise on the Prairies. Also consider that a big part of what we do in western Canada is directly related to agriculture. It is obviously a resource industry.

Against that back-drop of how bad the weather has been and all of what has happened in commodity prices, whether it is oil or some of the metals—lumber is somewhat of a different story—listening to the opposition, one would think that everything was terrible. Well, there is no question that there are problems, but, if one looks at some of the numbers, they do not bear out what the motion says and what we have heard to date in this debate.

In point of fact, Manitoba and Alberta have the second-lowest unemployment rate in the country. Over 400,000 jobs—new and, 85 per cent of them, permanent jobs—have shown up in western Canada in the last five years.

What I do not understand is that they can be critical of us and tell us we can do better, but put it in some perspective. Things are not as bad as they make them out to be. Second, if they are that bad, then tell us what you would do differently. All we hear is: "Spend. Spend more money. Get us out of the problem by spending money." Well, if in fact that was going to solve our problem, one would think that with the mountain of debt that we are carrying in the country, accumulated over a period of years, that that would have solved our problem.

Big debt, I think we have come to learn rather graphically and dramatically, is not self-liquidating. It turns out to be, as we find, self-perpetuating. If we let it go and do not deal with it, I would suggest that it can be self-liquidating. It can cause all kinds of problems for us. So, within that back-drop, we have begun to bring some sense about it as far as government spending is concerned and we have begun to reduce gradually the over-all deficit which, I think, is what most people want us to do, and with that we are going to see some results.

Think about that. We have begun to reduce government spending. At the same time, the government has supported the average family farm on the Prairies to the tune of something like $30,000 each over the last five years. We have done that. So, to suggest and condemn us out of hand, without putting some of those things in place so that we can have a reference point for which to criticise us, does not make a lot of sense. To talk specifically about my responsibilty with Western Diversification, I do not think that the opposition understands what Western Diversification is.

Let me give you a quote from the hon. member for Winnipeg—South Centre who elected to this place in 1979, at the same time I was. Here is what he said after the budget of the Minister of Finance last February, as reported by a Winnipeg newspaper:

> The Western Diversification Initiative is "being gutted" by shifting from grants to loans, the Winnipeg—South Centre MP said.

This is absolutely incredible. This member has been in this House for 11 years. He has been here since the inception of WD, and he says the outfit is being gutted because we are no longer going to do grants. Eighty per cent of what we have done from day one has been loans. We do very few grants. Surely to goodness we can expect better than that from the opposition members. It is bad enough that they criticize us and do not want to use the whole story, but to come out and make an obvious error like that tells me a lot about some of the homework they do. We do not do grants as a rule of thumb. We never have. Surely, we can expect them to do a little bit of homework when they want to be critical of us. I have given up on expecting them to give us any suggestions as to alternatives.

Let me tell you what we do. This is first time ever that we have had a deputy minister of a full department of the federal government located in western Canada. Have you ever talked about that? Four assistant deputy ministers are located in western Canada because we believe, if you are going to deliver regional development programs, the best place to administer them is in the area we are trying to help and it is easier for people to come to see us.

An hon. member: Right on. Get them out of Ottawa.

An hon. member: In the regions, for the regions.

Mr. Mayer: A full deputy minister of a full department of the federal government is located in Edmonton. There are four assistant deputy ministers, one in Winnipeg, one in Saskatoon, one in Edmonton and one in Vancouver. Did anybody ever talk about that? We also have an assistant deputy minister of Agriculture for the first time located in western Canada.

In the gain and oilseeds business, Winnipeg used to be the centre for North America. One can now make the case that, if there is a centre in Canada, it is in Winnipeg. It makes a lot of sense to have the grain and oilseeds policy branch of the Department of Agriculture located in Winnipeg. That is what we have done. Has anybody ever talked about that? No, no.

We do loans. We do small loans and big loans. We are very flexible. We try to restructure the payment schedule around the individual business. If we make a loan and there is going to be increased returns as a result of the loan, immediately we will structure it so that repayment starts quickly. If it is going to take a little longer, then we will wait one, two or three years, in some cases, before we want repayment. We try to structure it on the basis of the individual company.

Let me say a little bit about trade. Everybody talks about the free trade agreement and how terrible it is. Think about this: 50 per cent of the west's exports go to the United States. In Alberta, it is something like 70 per cent. It makes sense to have some trade rules with the Americans so that we can have a little more secure access.

Let me just read a little bit out of a Winnipeg Free Press story of last week. There is an outfit in Winnipeg called Versatile Equipment. It started out manufacturing swathers and sprayers. Back in the late 1950s, I bought one of its sprayers as a farmer. I still have it and that tells you about the kind of equipment it makes. That makes it 30 years old. It is a good piece of equipment. Laterally, in the last 15 years, it has begun to manufacture four-wheel-drive tractors. It is a leader in its field. Its tractors under 40 hp are made mostly in Japan, worldwide and some in Europe. Those between 40 and 100 hp are made in the United States. Above that, the tractors are made in the United States and Canada. We have better trade rules for these people as far as access to the U.S. market.

For those of us in the west who are connected with agriculture, the GST is going to be a net benefit to the agricultural industry. We estimate that, because of the way the GST is going to work, there is going to be somewhere between $200 million and $250 million of direct net benefit to the agricultural industry right across the country. Here is how Versatile views the GST and how it is going to affect them.

> The Winnipeg plant produces four-wheel-drive heavy tractors, swathers, and industrial front-end loaders for Ford New Holland's 5,200 dealerships around the world.

Versatile has had some financial problems and it has been restructured as a result of Ford New Holland coming in to be part of their operation.

The article continues:

> The GST, which is geared to help export-oriented manufacturers, fits Versatile like a glove. More than half the Fort Garry plant's outputs are destined for American, Australian and European markets.
>
> "Any country that has a VAT-type of tax—

—which is what the GST is—

> —is by definition trying to get an advantage in export markets vis-a-vis countries which don't have a VAT—
> "To that extent, the GST brings Canada into line with most of Europe, Mexico and various other countries."

• (1540)

It goes on to state, and I will conclude with this point:

> He said the cost the tax added to the price of a Versatile tractor now——and here, he is talking about the present manufacturer's sales tax—

> —may be the difference between being cheaper or more expensive than its major American rivals.

Here is a case of a western company, that is a leader in the world and is hooked up with Ford New Holland with 5,200 dealers around the world, is going to have an advantage because of the GST over the present manufacturer's sales tax.

I will conclude on this point. It is one of the things that we have done in the government that makes me particularly proud to be part of this government. We have taken the case that we have at GATT on behalf of our farmers very, very seriously. Fifty per cent of every income dollar that a Canadian farmer earns comes from exports. Canada is a country of 25 million people. If we cannot have better rules and fewer subsidies around the world for our farmers to compete against, then we indeed have problems when we look down the road. There is another thing that we have done in terms of regional development. We have taken some of these things seriously.

To conclude, in looking at our record, one may want to say it is not perfect, but it is not that bad. We have created over 400,000 direct jobs in the last 10 years—not part-time jobs, but direct jobs. Western Diversification, designed to diversify western Canada, is responsible for about 20,000 of those 400,000 jobs. GST is going to benefit manufacturing in western Canada and a big part of what we do goes into the export market. We are going to control our deficit and get interest rates under control as a result of controlling the deficit. As I indicated here and there are many more examples of it, clearly the GST is going to help industries in western Canada that need to compete on the export market. That is a pretty good record on behalf of western Canada as far as regional development is concerned. There are a lot more things I could say if I had the time.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the minister and I do not question at all the sincerity with which he approaches his job, nor would I want to be one of those who does not recognize that some positive advances are made from time to time. However, I represent a constituency in the province of Saskatchewan, and I think the government does have something to answer for, at least in respect of that province. I am talking about the failure to renew ERDAs.

As the minister knows, the province of Saskatchewan lost 23,000 people from its population last year. That is the equivalent of some of our largest communities. In fact, Saskatchewan has only four cities that are bigger than 23,000. Three hundred of the 500 communities in that province lost population last year, so it is an urgent situation.

The existing Economic Regional Development Agreements, ERDAs, were originally scheduled to run for 10 years. The first five years were up last March 31, at the end of the fiscal year, and people had done their planning on the basis that there would be another five-year renewal. The minister said at the time that the negotiation of new agreements was just around the corner. When asked about it again later on in the summer, negotiation was just around the corner. I am starting to think that this building is an octagon. There are always more corners to go around to get to see the actual ERDAs. When is the government going to get serious about renegotiating those ERDAs?

In the area of minerals, they have kept small exploration companies They have now been nailed by the elimination of the flow-through share program. In the area of forestry, not only are we not catching up, but with the forest fire devastation and so on, we are falling even further behind. In the area of northern development, a lot of good initiatives in the community development corporations, and so on, that were just getting up a head of steam are being allowed to stagnate. In the area of tourism, which does hold some potential, a lot of projects are stagnating. There have been a lot of positive suggestions made around the idea of supporting local economic and sectoral organizations so that small communities and small business can get involved in organizing their sectors to be more competitive and to access big programs like WDO. If the commitment is so serious, how can we have waited a whole year and still have nothing in sight? In fact, we are being told once again that this building has another corner.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, we do not have to get serious about negotiating ERDAs. We have always been serious and we have said so right from the budget in April, 1989. The provinces are well aware of our position.

I will be straightforward with the member. It has taken us longer than any of us would have liked, or I would have thought at the time, to get the final paperwork done to get everything in place. In the meantime, he should know that there is regular western diversification programming going on in the province of Saskatchewan. It is pretty significant in some areas. He should also know that there are some fairly exciting projects in the pipeline that we are looking at with province of Saskatchewan that will be of direct benefit.

We have $242 million still there. We do not operate on the basis of spend it or lose it. The money is not rotting. It is there. I have met with representatives of the province of Saskatchewan as recently as a month ago to go over where some of their priorities are. We are both getting ourselves geared up so that once we have our final paperwork done that we will be in a position to sit down, be specific and sign the agreement.

The province is not chomping at the bit to sign these agreements because some of the other money is still flowing. There is regular programming under Western Diversification and they are satisfied that the money that we were allocated to use in ERDA-type arrangements last April is still there. I have never used the word "corner". We are getting closer and closer all the time to signing those agreements.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to speak in this debate this afternoon which is of vital importance to every member of our caucus, to every member of the resource areas of this country, including Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario and the western provinces.

The resolution was brought forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River because of the extreme concern there is in every part of our country with the direction that we are going, whether we are talking about transportation across these regions and VIA Rail, the dramatic cutbacks in the funding of ERDAs, as has been raised by the hon. member from Saskatchewan, the fishery problems in Atlantic Canada, or the tremendous problems that western farmers face because the government is not willing to make a commitment as to what financial support will be provided to them in a timely manner.

Last week I met with a group of members of the Saskatchewan Pool who described the kind of malaise and tremendous concern there is because the government simply will not make up its mind whether it is going to provide any support or not. The night before I was meeting with this group of pool operators and producers, the Premier of Saskatchewan came on the air on province-wide television to pleaded with the federal government to provide financial support and assistance. That is what makes the whole speech by the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds such a joke. The Tory Premier of the province was pleading with the federal government on a province-wide hookup. It is a spectacle that no one would ever imagine. The sad part of it was that it had not come because he had not been able to have a meeting with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, or the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. He had had his meeting and struck out. They were turning him down and he was demanding support.

I think we are dealing more with the regional development programs of the country. We can sketch across Atlantic Canada with the tremendous cutbacks it suffered a year ago, the kind of critical situation which exists in the Prairies with the agricultural economy, and the kinds of difficulties we have in transportation all the way across the country.

I want to spend more time on northern Ontario. I hope the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism will respond to my comments. He spoke about the FEDNOR program and the small incentive grants in such glowing terms today, and even though it is a modest program compared to the economic development across the whole country, it has been extremely useful in small communities.

The question hanging over everybody's head is whether the program is a grant or a loan. The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, who is also responsible for the Western Diversification Fund, said that they mostly give loans in western Canada under that program. In FEDNOR, it has been mostly grants. The question is in everyone's mind because of the budget and the minister did not respond to that this afternoon. Is it because the budget says, with limited exceptions, it will be able to become a loan program? It simply will not be effective as a loan program with the kinds of small projects that we are dealing with in northern Ontario.

The minister is already disparaged with the NODC program. The NODC program is a loans program. When Leo Bernier and the advisory board to FEDNOR sat down to design the FEDNOR grants system, they said the problem in northern Ontario is equity. The loans do not help because there comes a point when one just does not have enough equity to support any loans. Adding another government loan is of no use.

I hope that Mr. Bernier will put great pressure on the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and use the same arguments that he used when they were setting up the FEDNOR program, that our problem is equity. For these relatively small projects, small by business standards, it is essential that we reinstate or clarify that the grant program, at least under the small rural incentive program of FEDNOR, be maintained as a grant program because it is the equity that is needed.

I cannot emphasize too much to the government its importance to communities like Elliot Lake which have suffered literally hundreds of thousands of job losses. It is not unique just to Elliot Lake. In areas like Timiskaming, as the minister mentioned, we had Corps Addison Mines signal that it was shutting down in June, 1989, with the loss of 360 jobs; another silver mine in Cobalt, 120 jobs; the Adams mine in Kirkland Lake, 350 jobs; and a mine in Temagami with 350 jobs. There are three mines which are going to have massive layoffs in Elliot Lake. We are looking at 1,600 layoffs at the Quirke and Panel mines in the next 12 to 14 months and another 450 at the Denison mines, representing over 50 per cent of the labour force. It is essential that we have a co-ordinating activity and body from the federal government. I would hope that FEDNOR would be the agency to help co-ordinate the federal government response.

We have the Minister of Employment and Immigration saying that her department will provide the assistance for the industrial adjustment activities. That is important for the individual worker, community and so on, but it deals mainly with the relationship between the worker and the mining company to ensure that the workers have adequate tools for adjustment, retraining and severance pay.

Clearly, the mining industry in northern Ontario is facing grim times because we are not only talking about the half a dozen mines in the Temagami and Kirkland Lake area, but the ones in Algoma. We are not sure about the situation with regard to Wawa; it is another mine in the area north of Sault Ste. Marie about which there is some uncertainty in the next two years.

One of the things which the government has removed in the last two or three years is the MEDA, the Mine Exploration Development Assistance grant and flow-through shares. That program, which was instituted in the 1983 budget and implemented in 1984, in the last four or five years put literally hundreds of millions of dollars into exploration and development in northern Ontario and resulted in a number of mining operations being approved there. Without that program, I am not sure whether we are going see many new mines come on stream. I really am very concerned. There was a report in The Globe and Mail this morning with the headline: "Canadian Mining Facing Uncertain Future". It documents how the lack of exploration and development funds is going to have a profound impact on the development of new mines because there simply is not the kind of incentive necessary.

We have a number of other decisions in the budget which are extremely harmful. That MEDA program was done away with a couple of years ago. The CEIP program was done away with in the current budget. The incentives for assistance in areas such as northern Ontario and western Canada for oil, gas, and mineral exploration will be completely lost under this system.

A number of other programs should have been in this budget of a few weeks ago removed funding for programs like the Small Craft Harbours Program. It is a very small program by national standards. I think there is $3 million in the Ontario regions. Let us put into perspective how much the small craft industry does for the province of Ontario compared to what the federal government spends in it.

The industry of small craft harbours, when you take into account fishing boats, licences, tackle, and all the rest of it, turns back something like $150 million in sales taxes to both the federal and the provincial governments. Out of that $150 million it receives each year, the federal government provides a budget for the Small Craft Harbours Branch of only $3 million. Imagine, in an industry which is so very valuable to the whole tourism economy of Ontario, the two levels of government take roughly $300 million on a shared equal basis in sales tax, and retail sales tax from the province. The federal government obviously will take more under the goods and service tax, if it is ever implemented. The federal government turns back about $3 million in the Small Craft Harbours Branch. I am very sorry to see that decision made in the budget.

There are many aspects to regional development that are important. Small craft harbours is important in my constituency, it isn't in all constituencies in northern Ontario. Chiselling away at each department, as the recent budget did, has an extremely adverse impact on the economy of northern Ontario. Our economy is based on the resource industries and tourism. It is based on minerals; it is based on some agriculture in some areas; and it is based on forestry. Clearly, the pulp and paper side of the forestry industry for the past few years has gone through an unprecedented period of growth. While it is coming into a period of consolidation right now, it has been strong. One of the most important employers in northern Ontario is the forestry industry. In 1987 when the government signed the agreement to impose a 15 per cent export tax on the industry it drove a stake into the heart of that industry. It is clearly an incredible decision made by our government.

• (1600)

The hon. member across the way knows that if the government had let the United States impose its countervail duty of 15 per cent, or whatever, it could have been easily appealed to the International Trade Tribunal in New York, we would have won it the same as we won it in 1982. It was strictly a sell-out by the Government of Canada that was in the final stages of negotiation with the Government of the United States on the free trade deal. They thought this was a giveaway. It was a token that they gave the United States industry. In British Columbia, in order to get rid of it, the government had to impose something like $600 million in stumpage fees. In Ontario, we chose not to. It has to be a most asinine deal.

The stumpage charge that we would have had to impose to get rid of the export tax in Ontario would have had to be imposed across the entire gamut of all softwood lumber production in the province. It would not just be imposed on the 25 per cent or 30 per cent that is sold into export. We would have to impose it across the entire spectrum.

So, the Ontario government and the Ontario industry said no. There is no point in taking a much bigger bite across the whole industry which would result in an increased stumpage charge of some $75 million rather than the $30 million that it is costing now, so it goes on. The result is that communities and sawmills in communities like Thessalon, Nairn Centre, Searchmont, Dubreuilville and Hearst throughout northern Ontario are now cut off from sending those exports to the United States because it simply is not a viable proposition.

If the government had really thought—and it was not thinking very much when it made this deal—one of the problems was that the United States at that time had a great deal of difficulty in competing with our softwood lumber production. The technology was farther advanced in Canada. One of the factors was a very low dollar. You will recall that when this government first came to power the dollar dropped to something like 69 cents, certainly in the low seventies and, of course, that gave our producers a tremendous advantage.

The free trade deal was signed and part of the hidden and secret agreement was that we would raise the value of the dollar. That is why the Canadian dollar rests at about 500 basis points higher than the United States loan rates. The bank rate now is about 13 per cent now compared to 8 per cent in the United States. That was part of the free trade deal although it was kept secret. When the documents are released in 30 years time it will clearly indicate that it was a secret deal to raise the interest rates to provide for a very high dollar.

The result has been that our softwood lumber industry is getting a total double whammy. They are getting a 15 per cent export tax and the value of their product has gone down by 15 per cent. They have an incredible disadvantage and, of course, literally dozens of sawmills have shut down and have been gobbled up by pulp and paper industries and the local management lost.

There are a lot of factors involved in regional development. One is good trade policy. Another is good transportation policy. Northern Ontario has always depended on VIA Rail and rail service. What have we got? We used to have trains from Montreal and Toronto to Sudbury and the west. We used to have train service from Ottawa to North Bay to Sudbury and to the west.

What happened when the VIA Rail cuts came about is simply unbelievable. It is simply unbelievable what the government did. There was a train travelling through communities such as Sudbury, Thunder Bay and North Bay with populations of something like 400,000 people. By the time the government got through, there was one train, a trans-Canada train which missed all the big centres in northern Ontario. It travels three days a week, stopping at Capreol, going through to Winnipeg. It stops in communities with 20,000 or 30,000 population.

It will not be hard for the government to prove in a few years time that people are not using the train. It only goes through three days a week, so why do we not cut it out altogether? The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River used to serve on one of the national railways. That is why his community and other communities throughout northern Ontario are very upset and very concerned. It is interesting that the day the government announced the cutting of VIA Rail service was two days after it had announced that Air Canada would discontinue its service to northeastern Ontario, Timmins, North Bay and Sudbury.

There are a lot of factors involved in regional development. Clearly, the screws are tightening in areas like northern Ontario whether it is in grants, transportation or regional development policy.

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to question my hon. colleague from Algoma. When he was talking about small craft harbours, he mentioned that in Ontario there is only $3 million spent. That is incorrect. I know in British Columbia it was $6 million and in Ontario it was over $6 million. I would like the member to just check that out. He will find that $3 million is incorrect and $6 million would be more like it.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member raising this matter. In my constituency of Algoma—Manitoulin we have about 10 per cent of all small craft harbours in the Ontario region. We have one office with about seven professionals and half a dozen clerical people looking after all the small craft harbours, not only in Ontario where there are about 4,400 of them, but in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories.

The hon. member talks about the budget for small craft harbours and about the budget being $6 million. He may well be talking about what the government did in 1987. Essentially, what they did with the department from 1984 to 1987 was nothing. Suddenly there was a big shot of money, I think about $17 million, in the Ontario region to provide funding in preparation for the general election in 1988.

If there ever was a bass ackwards way to run a department and an industry, it is on the political kickout system. I did not say kickback, I said kickout. The hon. member is either talking about the budget for employees or he is talking about the special funding provided in 1987–88. You cannot even maintain the 4,100 or 4,400 small craft harbours in the Ontario region with an annual budget of $3 million or $4 million. That is why I am very concerned that we saw a cut–back in the recent budget of $4 million from a small agency of government which can be extremely useful in assisting in tourism.

In my constituency we could easily use the entire Ontario region budget. We do not get it because it has to be spread over the other 90 per cent of the projects in the Ontario region. I certainly hope that the hon. member will be making representations to the government not to implement that $4 million cut because it is not only going to hurt B.C., it is going to hurt the Ontario region. It is certainly going to hurt the Algoma–Manitoulin area where we have some 10 per cent of all the small craft harbours in the Ontario region.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the regional development motion put forward by my colleagues, I congratulate them on raising a very important issue.

I wish to put a comment to the hon. member with regard to the sense of fairness and justice in this economy concerning the recent cuts by the Conservative government to women's centres across Canada.

In my area the Campbell River and district women's organization had 100 per cent of their funding cut. That organization played a very important role in ensuring that women could participate in the workforce in a fair and equitable way. It assisted in putting employment training and retraining programs together. They were involved in counselling services, referral services, operated a drop–in centre and provided a very active organization in support of local child care.

In addition, this organization put together the initiative for a transition house to protect women and children from family violence. It was involved in putting together programs to assist in remedying child abuse, planned parenthood and providing legal advice. This was a tremendous community service and initiative to provide services to women. This helped to get women into the workforce, to get them out of job ghettos and into fair paying jobs and to ensure pay equity. The organization was exemplary in terms of a community service and absolutely important in terms of services to women in that community. The organization also became the spark that started women's organizations in other communities in more remote areas and in single industry towns where there are no employment opportunities in many cases. It did a tremendous job.

It is interesting that this particular Campbell River and district women's resource centre was started by the present Minister responsible for the Status of Women. She was one of the key individuals who started this particular resource centre. It is ironic that she would turn around and justify the government's position for gutting the community of this tremendous resource. I ask the member of the party that brought forward this important motion today whether he feels the government should immediately restore funding for women's resource centres and whether or not that core funding should be enhanced to an acceptable level in order that the centre may do the kind of work that would provide opportunity and equality for women in the employment opportunities which would be created in a rational regional development program.

I see the Minister for International Trade in the House today. I wonder if he as an advocate of the rights and equality of women in Canada might stand up and comment on the government's position, if the hon. member for Algoma would permit it.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to have the hon. Minister for International Trade stand up and defend the government's budget with regard to the cuts, not only for women's transition centres, but the cuts that were made in this budget which often hit either low income or remote areas. That is what we are talking about in this motion today, although obviously there are low income areas in cities as well. These programs that the hon. member is speaking about are very important in remote areas. I must agree with him that the funding is always extremely tight for rape crisis centres, transition houses and programs for people who are disadvantaged, not only women but aboriginal groups. There are a number of them in communities in my riding or adjacent to them.

It is as if the government is taking the disadvantaged and cutting off their ability to communicate with the country at large or to communicate with the larger community. It is taking away their voice. If they are not organized,they do not have the drop in centre or the transition house. There is nothing worse than to be in difficulty and have no one to speak for you.

Funding has been cut to the CBC as well. If you really want to get your story out across the country, it is the local CBC station that can do it. The local radio station can broadcast the problem for the local community, but they have no capacity to carry it across the country unless they are tied into Canadian Press, and that often is not the case. I think the cuts to the CBC are another way of trying to smother or to push down any dissent or opposition there is to the government cuts in regional areas suffering great difficulty.

By the same token, our resource areas are going to be extremely adversely affected by cuts in the CBC nationally. I think of the situation where we have one national farm broadcaster, George Price, who covers meetings of the agriculture committee, transportation committee and other committees concerned with agriculture across the country. This is an important resource throughout our country. He is retiring in another month or so and is not being replaced. That hurts agriculture and those resource industries across the country because there is no report going out.

We see this kind of unique national mechanism, which is so important to our country in trying to build understanding and knowledge of our country on a broader basis, being hamstrung by these cuts that were brought in the recent budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today to the opposition motion which refers to the government's actions and policies across the country, and of course one of our policies was the last Budget which, as you know, is a major component of this country's economic strategy.

Madam Speaker, in the latest Budget, various types of government spending have been frozen, and this includes spending on transfers to the provinces. In my riding, Madam Speaker, and I am sure you have had the same experience, I have been asked a lot of questions because people don't understand the difference between cutting payments to the provinces and freezing the amounts they receive.

We have a major deficit which was created, although this falls on reluctant ears, by the previous Liberal government. If you tell me the deficit increased since the Conservative party came to power, you are right. But it is also true that since 1984, since we were elected, we have managed to control our expenditures. This year, excluding interest payments, government revenues exceed government expenditures by $9 billion.

• (1620)

In 1984, when we were elected, the government was spending $15 billion more than it collected in revenues, always excluding interest payments.

We have now turned the situation around and are in a position to say that by 1993–94, we will have enough money to pay for all federal spending, including the interest on our debt.

Madam Speaker, we must remember that Canada consists of ten provinces, and when interest rates go down as a result of Ottawa's policies, the provinces benefit. When inflation goes down across the country thanks to Ottawa's policies, the provinces benefit. And even when we have a debt of $350 billion, it is also because the provinces have benefitted.

Madam Speaker, when we realize that since 1984 federal spending has increased 3 per cent annually and that the provinces increased their annual spending by 5 and 6 per cent, it is obvious that we will all have to bear our share of the burden.

Madam Speaker, we transfer $35 billion annually to the provinces—that is for 1989–90—an increase of 6.5 per cent over 1984. The federal government, however, kept the increase in its own spending below 4 per cent.

So it was time, and I think it was the best possible choice for the Minister of Finance, to freeze federal spending, including transfers to the provinces, and I said freeze, not cut, Madam Speaker. If we look at annual interest costs for the federal government, these represent 35 cents on the dollar. The provinces, however, pay 12 cents on the dollar.

Madam Speaker, in this country we have to work together. We need the help of the provinces. We must not forget that there are two main components in provincial transfer payments. One is called established programs financing, under which the same amount of money per capita is given by the federal government to all provinces. All the provinces receive the same amount because it is a set amount per individual. This program was frozen in 1989–90.

There is another federal program which comes under provincial transfers and I am referring to equalization transfers. Equalization is for provinces with the lowest incomes, and these payments have not been reduced. This means that lower-income provinces, including Quebec, our native province, the beautiful province I represent here in the House of Commons, Madam Speaker, will receive more money in 1990–91 than in 1989–90. Established programs financing payments are frozen, but equalization payments have gone up—there is no freeze on this component. As a result, payments to the provinces will increase by $1 billion between 1989–90 and 1990–91.

Madam Speaker, we give the provinces $36 billion without any obligation to account for the way they spend that money. This is an important point. The federal government spends nearly 25 per cent of its budget on the ten provinces and has no idea what the provinces do with that money. Do they use it for hospitals, education or roads? We have no say in this whatsoever. You may recall the Auditor General made some comments in this respect.

Madam Speaker, I think we have a duty to support the latest Budget and so does the opposition, including the cuts in all federal spending, the freeze—no cutbacks but a freeze—on established programs financing payments to the provinces and the increase in equalization payments.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, the current economic conditions in the north contrast sharply with those of the mid-1980s when the joint federal-territorial economic development program began under the economic development agreement.

In 1984 the economic indicators such as gross domestic product, value of production and employment, still demonstrated the effects of an earlier economic recession. Today these indicators show signs of growth. For example, in 1988 the gross domestic product increased by 10 per cent in the Yukon and 7.4 per cent in the Northwest Territories. We must, however, ensure that the improved situation today is sustained and that present growth which has occurred, thanks in part to policies and economic development programming of this government provided by this government, continues. It has provided such a tremendous input in incentives that we want to see this growth continue.

In particular, the government recognizes that Yukon and the Northwest Territories must continue to strengthen their leading sectors and also continue to diversify into other sectors if they are to achieve greater stability in the future and provide northerners with an adequate number and variety of economic opportunities.

This is not a quick step approach to economic development. We believe in concrete, sensible, co-operative mechanisms which meet the needs of northerners and creates the climate of economic opportunity and growth which was lacking under the previous government.

The government has undertaken a number of successful initiatives to help support economic development in the north and also to provide a stable planning framework. From a policy perspective it has provided greater certainty to northern developers by reaching agreements in principle with northern native groups on outstanding land claims, with territorial governments on the northern energy accord and by introducing a northern mineral policy. Through targeted economic development programming under the federal territorial economic development agreements, it has provided assistance to northern entrepreneurs in organizations to investigate and pursue new employment and business opportunities.

Federal funding over the past five years has amounted to $43.1 million. This programming has been successful because with minimal support the federal government is able to lever additional territorial government dollars and project proponent dollars.

The tripartite co-operation is essential in the north where the territories are assuming greater responsibility. That is good to see. Most private sector investment is from other regions of Canada or from abroad. These agreements have been successful because spending has been targeted at strategic priorities and projects that now are showing and will continue to yield definite, long term benefits. This is particularly so in the societal infrastructure which has been put in place in numerous communities under the auspices of economic development planning subagreements. I am also thinking of the renewable resources subagreements where various projects have been undertaken to develop commercially viable renewable resource businesses such as a bison ranch in the Northwest Territories and a char farm in the Yukon.

These projects have enabled the territories to market their products effectively in new and existing markets and to upgrade both human resources and infrastructures serving this sector.

Participation by native people in organizations as proponents of economic development agreements in the Northwest Territories have really been significant. In the Yukon, however, uptake has been increasing but we know that we can do more and more can be achieved.

• (1630)

The federal government has introduced the Canadian aboriginal economic development strategy to support native business and employment opportunities and to address the economic development requirements of native people in general. This program will benefit native people throughout the regions of Canada. With a participation of representatives of native organizations on these EDA committees, a greater understanding of programming has been gained, with a great deal of results.

This government believes in involving northerners and involving the native people in the decision-making process. The efforts under the economic development agreements to date have certainly made a positive contribution toward expanded, diversified and more stable territorial economies. However, to realize the full potential, long-term benefits of federal government's contribution to economic development, government support and assistance is needed in the sectors that we have been encouraging. As I mentioned earlier, this support is in co-operation with the territories and with the private sector.

The future challenge for the federal government in co-operating with northern governments is to continue this transformation of the northern economies. This involves further diversification of economic base with increased emphasis on sustainable economic development, structural changes to sectors such as mining to enhance the economic and social returns to communities and also to their residents, and increased linkages among the sectors of the northern economy.

Given the relative strength of the Canadian, the Yukon and Northwest Territories economies and the possibilities that are arising from the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, it is easy to see that there are opportunities which can be pursued through the improvement and expansion of the mining industry, through growth in the renewable resources and tourism business sectors, through export opportunities and programs leading to skills acquisition and other human resource developments, plus economic planning by communities and governments.

The theme of diversification is not new. It has been the thrust of the federal and territory economic program in both of those territories over the last six years. We all recognize it is the solution to another challenge which is to minimize the reliance upon few sectors for revenue and employment.

Contrary to the hon. member's motion, we are working on expanding the economy of the north. Import substitution is a principal component of diversification. The renewable resource sector is an excellent example of this type of development which will lead to stronger linkages between the wage economy and traditional economies of the aboriginal people.

Technological innovation is another avenue for generating business opportunities, especially at a time when science and technology is a national and also an international growth area for future development.

Regardless of the approach which is taken to diversify the economy, long-term benefits can only accrue when economic growth has been balanced by the development and the maintenance of a healthy resource base. Keys to this are the acquisition of the requisite skills and training by northerners participating in their expanding economy and the provision of an infrastructure that will be achieved through community based planning which will encourage industry to locate and develop. I expect future economic development programs for the Yukon and also for the Northwest Territories to recognize many of these opportunities.

In addition to further development of the preceding sectors there are other events which I foresee as having significance to the north: the North American air defence modernization project and the renewed interest in northern gas pipelines. We have seen that that is something which is coming and coming quite quickly. Oil and gas projects in the Beaufort should also generate opportunities for new and expanded business and indeed enhance the employment for the northern people. These will be reflected in and complemented by the organization of the land use planning commissions and the settlement based on the agreement in principle of the land claims for Yukon Indians, the Dene Métis, and the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut.

Settlement land claims will be of particular significance to each territorial economy. Obvious benefits will be derived from a direct injection of funds into the economy.

In conclusion, as a member of this side of the House I am confident of the ability of northern Canadians to move forward, see the challenges and accept them. We will be behind them all the way to see them expand and continue expanding.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I should like to compliment the hon. member on her remarks this afternoon. She twigged my attention to something I think we have forgotten on this side of the House when it comes to debt and deficit.

We have been hearing a lot of members on the side opposite today talking about the fact that when they came to governance here in 1984 they inherited this massive debt. The facts are that in 1980 when the Liberal Party came to power we had a national debt of approximately $80-odd million.

From 1980 to 1984 it is factually correct that the debt of the nation doubled. It went to almost $170 billion. This happened during the worst recession in the world. Interest rates at 21 per cent and 22 per cent were world-wide.

The Conservative government came to power in 1984 and by the end of 1988 it managed to take that national debt of $170 billion and double it to almost $360 million. In her speech today the hon. member referred to this incredible growth in the economy.

My question is a very simple one. With that incredible growth in the economy, when interest rates were much better and employment was down, how did your government manage to double that debt? What policies did the government have that did not work, or was there waste?

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood for his question. It is interesting that he brought forth two important issues: one is talking about the national debt and the other is talking about the deficit. I would just like to refer to the fact that in 1984 when we were elected to power the national debt was $200 billion or $199.5 billion.

Mr. Mills: It was $170 billion.

Mrs. Sparrow: I am sorry, it was $199 billion. We also had a deficit of $38.3 billion.

The hon. member's government was increasing program spending by 15 per cent per year from 1980 to 1984. When we took over the national debt was $38.3 billion. The previous government was in a negative position of $16 billion on its program spending and in a negative position of $22.5 billion on the deficit. That shows that his government with its $38.3 billion deficit caused most of the problems.

In exactly five years we have lowered the deficit and we now are in a surplus position on program spending. We turned around $25 billion, and we do not need any lectures from that side of the House which led this country absolutely into debt.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I have just a short comment. The concern respecting regional development that I would like to explore with the member who just spoke is the matter of cutting 100 per cent of the funding for women centres.

Again, I return to the Campbell River and District Women's Resource Centre that offered programs to help women get back into the workforce, women who had been out for many years, through re-entry programs, training programs and retraining programs. This women's resource centre ran counselling and referral services. It was involved in assertiveness training programs, as well as a whole host of other opportunities for women to go back into the workforce, to make basically the entry into a job, to get women out of job ghettos, and to fight for equal pay for work of equal value.

This women's resource centre was a credit to the community which along with other women's resource centres across the country provided an effective, important service to 50 per cent of the population, especially in rural and remote communities like Tahsis, Gold River, Zeballos, and Bella Coola. These are important organizations that should be fostered and developed with core funding to an adequate level and also program funding. The Minister of National Health who is sitting here could be an important agent in that program funding.

How can the hon. member sit in this government and justify the kind of cuts that have happened to the women's resource centre, a national women's organization, and still speak about the record of this government in regional development?

Mrs. Sparrow: We certainly do not target out small areas, whether they be in the north or in the south. I can assure the hon. member that getting women back into the workforce is indeed extremely important.

We will do this with the training centres and by co-operating with the provincial governments. We have not let those people down. This government has and will continue to diversify and support the regions whether it be western Canada, Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario, or north of 60th parallel.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would like to refer to a point which is held very strongly by the New Democratic Party. I am afraid that the government has recognized the problem that it has created in the regional development issue. I refer to the question of the cut-back to women's organizations and link it to a serious impact on regional development. In the area I represent on northern Vancouver Island and on the coast of British Columbia, most communities are in fact resource based communities and a great many of them are very small, single industry towns.

For example, when a family moves into a single industry town with, for example a pulp mill, the male member of the family goes to work and the woman stays in a trailer with a couple of children and there are no opportunities or very few opportunities for employment. Most of the opportunities for employment that crop up are very low paying, part-time service jobs. We are all aware of the kind of exclusion from the workforce, the exclusion from decent paying jobs and the exclusion from justice and fairness in the economy that women experience.

This House has reacted very strongly for the decade that I have been here and in the previous decade to try and get that situation turned around. It is important that a regional development program contemplate very seriously the needs of women. It is not just contemplation in the drafting of the legislation and the policies, but it is also a strong action program associated with it.

The issue that is so important to us is the recent action of the government. I would juxtapose it to the comments on more than one occasion by the Minister for International Trade whose contemptuous remarks toward women in Canada make Canadians wonder if this government really understands what is wrong with his remarks and what is wrong with making the kind of cuts that they did in women's programs.

For the regional development aspect, I would use the example of the Campbell River and District Women's Resource Centre. There was a desperate need in the community for organized assistance for women. One of the major aspects was an opportunity for women to get involved in the workforce. This organization came together and began to provide a service to women by working with other agencies in the community, such as Canada Employment Service and the North Island community college system, trying to get workforce re-entry programs for women and attempting to get training programs for women who were looking for employment.

There has been a great deal of initiative in that community for training programs, be they in traditional employment for women or even in non-traditional activities. There are women training as electricians, welders and working in those trades today in very, very small numbers. There is a need for greater access. These women's centres have done an enormous job in breaking down those barriers, but they have just simply started the procedure.

The cut in the case of the Campbell River example was $25,000. That $25,000 was probably the best dollar value this government ever got for anything. That $25,000 a year put together a hard working board of directors, three paid staff members who were essentially doing a tremendous professional job for peanuts. It paid for the rent of an office and all the utilities and the equipment in it. Ultimately the $25,000 represented a 100 per cent cut in government funding and all that is there today is an answering service which states that the federal government put out of business this women's centre and all the services it provided to the community.

We cannot have a regional development program without the human resource development aspect of it. What the government is telling us is that 50 per cent of the people in the community, the women in that community, are not going to be provided with the assistance to get into the job market. They are not going to be provided with the incentive and the opportunity to get into training and retraining programs, that the counselling and referral services that were provided through that agency are not going to be part of it. What the government is saying to Canadians is that 50 per cent of the population do not count in regional development and do not have that access.

In addition to the direct programs related to employment, there is also the question of individual and family support. Women today bear the responsibility for families in many, many cases. Of course the most serious example is the single parent attempting to raise children.

This women's resource centre fought continuously to attempt to get community child care resources enhanced so that a woman who wanted to gain training and go to work knew that her children would have safe, dependable child care at a cost that she could afford. This community resource centre fought for that. The Conservative government promised to put it in place and has now reneged on it. Not only has the government reneged on it, but it is proposing to cap Canada Assistance Plan funding that funds the child care centres. It is absolutely unconscionable activity.

There is no doubt that people equate the government with the remarks on more than one occasion of the Minister for International Trade who shows that he does not understand the issue. By association with him and with the cuts, they believe the government does not understand the issue. It is important that it does some work on this and turns it around.

It is extremely sad that the minister who is now responsible for the status of women happened to think that the remark made by the Minister for International Trade was funny. It is an absolutely ridiculous situation. Again, as my colleagues say, the government has no understanding of the requirements of women, of the respect of individuals, or of the need to provide the opportunity to gain access.

• (1650)

It is ironic that the present minister responsible for the status of women was one of the people instrumental in putting the women's resource centre together. The present minister responsible for the status of women was a key individual in organizing the Campbell River and District Women's Resource Centre. She went through the community with others, got this organized on the basis that it was a serious and desperately needed resource for the community, and can turn around today and support the role of the government in making 100 per cent cuts and putting these organizations out of business. Not only is that not acceptable, but it is an incredible act of hypocrisy.

Although it may drift an inch or two from the topic at hand, that community resource centre along with those in Port Alberni, Courtenay and all over Canada, were not only involved in the economic and employment side of justice and fair play for women, but they were also involved in critical support to family services such as the child care issue. Without safe, effective child care, a woman cannot leave her children without leaving them in jeopardy. For either two-parent families or single-parent families in which the parent can be either sex, child care is an absolutely critical aspect.

Another important aspect is transition homes where women and children who are exposed to family violence can find a safe place to protect them from the violence in the home and give them an opportunity to begin to reorganize their lives. That women's resource centre in Campbell River was instrumental in getting just such a transition house going. Not only has the resource centre closed but there are questions about the continued viability of the transition house. Hopefully, it will not be dragged down by the negative policy of this government.

The Campbell River and District Women's Resource Centre was an outspoken advocate for better programs, more direct programs to prevent the abuse of children, be it mental, physical or sexual abuse of which there is an enormous amount. It is a hidden problem in Canadian society. That organization was instrumental and very effective in the discussion to try to get at this problem through prevention, through protection, and through treatment of offenders.

It is absolutely critical that that core funding be restored so that not only operations like the transition house can continue but programs they are instrumental in developing or supporting for the prevention of the abuse of children.

There is a need for planned parenthood. This government, with its head buried in the sand along with the provincial Government of British Columbia, has created serious damage to individuals who want rational family planning. What we need are community services such as the women's resource centre which took an active role in providing information and leadership in developing proper programs for planned parenthood. I congratulate them for the job they have done and absolutely urge this government to consider the wrong-headed approach that led to the 100 per cent cut in this organization's funding.

This organization provided legal assistance and in many cases advocacy services for women with a whole range of problems, be they legal problems or debt related problems. One could go on all day about the kinds of important services it provided to the community.

For $25,000 this government obtained an active, hard working board of directors, a system of volunteers, three part-time employees, and a modest, low cost office in the community. It could not be bought in the Public Service. It could not be obtained anywhere. These people were principled, dedicated and working for absolute peanuts. This government put that valuable service to the community out of business.

I for one urge the present Minister responsible for the Status of Women to get on the government's case—from the Prime Minister to the Minister of National Health and through the entire cabinet—to have that funding restored or resign. No one with a clear conscience could stay with a group of individuals who would carry out an activity like that, especially a woman who was instrumental in assessing the needs of that community in Campbell River and finding that that community desperately required the kinds of resources provided by the women's centre. She was instrumental in putting it together. If she cannot turn this cabinet and this government around, she should resign. It is the only position of integrity that she can take.

It is an extremely important issue. It is the first thing on which I wanted to speak in terms of regional development because it is absolutely critical. It is a first priority that half this population be in a position to enjoy and to obtain access to the benefits of the economy and the society in which we live. This government has blocked it in a very wrong-headed approach and hopefully it will change its position and provide adequate core funding to these organizations.

If it wants to involve the provinces, fine. Leave the funding in place until an agreement can be worked out with the provinces, but don't cut off the women in the communities of Canada from the kinds of services that allow them access to the economy, a decent position in the economy, and essentially fair play in this country.

I want to talk about regional development in terms of western initiative programs. In Port Hardy there is a proposal to put a ferro-chromium plant in place by an individual, Mr. P. J. Woody. As my colleague points out, they have thrown him out of Bamberton and they have thrown him our of Nanaimo. Many communities are very concerned about it.

Be that as it may, what is critical is that we do not understand the environmental impact of his project, and yet about a quarter of the total funding of the budget for British Columbia is being put by the federal government into his project. Yet it will not provide in the environmental assessment review panel for intervener funding. Nobody knows what the impact of this project is going to be. There is very serious concern in many, many of the quarters, be it the Kwakiutl Tribal Council, the Fort Rupert Indian Band, the fishing industry or people concerned about water supplies.

It is absolutely important that when the federal government undertakes to fund an industrial initiative those people who have concerns, especially about technical and long-term impacts with the potential to contaminate the environment, have access to intervener funding. I would ask the Minister of National Health who is sitting here in the House today if he would consider assisting with this intervener funding because it is the health of Canadians that we are dealing with here. Would he encourage the provincial government, in partnership with the federal government, to provide funding for those people who need to obtain some technical expertise to evaluate the project and to come up with some indication of what is going to be its impact on the future health of Canadians?

We have put the proposition to the Minister of Indian Affairs who is responsible for the Kwakiutl District Council members, the Fort Rupert group, the Kuatsino Indian Band and the Tsulquate Band in that area. We have also asked that the minister responsible for western initiatives provide intervener funding. At this point, there is no response from fisheries, environment or health.

The provincial government hands it all over to the environmental assessment review panel. It in turn passes it back to the government saying that the Federal Court requires that some assistance be provided. Hopefully, the conscience of the individuals involved in those cabinet positions will make some intervener funding available so that people have a fair chance to evaluate this project.

Some of the initial comments by the owner of the project concerning organized labour and the desire not to have organized labour involved in the project are interesting. The main concern I have as a member who represents the riding in which the project is located is one of fairness. When the federal government is giving a grant, a condition of that grant should be that the employees of that operation have the right to organize and bargain collectively with a fair contract for wages and working conditions. Not only should the opportunity for environmental impact funding be provided through that grant but also in that grant should be included the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively. That is absolutely critical.

I had hoped to discuss some of the difficulties in regional development that we have had created by this government in the fishing industry and in the forest industry. A catastrophic effect caused by the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade is the deterioration of the fishing industry in the province of British Columbia. In the Johnstone Straits there is a continued erosion of the fishing industry and an absolute unwillingness of Fisheries and Oceans to permit traditional fisheries to continue in those areas. That has negatively impacted on places like Campbell River, Port Hardy and Alert Bay. Instead of a fishing season that would extend from July through till September we are now looking at 10 and 12 days. People cannot even qualify for unemployment insurance in the fishing time provided, and the communities will undoubtedly wither and die.

The fact that the Minister for International Trade and this government are prepared to allow the export of salmon and herring directly into the United States means that, if we can believe what the B.C. Fisheries Council said when they appeared before the committee, it is their intention to move their production units into the United States. It only makes sense because their employees are not organized, they do not have collective agreements to protect them, their wage level is half, there are no benefits and Canadian processing companies, which are already in position in southeast Alaska and the State of Washington, will move into their areas and close Canadian processing plants.

Here you have a program of regional development which is trying to create a few jobs, and yet is destroying an entire industry. It is an absolutely astounding role to play. Regional development operations are not ensuring that people can organize and bargain collectively for wages. Low wage units mean that the foreign companies that the Conservatives have invited in usually take higher profits out of those areas and remove them right out of Canada. At least with a decent wage level, protected by a collective agreement, more money stays in that community and the greater benefit from the resources we have is spread among the residents of that community.

But what has happened with the fishing industry on the coast of British Columbia is absolutely catastrophic. It makes a mockery of any regional development proposal when the government is prepared to destroy industries like the forest industry and fishing industry.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the member for North Island—Powell River for that section of his remarks that dealt with family life. Too often we in this House forget the importance of talking about family issues. His remarks today were some of the finest I have heard.

I come from a riding where 25 per cent of the children come from single parent families and it is tough right now. It is especially tough with a government that is retreating from its responsibilities. But I have always had pretty good luck with this Minister of National Health and Welfare and I want to ask the hon. member a very specific question.

Does he not think that there is a possibility that this particular women's resource centre, which he claims has been turned down for only $25,000, may have been turned down because of a bureaucratic foul-up rather than the political will retreating again?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Unfortunately, we have lost that resource centre as well as the one in Alberni and the one in Courtenay. I guess it was just the selection within the department as to where those budget cuts were applied. My colleague says Penticton is gone. The dilemma was the funding cuts. To my way of thinking, when they began to cut the national organization's budget they made the ability to lobby the government ineffective. The next step was to take out the women's resource centres. The two activities, of course, are delivering services but they are so constrained in the delivery of those services by the present legislative framework that they had to begin an intensive lobbying process to try to increase funding for the services and their core funding, and to try to get the legislative framework within which women are confined changed.

I really think that behind the cost saving motivation of the government was this fear of the political action that women were taking. That political action was to try to create greater space in which they could work. That greater space is respect for the individual and equality. Unfortunately, that is why this must be turned around.

I too have great respect for the Minister of Health and his predecessor. It is my hope that they, in their concern for the health of Canadians, can see the development of programs. The member mentioned that 25 per cent of the children in the area that he represents are the children of single parent families. There is also, of course, the problem of drug and alcohol. Enormous difficulties are created for individuals and families by that. There is a very limited amount of treatment available or prevention activities. There is greater stress on police enforcement, on one side, but we do not have the corresponding support for people in the drug and alcohol programs and the treatment centres. Hopefully that minister can be of greater assistance in making sure that we have that resource that women's centres have been crying for as well.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for tying into this debate the very important issue of the cuts to women's programs. I was quite fascinated when he pointed out that although this government claims to be in support of women and children when it comes to family violence and protection of the family, it has cut and put women on notice not only in Transition House and the Women's Centre in Campbell River in the member's riding, but in 28 women's centres out of 33 in British Columbia. I found that astonishing. The cutting of the federal government funding means the doors have closed and those women have been fired.

I would like to thank the member for raising another issue which I found shocking. How can he reconcile that the government minister responsible for the status of women, I believe he said, had a role in building and opening the Campbell River Women's Centre and creating it as a community activist, with the fact that she is now failing to fight for it? I find it fascinating that that is happening.

I would really appreciate it if the hon. member would comment on that and possibly also, in terms of regional development, the failure of this minister to fight for the Polar 8 which is also in her riding.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I agree that the minister responsible for the status of women is in a terrible position. First of all she, with other women in the community of Campbell River, realized the shortfall in services to women and the desperate need for a resource centre there. She got out with those women and campaigned in order to get the funding and the program rolling.

I happened to see her presentation on CBC after the news on Sunday night in which she was justifying the activities of the federal government. I have to say it is a terrible act of hypocrisy to know of those needs, to be moved to the point where she became involved in trying to resolve those needs with other women in the community, and then to turn around and to say that what the federal Conservative government had done was acceptable. That could only be construed as an act of hypocrisy.

I would let her conscience deal with the matter of finding the remarks of the Minister for International Trade funny. I mean that is such a tragic comment from a person so highly placed in the government that the appropriate action is a resignation, or a demand for the resignation.

I think that both of those ministers have some very serious soul-searching to do and certainly owe the public of this country an apology. In addition to the apology we need a change in behaviour. We need solid support for those women's resource centres. A partial funding, core funding, of those organizations is not acceptable. Putting them on a decent footing so that they can provide the needed services to the community is absolutely essential.

• (1710)

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I would like to add my own words of congratulations to my colleague from North Island—Powell River, particularly for his reference to the closing of the women's centres in the context of the debate on regional development.

I know some members of the House may have a hard time understanding how the two jive together, but I can assure the House that, as my colleague knows, in areas like mine in the West Kootenays and his in North Island, women often do not have access to the kind of social service institutions at the sophisticated level that they do have in major urban areas. Those centres do play a very vital role in the economic and social development of women and their organizations in hinterland areas.

People from my own constituency often find themselves here in Ottawa on behalf of the women in trades movement. I often see them in the galleries because they have been acting as advisers to the government on policies dealing with those issues. They, along with their sisters in the Nelson women's centre, in our case, are now being cut off totally at a time when we are seeing major construction programs beginning in our area and they finally have a chance to take advantage of some of those employment and economic opportunities. It is absolutely criminal and stupid. It is counterproductive for the government to be making major cuts to those kinds of development organizations just at this time.

The only other short comment I would like to make, and if my colleague has time to comment he may wish to, is on the major cuts that we now see emerging to the Forest Resource Development Agreements. The former Liberal government continued to make cuts to forestry over years and years. Finally, in its death throes, in the last one or two years, it saw the light and brought in a program that in 1983-84 saw some $55 million from the federal government matched with the government of B.C.

When the Conservative government was elected in 1984 it thought it was doing great things when it spent $30 million a year over five years. But we forgave it that annual cut because at least it did it on a sustained basis and it made some sense. Now it is going back to the worst days of the Liberals and it is only going to be $6 million a year, if we ever get it renewed at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now ended. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I take a bit of pride in being able to speak here this afternoon on the motion. Before I get too far into the motion I would like to say that I truly understand the importance of regional economic development. As a businessman who started out in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, I personally felt the effects of what the previous Liberal government was doing with its centralized economic policies. It caused significant problems for us in western Canada.

We talked about interest rates on supply products. As a businessmen trying to finance various projects at extremely high finance rates, I found at times that I was on working and working and working and at the end of the year the finance costs basically took over all the efforts and any profit margin that my small or medium sized business was able to attain.

One of the other problems that I had at that time was supply material. Because of the centralized policy that the government had at that time there was a reasonably booming economy down in southern Ontario. When you come from a small region such as I did in Manitoba, the suppliers and manufacturers, although they did not really take a dim view of what we were doing in my region or the other regions of western Canada, they took a look at market shares. They decided that it was unimportant to make sure that the small business or the small wholesaler in regions outside central Canada had goods in place so that they could carry on their projects. That is one of the major reasons why the past government was defeated. Those of us in areas outside central Canada took a complete dislike to what was going on. It is important to give that background before I get into what I have to say because I think the record of our government since 1984 speaks for itself.

In the last little while we have taken on economic renewal, not only in western Canada but all throughout Canada. We have put a lot of thrust into small business. We have taken a look at small business and we know how important it is to each individual small community. Small business is one of the greatest creators of employment. We have done our job to reduce the deficit. We have reduced the size and role of government in all aspects, not necessarily just business. We have gone through regulatory reforms and we have gone into privatization. We have privatized a number of things.

One thing to remember is that we have delivered on all the things we said we would do, not only in 1984, but also when we resumed after the past election.

We can talk about how we have turned the deficit around. When we came into power in 1984 there was a program spending deficit of approximately $16 billion. For this present year, we are going to have a $9 billion surplus in program spending. The net result is that we have turned that program spending around by $25 billion. That is quite significant. That is an awful lot of money.

We have reduced the public service. We have taken the attitude that government does not have to be everywhere. We listened to the people of the country and decided it was important to reduce the size of the federal civil service, and we have done that by approximately 12,000 people. Right now we are back down to the 1973 level. It is quite surprising that we can do all this work with fewer people. What we have, for lack of a better word, is a lean, mean machine here.

Mr. Mills: Check your contracts.

Mr. Bjornson: Well that could be, but we get the job done and we have reduced program spending. Even if it is out there in contracts, we are spending less money doing it. That is a good thing to remember.

Mr. Nault: At double the price.

Mr. Bjornson: If I could get a job at double the price I would probably be out there right now, but I do not think that can happen.

We have sold 16 Crown corporations. We have done it. We have turned it around. We got rid of Air Canada. Air Canada is out there operating on its own, and who is the biggest shareholder in Air Canada right now? It is its own employees. We have turned this around and the government is doing quite well.

Let us talk about what has happened in agriculture. The farming community in western Canada needed help and we provided it. Last year in western Canada, on an average, we put $30,000 into each farm. We have an attitude that is positive.

What about the National Energy Program? What did that do for western Canada? What did that do for regional development? Down the tubes, pal. That is exactly what happened. There was absolutely no support for western Canada when the National Energy Program was in place. That hurt us and hurt us bad. I do not see anybody from Alberta or western Canada, Saskatchewan included, considering the transfer of money that went from western Canada into central Canada as a result of the National Energy Program.

We have also taken a look at financial institutions. We were concerned about them. There were times when there were problems and the government responded. There were some problems in the banking industry in western Canada and the government put in approximately $1 billion to save the pensions and the savings accounts of many people in western Canada.

We have taken a look at the transportation industry. We have deregulated the transportation industry and it is now wide open. I know what the effects of that are on the small communities of western Canada. Now the farmer is not paying top dollar to get his fertilizer delivered. He is paying an economical rate so he can put it on the field.

A personal friend of mine has been very involved with the regulation. He has expanded his company. He is booming. He is making a living because the government's has an attitude that small business should look after itself.

We can talk about free trade and what free trade has done for regional development. Once again, I come from a small area in western Canada and I like speaking about western Canada because I think it is a fine place. The three biggest employers in my area are exporters. The fact that we have free trade makes their products more competitive in the international market, in particular in the American market.

I know that the people who work in these industries in my communities are more than impressed with the effects of free trade. The workers are not being laid off any more. They are not working for three or four months and off for a month and back for three or four months. They are out there full time and they are working hard. They are making money and at the end of the day they have money in their pockets. They can take their children on holidays in the summer time. They are doing well. I think that is all because the government has decided to do something about regional economic development.

Let us talk about unemployment in 1984 and 1989. Let us start off with British Columbia. I think it is important that these numbers get on the record. In British Columbia in 1984 unemployment was at 14.9 per cent. In 1988 it was 8.3 per cent. In Alberta it was 11.7 per cent in 1984 and it was down to 7 per cent in 1988. Saskatchewan had 8.8 per cent unemployment in 1984 and it was down to 7.2 per cent in 1988. Manitoba's unemployment rate dropped from 9 per cent to 7.2 per cent. I think it is important that you take note of those figures.

We can talk about job creation in western Canada from 1984 up until September, 1989. We have created 404,000 jobs. Eighty per cent of those are permanent jobs. Over 60 per cent of those jobs are held by women. We do have an attitude of trying to do something in rural Manitoba, rural Saskatchewan, rural Alberta and rural B.C. We want those people working. British Columbia had 246,000 new jobs. Obviously we must be doing something on this side of the House to be creating jobs.

All the approaches of past governments obviously led us some place that we did not want to be. What did FRED do for us? What did ARDA do for us? GDAs, REDAs, ERDAs, IRDPs, where did they all go? They were a bunch of fixed programs that had no flexibility to react to short term needs. They were tied in. You had to spend that money no matter how. Away it goes. We just spend that money because that is the way of it. There was absolutely no flexibility; spend, spend, spend. That is exactly what these programs did.

How many of these programs did nothing but support civil servants in the provincial government for working and not actually accomplishing anything? We did not give the private sector the opportunity to work. We did not give the private sector the opportunity to take that money and go out and do something.

At least we had enough sense in this government to bring on western diversification, the opportunity for businesses in western Canada, with something new and innovative, to get out in the marketplace and put people to work in western Canada. I think we have got the minister to do that.

We have got a minister who really is important. He works hard and he is very influential at the cabinet table. We have got a minister with a mandate for change and for addressing the regional development challenge in western Canada. And we want to eliminate the disparity between western Canada and elsewhere. We want to make everybody the same. In the budget we looked at what has happened to the ACOA program. We are finally getting a level playing field, which is the terminology everybody is using.

We can talk about the fact that we have put $1.2 billion into western diversification. Instead of wasting the money that was in all these other programs we are bringing it in so that the private sector has the opportunity to go out and create jobs.

Through the leadership of the minister we put together a program. We have 313 person-years in all of the western diversification programs. If any members from western Canada have an opportunity to do any business with WD they will find that they get those programs turned around right away. They are not buried. They are not lost on somebody's desk or in somebody's file. We have a turnaround time to put that stuff back out on the table and if it is a good project that really works, it is done. No more bureaucrats sitting around playing games. We have a job to do and we are going to do it.

Where are the offices of the deputy minister? They are in western Canada. No longer are the offices looking after development in western Canada situated in Ottawa or Toronto. They are in western Canada, exactly where it should be. There are regional offices throughout western Canada. In each of the major centres we have an office which handles the Western Diversification Fund, and they do it quite well.

We also go into risk sharing. We take a look at the projects that are coming up. I will use one in my own riding as an example because it is one of the best examples I can find. We have a company coming in which is going to spend well over $100 million looking into what we can do in research and development.

The first phase is the risk sharing. We understand the company is spending a lot of money and we are risk sharing. If the project is successful, we get the money back. If the project is expanded, we have decided that western diversification should become a participant in phase two of this project. If it is successful we will have well over 400 jobs in the community within the expansion program itself.

Think of the spin-off coming out of that. If we have 400 jobs at the plant, what happens outside with all the service industries, the grocery stores, the school teachers, everything that is involved. This is mainly due to western diversification.

We do take risks and I think it is important to take risks. We have to understand that the private sector involved in making decisions, and some very risky decisions, and we are prepared to do that as well. Rest assured that when those decisions are made, they are good decisions. They are not far out decisions. I would think that, in most cases, being Conservative, we make rather conservative decisions in situations like this.

From what I understand, less than 2 per cent of the funds that have been put forth by WD so far are in risk. That is a pretty good rate. I do not think any of the other development programs which will be putting money out and looking to getting it back could say the same. Western diversification is a very tight ship.

I think the whole concept has to do with the attitude of western Canada. Western Canadians do not look for hand-outs. They look for help when it is needed and when they do get help they put their best foot forward. Far too often in the the late seventies and early eighties everybody had their hand out. We do not like that in western Canada. We have had enough of that attitude in western Canada. Development in western Canada is going to be done with the help of government funding, but not with only government funding.

That is the attitude that we should have throughout Canada. No longer should a businessman come to the government and say, "I've got a great idea for a project, but I need your money". Western diversification is prepared to help, we are not prepared to give. That is important because those projects in which everyone is involved work a heck of a lot better than the ones where there is just grant money. I think we should keep this up.

There is a lot of procurement in western Canada through the direction of WD and a lot on the initiatives of three prairie provinces. We know that government spends a lot of money. But now, through WD, if there is an initiative in place we want procurement to be equal throughout western Canada. We want things to work together. With the direction of WD I think we are going to be far more successful in that.

We can talk about ERDAs and the fact that the Prime Minister made a significant announcement in Brandon, Manitoba, three or four weeks ago, basically tipping our hat to the fact that we do have what we will call a new style of ERDA programming. There is $242 million which will be shared equally between the four western provinces. The whole direction of those funds will be negotiated through the Western Diversification Office and in particular with Minister Mayer. He has taken a very personal concern about how things will be handled and seems to have quite a rapport with not only his cabinet colleagues from western Canada but also with his provincial counterparts. It is working very well. I know, coming from Manitoba, with the flags that have been showing for us that there is a concern through western diversification, which I call the new ERDA, in rural redevelopment of Manitoba.

• (1730)

We are working to maintain the rural Manitoba communities so that they are viable and so that we do not have people leaving the communities. We want to maintain industry there. We want to give industry the ability to expand in southern Manitoba. We do not want to lose those businesses. Western diversification is taking that attitude to the rural communities of Manitoba with the help of the Manitoba government.

We are also looking at other issues in Manitoba. I know I speak best about Manitoba where we are looking at the communication industry. We are looking at the cultural industry. We are looking at the mining sector. We are looking at the forestry sector. These are all concerns that we have in Manitoba, and they will be addressed by this WD funding and on the joint efforts with the provincial government. I am looking forward to being very, very successful in what we will be doing.

In conclusion, the attitude of this government toward regional development, whether it be in western Canada, eastern Canada, with the FEDNOR agreement, or in southern Ontario, I think it is equally favourable throughout Canada. I think the attitude that we have is not one of just grants. It is one of equal participation. It is one that stimulates the business communities to have an input to get things going, to make things work so that they know at the end of the day that it was not a gift. It is something that they earned themselves. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to speak on this important issue, particularly to those in Manitoba and western Canada.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I was interested in listening to the member's comments. Although he may be here on Parliament Hill in the same office building, after I listened to his speech I think we must live in different worlds in western Canada. The western Canada I live in does not feel that it has been treated well by this government in terms of regional development. The facts are there to prove it, certainly in the province of Saskatchewan.

Twenty-three thousand people have left that province in the last year. Three hundred out of 500 communities lost population. There is a feeling of despair and hopelessness in that province that in all my years of living there and even in the memory of people who were there in the thirties that has never been seen. In all that time nobody has been as depressed about their prospects in that province as they are now.

We look at what the Conservative philosophy has done to that province, now that we have Conservatives both federally and provincially for this period of time. We have seen a debt load that went from the NDP period in Saskatchewan of zero public debt chalked up by the government, with balanced budgets for 11 years in a row to $4 billion plus that the people of that province now have to carry in debt. We see that in spite of what the Conservatives proclaimed when they were in opposition before 1984. They were always saying that high interest rates were a detriment to western Canada, that what interest rates did was suck money out of the prairie region, out of western Canada, out of the resource producing regions and send it to Toronto from where it is tougher and tougher to get it back. That still persists.

The member brags about deregulation. He knows full well, I am sure, that in many of the communities where there used to be an orderly transportation system, none exists now. Trucking has become worse and worse. Only the major points get covered. The smaller communities are left out. The airline service is now all done by regional carriers with smaller aircraft, which makes it a lot less attractive for people to do business there. We see farm income falling steadily. Certainly, there have been other factors. Ad hoc programs from year to year have not convinced any farmers that farming is the thing to stay in.

• (1735)

The member alludes to WDO being involved in procurement and the great things it has done for procurement. If he would look at the record, he would see that for all the smoke and mirrors and song and dance, procurement percentages for western Canada have declined during the period of Conservative governments since 1984.

My colleague from the Okanagan tells me that in B.C., which has 11.5 per cent of the population, procurement has gone down from 4 per cent to 3 per cent during the period of Conservative government.

The member says that the Minister for WDO is doing a tremendous job in terms of the ERDAs. I would like to ask him where are those ERDAs? Those ERDAs have not been around for a whole year now.

Forestry is suffering. Mining is suffering. Tourism is suffering. Northern development is suffering. I would like to ask this member how in the face of that can he say that this Conservative government is sympathetic and supportive of regional development when the facts say that that region is going down the tubes. The kind of structures that we need by way of infrastructure, economic structures, interest rate policies and public fiscal policies are all heading us even further down the tubes. How does the member respond to that?

Mr. Bjornson: Madam Speaker, first, the hon. member expressed some concern about the fact that there seemed to be some loss of population in the province of Saskatchewan. I am glad the hon. member moved out there so that the number was not quite as high as it should be. I do not know how long "all these years" are, but I imagine there is a certain amount of experience up there in northern Saskatchewan.

I think possibly the member just maybe missed the fact that I talked about $242 million which was brought forward by the government which is to be handled by Western Diversification which is to be shared equally by the four western provinces. I do know, as I said in my comments earlier, I am more than impressed with the attitude of both the provincial governments and the federal government, how they are working together to solve this problem.

He makes some comments about the concern of deregulation in the transport industry. In the areas that I represent, which is rural Manitoba, somewhat like the area the hon. member represents in rural Saskatchewan, there does not seem to be a problem. In that particular industry there seems to be trucking companies popping up all over the place. Maybe you do have a problem in that area. I cannot speak to that, but I can speak for Manitoba. That is not a problem in my area.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I would like to put a proposition to the House. This has been a very interesting day. I am sure that the interventions have been very constructive. The Liberals would like to have one more speaker on this day. It has been our day. We only had three members today up to now speaking on this debate.

I have the member for Nunatsiaq who has his speech and who would like to speak for northern Canada. I think that the House would benefit hearing from him.

I wonder if there would be a disposition, Madam Speaker, to give the member for Nunatsiaq a chance to make his speech and then adjourn the House. I can give you my undertaking we will not be doing anything to prolong the hour past his regular 20–minute allocation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Speaker is quite prepared to hear the hon. member, if there is unanimous consent from all three parties.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, certainly I think it is important that the member be heard. Given that, I believe that we in this party would be more than happy to agree with the proposition put forward, on the understanding, of course, that the co–operation from this corner be noted when it comes time for some of our motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, speaking on behalf of the government, we agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If I understand correctly, the hon. member will have 20 minutes, after which we shall adjourn.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, it is always an honour when the House saves the best for last.

I would like to comment on the remarks of my colleague from Calgary Southwest who was speaking on some northern issues when she had the floor. I would just like to bring back to reality some of the comments she has made.

I am pleased to be here today to speak to the motion of my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River. I would like to congratulate him for putting forward this very important topic of regional development for debate.

The motion refers to the government's failure to protect, support and promote the regional economies of Canada, Atlantic, western, northern Ontario and northern Canada. This motion is appropriate and timely for all these regions, but I will focus specifically on northern Canada.

The northern economy is a developing economy. It is an economy in transition. In the Northwest Territories our economy is moving from a land-based to a wage-based market economy. Our economy is heavily dependent on natural resources, and we export these raw resources.

Ours is also an economy which imports many goods and services, and labour. The economy of the Northwest Territories mirrors in one important aspect the Canadian economy in general. While the economy has been growing, not all regions have benefited from the growth. In fact, there are serious and continuing disparities between regions within the Northwest Territories.

Local efforts to reduce these disparities are constrained by our dependence on federal funding and by our high cost of living. At the present time the Government of the Northwest Territories receives about 85 per cent of its revenues through direct transfer payments from the federal government.

The Northwest Territories has a small and volatile tax base and cannot strain that base much more than it is doing now. The federal government knows this. It knows the northern economy is a developing economy and that our cost of living is the highest in the country. It knows that some of our regions have the highest unemployment rates in Canada.

Figures released in the budget of the N.W.T. Minister of Finance last month established an employment rate of 16 per cent in the first quarter of 1989, northwest territorial wide. But the three regions in my constituency in the eastern Arctic have unemployment rates above 20 per cent. The Keewatin and Baffin have an unemployment rate of 21 per cent. The Kitikmeot region in my constituency has an unemployment rate of 31 per cent.

This is a tragic situation. The government should be dealing with the situation as a national tragedy, but what is the government doing about it? The government's proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system will make it harder for northern residents to receive unemployment insurance. When they do get it, they will get it for a shorter period of time.

In addition, federal transfer payments to the northwest territorial government have been cut by this government. These transfer payments go to the N.W.T. government through a formula funding arrangement.

Prior to losing office in 1984, the previous Liberal government negotiated a generous formula funding agreement with both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories governments for a five-year period. That five-year period has expired. Negotiations with the current federal government on a new five-year funding arrangement did not prove successful for the northern governments. The federal government unilaterally imposed a new funding arrangement which is detrimental to northern economies.

In his budget speech to the Legislative Assembly of the N.W.T., the N.W.T. Minister of Finance did not mince words about how bad this new arrangement is for the N.W.T. economy. He said the N.W.T. had been dealt a bad hand by the federal government with the imposition of the new formula financing arrangements. The immediate financial impact of the new arrangement is a reduction in this fiscal year of about $25 million from what the government would have received under the old formula. The reduction in the federal grant represents a reduction of $475 per person in the Northwest Territories.

• (1745)

Over the next five years, the reductions will amount to about $110 million. Not only are these cuts damaging to the government's fiscal position and to the N.W.T.'s ability to respond to the pressing needs of its residents, but the new formula contains serious flaws which will limit the N.W.T.'s ability to develop the northern economy.

The new arrangements take effect April 1, 1990, and will be in place for five years with a review after three years. The changes to the formula financing mean that the N.W.T.'s revenues will grow by less than inflation in the 1990–91 fiscal year. This is the first time that this situation has had to be dealt with by the territorial government.

The territorial government, because of reduction in federal transfer payments, has had to reduce expenditures and increase taxes. The new formula funding arrangement forces the territorial government to increase taxes. However, as a result of the federal changes, the N.W.T.'s funding will be tied to an indicator based on a provincial and territorial tax effort in the year 1987–1988. The result is a reduction in the grant to the N.W.T. because the federal government considers the tax effort of the N.W.T. government to be lower than the provincial average for that year.

In addition, the federal grants in subsequent years will be reduced according to how the N.W.T. has lagged behind the growth in provincial tax effort since the base year 1987–88. These changes by the federal government to the financing arrangements with the government of the Northwest Territories have fundamental consequences for expenditure and taxation policies of the N.W.T. government over the next five years. The government of the Northwest Territories will have to impose the same taxes as the provinces at rates comparable to the provincial average in order to recover the cost imposed by the federal government.

We will also have to keep up with increases in provincial tax efforts to protect the total funding from further erosion. This provision of the formula ignores the fact that northern residents already face a higher tax burden than most other Canadians when the high cost of living in the north is taken into account.

According to the N.W.T. Minister of Finance: "In fact, the formula as a whole, we believe, acts as a disincentive to economic development". Some small comfort was provided by the phase–in of the financial impact over three years, and the fact that the reduction is not as large as was originally proposed by the federal government.

However, the government of the Northwest Territories remains fundamentally opposed to the application of the tax effort adjustment to the formula. Its use produces a formula which is flawed and its imposition by Canada could have severe financial consequences for our government over the next five years.

The federal budget released on February 20 had more bad news for the northern economies. Recent budget cutbacks are going to negatively affect the northern economies. Under the terms of the new federal formula financing arrangements with the northern governments, the two northern territories will have to increase their taxes if the provinces increase their tax rates. They will have to raise their own taxes or face a reduction in their annual operating grants.

By cutting transfer payments to the provinces for health and education, the federal government is forcing the provinces to increase their taxes. If the provinces increase their taxes, the territorial government will have to increase theirs as well.

I have already mentioned the cutbacks the federal government has imposed on the funding it transfers to the two territorial governments. The Northwest Territories has been cut back by $110 million. Yukon's transfer payments have been reduced by $9 million this fiscal year, by $12 million next year, and by $20 million the year after next.

According to the N.W.T. government, the cutbacks jeopardize the territorial government's ability to stimulate the economy. The Northwest Territories Minister of Finance has called the federal action a disincentive to economic growth.

• (1750)

The recent budget also eliminated the Canadian Exploration Incentives Program which will affect mining exploration. While not as helpful as the flow-through shares program which was cut two years ago by the current government, it is still a loss.

Cutting back on the subsidy to Canada Post for the food mail program to remote northern communities is having negative economic and social effects on the residences of these communities. Many of my constituents are paying $5 for one litre of milk so that the government can pocket more of Canada Post's profits. In the budget, the Minister of Finance said he wants Canada Post and other profitable Crown corporations to turn over more of their profits to the government. This is supposed to contribute to the deficit reduction. This government is taking food out my constituents' mouths so that it can put more money in its pocket.

The budget of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been cut by $100 million over the next years. Economic development is among the affected areas. Aboriginal communications groups and organizations have had their funding slashed, and in some cases eliminated.

Jobs are being lost. How does the loss of northern jobs, aboriginal jobs contribute to northern development? Between 100 and 180 jobs will be lost as a result of these cuts to the aboriginal communications programs throughout the country. In the north the cuts to the Inuvialuit Communications Society means two people will have to be laid off at the end of this month. Four other positions that were up for hire will not be filled.

The Native Communications Society of the western N.W.T. has been cut by so many jobs, adding insult to injury, as of last week. As of last week, they still had not received their funds for February and March. Furthermore, April's money will not arrive until May.

In addition to the cuts they have suffered, they will have deficit finance incurring additional and unnecessary bank costs.

The Inuit Broadcasting Corporation will lose more jobs as well.

The proposed goods and services tax is a source of serious concern for the N.W.T. Northerners have argued against the tax in its proposed form because it is inequitable and will reduce the N.W.T.'s relative competitiveness with southern Canada. The tax will result in N.W.T. residents paying more sales taxes than other Canadians for the same goods and services. The current sales tax which will be replaced by the GST is applied at the manufacturers' level. Because the GST is applied at the retail level, the large component of transportation costs and higher northern margins that are not currently taxed will be fully taxed under the goods and services tax proposal.

Also, higher incomes in the north will result in residents with the same real purchasing power as southern Canada benefiting less from the enhanced federal sales tax credit. In addition, with the exception of some industries, the proposed goods and services tax has the potential to seriously reduce the N.W.T.'s competitiveness compared with southern Canada. The tax will make the N.W.T. an even higher cost region in which to do business and, therefore, a less attractive place in which to invest. This will, according to the N.W.T. Minister of Finance, retard the N.W.T.'s economic development.

The goods and services tax, whether at 7 per cent or 9 per cent, is simply not acceptable to the residents of the Northwest Territories. Rather than assisting the N.W.T. government to effectively deal with its economic problems of regional disparities, high unemployment and lack of infrastructure, the federal government is blocking further progress.

At present, the federal government retains control over N.W.T. land and its resources. The Government of the Northwest Territories' ability to plan and manage the economy is limited as long as control over land and resources remains with the federal government.

However, the scale and face of development is largely controlled through the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, with priorities designed to benefit all of Canada.

Devolution of responsibilities is a slow process. Transfer of control goes hand in hand with aboriginal claim settlements. Aboriginal people want to be partners in northern development.

A new economic development agreement is being negotiated between the N.W.T. and the federal government. I urge the federal government to recognize the unique development needs of the north. Transportation is an essential element in the development of the N.W.T. economy.

• (1755)

The government of the N.W.T. is actively pursuing the transfer of federal government responsibilities for transportation, and work has begun on a special joint study to develop an N.W.T. transportation strategy. Any transfers must be accompanied by the necessary resources. The federal government must continue to play a major role in the northern economy, particularly in developing the necessary public infrastructure to stimulate and sustain the economic growth. Job opportunities and an economic future for the use of the territories must be a priority for both the federal and territorial governments.

The population of the Northwest Territories is very young and these young people will soon be moving into the labour force. There is a need to focus efforts on education, training, income opportunities, infrastructure and job creation.

As a final comment, I urge the federal government not to view economic development in N.W.T. only in terms of the export of natural gas from the MacKenzie Delta. In 1989, 64 per cent of the people with jobs in the N.W.T. were not born in the N.W.T. Dependence on imported labour is greatest in the mining, oil and gas sectors, sectors where northerners have very little control or influence at this point in time. It is critical to the balanced development of the N.W.T. that an acceptable northern accord for the revenue sharing of oil and gas royalties be concluded in the near future. Diversification of the N.W.T. economy must be encouraged.

We cannot afford to place our economic future in the hands of non-renewable resources development alone.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is now my duty to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

1990–91 MAIN ESTIMATES

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Before commencing debate, I would like to give a ruling which I undertook to do some days ago.

During the course of the sitting, Thursday, February 22, 1990, three different members raised questions relating to the Estimates and the traditional lock-up preceding their presentation by the President of the Treasury Board.

The first question was raised as a point of order by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who noted that while 87 Parts I and II of the Estimates were being tabled, only 73 Part III reports were available and complained about the 14 missing Part III reports.

Later in the day, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby rose on a question of privilege to object to a lack of information respecting certain specific programs during the lock-up allowing members an advanced look at the Estimates prior to their tabling.

The third complaint came from the hon. member for Mackenzie who challenged the accuracy or credibility of data printed in the Part III report for Agriculture Canada.

[Translation]

I have had an opportunity to consider all three cases and am now prepared to rule on them.

With respect to the first matter, the Hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell argued that the government breached a rule of the House in not tabling all of the Part III reports at the time Parts I and II of the Estimates were presented. The Hon. Member recalled that in 1982 the House had concurred in the Twelfth Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which supported major reforms to the preparation of the Estimates. The Hon. Member further argued that in not presenting all of the Part III reports, the Government had failed to respect the expressed wish of the House with regard to Estimates.

[English]

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan intervened to support the complaint made by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. On behalf of the government, the parliamentary secretary to the Government House Leader explained two points. He maintained that the government had complied with the rules of the House, in that Part II of the Estimates, known as the Main Estimates, are all that are explicitly required to be tabled according to the Standing Orders, and that the Main Estimates were presented in advance of the March 1 deadline.

Moreover, the parliamentary secretary indicated that the government fully intended to provide the 14 missing Part III reports on or before March 12. This statement elicited an objection from the hon. member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair, who pointed out that the Standing Orders set March 1 as the date by which the Estimates are to be referred to the standing committee.

I want all members to know that I have considered this issue very carefully. I have reviewed the Twelfth Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and statements made by the President of the Treasury Board when the present format of the Estimates was introduced over a span of years, beginning, I believe, in 1981.

[Translation]

I can understand the sense of frustration expressed by the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, but I must point out that technically, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader is correct in claiming that the rules, that is the Standing Orders, require simply that the Main Estimates be referred to standing committees by March 1. In the present format of the Estimates, Part II constitutes the Main Estimates, the document that directly relates to the votes that will lead to an Appropriation Act to be adopted by the House usually no later than the end of June.

[English]

That said, however, I must also state that when the House concurred in the Twelfth Report of the Public Accounts Committee in 1982, the House endorsed the committee's support for the new style of presenting the Estimates devised by the government in response to a recommendation put forward by the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee.

• (1010)

This new format makes up the complete estimates and all three parts are necessary for the standing committees to do their work effectively. Part I provides an overview of the government's spending plan while Part III gives details for the expenditure proposals and expectations of each department.

Part III, therefore, is necessary to the standing committees if they are to adequately understand the votes they must consider that are presented in Part II, the Main Estimates. In this particular case the frustration is all the greater because the 14 missing reports, I understand, constitute approximately 75 per cent of the government's proposed spending for the fiscal year 1990–91. Were these documents to remain unavailable, the work of the standing committees would be seriously handicapped.

However, the parliamentary secretary indicated at the time that the government fully intended to present those documents on or before March 12. Indeed, they were tabled on March 5. There remains, I believe, a sufficient opportunity for the standing committees to do their work in the time they have available up to the end of May.

The second objection raised concerning the Estimates was brought up by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby who complained about the inadequate information she had received from Treasury Board officials during the lock-up prior to the presentation of the Estimates in the House Thursday, February 22.

The member explained that she had asked specific questions about the impact of the budget on women's programs, multiculturalism, native affairs and programs assisting visible minorities. Despite the fact that officials told her that the information she sought would not be available for a week or so, the hon. member learned from some women's groups of the effects of the budget on their organizations shortly after returning to her office after the lock-up. This, she contended, proved that the information was available but that it had been withheld from members of Parliament. In consequence, the hon. member raised this issue because she felt it constituted a breach of privilege.

[Translation]

After having examined the question both in terms of privilege and in terms of comtempt of the House, I cannot conclude that the question raised by the hon. member meets the very narrow criteria of privilege, which concerns certain very specific rights deemed necessary for hon. members to carry out their duties and assume their responsibilities.

[English]

The lock-up is provided by the government in order to give members information on the Estimates in advance of their presentation in the House. The fact that the government has undertaken to provide the lock-up suggests, on the face of it anyway, that the government understands the needs of members to have this kind of information. At the same time, however, the lock-up is not a procedure of the House and there is no guarantee the government will furnish absolutely all the information that might be requested.

Moreover, there was nothing in the hon. member's presentations to suggest that Treasury Board officials sought wilfully to deprive her of the information. Such a situation, while it may indeed be a grievance, does not, in this context at least, constitute a question of privilege or contempt.

Finally, the hon. member for Mackenzie raised a point of order concerning certain data presented in the Part III report prepared for the Department of Agriculture. Specifically, the hon. member complained of the way the appropriation or possible appropriation is given for the Farm Credit Corporation listed as a non-budgetary item.

At the time I suggested to the hon. member that I did not think the Chair could address this question as a point of order. I have subsequently had an opportunity to review this matter and have noted that the Third Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts presented last October offered certain criticisms of the way the Department of Agriculture has presented some information in the Part III reports in previous years. As I originally suggested February 22, one avenue open to the hon. member to obtain redress of his complaint is to raise it in the Standing Committee on Agriculture or in the Public Accounts Committee. It is not an issue which the Chair has the authority to resolve.

I thank all hon. members who raised these important issues related to the Estimates process and all those who contributed to the discussion and assisted the Chair in the consideration of the matter. I certainly feel that while certain members may indeed have a grievance in this area, it is not a question of privilege.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved:

That this House condemn the Government for its failure to support the National Research Council as Canada's premier research institution and its failure to promote basic scientific research in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the House this morning on the subject of the National Research Council of Canada. I would like to start by putting our subject in a context that directly concerns the government: that of the federal deficit.

[English]

I participated in a debate last evening in Kitchener on the subject of the goods and services tax. On attempting to return to Ottawa late last night, or early this morning, we could not land because of the fog. It struck me that the good people of Kitchener, before I left there, were convinced, having listened to a discussion on the goods and services tax, that Ottawa was definitely enshrouded in fog.

What we heard from the supporters of the GST last night was very much an explanation—

Some hon. members: Supporters?

Mr. Manley: Well, there were supporters there. There was the hon. member for Cambridge, who acquitted himself very well, I might add.

The explanation for the infliction of the pain of the goods and services tax on Canada was primarily that it was a solution to our deficit. It struck me that this was ironic in the context of a week in which we have become increasingly aware of Canada's failure and the government's failure to make a real commitment to the needs of science and technology in this country.

You see, Mr. Speaker, there are three ways to address the national deficit. There are expenditure cuts, and we have heard lots about those. There are tax increases, and that is what the goods and services tax is really all about. The third way is that if we can increase Canada's productivity as a nation, if we can grow, if our economy can expand, if our people can be made more productive, then we have the opportunity to do the kinds of things we want to do as a generous nation, we can maintain the programs that we have and reduce our deficit.

It is not just a matter of cutting expenditures or raising taxes. If we lose sight of the importance of building our economic strength as a nation, then we are doomed to failure at deficit reduction; we are doomed to a generation of tax increases.

We have had some fairly significant new information come forward this week in the area of science and technology. We have learned that the Minister for Science does not believe in the matching grants program for the university granting councils. We know, from evidence given to the Industry, Science and Technology Committee yesterday by the president of the National Sciences and Engineering Research Council, that the failure to replace the matching funding, which is scheduled to end in the upcoming fiscal year, will be devastating—and that word is his—devastating to the granting council.

On top of that, there was a memorandum made public on Monday from the president of the National Research Council which contains some startling comments by that individual. Among other things it says that NRC intends to limit its involvement in basic research to that required to maintain a minimal scientific insurance policy for the nation. Not only that, he says the next five-year plan for NRC will propose a clear policy statement and strategy on privatization and divestiture. He says that there are planned reductions in permanent employees at NRC which will produce an organization with a significantly different balance of permanent and term employees.

Is it any wonder the people of Canada think that Ottawa is in a fog? At a time when they are being called upon to sacrifice by expenditure cuts, when they are being called upon to pay more in taxes, the very core of what we need to do to improve our productivity as a nation is on the chopping block as well.

• (1020)

We need to look at the importance of scientific research as part of this effort to make Canada globally competitive. That is what we heard last night in Kitchener as well. We need the GST to make us globally competitive is what we were told.

What we need is a firm, continuing and definite commitment to science and technology, to science–based innovation to make us globally competitive. That does not mean just getting the industrial sector to do more. That does not mean that we advance our cause a bit by having government spokesmen, including the Prime Minister, going around saying: "Well, the problem with research and development in Canada is that the industrial sector does not do its share."

Just this week the science and technology committee was told: "What do you expect in Canada?" We have a very large resource– based industry and everywhere else in the world it is governments that do research and development in the resource sector. It is our weakness in the other manufacturing sectors that exposes our inability to compete unless we can learn how to do science–based innovation and move forward on that basis.

One of the most startling presentations that our committee received was that by Dr. Fraser Mustard who came before our committee some months ago and talked to us about the importance of innovation. He said, for example, that innovation is the key to economic growth and sustaining and enhancing our prosperity. He pointed out to us that innovation is increasingly science based. He said that innovation in the context of economic growth has two components, institutional innovation and the innovation that leads to the creation and production of goods and services that are sold in world markets.

What we are witnessing today, Dr. Mustard told us, is a rapid change in the relative position of nations in the global economy as a result of institutional innovation, the creation of new technologies, new production techniques and effective capture of market share. Regions that are able to innovate in terms of developing new institutions and producing tradeable goods and services will remain strong trading regions. Regions that are not able to innovate will be fading regions.

In the context of what has happened this week, I ask myself, where is this government attempting to lead us with its policy of cutbacks and spending cuts on science and, at the same time, tax increases? Where is the government attempting to lead us?

Let us look at the National Research Council itself. This is a venerable Canadian institution. It has really been the jewel in the Crown of Canada's commitment to science over many years. It has been an inspiration to our youth. It has been an opportunity for our graduates in science and engineering to find employment. In many areas it has led the world in scientific achievement. Even as recently as December, 1987, NRC's Atlantic Research Laboratory found what might be called a needle in the haystack, according to NRC, when researchers identified domoic acid as the toxin responsible for the mussel poisonings in Prince Edward Island.

We have had so many examples of achievement by NRC and its scientists.

In 1988, NRC scientists found a new method to render high levels of PCBs safe for disposal. The discovery was made possible through the NRC's Division of Chemistry which was doing basic research on reactive intermediates.

This aspect of NRC performing basic research is very important because what we have in Canada is a very thinly spread scientific community. We have the building blocks of NRC, our universities and the private, industrial sector. In the main, our industrial sector has research facilities which are too small and inadequate for the task of performing basic research on a very broad scale.

The Fields Institute for Research in Mathematics pointed out this week to the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development: "The longer-term goals of pure research will not be funded at all if not by government".

Pure, basic and fundamental research is difficult to perform in the industrial sector. The costs are large. The results are always questionable. That is why it is basic research. One never knows for sure that one will find something that is usable or that can be exploited for commercial purposes.

In the context in Canada in which much of our industrial sector must look to the bottom line of profit results in the short-term cycle, be it quarterly if not annually, and in the context in which the cost of capital is enormous for the performance of basic research, or any research at all, we need the help of government and well-funded universities to ensure that fundamental research is being done. It is not enough for us to say that we can get the best research results from other countries and incorporate them in Canada. If we do not have the highly trained and skilled people here in Canada capable of knowing what it is we need, we will not be able to go around the world to shop for the results of other people's research. We need those people.

In Canada, we need a commitment to the development and retention of people. That commitment involves, necessarily, government. It involves the federal government making its commitment in various ways, but including the maintenance of a world-class scientific facility such as the National Research Council. Without that, Canada fails to have the focus of excellence that will be required if we are going to compete in this new global economy that is based so much on science and technological innovation.

Those of us who are concerned about this issue on all sides of the House, I am sure, can only share the feelings of anxiety, concern and despair of the scientists at the National Research Council who have now experienced over the last five and a half years a series of cuts and cutbacks that leaves them dispirited and anxious.

I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of some of the cuts which have occurred at the National Research Council. In November, 1984, $60 million was cut from the NRC budget. As a result of that, major divisions or projects were closed or cancelled, including the energy division, the Environment Secretariat, the Manufacturing Technology Institute, the Institute for Electrochemistry and the Cold Regions Research Institute.

On October 1, 1986, we had a Speech from the Throne with a four-point science policy. Within that very month an additional $29 million was cut from the NRC budget, which cuts included the photochemistry and kinetics section, the very section where the Nobel Prize-winner, John Polanyi, commenced his work; the electromagnetic and mechanical engineering program; the environmental toxicology program; and aeronautics, construction, and physics programs. Two hundred jobs were to be eliminated as a result of those cuts.

• (1030)

Earlier this year we learned that the high energy physics research performed by NRC would be gone by 1995, possibly farmed out to Queen's and Carleton universities. The prairie research station will be cut. The avalanche research group in British Columbia, the only one in North America of its kind, is going to be cut.

Is it any wonder that scientists at the National Research Council are dispirited, anxious and wondering if they have any future at all in that institution? This was the crown jewel of Canada's research establishment.

This is the council which, in 1916, when Canada was a fledgling country, engaged in a world war, which demonstrated Canada's commitment to science by establishing a world class observatory in Victoria, British Columbia, at the farthest extreme of the young Dominion and at great expense. However, it showed two things. It showed that Canada was committed to performing world class science. It also showed that Canada was willing to spend the money necessary to do so, not where it was politically expedient but where the interests of science dictated. If you have ever visited that facility, Mr. Speaker, you marvel at the fact that that giant lens was hauled up the hill in Victoria, I gather by animal power, at a time when Canada was so young, so new and engaged in a world war.

Where is that commitment now? Why is it that this government is not saying to Canada's young people: "We are committed to making Canada a leader in science based innovation"? Why is it that I drive in from the airport with a taxi driver who has a Ph.D. in engineering who says that he has not been able to find a job in engineering for three years, which is why he is driving a taxi.

I received a call from a young woman science student in my constituency, a student funded under the Canada Scholarships Program. This program is supposed to especially encourage women to pursue careers in science. She tells me that because of some technicality in the McGill program, after being told that her scholarship had been renewed, it has been eliminated by a government that does not really care. This is after she has already embarked on her studies. Why do these things happen?

Why is it that the president of NSERC has to tell a House of Commons committee that if he does not find out soon whether or not his budget is going to be maintained stable next year, he does not know how much time is going to be wasted by university scientists who are preparing applications for grants?

Why is it that we are not going forward to the people of Canada, as President Kennedy did in the United States in 1961 with the space program, saying to them: "By the year 2000 Canada will be the world leader in environmental technologies"? Why are we not opening our doors to scientists from all over the world, telling them that if they want to make a contribution in environmental technologies, Canada is the place to do it, that Canada will fund and welcome them? Why not? I do not understand it?

Why is it that we are so preoccupied with today's deficit that we cannot see that by investing in science and technology, especially in those people oriented to preserving and enhancing the environment, that we will ensure that tomorrow we will have the solution to the deficit, that tomorrow we will sell our products to the world, a world that is anxious to receive them.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this House should express its discontent with the government because of its lack of commitment to the National Research Council and its lack of commitment to basic research in Canada because these are the crucial issues of today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first I want to compliment my colleague for a passionate and very substantive address on this issue. Before I address my question to him, I want to say that I have been noticing in the last few days that this government has been retreating from its responsibilities. Have you noticed, Mr. Speaker, that if the word "national" or the word "Canada" is in the name of an institution that it denotes an immediate decentralization process, whether it is Air Canada or Petro-Canada? The philosophy is: "Let's sell it off". The government will even change the names of the museums. It is an incredible thing.

Mr. Beatty: There is still Health and Welfare Canada.

Mr. Mills: They have not got to you yet, minister.

Here we are with the National Research Council and the process of decentralization has begun. This government is a maître d' to the provinces. It is really becoming quite serious.

My specific question to my colleague is this. The Canadian Space Agency which had its foundations in the national capital region was moved to Montreal some few months ago. This is where labs, families and institutions had begun the process of galvanizing. Does my colleague think that the move of the Canadian Space Agency to Montreal was in the national interest?

Mr. Manley: We debated the bill to create the Canadian Space Agency in this House last spring. At that time I talked about Canada's commitment to the space program and the value that Canada's contribution in space technology has made to the world. In fact, Canada is one of the few countries which actually exports more in space technology than the government spends on it. That is a pretty good recommendation for the fact that early on in the space program we committed ourselves to being part of that program. Other countries, such as Japan and the United Kingdom have been trying to catch up to us. We moved ahead. We were early and we have achieved a lot on it. That commitment needs to continue.

What the government did with the establishment of the Canadian Space Agency was to turn it from being a symbol of national pride in our achievement in space technologies into a political football. We had rival municipalities arguing whether they or another place should be the new headquarters of the Canadian Space Agency. You will notice it is called the "Canadian" Space Agency, not the "National" Space Agency. That rivalry, those arguments, detracted so badly from the establishment of what should have been a source of national pride that it became a source of national disunity.

I say this cautiously. As a representative of the national capital region, I do not want to be seen to be engaging in the same kind of parochial politics that gave rise to the problem in the first place. In 1916, when Canada spent all that money to put an observatory on the top of a mountain in Victoria, British Columbia, when hardly anybody lived out there, it did it for one reason. That was the place in Canada where the science of observation was best served. It was not because there were great electoral results to be earned by doing it.

When Canada makes a commitment to do something like the space agency, the issue should be this. Where can the interests of science be best served? I think that the decision-making process on items like the Canadian Space Agency's location should not be done at the political level, but done much as we administer the National Centres of Excellence program or the granting councils, let us have the scientists concerned do it on the basis of what is in the best interests of science.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member wondered where this government is taking us, I would like to inform him that our government's goal is to put this country on the road to prosperity. We want Canada to be a first-class country by the year 2000.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall, for the hon. member's benefit, some policies that have been fundamental to the government's purpose, and not necessarily in terms of dollars and cents. We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that we took these steps in order to have a country that is able to adjust more readily. I may therefore remind the hon. member that we established a science and technology policy for Canada, under which each province was asked to do its share to help workers and students adjust and make them better trained so that they can meet industry needs. We had the conference on innovation in Toronto, where Canadian industries were asked to upgrade the quality of their products. They were asked to increase productivity and enhance the value of their products. They were also asked to incorporate advanced technologies in their processes.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to mention, for the hon. member's benefit, a series of measures that were taken to make our country more flexible. We set up InnovAction and Strategic Technologies. We identified the areas in which Canada could excel, such as artificial intelligence, biomaterials and telecommunications. For the universities, we set up a program called Matching Grants, because we found that although the research being done in the universities was excellent, often researchers were cut off from what was going on in the rest of the country. Through the Matching Grants Program, industry will do a lot more research and it will need more and more of the type of research being done by these very competent people. And in the end, Mr. Speaker, we will get students that are far better trained to respond to the needs of industry.

We also developed the well-known Network of Centres of Excellence Program which promotes basic research across the country. This is a tremendous program, Mr. Speaker, because it allows universities, participating industries and our various research councils—especially the National Research Council of Canada which is a participant in 10 proposals—to do research and make their findings known across the country, thus enabling other researchers to use the information to best advantage.

To increase substantially the number of researchers in this country by the year 2000 and to enable our country to meet this objective, we set up the Canada Scholarships Program, which is intended to encourage more young people to continue their education and go on to university, where we hope they will want to continue their studies and go on to become better researchers.

Mr. Speaker, I have the following question for the hon. member: regarding the National Research Council and preparations for the five-year plan, I wonder why he cannot understand that the council executive might want to identify new avenues instead of simply maintaining existing ones.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa South. I will allow him a couple of minutes to answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is a great deal I could say in response to these comments. However, I will probably have an opportunity to do so later on. I would like to start by answering the last part of the question, about the National Research Council. I will answer in English, since that is easier for me.

[English]

I would like to try out an analogy on the parliamentary secretary. I think what we have in the NRC is something like an orchard.

What the government needs at the NRC is a good horticulturalist. Perhaps some cultivation is necessary. Maybe we need to do a little bit of pruning and spraying. Maybe the odd tree is unproductive and should be cut down, but maybe there are new varieties of fruit required and we should do a little bit of grafting to get some new varieties of fruit.

What the the government has done is it has decided to make a cut. Instead of sending in the horticulturalist it sent in the local wood cutter. He chopped down a bunch of trees. He chopped down the ones closest to the road because they were easiest to haul away. Worse than that, there was no attempt to choose the trees that were unproductive, he just cut down trees. It was a chain-saw massacre at the orchard.

In this analogy, just to stretch it a little more, these trees know what is going on. The good and productive ones are scared out of their minds. They can uproot themselves, leave the orchard and go to another orchard. A lot of them are doing that. The ones that are not that productive are the ones staying there. They are scared and more unproductive than ever.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that she consult a horticulturalist in dealing with the National Research Council.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I can now respond more specifically to the hon. member's comments on the National Research Council.

Perhaps I may repeat, for the hon. member's benefit, that traditionally, the National Research Council has been Canada's foremost research institute, and it continues to be the cornerstone of the government's science and technology strategy.

During the past five years, we have relied on the NRC's well established resources to enhance its impact in a number of ways, as I will explain in a moment.

Its role will become even more important in the future. By insinuating that the NRC's role has recently been diminished, opposition members show they are ignorant of the real situation and the dynamic nature of the National Research Council of Canada.

The NRC has a broad mandate to initiate, support and promote scientific and industrial research projects. It has carried out this mandate in many fields since it was created 75 years ago, and it continues to do so with great vigour.

Today, as when the NRC was first established, its work is characterized by the ability to evolve with Canada's changing needs. Today, thanks to the government's support, the NRC has an annual budget of over $400 million and about 3,000 employees in programs and facilities across the country.

It is one of the most flexible and powerful instruments the Government of Canada has to support science and technology in Canada.

One could also say that the government supports the NRC in various ways so that it can act as the cornerstone of Canadian science and technology.

We must not forget that the NRC spends about $215 million annually on supporting our national scientific and technological infrastructure.

The NRC's programs and facilities make it possible for engineers and scientists in industry, government and universities across Canada to carry out R and D in many important sectors.

This contribution to the Canadian science and technology infrastructure includes maintaining large federal facilities for science and engineering, such as basins for testing ship's models and all the very sophisticated instruments researchers need to work on a broad range of projects ranging from routine tests to advanced research.

• (1050)

The NRC also provides scientific and technological services, including on-line data base and document delivery and lending services through its Canada Institute for Scientific and Technical Information.

Thanks to this structure, the NRC has the ability to answer every year some 400,000 requests for information.

The support which the NRC provides to the national scientific and technological infrastructure also includes IRAP, the Industrial Research Assistance Program. This is a highly regarded government program which provides every year financial and technological assistance to thousands of Canadian businesses.

The NRC also carries out and supports research in a number of areas which can be classified as public or national interest-oriented.

This activity, which involves yearly expenditures of over $100 million, includes the operation and administration of the federal observatories, the national scientific library, the national measuring standards, as well as the development of the national building and fire codes.

The NRC's scientific and technical skills and facilities also contribute to national priorities within the framework of formal and co-operation agreements with the various federal departments and organizations which must assume a leadership role in some specific areas.

These organizations include the Department of National Defence which works in close co-operation with NRC's air space scientists, Transport Canada which co-operates with the NRC on a number of transport security related issues, as well as Environment Canada which the NRC is helping to identify government priorities in the area of environmental protection.

The NRC also carries out long-term research activities as a sort of insurance policy to help Canada face such crises as the tainted mussels in 1987.

These oriented long-term generic skills will make it possible for Canada to take advantage of new developments and opportunities, the same way the research and development laboratories of a major corporation meet the needs of its production departments.

The NRC also does economic research in co-operation with industrial partners. These joint efforts may involve major companies which work with the NRC to carry out strategic research and development projects and to develop and market new products. Or again they may involve groups of companies, each of which may eventually benefit directly from these joint endeavours.

The NRC sponsors major technological programs in such fields as industrial materials, biotechnology and information technologies from which many companies and industrial sectors benefit.

The NRC's major research programs are a source of general reference for leading industrial sectors. For instance, the Institute for Research in Construction is the main pool of expertise for Canada's building industry whose activities run into billions of dollars every year. Through the National Aeronautical Establishment, the Institute for Marine Dynamics and other engineering divisions, the NRC provides similar support for many sectors of the transport and transport equipment industries.

In all these roles the NRC makes a major contribution to train the highly skilled human resources needed by our nation. The NRC gives industry, governments and educational institutions access to major facilities, equipment and direct financial support to help them train the scientists and engineers they need.

The NRC also trains personnel on training assignments within its own programs and provides other means for trainees to learn at the NRC before going on to a career elsewhere. More than 20 per cent of the professional staff of the NRC holds such trainee positions, particularly under the research assistant program for scientists and engineers with graduate degrees. The NRC also offers an important student summer employment program and actively seeks to involve research trainees funded by its clients and associate agencies.

In view of all these well-established activities, programs and roles, it is hard to see how the opposition can claim that the NRC no longer plays an essential role in science and technology.

Since taking power, the present government has helped the NRC strengthen all its activities in various ways, especially as regards the essential support the NRC provides for the Canadian economy.

For several years, the NRC has pursued its traditional activities meeting the great scientific and technological challenge by creating new programs and new initiatives.

When this government was elected five and a half years ago, Canada was just getting out of a serious economic recession. Canada was running an ever-increasing trade deficit in technology. There was an obvious need to rely more on technology in both traditional and emerging industries.

With that in mind, the NRC redefined its key role as "encouraging and helping Canadian industrial enterprises to adopt technological solutions" by means of a long-term plan supported by the government and published in 1985. Under this plan, the NRC undertook to place its facilities and capabilities at the service of Canadian industry, to develop its activities and to increase its ability to meet the country's needs, taking account of the necessity for budget austerity because of the large public debt which the previous government left us.

Among the achievements of the past five years, we should include steps taken by the NRC's research division to regroup their sections within the larger laboratories dedicated to a broad range of research; upgrading certain programs by creating important new research facilities such as the Biotechnology Research Institute in Montreal, the Institute for Marine Dynamics in St. John's, Newfoundland, and through participation in the James Clerk Maxwell Telescope in Hawaii; the creation of advisory boards and committees headed by industry to guide the NRC's activities and research programs; the implementation of projects on the basis of joint initiatives, memoranda of agreement and various other measures taken to reinforce interaction between the NRC and its clients industries, government, the scientific community and foreign governments.

Industry's demand for the services of the Canada Institute for Scientific and Technical Information has increased considerably, Mr. Speaker.

The Industrial Research Assistance Program has broadened its range of services for Canadian businesses in order to give better access to foreign technology and provide specialized services to the Canadian building industry.

We also wish to point to a major development consisting of the creation of several major multidisciplinary initiatives, making good use of the established resources of the NRC's laboratory divisions. This approach promotes of co-operation between the NRC and its partners by making the latter more aware of the full range of facilities and resources available at the NRC.

Considering the need for attracting collaborators and covering areas that are of strategic importance to Canada, the NRC promotes programs involving technologies that respond to the needs of various industrial users and sectors.

As I mentioned earlier, these very promising areas include activities related to biotechnology, materials, standards and precision measurement, industrial systems and manufacturing technologies of interest to major industrial sectors such as the construction and transportation industry.

During the past five years, the NRC made an effort to increase its participation in joint research agreements, provided NRC partners would invest as much—

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, during the break, I had the honour to participate as a member of a Canadian delegation in a portion of this year's session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

The work of the United Nations in the field of human rights has been unduly neglected. Too many Canadians are not yet aware of the importance of the universal struggle for human rights or the important role played by Canada internationally in this quest.

At this year's session, there have been resolutions on a number of countries where the human rights situations are preoccupying. Canada has co-sponsored many of these texts, and has been active in ensuring that the commission treats each situation in a balanced, considered manner. The Canadian delegation has been one of the strongest teams in Geneva and due tribute should be paid to the Department of External Affairs and the minister. At another meeting, Canada was also complimented on its leadership with regard to refugee programs.

I want to emphasize today the importance of the breakthrough made this year at the commission, which has important ramifications for future work in the international human rights field. This breakthrough is the strengthening of bonds between countries of the western group, of which Canada is a member, and countries of the eastern group. Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary have played important roles this year at the commission, in some cases voting alongside western delegations on many resolutions.

I view this as a promising sign. Human rights issues should not be considered ideological or political matters. As the barriers hindering co-operation between west and east come down, I hope that greater co-operation can be effected among all countries, in order to ensure that the high standards—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

"WE'RE AKIN TO IRELAND"

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, for 200 years, Irish immigrants and their descendants have played a vital role in shaping the culture, economy and character of Prince Edward Island.

In recognition of this great contribution, the Government of Prince Edward Island has proclaimed that in 1990 islanders will honour our Irish heritage by celebrating the theme "We're akin to Ireland".

The year-long celebration will affirm P.E.I. as the most Irish of Canadian provinces. "We're Akin to Ireland" will be marked by festivities and heritage events, with the central theme being that of music. Plans include concerts with P.E.I. talented Celtic musicians, theatrical performances, an Irish film festival and much more.

I congratulate the various Irish associations, the P.E.I. Museum and Heritage Foundation, and the public and private sector individuals who are working to make "We're Akin to Ireland" a great success.

I invite all of you, and all Canadians, to visit this beautiful island this summer, enjoy some wonderful Irish music and culture and do your share to keep P.E.I. green—spend money!

ROYAL PARDON

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this House the tragic case of a woman in my riding. Since 1979, Mrs. Annette Proulx, who will soon turn 75, is serving a life sentence in the Maison Gomin of Quebec City for a murder she presumably committed in 1979. Although admitting to the crime and expressing sincere regret would help her obtain royal clemency, 11 years later, Mrs. Proulx still claims she is innocent.

Considering she has spent many years in prison and that Justice Yvan Migneault, who presided at her trial, as well as the Crown attorney assigned to her case and the Correctional Service of Canada feel that Mrs. Proulx is not a threat to society, I urge the Solicitor General and the 12 Members of Parliament studying Mrs. Proulx's request to grant her the royal clemency.

It seems to me that, after 11 years of incarceration, Mrs. Proulx deserves to live in peace and serenity her final years and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that she will be given that chance. It is really a humanitarian case.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, as you know, this week has been declared a national week of protest against the goods and services tax, better described as the grief and suffering tax. Liberals from coast to coast in this big country have given all Canadians the opportunity to voice their opposition to the GST. They have done it in overwhelming numbers by simply picking up the phone and phoning 1-900-720-6052 or 1-900-720-6051. All week this number 1-900-720-6052 has been overloaded by phone calls from thousands and thousands of Canadians from one coast to another saying to this Tory government that this is a rotten tax.

In fact, these phone lines have been so popular two things have happened. One is we added a second line on Wednesday to accommodate the rush—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Sault-Ste. Marie.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, after having decimated the rail transportation system in this country, the government continues its mishandling of the issue. The government's complaint was that taxpayers could no longer spend hundreds of millions of their tax dollars subsidizing the system. Now there are 300 excess cars of rolling stock in various states of disrepair, but some that could be put into immediate use by Canadian interests to the benefit of Canadian taxpayers. Rather than offering any assistance, VIA Rail has contracted out the disposition of this stock to Canadian and American interests. In other words, the government is asking Canadians to pay again for what is already theirs.

In my community, the single most important tourist attraction is the Algoma Central Tour Train which requires $30 million to $40 million for refurbishing of cars. This would be a golden opportunity for the government to offer one community a tremendous economic lift. I am sure there are others in like need.

I ask the minister to intervene, establish Canadian priorities and distribute this rolling stock to Canadian interests at nominal cost.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when people are asked if they have read the Meech Lake Accord, almost 90 per cent of the population have never read it. It is sad to say that many who think negatively about the important unifying accord have not read it.

I hope everyone will have the opportunity to read the article written in The Globe and Mail by Gordon Robertson, former Clerk of the Privy Council, entitled: "Dispelling the Myths that surround Meech". He wrote: "Many confident critics appear not to have read the legal documents. They have uncritically accepted the myths and produced a chorus of unverified assertions about the potential disasters the accord will bring".

Mr. Robertson, who was involved in every constitutional conference from 1968 to 1978 shoots down every myth presented. He ends his dissertation with this statement: "The challenge for Canadians is to refuse to be panicked by the myth-makers. There is no injury of any consequence in the accord. There is rather the prospect of great benefits: the end of constitutional deadlock, the lessening of tensions and the chance to return Canada to effective co-operation in the pursuit of real goals of concern to all Canadians—and to the generous acceptance of diversity upon which our national unity depends".

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, this is a call to all veterans. Canada, once again, needs you. You have already given much to your country. You have fought for our freedom. You have seen comrades die. Many of you still bear the scars of battle, wounds and disabilities which you will carry to your grave.

How does this government show its gratitude? How does this Tory government repay you for your sacrifices? They raise your lodging charges for long-term hospital care to save $17.3 million. They withdraw services to you under the Veterans Independence Program to save another $18 million. You too will have to pay the dreaded goods and services tax, if this government is not stopped now.

Yes, veterans, we are in another battle, a battle to save Canadians from the GST. We need your help one more time. This is how you may join the fight, the Liberal anti-GST fight on behalf of all Canadians. Your weapon is the telephone. Pick it up and call 1-900-720-6051 or 1-900-720-6052. NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the government for its excellent science and technology policies and its efforts to promote co-operation between the government, the industry and Canadian universities.

The National Research Council's new focused-ion beam facility is a case in point. This laboratory is the only one of its kind in Canada and one of five in North America.

For the NRC, this facility is the key to research on electronic and optoelectronic devices of the year 2000. These devices will be about 100 nanometers, or 100 billionths of a meter, thick, which is 10 times smaller than current equipment.

This new technology is so precise that researchers were able to illustrate its amazing possibilities by drawing on the point of a pin—not the head but the point—no less than 1,711 tiny angels.

This facility is jointly managed by seven agencies: the NRC, Northern Telecom Electronics, Bell Northern Research, the Department of Communications Research Centre, Carleton University and Queen's University.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would agree with me that what I want to do this morning is rather rare: I want to commend four members of the Conservative party who sit opposite us for the courage of their convictions and for being so outspoken on behalf of their constituents.

The first award of excellence comes from what is headlined in the Edmonton Journal:

> Wilson must go, Kindy says
> Dump GST too, Tory says

I commend that member of Parliament for the courage of his convictions.

The second award, according to the Toronto Star, goes to David Kilgour who will vote against the GST. Congratulations to the other member from the Conservative party in Alberta.

The third award, according to the Toronto Star, goes to Willie Littlechild who stated that he will vote according to the wishes of his constituents. Congratulations to that Member of Parliament.

The fourth award goes to another Albertan. According to the Toronto Star, Louise Feltham stated that she will abstain or stay away from the Commons when we vote on the bill.

Let us congratulate those four Conservative members of Parliament for the courage of their convictions, and encourage the other Conservatives who are now revolting against this tax quietly in the back-benches to speak up and vote against that tax here in the House of Commons.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, the opposition to this government's ill-conceived goods and services tax grows by leaps and bounds even as we speak.

The telephone hotline set up by the Liberal party has garnered such a large response that a second line has been added, and the project extended until Sunday, March 18, at 11 p.m. central time. Tens of thousands of Canadians have made their opposition to this tax known, and I am sure that thousands more will do the same over the next few days.

I wonder if the member opposite will put his phone number so people can call him and see what he will do. They do not have to pay 50 cents when they call you. However, I am going to give them the number.

I call on all concerned Canadians to call 1-900-720-6051 or 1-900-720-6052. Let this uncaring government know that the people of Canada will not let this tax pass without a fight.

If any of you have any guts, put your phone numbers up and see how the constituents are going to call you.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, Canadian companies can count on the National Research Council for many kinds of help. One is relatively new, but it is working well. It involves a group of companies willing to work together with NRC to conduct what is termed "pre-competitive research".

The NRC has signed an agreement with a consortium of loudspeaker designers and manufacturers to do the pre-competitive research necessary to develop the next generation of smart loudspeakers.

It is very rewarding to see Canadian companies, many of them competitors, working together with NRC at a pre-competitive level. Increasingly, this collaborative approach is necessary to remain competitive in world markets. This would not be possible without the help of the NRC.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the government has again attempted to undermine research and development, long term economic growth and the competitiveness of Canadian business in world markets with the recent decision in the 1990 budget to cut science and technology spending by $39 million, to reduce transfers to the provinces for education, and most recently the cut-back on research staff. Further, a letter written by the president of the council indicates that steps to privatize the National Research Council are being taken.

In an area in which technological preparedness is a key determinant of strength of the Canadian economy, the National Consortium of Scientific and Educational Societies recently recommended that the government increase investments in research performed by federal laboratories. It is imperative that the development of scientific research and technology be encouraged and funded publicly, as well as privately.

While research activity in the private sector has increased in recent years, current forecasters predict a decline in R and D spending over the next five years in anticipation of an economic downturn. The government must increase investment—

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Yesterday the State of Iraq executed Farzad Bazoft, in violation of international law. Mr. Bazoft was aged 31. For what cause, Mr. Speaker? Because he was a journalist in search of a story.

This was a barbaric act and deserves the condemnation of civilized people everywhere in the world. I call upon the Canadian Government to recall the Canadian Ambassador from Iraq and for the nations of the world to take economic sanctions against this barbaric regime.

I call on the House of Commons to pause for a few seconds in solidarity with the journalists from the London Observer who had a silent vigil in front of the Embassy of Iraq in London.

This was a barbaric and tragic act and a blow to freedom of expression and to journalists everywhere in the world.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

In the discussions leading up to the free trade deal, Americans said they did not like our system of unemployment insurance and they wanted it brought down to American levels. They will get that if Bill C–21 goes through.

They also said they did not like our system of regional development grants. They will get that if the budget goes through.

Furthermore, they said that they did not like our approach to giving Canadians priority access to Canada's own natural gas. They are going to get that with the decision of the National Energy Board yesterday that it will no longer apply a cost benefit test in deciding whether to permit exports of Canada's natural gas to the United States.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister, will he not admit that there is an emerging pattern here, a disturbing pattern of Canada caving in, in every instance when it comes to protecting the rights of Canadians about their future and the future of this country, or will this government give a direction to the National Energy Board that it must continue applying the cost benefit tests when it comes to exports of natural gas and making decisions about such exports?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board's decision takes account of the market's ability to balance supply and demand. It also takes account of Canada's environmental and energy supply requirements. Its approach takes account of these two aspects that are fundamental for Canada. On one hand, we have a free market, of which Canada is part. On the other, we have our environmental and security interests. I believe that the board has come up with a balanced proposal.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer flies in the face of the history and experience of this country which says that leaving everything to the market, important as it is, does not necessarily always result in the Canadian public interest being respected.

Foreign ownership of our upstream petroleum and natural gas sector has increased to 62 per cent. What the decision of the National Energy Board is saying is that not only will foreign subsidiaries be sending back dividends to the United States, but also that they will be getting cheap natural gas and contracts lasting for 100 years.

I want to ask this government if it is going to give a mandate to the National Energy Board to protect the interests of all Canadians, stop caving in and start standing up for this country, all of this country? When is it going to do that?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. colleague represents a party that does not trust the laws of the market. But they are the laws that apply in the western world at this time. I believe that they can assure and support trade in energy. However, in some areas there are environmental priorities. It is essential to protect the environment, it is essential to protect Canadians' security of supply. When these are at stake, the board will make the appropriate decisions. Meanwhile, the laws of the market favour both producers and consumers, whether they are in Canada or in other countries, but the Liberal party has still not realized this aspect of its policy.

• (1120)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned a matter of trust. Canadians don't trust this government, which is obvious from the fact that the Province of Ontario said that without a cost–benefit test, the National Energy Board could no longer excercise its mandate, which is to protect the interests of the public, and Quebec noted that a cost–benefit test was the only way to reconcile public and private interests.

I therefore want to ask the minister what action the government intends to take to give due consideraton to the concerns of Ontario and Quebec and protect the public interest?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government wants its policy to be balanced. We have the producers who own the resources, Mr. Speaker, and who want to sell them. We also have the general concern of Canadians about two priority areas, namely, protecting the environment and protecting security of supply. The government and its agency look at both aspects.

I believe the laws of the market will achieve a balance between supply and demand, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. The National Energy Board's decision marks a radical departure from its position a little more than two years ago when it introduced the cost-benefit test. Yesterday, the board scrapped the test, the most important tool it had, to measure public interest of an energy export.

I want to know what the government's position is on this decision, and what is it willing to do to ensure that the public interest is protected?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government is committed to an economy that is based on free markets, free enterprise and free entrepreneurship. The result is that the economic situation in our country is improving and that responsible producers who own their resources are able to sell them, while two priorities of Canadians are also protected: the environment and security of supply. That is the thrust of the regulatory agency's policy, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in submissions to the National Energy Board, this cost benefit analysis was called the most important tool to protect the public interest.

Yesterday's decision to drop this test was made in the context of the government's trade deal with the United States. I want to ask the minister if he will admit that the free trade agreement is really to blame for the loss of this very important public tool.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, with or without the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement, this government is committed to an economic system based on the laws of the market, on an economic system that allows us to move our goods. The Liberal Party is committed to reintroducing in Western Canada a national energy policy that was a disaster, both for western provinces and central Canada, and which cost the people of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia billions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, we will not turn the clock back.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my question to the same minister on the same subject. Once we cut through the gobbledegook of yesterday's decision, what we find is that four huge export contracts of natural gas will be permitted to go to the United States at costs which are much lower than the costs that consumers in Canada will have to pay in the future to replace those exports.

In 1988, the NEB itself stated: "Canada's current gas supply is from conventionally producible resources. Over time the nation will become increasingly dependent on higher cost resources".

Will this government finally stand up for Canada's interests, for Canadian consumers, and tell the National Energy Board to defend the public interest as it should be doing?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, NEB officials follow current policies and set prices in accordance with the market. Intervention on the part of the regulatory agency is justified because they have concluded that the market is not operating efficiently and that public interest is not properly served.

[English]

What happened yesterday with the National Energy Board is very good news for people living in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. They do not want this government, pushed by the Liberal party or the NDP, to return to the national energy policy. We think that the market is the best way to regulate the markets, not the national energy policy.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact, this decision is very, very good for the producers and very good for the companies which are selling natural gas to the United States. It is not good for the people of Alberta, Saskatchewan or British Columbia, and I think the government should realize that.

The social cost benefit analysis approach, which is an approach used by the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, all sorts of institutions—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Langdon: I ask this government to stand up and say to the National Energy Board that this test of the public interest, the social cost benefit test, is something which should be protected, something which is used throughout the world, something which protects not just consumers but producers, too.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we should keep in mind that the social cost benefit test was just one of the many tools used by the NEB to decide whether the proposed exports are in the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted as well— I pointed out that our colleague—

[English]

—that this policy is in favour of companies. First, this policy is favourable to those who work for those companies. There are more people in Alberta who work in the energy field for companies than there are companies. This is not just for the companies as investors, it is first of all for those who have jobs in the energy field.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me make it clear that it is companies that will gain short term profits at the expense of long term jobs.

Is the government prepared to stand up and protect the consumers of Canada right across this country, because this is an approach which will damage consumers, not just now but in the future. Is this government prepared to stand up and protect the consumers of this country?

• (1130)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat that the government is quite confident that the National Energy Board gives due consideration to the market forces as well as to the short-, medium- and long-term interests of Canadians with respect to the environment and the energy supply. These regulations have nothing whatsoever to do with the free trade agreement. First and foremost they apply in a free world where the market is the rule which makes it possible to balance the needs of consumers and producers alike.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. He has just said that this decision had nothing to do with the free trade agreement. We know that it was occasioned or caused by the cases which were being brought by the U.S. companies and that the U.S. government was going to challenge under the FTA. The pressure was on and once again the government caved in.

I want to put this question: Does the government not understand that there is a difference between the interests of Shell and the interests of the public of Canada? Does the government not understand that the responsibility of the National Energy Board is to use powers to protect the long-term security and pricing of a resource that the Canadian taxpayer has been subsidizing for the last 20 years or 30 years?

Why has he given up those powers? What kind of powers is the government now going to give back to the NEB so he can protect Canada again?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I know that for a good many years now the Liberal Party has rejected the notion that Albertans own their natural resources and ought to benefit from them. I know full well that in recent years, within or because of the national energy policy, the Liberal Party has sought to compel Albertans to share their resources with the rest of Canada. However I would suggest that Albertans own these resources and have the right to use them to develop their province and promote the well-being of the local population.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is hardly the minister to tell me what is good for western Canada. I can tell him what is good for western Canada, because I have been fighting for it—

Mr. Hawkes: You gave in.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: We'll see after the next election, Jim.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a very basic question for the minister. He says that he has to balance between the rights of the market-place and the rights to defend the public interest. We know that the government has been giving all kinds of power to the market-place. What powers are possibly remaining under the National Energy Board to protect the public interest? Who is going to have any authority to exercise judgment about what is the long-term interest of Canada? I remind him that it is Canada we are talking about, not a bunch of provinces.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the National Energy Board, first, has all the confidence of the government to make that judgment, and it has all the tools to make sure that its judgment will be based on something good for Canadians. It has all it needs to protect the environment of the country and to protect the national security for energy. The National Energy Board has all of that and it knows one thing for sure—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You've taken its tools away.

Mr. Masse: —which the member does not seem to remember, that is that natural resources are owned by provinces. People who want to develop those natural resources have a right to do so. I think that people who live in Alberta have a right to develop their province and their own well-being based on the natural resources. They want to trade, not just for you but for them too.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance was in Montreal yesterday and kept up his mean-minded attack against Canadians who object to his GST legislation. He said seniors are behaving like children. He asked Canadian workers to be less greedy. Here is my question: Will the government ask the Minister of Finance to apologize to Quebec seniors and to Canadian workers whom he accused of being too greedy?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is in Montreal for two days of meetings with various groups.

There was a request that seniors meet with the Minister of Finance in Montreal. That meeting was arranged. The seniors arrived at the meeting, made a statement and left. They did not stay to listen to the Minister of Finance discuss the various positions on the goods and services tax.

The positions include the fact that 84 per cent of seniors will receive some form of tax credit rebate from the goods and services tax and that in fact a very large portion of them will be far better off after the goods and services tax comes into place.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Minister of National Revenue told us that small business supported the tax when every indication in the country is that a vast majority of small business people oppose the tax.

The Minister of Finance went to Montreal and insulted senior citizens of the country by refusing to listen to them. He told them that they were behaving in a childish way. The Minister of Finance told workers in the country that they were too greedy.

My question is very simple. Is the Minister of Finance going to be asked by the Prime Minister and by the government to apologize to Canadians whom he attacks if they oppose his favourite hobby-horse, the goods and services tax?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the hon. member, who has been attacking the Minister of Finance, apologize to him. We all watched the debate between him and the Minister of Finance with great interest and we know very well who clearly won that one—the Minister of Finance, hands down. The Liberals do not have any alternative to the goods and services tax.

The only thing they have done is to open a phone line and have people from across Canada pick it up and say: "I am against it." The Liberals do not say what they are for. They have no ideas. They are bankrupt. They are living back 20 years ago.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

It is a poor situation in the country when decisions about what crops will be planted and the future of tens of thousands of farm families depend upon what happens in a meeting between bankers and politicians.

Nevertheless, since that is the situation in the country, can the minister tell us what it was that the Minister of Agriculture and the Premier of Saskatchewan told bankers yesterday in Toronto?

What form of assistance can farmers expect? Will it be loan guarantees? Will it be cash payments? Will it be a targeted program? Will it be universal? How much money are we talking about? Most of all, when can farmers expect to know how much money they will be getting, and when will they get the money?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, it is a difficult situation in a good part of the prairies. There are areas that are not nearly as difficult as some of the areas of southern Saskatchewan and southern Manitoba.

I was at the meeting last night in Toronto with the Premier of Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan Minister of Agriculture, and our Minister of Agriculture. It was a very good meeting.

We are looking for ways to work together with the industry. We believe that all of us are part of it: the federal government, the provincial governments, the banking institutions, the chemical companies, the machine companies—everybody. We are looking for ways to get through this difficult period because we believe that there are going to be some better times ahead. We believe we are going to make progress at the GATT and see an improvement in prices.

Our record in terms of supporting farmers I think is pretty significant as far as the government is concerned. The Minister of Agriculture has been saying, as have many of the rest of us, that we are there to work with the provinces in this case to have some support as quickly as we can. We are well aware that spring seeding is just around the corner.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. He knows very well that farmers cannot plant consultations and that you cannot use press releases as collateral.

The Minister of Agriculture clearly promised that money would be in the hands of farmers before spring seeding and the minister knows that seeding starts by the end of April in many areas in the south. Farmers are making their planting decisions now.

Therefore, can the minister say precisely when the government will announce its program and when farmers will get their money? Can he give farmers an answer? They need to know right now.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I know exactly what the member is talking about. I have farmed all my life. I have had a permit book for something like 35 years. He does not need to tell me when farmers need money.

The record of the government in terms of getting money to producers is very impressive. One of the first things we did as a new government in 1984 was to amend the Western Grains Stabilization Act in order to get cash into the producers' hands. We are aware of that, and we are working with the farm community, the provinces and the industry to develop a plan that is going to work and be of significant benefit to those areas that need it the most.

• (1140)

We are well aware that seeding is coming, and we are going to do our very best to have assistance announced prior to spring seeding so that farmers will know what they are likely to get and when they are going to get it.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In 1979, Mrs. Annette Proulx was sentenced to life imprisonment for a murder she has always denied committing.

For the past 11 years, she has been serving her sentence at the Maison Gomin in Quebec City. Under normal circumstances, this woman, who will celebrate her 75th birthday on May 3rd, will be 89 years old when she comes out of prison.

Mrs. Proulx is seeking a royal pardon, because this is the only way she would be allowed out of prison before she is 89 years old.

All the people involved in this affair, including the Crown, the police, even the presiding judge, agree that Mrs. Proulx would not put society at risk because she is not likely to commit a similar crime again.

In view of this really pathetic situation and on strictly compassionate grounds, I should like to ask the hon. minister if it is true he is about to sign a letter denying her a royal pardon.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Of course, Mr. Speaker, I have been informed of this case and I have every intention to review it before signing anything.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. This has been quite a week for Connaught. In the latest chapter in the "book of revelations", Institut Mérieux confirmed today that it will not nor does it have any obligation to the people of Canada to fill the jobs of five top Canadian executives that were taken away. This is in direct contradiction to what the minister of industry promised this House last Wednesday. I quote:

> —all, or least most, of the jobs—will be filled again by Canadians.

Who is in charge? The government or Institut Mérieux?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my hon. friend that this is a holding company which is being affected. There were five management personnel in the holding company and, with the takeover by Mérieux, one does not need the holding company.

What the opposition, the hon. member and the government are concerned about is the operating company, the actual medical company that does the research and the sales in the field. It turns out that the holding company disappears with the takeover. Those are the only jobs affected.

All the Canadian jobs that are in the operating company, Institut Mérieux has made it clear that those jobs will continue and be filled by Canadians.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, that is not what the minister promised the House on Wednesday.

One more revelation is that today the French firm announced that it would be closing the head office because it will not be needed any more. There will be no Canadian head office to protect Canada's interest and to ensure that Connaught remains a major key player in the world market-place. Overnight, Connaught has become just one more branch plant.

My question is this: Now that the French government has control of Connaught, what will the Canadian government do to protect Canada's vital economic interest for the future?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not understand that the plant closure of those executive offices on University Avenue in Toronto reflects the fact that they will no longer be required once Connaught's interest in certain related companies have been sold. The takeover itself means one does not need to have the holding company. It is just a small company of management people.

Mr. Peterson: The top management people, the chief financial officer.

Mr. Hockin: Ninety-nine per cent of the operations is the operating company.

In the sale of Bioresearch and its share in Nordic Laboratories Mérieux is committed to giving preference to any competitive bid by a Canadian purchaser. As I have said before, the main business of Connaught Laboratories, which develops, produces and markets vaccines, will continue to be operated and managed out of Willowdale.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance or to the acting minister. The minister stated in the GST technical paper and I quote:

> —an inflationary response to the sales tax reform would damage the prospect for sustained economic growth.

Does the minister not accept that workers in Canada must protect themselves against the effects of the GST? Why should the workers bear the brunt of the effects of this unfair tax?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, most responsible economists in the country have said that the inflationary impact of the GST will be minimum, around 1.25 per cent to 1.5 per cent. In fact what the government and the Minister of Finance have been saying is that it is not necessary to have large pay increases blamed on the GST and the inflation that will follow. It is a very small amount of inflation and will be only a one-time blip in the inflationary factor. The workers are concerned about something that they should not be concerned about. In fact there is not going to be a large inflationary increase because of the GST.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the new contract settlement for members of the Canadian Auto Workers at Pratt and Whitney provides, and I quote, "an unlimited cost of living allowance to protect themselves from the price effects of the GST". They have every right to seek this protection.

The inflation rate of 1.23 per cent that the minister promised does not take into account the inflationary effect of wage pressures generated by fear of the GST.

What does the minister plan to do? Revise the inflation figures, deny workers the right to protect themselves, or scrap this tax?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, no, we would not deny the rights of workers to collective bargaining and whatever they can bargain with their unions and with their employers. That is entirely up to them and that is the system that they work under in the country. The latter option of scrapping the tax is not an option as far as this government is concerned.

An hon. member: Why not, John?

Mr. McDermid: The Liberals want to tear up the free trade agreement and scrap the tax. They want to go back to the old, old ways which do not work. We are not prepared to do that.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, last week at the Kingston Penitentiary, a 40 year old man named Gordon Taylor died. The Ontario Provincial Police is presently investigating very serious allegations that the death was murder by a group of guards at the pen.

I met yesterday in Kingston with a number of witnesses and had discussions with senior officials who, I may add, gave every co-operation to me and to my associates.

There is very substantial evidence supporting the allegations. My question to the minister is this. The Correction Service of Canada has ordered an inquiry. Will the minister outline to the House the terms of reference of the inquiry? Will he indicate whether he has given any special instructions to the board of inquiry and, if so, what those instructions would be?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the terms of reference, they are the terms of reference of the commissioner, of course, in these circumstances. I am prepared to tell the House what those terms of reference are, but it might take a few minutes. If my hon. colleague would be satisfied with my sending him a copy of the terms of reference, I am prepared to do that. Otherwise, I can read them, Mr. Speaker, but it will take a little while.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member in his supplementary question could ask a more specific question. I think the hon. minister is right. If it is a lengthy reply, it should be done in another way, but I will hear the hon. member's supplementary question.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite content if the minister would table the terms of reference to which he has referred, and perhaps in answer to my supplementary question he may wish to summarize it.

I would like to ask him, in addition to that, whether he has ever visited Kingston Pen, in his professional capacity, I may add. The prison was built in 1837. As the minister will know, the staff and inmates are trying to survive in really impossible medieval conditions.

• (1150)

Would the minister agree to go to Kingston to meet with the inmates, the staff and the officials? Would he be prepared to ask his officials to finally launch a plan to close this institution, which is such a disgrace to the country?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, I have been Solicitor General for just about three weeks now. I have not had time to visit all those institutions. As part of my responsibilities, I intend to visit as many as possible.

I did visit the women's prison in Kingston last week. Unfortunately time did not permit me to visit that particular institution. If it is possible, I surely will. It is an important institution, as my hon. colleague knows, and when time permits I will be there.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Today we heard from a Public Works lawyer that the government could lose $2 billion a month if a dispute over a home for the unwanted GST data centre continues.

The dispute involves claims that Public Works is in fact violating government policy for awarding contracts to the lowest qualified bidder.

Can the minister tell the House exactly what he intends to do about this dispute and how he plans to prevent this from happening in the future?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, today I am representing the Minister of Public Works who is meeting in Atlantic Canada.

My understanding is that the issue raised by my hon. friend from Ottawa Centre is before the Federal Court at the present time. It would be inappropriate for us to comment on it at this time.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I respect the statement of the minister.

If the Canadian people have their way we will never see or need a home for the GST anyway.

My supplementary question is also directed to the same minister. With millions of square feet of office space in the national capital region occupied by the federal government, with downsizing, and with thousands of public servants being laid off, can the minister give the assurance to the House that every effort was made in order to accommodate the GST centre in existing buildings rather than going out and spending millions of dollars renting a new one?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the government has set up an expenditure review committee which examines every dollar that can be saved and that every dollar spent by the government is wisely spent.

I can also assure the hon. member that the procedures followed by the government are those to assure that the taxpayers of the country get the best value for the dollar spent. I can assure him of that.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The termination of CEIP will have a crippling impact on the Canadian exploration industry. Without CEIP, capital spent by exploration firms on exploration will fall drastically and dramatically in 1990 and will fall even further in 1991. That is a period in which even the energy department has stated categorically that at least $500 million must be spent on base metal exploration alone.

How does the government expect to discover the new mineral deposits of tomorrow if exploration is not encouraged today?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the measures which the hon. member has referred to are part of a package which the government has developed to assist the mining industry by providing it with geological analyses, material research and development, as well as means to improve plant productivity. I do not think that just because a program had to be cut for whatever reason, in this case in an effort to help Canada fight its deficit, the whole geological policy and effort of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources comes tumbling down. This is only one aspect of a package. I will refer the question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who is very active in all his areas of responsibility, including the mining industry.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

If the minister has any intention of maintaining a healthy mineral sector in Canada, that is maintaining a healthy sector in the northern provinces and northern portions of our country because that is where a lot of the mineral reserves are, he must recognize that mineral exploration today is essential.

Does the minister recognize the importance of replacing depleting mineral reserves and, if so, is he committed to finding some type of alternative measure as a replacement to the CEIP?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind my hon. colleague that one of the best ways to help in the development of the mining industry is through flow-through shares. The reason the government has fully maintained the flow-through shares is to assist in the development of the mining industry.

NATIVE PROGRAMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, every week seems to bring another cut to aboriginal programs. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development last fall boasted that the fur industry in Canada out of a total employment of 100,000 supported 50,000 to 60,000 natives and contributed almost $800 million to the GNP.

Just when Canada is now making headway in convincing the European Economic Community to support the marketing of Canadian furs in Europe, why has the minister's department cut core funding to the Aboriginal Trappers Association by 100 per cent, from $120,000 to nothing, and to the Indigenous Survival Institute by $30,000?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, considering the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is away on business today, I will try to answer the question from my best recollection.

If I recall correctly, there was a program created through the initiatives of various departments, including Indian Affairs, but also External Affairs and another department, for a number of millions of dollars. Indian Affairs had committed some funds up until this year. The funds, therefore, are not reflected with respect to this year in the Estimates, but I understand that there will be some funds from Indian Affairs.

I am sure that my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs will make the appropriate announcement at the appropriate time.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I have a short supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Given that total government funding to support the fur industry has been cut by about 66 per cent this year, and given that the native lobbying program or native advocacy in Europe has been more successful in turning the situation around there than any other component of the fur industry, why is the minister singling out the native component for the deepest cuts—100 per cent to the Aboriginal Trappers Association and 17 per cent to the Indigenous Survival Institute?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Again, Mr. Speaker, as I said there was an initiative through three departments over a number of years. I think it was a three-year program or a five-year program. I am sure that my colleague will correct me in due course.

Nevertheless the funds were allocated for a number of years. They have been allocated. The Indian Affairs commitment was to terminate this year. Notwithstanding the fact that nothing is in the Estimates, I understand that my colleague will have some funds available for that particular program. He will announce them in due course.

Mr. Speaker: A single question from the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Off the top, I should like to congratulate her on her recent appointment to the cabinet.

There is a young man serving time in the Stony Mountain Penitentiary in Manitoba for murder, a murder which he claims he did not commit. This is a matter that goes back 20 years. He has served time for 20 years.

There is some new evidence suggesting that it was not possible for this young man to commit the murder. This evidence is supported by a forensic scientist at an institution at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver.

I understand that the Justice Department is investigating this case. When can we expect a report on this matter?

• (1200)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes.

The case is under investigation by the Department of Justice, as the hon. member has said. It is not ready for presentation to me, and when it is and I am in a position to make a decision, I will advise the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. I wonder if I could get the minister's attention. My question is this. What will the government of Canada do to protest the barbarous execution of Farzad Bazoft, the British journalist who was executed last night by the government of Iraq?

Mr. Speaker: This is a serious question and I am sure the government would want to respond. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond on behalf of the government and say that the sentiments on this side of the House correspond exactly with those expressed by the hon. member.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has publicly issued a statement regretting this barbarous act. We see it as no hallmark of any country that would purport to comport with other civilized countries of this world.

In the past year, 53 journalists have been killed in the line of duty. This indicates how high the risks are, and in this particular instance the Government of Canada has expressed its outrage over this very tragic development.

TRANSPORT

RESPONSE TO FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, further to the government's response to the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Transport, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, a proposed strategy concerning substance use in safety-sensitive positions in Canadian transportation.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to refer this document to the Standing Committee on Transport for consultation with interested parties. I would ask that the committee report back to this House within 90 days.

Mr. Karygiannis: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. My colleague wanted to respond and I just noticed that your eye was not on this side.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if I may respond to the hon. minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no response to tabling of documents.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the hon. minister is looking for unanimous consent of the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. minister asking for unanimous consent?

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, within the context of my remarks, I asked for unanimous consent to refer it to the Standing Committee on Transport, and my hon. friend may be wishing to respond to that request.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to respond?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, the Official Opposition gives its consent and expects the government to act with speed and sensitivity to the report of the Standing Committee on Transport when reported back to the House.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, there is unanimous consent on behalf of the New Democratic Party to have this report referred to the Standing Committee on Transport for a very thorough study.

1989 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

TABLING OF REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 26 of the Judges Act, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, the report and recommendations of the 1989 commission on judges' salaries and benefits.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See Today's Votes and Proceedings.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition to the House regarding an individual, a Canadian citizen, who has travelled overseas and was detained. I hope that the government will act very quickly to rectify this situation.

The petitioners have approached many members of this House about Mr. Leo's case. I hope a resolution will come about quickly because when Canadian citizens travel abroad we should be able to protect them.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Scarborough—Rouge River, I am delighted to present to the House a petition certified as correct under the standing orders in connection with the conviction and jailing of Mr. Columbus Leo in Taiwan as a result of a visit there.

Approximately 100 petitioners residing in my constituency and in surrounding constituencies ask the government to intervene and attempt to resolve the matter for Mr. Leo and bring him back to Canada.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a large number of petitions from many regions of Canada from Canadians who object to the clawback of old age security benefits contained in the legislation which is now before the Senate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, petitions from a variety of neighbourhoods in my riding.

A condominium corporation is represented here, a high rise apartment building which is rented primarily to seniors, and the full population of one entire street. I think that is representative of the proportion of Canadians who feel that they want Parliament to reject the goods and services tax. They are concerned about its impact on their spending powers. As consumers they are concerned about its impact on the economy of the country and the future of their families.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the signatures of several hundred people from my riding of Nepean and some from outside the riding.

They are all opposed to the imposition of the goods and services tax. They feel it will be injurious to the economy, create higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of hundreds of Canadian citizens of the municipality of Gloucester, the Carleton—Gloucester region, the City of Ottawa, and of several municipalities of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario as well as of the Northwest Territories who are opposed to the federal government's proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens of the city of Edmonton—probably constituents of yours, Mr. Speaker—who are concerned about the goods and services tax.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax and request a reform of the taxation system be put in place so that there would be an effective tax which would be fair to all Canadians.

• (1210)

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to present a petition signed by many residents in my constituency and the neighbouring constituency—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, they are residents of Rivière-du—Portage, Pont-Lafrance, Sheila, Leach, Pont-Landry, Shippegan and Caraquet who are strongly opposed to the goods and services tax. They urge the Conservative government to withdraw this tax which will have harmful consequences throughout Canada, particularly in the region of the Acadian peninsula.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present petitions on behalf of my constituents and many others across Canada, most of them seniors who are totally demoralized by the current government's approach to the goods and services tax. They oppose it completely and want something that is more simple, fair and workable.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from people of Ontario and Quebec who totally reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax.

They ask that the government ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the MST, that this new tax not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab upon the people of this country. They also ask the government to desist in its proposal to shift the tax burden to ordinary Canadians through this regressive consumption tax and attempt a real tax reform.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions from a series of communities across Canada including communities in that great constituency of Comox—Alberni.

The petitioners are calling on the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the tax system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. They note that neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives have presented an alternative to the goods and services tax.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and indeed a privilege to present four petitions from constituents in Sault Ste. Marie indicating that the government should scrap the tax. The petitioners are wondering about democracy in this country, when 80 per cent of the population is against such tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): I also have one belated petition that I am very happy to present, although it is too late. VIA Rail has already been gutted. They are adding insult to injury by trying to sell the excess cars back to Canadians taxpayers who will have to pay for them again.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and privilege to table hundreds of petitions containing thousands of signatures signed by seniors across Canada.

They protest the cutback in the old age security system engendered by the government's introduction of the clawback provision to the Income Tax Act. These senior citizens, the thousands and thousands who have signed these petitions from all across our country, are outraged that the government has chosen to tax away their pension rights to which they have contributed over the years.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the inequitable and unfair tax burden being placed on them to the exclusion of all other citizens as contained in the clawback provision to the Income Tax Act introduced by this mean-spirited government.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present petitions from hundreds of taxpayers across this country who are calling upon this government to reject the goods and services tax. They want reform of the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and on big corporations. They want to ensure that there is a broad public consensus of the sales tax measure to replace the MST, not to use this so-called reform as an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab on its citizens.

They call on this government to reject the goods and services tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Routine Proceedings

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 217 and 218.

[Text]

OSLO ENVIRONMENTAL REVIEW PANEL

Question No. 217—Mr. Caccia:

Is it the intention of the government (a) to include in the terms of reference of the OSLO Environmental Review Panel the impact of production from the OSLO oilsands on Canada's carbon dioxide balance (b) to withdraw its funding and support for the OSLO oilsands project if the Review Panel determines that such project would increase carbon dioxide pollution in Canada, using 1988 as a base year (c) to provide funding for intervenors in the Public Review and, if so (i) what amount (ii) in what manner will it be allocated?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): (a) The terms of the agreement with Alberta governing a joint federal/provincial review of this project have not yet been finalized but the intent is to permit the panel to examine all environmental impacts of the project.

(b) The federal government has announced its decision not to provide funding for this project other than for engineering studies.

(c) No.

COSTS INCURRED BY GOVERNMENT FOR TRAVEL TO/IN EL SALVADOR

Question No. 218—Mr. Blaikie:

In (a) the month of December, 1989 (b) the entire calendar year 1989, were any costs incurred by the government for (i) transportation (ii) accommodation (iii) meals and other expenses for government officials present in El Salvador and, if so, in total, what were they?

The Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The cost *(including transportation, accommodation, meals and other expenses) incurred by government officials present in El Salvador were:

a) $6,444.63 in December 1989

b) $54,352.55 in 1989

* Itemized costs not readily available

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 206 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 206 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Question No. 206—Mr. Saint-Julien:

In fiscal year (a) 1979–80 (b) 1980–81 (c) 1981–82 (d) 1982–83 (e) 1983–84, were fees paid to notaries and legal agents acting on behalf of the Federal Business Development Bank and, if so (i) what are the names of the recipients (ii) what were their dates of appointment (iii) what fees were paid to them?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Manley:

That this House condemn the government for its failure to support the National Research Council as Canada's premier research institution and its failure to promote basic scientific research in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member had six minutes remaining in her speech plus ten minutes for questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I shall continue. The NRC has substantially increased its revenues, from $12.5 million in 1984–85 to $22.1 million in 1989–90.

This increase in revenue reflects an increasingly widespread perception of the usefulness and value of the NRC's services and helps guarantee that NRC programs are relevant to the needs of its clients.

I think it is becoming increasingly attractive for NRC laboratories to be active in research consortiums and other research activities involving several partners.

Participation in several collaborative ventures as set forth in the federal policy on technology centres has helped the NRC to enhance its image and obtain substantial bonuses.

The NRC has also entered into a number of scientific and technological agreements with partners in universities, government and industry. Since 1985, it has signed 40 memoranda of agreement with other government departments and agencies, industrial associations and Canadian and foreign research agencies.

Furthermore, the NRC will be associated as a partner with 10 of the 14 networks of centres of excellence financed by this government, as I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Speaker, now that we are entering the 1990's, Canadian industry must be able to contribute to the latest technological developments and incorporate them in its products, if it is to remain competitive at the highest levels on international markets. We must act now. If we hesitate and are left behind by our competitors, we can kiss our very comfortable standard of living good-bye.

The federal government is committed to deploying all available resources to support this national priority, and the NRC is one of the most powerful and effective resources it has today. The key to success, however, is to refine the priorities of the NRC.

The NRC must play a critical role that very few other Canadian institutions would be able to play. It must serve as a catalyst in the development of profitable co-operation between all the players involved in research and development in this country, namely the provinces, the industrial corporations and the universities. It must provide a solid technological information and resource base. It must create job opportunities for young scientists, engineers and technicians and contribute to the training of a technically well-qualified labour force to meet the needs of all the sectors of our economy.

The NRC will continue to carry out world-class research as it has done in the past 75 years, well aware of the necessity to remain relevant and to satisfy the needs of the nation.

• (1220)

Such are the priorities which are being considered while the National Research Council is preparing its next long-term plan. This process aimed at defining the NRC's major development orientation over the next decade should be completed soon and will require consultation with the NRC's main customers and partners, as well as the users of its research abilities.

As the science minister mentioned in the House on many occasions, the National Research Council will continue to play a vital role in the future.

It is responsible for bringing together various research and development partners and for building some forms of co-operation conducive to a maximum utilization, an optimum use of Canada's research and development resources.

This is especially true of the long-term precompetitive-type research and development which the NRC is ideally suited to carry out and support. However, the NRC's whole range of activities may benefit from this approach.

The hon. members are well aware that the NRC is preparing a long-term plan which will define the strategies and initiatives which will give it the opportunity to assume this role, and the government is looking forward with great interest to reading it.

Mr. Speaker, the NRC can expect a brilliant future and an increasingly important role.

This opposition motion does not take sufficiently into account the NRC's current major achievements, and it overlooks very attractive opportunities which will be available in the future.

I, therefore, strongly urge the House to turn down this motion.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member that in listening to her speech I felt she made a brilliant case not for a cut-back in the National Research Council but for an enhancement of its budget. She talked about—

Mr. Beatty: You are even frightening the babies in the galleries.

Mr. Mills: Well, having four of my own, Mr. Minister, I did not mean to frighten the child.

It is precisely because of this child that we are here today. This government has lost its sense of vision.

My colleague said this morning that it was 1961 when John F. Kennedy said, "We are going to put a man on the moon". He was able to galvanize the will of Americans in science, educators and labour. Everybody pulled together.

This member has made that same case. This is one of the most powerful instruments which this national government has to galvanize this nation, galvanize it in a way that the productivity we need to be world class is there.

So my question to the hon. member who made such a brilliant case for the National Research Council is this. Why should we cut back on the funding of a national instrument that is so vital in terms of our ability to become world class competitors in science and technology?

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that I talked as though we were improving the budget for the National Research Council.

I must remind the hon. member that if he looks at the budget figures, he will see that, excluding everything to do with the Space Agency, the funds for the National Research Council have increased.

But it is true that the management of the National Research Council wants to make the NRC much more efficient, to deal with what must be done in the fields of research that must be emphasized in the coming years.

So when the hon. member seems to be referring to the fact that our government—You always seem to be saying that we do nothing, that we do not want to have a competitive country. I just started after my colleague's speech to explain what the government was doing and how it went about it and why it all fits into a total picture. It is not just one thing we are doing.

So I must tell the hon. member that I was just explaining everything we had set up, the science and technology policy throughout the country, so that all the provinces in Canada train students and skilled workers to meet the new requirements of high-tech industries, because more and more, industries will be modernized and need this kind of personnel. So I had got to telling you about what we are doing for universities and also for basic research. I was talking about the centres of excellence that will enable us, Mr. Speaker, to continue doing first-class research and basic research, by establishing networks and choosing niches to make Canada a world leader in this field.

Also, another member earlier suggested, when presenting petitions, that the GST was wrong. But behind this initiative, the GST proposal, there is of course the need to reduce the deficit. Since we have to pay interest on the debt to the tune of $39 billion a year, can you imagine what we could do for research or social programs if we did not have to pay that kind of money each year? This is really disturbing. Also, under the over all plan which calls for efforts to be made to turn Canada into a first-rate country with a competitive industry, it should be noted that by changing the tax from the 13.5 per cent levied on manufactured goods produced here in Canada, we will end up being competitive and have a chance—Canadians will have a chance to buy Canadian products, because they will be comparable to foreign imports.

There is also the involvement of universities. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not here earlier, or he would have known that all this is part of the plan. All our policies are developed and designed, to make our economy more flexible so people can adjust. We called upon industries and universities. We introduced matching funding under which industries now can use top-notch scientists that are doing research within universities. Matching funding has a two fold benefit because Students can now be trained to really meet the needs of industry.

We are also keeping high priority on large projects such as the Space Agency, the RADARSAT program, and our involvement in the space platform project.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as I answered briefly to the first question put by the hon. member, there has been no cuts to the NRC. The five year plan is being prepared, and this is something important for the future, Mr. Speaker. The Council is now reviewing all areas of research currently done in-house, Mr. Speaker, and they are looking at new avenues that could be extremely interesting.

• (1230)

[English]

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I am mystified by the parliamentary secretary's statement that there have not been cuts. From 1984-85, when this government came into office, the budget has been reduced for the NRC from $505 million down to, in the coming fiscal year, $433 million, with the space agency included. So there has been an absolute reduction.

The parliamentary secretary has made a very good case, as my colleague said, for the National Research Council. Having made that case, does she and the government agree with the views of the president of the National Research Council that the NRC should limit its involvement in basic research to that required to maintain a minimal scientific insurance policy for the nation? And does she agree that the NRC should pursue a policy of privatization and divestiture as indicated by the president of the NRC?

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my honorable colleague for asking that question. I must point out to him that it is not the intent of this government to have the National Research Council of Canada privatize its staff. In our view, it is important to keep a strong National Research Council really responsive to the needs and expectations of Canadian scientists and industries, and that is one of our priorities.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the NDP to support the motion made by the member for Ottawa South. We also would like to join in condemning the government for the lack of support it has had for the National Research Council and also for research in general in Canada.

I was interested in listening to the comments of the parliamentary Secretary. The government always argues the deficit by saying that if it was not for a $30 billion deficit we would be doing so much more government research. I suspect that the deficit is simply an excuse to cover the government's ideological direction that it prefer that research be done in the private sector and that the government do no research at all. That is a completely ridiculous point.

It is interesting that the parliamentary secretary always justifies funding cuts as a method of increasing efficiency. When you cut funding to research or the National Research Council, you do not increase efficiency, you inhibit the council to do what it was set out to do in the first place and that is to conduct pure research that may not be a part of the system of priorities of the private sector in the country.

We have all read the statistics that indicate that Canada has one of the poorest records of the industrialized countries in terms of its support for research and development. A recent issue of Science Statistics that points out that the federal government's contribution to research and development in the country continues to decline, both as a performer, 17 per cent of total research and development, and as a funder, 31 per cent.

Even when the government was still talking about nuclear submarines and not deficits, it was still in the process of cutting support to research and development, both in terms of the amount of research it did and in terms of the amount of money they made available to it. So Canada has a poor record since 1984 with respect to its contribution to research and development in spite of the promises made over the years both by the Prime Minister and by other ministers in the cabinet.

We spend 1.23 per cent of our gross national product on research and development. That is half of what Japan spends and half of what countries like Sweden spend. I think it is reflected in the way our industry and economy are organized in this country.

In terms of employment in research and development we rank eleventh among the industrialized countries, that is in terms of employment in universities as well.

University research is an important part of the research and development capability of this country, part of it in connection with the National Research Council and part in connection with private industry through discovery parks, centres of excellence and all those things that have been set up. Centres of excellence have been set up over recent years by Conservative governments.

Yet the same government that talks about its priorities with respect to research and what it would do if it could only cut the deficit has, over the years, cut EPF funding to the provinces which in part goes to funding university research.

David Suzuki made an interesting statement a few years ago about how the employment of scientists is allocated in Canada. He pointed out that 99 per cent of the scientists who are working in Canada are working in undemocratic institutions. They are working either for the military or for corporations where decisions are made on the basis of one dollar, one vote.

That was an interesting comment because when that happens it means that the research is not directed by the needs of the people of this country but by the needs and priorities of undemocratic institutions. We are trying to improve and maintain the funding of the National Research Council which represents the resource priorities of the people of Canada and, therefore, we consider this an extremely important organization.

The National Research Council has some important facilities, some of them based here in Ottawa. It has wind tunnels that are used by private and public organizations around the country. For example, Toronto City Hall was designed with the assistance of the wind tunnel here owned by the National Research Council.

The wave pool facilities that are located here in Ottawa are used to develop ports on every coast of Canada. In fact, they were used as part of the investigation to determine what happened to the Ocean Ranger when that oil drilling rig capsized off the east coast of Canada. It was National Research Council facilities that were used to find out why that happened and in fact it was National Research Council scientists who were able to find out exactly what the problem was.

So the NRC has provided great scientific service to Canada over the years. By cutting back the funding to the National Research Council, the Tories in this country are doing a great disservice to Canadians.

It is easier to understand this ideologically because the Conservatives essentially believe that research and development should be done by the private sector. However, there are a few horror stories that show that this should not always be the case, that there should always be the ability on the part of government, on the part of the representatives of the people, either to do pure research on behalf of the people or to audit the research that is done by private organizations.

One of the classic examples of this is the Industrial Biotest Laboratories scandal in the United States. This happened in the 1970s, so many people might not remember. IBT Labs were a subsidiary of a chemical company and at that time the Environmental Protection Agency of the United States, under a similar kind of privatization ideology to that enjoyed by this government, decided that they would not use government labs to test pesticides. Those chemical companies which were applying for the registration of pesticides would have private labs do the examinations, toxicology studies and all the other studies that were necessary in order to justify the registration of those pesticides through the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States.

It was found out, after an examination by the office of management and budget in the United States, that 737 tests done by IBT Labs in the United States were faked in order to get those chemicals registered as pesticides in the United States. Over 200 pesticide chemicals were involved and, as a result, the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada were forced to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in order to go through all of IBT's scandalous pseudo tests to find out which ones were accurate and which ones had been faked. They then had to go through the process of deregistering pesticides that they found out were teratogenic, that is they led to monstrous birth defects, or carcinogenic, that caused cancer, which information had been suppressed by IBT Labs in the United States.

Canadians and people in the United States who believe in the so-called values of privatization must understand, from that example, that as a result of what IBT did in the United States, as a result of the scandalous suppression of information in those toxicology tests, hundreds of Canadians today may be dying of cancer or giving birth to children with monstrous birth defects.

In spite of the information gained and the lessons we should have learned from IBT, the fact is that, for example, the Government of British Columbia has just privatized its environmental lab and now people in British Columbia are complaining about the very low quality of environmental research and environmental testing that is being done in British Columbia. It is actually inhibiting the clean-up and the enhancement of our environment on the west coast and creating serious problems for people in the fishing industry and people who depend on fresh water supplies and also on the life-sustaining capabilities of the marine environment on the west coast.

I have some serious concerns about the ideological propensity of the Tory government to cut back on research in order to encourage research being done in the private sector because that research tends to be of lower quality and also tends to be more self-serving and in some cases, as in the IBT example, is extremely suspect.

I had a case in my riding which does not relate directly to scientific research but which relates to public funding of applied research that can have an impact on how Canadians are served by the scientific community. In the Toronto Children's Hospital we had a doctor whose name, I think, was Ian MacDonald. He became an expert in reconstructing the craniums and faces of children who were born with extremely distorted faces. Those kids were often abused by the other kids at school. They were rejected by their parents. They ended up living short, unhappy, terrible lives.

Dr. MacDonald was able to put together a team at Toronto Children's Hospital which developed surgical techniques and treatment techniques. As a result of the public support given by Toronto Children's Hospital, he was able to put together one of the best teams on the globe for cranial facial research and reassembling the facial bones of these children so that they could look like normal human beings, enjoy life and relationships with other children and become fine, positive, contributing citizens of Canada.

However, the Humana Hospital in Dallas—Forth Worth found that it could give more money to this type of research than Toronto or than the province of Ontario was willing to give. As a result, they were able to take Dr. MacDonald and his team of cranial facial specialists down to Humana Hospital in Dallas—Fort Worth and set up what they call the International Cranial Facial Institute, which is now the premier institution in the world for doing this kind of research and for providing treatment to children.

The worst thing about that is that now Canadian children are being sent to Texas to get this type of treatment and Canadian doctors are going there to become involved in this kind of research because Canada, as a result of its foolish priorities or its lack of priorities in this area, neglected to provide the necessary funding.

We also tend to believe that research is going to be done in universities but, as I mentioned before, the current cuts in transfer programs to the provinces is going to result in a cut in funding to research. In my discussions with presidents, deans and department heads in universities over the last four or five years I have heard that there has been a massive outflow of quality scientists from Canadian universities to the United States and to other areas where there is a priority for investment in this kind of research. The priority for the investment seems to be lost in Canada. That loss of priority is reflected in the funding cuts to the National Research Council and the lack of priority that this government seems to allocate to research and development in this country.

The parliamentary secretary was talking about the problem of the deficit, saying that we have to take money from scientific research in order to deal with the deficit and that when the deficit is no longer a problem we will come back and fund scientific research. By that time it is going to be too late. The reputation of our research institutions will have suffered. The ability of our research institutions to recruit people will have suffered and the respect that scientists around the world have for research institutions will have suffered as well.

As a result, Canada will be spending millions upon millions of dollars more than if the government had maintained those facilities and the funding and kept the scientists rather than doing the silly thing that it is doing now, which is transferring money from pure scientific research to paying off the deficit.

There are other things that can be cut and we pointed out in previous speeches in the budget debate exactly where those cuts could take place without seriously harming science and our economy. These kinds of cuts do disastrous damage to our economy and disastrous damage to our scientific establishment.

We congratulate the Liberal member for Ottawa South for bringing up this resolution in the House.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, my honorable colleague raised quite a few points. The government continues to favour also research done in laboratories, in universities and elsewhere.

[English]

The greatest problem is transferring out the knowledge gained to the industry where it will do the most good and increase productivity.

[Translation]

That is the primary role the National Research Council has been playing for some time in basic research within the context of its long–term applied research based approach which may have general applications in the industry and in governmental programs. The universities also play a very important role in basic research, and the government suports such activity through granting councils and centre of excellence network programs.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, not only will basic research be maintained at the National Research Council, but it will be intensified through co–operation with the academic sector and other research agencies.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think the parliamentary secretary was just rereading sections of her speech, so there is really no point in responding to that.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I took some exception to the definition of undemocratic institutions, referring to our Armed Forces. I do not know if the hon. member is suggesting that we vote every time a colonel or captain makes a decision.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, the member talked about the issue of research and development and the cuts to the NRC. I would suggest that in general terms there is a lack of understanding of what is happening out there.

In my view there is no national standard to deal with the issue of education in the first place that can address and redirect our student population to the proper fields. For example, we have here in Canada 20 times more lawyers per capita than they have in Japan, while in Japan they have 10 times more engineers per capita in society as a whole. In the House of Commons we have approximately 56 to 60 lawyers. In comparison, we have about three engineers. If you consider those figures you have a pretty good idea of what is happening.

There is a lack of understanding and, in fact, a lack of commitment to the issue of education. The fact that the drop-out rate in our post-secondary institutions is approximately 30 per cent should tell us something.

• (1250)

In my view, the whole issue of research and development has to start at the very bottom end of the scale, that is, at the primary school level. We have to start encouraging more students to go into the research and development field, the science field and so on, and start building from the bottom up.

Condemning the government is the least we can do at this point in time.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, what I referred to as undemocratic institutions are institutions that could fire a scientist who discovers something that the institution did not want him to discover. That is what happens in the case of the military. I think we have seen many examples of it both in Canada and in the United States.

I support 100 per cent what the member says about starting at the bottom end, I just do not agree that that is the bottom end. If we want to produce a good crop of scientists, the top end is the elementary schools. Instead of having a 27 per cent drop-out rate, we should be contributing the funding that is necessary to produce a good school system in this country so that we are turning out top quality scientists.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the mussel poisonings in December 1987 threw the country into a public health safety crisis. In a matter of days, the health culprit was apprehended. Canadian researchers and scientists identified domoic acid as the responsible toxin.

The identification of this toxin was an historic achievement, an historic scientific breakthrough, thanks to the Atlantic Research Laboratory of the National Research Council.

Many more achievements have been made by this council, and many more will be made, but only if we continue to provide adequate funding. Complacency has no place if scientific breakthroughs are to continue.

That is why the topic we are debating today is such an extremely important one. I therefore support and congratulate my hon. colleague, the member for Ottawa South, for his motion:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to support the National Research Council as Canada's premier research institution and its failure to promote basic scientific research in Canada.

This is extremely important because science and technology will play a vital role in determining the future prosperity of all Canadians.

The NRC was formed in 1916 as the honorary advisory council for scientific and industrial research and in 1928 the national laboratory was founded. Between 1939 and 1952 reorganization was done to provide a strong foundation in basic science. The principle was established that the extramural budgets of the National Research Council should increase to match the intramural budget.

The NRC is the government's principal scientific research arm, the internationally renowned seedbed of Canada's two Nobel prizes. It has been a source of technological development, not only for Canadians but for citizens of the world.

I would like at this juncture to briefly indicate some of the achievements in order for Canadians to know what the National Research Council has done. Dr. Luc Piché, a scientist at the NRC's Industrial Materials Research Institute, was chosen by the American magazine Research and Development, for an award for developing one of the 100 most significant technical developments of 1987. He developed a technique to measure the density of polyethylene using ultrasound technology. This technology provides a valuable tool for both quality and process control, giving the polyethylene manufacturing industry a competitive edge in the international market.

NRC scientists in Montreal developed a biosensor, as another example, which accurately measures the freshness of meat or fish. This product will have an important impact on the food processing industry because it reduces what was formerly an hours–long process to a mere five minutes.

The NRC's division of physics developed a fibre optic system that was used in the world's first open heart surgery to remove plaque from the coronary arteries. Further refinement of his technique, which uses an ultraviolet laser beam to cut away the plaque blocking the blood vessels of the heart, would "ultimately eliminate the need for major open heart surgery", the National Research Council reports.

The public security program of the NRC has developed a system that tracks patients quickly and easily through miniature transmitters inserted in their identification bracelets. This is very useful in keeping track of elderly patients in chronic care hospitals and nursing homes who tend to wander away. These are already being used in Canada and are now being marketed world–wide.

Also, Porter Dillon Ltd. of Nova Scotia has designed Canada's first full–scale biomass reactor for the treatment of municipal wastes. These reactors effectively treat waste and recover energy while offering minimal impact on the environment.

Today, industry in Canada is spread out across the country and the country needs an agent to bring research and development resources together; industry, universities, and government. The NRC is supposed to be this agent. It is ironic that the government expects the NRC to play this vital role at a time when this government is ruthlessly and continuously cutting its budget.

In 1984, $60 million was cut from the NRC budget. In 1986, an additional $29 million and 250 jobs were lost. In the next fiscal year another $30 million will be cut. Hence, programs and personnel will be cut, staff morale will be diminished and benefits to Canadians today and tomorrow will be lost. Many more programs are going to be phased out.

The government has dealt some fearsome blows to the NRC. Scientists wondered in the past, as they are wondering today, if the NRC will survive at all.

In the time remaining I would like to speak about basic research which is very important in the establishment of the NRC, which now has been shifting its focus to helping industry. It appears that basic research is being neglected by the government.

On Tuesday, March 13, The Ottawa Citizen and Montreal Gazette and other major newspapers carried the news of the cuts to NRC staffing and basic research. It required the courage of the NRC President, Mr. Pierre Perron, to release his letter of January 5 addressed to the Science Council of Canada. I quote: "NRC plans to limit its involvement in basic research—to that required to maintain a minimal insurance policy for the nation." The Research Council's next five–year plan "will propose a clear policy statement and a strategy on privatization and divestiture."

It appears that basic research is being neglected by this government and I challenge government not to do that. It is most crucial that we continue to encourage our creative scientists, provide them with the environment and milieu conducive for them to continue their work and, at the same time, continue to have a decent family life.

• (1300)

The Canadian Association of University Teachers appeared before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology just yesterday. In its submission the association indicated to the committee its concerns about the plight of basic research in the country.

I ask the government to reconsider its plans and to strengthen rather than dismantle the NRC, if we are to ensure the continued scientific breakthroughs that I have alluded to earlier, thereby ensuring prosperity for all Canadians and for all citizens of the world.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on the important issue of government initiatives in research and testing facilities, I would like to give the member an example of what was in place in British Columbia. It involved basic environmental testing facilities which were equipped with scientists in government owned labs. It was their responsibility to test the impact of various operations on the environment.

The Government of British Columbia decided the best course of action, following on the Conservative model, was to sell off those labs or close them and get rid of them. What we have now is a situation in which private contractors who work for the companies in normal situations are the same people who are hired by the government on a private basis to produce environmental impact studies for the government and for the people of that province.

Thus perhaps the most severe conflict that one could imagine is taking place. There is a real distortion of the needs of people because of the government's very short-sighted privatization fixation, if you will, and because of the tremendous conflict of interest that is now in place.

We see the same kind of model at work here with the NRC and with the effects of the government selling off its assets, proposing to privatize those labs, giving them away for a song to private industry which will use them in a very narrow capacity. Also, public confidence is being broken in terms of the testing process. That data not only has to be produced so that people can make informed decisions about the kind of industrial and development activity that takes place. They must also have credibility. The data must come forward with credibility because of the objectivity of the group involved.

In British Columbia we have one of the worst examples of a conflict of interest and a lack of credibility in the data if it is produced that one can imagine. We are developing the same thing here through Conservative initiatives at the NRC. Would the member like to comment on that?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I certainly concur with my hon. colleague as to the importance of proceeding with research that would assure that the environment is protected. As we protect the environment today, we are protecting the future of our children.

What I detect from the hon. member's question is the need for academic freedom for researchers to be able to pursue their research without fear of the politicians, without fear of the uncertainty that funding will not be there next year.

I also detect in the hon. member's question the need for the independence of the National Research Council, for it to be able to propose bold initiatives in the area of the environment without being deflected by the government of the day in terms of its political agenda.

I think it is most crucial that if basic research is to continue we have to encourage our universities, our scientists and science teachers to go on with their duties, obligations and mission unfettered, unhindered and unafraid of the uncertainty of political actions.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in participating in this debate on the question of the National Research Council and basic research at the National Research Council, it is important to try to put the debate into some kind of perspective to allow Canadians to determine the significance of the prospect of cutting basic research at the NRC. I propose to do so in the following manner, Mr. Speaker.

It is no secret that in today's world, human resources, research and development, and knowledge generally speaking have become critical factors in international competition. It is also no secret that Canada's economic prosperity is still largely based on the exploitation of natural resources.

Several weeks ago representatives from the Canadian Advanced Technology Association appeared before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology and reminded us once again that Canada depends largely on natural resources for our economic prosperity. They showed us figures pertaining to Canada's balance of trade in manufactured products. We have a large surplus—I think it amounts to $17 billion or $18 billion—in exports of resource related products. However we have large deficits in technological products, in low technology products, in medium technology products and in high technology products.

The reasons for this situation are profound and deep-seated. I would like to run through a number of them.

First, it is well known that Canada invests only half as much as our major competitors in research and development.

Second, we have fewer than one-half the number of scientists and engineers in our workforce than the average of the industrialized countries.

Third, we have a low prevalence of industrial research and development. Indeed, only about 2 per cent to 3 per cent of firms which depend on technology for their futures actually do any R and D. The officers and senior management of many Canadian companies have no scientific background and lack familiarity with what science and technology can do for their companies.

Fourth, science education in Canadian schools is poor and Canadian students do poorly in international competitions.

Finally, rather than providing adequate vocational training for Canadian workers, we have a history of importing skilled workers.

In order to remedy this situation we require a strategy that is far-reaching and comprehensive. There have been suggestions over the past five or six years that what is required is a cultural change. We have to make the transition from a resource based culture to an R and D culture, a culture which values education and learning.

Obviously a cultural transition is something which cannot be accomplished overnight, but the depth of the transition that is required should not be an excuse for inaction. What is required is a quantum leap in the attitudes and actions of Canadians. It is not sufficient to tinker around with programs and departments. Certainly at the very least we should not be interfering with that which is working well.

• (1310)

This brings me to the NRC. Government labs such as the NRC have been a sector in which for many decades Canadian investment in R and D has compared favourably with that of other countries. I want to stress "compared favourably". Government performance of R and D in Canada is about equal to that which is done in other countries. It is not excessive.

If it is proportionately higher to industry than it is in other countries, it is not because government is doing too much but because Canadian industry is doing too little. We do not get industry to do more by cutting government R and D, by cutting one of the few areas where we hold our own by international standards.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the Conservative government first came to power, government laboratories have been threatened by hasty and circumstantial analyses, budget cuts, uncertainty and red tape. The government now wants to reduce the National Research Council's involvement in basic research.

Mr. Speaker, this shows how deeply ignorant it is of the importance of basic research and of the National Research Council's mandate.

First of all, we know that basic research often leads to unexpected results and, to illustrate this, I would like to quote Professor John Polanyi, Canadian Nobel Prize winner:

> Since technology needs science, there is a temptation to ask scientists to justify their projects by taking into account the value of resulting technology. By always looking for short-term benefits, we are dismissing scientific efforts— whose purpose is to answer fundamental questions and then to suggest totally new applications.

Mr. Speaker, when we stop doing basic research, we deny ourselves these new unexpected applications Professor Polanyi was referring to. And the situation is even more dramatic today because the time between a new discovery and its commercial applications is getting shorter.

Basic research is therefore essential if we want to keep up with the latest technological developments.

Mr. Speaker, the mandate of the National Research Council has always been to foster industrial research. This has always been an integral part of its programs. A good example would be the Industrial Research Assistance Program, IRAP for short. It happens to be one of the most important programs of the National Research Council and accounts for a major slice of the NRC budget.

A 1983 study revealed that a government investment of only $150 million produced an economic fallout in excess of $2 billion. In other words the companies that took part in this program reported sales of about $2 billion on an investment of only $150 million.

I might add that a Conservative government survey revealed that IRAP is the most popular government program in the private sector. Why would this program be so popular, Mr. Speaker? Why such a huge economic fallout? It is because this program is closely linked to the NRC's laboratories, because we could count on the scientists to evaluate a project and determine whether it was feasible or not.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my comments today by saying that. I hope I have been able to show you how critical it is to maintain basic research and, indeed, the absolutely fundamental need to pursue our basic research efforts so that we can benefit from significant industrial activity.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I would like to assure my honorable colleague who has a great concern for everything regarding science and technology that this government fully recognizes the importance of basic research. It is recognized, however, whether it is performed at the National Research Council or in universities and it is recognized as a national insurance designed to help us deal with social needs and also national needs to ensure national competitiveness.

I would like to give the honorable member some figures, for the sake of comparison, on what other countries spend on basic research. In Canada, 14 per cent of the science and technology budgets go to basic research. In France, it is 15 per cent; in Germany, 12 per cent; in Japan, 7 per cent and, in the United States, 4 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I think, therefore, that the Government of Canada is doing its share to promote basic scientific research. But I wish to repeat to the hon. member that it is not because in 1985 National Research Council officials were asked to submit a five-year plan, as is the case now, that they will run out of funds this year and they will have to submit another one for the next five years—it does not mean because the five-year plan is being submitted, that basic scientific research will stop. This is a government which looks to the future and knows where it is going and which has its priorities well in hand.

For the information of my hon. friend, I must emphasize that the funding to the IRAP Program was not cut. In fact, the budget states that NRC's grants and contributions will not change from the previous level. It is therefore possible that some components of the IRAP Program might be governed by new policies and practices which will make assistance to businesses dependent upon conditions more consistent with those of the commercial sector.

Furthermore, I wish to advise him that the President of Treasury Board will soon develop guidelines for the implementation of this policy and will make the announcement. Just the same, the decision will not affect the applications received before February 19 which are already in the system.

The government recognizes that the IRAP is the most successful program when it comes to helping the industry and it is committed to it.

Again I will tell my hon. friend that basic scientific research is very important to the Government of Canada.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary in a way strengthened my argument. She compared the level of basic research done in Canada, in our universities and in the NRC, to that in France, Japan and the United States, but apparently she forgot that the bottom line is that Canada is only doing half what those other countries are doing. We are falling far behind them in research and development and our weaknesses are unbelievable.

• (1320)

Therefore, instead of reciting all the items in her strategy and quoting all kinds of statistics, I would simply like her to reply to a very simple question.

Her Leader, the Prime Minister, stated before he was first elected that he would increase twofold the Canadian research and development effort during his first term. As we know, the opposite happened. Canadian research and development expenditures have plummeted since the government was elected. Therefore, what specific action does this government intend to take to increase Canadian research to the level of other countries?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I cannot allow that question right now.

When we get into 10-minute speeches and 5 minutes for questions and comments, and when there are long comments lasting two, three or four minutes, I cannot get in any more than one questioner and one rebuttal.

The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Calgary Southwest on debate.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today. I notice that the motion put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa South condemns the government for failure to support the National Research Council, which simply is not true.

I want to make it perfectly clear that no new cuts have been imposed upon the NRC. What the opposition is talking about relates to adjustments due to the creation of the Canadian Space Agency. In fact, the NRC budget without space program funds was $400 million in the last Main Estimates. It is $402 million in the upcoming fiscal year. There are no new cuts imposed upon the NRC.

The projected personnel reductions are as a result of previously announced restraint measures, something which the NRC has known about for several years. In fact, if I recall correctly, it was 1986 when that was announced.

The NRC has tabled some new and exciting programs and initiatives that it is going to undertake in its long range, five-year plan. All research programs change and evolve with time. Some research programs reach maturity; others develop in directions that are actually outside the mandate of the NRC; and others may shrink to a sort of sub-critical size or be phased out as resources at the NRC are reallocated and new initiatives are developed. It is very important that we constantly be aware of the new initiatives.

The NRC is committed to basic research. I notice that the parliamentary secretary gave some interesting statistics. I just want to repeat that out of the total amount of funding that this government puts into R and D, 14 per cent of it goes to basic research. As the parliamentary secretary just said, France is the only other industrialized country that is ahead of that, and only by 1 per cent. I would say that some of us here might recognize that France has a socialist type of government, so 14 per cent is nothing to be ashamed of. Look at Germany with 12 per cent, Japan with 7 per cent, and the U.S. with 4 per cent. This government is committed to supporting basic research.

Canada today, like other industrialized nations, is facing scientific and technical changes. The NRC remains as committed today as it always has been to excellence. It is committed to remaining an organization where world-class research is performed by world-class scientists and engineers in world-class facilities. This means choosing carefully the areas where we intend to be excellent so as not to spread ourselves too thinly with the resources that we have available. I believe that even with new resources we would be obligated to review every activity that takes place with a critical eye to guarantee scientific merits and to ascertain the relevance of Canada's needs in terms of what is needed out there today. Whether the NRC is the best place to do basic research or whether it is best done in the universities, everybody has to be reviewing constantly what is in the best needs of Canada.

Excellence is essential for all our programs, but excellence alone is not enough. Our research must also be relevant and mesh well with other NRC activities. One of the best ways for NRC to choose priorities and increase the impact of limited resources is through increased collaboration and increased communication with its clients, with government officials in the departments such as our new Department of Industry, Science and Technology. Let us just state here that this department has received world acclaim and we have a minister for science.

This government recognizes that if we are to be competitive in this global trading world this country must improve its science and technology, which is just the way we are going.

The federal government has played a leadership role in developing Canada's competitiveness by investing heavily in the S and T area. The support the federal government gives to research and development is significant and compares favourably to public sector non-defence spending of its major international competitors.

In 1989 over $5 billion was spent by the federal government. Since 1984 more than $2.5 billion in new moneys has been spent on federal science and technology, and the $5 billion figure is for direct funding only.

In addition, the federal government indirectly funds university research and development through Established Programs Financing transfers and industry, research and development through a system of research and development tax incentives.

The achievements and initiatives resulting from federal support of basic research are truly significant. There are many examples such as the funding to the tune of $7 million for the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research with its unique capacities to form networks of co-operation in such fields as robotics and biotechnology. There has been the selection of 14 networks in the $240 million networks of Centres of Excellence Program which links industrial, university and government scientific research in engineering, natural and medical sciences, manufacturing, business, resource and high technology sectors all across the country. Each network involves from 5 to 25 institutions and companies.

It is interesting to note here, Mr. Speaker, because I know you will be very much aware of this, that out of the 14 centres the University of Calgary was affiliated with 7 of them. I believe your university, the University of Alberta situated in Edmonton, was affiliated with 8 of the 14 centres.

There is also the Canada Scholarships Program which has a budget of $80 million. It awards 2,500 scholarships annually to recognize and encourage more of our top students to pursue undergraduate studies in natural sciences and engineering. Academic excellence is the basis for selection with a minimum of one-half of the scholarships being presented to outstanding women.

I have just completed 10 letters to people in my constituency who won these scholarships this year. I think that shows right across Canada how much we appreciate and how much we are trying to inspire young people to get into the roles of engineering and science. It certainly is the future of this country.

• (1330)

I do recognize that there is always a need for more funding. However, I also recognize the new five-year plan coming from NRC, where it is studying each particular area, and looking at new areas. If Canada is to keep up, we must not become stagnant but we must always be aggressive enough to see what is out there and what we must grasp hold of.

Basic and applied research is important. As chairman of the Standing Committee of Industry, Science and Technology, we had about about 15-17 witnesses before us. They all stated that it is not the money—money is very important—but it is rather how the money is managed. We must learn how we are best able to interest and stimulate our industries here in Canada to take on research and development themselves and how to stimulate youngsters to study science and engineering. It goes right to the elementary and secondary level of school education. It is a major problem. I know that level of education falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Perhaps it is time to have a debate on whether the federal government should suggest some sort of a standard of education, but we will leave that for another day. There is no doubt that I support stimulating all young people to get involved in science and technology.

In conclusion, this government gives total support to S and T, to R and D and we look forward to Dr. Perron's five-year plan from the NRC and we look forward to supporting the NRC as best as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to answer the conservative member for Calgary-South-west.

[English]

I heard her huffing and puffing about all the good things that the government has been doing. Before asking her the question, I would like to make a comment about the National Research Council, which is located in my riding of Carleton—Gloucester and where most of the employees reside.

The cut-backs to the National Research Council in November, 1984, when the present government came into power, cut the NRC budget by $60 million. They cut the Energy Division, the Environment Secretariat, the Manufacturing Technology Institute, The Institute for Electro-Chemistry, and the Cold Regions Research Institute amounting to 80 lay-offs.

In October, 1986 there was a $29 million cut to the NRC budget. Among the cuts were the photochemistry and kinetics section where Nobel Prize winner John Polyani began his research. The government also cut the electromagnetic and mechanical engineering programs, environmental toxicology programs, and aeronautics, construction and physics programs and 200 more jobs were eliminated.

In February of this year the new president, Pierre Perron, in a confidential memo wrote:

> NRC intends to limit its involvement in basic research—to that required to maintain a minimal scientific insurance policy—
> The next five-year plan for NRC will propose a clear policy statement and a strategy on privatization and divestiture.

Third, he planned reductions in permanent employees at the NRC. There have been more cuts since 1984. The $500 million budget was cut to $400 million in 1990. This is a 20 per cent cut in 1984 dollars.

I would ask the member the following question. How will these budgetary cuts and the new NRC President's objectives enhance the role and the place of the NRC in a world-class research community?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester for his remarks and questions. First, I believe that the statement that the NRC was limiting its basic research came from some external advisers. The hon. member knows perfectly well that in any sound business, and indeed any government agency, work does not continue on and on without reviewing, exploring, and having an in-depth study of the programs and mandate. Perhaps these were external researchers who were getting this type of information.

I can assure you that Dr. Perron, the president of the NRC, states that the commitment of the NRC is to basic research in priority areas. They are not going to change that mandate. Their priority areas include legally mandated areas such as astronomy, standards in measurements research, as well as the basic research needed to maintain skills in generic research programs. This has been NRC's fundamental role in basic research for some time as it focuses upon long term applied research with broad applications to industry and government programs.

Universities play an important role in basic research and the government is supporting this activity through the granting councils and the Centres of Excellence program. We have the Medical Granting Council as well as NSRC. There are three major ones. They do tremendous work. You do not put all your funding into one area. Regardless, basic research at the NRC will not only be maintained but it will be strengthened, as I said earlier in my speech, by collaboration with other performers in universities and research organizations.

The NRC, in fact, as a collaborator in 10 of the 14 chosen networks surely shows its importance and why those new centres will come forth and bring benefits to this country, not just tomorrow, but long term benefits.

The hon. member did question me on privatization and divestiture. I thought that I heard the parliamentary secretary state that our National Research Council will not be privatized. The NRC internal working memo refers to privatization and divestiture and it clearly states the NRC is going to encourage private consortia to assist in its operations and its facilities, but it will not be privatizing.

It is time that we became involved in partnerships. We cannot remain stagnant. It is very important to realize that just because money has been spent in one area for the past five or ten years, there are certainly no criteria or guidelines to suggest that the money should continue to be spent in that way.

Dr. Perron and the NRC's five-year program will show us the direction of Canada and why we have to become more competitive, and why research and development is so important, not just for the federal and provincial governments, but for universities and private industries.

It was interesting yesterday at the standing committee meeting. Dr. May from NSERC appeared before us and explained the good things that NSERC is doing and how their budget has been maintained, and indeed increased. This is an excellent way for our government to ensure that engineering science research is carried on at the universities.

We also had before us the Canadian Association of University Teachers. They are very worried about the falling enrolment at universities, and also the quality and level of education of students coming into universities. That gets back to my concluding statement that although elementary and secondary education falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces, somehow—and I do not have the magic answer—we have to stimulate young people to be interested, to be inquisitive and to want to grasp the sciences and to go into engineering and to our science portfolios.

I appreciate the hon. member's questions. I can assure him that we are not privatizing the NRC, and that we are not limiting our basic research. It is very important and it will continue to be important.

• (1340)

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, when I was 18 and just leaving high school, the very first job I applied for was at the National Research Council. I had no idea then that I would be standing here all these years later fighting a battle to preserve that institution. One of the proudest moments of my life was when I was accepted for a job in hot and cold state physics at the National Research Council.

I had grown up with the view of this institution epitomizing Canada's excellence in fields of research that were not happening anywhere else in the world, epitomizing our progress and adventurous spirit and our high stature, despite the fact that we were such a small country.

Things changed that summer, and I ended up going back to university and eventually making other decisions about the course of my life. Otherwise, I might have been sitting in the gallery today wondering what my fate was going to be instead of standing here defending those people who have made this country great and created our reputation internationally and continue to do so, despite the hammering that they have received at the hands of this government.

I want to talk about the people. The new frontiers of human endeavour are no longer the frontiers of geography, distance and climate. They are the frontiers of the human mind. We only conquer those frontiers and go beyond them with people of courage, commitment and dedication who are prepared to work for years and sometimes for decades with no specific results, except the pursuit of a new idea that eventually will lead somewhere. I will come back to that theme. I want to talk a little more about how the people who have done this for the country are being treated.

Aside from the cut-backs, aside from the people who are leaving—and they are now in the hundreds—the people who have been forced, coerced or cajoled into leaving are lost to us as a nation, not just to the National Research Council. As a nation these people are lost to us. The whole atmosphere has been demoralizing.

Mr. Perron writes one thing, and then he sends an internal memo to employees which states something else. On the one hand, he reaffirms to the employees the commitment to excellence and basic research. On the other hand, in another document he states: "We will be trimming our basic research to the bare minimum necessary for a minimal insurance policy", whatever the heck that means.

He talks about planned partnerships and working with others in his memo to the employees, and then in another memo talks about planned partnerships as the driving force behind the National Research Council. Planned partnerships are not a driving force, they are not an objective or a mission for an organization. They are tools to accomplish certain things. But to say something like that is to be the driving force is absolutely ridiculous.

It is no wonder people are demoralized, wondering where their life's work is going and wondering where there careers are going. They are being treated inhumanely as employees. There is an unofficial attrition program at the National Research Council that is far more vicious than many of the formal ones taking place in the public service. People are unprotected. They are obviously being hushed up when they retire early. We have statements and numerous clippings over the last three years which indicate that people are not free to comment. Why are we buying off people? People who have dedicated their lives to this country deserve decent treatment when they leave.

The most important thing is that scientists are being prevented from speaking out about what they and they alone know. What is wrong with free and open examination in the media of the implications of the actions of the government in cutting millions of dollars from the budget of the prime institution of basic research in this country?

There was a memorandum sent to the employees of the National Research Council which stated:

> In the current climate, it is preferable to limit the number of people speaking on behalf of NRC.

Contrary to the policy that scientists are free to speak out on their areas of expertise, the memo states: "If a reporter calls you, please do not answer", instead call the head of the communications section. That is stifling and gagging people. The very people who should be front and centre in the debate about the future of the National Research Council, because it is fundamental to the future of science in this country, are being told they cannot speak out.

Good research is done by teams of people. These teams take time to assemble. They can be broken up quickly, but they cannot be rebuilt quickly. The actions that are taking place at NRC, not only are removing good people at NRC from the fields in which they are expert, but are discouraging young people from coming into the National Research Council and discouraging young people from careers in science.

What we do at the National Research Council affects far more than the people who are there and the programs that are there. It creates a whole atmosphere. It exacerbates the problem of lack of understanding and lack of support for basic science. We who are leaders in this country have an obligation to give our scientists the freedom to say to the public that science is important, not only for what happens this year and next year but for what happens for the next century in this country and in the world.

We see a total lack of direction. How could the government, in 1986, abolish the Environmental Institute, cut out energy programs, cut out environmental technology and then decide, in 1990, that that is this year's priority. What is likely to happen is that we are going to see the chemistry division turned into an environmental division. What a stupid waste of money. What a stupid waste of people's lives, careers and expertise. How can anybody justify that kind of nonsense?

I want to finish with a few quotes from Canada's most recent Nobel Prize winner. Is it not ironic that in 1986, within the very week that Dr. Polanyi was being named Canada's latest Nobel Prize winner in science, the very lab where he had started his work was being destroyed at NRC. He was not alone. The Basinskis internationally acclaimed for 30 years for their leading expertise in research which led to developments of tremendous amounts of technology over the years, were having their lab closed down and their lives' work ended.

At that time, Dr. Polanyi was appealing for the National Research Council and for basic research and when talking about his own work stated:

> Had they asked whether the research was likely to produce applications and whether those applications would accord with the socioeconomic priorities of the day, they would surely have despaired of our work after a few years.

He talks about how the work which led to his Nobel Prize in 1986 started in 1957, not with the technology, not with an object in mind, but simply because people were seeking basic knowledge that they knew would lead to benefits for humanity as a whole. When asked by a young science student where he should plan his career, Dr.Polanyi stated that his advice to a talented and ambitious Canadian scientist would be that he go abroad. Dr.Polanyi stated that he did not relish giving him that response, but that at this juncture in our scientific history, which was in the middle of the first round of cuts to NRC, it was the only answer he could give. He also stated that it is not by chance that we talk about research and development. We do not talk about development and research. The research comes first.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her intervention and her commitment to research and development.

I was interested to hear her comments about the opinions of the Nobel Prize winner, Dr. Polanyi. I wonder if the hon. member could advise the House whether or not she and her colleagues have pursued this question with Liberal leadership candidates to see what their views are on such an important question.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think that is an inappropriate question for the floor of the House. The member knows well where the Liberal party stands on these issues, where I personally stand on these issues and where my colleague, the critic for science and technology stands. All she has to do is to listen day after day in this House to know where the Liberal party stands.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I suspect that the hon. member is aware that the Speaker will rule what is an inappropriate question in this House. I did not see the Speaker rule against that. I wish she would answer the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair does not wish to get into debate. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): I listened carefully to the hon. member and I know that since she was elected she made a lot of recommendations concerning NRC scientists. I would therefore like to give her the assurance that no new person-year reductions have been forced upon the National Research Council by this government. In fact, the National Research Council is now negotiating an agreement with Treasury Board for increased security and flexibility in the management of its human resources. That memorandum relates to the planned previously announced cuts in the NRC'S permanent staff. Those cuts are part of a well-known effort to restructure and re-organize the National Research Council. The down sizing in full-time jobs at NRC was outlined in public papers, including the Estimates. In fact, the NRC will do its utmost to relocate the employees affected by the cuts, either at NRC or elsewhere in the scientific community in Canada.

In the open letter from the President of the NRC, he points out on page 5, and I quote—it is the President talking:"—that the NRC commits itself to maintaining the duties of the groups concerned and that it will do its best to make sure that they be transferred to a more appropriate activity. We will take into account the needs and aspirations of the people affected. Their application for suitable jobs at NRC for which they will be qualified will have priority.

Therefore, I can assure my colleague that, as far as the scientists are concerned, if ever a field of research had to be transferred to universities for instance, the whole thing will be done in a most civilized manner.

[English]

Mrs. Catterall: The hon. member has left me time to say little else in reply except that is absolute nonsense. Since I am not going to have time to give her the information she needs, I suggest she dig it out herself. I suggest she find out how many people have been forced into early retirement and what mechanisms are being used to force them into early retirement, and how they are being bribed not to talk about why they left.

In fact, from 1984 through 1986, NRC lost 221 person-years. That is brains. Yet management is being increased this year by 12. That is management, not scientists, not the people who do the work, not the people who go around the world creating Canada's international reputation. This year they are cutting another 125, 30 researchers and 110 technical support staff. That is the best information I have at this point in time.

I suggest the member not speak in the House until she has done her own research and found out what is happening. We are losing brains. We are losing them to the United States and to Europe. We are losing them to retirement. That is a crying shame and a waste of the most important resource this country has.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for ten minutes, plus five minutes questions and comment.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the excellent contribution to the debate by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West, may have rendered redundant some of the comments I was going to make. Earlier this morning, the member for Ottawa Centre made an excellent presentation as well.

However, I want to make a few other comments and I have a few quotations and some figures that might assist my friends opposite in their attempts to make up for five years of neglect and cuts that have damaged one of Canada's foremost scientific institutions.

The National Research Council is clearly one of the most distinguished scientific organizations in this country. Since its founding in 1916, it has been a leader in the scientific field here and abroad. Indeed, out of the National Research Council, as hon. members know, the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited body grew as a result of the research carried on. In addition, the Defence Research Board was a product of that particular council. It has been the foundation stone for contributions to scientific research at Canada's universities, certainly since World War II, and in the period before through its program of scholarships for promising young Canadian students.

What we have here is an attempt by this government to dismantle, in effect, the National Research Council. The work has been going on in an insidious and carefully manoeuvred way to make it appear that, in fact, nothing is changing. I suggest that it is changing, and all for the worst.

I want to turn to the Prime Minister's comments on this. He has made statements about the government's promises and his hopes for scientific research in Canada. I quote from a statement he made at the University of Waterloo, March 4, 1987: "We are determined that excellence and relevance are the guiding principles for managing our government laboratories. For some years, I have been speaking and writing about the urgent and pressing necessity of increasing our national commitment to R and D, not only in the amounts we spend, but in the way we spend, such as using procurement of our government labs and for greater national support for university research. We cannot be satisfied with what we have accomplished".

Those are his words. They are certainly true. He might have said that most Canadians are grossly dissatisfied with what this government has accomplished.

In support of that, let us take a look at the figures. In the 1984–1985 financial year, the last year the Liberals were in office and it is the year that my Conservative friends hark back to every time as the worst year imaginable. The National Research Council, according to the National Council of Canada, spent $480 million. In this year's Estimates, the 1990–1991 Estimates, the total allowed to the National Research Council is $433 million. That is not only a matter of reduction in the increase in rate, that is an absolute cut in the money available to the National Research Council over a five-year period, five years of cuts by this government in what can only be regarded as one of the jewels in Canada's scientific crown.

Let us look at some of the other things that have gone on in the council. In the good old days, a group of people were appointed to head the National Research Council, and it was made up of a relatively independent group of distinguished men and women, at least half of whom were generally academics, scientists and persons with scientific knowledge of considerable distinction and repute in Canada. Under this government there has been a shift in the kinds of appointments made to the council. Sixty per cent of the current members are composed of businessmen. It reflects the government's obsession with the bottom line and its unwillingness to consider the importance of scientific research in and of itself and for its own value. I submit that the presence of this particular group on the council is influencing the tenor of scientific research in Canada. It is changing from being pure science to applied research, research which is of interest to a certain group but of no interest to other groups.

• (1400)

In support of that let us look at the recent letter from the president of the National Research Council, Dr. Perron. He said in this letter to the employees dated February 15 of this year:

> However, I believe that, even with new resources, we would have an unavoidable obligation to review our activities with a critical eye to scientific merit, relevance to Canada's needs, and to whether NRC is the best place for these activities.

Let us look at those three things. First, a critical eye to scientific merit. Who is putting the critical eye on it? This new board of businessmen. Second, relevance to Canada's needs. From whose perspective? The businessman's perspective, not the scientist's. Third, whether NRC is the best place for these activities. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you had your own lab operating in your own plant and you could get government funding for the lab, would you not rather have the research done there? That is exactly the kind of question that is being faced by the council of the NRC. They have stacked the deck, I suggest, in a way that is unfair to the scientific community of this country.

My colleagues have mentioned the results of what has been going on because of these changes, and I suggest that it is not surprising, given the attitude of the National Research Council as exemplified in this letter. The president's letter continued:

> Excellence is essential for all our programs, but excellence is not enough. Our research must also be relevant and mesh well with other NRC activities.

Having made those statements, the embarrassment of having them challenged by other members of the National Research Council, employees, and scientists who are working there was too much. So, an additional memo came out which tells the members of the National Research Council to keep quiet. They were not supposed to talk about it. On February 22, there was a memo to all directors general from Pat Mortimer, Director of the Corporate Secretariat. It read, in part:

> —recent media reports have outlined changes that are planned or underway at NRC, and Dr. Perron has sent a letter to employees explaining the context of these decisions, and clarifying the direction NRC is taking.
> In the current climate it is preferable to limit the number of people speaking on behalf of NRC. Should there be any further media inquiries on these or related policy issues, the primary spokesperson for NRC will be Dr. Perron or, in his absence, Dr. Ross Pottie.

That is what they said. That is a kind of gag order and I suggest it is inappropriate. What we have here is an attempt to reorganize the National Research Council.

To help my friends, I have a quotation from the time of Nero, A.D. 65, Gauis Petronius Arbiter, Pro-Consul at Bithynia in the Roman Empire. Here is what he said. It is directly relevant to what is going on with the government and its meddling with the NRC today:

> We trained hard but it seemed that every time we were beginning to form teams we would be reorganized. I was to learn later in life that we tend to meet every situation in life by reorganizing, and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion, inefficiency and demoralization.

We have heard all about the demoralization that is going on at the NRC as a result of the policies being pursued here today.

There is one other scientist I would like to quote, a distinguished physicist at Queen's University, Dr. Alec Stewart. In his speech in November, 1986 to the Bedford Institute of Oceanography he said these words, and I suggest they are relevant to consider in light of the lack of promising future for our young students at the National Research Council and in the scientific community in Canada in general as a result of the cuts that have been going on here. He said:

> Any healthy society, especially in lean and straitened times, must look to the future. The injury done in closing laboratories is real but small compared with the more intangible injury and damage done to young people's expectations and to future opportunities for them in Canada. Our perceptive children may see how little we care about the future—their world—and they may reasonably seek the stimulus needed for their growth outside our country.
> Fiscal responsibility is necessary and so is an attitude that values human energy, knowledge and intellectual achievement. Both are essential for a future for Canada.

Those are the words that he used, and I submit that those words are extremely relevant for us today.

I urge the government to review its short-sighted policy, review the cuts that it has made to the National Research Council and which we hear denied with statements of the great amounts of spending, and reinstitute the good days when the National Research Council was properly funded and properly run.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands, as well as some of the other speakers from Ottawa who have spoken out so eloquently in support of the continued and improved levels of funding for the NRC.

I come from a region of the country with its own high academic tradition, and has also benefited through the work done at the NRC by sending students here and also by having some of our graduates become distinguished scholars at the NRC. I can attest as well to the importance of this institution and the scientific work which it promotes and which it carries out.

I would like to ask my colleague to speak some more about the work that is being done at the NRC and the relationship with his university, Queens, which is another institute of higher learning that is doing a great deal of scientific research.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, clearly the National Research Council, in its long and distinguished history, has been the basis on which university funding of research has started. In fact, it has been suggested to me by some of the scientists with whom I have discussed this matter over the last few weeks that without the National Research Council there would be virtually no university research going on in the country today. It was the NRC that started universities on the road to extensive research which turned our universities into the very capable world leaders that they are in terms of research, both here and abroad.

That recognition has been achieved largely as a result of the National Research Council's work in funding research programs in universities at the end of the war. That funding was possible because of the attitude of the governments then which was very conducive to growth of research and scientific work in Canada. Also, the NRC had developed a pool of expertise in the course of the war, attracting scientists of considerable repute and calibre to Canada, to move here and to work in this country. Indeed, it continued to do that throughout the years until now. Now we find a government that seems to be bent on destroying this institution, depriving it of the opportunity to attract talented and capable scientists.

The cuts are going on there and the people are no longer coming. The difficulty that I keep hearing about from the scientific community—I have been in touch with them for some time and they are very, very concerned about this—is that once you start breaking up an institution like that and people start leaving, it is a very difficult trend to reverse. That is the message I keep getting.

In answer to my friend from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, I am afraid that we are going to lose these people from the National Research Council. Once they start going, they are going to keep going. The numbers are dropping off because of the cuts and the demoralization. The institution is in a very precarious state at this time, thanks to the efforts of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is only one minute left for a short question or comment. That is about all I can allow the hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, members of the industry, science and technology committee had the opportunity to visit the NRC a short while ago. We met some of the top people there. Their ranks were much thinner than they had been previously because of the major cuts at the top and throughout the NRC. When we asked these people specific questions about the state of research and development in Canada, they were afraid to answer straightforward questions. In my own mind, I was criticizing these people. I want to apologize to them.

• (1410)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a Minister of State for Industry, Science, and Technology to speak to this opposition motion today.

I have had the chance to listen to a great many of the speeches by hon. members opposite, as well quite factual and helpful speeches by hon. members on this side. I want to make a preliminary comment and then develop further the government's position on not just the National Research Council, but on science and technology funding generally.

I listened carefully this morning until noon and then came back later to listen to more of this debate. Not once did I hear anything from the opposition anything about links to the private sector. Its whole discussion of science and technology reminded me a bit of a defence of a cultural institution. Science and technology, according to the opposition, should go on in universities and government laboratories. Not a word do we hear about feeding and strengthening those institutions through links with the private sector and with the industrial reality of this country. It is a fundamental flaw in everything I have heard from hon. members opposite today. They do not feed the institutions that we have for research and government and university with linkages to the private sector. They do not talk nor care about that. They almost look upon science and technology as a cultural artefact which exists without any linkages to the real world or to the private sector.

Mr. Milliken: Nonsense.

Mr. Hockin: Hon. members opposite say this is nonsense. It certainly is nonsense but this is what they are saying by neglecting to talk about the links to the private sector. The problem with their approach is they want us to maintain these institutions almost in an incarcerated way, cut off from the lifeblood of what will make them dynamic and strong which is to link them with the real world, industrial research and the private sector.

The government has done a great deal to make sure that happens. Members opposite find this most difficult to agree with, but something we have tried to do is to make them stronger in their linkages with the private sector and the industrial community that is outside of universities and government.

I want to make comments in three different directions. I want to talk about this linkage with the private sector and basic research. I also want to give some examples of how this new approach of linking industrial research that is done in government and universities more with the private sector is bearing fruit and working. I want to delineate how important that is to the government's philosophy toward a stronger scientific and technological sector in Canada.

Let me correct a factual error first. The hon. member for Ottawa West mentioned the cuts of the NRC at the senior management level. She argued that there was an increase in senior management of 13 people. She was contrasting that with decreases in employment in other levels. I want to help her with this. Since November 1989 there has been a reduction of four in executive management at the vice-presidential level in the NRC. I refer her to Part III of the Estimates on page 63. I will give this to her after I speak today. There has been a reduction in executive and senior management. Therefore, she has either misread the documents or she needed this exegesis of mine of the Estimates. I encourage her to look at page 63 of the Estimates.

The other point is more fundamental. The contribution of the government to science and technology as a proportion of government program spending has gone up under this government over what we inherited. When we came to office, the proportion of federal government spending on programs, as a percentage of federal government spending on programs, was a little over 4 per cent; it is now almost 5 per cent. This is at a time when there are tremendous other pressures, the claimants for government attention are growing, and a time when the government has had to be fiscally responsible. Science and technology has increased in that proportion. That over-all expenditure reality has been overlooked by hon. members opposite and it is very important for me to bring that back into the House so that hon. members will remember what we have done in terms of proving, with dollars and cents, how important science and technology spending is to the government.

Let me just move to some systematic comments about what we are doing. First, the problem with what we have heard today from hon. members opposite is that they are putting the NRC on a kind of Olympian pedestal, and they are doing a disservice to the NRC by doing this. What they want to do is put it on a pedestal. We even had a wonderful quotation from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. When the hon. member quotes proconsuls from some previous century, I listen carefully. He has good quotations and I like to learn from them. In his quotation, a quotation against reorganization, he said we should not reorganize because that can be very difficult for the life and health of any institution. I want to address that. If an organization does not change, if it is not renewed, if it does not improve its context in the society of which it is a part, it will die. Those reorganizations are, of course, what we have encouraged and I am going to outline how we have done that.

We should not place this institution on a pedestal, far above the hurly-burly of day-to-day life; we should not do that. What we will do is involve the NRC far more than ever before in the most important challenges facing the nation. We want the NRC to be right at the vanguard of the challenges facing the nation, not to be incarcerated in some ivory tower. We have, in fact, helped that to happen in dozens of ways.

With our support, for example, the NRC's council is sharpening the NRC into one of the country's principal agencies for economic competitiveness. That is something else we have not heard a word about, economic competitiveness. The department of which I am a part is essentially the department in charge of industrial competitiveness. I did not hear a word about competitiveness. What hon. members opposite want to do is protect these institutions from change. I say, if these institutions are going to have strong morale and a sense of purpose, they must deliver on the country's economic competitiveness, and that is what the government has been doing.

The NRC has a very proud history, but it cannot flourish as a monument to past achievements and that is what we have been hearing. Members want this monument to past achievements not to be touched, not to be renewed, and that is not our philosophy. It must always be a national resource, helping to meet the country's most significant needs.

We heard the hon. member for Ottawa West talk about morale. The problem with her presentation was that she linked morale with a kind of glacial stasis. She argued that any change at all will affect morale. She knows that institution well and I do not believe that any institution believes that. Most institutions believe that their morale is improved if the changes made will give a stronger more pertinent long-term future.

In looking at history and this quotation of a proconsul from a previous century, it said that we should not reorganize. In fact, the NRC has never been static. It has always gone through waves of pertinent reorganization. Before World War II, the NRC cultivated and supported university science, and this has been brought out during the debate, helping to create world-class faculties out of small undergraduate laboratories. This we acknowledge; this was part of its mission; this was an important contribution, part of its style and essence. During the war, the NRC helped to give the country the technological edge so important to victory in World War II. That was a mission which is different now. It is not participating in that mission, but that was a mission that it had during World War II. That was a change from what went before, and what the NRC is doing today is a change from that.

In the 1950s and 1960s, the NRC undertook fundamental research and used this intellectual fervour to attract and retain for Canada some of the world's best scientific and engineering talent, people like Gerhard Herzberg and John Polanyi, both Nobel Laureates. Recently the NRC has taken up the new challenge, a new development in its distinguished history, to help Canadian industry become the best. Its council is working on a five-year plan that, building on the experience of recent years, will turn the NRC into an engine of applied intelligence. The NRC has always managed to change to better serve this country. The NRC will continue to change, just as the nation as a whole will change.

The NRC has changed. It has gone through, probably, four or five important iterations in its history. The hon. member who quotes the proconsul does not want it ever to change. It is important for its health and its relevance that it goes through these changes. That is what will guarantee its success and its relevance to the country as a whole. We need the NRC. Canada cannot exist without a strong National Research Council. The government is determined to make sure that it does not atrophy by doing things from another era. We are determined to lead, as you know, a competitive renaissance in Canada, and we want the NRC to be part of that.

On the platform of abundant resources, Canada must build right now an edifice of applied intelligence and applied skills in order to maintain our standard of living. We must do that and we cannot be laggards in doing that. Only through economic growth fueled by effective competition in the world's markets can the country maintain its social safety-net, its support for the arts, its regional balance and social harmony. If we are going to win competitively, it requires an intelligent and skilled workforce employing the latest technology. The NRC will be an important way of ensuring that Canada's workforce can be the best. We do not want to incarcerate the NRC and make it irrelevant to the competitive agenda, we want to put them at the forefront of that agenda.

Several things are happening at the NRC to fit it out for its new task. Planning is still taking place, but the next five years will see the following: a renewed commitment to excellence backed by more intensive effort in selected critical areas; closer ties to Canadian industry through participation in consortia, joint research, employee exchanges and increased assistance. I did not hear a word from hon. members opposite about that and how important that is to sustain it and give it a lifeblood of creativity from connections outside of its own doors.

Up until now, government laboratories made extensive efforts to transfer their knowledge to industry. Government laboratories have been very helpful with regard to that. In the new NRC, industry will co-develop that knowledge and the transfer will be to foreign markets in the form of competitive products and services.

Finally, the NRC will resume its role as the finishing school, if you like, for the country's most highly trained scientists and engineers. Once again, the country will enjoy the talents of an NRC alumni of scientific excellence. That is our view of where it is headed. That is our view of its relevance.

Although hon. members opposite do not like to speak of the links with the private sector, yes it is true, the new NRC will be industrially-oriented. It will not be an ivory tower. It will not be an incarcerated institution. We are going to make sure that its roots are strongly in the industrial reality of the country. Its Industry Development Program, like the Industrial Research Assistance Program and the Canadian Institute for Scientific and Technical Information, will be sharpened and honed.

Industry will be encouraged to shoulder a larger part of the nation's research, in part by having increased access to the rich talent and the facilities of the NRC. What is wrong with that? Why should we not ask the industry of the country to carry a larger part of this burden? Hon. members opposite too often want to foster dependence on government to an excessive degree. That is not healthy for the country and it certainly is not healthy for the scientific and engineering excellence in this country. If industry is encouraged to shoulder a larger share of the nation's research, in part by having increased access to the rich talent and facilities of the NRC, does this mean that it is any less a laboratory? Are you defiling the laboratory by encouraging it to do this? You are not. You are making the laboratory relevant. Is relevance and usefulness wrong? Of course it is not. Must Canadian technology always be developed by our competitors, instead of our industrial partners? That is our view of the kind of linkages we would like to see for the NRC.

One of the most appalling misunderstandings has been the charge that the new NRC is doing this somehow against its will. I do not believe most members of the NRC are doing this against their will. They do want to have these linkages with the private sector. It is a misunderstanding that somehow this means that they are neglecting basic research.

As a former academic myself, I know what basic research means. I believe that basic research is best conducted not just in an ivory tower. Let me just tell you what is happening about basic research in the NRC. We have had the hon. member for Calgary South speak to this, but we have had some additional information that we think the House should hear.

What do the critics really mean when they talk about this? If they mean that the NRC is neglecting its contribution to humankind store of knowledge, they are wrong. For example, in the Herzberg Institute, the NRC has a world class performer in astronomy. The institute provides Canadian astronomers with first-class facilities, collaboration on frontier research and scientific leadership in important areas.

The NRC is participating, too, in the world-class basic research of 13 of the 16 Centres of Excellence. They are right there and a part of that basic research phenomenon brought by the government, the Centres of Excellence.

Mr. Milliken: Are you moving the Herzberg institute? Answer the question.

Mr. Hockin: The hon. member wants to know whether we are moving an institute from one place to another? That is all he cares about. He cares about those kinds of small political things.

Mr. Milliken: That is not small at all.

Mr. Hockin: What he should care about is basic research and what the NRC is doing about basic research. That is what I am talking about.

The NRC has played a critical role in establishing this Sudbury Neutrino Observatory. Does the hon. member object to that?

Mr. Milliken: No, I think it's great.

Mr. Hockin: Very good. It is a uniquely Canadian contribution to the cutting edge of the understanding of cosmology. Are these the achievements of a national laboratory that is turning its back on basic research? It is not. It is doing basic research. This will continue. I have dozens of examples here I would be glad to give in terms of answering questions or making comments.

Let me just conclude with this. NRC is not just contributing to basic science or linking with the private sector, but it is innovative. The NRC has never lacked for innovative approaches to problems facing Canadians. This is very important to us in this decade. Just last year it was involved in electronic pace and tracking systems, assembly-line programming, measurement devices for food freshness, a coal-water burner, aerial magnetic instrumentation, automated pipe welding, rail grinding to prolong rail life, oil-rig stability measurements, an innovative five-wheel unicycle for the physically-challenged, and a trace vapour detector for airport security.

These examples and more all demonstrate that NRC's research has the potential to become competitive products and competitive services. This new approach of linking with the private sector as much as possible and encouraging basic research has produced these innovative approaches.

This new approach featuring in depth NRC industry and university research on problems of fundamental importance will only increase the value of this institution's efforts. All our competitors have organized their science along similar lines. The opposition would not like to do this. It would like to somehow isolate and incarcerate the NRC. That is not our view.

Canadians, as I have already pointed out, remember with satisfaction the contribution of the NRC in aid of the war effort. The country is in a commercial battle every bit as intensive in its own way today. It is not a military war, but it is a competitive war. We need the NRC to win that battle, and we need it as a vanguard.

If we are to do this, there will be changes in the NRC. Some established programs will be discontinued or handed over to others in the university and industrial sectors. But it will be worth it. The commitment to deficit reduction does not permit the easy solution of endless expansion. Remember, though, the NRC did not establish its Canadian and international reputation by staying the same. That is not how it got where it is. It has always been one of the pillars of Canadian science and technology by maintaining a commitment to excellence, a commitment to relevance, and a commitment to change with the times.

• (1430)

That is why it is run by an arm's length council and president, and this is why the council largely sets its own rules and determines its own directions. This is also why the government continues to assign NRC new tasks, always important tasks, and why the NRC is strong now and will be even stronger in the future. Let us breathe life into the NRC. Let us make it relevant to our economic future this decade. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was amazed when the hon. minister mentioned the fact that there was an increase in terms of federal government investment between 1984 and now. The facts speak for themselves. In 1985 the spending in terms of Gross Domestic Product was $1.4 million. In 1987 it fell to $1.35 million. I cannot see how that can be considered an increase.

In terms of the over-all funding for the National Research Council, in 1984–85 the government spent close to $505 million. In 1990–91 that fell to $402 million.

Can the minister explain his original statement to the House that there was an increase in research and development and an increase to the National Research Council?

He also talked about creating a partnership with the private sector. That is great; that is definitely the way to go. We are not disputing that at all. One has to remember, though, that the federal government has a leadership role to play. The federal government has to create an economic environment for the private sector in order to invest in research and development.

Obviously, when the private sector sees us as the federal government attacking one of our major institutions, the National Research Council, by cutting grants, it is not going to move the way it could move if we play a leadership role with them.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that my hon. friend has asked these questions because it allows me to clarify statistical points that I was making.

First, if we take out the space component the NRC's budget has gone up from $400 million last year to $402 million this coming year according to the Main Estimates. We took the space expenditures out and put them in another part of the Estimates book. That is where the hon. member has been misled and why he is quoting inaccurate statistics. It is probably not his fault. If we remove the space program and put it elsewhere in the Estimates, we find that spending for the NRC has gone up slightly from $400 million to $402 million, not down the way that he expected.

Mr. Milliken: What kind of per cent is that? Tory times are tough times.

Mr. Hockin: That is very important because we are making the NRC more relevant. The NRC is having to share its role in the over-all scientific and technological thrust of this country with respect to other expenditures.

We remember what they are— the $240 million network of Centres of Excellence Program, the $80 million Canada Scholarships Program and the $200 million increase in base funding for the granting councils. We do not hear about this from the hon. members opposite because they are fixated with the NRC.

Mr. Milliken: You will.

Some hon. members: Lower the debt.

Mr. Hockin: They should look at the whole package. This is part of the whole package.

Finally I have to add all this up and tell the hon. member that it is program expenditures on which the government has flexibility. If we want to find the priorities of a government in Canada we cannot look at the interest on the debt because that is a given. The government cannot do much about that except to decrease the deficit every year as best it can, which we have done and the previous government did not do in the 15 years before we took office. What we should do is look at program expenditures. As a proportion of program expenditures the S and T envelope has increased from 4.46 per cent in 1984 to close to 5 per cent under this government. This is financial and symbolic evidence of the importance of S and T to this government as a priority. In very difficult fiscal times there has been an increase. This is a priority, not the opposite.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the minister promised us some examples of the products he was talking about and I did not hear of them. I think it betrays his ignorance of NRC if he thinks it was only in the last year or the last few years that links with the private sector have been an important part of NRC's operations. They always have been.

On the other hand, the shift here is to turn away from promoting science to "serving Canada's industrial competitiveness", and you serve Canada's competitiveness by having new products and new technology and most of all from research.

The president of NRC goes on to say that this industrial partnership, this approach on competitiveness, could be temporary and NRC may very well have to shift back to promoting science. When it shifts back it will not have any scientists to do it with. I am shocked that the minister is not concerned about the number of good and competent people we are losing.

I will give him a few examples of why it is important to keep basic research, because that is what international competitiveness is. Before I do so, I want to remind him that he talks about NRC going abroad and selling our technology. We now have 90 per cent of our technology developed abroad and only 10 per cent developed in Canada. It seems to me that the job we have to do is some work in Canada. We do not do that by cancelling what has led to the science and technology we are now feeding out all over the world. What we learned to do is to enhance that, to make it better, and to improve our ability to develop it here in Canada.

I just want to go back again to the fact that it took 15 years to discover the protein that only grows in tumours and allows us to identify cancer at an early stage. The end result had nothing to do with what people were looking at when they started; they were looking at calcium in tumours. If we cancel that kind of research for five years we are stifling our progressiveness for the next fifty years.

I go back to Dr. Polanyi. The very detectable infrared luminescence that Ken Cashion observed in 1957 led three years later to a suggestion for infrared lasers. A decade later the sort of laser we proposed had become the most powerful source, and yet another decade passed before it began to be evident what the market use might be for such lasers. It was 28 years before the first small observation led to one of the most significant technological developments in the last century. That is what is important. These other things are all products. They are all what you do after you have done the sciences. They are not what you do instead of the sciences. I fail to understand why the minister does not understand that.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to my hon. friend's comments. She gave some very good examples of important contributions NRC scientists have made through basic research to real world success stories, research that was done originally as basic research which lo and behold suddenly became relevant in the real world. That is precisely what we want to do. We do not want to make a total dichotomy between basic science and industrial application. As I made clear in my remarks both must occur.

What I think we have to recognize better than the hon. members opposite have is the link between basic science and real world realities. Let me give some examples of the two happening: the NRC which is a storehouse of basic ideas suddenly becoming adaptable to the real world. For example, the NRC does research on environmental problems. Researchers at the NRC's Biotechnology Research Institute in Montreal are working with Environment Canada on developing new technology to clean up the banks and the sediment in the St. Lawrence River.

Another example of a combination of basic research with the real world, in 1987 NRC scientists identified the mysterious toxin in P.E.I. mussels which caused two deaths and more than 100 cases of serious illness. In Saskatoon, the NRC worked with the University of Saskatchewan to discover a group of chemicals that promote rapid seed germination.

• (1440)

Nothing is more basic to transportation and the life of this country than safe trucks. The NRC is working to make trucks safer and cut down on the number of accidents. For example, when a fuel truck hit a bus in Ottawa last September, I think in the hon. member's riding, killing the truck driver and causing a huge fireball, police turned to NRC experts for help in determining the cause.

Finally I refer to a great example in that we all have to carry bills around in our pockets. NRC technology has made Canadian money counterfeit-proof. I agree with the hon. member. This is basic research adapted marvellously to the realities of the real world. That is what is going to make us competitive and relevant.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to some of the things which the minister has talked about. The minister focused, not surprisingly, in his comments on the essence of the motion itself and the accomplishments of NRC. Incidentally, by noting some of these accomplishments I think the minister is simply proving the point that this is an extremely valuable institution with a fine record behind it, a record which deserves consistent and continuous guaranteed government support so that it has a sense of confidence and security for the future to be able to continue to do the excellent work to which the minister has referred.

One issue which the minister referred to in the earlier stages of his comments is the relationship between research and development and science and technology, on the one hand, and the whole industrial structure on the other hand. Like the minister I think that a fundamental weakness in our society is that economically we do not have in this country what we see in the suburbs surrounding Boston, in the areas surrounding MIT or in the areas around Stanford in California, that is a massive number of small businesses which have been spun off from the basic research taking place in the universities that have made the connections with industry. By making those connections with industry they have started to make the commitment, as this motion puts it, to promote basic scientific research in Canada as something which is economically significant, economically tight, and economically important.

Mr. Hockin: What about the University of Waterloo?

Mr. Langdon: There are exceptions. The University of Waterloo, as the minister suggests, is one which has done relatively well. There are other exceptions. The University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon has done quite well with this kind of thing. Even in those cases we are talking about a level of relationship with the industrial structure which is so different from that which exists in the United States and indeed in many countries in western Europe that we are virtually talking night and day.

What are the reasons for this problem? I have got probably 10 or 11 more minutes in which I can speak, and I want to identify three crucial problems which exist in the heart of our economic structure and help to explain the problem. Often there are people on the Conservative benches, and indeed on the Liberal benches, who wonder why it is that this party is so concerned about foreign ownership and about foreign takeovers in particular. There is a distinction between foreign ownership and foreign takeovers. We can have a new industrial enterprise that when established sets up a number of different parts of its operation, some of which contribute to new scientific activities in this country. When we have foreign takeovers of scientifically based companies, high tech companies, in this country, it is much more difficult to see the likelihood of new expansions in research and development.

I looked at some success stories we have had here in Canada of industries which had recognized the importance of making the link with the scientific community, the university community and institutions like NRC.

I think, for instance, of a company like Mitel or Connaught Labs which grew out of the central core of the University of Toronto. I look at both these institutions and I see now that both of them have been taken over by a foreign owner. As a consequence of foreign ownership, major changes are being undertaken to these high tech companies in Canada which recognized in the past the need for an integral connection between those in industry and those in institutions of scientific research in this country.

Those connections inevitably are destroyed when foreign ownership reduces the staff, through massive rationalization, as in the case of Mitel. It is a polite word for explaining that lots of people are fired and lots of lay-offs take place.

In the case of Connaught Labs we have the key Canadians who turned this enterprise into a successful, high tech enterprise simply eliminated by the French company that has taken it over.

We see the same kind of thing in the case of a company like Federal Pioneer. Federal Pioneer is perhaps the foremost company in this country that develops electrical equipment. For the development of that kind of innovative, electrical equipment, its connections and relationships with the scientific community have been crucial. I am certain those relationships, too, are going to be subject to devastating attack by the foreign takeover which is now to occur with Federal Pioneer. That is one set of issues. I could talk at much greater length about the problems associated with foreign ownership.

The second set of problems are those associated with the free trade arrangement which we have entered into with the United States. I have to talk about two or three examples which have come to my attention in the last year or so, in a particularly compelling and personal way. During the campaign for leadership of the New Democratic Party I worked a good deal of the time in Ontario. One of the places I visited was the massive Massey-Ferguson plant in Brantford, a plant which strikes you now as perhaps the most symbolic example of the potential consequences of free trade in this country. We have had a free trade agreement in agricultural implements with the United States since 1948. When you go into that magnificent plant in Brantford it is as if you see six full football fields completely bare. That bareness or that destruction is a destruction not just of the jobs, not just of the people and their families, but a destruction of the innovation which was associated with that company. In fact the major innovation associated with that company has been transferred to the United States, the axial combine which was being produced by Massey.

The same thing is taking place in a company like Stelco, one of the biggest and most important companies in this country. This is a company which has done much research and development. It is now transferring much of its attention to the United States for expansion.

Finally I have to talk about a third area of serious problems, and that is the fact we do not make use of our natural resources to benefit our country, our industrial structure. We see it, for instance, today in the National Energy Board decision which effectively means that we will not be able to apply to exports of natural gas in the future the national interest test that social cost-benefit analysis permitted us to do.

What happens when these three kinds of developments take place? First, we see that there is no longer a focus for scientific research here and for spin-offs from that scientific research. We see it in the case of Mitel. We see it in the case of Massey. We look as well at the destruction of our high tech firms. Those firms are then not able to make the connections which I agree with the minister are so crucial to the ability to establish successful scientific research in the future.

That is why we do not have a commitment to basic research in this country. That is why scientific research is so weak here. It is not because NRC is being attacked, though I agree that the attacks on NRC are foolish and short-sighted. The reason is that the basic policy being followed by this government and the basic policy followed by the previous government was a policy which failed to tackle the questions of foreign ownership and the questions of development of high tech firms of our own, here in this country. That is what we have to change.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa South which blames the government for not supporting the National Research Council and also for not encouraging basic research.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that half of the NRC's budget is for applied research, 25 per cent for basic research and 25 per cent for national facilities, CISTI, and administration.

The member who made the motion said this morning that our priorities were to reduce the deficit instead of maintaining funding for research, science and technology in Canada. It is true that we put a lot of emphasis on deficit reduction, Mr. Speaker, but I must tell you that we have to do so now in 1990 because they did not for some 20 years. It is because they too brought down budgets that did not give what they should have for science and technology.

I have some details on that, Mr. Speaker, to tell you about. They say that people do not realize that under the Liberal government, the NRC's budget was $531 million in 1984 and that the forecast for 1986, had the Liberal government remained in power, fell to $480 million.

In 1986, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance made his financial plan for the next five years, of which the last year begins this April 1, he forecast a budget of $3.4 billion, which is nearly $700 million a year. This year, Mr. Speaker, the budget for the last year of this five-year plan is $731 million.

So this means that since 1984 we have been increasing our estimates by 38 per cent each year and if we compare the $3.4 billion figure I mentioned earlier to the $2.3 billion in the Liberal Government Estimates, we have increased the national investment in science and technology by 48 per cent.

I have another statistics, Mr. Speaker. It strikes me that the opposition often suggests we are opening the door to foreign investment here in Canada, we are pushing the door wide open. I have here, Mr. Speaker, three foreign-controlled corporations—Pratt and Whitney, IBM Canada and Imperial Oil. Pratt and Whitney, Mr. Speaker, is investing $243 million a year into research and development, IBM Canada $132 million, and Imperial Oil $54 million.

When they suggest foreign capital is coming here to steal our jobs away, when they suggest as I heard this week that we are selling the Canadian soul away to foreign corporations, I believe this is hogwash and I label that disinformation. This is not information but disinformation Mr. Speaker, because those corporations come here and invest, they come here and do research, they come here and employ our workers and researchers in their operations.

What is wrong with that? What is wrong with that, Mr. Speaker? Why do we have to hear that kind of demagogy, that kind of disinformation about foreign investment?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if opposition parties were a little more co-operative on government initiatives, they would not accuse us of spending millions of dollars to advertise the budget or the sales tax while that money would be spent for science and technology.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it three o'clock, I wish everyone a very happy St. Patrick's day and a very happy weekend. You must remember:

It's a day for wearin' a shamrock
To honor that glorious saint!
It's a day when folks who are Irish
Feel sorry for those who ain't!
It's a day for thinkin' of Erin,
Colleens and the Lakes of Killarney,
And toastin' friendships both old and new,
And speakin' a wee bit o'blarney!
It's a day when a smile's for the wearin',
And the bands will be blazin' away,
And for wishin' friends "The Top O' The Mornin'"
For sure—'TIS THE IRISHMAN'S DAY!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired. This House stands adjourned until Monday next at 1 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

FUNDING

The House resumed from Monday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Keyes:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the motion put forward by my hon. colleague for Hamilton West which impresses upon this House the need to reinstate funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

We know the centre was established in 1978 under statute which set up a tripartite board of governors to administer this institution. It gave equal representation to employers, employees and government.

There are certain areas of concern in this country in which I believe government must be involved. For instance, I believe that transportation is such an area considering the size and diversity of this country. There is the health and safety of workers as well as employers in the workplace.

Just like transportation, justice or the environment, to name but a few, health and safety in the workplace is an issue which affects millions of Canadians often in ways which are for the most part beyond their direct control.

Governments have an absolutely fundamental responsibility to do everything within their power to ensure that Canadians in the workplace are safe and healthy. That is the basic principle which we are discussing today.

With respect to this responsibility the federal government in 1978 established the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. While the government has a responsiblity to make places like the centre possible, it is nonetheless crucial that the source of health and safety information be completely impartial. The relationship between the centre and its funding must remain at arm's length at the very least.

The information which is given out by the centre may very well cause problems for employers, including the government itself. I can appreciate that. But no one can deny that workers deserve all the protection that we can give them. An independent, fully–funded centre is the best way of achieving this impartiality. The bottom line is that the workers must be protected.

As we look at various aspects of safety and health hazards in the workplace, we see that it is governments themselves which in many cases are at the root of many of the problems. Some of the worst abusers of the system, and some of the most skilful at sweeping things under the rug are governments, either municipal, provincial or federal. The fact remains that since governments should not have as their bottom line a profit motive, they are the best source of funds for centres like the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

I do not believe that this is the reason that the government wants to abandon its responsibility to fund the centre. I do believe that this government is not as sincere about its concern for worker health and safety as we would like it to be, or as it would present itself to be.

As we see from its agenda for the economy and for the areas of social welfare, the government tends to dance to the tune of big business. There is no doubt that when it comes to health and safety of workers, be it in the mines, mills or in any of the industrial areas, big business certainly has not led the way in health and safety. Their bottom line is profit, not people. That is unfortunate but true.

The leaders in workplace safety have always been the workers. If we go back to the late 19th, or the early 20th century, we see that the big issue of the day in the mines in Canada, the United States and around the world was safety. Unfortunately, for many reasons, health was not yet the prime concern of workers. The causes of disease in general were only beginning to be explored and understood by the medical establishment, much less by the workers.

The result of that can be seen in the number of miners today and years ago when miners suffered from that terrible disease known as black lung. The main concern was safety, because workers realized that every day they were going down into the pits, the coal mines and the gold mines, they were incredibly dangerous places to go. We all know there were many long drawn out battles and strikes like those led by the then famous John L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers, just to achieve some measure of safety and to get safety features written into the contracts.

The triumphs of these workers are prized today throughout Canada and around the world. Now, and in the last few years, health has become a very prominent issue, as it should be. Health is of major concern because there are so many chemicals and so many situations out there that affect the workers today, whether in buildings—a big problem being these sick buildings that we hear about—or whether underground in the mines, or in the mills or in the plants. All kinds of chemicals, dusts and fumes pervade the workplace. Over the years they have, in many cases, adversely affected the health and safety of the lives of workers. We see it with asbestos and with other agents that have been used throughout the years.

Time has shown that these agents are not the miracles that we believed them to be, that the price for the convenience and profit they provide have been too high. Canadians are increasingly aware of the damage we do to ourselves and to our environment.

I am quite aware of what the government intends to do to this centre. It wants to operate it much like a retail business where you buy your information. To that extent, of course, it has already been done at the centre as some information is available on disks for which there is a charge in order to generate revenue. If the source of health and safety information is to remain impartial, effective and accessible to all, then it must have adequate funding. If the government eliminates its funding the centre will have to look elsewhere.

Certainly, the workers cannot contribute the sums of money that are going to be required to maintain this organization because, as we know, they simply do not have the money. As the Canadian Labour Congress says, it cannot afford to contribute to the centre's funds because the funding would have to be continually indexed to maintain the level that is required and such organizations are not in a position to keep up with this, nor are private individuals.

The centre must not have to depend on money from big business for its survival because, if it does that, then it is to some extent beholden to them, and they simply cannot be trusted to place health and safety above all other priorities.

I believe that if this centre is to survive, if it is to maintain its world-wide reputation as an accessible, effective information centre, then it absolutely requires continued government presence and continued government funding. A basic foundation of the centre's mandate stipulated in statute was that the information would be accessible to any individual in Canada or, indeed, around the world. To ensure this continued funding is essential.

As I explained, another basic principle of the centre is that it be impartial. Therefore, the only realistic funding option is the federal government, public money, because the centre exists for public good.

I believe that the government has an absolute obligation to continue its presence and its funding to this centre. A withdrawal of regular funding amounts to nothing less than privatization of this institution.

As I stated, the centre exists for the public good. It must continue to do so. There are some things that must not carry a price-tag. There are some things which must not fall victim to the government's mania for privatization. One of these is the health and safety of Canadian workers.

I think that the government must be feeling a little bit guilty because it has promised to extend the centre's line of credit of $11.6 million until it becomes self-sufficient. Such a gesture by no means absolves the government. Its bottom line is not supposed to be profit, it is supposed to be the welfare of the Canadian people.

I have no doubt that if the centre were to try to generate all its revenues, then it would not remain open very long because its effectiveness, its credibility and its accessibility would decline sharply. Quality of service does not come cheap, and whatever quality of service would be offered the centre would in many cases be too expensive.

I believe that the plan put forth by government will see a decline in the reliability and the accessibility of the centre through no fault of the people who work there. It is a fact that when the main preoccupation becomes financial survival then other priorities lessen in importance.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has an excellent world-wide reputation as a one-of-a-kind source for vital information. To abandon this successful and admirable centre would be tragic and short-sighted.

Therefore, I support the motion put forward by my colleague from Hamilton West. I realize this is a free enterprise government, that its dream is a completely market-run economy, but such a concept violates basic Canadian values. One of those values is that the government must play a role in certain areas of public concern. One very important area is occupational health and safety. Every Canadian should have complete access to this information, and that principle cannot be denied.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be participating in this debate, although I wish the reasons for it had never come about, namely, because of the decision of the government to privatize, to make self-sustaining, whatever the term it wants to use, in a sense to ditch from the duties of the government and the public the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was established in 1978 as a public corporation by the Parliament of Canada with the passing of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety Act. The centre was set up as an independent body, reporting directly to Parliament through the Ministry of Labour.

A tripartite council of governors consisting of representatives from labour, employers and government was established to govern the centre. The enactment of this founding statute enjoyed all-party support, including the full support of the Conservative party.

It is important in commencing my remarks to touch on the objects of the centre. As set out by statute they are: (a) to promote health and safety in the workplace in Canada, and the physical and mental health of working people in Canada; (b) to facilitate (1) consultation and co-operation amongst federal, provincial and territorial jurisdictions, and (2) participation by labour and management in the establishment and maintenance of high standards of occupational health and safety appropriate to the Canadian situation; (c) to assist in the development and maintenance of policies and programs aimed at the reduction or elimination of occupational hazards; and (d) to serve as a national centre for statistics and other information relating to occupational health and safety.

These objects underline the fundamental principle upon which the centre was based. This principle is the right of access for all Canadians to information that they need to achieve their fundamental right to a healthy and safe working environment. All of this is now at risk due to the government's decision to cut the centre adrift.

Before commenting further on our attitude and response to the business plan which the Minister of Labour approved on March 7, the new guidelines for the operation of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, I think is is worth-while to note just what is at risk out there in the Canadian population. Every year, year in and year out, close to 1,000 Canadians will die as a result of occupational hazards. Some 20,000 will become permanently disabled, and hundreds of thousands of others will suffer illness or injury due to any one of a number of reasons related to their work. The direct cost of death and injury in the Canadian workplace was $3.54 billion in 1987. Those were the costs, both in human suffering and financially.

We believe that it is a grave error—worse than that, it is a major injustice—for the government to set adrift this centre which was vitally needed in 1978 to protect working Canadians. It is just as vitally necessary today.

As I said, on March 7, the Minister of Labour approved the business plan which, under the government's direction and with some hesitation on the part of the council of the centre, was drafted by the centre's council under duress and with a change of directors in the process.

In his statement of approval of that business plan, the minister said: "The government is deeply committed to the vital role played by the CCOHS in improving the safety of workplaces in Canada, and in protecting the health of Canadian workers".

• (1320)

No one in this Parliament, regardless of party, wishes harm to come to any Canadian. However, the likely result of the privatizing of this institution may lead to its breakup because one of the basic reasons for the tripartite council and the institution's credibility will be gone when it adopts as one of its prime functions the making of a profit or breaking even rather than providing a legitimate health service to Canadians. We doubt that the survival of the centre and the survival of its obligation to Canadian workers will survive this change in its status.

I would just like to comment briefly on the business plan. The overwhelming focus of the business plan is the commercialization of CCOHS through the sale, primarily to employers, of products, and the privatization of CCOHS by the termination of public funding. There are no proposals to use profits, to restore or expand the free health and safety information service that the centre offers to workers and the public. If this were in fact to be done there is a case for saying that the size and the impartiality of the nonelectronic part of its free information service could be maintained.

Second, the centre has built its reputation largely through providing high quality information on occupational health concerns, but the focus of the centre is now to be on safety issues with a mind to the cost of accidents to employers and workers compensation boards.

As someone who has had a fairly lengthy history of occupational health and safety on the job, one of the chronic problems in the past in Canada has been this emphasis on safety in the workplace as opposed to health in the workplace. It is only in fairly recent years that we have given appropriate attention to the health hazards that exist and the need to attempt to stop the problem at source instead of adopting programs, whether they be educational or anything else, that attempt to change the focus away from a safe workplace, suggesting that the problem is with the worker or with the employee.

Placing that kind of guilt trip is the kind of path that has been pursued by inspection services and compensation boards across Canada for many years. It is only in this last 10 years or so that we have begun to shift the focus on to where it primarily should be, that is, on having a safe and healthy workplace as opposed to putting the guilt trip on the individual worker.

I just want to give a couple of examples of that from a few years ago in British Columbia, what I like to call the bad old days, which is an odd way of putting it. We had one publication put out by the Workers Compensation Board in British Columbia that was just full of ideas for parades, prizes and safety contests. I can remember the quote: "the blowing of horns, the tooting of whistles" for community extravaganzas to draw attention to the area of safety and health.

One of the recommendations in that particular brochure, and I have seen similar things in other jurisdictions in Canada, was that a safety contest at sawmills should be to hide $1 bills—with the rate of inflation they should be $10 bills now—underneath boards that were left lying around in the sawmill yard for people to trip over. If you were smart enough to go and pick the board up, you would get this prize of a $10 bill that was hidden underneath it because you should not leave boards lying around because people trip over them and get hurt.

That is the kind of crazy attitude that we had to health and safety in the workplace in Canada for years and years. I am afraid that the privatization of this centre is going to be a signal to Canadian workers that we are turning back the clock once again. What we are asking the centre to do is to sell a product that it does not own, which is information on workplace hazards that has only recently been accumulated. There are signed agreements with NIOSH and other international centres of health information that may be broken in this process. If our source for the product dries up, we will have nothing left to sell.

This is a retrograde step by the government. It will be harmful to the health of Canadian workers. I hope beyond hope that the government will change its mind, recognize reality and renew its commitment—the commitment of all of us—to the health and safety of Canadian workers.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter this debate on the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. The position of the government for all the time we have been in government has been to attack the deficit. We do much of that through control of our spending, reducing the burden of our public debt on the people of Canada. There is probably no other topic that is more constantly brought to my attention in my riding.

To achieve this objective, the government is determined to sustain its drive toward improved management of expenditures. This requires not only that all departments realign and reduce their expenditures, but also that all sectors of the economy take part in this national effort.

In 1989, respecting the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, the cabinet decided to reflect the policy of fiscal restraint and expenditure cuts to combat the rapidly escalating national debt. The cutbacks in expenditures were directed on a priority basis at the government's own programs. Indeed, we have been remarkably successful in this. Our programs have been growing at the rate of something like 3.6 per cent per year, not like some of the other governments in Canada which have been growing at two and three times this level. In mid-December, because of increased financial pressures on the economy, the government announced further cutbacks on department and agency expenditures amounting to $1 billion.

There are two principal elements of labour-management relations to achieve these economic objectives. The first element is partnership, which I believe to be the key to both economic and social development in Canada. Harmonious relations between all the partners—governments, employers and labour—to reconcile the often divergent interests is vital to the success of any initiative.

I have used the term "partner" deliberately. This is true of many other things that we do in government. An example of this would be the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information Service which provides a pan-Canadian standard for the pro-active disclosure of hazard information about materials used in Canadian workplaces. This is a prime example of effective partnership.

The consensus building and co-operation exhibited by all the partners resulted in WHMIS, an information system that is the most advanced of its kind in the world. Indeed, the unique and distinctly Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety itself was created in 1978 by an act of Parliament. As we have heard from the member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke, it has resulted in co-operation and collaboration between governments, associations of employers, workers and occupational health and safety professionals.

Speaking after the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke is indeed difficult, because he, in his own right, is an expert in the matter of labour. He knows the problems and the dangers in the workplace. He also recognizes that all of us in Parliament are deeply concerned with the workers of Canada that their health be maintained.

The member and I differ in another regard very basically. He does not believe private enterprise can do a job. He believes that government-funded agencies are the only way to deliver services, and I believe that private enterprise is more efficient. I believe that private enterprise is not complacent and that people who do in fact pay for information probably value that information better.

The new technologies coupled with the specialty field of health and safety, the environment and other related fields are all areas where progress demands a change in work attitudes. Organizations and methods are the second element. The government, together with its partners, is constantly on the look-out for new approaches that can be used to make the workplace safer for Canadians.

The rate of scientific change and technological change, the very speed at which things change, has been constantly increasing and challenging all occupational health and safety professionals to improve preventive measures. We know that the future health and safety of all workers largely depends on the ability of all nations to share knowledge, to recognize new potential dangers, to find immediate solutions and to ensure the implementation of appropriate preventative measures.

• (1330)

Since 1978 the centre has assumed the role of a national information resource which gathers, evaluates, and distributes occupational health and safety information to workers, unions, management, governments, other professionals and the public also receive this information. These information services have been provided at no cost, or on a minimal cost recovery basis.

The 1989 cabinet decision on the budget was that the centre should become financially more self-sufficient over the next three years for the information services provided to the users of the centre. This decision was based on the fiscal restraints confronting the government but also on the basis of the apparent financial maturity of the centre. Since 1978, the government has helped the centre with about $67 million in operating costs and approximately $2 million per year for other costs.

Since a few years ago, the centre has been recovering some of the costs of producing its information products. The 1989 decision meant that the centre should broaden its base of cost recovery. The costs are those associated with the costs of packaging and distributing these information products that are meant to be recovered, not the costs of the information itself.

The cuts in federal program expenditures are being applied to departments and agencies of the government delivering important services to Canadians. Some of these departmental programs like that of the centre are providing vital information and statistics to both the private and public sector. For instance, Statistics Canada is delivering its information services to its various clients on a cost recovery basis. Why then should the centre on Occupational Health and Safety, which is separate and distinct from government, albeit a federal agency, which has been principally funded by the federal government, be exempted from the general fiscal restraint and government policies on cost recovery?

The centre has demonstrated that it is capable of recovering some of its costs of producing its services. At the same time, it is an enviable market position of having a high quality product which is obviously in demand in a market that can be further exploited.

Cost recovery is not a new principle, nor is it confined to the federal government. It is a matter of good business practice within the public sector. For example, some provincial Workers Compensation Boards charge employers directly through sectoral assessment for the cost of providing workplace accident and injury prevention programs. Other compensation boards directly fund their preventive educational programs through moneys recovered through direct assessment of employers.

I would like to remind the members of the House that the decision to charge for the packaging and handling of the products of the centre was not made initially by the government, but rather, by The Council of Governors over two years ago. The Council of Governors decided at that time to charge for the packaging and handling of the discs, but not to charge for single copies of the other information products of the centre.

The application of this principle seems to be fair and reasonable. Broadening its application to other products of the centre is not unreasonable. Cost recovery is not a new principle. It is the policy of this government and of preceding governments to charge for and recover the costs of producing items of information. The principle of charging a nominal amount for this information is not new, it has been around for ages.

For example, Public Works Canada charges other departments equivalent market rates for accommodation services. Similarly, the Department of Supply and Services provides material and equipment purchasing services for other departments on a cost recovery basis. Statistics Canada charges for the data, information and publications that it produces and provides to both public and private sectors. The Government Publishing Centre, the Queen's Printer, of the Department of Supply and Services operates on a cost recovery basis.

I note that my time is coming to an end. I repeat what I said earlier today, that I believe private enterprise is a solution, in many cases, for government distribution of services. Under private enterprise, there is less complacency, more attempt at efficiency, and the people who buy the product are indeed more satisfied and want that product rather than the products that arrive at the door free of charge.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, occupational health and safety are vital issues in Canada. Occupational death is the third leading cause of mortality among Canadians, after heart disease and cancer. Hence, I am pleased to speak in favour of the private member's bill of my hon. colleague from Hamilton West which states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

The centre is the largest Canadian information bank and research centre on work hazards and disease.

The motion by my colleague is in response to this government's decision to reduce federal funding to the centre by 50 per cent by the year 1990–1991 and to totally cut funding by April, 1991. This government, in partial response to criticisms, decided this month to grant the centre $11.6 million to help it become financially self-sufficient in the next three years. This suggests that the government intends to privatize it at the end of these three years.

Established in 1978 as a public corporation by the Parliament of Canada, the centre is an independent tripartite council of governors from labour, employers and government. Its objectives are fourfold:

(1) to promote health and safety in the workplace in Canada;

(2) to facilitate participation by labour and management in the establishment and maintenance of high standards of occupational health and safety at all levels of government;

(3) to assist in the development and maintenance of policies and programs aimed at reducing or eliminating occupational hazards; and

(4) to serve as a national centre for statistics and other information relating to occupational health and safety.

Indeed, the centre has operated on the principle that it is the right of all Canadians to have access to information that they need to achieve their fundamental right to health and safety in the working environment. It is this principle that would be violated by this government's decision to privatize the centre.

I would now like to discuss some of the statements that have been made in the government-directed draft business plan for the centre.

First, under the mission and objective section of the draft business plan for the centre, it is stated: "The centre must become a commercial organization while operating under its basic mandate of serving workers." The plan also states that it is premature at this stage to state that the trend will be towards financial self-sufficiency and independence.

It is obvious that profit-seeking will take priority over serving workers under the proposed business plan, and this will jeopardize the fundamental principle of the centre, namely, that all Canadians have a right to access to information to achieve a healthy and safe working environment. Obviously, this government is not caring enough to continue promoting this essential right.

In the business plan, it also states: "It was not possible to conduct the kind of detailed market research and implementation planning necessary to develop a business plan that represents a firm commitment. Despite this, it has been concluded in this plan that financial self-sufficiency for the centre is entirely feasible."

This is an admission that this conclusion has been made without sufficient information and evidence. This is unacceptable. It makes a complete farce of the task force's promise of free access for individual Canadians to the centre's important health and safety information.

The third and last point in the business plan that I would like to comment on relates to the principles that govern tri-sectoral sharing in the centre's decision-making. I submit they ought to be continually recognized.

• (1340)

Although the business plan attempts to say that the principles will be recognized, if labour pulls out of the governing council because it believes the centre would no longer be an unbiased, impartial organization and instead, would merely be another business enterprise, then the commitment to tri-sectoral participation will collapse.

When it becomes a business enterprise, the centre will charge user fees which will have a strong negative impact on small employers with limited financial resources.

The government, in its arguments for privatization of the centre, has stated that it would save $10 million a year by cutting off funding to the centre. Is this good money management? Let me cite a few frightening statistics.

The Workers' Compensation Board stated that the direct cost of compensable injuries in 1987 was $3.54 billion. This only includes money spent to compensate workers or their survivors for injuries or deaths caused by workplace accidents and industrial diseases. Not included are productivity losses associated with accidents or diseases contracted in the workplace.

Estimates by Labour Canada put the total cost of direct compensation payments and direct productivity losses at $14 billion per year. This still does not include industrial diseases whose costs are incurred by medicare and welfare plans.

Such statistics are astounding. How much more will they be when the centre is no longer able to perform its current functions?

Mr. David Leitch, a lawyer and director of the Toronto Workers' Health and Safety Legal Clinic, said in The Globe and Mail of October 16, 1989: "Recognizing only the direct cost of workplace accidents and disease and assuming that the centre reduces the rate of workplace accidents by only one per cent per year, the direct savings contributed by the centre would be more than three times its $10 million annual budget."

Mr. Speaker, I ask, is the plan of the government good money management?

In conclusion, it is obvious that the withdrawal of government funding from the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety will not help reduce the deficit or our health care costs. Indeed, it will increase them. Cuts to the centre will lead to more on-the-job injuries and work disruptions. It is only too clear that this government puts its obsession with deficit reduction ahead of the health and safety of Canadians. This in itself is objectionable. What adds insult to injury is that by cutting funds to the centre and, hence, threatening the health of Canadian workers, the government will not be saving money. This lack of logic on the part of the government is truly frightening.

Hence, I support this motion. The government must not abdicate its responsibility to occupational health and safety and thereby endanger the well being of our Canadian workforce. The government cannot afford to do it. This House must show leadership and tell the government it cannot proceed.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was created through partnership and as an expression of co-operation between labour, employers, governments and health and safety professionals, not only to minimize the pain and suffering caused by work related injury, illness, disability and death of Canadian workers, but also to reduce the economic losses to Canadian society.

During the first 12 years of its operations, the funds provided to the centre by the federal government amounted to some $67 million. During the first six years from 1978 to 1984, the centre received an average of some $3 million per year from the government. During the last six years, from 1984 to the present time, the support has been in the area of approximately $50 million or about $8 million per year. This surely demonstrates the government's concern for the health and safety of Canadian workers.

In addition to the direct financial support the centre has received since 1978, the government has also indirectly contributed through costs of services such as accommodation and translation.

Unfortunately, the national debt and the difficulties in servicing it have resulted in constraints upon this government. It is not good enough for those opposite to speak in terms of the health and safety of Canadians being threatened in regard to any decisions relating to this centre. The fact is that the health and safety of Canadians in future depends very much on deficit reduction, because if the government of the day is not financially responsible, there will certainly be insufficient funds left in the future to maintain any sort of services for Canadian people.

In the spring of 1989, the cabinet decided, because of fiscal restraints and the apparent financial maturity of the CCOHS, that the centre should progressively become financially self-sufficient over the next three years, in so far as the information services provided to its users. This would make the centre independent of funding support from the one partner, through increasing its revenues and by recovering more of the costs of producing the products of the centre from those who use it, that is, all of the partners.

The government's decision on funding is simply that the centre has been asked to broaden its cost recovery policy which it started to implement over three years ago. This decision to recover some of the costs of the centre's products was made by the centre's Council of Governors and not by this government.

In May, 1989, the minister requested that the president of the centre, in consultation with the governing council, develop and submit a business plan to him by the fall of 1989, in order to meet the government's decision on funding. The minister also met with representatives of the centre's Council of Governors to discuss the Treasury Board decision and the requested business plan.

The business plan for the centre's operations was developed by a task force of governors of the centre, with the assistance of Price Waterhouse, management consultants. This plan was presented to the council in January of this year. It was submitted to the minister in February of this year. The business plan reinforces the cabinet's decision and concludes that financial self-sufficiency for the centre is entirely feasible.

The business plan strategy focuses on information products and services that can be delivered through compact disc technology. It suggests development of existing and new markets for existing products. It concentrates on marketing safety related products, and bundles services into packages where possible. It recommends marketing them through existing marketing channels and special arrangements with other organizations and associations.

The key challenge facing the CCOHS will be to meet the challenge of becoming a self-sufficient organization while operating under the basic mandate of serving Canadian workers.

The balancing of these two demanding objectives, while at the same time maintaining the stability of the organization and the conformity of its services through the period of adjustment, will be a challenging task for the management of the centre.

It is understandable, Mr. Speaker, that the sequence of events over the past year have imposed some anxiety upon the staff of the CCOHS and engendered uncertainty about their future. That is why earlier this month the Minister of Labour announced that the Government of Canada would provide interim bridge financing for the centre in order to assist it in becoming financially self-sufficient in the next three years, as proposed in the centre's business plan.

It is the government's intention that the centre will continue its role of providing valuable information to all Canadians on matters of occupational safety and health. The government's decision, again, is simply that the centre should recover more of its cost in packaging and distributing the information products of the CCOHS.

The need for greater devolution of responsibility and accountability and increased efficiency within government agencies is higher now than every before. As part of this government's commitment to financial restraint, it has decided it is no longer possible for the government to be the sole financial supporter of the CCOHS. Accordingly, it is the intention of the government that the CCOHS will continue as a financially viable and useful source of unbiased information on occupational health and safety matters in Canada.

The government's funding decision on the centre is not an attempt to privatize it, which would destroy this unique tripartite partnership and the unbiased nature of the products of the CCOHS. The decision is simply and only to make the CCOHS more financially self-supporting by recovering more of the costs of producing its products.

The reason for this thrust and, indeed, that of many others put forward by this government over the past almost six years is to address the difficulties that were left to it. There is a national debt in the area of some $200 billion and a requirement to find the wherewithal not only to pay for the services and operations of the departments of government, but also to pay interest on the accumulated past debt. This requirement has now reached the area where some 30 cents to 35 cents of every revenue dollar acquired by government has to go to pay interest on that past debt that was acquired over roughly the period from 1970 through 1984-85.

• (1350)

The need to deal with this debt and deficit problem has become the most compelling factor on the national scene. If the problem is left unaddressed and without sufficient attention being paid to it, we shall soon reach the position where so much of the revenue of government will be required to pay interest on that past debt, there will virtually be nothing left to carry on the essential services that Canadians expect of their government.

It is against that difficult background that the Department of Labour, and indeed all of the departments of government, have to operate today. That is why it is necessary to ensure that some of the services which are put out in fact have to become financially self-sufficient.

In closing, I want to reassure the House that the funding of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety reflects these philosophies and will not result in the closing of the centre. The changes merely reflect this government's belief that the CCOHS is now a viable enterprise, capable of becoming more self-sufficient financially. This opinion has now been supported by the Council of Governors itself in their business plan for the centre.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to support my colleague from Hamilton West who sits in the opposition on this side of the House who has moved the following motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

[Translation]

When the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was founded approximately 10 years ago, its primary purpose was to serve workers and the general public by informing them of potential hazards in their respective workplaces. It was supposed to warn workers and help them avoid, as much as possible, unfortunate accidents that might also put their lives at risk.

As a result, the federal governments been annually saved millions of dollars which would otherwise have been spent on hospital care.

Every year, work-related accidents involve direct and indirect costs totalling $17.7 billion, and the government is fully aware of this. Furthermore, we must not forget that accidents in the workplace are the third major cause of death in Canada, after heart disease and cancer.

The government wants to make the centre an autonomous, fee-for-service agency.

Mr. Speaker, I predict that if this is done, the centre will close very shortly.

In its frenzy of cutbacks in all areas that come under its jurisdiction, the government does not seem to realize the long-term consequences of its actions. To operate on a profit basis is entirely acceptable. In fact, it is the way any organization should operate. The problem with putting the centre on a commercial basis is that it would doom the centre to disappear, because it was not meant to operate this way, and the organizations with which it has reciprocal agreements and exchanges of information free of charge would be reluctant to continue this relationship.

Obviously, foreign governments, various United Nations programs and international labour organizations involved in the same type of work as the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety will seriously consider withdrawing their support from an agency that sells the information it obtains free of charge, especially since the information was obtained by non-profit organizations.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety must continue to be subsidized by the government, otherwise it may very well close down or eventually be privatized, which amounts to the same thing. If fees are charged, services will be more readily available to those who can pay for them than to the persons for whom the centre was in fact founded, the workers, who will then be cut off from information they desperately need.

The Canadian government must ensure that all Canadian workers have access, free of charge, to any information relating to occupational health and safety.

[English]

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on this motion this afternoon. I think it is important for everyone to realize that this centre was established by an act of Parliament in 1978 and that the objective of the centre is to gather, evaluate and disseminate occupational health and safety information to Canadian workers.

In putting forward a business plan for the future of this centre, it is certainly not the intent of the government or any other of the partners involved in this centre to weaken its future. Quite the contrary, it is the intent and certainly the concern of the government that this centre have a very positive future and have a sound financial basis from which to operate.

Mr. Speaker, you will be aware that for many of the services of government and partners of government, there has been an action by the federal government to try to make a number of these services more self-sufficient, to increase cost recovery, and certainly the action here is not out of line with many other actions that have been taken on other government services. It is important that we realize that and concentrate on firming up the future of this centre in a self-sufficient manner.

Therefore, a business plan for this centre's operations has been developed by a task force of governors of the centre with the assistance of Price Waterhouse, management consultants. The plan was presented to the council on January 23, 1990 at a meeting in Hamilton and was submitted to the minister in February. The business plan reinforces the cabinet's decision and concludes that financial self-sufficiency for the centre is entirely feasible.

The key problem facing the centre will be to meet the challenge of becoming self-sufficient in the future while operating under the basic mandate of serving Canadian workers. The balancing of these two demanding objectives, while at the same time maintaining the stability of the organization and the conformity of its services through a period of adjustment, will be a challenging task for the management of the centre.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have six minutes remaining in his debate the next time the motion is brought before the House.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

MINORITY LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court decision in the Mahé case is an important victory for linguistic minorities in Canada. The Court ruled that section 23 of the Charter of Rights includes the right to manage and control schools. I want to remind the House that Franco-Albertans were able to go to court to determine their rights because in 1980 the Liberal government decided to repatriate the Constitution and include a Charter of Rights in it.

At the time, we decided that we had to define once and for all the rights that belonged to all Canadians. We believed that the Charter would thus become an important unifying factor. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, Canada is the big winner in this Supreme Court decision affirming the rights of linguistic minorities in this country.

MINORITY LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on March 15, the Supreme Court handed down an historic ruling on francophone minority rights with respect to education. The judgment makes it clear that francophones in Alberta have the right to control and manage their own schools. This is a major victory for all francophones outside Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, it took eight years of waiting and costly legal battles before Franco-Albertans finally saw this fundamental right recognized.

The judgment specifies that the quality of the education offered must equal that of the education given the majority, without necessarily being identical.

However, by refusing to comment on the terms "where numbers warrant" in section 23 of the Charter, the Supreme Court has handed the issue back to the provinces and our legislators.

Considering yesterday's judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that the provinces be more generous in recognizing the legitimate rights of their language minorities and stop harassing them before the courts.

SPORTS

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this House I would like to extend best wishes to Team Canada and all the women who will be competing in the first International Ice Hockey Federation Women's World Championships here in Ottawa.

Beginning today and all this week, teams representing Canada, United States, Japan, Switzerland, Finland, Sweden, Norway and West Germany will face off in this inaugural meeting of the best women hockey players in the world.

As a great hockey nation, we can be proud that the first women's hockey championships are being held here in our capital. I would like to recognize and thank the co-hosts of this event, the city of Ottawa and the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association.

I would also like to recognize Tackla Canada Incorporated, The Ottawa Citizen and the Tyrell Press which as principal sponsors, have offered their assistance in the staging of this world-class event.

I urge all members and the public to go and see the games and cheer on the competitors.

Good luck to you all!

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, moving the National Energy Board to Calgary is an idea whose time has come.

The heart of the oil and gas industry is in Calgary. Naturally the bulk of the board's work involves interfacing with Calgary based companies.

Moving the board's 285 Ottawa employees to Calgary would save dollars and increase and improve access to the oil patch.

The National Energy Board is an independent, self-contained agency which could operate anywhere and should operate close to the source of the action in the industry.

The largest percentage of the costs of operating the board are borne by the industry, so the National Energy Board should conduct its business and spend its money in the community that bears all the costs.

Moving the National Energy Board to Calgary would be more than a symbolic gesture. It would put the National Energy Board in the same business and political environment as the companies and people whose livelihoods depend on its decisions.

TOURISM

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, tourism, Canada's fastest growing industry, is also an industry at risk. Canada's share of world tourism is declining. Our travel trade deficit is now over $3.5 billion and growing. That is an increase of some 28 per cent over the previous year.

While U.S. visitations have declined, the exodus of Canadian visitors to the United States has surged 53 per cent since 1986.

A recent study of 500 American travel agents revealed that Canada does not even make the top 12 destinations for Americans in 1990. Despite this dramatic decline in U.S. visitations, the federal government has slashed its tourism marketing budget 30 per cent since 1988 and now plans to impose a goods and services tax that will result in substantial price increases and a projected loss of 25,000 jobs and $1 billion a year to the industry.

Inadequate tourism marketing and increased taxation is pricing Canada out of both international and domestic tourism markets. At a critical time for tourism, this government has failed to provide the support the industry needs in order that Canada remain a competitive player in the global tourism market-place.

FOOD PROCESSING INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, changing consumer trends and new technology are promising to revolutionize the Canadian food processing industry. Early evidence indicates that Canada's food processors are rising to meet the challenge by becoming increasingly more competitive and market responsive. Despite media reports blaming plant lay-offs and closures on the Canada-U.S. trade agreement, shut-downs can be attributed to changing business cycles resulting from antiquated facilities and company-wide restructuring.

The news that is receiving little attention by the media is the amount of new investment being carried out by food processors. For example, aggregate planned expenditure on plant and equipment in the food processing industry increased by 15 per cent. In the baking sector increases were 40 per cent and up 73 per cent in the red meat industry. From January 1, 1989 to December 31, 1989 there were 18 plant closures, 62 new investments including new plants and plant enlargements, and 35 plant mergers and acquisitions.

Canada's processed food industry is confident in its ability to produce quality products, and the significant increase in Canadian investment is proof of that fact.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, while the Prime Minister is soaking up the rays in Barbados, a growing number of Canadians are venting their outrage at his new 7 per cent goods and services tax, and they are finding new ways to condemn this government's tax grab.

For instance, last week the Liberal Party organized an electronic petition, the first ever in Canadian politics. By calling the hotline number, Canadians could register their vote against the GST. This pilot project was a resounding success. As a matter of fact the response, dare I say, so overtaxed the Bell Canada 1-900 service that a second line had to be installed mid-week.

Over 70,000 Canadian households called to register their opposition to this disastrous tax. Their calls joined the over 600,000 signatures that we have already presented in this Chamber. Those Canadians want to deliver a simple, visible but very loud message to the Prime Minister about his unfair tax; either scrap the GST or Canadians will scrap you.

Stay tuned, Mr. Speaker, for the next chapter in the Liberal Party's continuing fight against this Tory tax grab. Axe the tax.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in June 1987, 11 first ministers agreed on a formula for getting the Province of Quebec back into the Canadian Constitution.

Whatever the outcome will be, in the course of this lengthy process Quebecers have acquired greater maturity and a more balanced outlook, and they are in a better position to weigh the views held by anglophones with respect to Quebec.

The process has also helped a number of anglophones to acquire a better understanding of the position of Quebecers in the Canadian society.

Basically, I think the Meech Lake Accord must be ratified by all provinces, so that we can continue to work for the well-being of all Canadians.

In fact, the following words by Jean Jaurès say it quite admirably, and I quote: "Le courage c'est d'aller à l'idéal et de comprendre le réel".

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is about time this government started listening to Canadians. Over 70,000 households and small businesses called in against the GST on the Liberal Party's phone-in petition, and we want to thank each and every one of those people. Over 600,000 people have signed petitions against the goods and services tax.

Canadians have overwhelmingly said no to this idiotic tax, but this government's response has been to stifle debate in the House of Commons on the proposed tax. It has ignored 600,000 people who have signed petitions. It has also paid no attention to thousands of Canadians who have protested this regressive tax through letters and rallies.

• (1410)

The Conservative government does not care what Canadians think about the GST. It just spends money to advertise a tax that has not yet gone through Parliament.

The Liberal Party of Canada does care what Canadians think. We are listening to the people. We have collected hundreds of thousands of names on petitions against the GST. We will collect even more. The Liberal Party will continue to represent the voice of Canadians in a fight against the GST. We will continue to fight this fight to the bitter end or until this government is defeated, whichever comes first.

DRUG TESTING

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the misplaced priorities and lack of consultation inherent in the government's strategy for substance abuse tabled in this House on Friday last lead us to believe that this report is more a red herring strategy for the political safety of the Tory government than a strategy for the safety of the travelling public.

The public has a right to expect the maximum degree of safety and security compatible with a free society, but this government report fails on both counts.

First, by focusing on mandatory alcohol and drug testing, it simply takes employers and the government off the hook and gives the appearance of doing something about safety.

Second, while concluding that work related stress and fatigue are the primary causes of alcohol and drug abuse, the report totally fails to deal with these causes which result from our mismanaged, understaffed, overworked and deregulated transport industry.

The consultation process on this sensitive area was seriously flawed and worse as a signed agreement with the Canadian Labour Congress, and consultation was unilaterally broken by the government. That plus the unrealistic 90–day committee study suggested by the government leads us to believe that this policy is designed to meet the conditions and timetable of U.S. laws and the U.S. government rather than the needs of Canadians.

We can only hope that the transport committee will put this report into a proper context, give appropriate recognition to the rights of Canadians and consult more fully than did the government.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, March 18 to March 24, 1990 marks Manitoba's first Immigration Awareness Week. The event celebrates the contribution immigration has made to the growth and development of our community and country. Immigration has enriched our social environment, multicultural mosaic and political system,and has strengthened our commitment to family values and humanitarian ideals.

Equally important, immigration has stimulated Canada's economy through an inward flow of capital, $6 billion in 1988; the creation of jobs, 36,000 within the next six years; increased demands for goods and services; more taxes paid; and provision of a quality labour force. I therefore salute the Manitoba steering committee with its multi–sectoral representations for their laudable initiative.

I invite my colleagues in Parliament during this week to celebrate with Manitobans the role immigration has played in the building of our province and our nation.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, in periods of dissension or disagreement in a partnership or between family members is the fact that we can appreciate, respect or love another just as much for dissimilarities as those points that we share or have in common.

Canada for 125 years has been a country that includes the province of Quebec with all her differences, and it is those differences that make Canada the country, Canada and its citizens more unique and more attractive.

Quebec's uniqueness must be allowed to foster. She must be allowed to grow within the Confederation of Canada as a strong and contributing family member who may have different points of view and opinions, but whose differences should not be judged as ones of intolerance but ones of appreciation and appeal.

SPORTS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party is very pleased that Canada is hosting the first ever women's world hockey championships in Ottawa beginning today and running this week.

It is only appropriate that Canada, the birthplace of hockey, be the site of this landmark event. Hockey is truly a great sport, a sport which Canadians take great pride participating in and supporting.

I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party would like to commend the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association and the International Ice Hockey Federation for recognizing the value and merit of this event and sanctioning it.

We hope that this is the first of a series of steps which would see both the increase in popularity of women's hockey in Canada and around the world and rapidly lead to the inclusion of women's ice hockey in the Olympics as a full medal sport.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I read in the paper that the Liberal Party had set up a phone line so people could call and express their opinion on the GST. I thought this was a decent idea because I think Canadians should have an opportunity to express themselves.

I called the number and a machine came on and told me my vote had been recorded and then the line went dead. I did not have a chance to say anything.

Then I called the government's GST hotline and a real person came on and gave me information. I believe Canadians would rather have information about the GST and make up their own minds.

I urge all Canadians to call the GST hotline at 1-800-267-6620. Once again, that is 1-800-267-6620.

CANADIAN POLICEMEN'S CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, this week, the town of Cap-de-la-Madeleine is hosting the 35th Canadian Policemen's Curling Championship. This will be an opportunity for all participants to get to know each other and develop strong ties that will remain, beyond the barriers of distance and language.

I would like to take this opportunity to stress the magnificent job being done by police officer Raymond Rochefort and his team of volunteers, who during the last two years have worked so hard to make this event a great success. We had some indication of this at the official opening which took place at the Jean-Guy Talbot arena yesterday afternoon.

I also would like to mention the town council of Cap-de-la-Madeleine which went all out to support Raymond Rochefort's team in every way.

The Canadian Policemen's Curling Championship is so successful thanks to the determination of all those who believed that making this event a success was the best way to show all Canadian provinces that the people of Cap-de-la-Madeleine know how to organize and get things done.

Once again, our congratulations to Raymond Rochefort and his team, and many thanks to all those who trusted Cap-de-la-Madeleine to organize this first-class event.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

This government always claims to support the concept of sustainable development, and I am sure we will hear a lot of high-flown rhetoric in that regard at the Globe 90 conference in Vancouver this week. Almost two years conference in Vancouver this week. Almost two years ago, in June 1988 at the International Conference on the Changing Atmosphere, the Prime Minister said:

> We have established mechanisms to ensure that economic decisions take environmental impact into account.

Yet last week, the Federal Court of Appeal agreed with an environmental group when it ruled that the federal government failed to apply its own environmental assessment rules before approving the construction of the Oldman River dam.

Why has the government not used the Navigable Waters Protection Act to stop construction of the dam? When will the government apply the mechanisms the Prime Minister boasted about over two years ago to protect the environment, or is the government saying its participation in the Globe 90 conference will be nothing more than a sham?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's conclusions are totally inaccurate and inappropriate. This government has had a tremendous record on the environment and the commitment has been reaffirmed, has been recognized and has been acknowledged; perhaps not over in the Liberal Party but certainly throughout the world.

Both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Environment have indicated that this is a very complex ruling. It is being considered in a very full manner and, when a decision is reached as to the next steps that the federal government will take with regard to this matter, it will be announced in an appropriate fashion.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Federal Court couldn't be clearer. It says that the government does not have the option. It is obliged to stop construction of this dam and, second, to apply a full environmental assessment to this project before it goes ahead.

This decision reinforces two previous decisions of the same court on the Rafferty–Alameda dam. These decisions together say that when any project has federal implications it cannot go ahead until there is first a full federal environmental assessment.

• (1420)

Why is the government ignoring the decision of the Federal Court and thereby failing, in the Prime Minister's words, to ensure that economic decisions take environmental impact into account? How does the government expect to be taken seriously on the environment when it is ignoring the words of its own Prime Minister and when it fails to uphold, enforce and accept the decision of the Federal Court on the Oldman River dam case?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are two or three points which should be brought to the attention of the House.

First, the decision with respect to the Oldman River dam that was just handed down was contrary to the earlier decision of the court. It is certainly appropriate, therefore, for Justice, Transport, Environment and Fisheries and Oceans officials to consider very carefully the implications of that decision.

Second, I would remind the hon. member that the decision handed down by the appeal court did not address the issue of construction, despite what the member just said.

Third, with respect to the concept of sustainable development and whole issue of environmental assessment, it is very clear that the government has indicated from day one that it will be implementing the federal guidelines, the EARP guidelines, and that it will be doing that in the very reasonably near future.

I point out, in conclusion, that after Rafferty–Alameda there were appropriate deliberations and the right decision was made after a period of several days. I suggest the same thing will happen here again.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks of environmental assessment guidelines that are going to be coming in the future, but the Prime Minister said almost two years ago that these mechanisms are already in effect and are to be applied when there are economic decisions to be taken. The member has failed to explain why the government is ignoring its own policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, three times, citizens had to go court to make the federal government enforce its own environmental legislation.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Can we really expect Canadians and people from all over the world who have come to attend the Globe 90 Conference to believe this government when it promises, and I quote: "an environmental agenda aimed at ensuring sustainable development", when this government doesn't even comply with its own environmental legislation? Can we?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to sustainable development, promises made, and the Globe 90 Conference which is a landmark conference taking place in Vancouver this week.

I would suggest that those who are attending the conference, perhaps later this afternoon, will in fact hear news from the government with respect to promises made and with respect to sustainable development. I think it is the kind of news that all Canadians and people throughout the world, particularly in the province of Manitoba, will applaud.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Now that the minister has had a few days to think about what he said in Montreal, that Canadian workers should not be so greedy, and about his refusal, to listen to senior citizens who objected to his GST bill, is the minister prepared to apologize to senior citizens in Quebec across Canada, as well as to Canadian workers who object to his GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think what the hon. member has done is, first, totally distorted what I had to say about wages and salaries. Second, he has put the thing totally backward in relation to my meeting with the senior citizens.

I think I heard the hon. member say that I did not want to hear the senior citizens. Quite the contrary, I did want to hear the senior citizens. That is why I set aside an hour and a half that day to meet with 15 organizations, to have a dialogue on the goods and services tax, to hear their points of view, to tell them what my points of view are, and to see whether we could get some better understanding. Unfortunately most of the people who came to that meeting left before we had any dialogue. I think that is very unfortunate.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the point is that the minister refuses to listen to anyone who opposes his tax. He has attacked everyone—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): —who has ever had anything to say about it.

Since the Minister of National Revenue has floated figures from $200 million to $365 million, and since there have been figures as high as $1.4 million to implement the minister's goods and services tax, will the Minister of Finance, in consultation with the Minister of National Revenue, finally tell Canadians how much it is going to cost to implement and administer the goods and services tax? One figure.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the hon. member again saying I refuse to listen. What we have been doing over the course of the last five years, and intensively since June 1987, has been just that: listening, discussing, and having a dialogue to understand the points of view people have on the goods and services tax. We have made a number of changes to reflect the points of view that Canadians have put forward.

Unfortunately I have not been able to have a dialogue with members of the Liberal Party of Canada because the Liberal Party of Canada has no alternative. They have no ideas. They have not put any proposals forward as to what they would do. They say "replace the existing sales tax", but then they do not say how we would find the $18 billion that the existing sales tax is raising for us now. Unfortunately we have had a total cop-out from the Liberal Party of Canada.

My hon. friend asks for the specifics on the administration of the goods and services tax. I point out that he said it is going to cost $1.4 billion to implement the tax. That is wrong. If he would check The Budget Papers, he would see very precisely the amounts of money for the administration as well as the implementation.

I point out that the $1.4 billion figure which has been floating around includes the cost of implementation and the first four years of the administration of the tax.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. On the weekend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs drew a parallel between the consequences of non–ratification of Meech Lake and the violence during the 1970 October crisis in Quebec. Does the Deputy Prime Minister really believe that this kind of statement, which is insulting to Quebecers, will help promote the Meech Lake Accord? Is that the kind of leadership the Prime Minister meant?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should be a little more circumspect about claiming she speaks for the people of Quebec.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If she wants to quote me, she should not quote just a few passages out of context of what I said in Edmonton, and that is the plain truth. Many critics of Meech Lake tend to forget the kind of situation we had here in Canada a few years ago, when there was a wave of separation in the province of Québec and threats of violence in the streets. We cannot afford to forget Canada's history if we are to achieve unanimous ratification of the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians are increasingly concerned about the future of this country. Surely discussions about violence or potential violence simply fuel the flames of that concern.

What is this government doing to promote a reconciliation of this country instead of fuelling the flames of dissension?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question because there has been outstanding leadership from some of the members of her party who have been working very closely on this issue. We appreciate that support very much. I particularly refer to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, who has been very instrumental and very supportive of the exercise. I can assure the hon. member that discussions are ongoing. There is still hope that some accommodation may be reached. I still believe that with goodwill prevailing, and tolerance and understanding, the future for ratification of the accord is very much alive and very much a clear possibility.

• (1430)

The Prime Minister, as you know, is out of the country at the present time on official government business. I can assure the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party that even while he is out of the country he is working on it and he will be totally seized of the issue when he returns.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I appreciate the Deputy Prime Minister's serious response to a serious question about the future of this nation.

Are the Prime Minister and his government prepared to call a full and open conference long before June 23 so that Canadians can hear the dialogue and understand what is involved to reconcile the impasse that we are at now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House on an earlier occasion, that has certainly not been ruled out. But I think it is important to ensure that there is progress made in closing some of the gaps with respect to the divergent views of the three provinces that are still having difficulty with the accord.

My sense is that if there can be a closing of that gap and some progress made, it may very well be appropriate to call a First Ministers' Conference. As I said, that has not been ruled out but I think the timing is important here. Hopefully there can be some progress made before the convening of such a conference.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the newly minted Minister of Fisheries who, I may say, has made an impressive beginning in what is a difficult portfolio. To his credit, in the last three weeks or so he has seen first hand the havoc and pain being caused by the collapse in the inshore fishery in Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada generally, the cutbacks in the offshore and the shut down of fish plants.

Is he in a position now, or could he put a time frame on when he might be in a position to announce on behalf of the government a comprehensive emergency response program to come to the aid of the fishermen and the plant workers whose incomes have been decimated by the events I have mentioned?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the situation in the fishery in Atlantic Canada is very complex. I have been busy in the last two weeks since my return from Atlantic Canada consulting with my colleagues on the Northern Cod Committee who have been seized with this issue for a long time.

We are progressing in trying to shape an initiative on the part of the government that will address the concerns of the people living off this resource in Atlantic Canada. I am hopeful, although I am unable to give a definite time frame, that in the very near future we will be able to put in place initiatives addressing the concerns that exist.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. He would have had an opportunity by now to peruse and perhaps study closely the findings and recommendations of the Harris panel on northern cod.

Why is it taking so unconscionably long to make this report public, if not to act on it certainly to make it public? Also, in particular, could he tell us whether he anticipates any further cuts in quotas or plant closures or lay-offs as a result of the recommendations contained in the Harris findings?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, given the severity of the problem and the issues in Atlantic Canada in the fishery, I do not think that it would be to the advantage of the fishery in all of Atlantic Canada to rush the release of Harris just for the sake of being expedient. I and my colleagues agree that instead of coming with a quick answer we should put it in the context of the whole fishery in Atlantic Canada in order that we put in place what is right for the industry, and that is what we are aiming to do.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and pertains to the events happening in Lithuania this weekend.

On several occasions the president of the U.S.S.R. has ruled out the use of force as a reaction to Lithuania's declaration of independence. Over the weekend, however, military aircraft, tanks and Soviet troops staged manoeuvres near the border between Lithuania and Byelorussia.

Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs called in the ambassador of the Soviet Union to find out exactly what the Soviet Union is trying to achieve with these manoeuvres after promising that no such military tactics would be used?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed called in the Soviet ambassador and expressed our concerns about this matter, and I know they are concerns shared by the whole House.

I think the House would be interested in knowing that there are Canadian citizens involved in helping the government of Lithuania with its activities, including its media relations. One of those Canadians, Carla Gruotis, has told Canadian government officials that the low-level military manoeuvres that were taking place in southern Lithuania, especially near the Byelorussian border, are "unnerving but not serious" and attributed them to over-zealous local commanders. That is the view of Canadians working with the Lithuanian government in the area.

Nonetheless, we are very concerned about these matters. We are in touch with the Government of the Soviet Union urging it to recognize the clear majority opinion expressed by the people of Lithuania, to proceed in a way that will yield a negotiated, acceptable solution and to respect the commitment that was given to me by Mr. Shevardnadze that there would be, to use his words, "no crackdown".

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. minister for that detailed response. Canadians of Lithuanian descent are very concerned about the breakdown in communications in Lithuania. Many have been trying to no avail to get in touch with their families and friends.

Has the Secretary of State already in his talks with the ambassador broached the subject, or does he intend to broach it with the ambassador so that Canadians can be assured that their loved ones are safe?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are pursuing that but telephone lines which have to run through Moscow to get into Lithuania are subject to what Soviet authorities are calling "preventive maintenance".

We are asking that that phase of preventive maintenance be ended and that communications be encouraged and allowed between Canadians of Lithuanian origin and their relatives and friends in Lithuania.

MULTICULTURALISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. When will the Prime Minister fulfil his election promise, which he repeated again just recently, to acknowledge the injustice of the racist Chinese head tax and also the Chinese Exclusion Act?

Also, when will he apologize officially for injustices that were perpetrated against Ukrainian Canadians during World War I when they were interned and also Italian Canadians and others who were interned unjustly during World War II?

Does the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that it is important for us to acknowledge these past injustices in order to help prevent a recurrence of racism and prejudice in Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, on behalf of the Secretary of State, that the government is used to working with different communities in this country as it has with the Chinese community.

The Secretary of State is working on this matter at the present time. He has met and will meet again with representatives of the community and that is the way that the Secretary of State will address that issue.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister since this is a matter of government policy.

• (1440)

We know that there are different views on the question of redress. Would the Deputy Prime Minister appoint a national redress commission that would develop redress policy and that would also recommend specific compensation in the cases of redress that I have mentioned?

Will the minister, in co-operation with the minister responsible for multiculturalism, and perhaps the Minister of Justice as well, consider establishing a national redress commission?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I believe that when I answer the questions of the hon. member I am speaking on behalf of the government.

I think it is a very serious question and that is the way I take it. I believe also that the Secretary of State is, as I was when I was in that position three years ago, always working with the communities in the way that he determines.

Ms. Mitchell: That's not the question.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The member is not satisfied. I am not finished my answer, Mr. Speaker.

He will work with those communities in the way that he determines is the best, and I am sure the member will agree with that. It will not be necessarily what she proposes, but we have done a lot of things that she never proposed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Over the last few days the Liberal party has been running a 50 cent phone line telling Canadians that if they call the number they will be recorded as being in opposition to the GST.

Media reports indicated that some 60,000 calls were recorded. That has been updated today to 70,000. Of course, we do not know how many duplications there are.

I would like the Minister of Finance to tell the House how many calls the government is getting on its hotline and for what kinds of information about the GST Canadians are asking.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a very perceptive question which the hon. member has asked.

In fact, since our 1-800 number was put in, in early August, we have had over 100,000 calls. In recent weeks we have had as many as 7,500 calls in a day. So there is a very large number of Canadians who are interested in getting information. Seventy per cent of the callers who have used our 1-800 number have asked for information about the GST.

I have something here from the member for Ottawa—Vanier. He says that this government does not want to know what you think. The implication is that Liberals do want to know. But then he asks the question: "Are you for or against the GST?" and gives the 1-900 number. But when you call the number you get a recorded voice that does not listen to whether the answer is yes or no—

Some Hon. Members: He called, he called!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AMERICAN EXPRESS

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance or the Minister of State for Finance.

The Minister of Finance announced recently that, contrary to his undertaking of a year ago, the government will issue a banking licence to American Express without waiting to introduce its long delayed financial institutions legislation.

Since American Express, a foreign corporation, is not a bank in its domestic jurisdiction, but rather a commercial corporation, will the minister confirm that the government is now saying that a foreign corporation will be allowed to do in Canada what a Canadian corporation cannot do in Canada or, for that matter, in the United States?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows very well that we neither meant nor said such a thing, nor would we act in such a way. We are dealing here with one of the world's best known financial institution organizations that gets 90 per cent of its resources from financial services and it is already operating in Canada without being regulated. Surely the member will agree that there is a lot of merit in having this company regulated.

Furthermore, we have worked on this for well over three years. In mid 1985, we worked very carefully with the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to be sure that it would be within the Bank Act. We are satisfied that they are within the Bank Act.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well that the central question in this issue is that American Express is not regulated as a bank in its domestic jurisdiction.

The minister knows that in the case of all foreign banks operating in Canada, both the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation rely upon, and must rely upon, banking information supplied by the foreign jurisdiction to regulate the foreign bank here in Canada.

Since American Express is not a bank in its domestic jurisdiction and since, accordingly, the United States government cannot supply the necessary information, can the minister explain to the House how the government proposes to regulate American Express in Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this is precisely the point. American Express will be regulated in Canada. We have also asked them to provide us with letters telling us their situation and to protect their investment here.

We are fully satisfied that this organization can function properly within the Bank Act. We have followed the guidelines and we will, therefore, proceed with this matter.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. On December 15, 1989, the minister responsible for the Treasury Board announced several cuts in government programs.

For instance, he indicated that the photo lab of the Canadian Centre for Exhibition was to shut down. On the same day, 93 people received lay-off notices. The government also announced that it would sell two of its Challenger jets that are so often used and even abused by cabinet ministers.

As of last Friday the government had done absolutely nothing to dispose of those jets. Why is the government so quick to cancel everybody's else programs and so slow when it comes to cutting its own benefits?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the fiscal year ends on March 31. The two Challengers will be taken out of service, and the appropriate procedure followed. In the circumstances, there is nothing out of the ordinary about the present procedure.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious the ministers opposite have no intention of taking commercial flights with the rest of us Canadians who are not so keen on hearing them talk about the GST.

I would now like to put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister himself, today's Acting Prime Minister. When will he implement his ministers' own statement? Doesn't he think his government lacks credibility when it advised civil servants of their lay-off a mere 24 hours after announcing the program cuts on December 15 last year, while months later, nothing has been done about the planes? It has now been four months, and nothing has been done about getting rid of these planes. When will the government finally make good on its commitments?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the Challenger jets, one of the reasons that this government is able to dispose of two Challenger jets is because we have reduced the use of them by 37 per cent from the days when the Liberals used them.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. I would like to ask him about some comments made by the Prime Minister on his recent trip to Mexico.

As the government is aware, thousands of jobs have been lost along the U.S.-Mexican border through the Maquiladora program where jobs that were paying $12, $14 or $16 an hour are now being done by Mexican workers at $1 an hour. The products are then imported back into the United States. Questionably some of them may even return to Canada.

In light of those thousands of jobs lost and that trade agreement affecting the Maquiladora program, is it the government's policy to pursue a free trade agreement with Mexico?

• (1450)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as usual, is talking through his sombrero. There have not been thousands of jobs, or any jobs, lost with respect to the Maquiladora area, for the simple reason that under the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, if the hon. member had read it as I have—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If the hon. member has read every jot and tittle of the agreement, as I now have, he will see that there has to be a certificate of origin. The goods have to originate in the United States or in Canada to be admitted under the free trade agreement at the duty rates that are provided.

With respect to Mexico, there are no negotiations under way for a free trade agreement between Canada and Mexico, but we are attempting to improve our trade with Mexico, and the Prime Minister has just had an astoundingly successful visit in Mexico.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I asked for the Deputy Prime Minister and I got a Mexican jumping bean instead. And I am not alluding to any methanol or to the potential consequences.

I would like to ask a question of any one of the ministers who wants to deal with this question, through the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has said that 200,000 jobs have been created by the free trade agreement and 25,000 of those jobs were created last month alone. When the Minister for International Trade was at the committee he could not list one single job that had been created by the free trade agreement.

Is the government now prepared to table, in detail, all of the 200,000 jobs that the Prime Minister says have been created and, specifically, the 25,000 jobs he said have been created in the last month? Will it table the information in this House?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, all we need to do is refer to an impartial third source with respect to the value. I will not even cite the Prime Minister as an impartial source. All we have to do is refer to an impartial third source. We have just had a report from the Japanese mission to Canada, led by the president of Mitsubishi, who says that Canada is a much more attractive place for investment as a result of the U.S.–Canada free trade agreement. I can cite any number of plants which have expanded—

Some Hon. Members: Table them!

Mr. Crosbie: Someone should table the hon. member and perhaps we would get some sense out of him in that case.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question too is for the Minister for International Trade. The minister will be aware of an article which appeared recently in The Globe and Mail, which described this as a "new era" in relations between Mexico and Canada.

In keeping with this government's enviable record of enhancing Canada's reputation as a trading nation, would the minister explain to the House the significance of the agreement signed by the Prime Minister recently, particularly in light of the fact that there was a 25 per cent increase in trade between Mexico and Canada in 1989?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is unusual to hear a rational and sensible question asked in the House.

An Hon. Member: Did you write it out?

Mr. Crosbie: It is hard to compete with the barrage of barracking that comes from the hon. gentleman in the New Democratic Party. That substitutes for brains and elocution. It is just a lot of noise from the hon. gentleman.

The Prime Minister actually said that a free trade zone—now listen gentlemen, please—involving Canada, the United States and Mexico may be only a decade away. So it may be a decade or it might be a bit longer.

There was signed in Mexico the new framework for trade and investment consultation as well as a customs agreement. And MOUs on agriculture and forestry co-operation are designed to facilitate increase in trade in both directions.

That is the effect of the agreement signed and I am glad that the hon. gentleman is interested in what was signed, and not in a lot of specious rumours that are repeated by the hon. gentlemen of this House.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Press reports say that the Deputy Prime Minister met with the Canadian Bankers Association to talk about the serious financial crisis facing Canadian farmers this spring. Many banks are refusing to give loans based on the farmer's equity in his farm and are only giving loans based on cash flow considerations. Many crops are priced so low this spring that there is no cash flow.

Was the Deputy Prime Minister able to get some kind of commitment from the Canadian Bankers Association that they would provide production loans for farmers to plant their crops this spring based on an equity basis rather than cash flow? Was he able to get any commitment like that last Thursday?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. members knows, we have set up a federal-provincial monitoring committee to assess the situation and that report has been made. We met with the banks to talk about the current debt situation, particularly as it applies to the province of Saskatchewan. The premier of Saskatchewan was there as well. We talked about a number of possibilities and options that might be considered.

All I can say to the hon. member is that it was agreed that the problem is one that will require a joint solution. It will require the close co-operation and participation of various components within the agri-food industry including the banks, the Farm Credit Corporation, the provinces and the federal government.

I can assure the hon. member that we are working very hard on this particular issue at the present time having regard to the fact that the period for seeding is not too far in the future. The deputies will be meeting later this week and the ministers of agriculture will be having a meeting later this month. Hopefully by that time we will be in a position to announce something in a more specific vein.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture have known since last November that this financial crisis was upon us. Groups like the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Ontario Corn Producers and others have been demanding a special response. The Minister of Agriculture has outlined all the players who will have to co-operate in this. The minister's own department has suggested that provinces like Saskatchewan will have a negative net farm income, the worst situation since the 1930s.

Can the minister clarify exactly when is he going to announce a special response from the federal government, an interim agriculture stabilization payment, a special grains programs or funds well before seeding takes place. Can the minister give that indication right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I just indicated to the hon. member and to the House that last December we set up this federal-provincial monitoring committee to look at all details and all aspects of the current cash flow situation, debt problem and income support systems.

As he knows as well, there is some long-term policy review, specifically in the safety net issue and that work has been accelerated. The report has just been received. We are looking at it and we are trying to design a program that will target and meet the specific needs that have been identified by the committee. As soon as that is done an appropriate announcement will be made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There will be one question from the hon. member for York Centre and also one question from the hon. member for Kamloops.

NORTHWEST PASSAGE AGREEMENT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I want to ask him about the delusions of grandeur he has about this Northwest Passage Agreement with the Americans. The minister said in the House last week three times that Canada's consent was required for all U.S. vessels to pass. That is false. The consent required is limited to ice-breakers. His agreement means, in effect, that other U.S. vessels like submarines and oil tankers can pass without seeking consent.

Is his agreement not a step backward from the long progress to have the Americans recognize our sovereignty?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we will let the people of Canada decide what is a step backward.

When the hon. member was a minister of the Government of Canada, Canada exerted no effective control over its Arctic. Indeed, there was no understanding by the Government of the United States with regard to the requirement to seek the consent of Canada concerning the passage of ice-breakers.

The member will recall that as a result of that consistent Liberal failure, there was controversy during the summer two or three years ago. This government acted to end that controversy and took a substantial step forward by concluding an agreement with the United States by which the United States seeks the consent of Canada before there is a passage through our territorial waters by their ice-breakers.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister who will be only too well aware of how deeply the people in Alberta feel against the goods and services tax.

Since Albertans generally feel that their views in opposition to this tax are generally ignored, would the Deputy Prime Minister indicate whether or not the government will permit members from Alberta to reflect their views and oppose the tax if they so wish?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member should know is that the people of Alberta are wondering what sort of an alternative the NDP would provide and what alternative the Liberals would provide because to date they have provided nothing.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

PRESENTATION OF ELEVENTH AND TWELFTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present the eleventh report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and also the twelfth report of that same Standing Committee.

I intend to move concurrence in the twelfth report at the appropriate time by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CONCURRENCE OF TWELFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to move concurrence in the Twelfth Report of the Standing Committee presented this day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, as we heard earlier in this House today, 70,000 Canadians phoned the 1-900 number objecting to the goods and services tax even though it was reduced to 7 per cent.

When I go to my riding every weekend I am flooded with more petitions asking the government to abolish and reject the proposed goods and services tax at the 7 per cent level.

QUEBEC BILL 178

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I present a duly certified petition from 36 constituents who are concerned that the rights of Canadians are hurt by Bill 178 in Quebec. The petitioners are asking the government to use its power to disallow Bill 178 in the Province of Quebec.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from a number of constituents throughout Manitoulin Island, including Gore Bay, Manitowaning, Little Current, North Bay, Sudbury and Kagawong objecting to the goods and services tax. This is in addition to the 70,000 phone calls that were made last week during a seven day period opposing the goods and services tax.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I too have the pleasure and honour to present petitions to the House which are against the goods and services tax.

These petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36, have been certified correct as to form and content. They state that this is a regressive, invisible and harsh tax which will be a terrible burden on all Canadian taxpayers. I want to point out that all of these petitioners are from western Canada, including many from my own riding of Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, we have had 70,000 calls, and 600,000 petitions submitted to the House.

It is my honour to present another 500 names to add to those 600,000 against the GST, and more and more are coming. The petitioners ask and plead with the government to scrap its ridiculous idea of having this insane tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have at least eight petitions signed by Canadians opposing the imposition of the goods and services tax on January 1, 1991.

These people believe strongly that this will affect low-income Canadians, that it will be an unprecedented tax-grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from London, Stratford, Calgary, Toronto, Kitchener, Victoria and Vancouver.

The petitioners are opposed to the government's goods and services tax. They point out that it is an unfair form of taxation because it ignores the person's ability to pay that tax and they point out that in Canada taxing home heating fuels is a very regressive way to proceed. They ask the Parliament of Canada to do what it can to have the government back off from this tax initiative and go back to the drawing board and come up with something that is real tax reform, something that is fair, equitable and just for all Canadians.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present on behalf of a number of citizens of Saskatchewan a petition calling for the rejection of the goods and services tax.

I am sure the Minister of National Defence would be particularly interested in these petitions because they are from places like Wartime, Saskatchewan, which is his home, Elrose and Plato, Saskatchewan.

These citizens call upon the government to reject the goods and services tax and put in place a tax which would be fair to all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to present a petition certified correct as to form and content under Standing Order 36, wherein the petitioners humbly sheweth the government has failed to provide the resources necessary to fulfil its promise of improved passenger rail service, and whereas the government's deregulation of air passenger service has dramatized the need for safe, convenient, economical, rapid and environmentally sound alternative passenger service, the petitioners urge Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail services in those areas of the country where it can provide the better service.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present two petitions. The first one I add to those previously presented to the House indicating that the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt are against the goods and services tax. These people are from centres such as Grand Forks, Oliver, Kaleden, Penticton, Naramata and other within that riding.

All of these petitioners are asking the government to cease with this proposal which will shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax.

FORESTRY AGREEMENTS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition with respect to the forestry resource agreements with the provinces.

People in various parts of my riding and parts of British Columbia are very concerned that this government continue with the federal-provincial forest resource development agreements.

• (1510)

They ask that I present this petition to encourage the Parliament of Canada to renew the important agreement with British Columbia and thereby provide for renewed commitment to restocking our forest land, advancing forestry research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing new products and markets which will provide us with forestry jobs of the future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition signed by numerous Canadians who are opposed to the goods and services tax and who call upon Parliament to reject this unfair and inequitable tax measure.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions from various parts of Canada calling on the government to modernize VIA Rail services in those areas where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of residents from right across Canada. These petitioners continue to oppose the government's drastic cuts levied on VIA Rail services in this country.

The undersigned signators request that the government maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail services in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

I submit this petition on their behalf.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to submit a petition to the House.

The petition is signed by Canadians at the VIA Rail, Kitchener station. It recognizes that the Government of Canada has failed to provide the resources necessary to fulfil its promise of improved rail service in Canada and calls upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will not be too long. I just want to say that I am very pleased to have the opportunity to commence third reading debate on Bill C-48, legislation to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

I think it is fair to say that the bill has received thorough debate and thorough study at the committee level. As well, it can be pointed out that we have had a very constructive debate at report stage when the government accepted two of the three amendments proposed by the opposition parties.

While we were not able to incorporate the third amendment into the legislation itself, we did indicate that we accepted the proposal in principle, but because it would encroach upon provincial jurisdiction, based upon legal advice that I have received, the government is not able to incorporate it into legislation. Nevertheless as I undertook during the course of that debate, and I undertake again today, we will, in the process of negotiating the federal-provincial crop insurance agreements, try to incorporate the establishment of advisory committees into these agreements so that they will fulfil the purpose for which the hon. member for Algoma intended.

It is important to point out, and it has been mentioned by a number of members, that this bill sort of sprung up in the middle of the night at a meeting in Prince Albert.

This particular issue has been before the farm community for some time. There has been a comprehensive federal-provincial crop insurance discussion paper. It has been reviewed and many of the points that were brought forth in the course of that review have indeed been incorporated into this legislation. It bears repeating that crop insurance is essentially a matter that falls within provincial jurisdiction and we had to ensure that we had the broad based support of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to break in on my hon. friend's speech. It is an important piece of legislation from the government's viewpoint dealing with a very important matter. I have to use this opportunity because as I speak there are security people and police in front of the building preventing protesters from representing their views.

I think we agree that people in this country have the right to assemble, to speak their views and I simply want to protest very clearly that this is not a police state, that the police ought not to be disallowing—

An Hon. Member: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not find that a point of order. I think if the hon. member would like to discuss this matter further, he should discuss it in my chambers.

I will recognize the hon. House Leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr Speaker, last November 22 at a meeting of the Board of Internal Economy at which the hon. member for Kamloops was present, and every other party was represented, a motion was passed unanimously asking the Department of Public Works to amend the public nuisance regulations to move demonstrators back from the entrances of the House of Commons because of the nuisance and security factor. The hon. member agreed with that position. The regulations came forward and have been in the public domain for two weeks which require a 50 metre distance from any entrance. The hon. member now is playing cheap political tricks. It shows you cannot trust the NDP members to keep their word. We are doing what the member asked for.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is debate. This matter should be discussed in the Speaker's chambers.

I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, just to clarify for the record. First, I hope my hon. friend will table the minutes that he has referred to from the Board of Internal Economy. He has read from them, I notice reading Hansard of last week.

I want to say that, yes, I was at the meeting when the decision was taken to ask the minister to look into the situation and take appropriate action. That is where the matter ended at the Board of Internal Economy.

We find that this government has stated that it will not tolerate any dissent to this government in front of Parliament unless you are back at least 50 metres.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognize the hon. Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, during the course of discussions it was agreed that the crop insurance legislation had to be renewed and improved to provide for a more equitable sharing of federal-provincial costs and to enhance the program to reflect the realities of today and the current decade.

• (1520)

This legislation will reform the act to provide producers with guaranteed protection against losses caused by natural disasters. It will also ensure the best insurance coverage available at an affordable cost to the largest number of producers.

One of the major areas of change modifies the calculations which were used to determine the level of protection producers will be eligible to insure. The current act provides a method of predicting yield based on the simple historical average of a producer or of a geographic area. This method has been considered by producers to be inflexible and even punitive.

Bill C–48 provides new approaches to determine insurable yields and these approaches will take into account the use of new technology by producers. It will also buffer producers' yield calculation for successive losses, particularly in western Canada. We have had a situation where the historical average fell because of successive years of drought and other weather related disasters. I might say that the last three or four years in western Canada, in terms of the levels of precipitation and heat have probably been more severe than that experienced during the Dirty Thirties. So you have a problem of successive droughts where the over–all average is reduced triggering the lower level and thereby the producer does not get what would usually be considered a reflection of his normal crop.

Bill C–48 provides new approaches to determine insurable yield. As I said, the government will take into account, not only the new technology and methods of production, but also this problem of successive losses.

The amendments also allow the provinces to offer qualifying producers the option of insuring low risk crops at a higher level of protection. For example, the farmer could qualify to insure a crop at 90 percentage coverage instead of the current 80 per cent.

The provinces will now also have the flexibility of basing unit prices on market value or on cost of production. Again, this incorporates a very important item that will enhance the over–all operations of the crop insurance program.

Another major change being proposed under Bill C–48 provides for more equitable cost sharing arrangements that recognize agriculture is a shared responsibility between the federal and provincial governments.

Under the current act, the most commonly used formula allows provinces to pay all the administrative costs, while the federal government and the producers pick up the share of the premium on a fifty–fifty basis.

Under these amendments the federal and provincial governments will share all administrative costs and 50 per cent of the premiums. Producers will remain at the same proportion, namely paying 50 per cent of the premium and nothing towards the cost of administration.

This is an approach that most provinces favour in the over–all amending approach, the over–all improvements that we see incorporated in this legislation.

This approach will make the cost to governments more equitable, while at the same time provide for additional federal funding for improved program administration, including more producer education about the program.

I should say here that while the percentage of federal government spending, particularly as it relates to the premium, will be reduced. The federal government's over–all financial support of the program is expected to rise above traditional levels because of the enhancements. That was clearly the trade–off in working through the improvements to the crop insurance program.

Enhancements to the program, combined with increased participation and contributions to administration costs will increase federal expenditures under this program above historical levels.

Another proposed change will strengthen the crop insurance regulations. Regulatory provisions are being rewritten to set out clearly the basis for federal contributions to crop insurance. We got into a bit of that debate the other day where the hon. members were suggesting that because we use the words "up to 25 per cent", there was some concern that that would not be the case. That clearly is the case and it is now accidentally or otherwise enshrined in the legislation.

Special provisions are also contained in the new bill that recognize the importance of diversifying agriculture production. Crop insurance will be available on new and minor crops by easing the yield data requirements for them. I think that is a very important feature as well because we are asking the industry to diversify and to engage in new crop production and new plant production. This will provide more flexibility again in ensuring that adequate coverage will be available to cover new crops and that they will not be penalized.

The final major change is a special provision to compensate producers when their crops are damaged by migratory waterfowl. This provision recognizes the federal government's responsibility under international treaty to protect migratory waterfowl. The amendments propose to increase the compensation to 80 per cent of the actual value of the crops damaged.

I have been informed as well of the views expressed by the members of the legislative committee on additional ways to improve the program. I will take them into account before proposing regulations to the Governor in Council and in developing federal provincial agreements with each province. The deadline for signing crop insurance contracts is fast approaching. The provinces, as the insurers, have to know precisely what the terms and conditions governing the federal contribution are going to be as of April 1, 1990.

The provinces and Canada's producers would therefore appreciate our expeditious consideration and passage of this bill.

The changes I have described represent major improvements to the Crop Insurance Act. Through Bill C-48, the federal government is giving producers an insurance program that is more comprehensive and flexible. It is what producers want and this what we are prepared to deliver with this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Humbolt on a point of order.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to point out that we have been unable to get a copy of the bill. Bill C-48 as reported at second reading does not seem to be available in the House and I was wondering whether it could—

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Ask and you shall receive. Bill C-48 is what you want?

Mr. Barrett: I rise on a point of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have just been questioned by a member of the RCMP for speaking to a citizen who is standing in front of this building —myself, Mr. Bellemare, also a member of this Chamber, for speaking to a citizen. The RCMP came and pushed us out of the way—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member would only sit first.

Mr. Barrett: If they did anything wrong, why not take some legal action?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on a point of privilege..

DEMONSTRATION

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege. As a member of this Chamber I was speaking to a Canadian citizen in front of this House. I was accompanied by Mr. Bellemare whose seat I do not know, but he is also a member of this House.

In the process of discussing with this citizen his complaints about the federal government we were interrupted by RCMP officers who grabbed the citizen away from two MPs, both of us clearly identifying the fact that we were members of Parliament. We told the Mounties that and they still grabbed the citizen away from us.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I felt intimidated by having the Mounties listening to our conversation, moving in on the crowd that was around, pushing their way through, past Mr. Bellemare and myself, seizing the citizen and dragging him away with no explanation to myself or to my fellow member.

This is the earliest possible opportunity at which I could raise this matter of personal privilege. My privileges as a member of this Chamber and the precincts of this Chamber have been violated. I ask the Chair to investigate this and do something in terms of responding to a police action that was violating my rights as a member of Parliament.

• (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege, similar to my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: He's blind.

Mr. Bellemare: I think if anyone is blind it might be the hon. member from Halifax. If I may, with the indulgence of the bullies facing us, I would like to explain what happened.

The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and I were having a conversation. We started to speak with one Mr. Kealey, standing in front of the House of Commons across the roadway. We were having a discussion on the accusations that Mr. Kealey was making vis-à-vis the government. We thought his accusations were interesting, outlandish and even entertaining.

We were having a good conversation when all of a sudden at least four very huge RCMP officers decided that they would pull them away from us. At that point, my colleague and I both identified ourselves as members of Parliament and said that we were having a very civil conversation with Mr. Kealey. Notwithstanding that, they dragged the gentleman away. We tried to intercept without physical force, but by insisting we were members of Parliament, and that we would complain if our rights—we do not know what wrong Mr. Kealey had done—were affected at that point as members of Parliament wanting to have a conversation with a private citizen who had not yet been arrested for anything. I then asked the name of the person in charge as they arrested the gentleman and put him in the car. I would like, with my colleague, to identify this officer as Inspector McCallum who was absolutely uncivil to members of Parliament.

Mr. Cooper: Then why don't you lay a charge against him?

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I stand as well on a matter of privilege. It relates to the same factual sequence as was described by my colleagues.

Just to be specific, I attempted to speak with the Roman Catholic priest who was taken away by the RCMP. I was advised by the RCMP that the priest was not under arrest. However, he was in a police car and when I made some move to approach the car and speak with the priest, I was advised that I may not touch the car. I discussed it with the police officers and decided it would be better in terms of discretion not to provoke an incident and I let the matter rest. Subsequently, in front of me, the priest was physically taken away and the Mounties then advised that he was under arrest.

This raises a very serious matter involving the right of free speech. In particular, it involves my privileges as a member of Parliament to be accessed and to be able to speak freely with individual Canadians who are on these precincts and who are not under arrest. I am not critical of the RCMP in the way that they may have carried out their functions this afternoon. If they had a job to do, that may have been the only way they could have done it. However, I am very critical of the regulation that has been passed. I suggest to Your Honour that what is taking place under the regulation in the Public Works Act and what is happening out in front of the House of Commons now is a breach of my privileges as a member and of the privileges of every other member of this House.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to read from the minutes of the Board of Internal Economy meeting of November 22, 1989. In the Chair was the Hon. John Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons. Those present were the Hon. Robert de Cotret, Herb Gray, Robert Layton, Doug Lewis, Messrs. Jim Hawkes and Nelson Riis. Mr. Marleau, Clerk of the House, Major General Cloutier, Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Riedel, Administrator and Steven Ash, Principle Secretary to the Speaker, and Secretary, Mary McDougall.

This committee does not take formal votes. It acts by consensus, and the experience, as I am told—I am just a new member of the committee and was not a member at that time—is not to act if there is strenuous objection from any of the major parties. My colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, nods in concurrence.

According to the minutes, it was agreed that the Speaker would send a letter to the Minister of Public Works requesting that the Public Works nuisance regulations be amended to permit the Minister of Public Works to designate specific areas on Parliament Hill for holding demonstrations and other activities, and to allow the minister or a peace officer to prohibit or evict any persons not complying with this order.

Based on that decision by the Board of Internal Economy, on December 1, 1989, the Speaker wrote the following letter to Mr. Elmer MacKay, Minister of Public Works. It states:

> I am writing to convey to you the concerns which have been raised by the Board of Internal Economy regarding the presence of demonstrators at the entrance of Centre Block, particularly the West Door.
>
> The board discussed the possibility of designating areas on Parliament Hill where demonstrations could take place. The Members agreed that I write you on their behalf requesting you consider amending the Public Works Nuisance Regulations in such a way as to restrict demonstrations, marches or public gatherings to areas specifically designated for such purposes. I understand this could be done by adding to Section 6 of the Regulations a paragraph similar to the following text:
> > (3) No person shall participate in a demonstration, march or other public gathering upon any public work, except in those areas specifically designated for their purposes.
>
> This change would thus allow the RCMP to enforce directives as to the location of any demonstration.
> It is not the intention of the Board to limit access to Parliament Hill by the public but the Board is concerned that Members and staff have access to the buildings, free of harassment and confident of their safety.

Let me repeat that: "—the board is concerned"—this board of which I was not a member, but the member for Kamloops was—, "is concerned that members and staff have access to the buildings, free of harassment and confident of their safety".

The letter goes on:

> I would, of course, be more than ready to discuss with you further should you wish more information.
>
> Sincerely,
> John Fraser,
> Speaker of the House of Commons.

I will not read all of the regulations, because they are lengthy, but based on a unanimous decision of the Board of Internal Economy, with all three parties represented, the Speaker was requested by this group to write to the Minister of Public Works to promulgate regulations, of the sort the Minister of Public works did. They were out there two weeks ago. There were no objections from any member of this House or from any party to these regulations. They are now being enforced by the RCMP.

I have no idea whether the RCMP is exercising proper judgment or whether it is going too far, but I strenuously object to members of this House now standing up and screaming in indignation at the results of an action for which their leaders asked. They are in contempt of the Chair.

Mr. Barrett: The citizens are free to talk to anybody at any time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think that we should carry on with debate in the House—

Some Hon. Members: No!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): —and I think that what I should do is call upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to make a complete report. I can come back to the Chamber, if not today, then tomorrow or the next day, to give a complete report to hon. members. I think that this is where we should cut off debate in this respect, and carry on with debate in the House, so that I can get the Sergeant-at-Arms to make a complete report to the House.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I have just been made aware of what took place on the Hill, and the information we do have is vague. You may wish us to proceed immediately and wait for a report from our distinguished Sergeant-at-Arms, but I have colleagues here who were witnesses to the events which took place. I want to be on the record.

• (1540)

I wish I had been there to see any RCMP officer either take away a paper from me that someone had given me, or ask someone to move along some feet away when we are not aware of these rules. If such a rule was passed, all members of Parliament should be made aware of it.

An Hon. Member: No such rule was passed.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring this to a conclusion. I will ask the hon. member to complete his point of privilege.

Mr. Prud'homme: Every year people come to demonstrate for good causes. With all due respect to the Board of Internal Economy and whatever wishes it may have expressed to the Minister of Public Works who then issues certain regulations, I think that on the Hill, members of Parliament should be made aware of what is going on. We should know the rules. We should not be informed outside suddenly that there is a new rule.

As annoying as some people may be for some members on the Hill, it is totally relevant as far as I am concerned, if there are going to be new rules—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cooper: Nelson, you're part of the process, you should be ashamed.

Mr. Riis: Don't tell me to be ashamed.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I do try to be cool on these questions but if hon. members want to study Parliament, I will tell you how disgusted I am. I just finished visiting inside Parliament. Suddenly, out of nowhere, on the Senate side you see spotlights on the sixth floor, the fifth floor, the fourth floor, the third floor, the second floor and at the main entrance. I believe in security, but I like to know how far this will go.

Members involved should be told. With all due respect, we should be told. If a new regulation is made, it should be discussed in the open and we should not be told by somebody else, a third party. I am not blaming the RCMP who, if they have a new regulation to enforce, are enforcing it. Fine! I am not going to blame these men or women in the RCMP. The one thing I would like to know is what the new rule is. Members should be made aware officially, so that if we wish we can disagree.

If Mr. Speaker was in the Chair, I would say that he should immediately suspend the new regulation until we have a debate on the question.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I was witness to the events that just took place outside. As a member of Parliament, I was aghast at what was taking place outside the peoples' house, the House of Commons. When I and my colleague next to me went over and spoke to the RCMP officers, the question was raised if whether or not the new regulation that has been passed to the Public Works' nuisance regulation, affected me as a member of Parliament. If I wanted to pass out pamphlets outside the House in my crusade against the GST, could I be arrested? I was told that, yes, the regulation that was passed equally applies to me, as a member of Parliament, as it does to any other member of the public.

The point of privilege I am raising is that this particular regulation, I believe, infringes upon my rights as a member of Parliament to do my job and to demonstrate for or against, both inside this place and outside this place, and that means outside the door. I would ask the Speaker to look into this particular aspect.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to take part in this discussion because I was not present at the meeting of the Internal Economy Committee that night. It was one of the few meetings that I did not attend during the year.

I think that the Chair should keep two points in mind. First of all, on the subject of jurisdiction, I think it is difficult to decide whose jurisdiction we are talking about. The privileges of members here in the House of Commons are protected by the Chair. We were always told that outside, on Parliament Hill, Public Works, the National Capital Commission or some other public body had jurisdiction over people's behaviour. Of course, the RCMP enforces the law of the land and I have nothing against that.

There are still two issues that must be dealt with.

[English]

The right of members of Parliament to address citizens on the Hill is the first question I hope will be resolved today. We have to address that question. We have an example today involving the privileges of a lot of members to speak and to discuss with Canadians on the Hill matters of mutual interest. Whether or not they knew about the regulation or not is not my point.

These members apparently did not know about this regulation and were speaking with somebody who has been there for some months. He was giving us in Parliament the message he gives every day. That is, yelling certain things to members of Parliament as they enter the building. That is not the point.

These people were talking to a citizen of this country. In my view, we have to settle that point by asking ourselves: Were their privileges as citizens, and their right to free expression somewhat impaired by the actions of the police? That is the first question.

The second one involves the Board of Internal Economy. The House leader for the government read into the record the minutes of a board meeting. The board asked Public Works Canada to look into the amendments of the regulations affecting conduct on Parliament Hill. They did not come back to the board with the regulations. It was news to many people last week that the regulations had been promulgated by Cabinet.

Regulations are non-discretionary. They must be clear and, as far as I am concerned, they must be without a doubt, interpreted by all people so that we have no difficulty in assessing exactly what is meant.

In this we may have an example of some regulation we could look at. I would probably recommend to the Speaker that this whole thing should be referred back to a committee for a full investigation of: (a) the rights of members of Parliament on the Hill to talk with people; and (b) can we not look at these regulations with a way of adjusting them so that all people concerned would understand what is going on.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, that is a very good suggestion from my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier.

As I have indicated, and I have quoted from the minutes, all that happened was that the Speaker, acting on behalf of the Board of Internal Economy, asked for amendment to the regulations. The regulations were amended and apparently they are being enforced. If what I hear is correct, they are not being enforced in a manner that I would find acceptable. They are not being enforced under direction from the government, I can assure you. They are being enforced by the RCMP, in fulfilment of regulations which were asked for by the Speaker.

In many ways, if that request to the Minister of Public Works was out of order or improper, then we are in essence criticizing the Speaker or the committee. I do not think that is proper. The proper decision now would be for the House or the Chair to ask the Board of Internal Economy to look again at its recommendations and to see whether the request made to the Minister of Public Works was complied with properly. We should treat the matter in that fashion. Otherwise, we enter into a situation where I would be very reluctant ever, in the future, to act on the kinds of request the Board of Internal Economy might make. A fundamental recommendation of the McGrath Commission to involve the opposition in the administration and with membership on the Board of Internal Economy would be put into jeopardy, and that would be an error.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is another point of privilege. This is going to carry on all day. I would like to recognize the hon. member for Kamloops on a point of privilege.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My point of privilege is twofold. The government House leader has indicated that I cannot be trusted because I do not support what the government is doing.

Mr. Hawkes: He did not say that.

Ms. Mitchell: He did say that.

Mr. Cooper: Tell the truth.

Mr. Riis: What he has done is read very clearly—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, if I may have an opportunity to respond. First, I would expect the minister to table the document from which he has quoted. Beauchesne calls for that. I would hope he would have the decency to do that.

He read from the Board of Internal Economy minutes where the board instructed the Speaker to seek amendments to regulations, which he did, on behalf of the board. Presumably, the assumption was that, if there were going to be dramatic changes in the nuisance legislation, dramatic changes in the legislation that would keep people away from Parliament Hill, then that would come back to the Board of Internal Economy. That would go to the Members' Services Committee or come back to the House of Commons.

I noticed with interest that there were people consulted. The RCMP were consulted. The Department of Justice was consulted and, of course, the Department of Public Works. But members of Parliament were never consulted, including those that sit on the Board of Internal Economy. They were not consulted on the details of what the Minister of Public Works planned to do.

Today, we have two issues before us. One is the fact that the government has moved expeditiously, without any consultation with members of Parliament or the caucuses of the various parties as to the specifics of these changes.

We also noted that the request of the Speaker was that there be areas designated clearly to promote demonstration, to encourage dissent, and to encourage people to speak their views. What we see is a zone declared to remove people. That is one point.

The second point is that members of Parliament were not allowed to speak to Canadians in front of the Parliament Buildings of Canada.

Mr. Barrett: That is my point.

Mr. Riis: The police moved in and said: "We will not allow these discussions to take place".

Mr. Hawkes: Did you see them? Were you there?

Mr. Riis: This is not a police state. Eastern Europe has been moving away from this type of tactic.

Mr. Barrett: Are you calling me a liar?

Mr. Riis: Now we have the government moving in such a way that police are not allowing members—

An Hon. Member: Repeat what you said, Hawkes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Boudria: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on the same point of privilege.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one or two brief comments. First, I do believe that what the Speaker should consider is whether or not instructions that he gave were in fact followed in an appropriate manner.

The issue here is not whether the Speaker was out of order, or anything in that regard, as the government House leader insinuated a few moments ago. No one is questioning whether the Speaker acted properly by contacting the Minister of Public Works, after having been instructed to do so by the Board of Internal Economy. It is the result of that communication that we are questioning, not whether or not the communication was authorized or should have taken place. That is obvious. I do not believe that my colleagues are I are criticizing the Speaker for what was done. As a matter of fact, quite the contrary.

Perhaps none of this was intentional, but it is obvious that the government should have got back to Mr. Speaker with what it was that it thought was the solution to the problem, how it saw this particular solution working, and if it was felt by the government that several people needed to be contacted, for example, Justice and a number of others. Members were not consulted and my colleagues were not consulted after that initial action was taken.

The other issue, Mr. Speaker, that you will want to consider is whether this solution offered by the government, adopted in the way that it was, infringes unduly upon the rights and privileges of members of Parliament that have been with us since the action of the British Parliament of 1675. At that time, my colleagues who are familiar with procedure will know that a member of Parliament in the British House of Commons in May 1675, was prevented from having access to the House. At that point the privileges of members of Parliament were invoked. Similarly, my colleagues who were prevented from speaking to a constituent today, I believe, had their privileges affected in much the same way.

Finally, I want to draw to your attention that those regulations refer to disturbances and so on. One person who was removed from the site was Father Van Nee and you will know, Mr. Speaker, that Father Van Nee does not make speeches on Parliament Hill. He has never been recorded to do so, even though he has been there for two years. Father Van Nee is fasting outside the House of Commons. I do not exactly consider his actions a disturbance. He was dragged physically by the police. I tried to talk to him at that point.

Mr. Cooper: Charge the RCMP.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, a colleague across the way says to charge the RCMP. I am making a statement in the House of Commons. I was not hired as a policeman. I was sent here by my constituents. If some other members across the way think they should be policemen, perhaps they should change jobs. Personally I want to stick around this place where I was sent and make this point.

I conclude by respectfully suggesting that the Speaker should contact the Minister of Public Works, have the regulations temporarily placed in abeyance until such time as proper consultation can take place with all members of the House of Commons and most of all, the respective members of the Board of Internal Economy representing the various parties in the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. Then I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer.

I hope that I would then be able to take this whole procedure under advisement and report back to the hon. members. It is pretty hard for the Chair to come up with a solution for hon. members unless I can check with the Sergeant-at-Arms and all those who are responsible who have taken part in the incident this afternoon. I will recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on a point of privilege.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise again on a point of privilege and clarify specifically what my point of privilege is. I am not talking about the regulations. I am not talking about whatever went on in the Board of Internal Economy. I am not talking about any of that.

As a member of Parliament, I was talking to a Canadian citizen in front of these buildings. I was not finished with my conversation and was joined in that conversation by the member for Carleton—Gloucester. Both of us were in a conversation with a Canadian citizen. In the midst of that conversation, four policemen came in, pushed the crowd away, seized the citizen who was talking to us and ended the conversation abruptly, not willingly by myself or the other member.

I want to make my point very clear. It has nothing to do with the regulations, nothing to do with Board of Internal Economy minutes, but absolutely to do with the simple fact that in the midst of a conversation with a citizen, we were interrupted by police and the citizen was dragged away. When we asked questions of why he was being dragged away, we were given an explanation that he was interfering or breaking some rule that was not clearly defined. The only thing that we could see happening was that he was speaking to us.

I want my point of privilege separate. I do not want it with the committee. I do not want it with the Board of Internal Economy. I want the Speaker to look at my complaint, my point of privilege and I want a separate ruling on my point of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Glen Kealey is one of my constituents in Hull—Aylmer. He was my political opponent in November 1988, so I can hardly consider him to be a militant member of my association.

Mr. Speaker, since the 1988 election, Mr. Kealey has been standing here in front of Parliament, every day of the week, to give vent to his criticism of the government. This is all quite true, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Kealey has been here, with other people, for a year and a half.

However, my concern today is the way democracy seems to be lending itself to a new form of dictatorship, when a person can no longer stand in front of the Parliament Buildings and say whether he agrees or disagrees with the government.

Does that mean, Mr. Speaker, that if a an impressive group of citizens were to stand in front of the Parliament Buildings tomorrow and tell the government it did not agree with the GST, the government or the RCMP could arrest every single member of this group? Mr. Speaker, I think we need some clarification about this procedure. I also wonder whether this is perhaps an exercise in preparing for the post-Meech period, to prevent Canadian or Quebec citizens from coming to tell this government what they think.

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I noted that in reply to the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, the government House leader indicated his concurrence in the suggestion made to refer the matter again to the Board of Internal Economy. I would also like to echo the sentiment of my colleague the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and request the Speaker to require the government to rescind temporarily the regulation in question. In fact, I would like to see the government voluntarily suspend implementation of the said regulation.

Obviously, we can see that there are a great many concerns being expressed by members of Parliament. I think it is recognized that dissent and freedom of expression are at the heart of democracy. I think this matter should be clarified very quickly.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the board. I have listened with a great deal of interest to all the discussion that has taken place here today.

Members may recall that not too many months ago there was a protest on the Hill and inadvertently, I think, the entire roadway was jammed. It made it impossible for emergency vehicles of any kind, ambulances or fire trucks, to make it to these buildings. This put at risk not only the members of Parliament who work in these buildings, but members of the staff, as well as visitors who sit in the gallery.

It was that event which led to the discussion in the Board of Internal Economy and to the request from the Speaker to the Minister of Public Works to pass a regulation that would indeed provide peace officers on the Hill with the authority to keep open the emergency lanes related to roadways.

Members may recall that the regulatory process is a very public process, that there has been ample time for all members of this House and indeed for all Canadians to respond to the proposed regulation. It was raised in this House the latter part of last week on an opposition day. It could have been the subject of debate, if it were a debatable item.

If members look at the regulation, they will find that prominent in the regulation is the notion of 50 metres. Why do the words "50 metres" appear in the regulation? Because it is a distance sufficient to protect the roadways from the point of view of protests so that emergency vehicles can make it to the House.

There are people who have been protesting on the Hill for quite some time, for quite a few months, something which I understand from what I have heard from members opposite. Historically, they have been asked since the passage of this regulation to move about 30 feet or 40 feet to a somewhat different location to be in accordance with the regulation passed to protect fire and safety on the Hill.

If they choose deliberately to carry on a protest in a prohibited area then it is a choice they make. If members of Parliament choose to talk to them in that prohibited area rather than in another area, that is the choice they make. Members of Parliament could invite them into the House at any time and into their offices. They could talk to them in many, many places.

Simply, if a member of Parliament stops in the middle of the busiest intersection of Ottawa, right in the middle of the street, and talks to a constituent, there is nothing in law that would lead you to the principle that the Mounties or whatever police force should not come along and remove them all from the intersection so that you can have the safety which roadways require.

Sitting here I felt that maybe there was not enough background for members and—

Mr. Riis: Did your caucus agree with it?

Mr. Hawkes: —if they were to recall the dangerous situation which led to the discussion and the regulation, they might be less unhappy with what happened out there today. The behaviour of particular officers may or may not have been appropriate. I simply say to the House that we put the whole of democracy and all our lives at risk if we allow protests to take place in areas that stop access of emergency vehicles including ambulances and fire trucks.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton–Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I think the comments made by the hon. member who just spoke are totally absurd. I wonder whether he was really there or whether he was dreaming during the incident.

[English]

My colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was having a conversation with Mr. Kealey with whom I often converse because I find him extremely entertaining and very informative. There are times when I wonder why the federal government is not charging him with something where he would have to put up or shut up on the accusations he makes.

I did not stand in the middle of the street; I do not stand in the middle of streets. I am very much aware of municipal, provincial, and federal by-laws regarding highway traffic legislation. I was instrumental, for 20 years, in the development of highway traffic legislation. I am very much aware of the law.

I was on the sidewalk. Mr. Kealey was on the sidewalk. My colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was on the sidewalk. We were having a very peaceful chat with this gentleman.

There are two points here that I wish to make. There is a regulation, apparently, about which we have not been advised as MPs where people may or may not speak, talk, yell, sing, or pray.

We have been informed that a 110-pound priest was dragged away. I have spoken to this priest many times. He hardly speaks to any one. You must approach him to be able to talk with him. Usually it is the individual who initiates the conversation, never the priest. The gentleman in the front of the building was on the sidewalk.

The point I am making here is: as an MP, Mr. Speaker, when you review this rule, do I have a right to go outside either alone or with a fellow MP, to go on the sidewalk and to have a conversation with anyone without being impeded by the RCMP?

Finally I would like to ask you: during an occurrence, to use the police language, of that nature, is it not the right of an individual, a citizen, let alone a member of Parliament, to ask who is in charge of the police group so that one can address questions to that person? This Inspector McCallum did not identify himself—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member brought that to my attention initially. I appreciate his comments. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I think this dialogue is interesting. I would like to ask the Speaker to take this whole matter under advisement.

However, there is one point that bothers me, and some of my members here who have not spoken today would like to get involved in it. It is this point: members who were outside were asking the police forces whether if they had spoken or if they were going to circulate documents, would they be arrested and the police officers told them yes.

I do not think that is the interpretation of the regulations that we wanted to put forward. I do not think any member of Parliament should be prevented from doing his duty. I do not know if the police officer who was there knew exactly what he was saying when he told several members of my caucus that indeed if they circulated material or spoke out against government policy at that time they would be arrested. I think that is totally out of the present discussion. It should be clarified for all people that we as members of Parliament have a right to situate ourselves against this government without harassment and without being put under any duress.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, first, I want to make it clear that the regulations that my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, promulgated are the closest reflection he could find to the request made by the Speaker. The intent is to make it possible for members to get to the House of Commons.

My colleague, our party Whip, reminded me that at the demonstration last fall which led to this decision Parliament Hill was jammed up with vehicles and members of the opposition rose on questions of privilege, saying that this congestion prevented them from reaching the House of Commons. In fact the decision of the Board of Internal Economy was brought forward because of questions of privilege from opposition parties about the congestion caused by the demonstration.

I am curious as to how come the RCMP should show up at the same time as several members of the opposition were talking to people out there, when there were television cameras and so on. If I were suspicious I might think it was a set up for the purposes of the national news tonight. I do not know. I am curious as to why that might have happened.

In any event, I think the suggestion of my hon. colleague to have the Speaker take this matter under advisement is well made. I agree with it.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I was a witness to the events. I was also a witness to the first incident that the hon. member for Calgary West indicated caused the problem of congestion on Parliament Hill.

The congestion was actually caused by holding up the cars, by not allowing them to go through in the normal vehicle flow. Members of Parliament were restricted from coming to the Hill because they were in taxis and the RCMP had ruled at that time that taxis were not allowed on the Hill because it was thought that they were also in the demonstration.

With regard to today's incident, I am very concerned because it does have some very serious implications for freedom of speech. I was one of the members out there who asked the RCMP a question about my duties tomorrow, that is, if I wanted to distribute literature. I was told that it would be illegal in their interpretation.

The other point I would like to make as to demonstrations is the reason behind the regulations. I am not saying that I am for the regulations. I am definitely against this type of regulation because of what it has done today. When we talk about demonstrations, we do not talk about one or two people out there. We talk about the first incident when we had 400 to 1,000 people out there. In the first incident, the estimates were that there was up to 1,000 people.

Out there today were two individuals. How could they restrict emergency vehicles from coming on to the Hill? How could they restrict MPs from doing their job?

I think the whole process has to be reviewed. With all due respect, the regulation should be suspended until it is dealt with completely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I appreciate the remarks of all members who have advised the Chair as to exactly what happened here today. I have a couple of issues of privilege to deal with. I think we should report on the role of the Board of Internal Economy. The Chair will take all this under advisement and get back to the House as soon as possible.

I believe that the Chair has heard enough as far as debate is concerned in this regard.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked the government House Leader if he would table the minutes from which he quoted in his presentation. He indicated he would do that. Has he done that, or does he plan to do that now?

Mr. Andre: Yes, I will, as soon as I find a Xerox.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is fine. The hon. member for Algoma has the floor on debate.

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If you did not hear the hon. minister, he said he will table the minutes as soon as he can get a copy of it.

The hon. member for Algoma is on the floor for debate.

Mr. Riis: Can he not hand in the copy from which he was quoting?

Mr. Andre: Then I will not have one for my own files. Will you let me make a copy? I keep my word, don't worry.

Mr. Riis: I sense some kind of a cover-up, Mr. Speaker, and I want to get it out in the open.

Mr. Andre: Don't judge me by your friends' standards.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, with interruptions like that there really will be no opportunity to continue the discussion on Bill C-48.

I should like to comment on the remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister during the course of this debate because he certainly left a number of questions open, in my view. He accepted an amendment last week. As I recall the incidents of last Thursday afternoon, he only accepted one small amendment. With respect to the other one, he was sort of asleep at the switch and the amendment got through without him noting it.

I was disappointed that he did not accept the amendment with regard to the establishment of an advisory committee because the difficulties that we have with climate change in this country are very severe. We have seen literally thousands of farmers in southern Ontario especially, as well as in the three prairie provinces, lose their farms over the last three or four years because of climatic change. It does not seem to be improving very much. Thus Bill C-48 is a very important bill.

The minister tried to make the argument this afternoon that this matter was widely discussed. It clearly was widely discussed last July by a very large group of farmers from right across the country. They all agreed that the funding should be one-third, one-third, and one-third; it being shared by the federal and provincial governments as well as by the farmers. When the governments of the provinces and the federal government got together in Prince Albert at the end of July last year, there were no farmers there. A deal was struck which essentially cut up the cash in such a way that the federal government is paying 25 per cent, the provinces are paying 25 per cent, and the farmer ends up continuing to pay 50 per cent.

Although we agree with most of the amendments to the crop insurance legislation, this change really negatives the whole bill. Farmer group after farmer group—practically every group that came before us—said that the problem with it was that although the coverage was moving up from 70 per cent or 80 per cent to 90 per cent, the farmers could not afford to pay it.

That is why they were all opposed to it in the national meeting they had in early July. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which represents the largest and most broadly based farm group, said in its presentation before the legislative committee about the 25, 25, and 50 formula: "While in some provinces this formula results in a relatively equal tripartite cost sharing of total program costs, in others the producers may end up paying up to 77 per cent more than the federal or provincial governments in their contributions. Uniformity and fairness across the country is essential to a national crop insurance program".

That is why the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and all constituent groups across the country are opposed to this measure. In its final summation before the committee it stated: "As a final note, we would like to point out that in order to increase producer confidence and therefore participation in the program an improved and enhanced program must offer an affordable price. Our members are skeptical of the likelihood of the continuation of an affordable program as it appears that the federal share of crop insurance is being systematically reduced".

I think that is really the problem with the whole of the government's Green Paper. The paper the minister tabled in the House and about which he spends a lot of time talking essentially provides for two main proposals. One is that the government will reduce support programs to agriculture, which is what it has been doing for the last year. Every program that the government is involved in is being cut in one way or another. The only thing that it followed through on was the drought assistance that it promised in the 1988 general election. Last year the budget was cut by some $500 million to agriculture. Crop insurance alone was cut by some $200 million over two years. There is a whole list of other things including advance payments and other programs which were cut.

If we look at the spending estimates which were tabled a month or so ago, we see that drought assistance has been cut by $365.6 million. We see that the two-price wheat system has been cut by $56 million. We see that $42 million in statutory payments on crop insurance has been reduced. Yet there is all this talk about there being improved coverage. There is going to be improved coverage all right, if one can afford it.

If we look at the cost of the program to various groups we see that it is not going to be affordable. Several members from my caucus including the member for Lambton—Middlesex, the member for Prince Edward—Hastings, the member for Kent—Essex and the member for Essex—Windsor met last Friday with a number of wheat, corn and soybean producers. Most of these groups, which included corn producers, soybean producers, fruit and vegetable producers and winter wheat producers were all arguing that the cost of the coverage is simply too high.

For instance, for winter wheat producers, we see the cost of the coverage going from 4.4 per cent to 7.2 per cent. That is just to go from 80 per cent coverage to 90 per cent coverage. That is a 63 per cent increase to move up only 10 per cent in improved coverage.

Likewise, with corn, it is 64 per cent. For soybeans it is a 50 per cent increase. Similarly, for producers of red spring wheat in Saskatchewan, the cost of coverage goes from 12.6 per cent for 70 per cent coverage, to 19.5 per cent for 90 per cent coverage. We are looking at an almost 50 per cent increase in the cost of the coverage. This type of increase is similar for almost all crops.

Although the bill provides for improved coverage, nobody is going to take it. That is exactly the problem we are facing today. Producers, whether they are corn producers, soybean producers or wheat producers in southwestern Ontario, or wheat, barley and other crop producers in the west, are demanding a special financial aid program. They do not have any of the tools that the American producer has. The American wheat grower today has a target price of about $4 U.S. that he is guaranteed. He has a loan rate of something around $2. He has a deficiency payment between those two figures.

About two weeks ago a couple of members from each caucus in the House met with a group from the Agriculture Leadership Training Program of Ontario. There were some 30 young agriculturalists or farmers who met with members of Parliament and put the argument to us that we hear every place we go in this country. It is that there is no certainty.

The government has taken away the advance payments program, which was roughly the same as the American loan program, although not quite as good. There is no target price and there is no deficiency payment. Nobody knows whether the whole special grains program, although very beneficial, is going to be there. It was triggered in 1986 in the middle of a provincial election in Saskatchewan. Will it be triggered this year? We do not know if there is going to be a provincial election. If we knew there was going to be a provincial election, then maybe it would be triggered, but maybe it will not be.

Mr. Malone: Tell us about the Liberals' special grains program.

Mr. Foster: I believe the hon. member for Crowfoot is talking about the Liberals' special grains program. Back in the late seventies and early eighties when wheat prices were at $5 or $6 a bushel, when we had a two-price wheat system and the cost of production was probably 50 per cent or 60 per cent lower than today, farmers did not need a special grains program because they were immensely better off than they are today.

We had the spectacle a week ago Monday night with the Premier of Saskatchewan, who is also the Minister of Agriculture, pleading on province-wide television for financial support from the federal government. He had already met with the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and the Deputy Prime Minister. He has probably discussed it with the Prime Minister, yet he has to go on province-wide television to plead for support. The Minister of Agriculture had this all laid out for him by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool last October and November, which was asking for a special injection of $500 million to put the crop in the ground this spring.

Ontario corn and soybean producers have made the same arguments. They are facing the same difficulties, as I told the members of our caucus last week. Yet it goes on month after month: December, January, February, March, April. Farmers just do not believe that there is going to be any special grains program or that there is going to be an interim payment under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. It is just left up in the air. What is going to happen? Nobody knows.

Compounding that problem is the situation we have with the banks. I was in Saskatchewan a week before last meeting with members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool from around the Yorkton area. It was the same thing with grain producers in southwestern Ontario last week. The banks are essentially closing down Canadian agriculture. They will no longer lend money on the basis of the equity the farmer has in the land itself. The only basis on which they will lend money is on a cash flow basis. As I have already said the price of many grains—wheat, soybeans and corn—is below the level where they will have cash flow. We are caught in this bind.

The minister met with the Canadian Bankers' Association last Thursday night. He tried to reassure us today. It seems to me that the whole thing is so hollow. He is talking about all the stakeholders, all the players in the game—the provincial government, the Farm Credit Corporation, the banks, the lending institutions in this country and the federal government.

How can anybody else in the game take the minister seriously when he is sitting there with the producers demanding financial support since last November and no financial support is forthcoming? Will there be a special grains program? Will there be an interim payment on ASA? Nobody knows, and there we sit.

There is great, great uncertainty. The minister's comments today leave everybody wondering what is going to happen in this situation. Clearly this legislation just provides for more and more ad hoc programs because farmers will not use it.

There is another special concern for people from provinces like Prince Edward Island. It is not only the growers who are going to have extreme difficulty in meeting this new program. In provinces like Prince Edward Island they are going to have great difficulty with the provincial government coming up with their share of support.

I believe what is happening in Prince Edward Island is similarly happening in New Brunswick and perhaps in B.C. When we get to the end of the day we see that Ontario opposed it. With Quebec and Newfoundland, previously there really was not a great deal of support. For Prince Edward Island the costs are going from $150,000 a year to $650,000 a year. We are talking about $500,000 in additional costs to that small province with 130,000 residents.

• (1630)

How is the government of Prince Edward Island going to afford that? It is probably praying that the premiums will be so high that the farmers will not take out the insurance, because it does not know where it is going to get the $500,000 additional cost to its small province.

I do not have the figures for B.C. and New Brunswick, but I am sure that they have similar problems. The Deputy Prime Minister talks about this as though it was not a bill sprung on everybody in the middle of the night. It certainly was sprung on those four provinces that are opposed to it. It certainly was not what the farmers themselves asked for.

The angering part of this whole thing is that it is coming at a time when the United States is starting to work on a new farm bill which, we are told, will essentially be the same as the 1985 farm bill, and the United States is cutting its programs. That government is not reducing its deficiency payments or loan rates, but our government is reducing its support for crop insurance, for advance payments and for a whole series of programs, and we are doing it unilaterally.

That is simply not workable because we have to compete with those American producers. We do not have an export enhancement program, although the premier of Saskatchewan is calling for that and it is probably a good idea if we are going to maintain our share of the world market. Our producers do not even have the programs that they had two years ago.

This bill will pass the way it is, regardless of how unworkable it is. The real issue today is whether the government is going to come forward with an emergency financial package. Every major farm organization has asked for it. The premier of Saskatchewan is asking for it and so far there is simply no response from the government even though seeding is only a month and a half away. I want to call attention to this. I do not know how it can be more firmly imprinted on the Deputy Prime Minister's mind and focused more dramatically to get action in this regard.

Clearly, the emergency need for funding is there, but we do need action on the farm debt problem. Last Saturday's Globe and Mail illustrates the type of problems that farmers in many parts of the country are facing. In that article, the premier of Saskatchewan pointed out:

> "We're facing economic war in Saskatchewan," he said before meeting with the agricultural committee of the Canadian Bankers Association late Thursday. "Our farms are dying. It's a crisis."
> He noted that 20,000 farmers—one-third the entire province—are faced with financial ruin unless they receive an immediate cash bailout of $500 million.

That is the $500 million that he went on province wide television a week ago last Tuesday to demand action on.

The article further states:

> Moreover, he said, they need another $1 billion to tide them over until the harvest this fall and long-term help so they can carry a debt burden that has risen to more than $5 billion.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, 60,000 farmers carrying a debt burden of $5 billion.

The urgency is for the government to act, yet it refuses to act. It is putting through a farm crop insurance program which is nickeling and diming and which is going to cause a great deal of problems because farmers will not take out enough coverage and we will have to continue on with this ad hoc program that is being demanded by the Saskatchewan farmers.

The uncertainty not only rests in grain and oilseeds, corn and soybeans, but in every sector of the Canadian agriculture economy today. If you talk to people who are in supply management, in poultry, in eggs and turkey production, in the dairy industry, there is tremendous uncertainty. Last week, I asked the Minister for International Trade if he would give a commitment that in the proposal that they are putting before the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva, Switzerland, this year, they would take the advice of the poultry producers and the dairy producers of the type of access that they would agree to under Article 11 negotiations of the GATT agreement. He gave me the usual non-answer answer. It is absolutely essential that we get a commitment from the government that it is not going to sell out the farmers.

In the free trade deal they did not take the advice. They appointed a special advisory group on international trade, SAGIT, represented by producers, processors and farmers. They made a recommendation that any commodity coming in from the United States, whether it was processed chicken or processed dairy products, that had more than 10 per cent by dry weight or volume of a supply management commodity, would be subject to import controls.

That recommendation of the SAGIT was never accepted. The government went ahead willy-nilly, signing an agreement where the tariffs came down from about 12 per cent to zero over 10 years and essentially gave away the whole supply management structure in that agreement. The Minister of Agriculture said: "Have no fears. We will put all those items from the tariff list over to the import control list and there will be no problems."

That was in January 1988. We knew that there were very serious problems because the chairman of the Senate trade committee in the United States, Mr. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, immediately complained to Mr. Yeutter, the Secretary of Trade at that time, that this was breaking the agreement, that there was no provision in there, that they would take Canada to the GATT if they put those items on the import control list.

Sure enough, as soon as they put them on the import control list in December 1988, effective January 1, 1989, the United States petitioned GATT to establish a panel to see if putting those items on the import control list was a conflict of Canada's obligations under the GATT treaty. In September or October of last year the GATT came down with a decision stating that they were in contravention and ultimately the government accepted it in early December.

There we were in the GATT negotiations with an incredibly weak hand to play, to say the least. It is hard to see how the government can play that hand, if one looks at the people who are opposed to Article 11 of the GATT. There is our free trade partner, the United States, the trading group that we are associated with, the Cairns Group, and now Professor Worley of the University of Guelph, who is an expert on the GATT negotiations, saying that he thinks the European Economic Community is going to oppose our position as well to strengthen and clarify Article 11 of the GATT.

Of course, there is also the off-hand comment to one of our officials by the United States Ambassador to GATT who stated: "Look, we don't really have to negotiate Article 11. All we have to do is get a couple more GATT panels on the other processed dairy products and we have total access to your market anyway."

While this may sound very complicated, it is very simple to the dairy producers of this country, those who have market-share quota, those who produce milk for the industrial production of processed dairy products, items like ice-cream and yogurt, cheese, skim milk powder and butter. With that border open into the United States, they can easily swamp our market and swamp those producers, many of whom are in the province of Quebec, if the GATT negotiations fail.

That is why I asked the Minister for International Trade the other day if the government would abide by the recommendation of the dairy farmers of Canada, which is to limit imports under the access to our processed dairy products to 5 per cent by value and 3 per cent by volume. That would leave the production of cheese, which has now about 9 per cent access and increase a number of other commodities which have no access now to 1 per cent. However, even 1 per cent is a lot of money. This is a $4 billion business, so 1 per cent is $40 million of access by the United States.

Mr. Speaker, you can understand why every dairy producer, every poultry producer, every egg producer in this country is extremely nervous about those negotiations. Our bargaining position was given away in the free trade deal. Our bargaining position at the GATT is extremely weak. We do not have many friends. Apparently we have the Swiss and the Austrians and some of the Scandinavian countries with us, but compared to the power and influence of the European Economic Community, if Professor Worley is right, and compared to the United States that has vowed openly to do away with Article 11, and compared to the 11 or 12 countries in Cairns Group, our position is not strong.

That is not to say that we want to see the government not succeed in this, because doing away with the vibrancy, efficiency and viability of the poultry and dairy industry would be a disastrous blow. We would be facing the same kind of demands for financial support from that sector as we are facing in the grain, oilseed and corn crops this year, if we were to lose out in those negotiations.

This bill makes some improvements. It looks good on paper, but the cost to producers is dramatically increased at a time when they cannot even borrow money on the equity they have in their farms. They can only borrow on the cash flow of their crops. Many farmers will not be able to afford the dramatically increased premiums which, in some cases, increased by 60 per cent and in some cases even more than that.

We want to see the government act immediately on the farm debt crisis and the farm financial crisis, because we are talking about the very future and the viability of our industry. We know it may be counter to the government's Green Paper, which is essentially to remove support programs and to make the industry wide open to world markets. We think that they should stop and look at survival of an industry which is facing horrendous difficulties in this coming year. It is an industry that is competitive. Our problem is coping with the international community, the massive subsidies in the United States and in the European Community. It is essential that we look at this from a global point of view. Are we going to have a viable agriculture industry which not only provides efficient food production in this country but provides a vibrant and effective rural community which is essential to the well-being of our country.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on third reading debate of Bill C-48, an act to amend the crop insurance legislation. To give some background, I would like to spend a few minutes in the 20 minutes that I have available to me to go through some of the international affairs that have affected the world of grain production and the impact that that has had on the farms of people on the prairies in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and northern British Columbia, and also as it affects grain production in central and Atlantic Canada. All grain producers producing crops in this country have been affected by the grain wars that have erupted between the two big power blocs, the European Economic Community and the United States of America.

Each war is quite unique. This particular one is centred on a question of who should be a producer of grains for exports in the world, with the Americans taking the position that they should be the pre-eminent exporters of grains and that other countries should be much smaller exporters of grains. In particular, the American viewpoint is that the Europeans really do not have any business exporting grain into world markets. That is an attitude that carries back to the last world wheat talks which failed, whereby the wheat exporters of the world were attempting to set a floor price beyond which countries that were participants in the wheat agreement would not offer grain.

The system of floor prices has been in effect for quite a long time; sometimes it worked and sometimes it did not. When wheat was in high supply, often some of the countries involved in the pact would begin to break the agreement.

From Canada's point of view, it was very often the United States which broke those agreements. It would find ways of offering some grades of grain and some types of grain below the floor price and that would eventually break the price. A number of times in my memory when Canada attempted to abide by the commitments under the International Wheat Agreement and held the price up, the consequence was that we sold very little grain in those periods of time because we were trying to abide by international rules.

I raise this because what we have been facing in rural Canada over the last decade almost, certainly in the last six or eight years, has been a heating up of the dispute as to who should be able to sell grain between the Europeans and the Americans. It got much warmer in 1985 with the introduction of the American farm bill which had not only the plethora of subsidies that is endemic in the agricultural system of the United States of America, but an additional impetus to exports by including the Export Enhancement Program whereby the United States offers money to potential buyers of grain to buy their grain as opposed to somebody else's grain.

They began by offering incentives in the range of $7 per tonne. More recent sales this calendar year have gone over $20 per tonne. So the war is heating up.

I am a Canadian farmer, as are thousands of others in this country. We can understand the ups and downs of international marketing, and to some extent, even though there is a lot of politics in it, we have learned to accept and live with that. What we find very difficult to live with is when our own government refuses to come on side and be an advocate for us in those grain wars.

We can accept that there are times when other countries will be shooting at us and we will be caught in the crossfire, as we have been between the Europeans and the Americans. It is extremely difficult to accept our own government shooting at us as well. It is bad enough to duck the competition but when your own government starts shooting at you, you start to think that something is wrong. I submit that something is very wrong when, since re-election in 1988, the government has contributed to our misery in rural Canada by taking an additional $1 billion out of the pockets of farmers.

How have they done this? In the last two budgets, programs have been pulled away that had existed for a long time which were of benefit to rural Canada. For example, small programs such as the at and east freight rates encouraged western grain to go into Atlantic Canada, permitted workers in Atlantic Canada to load ships year round, and kept rail line workers busy ferrying grains from the Georgian Bay elevators over to Halifax and Saint John.

There was also a reduction of the crop insurance money that goes into crop insurance, the program we are debating here today. The Government of Canada has decided that it will not supply close to half of the premiums to carry the cost of crop insurance. After Bill C-48 that we are debating today is passed, instead of farmers paying 50 per cent of the premiums and the federal government paying 50 per cent of the premiums, farmers will continue to pay at least 50 per cent of the premiums and the federal government will drop its contribution to 25 per cent and leave the provinces to pick up the other 25 per cent.

That will mean that farmers and rural people will be paying through their provincial taxpayers' pockets. For some of the larger provinces, this will not be too much of a problem. However, in provinces like Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island where farmers and farming make up a great deal of the economy, taxes will increase quite perceptibly because the Gross National Product of those provinces depends very much on the production of field crops, whether they are potatoes, wheat, or some of the oilseed crops. It will make a big difference to the amount of taxes that provincial taxpayers will put into the crop insurance program.

That is where some of the controversy takes place. In the course of the building of the grain wars, the balance between the amount of money that a farm takes in and the amount that that farm has to spend on personal expenses and business reinvestment has changed remarkably. Up until about 10 or 15 years ago, approximately 50 to 70 per cent of a farm's gross income went out as expenses. In Saskatchewan, the crop insurance program covered 70 per cent of the average long-term yield for that province. If land was producing 30 bushels to the acre of wheat, the crop insurance program would cover 70 per cent of that, which would be something like 21 bushels per acre. This would virtually cover the actual cash outlays of those farms at that time.

Because of the grain wars and the downward pressure on price, most farms are now finding that even the most efficient with good crops have only about 10 to 15 per cent to spend on their own families and for reinvestment in the farm after all costs are paid.

The government's response at Prince Albert was to open up the crop insurance legislation so that the various contracts with the provinces between the federal government and the provinces could include crop insurance that would pay up to 90 per cent of the loss. The idea was to permit farmers to take out enough crop insurance to cover their cash losses if there was no crop.

I have no great objection to opening up the legislation to permit higher levels of coverage. I just point out that it is not going to address the income problem that is out there. Fiddling with crop insurance is not going to be the answer to a problem that is essentially a world price problem.

At one time, we had two sets of programs because we recognized that there were two problems that faced farmers. One was a production problem, for which we had crop insurance. It was not always as adequate as it could be, but the program is there and still will be there after C–48.

On the other hand, we had a price insurance program which went into place through two different sets of legislation. In the Wheat Board area of western Canada, the Western Grain Stabilization Act applied and we contributed 2 per cent of our sales to finance that. The federal government also contributed on a two for one basis. In the rest of Canada, price was protected under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. Farmers in those regions who had crops that were not of the six major grains in the Wheat Board region got coverage without paying premiums.

Anyone who has watched farming policy in the last number of years knows that one of the last acts of the old Liberal government and one of the first acts of the new Conservative government in 1984 was to make some fairly drastic amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act, with the idea of paying out a larger payment for a couple of years, on the assumption that the world price problems that were surfacing would go away.

Even when there is no political interference, world price problems generally have a cycle of about 15 years from the low through the high and back to the low. If I had any criticism of the Western Grain Stabilization program, it was that it had too short a vision. It looked at a 10 year period of time instead of the 15, which would have more properly reflected the reality of world price cycles.

After 1984, we shortened that up to seven years with the result that the program is now virtually useless. The fund is in deep deficit. No money is being paid out, and yet farmers needs are still there. That happened because the formula was changed to generate a quick, large pay–out around election time. It did its political job, but it did not do its economic job of evening out farm incomes.

This particular legislation is permissive. As I said earlier, it fails to follow the government's own program of tripartitism, which involves provincial, federal and producer payments on an equal, one–third, one–third basis. Instead, the federal government has taken a quick–fix budget oriented approach to increase coverage which will increase premiums to producers, but the federal government will not increase the amount they pay on those premiums. In fact, it has decided instead to unload that responsibility onto the provinces.

While the federal government proposes to save $90 million in the year that is coming to a close and an additional $110 million in the fiscal year coming into play April 1, the provinces will have to pick that up. For the further coverage that may be possible with the opening up of the program to coverage up to 90 per cent, producers will have to pay extra premiums.

• (1700)

Just to give an idea of what that will mean, we got some figures from some of the witnesses from Ontario who appeared before us. They pointed out that for Ontario right now the average winter wheat producer pays $4.50 per acre for the basic coverage package. The new increased coverage will cost him an extra $1.79. That simply puts his coverage level 10 per cent higher than it was. He goes from an 80 per cent coverage to a 90 per cent coverage in the province of Ontario and that will cost that producer almost $1.80 per acre more.

Had this initiative been carried out on a tripartite basis, where the producer, the federal, and provincial governments paid equally, that extra coverage would have cost that Ontario producer of winter wheat an extra six cents per acre. We can see the dramatic difference that this makes in production costs to producers. For winter wheat, it is almost $1.80 an acre.

If we consider something like tomatoes, where the producer is now paying $41.50, enhancement to the program namely, going from 80 per cent coverage to 90 per cent coverage will cost him almost an extra $35 an acre. Under tripartite it would have cost him an extra $20. So the tripartite system is one that producers had expected and were looking forward to as being part of the package, and there is some disappointment that that was not the case.

As well, one of the confusing things at committee level was dealing with 10 different contracts. The federal government has a different system of contracting crop insurance with each of the provinces. The rules affecting a producer of commodities like wheat or peas in one province are sometimes quite substantially different from the rules that affect a producer of the same commodity in another province.

For instance, the federal government makes ad hoc changes to the contracts that it puts on. Sometimes these are encouraged by the producers in the area, but they are never fair. For instance, at the end of last week there was an announcement about the final multi-year disaster benefit for 1989 to those regions of prairie Canada that had a further continuation of the drought. For some regions it was the third consecutive year of drought.

It would be possible to treat them on a farm-by-farm basis in the province of Saskatchewan because of the kind of crop insurance records and program that we have. We have had crop insurance since either 1960 or 1961, which took over from the old Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The region of the province where I live, which is reasonably well watered most of the time, was the pilot area to start that insurance program. We paid our 1 per cent, not to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act but into crop insurance premiums. Some of us did not have very many losses during that period of time, but it meant that if we did have a loss on our farm, we would get paid for the losses that we had, rather than having to depend on all of the surrounding townships having losses before we qualified.

The government has forgotten those lessons of the PFAA and has reintroduced the multi-year disaster benefit. Even though your farm had a drought for three years in a row and you collected the maximum crop insurance, you did not qualify for the extra 10 per cent coverage benefit unless you were in a municipality that bordered on three other municipalities which make up a district of four municipalities suffering the same disastrous occurrence. If you happen to live in a municipality that is isolated then you are just out of luck. Many people found that they were out of luck and were not able to get any assistance, as a result.

We believe that this particular bill is not entirely beneficial for Canadian farmers. We think it is simply an excuse for the federal government to unload some of its spending responsibility for farmers on to the provinces, and an excuse to charge farmers more for crop insurance. As I said at the beginning of my speech, that is consistent with its move to take more than a billion dollars of extra funds out of farmers' pockets in the last year and a half since its re-election. If the federal government would simply recompense those funds it has already taken out of farmers' pockets unjustly, farming would be in much better shape than it is today.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, last year's budget indicated that the amount to be spent on crop insurance for 1989-90 would be reduced by $90 million—

An Hon. Member: No questions or comments after the first three speakers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Not for the first two speakers, but for the third one there is a question and comment period. I just want to bring it to the attention of the hon. member that under Standing Order 43, the first two speakers have unlimited time, the third speaker has 20 minutes plus questions and comments. I recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt again on his question or comment.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the last federal budget indicates that the amount to be spent on crop insurance for 1989-90 would be reduced by $90 million and a further $110 million decline was projected for 1990-91 fiscal year. This reduced the federal commitment which would equal the share of the crop insurance premiums paid by the provinces to a maximum of 25 per cent.

How will this affect the likely returns for farmers who are collecting crop insurance in the next year? Can it be projected into the pocketbooks of the farmers during the next year?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, the $91 billion from last year and the $110 million of savings to the federal Treasury in the coming fiscal year are to be brought about as a result of unloading part of the cost on to the provinces.

If the provinces sign new contracts increasing the amount of coverage to the farmer, permitting contracts which would allow the farmer to increase his coverage from the existing 70 per cent in Saskatchewan up to 80 per cent which was available in the past crop year, and as high as 90 per cent in the province of Ontario, which was, available last crop year, the federal government is projecting that it will mean higher premiums being paid by the farmers. Between them the federal government and the provincial governments have to match those premiums.

Since the federal government is proposing to save some $90 million last year and $110 million in the coming fiscal year, that means the provincial governments will have to pick up the same amount that the federal government saves. The provinces will be having to raise approximately an extra $100 million as a result of this initiative by the federal government.

Farmers will be paying slightly higher fees if they opt for the higher coverage levels which I think they will be forced to do given the change in the production economics at the farm level whereby close to 90 per cent of the gross sales of a farm go out directly for cash costs.

If the farmer wants to stay in business after having a crop loss he will need crop insurance that will cover at least 90 per cent of his cost. Therefore, premiums will rise at the farm level, and coverage will be up. The main problem for provincial governments will be that they will have to raise quite a bit more money to make up the deficit of the $90 million last year and $110 million this year.

• (1710)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, will the vegetable growers, fruit growers and non-grain growers be affected in the same way?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, we did not get to see all the contracts which exist, but my understanding is that increased coverage will be available to vegetable and fruit growers as well.

The premiums will be somewhat higher. I believe I mentioned tomato growers in southern Ontario having to pay an extra $35 per acre for premiums for that extra 10 per cent coverage. It is a fairly high rate, but given the kind of cost-price squeeze that is affecting farmers now, some of them may be forced by their creditors and their lending institutions to take the higher coverage levels, just for the mutual protection of the farmer and the banker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-48. As I was listening to some of my colleagues speak to this issue, I started to reflect on what has caused this lack of pride that we, as Canadians, seem to have in our agricultural community.

I want to go back to an experience I had in 1986. I was flying to Cuba with our former Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Eugene Whelan. The Liberals were not in power then and Mr. Whelan was long gone as a minister. I remember, as he was walking to the back of the plane, everyone gave him a friendly greeting, saying that it was nice to have him back. We went on to Cuba where we received a very warm welcome from officials.

One evening I asked the Cuban officials why they had such respect for this man who had been away for so long. One of them said that when they were in need the minister made sure that they had Holstein cattle to help feed the people and when they had fever break out from time to time, Canadian veterinarians would go to Cuba. There seemed to be a sense around the world that Canadian agriculture had a place of pride.

About two months ago, I was in Moscow to speak on an environmental issue. I was amazed by the lineups for food that I saw every morning on my way to the conference. There were lineups of 200 people or 300 people at every food store in the city. These people were afraid that if they did not get to the food stores early in the morning they would not have lunch or dinner. The food that was in these stores made me feel ashamed.

When I returned home I was struck by the fact that I do not think we really give the farmers of this country enough respect or enough time. We have seen a government that has been retreating from its national responsibility over the last five or six years. I am afraid that situation has now reached the farmers.

Mr. Blais: You are always away. You don't know what is going on here.

Mr. Mills: The hon. member says that we do not know what is going on here. If the hon. member watched W–5 last night, he would know that 50 per cent of that show was dedicated to the farmers of Canada, who are crying out desperately for government, at all levels, to give them some time and attention. Even though I am an urban member, many of my constituents are phoning my office and telling me that we are not giving enough time to the agricultural community of this country.

I admit readily that many constituents do not understand what crop insurance is. I understand that the government is trying to redefine and reshape its priorities and put more responsibility in the provincial hands. At the same time I do not think the government is realizing that agriculture is not a business. It is like a vocation. I suggest, in my humble opinion, that the government does not realize completely the sacrifices of farmers and the the desperate financial shape the farmers of this country are in. If it did I think that we would be spending a lot more time on this issue.

Very few people in this House realize that I have been in agriculture for over 22 years. I do not grow crops but I have been involved and have had an operational farm for over 22 years. Even though I am not involved in it day to day I hear the stories from my own farm manager and our neighbours about how desperate the situation is.

The desperation seems to stem from two or three areas. First, many of our farmers are of an age where they would like to take life a little easier. They see that everyone else in the country has a certain quality of life and that as they get a little older they seem to be able to take things a little easier.

However, in the agriculture community this is not the case. Many of the farmers who are most active in this country today are in their early sixties and some are in their late sixties. This is a tremendous strain for them.

We see that their sons and daughters not wanting to stay on the farms. They are tempted because of the quality of life not to stay in rural Canada but to go to the urban centres. Who is going to carry on these family farms? From coast to coast we are seeing a complete deterioration of the family farm.

I know that members opposite are not designing this kind of a situation. I cannot imagine any man or woman who would want to see that kind of thing happen. The problem is that there does not seem to be an aggressive approach to promoting and enhancing the family farm. There does not seem to be enough awareness in the urban communities of the importance of the family farm and the health of the family farm. There does not seem to be enough communication to the people at large.

Mr. Lewis: He has a hobby farm.

Mr. Mills: There does not seem to be enough communication that family farms are vital to our economy. It is vital in terms of our experts. The hon. member for Simcoe North talks about me trying to give a lecture about family farms—

Mr. Lewis: From Broadview–Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: He knows about many farms in his own community where they are having a very difficult time now, where sons and daughters of those farmers in his own riding are leaving those farms. They are so close to the metropolitan areas that there is a disincentive factor.

An Hon. Member: Welcome to the 20th century.

Mr. Mills: Welcome to the 20th century he says. That is the attitude we get when we are trying to talk constructively about the family farm in this House. That is precisely the problem. This government is so pre–occupied with the retreat from national governments, so pre–occupied with cutting things like—

Mr. Blais: Where?

Mr. Mills: Where? VIA Rail, unemployment insurance, farm programs coast to coast. Cutting back on crop insurance responsibility and adding it on to the provinces. Right now you have disadvantaged provinces—

Mr. Blais: They all agree. The farmers agree. You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Mills: There is the smugness and the arrogance of the members opposite when we are trying to make people aware of a group in our society right now wich is crying out.

• (1720)

We are trying to show that we on this side of the House care about the agricultural community in this country. Never before have the farmers been in such desperate straits. There are farm foreclosures day after day. Lines of credit are being cut back.

Mr. Blais: What have you done for the long-term dairy policy?

Mr. Mills: It is an incredible thing for someone who initially, when he came to this House, seemed to show a sense of respect for a community he came from. Now, all of a sudden, those members seem to have all the answers. They do not have all the answers and that is why the agricultural community of this country is in such desperate shape.

The Conservatives are not listening any more. They do not want to listen. They just want their own design, which is a massive decentralization of the national government. The only way we are going to put the agricultural community of this country back in shape is if this Chamber takes some leadership and we start putting some pride and a sense of appreciation back into the agricultural community.

I realize this is a complex issue, and that we must address the debt and deficit. The greatest resource we have in this country is our agricultural community. We in the city as we walk along the Danforth see in restaurant after restaurant plates piled high with food and every grocery store filled with every product one could conceivably imagine. We live in a cocoon in the urban areas of this country.

We are taking our agricultural community for granted. It is time we gave agriculture a higher priority and made sure that we develop policies in this country that will give our farming community a greater sense of respect and appreciation. We have to show them that we in this Chamber really care about their direction and their future. We have to get our youth back on the family farm. We have to make sure that those people out there right now, who are facing increasing difficulty in acquiring new machinery and equipment, know that we care.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the hon. member where in the world would he ever get the notion, and why would he ever say it, even if he read it in a comic book or otherwise, that farming is not a business?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, did the hon. member say that I said that farming is not a business? I correct myself. I am well aware that agriculture is a business.

My comment was that it is more than a business. It is a vocation, a part of our cultural heritage, and it is a way of life. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): I would like to ask the hon. member to justify how he can say that the government today does not care about farming, when the support for farming has increased 650 per cent from the time the Liberal Party was governing this country.

How can he claim that the Liberals cared more when they did not have drought assistance, a special grain program or the $51 billions that went for support of the farm industry? How can he come to the House of Commons and make the claim that they are somehow more caring for the farming industry, when there is nothing in the public accounts of Canada that would give any documentation whatsoever that that might even be slightly factual?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, this government has an incredible way of playing gymnastics with figures and percentages. The hon. member says 650 per cent. I do not know whether he is including the sum of money toward drought assistance. I do not know exactly what he means.

I do know one thing. Ask the agricultural community of this country if it has the same sense of pride in its work, in its state, in the general fabric of this country today, compared to 1984 and before. I can tell you that a great number of farmers are not satisfied. They are not happy. They think a lot more can be done.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a short comment and conclude with a question.

First, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for his speech. It is not often enough in this House that we hear members representing urban areas speak on agriculture. Agriculture is not just a subject that those of us who represent agricultural ridings should speak about, and because all people eat, we should bear that in mind.

During the excellent discourse of my hon. colleague I heard some members across the way heckling. There were insinuations about what an urban member was doing talking about agriculture.

I think all members from both sides of the House should spend more time concentrating on agriculture because it is not just the business of those of us who live in rural areas. I want to congratulate him for taking that initiative.

There is a lesson here that all members of the House should learn. It is to become knowledgeable in agriculture, as my colleague has just obviously demonstrated, judging by the excellent speech that he made. Perhaps other members representing urban areas can do that as well.

I also recognize that my colleague has a keen interest in agricultural issues because of certain holdings and because of his many acquaintances in rural areas. I am particularly glad to see that as well.

I want to ask my colleague about another issue in agriculture. It concerns the general malaise that farmers are seeing vis-à-vis the threat to their supply management systems for the dairy industry principally and, of course, the poultry producers as well.

My colleague will know that the government has signed a free trade deal with the Americans and has made certain promises primarily to the agricultural sector, whereby it would be protected from imports, particularly in area of ice cream and yogurt. The Government of Canada made a unilateral statement in that regard, and that as such, it was in fact the law, knowing of course that there is no such arrangement.

When the government then tried to impose its ruling unilaterally, placing ice cream on the import control list, the Americans appealed to the GATT and won a first round decision, only to find that the Canadian government caved in afterwards.

Does my colleague agree with me that the Canadian dairy farmers need to have their supply management system strengthened and protected by a government which cares about supply management the way the previous Liberal government did? Does he agree with me as well that the government across the way has been caving in to the Americans and failing to support supply management as it should, both with the United States and at the GATT?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on a very short reply.

Mr. Mills: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it will be a very short reply. Of course I support my colleague, but I want to add that my constituents are demanding that we become knowledgeable about agricultural matters. A group of them worked with one of the agricultural associations over the last two weeks and our next householder is devoted specifically to agricultural issues, because the basic problem we have is that this government is decentralizing to a point where it is hard to develop a national consensus and a national will.

It is only when everyone in the community becomes involved in these problem areas that we can begin to galvanize the country. That is where you get support and that is the only way the agricultural community of Canada is going to get the support that it needs.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today on Bill C-48.

Once again the government is persisting in off-loading federal costs to the provinces with this bill. In the past two budgets it has become very evident that off-loading is the main objective of this government. It is as if the people who pay the federal taxes are different from people who pay provincial taxes. It is as if we are talking about two different countries, not two different jurisdictions.

• (1730)

If Bill C-48 is passed, the federal government says it will save $200 million. Taxpayers will not save $200 million. They will pay the same as before, or more. All that is really happening is that a different jurisdiction will pay for the same program, with little or no improvement to the program.

The minister has claimed that all the provinces are agreeing to these new arrangements under Bill C-48. This is not true. British Columbia is not agreeing to this program, New Brunswick does not agree with this program and Prince Edward Island does not agree with the program changes. In fact, Prince Edward Island would be better off under the old program than under these new regulations.

In the past the crop insurance program was cost shared fifty-fifty between the producers and the federal government with the provinces picking up the administrative costs. Even with this arrangement, the costs were such that farmers were reluctant to buy crop insurance in my province. With the new arrangements, the producer continues to pay 50 per cent of the premiums with the other 50 per cent divided equally between the province and the federal government. The administration costs would also be shared between the federal and provincial governments.

This new arrangement will increase the cost to the Prince Edward Island taxpayer by at least $500,000. This the province cannot afford to pay. It will definitely be a hardship for our small number of taxpayers.

I was happy to hear the minister say last week, in response to the member for Algoma who has been doing yeoman work with this legislation, that he is prepared to work out a timeframe in the new sharing formula with P.E.I. This is good news and should result in a reduced cost for Prince Edward Island in the short term, but the end result will be the same. In a few years the crop insurance program will cost Prince Edward Island taxpayers in excess of $500,000, which they cannot afford. The net result will be that the new program will be used less than the old one.

The federal government is saying, "Pay now and see what the benefits will be later". Well, the farmers are not willing to do that, nor would anyone else in similar circumstances. This was proven in the changes made to the Advance Payment for Crops Act. The federal government off-loaded again. As a result, no Prince Edward Island farmer is using the provisions under the act. There was absolutely no one available to administer the act in Prince Edward Island and the farmers saw absolutely no advantage for them to use it.

Crop insurance is vital to farmers. It means that if a disaster strikes they will not be wiped out, they can retrieve their costs. But if it is going to be cost prohibitive to join the program, farmers will take their chances and will not buy insurance.

It has been proven in the United States, our friendly neighbour to the south, that unless premiums are affordable and coverage substantial, farmers will take their chances with the weather rather than with the insurance program. Farmers will not take out coverage which, in the end, will see no improvement in their position, whether they take out insurance or not.

Since we, as a nation, cannot afford to see any more farmers going into bankruptcy, it is incumbent upon governments to enhance programs like crop insurance and not just simply to increase costs. The tragedy now being played out in Saskatchewan can happen in other areas of Canada, more so now and in the future because of the environmental instability due to the greenhouse effect, ozone deficiencies and the normal natural weather patterns. I hope the government will continue to be generous to Saskatchewan farmers and will enhance programs for other Canadian farmers rather than make it more difficult for farming to be a prosperous and vital industry.

We have no need to fear American trade action if we are supportive of our own farmers, at least no more than we do now. It is becoming obvious to us that the Americans subsidize agriculture as much or more than we do. It is a matter of semantics as to whether agriculture is being top-loaded or bottom-loaded. The United States is not prepared to allow its farmers to be abandoned to market forces, and neither should we. We should make that claim to the Americans.

There is no reason to dive headlong into a subsidy cutting exercise in order to please the Americans. The Americans will never be satisfied as long as they cannot compete against producers from other countries. If they cannot compete, they believe we are cheating. They believe we must be getting something free, we must be getting some assistance from our government.

As long as we have no common understanding of what a subsidy is, the free trade agreement, as far as agriculture is concerned, is a farce.

To conclude, the minister says the legislation is in provincial jurisdiction. Yet he is changing the program without the consent of the ten provinces. He only has the consent of seven. The act says clearly that mutual consent or five-years advance notice is required if changes are made in the act. This did not happen. New Brunswick, P.E.I. and B.C. have not given their support. In addition, the government changed the spirit of the old act when it changed the requirement that Ottawa obtain the consent of the provinces to a provision which requires Ottawa to simply consult with the provinces.

That is all this government has done—consult. It did not receive the consent of the provinces.

This bill will do injury to P.E.I. and New Brunswick. The objectives and reservations these provinces have should be addressed before the bill is passed.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment. On the weekend I had the opportunity to look at the new insurance program as it affects Saskatchewan and the people in our area. The purpose of the bill is to improve the coverage in order that it be more comprehensive for the farmers. It does exactly that. In fact the farmer can choose to increase his coverage up to 80 per cent, in the case of Saskatchewan, if he cares to. He can insure at 70 per cent, as has been the case, or he can insure at a lower percentage.

The cost of the insurance, at least as it affects the farms with which I am acquainted—and I had an inquiry on the weekend specifically on this—is the same as it was last year. If you increase the insurance, of course your coverage is going to be higher. But it is much more comprehensive and it certainly gives the farmer a greater opportunity to cover his operation by insurance.

I spent about one hour with the people who are administering this provincially and I felt very positive about the program. It certainly contains extensive coverage. I have not heard anyone on the opposition side indicate how the program works. As I say, I had a first-hand look at how it applies in Saskatchewan. I do not know how it applies to other provinces because each province has some input on the way the program works in that province.

There was a suggestion made that there was too much centralization. Well, we must realize that farming in Saskatchewan is quite a different situation.

Mr. Mills: Decentralization.

Mr. Gustafson: I believe the hon. member made the comment that there was too much centralization.

Mr. Mills: No.

Mr. Gustafson: Then I misunderstood his comment.

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, I am getting my information that the program will not be used as much in Prince Edward Island as was the old program from the provincial government itself. It has asked Agriculture Canada to calculate what the new system of 10 per cent deductibility would do to premiums in P.E.I. To this point the federal Department of Agriculture has not come up with the two different sets of figures. However, according to the province's own figures, the changes to this act will act as a disincentive to the farmers in Prince Edward Island. This is why they have been holding out trying to get a better deal for them as compared to other provinces.

It is interesting to note that the proposal that Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and B.C. came up with, and to which the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Newfoundland agreed, was killed by the province of Saskatchewan. I am not really sure what difficulty they had with the arrangements that these three provinces were proposing, but they did succeed in negating the progress which these three provinces were making in order to come to a better deal with the federal government under these new regulations. I cannot really comment any further than that.

• (1740)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I just want to reiterate the problem that most farmers are facing. I think the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister had indicated that for an increase of $4,300 you could move from 70 per cent coverage to 80 per cent coverage. Although $4,300 to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister is really a drop in the bucket, practically small change, to the average producer it is a very significant increase. This would be on, say, 1,200 acres of wheat production.

Producers across the country, including the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which represented the Pools before the committee, were arguing that if we had a three-way split on the premiums with the farmer, the federal government and the provincial government each paying a third, we could have that same kind of coverage, 80 per cent coverage in Saskatchewan for the $5,700, which was the premium paid for 70 per cent coverage last year. You would be able to move up because you would be splitting it three ways. The average producer will have difficulty paying that extra $4,300 to move up to the maximum coverage which is 80 per cent in Saskatchewan from 70 per cent last year.

The argument we are making is that we are just perpetuating the idea of more ad hoc programs. We are trying to get away from ad hoc programs but, because the cost of the premium has gone up so much to move to the higher percentage coverage, the government is going to continue to come up with ad hoc programs such as they need in Souris—Assiniboia and in Brandon—Souris.

They need a special drought assistance program this year because the drought there is worse than it was in 1988, which was the worst year since the thirties. By passing this law now without reducing the price of the premiums, we are perpetuating the need for more ad hoc programs, such as we do need in Souris—Assiniboia and in Brandon—Souris this year.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that in his comments the hon. member for Egmont pointed out that this particular proposal was unacceptable to Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the province of British Columbia.

Could he inform the House whether the existing contracts in some or all of those provinces are such that coverage will be on the basis of existing law or whether the federal government will force these people into signing new contracts under the new legislation, Bill C–48?

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, it is my information that the implementation of these regulations by federal government will include every province of Canada, whether or not they agree with the specific regulations that we are passing here today.

The minister also said last week that he is now working with New Brunswick and he is going to continue to work with Prince Edward Island to work out specific details on a slightly different arrangement. How quickly this is going to happen I do not know, but as of April 1 the province of Prince Edward Island will be required to change over the administrative apparatus at its own cost and have it implemented in 1993.

Again, the costs are being put on the provinces to make the changes but specifically I hope that the changes Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the federal government will finally come up with will save the producers of Prince Edward Island some money and will make it more attractive for the farmers there to participate in the program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary cannot direct a question to the hon. member for Algoma, but if he has another supplementary question that he would like to ask of the hon. member for Egmont, I will entertain it, but be very brief please.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to comment that for the most part the farmers in Saskatchewan, to whom I have been talking and who are now looking at this new program, are going to take the higher coverage. That is the information I am getting from the grassroots and that is where it counts, at the grassroots.

In the case of Saskatchewan it is important that they have the opportunity to increase the coverage four to five bushels an acre, which is the higher risk. Naturally there is a little more premium but most of the farmers are choosing to take that initial coverage.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today is Bill C–48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, presented to us at third and final reading. It is just one more example of how this government is abdicating its responsibilities to Canadians.

We have seen this government working hard to get out of the business of government. The examples are many, but the visible process began with the free trade agreement and it is continuing with these most recent bills before us. The unemployment insurance legislation amendments, Bill C–21, was just one in that long list.

I do not want to deviate from the bill before us, but I must say a few words about Bill C–21 in order to establish the basis for the argument that I want to present here today.

Bill C–21, the unemployment insurance legislation, has many faults. One of them is that it allows the federal government to remove itself from all funding responsibilities for that program. The total cost of Canada's unemployment insurance program, because of Bill C–21, will now be borne by the employees and the employers of Canada. There will be no federal financing involved in the benefits of the unemployment insurance program. The bill transfers the costs of those programs away from the federal government, and I object to that.

Most recently, Canadians will recall that the finance minister's budget, brought in on February 20, transferred a greater share of the costs of post-secondary education and health care to the provinces, again showing the reduced commitment of the federal government to those important national programs.

I can cite quite a few other examples, Mr. Speaker, and I know you are aware of examples yourself, but I do not want to stray too far from the substance of Bill C–48 now before us. The bottom line, however, is quite clear. In this, as in the other circumstances, the government is abandoning or beginning the abandonment process of the Canadian people and of the programs that bind them together.

The one other clear example that I cannot forget to mention in all of this is the post office. As the post office critic for the New Democratic Party, it is a subject that I am very close to. There is not a single person in rural Canada who does not know that Canada Post, with the support of the government, is abandoning rural Canada. More and more post offices are closing and more and more postal services are being provided by the private sector in areas where the federal presence is desperately needed.

The ability of Canadians to look to their government for leadership, direction, assistance and guidance is being taken away by this government, slowly and without much fanfare. When Canadians are in trouble, they will soon have nowhere to turn because this government is removing itself from taking responsibility for helping Canadians to determine their own future.

I know that that is the Conservative government's way. Get government off the backs of the taxpayers, we have heard in the past, reduce government to a level where it is insignificant. And when Canadians need the help of their government, it is not there to provide them with that help.

The Conservative way does not work because with the reduction of support has gone the increase and the cost of the government. Our national debt continues to grow, the burden on the taxpayer continues to escalate, as the support from the government diminishes.

I find that shameful. Bill C–48 before us today outlines this very well and fits into that big picture which I think we all detest. What this bill proposes at the outset is to again reduce the federal government's commitment to crop insurance and, therefore, its commitment to agriculture and the people of rural Canada.

If passed, and I do not doubt that it will pass because of the majority of government members, the legislation will reduce the federal cost sharing from 45 per cent to approximately 27.5 per cent. In so doing, it increases the provinces' costs on the crop insurance program. It is a move that could result in the farmers themselves shouldering a greater percentage of the costs of the crop insurance for two reasons. One is the way the program is designed and the second is that the additional provincial financing burden will show up later in reductions in revenue sharing for smaller communities and rural municipalities across the country.

Those concerns were outlined quite clearly by the National Farmers Union in a brief to the government committee studying the bill. I want to quote briefly from that National Farmers Union brief:

> The last federal budget indicated the amount to be spent on crop insurance for 1989–90 would be reduced by $90 million and a further $110 million decline was projected for the 1990–91 fiscal year. This reduced federal commitment, which would equal the share of the crop insurance premiums paid by provinces to a maximum of 25 per cent, would create inequalities among provinces and producers. Adding costs onto provincial treasuries will hurt poorer provinces, and result in disparate programs available to producers in different regions.
> Under current wording of the proposed legislation—federal contributions would be governed by annual loss claims. Enrolled producers will need to pay their full share of premiums but the federal and provincial governments would pay their respective shares into the provincial plans only if circumstances dictate. We anticipate there may be years in which the producer share would represent well over 50 percent of funds collected by their respective crop insurance programs. The funds could conceivably be depleted every year and farmers could well be confronted with rate increases which might otherwise not be the case.
> The NFU is recommending the federal government's financial commitment to the crop insurance program be increased to cover two–thirds of the premium costs. Producers would pick up the other one–third of the premium expenses, with the provinces assuming the administration costs associated with the program.

The recommendation is one that has a great deal of support throughout the agriculture industry and this government must address it. Even with the amendments so far accepted, this legislation is not going to assist the farm populations in western, central or Atlantic Canada address their real needs.

I remember at the beginning of this debate my colleague for Saskatoon—Humboldt putting this into perspective. He said and I quote: "It is very doubtful that this bill is going to do much to improve farm viability or to reduce the exodus of population from rural communities. All it will do is reduce the cost of the crop insurance program to the federal government."

I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a financial crisis in agriculture today. The price of grain is too low to cover the increasing cost of production. Because of this, the Department of Agriculture is projecting a net loss in income for Saskatchewan producers in 1990.

Also, I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my province has lost 55,000 people in the past five years. In my constituency the largest community is the city of North Battleford with a population of 15,000. In the past five years we have lost the equivalent of three and a half North Battleford Saskatchewans, all because there has not been enough support for the people of rural Canada, the people of rural Saskatchewan and the agriculture industry.

Can we continue the loss of farmers off the land? Can we continue to lose young people from our rural communities, from our cities and from our province? No, we cannot. We certainly need more than a program which relies on higher premiums for producers and a greater contribution from the provincial Treasury to correct this problem. This crisis affects us all and all legislation, no matter how small or seemingly insignificant, must be directed at correcting the problem.

That means, first, increasing the revenues at the farm gate and, second, decreasing the cost of the debt now running at $22 billion, an almost unbelievable amount at the farmgate, considering how valuable agriculture is to the future stability of our entire economy.

Bill C–48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, does nothing to address either of these matters. This bill sets out the terms under which the federal government will contribute to provincial crop insurance schemes. It is an opportunity to express the federal government's commitment to the industry and acknowledge the value that that industry holds for our country.

I know that the federal government does not have jurisdiction on crop insurance and it is not responsible for designing the crop insurance scheme. But that does not mean that the federal government does not have an interest in ensuring that the insurance practices in one province are the same as in another, and that all producers, no matter where they farm, have the same degree of protection that the insurance schemes provide.

With Bill C–48 we see the opposite happening. New Democrats concerned about the future of agriculture will not stand idly by and accept this. The government had undertaken consultations prior to drafting C–48 and listened intently, I expect, to representations made during the committee hearing process. But the bill has not been drafted to assist farmers, as the consultations led us to believe. Its only purpose is to continue the government's plan of reducing its own responsibilities to Canadians.

Let there be no mistake. This government would rather not have to deal with the problems of our economy. That is its philosophy. It is a philosophy that will drive farmers off the land and return agriculture to the control of the private sector which nearly bankrupted the entire industry just a few decades ago. The fact that this legislation is before us today leads me to believe that other initiatives being undertaken by this government are expected to produce the same result.

Perhaps my greatest concern lies with the government's initiated review of the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board because, if it is the intention of government to get out of the business of government, the goal for the Canadian Wheat Board is to get out of that business and not act for the farmer as it has been doing until now.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in November, 1988, there was a general election in this country. Prior to that election there was a great deal of concern about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board because the then proposed free trade agreement was threatening its existence. The government said, "No way, we are committed to the Canadian Wheat Board. The free trade agreement does not affect the Wheat Board. The existence of the Wheat Board is secure".

Well, while this government was in the process of amending the Crop Insurance Act, with the intent of reducing its financial commitment to that act, it has launched an attack on the Wheat Board at the same time; first, with the removal of oats from the export jurisdiction of the board, and now with this full-scale review of the board itself.

Do not blame me for being sceptical or afraid that once again the Conservative philosophy of getting out of government will lead to the destruction of the Canadian Wheat Board and the destruction of farms across the country. Central desk selling and the pooling of grain prices is still the preference of the majority of farmers across Canada. The Canadian Wheat Board has proven its value. Last year in particular, despite advances made by the Americans and the Europeans on the world market, the Wheat Board beat the odds and sold more grain than it was expected to sell under those circumstances.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board was established because Canadian farmers had absolutely no say in the market-place. That seems to me to be the direction to which this government wants to return.

• (1800)

At a time when Canadian farmers need the support of their government and the benefits that can be achieved by co-operation and pooling resources, this government is working to return the industry to the hands of the grain trade whose only interest is the profits they can make, not the income that the farmer can make.

Farmers and Canadians have to ask themselves: should farmers go back to the winner-loser type of market situation where every grain grower is competing for market share and price with every other grain grower in the country?

Saskatchewan Wheat Pool delegates recently showed their preference by voting to support the orderly marketing of grain through the Wheat Board. The government opposite must take heed or risk putting farmer against farmer, community against community, and slowly destroy the entire basis on which the farm economy is structured.

Bill C-48 is just one more step in this long, complicated and dangerous process that is removing the federal government from its commitment to the future and to Canadian farmers.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that I rose in my place last week to ask the government to provide immediately for the industry's call for $500 million so that producers could get their crops in the ground. The snow is melting on the prairies, the farmers are in their garages and their Quonsets preparing their equipment for the land, but the financial institutions are refusing to lend the money they need to get the seed in the ground.

We have never seen a crisis like what we are seeing right now on the prairies. The government takes great pleasure in talking about all it has done for agriculture. I have heard it said that the proof is in the pudding.

If what the government has done in the past is so wonderful, why is the industry in such trouble today? The government's band-aids have been necessary but they are wearing awfully thin. If the crisis in agriculture is a wound, it needs a cleansing remedy, it needs a tourniquet, it needs to be healed so that a healthy industry can grow.

Nothing done to date has been anything more than a band-aid. The assistance in recent years has been greater than at any other time in our history. That does not mean it has been adequate or that the programs which brought it forward were adequate. The agriculture crisis has been building for nine years. It is the result of Liberal and Conservative government mismanagement and totally inappropriate responses to the circumstances in the world market-place.

The amendments to the Crop Insurance Act, the removal of oats from the Wheat Board, the termination of the branch line rehabilitation program, the cancelling of the interest-free cash advance, all make it more difficult for the farmer to respond individually to changes in that international market-place.

Although the Uruguay Round at GATT will end this year, the international problem with export subsidies is still there. There will be no magic solutions for the crop year ahead of us. The government cannot continue to sit on its hands and hope that the market-place will solve the problem for it.

How do we who represent farm interests in this House convince the government that its approach is wrong when it is not listening and cannot read the writing on the wall?

Bill C–48 is taking Canada in the wrong direction. The correct approach is to act internally to reduce interest rates, to institute an income stabilization program to ensure that farmers have an adequate income for their labours, to put in place an immediate $500 million for Saskatchewan farmers to help cover the costs of the recent droughts and low grain prices, and to establish a moratorium on farm foreclosures at least until July 1, 1990 to ensure that a debt restructuring program can be designed and executed.

The Minister of Agriculture is aware that the agricultural debt in Saskatchewan alone is $6 billion, half of which is held by federal and provincial government institutions. Unless that debt is restructured no amount of other assistance is going to alleviate the farm financial crisis before us.

Bill C–48 is an attempt to cloud the crisis, to fool farmers into thinking this government is acting on something. We in the Canadian farm population will not be fooled. At this time of great difficulty in the industry we need a government that is prepared to show leadership, a government that is prepared to see the industry through this difficulty without undue and unnecessary stress, and a government that is prepared to step in where necessary rather than a government that will remove itself from the process.

I will not support Bill C–48 and hope this government will reverse its direction so that farmers can do what they do best: farm the land and provide food for the world.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just one brief comment.

I listened very closely to the hon. member's remarks. He is not recommending that this is a good program. I want to recommend it to the farmers of Saskatchewan. I took a good look at this bill on the weekend with different farmers as it relates to their individual farms.

If the government pays 50 per cent of the coverage plus the administration cost, as it does on the crop insurance program, it is a good deal for the farmers. The additional cost and coverage are very important. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting to the farmers of Saskatchewan that they should not take this coverage, particularly when there are difficult problems for agriculture in Saskatchewan.

The government realizes the problem. That is why the amendments have been made and why this program is important. It is important to farmers to consider taking this program or coverage unless they are in good shape financially.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman opposite has a great deal of experience in the farm community. I know that on occasion he represents his constituency extremely well. I do not doubt for a minute that he advocates the taking of this crop insurance by the farmers in his part of the province.

He will recognize that there are great discrepancies across the province of Saskatchewan in terms of the way in which the crop insurance schemes have been designed and the way in which they assist farmers on marginal land in the north versus the farmers in the southern part of the province. That is not what we are here to debate today.

I believe in crop insurance. I believe crop insurance is an essential part of the agricultural program. However, my argument, if the hon. member had listened, was quite clear, that no amount of tinkering with the crop insurance programs we have today is going to alleviate the farm crisis. Rather than debate this motion, we in this House have to try to find a way out of the farm crisis, to find a way to keep the farmers on the land, and not to try to fool them that we are doing something about it when in fact the big problem is still there.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member from Saskatchewan. He has often served on the agriculture committee and I know he is aware of the difficulties facing Saskatchewan.

The recommendation made by a number of groups in Saskatchewan that there be an acreage payment of something like $20 per acre with perhaps a lesser amount for summer fallow would be a kind of cash injection. The member was saying that we should not be tinkering with the system, that we need a cash injection at this time so farmers can put their crops in the ground this spring. I am interested in knowing the hon. member's view as to what mechanisms should be used.

I understand the federal government is arguing that it should be a cost shared arrangement with the provinces, especially the provinces of Saskatchewan and Ontario, for corn, soybean and wheat producers.

I would be interested in hearing the hon. member's comments with regard to the initial payment and why he believes the Government of Canada has diddled since last November when the Saskatchewan Pool at its annual meeting recommended that there be at least a $500 million cash injection. The premier talked in terms of $500 million now and an additional $1 billion throughout the coming crop year.

• (1810)

Why has the federal government taken so long to make up its mind, and is there going to be a payment before seeding time this spring?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the comments and questions from the hon. member with whom I have served a number of times at committee. I always enjoy listening to questions and comments of the hon. member because he answers a good part of his own question and I share many of his thoughts on this pay-out.

One of the things I was going to say about the pay-out was that it was originally requested by the Saskatchewan Pool. The president of the pool requested quite some time ago the $500 million pay-out.

I do not want to get into the nitty-gritty, the ins and outs of how it should be paid or to whom it should be paid. From my meetings with representatives of the pool and its members, with representatives of national farmers unions and other farmers throughout my constituency and with representatives of the political parties, I believe a number of different schemes would get these funds into the hands of farmers.

My biggest concern is not how the funds get there but that they get there. If seeding does not occur this year, we will be in serious difficulty. The only way that it will occur is for the government to take a leadership role and to provide the mechanism for the release of those funds.

I believe very strongly the words of the hon. member that the government is diddling with this issue are sincere. The government is certainly diddling with this issue. The essence of my remarks today were, quite frankly, that the government did not want to deal with this problem and that it was hoping that something else will occur to take it away from dealing with this problem of the farm financial crisis on the land today, both on the revenue side and on the debt side.

The problem will not go away on its own. This government has to take a leadership role and act now. That $500 million is a minimum that Canadian farmers, in fact Saskatchewan farmers, are asking for.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member on an excellent presentation this afternoon.

During the course of the debate we have heard government members praise the government's actions on behalf of farmers. The government states that there has been an increase of 650 per cent or some such figure in aid to farmers. Most of that aid has occurred in the past. What we have is an expert operation of the kind seen in magic shows where the magician talks us into looking at something other than the trick he is pulling.

We heard a lot from the government about all the assistance it has pulled out of the hat by way of ad hoc payments, but we did not hear much and we never hear very much from the government concerning the amount of money it is taking out of farmers' pockets, particularly since its re-election in November 1988.

There was something like $200 million in the past budget and the current budget out of crop insurance, which will be pulled out of our pockets as taxpayers at the provincial level or in higher premiums at the farm level, taking something like $25 million to $30 million a year forever out of farmers' pockets because of the government's decision to do away with the interest-free cash advance payments programs in the west and across the rest of the country.

There were increased producer levies under the western grain stabilization program. The doubling of the increase there did not come into effect until after the election was over. Although it was known to members of the stabilization committee before the election, it did not show up at the elevator until the election was well in hand.

Also, the discontinuation of the fuel tax rebates was announced in this past budget. It will take effect over two years: January 1, 1990 and it will disappear totally January 1, 1991. It will have the effect of taking between—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Could the member put his question?

Mr. Althouse: What does the member think of a government that talks a good line but is pulling money out of our pockets at the same time as it is talking?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will give the hon. member one minute.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I do not have more time to answer that question and to reiterate some of the figures that my hon. colleague has cited.

There is no question that my hon. colleague, who has been the New Democratic Party's agriculture critic for a number of years, has served the agriculture industry very well. His research has been second to none, and the government would be well served if it would listen to the criticisms and support brought forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie whom I consider a friend as well as a colleague.

The information that he provided to us today is very accurate. There is no question that the government is acting like that magician out there who is showing one thing in one hand and doing something else with the other one. I agree with him entirely and I wish him well in continuing to serve the farm community on agricultural matters.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to start today with commenting on the work of the House at the report stage on Bill C–48, the crop insurance bill.

I am glad to see, in spite of the two ministers' objections, that the House had the wisdom to adopt the amendment that ensures the federal government's commitment to the crop insurance program is at least 25 per cent and not up to 25 per cent. We would rather have had 50 per cent or one–third, at least. To cut it back to 25 per cent and then not include a proposal to make sure at least that it stays at that level and not be withdrawn or cut back later is wrong. That amendment is certainly a good one, and the House should be commended on its wisdom to include it as part of the legislation we are debating at third reading.

The Minister of Agriculture attempted to assure the House that the cut–back to their share of the premium would never happen. Now, because of the amendment, we are sure it cannot happen unless the act is changed again by the House.

I would like to point out that this legislation is indeed a cutback in federal government funding for the crop insurance program. I would like to reflect on all the cutbacks in various farm programs this last year, and all of these coming at a time of extreme economic hardship in the farm sector. Spring planting is just a few weeks away and my neighbours will be starting to plant in a couple of weeks. The lending institutions are no longer lending on equity but rather lending only on a cash flow projections basis. No matter how one budgets for this coming year, with our low prices of wheat, corn, soybeans and other crops, one cannot cash flow in order to show a profit next fall. Consequently many farmers are having their operating loans cut off this year.

I think back to some of the discussions earlier this afternoon and to what happened on November 21. That was the day of the massive demonstration, that wonderful demonstration that was put together by the UPA of Quebec, the producers, organization in Quebec. They protested on Parliament Hill because of these massive cutbacks in spending in agriculture, because of the uncertainty resulting from the free trade agreement, and because the government failed to stand up at GATT and take the part of the producers.

I look back at what happened at that time and look at the events of today when two innocent people who were protesting on Parliament Hill were dragged off by the police, dragged out at a time when they were speaking to members of Parliament. One of them was a priest who was fasting on behalf of the unborn.

• (1820)

We heard arguments and references made to that meeting of November 21. When I think back on that I have to wonder if it is sheer coincidence that this action took place here today because the farmers were demonstrating on November 21 on the Hill. I have to think that perhaps the government is afraid to let them back on the Hill again to protest. It is afraid that the next time they come back if the government does not listen, they will tear the place apart. No doubt they will be joined by literally thousands upon thousands of farmers from across the rest of Canada.

An Hon. Member: Simcoe too.

Mr. Ferguson: Simcoe, too. I do not doubt that at all. Most of the rich people from Toronto own homes up in Simcoe County. A lot of the very wealthy ones are up there, and they do not get hit as hard as the rest, but I would suggest that the Minister of Transport should go out and talk to the real down to earth farmers, the ones who make their livelihood out of the soil.

The government knows that if these farmers are forced to come back to the Hill to demonstrate again, there will be double the number that were here last November. At that time, there were between 12,000 and 13,000, according to the figures that were obtained from some of our institutions on the Hill. La Presse said 15,000. The Ottawa Citizen said 13,000, but the figures we have indicate between 12,000 and 13,000, most of them from the province of Quebec, but quite a number from the province of Ontario as well. If they come back, they will hold the government accountable for what has happened to agriculture since the fall of 1984 when it took over.

Passing an Order in Council to prevent the people of this country from demonstrating on the Hill is not acceptable when we have the economic conditions that we have here in the farm sector today.

When I was a young person going to school, I used to hear my father talk about the tough times under the Bennett government. The farmers from across Canada came by railway and every other means possible to demonstrate on the Hill. Their demonstrations proved to be effective because back at that time we had the various boards come into place. They gave the farmers control over what they are selling and the returns they had to have, and took it out of the hands of a few very large corporate people who were making excessive profits.

One of the problems that producers have today is that they do not have VIA Rail any more. The government cut that off too to keep them away from the Hill here, so they could not demonstrate.

An Hon. Member: Some 2,700 people down the tube.

Mr. Ferguson: That is right.

We heard the Premier of Saskatchewan saying last week that a third of their farmers are in extremely difficult positions and may go down the tubes. That is a third of all farmers, 21,000 in Saskatchewan is a third of their farmers, and another third in difficult problems.

I ask you to listen to what the Minister of Finance said in his 1989 budget. It is on page 15 of his budget speech. He said that a rebalancing of the costs of this program will result in a federal saving of $90 million in 1988–89 and $110 million in 1990–91. What we are seeing today is the result of that statement. A massive cutback at this time, when the farmers are facing such harsh economic conditions out there, and now their operating loans are cutting off, it is neither acceptable nor can it be condoned.

Clearly the Minister of Finance sees this as a cost cutting measure, with the federal government's share of the program being cut. Of course this past Wednesday the Minister of Agriculture told the House that this is not a cutback on the government's share of crop insurance costs. Let us look at the effects of the program's new funding arrangements.

The provinces share the cost of crop insurance, and their share will increase. For example, the cost to Prince Edward Island is going to increase from $150,000 a year to $650,000 a year. That is a half a million dollar increase—a whopping 333 per cent. Producers' costs will increase as well. In some cases the producers' costs will increase by close to 50 per cent.

As we heard earlier, the federal government will spend $200 million less on crop insurance over the next two years. How can it possibly say that the $200 million is not a cutback? Last December, when this legislation came before the House, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture told the House that one of the major reasons for the change of crop insurance was: "We have provided a more equitable rate for sharing the cost of insurance premiums".

It is easy for two of the three partners in the program to get together and say: "Look, we will share one-half of the cost and leave the other guys alone because they are not here." It is easy for them to make such an arrangement when that third party is not at the table and is not involved in these negotiations. This is exactly what happened. The producers were not present when this agreement was arrived at.

Indeed, the members used the terms "equitable" or "balanced" more than half a dozen times to describe the changes in the premium funding arrangements. If the member listened to the witnesses when this bill was before the committee and took the time to read their briefs, he would fail to bring to light a single witness, other than the minister, who calls this change "equitable".

Even the governments of Ontario, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and New Brunswick found that it is far less than equitable. Seven out of the nine producer witnesses asked for a tripartite sharing of the costs of crop insurance. The list of witnesses was very impressive, witnesses who were asking for an amendment to change the funding for the crop insurance program to a one-third, one-third, one-third split.

We have the Ontario Agriculture Commodity Council that represents 17 different producer groups. The Soybean Growers' Marketing Board of Ontario was present. The Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities made a brief. The Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers' Association, the Western Barley Growers' Association, the Ontario Seed Growers' Association, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, all these organizations that came before the committee recognized an equitable sharing of the premium would be one divided along the line of one-third, one-third, one-third.

Only the minister and his department's witnesses agreed with the proposed format. I suggest that only this government could possibly argue that this legislation would implement an equitable sharing arrangement.

I should point out, perhaps, that when the National Farmers Union appeared before the committee it asked for a one-third, two-thirds sharing of the split, with the federal government accepting the two-thirds share.

In December, I argued for the precedent of the tripartite cost sharing to be established in crop insurance. I would like to point out today with this legislation that the government is clearly attempting to undermine that precedent and to set a new precedent for cost sharing and programs to provide the rationale to reverse these previous decisions.

I would like to take a few moments to point out some of the other weaknesses of this legislation to show how some of them are directly related to this legislation's failure to introduce equitable cost sharing. The coverage under this bill would improve from 80 per cent to 90 per cent for some crops. That may seem like an improvement that the legislation would make for crop insurance. However, on a field of corn, this 10 per cent improvement would cost the farmer almost double the premium. The farmer's insurance premium costs would go from $5.71 an acre to $10 per acre. Common sense alone should tell the government that this is far from balanced, or is very inequitable to say the least.

Look at what happens to a Saskatchewan farmer. Let us say that he has 1,200 acres of wheat with a coverage of 70 per cent, guaranteeing him returns of 18 bushels an acre. His premium would be $5,700. To increase that coverage from 70 per cent to 80 per cent, a 10 per cent increase in coverage, his premium would increase by 75 per cent—a 75 per cent cost for a 10 per cent return. That is far from being equitable. I am reasonably sure that very few farmers will be opting for that additional coverage, because of the extra cost.

Considering the administrative difficulties and the gross inequities revealed by the application of the Canadian Drought Assistance Program, I would have thought that the government would have attempted to address these problems in this legislation. I have to refer to the fact that it has been recommended by various groups that we should have more coverage that is available for individual farms. For example in my own riding, producers in Ekfrid, Metcalfe, and Adelaide townships were able to establish a long narrow drought band cutting a swath across their townships. The area of the band in total was fairly large. Because the majority of the three townships in question was not as hard hit, the whole township was ruled ineligible for drought assistance. Because of the guidelines the appeal process failed to rectify the situation. If the intent of the legislation is truly and actually to reform crop insurance, we should have included changes that would allow for damage assessments such as this and make recommendations for future years, such as we had in 1987 and 1988, and in some areas in 1989.

I would like to speak of tomorrow. A few moments ago I referred to the fact that spring is almost here. It is here officially on March 21. In my area, seeding will start around April 1.

Canadian producers need that legislation now, and they need the financial assistance to go along with it. Farm incomes are forecast to drop dramatically this year as Canadian farmers are victims in an international trade war in which their government refuses to fire a shot. I call on the government to show some compassion in view of the fact that farmers are not getting their operating loans this year. Again, one cannot cash flow one's input costs against expected returns.

I call on the government to provide an insurance coverage program by delaying the payments on the premiums until the harvest and sale of this crop takes place. Surely, in these economically tough times, the government could take a look at this. We are only asking the government to share some of the risk rather than have these people not being able to plant their crops because they cannot afford crop insurance.

I have a petition here that the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board committeemen presented the week before last, on March 6, to the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, asking for help. It states:

> The undersigned Ontario wheat producers, duly elected county committeemen, implore the federal government to immediately establish price support to equalize the damage caused to Ontario wheat prices by the United States export enhancement program. Such support can be accomplished by approval of the Ontario Wheat Board's request for the 1990 initial payment guarantee of $130 per tonne.

These committeemen, and there are three pages of names here, represent 25,000 wheat producers across the province of Ontario.

We have letters of request from the Ontario Corn Growers Association. Again, it asks the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister to realize the severity of the drought experienced in several parts of southwestern Ontario and central Ontario last year and to come across with some assistance this year to help in planting the crops.

It goes on and on. The soybean producers are equally hard hit. It is the same for the wheat producers in Saskatchewan.

On March 12 the corn producers announced that their members' incomes have declined substantially and are now only 28 per cent of pre-1985 levels. This shows that incomes have dropped dramatically since this government took power in 1984. The sums the government is currently offering barely meet one-tenth of the United States Export Enhancement Program's current allocation of $570 million. That is a program which is to be increased to $900 million for next year.

We should not fail to consider the European Economic Community's subsidies which the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture on March 5 estimated to be close to $80 a tonne for grains.

In view of this situation, I call on the minister and the government to listen to all these requests for assistance and to act now before it is too late so that our producers can plant their crops this year.

We have the most efficient producers in the world who grow the highest quality produce. The government should not be abandoning its responsibility to provide equitable crop insurance as this bill clearly does. I cannot support this bill in its current form.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member. I noticed that he mentioned some of the wheat producers and corn producers with whom he met recently are pointing out the great need for a price support program of some sort to offset the effects of the grain wars going on between the United States and the European Economic Community. Would he care to comment on that just a little bit more? Would he place particular emphasis on the initiative that the U.S. embarked upon some years ago to try to get all countries off a subsidy program, which is interesting coming from that country which is one of the highest users of taxpayers' money to produce raw grain and food products of any country in the world?

A lot of the other countries have programs that force their consumers to pay more for food products, countries such as Japan and countries in Europe. The U.S. is the most fervent user of taxpayers' money to produce food to try to get the price down. The result has been a very low amount of money that the consumer pays for the grocery bill. It is something like 11 per cent of income. That is masked because that same consumer's tax pocket is being used all the time to keep the price of food low.

I realize that we are all calling for some sort of ad hoc price support program. Would the member look down the road for just a moment and tell us what he thinks the possibilities are of living in a subsidy-free world, given that that same subsidy-free world assumes that somewhere out there there is a free market?

I ask my question given the reports from some parts of the United States with regard to actions on the Chicago Board of Trade concerning soybean futures in particular, and also the indications of massive manipulation by some of the users of the Chicago Board of Trade which is the point at which most world prices are established. Will the member tell us how comfortable he is with having to rely on that to be the methodology whereby price discovery takes place if we do in fact reach this great world that the United States is trying to direct world agriculture into?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the question which the hon. member has laid out very clearly. When I look at what is happening in the area of price discovery in the market-place I see that that method of price discovery no longer exists. The U.S. Export Enhancement Program that provided $20.50 a tonne subsidy on the sale of wheat to Russia in January caused our price of wheat here in Canada to drop by $20.50 a tonne. The Americans actually set our price of wheat; the market-place had nothing to do with it. Our world grain reserves are a low point, yet the prices are held down artificially by such actions.

When I look at what is happening in the area of corn production and the price of corn, the U.S. has an acreage allotment program. That acreage allotment program has been in place for a great many years. Farmers are required to set aside 10 per cent of their acreage, and in return they have a target price. They receive a deficiency payment which is the difference between the market price and the target price. That money will come into the producers' hands this month. They will be able to go ahead and plant their crops for the coming year. The money that comes into their hands is half the deficiency payment, the other half is paid a year from now.

The member also referred to the scandal last summer on the Chicago Board of Trade. I followed that very extensively. Again, it was price manipulation by a few very large corporations that was not stopped by the proper regulatory authority. It was allowed to continue.

When I look at the method of price determination and then at the actions of this government, which is working hand in hand with the American government to try to bring about an end to the subsidies, I find it hard to find words to describe just what is happening. Perhaps I can refer to a description I heard not long ago as to what is happening to the Canadian farmer. What is happening to the Canadian farmer at the present time is not unlike what Jimmy Bakker did to Jessica Hahn. I think that sums it up very clearly.

The hon. member asked me what we can see down the road. It is up to we as Canadians to set the direction for Canadian agriculture. It is up to we Canadians to show the world that we have the highest quality products in the world. We have maintained our share of the world markets over the years.

I am convinced that we should ignore what is happening to the south of us and go with our own programs which are designed to protect Canadian farmers. We should make food a national security item here in this country, with the large percentage of it produced and processed in this country and forget about that ill-founded trade agreement that gave the Americans our oil, natural gas, water, and is putting adverse pressure on our producers.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand in the House today and discuss this very important bill, Bill C-48, which has a tremendous effect on the Canadian farmer and the Canadian institution itself.

As I stop to think about what I would consider some of the most important issues is Canada, it is making sure that businesses, such as all farms are, are given the proper tools and the proper facilities to operate in this society. I honestly believe, without question, that crop insurance is a very, very important tool required to operate.

As I think about crop insurance I have to think about what it does in order to help the Canadian farmer live a much better life, a much more stable existence. It seems to me that year after year, problem after problem, we hear of ad hoc policies that are brought out by the government in order to stop difficulties that exist.

Let me give an example of that. In 1988 a drought hit across Canada and destroyed much of the agricultural community. Weather conditions cannot be easily controlled. As a result, a drought is devastating to an enormous part of agriculture in Canada.

Just last year in my area we had a tremendous flood. No one expected 12 inches of rain in a very short time period. That devastation came down upon the farmers in my area and literally destroyed hundreds of acres of production. The result is that we scramble here and there in ad hoc committees, hoping that we will set up programs which will answer the difficulties the Canadian farmer faces.

I get a little tired when I hear that the answer to many of these problems is a payment of this or a payment of that. The Canadian farmer deserves better. He is a very hard working, very good businessman and does produce to the best of his ability with the circumstances he is in. Of all businesses I think about in Canada, the agricultural community is more subject to weather conditions which produce droughts, floods, frosts which cause a tremendous amount of damage, and hail storms that knock out a tremendous amount of crop production from time to time.

As we start considering those in the agricultural community, we see that they really do need a very strong, stable insurance program. That stable insurance program needs to have two qualities. The two qualities are affordability and flexibility.

When I stop and think about the aspect of insurance being affordable, all I have to do is relate it to any consumer who is buying auto insurance, house insurance or any other type of insurance. If the cost of that insurance exceeds its ability to support that family, or if it exceeds the ability of the family to buy a car and have it properly insured, then the insurance policy is not meeting the need of the consumer.

If this crop insurance program which is being produced is going to have rates that are extremely high, and if those rates are not being somehow supported by both levels of government, federal and provincial, the effectiveness of the insurance is strongly affected by its affordability. If a farmer in my area decides that the cost of insuring his acreage of corn, soybeans, tomatoes or whatever is too high, he is going to stop and start thinking about what the odds are of getting around this insurance policy this year. His input costs and all his other costs are so high, he may not be able to participate in the plan.

What I am seeing and hearing is that the number of dollars available to farmers in this area and farmers right across Canada are not plentiful. They are not there for him just to go out and buy insurance easily.

I see articles with headlines suggesting that if you thought you could afford crop insurance last year, you may not be able to afford crop insurance this year. They are suggesting that the rates of this crop insurance program are not being alleviated at all by the introduction of this crop insurance bill.

As a matter of fact, we all know that the federal government in its generosity did support crop insurance at a rate of 50 per cent of the premium in many provinces across Canada. Particularly here in Ontario the 50 per cent rate was covered by the federal government up to a maximum of 80 per cent of historic crop value. At the same time the provincial government carried the administrative costs and the farm community carried the other 50 per cent.

To make this insurance more affordable to the farmer, the recommendation came from almost every farm group across this country that we set up a tripartite payment plan which would give the federal government, the provincial government and the farmer or the producer each one-third of the payment responsibility.

This would affect the farmer in two separate ways. First, it would make the program more affordable. Second, it would give the opportunity to many of those who did not have the financial resources to participate in the insurance program the ability to get into the program and to participate in a reasonable way.

The recommendation was very strongly put forward. One of the greatest disappointments I have read from almost every producer area across Canada was with respect to the fact that the federal government, rather than following through with reducing from 50 per cent input to 33 per cent input decided to go right down to 25 per cent, which it passed on to the provincial governments. In other words, our federal government changed its method of support to the farm community, reducing its costs by approximately $100 million a year. Now the provincial government has to pick up what the federal government was paying up until the introduction of this bill.

The federal government is going to pick up part of the administrative costs, which are very low. They are estimated to be in the 7 per cent range. The federal government is picking up part of the administrative costs but only subsidizing this program to 25 per cent. That is a very unfortunate situation when we look at what is happening in the farm community in general.

People in the farm community have also been hit with many bills because of the legislation that has come down in the last two budgets, particularly the budget before this one. They are still feeling those effects this year. We are seeing fuel cost rebates being taken back. The farmer is paying much more for the cost of gasoline and diesel fuel.

We have seen transportation subsidies reduced. We have seen many farm programs, where we have had subsidies in line to pay the farm community what it needed for support, taken away. At the same time I feel that this insurance program could eliminate the ad hoc programs that we come to from time to time. We have not basically taken hold of that crop insurance and really encouraged the farmer to get involved, but we have cut back our support in that area as well.

The major problem that the farm community was upset with was this reduction in federal support, the federal support in the crop insurance program. Another area in which help was asked for in this insurance program was the optional coverage going from the 80 per cent level, which is in most programs now, to a 90 per cent level, which would give the farmer an opportunity to more protect his crop and more protect his harvest. That is in place, in part.

For some programs like corn, farmers will be able to get a 90 per cent coverage, but there are many other crops that have quite a strong variation. One year they might have 50 bushels per acre, while another year they have much less and another year more. Because of those variations there is a very complicated formula that has been put out by the federal government resulting in crops such as soybeans only being allowed to have 86 per cent coverage. Crops such as spring wheat would only be allowed 83 per cent coverage. There are many other crops that would not be allowed to come up to the 80 per cent.

I would like to look at comments that have come back about this crop insurance bill from people whom we all respect in the agricultural community. Roger George, the vice-president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, said that the changes are mere illusion. "There will be no break for farmers," he said. Don Drew, from the Ontario Corn Producers' Association said that any improvements are marginal at best. John Jacks said that improvements will either be marginal or non-existent.

What they are saying is that as this bill has been formulated, it has been formulated for a very specific reason by the Conservative government. Basically, the bill is reducing its commitment and its costs to the farm community. It is reducing its commitment and costs for, I think, very narrow reasons. It does not look at the farm community as a community that needs a great deal of help in this time period. It is looking mainly at the farm community which may be a group of people that represent 2 per cent to 3 per cent of our society today. Maybe because there is not a huge voting element in the farm community they are not being supported well with a higher-price food policy. We have a cheap food policy which is driving agricultural group after agricultural group to its knees.

This policy is being couched and covered in many different ways. We are being told that because of agreements that have been made between the United States and Canada, because of GATT rulings, because of all different kinds of agreements that have been entered into, that we cannot protect the farm community.

That is not necessarily the truth when it comes down to some of the statements that have been made. I would like to quote a comment which appeared in the corn producers' June 1989 newsletter. It states that federal spokesmen have claimed that their jurisdiction for a 25-25-50 split in premiums among the two levels of government and producers, respectively, will have to be followed because of an agreement that was made at the April Geneva GATT conference which froze agricultural subsidies. It goes on to state that federal trade negotiators have assured people in this House and all farm communities that the freeze involves the total effective level of support, that the statutory and ad hoc measures must be included.

Therefore if we look at crop insurance as a statutory law and we look at the ad hoc measures, the payments for drought assistance and floods, or payments made to all other areas, we realize that there is a tremendous amount of latitude and extra dollars that this government is not being forced to peel back. As a matter of fact, the government has a tremendous amount of room to negotiate, when we realize what it has done to the advance payments to farm communities and how that is affecting the farm community financially, and when we consider what it has done to the transportation payments that have been paid and which have been cut back dramatically. In this regard we can also consider the fuel tax rebates which are being cut out, as well as the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been taken out of the farm community in the last 18 months.

I am frightened for the farmers in my area and for farmers across this country because they deserve better. They deserve the opportunity to be the type of business they deserve to be, that is, a stable industry in this country.

If we realize the value of food to any country, it is imperative that we take similar measures to the U.S. and Europe to protect our agricultural industries. We are going in the opposite direction. We are taking dollars out of their pockets day after day, week after week, month after month, while we watch the U.S. not change any laws about subsidies or cut back any moneys to its agricultural communities. We see the U.S. in a real entanglement with the European common market, and it is putting in more money and more money which in fact comes back and devastates the Canadian farmer. It is an unfortunate but real situation that our farming community is under a great deal of stress today. We must do what we can to support it.

I believe that this bill has flaws in it that do not support the agricultural community as it should. I cannot support the bill because of the main item in it, that is the three levels of government and their participation. I believe that the federal government should pay one-third, the provincial government should pay one-third and the producers should pay one-third. Clearly, that would make a much fairer situation, a situation in which we are not always going back for other ad hoc support for the agricultural community.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, we have been told by Statistics Canada and by Agriculture Canada that the statistics show that farmers will actually be losing money next year from their realized income. They will not, in a sense, get back what they have put into inputs.

Can the member give us an indication of what he feels the value of insurance is going to be under those kinds of circumstances, especially when we know before we plant the seeds that we are not going to get a return which is going to cover the costs of production?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, the people in my area to whom I have talked are very concerned about being able to have some money in their pockets to be able to go out and plant the crops this year. Because of the cutbacks in advance payments and because of the stress that they are under, many of the banking institutions are not extending credit for the basic start-up fees that our farmers really need to get under production.

Certainly the aspect that the hon. member brings forward is one that the farmer is going to be challenged with if he does get the start-up money or the advance money in order to get his crop in the ground. The actual harvest price is not looking good. We have been under attack by U.S. and European subsidies on certain products. We have actually driven the price of that commodity below the cost of production. If that is the case, there is a strong question of how the farmer can survive at all.

It is not how you operate a business in this case, it is whether that business is being so subsidized by different governments that it is unfair to exist.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have eight minutes remaining in his questions and comments.

It being 7 p.m., pursuant to an order made Thursday, March 15, 1990, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion of Mr. Nault in relation to the business of supply.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—REGIONAL DISPARITIES

The House resumed from Thursday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Nault:

That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect, support and promote the regional economies of Canada, in order to eliminate regional disparities in the Atlantic provinces, Northern Ontario and Western and Northern Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NAMIBIA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in just six hours Namibia will become fully independent from South Africa. There has not been an independence celebration anywhere in the world for nearly six years. This event is particularly momentous as Namibia is the last colony in Africa.

Namibian independence is, in the first place, a success story for the United Nations. The UN, which for 10 years previous, had no new peace-keeping operations has launched no less than five in the last two years, of which by far the largest was UNTAG, the UN Transition Assistance Group in Namibia. UNTAG was nearly stillborn last April when a tragic final outburst of fighting broke out between nationalist guerrillas and South African-controlled forces on the very day of the formal ceasefire. But reason prevailed and the transition process was accomplished without a hitch, military withdrawals and demobilizations, amnesty and repeal of apartheid legislation, repatriation of refugees and release of detainees, and finally registration of voters and the election of a Constituent Assembly in November. UN special representative Martti Ahtisaari and UNTAG now leave the country with the great satisfaction of having accomplished their mission—in full, on time, and within budget.

Namibian independence is also a success story for Canada. In 1977, Canada, with France, West Germany, the United Kingdom and the U.S.A., took the lead in negotiating a settlement plan for Namibia that came to be universally accepted as Security Council Resolution 435. Several years of negotiations followed, with Canada centrally involved in what was called the Contact Group, to overcome obstacles to the implementation of Resolution 435 through a parallel agreement on constitutional principles and UN impartiality. The final obstacle, linkage to Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola, was resolved in the fall of 1988 through an American-mediated regional agreement.

Canada then pitched in to implement the plan it had helped to devise. We advanced 80 per cent of our UNTAG assessment of $15 million to get the operation off to a fast start. Over 500 Canadian forces personnel served in UNTAG in two rotations, later joined by 100 members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 50 election supervisors from the federal and provincial electoral institutions and the national political parties, and 12 fingerprint and computer experts. The government established a diplomatic observer mission in Windhoek while our UN mission remained active in the search for solutions on the Security Council.

Four parliamentary observers went to Namibia last September for the elections, as well as a Canadian member of a Commonwealth group and a number of independent non-governmental observers throughout the process. Some $3.9 million worth of development and humanitarian aid was provided, including $2 million for the UN refugee repatriation. Four thousand ballot boxes were supplied for the election.

Canada has invested over $22 million to help Namibia secure its independence, and over 700 Canadians have participated and contributed personally. I know I speak for all members of the House in saying that we are very proud of, and grateful to, every one of those Canadians.

Above all, Namibia's independence is a success story for the Namibians. They are emerging from over a century of German and South African colonialism. When given the chance to participate in free and fair elections, their enthusiasm for democracy knew no bounds. They walked great distances and waited patiently under blazing sun in lines up to a kilometre long in order to elect their Constituent Assembly. The turnout in that election was 97 per cent.

The new Assembly, animated by a strong, all-party commitment to reconciliation and co-operation, adopted unanimously in just 80 days an exemplary constitution. It provides for fully entrenched human rights, a presidency accountable to a bicameral Parliament, an independent judiciary, regular multi-party elections, and the absence of preventive detention and the death penalty. Namibians are justifiably proud of their new constitution and they are determined to make it work in practice and not just on paper.

Lastly, Namibia's independence is a success story for South Africa, and a harbinger of hope for the future. South Africa has decolonized with dignity and shown the world that it can be trusted to fulfil international agreements. South Africans can now look to Namibia for persuasive proof that fundamental political change can be achieved through a peaceful, negotiated and democratic process. Namibia, long a hostage to apartheid, is now leading the way for South Africa in dismantling apartheid, by showing what is possible when reason overcomes emotion and compromise replaces prejudice.

• (1110)

And so Africa's last colony later today takes its long-awaited and rightful place among the community of nations. We will welcome the Republic of Namibia as the fiftieth member of the Commonwealth and soon as the one hundred and sixtieth member of the United Nations.

[Translation]

Canada is represented at the independence celebrations by my colleague, the Minister for External Relations and International Development (Mrs. Landry). The delegation also includes parliamentarians of all three parties—the members for Waterloo, Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Speller) and Windsor-St. Clair— who have a long standing interest in Namibia and Southern Africa.

[English]

Namibia will need the continued support of its friends. I am pleased to announce today that Canada is opening a high commission in Windhoek.

Canada is also ending the application to Namibia of certain economic sanctions which were directed at South Africa when South Africa was in control. The ban on new contracts for the toll-processing of Namibian uranium is lifted with effect from March 21, 1990. I am confident that uranium can become a field of productive co-operation with Namibia and that new contracts can soon be secured. The ban on importing South African uranium remains in place and will be stringently and effectively monitored.

Canada is also moving to normalize export promotion in Namibia. The program for export market development is now available there, and we will be active in promoting trade with Namibia.

[Translation]

The Export Development Corporation has been told that there are no longer any barriers to export finance and investment insurance, and the chief executives of major chartered banks have been told that export credit restrictions and other voluntary financial sanctions on South Africa no longer apply to Namibia.

[English]

As for development assistance, the Minister for External Relations and International Development is advising Namibian leaders that CIDA will be providing a special independence contribution of up to $1 million to support an expanded program of immunization through UNICEF. This is a high priority for the new Namibian government. With a further $1 million already pledged by the Prime Minister through the Commonwealth Fund for technical co-operation and other aid, total Canadian assistance to Namibia is expected to exceed $4 million this year. It will be delivered mainly through Canadian and Namibian non-governmental organizations and multilateral channels.

Finally, Namibia has a continuing need for security assistance. There is a requirement to strengthen and reorient the police force so that the stability essential to economic development can be maintained in a climate favourable to human rights. With the concurrence of my colleague, the Solicitor General, the RCMP will soon be providing police training services funded through the Commonwealth, and the RCMP director of training will shortly lead a needs-assessment mission to Windhoek. Namibia is also being invited to join the Military Training Assistance Program already offered by the Canadian Forces to southern African and Caribbean countries.

To mark the actual moment of independence—midnight in Namibia and 5 p.m. here today—a motion of congratulations will be proposed then for unanimous consent in this House.

Namibian independence is a success story for the UN, for South Africa, for Canada and, most of all, for its own people themselves. It is a world class achievement which this House, and all Canadians, proudly applaud.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity, speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, to add my comments to the statement made this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We are of course delighted with Namibia's independence, and we shall be very pleased to support the motion which, Mr. Speaker, I believe you will propose to the House for unanimous consent at five o'clock this afternoon.

Besides the Namibians themselves, I think the happiest person alive today is probably Canada's former ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Bill Barton, who is at last seeing the results of his efforts. In 1977, acting on behalf of Canada and together with the ambassadors of a number of other countries, he initiated a resolution, universally adopted in the form of a United Nations resolution and referred to as Security Council Resolution 435, which signalled the start of the independence process in Namibia.

The minister has every reason to be proud, since over the years, his department, through various officials, has led a sometimes discreet, sometimes vigourous campaign at the United Nations. Above all, he can take pride in the efforts of over 700 Canadians who contributed, either directly or indirectly, to the event we are celebrating today.

I would like to join the minister in extending our warm thanks to 500 members of our Canadian Forces personnel who certainly played a vital role in the exemplary democratic process that took place in Namibia; 150 members of the RCMP, who also played an important role; 50 elections supervisors who went there to see to it that the election took place according to the best democratic traditions, and another 50 Canadians, including ambassadors, public servants and technicians, who were down there and also played an important role in bringing about the event we so proudly celebrate today.

Of course, I believe most of the credit should go to the Namibians themselves and to the United Nations which, with tremendous skill, was able to break the deadlock at a time when it seemed there was very little hope of having a free democratic election in Namibia.

I think it is also appropriate to mention the role played by various non-governmental organizations. I was particularly impressed by the level of Canadian interest as expressed by a substantial number of these organizations. In this respect, I would like to single out OXFAM Canada which helped to keep the Canadian government up to scratch, as it were, and ensure that the government and its representatives remained dedicated to this cause. I must say that OXFAM kept us very well informed throughout.

[English]

In fact, Oxfam Canada regularly distributed news reports and analyses filed by the Namibia communications centre, a Namibian church-sponsored news service. Oxfam Canada launched this program as part of a larger information, education and election observation project founded by partnership Africa Canada, and under the leadership of the United Church of Canada and World University Service of Canada as well as Développement et paix, and, of course, Oxfam Canada.

These reports were distributed weekly across Canada to journalists, members of Parliament, development organizations, solidarity networks and the public at large.

Occasionally, they were complemented with reports from Namibia's leading newspaper The Namibian.

• (1120)

I want to express personally and on behalf of my party our sincere thanks to John Graham and to Hein Marais and others for their remarkable jobs and certainly for keeping us on our toes in making this process a successful one.

[Translation]

I would also like to mention very briefly the important contribution made by the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, which organized a round table discussion on Namibia at a time when the outlook seemed very bleak indeed. I am sure this international round table was also instrumental in persuading the United Nations to clamp down on certain irregularities that were on the verge of spreading just prior to the election in Namibia. I believe that the round table, which brought together a very high-powered group of individuals interested in this issue, was able to submit recommendations that proved very useful to the United Nations.

[English]

The success of the UN role in helping to facilitate the transition to Namibian independence, coupled with the fervent desire of the Namibian people to control their own fate through the democratic process, culminated in an election which saw individuals sometimes walking for days through the harsh climate of the Namibian desert proudly to register their votes. In all, 97 per cent of Namibians eligible to vote did just that. It is certainly an expression of democracy and freedom that should serve as a clear signal that despite the hardship of continued repression, freedom will eventually triumph.

I do hope that this example will give faith to many other people in the world who are suffering under various types of dictatorships. Indeed, as the United Nations, helped by countries like Canada and others, tries to emulate a greater effort of freedom and democracy throughout the world, many other individuals like Namibians, will eventually go through this process of free elections and will also be able to have their own democratic government.

Currently we see a tremendous example of this taking place in eastern Europe. I do hope that we shall see the same fervour for independence and democracy take place in some Asian and African countries. It is not something that we should only dream about, but see every nation in the world being free and able to elect their own government democratically.

As the Minister for External Affairs has pointed out, Namibia's peaceful transition to independence should serve as an example to all South Africans that reason in the pursuit of freedom for all members of a society can result in the peaceful transition from oppression to liberty. In this vein, I congratulate the South African government for its role in Namibia's transition to independence and ask that it show the same reason and courage in the upcoming negotiations over the development of a new constitution for South Africa. Perhaps South Africa can look to the spirit of freedom and respect for fundamental human rights contained in the exemplary constitution that the Namibians have adopted as a starting point for these negotiations.

We are pleased that the minister has decided to remove the economic sanctions that have been in place against Namibia. Perhaps this too will serve as an example to the South Africans.

[Translation]

In concluding, I may mention very briefly that two of my colleagues, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk have been interested for quite some time in the Namibia question. In fact, the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk is down there at this very moment, as a representative of the Liberal Party of Canada.

I would like to conclude with two short quotes from a report the hon. member made after visiting that country recently with several other Canadian parliamentarians, in which he said:

[English]

> We affirm our support and friendship to Namibia and urge the Canadian government to respond generously to requests for development assistance particularly to expand training and education programs for black Namibians. We believe that the Canadian churches and non-governmental agencies are uniquely positioned to be partners with the government in providing assistance.

Obviously, the amount of money that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has announced this morning is a significant contribution. I do believe that Namibia will need much more. I do hope that it will be possible for Canada, through non-governmental organizations or directly with bilateral aid to Namibia, to make a much bigger contribution.

Let me quote again:

> We would welcome Namibia's joining the Commonwealth as one of the most promising new nations. It is important and significant that a peaceful transition to independence in Namibia will have a positive effect on the struggle for human rights in South Africa especially in the battle against apartheid.
>
> As Lester B. Pearson once said: "it is part of the Canadian psyche to accept international commitments". In accordance with our Charter of Rights and Freedoms we readily accept our responsibility to support Namibia's successful transition to independence, and will continue to show our concern for the well-being of Namibia and South Africa in general. After independence, Namibia will continue to be vulnerable to pressure from South Africa. Canada, and the other nations of the world, must ensure that this fragile new democracy is given every opportunity to develop in peace.

[Translation]

Finally, I hope that the minister will not only monitor very closely future relations between Namibia and South Africa but will also continue his past and present efforts to end apartheid in South Africa, which will be very soon, I hope.

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of the New Democratic Party. We join with the rest of the House in celebration of freedom and independence in Namibia.

• (1130)

The excitement in Windhoek five and a half hours from now will be exceptional. At the airport planes must leave and park somewhere else as more and more people come to join in that celebration.

As the minister has stated today, this most recent United Nations success story is first and foremost the story of the will and determination of the Namibian people. Members of Parliament, development workers, church groups and other Canadians from all walks of life have taken a keen interest in events in southern Africa for a number of years. Today marks the culmination of these efforts by Canadians on behalf of the people of Namibia.

As Namibia attains independence, it is important to recognize the sacrifices made by those along this road to independence. Over 20,000 people lost their lives in the bloody struggle against South African rule and many paid for their opposition with long years of imprisonment and exile. I met many of those at an anti-apartheid conference that was concurrent with the last Commonwealth conference in Vancouver a number of years ago. We must remind ourselves that this was not a peaceful struggle for independence.

While it is important to recognize the goodwill and the compromises made by all sides to obtain this independence, we will be mistaken if we forget that this settlement was achieved through great pressure, and I think the Canadian anti-apartheid movement should take some credit for that. I know that the role played by Canadians was very important in keeping that pressure on and encouraging our government to act and to speak out forcefully in the struggle against apartheid.

The international community played an important role in bringing the South African government to the bargaining table through policies of economic and diplomatic isolation. These same policies will be essential in any upcoming settlement in South Africa, and it is interesting to note that one of the prime movers of the anti-apartheid struggle, the main symbol of that anti-apartheid struggle, Nelson Mandela, will be in Windhoek this evening for the celebrations.

As well, we would be advised to recognize that Namibia is not entirely free so long as they do not control the essential port of Walvis Bay and as long as they remain economic vassals of South Africa. Canada must remain committed to the full independence of Namibia. Our aid commitments must be even more generous if we are to help Namibia to overcome the poverty and imbalance of years of apartheid rule.

I was pleased to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs announce further aid to Namibia. Development assistance must be increased if Namibia is to prosper and shine as an example of self-determination. I was gratified to hear the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel extol the virtues of the non-governmental sector and particularly of Oxfam Canada. Prior to my election I was a colleague of John Graham at Oxfam Canada and I know the level of commitment, not just within Oxfam, but that the other non-governmental organizations have in this struggle. The non-governmental organizations understand only too well that development assistance is part of this struggle for independence. If we are going to have true development and not charity we have to fund those organizations very generously.

Non-governmental organizations have urged the government to do more in this regard, and I invite the Secretary of State to seriously consider these representations.

Today, however, we celebrate with our friends in Namibia and with the many Canadian organizations and individuals who have contributed to this historic event, including the non-governmental organizations, the RCMP and the Canadian military, many of whom live in my riding, who have been to Namibia and contributed to this historic event.

Namibia independence marks the final chapter of a decolonization process of over 40 years in Africa. The last colony in Africa—that has a wonderful ring to it. Today we celebrate Namibia for all of Africa.

In closing, it is with great excitement and enthusiasm that the New Democratic Party welcomes an independent Namibia into the international community.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

PRESENTATION OF THIRTEENTH REPORT OF THE CANADA-NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour as vice-chairman of the Canada-NATO Parliamentary Association to present to the House, in both official languages, the thirteenth report of the Canada-NATO Parliamentary Association.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-40—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio communication, with amendments.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents who oppose what the government has done regarding VIA Rail cuts. The petitioners hope that the government will reconsider its curtailment of VIA Rail service in various parts of Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of constituents commenting on the government's goods and services tax. They feel it is a very unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay. They are asking the government to reconsider continuing with this particular tax.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions, totalling some 1,500 signatures from petitioners across eastern, central and southern Ontario. They call upon the Parliament of Canada to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and call upon the Government of Canada to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which relates to passenger rail service in Canada. Canadians are not giving up in their struggle for a passenger rail service that will serve them. The petition that I am presenting is on behalf of many of the constituents in the province of Saskatchewan. They ask Parliament for a passenger rail act giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate and to revise the costing arrangement for that railway to operate.

In conclusion, these Canadians insist on a passenger rail service which will allow them equitable and reasonable transportation service throughout Canada. This is our national transportation link and Canadians are not going to take its winding down lightly.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 with a petition from people of Ontario, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia and Saskatchewan who, as well as those whose petitions have been tabled earlier, are greatly concerned about the killing, if you like, of VIA Rail.

This group of people is telling the government that they are joining the efforts of Transport 2000 and of Rural Dignity of Canada in order to obtain justice and satisfaction to what they feel are legitimate demands, and that is the saving of the railway.

• (1140)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty, on behalf of citizens from across Canada to present a number of petitions dealing with VIA Rail. These petitions are in a different form but they all call upon the government to live up to its original pledge to support VIA Rail and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA to operate as a modern, effective transportation company.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from Lebel-sur-Quévillon in the Abitibi area, concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Lebel-sur-Quévillon is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient as it concerns the northern tax benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the north and offers no incentive to develop northern resources.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to table five petitions from Canadian men and women who object to the government's proposal to impose a 7 per cent goods and services tax on Canadians.

According to your petitioners, this government's record on taxation is terrible. It has introduced 31 new taxes since it came to power in 1984 and raised taxes on manufactured products from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent.

Your petitioners object to a new goods and services tax because they feel this is a tax Canadians will find very hard to pay, a tax that will put an additional burden on small businesses, cause inflation to rise and interest rates to rise very substantially, and probably increase unemployment to alarming levels.

Your petitioners ask the House of Commons to reject the government's proposed 7 per cent tax on goods and services.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present petitions signed by dozens of Canadians who, like the ones mentioned by my learned friend for Ottawa—Vanier, are opposed to the goods and services tax. They have signed these petitions which call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax as unfair, discriminatory and wasteful.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 228, 232 and 233.

[Text]

CN ADVERTISEMENTS IN THE MAGAZINES "SEAPORTS AND THE SHIPPING WORLD" AND "SAILINGS"

Question No. 228—Mr. Milliken:

Since the date of the appointment of Mr. Brian Gallery to the Board of Directors of CN, has CN placed advertisements in the magazines

"Seaports and the Shipping World" and "Sailings" and, if so (a) what number (b) what was the amount paid for such advertisements?

Hon. Douglas Grinslade Lewis (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National advises as follows:

a) CN has been advertising in Seaports since 1973.

a & b) From 1985 to 1989, CN advertised in Seaports magazine, expending between $17,000 and $32,000 per annum to cover advertising in a range of between 8 and 14 insertions.

During the same period, CN had one advertising insertion in Sailings magazine, expending $1,200.

CONTRACTS WITH LAVALIN INC.

Question No. 232—Mr. Nault:

Has the government entered into any contracts with Lavalin Inc. for maintenance, repair, construction or reconstruction of any buildings at C.F.B. Goose Bay during 1989 or 1990 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the (i) nature (ii) amount of the contract (b) has the work been (i) commenced and, if so, what is the anticipated date of completion (ii) completed?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): No.

FATAL CRASH OF CANADIAN FORCES CF-18

Question No. 233—Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East):

With regard to the fatal crash of a Canadian Forces CF-18, during a cruise missile test over northern Canada on January 29, 1990 (a) was any part of the loss in personnel and material insured and if so, to what degree (b) what are the total costs of the loss (including, but not limited to, the costs of the plane and the costs of any settlement awarded the dependents of the pilot) (c) will any part of the total non-insured costs be borne by the government of the United States and, if so, what part?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): a) No.

b) With respect to the cost of the loss of the CF-18 aircraft, the crash recovery is still ongoing; figures are not available at this time. In addition, over and above normal benefit payments, e.g., pension benefits, dependents are not awarded monetary settlements.

c) No.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Committees sitting at the same time as bells are sounded to call members into the House for a recorded division continues to be a problem in the eyes of some hon. members. On January 25 and again on January 30, first the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier and later the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca raised this matter.

[Translation]

This is not the first time this matter has been brought forward. Last May 31, for example, the hon. member for Hamilton East complained that the Standing Committee on the Environment was sitting at the same time as division bells were ringing in the House to call the members in for a vote.

The Chair appreciates the difficult position that members are put in because they cannot be in two places at the same time. Committees sitting concurrently as the House calls in members for a vote can mean that an hon. member has to decide to attend either the House to cast his or her vote or to attend the committee meeting. This is very often a serious dilemma for members.

[English]

Let me first point out that subsection (1) of Standing Order 108 grants powers to standing committees which specifically includes the power to sit while the House is sitting and during periods when the House stands adjourned. Subsection (5) of Standing Order 113 grants exactly the same powers to legislative committees. There is no qualification whatsoever in the wording of these Standing Orders. Thus, it would appear that there is no restriction in our rules which would prevent any committees of this House from sitting at the same time as division bells are ringing to call the members in for a recorded vote.

This view is in keeping with rulings arising from similar situations that have occurred in the past. I can refer the House to rulings of the Chair on February 16, 1971, February 22, 1971, May 28, 1971, May 5, 1976, June 23, 1976, November 7, 1978 and June 8, 1981. These are rulings of Speakers Lamoureux, Jerome and Sauvé, and all are agreed that the Speaker can do nothing in the circumstances complained of in the face of the Standing Orders. In the ruling of February 22, 1971, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux spoke of records showing that such situations had occurred in every regular session since 1952.

Mr. Speaker Lamoureux pointed out in the same ruling that the Standing Committees of the House of Commons at Westminster interrupt their proceedings in order to allow members to participate in divisions. It is only fair to add, however, that this is the usual practice in our committees. It is a voluntary action to suspend proceedings and respond to the bells.

[Translation]

I am concerned about the matter raised by hon. members but, in my view, it is neither a point of order nor a question of privilege. It is rather a grievance but a serious one and in light of the many instances where the matter has been raised on the floor, it is one that merits some attention by the House. Perhaps the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges might consider the situation and decide whether or not to recommend changes to our rules.

[English]

Another issue relating to the bells was raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt on January 30, 1990. He asked whether a 15 minute bell or a 30 minute bell is not required to sound for the full time provided in the Standing Order. In other words, he maintains that a 15 minute bell must ring for a full 15 minutes and a 30 minute bell for the full 30 minutes. With respect to this point, I should bring to the House's attention the wording of Standing Order 45. The relevant words are found in subsections (3) and (4). They are "—the bells to call in the Members shall be sounded for not more than fifteen minutes" or "—for not more than thirty minutes."

The important words appear to be, "for not more than", which would indicate that the bells can be sounded for any period of time which does not exceed the time mentioned in the Standing Order. It implies, however, that the time for the bells to ring may be less than the total stipulated. Thus, the process followed in the circumstances complained of was proper.

It is interesting to note that in the recent revisions of the Standing Orders creating legislative committees, those committees were given a prior right over that of the Standing Committees to sit during sittings of the House. I am here referring to Standing Order 115, which I will read in part to the House.

> (1) Notwithstanding Standing Order 108(1), no standing or standing joint committee shall sit at the same time as a legislative committee on a bill emanating from or principally affecting the same department or agency.
> (2) During periods coinciding with the hours of sittings of the House, priority shall be given to the meetings of legislative committees over those of standing, special and joint committees.

[Translation]

The legislative committee thus has priority to sit over the standing committee but no provision is made for situations where the House is dealing with a bill or motion in a similar subject area as that before a committee.

The Chair has suggested that the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges might also look at this issue to decide whether or not to make recommendations to the House to amend the rules in this area.

[English]

I wish to thank all hon. members for their assistance to the Chair in these matters. I must repeat that the Standing Orders, in practice, do not at this moment give the Chair authority to respond more positively to the hon. members' complaints.

POINT OF ORDER

PARLIAMENT HILL—S.O. 52

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know normally during Routine Proceedings there would be a call for applications under Standing Order 52. While I am well aware of the requirements under Standing Order 52, the fact that a priest was dragged away from the front of the Parliament Buildings yesterday and arrested by the RCMP was going to encourage me to call for an emergency debate on this Draconian action.

• (1150)

In my anger and frustration, myself and a number of my colleagues actually went out in front of the Parliament Buildings this morning to see if we would be arrested as the ordinary citizens of the country were arrested yesterday, only to find out that we were not.

Therefore I missed filing a request with you an hour in advance.

I was wondering if there is any mechanism that you are aware that would still permit me to request that the House adjourn to make the case for an emergency debate on this Draconian initiative.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put the matter to the House. The only way that his application could be accepted would be with complete consent of the House.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the hon. member there is not consent.

DEMONSTRATION ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order on a different matter. Yesterday the Acting Speaker indicated that the Speaker would respond to the concerns raised by hon. members by requesting a report by the Sergeant-at-Arms on the whole issue.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you could indicate to the House and to hon. members, and to the people of Canada, when such report would be forthcoming.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that there was an exchange of views in the House yesterday. I will be discussing the matter with the Acting Speaker, and I will report back to the House as soon as I can.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CROP INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, be read a third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended 31 minutes, beginning at one o'clock.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C-48, dealing with crop insurance. Although the bill very specifically deals with crop insurance, it is symbolic of the direction that this government is taking and has taken relative to agriculture in this country.

This bill seems to be part of the government's effort to reduce its costs to agriculture across the country. There seems to be little concern in this bill for the viability of the farm or any indication that this insurance bill will assist farms across Canada to become viable in any way. It is doubtful that this bill will help stop the exodus from the farms and farm communities across the country.

This exodus could represent the disintegration of rural communities in Canada. Half of the farms in Saskatchewan, for instance, have disappeared in the last 20 years. In the last few years, this exodus from the farming community and the communities which support those farms has been increasing.

While this bill may have streamlined the process of crop insurance to some extent, there is no doubt that the government's purpose for the bill is to reduce the cost of crop insurance to the federal government.

Cost reduction seems to be the driving force behind all of the government policies brought before us in this last five years. The overriding theme in the minister's Green Paper, Growing Together is how to cut down the government's cost and involvement in agriculture?

The government is attempting to reduce the cost of agriculture to itself in a number of ways. During its previous term of government, the Nielsen report recommended a number of ways to reduce the cost of federal government programs. One way to accomplish this is to reduce the service the federal government has provided in the past. The cost of a program is passed on to the provincial government, the municipality, the farmer, or the consumer. Another way to reduce cost is to pass the service on to some other organization which then proceeds to charge a fee to provide that service and make it an extra cost to the farmer.

This often results in passing responsibility and control of what happens in agriculture from the government to the multinationals or other organizations. The final step is to abandon the whole process, in most cases to the market. The government's rationale is that the farmer or the consumer should have to pay for it. That is the theme of the Green Paper, Growing Together.

There is, of course, a great deal of overlap in these areas of cost cutting. For example, how does the government eliminate or reduce the services? In the last session of Parliament we had a number of examples, including the reduction in meat inspection services and the reduction in services of the inspection of seeds that are being sold into the market. The cost of that is passed on to somebody else, or the service is no longer offered. In the case of meat inspection, the service almost disappeared, although the abattoirs, the packers, the processors are supposed to pick it up themselves.

The government has passed on a number of expenditures which used to be part of its expenditures in agriculture. This insurance change is one of them. The cost of this insurance is passed on to the provincial government and ultimately to the farmer or to the taxpayers in the provinces. It no longer appears as a cost to the government. The increase in levies in stabilization programs is another example of cost passed on to the farmer or the taxpayer.

The municipalities, by the very process, have also taken on a certain amount of the costs which were previously federal government responsibility. Every time a rail line is abandoned in Canada, the roads must take up the traffic. That is a cost to the municipalities and provinces due to the increased traffic and maintenance on the roads.

A portion of the cost for branchline rehabilitation, elimination and abandonment and freight assistance has been transferred to municipal governments and of course, the farmer himself has taken up a major portion of the cost which used to be a cost to the federal government. Some of these are the inspection of meat and seed, the operations of the Grain Commission and fuel taxes. Farmers used to get a rebate of the taxes they paid on fuel. That rebate will disappear entirely before the end of the year.

The stabilization levies have been increased, particularly to western farmers. The interest on advance payments used to be picked up by the federal government. That program made it possible for the farmer to bridge the period of time when he needs funds and is unable to deliver any crop he may have left in the bin. The farmer was able to get some money in order to pay his bills. Again in the spring, when it is on occasion impossible to get to the bin, the farmer can get some advance payments to tide him over.

The GST is another thing that is going to increase costs to the farmer. The government has passed some of the costs on to the banks, multinationals and trust corporations in the whole process of credit. The government is removing itself very effectively from the credit structure relative to farms, putting it in the hands of the multinational banks and trust corporations, and forcing the farmer to deal with them instead, to their detriment in most cases. There is a continuing abandonment to the market. In fact the whole of the paper Growing Together is aimed at making the agricultural industry much more market oriented.

One of the real dangers to the farm community in this process the government is perpetrating on it is that it is insidious, disjointed and all pervasive. It goes under many names and you cannot recognize it in all cases. You have to look at it very carefully. It goes under the suggestion that you leave it to the market, that you are developing a sustainable economy, that it is a consultative process, that it is cost sharing, that it is cost cutting, or deficit reduction. In every case it is an attack on the income security of the producer. That sounds Draconian and ominous, but it is an attack; a war.

The minister has stated that the seven task forces—and that also sounds like a war—from the Green Paper will report and that when consensus has been reached the government will act. That in itself has an ominous sound because if the government acts on each of these separately as consensus is reached within that task force, it will be making a decision on a very small part of the concerns of agriculture. In the process it is not looking at the effect of those decisions or that action on the rest of the industry.

All fronts, to again use war terminology, will be treated separately. The farmer is expected to protect himself on all of these fronts at the same time. The government is refusing to pay to assist the farmer to protect himself in these task forces. If you want to be represented in the task force you have to find the money to be there. The cost for a farmer funded organization to be represented at all stages of the hearings would be from $25,000 to $50,000.

Again it sounds like a war, a war against the farmer, as it is today. To defeat the enemy you attack on all fronts, and that is what the government is doing. The enemy in this case seems to be agriculture. I do not think it is the individual farmer, but it is agriculture as we know it today. The structure of agriculture as we know it today is under attack in every part and in every way by this government.

The aim of this Green Paper seems to be to take production out of the hands of the farmer and put it in the hands of the processor, which in most cases means putting it in the hands of the multinationals. If you take enough farmers off the farm and put production in the hands of people who are closely attached to the processors, like Cargill, you have in fact put the effect of production in the hands of that multinational.

If you think that is far–fetched, take a look at the free trade deal. Cargill had people at the top level on both sides of those negotiations. It had advisors at the table on both the U.S. and Canadian sides. So, who got a good deal out of the free trade? Cargill.

This insurance bill is just one spoke in the wheel. It gives very little extra security to the farmer. That is why it is insidious. It seems to improve the situation. It suggests that maybe the farmer is getting a little better deal, when actually he is being conned into a situation where he has given a little and has made it possible for a different approach by the government. Except for a quirk in the process of legislation, the government would have had the ability to withdraw from insurance entirely. The bill does not allow it to do that, but it is not the government's fault that the bill does not allow it to do that. It is the fact that the opposition in the House of Commons made a change.

Nothing is being done to assist the farmer and a great deal is being done to undermine. Nothing is being done about the debt. In Saskatchewan, for example, 20,000 farmers are going to be eliminated or affected by debt during the next year or so. There is nothing in this kind of bill to increase the possibility of them staying on the farm. Who will own and operate these farms when these farmers are forced off the land?

The system is being undermined. I could go into a long story about the effects of government legislation on supply management, the putting in place of quotas. It makes me a little suspicious all the way around. If they undermine the supply management system by increasing the quotas and saying they are supporting it every time we talk to them, you become a little suspicious about what kind of defence they are making of Article XI at the GATT talks right now.

Nothing seems to be happening regarding the promised money for seeding on the prairies. We all know that the farmers there are waiting for money to seed. It has been promised. We are told that they are looking at it, but nothing is happening. There is nothing on the table, not even a promise that you can take to the bank and ask for some money. The banks are refusing to supply that money for seeding.

Even though I recognize some value in the changes in the crop insurance bill, I cannot support this bill. It is part of the process of destruction of what I know and love of rural Canada. By doing it a little at a time, the government is ensuring that there will eventually be such anarchy in the agricultural industry that it can eventually be dominated by those strengths in this economy which would rather see the control of production in the hands of someone other than the farmer. If this is a move in that direction, neither I nor anyone who loves and believes that rural Canada is worth saving can support it.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member could expand briefly on his comments with regard to reduction of service and the implementation of fees for service under this government, which carried out a program begun by the previous Liberal government. Perhaps he does not have the numbers in front of him, but could he tell us what this is doing to the actual taxpayers' costs for agriculture and how this is costing farmers even more than the numbers that he utilized in his speech?

I understand that the spending estimates for agriculture have dropped from something like $3.2 billion two years ago to in the neighbourhood of $1.8 billion or $1.9 billion this year. When we take into account the receipts which do not show up as a net figure in the Estimates, the actual cost to the Department of Agriculture is something under $1 billion this year in terms of government funding. This means that less than 1 per cent of government revenues are going into the whole area of agriculture which employs something like 20 per cent of the population from farm gate to consumer.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the approach that the member has taken. It is very obvious, if we look at the Estimates, that there has been a considerable reduction. If we look very closely at the Estimates, we will find there is some fiddling in there that we have not quite got to the bottom of yet. If we take a look at the expenses of the Farm Credit Corporation we will be amazed at the increase that appears in the Estimates but does not appear in the operations of the Farm Credit Corporation.

In the last year and a half we have done some investigations of the impact of changes in government policy on the farmer or on the taxpayer. In some cases the taxpayer does not have to pick up the cost; in some cases it disappears. For instance, I mentioned the fuel tax rebates. That is going to be reduced by $125 million this year and by 1991–92, with the excise and the sales tax back on, it is to cost farmers about $260 million.

In the last session we had the elimination of two–price wheat which cost farmers $240 million. We have increases in the stabilization levies I mentioned before which are now costing the farmer an extra $91 million. The elimination of interest–free advances for farmers is costing them over $27 million.

All those areas have a direct impact upon farmers. The crop insurance bill that we have before us in itself, according to the government Estimates, is to save it $90 million in 1989–90 and $110 million in 1990–91. Again that is an indirect attack on the farming economy, in that at a time when the farmers are really short of income they find themselves having to pick up more and more of the costs which over the years have been the costs of the government relative to its involvement in agriculture.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the committee hearings on the crop insurance legislation, we heard representations from virtually all farm organizations indicating that the crop insurance program was quite inadequate in handling losses due to depredation by wildlife. There is a clause which deals with depredation under the Migratory Waterfowl Act. The American and Canadian governments have come together to provide some forms of assistance where geese, cranes, or ducks move in on crops and clean them out. They provide a spot loss kind of adjustment process which normally occurs with a federal–provincial agreement each year, although there have been a few years when some of the provinces have failed to complete those agreements.

Has the hon. member any opinions on whether wildlife depredation by elk, deer, racoons, or blackbirds for that matter, could be treated on a spot loss basis something like hail damage is now? Could he speculate on why the government chose not to include that permissive possibility in the legislation?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, one of the concerns of all the people who came before us was the division of sharing of costs. One–third, one–third, one–third was what they all wanted, which they did not get. A good number of these people suggested that waterfowl coverage should be changed to wildlife coverage.

To be fair, I have to say that the changes in the waterfowl coverage are somewhat of an improvement in that they have established a structure that makes it much clearer, because it will now be in the act and it will also pay relative to what the farmer got off the rest of the field in a spot loss, which it did not before. It was estimated by someone and the farmer got paid. One of my neighbours, for example, got $600 in crop loss for half of his field and he took $6,000 off the other half. This really was not a fair payment.

The insurance people tell us that wildlife damage can be claimed under spot loss insurance, but I know from discussing it with the farmers who were before us, farmers in my area and from personal knowledge, what can happen in the case of wildlife. A herd of elk in my area can eliminate a field of alfalfa in one night. The farmer cannot claim that under any of the insurance policies.

It does need some clearing up, and I see no reason why it cannot be put into the regulations in such a way as to cover these situations. We do it in other parts of insurance programs for crops, and there is no reason why we cannot recognize wildlife damage in such a way that the farmer can claim under the insurance programs presently in place.

• (1220)

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to join in the debate on third reading of this bill, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

I listened with great interest to the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. I must commend him on his remarks. It is quite easy to see that he not only has a great amount of expertise in the area but speaks with a tremendous amount of passion on agricultural matters. You may think, Mr. Speaker, that as a relatively new member with virtually no agricultural background I am easily impressed, but I think all members in the House look upon members such as the one who spoke previously with a great regard.

I know we are not supposed to comment on who is and who is not here, but I see the parliamentary secretary on the government side, the member for Huron—Bruce, and the member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup who care tremendously with equal passion about agriculture.

In opening I should like to refer to remarks made by a colleague of mine, the hon. member for Algoma, as reported in Hansard of March 14 on page 9289 when he said:

> This bill does some very good things. It provides for greater benefits to be paid under the crop insurance legislation, but the percentage of the premium is the problem. It does not provide for tripartite participation.

He continues:

> Practically every farm organization in this country from the prairie pools to the Ontario government, to corn producers, to soybean producers have asked that the percentages be 33, 33 and 33.

That brings me to the words of the member for Mackenzie who indicated that this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-48, was inadequate. I believe it is just another example of the government's strategy, its diminishing commitment to Canadian agriculture. This legislation simply follows the trend established by this Conservative government to reduce agriculture support programs regardless of the financial hardship caused to our farmers.

It is becoming more and more obvious as the days go by that the government's Green Paper on agriculture entitled Growing Together: A Vision for Canada's Agri-food Industry should possibly be renamed. I would suggest the title "Going Broke: A Blueprint to Dismantle Canadian Agriculture."

The reason behind crop insurance is clear enough. It is to provide protection for farmers who suffer crop loss. Obviously this is a very important program. It gives our farmers a measure of security against the many risks they face in growing their crops. It is therefore very unfortunate indeed that the federal government by way of Bill C-48 will continue to make farmers pay high premiums for crop insurance coverage.

High crop insurance premiums simply add to the increasing costs of farming. This financial burden is a factor in producers deciding to take out less insurance coverage. When farmers are forced to take less coverage, the demand for ad hoc programs such as the special grains program or the drought and flood relief programs is increased and perpetuated such as we have witnessed over the past several years.

I would like to refer to some comments of the Ontario Agricultural Commodity Council, a highly regarded group representing many commodity organizations such as the Ontario Apple Marketing Commission, the Ontario Bean Producers Marketing Board, the Ontario Cattlemen's Association, the Ontario Canola Growers Association, the Ontario Pork Producers Marketing Board, the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board and many others.

Very briefly it says:

> The major reason for crop insurance reform is to eliminate the need for ad hoc weather related relief assistance by providing an affordable and flexible program in which farmers will participate.

Bill C-48 does not provide adequate changes to the current Crop Insurance Act. It does not create an equitable sharing of the program's cost between the federal and provincial governments and the producer. It is clear that the primary objective of crop insurance reform is not achieved in Bill C-48.

A letter to the hon. Minister of Agriculture from the Ontario Pork Producers Marketing Board says it very well, simply and concisely. It reads:

> Premium costs should be shared equally between the federal government, the province and the producer.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, again with regard to the tripartite program, says:

> We will particularly continue to press for the legislation to allow for a one-third federal government, one-third provincial government, one-third producer cost sharing.

That just highlights the inadequacies of this particular piece of legislation.

It seems quite counterproductive and ironic to have a program which is supposed to protect farmers being itself placed in jeopardy by the government. Farmers are once again being denied the opportunity to participate fully in this program as many are not able to afford the high premiums. Furthermore, the problem will be exacerbated as the premiums increase as a result of Bill C-48. Producers who were unable to afford crop insurance last year will certainly not be able to do so in 1990. So much for crop insurance reform.

The government will, of course, say that the amendments contained in this bill will make crop insurance more attractive to farmers. This simply is not the case. The following should be obvious even to this government. If crop insurance premiums are so high that farmers cannot afford them, what benefit is there in improving particular aspects of the program when farmers will not be able to participate in it?

The changes in the cost sharing formula contained in Bill C-48 reduces the federal government's contributions to the crop insurance program from 50 per cent to 25 per cent. The government shifted the other 25 per cent to the provinces. While crop insurance is co-ordinated by the provincial governments, this move nonetheless reflects the recent federal government policy of dumping its responsibilities on the provinces as seen in the recent budget. Currently the provinces contribute 10 per cent to the cost of the program. Farmers will continue to pay the remaining 50 per cent. A tripartite arrangement would see the cost shared equally by all three parties.

According to the Ontario Agricultural Commodity Council this decision by the federal government on cost sharing represents no improvement for producers. The vice-chairman of the council is indeed correct in his assessment when he said:

> The government's objective has been primarily cost savings for the federal treasury with only marginal improvements provided for farmers. There would be little to show for all of the time, effort and finances that have been devoted to crop insurance since 1986-87.

The decrease in the government's support of this program will create higher premiums for crop insurance. For example, Bill C-48 will enable insurance coverage for corn producers to rise from 80 per cent to 90 per cent. This translates into an increase in premiums from $5.71 per acre to $10 per acre and almost doubles the current premium for only a 10 per cent increase in crop coverage. The rise in insurance premiums will simply increase the number of producers who cannot afford to take out crop insurance.

It is not unheard of in Canadian agriculture for the federal government to participate in tripartite arrangements with the provinces and producers. Such an arrangement already exists in the tripartite stabilization for beef and pork producers with all parties contributing one-third of the program costs. It is not unreasonable, then, to question why the federal government does not see fit to have a tripartite system for crop insurance. The answer of course is that the government does not want to do so. In fact, it is more interested in cutting its contribution in half than to have the three parties equally share the costs. This is simply not good enough. Canadian farmers and the national and provincial farm organizations will no doubt agree.

Organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Ontario Pork Producers Marketing Board joined with farmers across Canada to try to convince the government that an equal cost sharing arrangement would be the most constructive course of action for crop insurance reform. A tripartite crop insurance program would indeed be very welcome. It is most unfortunate and unreasonable that the government chose to ignore these representations. The government has instead decided to do what it wants and not what would be best for either the viability of the program or for what is the most beneficial to producers.

In conclusion, the reasons behind the government's decision to limit its contribution to the crop insurance program is not based on any desire to support Canadian agriculture or to ensure that producers will be able to maintain and afford protection for crop loss. The decision is based on the government's over-all plan to reduce agricultural support programs in this country. It is indeed sad that in the final analysis it is once again the Canadian farmer who will suffer. I simply cannot support this bill.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas knows, this is a very important bill. That is why it should be given more serious attention. The shared cost provisions of crop insurance in this bill are also very important, and the hon. member has mentioned those.

It just seems that the government does not care about the weather and how it affects farmers. It is the bottom line on the Minister of Finance's budget and his Estimates that the government seems to be most concerned about. As the hon. member indicated, it almost looks as if the government's philosophy is to kick the farmers when they are down. This is very well exemplified by the fact that when the farmers met early last July they were agreed on a one-third, one-third, one-third breakdown with the federal and provincial governments on the cost shared program for crop insurance. Then when the federal government and the provinces met at the end of July, it ended up at 25 per cent for each of the two senior governments and 50 per cent for the farmers.

Does the hon. member not feel that this relates to the very important face-saving of the Minister of Finance on his projections in his budget and how he wants to come out looking good on them? Or, is this just another example of the leadership of this federal government in trying to bring the agricultural community in Canada down to the level of no subsidization at all, no assistance whatsoever; let the farmers loose to sink or swim in competition with the American agricultural industry as a result of free trade?

Is this a continuation of the same kind of deal that we saw this government give Canadian agriculture under free trade? Here is another example of the federal government refusing to give the agricultural industry in Canada any support whatsoever because it wants to look good on its financial statements and it could not care less about what is happening out there.

It is going to make the farmers pay more for crop insurance at a time when the climate of this country has been very cruel to farmers. Should there not be a more flexible system than the one in the minds of the Minister of Finance and the Deputy Prime Minister who are handling this very crucial issue?

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his comments and his question.

It has become increasingly evident that this government and its policies are largely, if not entirely, budget driven. We would recognize the good intentions of members on the opposite side of the House, but when it comes to delivery we see quite clearly that the bottom line prevails. Certainly this is a time when the agricultural industry is experiencing some very difficult times, as are the fisheries and other areas of our economy. But the level of anxiety is at its peak in the agricultural industry, if you will. When more stability is required it seems to be lacking in the leadership displayed by the government of the day.

It would appear that the biggest obstacle for the government might be the question of credibility. We hear quite repeatedly of its support of supply management on the one hand. On the other hand, and returning back to the Growing Together Green Paper, we repeatedly refer to having to become more market oriented. I have difficulty finding the compatibility between those two areas.

The agricultural community is increasingly being brought to its knees. Thank goodness for the farmers themselves and for their inner strength. They have demonstrated in the past how they have been able to adapt. Surely it is not too much for them to expect greater leadership from this government to assist them at this very critical time.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, we are debating today the merits of Bill C-48, a bill to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

In many ways it seems to be a fairly innocuous bill. It makes some technical improvements in that it increases the amount of coverage available to farmers. It includes some crops that have not been included before. Thus it does not seem to be a terribly striking bill; it is mainly technical in nature.

• (1240)

However, when one looks at what is motivating the government in proposing this particular legislation, it seems that it might very well be another aspect of what we have been seeing so much of, that is to say, the government withdrawing piece by piece from various sectors of the economy, bit by bit from various contributions that it makes to the assistance of different sectors of the economy. That is particularly shameful at this time in the field of agriculture.

Many of the groups that appeared before the committee said that there is already a problem with insurance premiums and coverage. Those farmers who are most in need of coverage, who have been hit year after year by drought—as has occurred in many parts of my province of Saskatchewan—and who are on marginal farms are already having trouble coming up with the crop insurance premiums.

Instead of the government recognizing that, and making it easier for farmers to get involved in the crop insurance program, this piece of legislation raises crop insurance premiums, particularly for the better types of coverage. The producer groups and the producers spoke eloquently in this regard. Members have reflected on the different groups which appeared.

What the government should be doing is coming forward with a tripartite approach, as it does in so many other aspects of agriculture. Surely, a one-third, one-third, one-third approach is the route to go. That is something at which the government needs to take another look in this legislation. It is certainly one of the reasons that we will not be supporting it.

Farmers are quite right to wonder about the government's commitment to its involvement in this crop insurance program. I believe it was only a few days ago that the hon. member for Mackenzie wanted to make sure that at least the 25 per cent of federal contributions to which the bill alludes is enshrined in statute, that it be a guarantee of 25 per cent government involvement.

In fact, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and various spokespersons for the government stood and spoke against that suggestion. They said they needed this flexibility in case a province were to shirk on its contributions or something else happened in a particular year in a particular province.

That gave farmers an indication that not only was the government planning to withdraw to 25 per cent, but that in fact it had plans to leave its options very much open with regard to the 25 per cent. As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, it really was just by fluke that the 25 per cent guarantee came through because the government was asleep at the switch and ended up voting against its own position.

When we look at the background against which we are proposing this bill, it really seems like a very inadequate response to the type of crisis we are seeing today in the farm community. Particularly in the prairies among grain producers, but also right across the country, farmers are losing their farms. Farm families are seeing generations of work go down the drain. Rural communities are not able to fill their schools or keep up their skating rinks, and so on.

In the province of Saskatchewan alone, one-third of its farmers—that is about 20,000 farmers—are tottering on the brink of disaster in this crop year. Many of those are farmers who had until now thought they were doing all right and had their debt loads under control. They were not the kind of farmers who, when money was free and easy a couple of years ago, borrowed a whole bunch of money and perhaps in some ways authored their own misfortune.

It must be added that in those days representatives of the Royal Bank went around from farm to farm in a nice little van with a desk in the back at which you could sit down with your friendly banker. The banker would ask how much you wanted, and if all you needed was $10,000, the banker would go through your statements and if he saw that you had so much equity in your farm he would encourage you to borrow a little more. You could perhaps buy a new piece of equipment that you really were not planning on buying. Those are days that are long gone now, but that is how a lot of people did get into trouble. That particular aspect was made worse by the cost allowance provisions in the Income Tax Act which were changed overnight and which left a lot of people high and dry.

What we have seen too with this government's response and the reason why people are cynical about this and finding it so inadequate is that we have an immediate crisis on our hands. Rather than debating technical adjustments to the crop insurance program, I think it behooves us to be talking instead about the crisis which is confronting agriculture—the 20,000 farmers on the verge of going broke. There are very many others who are not able to farm the way they should. We might in fact end up with Canada having much less of a crop to sell in the export market than it otherwise would have.

Last November when I attended the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool annual meeting the president of that organization, Mr. Stevenson, put out a call for a $500 million payment to Saskatchewan. We have been hearing that for months. At that time it was already becoming clear that in the coming crop year there was going to be not only very low income among farm communities and farmers, but no income at all.

Next year it is forecast that in Saskatchewan there will be a minus income of $9.4 million. In fact there will not be anything to live on, there will not be anything with which to pay debts. There will be a minus income when it comes to income and expenses of $9.4 million. This means that, on the average, farm families across Saskatchewan will have nothing to live on and nothing to pay for their labour with. Of course that spells very disastrous times, not only for those individual farmers but for their families and their communities.

In many communities one spouse or the other has to leave the community in the winter to look for work in the cities of Alberta and British Columbia because there is no work in Saskatchewan. The Conservative government of that province has seen to that. That creates all kinds of stresses and strains on the family because not only are they already in debt, many of them feel guilty that family farms which have been built up over the years are in danger of disappearing. Also, there is separation from families which adds crisis to farm family life.

What we have seen is this government withdrawing from agriculture support right through the course of its term of office. Not only have we seen actions which have restructured agriculture, for example, taking oats out from under the Wheat Board without consultation, we have seen the price of oats fall dramatically to the point where it is hardly worth growing. Farmers were never consulted on that. They have called repeatedly for a referendum but never got it.

We lost the two-price wheat system. I have checked the Estimates closely in this regard. We were assured in Prince Albert by the Premier of Saskatchewan that just because free trade meant two-price wheat was going—it was worth about $800 million a year—we would certainly see that money returned to farmers directly. I have not seen anything in the Estimates since I have been here which would reflect that kind of payment back to farmers.

We see a restructuring of agriculture in the agri-business model. We in Saskatchewan have always looked across the North Dakota border and have seen where that kind of approach has been taken. Rail lines have been consolidated. There are much larger elevators, and much larger farms. The population there has been disappearing from communities. You have towns without schools and very poor hospital services. What gradually happens is that not only does it become economically not viable to live in these rural communities, the lifestyle becomes so inadequate that families do not want to live there. The services are not there for their children and the whole rural way of life starts to crumble.

What do we need instead of this particular program? Certainly we need the $500 million that the farm community has been calling for. Here, again we see one of these now you see it, now you don't kind of smoke and mirror shows. It is just like going to the fall fair and walking through the house of mirrors when it comes to the $500 million or whatever the assistance payment will be. We heard the Minister of Agriculture earlier in the year say very categorically that there would be a payment in the hands of farmers before spring seeding. The time for spring seeding is getting closer and closer. People are already making their cropping decisions and certainly there is no money.

We have been pursuing that in the House. First, we heard that perhaps the money might be late in coming but nevertheless we would have a firm announcement very soon. There have been consultations going on continuously, allegedly. Surely, in this time of consultation with bankers, with ministers and with provincial officials there has been plenty of time to come up with a program. The need is surely there. Still we have not seen an announcement.

I would like to take this opportunity to call on the government to make an announcement on that payment because it is absolutely critical so that farmers can get on with their seeding plans.

As well, we have to start looking at the whole question of restructuring the farm debt. It has always struck me as absurd that we structure our farm debt in this country so that every generation has to buy the farm over and over again. Every generation is in hock to the banker and creditors and paying interest over and over again.

Especially with high interest rates that have been prevalent over the last 10 years, anyone who got into farming in that time has found that they are very lucky just to keep up with interest payments. In many cases the farm debt that started out at a relatively modest level has in fact grown. I have had phone calls from many farmers who have said that 10 years ago they were $70,000 in debt and now they are $150,000 in debt. More and more land in the farm communities in the province of Saskatchewan is being held by financial institutions and by the Farm Credit Corporation. We need to get urgently at the problem of restructuring this farm debt. If we do not look at the restructuring of this farm debt it is going to end up in the hands of financial institutions. Those families which have been farming that land for all these generations will not get the opportunity to do so any more. Once it is gone it is very hard to get it back. That is one of the big reasons for the depression, the sense of hopelessness that pervades many farm communities.

I am concerned that this legislation is really being introduced in a bit of a policy vacuum. We had a conference to discuss the Green Paper on agriculture which is entitled Growing Together. This conference was called the Outlook Conference. I would like to rename the Green Paper "Growing Broke Together", a more appropriate title.

This conference spun off a number of task forces which are just starting to meet and report. My understanding is that while they might individually be doing some good work, in fact there are no linkages between them. Farmers do not know whether the task force on sustainable development, the safety net, transportation, marketing or the various areas they are looking at such as research and development interact. I understand there is no mechanism within the Department of Agriculture to make those kinds of linkages. It seems very premature to me to be talking about this as a panacea to the farm program.

Therefore, I would like to move the following motion:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-48, an Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence".

I would like to go briefly through the reasons why I am proposing this motion. First, it is very important to review two things about the bill itself. One is the review of the cost-sharing formulas that have been included. Farm groups have made it very clear that their members will find it difficult to maintain the kind of crop insurance that they need with these 50 per cent premium levels. I think that aspect needs another review to make sure that farmers are able to get the crop insurance which is in fact intended for their benefit.

Second, I think we must do this to ensure that the government comes through with its commitment to assist farmers with their seeding program. I think that commitment is coming more and more into doubt as we listen to ministers make assurances which are more and more vague about what form this in fact will take. They cannot answer whether it will be a loan, whether it will be an acreage payment, on what basis it will be paid, when it will be paid out and so on. I think the government needs to be reminded of that.

Third, I think we need to make sure that we no longer continue with ad hoc agriculture programs. Before we adopt this particular piece of legislation we must be very clear that coming out of the task forces and the policy thrust being proposed by this government will be the context for the future of this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will accept the hon. member's amendment.

Are there questions or comments?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. He seemed to be putting the argument that the government really has no reason not to go ahead and announce the special financing program so that farmers can plant their crops. I think back over the last four and a half months when this question has constantly been put to the Prime Minister, to the Deputy Prime Minister, to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and to the associate minister of agriculture. We always hear the argument: "We are the last of the big time spenders. We have provided $20 billion over the last five years".

The echo that I heard from the prairies when I visited with a number of producers there last week was: "We are not talking about the last four years. We know it has been the worst time in Canadian history in agriculture. What we want to know is whether the government is going to come forward with a special program of financial assistance to help farmers this spring so that we can put in a crop." I do not know how more graphic you can have it.

The minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan and the premier of the province went on province-wide television two weeks ago tonight and pleaded with the federal government to provide assistance. If that is not a dramatic move, I do not know what could be more dramatic.

A week and a half ago when I was in Saskatchewan I was reading a copy of The Leader Post of Regina, the March 7 issue. It pointed out graphically the problem facing rural Canada in Saskatchewan. It pointed out that the number of bankruptcies in farm and farm service operations in Saskatchewan in January of this year totalled 16. That is equal to the total number of farm and farm service bankruptcies in the province of Saskatchewan in 1980. In fact in 1989 there were 152. In 1988 there were 115. In 1987 there were 85, and so it progresses on down.

The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture like to tell about how terrible things were when the Liberals were in office. Clearly, if you look at the number of bankruptcies last year you will see that there were 152. In January of this year we started off with 16 totalling losses of $3 million.

The article went on to point out that the second largest group in Saskatchewan was the retail trade industries where 11 businesses went into bankruptcy involving $1.6 million worth of liabilities.

I would be willing to bet any amount of money that every one of those retail service industries went bankrupt because of the serious problem in cash flow in farms. That is what we are talking about here as we debate Bill C-48. We are talking about crop insurance.

We want to see the government make a commitment now with regard to cash injections. The leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, Lynda Haverstock, has recommended that it be $20 per acre for seeded acres and that it be something less for summer fallow. The premier is calling for roughly $10 per acre in Saskatchewan and a further injection throughout the year.

• (1300)

We do not need to get into the details. We just need the government to make this announcement today. This report from The Leader Post about the number of bankruptcies calls attention to the very serious problem facing the industry and the need for a cash injection and financial support in order to put in this year's crop.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for pointing out those very graphic statistics. As the hon. member knows, for every business that goes bankrupt, there are probably 10 entrepreneurs who walk away from an intolerable situation or walk away from their debts. Bankruptcy comes at the end of a long legal process that a lot of people do not bother going through. You can factor that by at least one to ten.

The hon. member's remarks also reminded me of what the Prime Minister said during the election campaign. In Dundurn, Saskatchewan, on October 7, 1988, the Prime Minister said that "the government was not going to allow a single farmer, not one farmer, to hang out to dry simply because the Americans and the Europeans have this subsidy war going on. Until the matter is brought to a halt, the Canadian government has a responsibility to step in and defend the interests of the Canadian farmer."

"Not one farmer to hang out to dry", he said. Already in the month of January, the member alluded to 16 farmers that got hung out to dry. The member talks about the need for this program. The government is shifting more and more to ad hoc programs and this continual crisis kind of management in agriculture. As the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt pointed out, over the last two years while the government has bragged about the amount of money it has put in special grains programs and so on, it has also cut $1,077 million in ongoing farm programs that farmers could count on from year to year. Those were the contributions they now have to make through Western Grain Stabilization, fuel tax rebates, increases in crop insurance, which we are talking about, branchline rehabilitations and so on. We are into a crisis management mould.

The third point that needs to be made is with regard to why this program is so slow evolving, this very desperately needed program for financial assistance. Members from the prairies, on all sides of the House, I am sure are getting calls daily from very desperate farmers. In spite of his very obvious qualities, abilities, and skills, I think the time has come when the Prime Minister needs to look at whether or not we should have a full time Minister of Agriculture. I know the kind of clout that Minister of Agriculture has is certainly worth-while to farmers. On the other hand, we have been dragging on for four months with an obvious crisis. We seem to be no closer to being able to make the decisions and carry on the consultations that will put this money in the hands of farmers. It is time to consider very seriously whether or not the agriculture load, the massive crisis, and the need for a full scale policy review, doesn't require that the country have a full time Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate, but I wish we did not have to.

I am a child of the Dirty Thirties. All during the war and following the war, the struggle that went on by the farm community and the provinces to get some kind of a crop insurance program took years of doing. Federal governments of those years were persuaded to launch such a program. Initially, the provinces agreed to pay all the administration costs, including the crop insurance inspectors. The federal government and the farmers shared fifty-fifty in the premiums.

There is an old saying: "If it is working, don't try to fix it". All that needed fixing was additional kinds of coverage. This bill follows the same pattern as a number of other items of legislation. The government is following through on what it said about giving the provinces more say, more participation, and more involvement. What that really means is shifting the costs of programs that are a federal government responsibility, no one else's, onto the provinces. In some cases, it even shifts costs of the federal government's not only on to the provinces, but on to municipalities and on to individual farmers.

One thing that bothers me about this bill is that of all the times to bring about this kind of change, it is not now. If we had good crops and prices were good and what not, there might be some validity that farmers could afford to pay more. I look at some of the premium increases that will affect people like tomato growers and winter wheat growers and so on at a time when prices are depressed, particularly on wheat. The nicest thing I can say is that the government's sense of timing is that it is about as bad as it can be.

If you had good times, if you were going to make this change and it was one that you were committed to ideologically—part of your government's policy—one would be more hard put to argue. But it should not be an occasion when my province of Saskatchewan is in as bad a financial and economic condition as it was in 1938. If you transferred the situation into the 1990s, in terms of dollars or anything else—in fact, in many respects because we have a lot more things now to worry about than we had in 1938—we are worse off in 1990 than we were in 1938.

Our province is bankrupt. Its bond rating was reduced recently, and that is going to be happening some more. I remember, following the end of the war, my province could not borrow a nickel anywhere in the private market. My province was faced with every farmer having seed grain debts going back to the early thirties. There was no hope of getting enough money to pay them off. Every municipality had relief debts, payments made out to farm families all over the prairies in those years. We recovered from that during the war and the first number of years afterwards because we were feeding the whole world that had been devastated by war in Europe and Asia.

In light of what our neighbours to the south of us and the European Economic Community are doing, all their talk about free trade and getting rid of tariff barriers is sheer nonsense. When it comes to the crunch they are the first ones to protect themselves and to heck with a country like Canada, and we fall for it.

This bill is going to cost the federal government less and it is going to cost the provinces more. No matter what political stripe of my province—at the moment it is a conservative one—is in debt something over $3 billion. That is about as bad as it was in 1938 if you translate the then debt into 1990 dollars. So we are in the same shape.

Now the federal government is going to pick up half the administration costs. Before the provinces paid all the administration costs. The federal government is going to pay half of the administration costs and the provinces are going to pay half. In exchange, if you can call it an exchange—it is not a fair trade—the provinces will pay half of the premiums, which comes to a heck of a lot more than half of the administration costs. This was a bad deal for the provinces. This does not resemble one-third/one-third/and one-third to me. The provinces got sucked in on a bad deal. But, of course, considering the fact that the four western provinces have Tory governments one can expect them to be suckers with their so-called sound business practice. The provinces just should have said, no, on day one.

The program of crop insurance is, in effect, being eroded. Farmers are in no position to pay higher premiums. The provinces and the municipalities on the prairies, and I suspect the same is true in central and eastern Canada, are having enough trouble as it is. This is the stupidest time of all to try to bring in these kinds of changes. It was a struggle over the years to get crop insurance which people could afford.

Some special assistance for spring seeding has been mentioned. That is what we went through in the years when I was just a kid, growing up. The special assistance was for seed grain. There was hardly a quarter section of land in Saskatchewan without a lien or a caveat on it for seed grain debts. It was not until 1944 under Tommy Douglas that the province took those debts for seed grain off the backs of farmers and took the relief payments off the backs of muncipalities. These had been piling up for years.

There has been much talk about some kind of a national disaster fund for agriculture. This is a good idea whose time has not come, and will not come under this government. We have crop insurance and that covers the dealings we have with Mother Nature. She decides and there ain't a darn thing we can do about it. So we try to protect ourselves collectively: the farmers, the provinces and the federal government.

There was the income stabilization bill, which was designed to protect farmers from the vagaries of the market. There are those who would say that we have to have a free and open market system. It is free and open, but it ain't free for farmers. All farmers have had is price lowering. The income stabilization program was designed to protect them from the vicissitudes of the market. You had a combination of two things, to try to provide a measure of stability and insurance. They both are essentially insurance programs to which the farmers contribute and contribute handsomely.

Now we need a third one. We need some kind of insurance for agriculture, generally, to protect the farmers from this kind of government. Anybody stupid enough to make these kinds of changes in the crop insurance program, in light of the conditions that our farmers are in, has to be some kind of congenital idiot or else just plain ignorant and stupid. I do not know if there is any difference in those, but I cannot judge it any other way. It was working, it needed some improvements, and it still does; nobody is arguing about that. We will all work and discuss improvements that we can bring in over the coming months and years.

There is an area that I have always felt strongly about. I like to go hunting for goose, duck, sharp-tailed grouse and Hungarian partridge and I have always felt that people like me in Canada—and there are a few million—should make a contribution to the cost of conservation of wildlife, but also to the cost to the agricultural community from wildlife crop loss and damage.

I do not know what the situation is right now. I tried to get an answer from the Minister of Agriculture one day last week. I know for years a portion of my hunting licence fees went to this very thing. Some went to wildlife preservation and some went towards wildlife crop damage. That was always separate from crop insurance but I think it should be included.

Those who go hunting and fishing should make a contribution, although I do not know of any fish that are damaging our crop—we do not have any rain. That is an area which needs to be included in the crop insurance program. I, as an ordinary citizen and one who likes to hunt and enjoy the outdoors, am perfectly willing to make a contribution towards the cost of that kind of protection for our agricultural producers.

I have seen what 12,000 or 15,000 Canada geese and 5,000 or 6,000 sand-hill cranes can do in an 80 acre field of swath. You have a pretty large mess and I have seen what can happen. Many efforts have been made by Ducks Unlimited, by municipalities and provincial governments to provide lure crops, safe habitat and feeding areas for wildlife, but you cannot cover it all. Canadians, as a whole, should make a contribution.

Some Canadians who enjoy hunting of all kinds should be making an additional contribution. I am quite willing to do so. I know the Saskatchewan Fish and Game League and various groups in my province support a portion of our licence fees going into that type of program. If the government has to raise the fees $5 or $10 more a year—they have raised them a few times lately—but if they have to raise it some more, that is fine, fair ball. As long as we know that is where the money is going.

I do not understand why the government would require grain producers to pay more than they are paying now on crop insurance for their grain production. Let me give you an example. Winter wheat, a farmer pays currently $4.50 for basic coverage. His increased coverage will cost him $7.72. We have an extra $2.22. If you had a tripartite arrangement, it would cost the producers an extra six cents, not $2.22. The government is doing it backwards. In its drive to reduce the the national deficit it is attacking the people who are in no position to pay a higher share of those kinds of objectives. If it were attacking banks that pay no income tax or some 90,000 corporations that made a profit in 1988 and did not pay a nickel's worth of income tax in order to reduce the deficit, it would be applauded by people all over Canada of every political stripe.

No, the government is not doing it that way. It is going after the people who are not in a position to pay any more than they are now. It does not matter whether it is a property tax, income tax or sales tax. When you look at the cost of food and housing these days in a province like mine, what logic or civility is there in picking on the very people who are in the worst position to pay more? That is what the government is doing in the case of farmers.

We have lost thousands of family farms. In some cases, the land has been in the family for three or four generations. It is not only an economic tragedy but a human and social tragedy for which we in Parliament, the government and the previous one, have no excuse. There is nothing rational about further devastating our farm and rural economies.

When my riding covered a much larger rural area there were dozens of implement dealers. There were little communities in which two or three generations of people had invested their endeavour in those communities, businesses, community halls, skating rinks, elevator companies and everything else and they just folded up. All the nation could tell them was to get up and walk away.

This type of legislation adds to that. Why in heaven's name would the government want to bring in a measure that increases the already existing problems? It makes no sense. It is unchristian, uncivilized and unjust. I do not know how many "un" words I can think of to label this.

The federal government should continue to pay half the premiums. It should increase the areas of coverage. The provinces should continue to pay the administration costs. If, in certain areas of increased coverage, it is peculiar only to a certain province or region and they want increased coverage because of circumstances peculiar to a province or a region, then fine. Let them have it but they will have to share in the cost of the increased coverage. Otherwise, why load more of this on to the backs of provinces? Surely it is an evasion of national and federal responsibility to get the federal government out of something for which it is responsible. This is what I call a weakening of federalism. One of the main reasons we are here is to keep this confederation in which people in every walk of life in every region, province and territory of Canada are treated with a reasonable degree of equity and fairness.

No wonder we have the anger and frustration that we have in different parts of the country. I say to the government: "You brought it on yourself".

An hon. member: They are waiting for this legislation.

Mr. Benjamin: This kind of legislation will increase the anger and frustration.

An hon. member: It sure will.

Mr. Benjamin: I haven't any farmers in my riding who have told me they are waiting for this. I have not had a single one and I have been out to see them.

Why did the government mess around with it in the first place?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina has put forward a very convincing argument at third reading. We are on the amendment to the six month hoist so there could be a number of other speakers.

I would like to ask the hon. member what he thought of the arrangement last July when the federal and provincial ministers got together and carved up the pie in Prince Albert with no farmers being there.

The Minister of Agriculture likes to say: "Oh, there was great agreement on all this. We all agreed to it." When you check it out, P.E.I. did not like it. New Brunswick did not like it. British Columbia did not like it and Ontario did not like it. The formula left in Bill C-48 is the formula that Quebec and Newfoundland have used for years. Quebec has a special way of adjusting it so it becomes a three-way split anyway.

I am wondering if the hon. member really believes that the farmers had any input into this. Was it just a case of the federal government using its muscle power and twisting some arms to get some support from the three prairie provinces because they are waiting on their drought assistance with the farmers not being there?

What you have is a deal of two partners carving up the pie on the basis of a drought assistance payment with the feds saving themselves 25 per cent or 50 per cent of their previous costs and the farmers being left to hang out to dry and faced with 50 per cent of the costs and the federal-provincial government reducing their costs. I wonder what the hon. member thinks of that kind of a deal with the partner who will pay the biggest chunk of the premium in the future not being at the table?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. His point about carving up the pie in Prince Albert is just another classic example of the wheeling and dealing going on among some premiers and the federal government.

In some cases the premiers have been nothing more than suckers. They allowed themselves to be suckered in on this one in the hope that they could get another drought payment and they would not have to lose any more federal programs or have them reduced. They thought they were being statesman-like and diplomatic by agreeing to pay higher costs on this program in order to get some money for something else. It is the only thing to which I can attribute it, either that or outstanding stupidity on the part of certain provinces.

The bill before the House right now is similar. I do not understand why the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. are not raising hell about losing the at and east rates which means $40 million so that they can mill flour and have grain terminals in Halifax and Saint John. That legislation will doom all three of those operations. It will finish them. We heard not a word from the premiers of those three provinces. Similarly, the premiers in the three prairie provinces blocked this nonsense.

An hon. member: It is not the Ontario farmers.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not know of any farm organizations and I just checked with our critic on agriculture.

An hon. member: I will send you a list.

Mr. Benjamin: Send me a list and I will predict who they are. It is not the co-operative organizations. It is not the National Farmers Union but I can predict who it is, all the ones that do not farm; All the ones that do not farm such as the chemical producers. They think it is a good idea.

• (1330)

They are destroying the intent of the legislation, the practice of crop insurance premiums which farmers could pay. If this legislation had provisions in it when prices went up farmers paid more and the government a little less.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1.31 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1.31 p.m., the House took recess.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, between 1885 and 1923 Canada collected a head tax of as much as $500 per person from Chinese immigrants either for the reason that they came from China or because they were racially Chinese—we're not exactly sure which.

However, we are sure that our predecessors in this House of Commons were morally wrong in imposing such a tax.

For Canadians, part of the legacy of this discriminatory legislation, which carried on until 1947, is an obligation to admit the moral wrong and learn from our history, and to provide redress to those materially harmed.

This legacy also includes a diminishing number of lonely old men who paid the tax but could not bring their families, leaving them alone in their new homeland. To these men, this House owes an acknowledgement, an apology and repayment of the tax, however token or symbolic that may be. To all Canadian society, including those of Chinese origin, we owe a mechanism for redress to manifest our collective awareness and our national coming of age in a multiracial world.

SPRING

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I am here to emphasize to our colleagues in the House and to the country at large that British Columbia is a haven for many people who move there from the rest of Canada; thousands of people are migrating to British Columbia, and for very good reason.

Today we are announcing that spring has already arrived in British Columbia. While on the one hand people go to British Columbia, to places like Whistler to enjoy skiing, just a few minutes away, a few miles down the road, we are already enjoying the balmy spring weather.

So since spring has arrived, we want the rest of the country to know that spring in Canada always begins in British Columbia. It is the first place to which it comes. British Columbia is a great place to visit and even greater place to live. The flowers that have been distributed to all members in the House today are a symbol of spring having arrived in British Columbia.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago the immigration commission and minister planned to deport two refugee claimants, Simon Mwindi and Abdilahi Hantoosh, back to Kenya. Outbreaks of government violence in Kenya rightly prompted the minister to stay the deportations. Again she recently ordered them deported as of today, but after phone calls, telegrams and a demonstration in front of her constituency office, she again stayed these deportations. Yet she seems unwilling to consider Kenya a repressive, refugee producing country.

However, the truth is that demonstrators in Kenya have been killed, wounded or arrested by the military of President Arap Moi. On March 1, Moi banned all demonstrations, announcing: "From now on, the government will not allow demonstrations of any kind in the country".

I urge the minister to place a moratorium on all deportations to Kenya and consider landing these refugee claimants on humanitarian grounds. After all, even the Canadian government that has banned free speech within 50 metres of Parliament ought not to send Kenyans to likely prison or death.

CATHOLIC CLERGY

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the head of the Catholic Church, Pope John Paul II, announced the appointment of Monsignor Maurice Couture as Archbishop of Quebec City. The new primate of the Church in Canada is a man of great dedication who has always been very much aware of the needs of the least advantaged in our society. A communicator and a man of commitment, this member of the Order of Saint Vincent de Paul has always been very involved in working with young people, both in the "patros" and in education, the latter as director and founder of the Saint-Augustin Seminary near Quebec City.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome the appointment of this man of action as head of the oldest diocese in North America, and I wish Monsignor Couture every success in serving over one million Catholics in the 273 parishes of his diocese.

My best wishes also go to newly appointed archbishops Monsignor Jean-Claude Turcotte of Montreal, Monsignor Aloysius Ambrozic of Toronto and to Monsignor Pierre Morrissette, the new bishop of Baie Comeau.

I wish Cardinals Louis-Albert Vachon, Paul Grégoire and Emmett Carter a happy and peaceful retirement.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture gave unanimous approval to a motion I presented concerning the National Film Board.

The motion briefly states that "in view of the significant contribution of the NFB to the artistic and cultural life of this country, and as a tribute to its international acclaim during the past 50 years—the chairman be instructed to write to Canada's national air carriers, Air Canada and Canadian Airlines, to screen National Film Board productions."

I find it incredible that NFB productions can win nine Oscars and be heralded for its excellence around the world, and yet Canadians do not seem to have maximum access to this quality here at home.

Look at it this way, Mr. Speaker. If you were on the same plane that was transporting the Grey Cup or the Stanley Cup, would you not want to get a look at these national treasures that we are so proud of?

In my view, the NFB along with other Canadian film producers, turn out quality treasures which can and should be seen on Canada's airlines, not only within our boundaries, but everywhere we fly around the world.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate Henri Eugène Duguay and Mrs. Albertine Léger who organized a public meeting in Shediac, attended by several hundred fishermen and individuals involved in the fisheries industry. These people from southeast New Brunswick came to meet government authorities and talk about their concerns about the industry.

I listened carefully, together with New Brunswick Minister of Fisheries Denis Lozier, who had come especially to listen to these people. It is too bad, Mr. Speaker, that the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who was absent, was unable to see for himself the willingness of all these people to find a solution to the present crisis before it becomes an unmitigated disaster.

[English]

Representatives from different communities voiced their concerns about the uncertain situation of the lobster and herring industries. Fishermen have offered very positive elements for solutions, but it was stated very clearly that action must be taken in the very near future. The province of New Brunswick has taken some action, but the federal government is dragging its feet.

Very shortly, I intend to table in the House a petition with 2,800 signatures which I was given during this meeting.

1990 TITLE OF EXCELLENCE

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the Association des femmes de carrière du Québec métropolitain annually sponsors the Title of Excellence Award, and 1990 is the seventh consecutive year. The main purpose of the award is to acknowledge the impact and professional standards of women on the labour market in the greater Quebec City area.

As chairman of the jury, I would like to congratulate all finalists. In the executive category: Joceline Gros-Louis, director of the Loretteville native friendship centre; Gabrielle Lapointe, director of administrative services of the Nouvelle-Beauce school board in Sainte-Marie de Beauce; and the winner in this category, Jacinthe Blackburn, Mayor of Baie Saint-Paul.

In the business category, the winner is Michèle Beaulieu, owner of Alimentation des Quatre-cantons in Lac Beauport, and the other finalists were Ghislaine Lambert, president of Voyages Lambert and Reine St-Onge, president and director general of the Optometrists Clinic Reine St-Onge in Lévis.

Award winners and finalists reflect the energy, courage and determination typical of all women in the Quebec City area, in Quebec and across Canada, to whom I wish to pay tribute today.

What has been achieved in the last 20 or 30 years on the labour market and in our communities proves that women are increasingly taking advantage of the choices and opportunities they are offered, and in Quebec, 1990 is a particularly important year because it marks the 50th anniversary of women's suffrage. I say, three cheers for all Canadian women!

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, this government has no commitment to supporting social programs. During elections or when in opposition, the Tories pretend to care about the sick, the poor, the aged and the young. But as soon as they get their hands on the levers of power, the disadvantaged are immediately sacrificed to the interests of the rich and powerful.

• (1410)

When in opposition in 1982, in this House the Minister of Finance reproached then Minister of Finance Allan MacEachen for his attack on health and education spending. The Minister of Finance wept crocodile tears over the "risk of major cutbacks in medical care and post-secondary education"—to use his words, as a result of Mr. MacEachen's savage cuts to the provinces.

Now the Minister of Finance is making the biggest cut to social programs in the history of Canada. The effect of his cuts to health and post-secondary education in 1986 and 1989 will be to cut $24 billion by 1994-95. The effect of the latest vicious cuts announced in the infamous budget of 1990 will cut an additional $7.3 billion by 1995-96. The total of the cuts is the equivalent of all the federal money spent on health and education for two years running.

The Minister of Finance is the Pontius Pilate of medicare. By washing his hands of responsibility he is signalling to right wing governments across the country that they can slash medicare, hospital insurance and privatize universities with no threat of reprisals from the federal government.

The Minister of Finance has signalled his intention to pull the teeth from the Canada Health Act and refuse to enforce its provisions setting out minimal standards and hospital insurance. This government must be thrown out of office before they destroy—

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, upon taking power, the Prime Minister went to work on the constitutional problem which threatened to worsen the isolation of Quebec brought about by the Trudeau-Chrétien-Lalonde gang in 1981.

With the premiers of all the provinces and the support of Robert Bourassa, in the spring of 1987 the Prime Minister achieved a real reconciliation, but the opponents of Meech, by spreading disinformation, have managed to stir up anti-Meech feeling among the people.

The accord in its present form fully respects anglophones' rights, meets Quebec's minimal demands and ensures constitutional peace.

Mr. Speaker, I urge Canadians to adopt a better attitude. Let the debate on this be calm, tolerant and moderate. I rely on reason.

What Trudeau and Chrétien are now saying is an insult to the intelligence of Quebecers and Canadians. They are bringing about a growing intolerance in English Canada.

As a Quebecer from the Beauce, I am humiliated. Will Quebecers forever deserve the contempt of Pierre Elliott Trudeau and his followers?

THE LATE DALTON MCGUINTY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my sorrow and that of the community of Ottawa South at the death of our member of the provincial Parliament, Dalton McGuinty Sr.

Dalton's service to the community is well documented: trustee and vice chair of the Ottawa Board of Education, executive administrator of the Terry Fox Humanitarian Award and MPP. Indeed, he did Ottawa proud.

A man of strong convictions, Dalton's success was in part due to his ability to look at the world and himself with a sense of humour. He enjoyed life and made life enjoyable for those who knew him.

Dalton set out his approach to politics in an essay he sent to me not long ago: "The politician as a Reflector or Beacon". He said: "The reflector view maintains that the politician merely reflects the consensus view of those around, regardless of his or her personal views. The politician as beacon considers the views of others, and looks to his or her own understanding and the dictates of conscience within. With a clear conscience, the only just reward. Let the votes fall where they may".

Dalton described himself as the beacon, and it is clear that people respected him for it.

To Dalton's wife Elizabeth, their 10 children, and the McGuinty family, our deepest sympathy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party continues to stand with the overwhelming number of Canadians who oppose this government's goods and service tax.

Yesterday, members of the House saw a feeble attempt by the Minister of Finance to undermine the unprecedented success of last week's anti-GST hotline organized by the Liberal party which received calls from more than 70,000 Canadian households calling in their opposition to the goods and service tax.

In response to a planted question—and a poor one at that—from the member for Halton—Peel, the Minister of Finance gushed as he told the House that since last August his toll free GST line had received about 100,000 calls from Canadians questioning the tax. After spending tonnes and tonnes and tonnes of taxpayers' money in promoting his hotline, the Minister of Finance has only received an average of about 400 calls a day. He cannot even tell us if one of those callers supported this unfair tax.

On the other hand, the Liberal hotline which people had to pay to use because we have not abused taxpayers' money on this side, got over 10,000 per day with every caller opposed to the goods and service tax.

Today, I issue a challenge to the Minister of Finance: be brave, be responsible, be fair. Set up a 1-800 service that will give all Canadians a chance to vote either for or against the GST. The Minister of Finance may then finally see the error of his ways, do the right thing, and axe this tax.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last night I did something I thought I would never do. I slept with a Tory.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: In fact, I spent the night with a whole committee of them.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, it was not a pretty sight. Between winkin', blinkin', and Blenkie and snoring Dorin, I can only conclude that there is no happy ending to a bedtime Tory.

My Liberal colleagues, young as they are, did no better. They woke up to find themselves in the compromising position of having no position at all.

But, Mr. Speaker, what I really want to put on record is, though I slept with these Tories, it was the taxpayers who learned that love certainly means never having to say you're Tory. All in all, it was a very taxing experience.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. I want to ask him about the unacceptable regulations the government proclaimed in force on March 14 dealing with demonstrators within 50 metres of the Parliament Buildings.

Why did the government not follow its own regulatory policy and allow 60 days for public comment before bringing these regulations into effect? Why did the government fail to follow its own policy before it proclaimed these regulations to be in force?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, these regulations came as a result of a request from an all—party committee, of which he was a member, asking the Department of Public Works to bring in regulations under the Public Works Nuisance Regulations.

In fact, that was done. It was no secret. For two weeks, these regulations were promulgated. They had been reported in the media. The hon. member, or any other member of this House, had an opportunity to object to them.

The only thing that was done by the government was to respond positively to a unanimous request from the hon. member and the member for Kamloops—Shuswap to introduce such regulations. I find it rather surprising that the hon. Leader of the Opposition should now say that those regulations which he asked for are somehow improper.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the record the House Leader placed in Hansard yesterday shows that the members of the Board of Commissioners of Internal Economy did not agree to the specific regulations. They were never shown the regulations before they came into effect.

This is demonstrated by the letter from the Speaker which states in part:

> The Board discussed the possibility of designating specific areas on Parliament Hill where demonstrations could take place.

The Speaker's letter went on to say:

> It is not the intention of the Board to limit access to Parliament Hill by the public—

I want to specifically ask the government House Leader why, before proclaiming these regulations in effect, not only did the government not follow its own regulatory policy of allowing 60 days for public comment, but instead consulted with the Secretary of State state ceremonial, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Department of Justice and Public Works Canada, but not the House of Commons and the Senate.

Why, at least, did the government not consult through the usual and accepted channels with the House of Commons and the Senate before proclaiming these specific regulations in force? Why can he not give us a straight answer to these questions?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, all this preceded my membership on the Board of Internal Economy, but I am told by my colleague who is a member now and who was a member then that all of this was done through the Board of Internal Economy.

The regulations in question do not restrict anybody's access to Parliament Hill. If the hon. member reads the regulations and what was requested, namely, that "No person shall participate in a demonstration, march or other public gathering upon any public work, except in areas specifically designated for such purposes", he will know that what was in fact requested was much more restrictive than the ultimate regulations which state that you can demonstrate anywhere on Parliament Hill, except there must be a clear area of 50 metres at entrances so that people are free of being pestered and allowed to enter.

• (1420)

My colleague, the minister responsible for regulations, says he had no indication of concern from any member of this House. Even though they have known about these regulations, they chose not to comment on them. I wonder why now.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the minister in charge of regulatory reform could expect to get comments from anybody if the government did not first publish the draft regulations in the Canada Gazette and give people a chance to comment.

[Translation]

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the government did not follow its own policy calling for prior notice to enable the public to comment on such regulations. Also the government consulted several government departments but not the House of Commons and Senate before putting those regulations into effect.

[English]

For that reason, and because of the concern in the House of Commons and across the country about the possible impact on the rights of members and of the public of these regulations, I ask the minister if today the government will withdraw these regulations and enter into consultation with the House of Commons and Senate, through the usual and accepted channels, as a way to deal with this matter which is consistent with the rights and privileges of members and of Canadians generally?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the government has done nothing but respond to a unanimous request from an all—party committee, of which the hon. member was a member, and he is asking now whether in fact the government will unilaterally amend these regulations for which he asked.

I would remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that, in fact, it was his point of privilege in which he stated that he was not able to access the House of Commons because of demonstrators at the front of the Parliament Buildings that led the Board of Internal Economy to reach this unanimous conclusion.

I find it surprising that he should now resort to what he thinks is a politically opportune time to score political tricks.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister forgets that my question of privilege was about how I was limited in access to the Parliament Buildings in my work as a member of Parliament.

I want to ask the minister, by what type of strange Tory double–think and double–talk could he say that a regulation making it possibly illegal for members of Parliament to have access to the grounds of the Parliament Buildings could be a response to my concern about broader rights for members of Parliament?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition did not have time to write out his question so I will forgive his misspeaking it.

To suggest that somehow these regulations prevent a member of Parliament from accessing Parliament Hill is absurd. The hon. Leader of the Opposition raised a point of privilege saying that demonstrators prevented him from accessing the House of Commons. That matter was referred to a committee of this House. It was in part because of that concern that the Board of Internal Economy, of which the hon. member is a member, unanimously asked for these regulations. The Board of Internal Economy can ask for amendments but that is where this should happen. The hon. Leader of the Opposition should not go back on his word this way.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I certainly stand by the decision taken by the board, which was not a decision for these specific regulations and we were never shown the regulations.

I specifically want to ask the government House Leader, when the regulations state that "no person shall engage in any of the following activities", how can he say that these regulations do not apply to members of Parliament? They apply to members of Parliament surely from the wording itself.

Therefore, I ask the minister again, will he withdraw the regulations until this matter can be gone into further through the accepted channels in the House or the Senate? If he is concerned about the freedoms of members and the public, then why will he not do this? Certainly, it is a perfectly clear, logical and simple request.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, of course the regulations apply to every citizen. Not even members of Parliament are above the law. But the Leader of the Opposition should examine the "blues". What he said earlier is that the regulations prevent members of Parliament from accessing the House of Commons and that is simply not true. They do no such thing.

As to the question of whether in fact the government would respond favourably to another decision from the Board of Internal Economy, they generally do, and of course they will. The decision that is now in place was a result of a unanimous request from the Board of Internal Economy.

If the hon. member, for political opportunistic reasons, now wants to reconsider his decision of last November 22, well so be it. Let us do it through the proper channels.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, let us make it perfectly clear that the Board of Internal Economy has never, ever seen the regulations that were introduced by Order in Council by this government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops will put his question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot of fine words in the last little while from this government about how wonderful it is that the people of eastern Europe have thrown off the chains of oppression. Yet yesterday in front of the Parliament of Canada, that belongs to the people of Canada not the Tory government, we saw a priest, who was standing in a silent vigil, dragged away by police.

Since these people are simply exercising their constitutionally guaranteed right to freedom of assembly and freedom of speech, I am asking the government House Leader if he would now do the honourable thing, since he did it in secret, he did it behind closed doors, he did not alert his own caucus, and admit that this is a government initiative and withdraw this initiative.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I read into the record, as reported at page 9468 of Hansard, that the regulations in place were as a result of a letter from yourself, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Board of Internal Economy which, on November 22 by way of minutes, which I also read into the record, and the House Leader of the New Democratic Party was there, unanimously asked that Mr. Speaker write a letter asking for regulations under the Public Works Nuisance Regulations that would in fact provide freedom from harassment and freedom from obstruction for all persons accessing the House of Commons.

The House Leader of the New Democratic Party comes back from two weeks in England and declares himself surprised that what he asked for has been implemented.

• (1430)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as the government Whip clearly indicated in this House yesterday, the purpose of the legislation was to allow emergency vehicles access. That was the Board of Internal Economy's concern, that emergency vehicles did not have access.

Was the priest who was arrested by the police yesterday, jailed overnight and in court this morning, obstructing emergency vehicles from accessing the House of Commons?

Mr. Nystrom: Arresting a priest, come on!

An hon. member: Answer that.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I read Beauchesne's, the hon. member just asked me for a legal opinion. All I can say, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: All I can say is to repeat—

Mr. Riis: What a phoney.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, all I can—

An hon. member: Where is Doug Lewis when you need him?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I had indicated yesterday, in response to the House Leader of the Liberal Party, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, that I would certainly think it would be appropriate for this matter to be brought back to the Board of Internal Economy for reconsideration. I will repeat that today to the hon. member. I would make one request and that is that this time if the hon. House Leader of the New Democratic Party agrees to something he keeps his word.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, needless to say I will be rising on a question of privilege at the end of Question Period.

I want to refer to the regulations which read that a peace officer or the minister can now walk out in front of Parliament and within a 50-metre radius decide which protester, which member of Parliament handing out literature, which child making loud disruptive noises, perhaps crying, or what person demonstrating with a sign can be requested to leave and, if he or she does not leave, he or she will be arrested.

Yesterday the police or the minister requested that two protesters outside be arrested and jailed. After Question Period, when some of us as members of Parliament will be standing out in that same 50-metre radius and handing out literature in contravention of this regulation, will the minister be out there asking for our arrest and for our jailing?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, not this minister, not any minister of this government, asked for anybody to be arrested and jailed. Regulations were promulgated in keeping with a request from an all-party committee of this House, including the hon. member.

Mr. Riis: You are all lying again.

Mr. Andre: Those regulations, according to law, are to be enforced by the RCMP. The RCMP enforced those regulations, as I understand it. If the hon. member does not like the regulations or does not like the RCMP being on Parliament Hill—

Mr. Barrett: You're liars.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sudbury.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance for a little change of pace.

Canadian consumers will be hard hit by this government's proposal to tax with the GST such essential commodities as hydro and home heating fuels.

Yesterday Ontario Hydro announced that its rates will rise by well over 12 per cent next year, in large part as a result of the proposed GST.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Duhamel: It is really funny, a 12 per cent increase!

Mrs. Marleau: Whether you think it is funny or not, this is the equivalent of an extra month's payment. Instead of 12 payments a year, it is like having 13 payments on the electrical bill for every household in Canada.

How can the minister justify asking Canadians to pay so much more on such basic human necessities as heat and light?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to advise the hon. member that there is tax now in her hydro bill. There is federal sales tax today in the hydro bill as a result of the fact that there are elements Ontario Hydro used which are subject to federal sales tax.

The hon. member is saying not to tax electricity. The impact of that is that those people in this country who have a large house heated by electricity will get the biggest tax benefit compared to someone who has a small house that is also heated by electricity. She is telling us to give a tax benefit to those people who live in the largest houses because they are the larger users of electricity.

What we have suggested is to tax the product and then give the low income earners the benefit of the GST credit, which is a cheque paid four times a year that will offset the impact of the GST. In fact families earning less than $30,000 will be in a better position than they are today. We believe that is a much fairer way of treating the question.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, this is a shocking answer. We do not want the tax at all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Marleau: What this latest 12 per cent Ontario Hydro revelation leads us to believe is that Canadians will be far worse off with GST, especially those of more moderate means.

Does the minister not consider heat and light just as essential as food, and is not this just another reason to scrap this tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are going to scrap a tax. It is called the existing federal sales tax which is a tax that is hurting low income people, particularly in relation and in comparison to the proposed goods and services tax.

If my hon. friend is saying we should exempt electricity or exempt heating fuel and give the biggest benefit to those people who live in the biggest houses, which are the biggest users of heating oil and electricity, and not provide the low income people with a GST credit, I do not know where her measure of fairness is. Why does she want to give the biggest tax break to the people who own the biggest houses and take away the GST credit, that cheque that goes to low income people which make the GST a fair sales tax? Where is her sense of fairness?

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

Yesterday the Federal Court ruled that the government acted unfairly when it recommended choosing the second highest bid to accommodate the data centre for the goods and services tax.

Will the minister explain to the House today why the government chose to award the contract to the second highest rather than to the lowest qualified bidder?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was not here yesterday for my colleague's question. I can simply point out to him that I have not had a chance as yet to read Mr. Justice Strayer's decision, but as far as the criteria are concerned I understand from my officials that there were factors taken into account such as security, working conditions, and quantifying the value of the premises. This process, as my colleague who is the official critic knows, is completely transparent. Any of the bidders who are curious can find out all the criteria by simply consulting with the department.

• (1440)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the minister tell this House whether or not negotiations have taken place with any of the four bidders prior to putting out the formal tender call?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. There may well have been.

I can assure my colleague that I noted with interest his suggestion that the government take a look at economizing and using existing premises. I will inquire as to the answer he wishes. I have no knowledge of what negotiations went on, if any.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Chairman of the Finance Committee presented a motion to end the discussion on the GST.

Mr. Speaker, many people would like to give their opinion on this tax. Closing off the discussion is unacceptable. How will the Deputy Prime Minister ensure that these people can continue to discuss this crucial matter?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate thing about last night is that there were witnesses waiting to be heard, anxious to be heard and could not be heard because of the obstructionist tactics of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: You denied them the opportunity. You didn't want them there.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is not new. This has happened before. What these tactics fail to take into account is the fact that we have had a debate on the goods and services tax which started with the release of the White Paper on tax reform in June 1987.

We had consultations and discussions with people in the private sector, with provinces, with various groups interested in this issue. It was discussed many times during the election campaign. It was the subject of extensive hearings in the fall by the finance committee.

We believe that the time has come when actions and decisions should be taken. We have had nearly three years of discussion on the goods and services tax and the whole proposal for sales tax reform.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Canadians do not want this tax. Canadians want to be heard about this tax. The government continues to refuse to listen to Canadians. The committee did not travel to all provinces. The New Democratic Party is simply saying: listen to Canadians.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister again: Will he show that this government is prepared to listen to Canadians and ensure Canadians that he will not invoke closure either in the committee or in this House so that Canadians can have full discussion of the goods and services tax and present their alternatives as we have done as a party?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that Canadians want to be heard. They have been heard. We have listened very carefully to what Canadians have said about sales tax reform. We have made a number of changes to the sales tax proposal which specifically take into account recommendations that Canadians have made directly to us as a government and through the finance committee. Again we have made adjustments to the sales tax proposal that take into account what Canadians have said.

After nearly three years of discussing this issue I believe that Canadians are owed a decision on this matter. We believe that it is important to get on with the business of government. What the finance committee chairman was doing last night was trying to get some agreement from the finance committee whereby we could have an understanding of how effectively we could get this legislation back to Parliament. Unfortunately, those discussions were not allowed to continue because of the obstructionist tactics of the New Democratic Party.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in view of the numerous requests by various producer groups including the Ontario Corn Producers' Association, the wheat producers, the prairie pools and the Premier of Saskatchewan, for financial aid to assist the farmers to plant their crops this year, will the Minister of Agriculture tell us today what help will be forthcoming from the government for this purpose?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that would help enormously is if the hon. member would appeal to his colleagues and to his NDP friends to get the crop insurance bill through. It would certainly help very much.

As I indicated to the House yesterday, we have the report of the monitoring review committee that was set up in December. We are looking at it. As we meet in the House of Commons right now the federal deputy minister is meeting with his provincial counterparts and discussing this very important issue.

I can assure the hon. member that we are working on it. It will be a joint federal response with the provinces being involved in the design. Hopefully it will be targeted. It will be flexible and because it is a multi-faceted problem we hope that it can be designed in such a way as to address the multi-faceted situation. Of course the program will be comprehensive and flexible.

I want to assure the hon. member that this is an issue that is going to require shared responsibility and we are working at it on that basis.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister forgave a $182 million debt for the Commonwealth Caribbean countries. Will the Minister of Agriculture commit his government now to a similar forgiveness of debt and an immediate moratorium of debt repayment and interest for our Canadian farmers as provided for in section 11(1)(e) of the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the farm debt review board process has been very effective in dealing with this important issue. I think it is also important to note that hon. members make representations about the level of farm bankruptcies. I point out to the House that we reached a high in farm bankruptcies in 1983-84.

Under the Liberal regime farm bankruptcies across Canada approached about 550 on an annual basis. We have progressively brought it down to about 300, which is still too high but certainly demonstrates very clearly that it is the policies of this government that have worked and are removing some of the very difficult problems inflicted by the government of which he was a member.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it concerns the amendments she proposed to the refugee backlog system.

According to the changes announced today, refugee claimants may now be considered according to such factors as separation of family members, employment, long-term residency, social integration, or whether they have had children raised or born in this country.

Why did it take her government a year and a half to implement the very requests that were made by virtually everyone some 15 months ago? How long will it now take to clear the backlog under the new criteria?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the backlog will be cleared within the time frame that we originally established for it, and I have explained this to the hon. member on any number of occasions. It will be done within the budget that was originally allotted for it.

The guidelines were altered to meet the requests of Mr. Justice Jerome because it did not alter the principle that we had established of humanitarian and compassionate considerations and a credible basis review to determine refugee status as opposed to immigration status.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, as we speak today, the minister knows full well that the government is $100 million over budget and nine months behind her proposal. I think Canadians were interested in knowing the threshold from here on.

I should like to direct my supplementary to the same minister. Given the fact that many claimants have either been denied or deported under the old criteria, will the minister guarantee that those who have been denied or deported will receive a second full hearing in Canada under the new criteria?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I outlined this morning, those who have already left Canada, who have voluntarily departed or have been deported, will get the benefit of a full humanitarian and compassionate review in our overseas posts, which is perfectly appropriate since we have people there who are perfectly qualified to give them under the same guidelines.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday's Speech from the Throne in Saskatchewan reads in part:

> My government has received a commitment from the Government of Canada that financial assistance will be provided to farmers for spring seeding.

Will there be a direct cash payment of at least $500 million in the hands of farmers by mid-April?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House earlier, at this very moment the deputy ministers are meeting, addressing this situation, and reviewing the report of the crop review monitoring committee.

As I have indicated to the House on previous occasions, we would be trying to work out a joint federal-provincial program with the provinces involved in the design to meet the difficulties experienced in western Canada and indeed in other parts of the country.

The hon. member will just have to wait and be a little patient. I think he should take a lot of comfort in the fact that work is going on and progress is being made.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the same Speech from the Throne also indicated:

> Ottawa has also agreed to establish a mechanism to help counteract the international grain subsidy wars.

Does the minister now have a cabinet commitment of at least $1 billion to counteract the price effect of the grain subsidy wars on Canadian farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might ask the hon. member how he came up with the calculation of a $1 billion loss as a result of the grain war. If he could give me those figures, perhaps I would take them into consideration.

SPACE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Science.

The regional plan for the space agency included a regional distribution objective for spending with approximately 10 per cent identified for Atlantic Canada. To date, only a small portion of that has gone to Atlantic Canada.

Is the objective still 10 per cent for Atlantic Canada, and will the agency work with the aerospace industry in Atlantic Canada to ensure that the maximum benefit is achieved?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure my colleague that the regional distribution of space agency contracts is very much a part of this government's policy. We have to realize that historically the space industry in Canada, in essence, developed somewhat unevenly across the country.

There may be a lag in terms of when we reach those distributions, but I can assure the hon. member that it is and will remain this government's policy that we work with the space industry itself to ensure that all regions of the country receive a benefit and the real benefit from the whole space program.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. On February 15, Canadian producers were to get a higher price for industrial milk. It seems the government changed the formula used previously to establish the value of inherited farms in Quebec, so that the increase was cancelled, despite a substantial increase in operating costs over the past year. Why did the government change the way it calculates costs for producers and why this discrimination against industrial milk producers in Canada and more specifically in Québec?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I will have to correct some of the figures quoted by the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. If this year we had followed the usual procedure for setting the price of industrial milk, it would have meant a reduction of about $1.34, and after lengthy discussions, the Minister of Agriculture, the other interested parties and myself reached the conclusion that since we have a task force representing all interested parties, something unheard of under the Liberals, it was preferable to consult those concerned. Thus, we have a task force in which industry, producers, and all people involved in the dairy sector are represented and which is now working on a report within the next few months that will help us decide on a formula that is agreeable to all parties. We have decided to maintain the price at its present level instead of letting it go down, which was very good news for Canadian milk producers.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was long and belaboured, while the situation is actually quite simple.

Industrial milk producers have clearly established that their costs have gone up by 2.8 per cent, and that as a result, prices should go up accordingly.

If the minister needs outside experts to justify his poor decision-making and his government's bad policies, I would simply ask him to review this decision which, I think, was probably not made in Ottawa, but perhaps in Geneva or Washington, and give industrial milk producers what they deserve.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this government doesn't need any long and belaboured advice from the opposition, which left the industrial milk question on the back burner for more than five years. Five years before we came to power, Canadian milk producers didn't know the meaning of a long-term dairy policy, Mr. Speaker. This government introduced a long-term dairy policy, which we have promised to extend, but we will do that in consultation with farm producers and all the people in the industry, Mr. Speaker.

We don't need the advice of the previous Liberal government which had simply encouraged farmers to object. What we are now seeing, as the hon. member ought to know, is that farm producers—

NATIVE PROGRAMS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The minister is responsible for developing procedures to implement the new business policy announced in the budget which will, with some limited exceptions, eliminate grants to business and make more financial contributions repayable.

Applying this policy to aboriginal business would seriously set back aboriginal economic development. Will the government assure aboriginal people and communities today that the government remains committed to increasing aboriginal participation in the national economy and will not subject aboriginal businesses to a greater financial burden?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. colleague that the police designed to ensure that the business community repays contributions and grants paid to it by the government is a policy that is flexible and one that will certainly take into account the needs of aboriginal people, the needs of poorer regions of the country, and the needs of regions that are far north or particularly in difficulty.

The terms and conditions of the policy which will be approved by Treasury Board in the coming weeks will certainly reflect that intention.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): That was nice to hear, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary question is for the same minister.

The government's own aboriginal economic development strategy recognizes that aboriginal people continue to be the most disadvantaged group within Canadian society and that most aboriginal communities and individuals lack the financial resources to start up even the smallest enterprises.

Given the continuing socio–economic disparities faced by aboriginal people, will the minister agree to exempt all aboriginal economic development programs in all departments from the application of this policy? Will he make these exemptions?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will deal with some of the issues my colleague just raised.

The policy clearly exempts all grants and contributions of less than $100,000. There is another feature in the policy that the minister responsible for a program, be it in one department or another, can make an exception to the other rules.

From the point of view of flexibility, all the flexibility is built into the regulations, and I am sure we are going to be able to meet his concerns.

Mr. Speaker: A single question, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

• (1500)

EXILED INUIT

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it involves the high Arctic exiled Inuit who were forcibly removed from northern Quebec to Resolute Bay and Grise Fiord. The Inuit make claims of wrong–doing, forcible confinement, slave labour, rape, and theft.

Will the government formally apologize to these high Arctic exiled Inuit? Will the government acknowledge their role in the protection of Canadian sovereignty in the north? Will the government compensate these Canadians for the abuse and wrong–doing inflicted upon them by the RCMP and the government of Canada?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the government is very sensitive to the concerns of the people from Inukjuak. In the 1980s, for example, when they mentioned that they would like to go back to their homeland, the government made $250,000 available to move them back and also provided 10 houses to ensure that they had comfortable quarters in which to live.

We are very concerned about these people and we will continue to consider their interests and their concerns.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS REGARDING REGULATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege based on the comments made by my hon. friend the government House Leader who, being unable to react to the substantive aspects of any argument, had to resort to personal attacks on myself by saying that I was being dishonest.

Mr. McDermid: What did you call us?

Mr. Riis: For the record I want to be very careful. The accusation was that I was aware, because of my participation in the work of the Board of Internal Economy, that the regulations that prohibit individuals from making any loud noises in front of Parliament, from demonstrating alone or with other persons with or without a sign, from participating in any demonstration, from distributing any literature or documents, now can be approached by a police officer or by the minister and asked to remove themselves to an area 50 meters away from the doorway and that if they fail to do that they would be subject to arrest.

I want to say very clearly that those regulations were news to me until they were brought to my attention by the media.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has indicated that the minister said that he was dishonest. I do not know whether those were exactly the words used but, in any event, the hon. member for Kamloops raises that and I suppose is asking that whatever it was the minister said, if that was the imputation, be withdrawn. That is the single point I am here to decide, not to reargue what has already been argued extensively.

If the hon. member has a record of the alleged statement I would want to hear that. Otherwise I might have to wait until the "blues" are available and ask hon. members to address me further on the matter.

That is the single point I need to know on this application.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention and I will examine the "blues". Maybe there was some other term and perhaps "dishonest" was not the exact phrase. But the fact is that it reflects on my ability as a member of Parliament. That was the point on which I was rising in terms of what that would mean to my constituents if that were to go unchallenged.

I appreciate your point, Mr. Speaker. I will examine the "blues" and if that were the case I will certainly be asking my hon. friend and colleague, as House Leader, to withdraw this particular term.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the co-operation of the hon. member for Kamloops. I think that is the proper way to proceed. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants on a point of privilege.

DEMONSTRATION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I tried to catch your eye during Question Period. I appreciate the difficulties involved in that. Also, I was not on any list, so that makes the difficulties even more difficult.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that if I had caught your eye I was going to ask a question of the House Leader about the present situation on this demonstration regulation that came out of the blue, as far as most members are concerned. If I go outside now and identify myself with some of those lined up ready-to-be political martyrs, am I also infringing on the rules and regulations of this House so that my effort as a member is impeded?

The question that I was going to ask the House Leader, Mr. Speaker, if I had caught your eye was to make sure, in view of the confusion and/or the misunderstanding about this regulation, that the House Leader took it upon himself as the House Leader can do to make sure that he instructs his officials not to implement that regulation any further until this matter is clarified.

That was the question I had wanted to ask, which I could not ask. Therefore I ask you, as the Speaker of this House, if I go outside am I infringing on the rules of this House and/or do I find myself in violation of something that I do not know anything about, and frankly did not make any contribution to?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I will respond briefly, Mr. Speaker. Part of the question the hon. member was going to ask was whether I would ask my officials to stop something. My officials are not enforcing any regulation whatsoever. No officials of any minister are enforcing anything. The RCMP are enforcing regulations which were brought in at the request of the all-party Board of Internal Economy.

We have heard the discussion and the suggestion of the House Leader of the Liberal Party to have the Board of Internal Economy consider this matter again, which I agreed yesterday was the most appropriate, reasonable way. In the meantime, you may get on national television if you go out there and behave like those other members of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to call on the hon. member for Saint—Denis in a moment, who usually makes a helpful contribution to this place.

It might be helpful, given the feeling that has been shown on this particular issue, especially given the suggestion that seems to come from the Official Opposition and some indication from the minister that he would be prepared to consider it, that some conversations take place on both sides of the House.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has posed a question to the Chair, one which I do not think it is appropriate for me to try to answer at the moment because the question is hypothetical. However, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has been in this House for many years and has also made a suggestion which might be helpful. I would hope that his representations have been listened to. I do want to hear a very experienced member and colleague, the hon. member for Saint—Denis.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, thank you for introducing me that way. I hope that you will not change your opinion when I finish my presentation.

I must admit that when we are stuck with a problem we have to cool off. I have myself cooled off since yesterday. I received a phone call last night saying that I blamed the RCMP. To put the record straight, I am not blaming the RCMP. If they think that is their job, and probably it is their job, they have to enforce any law. So let us put the record straight, I am not here to blame the RCMP.

Second, I will even, to the shock of some, say that I am not here to blame the Minister of Public Works if he was asked to do certain research and to put forward a proposal. I am here to ask some guidance. It is well known that for 26 years now, soon 27, when I see people on the Hill most of the time I go to them first and see what is bothering them.

I want to know because when people take the time to demonstrate it is because there must be something wrong. Sometimes after looking and reading—I do not make comments. I do not insult people—I say that I do not think they have a good cause or, in my judgment, and I may be wrong, I say they have a good cause and I look into it. I have been doing that for 27 years.

• (1510)

I even wave to all the cameras because I know they are directly connected to the RCMP, and there are more cameras than ever on the Hill. If you want to know where they are just look on top of every building. There are two on the Peace Tower, one on my building, one on the East Block and one on top of the Langevin building. All of your pictures are taken by these cameras. I always tell those who come to demonstrate to give a good smile because their picture will be taken. I resent that, to be frank.

But when you go in the Senate now, if you scratch your nose someone is going to look at you. If you are interested, go and take a look for yourself.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you are not going to put us through that in our House or in our buildings. If you go with me, people will say: "I saw the Speaker with Marcel". In the Senate now there are cameras on the sixth floor, fifth floor, fourth floor, third floor and at the entrance. Maybe they do not like us and they want to know who among the commoners goes to visit them. But anyway, that is the case.

I am a little bit worried about that. There is more and more security. We cut everything in the budget but we give $35 million more to this so-called James Bond organization that I opposed under Trudeau and I still oppose. I opposed that under Trudeau and I still oppose the creation of that service. We should have left it to the RCMP. I am still opposed today.

I am worried about this multiplication. I think we could resolve this by looking into it again. I will give you an example. I got this document in English yesterday because I was quick in getting the document. I learned two new words, "ingress" and "egress". It sounds like something in French that I will not mention, but I did not know what they meant.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: Genuinely, I didn't know what they meant. I asked my colleague, Madam Mitchell, so I waited for the French translation.

I have to ask you something, Mr. Speaker, as our guide and as our servant of the House. We always take guidance from you. We may exaggerate a little bit. We may push too much without explaining. But I wish someone would tell me what this means: "Parliament Hill, Public Works Act, Regulation, Amendment put to me by the State Ceremonial, Parliament Hill, under the Schedule, subtitle, "Parliament Hill".

> 10.1 (b) demonstrating, alone or with other persons, with or without a sign, or participating in any demonstration;

I can imagine one of the gentlemen who was arrested yesterday coming back here with the thousands of kids in the summer who like to see the Prime Minister or the ministers coming out of the building. There are always lots of people watching us leaving. I do not know what they are watching us for but they do like to look at us.

I am not trying to suggest to the gentleman who was arrested yesterday what he should do tomorrow, but if it is helpful to him I hope he will listen. If he is there on the sidewalk alone with no sign, but just smiles and waves to everybody that he is annoyed at, is he going to be arrested?

I will say only that. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I know your patience is coming to an end, and you are absolutely right. You know I will respect your guidance.

We are stuck with a problem and I would like this problem to be looked into again to see how we can depoliticize these great champions of human rights and political freedom, and all that when we know there is a little bit of political game-playing going on. We all know that.

I will act according to your guidance, Mr. Speaker, but I wish very much that you will take what I have said into strong consideration to see if we have not acted a little too promptly. My father always told me to make proposals and suggestions. Even if it is not acceptable, I will make one.

Maybe the whole matter should be returned to the Board of Internal Economy and it, having listened to everybody, will make some proposals. These proposals should go to the caucuses. If members are absent from caucus or the caucuses have not consulted, that is just too bad. After that, when you are satisfied, you say that these are the new rules on the Hill. This is urgent. Hon. members know that on April 24, my friends from the Armenian community will be coming to the Hill, as they have for 25 years. I would not like to see them in trouble because they do not know about this and they will not know exactly where to walk and where not to walk, and so on.

So I am in your hands, and I know we are in competent hands. It is a difficult cause to solve, but I would hope my colleagues will try to help out in depoliticizing— that is a tough word—to depoliticize this issue so that we can come up with something intelligent.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding my notice to you about three hours ago, I was not going to rise on my point of privilege because it had been indicated to me about an hour ago by the Table officers that my question of privilege would not be in order because it related to yesterday's incident in front of the House of Commons. But in the last 15 minutes all the talk has been about the incident of yesterday in front of the House of Commons.

I do not want to go on too long. I just want to say a couple of things. I think that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has raised a very good question. I think there should be guidelines given to us immediately by the government so that not only MPs but the general public know where we stand.

Is this new regulation going to be enforced? Are we liable to be arrested if we go out and do something that is contrary to the regulation? I think it is incumbent upon the government to tell us exactly where we stand. I also think that my colleague from the Liberal Party who spoke just a few moments ago makes a very good suggestion that this matter go back to the Board of Internal Economy and that it be rehashed and brought to the caucuses so that once and for all the matter can be settled.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank hon. members for their interventions. We have all heard what has been said. There seem to be some helpful suggestions here and, as I suggested earlier, perhaps some appropriate discussions should take place. Again, I thank hon. members for their approach and for their helpfulness.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, as you probably are aware from reading Hansard, I was involved in the incident yesterday for which I think the legal term, in police words, is "occurrence". As you are probably also aware from reading Hansard I was having a conversation, as a member of Parliament, with a citizen. It was during that process that this harassment took place.

I have been asked to appear in court on Friday and I am not sure, as a member of Parliament, about the propriety of it. I have not been subpoenaed. I am a willing witness in this case. But there is much confusion about this regulation which, I understand, is a regulatory reform. There is a citizens' code here that requires a pre-publication in the Canada Gazette, if I understand correctly, of 60 days. The 60 days' notice has not been given, as far as I am concerned or as far as I have knowledge of it. It looks as if the government has dispensed with this. I am not sure, as a member of Parliament, where I stand at this point.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could meet with me in my chambers in a few minutes. I probably could give the hon. member some assistance.

Orders of the day.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-56, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

• (1520)

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, certainly I would like to speak on this bill. The bill itself, I believe, is an important part of a very important small part of where I think that the government should go in the area of small business.

The bill would extend at the present time the Small Business Loans Act for a further three years to ensure that certain loan guarantees of the government for the banks are insured for the small business community. That in itself is advantageous from that perspective. I would certainly like to see this bill passed by March 31 to ensure that those small businesses that are affected will be able to have their loans guaranteed and proceed.

We must look at not only this legislation but at what this government has done for the small business community over the past some years. We see in its last two budget years there were cuts to the Federal Business Development Bank of some $13 million last year, and $18.5 million this year. We have seen shutdowns of rural post offices, which are of major assistance to small business. In small communities people come in to the post offices to visit, to talk to each other and extend out into the community, purchasing within the business community, doing their business in town.

We also see the high interest rate policies of this government. We know that this affects a great many small business people because they do not know from day to day what their expenses are going to be for interest rates. The uncertainty of being in business is bad enough without having the added worry of these excessively high interest rates that the government, quite frankly, can control somewhat, but which it has chosen to let rise at the expense of the small business community.

What else have we seen this government do? Last year in particular, but as well as this year, we have seen cuts in the tourism budget. Much of the tourism in British Columbia in particular and in Canada in general is run by the small business community. In our experience in British Columbia we have seen the rates of tourism increase as the government expended money to advertise tourism. We know that government intervention and government expenditures on advertising assist tourism and the small business community.

But what has this government done? It chose to cut back, again at the expense of the small business community and tourism. That is reflected, I would suggest, in lower tourism rates throughout most of Canada with the exception of those provinces that have put in major inputs into advertising tourism.

What else is there? The small business community does not seem to get the same tax breaks that large corporations get. We question why. Is it not important to Canada, I suggest to the Minister of State for Privatization, that the small business community is an integral part of the economy of Canada and should be treated as such? We are asking a minimum tax on large corporations, on profitable corporations. We are asking—if you pay attention, if the minister pays attention—

Mr. McDermid: Check your facts.

Mr. Whittaker: Profitable corporations should pay their fair share of taxes. Everybody in Canada should pay their fair share, including the minister. Unfortunately the minister does not really know too many policies. He does not even know the policies of his own government. As a matter of fact he got our page so upset that like him she spilled something just like he spills forth with stuff about which he knows nothing. That is exactly what happened here.

I would suggest further to the minister and to the Speaker that the small fishing community is again a small business community. What has the government done for that community? Perhaps we should ask what has the government done to that community? It seems that on the west coast and on the east coast we have a further destruction of the small business community for the fisherpeople. I would say that that again is unfair.

We also see a mass of bureaucracy and red tape for the small business community. These poor people who are trying to start up firms, often small businesses consisting from one up to five people, have to go to lawyers to get interpretations of all of the mass of red tape in order to get loans and start operations, with the added expense of the borrowing. That appears to be what this government has done to and for small business.

What do we propose for small business? We have to ensure that banks provide more loans to small business at the same rates as those given to the large corporations. We should establish in government a more aggressive "Buy Canada" program which includes government contracts and is targeted to the small business community enterprises. This is how we can give a little hope to some of the small business community.

In the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt I have tried to ensure that the small business people there are aware of the government contracts that they can perhaps bid on. But the process is so complex and complicated. They go on a waiting list for over a year and they become frustrated.

Those who do succeed in getting some of those bits and pieces of contracts find that they have to wait from 60 to 90 days often to get paid for what services and goods they have supplied. We must streamline the process within government to ensure that we are geared to helping small business. The government should consider the small business community when making its purchases.

We should further provide risk and venture capital for small businesses. We should provide greater opportunities for women to establish small businesses, including the commitment by the banks to treat women in an equal manner. I have spoken a number of times in debate on small business bills and small business motions about the unfairness to the women in the business community when they deal with banks. I will not go into it in great detail at this time, but I want to show you, Madam Speaker, that in spite of strides that have been made by the banking community, and perhaps even by the various governments across Canada, women are still not looked on with equality in the small business community.

Further, we should identify areas in which small business could expand in order to meet consumer demands now covered by imports. We should provide small businesses with relevant financial marketing and management assistance through a federal one-stop shopping centre to be organized in conjunction with local business communities. I think this is a key to what we should be looking at for the small business community.

What we run into constantly as lawyers in communities, as advisers to the small business community and as members of Parliament fielding questions of the business community is that these people do not know where to go for assistance. They do not know where to turn. They do not know how to go about getting where they want to go through the bureaucracy, federally, provincially, or whatever. There should be offered to these people a one-stop shopping area where they can get the advice they need. They could pick up the brochures they need, as well as the forms they need in order to apply for various grants and programs. They could get advice there, something which they now do through case counselling in the Federal Business Development Bank. Everything should be in one location to assist the small entrepreneur who wants desperately to make it on his or her own in the business world, to be their own boss, but with some chance of success.

What we see so often in the business community is people with a germ of an idea. They know where they want to go and what they want to accomplish. Unfortunately, they do not know what hoops they have to jump through in order to meet those ends and aspirations successfully. Often, they are unable to calculate a budget properly. Sometimes they have a lot of difficulty with the various rules and regulations set out by government bodies. I suggest that they be given that place to go to get some ideas, to get some basic training in business in terms of how to succeed in business, a place to look for contributions and grants, a place to go to put together their financial packages and to learn how to properly budget. All of these things could be offered in this service centre.

Further, I suggest that the Federal Business Development Bank should be reformed to refocus its activities on small business, especially those most in need. I spoke about this in a motion which was accepted by all sides of this House. I suggested in that motion that the Federal Business Development Bank should be made more relevant to small businesses as opposed to the large or medium sized businesses. Although not all business groups feel that the Federal Business Development Bank is the route to go, it seems that it is the one tool that can be used successfully to ensure a successful small business community, one that thrives.

I further suggest that we direct the Canada Patent Development Corporation to work with small businesses to help them patent new innovations and to market those patents world wide. It is particularly the case in small communities, as I am sure it is in larger communities in Canada, that people with ideas, inventions and interesting innovations do not know where to turn in order to have these successfully produced and patented and to have their inventions successfully protected. We have a lot of expertise within Canada and a lot of people with a lot of good ideas. They do not have the education to know which steps to go through. Often, one of the problems is they do not have the financial backing. They cannot afford to employ a patent lawyer to give them the advice that they require. We have to look at that area in assisting our small business community to expand.

I remind the House that in the last 10 years 70 per cent of the employment created within Canada was created by the small business community. The profits made by these small businesses are usually turned back into the businesses, therefore turned back into Canada in assisting Canada grow and Canadians prosper. We must ensure that this small business community is encouraged, is nurtured and is assured success into the future.

I would further suggest that the tax system be changed to make severance pay tax exempt and to allow the tax-free use of registered retirement savings plans where they are used to start up a new small business. It is not a new idea, but something I suggest could be looked at to encourage the way of the future for Canada. Such a provision would encourage these people who have tucked away some money through one method or another to be able to invest in their idea for the future and to create their niche within Canada's small business community.

I would suggest, as I did earlier, that we immediately move away from the high interest rate policies that we have at the present time. These are very destructive to the small business community.

Last, but certainly not least, in my list of suggestions for this government is that it must now listen to the over 80 per cent of Canadians, and the almost unanimous decision of the small business community, that it must get rid of this goods and services tax. It cannot continue with its jackboot attitudes toward democracy by what is going on in this House through closure, time allocation and by what has been going on in the finance committee over the last couple of days. The government majority in that committee is trying to stop free debate on a tax change so massive that it will cut the legs out from under the small business community when it needs the help the most.

What has been going on in that committee and what has happened in the House since I have been here is scandalous, to say the least. The government has simply said: "We do not want to hear you as Canadians. We do not want to hear you. We will take your briefs, we will not necessarily read them. We do not want to travel to your region of the country. We do not want you to know what we are doing and we do not want you to speak to the committee. We are restricting the ability of Canadians to appear before the finance committee. We are restricting the ability of your members of Parliament as your spokespersons to speak in committees and in Parliament". I say shame on the government for all of those 23 or 24 times that it has brought in time allocation and closure since November 21 of last year. This is the type of thing that shows the disdain this government has, and in particular the minister responsible for privatization, for small business and the average person out there on the street.

• (1540)

We do not need this kind of thing that we are getting from this minister who is a loudmouth with very little content. We need something with a little bit of substance. We need the opportunity to be heard as Canadians. We do not have that.

We do not need the gags that are being put on members of Parliament and members of the public as a result of what is going on in the finance committee. We in my party will not let that happen. We believe in the people of Canada. We believe in democracy. We do not believe in the jackboot tactics of this government.

An hon. member: You do not know what democracy is.

Mr. Whittaker: Certainly the member does not know what democracy is since he is a member of the side that is putting the gag on. I say that these members should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. McDermid: Did you hear what the Quebec farmers said about the NDP last night?

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, if the member knew how to read, he would also tell the House a little more about the reaction of Canada to the shameless tactics of this government in trying to muzzle Canadians. There is no excuse for that type of thing in a democratic society, in a world that is expanding into democracy in eastern Europe. While we are putting up with this government, democracy is being expanded on other sides of the world. It is unbelievable that members of the government can sit there and laugh about it as the minister responsible for privatization is doing, while they carry on shamelessly with their tactics of shutting people in Canada up without giving them the opportunity of speaking up and being heard by the government.

A habit this government got into is one of never listening. It says: "We can hear you". But it does not. It does not know how to listen. It says: "Yes, you can put in your briefs and we will pay attention". But does it? No, it does not. It brings in closure so we do not have the opportunity of ensuring that the people of Canada are heard.

Let us move on to the small business community. Although I do not necessarily agree with every one of these tenets, I think it is fair to set out some of what the Federal Business Development Bank has asked this government to look at with respect to small business. It said that over the last two years there has been a decline in the actual number of new and existing borrowers. There has been a decline in the average dollar value of loans from $163,000 in 1987 to $155,000 in 1988. In 1988, more than 80 per cent of all funds for loans and guarantees were in the over $100,000 category. To put it differently, 3,306 firms or individuals received loans or guarantees in the under $100,000 category, for a grand total of $147 million.

At the same time, those larger firms receiving funds in the $100,000 plus bracket consumed a grand total of $714 million, or more than 80 percent of the $862 million in funds authorized.

In the finance minister's 1989 budget, it is noted, as I have noted before, that he cut $13 million from the Federal Business Development Bank management services. He has cut a further $18.5 million in his new budget from the Federal Business Development Bank budget.

The Federal Business Development Bank is suggesting that it is time to advance from what is all too often a program on interest subsidy for business and a welfare program for the banks to a loan guarantee system funded by users, the banks and government operating at market rates. It further feels that the present loan guarantee system should be changed to eliminate existing distortions by moving to market rates, plus a 1 per cent guarantee fee. The enhanced profitability of the Small Business Loans Act—loans at market rates—would allow banks to end the practice of securing personal collateral in addition to the loan guarantee.

The present practice of triple-dipping, which I have spoken about in the past, by securing loans with government, business and personal collateral should be terminated as a result of moving to market rates.

It further states that consideration should be given to a requirement that banks share in the cost of the 1 per cent guarantee fee given that the banks would be the beneficiary of the market rates. I think that is something that definitely should be looked at.

The FBDB states that chartered banks should take on a greater sharing of the risk through an adjustment of the loss ratio, especially in those regions of the country which enjoy economic prosperity and growth.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business recommends that the present 85-15 risk sharing arrangement be adjusted to 80-20 or to 70-30 in areas of economic prosperity. The Small Business Loans Act, it states, could be adjusted to reflect different regional economic circumstances to the risk-sharing ratio by introducing a 90-10 formula. This regional sensitive Small Business Loans Act Program could then be promoted by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Western Diversification Office.

It goes on to tell us that moving away from a system based on grants to one of loan guarantees of government would remove the market-place distortions created by advantaging certain companies in the market area. It states that a system based on loan guarantees would also be less countervailable in the Canada-U.S. free trade context.

Finally, it suggests that the present limit of $100,000 on loan guarantees, which has been in place since 1980, incidentally, should be increased to $250,000. It notes that the guaranteed loan programs available to the independent business community in the U.S. has a $500,000 limit.

I think the last one is a reasonable request, that there be an increase in the lower end from $100,000 to at least $250,000. It is not too bad if we consider the upper limits. Certainly, since 1980 we have seen a substantial increase in the cost of living and interest rates which have fluctuated up and down since that time.

Given those situations over the past 10 years, it seems to me, without doubt, that those limits should be raised. As suggested by the Federation of Independent Business, $250,000 seems to be reasonable.

Let me move on to some of what the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women has suggested for women entrepreneurs. In its 1988 report, it made nine initial recommendations for aiding women entrepreneurs. Although these are not necessarily all adoptable by my party, we have to look at them in the context of where we want to go in encouraging the small business community under the Small Business Loans Act, the Federal Business Development Act and other legislation.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women tell us that it should obtain the funding and resources required, the longitudinal research, on female entrepreneurship throughout Canada. There should be set up a national information centre on female entrepreneurship in order to develop and maintain a data bank containing recent, up-to-date information on business women and their activities.

Second, the advisory council urges governments and financial sponsors to produce documents and information designed for aspiring women entrepreneurs and elementary school children. I think that is a route that we should look at, an expansion into areas that perhaps have not been looked at before. It is interesting to note in reading statistics and in reading some of the material on women entrepreneurs that what it appears happens is that in the male-dominated business world men have a tendency to look and decide that they want to get into one particular area. They then move with that idea into trying to create a market. They often use borrowed money in order to do so. Whereas the statistics seem to show us that the woman entrepreneur recognizes a need and moves in to fill that need and because of the difficulty in borrowing money often uses her own money in getting to where she wants to go in the small business field.

• (1550)

Statistics also show us that women are more successful. In other words, they have fewer business failures than do men in the small business field.

If we take that as a given, it seems to me that in moving toward equality in all things in this country that we should be encouraging women entrepreneurs through initiatives such as those set out by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

Their third recommendation is to find a mass means of teaching entrepreneurship other than colleges and universities, another building block, if you will, that fits in with my other discussion.

The fourth recommendation is to allocate budgets to develop teaching materials with greater emphasis on female entrepreneurship, to find ways to encourage the creation of women entrepreneur associations, a method by which women can talk to women about successes and failures and where they want to go in developing equality within the business community.

Fifth, the council suggests encouraging universities, financial institutions and governments to carry out longitudinal research on evolution of women-owned businesses, the rate of return, market share and financial structure.

Sixth, it suggests establishing university chairs mandated to develop women entrepreneurship and business incubator projects.

Seventh, it suggests that ways be found to offer aspiring women entrepreneurs free or subsidized services relating to business incorporation and all other services required to start up their business activity effectively.

Eighth, provincial departments responsible for industry, trade and export should be interested in organizing female entrepreneurship bureaus within their system in order to encourage women to create businesses and to provide them with the support they need to develop their enterprises.

Finally, the advisory council suggests that we continue to make bankers, accountants, lawyers and consultants aware of the trust women entrepreneurs place in them and to provide them with useful, up-to-date information on female entrepreneurship in Canada.

If we proceed with many of these recommendations I believe that we would have a much more solid base on which to build our small business community into the future, not just depending on the male-oriented sector but with equality, encouragement and education from school time through to adulthood. Through doing this we could harbour the entrepreneurship attitude in our young. I think we can succeed in getting where we want to go without selling out to multinational corporations and without seeing our resources taken away in dividends and payments to out-of-country corporations.

I would like to turn for a minute to the farmer as a small business person. I think we often forget not only here in this House but in everyday life that the farmer is in fact as much a part of the small business community as is the grocer, the accountant, the small town lawyer, the small manufacturer or retailer. The farmer has the same problems that all business people in concert have.

The farmer must take in inventory, juggle it, sell it and look after everything in between from the purchase of seeds or stock through to the sale of the final product, as does a manufacturer, a wholesaler or a retailer.

The farmer is often forgotten. As we look at some of these suggestions I have set out, in the over-all concept of the successful small business community or entrepreneur in Canada, we have to ensure that what we do in this House to ensure that the small business community is successful is disseminate that information and give encouragement within the farming community. This would give those in that community the same opportunities as all others to have their accounting and computer training, all of the small business training that I spoke about within the one-shop concept.

Farmers, in order to be successful in agriculture, must also be successful in business. It is not good enough, as it was in the past, for farmers to be able to grow products in the field. They must now be effective and efficient. They must have the means in order to do that.

The farmer runs into the same problems that many small business people run into. They do not know where to go to get this information. They do not have the means or the time to get out and find it. The concept again of the one-stop shop would be of benefit to them. If set up across Canada it should be set up in farming communities to give farmers the assistance they require.

In closing, I want to take one last shot at the government for the fact that it is now going to saddle the small business community with the administration of this onerous goods and services tax. The small business community is just rising after the terrible recession of the early 1980s. Although they may have done a little better in the Golden Triangle of central Canada, in the regions of Atlantic Canada, western Canada and British Columbia, they are just starting to reach some of the levels reached in eastern Canada a year and one-half or two years ago. Business is starting to pick up a little bit. But interest rates are causing a lot of difficulties. Now, in 1991, with the turnaround appearing on the horizon, farmers have to deal with the goods and services tax.

In going through the various communities of Grand Forks and Midway near Penticton, Summerland, Merritt and Princeton, I spoke to members of the small business community. Unfortunately, there have been a couple who have simply said: "We do not need the hassle of more book work", even though the government has told them it will be simple. They have read through the government publications. A number of them have already said: "We are getting out while the getting is good. We are going to go back and try to find a job working for an hourly wage instead of creating employment within our communities".

I spoke to one restaurateur who owns three restaurants in and around Penticton, British Columbia. That gentleman said that with the amount of taxes through municipal taxes, school taxes, provincial taxes and federal taxes presently levied on him and with the added goods and services tax he has already got rid of one of his restaurants. He said that he is on the edge and may not be able to survive with his catering business and his other restaurants. It is unfortunate. That man creates a lot of employment within the city of Penticton and the region.

• (1600)

Small shops in Grand Forks have told me the same thing. They are having difficulty as a result of the perception of the free trade agreement, and as a result of what is happening with the goods and service tax and the perception of what is going to happen as a result of the goods and service tax. Those communities in my riding that lie along the borders are constantly running into further problems with the leakage of business into the United States.

One of the grocery retailers told me that over the American Thanksgiving weekend approximately 15,000 turkeys were purchased in the United States and brought back to Canada. Another grocer told me that at Christmas this year, as a result of those sales, his sales dropped. Prior to this, even against the American lower prices, he used to sell something like 1,200 to 1,500 turkeys before Christmas. This past year he sold just under 150 turkeys. This is the type of thing that we are running into.

Although the taxes are not on groceries, as such, under the goods and service tax, there are constantly more and more people turning to the United States for their purchases. They feel that they can buy it cheaper and still pay the taxes as they come across the border. This is something that has to be looked at to protect the small business community, while encouraging entrepreneurship in Canada.

I agree with the concept of increasing the Small Businesses Loans Act for a further three years. As I have suggested over the past few minutes, I think the government should be encouraged by the small business community to look deeper into where we want to go and how we want to encourage the small business community to develop employment opportunities for the future of Canada. I feel strongly that the small business community is the route of the future for Canada. It will keep Canada competitive within itself and on the international markets.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I must first of all apologize for not being here when the motion was presented; I was at the "marathon" sitting of the finance committee. It is customary to have a few minutes' notice, but unfortunately it was not given soon enough and so I do apologize to the House that I was not here to speak first for the Official Opposition.

This afternoon we have before us a bill to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. I must make another comment, that on second reading, the minister did not deign to give us new policies to deal with the problems facing small business today. I was not here, but I was told that the government gave no answer on third reading and many organizations are wondering whether there is a minister looking after small business who speaks on behalf of the government, who has a voice in this government, who represents small business in this government. Canada has over a million small businesses.

When the GST bill was being considered, we were told that there were 1.2 million enterprises in Canada, of which 90 per cent are small businesses, and the Minister of National Revenue told us that there are now 1.6 million, an increase of 400,000 over the previous estimate.

In the present debate on the GST, when noticing the absence of the Minister of State for Small Businesses, one can not help wondering, Madam Speaker, if this government has ever understood or if it really intends do something for small business. I do not want to dwell on the subjet, but I wish to offer the government, which is apparently bankrupt of ideas, a few positive ideas concerning the modern small business. To prove my point when I say that this governement does not understand the small business, simply turn to page 8 of the good-looking brochure entitled "Information for small businesses", which must have cost a lot to produce. There is the proof that the government does not understand the first thing about small business. The cash book shown on that page is confusing because, according to the law, the tax will be payable at the time of billing, while in the brochure the tax is payable at the time of collection. That is to say that the law is stating one thing and the Department of Finance another. We must sympathize with the Canadian entrepreneurs who have to spend a lot of time trying to figure it all out while earning their living and that of their families.

I would like to come back to Bill C-56 which is before us today for third reading, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. Madam Speaker, everybody in Canada agrees to say that small businesses are underfunded. The only real financing program to assist small businesses happens to be the one governed by the law we are amending here this afternoon. Yet, the number and volume of such loans have been reduced by 50 per cent in the past five years. In 1985, the first time this Tory government introduced a Bill to amend this legislation, Madam Speaker, we were really concerned and we mounted a rather virulent attack against it, because we felt rather strongly at the time that the amendments aimed at reducing to 85 per cent the government's guarantee, as well as the 1 per cent cost for obtaining the loan, would proportionally reduce access to the program. In fact, those are not our figures, but those of the department. The annual report clearly demonstrates a significant reduction the first year this legislation was amended in 1985, that is to say, as soon of the guarantee was reduced and as soon as 1 per cent of the total loan was used to cover the loan registration costs.

Madam Speaker, this is not a figment of my imagination, but data which were confirmed by the department responsible for the operation of this program when I raised the issue in committee, and I should like to quote from the transcript of that meeting.

[English]

I have a transcript from the legislative committee on this bill. I asked the person in the government responsible for this program why 50 per cent of the activities of this program have been reduced since the first major amendment proposed by the Conservative government in 1985. Even though we vigorously opposed it, the government went ahead with it. We told them then that it would reduce the activity. This is the only program for small business. When I talk about small business, I mean real small business. Small businesses had access. That program was reduced by 50 per cent, not because people do not need money.

• (1610)

We know, and everyone agrees, that the small business sector is underfunded and the program was not available. We had a guarantee of 100 per cent and it was reduced to 85 per cent. We know the banks are not non-profit organizations. The banks are there, and God knows that for every dollar it gives it wants $2 of guarantees. Therefore, it automatically reduces access to that program for starters; young people, women, anyone who wants to start a small business and did not have enough experience in business or collateral to satisfy the bank. On top of that the small business has to pay 1 per cent of the total loan so the government could have insurance to cover any future loss.

All those amendments reduced the activity of the program today to 50 per cent. What I am saying is not an invention. It was confirmed in the legislative committee when amendments to this bill were discussed. I would like to quote for the record what Mr. Juelich said:

—the first time, the registration fee and the loss-sharing per loan of 85-15 and it was stated during discussions of the bill by Minister Bissonnette at the time that it was anticipated that because of those changes—

—and I repeat—

—because of those changes there would be a reduction—

There was an anticipation of a reduction in the numbers of dollars. We saw that for the first time in the first year following the introduction in the fiscal year 1985-86.

It was not an accident. The government did not think it was good and would create more loans and more business. It knew when it presented those amendments that it was depriving Canadians access to this program, which is the only program that really works. It has less bureaucracy, it is being managed by the financial institutions. There is no government bureaucracy involved. It is simple and everybody understands it. But because the government made such fundamental changes, the program is almost useless, because in five years there was 50 per cent less in dollar terms and in the number of loans. I think this is a disgrace. This is a government that gives a lot of lip service to small business but when it comes to doing something, it does the opposite to what small business needs.

[Translation]

At the beginning, Madam Speaker, I said that I was anxious to put forward several positive ideas about what could be done today to help this most important area of our economy which creates the greatest number of jobs. The fact is that over the past five years, I have been looking into small businesses and, as a Member of Parliament, I have carried out several consultations and travelled throughout this country. At the time, following all these consultations, I had divided the role played by the federal government in this area into four main components. First of all, information. We have here in Canada approximately 560 different programs either federal, provincial or municipal to help small businesses. The great number and complexity of these programs are a source of bewilderment for business people who do not know where to go to obtain all the relevant information to apply for and obtain assistance under these programs.

In 1984, the Federal Business Development Bank announced a program called Aide in French and Aim in English. The purpose of this program was to enter in a computer all the assistance, information and consultation programs directed as small businesses to make them more accessible to people. This was a pilot project, and instead of encouraging this program—of course, this project could have been improved upon by being made more readily available, by making it an information tool for small businesses. The government decided otherwise and completely cut off its assistance to the Federal Bank; although it is still there today it is only for reference purposes and practically speaking, it no longer exists. Therefore, that phase has long disappeared and is now part of the history of the Federal Business Development Bank.

For instance, without really creating a bureaucratic network, the Government could have provided a service. But it would not have been enough, in view of the fact the offices of the Federal Business Development Bank are only located in major centres but the government could have used the services of the various boards of trade. It could have made arrangements with municipal development corporations and other organizations representing small businesses.

Within all these programs, it could have included all markets and statistical data provided by Statistics Canada to provide essential information which small businessmen need to operate a business.

This reminds me of the man who wanted to open a pastry shop and who, while passing through a commercial street, noticed a recently opened pastry shop with a long line of customers waiting to buy cakes and loaves of bread. He said to himself: "This is a fine place where I could open a second pastry shop." Therefore, without investigating whether there were enough potential customers for two identical businesses to survive, the guy went ahead. He found a store close by and opened his shop after spending a huge amount of money. After six months, he realized that both pastry shops could not survive and that one of them would have to close for lack of customers.

If this man have been able to check the federal census and all relevant statistical data, or if he had been able to contact a development board or a chamber of commerce within his community, he would have had access to all the management tools necessary to make the proper decision as to whether this was the right kind of business to get into and the right location.

Therefore, an information centre—

[English]

Madam Speaker, I called it in my small business task force report a one-stop shopping centre for small business. You have everything in one place.

I had the pleasure and the honour of travelling across Canada. For example, I went to British Columbia and spoke to small chambers of commerce. For them that program would have been beautiful, just a small PC computer. They could have been hooked up very easily and it would not have been expensive. It is not an expensive program. The chamber of commerce would have contributed to the development of small business and the economic development of the region they serve.

Even though the FBDB started the program AIM, a pilot project which I said from the beginning was not the answer, but at least that was going in the right direction. The program went down the drain because of lack of funds.

Small businesses need information and commercialization. Today, we see a minimal number of small businesses involved with exporting to other countries. It is a sector that creates a lot of jobs. It is a sector that is easy to adjust. It can change very easily because it is small. It does not make boardroom decisions. Usually you make decisions on the spot. It can adjust easily and be competitive in the market.

In order to export products, we need good marketing. We have offices all over the world, in our embassies and so on. But no one looks after small business. Therefore, that sector is missing a big part of the action. We need programs to help.

There again, we do not have to create new things. We have embassies and consulates. We should have people who just look after small business, people who understand the problems of small business. Small business cannot have just one product with big orders. We have to service products and have different small business groups to try to compete in a foreign market. Any Canadian embassy or consulate can talk to big business. When it comes to small businesses, they are lost because they have nothing.

I understand that it is easy to deal with a big contract worth millions of dollars. It looks good in the books and the annual report. Perhaps we should take more time for small businesses. The big million dollar amount will not be there in the beginning, but in the long run it will be.

Think about how many jobs we would create if we encouraged the small business sector to export service and goods. We do not have to take lessons from anyone when it comes to products. We have good Canadian products. We need some marketing. We should help our Canadian small businesses in marketing, giving assistance, help and information on the foreign markets. If we had such a program specifically for small business, I think we could create more businesses by young people coming out of university with new ideas. They would create new products and services and be there to challenge the new markets of tomorrow.

Year after year, the government has cut those vital programs, those few programs that exist. The government might think that small business has a lot of help but really the only federal program is the Small Businesses Loans Act. It has been reduced by 50 per cent in the past five years. There is nothing left. The budget of the FBDB has been cut practically every year and the orientation is moving toward medium sized business. What do we do for small business? Imagine when January 1 comes and the government applies this madness of the GST. What will happen to them? Already John Bulloch has predicted that 50 per cent of small business in the food sector is at risk of closing because of the complexity of the GST.

The government has in small business loans a maximum of $100,000. Today, if you want to open a store, what do you do? Just think of the fact that $100,000 is the maximum allowed, and one has to put up 20 per cent. The rule is that the government will finance a small business for 80 per cent. In certain cases, it is 90 per cent, but they are very few. The majority is 80 per cent. In order to get $100,000, one has to have a project worth $120,000. That is the maximum. Where can you go with that? Most people have nowhere to go.

Small business is asking that instead of having changing monthly payments which fluctuate with the interest rate, why not have an option? It might cost a little extra because it has to have a fixed interest rate and, therefore, the fluctuation might be different. The small business may be ready to pay that little extra in its cash flow planning. Sometimes they do not know how to manage their cash flow, but we are not helping them to manage their cash flow with this program. They do not have the option of saying: "Look, this is my loan. I started with $600 a month and I want to finish with $600.

I know that every month I have a payment of $600 until the end in five or seven years."

[Translation]

I see, Madam Speaker, that my time is up. I still have so much to say. I am sorry because if I had been here and if I had been told in advance, I would have had illimited time to address this issue. However you are giving me the signal that my time is up but I do think tradition has been lost here today.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion, I think if we really want to help small businesses, now is the time to put partisanship aside and to stop talking and start acting.

Nowadays, I like to express my ideas. Of course, if we had been elected in 1988, we would already be enjoying all this because it was part of our platform. Instead of increasing the tax burden and the redtape, as the GST will do, thus creating a nightmare for our small businesses, the governement could make the fiscal system much simpler and easier for them with financing programs, for example. There could be loans, but also capital stock to help young people, not to mention women who play quite a part in our economy. So, you will forgive me if I focus on this, but there is so much to be said and I hope we have the opportunity to come back to this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before proceeding to the question and comment period, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Child care; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Proposed Goods and Services Tax; the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel—Lay-offs.

I simply want to make sure that, in his comments, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard did not question the way the chair recognized members. When the motion was put forward, the only person to rise was the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and I had to recognize him according to the rules. It was not a matter of changing the usual practices and procedures of the House.

Questions and comments.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Saint-Léonard on a point of order.

Mr. Gagliano: I only want to say that I have total faith in the Chair who gave me all the time I needed, even a little more than the rules allow, and I thank you for it. I just wanted to tell the government that we get used to things being done a certain way. Since I was at the Finance Committee, with five minutes notice I could have got here in time.

[English]

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I enjoyed the presentation of the hon. member. I would like to make a comment and ask him to reply.

The comment is interesting. It came from a constituent, in this modern day of parliamentary following and input, by a telephone call and then a fax. The fax today from the constituent reads as follows:

> Mr. Prime Minister,
> Many happy returns on your birthday, a time to celebrate, reflect and enjoy your accomplishments of the last year. One such accomplishment is the—nuisance regulation—against demonstrating within 50 metres of the Parliament Buildings. Let's enforce it to more than just Kealey—and keep our capital free of demonstrators of all kinds. With this in mind I would ask the Sgt at Arms to arrest and remove you from the House for demonstrating—not only your ignorance of fundamental rights for freedom of expression and peaceful assembly but fiscal responsibility—In Canada—

Mr. McDermid: Relevancy.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, order! The Chair has very much difficulty relating the comments of the hon. member to the speech the hon. member for Saint-Léonard just ended.

We will go to someone who has a relevant comment.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the hon. member just going to finish reading whatever he was reading?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): No, Madam Speaker, my comment relates to the lack of relevancy to the small businesses bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It will come to that one line? The hon. member.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): The individual involved is, of course, a small business person in the community of Courtenay, British Columbia, one Mr. Lance Vrabek. He puts the question—

An hon. member: I know Lance, he's an NDPer.

An hon. member: No, he was a Conservative up until this year.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): —in terms of government expenditures on items such as the small business development bond are the topic of conversation in many places today. The reason that such concern is expressed is that they see how responsible the government is being with the money that is raised by small businesses and consultants such as Mr. Vrabek. He asks why the Prime Minister is continuing to expend tax dollars to pass and enforce nuisance regulations that will be challenged in the courts and cost further money.

• (1630)

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I will not reply to the first part of the question because I do not think it has anything to do with small businesses. There will be other places and other times to discuss that. As to the money the government is spending while cutting programs for small businesses, as I said in my speech, that is precisely what is happening since this government has cut almost all programs that existed before it came into office without replacing them with new ones. So this government is cutting, and we are seeing almost the end of those programs since the only one remaining has already been reduced by 50 per cent. I hope a copy of my speech will help him inform his constituent.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I congratulate hon. members for their good and positive speeches and suggestions. The hon. member spoke about co-operation between the various levels of government: provincial, municipal and federal. I praise him particularly for his comments on the one-stop shop. In the end, what is missing, Madam Speaker? What we could call a Small Business Protection Act, something to protect small businesses, specially in economic matters over which they have no control.

[English]

For example, the small business community needs protection and the proper environment to grow. It does not need hand-outs as much as it needs that kind of protection.

I want to ask the hon. member about his comments in term of the goods and services tax affecting the small business community. Can he tell the House what the introduction of the goods and services tax will mean to a small business that pays $1,000 a month in rent for a shop? Can the hon. member also elaborate a little about the question of the interest rate and what the impact on the small business would be in light of the high interest rate at this point in time?

In conclusion, I really enjoyed his presentation.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the question.

In my experience as a parliamentarian, as a critic for small business and as an accountant before for small business, I want to make it clear that no small business wants a hand-out. That sector is proud and works very hard for the community. When one looks at community organizations, who is there to do the job, contribute and give money, goods and service? It is always the small business sector.

Members of the small business sector want programs that can help them, not by way of giving money but by direction, assistance and knowledge about what markets they can have access to or some financial protection in terms of program assisting or a matching program. Really, we have nothing to help them. I am glad in the House today that we have the new Minister of Science, Industry and Technology who is responsible even though he is a junior minister. I hope he pushes a little as a junior minister to be more active in the small business role in terms of advocacy and programs.

Concerning the GST, I think we all agree it is a nightmare and the small business—

Mr. McDermid: No, we don't all agree.

Mr. Gagliano: Maybe members on the other side do not all agree. When I say that they all agree, I am talking about Canadians.

Mr. McDermid: No, they don't all agree either.

Mr. Gagliano: I might remind the hon. minister that last week in Small Business magazine 51 per cent of Canadians said scrap the GST, 45 said change it, and only 4 per cent agreed. Only 4 per cent agreed.

When you say you represent small businesses I say shame on you, you do not even listen to them. You know how we feel about the GST. Interest rates are another mess that this government is creating by keeping interest rates very high.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is a minute left on questions. The hon. member.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member for Saint-Léonard on his speech. It was a very constructive one. It showed that he is in touch with the small business community and knows what is going on out there. That is why his speech was so valuable to the House at this time. He gave some very basic examples of what was going on. He talked about the one-stop shopping centre, which is very popular. He even got the front-benchers of the Conservative Party enthralled with his remarks. They just cannot get over it.

He talked about interest rates. We hear from members on the government benches every day about high interest rates and what a terrible problem they inherited with interest rates when they took over government. I want to remind the House today that when this government took over in September 1984 interest rates in Canada stood at 13 per cent. Today interest rates in Canada stand at 14.25 per cent, higher than when they took office. Yet we hear all this screaming over there.

I want to ask a question of the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, who is obviously very well informed on these things. How will 14.25 per cent interest rates, which may go even higher, affect the legislation before us today? Indeed, how will it affect loans for business improvements for small businesses, combined as they will be with the GST problem they will have to face? Let us keep reminding these people that they took over a 13 per cent interest rate in 1984 and they have succeeded in putting it up to 14.25 per cent and still going higher.

Mr. McDermid: We remember when it was 23 per cent, and so do you. We got them down. You didn't.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A very short comment from the hon. member for Saint-Léonard.

Mr. Gagliano: Even if the members are screaming about what the situation was before they came in, I want to remind them that the real interest rate has never been so high in Canadian history.

I mentioned in my speech that every time the interest rate goes up, the payments on small business loans change. They pay it almost on a daily basis, every Monday, and that is why they do not like it and why they are asking for a fixed payment. This government had a chance to fix that in this amendment and it did not do the fair thing, because it does not understand anything about small business.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is as follows: Mr. Hockin, seconded by Mr. Clark (Yellowhead), moved that Bill C-56, an act to amend the Small—

Ms. Hunter: On debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I did ask if there was anyone for debate and nobody rose.

Ms. Hunter: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There cannot be a point of order once the question is being put. I am sorry.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, a point of order.

Ms. Hunter: Point of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Once the question is being put to the House, which was done, there can be no point of order, there can be no point of privilege. The question has been put to the House.

Mr. Whittaker: Over our objections. We did not hear you call "question". We want debate, and you know it.

An hon. member: Respect the Chair and sit down.

• (1640)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please. I did ask for debate. Nobody rose. I said: "Is the House ready for the question", and no one said no; people said yes.

Mr. Whittaker: We said no.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please. I started putting the question to the House, then the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands rose. I had already started to put the question. Then the hon. member who rose after could not be recognized because he had already spoken on the bill.

I had started to put the question, therefore there can be no points of order or points of privilege.

Mr. Whittaker: Nonsense.

Mr. McDermid: Read the rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do not like this remark from the hon. member, because it is not nonsense but the rules of this place, which I did not make and which I try to follow.

I am quite prepared, should there be unanimous consent in this place, to revert to debate and recognize the hon. member if there is unanimous consent of this House, but there has to be unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: This is a partisan Speaker.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Stand up and say that. That is contempt of the House.

Mr. Riis: You guys are not going to get away with this. You can't ramrod legislation by having a partisan Speaker in the chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have to continue. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Fretz: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like it recorded that I was in the House for the vote. I did not vote because I chaired the legislative committee on Bill C-56.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDEPENDENCE OF NAMIBIA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think there is unanimous consent in the House for the approval of a resolution which I would be honoured to move, seconded by the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands:

> Be it resolved that this House, at this moment of Namibia's long-awaited independence, extend to its members now in Windhoek its warmest congratulations to the National Assembly and people of the Republic of Namibia on their attainment of sovereignty and on their new constitution.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent for the minister to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S. O. 57

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I hereby give notice that at the next sitting of the House immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on the motion for third reading of Bill C-48, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act and on any amendment thereto, I will move that the debate be not further adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Riis: I have a very short point of order about House business, Madam Speaker. Just prior to coming in I was informed that tomorrow would not be an allotted day. I did not quite understand the point he was making. I think he was giving notice of closure on the crop insurance bill. Could he confirm that tomorrow will or will not be an allotted day?

Mr. Andre: No, it will not be an allotted day, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I have received advice to the contrary, but I am looking at today's Order Paper and it says in fact that the commitment was that Wednesday, March 21, the seventh of eight allotted days for the Supply period ending March 26, 1990, would be tomorrow. Is the minister saying that he is withdrawing this particular commitment?

Mr. Andre: Last week, at the usual time when the question of House business was asked of me, I gave my best intentions.

That was based on certain assumptions as to what would occur between then and now. One of those assumptions was that this crop insurance bill, which is so vitally important to western farmers in particular and farmers right across this country, would be passed.

Since that has not happened, I am forced to bring that in tomorrow and to apply closure to ensure that this is in place for the benefit of farmers.

If in fact there was a disposition not to see the clock and deal with Bill C-48 now, which I understand all parties are in favour of, then tomorrow could be an allotted day as was originally planned; we would be able to follow our plans much more closely. If there is that disposition we are ready to proceed.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, this is an interesting way to do the business of the House in terms of debate.

Our concern, of course, has been that we have been participating in the debate on the crop insurance legislation. It is an important government initiative. We have some deep concerns in terms of the implications, but I am still perplexed that when I read today's Order Paper it says that tomorrow will be an allotted day.

An hon. member: Proposed.

Mr. Riis: It does not say proposed. It says it will be an allotted day.

I guess, at the whim of the government House Leader, the government can curtail that commitment.

I just want to make sure we understand that the government had made a commitment that this would be the business of the day. It has now reneged on that commitment in saying that this will not be the business of the day.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, let me make it clear that the decision I announced to the House after the House Leaders' meeting last Thursday was based on certain commitments given by the New Democratic Party.

Since those commitments were not honoured, I am not able to carry through with the commitments that we made. In fact, had the NDP honoured the commitments it made, I would have been able to honour the commitments I made. Since they did not, I am not able to. I regret that that happened.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret that we are interrupting my hon. colleague's private member's business.

The government House Leader indicates that somehow a commitment has been broken. I have had consultations about what the commitment was. It was that if there was a commitment by the government for an adequate length of debate on the borrowing authority, we could see fit to restricting debate on the Small Businesses Loans Act as well as on crop insurance. That commitment was never forthcoming from this government. For the reason that the government had broken its commitment, we felt no compulsion to fulfil any agreement that the government had.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House leaders of all parties may want to continue discussing this point, but I think we should proceed with the Private Members' Business.

I may also in trying to help the House, remind all members that in reading the Projected Order of Business we can all see when there is projection of business for subsequent days that the projection is subject to change without notice.

I am sure that all House Leaders can get together and find a way to resolve that situation.

In the meantime, we will turn to the Private Members' Business with the hon. member for Western Arctic.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

NEEDS OF YOUTH

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Anawak:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of aboriginal youth.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, last week more than 1,000 athletes from the Soviet Union, Greenland, Alaska, northern Alberta, and the Northwest Territories came together to compete in all kinds of sports and games in the Twentieth Arctic Winter Games.

The symbol of unity and friendship was a message to governments all around the world that young people are models in the practice and demonstration of peace and friendship. That is why this motion is very important. It promotes youth, our future leaders.

The peace makers and this government need to strengthen their investment in the youth of our country. We have many young people who have demonstrated a quest for excellence in this over–all activity that took place in Yellowknife last week. We want to work to enhance the capabilities of young people to be able to relate to and deal with the challenges that face them in the future.

• (1730)

Without the support of the community leaders such as the mayor, Pat McMahon and the chairpeople Don Cooper and Don Sian this would not have been accomplished. These individuals give support to our young people and have made it possible for these young people to participate in an activity that challenges and gives them the opportunity to excel, not only physically but mentally and psychologically. It equips them and does something for their integrity to be able to excel.

I would like those from all over Canada to support our youth and to enhance and strengthen our commitment to the youth of this country. These are going to be the true environmentalists, the true conservationists. We do not have to change their minds. Their minds are made up that they want a clean environment and they want the proper education. They want to care for the older people and the youth in this country and they also have a commitment to peace. These are not things that have to be taught, these are things they know. These are things that have been demonstrated to them over the last 20 years. An activity such as this and the people who co-operated and helped to put forth this opportunity for our youth are to be congratulated.

[Translation]

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): I rise today in the House to deal with this motion concerning the education, employment and health needs of aboriginal youths in this country.

Considered individually or all together, these issues are of vital importance. They reflect the very essence of what we, as Canadians, could probably define as our basic right, namely, the possibility to learn and develop our intelligence, to work in an area of our choice and to have access to the essential health services which greatly contribute to our quality of life.

Clearly, Madam Speaker, when dealing with the living conditions of our aboriginal youths, these issues are of particular significance because several of the benefits which a great many Canadians enjoy in the area of education, employment and health services remain inaccessible to our aboriginal people, both young and old.

Over the years, a lot of effort was spent trying to rectify this imbalance. Our Governments have spent billions of dollars to help our aboriginal people with programs and services, more specifically in the key areas of education, employment and health services.

Nevertheless, our aboriginal people still face tremendous problems. It is especially true of our aboriginal youths whose plans for the future were repeatedly crushed because of poverty, inability to attend schools of higher learning and a lack of decent jobs.

Madam Speaker, past experience has shown beyond a shadow of a doubt that there is no point attempting to deal with these problems on the superface.

Yet, have we not learned from the errors of the past which direction we should follow?

This government has set definite objectives in its policy on aboriginal self-government; first of all, within the limits of the Canadian Constitution, to increase the powers and make sure that more decisions are made at the local level; then, demonstrate more flexibility while acknowledging the various needs, traditions and cultures of the aboriginal people; and finally, make local administrators more responsive to their respective communities.

As I said, Madam Speaker, those are definite objectives. History, however, has shown that to reach these goals, we must overcome a great many obstacles. The fact that the right of Aboriginal people to self-government was not included in the Consitutional Act either in 1985 or in 1987, makes the path to progress beset with obstacles. To achieve progress, we must resume this dialogue.

It is imperative that take we a totally new approach conducive to more productive understanding, trust and consultation. We are now concentrating our efforts on the development of this new climate of understanding, communication and progress.

This calls for leadership, and that is what this government has shown so far. When last on the hustings the Prime Minister restated the government position when he said that Canada cannot be complete unless we solve the problems related to native rights. Indeed, finding a solution to these problems and granting self-government status to native people is the only way to make progress in education, employment and health.

On a number of occasions the Prime Minister indicated that the government is quite prepared to call another First Ministers' Conference on native self-government and rights as soon as the chances of success are encouraging.

Hon. members are certainly aware that in the last Speech from the Throne the government did commit itself to give priority to native rights the moment the Meech Lake Accord has been ratified.

Our position is clear and unequivocal: we are trying to foster closer co-operation with native people, establish a consensus and turn the self-government concept into reality. This is why federal ministers recently met with leaders of national native organizations, and they are looking forward to other such meetings in the near future.

Anxious though we are to make progress at the constitutional level, Madam Speaker, we are not ignoring the issue of self-government at the community level. As a matter of fact, if we are going to deal with education, employment and health we must not lose sight of the fact that the priorities of native people may vary according to their political structure, their economic base and their culture.

Fully aware of these differences the federal government has taken a number of non-constitutional initiatives concerning self-government so as to follow up on propositions made by various groups seeking to set up self-government systems which go beyond the confines of the Indian Act provisions. We do have strong evidence which allows us to state that this flexible community-oriented approach is producing positive results.

For instance, over 200 Canadian bands have submitted 134 proposals to the Self-Government Negotiations Branch. Even though most of them are only at the initial stage, the Whitefish Bay band, the Mississauga and Chippewa Nations United Councils in Ontario, the Gitskan Wet'Suwet'en bands in British Columbia, the Alexander and Sawridge bands in Alberta and three First Nations in the Yukon are currently taking part in negotiations to establish new community systems of self-government. Many other communities have made significant progress and are expected to initiate negotiations in the next few months.

The global claims settlement process is also designed to increase the Indian communities local autonomy.

Agreements in principle have been signed with the Council of Yukon Indians, the Dénés and Metis in the Northwest Territories and in Quebec. The government has also ratified an umbrella agreement with the Conseil Attikamek-Montagnais and the provincial government. An agreement in principle is currently under negotiation.

An umbrella agreement with the Labrador Inuit Association and the Newfoundland provincial government should be settled soon. Finally, in Eastern Arctic, the government hopes to sign an agreement in principle with the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut.

• (1740)

The Sechelt Indian Band Self-Government Act, passed in 1986, is a prime example of the success of these negotiations. It allowed the British Columbia Sechelts to gain control not only over their own lands and resources but also over social, health and education services as well as local taxation.

Madam Speaker, all these efforts to ensure self-government are major accomplishments but they don't stop there. The government has also made alternative funding arrangements in response to the native communities' desire to increase their financial autonomy and self-sufficiency under the Indian Act. These alternative funding arrangements enable band governments and tribal councils to assume greater responsibilities and more financial authority for program delivery, while maintaining good quality of service and financial accountability.

The Government of Canada continues to work in close co-operation with the provinces to advance the negotiations on land claims and to define and implement self-government plans for native people living off reserves.

These examples show this government's commitment to achieve tangible, progressive change in the area of self-government. They also show that progress is possible. The benefits of these agreements go beyond the communities concerned. These agreements are a major step forward in improving relations between the government and Canada's native peoples. They reduce these peoples' economic and political dependence on the federal government. They give Indians the power to take charge of their own communities, their own lives and their own future.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak today on the motion of my colleague from Nunatsiaq regarding aboriginal youth. The problem facing these young Canadians is serious and a thoughtful discussion is necessary in order to begin eliminating the problems that affect them. It is no secret to anyone that the aboriginal people of this country are living below the living standards that most Canadians enjoy.

The way we treat our minorities and our young people is a good way of judging our society. The aboriginal people of this country need the help of the Canadian government to develop policies and programs that will enable them to mature and become self-confident in their culture and their language.

The problems they face are enormous and there are some alarming statistics to demonstrate that. The life expectancy of an aboriginal person is 10 years less than a non-aboriginal. The mortality rate of Indian infants is twice as high as the Canadian average. The rate of infant mortality among the Inuit is three times as high. The rate of suicide among Inuit of the Northwest Territories is four times that of the national average. In the Northwest Territories 63 per cent of the population have less than a grade 9 education. Of Indians living in urban areas 66 per cent attain a grade 9 education and of Indians living in rural areas, 51 per cent attain a grade 9 education. Among the general Canadian population 80 per cent have attained a grade 9 education. The difference is enormous.

I think many Canadians would be surprised to hear that half of the aboriginal population in this country is under the age of 25. The socio-economic disparities between aboriginal youth and non-aboriginals is unacceptable. Their health level is lower. Unemployment is much higher. The education level is much lower and substance abuse, of course, is more prevalent.

As a government we have to develop programs and services that will cater to the needs of aboriginal youth. Obviously the programs we have now are either not effective or not as extensive as they should be.

The motion of my hon. friend from Nunatsiaq calls for the development of policies in consultation with the aboriginal people. It is imperative that we increase consultation with the aboriginal people and include them in the decision-making process in order to develop policies and programs that better serve their needs. They are in an advantageous position to understand the socio-economic problems facing the aboriginal people.

The state of health among the aboriginal is well below that of the Canadian average. I know that this problem was identified many, many years ago. Maybe Canadians will have to think twice before saying that we have the best health care system in the world, because our health care system is not reaching the aboriginal population.

There are numerous examples of the poor health level within the aboriginal population. The infant mortality rate is twice that of the Canadian average and the rate of tuberculosis among aboriginals is seven to ten times that of the national average.

Chris McCormick of the Native Council of Canada has said that perhaps the most urgent message voiced by our youth is their alcohol and drug abuse which causes 70 per cent of their deaths.

This is alarming. The problem is grave. Most of the substance abuse cases are due to the erosion of traditional values and the stress due to cultural transition.

Before I go further, I want to address the effects of the last budget on native programs and demonstrate this government's lack of understanding of the aboriginal people. One of the hardest hit programs will be the 99 Native Friendship Centres across the country. These centres, based in urban areas, assist aboriginal people with information such as housing availability, education, substance abuse and employment. This is exactly the type of program that helps young aboriginals to adapt and to cope with a new environment. It is administered by natives and it is for natives. It is a service that the federal government does not provide and it addresses problems of cultural transition and alienation.

Yesterday I received a letter from the Union of Ontario Indians. That letter addresses in part budgetary cuts to aboriginal programs in the last budget of the Minister of Finance. It says that the Government of Canada, through the recent budgetary cuts, has all but eliminated core funding in this organization. They have been notified that the union will only receive the first quarter funding of $45,548 for the 1990–91 fiscal year. This is a reduction of 75 per cent from $181,863 and it is a net loss of $136,646.

Core funding was designed to enable Indian political organizations to consult with their membership and the government. It was initiated as a way to create dialogue and inspire democratic political participation for the First Nation of Canada.

This organization can be an extremely useful tool for policy makers. I have to wonder about this government's commitment to the native people of this country. Why is it eliminating the voice of our aboriginal people?

Another problem that we must address is the level of education. The statistics that I gave earlier show how far behind the level of education is among aboriginal people compared with the national average. Part of the reason why the level of education among natives is well below that of the national average is due to accessibility and the stress due to cultural transition.

Youth must often leave home at an early age and move to a bigger centre in order to pursue their education after grade 9. They are away from home without the family as a support mechanism and they are living in a different world. The culture is alien and sometimes communication is difficult. A young person has to adapt to the cultural changes on his own, and this is not always easy. The statistics show that the level of substance abuse and the high rate of suicide is often an alternative to the cold reality.

I spoke earlier of the Friendship Centres and this is a perfect example of how these centres could provide support for youths attending school away from home. The centres would provide support to the young person in order for him or her to adapt to his new environment. We must, as a government, provide all the possible support to young aboriginals who want to pursue their education if we want to increase the level of education and start eliminating unemployment.

The alternative for these youths to going to school is to stay at home and face the problems of unemployment and a clouded future. The unemployment rate among aboriginals ranges from 35 per cent to 53 per cent depending on the region of the country. Unemployment is a pressing problem, especially because of the population growth of the Inuit and the Indians.

As my colleague from Nunatsiaq said in his speech, the population growth now stands at 3 per cent a year among the native population, which is well above the national average. In the Northwest Territories, this translates into 600 potential entrants into the labour force every year for the next decade. The government needs to stimulate the northern economy in order to find work for these young people before they fall into desperation.

• (1750)

I hope that in the few minutes that I have had I have been able to shed some light on some of the problems the young aboriginal people face in this country. The young people of our country are the future and we have to make sure that all the youth of this country have the same chance to contribute to that future. As a government, we have to include the aboriginal peoples in the decision-making process if we really want to address their concerns.

Last night on the news I saw our Prime Minister announce that the Canadian government will be forgiving debts of hundreds of millions of dollars owed to us by the Caribbean countries. As I watched that I was reminded that, in our own country, some people have a living standard which is comparable to some Third World countries.

I challenge this government to reconsider the cuts to native programs and to actually increase funding. I am pleased to support the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, and I call upon all members of this House, regardless of political affiliation, to support this motion.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to be able to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq which reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of aboriginal youth.

I am also very pleased that the committee which oversees these things saw fit to make this a votable motion because I think it is very important that every member of this House reflect on this situation and vote on it in order to put clearly on the record how they feel about this question.

I am very proud to speak in this debate because in my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River there are 12,000 Indian and Métis children and young people growing up whose hopes are to develop a life in that part of the country, people whom I represent in this House.

When I reflect upon my duties I do not think there is anything more key to how that part of the country develops and what the future society of northern Saskatchewan is going to be than what happens to those 12,000 young Indian and Métis people. Therefore, I compliment the hon. member again for putting this motion forward and causing me and all other members to reflect on the situation.

It is very easy, because of the statistics involved in health issues, employment issues, and the different social problems which exist, to view this as something that is steeped in hopelessness, on which there is not a sense in the community that progress is possible and that the whole thing is sinking into some kind of an abyss. That is a record that needs to be corrected.

When I travel around to the schools throughout my constituency, because there are Indian and Métis people living in rural areas and the cities and towns as well, I find a lot of pride in Indian young people in who they are and in who they want to become. I find that families have a lot of pride in their children. There are a lot of hopes for those children, and a lot of vision for what they can become.

I find a lot of very dedicated teachers, social workers and other professionals, and now many of these are of Indian and Métis background. The training programs which have been instituted over the last 10 or 15 years are actually starting to work and as the Indian and Métis people who have been trained in these professions get into the classrooms and the different professions, we are really starting to see a difference.

We see a reassertion of the role of the elders in these communities and a new willingness on behalf of the young people in those communities to listen to the elders. I see a leadership which is very much aware of the young people in their communities and the very important role those young people will play. When I go to band council meetings and other types of community meetings, a very great part of the time that people spend discussing these issues is in fact spent on discussing the schools and the programs available to their youth. That is probably the biggest priority they have.

Then there are the young people who see themselves playing an exciting role in a future society. They see the same statistics we do. They see the health problems. They have grown up with them first-hand. It comes as a surprise to them sometimes when they hear us bandy those figures about in here. To them it is part of their daily experience.

The problems with pneumonia and tuberculosis have a much higher incidence in those communities than anywhere else. They see rates of suicide among their peers which, depending on the communities, range as high as seven times those of the average population. That is very depressing for communities and families to have to live with. They see employment prospects that are often very dismal.

I note that even in the federal civil service only seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the employees are of native Indian ancestry. If it was not for the Department of Indian Affairs, there would be virtually none at all. This is in spite of the fact that there has supposedly been an ongoing employment equity program in place and that Indian, Métis and Inuit people form about 3 to 3.5 per cent of the population. We are way short in that particular regard.

There is unemployment in many of the Indian communities of 70 and 80 per cent. With regard to the off-reserve employment situation, to our shame, in spite of the fact that the economy has been growing in this country, private sector employment among Indians has actually been falling. Part of that is due to the fact that the policies of this government have focused employment growth on the large urban centres and when Indian people move into those centres they have all kinds of barriers to overcome. Whereas the areas they have lived in, the traditional native communities in the north and isolated areas, are those that have been hammered by government policies affecting them more than anybody else.

There is also the rate of incarceration. The Human Rights Commissioner says, to our shame, that a native young person in this country has a better chance of ending up in jail than graduating with a university degree. In spite of that, we see a highly motivated contingent of young people coming out of our native communities across this country.

I was pleased to note the report of the National Aboriginal Youth Conference that was held last year here in Ottawa. There was a very strong vision of the future emerging from that. As I think about the young people who attended that conference, I am also reminded of the post-secondary education debates that we had on this Hill last spring. Indian young people from across this country rallied on this Hill and, in the strongest of terms, drew the attention of this House and Canadians generally to the fact that post-secondary education, gaining the tools to determine their own destiny and run their own institutions are what they see as the key and they are prepared to fight for that.

We as people involved in government have fallen far short of our part of the bargain. I do not think we have recognized, as the Indian communities have, the burgeoning labour force that is growing up in those communities. The birth rate is more than double that of society as a whole. The average age in native communities is 23 while the average age of the larger society is 32. Almost 50 per cent are under age 20.

As the member for Nunatsiaq, who proposed this motion, said in his presentation, there will be 140,000 aboriginal young people coming into the labour market between 1987 and 1997, a period we are part way through. The consequences of that large a number of new entrants coming into the labour force is truly staggering.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, on November 22, 1989, I posed a question to the Deputy Prime Minister with regard to child care. At that time I reminded the Deputy Prime Minister that the United Nations General Assembly had approved a comprehensive convention regarding the rights of the child.

Furthermore, I went on to share with the House that Canadian governments, both past and present, had spoken out very strongly and enthusiastically with regard to the rights of the child. However, when it comes to the issue of child care, that seems to be another issue as far as this particular government is concerned.

In 1984 and again in 1988, the present administration made promises while in opposition and thereafter while in government with regard to bringing in comprehensive legislation regarding child care in this country. It was reaffirmed in two Throne Speeches. Canadians from coast to coast felt some comfort in the fact that perhaps the long-awaited program for child care would be finally legislated by the Government of Canada.

However, that was not the case. As a result, today as we had in those early years of 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and now in 1990, a major crisis is evolving regarding child care in this country.

We lack thousands of spaces for young Canadians in need. The need is well documented. Committees have been struck by this House. Members have raised this issue on the floor of the House of Commons. More important, journalists, as well as those who work in the child care field, have been announcing this crisis all across the country.

The crisis is of particular importance to natives. It should be noted that there are only 70 child care centres for approximately 1,000 native communities. This is a shocking statistic even for government members.

In addition to that, the native communities were promised $60 million by the present administration which has since been gutted by the administration across the way.

The child care initiatives fund was cut in the recent budget from $15 million to $13.25 million. The child care initiatives fund was set up some time ago. I wish to repeat that while it is not the panacea in terms of the difficulties of the child care movement, it is at least some attempt to provide research dollars for those organizations, and non-profit organizations in particular, to do some research regarding child care in this country.

Now, the great promise of the child care initiatives fund is being reduced by the Minister of Finance, aided and abetted by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and, of course, the Prime Minister.

The be all and end all of the Government of Canada's initiatives toward child care in this country has centred around the Canada Assistance Plan. For those of us in this Chamber who have some familiarity with the contents of the Canada Assistance Plan, we recognize first and foremost that it does not provide the poorer provinces or, indeed, the poorer regions in this country, with the same equitable opportunities as it does other regions of the country. As example would be Ontario. That economy, which is generating sufficient dollars to maintain a balanced budget for this particular fiscal year, can readily afford 50 cents on the dollar, unlike the province of Newfoundland under the Canada Assistance Plan, which cannot afford 50 cents on the dollar for the creation of new child care spaces in that province. This government chooses to do nothing to address the real crisis with regard to creating new spaces in this country.

• (1805)

Second, this government chooses to do nothing with regard to ensuring and enhancing quality child care across the country. More recently in the province of Nova Scotia we have had child care givers go on strike for a fair and equitable wage. Unfortunately, their demands have not been met as of yet. I urge them to continue on in their struggle to get a fair and equitable wage for their services.

It must be understood that the essence of a quality child care program in this country, even in the province of Nova Scotia, will centre around the qualifications and the abilities of those care givers. Therefore, they ought to receive fair and equitable compensation. I am certain that if the national government assumed its responsibilities in terms of putting in place a comprehensive program, it would be able to address this particular program.

In conclusion, I am dismayed at a government which, at one time, echoed the sentiment that it was supportive of a comprehensive child care program, only to find that it has been able to secure billions of dollars for its friends, such as the Reichmann brothers in Toronto. It has been able to write off the debt of other countries and provide untold millions of dollars to its corporate friends. Yet when it comes to child care, there has been no comprehensive legislative program put in place. There have been no substantial dollars being directed toward creating new child care spaces, establishing national standards or providing equitable and fair compensation for those people who work as care givers in the child care movement.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Cape-Breton—Richmond East. When we hear the hon. members opposite, we cannot help thinking that if we had not inherited this incredible fiscal burden in 1984, just imagine what we could have done if we had only 50 per cent of what we now spend on servicing the debt, which we could then spend on child care. Imagine what we could have done with all that money! There is a problem, and it is that this country has a serious budget deficit. However, I would like to remind the hon. member that some components of the national strategy on child care have been put in place, and I will repeat what they are, for his benefit.

I may recall that today, the deduction for child care expenses allows working parents to deduct up to $4,000 from their income per pre-school child. There is also the $200 supplement to the refundable child tax credit, per pre-school child, for low-and middle-income families. There is the Child Care Special Initiatives Fund. The hon. member referred to a problem with child care on Indian reserves. A national study is now being conducted on the subject. Two hundred projects have been approved so far. There are several feasibility studies for setting up new child care services.

Madam Speaker, I would like to suggest the hon. member go and meet businessmen in his riding, as I did in mine. We are about to set up a unique daycare facility in the workplace.

• (1810)

These businessmen realized it was no longer just the government's responsibility to set up daycare services for their employees. If the hon. member is interested, I would be glad to provide details on this new bill.

Finally, Madam Speaker, we must not forget that during the 33rd Parliament, the Liberal senators blocked a bill that was before the Senate. If this bill had been adopted, perhaps our discussion would not be the same today.

The government also transfers money to the provinces, and in 1989–90, nearly $240 million was paid to the provinces for child care under the Canada Assistance Plan. Finally, Madam Speaker, we are firmly resolved to act on our commitments. I think the government has shown fiscal responsability. We are convinced that, thanks to the latest budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, by the end of our term at the very least we will be able to come back with a more detailed national strategy on child care, and that will undoubtedly be the response the hon. member is waiting for.

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, on October 27 last year I rose in my place during Question Period to ask the Minister of Finance about the goods and services tax and the government's advertising and promotion campaign surrounding the tax.

I found the minister's response at the time totally unacceptable. You will recall, Madam Speaker, that as far back as May 23 of last year, the New Democratic Party's research office filed a request through the Access to Information Act to find out how much money the government was budgeting to spend to advertise the unpopular GST.

It was not until September 12 that the government responded by saying that it would spend $6.6 million on advertising. We took it at its word. Although $6 million to advertise a program for which no legislation had yet been drafted, let alone passed, was excessive, we were pleased to get the information.

Then, one month later, officials in the Department of Finance revealed to the members of the finance committee that actually $9.1 million worth of taxpayers' money would be spent in trying to sell this flawed and ill–conceived program to a reluctant and angry population. I was astounded.

The Minister of Finance had taken four months to provide us with the original figures and then one month later his department tells us those figures are 40 per cent higher.

This tell us two things. First, the Minister of Finance has no respect for the access to information laws of Canada. You will recall, Madam Speaker, just one month before in response to a local newspaper's request for information, the minister provided only a part of what was required in the answer.

Second, it tells us that the minister is not to be trusted. He has demonstrated that while he might say one thing, he does another. He tries to tell us that things change, and that his preliminary $6.6 million figure was accurate. If that is correct, then Canadians know something else about the minister—he cannot manage his department.

How can a budget for something like advertising jump 40 per cent in less than one month? How can the minister expect us to believe that he has control of his department or its programs if this sort of thing goes on? I find it hard to believe. That is why I think this is more a case of the minister saying one thing and doing another.

The Minister of Finance is doing what the Prime Minister told him to do when the first polls on the GST came out and the government discovered that more 75 per cent of Canadians opposed the idea of a goods and services tax. The Prime Minister likened his government's approach to that during the free trade agreement when he said to Canadians: "If they do not like it now, we will just sell it to them". The finance minister has taken his boss, the Prime Minister, literally. The more that Canadians protest the GST, the more money the government is pumping into advertising.

Let us also remember what happened with advertising around that free trade agreement. Even though we do not know all the details yet, because the information is not being made available to us, we know that the recent election victory of the Prime Minister was secured by a massive $2.1 million advertising campaign paid for by North America's big business. We know that that advertising blitz was instrumental in gaining support for a deal that otherwise would not have been supported by Canadians in their hearts, or at the polls.

• (1815)

But who paid for that advertising and what was its purpose? We are now finding out that advertising was paid for by Canadian subsidiaries of giant U.S. corporations, and by some Canadian companies which have since demonstrated very little interest in the well-being of the Canadian economy as they move their operations south of the border. The advertising dollars were invested so that these companies could exploit the Canadian market-place or make deals which were in their interests, in the interests of the American corporations, and not the Canadian people.

The government is selling out the Canadian people, selling us out against our instincts by using advertising and propaganda instead of facts. It is a public relations game that the government is engaged in and it has to stop.

The GST is only the latest example, but it is perhaps the best example. Take the delivery process that we are watching, the delivery process that is in force now as we see the government try to implement the GST at 7 per cent instead of 9 per cent. Has the government backed down? No. It is just an example of the expensive plan to convince us that we have to accept something that is bad for us and bad for Canada. It is all a part of this public relations game.

The GST was a bad tax at 9 per cent. Everyone said that before the finance committee and the government accepted that it was a bad tax at 9 per cent. So what makes it any better at 7 per cent? We know it is a push button tax and within one year of its introduction the government will push that button and the 7 per cent will be a 9 per cent tax. That 9 per cent tax which was bad in the first place will be back and we are supposed to be benefiting from it.

What will we have gained? We as Canadians, as taxpayers, as farmers, as business people, as wage earners or pensioners will have gained nothing from this tax. No amount of government advertising will prove otherwise. So we are well advised not to trust the Minister of Finance, the person whom I now call the minister of propaganda.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, on September 12, 1989, in response to a request under the Access to Information Act, the Minister of Finance described the mandate and operation of the goods and services tax communications working group.

With respect to operations, Treasury Board has approved a budget of $5.138 million for fiscal year 1989-90 and $2.523 million for 1990-91. These figures include expenditures for salaries, travel, supplies, materials and so on.

When salaries are excluded, the working group's operating budget is about $4.6 million for fiscal year 1989-90, and $2 million for 1990-91. In other words, the project total is $6.6 million—precisely the amount specified in the minister's response to the access to information request.

As the hon. member will note, there is no advertising component in this figure. A separate budget of about $4.5 million has been established for such items as advertising the GST 1-800 hotline and publishing public information inserts in newspapers.

The advertising budget was not included in the minister's response because information for the access to information request was based on expenditures up to and including August 8, 1989, the date on which the GST technical paper was released. The 1-800 hotline was started on August 9 and the two-page public information insert only began appearing on August 26.

Recently, the advertising budget has been increased through supplementals by $760,000 for fiscal year 1989-90. This reflects the increased demand by Canadians for information on the GST as evidenced by hotline requests.

The government has an obligation and a responsibility to ensure that individual Canadians and businesses are informed as to how the GST will operate.

The importance of public understanding is a key lesson from other countries where similar tax systems have been introduced. Where business people and consumers have been well informed, implementation has gone smoothly.

LAY-OFFS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, on January 26, 1990 I asked the Minister of Labour what steps he had and would be taking to convince the Canadian General Electric Corporation not to close their light bulb manufacturing plant in east Montreal on July 13, 1990 as planned as that closing would mean the loss of some 200 jobs, involving mostly women with more than 20 years' seniority who would have next to no chance of retraining for the labour market.

All I got from the minister was that he would make sure provisions in the Canada Labour Code would be adhered to, that those responsible for the plant closing would take steps to apply under the POWA Program for older workers. Madam Speaker, that answer was of course not good enough and I said so to the minister, insisting that he contact General Electric to urge them not to put their employees on UI benefits or on retirement, but to keep their plant in operation.

I was not the only one to do so because at a round table of elective representatives in Villeray to the three levels of government, namely Mr. Berthelet, Mr. Biello, Mr. Goyer and Mrs. Martine Blanc of the Montreal City Council, Mrs. Violette Trépanier and Mr. Christos Sirros, two MLA's whose constituencies comprise that plant in Montreal and who are also members of the Bourassa Cabinet in Quebec, as well as my colleague from Saint-Denis and myself, we talked with labour representatives from General Electric who told us about their problems. After that round table in Villeray and a number of consultations, all attendants at that meeting decided to support the employees in their attempt to save the plant. The Montreal councillors and the Quebec MLAs contacted their respective bodies.

I raised the matter here in the House of Commons and urged the Minister of Labour to intervene personally because he is responsible for the Montreal region.

Here we are, two months later on March 20, so I hope the response I get tonight from the parliamentary secretary is a lot more encouraging that what I heard last January. Hopefully the parliamentary secretary will tell me that the minister did get in touch with the company president and made representations to General Electric management to convince them to keep their Montreal plant operating. And I hope he did let General Electric management know that as spokesman for the Canadian government he is not going to stand still while jobs which are important to Montreal disappear because the company has chosen to relocate the plant in the United States.

In light of the fact that General Electric has reported profits of hundreds of millions of dollars for the last financial year, I would suggest this is quite a reasonable request. Nor are we talking about a run-down plant manufacturing nearly useless products, these are halogen or special lamps of the type used by Quebec Hydro and the city of Montreal, state-of-the-art products for which world-wide demand is very strong indeed. This is why we think it is utterly ridiculous that General Electric should decide to rationalize its operations in the United States and in eastern Europe rather than keep this plant running in Montreal.

This is a plant with no labour conflict. If General Electric could say that there had been strikes every year or two, that the labour climate was bad, we could understand that they want to go somewhere else. But I cannot remember the last time there was a strike or conflict at that plant. Labour relations have been very good there for a long time and therefore we cannot accept General Electric closing it down with no consideration for its employees who, I repeat, are mostly women with about 20 years of good service to this company. Overnight, they will find themselves with no alternative unless the economic situation in eastern Montreal changes substantially. I need not remind the parliamentary secretary that in the past fifteen months or so, there have been many layoffs affecting some 6,000 workers in the Montreal area.

These grim answers to the economic situation are absolutely frightening. If I were not short of time, I could give a whole list of companies that have decided to go to the United States or to rationalize their operations in Canada as a result of this free trade agreement. I cannot do so for lack of time, but I hope that the parliamentary secretary has a good answer for me.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the Hon. Member for Papineau—Saint-Michel for giving me this opportunity to inform him of what the Government is doing to help Montreal East.

The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel mentioned of course the many plant closures, but he could not, for lack of time probably, mention also the great many jobs created in Montreal. I could talk about that for a long time.

I should like to re-assure the hon. member that the Federal Government is fully committed to the economic development of the Montreal area. I can also tell him that my colleagues of the Conservative caucus who represent the Montreal area are doing a tremedous job and that at every caucus meeting, they are eager to inform us of their success, and we are well aware of the problems occurring in Montreal, its poverty, and I can assure you that you will hear more about this in the future.

Together with the Quebec government and the city of Montreal, Madam Speaker, the federal government has sponsored the establishment of a committee responsible for the economic recovery and job creation programs in Montreal east. It is made up of four components:

A new Montreal east industrial recovery program for which the Department of Industry, Science and Technology will allocate a budget of $35 million over the next five years. Of that amount $13.4 million have already been committed.

There is an allocation of $115 million, including $19.5 million spent in 1988-89 by the CEIC, for the recycling and training of Montreal east workers; a $125 million reserve made available over a five year period through the Federal Business Development Bank and earmarked for specific projects in Montreal east, including $50 million already in loans already granted; and finally the participation with other Quebec departments in the financing and operation of a discussion and promotion panel on Montreal East.

Of course, the Hon. Member also referred to older workers.

As you know, the government and the provinces have agreed on a single package, the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, and should the workers laid-off by General Electric qualify for POWA, they will get financial aid to meet their needs between the end of their unemployment insurance benefits and the start of their old age pensions.

Madam Speaker, the government is, needless to say, very disappointed to hear that General Electric will close its light bulb plant in Montreal due to a decreasing demand for products made there. It is not true, as the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel claims, that most of the jobs in this plant will be transferred to the United States. We're talking about a responsible company that has been here since 1888.

This company has an extensive employee assistance program which is rather special and could serve as a model for other corporations.

I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to speak on this, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for months I have been asking the Quebec government to finish work on Highway 117. When the Liberal Member for Lasalle—Émard visited Abitibi—Témiscamingue, he said on the Radio Nord station, on March 12, that Highway 117 was in terrible shape and that Quebec was prepared to speed up repairs on the highway.

I find that surprising, to say the least, because on March 7, 1990, the Minister responsible for Transport in Quebec, Mr. Yvon Vallières, answered my letter dated January 18 in the following terms:

"Further to your letter of January 18, 1990, in which you support requests by the regional county municipalities of Vallée-de-l'Or and Antoine-Labelle to speed up work on Highway 117, I am sure you will understand that considering the present budget situation, I can make no commitment to speed up repairs, and this applies not just to Highway 117 but to the entire province.

However, I intend to set aside $850,000 in 1990-91 for work on Highway 117 within the boundaries of the Abitibi—Témiscamingue region. Work on Highway 117 will continue according to the initial schedule, always allowing for the availability of funding in the years to come".

RURAL VITALIZATION DAY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, Rural Dignity of Canada has proclaimed today as the second annual Rural Vitalization Day.

It is a time to pause and pay tribute to all those Canadians living in rural Canada who supply us with our food, our forest products, our mineral wealth, a good part of our recreational spaces, as well as a lot of other goods and services.

Unfortunately, much of rural Canada is in crisis today. Farming and the fishery are presently going through a catastrophic economic period so severe that the very future of thousands of farm and fishing families is at immediate risk.

If urgent government action is not taken, these families will be forced out of business and their communities will wither and die. We must stop closing rural schools, post offices and hospitals. Instead, we must take steps to ensure economic and social stability for the rural communities of Canada.

It is time we recognize the immense benefits this country derives from our rural resources, and return to rural Canadians a fair share of those benefits.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, racism divides communities and leads to discrimination, which can destroy the fabric of a just and compassionate society.

As Canada celebrates the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, I salute the Canadian Ethnocultural Council for its noon program on Parliament Hill, which called to the consciousness of all today's celebration.

It is fitting that this House sets the tone for a national policy on racial equality and hears once more the words of retired Supreme Court Justice McIntyre:

Discrimination may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not, but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individuals or group not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits and advantages available to other members of society. Distinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those based on an individual's merits and capabilities will rarely be so classed.

The ways to eliminate racial discrimination are known. I urge the government to master the will to grant adequate funding to achieve the goal. Together we will go further.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, northern benefits has been an important program for people living in northern Alberta.

This program has helped schools attract teachers, businesses to attract the skilled workers they need, and it allows citizens to better afford the goods and services they need.

I urge the Minister of Finance to accept the two zone concept of benefits as soon as possible.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, today, March 21 is the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. It is a worldwide initiative to expose the very real threat of racism. Our nation is working toward becoming an ever more compassionate society, but the appalling reality of racist actions inhibits our ability to achieve that dream.

In order to succeed, Canadians must acknowledge that racial discrimination exists across our land.

It is critical that we mobilize all Canadians in a battle against racism. To that end, the federal government has initiated programs, legislation and policies.

I call upon all members of the House of Commons to take action against racism in their communities, to work together every day to eliminate racial discrimination and make Canada a truly fair and just home for all Canadians.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of the House that because of government cutbacks, the CBC has decided to eliminate the position of agriculture and resource reporter at its Ottawa bureau. This decision comes at a time when Canadian agriculture is in crisis, and we should be increasing the information available to the public, not reducing it. The CBC has maintained this vital position since the 1940s.

CBC reporter George Price has filled this position for over 20 years, reporting on Canadian agriculture year in and year out. He is well known in the agricultural community and has established himself as a trustworthy and impartial reporter and media personality. It is shameful that he had to learn the news of the abolition of his position by reading it in a wire story.

Today is Rural Revitalization Day in Canada. I believe it is totally unacceptable that the agri-food sector has lost an important means of communication with the public, which needs to know what is going on in agriculture and rural Canada. It is difficult enough as it is to make consumers aware of the difficulties facing Canadian farmers and rural communities without the government chopping this important means of communication.

I call on the government to reverse this budgetary cutback at the CBC, and to reinstate this important means of communication on the agriculture industry to all Canadians.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, today, on the 21st of March, I would like to take a few moments to mention measures taken by the present government to fight racism and racial discrimination. It was this government that concluded a historic redress agreement with Japanese Canadians to compensate for the unjust way they were treated during and after the Second World War. It was also this government that appointed the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals, the Deschesne Commission.

Hon. members will recall that our government passed the world's first legislation on multiculturalism—legislation that recognizes our rich cultural diversity as a fundamental characteristic of Canadian society.

Furthermore, the government tabled a bill establishing the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, whose mission will be to promote the equality of all Canadians.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the present government recently tabled another bill, Bill C-63, to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. These measures show how far this government is determined to go to eliminate all forms of racial discrimination in Canada. I am convinced that all Canadians will join us today, on March 21, to improve the state of race relations in Canada.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, like other members have already done, I wish to point out that today is the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

A recent study by B'Nai Brith revealed that last year in Canada there was a 57 per cent increase in incidents of discrimination against racial minorities.

To fight prejudice, B'Nai Brith is selling pins showing four people of various origins holding hands. The following words appear on the pin: "Proud to be Canadian", and "Diversity and Unity".

I am wearing one of these pins today, and I would invite all Canadians to take similar action.

To quote B'Nai Brith, every individual, community group and level of government has a duty to fight racism.

* * *

MULTICULTURALISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, racial discrimination continues to plague Canadian society in the widespread distribution of racist paraphernalia, increased anti-immigration sentiments, anti-Semitic incidents and the backlash against multiculturalism.

Visible minorities continue to be victimized by racial discrimination in the workplace, in schools, in the community, in the media, in the justice system and even in our own federal institutions.

Instead of expensive billboards on racism, the government must fund community projects that will tackle racism, including media monitoring, public education, TV programs and advocacy groups that speak for minorities.

Aboriginal people who experience discrimination in every facet of their lives must have Secretary of State funding restored to achieve their human rights. We must make employment equity mandatory to remove systemic discrimination, and past injustices must be redressed.

Canada is a multicultural, multiracial country, a country of colour, where all citizens must be equal in reality as well as in law.

DISTINCT SOCIETY FOR QUEBEC

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, opponents of Meech Lake should read or reread certain pages of their country's history. I am not referring to the fanatics and bigots but to those people who say they are acting in good faith, former and present leaders of our society who seem unaware of the fact that Quebec was recognized de facto as a distinct society when the Quebec Act came into force on May 1, 1775. The full title of the Act is: "An Act for making more effectual provision for the Government of the Province of Quebec in North America."

Perhaps it would be useful to recall what was said by Lord Carnarvon when he tabled our draft constitution before his peers in London in 1867. He said that Lower Canada was jealous and proud, and rightly so, of its customs and ancestral traditions, and that it was attached to its own institutions and would only enter the Union under the clear understanding that it would keep those institutions.

Quebec's distinct identity was not invented at Meech Lake. It has existed for a long, long time and enshrining it in the new Constitution merely sets the record straight and corrects the injustice of the "night of the long knives".

RURAL REVITALIZATION DAY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, today, March 21, is the first full day of spring. It also constitutes Rural Revitalization Day in Canada, a day for us to remember and to promote the quality of life for rural and small town Canadians.

Since the Tory government came to office, the quality of life in rural Canada has been in constant decline. The Tories have massacred VIA Rail, chopped the CBC budget, sent agriculture in a tail-spin, mismanaged fisheries, shut down several hundred post offices and promised to shut down all 5,221 rural post offices in Canada.

Canadians living in rural and small town areas have a right to their services. The very urban attitude of Canada Post toward our rural citizen reeks of arrogance toward so many Canadians. On behalf of my Liberal colleagues, I am pleased to stand in solidarity with Rural Dignity of Canada on this second annual Revitalization Day.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Today Premier McKenna of New Brunswick tabled in his legislature what he called a companion resolution, which he said was designed to respond to concerns people had expressed about the constitutional amendment of 1987.

Will the Prime Minister tell Parliament and the Canadian people today what is his response to the resolution of Premier McKenna, as presented to the New Brunswick legislature earlier this morning?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the question on this important matter. While I was away I received a copy of the resolution, which we are now in the process of examining.

I view the approach by Premier McKenna as constructive and helpful, designed to be of assistance to Canada in resolving an important constitutional difficulty. I am going to examine it very carefully with my colleagues in that light, and respond as quickly as I can, perhaps tomorrow evening on television.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Prime Minister that members of Parliament will want to know whether it is the intention of the Prime Minister to speak to the Canadian people on television, in this House and through this House, or via some other means, bearing in mind his role as Prime Minister in a parliamentary system.

I also want to ask the Prime Minister whether he will not agree that the time has now arrived for a meeting to be called by him of all First Ministers, himself and the premiers of all the provinces, to discuss Premier McKenna's proposals? Does he not agree that the time has now come to take this step?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have never ruled out a First Ministers' conference on the constitution. I thought it would be important for the elements of success to be reasonably present before bringing all the First Ministers together. After examination of the premier's proposal and responses to it from various provincial premiers, I would then have to make that determination, which I will do as quickly as I can.

With regard to the remarks on television, I do not know the format it would take. Presumably it would follow formats that other Prime Ministers before me have pursued, further to either rules that exist for the—I am trying to answer the question.

I am just responding to my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, that I suppose I will follow existing customs and conventions.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the light of Premier McKenna's resolution, I want to ask the Prime Minister why he will not agree the time has come for him to call a meeting of provincial Premiers and discuss Mr. McKenna's resolution as soon as possible. Why will he not agree the time has come for this kind of action?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because it is quite obvious this kind of action would be very premature.

It was only this morning that Premier McKenna tabled a complex resolution in the New Brunswick legislature, which has now been sent to other provincial Premiers across Canada and here to the federal Parliament. First of all, all parties must have an opportunity to read the resolution and analyse it very carefully. It will then be up to me to decide whether it would be useful to call a meeting of provincial Premiers and make some progress on this issue.

At this time, such a decision would appear to be premature. Before calling a meeting, I want to make sure we have a very good chance of winning our case. I think we should try and avoid any possibility of an other than favourable outcome as a result of this meeting.

It has happened too often in the past that a major player was hurt as a result of such a meeting, and I would not want this situation to go on indefinitely.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I believe we would all agree that television is a powerful medium in forming public opinion, expressing cultural values, and defeating the evils of racism. In fact, I would suggest there is no more influential instrument by which to celebrate Canada's diverse identity and to unify Canadians at this critical point in our nation's history.

The Prime Minister has said to his First Ministers that our communication system is the cornerstone for strengthening the unity and the sovereignty of this country.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Why has he allowed his government, in its broadcasting bill, to remove the CBC's mandate to contribute to national unity? Does the Prime Minister not believe in national unity any more?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government is firmly committed to the concept of national unity. However, I would remind the hon. member that she signed the report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture that recommended that the phrase "national unity" be removed from the objectives of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Edwards: Further to that, Mr. Speaker, I would impress upon her the reality that consciousness and a sense of identity must be there before unity can be achieved. That was the whole idea behind the change in the bill.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary so capably pointed out many times during the course of our deliberations, we did an excellent job but we were far from perfect three years ago. We have made many changes and this country has changed significantly since then. I would remind him that we are in a critical situation and there is a need for national unity at this time.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Communications. If our broadcasting system is a public service that is essential to maintaining and enhancing our national identity and sovereignty and if through its programming, the system is to contribute to our sharing a national conscience and identity, isn't the ultimate goal national unity? Why did the minister and his parliamentary secretary remove the national unity clause from the bill. Was it to please the nationalists?

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that not only did the standing committee make that recommendation but the Caplan–Sauvageau task force on broadcasting also made that recommendation. It was made in light of a survey of many such mandates for broadcasting organizations around the world. I would point out to the hon. member that such mandates exist in totalitarian regimes such as the Republic of South Africa and are not appropriate to a democracy such as Canada.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Late last night the chairman of the finance committee shut down the debate on the goods and services tax simply saying—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Shame, shame!

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the government side claps for anti-democratic measures and the Canadian public will see that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: In addition to that, the day before a Catholic priest and an ordinary citizen were arrested outside the House for legitimate and peaceful dissent.

Thirteen times since the 1988 election this government has imposed closure, ending debate on matters in the House. We in the New Democratic Party find this assault on democracy intolerable. I ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to shut down democracy in the country and to close the debate in the country? If not, what is he prepared to do about his government's actions?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as several of your predecessors and perhaps even yourself have commented many times, the business of the committee is the business of the committee.

My understanding is that what happened last night was an exact parallel of a situation in June, 1984.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Wrong.

Mr. Andre: After some 31 hours of filibuster, where witnesses were prevented from appearing before the committee, and in keeping with admonitions in Beauchesne's that committees must in fact finish their business at some point in time, the chairman of the committee, as we all do in this place, used the precedences that were there.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Canadians are asking to be heard on the goods and services tax. They have a right to be heard on the goods and services tax.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms. McLaughlin: I have a file of letters received in just the last day imploring the government to hear their views on the goods and services tax. I have letters from the National Union of Provincial Government Employees, from the United Fishermen and Workers' Union, letters from the Movement Action Chômage du Québec, Solidarité Populaire du Québec, the Homemakers, the United Steelworkers of America and the Chamber of Commerce.

When will the Prime Minister listen to the requests of Canadians and ensure that we can hear their views on the goods and services tax?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that groups were kept waiting as a result of the tactics of the New Democratic Party in filibustering and going into long, irrelevant and irreverent exchanges of all sorts. We saw the theatrics on television. They were entertaining, but certainly not illuminating.

If, in fact, there are any accusations to be made about not permitting witnesses to appear before the committee, those accusations should be directed to the leader of the New Democratic Party. It was her party's antics that prevented the procedures to be held in a sensible fashion.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. What has happened this week is alarming. This file is full of letters. People write us to say what they think of this government's anti-democratic measures. I will quote one from Henri Sader in Montreal:

> It is unacceptable that the Finance Committee should refuse to continue hearings on the GST.

Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is quite simple and it is one that everyone would like to ask him: When will the government realize that the public wants to say what it thinks of the GST?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would assume the leader of the New Democratic Party would not be suggesting that having bellowing, screaming, and yelling for hours on end and not permitting questions to be dealt with in a sensible, rational fashion is somehow an expression of democracy. It is more an expression of tyranny, of anarchy.

• (1430)

I would like to quote to the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party from the text Procedures for Meetings and Organizations edited by Messrs. Kerr and King with a forward by Dr. Koester, former distinguished Clerk of this House, which states: "The presiding officer is responsible for safeguarding debate by allowing complete and adequate expression of views and putting the question to a vote when those have been aired sufficiently."

After three years the views have been aired sufficiently.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister may not be aware, in view of the answer given by the House Leader for the government, that the time allocation measure that was proposed to the Standing Committee on Finance was moved while witnesses were still being heard. The roaring and yelling that was referred to was not taking place at all. In fact, the 30 hour long discussion that took place was as a result of the introduction of the time allocation motion by the Conservatives.

Does the Prime Minister agree that the government should impose closure on second reading in the House on the goods and services tax, the most important measure since the income tax legislation of the 1920s? Now we have time allocation in the Standing Committee on Finance, and members of Parliament on his side are stating that closure will be imposed as well on third reading, stifling debate not only in the country but also in the House of Commons on this very important tax measure. Does he agree with that?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, every attempt was made, as we usually do in this place, to get some agreement from the opposition as what would be an appropriate time period for ending discussion. The opposition absolutely refused to give any commitment. Therefore, at some point in time it behooves the chairman to bring things to a vote and indicate when that will be.

In this regard the chairman took a position exactly parallel to that taken when the Liberal government was in office in June, 1984. The chairman did nothing but what the member's party had established as a precedent some six years ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. Since we know that a number of Conservatives, both here in the House and across the country, are opposed to the proposed goods and services tax and that the Premier of Alberta and Mr. Kindy and many others object as well, is the Prime Minister prepared to allow a free vote on the goods and services tax bill? A free vote would be one way to do it.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we have had several votes on the GST, including a vote in November, 1988, since the GST was introduced before then. The people of Canada, if they had the view the hon. member suggested, had an opportunity to say so at that time. This government clearly has a mandate. This government was duly and properly elected.

Last night a very generous allotment of time was provided to conclude all questions so the matter could be brought back to the House for consideration. Last night a precedent established by the hon. member's party was followed. It takes a pretty vivid imagination to call that a tromping upon of democracy.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship).

Last year, the minister cut funding to cultural groups. This year, he eliminated the language education program and cut funding to native people. He subsequently ordered a study to create a new race relations network. I wish the minister would explain why he cut funding to cultural agencies established by their own communities, and then creates a new partisan agency.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, if I were the hon. member, I would be ashamed to ask such questions about multiculturalism. You did nothing during the whole time you were in power! You spent $45 million during your last term. We more than doubled this, to $94 million, during our first term. Today, we are spending more than $138 million, and the Canadian Race Relation Foundation we are going to establish, with a centre in Toronto, will be a project for all Canadians, to help us gain a better understanding of one another.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): For the minister's edification, we never replaced elected leaders by nominations from a political party.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, the minister has cut funding to cultural groups. Recently, he set up an advisory committee on multiculturalism, and he tabled a bill to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. Why does the minister keep injecting partisan politics into cultural issues, creating a lot of ill-feeling in the process?

An Hon. Member: Shame!

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, as usual the member is wrong again. There were constraints and reductions in this budget which have been approached in a very consistent and fair manner. The funding for multiculturalism will be the same this year as it was last year in addition to the other $24 million.

But let me tell you what we have been doing. We have been bringing forward an expression of long-term commitment with a statutory basis—a Canadian Multiculturism Act, a new Departmewnt of Multiculturism and Citizenship, a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, and a Canadian Race Relations Foundation. All of these are commitments which cannot be changed by future governments on a whim. It is our commitment to create a society and a community of equal opportunity and equal access for all Canadians.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Government House Leader. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you, like the rest of us, heard the House Leader say that what happened last night in the finance committee was the exact parallel of what happened in the justice committee on June 6, 1984.

I have the minutes of that committee meeting from 1984 and I quote one paragraph: "It goes without saying that if the committee does not uphold this ruling, then the chairman has no other recourse except to resign. Even if this ruling is upheld, at the conclusion of this process I will offer my resignation to the committee to avoid the future work of this committee being tainted by the process undertaken in relation to Bill C-9."

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: If this is the exact parallel of what happened in the justice committee in 1984, the logical conclusion and the honourable thing to do at this time is to call for the resignation of the member for Mississauga South as the chairman of the finance committee, isn't it?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have kept reading his history because the chairman was reappointed immediately thereafter.

Surely the hon. member, being a senior parliamentarian and having been around here for some 22 years now, recognizes that precedents are what guide our operation. He must recognize that there must be some mechanism ultimately to put questions to a vote. This mechanism was available by way of precedent.

• (1440)

It was not done on the first day of discussion; it did not cut off further debate. There will be several days of debate and discussion before it is reported back to the House. One has to really stretch one's definition of "closure" to consider this anything but a very reasonable decision by a very reasonable chairman.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the minister says one would have to stretch the definition. The minister said that the government followed the exact parallel of what happened in the justice committee in 1984. In 1984, the chairman of that committee said: "I will offer my resignation to the committee to avoid the future work of this committee being tainted by the process undertaken in relation to Bill C-9". The chairman of that committee did resign in 1984.

Why does this government not do the honourable thing and demand right here and now the resignation of the chairman of the finance committee? Demand that he resign.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I suspect the New Democrats and other members of this House would in fact raise a point of privilege of some ferocity, given the reforms of Parliament if in fact I were to ask for the resignation of any chairman or interfere with any chairman. He is elected by the committee.

I ask the hon. member to take advantage of his experience, to think back about what precedents mean, to think back about the reality that at some point in time every legislative body has a right to make a decision. This committee was a legislative body last night deploying a parallel from 1984 to put in place an order that provides ample time for discussion of each and every clause of the GST bill.

After three years of discussion in principle I think that is about as democratic as you can get.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on the environment and hopefully, in the absence of the minister, somebody from the government will be able to respond. I bring this question forward because there seems to be a lack of information provided by the government and also by the media.

Is there going to be a centre for sustainable development? Can somebody answer that question for me?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I think most hon. members of this House know, the Prime Minister, when speaking to the United Nations in September 1988, announced that an international centre for sustainable development would be located in Winnipeg. As the announcement made at Globe 90 in Vancouver on Monday of this week jointly by the Minister of the Environment on behalf of the Government of Canada and the Premier of the Province of Manitoba indicated, that centre is in fact now established.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is an excellent example of a promise made and a promise kept.

I am also pleased to advise the hon. member that an initial number of Canadians have been appointed to the board of directors and I will name just three. Lloyd McGinnis, a well-known Manitoban with an established record in international development; Dr. Clay Gilson, an agricultural expert; and Jim MacNeill, the Secretary General of the Brundtland commission are three who will serve as members of the board.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons.

Yesterday, the minister tried to implicate the opposition in its unacceptable ruling with respect to public order on Parliament Hill. However, he admitted himself that no one had ever shown either the ruling or its contents to the opposition.

My question is as follows: Why did the government violate its own official policy of giving sixty days notice before any ruling takes effect? What justification was there in this case for not applying that policy?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly provided in the Statutory Instruments Act that for internal matters the 60-day period does not apply. But in this particular instance I was certainly informed, and I saw on television two weeks before the implementation, that the regulations had been promulgated and that there had been discussions in the Board of Internal Economy earlier as to their nature. There was all-party agreement.

There was no reason to suspect that the hon. member was not kept informed by his House leader. How am I supposed to know that happens?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works because it was that minister who made the submission to cabinet that resulted in that order coming forward.

The minister said in paragraph 10 of his submission to cabinet that this regulation will only be enforced in situations of undue noise or disturbance immediately next to the Parliament Buildings.

What undue noise and disturbance was there in a 70-year old priest, Father Van Hee, whose protest was in the form of a silent vigil?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my colleague should know that it is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who, in their discretion, enforce these regulations. I know that he would not expect me or any other minister to direct the RCMP as to how they should carry out their business.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council study released today that the federal government has failed visible minorities including women, aboriginals and the disabled.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister of Canada how he can justify a rate of 2.9 per cent representation for visible minorities in the Public Service when there is an availability rate of 6.4 per cent in the labour market. This is clearly a failing grade for the government and totally unacceptable. How can he justify this?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to my hon. colleague that when we took office the rate of visible minority participation in the Public Service was 1.7 per cent. We have increased it in five short years to 3 per cent and the target for 1991 is 3.8 per cent. That is an awful lot more than that government ever did when it was in office.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister is going to go straight to heaven for his accomplishments if he dies today.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Why do the Prime Minister or the minister not simply admit that the representation of these groups in the Public Service is dismal, particularly in the management category?

Will the Prime Minister commit today to include all federal departments and institutions in a strengthened Employment Equity Act so that the visible minorities can take their rightful place in the Public Service, instead of being so absolutely ridiculous in his comments?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, to reach the goals that we have set for ourselves in this respect we have appointed an advisory committee. We have put in place a visible minority employment program in the Public Service. This is a program to actively recruit and promote visible minorities. We have allocated this program $15 million and we have provided this program 400 person years to facilitate the entrance of visible minorities in the Public Service. We are starting to see the results and they are very positive.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the House leader as well. He has suggested that there would be ample debate within the finance committee. In fact, the motion which was put before the committee last night says there will be five minutes of debate on each amendment. Do this minister and his government feel that five minutes of debate on each amendment is ample opportunity?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, after three years of committee study and touring the country and so on, to talk of five minutes is a bit ridiculous. But even five minutes is more than the NDP were allowing with their filibuster.

This committee order, as I read it, provides for several more days, many hours each day, of study of the bill and allows that there be at least five minutes on each amendment so that there is not an automatic push–through.

If New Democratic Party members had been willing or, indeed, are willing now to reach some reasonable accommodation as to when they would be prepared to see all motions put, then something could be done. As long as they remain unreasonable, somebody has to reach a decision.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact it was a maximum of five minutes of which one minute would have to go to the Finance Department. So we, the members of Parliament, get just four minutes.

Does the Prime Minister feel that this kind of dictatorship in committee is satisfactory in this country when he himself stands up for democracy in South Africa?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, for weeks and weeks, months and months indeed, we have been asking the New Democrats to tell us when they were prepared to see democracy work and a decision to be voted on by the committee. They refused absolutely to ever make a commitment that they would ever allow a vote to come to the committee.

Their filibuster took up the equivalent of 20 sitting days of that committee. Surely after that amount of time the hon. member has to concede in his heart of hearts that it is time to put the question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I know you would be interested in a phenomenon that occurred 51 years ago today where the perfect alignment of the stars signalled the birth of our Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: That may be, but what possibly could be the question?

Mr. Schneider: Does he know that it is my birthday in two days?

On a much more serious matter, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He will recall that two executives of the Saskatchewan Transportation Company were charged with a criminal offence. They are apparently free on bail in the state of Texas but are not permitted to leave the state. It is my understanding that their trial will not be held until September.

Can the federal government intercede somehow to allow these individuals to come back to Canada to at least spend that time prior to the trial with their families?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question relates to two Canadians, Don Castle and Darrell Lowry. The arrangements and laws that are in place do not allow those two individuals, in the current circumstances, to get back to Canada. They are facing criminal charges in Texas. Since that matter is before the courts I cannot comment further on it.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The 1991 expenditure plans confirm that the government is planning to not continue its citizen instruction and English language textbook training agreements effective April 1. That is less than two weeks away.

Why is the Canadian government insisting on undercutting those new Canadians trying to learn English, trying to establish a community life, trying to get better jobs, by taking away opportunities to learn our official languages? Will the minister immediately reinstate this low cost and effective program?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out how much of an increase there has been in the instruction and capability of language training for immigration since this government took office.

We spend $130 million a year on language training in our various programs. That is considerably higher than it was in 1984. I would point out particularly that the Settlement Language Training Program marks the first time that a government has provided a program designed for people not destined for the labour force. It is for women at home.

We have made a lot of progress in this area and I am quite hopeful that we will be able to make more.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I want to raise a very serious matter with him today because of the presence of a delegation from Indonesia.

As the minister knows, six Indonesians are facing a death sentence. Has the minister had an opportunity to raise that with this delegation? Perhaps more important, will he take measures to arrange for parliamentarians to meet with them so that we may raise our concerns with them at this time?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to raise the matter with the delegation, but I have had the opportunity to have the matter raised with Mr. Alatas, the Foreign Minister of Indonesia. He has given me an understanding that leads me to believe that those executions will not proceed.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Yesterday the minister informed the House that he would find out whether negotiation has taken place with any of the four bidders for the goods and services tax centre prior to the formal tender call.

Can the minister inform the House today whether or not such negotiations did in fact take place?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any particular negotiations that have taken place. Of course, as my colleague knows, once the tendering process has occurred and is complete, there can be no further negotiations except for clarification or it would be looked upon as bid repair.

As far as I am aware, there were no negotiations about any particular buildings.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister also told the House yesterday that the bidding process was completely transparent.

Can the minister explain how the system can be transparent and fair when Justice Strayer said with regard to the case last Monday that one of the bidders, namely the lowest tenderer, had not been informed of the changes in the rules?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I did read Mr. Justice Strayer's decision, as I indicated I would. I took his words very seriously, as I know the member would, when he talked about a certain lack of apparent administrative fairness.

Again I point out that as far as transparency is concerned, once the process has been engaged and any of the parties are concerned about how it works, the data is there for them to scrutinize afterward.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice my question is for whoever is speaking for her today.

Polls tell us that intolerance in society is dangerously high and this has been inflamed by racist pins, T-shirts and calendars, and by comments such as those made recently by the Deputy Prime Minister which denigrated our Charter of Rights.

When will the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member would not want to pursue that without a lot more evidence, especially on such a delicate question. Would she please complete her question.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to provide a quote if the Deputy Prime Minister would like it.

When will the Minister of Justice discuss needed amendments to the Criminal Code to reduce the dangerous expansion of racist and inciteful materials?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I could probably speak for all members of the House when I say to my hon. friend that the reputation of the Deputy Prime Minister with respect to the protection of individual and human rights is an absolutely outstanding one. I know my hon. friend will want to withdraw any suggestion to the contrary.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hovdebo: Read the article.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "Read the article." I have read the article. All I can do is tell you, having read it, that it underlines again exactly what I have said about the Deputy Prime Minister. He is an outstanding parliamentarian who has already defended individual and human rights throughout his career.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, where my hon. friend is right is that there are troubling instances of racism and bigotry in Canadian society. There is a tendency in some quarters to display an obvious lack of understanding and charity toward minorities of various kinds. This is most unacceptable in our society. Canada, with its imperfections, has always prided itself on some degree of excellence in this area of our national life.

I welcome the point made by my hon. friend. I give her the assurance that the government will be most vigilant, in respect of ridding society of these problems that she raises, by co-operating with all members of the House to make sure that instances of racism are stamped out as quickly as they can be in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rose earlier today to make a statement which I think is of particular interest to this House and did not have the opportunity to do so.

I wanted to bring to the attention of the House that it is the one hundredth anniversary of the first woman member of Parliament, Agnes MacPhail, and that later today we will be unveiling a plaque to Agnes MacPhail who worked for farmers and justice in this country.

I would like to say that I am sure this House joins us in commemorating the anniversary of the first member of Parliament in Ottawa, the first MPP in Ontario, and the first woman to the League of Nations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate the Leader of the New Democratic Party for this very valuable initiative and to commend her again on behalf of all parliamentarians for her own election as leader of her party. That in itself is an important part of Canadian history. I congratulate her for that magnificent achievement.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: My admiration does not extend beyond the issuance of the writs for the next election. Her achievement is already very considerable.

I take advantage of the very important point raised by my hon. friend to point out to the House that I had the honour recently of inviting the Governor General to invite to membership in the Privy Council the Hon. David Croll who turned 90 last week. He was a distinguished member of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, a member of the Senate since the mid-1950s and has served Canada with great distinction. The Governor General will be swearing him into the Privy Council this afternoon.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I want to join in the celebration of the anniversary of the first woman member of Parliament.

The individual in question was an outstanding member by any stretch of the term. She made a signal contribution to the work of this House and this country. She obviously was the precursor of growing numbers of women who are playing a substantial role in this House and in government generally.

It is not too often that I can find something good to say about any of the decisions of the Prime Minister. I do want to say that I have nothing but praise for his recommendation to the Governor General that the Hon. Senator David Croll be summoned to the Privy Council.

David Croll has had one of the most remarkable careers in Canadian public life, coming to this country as a boy with his family as an immigrant from eastern Europe. Between 1930 and 1940 he served as Mayor of Windsor, provincial member for Windsor—Walkerville, and member of the provincial cabinet under the premiership of Mitchell Hepburn in three cabinet portfolios. When he did not agree with his government when it came to organization of workers and unions, he left the cabinet with the words that I think should be an indication of an example for all of us when he said: "I would rather walk with the workers than ride with General Motors".

When the war came in 1939 he joined the Essex Scottish Regiment as a private. He ended the war as a colonel having served overseas. He was then elected to the federal Parliament as Liberal member for Toronto—Spadina, going on to be summoned to the Senate in 1955.

As a member of the Senate he was responsible for outstanding reports, precursors of important initiatives and social policy in the areas of pensions, in the areas of work for the aged and consumer protection.

I am very glad that the Prime Minister has chosen this occasion not only to honour the first woman member of Parliament, Agnes MacPhail, but someone who continues at the age of 90 to be a very distinguished and active parliamentarian, the Hon. Senator David A. Croll.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have some questions of privilege. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege arising out of what was said by the government House leader in Question Period.

In one of his answers to the member for York Centre I thought I heard him say that I as House Leader had received a copy of the regulations in question dealing with limitation of demonstrators 50 metres from the House of Commons before they were proclaimed, and that I knew about them at the time they were proclaimed. I want to tell the government House Leader that he is completely wrong in this regard.

The Commissioners of Internal Economy, at the request of a Conservative member of Parliament at the beginning of December of last year, as is on the record of this House, had a discussion about the matter of limitation of demonstrators within 50 metres of the House of Commons. As the record of this House shows, the Speaker wrote to the Minister of Public Works asking that the possibility of regulations be considered. The letter of the Speaker is on the record of this House.

I want to say to this House that I certainly did not see these regulations before they were proclaimed. I was not aware of them at the time they were proclaimed. If I had been, I certainly would have had a lot to say at the time prior to their proclamation.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the records of the Board of Internal Economy, of which I was not a member but of which the hon. Leader of the Liberal Party was at the time, show that on November 22 the committee asked the Speaker to write to the Minister of Public Works requesting that regulations be put in place providing unfettered, unharassed access to this building and providing a specific space for demonstrations.

I was told at the time that part of the motivation for that was the point of privilege of the Leader of the Liberal Party who said that he was unable to get to the Hill because of taxis demonstrating on the Hill. That matter I gather is still before one of the committees of this House, since it was found to be a prima facie case of privilege.

The request was made by the Commissioners of Internal Economy to the Speaker on their behalf to provide these regulations.

The regulations were done according to statutory instruments law. They were posted. There was at least one story in The Ottawa Citizen. Anna Marie Tremonti had it on The National on March 3, I think. There were discussions among people in various ways.

The fact that the Leader of the Liberal Party now says that he was in the dark about all this is a source of regret. Perhaps we would not be having what is a pretty silly discussion now if he were not in the dark on it.

There was no attempt by anybody to hide anything. What happened was that the government responded to a unanimous request from, among others, the hon. member himself.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the government House leader would have more respect from the members of this House and from the public generally if he would learn to recognize that sometimes he is wrong, that he can be wrong and is willing to admit it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The record of the House into which the Speaker's letter was read said simply that members of the Board of Internal Economy asked that the possibility of regulations—possibility—be looked into.

Second, the statutory instruments requirements were not followed in this case. There was not the 60 days' notice required.

I think that the government House leader, I repeat, would be in a better position to do his job if he were willing to accept the fact that contrary to what he suggested during Question Period I was not shown these specific regulations in draft or final form before they were proclaimed.

I also want to say that the issue I raised in the House as a question of privilege involved something quite different from the circumstances behind the regulations we are talking about. I raised a question of privilege because I was in a taxi near the flame, with a number of other taxis that wanted to ride up on the Hill to protest the government's goods and services tax. We were prevented from doing so by the Mounted Police.

I raised a question of privilege because there are precedents dating back hundreds of years in the Parliament of the United Kingdom which show that members of Parliament cannot be impeded, even by the police, when they want to get to Parliament. That is quite a different matter.

I never suggested in that question of privilege that I was impeded by any demonstrators. It was a matter of the RCMP doing it.

I raised the question of privilege which was referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections which, through no fault of the committee, has not dealt with it yet. I was not the source of the issue being raised by the Commissioners. It was a Conservative member.

I ask the minister to get his facts straight. I repeat, if he wants to have any respect in the House as House Leader, it would help if once in a while he would admit that he can be wrong as he was wrong in what he said during the last Question Period.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have no trouble admitting that occasionally I am wrong.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: The hon. member said that I should admit that I am in error. He said that this issue was raised by a Conservative member in December. The minutes of the committee meeting were for November 22. This Board of Internal Economy which he is on was anticipatory. It read the minds of this mysterious member who sometime later was going to complain. That is absurd.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I just want to say that I am happy to correct the record.

Mr. Speaker: If the Leader of the Opposition wants to correct the record, I would like to hear him.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am just happy to say that the meeting in question in which the issue was raised by a Conservative member preceded the date of the Speaker's letter. I will readily concede that.

Mr. Andre: Will you concede one more thing? I have one more thing that I would like you to concede. You said that the letter from Mr. Speaker was merely a request to look into it.

Will you concede also that on the strength of the request from the Commissioners of Internal Economy, a lawyer was hired to draft the potential regulations? Will you concede that that letter also contained the draft regulations in the letter?

An Hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Andre: Will he concede that that is something more than what he has implied now as merely an expression of "Gee, is it possible for you to consider this?"

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of which lawyer drafted the regulation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andre: I am tired of hearing your accusations. You were there; I was not. You were there and you asked for it.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. minister and the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition to let the Speaker intervene. I have listened to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and I have listened to the reply.

First, it is not a question of privilege.

Second, this is developing into debate. I think that in the interests of other hon. members who have business to bring before the House we should conclude the remarks.

There is a series of points of privilege. I will deal with them as they were delivered to me. They may well involve the same issue.

The first hon. member whom I will hear will be the hon. member for Burin—St. George's. I will give him sufficient time to explain the circumstances and to explain his claim for privilege.

If a number of other applications are on exactly the same point, I want to make it clear to the House at the moment that while I will hear individual members I do not intend to hear the same facts and the same argument repeated endlessly. If hon. members want to look for any examples, this is the practice that we have followed for a long time. A number of members may have the same grievance but if the same points and the same facts have earlier been argued then there is no need to repeat them endlessly. I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind.

In any event we have a number of applications. It is not for me to indicate to the House from whom they are, but I will be watching for members. I notice the hon. member for Burin—St. George's has already been on his feet and I recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I will take only take a moment or two of my hon. colleague's time. I did send notification to the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicating that I plan to rise on a point of privilege as a result of a near physical assault in the House of Commons yesterday.

The fact that he is here and the fact that if we are going to raise a point of privilege regarding an individual member, perhaps he would see fit to stay in the House so that we have a chance to raise that point of privilege at the appropriate time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has communicated with the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs in perhaps an ingenious way, but perhaps not altogether within the rules. I am going to leave the message where it has been sent.

In any event, I have to take the points of privilege in order and start with the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, as required, I gave notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege arising from the abridgement of rights of members in the Standing Committee on Finance last evening.

Last night in the committee around 10.30 p.m. the chairman, the member for Mississauga South, interrupted the proceedings and said in part: "It is my order as chairman that the resolution produced by Mr. Soetens is deemed withdrawn and that the committee proceed to the following order", et cetera. The chairman then proceeded to read the draft order that he had in his hand.

Further in the transcript you will find that a minute or so later the chairman said: "I am told by the clerk that there are no points of order, no debate on it any further."

I submit that those two actions, two utterances by the chairman of the finance committee last evening, first, have never happened before in that particular context. Reference has been made today to the June 1984 justice committee meeting. The House will be aware that that clearly cannot be a precedent and that the chairman of the day not only apologized for his action but offered, on two occasions at least, to resign in consequence of his actions.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that while it is often said—and rightly so—that a committee is the master of its rules, that should never be taken as a licence for the committee to become a law unto itself. It is a creature of Parliament and as such has no mandate to abrogate or trample on rights of members which are taken as being axiomatic in this place, in the House of Commons. Were that to become the case, a manipulative government would very quickly learn that the way to circumvent a fair-minded Speaker would be simply to send everything down to committee.

• (1520)

There are three points, Mr. Speaker. First, I submit that the chairman last evening had no authority for doing what he did in deeming the resolution by the member for Ontario to be withdrawn. I refer Your Honour to Standing Order 64 which explicitly points out that once you have a motion the following applies:

> A member who has made a motion may withdraw the same only by the unanimous consent of the House.

Nowhere in the authorities is there a provision for the chairman without the unanimous consent of the committee, and certainly without the initiative of the member who moved the resolution in the first place, to exercise the kind of initiative that the chairman did last night in deeming the motion withdrawn.

Beauchesne's fifth edition, on page 156, citation 443 reinforces this point. It states:

> (1) The Member who has proposed a motion may withdraw it only with the unanimous consent of the House.
> (2) An amendment may be withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the House, but neither a motion nor an amendment can be withdrawn in the absence of the Member who moved it.

I have submitted that the chairman had no authority within the rules or the precedents to do what he did in deeming the motion withdrawn last night.

I come now to the second quotation that I read into the record a moment ago wherein the chairman said, and I quote one more time: "I am told by the clerk there are no points of order, no debate on it any further", et cetera.

If you examine the rest of the transcript, Sir, you will find that the chairman provided for his ruling to be sustained and then proceeded immediately to adjourn the committee without allowing any points of order or any opportunity for debate.

My second submission is that the chairman had no authority to disallow points of order. The record of the committee will clearly show that a number of members made a number of attempts to raise points of order and never got beyond shouting: "Point of order, Mr. Chairman". At no time was anything said that would allow the chairman to find that there was no point of order. He heard nothing beyond the term: "Point of order, Mr. Chairman" and proceeded, as I have submitted, to inform the committee that there would be no points of order.

I submit he had no authority for doing so. My authority is in Beauchesne's fifth edition at page 78. Citation 235 states in part:

> Any Member is entitled, even bound, to bring to the Speaker's immediate notice any instance of what he considers a breach of order. He may interrupt and lay the point in question concisely before the Speaker. He should do so as soon as he perceives an irregularity in the proceedings which are engaging the attention of the House.

In that citation alone is ample evidence that the gentleman from Mississauga South, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, was acting without any basis of parliamentary authority or precedent to do what he did in disallowing points of order.

First, I have submitted that the chairman last evening had no authority to deem withdrawal of the resolution that was before the committee.

Second, I have submitted that the chairman last evening had no authority whatsoever to disallow points of order.

I come now, quickly, to my third submission, namely, that the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance last evening had no authority whatsoever to disallow debate on what was clearly a debatable motion.

In the interest of time, I shall not read the entire motion, but I shall just give you the gist of what it says, Mr. Speaker. The draft order given to the committee as a substitute for the one that he had deemed to have withdrawn provided for the business of the committee, what it would do on each of several successive days, when the questions would be put, and when the report to the House would be made.

That has all the elements of a debatable motion, whether you characterize it as a time allocation motion or a routine motion to deal with the future business of the committee. That is another argument altogether as to what was the real substance of the motion. The fact is that however you characterize it, whether as a time allocation motion, as a motion to deal with routine future business of the committee, or as a motion to make certain determinations about the substance of the legislation which had been referred to that committee, in any of those categories into which the motion clearly has to fall, I submit that it is clear by every rule of Parliament—and the citations are so many that there is hardly need to make reference—that it is a debatable motion.

I will give you, Sir, one citation, which is citation 67 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's which provides that the chairman has no authority to disallow debate on what is clearly a debatable motion.

It would be easy to get carried away on this particular issue, but that is not my point at this particular time. I just happen to believe it is time to flag what is going on in that particular committee.

I have given you, Sir, three clear instances where the chairman was clearly outside his authority. I submit that those instances are such serious breaches of my privileges as a member of this House and the privileges of other members of this House they cannot go unnoticed by the Speaker.

I accept the normal convention that a committee is the master of its rules, but I repeat in conclusion that mastery must never include the licence for a committee to do what in conscience the Parliament itself would never do. That clearly is what happened in at least three separate instances last evening.

Mr. Speaker, if you find I have established a prima facie case, I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. On the same point of order?

Mr. Gauthier: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Again, I have always followed a policy of not indicating until a member stands whether I have or have not a point of order. The reason for that is clear.

First, what comes to me is between myself and the member bringing it to my attention. Second, a member always has the right to withdraw and may, for whatever reason, not wish it to be known that he has put an application and then withdrawn it.

I wonder if hon. members would help the Chair by standing to indicate if they wish me to proceed with their questions of privilege. I will come back to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in just a moment.

• (1530)

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion as to what it is you are asking at this point.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have just heard a succinct argument put forward by the hon. member for Burin—St. George's on a question of privilege arising out of proceedings in committee.

I have a number of questions of privilege here. In order to maintain the confidence with which each of you bring these matters to my attention, and of course I am not indicting whom I have received them from, but as a consequence I am asking those who wish me to pursue their questions of privilege to stand.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): On this question, or on all questions of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: No, on this question of privilege. The reason is to try to put some order into the presentation of argument. I hope that helps hon. members.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan on a point of order.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, in order to assist the Chair, I am advised that some of my colleagues who have filed notices with you are not in the Chamber at the moment. They are outside the area. I wanted to indicate that your list may not be totally complete.

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members would want to assist the Chair in dealing with this in the most expeditious way. I understand the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wants to rise and to argue disposition. I am going to proceed seriatim with the applications which I have in front of me on the issue in which argument has commenced. As a consequence, I turn next, and this is in chronological order, to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to what has already been said by the spokesperson for the Liberal Party.

If you go through the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, or if you go through Beauchesne's, you will not find the appropriate precedents for what happened in the finance committee last night. We know that the chairman of the finance committee deemed that something occur. He deemed that a certain motion proposed by the member for Ontario be withdrawn and then made a ruling saying that another motion take the place of the motion that was withdrawn.

If you look at what happened, Mr. Speaker, you will find that this is very inappropriate in terms of the way this House has worked over the years. You, as the custodian of propriety and order in the House of Commons, should look at the precedents and at the proceedings of the House of Commons and at the work of a committee of the House of Commons. I do not think you will find that this is an appropriate way for a chairman to act.

At about 11.35 or 11.36 p.m. last night, the chairman did not put a new motion to the finance committee. Instead of putting a new motion, he made a ruling. What he said was that there could be no debate and no discussion of his ruling, and that there could be no point of order or point of privilege raised concerning his ruling.

In other words, the ruling could not be questioned at all. He said the only thing that could be done at this particular stage was to challenge the Chair. I have the minutes of that particular portion of the meeting here with me. At that time, the Chair was challenged. The chairman, the member for Mississauga South stated: "I am told by the clerk that there are no points of order, that there is no debate any further. This is the ruling of the Chair. If you would like to challenge the Chair, you may challenge the Chair". Then Mr. Harvey said: "I am not out of order and you know it". I take it he was trying to get the floor at that time. The chairman said: "It is the ruling of the Chair". Mr. Harvey said: "The Chair cannot rule that the moon is made out of green cheese and make it so". The chairman said: "Does somebody want to challenge the ruling of the Chair?" Mr. Young is quoted as saying: "Mr. Chairman, we challenge the ruling of the Chair and reserve the right to challenge it in front of the Speaker". The chairman said: "It has been moved by Mr. Young that the ruling of the chair is now being challenged. Is that challenge sustained? Are all those in favour of sustaining the Chair?" At that point the majority of people on that committee agreed to sustain the Chair.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to briefly look at the practices and the precedents in the House of Commons and you will find that what happened last night is very rare indeed.

The bizarre incident that occurred was further compounded today in the House of Commons by the government House Leader. During Question Period I asked him to confirm that the precedent that they used from last night was the ruling of the then chairman of the justice committee, Claude-André Lachance back in June, 1984 when that committee was discussing the CSIS bill.

At that time, the then chairman of the justice committee, Claude-André Lachance used a similar method, but not the same method. If you check the minutes of that justice committee, Mr. Speaker, you will find that those meetings went on for a considerable period of time. The chairman did say in his remarks that the spokespeople for the opposition parties were consulted about the proper way in which to proceed. The opposition was consulted about the ruling the chairman was about to make at that particular time. If my memory is correct, and I did not have a chance to look this up in the last few minutes, you will also find that the steering committee of the justice committee at that time was consulted about the propriety of the ruling that was to be made by Mr. Claude-André Lachance.

You should be aware that none of this happened in the finance committee, Mr. Speaker. We were never consulted either formally or informally about the ruling which the chairman was going to make.

The chairman cannot argue that this was a spontaneous ruling. He walked back into the finance committee at around 4.20 or 4.30 yesterday afternoon and said to us, in a pretty direct way, that a number of years ago Speaker Jeanne Sauvé had made a ruling pertaining to the ending of the bell ringing crisis here in the House of Commons and that he figured he had the power as the chairman of the finance committee to make a similar ruling. However, he did not elaborate as to what that would be. I questioned him, as did other members, as to what he was talking about. He obviously had some papers in his pocket. He would not share his information with the opposition.

I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that in 1984 Mr. Lachance did share the information with the opposition. He consulted the spokespeople in the opposition parties, they had a discussion about it and because there was no agreement as to the procedure, Mr. Lachance decided to go ahead anyway and deem that the committee be adjourned.

None of this happened last night, and I can assure you that none of it happened officially and formally. That is a known fact. I can also assure you that there were no informal discussions that I am aware of between the chairman of the finance committee and any member of the New Democratic Party. I do not know what happened between the chairman and the Liberal Party, they can speak for themselves.

This was compounded in the House of Commons today when the House Leader for the government said: "We followed the exact parallel of what happened on June 6, 1984". Those are his words. That is wrong on at least two counts. In 1984, there was some consultation between the then chairman of the justice committee and members of opposition parties. That did not occur in 1990 in the finance committee in terms of the procedure that the chairman used last night as the members across the way know. They will not say that publicly, but we were not consulted, we were not informed and we were not asked about this particular procedure, so the exact parallel was not followed on that count.

• (1540)

In conclusion, in 1984 when the then chairman made his ruling, he offered to resign as the chairman of the justice committee because he thought it would taint the work of the committee on Bill C-9. That was on June 6. For your information, Mr. Speaker, two days later on June 8, Claude-André Lachance did resign.

In Question Period the minister across the way said he was reappointed. He was reappointed on June 26, but only after the unanimous consent of all the members on that justice committee, representing all three political parties.

I maintain that the precedent was not followed. I maintain that the precedent was wrong in 1984, and still wrong in 1990. Even if it was right in 1984, there was a major difference between what happened on June 6, 1984 and what happened yesterday in the finance committee.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule in favour of these questions of privilege. It affects my privileges as a member of Parliament. We were subject last night to something that was extremely anti-democratic. There was no consultation, and that infringes upon the privileges of all members of Parliament.

We are elected to represent our constituents. We are elected to make their points of view known. We are elected to facilitate debate. We are elected to bring those points of view to Ottawa, to bring witnesses to Ottawa, to represent them in terms of amendments, suggestions, improving or rejecting legislation, which is what we want to do with the GST.

I argue very strongly that the jackboot tactics of the government across the way are wrong in a free and democratic society. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that later this day you will rule that the government and the chairman of the finance committee were wrong in what they did to us, and to Canada in terms of closing off the freedom of speech.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the question of privilege raised by a number of hon. members regarding the chairman of the finance committee and the highly unusual ruling that he made last night, and the fact that the committee sustained him in that rather unique and very unusual ruling.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to remind you or any members of the House that the traditions of this House would be breached in many ways if a motion was deemed to be withdrawn without any consent, that a resolution was deemed adopted when debate was adjourned without a motion to that effect and so on.

It is perfectly clear that anyone who has an inkling of understanding of parliamentary procedures and practices would know what the chairman of the finance committee did last night was completely unacceptable. The point is that we want to demonstrate clearly that fact.

Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to your attention and to the House's attention the fact that authority for a committee is derived from a number of sources. The House delegates some authority to each standing and legislative committee, and some of the parameters of that authority are embraced by standing orders. I refer, of course to Standing Order 108(1) and 108(2), which enumerate the powers of standing committees, and additional powers and mandates of certain standing committees.

In summary, these powers include the ability to examine and inquire into all matters referred to them by the House, to report to the House, to sit when they wish and to delegate all or any of their powers, except the power to report directly to the House.

Also, Standing Order 116 states:

> In a standing, special or legislative committee, the Standing Orders shall apply so far as may be applicable, except the Standing Orders as to the election of a Speaker, seconding of motions, limiting the number of times of speaking and the length of speeches.

I think we would all agree that that does not give much guidance in terms of what is and what is not allowable to occur in a committee. But it does not give carte blanche for the committee or the chairman of the committee to do anything he or she wishes.

It is appropriate that we consider the very first standing order which states:

> 1. In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by other Order of the House, procedural questions shall be decided by the Speaker or Chairman, whose decisions shall be based on the usages, forms, customs and precedents of the House of Commons of Canada and on parliamentary tradition in Canada and other jurisdictions, so far as they may be applicable to the House.

It is perfectly clear that, while all of the rules of procedure regarding committees have not been articulated clearly, they are to reflect the practices and the traditions of this House. The assumption that it is not in a Standing Order does not then allow the chairman of the finance committee to do anything he wishes.

For example, in terms of the traditions of this House regarding parliamentary behaviour of a Chair, the Chair acts always in a neutral way. Mr. Speaker, you would have to be awfully creative in your description of the chairman of the finance committee's work and behaviour to suggest that he ever acts in a neutral way, or I should say that he often acts in a neutral way.

The Chair does not move motions and votes only in the case of a tie. That is an obvious practice of this place. Also, the Chair of a committee examining legislation does not speak to the bill or vote on it. From my judgment, the chairman of the finance committee breaks all these rules, and has broken them regularly.

Let us go to the source, the guide that members of Parliament have regarding chairmen of legislative committees. It is very precise. The House publication entitled Procedural Guide for Chairmen of Legislative Committees, and of course what we are dealing with in a sense is a legislative committee because we had sent this bill to the committee, states: "The rules for time allocation, motions are given thus. Committees nevertheless may at any time by motion adopt restrictions and limits on the number of times of speaking or questioning permitted to a committee member. They may also appoint by motion a day or time at which all questions necessary to dispose of a matter before them shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment".

The guide that directs the chairman of the finance committee clearly states that time allocation in committee is by motion, not by a chairperson's ruling.

I have to ask then, if we do not expect the Chairs of our standing committees to follow some guidelines, some parliamentary procedure, practice, and tradition, are we saying then that anything goes? Will the Speaker ever intervene? Would the Chair intervene if the chairman of the finance committee had ruled and had been sustained on a disciplinary action against a member?

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago my colleagues, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and the member for Nickel Belt, maintain that they were threatened in committee. The Chair gave some indication that if they did not change the nature of their interventions he would have them forcibly removed from the room. Thank goodness that threat was never carried out and the Chair graciously apologized in this House a few days later, in other words recognizing that that type of decision, that type of action was completely inappropriate.

What if he had ruled that the two members be evicted from the committee? Would we not then feel compelled to intervene? Of course, we would.

Mr. Speaker, you must consider that there is a Standing Order which governs time allocation motions before this House, that had the government been committed to allocating time in that committee, there was a legitimate avenue through which they could have proceeded. There is a Standing Order which governs time allocation motions, and by that standing order the government could have approached the opposition parties on Monday of this week, given notice of time allocation later in that day, debated on Tuesday morning the exact motion which was given as a ruling later on Tuesday night. The point is that there clearly is an accepted procedure for the government to use if it wanted to actually curtail debate in the committee.

It chose not to. They chose to use some aberration of the rules, something that my hon. friend for Yorkton—Melville has quite frankly and quite rightly described as rather a dictatorial and jackboot tactic. I think we all agree that we cannot tolerate that kind of behaviour. The committees are an extension and a reflection of the work done in this House. We assume then that they should, as Standing Order 1 indicates, and as the rules that provide guidelines for chairs of legislative committees indicate, that we expect follow the rules, procedures, practices and traditions of this House.

• (1550)

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon, mindful of the difference between a point of order and a point of privilege, and of the proper reticence you would show at any time dealing with matters arising in a committee.

I must at the outset insist that there comes a point when the flagrant and consistent abuse of order in a committee is raised, thereby from being simply a string of questions of order into a larger question of privilege, which is why I submit this matter is properly before you this afternoon.

In addressing the merits of the matter, I would like to start with the very first Standing Order of all our Standing Orders. It is the Standing Order which supplies you, Mr. Speaker, and the Chairs of the various committees with their authority, and it states:

> 1. In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by other Order of the House, procedural questions shall be decided by the Speaker or Chairman—

It is clear that both you, Mr. Speaker, and any chairman of a committee, enjoy your procedural authority in those cases not provided for. I would submit that in the actions undertaken by the hon. member for Mississauga South, the Chair of the finance committee, last night he, to a remarkable degree, engaged in actions abundantly provided for elsewhere in the standing orders.

We must start on the clear basis of Standing Order 116 which states:

> 116. In a standing, special or legislative committee, the Standing Orders shall apply so far as may be applicable—

That is the basis for most of the rules of order in committee.

To examine first the question of the deemed withdrawal of the motion by the hon. member for Ontario: as was already pointed out this afternoon, it is a matter that is provided for in the Standing Orders. It is provided for in Standing Order 64 which states:

> 64. A Member who has made a motion may withdraw the same only by the unanimous consent of the House.

That is the only provision anywhere in the Standing Orders for the withdrawal of a motion once it has been moved. However, as it is there, as it is provided for, it is the procedure that must be followed.

Second, the Chair having deemed this withdrawal last evening went on to say, and I am quoting now from the "blues" of the committee hearing, so there may be some adjustment hereafter: "It is therefore my order as chairman that the resolution produced by the House by Mr. Soetens is deemed withdrawn and that the House proceed and the committee proceed to the following order".

The chairman then went on to make his lengthy and completely detailed time allocation order.

However, there is provision in the Standing Orders for the moving and passing of time allocation orders. It is to be found in Standing Order 67 which states:

> (1) The following motions are debatable:
> Every motion:
> (p) such other motion—as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the House—the management of its business, the arrangement of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment.

Such motions must be made in order to create a time allocation situation and once made are debatable. That is clear. It is provided for in the Standing Orders. I agree that at least in part this is unclear at this point, but if the Chair last night moved a motion of time allocation himself, he would be out of order right off the top because as I note in Beauchesne's fifth edition:

> 411.(1) Every matter is determined—on a proposition submitted by a Member—

—not by the Chair, not by the Speaker, but by a member, Mr. Speaker. So if in fact what he was doing was proposing a time allocation motion it was out of order on the grounds that he was not capable of proposing it as the Chair of the committee.

If, however, he was making a ruling, he was out of order on that count because according to the Standing Orders he exceeded his authority in attempting by a ruling to construct a time allocation situation. Either way, that was beyond the scope of the Chair's authority.

As well, I note in Standing Order 10 it states: "In deciding a point of order or practice, the Speaker" in this instance the Chair "shall state the Standing Order or other authority applicable to the case".

No such authority was cited in the committee last night—none—despite repeated attempts by some of us to elicit a statement of authority for the extraordinary actions undertaken.

I learned after the committee was adjourned that the entire procedure was being founded upon the instance of June 6, 1984 in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As has already been pointed out by the member for Yorkton—Melville, there are clear and serious discrepancies between what occurred last night and what occurred on June 6, 1984.

Even setting that aside, I wish to draw to your attention that a bad decision is not a precedent and that one decision is not by itself a determinant of convention or procedure thereafter. I would submit that what we have in the instance of June 6, 1984 is a bad decision, in fact a decision that the Chair of the committee himself recognized as a bad decision, which he feared would taint the further work of that committee, to use his own word, and for which he felt responsibility sufficient to compel him to tender his resignation having made that ruling.

It would be extremely unfortunate if the House, in its consideration of the goods and services tax here or in committee, felt itself in any degree bound by such bad rulings or in any way accorded to those bad ruling any sort of precedential status.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will end my remarks and wish you the very best of luck in reaching your judgment.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member and I thank hon. members for being succinct. I might indicate to hon. members, so that it may be of assistance to them, I was very much involved in the committee of 1984, as I was at that time a spokesperson on Solicitor General matters for the Official Opposition. I have a vivid memory of events and of course the record is clear. I do not think that members need to concern themselves as to whether or not I have a clear recollection of exactly what did happen.

In listening to the hon. members who have risen, I have a pretty good idea of the essence of the case. I would like the next member to rise to deal directly with the question of in what way any member's privileges have been affected, as opposed to the fact that they may have been inconvenienced or they may have been angered or irritated because there is a distinction and I know hon. members realize that.

The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville raised the issue that was in front of the Speaker a little while ago with respect to an incident in committee and the hon. chairman rose in the House to apologize and that was the end of it. I have never said that there would not be, or could not be, an occasion in which something that happened in committee might not very well be a question of privilege. I have always indicated that it has to be pretty severe indeed, and I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind in their remarks. I am getting a very clear picture of the circumstances and the arguments that are being used and, again, I thank hon. members for being precise.

• (1600)

I will hear next the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Again, I am going chronologically.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I will keep in mind the injunction you made.

My question of privilege arises from what took place last evening when the Conservative majority stomped on the rights of the minority in the finance committee and put an end to the discussions on the GST. My question of privilege has nothing to do with my being irritated; I was not inconvenienced at all. My question of privilege arises from something that is set out very, very clearly in Beauchesne's, fifth edition, citation 1. He cites, on the principles of parliamentary law, and I quote:
