MAIN ESTIMATES, 1990–91

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1991, was presented by the Hon. Robert de Cotret and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table in support of the Estimates, Part I, the Government Expenditure Plan.

I will table with the Clerk of the House on behalf of my colleagues Part III of the Estimates consisting of 73 departmental expenditure plans, with the remaining 14 to be tabled on or before March 12.

These documents will be distributed to members of the standing committees to assist in their consideration of the spending authority sought in Part II of the Estimates.

• (1110)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you have just heard what we have all heard, that in fact the minister today is tabling the estimates in Part III of 73 out of the 87 respective divisions of the Estimates.

In 1983 the Standing Committee of Public Accounts of this House published a report which was concurred in by this House to the effect that Part IIIs were going to be produced for all relevant departments.

Today we are told by the minister that the rules we have established by this House for the tabling of the Estimates have not been followed. He is informing us that 14 of those departments will not have Part IIIs tabled today.

We have just ended a briefing session this morning in a lock-up type format. Until such time as the Estimates were tabled, I was not free to rise on this point of order and to inform the Chair of this shortcoming and this failure on the part of the government to live within the rules.

This morning in this lock-up we asked why the rules of the House have not been followed. The explanation given to hon. members who participated in the lock-up was that the government was aware it intended to make what it considered to be important changes in the area of the Estimates for those 14 departments and it took a conscious decision not to print the Part IIIs.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that the rules of this House, which we have made for ourselves and for the government to follow, are not suggestions. We do not decide that the government is going to follow the rules if it is convenient for the government. The rules are that the Estimates are tabled, Part I, Part II the expenditure plan, and Part III which are the detailed expenditures of each respective department. Those rules are to be observed by the government.

This is not a mere decision that was made by someone at some point in time. This was a decision of the House. It was a report of the standing committee adopted by the House, and since then the Estimates have been printed that way.

Furthermore, the report in question made to this House by the committee of public accounts was made pursuant to a recommendation of the Auditor General who is responsible to you, Sir, as the custodian of our rights in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that the government has failed to live within the rules. Of course we cannot prevent the government from tabling the documents in question for the mere fact that I could not rise in this House and state that the documents were incomplete. I was privy to an in camera decision this morning and I could only do so afterward.

Had I been able without breaking my oath of secrecy, I would have risen on this point of order before the tabling of the documents in question, and I would have prevented them or submitted to the Chair that the documents should not have been tabled. Because that would have been a breach of the secrecy by which I was bound until the documents were tabled, obviously I could not do so.

I make the case to the Speaker now that what has happened over the last few minutes in this House is not proper and is not in accordance with the rules.

Some members across the way do not like the submission I am making to the Chair. It is not a matter of liking or disliking. It is a matter of following the rules that we have set forth for ourselves. If we decide collectively in the future that we want to change those rules, that we want to abandon having Part IIIs of the Estimates, I would resist that, but if the House decides that in its collective wisdom I will have to live with the decision that was made. Until such time as this House changes the rules, the government has to obey the rules that were made.

Mr. Speaker, you are the custodian of our rights in this House. I make the submission to you, that the government has failed to observe the rules that we have made. An hon. member across the way asks what I want. It is not a matter of what I want, it is a matter of what is right and what has to be done in accordance with the rules that we have set for ourselves.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to the point of order very briefly. My hon. colleague has made a very articulate presentation with regard to the decisions that this House has taken, and the fact that the document tabled just a few moments ago did not conform to that.

I would ask that Your Honour review the particular instances cited by the member, and at some point report back to the House as to whether or not the government, in fact, has violated the rules of the House and issue whatever appropriate instructions you may find to the government to ensure that if indeed it has broken the rules of the House by not tabling all of Part III, there be some process put into place to ensure that next year the government not be allowed to get away with only tabling part of the Estimates.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to intervene for a couple of moments on this point of order. It is my belief that the government has in fact fulfilled the rules of the House. What the rules of the House require in the tabling of the Estimates is that Part IIs be tabled which we have of course complied with.

I also wish to inform the House that it is not our intention not to proceed with the Part IIIs. They will be printed at a later date and will be in the hands of the members on or before March 12.

We believe that we have been consistent with the rules in tabling what we have tabled today and do not think that in any way have we violated the process.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to consider the point raised by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and joined in by the member from Thunder Bay—Atikokan. I will also, of course, take into account the comments of the parliamentary secretary. I shall return to the House at an appropriate time and remark on the issue that has been raised.

At the moment, I do not think that I have any authority to stop the government from tabling those parts which they are doing. As a consequence, whatever the rights or wrongs of this point may be, can be settled later. We do have to proceed with the tabling as it is. As I say, I will come back to the House with my comments at an appropriate time.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this, although I would be inclined to because I just had the same frustrating experience as my colleague from the Liberal side. I think I heard the parliamentary secretary indicate that the departmental Estimates will be available by March 12. The rules specifically say that they should be available by March 1.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt an hon. member rising on an important matter but the point of order has been made. I have indicated that I will give it very careful consideration and report back to the House. If the hon. member has another point of order, of course I will hear him. Is it another matter?

Mr. McCurdy: I want to point out that the parliamentary secretary stood in his place and indicated that the departmental Estimates would be available by March 12. I just want to indicate to the Speaker that under Standing Order 81(4), the rules require that those be available by March 1, not March 12. If the parliamentary secretary is indicating a promise to break the rules then that is a serious breach of the orders of this House.

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker: I should point out that the Estimates have now been tabled. The information documents are the ones that are still waiting. I will take into account the hon. member's intervention and consider that also.

Mr. Boudria: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member if this is a different point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, of course I will hear it.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Minister of Justice said that we are going to see what happens to government bills in the Senate. The reference made was that somehow the actions of the government today are related to an action in the other place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I would like to move, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 81(4) and Standing Order 81(6):

> That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, laid upon the table earlier this day be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows:

Since there is a detailed allocation of the Estimates to various committees and the list is lengthy, if it is agreeable to the House, I would ask that the list be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. minister. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have just tabled the government's Main Estimates for the 1990–91 fiscal year. It is the fifth time I have had the privilege of doing so as President of the Treasury Board, and each time, I have been able to point to new ways in which the government has improved the management of its resources on behalf of Canadians. I am proud of the continuing progress we have made, Mr. Speaker. It is no accident that today, our federal administration is leaner and more efficient.

Mr. Speaker, five years ago, the government proposed a plan to Canadians. The Prime Minister promised Canadians better management of the economy and better management of government operations. I will now tell you what this plan has accomplished so far and how we intend to pursue its goals in the future. At the time, our country had just experienced a painful recession from which no region emerged unscathed. The economy was unstable and federal spending was out of control. To manage the economy, we first had to make substantial improvements in the management of government operations. We knew the government should be more receptive and more accountable to Canadians whose taxes are used to finance federal programs.

We had to make some choices that were at times very difficult, to be able to control spending. We made those choices while respecting the basic values of Canadians. We followed the strategy outlined in November 1984 by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in his Agenda for Economic Renewal and in my government programs and spending review program. The spending cuts announced at the time were a first step towards putting the Canadian government's financial house in order.

[English]

I said then that we had to take a pragmatic and considered approach to reducing government expenditures and that we had to exercise the discipline necessary to ensure sound financial planning. These were the ingredients needed in the 1980s to manage the economy and to manage the government. They are as essential in the 1990s.

Our plan committed us to a program of economic renewal and management reform and we set out four challenges: First, to put our own fiscal house in order so that we could limit, and ultimately reverse, the massive build-up in public debt and the damaging impact of that debt on public confidence and economic growth. Second, to redefine the role of government so that government could expedite growth and job creation rather than being an obstacle to change and innovation. Third, to adopt policies that foster higher investment, greater innovation, increased international competitiveness and a positive climate for growth and new enterprise by Canadians. Fourth, to bring about these changes in a way that is fair, balanced and consistent with the nation's sense of compassion, tolerance and justice.

By making expenditure control and good management the primary focus of fiscal restraint, we are meeting these challenges.

Two days ago, the Minister of Finance presented this House with our expenditure control plan. That plan, coupled with the December 15 package of management initiatives, provides fiscal savings of $19.5 billion. This saves the equivalent of over $2,500 for each and every family in Canada.

This expenditure control plan continues our steady progress towards our goal of restoring long-term stability and good management. It will be the foundation for this government's planning through the next five years.

In his statement, the Minister of Finance described how this government is managing the economy. Today, I want to talk about how we are managing the government.

I would like members to focus on the clear evidence of substantial progress that can be seen in the documents I have tabled in the House today. Part I of the Estimates presents the measures we have taken to control spending and manage the government. Part II provides details of our spending proposals to Parliament.

In 1990-91 spending on federal government programs will rise by only 3 per cent, substantially less than the rate of inflation. This is an improvement even compared to this government's very impressive record of 3.6 per cent annual increases in the five years since the 1984 election.

Let me remind members how significant this management improvement really is when compared to preceding governments.

In the five years before this government took office in 1984, program spending grew by 14.1 per cent annually. In the five years before that, program spending grew by 10 per cent annually. In the five years before that, program spending grew by 17.9 per cent annually.

[Translation]

I think it bears repeating, Madam Speaker, that during the next fiscal year, program spending will increase only 3 per cent.

One of our major objectives is to provide for sound management. To do so, we must strive towards leaner and more efficient government operations.

Thanks to the Expenditure Control Plan, we will be able to save $19.5 billion during the period in question. However, it meant making some difficult decisions, some of which were announced in December 15 last year when I announced in the House a set of austerity measures that would save a total of $1.4 billion over the next three years.

In 1990-91, program spending will represent only 15.7 per cent of GDP. Compare this to 16 per cent for this year and 19.5 per cent in 1984-85! Madam Speaker, it will be the lowest it has been in 20 years.

• (1130)

[English]

A key indicator of how well this government is doing is the change that we have achieved in the operating balance.

The operating balance compares the cost of government programs with government revenues. When program costs exceed revenues the result is an operating deficit. Borrowing is needed to make up the shortfall. More borrowing is then needed to pay the interest leading to an upward borrowing spiral.

This is like a family borrowing to pay for necessities, and borrowing more and more to make interest payments on a growing debt.

The situation in 1984 was severe. So much so, that we inherited a $15.9 billion operating deficit. Put another way, the federal government at that time was borrowing more than $2,000 per Canadian family each year just to pay for its programs.

The government of the day was digging a hole which was ever deeper and ever more difficult for future governments to repair, one that was saddling future generations of Canadians with crippling debt.

There is no more telling evidence of the progress this government has made than the way in which we have turned that operating balance. We have gone from an operating deficit of $15.9 billion to a surplus this year of $9 billion. In 1991, we expect that operating surplus to grow to $12.6 billion, a turnaround since 1984 of $28.5 billion.

Madam Speaker, we are keeping our promise to improve the way the machinery of government is managed. These improvements do not make headlines but they result in large savings for Canadians. You will find the highlights in Part I of the Estimates and I trust that all hon. members will take the time to read the document because it gives evidence of evidence of better, more efficient management.

We have implemented better cash flow management methods. These alone have saved Canadian taxpayers more than $900 million since 1985.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. de Cotret: We have adopted a better way to manage the government's real estate holdings.

Since 1985, sales of surplus properties have yielded $400 million, generating revenues of $200 million and resulting in more productive use of real estate worth an additional $200 million. This is due to joint projects with the private sector and other governments.

The cost recovery program that we instituted contributes to greater revenue equity. We wanted users and other direct beneficiaries of government services to pay their share of the costs involved in these services.

Revenues from cost recovery should amount to $3 billion in 1990–91, almost twice the $1.6 billion they were in 1984–85.

We also sold all or part of 18 Crown corporations which more appropriately belong in the private sector. Since 1984, the personnel of Crown corporations has decreased by 75,000 as a result of privatization, productivity gains and rationalization of operations.

The government will sell its share in Telesat, will privatize Nordion and Theratronics and has also decided to offer the general public direct ownership in Petro-Canada. Furthermore, profitable Crown corporations such as the Canada Ports Corporation, Canada Post, Canadian National Railways and the Royal Canadian Mint will contribute to deficit reduction by paying dividends.

Our new method of management has enabled us to reduce departmental overhead expenses, cut down on paperwork and benefit from technological progress. We have also considerably reduced the number of regulations approved by the government in recent years.

[English]

I would be remiss if I did not take this occasion to comment in greater detail on managing the federal Public Service.

This federal government is no different than many other organizations in the world. We have challenged our Public Service managers to do more with less, with less money, with fewer people but with more responsibilities. I can assure this House that the management challenge is in fact being met. Let me put on record this government's performance.

We have worked to keep Public Service salaries from setting inflationary trends in the nation.

Since 1984, we have negotiated collective agreements that are fair to employees and responsible to taxpayers. Those agreements have been below private sector settlements, below, and in some case well below, provincial settlements, and below the rate of inflation.

Also, we have reduced the size of the Public Service. Since 1985, we have removed 23,542 person-years from departmental authority levels. To meet new priorities and to make sure that health, safety and security were not compromised, we have provided for some 11,000 person-years. The net result is that the Public Service is now 12,377 person-years smaller than it was in 1985–86. In fact, it is now the smallest it has been since 1973.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Cotret: Our approach to managing the size of the Public Service was based on this government's over-all plan to manage better. We are now doing things more effectively.

Over the next five years we will continue to carefully control the size of the Public Service. We will do this because we are committed to ensuring that over the medium term we maintain the balance between federal employment and total employment in the economy.

Let me say that this progress would not have been possible without a dedicated and highly professional Public Service.

Last December, the Prime Minister announced an initiative called Public Service 2000. This initiative will ensure a Public Service that can provide Canadians with the best value for their tax dollars.

In 1984, we committed ourselves to managing the economy and managing the government. Good management is not easy. It requires hard work, tough decisions and leadership. It requires a plan and the will to carry out that plan. This is what this government is doing. Our Expenditure Control Plan, in achieving this reduction, this saving of $19.5 billion, is evidence of our commitment.

We promised fiscal responsibility. This government is delivering. We promised to get the deficit under control, and we are delivering. We promised to cut expenditure growth, and we are delivering. We promised to manage government better, and we are delivering.

• (1140)

I am proud of this government's record. We have acted decisively in bringing about the kind of changes needed to ensure Canada's economic stability, and to ensure that Canadians are able to meet the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, this morning, members of this House had an information session where we were told that the minister responsible, the President of the Treasury Board, would provide us some information today and some later; that the rules of this House were there and that we could follow them when it suited the minister, but when it did not suit him, we could forget about them.

Mr. Robichaud: Disrespect for the House!

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Here is the list in the Estimates with respect to which departments we have little or no details as to what is going on within those departments: CIDA, Communications, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Energy Mines and Resources, Finance, Fisheries and Oceans, Health and Welfare, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Multiculturalism, National Defence, Industry, Science and Technology, Secretary of State, Transport and Veterans Affairs.

Do you know what we know about those departments, Madam Speaker? We know that there are cuts, period. That is all we know. We do not know what programs are being cut, other than the information we received in the one or two minutes of briefing that we got at 10.55 this morning.

We do not know anything that is in the Part IIIs of the Estimates because they were not tabled this morning pursuant not only to the rules of this House, because they form part of the Estimates, but pursuant to directives that this House gave to the government when it unanimously adopted a report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in 1983.

Why is the government behaving this way? It says that the Estimates would have probably been wrong anyway so it was better to disobey the rules of the House. That is Tory logic for you.

If this government did not know that you needed time to print the Estimates between the date of the budget and the date of the Estimates, well then why in blazes could it not have brought in the budget a few days earlier to give it time? You would think that it is someone from outer space who came here to present the budget, totally divorced from the government. The ministers are only one seat away from each other. There is approximately one or two inches between the chair of the minister responsible for the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance. Maybe they could speak to each other, or correspond if they are not on speaking terms.

Either way they could ensure between the two of them that they live within the rules we have adopted in this House and the rules which governments successively have followed, including this government in the past.

Now that this government is in its second term, arrogance is setting in.

Ms. Black: Setting in?

Mr. Boudria: My colleague says: "Setting in?". Maybe it was there all along, but it certainly has reached new depths as this second term is well under way.

The degree of arrogance is inversely proportionate to the popularity of the government. As of this morning, the government has a popularity of something like 19 per cent. Only the member from Madawaska could find that funny.

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: It is even lower where he comes from!

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, we know that the government's reserves in the past were about $3.4 billion. This year, the government has chosen to play with the figures a little. So they decided arbitrarily that the reserves would be reduced to $2.3 billion.

This morning, my colleagues and I asked Treasury Board officials how they could live with that amount. They said that they would be very thrifty. But those are the reserves, Madam Speaker. They are used when there is a drought in the country, when there is a fisheries crisis, when, for example, there is economic hardship in Saskatchewan, when the people on the west coast have difficulties, especially those who work in the fishing industry. These scenarios are quite possible this year. What will the government do? It will not even have any more reserves.

By reducing the reserves, the government claims to be cutting expenses. Either some people will suffer a lot this year because there will be no funds in the reserves to deal with such unforeseen situations or the budget estimates presented to us today mean absolutely nothing because they will not be adhered to in any case.

[English]

Let us look at some of the cuts in the Estimates in detail. We have a budgetary comparison between the Estimates of last year and this year.

You will remember during the election campaign the Conservative party said that it was going to establish a separate department of forestry. Most Canadians would have thought that that meant more money was going to go into forestry. Not so. You see, you have to think like a Tory a little bit here. You create a department and take away the funds. That way you can pretend that you live with the promise while doing the exact opposite.

So what did the Tories cut from that? They have cut $47 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: It was just a lot of window dressing!

Mr. Boudria: The hon. member for Beauséjour (Mr. Robichaud) says it was window dressing, and he is right.

[English]

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is a subject that has been raised in this House very eloquently by our colleague for Hamilton West. We see a cut here of $2.9 million.

Let us look at the National Capital Commission, an agency whose mandate is to make this city a better place. I remind the minister that in a previous incarnation he used to be the member for Ottawa Centre. It was a very short career that he had as the member for Ottawa Centre at that time. But he will recall in his days when he was the member for Ottawa Centre that it was his job to ensure that this city was a capital for all Canadians. Now, of course, he has changed constituencies, and the budget for the National Capital Commission is proportionately reduced.

The Secretary of State's area is one in which we see those major cuts of $5.45 million. That is one of the areas in which Parliament does not know what is going to be cut, save and except one or two lines in the budget of the Minister of Finance, the seat-mate of the President of the Treasury Board.

With respect to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship's department, our colleague for the Western Arctic indicated to us yesterday in this House just how wrong those kinds of cuts are. Nevertheless, the government is proceeding with those cuts in the area of $121 million.

The Western Diversification Program is being cut by $1.39 million. I say to the minister he, like I, must have seen and heard over recent weeks media reports of the terrible tragedy going on right now in the province of Saskatchewan with the loss of population and the tremendous economic losses. There is suffering going on in the province of Saskatchewan right now, and they desperately need help.

Let us turn to the cuts in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. If there is any group in this society which needs to be cut, then this group should be the last to suffer any kind of cutback.

I have the honour and privilege of representing a native community in the House, the Akwesasne Indian reserve, which is located partially on Cornwall Island in my riding and partially in the constituency of my colleague, the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry. We see a cutback in that area of $1 million.

In the area of Energy, Mines and Resources we have been made aware of the cuts in energy conservation and other very vital programs to which the government itself says that it is committed. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean often speaks eloquently of how he and his government are pretending to defend and protect our environment. Yet we are seeing these cutbacks in areas such as energy conservation, and others.

My colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has often raised questions in this House on the very important topic of Employment and Immigration.

[Translation]

The Canadian Jobs Strategy will suffer cuts totalling $15 million. The cuts in summer programs for young people are totally unacceptable. This year, my riding will get 10 per cent of what it received the year before, 10 per cent! A 90 per cent cut! And the same applies to Ottawa—Vanier, Carleton—Gloucester and several other ridings in the National Capital region, including Ottawa—West; a 90 per cent cut! Are young residents of the National Capital region supposed to do without summer jobs? How are they going to pay their tuition fees next fall? This is the same government that only two or three weeks ago was bragging about its strategy for keeping youth in school. I find that hard to understand, Madam Speaker.

[English]

In terms of National Health and Welfare, it was described to us this morning in a very summary fashion, because of the limited time, that there were going to be cuts in the alcohol and drug rehabilitation programs. That is what we were told at the Estimate briefing.

Ms. Black: At one minute to eleven!

Mr. Boudria: My hon. colleague says that that was at approximately one minute to eleven o'clock. That is the time that we were finally given the information.

We know, and it was said yesterday in this House, about how the transfers to the provinces will result in potential cuts in hospital beds. That has been made very clear. We all know how strapped the provinces are in trying to offer quality health care. With a cap on funding now from the federal government how will they do it?

In the area of Employment and Immigration that I mentioned a few moments ago, I just want to get back to one further point. I want to refer to the area covered by Bill C-21, that famous bill introduced by the government which will cut back on benefits to my constituents and others. The government cuts back on benefits involving unemployment insurance. That, in turn, will increase the welfare rolls. Do you know what the government says to the province of Ontario, Madam Speaker? "Don't you dare increase welfare payments because we are capping your payments".

Who causes the welfare payments to go up? The federal government, by decreasing unemployment insurance benefits. So the government is pulling back from unemployment insurance. It causes welfare to increase and then refuses to pay its part of the bill under a contractual arrangement that it has with the provinces. It has put a cap on. It says: "If your benefits increase more than 5 per cent, tough luck, provinces."

What are the provinces going to do? They have to increase taxes of their own, or they are going to ask municipalities, which in Ontario for instance pay 20 per cent of the bill, to increase their share.

When this government claims that it is living within its means, that it is doing a proper job and that it is not increasing taxes, all of those things are false.

First, in the area of increasing taxes, we all know that the GST, which is referred to in the budget that was introduced only a couple of days ago, will result in an extra $1 billion a year in revenue. That is one tax.

Then we know from the minister's statement this morning about the so-called dividends of Crown corporations. So what do you do? Canada Post, for instance, increases the price of postage stamps. You take the revenue generated by the increase in postage stamps, call it a dividend and return it to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That is a tax on postage. Call it what you like, that is what it is. That is another tax.

Then you cause the provinces to increase their taxes as well by cutting back on your contractual obligations with them. So the provinces have to increase the tax for the federal government.

I have just given three instances in which taxes are increased. And there are a lot more, of course.

There are countless ways in this budget, as well as in the effects of previous budgets which are just coming into force now, in which there are tax increases. So it is not accurate to state that there are no tax increases.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, in concluding, I would like to mention briefly some major cuts in the acid rain sector, where about $20 million in funding will be slashed. As you know, this is a very important issue in my riding and the riding represented by the minister, and I am thinking of our mapletrees which require positive measures by all governments if they are to be saved, and when we see these cuts—

[English]

Let me say in conclusion, as one of my colleagues told me only a few moments ago, this government always wants to compare itself with the private sector. If this government were the management team in any Crown corporation or in any private corporation for that matter, the shareholders would have turfed them out of office a long time ago. Judging by the present popularity of the government at 19 per cent, that is exactly what will happen.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, it is reported today that the standing of the government party is at the lowest level of any government party in the history of Canada. I would think this reflects the good sense of the Canadian people. Ordinarily, polls are passing things that reflect reaction to one or two events. This morning we are seeing a poll that represents the reaction of Canadians to the sustained ripping at the fabric of Canada by this government. That shows wisdom.

This is a government that prides itself on efficiency, good management and God knows what all. In so many ways it offends its claimed status in that respect.

As I understand it, and I am not as experienced with this as my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, it seems to me that it is self-evident that the Estimates are tabled in order to give us some insight into the details of the changes in expenditure patterns that are contained in the budget.

I could not have imagined a greater farce than was experienced by those of us who were attending the lock-up this morning. Quite frankly, the lock-up was a total waste of time. All of the information we got in the lock-up we could have gone out in the hall and screamed to high heaven and nobody would have found a bloody thing new in anything we said because no new information was provided to us.

Ms. Black: Which was deliberate.

Mr. McCurdy: Whether it was deliberate or not, I do not know. We were crowded into a small room in which it was not even possible for all of us to sit at the table to gain the information necessary to exercise our critical judgment in respect to the information provided to us, had there been information provided to us.

But, Madam Speaker, if you consider where the greatest changes occurred in this budget, I would just like to reiterate what my colleague indicated earlier. We were denied 13 Part III Estimates, the detailed departmental estimates, for CIDA, Communications, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Energy, Mines and Resources, Finance, Fisheries and Oceans, Health and Welfare, Indian and Northern Affairs, Multiculturalism and Citizenship, National Defence, Industry, Science and Technology, the Secretary of State, Transport and Veterans Affairs.

This is inexcusable. This is an outrage, not just to the opposition, but to the people of Canada that they are denied the kind of critical judgment that should be imposed on what this government tables as the Estimates which is supposed to reflect the detailed patterns of expenditures represented in the budget.

Subsequently, at three minutes to eleven, at our request, because no effort was made to make it possible on the initiative of Treasury Board to provide us with the information or to provide us with the resources to get the information, we began to get a notion of why it was necessary to obscure from us the detailed information.

When we asked Health and Welfare representatives about the detailed cuts, we discovered, for example, that there was a $2.7 million cut in expenditures for alcohol and drug programs, cuts to the funded drug strategy, cuts in the response of this government to what the Prime Minister described as a drug crisis in this country.

You probably listened to the radio this morning and yesterday, Madam Speaker, and learned that we are sending Canadians to California to be treated for drug addiction. At the same time, we have the spectacle of a $2.7 million cut here.

Remember the promises with respect to child care? We learned $1.7 million is cut from child care initiatives, $3.5 million cut from the seniors independence program and $3.9 million cut from health research.

We queried the Secretary of State about the $23 million cuts in the budget. There was no information provided to us to find out what these cuts constitute. We did not get all of the information but, the member waved around a couple of pieces of paper and told us that the women's program is being cut by $1.6 million and the youth program is being cut by $6.4 million. I guess in the absence of a true Minister of State for Youth—Madam Speaker, I know this is very pertinent for you—the government just chopped off $6.4 million. The Canadian university program was eliminated and aboriginal programs cut by $9.8 million in ways we do not even quite understand. We do know that native newspapers are going to be eliminated.

We were rushed into a tightly crowded room and denied specific information because this government, quite evidently, would be embarrassed by an announcement, at this stage of the game, of the details of the expenditures. The government would rather wait until some weeks have passed, particularly next week when no one will be around here, before leaking out bit by bit the information on the 13 departmental documents of which we have been deprived.

Some have called this the "Pass the Buck Budget". It is a budget that was, as my colleague indicated, announced in the context of no tax increases. Never mind the $7.6 billion increase in collected income taxes resulting from last year's actions. Never mind the GST that begins next year. Never mind the cuts in unemployment insurance benefits that will mean increased costs at the municipal level for welfare expenditures and the increased premiums the cities will have to pay. Never mind the hundreds of costs that are going to be devolved upon the municipalities ultimately and be paid for by the hugely regressive tax on property.

The government washes its hands, like Pontius Pilate, as the costs devolve on those least able to pay. But, $2,500 is going to be saved by everybody as a result of this budget. It is very easy to hide averages among 25 million people but, I have a sneaking hunch that the greatest benefit is going to go to the usual people on behalf of whom this government works. The government describes the result of this budget as follows, and I quote: "The rising standard of living and the quality of life second to none in the world will be achieved as a result of the Budget tabled yesterday".

This budget is hugely dependent upon certain presumptions about interest rates over the coming year. Even as I stand here, the markets around the world are anticipating yet higher interest rates. We will have a chance to get this right for the next budget, the corrected budget, that the Minister of Finance will undoubtedly have to take. I hope that the President of the Treasury Board will arrange a room with sufficient seats, that he will provide us with the detailed estimates, the Part III estimates for all the departments so at that stage of the game, we can judge what is going on.

The interest rates are a very important aspect of this. If he is off by 1 per cent, that is $1.5 billion cut from the $225 that people are supposed to be saving all around the country as a result of this budget. It borders on the ridiculous.

I would like to go back to the issue about the rising standard of living and look at the some of the presumptions in this budget, some of the goodies, the real good things in this budget, that give the Minister of Finance so much confidence in our future. There will be a mounting level of unemployment. When you fight inflation from the point of view of these people, that is good news. Increase unemployment. That relieves the pressure on inflation. That is good news. Even better news is that the average wage increases will be below the level of inflation. That is good news. When people are poor they will not buy as much and that will bring down inflation. That is all good news. This government has so much good news.

When you read the budget and consider the scenarios described in terms of making Canada more competitive, remember the mounting rate of unemployment and the decrease in the rate of increase in real wages. These are good things. It is also a good thing that there will be a decrease in the final domestic demand so we will not import as much. The good news is that we are importing machinery so that we can get our oil, coal and wood and ship it off to somebody else.

Of course, Madam Speaker, you understand that what is at issue here is that this government has absolutely refused to recognize that this country cannot compete as a low wage economy as the government would have us do. You question whether that is really what this government is thinking about. The government brags because it is only cutting back $39 million in research and development. This is a cut-back in an already inadequate rate of expenditure. If you really want to see the commitment of this government to a shift to a manufacturing and knowledge-based economy in lieu of a resource-based economy, look at what is being done to Established Programs Financing. The EPF transfer cut-backs have already reached a level of nearly $8 billion as a result of this budget. This has severely hurt our capacity to produce educated, creative graduates of institutions of higher learning which are necessary if this country is to shift its directions to create a high wage economy.

The Prime Minister gets up on any number of occasions and says, "Oh, my God, there has to be something done about education. We are going to take some new initiatives, we are going to have a task force. We are going to make everything all right". It is not all right when students face higher tuitions and the universities are in scandalous shape. I point out in parenthesis here that in addition to these sharp cut-backs in university operational support, they are being hit in a variety of other ways. They are being hit with huge licensing costs for the use of radioisotopes to the extent that universities, as well as the high schools, are going to be driven to abandon an area of teaching in science that is necessary if we are going to produce educated graduates.

Nothing this government does seems to be consistent with any other pattern than the commitment in the free trade agreement to make us the resource pool for the United States and a target for acquisition by all the other countries in the world so long as we remain a low wage economy. It is absolutely outrageous.

Then we have what is going to happen to medicare. In Vancouver, and in Windsor particularly we have a citizens' movement that makes it possible for people who are denied critical health care and heart treatment in Canada to go to Detroit. Sixty per cent of the people cannot get into or near a hospital to have their operations, because so badly has our health system deteriorated already yet more cuts have been imposed. Again, it is an outrage.

One does not have to look at the Estimates to see that this budget is a travesty. It breaks every reasonable promise to Canadians, such as we will continue to have a high quality of life in this country.

I could go on repeating descriptions of cuts but these have been reported widely. They have been criticized widely. They have been condemned by most Canadians except those who are going to benefit and it continues to be those who are wealthy.

This government wanted to make cuts in expenditures. But it should not make them in EPF, not in welfare payments, such as the cuts in the Canada Assistance Plan at a time when the actions of the government are going to impose greater and greater burdens upon the cities and towns of this country to make up for the shortfall. It had money to waste. Just weeks ago it had government money to waste; $161 million for Boeing, $14 million spent to sell the GST that no one wants. It will cost the government $1.2 billion to cover the increase in the deficit resulting from last week's interest rate rise, $350 million for RRSP top-ups for the very wealthy, those making over $86,000 a year. There were ways to cut the budget without hitting ordinary people and without threatening the very future of this country.

My leader has identified what is really wrong with this budget. We must emphasize the budget because the Estimates do not tell us a heck of a lot that is not in the budget. My leader has pointed out the real serious problem and it is the threat to the future of this country, not only in economic terms but in social terms. The civilized fabric of this country is being attacked by this government. Yet we ask why is there so much evidence of dissatisfaction and conflict in this country? It is because of this government's budget as reflected in the Estimates. I promise you, Madam Speaker, that if you are to preside over a future House it will be with a much diminished number of Progressive Conservatives.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member of Westminster—Burnaby on a point of order.

Ms. Black: Madam Speaker, my colleague from Windsor—St. Clair spoke very eloquently about what happened in the lock-up this morning.

I rise on a point of privilege about what happened in the lock-up this morning. I was in there for an hour and one-half. We got no information on the program cuts. I was in there for an hour and one-half. I asked specific questions about the cuts to women's programming. I asked specific questions about the cuts to—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, I will have to interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member is describing something that did not happen in the House. It did not arise from debate this morning. Henceforth, the hon. member would have to give notice to the Chair of her point of privilege stating what it is about. I cannot entertain at this point in time the hon. member's point of privilege. It did not happen in this House and did not arise from debate this morning.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that the hon. member gave you notice of her intention to rise on a question of privilege. It is not my understanding that it is normal practice to provide the details.

I have been privy to the information that the member wishes to raise and I can say categorically it is impacted by the tabling of the Estimates in this House today, the Estimates which are incomplete in the sense of Part III, and which the Speaker will be reviewing. The member's point is separate with regard to her ability as a member of Parliament to properly advise her constituents. That is the matter which she wishes to raise.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is the opinion of the Chair that to raise this question of privilege would require at least an hour's notice, and the letter or note sent to the Chair, should contain at least some indication of the manner in which the hon. member considers her privileges have been breached.

I don't think the note I received a few minutes ago is sufficient reason to interrupt the proceedings for a question of privilege on something that happened outside the House.

If the hon. member would care to send the Chair a more detailed note, she could raise this question of privilege after Oral Question Period.

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1989

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-290, an act respecting fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to introduce this bill today, which I think is important given the debate in this country on budgets and transfer payments. It is an act respecting fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces.

The purpose of the bill is to impose on the federal government an obligation to ensure that any amounts paid by it pursuant to any new shared cost programs are used in accordance with that particular program.

It is important because of the allegations that have been made, particularly in my province where the Social Credit government uses health and education money to pave highways, and the concern Canadians have over what allowed this to happen, the Liberal's six and five program. This bill ensures some responsibility in this Parliament to Canadian taxpayers that education and health money is spent on education and health.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

PETITIONS

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the responsibility to present a petition from people residing in Valrita, Harty and Longlac. They are very concerned about a recommendation to do away with the system of tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

Because of the hardships suffered by northern residents, including a harsh climate, the high cost of living and transportation and a lack of services, they ask with good reason for this recommendation to be thrown out and that the $2.5 million likely to disappear remain in the riding of Cochrane—Superior.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, following in the footsteps of my articulate friend and colleague, I am tabling today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, two petitions from residents of Lebel-sur-Quévillon concerning recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Beñefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

The petitioners, who represent an isolated community, are very concerned and reject the recommendations in this report which would result in many lay-offs among other things. They believe that the Canadian government has failed to recognize the harsh reality of their daily life in the North.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions on the issue of protecting VIA Rail. Members of the House may wonder why these petitions are being presented now that the government has already taken steps to gut VIA Rail across Canada.

My constituents on Vancouver Island managed to defend their little section of VIA Rail by taking the Government of Canada to court and ordering the government to continue the operation of our VIA service as one of the conditions by which British Columbia entered Confederation.

Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions from Courtenay on Vancouver Island, Parksville, Qualicum Beach and from other centres on Vancouver Island. The petitioners are concerned that the government is now attempting to sabotage the service that it has been forced to operate by raising fares, undermining the quality of service and generally driving passengers away. This gives some idea of how competently the Conservative government has been able to manage VIA in the past. I would appreciate the opportunity to table these petitions which are all duly certified under Standing Order 36.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, like two previous members I have a large number of petitions here from residents of my constituency, the towns of La Ronge, Ile a la Crosse, Cumberland House, Pinehouse and other points in northern Saskatchewan that implore the government to not implement the recommendations of the task force report on northern tax benefits but rather to extend those benefits into the future for those communities, recognizing the very high cost of living in those communities and recognizing the fact that many people will be forced to seek employment elsewhere, robbing those communities of a lot of the professional business talent and so on that they need to develop and keeping in mind that the proposed goods and services tax will inflict a much greater burden on those communities than on other communities. This is one way in which they could be compensated for those additional costs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): I have another petition signed by over 700 people from my constituency of Prince Albert, Shellbrook, Meath Park and other points in northern Saskatchewan.

It calls on the government to immediately withdraw the proposed goods and services tax or as it is referred to there, the grab and steal tax. They recognize the impact that it is going to have on their cost of living and the impact it is going to have on the ability of families to pay their bills. They ask that the government withdraw this tax immediately and bring in a fair taxation system that is going to allow Canadian families to pay their bills in the future and not be devastated by the tax burden.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Finally, I have a petition from Edmonton and communities around Edmonton. These people are protesting the low-level flights which have taken place over Innu lands in Labrador. They call on the government to withdraw from the agreements that make those kinds of flights possible, to stop the plans for low-level flights over British Columbia and Saskatchewan, including my constituency, and to redirect NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's original people to regain control of their lands and of their livelihood, and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to present some petitions from our good friends in northern Saskatchewan to show us that there is unity across this country against the goods and services tax and to show that they are against this majority uncaring government. They want to assure the government that the fight will go on. It is particularly timely now as the budget presented in the last couple of days suggests there are no tax increases. Canadians know better.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 51 minutes.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and on the amendment of Mr. Young (Gloucester) (p.8636) and the amendment to the amendment of Ms. McLaughlin (p.8644).

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, I stand today to speak on the budget and the motion made by the minister. I have to go back a bit and look at the history of this government and think about what has in fact happened over the time that the Conservatives have been the managers of the economy. If I were to give them a rating on management, it would be a pretty low rating. As a matter of fact, if this government was managing a company, it would have been fired a long time ago. However, that is not the case as it is managing the Canadian economy.

I would like to bring a statement forward to the government. I quote:

> The growing public debt has become a severe handicap to the economic progress and the most serious obstacle to economic growth.
> High deficits and growing debt will increasingly undermine confidence and put pressure on interest rates and reduce the prospects for growth in this country.

That statement was made by the Minister of Finance in 1984. Today, after five years in office, and against the background of an economy that turned out to be stronger than envisaged in 1984, the net public debt has grown dramatically.

The staggering federal debt figures prove that the government, despite protestations to the contrary, has failed miserably to address the problem. Virtually every measure it considered unacceptable in 1984 has been surpassed today. That statement was made by the Chamber of Commerce a short time ago when they made representation to the finance minister on 1990–91 budget.

People right across the country have voiced their opinions about the ability of the government to manage. We know a Gallup poll came out today which showed only one in five Canadians will support this government and the way it has managed the economy. The Angus Reid Poll last week suggested 21 per cent. Again, one in five Canadians would support this government. Four out of five Canadians oppose measure after measure that this government brings forward. Why? What is the reason? What has gone wrong with the management of this country?

Every time I turn around in this House I am told that we have a problem that was inherited from a Liberal government six budgets ago, and the government is unable to cope with it.

Day after day, week after week, year after year, that has been the message. Let us investigate what the statistics were in 1984 and what the stats are today and how a government with a majority has dealt with that huge problem it inherited, and how it has handled the economy in six years of total control. Remember, a government with a majority, as it has had, should be able to machine anything through it wished, set any policies it wished, carry the deficit as far it wished, add debt to this country as it would, and get away with it.

In 1984, the total revenues for the federal government were was $70 billion. Today, total revenues for the federal government are $120 billion. That is $50 billion in tax increases in its five-year tenure. The debt in 1984 was $170 billion. Today, $350 billion. It doubled the debt.

The payment on interest on the debt in 1984 was $22 billion. Today, it is $40 billion. The government has doubled that interest payment on the debt.

But it is really interesting to note that for six long years, this government has had total management of the economy. What has it done in that six-year period? It blamed the Liberals day after day for six years, saying it inherited a problem. However, it doubled that problem and severely curtailed its ability to handle the debt in this country. Through 31 tax increases of over $50 billion, it has run the taxpayer of this country right to the brink and maybe beyond in some cases.

The income tax levels spoken by people who have come into the finance committee, spoken by manufacturers across this country, talked to by economists, have reached their upper limits. There is no more room to add income tax to the Canadian taxpayer. They have decided not to raise income tax because the Canadian taxpayer cannot afford more. However, there is an index policy which automatically brings it up quietly and underhandedly.

Excise tax, the sin tax that we talk about on gasoline and alcohol, was increased to the limits. People in my riding and in my area who live in border towns are driving their cars across the border and filling up with Canadian gas in Detroit and in other border towns because the tax on gasoline in our country almost doubles the price. The same Canadian gas bought in Detroit can be purchased at half the price of gas bought in Windsor.

There is a problem with our tax structure. The manufacturers' sales tax, the killer of jobs according to the Minister of Finance, has been raised and raised until it was two and a half times as large as it was when he took office. Therefore the remedy is a new tax and the GST was brought in, a GST which will solve all the problems. It will be the biggest tax grab placed upon the Canadian public and it will be put in place during the time this budget is in force.

The government has come in and said it is introducing a budget with no new taxes. What a shock. It has taken income tax to the highest limits possible, taken our excise tax to the highest limits possible, introduced a goods and services tax to outrageous levels—we will climb and climb and climb—and now it comes in and says, no new taxes. What a change! But Canadians know there are new taxes.

I could just sit back and think about that cabinet meeting when it was decided to develop the "no new taxes" line. Somebody is sitting back there scratching his head. He is thinking, "Well, you know, we have taxed this Canadian public as high as we can tax them. Every interest group in this country is telling us, don't add more taxes to us. What can we do?" Then somebody came up with, "Let the provinces pay our bill. If we stop living up to the commitments through our transfer payments with the provinces, they can take $2 billion, $3 billion, $4 billion, maybe even $7.5 billion off our debt which will make us really look good. We have been trying to get below that $30 billion debt figure for five years. If we have the provinces pick up a portion of that, we can bring it down to $28.5 billion debt and that will look good on us."

However, the Canadian public realizes what this government has done. Everybody that pays taxes in this country pays to municipal governments, to provincial governments and to the federal government. If the federal government shifts taxes to the provincial government, it still costs our taxpayer the same number of dollars. What this budget has done is shift a huge tax from the federal government to the provincial governments.

The Premier of Ontario suggested that $495 million extra will be required by the province to meet its needs. He also stated that the federal budget will take food out of the mouths of kids in Ontario because problems have been moved from his government to the provincial governments. Ontario is not the only one to suffer.

The Minister of Finance, through his strategy, has done one thing. He has united all the premiers, united them to speak against his budget, united them in anger because they know a huge problem that the federal government has built over the last five years has been transferred to the provincial governments who must now deal with it. That is a shame. It is a shame because where a province has been a good manager, where a province has done the very best to be honest with the public and raised taxes in accordance with expenditures, these provinces are being penalized. All provinces across this country are going to suffer that penalty from this budget.

When we look at that shift, we certainly cannot think that is fair in any respect and yet it is a strong shift that this government has done. They have changed focus now to get below the $30 billion deficit and have the provinces and municipalities pay for it.

Just look at a couple of the specifics within this budget, that are going to affect groups in this country. The transfer payments to the provinces are going to add a great deal more burden to our health care systems. I come from the Essex County-Windsor area. There, Madam Speaker, we have had a great deal of pressure on our health care system. I know that there have been special arrangements made by the Ontario government for people who are having particularly chronic problems to be transferred from the Windsor area into Detroit for health care services because the Ontario government does not have the services available for them.

I know that there are shortages and long lines for hospital beds in many areas of Ontario and those shortages and long lines for beds go across this country. One action by the Minister of Finance, and we end up making longer lines, making greater shortages or asking the provinces to put in millions upon millions more to make up the difference. A neglect of an agreement that was made by the provinces, therefore, is coming directly down on the heads of those who are ill, those families who need very critical health services.

I kind of smiled as well, but it is a serious matter, when we look at the headline in the The Ottawa Citizen, "Vets At War With Michael". How on earth can a budget come down on the heads of veterans, hospitalized veterans from the First World War, the Second World War and from times in the past, who served this country offering their lives where need be? Now we are going to tax them in their hospital beds. That is a real travesty of taxation but it shows the low levels at which taxation can arrive at times. It shows that we do not meet the needs of all of those. Certainly I for one feel very badly that the veterans have been even thought of as another area of revenue.

I also have a student who is going to the University of Ottawa. I realize the need for post-secondary education in this country. We have talked about post-secondary education and research and development as the means by which we can get away from being drawers of water, as a means by which we can get away from the lower levels of jobs and raise our people into high-tech and high opportunities for the future.

The answer that this government has provided for students in post-secondary education, the answer that they have provided to research and development is to cut severely into the ability of this country to produce what we so direly need and that is a higher tech society—a society that can compete on a world basis.

When we heard the UI cuts, we heard there was going to be training for people. We are going to put that into place so that people who are displaced will be retrained. I haven't seen any evidence of that happening. We were also told during the free trade debate that we have to change from being drawers of water and hewers of wood to a society much better able to handle high-tech areas of this world. Yet the government cut research and development. It cut post-secondary education, which means it cut our future. It cut the future of those people who are able to develop higher skills. That is a travesty.

Let us look at the welfare program and the cuts or caps there. We have been hearing for months about the slowing down of the economy. The signs are very clear. Auto workers are being laid off in my region. Many, many people are having a lot more difficulty securing jobs than before. We have seen difficulty after difficulty across this country. There is a crisis in the maritime provinces. British Columbia has had a fair amount of suffering in the fishing industry as well. We know that the farmers in the prairie provinces are in a disastrous situation. Unemployment insurance rules have been changed, or are in the process of being changed, so people who become out of work will get less benefits than they would have just a year ago. Those cut-backs in UI are there when we are coming into a very difficult economy. What do we see? We see the federal government's obligation to the provinces being capped. In other words, it is telling the provinces that this huge problem of slow-down, created by high interest rates and mismanagement of monetary and fiscal planning, is going to come down on the heads of the provinces, because they are going to have to carry the extra expenses.

It is a real travesty when we realize that more people are going to be out of work in this country, as clearly stated by the Minister of Finance. The government has cut back its UI support. It is now cutting back its welfare support. Who is going to pay the bill? At least the provinces are caring governments. They are going to have to carry those expenses. It is a shame that this government, through mismanagement, is dropping that responsibility on the provinces.

When I mentioned the crisis across the country, this budget is glaring in the fact that it did nothing to deal with the Atlantic fisheries crisis; the farming issue in the west, or in Ontario; or the auto industry and the manufacturing slow-downs. The agri-food business has been put under tremendous stress through the free trade agreement and the government is neglecting that responsibility. By cancelling the Polar 8 ice-breaker, it again adds to unemployment in British Columbia.

As we go down the list, it creates its own crisis and difficulty, and then pushes it off somewhere else. It certainly is an unacceptable situation when I see all these things coming up. There is also the housing crisis and the CBC cuts causing a communication problem throughout this country.

We, as Canadians, are upset with the management of the government. The people of this country have a very clear, strong message to give to the government. With the polls indicating 20 per cent support, they are telling the government that it is doing a terrible job.

Mr. Lewis: It is 19 per cent this morning. Get up to date.

Mr. Pickard: I am averaging my 21 with your 19. The two latest polls give you 20 per cent and that is right up to date.

However, the point is a very clear one. This government is a terrible manager of the economy.

Mr. Wappel: Madam Speaker, may I just begin by congratulating my colleague on another of his excellent and incisive analyses with respect to the Conservative government making our society stray from that which is right and just.

By way of comment and question, I want to ask my colleague a very simple question. I would like him to comment on a particular part of the budget, and that is the very first paragraph in the budget book in which the Minister of Finance indicates and I quote:

> Since 1984 this government has been following a consistent and comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians can benefit from a rising standard of living and a quality of life second to none in the world.

I ask my colleague this question. In Canada today we have high interest rates, a crisis in the Atlantic fishing industry, a 24 per cent illiteracy rate, and the largest debt in the history of our country. As the hon. member pointed out, under this government, increasing poverty is evidenced by the increasing number of food banks springing up across this country, increased taxes on ordinary Canadians and decreased taxes on the corporate elite. Would the hon. member be kind enough to comment on how the Minister of Finance could possibly have the gall to make the statement that he did?

Mr. Pickard: I thank my hon. colleague for the question. I think he keys in on something that is very relevant to the arrogance that we have seen from the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board when they present that they are on course with an over-all process which is going to enhance our nation and that Canadians are better off. We have gone through six years of very prosperous times and some good economic growth which was not expected to be as strong. What happened within the whole process of growth and prosperity is that the government has set us on a disastrous course of huge debts and huge deficits. Michael Wilson said in his forecast in 1984 that if we followed the Liberal line we would end up at such and such a level of debt and deficit. Instead, we followed this government's line. Here is a statement made clearly by the Chamber of Commerce, normally a strong supporter of this government:

> The staggering federal debt figures prove that the Government, despite protestations to the contrary, has failed miserably to address the problem. Virtually every measure it considered unacceptable in 1984 has been surpassed.

This says that maybe it did set a course in 1984 to destroy the country. That is the only answer I can give when it says it is still on course and doing well with the economy. It has increased taxes. It has increased the debt. The interest payments on the debt have doubled. I really do not understand what course it set and what course it is on. It seems to be a course of disaster by a master.

Mr. Fontana: Madam Speaker, let me also take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague from Essex, near London, for his fine presentation on this very important and serious matter, the discussion on the budget. I want to ask him one question.

He has been very insightful in his analysis of the budget and the government's management performance over the past six years. We all know the budget is very much predicated on some assumptions, such as assumptions of growth rate, unemployment rate, interest rates, and so on. The minister obviously has to take into account what the performance of our economy is going to be in 1990. It is clear that not even his most favoured buddies and most favoured clientele in the Canadian constituency agree in fact with his assumptions, especially as they relate to interest rates. Would my colleague from Essex—Kent give us more information with respect to those assumptions and how inaccurate or how wrong they may very well be.

• (1300)

Mr. Pickard: Madam Speaker, again I thank my colleague for the question.

Our interest rate situation is a very difficult one. The reason is that we are in an economy that basically has borrowed, borrowed and borrowed. The Government of Canada is the largest borrower in the country. It is in a situation where it has borrowed tremendously not only from this country but from many others.

I quote an article in The Ottawa Citizen of today. It relates to James Gillies' warnings that Canada's worst nightmare is not the net debt, but that it will be growing at alarming rates from $350 billion to $406 billion by 1991-92. The article continues:

> The real killer, he says, is the foreign debt of $250 billion—which on a per capita basis is the worst in the world.

The worst foreign debt in the world has been built by this government. It continues:

> Our foreign debt is the most of any country in the world on a per capita basis—And of course, we are running a $20 billion deficit in our current account. When you get a big deficit, you have to import capital.

To get capital you have to maintain high interest rates. Our high interest rates are therefore there to bring in foreign capital to prop up our foreign debt. It is very clear that we have to be cautious about who is buying Canada. From the policies that are going on, this is a disastrous course.

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Speaker, I just heard the hon. member mention a debt of $250 billion built up by the government. I am sure he would want to correct the record by first acknowledging that when the government came into power in 1984 the debt in the country was $200 billion.

Mr. Fontana: No. Stop inflating that.

Mr. Nicholson: The interest on that is another $120 billion just on what the Liberal Party left us in 1984. That is $320 billion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nicholson: Does the hon. member ever talk with his colleagues about this? Some of them are pretty quiet such as the member for Winnipeg South Centre or Mr. Chrétien who is running for the Liberal leadership. I know the hon. member will agree with me that they are not too worried about this deficit but it is interesting the hon. member said that he is so worried.

Has he ever had this discussion in his caucus, asking why did they let this happen? I know the hon. member will agree with me when I say that we would be in a lot better shape today if we had not inherited a $200 billion debt in 1984 and if we did not have that $120 billion that we have had to pay in interest since then.

The hon. member's concern is very interesting and nice to hear, but has he ever talked with any of his colleagues in the Liberal Party? They have been as bad as the socialists in encouraging government spending.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, it is true. They have been as bad as the socialists in encouraging the Government of Canada to spend money it does not have. I put that to the hon. member.

Mr. Pickard: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comment from my hon. colleague on the other side. I would like to correct him on a couple of points that he made.

I was quoting a $250 billion foreign debt.

Mr. Oberle: Where did you get that? It is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Pickard: That came from an article, as I pointed out clearly, in The Ottawa Citizen. It was Professor James Gillies who was commenting on what is happening to the moneys going out of this country and the foreign groups buying in. That was where that figure came from.

I will go back to the 1984 budget figures.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the period for questions or comments has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to take part in this debate and to express my views on the measures contained in the federal Budget.

If we are to have a constructive debate on this Budget and some appreciation of all the nuances and subtleties it contains as well as the actual measures it proposes, I think we should consider the Budget in the context of the economic situation and the budgetary realities facing us today.

One aspect I would like to mention right away is the fact that the Budget contains no tax increases. It is the first time in living memory that a federal Budget has not proposed tax increases, and whatever certain opposition members, whose judgment is often clouded by political partisanship, may say, this Budget contains no tax increases. Canadians sent us a clear message. They asked us not to raise taxes and to cut spending, being equally aware of the major problem the deficit and our national debt represent for the economic future of our country.

Despite the fact that we have cut the annual growth of the debt from 24 per cent to less than 10 per cent since 1984, the debt is still growing faster than the economy. Our public debt has grown from $200 billion in 1984 to $350 billion this year. Eighty per cent of this increase consists of the compounding interest on the $200 billion which our Liberal friends left us as their legacy in 1984. We must not forget that the current budget deficit, contrary to what some people would have us believe, is not the result of uncontrolled government spending but was caused by the monstrous debt we were left by the previous Liberal government, combined with the incredible imbalance between that government's revenues and expenditures. That was the situation we inherited in 1984, and we have been working very hard ever since, with today's remarkable results.

In 1984-85, the government had an operating deficit. Program spending exceeded revenues by about $16 billion. This means that when we came to power in 1984, the government spent $16 billion more than it received in terms of tax revenue, and it was necessary to borrow those $16 billion.

Today, in 1990, this balance is now positive, with revenue $9 billion more than program expenditures. This means that now we do not spend more than we take in. On the contrary, we spend less.

This turnaround of $25 billion in the operating balance brought it from a deficit of 3.6 per cent of gross domestic product in 1984-85 to a surplus of 1.4 per cent in 1989-90.

Madam Speaker, I believe that it is also important to add for the benefit of Canadians and members of this House that 70 per cent of this improvement is due to cuts in spending.

Canadians sent us a clear message: they are ready to tighten their belts, the people are prepared to make an effort so that together we can repair the irreparable, but they demand that their governments and their representatives make a concrete effort to reduce expenses and that governments live within their means.

And the Minister of Finance and this government got the message. That is why this Budget contains no tax increases but rather a significant expenditure reduction of about $7 billion by 1992.

It is important to remember that this spending cut contained in the Budget is in addition to the one announced last December by the President of the Treasury Board which provided for major reductions of about $1.4 billion over the next three fiscal years.

• (1310)

The purpose of these measures is to eliminate waste, to make operations more efficient and to save money. For example, Madam Speaker, federal construction projects have been frozen, travel by parliamentarians and officials has been restricted, some parliamentary restaurants will be closed, two government jets are being sold and several government agencies are being merged or eliminated altogether.

Madam Speaker, those are courageous, concrete and responsible acts to give back to Canadians what our predecessors unfortunately endangered.

Madam Speaker, the deficit is a national problem. It requires a national solution.

If we want to restore the public finances, provincial governments must do their part, in the same way that they will benefit from lower inflation, declining interest rates and sustained economic growth.

The deficit cannot be reduced significantly without affecting transfers to the provinces. These transfers are too large a share of federal spending to be left out.

Let us look at the situation of transfers. In the fiscal year that will end soon, transfers of cash and tax points to the provincial governments will exceed $35 billion and these transfers have been growing faster than federal programs in general.

Transfers to the provinces have grown at an average rate of 6.5 per cent since 1984–85. Throughout that period, increases in total federal program spending were kept at an annual average of 3.6 per cent, which means below the inflation rate.

This year, 35 cents of every revenue dollar will go towards paying the interest on the debt. The provinces, on average, spend only 12 cents on servicing the debt.

If the federal government does its duty by keeping spending increases down to around 3 per cent, it would be hard to imagine allowing provincial transfer payments, for established programs financing in particular, to maintain a growth rate of 6.5 per cent.

The February Budget reflects the fact that transfer payments to the provinces cannot keep increasing at the same rate, if we are to achieve our objectives for reducing the deficit.

As part of the Expenditure Control Program set forth in the Budget, provincial transfers are expected to grow by an average of 3 per cent over the next two fiscal years, about the same rate as total program spending.

The Budget also reflects the specific needs of lower-income provinces. Federal transfer payments are expected to increase by an average of 2.3 per cent in higher income provinces and by about 4 per cent, during the next two fiscal years, in lower-income provinces.

The decline in the growth rate of provincial transfer payments represents about 1 per cent of total provincial revenues. Federal support to the provinces remains very substantial, nevertheless, and total transfers will continue to increase, reaching over $36 billion in 1990–91. The poorest provinces will receive a proportionately larger share of these transfers.

Madam Speaker, the spending restrictions we must impose if we are to deal effectively with the deficit and our national debt, require some difficult and very serious decisions. However, they reflect a concern for fairness and justice that ensures the provinces will not be unfairly penalized.

Madam Speaker, the Budget proposes a wide-ranging program aimed at controlling federal spending for two years. I shall, if I may, mention some of its components.

Although the Expenditure Control Plan will affect certain areas of program spending, major transfers to persons will be exempted.

In other words, the budget cut-backs do not apply to benefits for the elderly, family allowances, veterans' pensions and allowances, unemployment insurance benefits, and Canada Assistance Plan equalization transfers to poorer provinces.

Ever conscious of the views expressed by most Canadians, we want to maintain our social benefits and show that even if the fight against the deficit calls for stringent measures we can and we must do that without compromising our major social programs.

The growth of a number of programs has been limited to 5 per cent for the next two years. This applies to Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces—Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta—and to expenditures for science and technology, Indian and Inuit programs, as well as foreign aid and defence.

Other programs will be held at the 1989–90 levels for the next two years. With respect to Established Programs Financing, total per capita cash and tax transfers to the provinces will remain constant. These transfers will continue to grow with provincial populations.

Some programs have been reduced or eliminated. The government will not proceed with the offer of assistance to the OSLO oil sands project. The Canadian Exploration Incentives Program has been cancelled, and the government will not proceed with the Polar 8 icebreaker project.

Business assistance has proved to be very useful, but the government will take a more business like approach. With limited exceptions, grants will be eliminatd beginning in 1990—1991 and federal assistance will be repayable on more rigorous terms. The emphasis will be on economic development rather than private sector subsidy.

The Budget also listed, Madam Speaker, a broad range of measures to make government operations more efficient and less costly. We will continue to privatize Crown corporations and to sell shares in those which are no longer necessary to achieve public objectives. Also, to increase the return on public investments and to reduce the deficit, profitable Crown corporations will have to pay the government more dividends. The 2 per cent ceiling on annual increases in government operations and maintenance budgets will also be extended until 1994–95.

Together with the initiatives announced in December, these measures will yield savings of about $3 billion in 1990–91 and nearly $4 billion the following year. Total savings of over $19 billion will be realized in the next five years.

The Budget thus brings the deficit back to a declining curve, without tax increases. We are acting now so that the government's financial situation in the 1990s will make it possible to support the programs to which Canadians are most attached.

The measures presented in the Budget will lower the deficit to $28.5 billion in 1990–91 and cut it in half, to $14 billion, by 1993–94. The following year, the deficit will go down again, to $10 billion. The excess of operating revenue over program expenditures will reach $31 billion. Program spending will fall to 14.2 per cent of national income, the lowest level since the late 1960s. The national debt will start decreasing relative to the national income. The government will begin to pay down its bonds and Treasury bills.

Both collectively and individually, Madam Speaker, Canadians must commit themselves to building a sound and productive future on strong foundations. To that end, we need a government with the necessary financial freedom to monoeuvre and maintain the important services and meet the new challenges head on. We also need a dynamic economy to ensure an increase in the standard of living and a widening of opportunities for a full and satisfying life. We need a country which is mature, economically sovereign, perfectly competitive and the master of its own destiny.

Canada has the natural resources, the capital, the human resources and skills needed to prosper in a competitive world. However, our ability to determine our economic future is seriously compromised by inflation and our increasing indebtedness.

Our economic strategy and the positive steps we have taken in this Budget, in accordance with this strategy, clearly put within our reach a decrease in inflation and a progressive reduction of the deficit. Perseverance in our efforts will make it possible for us to determine our future better and use a larger share of our income to improve the standard of living and quality of life of all Canadians.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I just cannot overlook the words of praise which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has received from Mr. Bernard Landry, a highly respected and credible Quebecer, who stated, as reported yesterday in La Presse, and I quote:

"Under the circumstances, this excellent budget is an amazing feat. Mr. Wilson is certainly the best Minister of Finance Canada has ever had."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robitaille: The Minister of Finance has received words of praise from everywhere. The Minister of State (Finance) who is here can bear witness to that. I suggest that with respect to this budget, the Opposition cannot be right against everybody else.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a few questions of my hon. colleague. Since the budget in a real sense reflects the mind, heart and muscle of government, I did not see any heart for the poor, the sick, the youth, the seniors and the veterans. I see, in fact, no mind or vision for the future.

Would my hon. colleague not admit that were we as a country to be competitive, we truly have to have educated Canadians, literate Canadians, healthy Canadians? How can he expect ill and illiterate Canadians to compete in the coming century? How would he reconcile the increasing health care problems in all the provinces, and the need of the injured and the ill to have access to hospital beds, nurses, doctors and therapists, yes, how would he reconcile the needs of today with the budgetary cuts that this government has undertaken in the wrong departments?

There is a second point I would like to comment on before he stands to answer those specific questions. I would like to submit to him that when the government says there are no new taxes, this is only a way of being sneaky and less candid with the Canadian public. The transfer of payment cuts to the provinces are equivalent, and this is not original as the 1989 edition of the book, Canada, the State of the Federation did say that the transfer of payment cuts to the provinces are equivalent to increasing taxes—a sneaky way of increasing taxes without telling the Canadian public quite candidly.

Second, would he tell the House why taxation by surcharge is allowed to continue? This is also equivalent to increased taxes because by definition surcharges ought to be only temporary. We would also like the member to comment that since the GST, if enforced by this government by January 1991, will take effect within the current budgetary fiscal year, why then those GST not be new taxes to the Canadian public. I would like the hon. member to be candid to the Canadian public, to be candid to the ill, the sick, the youth and the poor. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his comments. I almost needed a tape recorder to catch everything he said. In any case, I will try to respond to all his questions and comments. When he told us here in the House that he found it hard to find any heart in what we are proposing, I think the hon. member failed to understand our message.

Obviously, there are a number of challenges facing this government. When he talks about the need to fight illiteracy and to deal with health care costs, the hon. member is perfectly right. But I would say that the biggest handicap and the greatest threat to all these programs remains the extent of our national debt and our deficit. The Liberal Party left us to deal with the public finances of this country in 1984-85. I may remind the hon. member that it was his party, when it was in power, that left us this mortgage on all our social programs. When we take measures to control spending, to reduce the deficit and, within the foreseeable future, to reduce the national debt, this is still the best guarantee anyone could wish for maintaining the effectiveness of our health programs.

The hon. member seemed rather upset or suspicious about my statement that there were no new taxes. I repeat: the federal Budget has no tax increases. There are none. When the hon. member says that the Budget will lead to tax increases at the provincial level, I may remind him that the provinces do not necessarily have to increase taxes. They have the alternative of engaging in the same exercise as we have initiated at the federal level, and I am referring to better spending control. I repeat that if we manage to keep our spending increases down to 3 per cent at the federal level, we can hardly let transfer payments increase by 6.5 per cent. I think that would be inconsistent.

As for the GST, Madam Speaker, I am sure we will have a chance to discuss this subject in greater detail.

However, I simply want to say that the GST gives the Government of Canada a certain revenue stability and it provides for a fair distribution of the tax burden among all Canadians, and that this series of measures, the Budget, previous budgets and all other measures that have been taken will make it possible to achieve a better fiscal balance, reduce the deficit, control the national debt and thus guarantee the continued existence of our programs in the future. We must realize this.

[English]

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, I commend the member for the delivery of his speech. I cannot say too much for the content.

• (1330)

I know he took great interest in the by-election in Chambly and I know he would like to take the opportunity when he gets on his feet to congratulate the new member for Chambly and congratulate the New Democratic Party in the Province of Quebec and also Canada. I know he is very eager to do that.

In this deficit discussion I notice that the Liberals suggest it is the Tories fault and they throw it back. However, I suggest that both parties share in the blame and there is no sense going back and forth. I think both parties should equally share in the credit for the deficit. Only the New Democrats have not shared in this deficit production.

Let me speak about the financial commitments of 1988. We have not reflected too much on the election lately, but it was crystal balled at that time that there were no problems whatsoever with the financial commitments of the government, and there was no mention of deficit. However, for the last several months all we have heard from this government, is "deficit, deficit". Why all of a sudden? What happened immediately after the election that we became pre-occupied with deficit?

The member mentioned concrete cuts and we are also interested in concrete cuts, but I understand in the lock-up this morning that it was very general, very vague. I would be interested in the member's comments about how concrete the cuts are and how specific they are.

As far as the "no tax increase", surely the member would agree that there is only one taxpayer and whether he or she pays taxes at the municipal, provincial, or federal level it is a tax increase regardless, and there are not going to be cuts across the board or else we will do without hospital beds and education.

To end my comments, I will just ask one question. Should not each sector be responsible for his or her own governments, own area, or own department? Should not the federal government have become responsible for its own area and not shift the blame to the other levels of government?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A very short comment from the hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, as for the election in Chambly, I think that the hon. member cannot doubt that— Yes, I welcome the new member for Chambly, but I am eager to hear him explain his position on Meech Lake. We are waiting for it here.

In his little talk, the hon. member said—for which I thank him—that the Conservatives and Liberals seem to be accusing each other back and forth and that the New Democratic Party is the only party not involved in creating the debt. I think that the hon. member will recall very well what the New Democrats did when we had a minority Liberal government, what orientation it gave to the Liberal Party, which might not have been strong enough to stand on its own two feet then. Furthermore, luckily we never had a New Democratic government in power because, hearing them talk in committees, calling for new programs, new services, wanting to run people's lives and decide what is good for them, I assure you that the bill would be quite a bit higher than it is now.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I must interrupt the hon. member; the time for comments and questions has now expired. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Axworthy).

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in a budget debate an opposition has a couple of key responsibilities. One is to clearly criticize and point out the flaws in the document presented by the government. Yesterday, we saw our own critic for finance do a superb job of analysing the lack of credibility and the lack of forthrightness in the minister's statement that there are new taxes, there is going to be a continuing deficit, perhaps a worse one, and that the premises of the entire budget are suspect.

As the days proceed, we will find other members continuing the very important task of holding the budget up to light and letting Canadians take a hard look at just how weak the document really is.

This afternoon, I want to present what I think is another responsibility of opposition, and that is to present Canadians with a choice, to present them with alternatives, to have them look at a different kind of economic blueprint, a different kind of economic statement that could have been made, that should have been made, and might have been made with a different government, a government that would have a different set of values, a different outlook, different premises, different assumptions about what is happening in the country, what the priorities are, and what is important.

As much as a critique is important, so is choice. Canadians must be given the opportunity to understand that there are different ways of managing the economy of this country, and certainly of presenting a blueprint and design for Canada that will stand us well in the future.

Every member of Parliament, as we turn this particular decade, was visited with all kinds of material about the 1990s and the vistas beyond. We should all be aware that what is going on in the country does require some direction and some sense of purpose. In our case, a budget is simply more than an accounting sheet of expenditures and revenues, it is more than simply totalling up taxes and outlays.

It does represent a direction, a purpose, a blueprint and that is, in large part, where our debate should focus. It is important to me because perhaps this budget more than any demonstrates the clear distinction in philosophy and political belief that is polarizing this country in part but certainly setting out major distinctions.

I also think it demonstrates the lack of reality and the lack of sincerity in coming to grips with the very substantial underlying strategic problems taking place in this country.

Let me just present a couple of examples. We are a country that is increasingly finding itself built on two levels, a split level society. The Economic Council said it best. I cite the Economic Council because certainly no one could ever accuse it of being a Liberal think-tank. In its latest report "Good Jobs and Bad Jobs, it states that the regional disparities in Canada are growing wider, that as we go into a service economy, close to 78 per cent of all new jobs will take place in four or five major urban centres.

That leaves a lot of Canadians dispossessed. It leaves a lot of regions of Canada on the outside. It leaves a large part of this country totally outside the job market. How did the Minister of Finance deal with that in his budget? He basically shut down regional development programs. He took the regional development agencies like Western Diversification, ACOA, and others and turned them into lending agencies. They are no longer development agencies. They are now banks. If you are big enough and have enough assets, sure you can get a loan. But if you are a small entrepreneur in a small community in the Atlantic or in the interlake of Manitoba you do not have the same capacity. You need a start-up and that will be denied.

Rather than offering at least some small semblance of gesture toward regional disparities as outlined in this document of the Economic Council, the Minister of Finance goes in the opposite direction. He does not seem to be looking at that reality that is staring him in the face that we are a country where most of the growth and activity is concentrated in one, two or three major urban centres.

That has enormous portents for the future of this country. It means the idea of building a country from sea to sea where there is a sense of belonging in every single part of Canada gets erased. The message is that you have to be in a big city, or one or two big cities in order to prosper.

While I am at it, let me point to another reality as presented by the Economic Council. It points out that the job market in the last five or six years has substantially altered, and that about half of all the new jobs, which this government is always standing up and being so proud about, are temporary, part-time jobs.

Mr. Nicholson: No way.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It says it in the document. I would suggest that Conservative members learn to read, because there it is. I cite it: "Good Jobs and Bad Jobs, published by the Economic Council of Canada. Forty per cent of all the new jobs are part-time placements or temporary jobs. Not only that, but the disparity in income is growing wider. Look at this figure in terms of the so-called income base of the middle class of Canada. It has gone down from 34 per cent to 29 per cent in a matter of about eight years.

• (1340)

The middle class is shrinking and we are getting one job market for highly skilled, high techs or service stock broker-type people who get high incomes, the BMWs, the fancy condos, and the expense accounts in Florida, but people in the other parts of Canada are suffering and their incomes are dropping.

What do we see in the budget document? What we see actually written in the document is that the Minister of Finance is predicting an income decline for Canadians. That is something we should take confidence in? In the document itself the government is predicting that there will be a personal decline in income.

Along with that reality of the growing disparity in incomes, which the minister does not address at all, is the growing burden of the taxation which falls upon the middle class, which is seeing its income drop. Those are not my figures. They are from the Economic Council of Canada.

So the middle class is losing income and paying more taxes. In the meantime, as the budget document itself points out and I cite specifically documents of the government itself—the Economic Council and the Department of Finance—which also point out that in the last five years, since 1984-85, the corporate burden of taxation in relation to the revenues of Canada have fallen from 13.5 per cent to 10 per cent, and the personal income of Canadians have gone up about 10 per cent or 15 per cent, which now represents close to 50 per cent of all the revenue.

That is a serious reality about this country. Again, I put to this House, what has the Minister of Finance done about it? What we have seen is that he is cutting back on those programs that would provide some assistance and adding taxes, for example, a consumption tax, which will fall heaviest on those middle income people, and relieving the corporations of another $9 billion worth of taxes.

Surely, looking at that reality in black and white, one would have thought there would have been a different budget presented, that the Minister of Finance had a responsibility to recognize that this was a new reality in Canada, a Canada in which there is a growing disparity, a growing gap, a growing separation, and a growing feeling that a lot of Canadians no longer count and are being pushed to the sidelines.

We have had a debate in this House and there is a lot of consternation in the country about the outgrowth of certain regions or communities that are becoming anti-French in some ways, or anti-Canada. Part of it is based upon an economic reality that they no longer feel they have a stake in the country. It is related to this economic reality. If you are losing your job, income and industry, you will lash out at people. You get angry and mad.

So much of the responsibility of this budget is to repair the fabric of Canada as much as it is to deal with dollars and cents. Yet I saw nothing in the budget that was prepared to deal with this kind of reality.

Mr. Parent: They don't care.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Maybe they do care. But maybe the Minister of Finance has become so fixed and obsessed with just one reality, the thing called the deficit, that he is ignoring the other realities of a country that is slowly tearing itself apart economically, and therefore socially and politically as well.

Let us look at another reality that is not addressed in this budget. We hear countless times about the talk of globalization, how we are now players in the international marketplace, how we have to make ourselves competitive and productive and show that we are able to meet the demands of the new international marketplace. I agree that is an incredible challenge that we face. I do not think it is a matter of partisanship to say that we are all in the boat together and everyone wants to see this country succeed.

However, let me return to the budget document for a moment and refer to a little known figure that was not drawn out or emphasized. Certainly, the Minister of Finance did not reference it in his speech. In this coming year alone, we are facing a current account deficit of $20 billion. We are becoming indebted to foreign countries. We are increasingly allowing our economic rights to be taken over outside the borders of this country so we will no longer be maître chez nous. Every single hour that we sit here over $3 million leaves this country. If you want to look at some striking figures, back in 1965 foreign indebtedness in relation to our Gross National Product was 17.9 per cent. In 1988, that had jumped to 21 per cent. About 38 per cent of our GDP is now in foreign debt.

Why that is important is it comes down to one final truth. The reason for our high interest rates. Because of the escape of capital and money from this country, the outflow of dividends, the outflow of paybacks, the outflow of that kind of money we have to have high interest rates to artificially entice further capital in. We are now paying the price for decades upon decades of foreign ownership and the resulting capital haemorrhaging that is taking place in Canada.

We used to be able to pay for it by a surplus trade balance. Back in 1984, the last year of a Liberal government, we had a $20 billion trade surplus. Do you know what the trade surplus was last year in 1989? It was down to about $4.6 billion. What we used to be able to pay through our merchandise trade, the sale of our grain and our resources and our manufacturing, we are now desperately losing.

I only have to remind you, Madam Speaker, that this is in the era of free trade. This is one year after we were promised by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and the Minister of Finance that free trade was going to open up new trade opportunities, bigger markets and larger growth. Instead it has shrunk, it has fallen, and we are now in a serious crunch in terms of our trade surplus and even more desperately in terms of our foreign exchange position.

That is a problem that no government can ignore but this government does. It does so with effrontery and arrogance to the extent that yesterday the Minister of Finance in Question Period said that we are going to persist with a high interest policy. The position of the Government of Canada is high interest rates. A high interest rate will keep the dollar high, the dollar will stay high and therefore our exports will fall, therefore we will have less money to pay for the $3 million an hour pouring out of this country. We are in a vicious circle. We are chasing our tail and the Minister of Finance does not deal with it in one sentence in his budget.

He does not care about the fact that this country, day by day, hour by hour, is becoming more indebted to foreign markets, to foreign banks, to foreign investors and therefore weakening our ability to be a significant independent player in international trading markets.

Is that a sense of responsibility? I go back to my first remarks that it is time Canadians knew that we needed a different kind of budget.

Let us take it one step further on the grounds that we are so deeply concerned about that international marketplace. What is the primary criteria for competition in that marketplace? Every single examination conducted by the Economic Council, the Conference Board, Bank of Canada says we must become innovative and creative. It is going to be information skills and knowledge that will allow us to compete.

What do we have in this budget? How is the Minister of Finance responding to that challenge? I will tell you how he is responding. He is responding by cutting back on higher education. He is responding by cutting back on research and development. He is cutting back on the very elements of investment that would make us strong and competitive. How can this government stand up with any nerve at all and say: "Hey, folks, we gotta become competitive, productive, smart and creative" when we are cutting back on our universities, cutting back on our research and development and totally ignoring the necessity for this country to get into the mainstream, to say nothing of totally contradicting the commitments made by the Prime Minister at the big meetings on education and the commitments made on research and development? That is what gets cut.

There is one exception and I would like to point it out. One part of the budget which still retains a large amount of funding, over $250 million, is the defence industrial productivity program to give grants to industry to make weapons, to make armaments, to fuel the arms race.

What are The Economist, the Washington Post, French magazines, German magazines or Russian magazines all talking about? They are saying that we are now living in an era where the arms race is coming to an end and that every country should start thinking about a peace dividend. How do we start re-orienting our budgets in this new age, to re-allocate it to training, to education, to research? How do we make the country stronger? Not by stimulating further arms investments, but given the chance for the first time in 45 years to re-orient our society, does this government understand that reality? Is there anything in this budget that acknowledges that to be the case? A defence budget of close to $12 billion; DIPP funding of $250 million.

I am not saying that we go and slash and hack away at the defence establishment. We need a policy. We should be talking about conversion. There are other things that we could be doing. We have argued now for a year, since the last budget, that there are all kinds of creative possibilities in which we can use those defence moneys. We can do it in terms of our own sovereignty, developing Summerside as a peacekeeping centre, these sorts of ideas. But the government has nothing in it, there is not a thing. So it is business as usual at a time when every other country realizes that there is a dividend to be achieved and we are failing totally in meeting that possibility.

It seems to me that there is another way, another option, another choice that Canadians could have seen in this budget that would have given us a lot more sense. We should have a creative Minister of Finance, rather than one who simply thinks that the deficit is the only thing that counts.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There will be three minutes available to the hon. member after question period, should he wish to conclude.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Association des prospecteurs du Québec feels that the decision of the Minister of Finance to abolish the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program is a catastrophy for the financing of mining exploration in Canada.

The APQ points out however that the Minister has chosen to maintain the flow-through share scheme which allows for 100 per cent of the exploration expenditures incurred by the corporations to remain transferable to the investors.

The APQ feels that the administrative decision of the Minister of Finance is bad, in view of the total funds invested during the program implementation and start-up period, and that this decision was not based on the cost-effectiveness and efficiency of the program.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I know that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of Canada and his officials have worked very hard to maintain this program and that this decision is simply the Minister of Finance's decision and his alone.

With all the prospectors and the mining industry of Quebec as a whole and Abitibi in particular, I will continue to strive to eventually obtain justice for them both from the Quebec and federal governments.

[English]

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in his single-minded pursuit of the deficit the Minister of Finance makes only passing reference in his budget to the government's commitment to sustainable development.

Three years after publication of the Brundtland Report this government has not rallied enough political will to act. For example, the Minister of Finance fails to see the importance of exempting from the goods and services tax products approved as environmental friendly, of introducing a carbon tax on consumption on fossil fuels, of changing the policy on fossil fuel megaprojects except for cutting the subsidy to OSLO, of shifting research and development funds to advance renewable resources of energy, of making a financial commitment to complete the national park system promised by the Minister of the Environment, of providing support programs to stabilize communities affected by the fisheries crisis, of strengthening Canada's research capability in the environment and so on.

In Ottawa, the gap between rhetoric and action is getting larger. Will the government ever act to implement sustainable development?

VETERANS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I rise to condemn the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Veterans Affairs for raising board and lodging charges for veterans in long-term care and cutting services provided to the Veterans' Independence Program. These two measures will enable the Minister of Finance to raise $35 million over the next two years, coming at the expense of veterans who are already living in poverty. He ghoulishly attacks defenceless veterans.

The government says the increased charges for residential care are means tested. Mr. Speaker, the incomes test for single veterans and married veterans is half of the poverty line. Once they are over half of the poverty line they have to pay $420 a month for their food and lodging. Veterans who live below the poverty line should not have to pay more for food and lodging in government long-term care facilities. In fact, veterans should not have to pay anything. The proposed cuts in the Veterans Independence Program is designed to allow veterans not to have to go into long-care homes. They are making their cuts, forcing veterans to go into long-care homes. Shame on this despicable action by the government.

An hon. member: Bring back George Hees.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the budget this week took steps to dismantle another universal program, the Canada Assistance Plan. This cost-shared program provides social and welfare assistance to persons in need and many other essential social services. By bringing in a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan the government has said there is a limit to funds available for social services. The finance minister cites the high growth rate of programs in the have-provinces as evidence that the cap on CAP is needed but seems to ignore the possibility that those programs grow because the need for them grows and the federal government has entered into an agreement to provide assistance for these programs.

Having now capped CAP in three provinces, what will be needed to do so in a have-not province? Just the implementation of the government's national day care system in one province might bring the need for 50 cent dollars above 5 per cent.

In another way, the minister indirectly reduces federal CAP spending by freezing the established programs financing for all provinces. With less money in the provincial coffers the provinces will be harder pressed to generate their own contributions to the cost shared programs under the Canada Assistance Plan. This in turn will eliminate federal spending under CAP and federal responsibility to those people most in need and least able to speak out against such measures.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, Prince Edward Island suffers a tremendous economic handicap compared to other Maritime provinces, which I attribute to the ferry crossing which effectively provides a barrier to trade, economic development and tourism.

Even before the impact of Summerside, P.E.I. had an unemployment rate 30 per cent higher than New Brunswick. It had an unemployment rate 50 per cent higher than Nova Scotia. The P.E.I. average income is the lowest in the Maritimes. Transfer payments per capita, are the highest. Youth unemployment runs at 25 per cent, which explains why so many young people must leave P.E.I. to establish careers.

I believe the only reason for these inequities is the ferry crossing. I predict that the fixed link will correct this situation, but at the same time the P.E.I. government cannot control such growth to comply with the wishes of Prince Edward Islanders.

I urge all those in favour of this project to prepare and present their positions to the environmental review panel hearings beginning on Prince Edward Island on March 19. My Amherst office will be pleased to provide assistance with any of these applications.

SASKATCHEWAN CURLING CHAMPIONS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the 1990 Saskatchewan Provincial Curling Champions. Tina Ford and the junior girls team will be competing in the National Junior Girls Championship in Sudbury. The Saskatchewan men's champ, Jamie Schneider, won the world junior championship in 1984, and will soon be competing in the Canadian Men's Championship.

The woman's champ is the two-time Canadian finalist, Michelle Schneider, who is representing Saskatchewan for the third time in Ottawa this week.

I take special pride in the accomplishments of these two world-class curlers, not only because they hail from Kronau and Regina, Saskatchewan, but because they are my cousins.

I wish their competitors luck. They will need it.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to decry the decline of western economic diversification under this government. When this party was in charge of western Canada, we managed to put in $1.6 billion of economic development moneys in the early 1980s.

When this government took over we heard said: "We do not like these programs, but don't worry". Right before the last election they said: "We are going to spend $400 million".

Well check your stats today, guys. You spent $75 million. The next year the government said: "We are going to spend $253 million in the west". Well, check the stats. You got only $130 million. The next year they tell us again they are going to spend $250 million. They have walked away from western Canada.

On Tuesday, the Minister of Finance announced a decrease in transfer payments to the west of over $2 billion. So the west is now at a net loss in dealing with this government. Next time around, westerners are going to tell this government what they think of its economic development strategy.

HYDE PARK CHEMICAL DUMP

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, recent newspaper reports say there is growing apprehension on the part of many people regarding chemical emissions from the Hyde Park chemical dump near Niagara Falls, New York. Located on the bank of the Niagara River this dump is the home of the largest single quantity of TCDD, the most toxic strain of dioxin in North America.

A recent study scheduled to be released soon will apparently show that the levels of dioxin build-up in the fish in Lake Ontario are not as significant as those originally estimated by U.S. government officials.

Many fear Occidental Chemical Corporation, the owner of the dump, will use these findings as a lobbying tool in an attempt to have regulations regarding the emissions of dioxins at the dump relaxed.

I ask the Minister of the Environment, using whatever means he can, to ensure that the U.S. government does not relax dioxin regulations at the Hyde Park dump, and in fact, remove this hazardous chemical wasteland from the Niagara River area.

S. O. 31

FISCAL RESTRAINT

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, if we want our children to have the kind of future we wish for them, we must continue reducing the deficit. Spending restraint is the key to Tory deficit reduction.

• (1410)

Since 1984 we have taken tough measures to cut expenditures. Over that period, however—in fact over the last nine years—we have allowed major provincial transfers to grow at more than the rate of inflation each and every year. The measures in this budget will limit that growth to less than the rate of inflation for the first time in a decade.

In our current fiscal situation it would not be reasonable to let provincial transfers continue to grow so much when everyone else is forced to tighten their belts. Spending cuts are never popular. The new ones we have announced are tough but they are necessary.

NATIVE COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, by cancelling the native communication program, the Secretary of State has virtually destroyed the native print media in Canada.

The 11 newspapers, funded by the native communication program, played an indispensable role as a media of communication between native organizations and Canadians as a whole. They played an active role in promoting literacy in communities where functional illiteracy often runs as high as 40 per cent. Furthermore, they gave positive media access to aboriginal groups which are either shut out of the national media controlled by the Thompsons, the Southams and Conrad Blacks of this country or else are portrayed negatively or in a confrontational situation.

By eliminating or cutting back on grants to native media and undermining the communications ability between natives and other Canadians the Secretary of State is threatening to create three solitudes in this country rather than simply two. I call on the government to restore full funding of native communications programs and transfer funding of native programs to a minister who does not appear to be biased against native Canadians.

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, it is almost laughable listening to the criticism directed at this week's federal budget by the Ontario treasurer and province's premier.

At the beginning of the week these same two people were announcing an unanticipated $952 million windfall from extra income tax revenues this year. Furthermore, during the current fiscal year Ontario's new payroll health tax and commercial concentration levy, which cut in on January 1, will bring the province another $560 million. Added together these new revenues will bring in more than three times the amount Ontario loses from cuts to the federal transfer payments for established program financing.

Before complaining further, Ontario's premier and treasurer might consider that since 1984 the federal government spending has been held to an average of 3.6 per cent while Ontario's spending has been racing ahead at an annual rate of almost 10 per cent. If the Ontario government is able to show meaningful restraint in its own spending there should be no need for any tax increase in the province because of this week's federal budget.

TELESAT CANADA

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, renewed talks by this government of privatizing Telesat Canada shows it is trapped in a market force ideological view. The government has failed to learn that our communication system works because it has been carefully crafted over many decades. It all fits together. You cannot remove one element, one wall from the house, without considering the whole system. Conservatives obviously have no vision for Canada except how to dismantle it. We have not seen the promised national telecommunication policy from this government in five years. Yet in this vacuum they want to turn Telesat, a cornerstone of our communication system, over to purely profit motives from its public policy mandate.

What about Telesat objectives? Are they just forgotten or traded for bottom-line profits? How could private managers justify serving small native communities? How could they resist the economic attraction of serving a U.S. market of 200 million instead? Will the government ever understand Telesat's real public policy role in research and development, like satellites and HDTV? And with risky investment under way privatizing Telesat now would be a fire sale throwaway of millions of Canadian dollars that are already invested.

There is absolutely no evidence the government has considered any of these questions. For a change it would help Canadians if government were to do a little bit more thinking and planning instead of just selling and cutting.

THE HON. HENRY HICKS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on March 5, 1990, the Hon. Henry Hicks will reach his seventy-fifth birthday and retire from the Senate of Canada. I am sure Members of Parliament from Nova Scotia and all members of the House will join me in wishing him and his new bride God speed.

Henry Hicks was an educator and a lawyer in a small town in Nova Scotia who, by his own words, "degenerated into a politician". But as a politician he made his mark as Minister of Education and Premier of Nova Scotia and then went on to be a president of one of our great institutes of learning, Dalhousie University.

He continued to contribute to the public welfare with a great career in the Senate, and I know he will continue to do that in the years to come.

Let us all wish Henry Wicks Godspeed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the federal budget contained nothing for Atlantic Canadians. There was no mention of any assistance package for those thousands of people hit by plant closures. There was nothing for the communities which are faced with extinction. There was nothing for the future of those whose livelihoods have long depended upon the fishing resources.

It is clear that the Prime Minister's word is worth nothing. On December 13 and again on January 22 the Prime Minister made a commitment to Atlantic Canadians. He made that commitment to this House and to the people of Canada to provide programs as generous as those made available to prairie farmers.

The budget was his opportunity to demonstrate that he was prepared to assist these people. He has refused to go to meet them, and he is not prepared even to fulfil the commitment that he intends to support them.

Indeed the deep cuts to health care, post-secondary education and the myriad program cuts in the budget will have tragic consequences on Atlantic Canadians already suffering under a crisis.

When is this government going to listen? When is it going to keep its promises? When is it going to care for Atlantic Canadians?

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my riding of Nipissing along with other northern Ontario ridings took full advantage of regional development grants. To cut incentive grants to business makes it even more difficult for northern communities to compete with our southern neighbours. We have already endured cuts to our transportation infrastructure by losing Air Canada and VIA. This is just another blow by a callous and indifferent government.

At a time when the Minister of Finance himself projects a higher rate of unemployment, incentive grants are essential for the economic development of the north.

Also of concern in my riding is the elimination of postal service review committee. At a time when many of my constituents are faced with the impact of franchising postal service and closing of rural post offices, a service review mechanism is essential. This just demonstrates that the government's only commitment to postal service is to deliver a profit and not deliver the mail to satisfied customers.

Our veterans, contrary to what the Minister of Finance said, will be affected by the cuts in the budget. They will pay $3,000 more a year for care in veterans homes.

Our veterans paid their dues when they walked into battle. When the government starts using these people to save money it has gone too far.

Now is not the time to dissolve our principles but rather to resolve our difficulties.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, this government continues to provide the leadership we were elected to give. The government will reduce the deficit to $28.5 billion in 1990-91 and to $10 billion by 1994-95.

To continue to build a secure future for all Canadians, we must continue to reduce the deficit. That is exactly what we did.

In our latest budget there are "no new taxes". Spending restraint is the key to deficit reduction.

The measures in this budget together with those announced in December will produce cumulative savings of more than $19 billion over the next five years.

Program spending was restrained to $3.6 per cent over the last five years. That is well below the rate of inflation, and it beat the performance of all 10 provincial governments.

There is no painless way to restrain spending, but we in Alberta are willing to do our share. The expenditure reductions outlined in our budget are tough, but they are necessary.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MAIN ESTIMATES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have questions for the President of the Treasury Board on the Main Estimates, quite apart from the procedural matter I understand the Chair is considering.

Today, in tabling its Main Estimates, the government failed to provide detailed spending plans in the form of Part IIIs for 14 key departments and agencies covering some 60 per cent of its expenditures.

I ask the President of the Treasury Board just why has it failed to do this. Just what is the government trying to hide?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. colleague, I would like to say we are not going to hide anything at all. It was done for security purposes.

• (1420)

Mr. de Cotret: Part III of the Main Estimates that were directly referred to in the budget began to be printed when the Minister of Finance stood in this House to make his budget speech.

Given the number of volumes we have to print, I was able to make the undertaking this morning that those would be before all members of this House on or before March 12. It is only for security purposes.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the detailed spending plans in the form of Part IIIs have always been presented as part of the Main Estimates.

The government has presented six budgets. It knows the form and detail of the Estimates. It knows how important this information is to Canadians.

I ask the President of the Treasury Board: Is the government, in effect, now admitting its incompetence, or is it simply trying to cook the books?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government is saying that it is maintaining the security of the whole budget process, a long-held tradition in this place and in the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in the past, Budget security was tight, but nevertheless it was possible to table all sections of the Estimates at once. Mr. Speaker, 65 per cent of government expenditures go to these 14 departments. The government seems to know how to increase taxes 31 times, but it doesn't know how to account for two-thirds of the finances of this country! My question is quite simple: Why do we have a Minister of Finance and a President of the Treasury Board, considering that they clearly have not done their job, which was to inform the public of the details of the Budget and the Main Estimates?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this morning I tabled Part II of the Main Estimates, which is about two inches thick and provides details on all government programs, departments and agencies. Perhaps the hon. member could consult that document, and in a matter of days, he will get the rest of the details in Part III.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Could the Minister of Finance confirm to the House and to Canadians that in order to meet the objectives set forth in his Budget, it will be necessary to create a recession in this country? In the Budget papers he said that the first quarter of 1990 would see a drop in economic growth, which would be a negative point. Is it part of the minister's plan to ensure there is a recession, in order to meet the objectives he listed in his Budget?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is typical of the hon. member to walk around with a little black cloud over his head looking for recessions.

We do not believe that there will be a recession. As I made quite clear in the budget statement there will be a period of slow growth, a period that is necessary to get the inflationary pressures out of the system.

As that happens we see a recovery very quickly toward the end of this year and into next year, at which time I am confident we will be back on a non-inflationary growth path that will be healthy for all parts of the country.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

The minister states that he has to create the necessary economic environment for sustained reductions in Canadian interest rates. I want to ask the minister again referring to his budget documents about the unemployment rate that will rise, and I am quoting, "throughout 1990".

Is it essential to his budget objectives that unemployment rise in Canada during 1990? Does he have to ensure there is unemployment in order for his budget to have any chance of success in reaching its objectives?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let's put this into perspective. When we came into office in 1984 the unemployment rate was 11.7 per cent.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I hear groans on the other side of the House. I know they don't like to be reminded of the bad old days, but that is a fact.

Mr. Mulroney: Liberal days.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Over the course of this year and into next year we do expect that there will be some increase in the unemployment rate, but the underlying employment will be growing. It is just because the growth in the labour force will be faster than the growth of employment. That leads to some increase in the unemployment rate, but this is going to be just this year and into next year.

Through this whole period there will be an increase in employment, unlike the substantial drop in employment, the huge drop in employment we saw in 1981 and 1982.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, just moments ago the Minister for International Trade announced that an agreement has been reached allowing 20 per cent of B.C. herring and salmon to be exported to the U.S. prior to landing in B.C., for this year; for the next three years, 25 per cent; and then further review.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Stupich: The minister and his colleagues have repeatedly said that no jobs "historically established" would be lost as a result of any decision reached under GATT or under the free trade agreement. Would the minister mind explaining exactly how Canada can allow up to 25 per cent of our total catch of fish to be exported before processing without losing processing jobs in Canada?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not advised the House that while this agreement may pose some difficulties it is a necessary agreement in order that Canada can live up to her international trading obligations and maintain access to our markets.

All Canadian fish, salmon or herring, are caught by Canadian fishermen. We have the most competitive processing industry in the world if we were to hear the workers and processing companies talk. Therefore they are just going to have to sharpen their pencils and keep being competitive.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

This agreement totally breaks all the promises made by this minister, previous ministers, the Minister for International Trade and the Prime Minister.

How does the minister intend to monitor the repercussions of this ludicrous agreement? How is the minister going to count up to 25 per cent of an unknown quantity when he knows that currently fish are being landed secretly? He knows this cannot be policed.

We have given in more than the free trade panel recommended. It said up to 10 per cent or maybe 20 per cent. Now we are going up to 25 per cent for four years, and after that who knows how high? How much more are we going to give to the U.S. just to get it to accept our largess?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not telling the House that under the recommendation of the panel 10 per cent to 20 per cent of the product could be exported uninspected.

Under this arrangement 100 per cent of all salmon and herring caught in Canadian waters will be subjected to examination, counting, and weighing by Canadian fisheries officers on Canadian vessels.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

The Minister for International Trade sold out Canada on the softwood issue. With respect to the fisheries we have given up control of the resource: 20 per cent for the first year, 25 per cent for the next three years, subject to review after that, and who knows how high it will go.

Will the Prime Minister give up this Minister for International Trade before he gives up total control of all resources in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the falsehood is inadvertent, but it is simply false for the member of the New Democratic Party to say that we have given up control of our fishery.

What we have done with this agreement is asserted control of our fishery by ensuring that conservation practices and standards of this country will apply to at sea as well as other catches.

In reply to the other question, this problem began for Canada with a GATT ruling. I assume that the New Democratic Party, which claims to believe in the importance of international agreements, believes that Canada should accept the rulings and the jurisdiction of GATT. That is where the problem began. We lost a decision before GATT. That was settled some years ago.

As my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans just said, there was a panel recommendation that would have been less favourable to Canada than the agreement which was concluded today and announced by the Minister for International Trade.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. He has just made an attempt to correct the members of the NDP. Perhaps he should correct his own explanation of the facts.

This problem did not begin with the decision of the GATT, this problem began when this government gave up the right to impose an export tax under the free trade agreement. That is when we gave up the right to protect Canadian interests. That is when the problem began, when the right of Canadians to protect themselves with an export tax which is legitimized by GATT was given up. That is the truth, that is the fact and that is why this government is sacrificing thousands of fish processing workers on the west coast.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member's indignation. His facts are wrong. Does he have question?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, what is wrong is the stand this government took to capitulate to the United States and giving away our west coast fishing.

I want to ask the minister this question. How can we stay credible when we just gave away to the Americans on the west coast what we are objecting to the Europeans taking on the east coast? How do we argue with the Europeans that they are taking one-quarter of our catch of cod on the east coast when we just gave it away to the Americans on the west coast? You have lost your credibility, you have lost your legitimacy and you are losing jobs for Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, you and I came to this House at the same time and we have noticed that one of the things that has happened is that increasingly Question Period is used for people to make dramatic accusations rather than put questions. That is what the hon. member has just done. He is wrong in his facts about the agreement. He is wrong in his suggestion with regard to the situation.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): State what the facts are. You surrendered this country. That is what we find.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Budget has provoked some strong reactions, and I would like to quote the Quebec Minister of Education, Claude Ryan: "I think it is absolutely deplorable that the federal government has further reduced its commitment to postsecondary education". "There is a deplorable contradiction between what it says and what it does".

How does the minister intend to respond to these words, coming from a politician who is an expert on education?

An Hon. Member: Good question!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, federal-provincial transfer payments have not changed. These transfer payments may be spent at the provinces' discretion. The transfers are limited to a growth rate of 3 per cent. The growth rate of federal spending is also limited to 3 per cent. We have asked the provinces to share these restrictive measures, in the same spirit as the federal government.

We have also made a distinction between higher income provinces, such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, which will receive a lower increase, and provinces like Quebec, which benefit from equalization payments. I think our policy in this respect is very fair, and I think the issue is important enough to ask the provinces to share a national solution in dealing with a national problem.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance not realize that he is committing a sin of omission in cutting government funding, which is also vital and fundamental for the future of our youth, who are really the future of our country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that if we do not reduce the deficit, it will be a big problem for our youth. It is very important for the future of our country and for the future of our youth to lower the level of the national debt. This government has a policy to reduce the national debt and a big part of this problem is reducing the annual deficit and asking the provinces to take part in solving this national problem.

MAIN ESTIMATES

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board said that the despicable contempt with which parliamentarians were treated this morning in a lock-up, in which we had half the amount of room we needed and half the resources required and denied 14 of the key departmental estimates, was as a result of budget secrecy. Some secrets. I do not blame him for wanting to hide the secrets from the glare of publicity.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): My question is: Will the President of the Treasury Board provide us with the secrets and explain the cuts in drug addiction funds when we have a drug strategy and cuts in grants to multicultural and ethnocultural organizations when we have a problem of tolerance steadily growing in this country? Will he provide us with the details of those 14 departmental estimates we have been denied up until now?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. We will provide the 14 documents. I explained very clearly that the reason they were not available this morning was because we wanted to preserve the security and integrity of the budget.

I indicated clearly in this House this morning that those documents have been in the printing process since the Minister of Finance stood in this House and will be available to all members of the House on or before March 12.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also participated in the lock-up this morning that was such a farce. When I left that lock-up, I received calls from women's organizations in Newfoundland, the Yukon and Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: That may all very well be so, but I want to know what the question is.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): My question is this: The information on the cuts to women's programming is public information. The women's centres in this country know that their program funding has been cut 100 per cent. Will the Secretary of State please tell us what other cuts will be made to women's programming? Violence against women is a crisis in this country. These are the centres that provide information and support to women. They tell me they have been cut 100 per cent. Will the minister confirm that?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there is a plan in place to provide for our future security and prosperity. The deficit is being addressed. That is what we are concerned with. It hurts when we have to say to any group in the nation—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would finish his answer.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, it pains us to have to say to anyone that we cannot give them as much as they need. Maybe there are some other sources of funding that might be available to groups. We have been very supportive of all of their initiatives and will continue to work within our program to see that they get as much help as we can give them.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

After abolishing the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program, will the government take special measures to help mining communities in Abitibi, Quebec and Canada affected by the cancellation of this program?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member is aware, we talked about this. I am very much aware of his concern and interest in the particular issue.

We are concerned about the impact of this on the communities in the north. We have programs in place through the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Community Futures Program as well as another program that deals with this type of situation. These will be fully available to communities in the north in order to ensure there is the easiest possible transition.

I should also note, Mr. Speaker, that there are grandfathering arrangements which will provide for a gradual reduction in the flow of funds from this program during the course of this year.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this budget has driven a knife to the heart of the Secretary of State women's programs. We have seen a 20 per cent cut to the Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women, a 100 per cent cut to Le Centre des femmes du Québec and a 100 per cent cut to the Centre for Canadian Women's Studies. My question is to the Minister of Finance. Maybe he can tell me if the Secretary of State can't. When will the minister end this institutionalized discrimination and stop this male chauvinist cut of a budget?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague has stated quite clearly that we are sensitive to the needs of women's organizations and other organizations that are affected by this budget. We are quite aware that we are asking organizations to share with us in dealing with a major national problem.

It is very important for us as a country to get the level of interest rates down. To do that we have to get the level of inflation and the level of the deficit down. That does not happen just by wishing it to happen. Everybody has to share in some reduction in the level of funding for various programs.

Yes, these programs are affected as are a number of other programs. I think that Canadians as a whole understand the importance of this. I hope that they will be able to accept the reasoning why we have had to take these decisions.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is I hope that the battered women across Canada understand why these groups have to take a 100 per cent cut in funding. I hope that the families and friends of the students in Montreal who died because violence against women is accepted in this country can accept this.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Clancy: When is the minister going to realize that women cannot wait, that they cannot accept his budgetary cuts on their backs?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the statement which the hon. member has just made is absolutely outrageous. It should not be made in a place like this, and she knows it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If she can show any program that is being cut by 100 per cent—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well, now I see the hon. member who just made the outrageous statement laughing her head off.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Now this is something that demonstrates the duplicitousness of people on the other side of this House. We have made it quite clear what our policy is. This government has been very sensitive.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. This government is now attacking veterans by cutting back. In 1985 the government doubled the board and lodging rate for vets. By 1991 it will be almost doubled again for over 1,500 veterans.

The Leader of the Opposition and I met with Legion members this morning. I quote a Korean War veteran: "These guys put their lives on the line, and I think it is a damn shame and a sin that the country doesn't take care of them now". Does the minister believe his cuts meet the test of fairness? How can he justify using our veterans as targets for the deficit cutting shooting gallery?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the changes that were made by the government with regard to veterans programs were done in consultation and after consultation with veterans organizations in Canada. I want to read one of the lines from one of the veterans' groups since the hon. member read one. It says:

> It is obvious that some changes had to be made—because the DVA rate was too low—

They go on to say:

> Having studied a large number of case histories of this nature, I had to come to the conclusion that the only statesman-like approach for veterans would be to accept an increase in the rate charged by DVA—

An hon. member: Who wrote the letter?

Mr. Merrithew: This is by Cliff Chadderton, who happens to be chair of the War Veterans Council and is executive director of the War Amps of Canada, the Legion.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Speaker, the Royal Canadian Legion as well has made public statements recommending the changes. They understand the need for changes because they correct inequities in the program.

Let me tell hon. members: We have the best programs for veterans in the world, and we are going to do more this year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, it must be a small world. The minister has said vets will only have to pay if they can afford it. However, if all 1,500 vets affected paid the full amount for 1990 and 1991, it would be $5.4 million less than the government says it will save over that two-year period. Why has this government decided that veterans who through this century have fought for Canada in three wars have not given enough? Lest we forget. Is this not a betrayal?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as we mentioned yesterday, and we mentioned it publicly, all of these charges for board and lodging are subject to income testing. In other words, the people in hospital for their disability will pay nothing. They will pay nothing in the future. With regard to those people who are on War Veterans Allowance or any of the other incomes which we pay these veterans, I can tell you that we will guarantee that there will be $1,185 a month reserved for them in a case of a married veteran and spouse, and there will be allowances as well for their personal needs.

Let me state that our veterans will pay the lowest rates in Canada now and will pay the lowest rates in the future.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1450)

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 social programs were a sacred trust, according to the Prime Minister. In 1989 the finance minister promised that money for health and post-secondary education would continue to rise higher than the rate of inflation. Now the Minister of Finance and this government has shattered both those promises, both those commitments to Canadian.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. What happened to the national dream, that no matter where you live in Canada, no matter what your financial resources, you are entitled to the same quality of health care as everyone else? Why should the finance minister and his pampered Bay Street buddies have the best health care money can buy, while the less well off Canadians have to settle for less?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this government is, has been, and will be committed to the best health care program that we can have in this country. That has not been changed by this budget.

We have asked the provinces to share in the solution of a national problem. The transfers that we make to the provinces are not for health care, or post-secondary education. They are unconditional transfers. It is up to the provinces to decide how they want to spend that money.

However, in making the changes we have been sensitive to the financial strength of the provinces. Provinces such as Ontario, Alberta and B.C., who are fiscally stronger, have been limited to a growth rate of about 2.25 per cent next year. The less strong provinces, such as the Atlantic provinces, will have a growth rate of about 4 per cent. But the average for all the provinces is 3 per cent and the average for the total program spending of the Government of Canada is 3 per cent.

We are not asking the provinces to do anything more than we are prepared to do ourselves. In fact, the other spending reductions that we have made represent a far greater adjustment in our spending than we are asking of the provinces themselves.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance should listen to his own words about compounding interest. What is going to happen in this country in the next five years is $7 billion is going to be cut out of health care. That is after 88 per cent of Canadians told this minister not to cut funding to health care and post-secondary education.

In this budget 70 per cent of the—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon-Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, in light of the 70 per cent of this budget being cuts to the sick, students and the poorest in Canada, why does the Minister of Finance not pick on somebody his own size? Why does he not pick on somebody who can fight back?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the provinces who we have asked to make this adjustment in their spending are quite capable of speaking for themselves. Some of the provinces have acknowledged that we do have a deficit problem, that we do have a debt problem and that we must deal with it. They understand the way that we have to deal with it, even though my hon. friend might not be able to deal with it.

Let me ask him to consider this one point. We cannot ignore this debt problem and what could happen if we do not deal with it. Consider the debt that this government took on in 1984 from the previous government. It was $185 billion. Eighty per cent of the deficits that we have incurred since 1984 have been simply interest on that debt. Surely that is a clear enough message to him that if we do not deal with this problem, we are going to get overwhelmed by debt and that is something—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Beaver River.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, after last year's budget I requested an analysis of the government's revenue and expenditure patterns by province, and was told that that simply was not available. This kind of analysis is essential. The government says its spending cuts will allow the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates. But this is true only if the greatest cuts are in the regions of highest inflationary pressure.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Will he agree to table a regional analysis of the government's revenue and expenditure patterns for this year's budget?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think what my hon. friend is really voicing is a sense that people have that this budget is going to be hard on this part of the country or that part of the country.

Let me quote from Jeffrey Simpson this morning. He gave some sample headlines from across the country. He wrote:

> B.C. battered by Wilson's budget—The Province in Vancouver. Alberta pays Wilson's tab—Budget hits Saskatchewan hard—
> In Central Canada—$3-billion cuts hit hardest at Ontario.

The same in Quebec and so on throughout the whole country.

I think the important message here is that most parts of the country feel that they have been asked to carry a share of the burden. That says to me that we have allocated that burden in a fair way.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, if such were the case, then I should think it would be very simple to table an analysis of regional spending.

This analysis is essential so that Canadians can see whether these cuts are fair. For example, utility tax transfers to Alberta have been simply frozen in this budget. Will the Minister of Finance confirm that just days before this budget he increased tax transfers to the Ontario treasury with a voluntary payment of $90 million in payroll taxes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the position of the Reform Party of Canada has been to cut spending.

We have cut spending in this budget. I cannot understand why my hon. friend is not standing up and saying this is a good budget, if she is supportive of the fact that we have taken the bull by the horns, that we are getting spending down, and that we are going to continue to get the deficit under control.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment I have an exciting question for his parliamentary secretary.

Although the fixed link to P.E.I. will have a major economic and environmental impact on my riding, there are no hearings scheduled for this part of Nova Scotia at all; only Westmorland County and Pictou County on the other side of us.

Will the Department of the Environment support an application to correct this oversight and hold hearings in Cumberland County to assess the impact of this tremendous project in our region?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as most members of this House understand, the very essence of the EARP process is the independence of the panels which are constructed to hold public hearings throughout the area affected.

Consequently, it would be very inappropriate for the minister to direct the panel to hold hearing in any specific community.

However I will certainly convey to the panel the interest of the member and ensure that it gives very serious consideration to his request.

PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put a question to the minister of energy. In his absence, maybe the Prime Minister would consider responding to it. It has to do with the PetroCan privatization, but it is larger than the privatization question.

Now that PetroCan is on the auction block, how will we maintain an adequate Canadian presence in the oil patch and ensure adequate Canadian participation? Even more to the point, who will develop frontier oil and gas reserves now that the Prime Minister's and the minister's own advisers say that we desperately need them if we are not to become too heavily dependent on foreign supplies again?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of energy, I would be happy to answer this question.

Petro-Canada is just one of the players in the frontiers as the hon. member knows. There are many oil companies in the frontier doing exploration work and have in fact found now known reserves of over a billion barrels of oil.

These various companies are in partnership with PetroCan. As the hon. member knows, it is extremely expensive to be exploring and to be developing these resources. Consortiums are formed. This will carry on through the policies of the ministry of energy. Nothing has changed in that way whatsoever.

Petro-Canada will play a role in that and will maintain its strong Canadian ownership and Canadian presence in the frontier.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister. He demonstrates that he knows lots about privatization and nothing about energy, which is why I would hope the Prime Minister would tell us the answer to another very specific question.

Point of Order

We know that in this one that the big winners are his buddies on Bay Street. They will make a couple of hundred million. The losers are Canadians—

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member to put his question, keeping in mind the time.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister this. Can he tell us whether there are other casualties? In particular, can he assure us that the privatization of PetroCan in no way delays or jeopardizes the Hibernia development off Newfoundland?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Simmons: Wilson's not interested. That's what they're saying back home.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wishes, he has the floor.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is yelling. He is not interested in the answer so he is not going to get one.

Mr. Simmons: You scum! You give scum a bad name.

Mr. McDermid: Don't be so god–damn stupid, Roger.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for London East may ask a single question.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The waiting lists for social housing are scandalous. In Toronto there are 20,000 people on a waiting list. In Vancouver there are 5,000. In New Brunswick there are 20,000. In Montreal there are 20,000 people.

How long do these waiting lists have to get before this government wakes up and realizes that we need more housing for the homeless, seniors, single parents and the working poor, not less? Why has this government cut the social housing budget by 15 per cent this year?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, obviously the situation with respect to and the need for social housing is one that is of great concern to this government, the Minister of Finance and myself.

It is also something that is of concern to knowledgeable Canadians in the field of social services. They are particularly aware of the problems that we are having with the budget.

A few months ago I received a letter from the Executive Director of the Family Services Association of Metropolitan Toronto in which he said: "It should be evident to most Canadians that 31 cents interest on each tax dollar is an unacceptably high price to pay for current government operations and programs. Furthermore, allowing the deficit to grow—"

Mr. Speaker: That is a very thoughtful letter. I am sure it could be given to the hon. member.

The hon. member for Edmonton East may ask a single question.

PETRO–CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, under Article 1602 of the free trade agreement, the 25 per cent ceiling on foreign shareholdings the minister responsible for privatization proposes to set on Petro–Canada can never be lowered ever. It can only be raised.

Will the minister agree that there is absolutely nothing in his proposals to prevent Exxon, for example, from securing anywhere up to 30 per cent of Petro–Canada's shares through itself, its subsidiaries and associates and thereby effectively controlling Petro–Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is entirely wrong. When he sees the legislation before the House he then will understand that that would be entirely impossible.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

A week ago a question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt in connection with a meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance on Thursday, February 15.

I have read over the transcript of that meeting. Apparently I suggested that the hon. member for Nickel Belt might be expelled from the hearings. Apparently that is not possible or proper. It did, in a way, reflect upon the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

I want to apologize to the House and to him for that insinuation.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the member for Mississauga South that I certainly accept his apology.

I also want to say that I have read over the transcripts. I have said a lot of things about the hon. member. I would like to withdraw anything I said that in any way reflected on the calm, cool personality of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will know that this will make it unnecessary for me to say anything about either of the two hon. members.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I raised with you by letter earlier today a question of privilege. Since that time, as a result of something that was said during Question Period, I must raise another question of privilege.

While I was questioning the Secretary of State, the member for Burlington called me a fishwife. I think that that is unparliamentary. My question was a serious one. It should be taken very seriously by the government.

I do not feel at all comfortable being called a fishwife. I think it is wrong.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to act on this matter. I would like the hon. member to withdraw the comment. It was heard on the television sets across this country as well.

Some hon. members: Shame!

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, my second question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will let me deal with the first question, I will do so. Then I will immediately recognize her again on the second question.

Does the hon. member for Burlington wish to respond?

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall directing a comment of that kind at the hon. member. I do not even know the question she was asking. I was not paying any attention.

However, if she thinks the comment I made was meant for her, I will withdraw it.

Ms. Black: That is a gracious response.

MAIN ESTIMATES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I will continue to my second question of privilege.

This morning I was in the lock-up sponsored by Treasury Board to inform members of Parliament in a secure environment about the Estimates and how they would impact on various departments.

When I asked specific questions on the impact of the cuts to women's programming, I was told that that information was not available and would not be available for approximately a week and a half. I asked specific questions about that program, about multiculturalism, native affairs and programs for visible and minority women.

I was told the information was not available. I left the lock-up after spending an hour and a half in there. I returned to my office one minute later and received phone calls from women's organizations from the Yukon, British Columbia, Quebec—from almost every province. The people calling were telling me they had been informed that their funding had been cut 100 per cent. I received calls from CRIAW and other women's organizations telling me their funding had been cut 20 per cent.

It is obvious to me that this information was available. It had been made public. Yet it was withheld from members of Parliament.

Speaker's Ruling

That is a breach of my privilege as a member of this House, as well as a breach of the privileges of other members.

I would ask you to review this matter, Mr. Speaker, and to rule on it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, Subsequent to the comments by the hon. member, I would ask that my request concerning a question of privilege be withdrawn. It was one which I issued last week.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for that intervention.

The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby has raised a question of privilege. I understand no one else is rising on it. I will take the matter under advisement and report back to the House.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period today the Minister of Veterans Affairs quoted from a document in his hand, a document which I believe was a communication from the president of War Amputations of Canada.

I would ask that following the normal processes of this House the minister be asked to table that document so that it will become a matter of public record.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan has raised a point with respect to a letter which the hon. minister was reading. Perhaps I was too hasty, but I interrupted the hon. minister with the suggestion, I think, that rather than read it, it could be sent across to the hon. member who had asked the question.

In any event, I understand that the minister is more than prepared to table the letter. I will accept that, of course.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I have just been advised that also during Question Period the minister responsible for housing quoted from a document, a letter from the United Way, and I ask that that be tabled as well.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps colleagues on the government side could take that request. If necessary, the hon. member can raise it again with the Chair.

The hon. member for Halifax is rising, I think, on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to an exchange and a response from the Minister of Finance during Question Period.

In responding to my supplementary question, the minister suggested and insinuated that I was laughing at the extremely serious situation relating to violence against women in this country.

This is not the first time that the hon. minister has so characterized members on this side of the House, myself among others, particularly when we have not had the opportunity of responding when it is indeed a supplementary question.

I think this is an extremely serious matter, particularly given the exigencies of television coverage in this House and the fact that our responses cannot be seen. I feel my privileges have been breached. I would ask that you, Mr. Speaker, review this matter.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I take the point my hon. friend raises. I would ask that if you, Sir, are prepared to do that, that you also examine the record. You will find that the member who makes the complaint suggested immediately thereafter that the Prime Minister was laughing.

Ms. Clancy: He was.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I think that the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax illustrates a problem in this Chamber that we have sometimes, not all the time.

I may be able to review both Hansard and/or the tapes. If the minister was on his feet, with the television coverage which we have in this place there is no way for me to be able to use that to assist in seeing whatever the hon. member was doing. I will not be able to do that.

I think the proper approach to this is to say simply this. It applies to both sides of the House and it applies at all times. This is a place of free speech. It is a very vigorous place; it is not a tea party, and I have said that before. It is an adversarial forum. That is what preserves our freedoms.

However, in the process we must be conscious of not only the feelings of each other but the implications that go with remarks we make outside this Chamber as well. I know that all hon. members would want most of the time, except when they sometimes become forgetful, to maintain that.

I think that is the only response that I can give the hon. member for Halifax. I regret the matter. But there is no way I can review it from an evidentiary point of view.

I do ask all hon. members to conduct themselves in such a way that complaints like this do not have to be brought to the Speaker.

I thank the hon. member for raising the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order and ask the usual business question.

In particular, I would ask the government to indicate to us what business it intends to call for tomorrow.

Second, is the government prepared now to give its answer to the question asked by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier as to whether or not Parliament will be sitting next week pursuant to the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. If so, will we be considering the budget next week in the manner in which the member for Ottawa—Vanier suggested?

In the unlikely event that we are not sitting next week, perhaps the minister could indicate what business he intends to bring forward when Parliament does resume after the one week recess.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to advise the House tomorrow at 10 a.m. we will commence debate on Bill C-56, the Small Business Loans Act. That is the only piece of government business we have for tomorrow.

After Routine Proceedings I have suggested to the opposition parties that we will be raising a point of order on the Message from the Senate with respect to Bill C-21.

On Monday, March 5, Tuesday, March 6, Wednesday, March 7 and Thursday, March 8, the week of March when we return, we will be debating the budget motion.

I did attempt to reach my colleague, the House leader for the opposition, who suggested that the Liberal party would be prepared to work next week rather than to adjourn, but he was on his way to the airport and/or in Paris and then on to Greece.

Mr. Boudria: He's not going to Greece.

Mr. Lewis: I did not get into long distance calls to try to reach him to see if he wanted to come back to work. In case my hon. friend is talking to him by long distance telephone, or perhaps communicating with him by telegraph or fax to a foreign country, he might tell him that we will take next week off as agreed because we want to go back to meet our constituents.

Members of the government party will be in our ridings meeting with our constituents. We will also try to cover Ottawa—Vanier in the hon. member's absence.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, just so that the House and indeed all Canadians are aware, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is out of the country until Monday night. He is out of the country on government business replacing the Deputy Speaker of this House. He will be back on Monday night.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the House will know that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier probably has an attendance record here which is unmatched by anyone, including the minister who just made those unnecessary remarks.

Mr. Speaker: My attendance record is pretty good.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Speaker's Ruling

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a point of clarification. It is because somebody on the other side said that I was wrong. When the member asked for the tabling of the document that had been read, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, you said that it should be exchanged with the member. I do not know why it would not be tabled and then be here for everybody to see.

My second point is that there should be some explanation as to why a document was brought into the House so that the minister could depose it in the House. I was here. I watched that. I understand the rule is that if anybody is reading from a document, then it is fair game and should be placed before the House. That is something that goes back for many, many years. Maybe that is something that has changed.

In this case what we had was the Minister of Veterans Affairs read a letter. We had another member who asked that the document be tabled. At the same time we had to wait for someone to bring him in some paper which he then tabled.

Mr. Lewis: He was out.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I am saying that he was sitting there when someone brought in the paper to him, whatever it was. That implies, for whatever reason, that he was not ready to table the document in the House.

• (1520)

I am just saying that there are two points here. It is very important we not forget that when you are reading from a piece of paper, that is the paper the person should be tabling in the House.

Maybe I misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me you said to exchange it with the other member. I think it should be tabled.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister was out of the House. Often ministers will quote either from an excerpt from an official document, which has been placed in their briefing notes, or from the entire document. I happen to think that in this case the minister actually had the entire letter.

I know that ministers leave the House and discuss matters with their aids. He came back in an effort to clear up the situation.

There is no question that the government has on record support from the War Amputations of Canada and from the Legion support for the government's programs. We would be glad to put that on the record. Having heard this exchange, I am sure that the minister will be able to put on the record and table in the House exactly the documents he used that are official.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South West Nova has raised a point with respect to documents that are referred to by a minister in answering questions or members. The rule is as she quotes it. In such a case the minister ought to table the document and certainly will have to if called upon to do so.

I may inadvertently have said something that led to some confusion. Without in any way denigrating the content of the minister's reply or the seriousness of the question and the answer, I felt that the minister had gone on too long. I interrupted him and said: "Perhaps that is enough. If you want the hon. member who asked the question to see the letter, then perhaps you can send it across the aisle," or words to that effect.

That may be where the difficulty arose. I have to say that I interrupted the hon. minister because I thought the hon. minister was going on too long.

Immediately afterward I think the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan rose, and I think I am correct, and asked if the minister would table the letter. I said that was appropriate and the minister did.

The point the hon. member makes is correct. The practice has always been that if letters or documents are read then those should be tabled.

I think I may have contributed to the confusion. I was only attempting to move things on so that more members would be heard.

I thank the hon. member.

MAIN ESTIMATES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the Estimates that were tabled this morning.

I note that in Part III of the 1990–91 Estimates for Agriculture Canada in Figure 2, page 1–7, we have a very strange and I think somewhat misleading set of data which are very hard to credit. I think it leaves an extremely wrong impression concerning the appropriations by the government to the portfolio of agriculture.

I would like to refer you, Sir, to that table. I know you do not have one in front of you at the moment, but if you would look at the radical change that has occurred in the accounting procedures I think you will find that it leaves a very wrong impression with the House and with members who are attempting to deal with government Estimates.

Specifically, what the government has done is in the non-budgetary appropriations concerning the Farm Credit Corporation it has increased its share of the principal contributed to the Farm Credit Corporation. Our understanding is that the Farm Credit Corporation may then lend 25 times that amount.

For years the government's appropriation to that corporation has been shown as being the amount of funds that the government has contributed. But for this year and for last year they have suddenly decided to come up with some wildly inflated figure which they say is the revised maximum allowable borrowing levels of Farm Credit Corporation. That is very easy to do in the print, I am sure. But when you look at the table you are left with the misguided perception that the government is appropriating something like $27 billion to the Department of Agriculture and Farm Credit Corporation—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mackenzie may well have a complaint. I find it very difficult to find that it is a point of order that I can address.

Having heard the matter that has been raised, which is of course a serious matter, perhaps the hon. member could have a discussion with someone on the government side and the matter could be resolved. I do not think it is something that as Speaker I can resolve.

Mr. Althouse: I realize you cannot resolve it, Mr. Speaker, but it almost fringes on privilege if members of Parliament whose duty and main job it is to look at the government's expenditure plans have a very great deal of difficulty in doing that, especially if the expenditures are presented in a way that is not of sound accounting practice and is quite misleading.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member's concern. Again, I do not think it is a point of order.

The hon. member can of course pursue the matter in the appropriate committee, and perhaps he will do so.

A great many documents are produced in this place. Over many years I have heard abundant complaints about a good deal of them. I suppose that applies to both sides of the House sometimes.

However, the hon. member has aired his complaint. Other members have heard it. Perhaps it will be resolved.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and on the amendment of Mr. Young (Gloucester) (p. 8636), and on the amendment to the amendment of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 8644).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When the House rose the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre still had three minutes remaining.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, what I was trying to present during the lunch period was the need for an alternate budget, a different way of looking at the economic and social landscape of this country. I tried to present a number of different and alternate ways in which the government could have organized a different direction for this country.

For the last three minutes let me just concentrate on perhaps one area in which we have agreement. I have heard the Minister of Finance say many times, and I agree with him, that the ultimate test is for the children. He talks often of how the financial deficit affects children and how we do not want to burden them with debt in the future. I think we all agree with that.

I also want to raise other deficits that our children are facing. How many children in this country are facing a deficit of poor housing, children living in substandard conditions in our inner cities? How many of our Indian children are still on the reserves sniffing glue in northern Manitoba? How many children in this country are facing the prospect of their fathers and mothers being unemployed and not being able to collect unemployment insurance any longer? Perhaps the only job prospect is facing a move to Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver to get a job where they do not have a prospect of growing up in their own regions.

The question of deficit is not just one that you account in fiscal terms. You account it in terms of the enormous gaps and vacuums and the real serious mortgaging of our future in terms of our environment, in terms of our conditions of our cities, in terms of the social conditions that our children face.

When we talk about a million children in poverty, those are a million individual cases of tragedy. More than that, those are the children who should be tomorrow's engineers, scientists, doctors, politicians and journalists who will never be there, who will never even get to the starting gate because we are cutting back on their education, health care and housing.

This country is going to be desperately in need of highly skilled and highly trained young people in the future. However if at the very beginning because of a lack of proper day care, support, treatment and abuse centres, all of which have been attacked in this budget, children are not even given that chance, this country will face the worst deficit of all, and that is a deficit of human talent, human creativity and human ambition. That is the real deficit we face which this budget has in no way addressed. The budget is a great failure in that it does not come to grips with the underlying reality of this country.

This year the United Nations ratified the declaration of the rights of children. We were party to that declaration. It says: "The states party to the present convention recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, moral, mental and social environments".

We are flunking that test. This budget flunks the test. We want to offer Canadians an alternative way, a better choice, another way of deciding how we will give direction to this country in searching out answers and solutions to its economic and social problems.

That is the real task for Canadians. It is a task that this budget does not address. When we in the Liberal Party are given a chance we feel adequate and ready to do the job.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I am really pleased to hear my colleague address one of the fundamental values and visions for Canada that seems to be absent from the view of this Conservative government.

There were many holes and gaps in this long winded, poorly conceived and badly designed budget. I would ask my hon. colleague who was addressing the question of children and their future how he felt the children and the future that we leave as a legacy when not one word in this budget addressed the environment in which we live and the potential for leaving a much diminished social, physical, as well as mental environment for our families and our grandchildren.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Mount Royal for the question. As I said in my opening address, there were other ways of attacking the problems of this country.

What an opportunity we had. The Brundtland commission is now three years old. We had a summit in the city of Toronto just two years ago where all the industrial countries agreed that they would make major efforts to bring down the standard of emissions of fossil fuels and carbon dioxide in the air. We know that if we do not do something substantial and radical in this country and in countries around the world in 10 years or 20 years the earth will be a cesspool. That will be one of the legacies we leave to our children.

One way of doing something, which was discussed in the Brundtland commission and since then, is a green tax. The Minister of Finance says he wants revenue. Then why are we not taxing polluters? Why are we not saying to those companies which are engaging in practices that are environmentally unfriendly that they will no longer get the business grants, subsidies, write-offs and deductions which they are now all afforded? There is an awful lot of money to be saved for the Government of Canada. At the same time a good market pressure could be put on those very same firms that are engaged in those kinds of practices.

But once again, as the member for Mount Royal pointed out, there was nothing there. It did not even mention the problem. It did not address the fact that economic fiscal tools by the Government of Canada could be used to set a framework, to set rules, and to begin to guide without heavy regulation the choices and decisions in a market-place to get a sustainable environment.

That is the real failure of the budget. There was nothing creative about it. Yet, here is a government that was strong in rhetoric two years ago in Toronto, but when the Minister of Finance has a chance to show how that rhetoric can be turned into practice, what do we find in these pages? Nothing but blanks.

Mr. Funk: Madam Speaker, this budget has distressed a lot of western Canadians. I think it fails completely to come to grips with the very real economic collapse happening in the rural communities right across the prairie provinces, as well as in the northern parts of the western provinces.

I was wondering if the member could attempt to sort out for us what the government is trying to do with the flimflam that we see with respect to regional development funding. It has created a mini-monster called the WDO which was supposed to take over the former regional development programs, the ERDA programs. However we see that virtually no money has been spent. Those agreements in Saskatchewan and Manitoba expired last March 31. As far as I can see scarcely $1 has been spent in the last year. If we look again no dollars are allocated for this year.

Where does the member see the government going? What has happened to regional development funding in western Canada?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, again I appreciate the question from the member for Prince Albert because it is a matter of vital concern in western Canada.

The regional development programs have been eviscerated. The only alternative being offered by this government is the Western Diversification Fund. Under this budget the Western Diversification Fund has been turned into a lending bank. The opportunity for smaller businesses to get direct grants to start off, to improve, to renovate, or to innovate has been extinguished.

It is okay for companies such as the West Edmonton Mall that want to put up another fancy amusement centre. They have the assets and the capital to go ahead and get the loan from Western Diversification. However to a small business in the Interlake or an engineer who wants to start a new kind of business or whatever the Minister of Finance has just said: "You don't count any more."

I think that is happening. Increasingly we are finding that western Canadians do not count when it comes to this government. They are not in the periscope of the Minister of Finance. The Western Diversification Fund is simply being turned into a pale replica of the Federal Business Development Bank and the Farm Credit Corporation which was simply a way of charging going rates of interest on loans and not giving the kind of stimulus or engaging in major investments in western Canada, in the infrastructure of Canada.

If we talk to any mayor of any municipality in western Canada, there is still the need to repair roads, to repair sewage systems, to deal with soil conservation, to deal with the water problem, and to repair the basic underpinnings of the western economy. There is no money. There is no support. There is no federal participation.

As I said in my earlier remarks that is part of the problem with Canada. The federal government is withdrawing from Canada. It no longer feels that it has responsibilities in the region. It no longer wants to establish a presence across Canada. If we have a government that does not believe in governing any more, that simply believes in leaving it up to the market-place where the market-place does not work or does not fit into the kinds of decisions being made on the Bay Streets, in the big business organizations across North America, then we simply become a forgotten territory and a forgotten people. That is the story of western Canada under this government.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, the hon. member paints a very pretty picture. He lives in a lovely dream world. The world he lives in is a very nice place. It is a world where dollars grow on trees, where there is a bottomless, endless pitcher of money flowing, and where everybody can live a Utopian dream.

He speaks about international affairs and how we can use taxpayers' dollars to manipulate things to our advantage and so on. Where does the hon. member think those dollars really come from if they do not come from the very taxpayers he is talking about supporting? Where does he think those dollars come from if they do not come from the business community that he is suggesting somehow we should support through some grant program? Where does he think the dollars come from to support the social programs of which the member is such a proponent?

I would like the member to tell this House how much he thinks he can stretch a single dollar. There is only $1 in this country, Madam Speaker. That is the dollar that comes out of your pocket, my pocket, the hon. member's pocket, and the pockets of all individuals out there. How does the hon. member think that that dollar can be stretched beyond its capacity right now, when 35 cents out of that dollar which they pay to this government go to service a debt that was created over a period of profligate spending where people—and the hon. member was one of those people—lived in this Utopian dream where they thought that there was never, ever going to be a time when we had to pay the piper.

I would like the hon. member to tell us how he thinks a dollar can be more than a dollar, and how he thinks the taxpayers can dig down deeper and afford to pay more than they already are for the debt that was created by the hon. member's government?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, let me make it clear to the hon. member for Winnipeg South that I do not see a Utopian world in Canada. I do not see a Utopian world when I see a million kids living in poverty. I do not see a Utopian world when young native kids are committing suicide. They have the highest rate of suicide of any group in the world. That is not Utopia, I say to the member from Winnipeg South; that is a tragedy. It is a dark scar on the face of this country. There is nothing Utopian about watching the children of this country go down the tube. There is nothing Utopian watching the children of this country going hungry, going without education, and going without proper housing.

I will tell the member where the money comes from. There are 116,000 corporations in this country that did not pay any taxes last year. I will tell her something else. Of the new investments in this country 96 per cent went for corporate takeovers and acquisitions; not new investment, not new business, but to play the paper economy game, to move the chairs around to help Conrad Black get bigger and bigger, and to strip down the corporations of this country. Some $3 million an hour leave this country to pay off our foreign debts. That is where the money is going.

How much money is lost because of our capital gains exemption? How much money is lost because we do not have a proper tax on succession of wealth in this country?

There are lots of places where dollars could be found, but the problem is that this government does not want to look for them because when they start looking for them that is where they will find their friends.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I am almost tempted to carry on from the last presentation because the member certainly provided lots of opportunities for me to comment. However I am really here to participate in this budget debate and in the debate on the amendments that the two opposition parties have put forward.

Yesterday morning in my constituency I had the opportunity of having a budget breakfast to which members of the business community, citizens of the community, and students were invited. Some 280 people participated. There was not one person who stood in objection to the budget program. Sure, there were questions. There were some serious questions about some of the programs, but in the end not one constituent stood in opposition at this particular meeting. I did not choose who the constituents were. Those who wanted to come simply came.

We come back to this particular budget and I say maybe my constituents are really quite concerned about it. About 45 minutes ago I made a point of checking with my office staff in the constituency and here in Ottawa to see how many calls have received from constituents concerned that some of the budget programs were impacting on them negatively. We received not one call, I should point out.

I have to presume from this point that the budget provides really strong leadership, the leadership that Canadians have been asking for. I mention that because I had a call from one of the local newspaper reporters in my area who was concerned that there was a poll released showing that we were at 19 per cent. She wondered whether I was concerned that we were at that number. I said to her that leadership was not public opinion polls. If this country wanted leadership by public opinion polls, we would have leadership that was in place prior to 1984. Prior to that time public opinion polls seemed to influence greatly exactly what was in every budget. One thing that did not influence the budget was the deficit; what did not influence the budget was where the money was coming from.

I am happy to report that in spite of what those public opinion polls say, we are providing the leadership in this country that is sorely needed. Fiscal responsibility is a direct cure to a disease that afflicts this country. It is one of inflation and deficits. The two go hand in hand. I do not think one should ever assume that they are out of step.

Since 1984 we have had to address two particular deficits. The first was on the program side. The previous government had been spending money to the tune of $16 billion a year faster than it was making it. Forgetting about the interest on the debt and the debt altogether, it was also spending $16 billion more a year than it was collecting in revenue. Not only did it not pay interest on the debt it was accumulating, it was paying $16 billion more on programs than it could afford. There was another $20 billion that had to be addressed which was the interest on the debt. When we came to office, the two combined amounted to something in excess of $38 billion.

I think we have done tremendous work in trying to address the two issues. We took the first deficit, that one that dealt with the deficit in programs, to zero in three years. Now, a couple of years later, we have taken that to a $12.6 billion surplus. We are now spending less on programs than revenues, and finally we are starting to pay some money toward the interest on our debt. That is what we should be doing.

Unfortunately, that debt has grown to the point where we have to raise $41 billion a year in order to pay the interest, so we still have a deficit of $28.5 billion.

I have made a point of listening to some of the members over the last day and one of the arguments listed by them dealt with interest rates. A point was very adequately made by a member that the finance committee of which I am a member did a study on interest rates last spring. We recommended strongly that the government encourage the Governor of the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates.

I supported that particular recommendation at the time because the evidence which was presented to us suggested that only southern Ontario was suffering from inflationary pressures.

Of course when the Governor of the Bank of Canada appeared he disagreed with our evidence, but we had numerous other people who suggested information to the contrary. Being relatively new at it, I thought that with all this contrary evidence maybe the government was wrong and all these other people were right.

Hindsight is a great thing. The Governor of the Bank of Canada was right. We need only to look at recent statistics from many parts of Canada to see that inflation is occurring all over Canada. I have a chart which I find rather interesting because I think it is representative of some of the inflationary pressures that exist in all parts of Canada.

One factor is public sector wage settlements for the last year. While the federal Public Service has averaged a 4.2 per cent level of wage settlements, other parts of Canada have levels much higher. Only Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I give them full credit for this, managed to bring in wage settlements that were less than that of the federal government.

I was told that in British Columbia there were no inflationary pressures. I should now ask why then would the province of British Columbia give an average wage settlement of 8.2 per cent in that province if there were no inflationary pressures. Why would Manitoba give 5.5 per cent? Why would Nova Scotia give 5.7 per cent? Why would Ontario average 6.6 per cent? Places like Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia settled at just under 5 per cent. Obviously there were inflationary pressures. The statistics in the public sector wage settlements show those numbers very clearly.

What does this lead me to conclude? Inflation is certainly a curse of sound economic conditions and the Governor of the Bank was right. Since I am a member of the committee, I guess I have to say publicly at this time that hindsight is a great thing. The recommendation we made last spring, almost a year ago, that the Governor should reduce interest rates was absolutely wrong. I have to say that very publicly, and I do fully support that inflation has to be addressed. Yes, I know that high interest rates cause problems throughout this country, but the alternative of high inflation will cause far more serious problems than the problem the governor is creating through interest rates. Very clearly I support the government's fight against inflation.

I have listened to other comments in debate and yet, yesterday for example, a number of members of the Opposition did not talk about the direction the budget was going. They talked about the goods and services tax. That is not a direction of the budget. As a member of the finance committee and one who has listened to all the debate on the goods and services tax and has actively taken part in it, I was shocked. If this budget is so disastrous, how could these members talk about the goods and services tax and not the budget? Obviously they did not have anything they really wanted to emphasize out of the budget that disturbed them, so they had to go to another issue that was politically a little more acceptable for them to talk about.

There was even a member who talked about the free trade agreement and how bad it was. I am not sure what the free trade agreement has to do with this budget. I checked through it all and I do not see any particular program being cut. I do not see any particular revenue earmarked against free trade or losses against free trade. Again, the problem was that they just could not find what they wanted to talk about in this budget. There were just not enough negatives for them and they certainly did not want to talk about all the good things. That leaves it up to members of the governing party to talk about the good things.

Before I get to the good things, there is this feeling of leadership that is required. I mentioned at the outset that leadership was required; it was not necessarily popular, but I do believe it was right. I have listened to members here complain about their part of Canada being terribly affected by this budget. I do not know, Madam Speaker, if you have seen this particular article, but in The Globe and Mail this morning, columnist Jeffrey Simpson listed some articles from across Canada that comment on the budget. If you wanted to describe it as leadership, I would certainly support that.

Let me read some of the headlines:

> B.C. battered by Wilson's budget—Alberta pays Wilson's tab—Budget hits Saskatchewan hard—$3-billion cuts hit hardest at Ontario— An "unjust" blood-letting of $220-million for Quebec—Budget ignored promised aid for fishermen.

We have gone from one end of this country to another and they are all saying that they have been picked on. What this says is that we have asked all Canadians to recognize that we have a deficit. It takes some leadership to deal with that deficit. No part of Canada is being asked to pay its undue share in the problems this country faces. That is what I call leadership.

Having listened to the other members, Mr. Simpson's final comment is probably the most appropriate one I can pass on to some of my colleagues in this House. I quote:

> With a debt heading toward $400-billion and a projected deficit, despite the cuts, of $28.5-billion next year, it would be fascinating to hear how the usual suspects and regional tub-thumpers would have acted. Chances are their "solutions" would have varied as much as their criticisms.

Certainly in the case of one party we know what its solutions are because it was in government long enough to prove that it knew how to spend money.

An hon. member: That was the problem.

Mr. Soetens: Now I would like to talk about some of those positive features I mentioned were in the budget.

So that I do not mislead anyone at the outset, I have to say that this budget is not perfect. As long as we have a deficit in any budget presentation, I know there is room for improvement. However we are going in the right direction. The deficit is going down. This budget clearly shows that there is some light at the end of the tunnel. We can see when we stop paying or increasing the debt. In fact in the budget there is some direction that indicates we are going to start paying it back. I find that very comforting. Although it is not perfect it is going an awful long way toward being perfect.

As I mentioned, six years ago the deficit was $38-plus billion. Four years ago the deficit was at $30.6 billion, as it was last year.

This budget forecasts the deficit to be $28.5 billion and next year it will be $26.8 billion. Those are positive steps. Those are things members of the Opposition ought to be talking about very proudly in their presentations. No, they did not rate a lot of mention in their presentations.

That is the improvement. This budget sets the stage for continuing growth and strength in the economy, which directly improves Canada's ability to deal with the debt. Until that debt is addressed, our ability to spend money in some of the very appropriate areas members opposite are talking about just cannot be addressed fully.

How did we accomplish these positive steps in the budget? No, contrary to the comments of some in this House, we did not attack social programs.

Exempt from any impact in this budget will be things like elderly benefits, old age security, family allowance, spouses allowance, guaranteed income supplements, veterans pensions, and unemployment benefits. None of those will be affected in any negative fashion by this budget.

Family benefit programs provided through the province will still be protected fully except in three provinces. One of those provinces is one in which I am a resident. In spite of the fact that they are not fully protected, they will still have an extra 5 per cent to spend on those programs if they need it.

It is not like we cut them back. We did not attack those people who need assistance the most. We made sure that the funds continue to be available. Since the government is holding all Government of Canada spending to a 3 per cent increase, it is not unreasonable to ask the provinces to share in that 3 per cent level. In the past, while we have been restricting ourselves to 3 per cent, we have been passing money to them at 6.6 per cent. We are saying to them, as we are saying to all Canadians, it is time for restraint. If you want money from the federal government, we will make it available to you on the same basis as we make it available to all government programs in which we participate at about 3 per cent. I do not think that is an unreasonable situation.

A lot has been mentioned about provincial transfers. There are various ways in which we transfer money to the provinces. Established Programs Financing is one. That has been frozen for all provinces, except for any adjustments owing to the variable due to population capacity.

This program traditionally funded health care and post-secondary funding, but since 1977 there is no relationship between the money we provide to the provinces and the services that they provide to their constituents.

Let me talk about Ontario for a minute. I read one headlines a little earlier about how badly Ontario was affected. In Ontario we have lists of people in hospitals waiting for major surgery. Cancer patients have to travel from Toronto to Ottawa and even to U.S. cities for that special care they need. Never mind the problems that rural Ontario faces, even urban Ontario has some real serious problems with health care.

The Treasurer of Ontario just this week made a special point of flying back from Florida to announce that he has balanced his budget because of an unexpected transfer of $950 million through taxation from the federal government. That is $950 million extra that he was not expecting.

Did he use it to hire one more nurse or one more doctor? No, he did not.

Did he use it to send one patient to a distant hospital for that special care? No, he did not.

Did he use it to build one more hospital room or to fulfil his promise to my constituents to double the size of the Ajax and Pickering General Hospital? No, he did not.

Did he use it to fulfil his commitment to my constituents that he would enlarge the Whitby General Hospital for extended care beds? No, he did not. When members in the House argue that health care will be affected, it is clear that in Ontario at least the provincial government will use it as it pleases.

I should comment that the province of Ontario did not use that money to improve the cash problems that universities are experiencing either.

Prior to the budget release I read some views in some articles that defence spending would be hit and hit hard. It was not. It was capped at a 5 per cent increase.

In this time when there are changing demands on our forces with the circumstances occurring throughout the world, the military needs this money. I certainly support that. It will have to live within its 5 per cent ceiling.

I should talk to some degree about the grants to business because I have heard some comments there. All across this country I have heard people comment about the fact that we ought to stop giving money to business. Throughout the entire hearing process as we travelled across Canada on the goods and services tax, that was the most favoured presentation by most of the chambers of commerce that appeared before us. Whether they represented rural parts of Canada or urbanized cities, they all supported a stop to these grants to business.

Lo and behold, now that they are in place I hear comments from the Opposition that say: "You can't do that. You can't stop these grants. You have to allow us to spend this money".

Grants are important and assistance is still there, but is it not better that assistance be provided on the basis that if it is such a good idea there will be a return on that particular assistance program to the federal Treasury and to taxpayers and the money will be repaid in reasonable terms and rates? Certainly on that side I think the budget has been very positive.

One of the highlights of the budget is the selling of a portion of PetroCan. I am sure all Canadians will endorse that. When a company is asked to operate in the private sector, it has to be given the tools to operate in full in the private sector. Unfortunately any company owned by the federal government that needs cash has a problem. We cannot give them any. Therefore putting Petro-Canada back into the private sector enables it to operate fully like Canadians would expect it to operate to generate the revenues, to generate investment and to create the jobs that Canada needs. I whole-heartedly endorse the move by the federal government to return Petro-Canada in stages back to the private sector to let it do as it should be doing.

There are numerous other areas of spending that have been addressed. I would like to get into them today but I appreciate that I cannot. I would like to close by saying to you, Madam Speaker that I appreciate this opportunity to address the House on the budget, particularly knowing that the member for Halifax West allowed me to speak in his place. He was most anxious. We switched places to do this, so I thank the member for the opportunity to speak at this point on the budget.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, in listening to the member's speech he touched on social programs and the fact that they did not cut back on social programs this time around.

However, one area he did not get into to which I would like to direct his attention was that of seniors. In looking at the Estimates we see that the senior's independence program has been cut $3.5 million and we look at the effect of this budget on seniors in particular.

In looking at the press release the One Voice Seniors Network put out yesterday, I note that it has pointed out that some of the measures of the government which will hurt seniors are the massive cut-backs in social housing. It pointed out that even though it is not in this budget the clawback will be coming into effect and is going to affect them. It also pointed out that through the government's policies and the goods and service tax they will now be paying tax on many things they have not paid tax on before.

I know the member will stand and say that they are going to be in a better position than they were in before because of the rebate system. I would also like the member to point out them that it is only partially indexed to inflation and that in fact they are going to be treading backward in the years to come.

Seniors are now going to be paying tax under the goods and service tax on things like the recreation, golfing, movies, and bowling. They are going to be paying tax on the taxis for those who do not have transportation to go down to the stores in the small communities which do not have public transportation to get their groceries.

We are seeing in the cut-backs to provincial transfer payments problems with social assistance on which many, particularly senior women, depend for top-ups. Those programs now must either be taken over by the province, or more funding has to be put in, or cut back. Similarly the member has talked about the health programs. I would suggest that those will also be hurt.

There are a number of factors where seniors are going to be hurt. By cutting these things to seniors we are ignoring seniors in the future. We have an ageing population. We have to face the facts that we must redirect our priorities in looking to the future, not only for the next generation but for our generation who is now ageing. My question to the member is this. Will he try to convince the Minister of Finance, the members of his party, the cabinet minister, his colleagues and the Progressive Conservative government that they cannot continue to ignore the aging population of Canada? They must fortify not destroy the programs that have been set in place up until now.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, it was certainly a very well thought out question. I guess the only debate I would have with the question is on the facts contained within it. Let me give some clear examples.

The member talked about the One Voice Seniors Network. They are well known supporters of particular viewpoints that the member is concerned with. I understand that.

In the presentation that the One Voice Seniors Network sent out to many of its membership, they talked about the impact of the goods and services tax. As I suggested during my speech, members of the opposition want to debate the goods and services tax rather than the budget. I will try to answer partially the hon. member's comment about the goods and services tax and partially his comment about the impact.

The goods and services tax in the brochure sent out by the One Voice Seniors Network talked about a new tax on telephone communication, a new tax on fuel, a tax on rents and of course, as Madam Speaker is aware, those are misstatements of the information that is provided.

If we are concerned about whether a senior should pay tax on golf, I can understand that that would be of concern to the member who asked the question. I am not sure I can say that seniors who have contacted me are concerned about having to pay tax on their golf.

With regard to the clawback, it is awfully nice to again hear the member speak about protecting the rights of seniors who make $77,000 a year and have to pay back their entire old age security. He talks about taxing high income earners and when we do that, he says we cannot do it.

Ultimately he is concerned about how Canadians are affected by this. Are seniors being affected? Let me put it this way. Seniors would be far more affected in the impact of social programs if we did not bring the deficit under control. Without a controlled deficit, all programs for all Canadians will be under attack. By reining in the deficit, we have a much stronger ability to protect all the social programs that Canadians want and expect.

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker, I rise today with great pleasure to ask my hon. colleague a question relative to the remarks that he has given today on a subject that no doubt is near and dear to the hearts of a lot of Canadians.

When I say to the hearts, I am talking about those who are capable of looking at the entire problem and not just looking at isolated problems. Our national debt is in fact a national problem of the kind of magnitude that it will take the credibility of people like my hon. colleague to resolve. My hon. colleague and I got to know each other as we spent a week in Saint-Jean, Quebec and learned a little bit about each other. I find that he is a man of integrity and I would entreat him to the residents of the constituency of Ontario.

I found as I followed him around the finance committee hearings throughout the past year that he indeed was a man who did provide a lot work to the committee. I have a couple of questions or points to which I would like him to respond.

First is the matter of Petro-Canada. He did touch on this subject. He did not touch on another component to it that I think if he had the opportunity he would like to and that is how much more effective Petro-Canada will be once the pride of ownership is given as an opportunity for these individuals who own these service stations.

Second is perhaps a little enlightening experience with respect to the fact that we are a government that does not govern by poll. Of course, we are doing some pretty unpopular things. Perhaps he could address to his constituents and to the members of this House how tough it is to be a member of the finance committee and a member of a government which believes in paying its bills.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, it is certainly a very good question and I appreciate the member asking it.

He is right, we did have a chance to get to learn a little more about each other certainly in our week at Saint-Jean, Quebec. I do not know if I failed the course, but I certainly would not profess to be bilingual at this point in time. I appreciate, though, that we did have an opportunity to try to learn together on what I think we both found a very difficult subject.

But on the issue of Petro-Canada, I would like to comment that certainly in my constituency, and I presume the same applies particularly in western Canada, there is an awful lot of people who simply will not shop at Petro-Canada because it is owned by the taxpayers.

There is a group of constituents in this country who believe that Petro-Canada should be owned by the private sector. People want to shop at Canadian businesses. There is no doubt about that. And if Petro-Canada were owned by the private sector, first, it would have the freedom to make some investments, to borrow some money, and make some long term commitments without the constraint of the federal government in its pocket. Right now PetroCan cannot borrow money without our approval because, of course, we are the owners of it.

When we do not have any money ourselves, it is awfully difficult for us to argue that somebody else ought to be allowed to borrow it. So I think that the freedom that Petro-Canada needs to operate as a private corporation in the private sector will enable it to be even more positive and more aggressive in fulfilling the mandate that it has. I have a lot of constituents who would be happy for that to happen.

Yes, being on the finance committee is tough. But I can tell you that constituents throughout my constituency and certainly throughout most of Canada want the government to address the deficit. They want to address the way we spend our money and I think that that is where leadership comes in. You just have to make those tough decisions. We are making them, and, yes, I am sorry we are down in the polls, but I know we are making the right decisions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now expired.

Before recognizing the next member in debate, I would like to tell the House that I have received written notice from the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan that he is unable to move his motion during the hour of Private Members' Business on Friday, February 23, 1990.

Since it was not possible to exchange positions on the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94, I instruct the clerk to move this item to the bottom of the order of precedence.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business will therefore be cancelled and, pursuant to Standing Order 94, the House will continue with the business before it at that time.

[English]

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, it is with mixed feelings that I rise to discuss the budget introduced so recently. It attacks all those things that the members of the New Democratic Party in this House hold dear. It attacks the sick, the students of the future, and it attacks the very poor in our society. Fully 70 per cent of the cuts in this budget attack the sick, the students and the poor, which is an indictment that I do not think any party, any government or any finance minister would want to spread around too freely.

It is not a surprise at all that only 19 per cent of people in this country support this government's position. This government was reminded by 88 per cent of Canadians not to cut post-secondary education and health care, and yet it went ahead and did it anyway.

This budget indicates that the government has run out of ideas and has no idea on how to manage the economy. The Tories have preached restraint now for six years and have yet to target the greatest single contribution to the size of the deficit—our insanely high interest rates.

With peace breaking out all over Europe, this government has not touched defence spending. In fact, defence spending will increase by 5 per cent, at the same time that consideration is being made to move the doomsday clock away from midnight for the first time since the Second World War.

This government continues to move the tax burden from the rich and the powerful, the multinationals and the millionaires onto to the middle and lower income groups. The Minister of Finance's own figures indicate that last year another $1 billion was shifted from corporations onto ordinary income earners. Taxes received from corporations were $1 billion less than projected, while the taxes received from individual Canadians were $1 billion more than was projected, a continuation of the move away from those who can best afford to pay taxes to those who can least afford to pay taxes.

Now the government claims that it has no choices left as to where to cut. Rather than show some leadership on the world stage and contribute to a lessening of international tensions by cutting defence spending, they now attack medicare. Instead of reducing interest rates, the government raises them and then cuts education spending to make up for the increased borrowing charges. Rather than let the Canadian dollar resume a sustainable level which would encourage our export industries, the Minister of Finance announces plans in the budget to borrow $3 billion to intervene on the international money market.

The lack of imagination shown by the government in addressing the needs of the country is so atrocious it brings new meaning to deadly dull. Their dullness now threatens the health of Canadians, their dullness attacks veterans by gouging them for an additional $35 million in user fees, their dullness threatens the future competitiveness of Canada by reducing access to post-secondary education.

Why should the sick, the poor and our youth be sacrificed so that this government can gamble $3 billion on the money market? Why are small businesses, farmers, home owners and consumers gouged with the highest real interest rates, second only to those that the Liberals created? Why are they gouging small businesses, farmers, home owners and consumers?

The Minister of Finance is like a little boy in his obsession with the level of the dollar. He wants to go to international meetings and boast about the size of it. The government is making up for its mismanagement of the economy by attacking the most defenceless members of our society—the poor, the sick and the youth. As I said, fully 70 per cent of these budget cuts are on the backs of the sick, the students and the poorest in our society.

There is no excuse for this, Mr. Speaker. It is a shameful recognition of the direction this government is following. Eighty-eight per cent of Canadians told the government not to cut health and post-secondary education funding, but it went ahead anyway. This is bullying of the worst kind, when a government refuses to listen to those who elected it, refuses to listen to the people it is representing.

The minister with his fat bank account and his life of privilege understands nothing of the daily struggle faced by millions of Canadians. Now he wants to undermine the national underpinnings of medicare, Canada's most essential and most valued social program.

This is the third time the government has taken the axe to health and post-secondary education spending. In 1986, the Conservatives reduced spending by 2 per cent a year, in 1989 they reduced spending by a further 1 per cent a year and now, less than a year later, they have reduced increases to 0 per cent a year. Given the government's own projections of approximately 5 per cent inflation per year over the next several years, it means that health and post-secondary education spending will decline in real terms for the first time since these programs were established and decline by 5 per cent each year.

Anyone who visits our universities and colleges, anyone who visits our hospitals knows full well that these institutions cannot afford a cut of 5 per cent a year. Already they are struggling to meet the demands that are placed upon them and this 5 per cent cut will make it impossible for them to ensure that we have the high quality health care that Canadians deserve and need, and that we have the high quality education system that Canadians need in order to take on the world economy of the future. It is short-sighted. It is short-sighted and it makes no sense.

The Minister of Finance has spoken about the enormous effects of compound interest in describing the growth of the deficit, but with his customary hypocrisy, he has not mentioned the compounding effect of all of the cuts to health and education spending. The total effect of the 1986 cuts was over $2 billion between 1986-87 and 1988-89. Because of the magic of compounding, the initial cuts have now reached $2 billion each year and, of course, the figure is growing. That just represents one of the three cuts this government has made with regard to health and post-secondary education funding.

When we consider the effects of the new freeze on health and post-secondary education funding, we have to include the 1 per cent cut announced last year. Incidentally, Bill C-33, which announced that cut has still not been passed by Parliament and, of course if New Democrats and the people of Canada have anything to do with it, we will make sure that it never gets passed.

The Minister of Finance has said that the government will save $7.3 billion over five years with the proposed freeze in transfer payments. The effect of this, plus the 1 per cent cut last year, if that is included, plus the 2 per cent, means that the actual cut that this government has made to health and post-secondary education is close to $11 billion over a seven-year period. To indicate the magnitude of that cut, the annual budget of the University of Saskatchewan, as you fully well know, Mr. Speaker, is about $160 million. That shows the extent of the cuts of this government, the slashing that it is making of two of our most valuable programs, health and post-secondary education.

If health and education spending had grown at the rate expected before the minister began to amputate the funds, the federal government would be spending $30 billion more between 1986-87 and 1994-95. These cuts are unprecedented in their size, and they are unprecedented in their lack of consultation.

I do not suppose the Minister of Finance would find one hospital, one university, one student, one professor, one doctor or one nurse who agreed with the extent of these cuts. In fact, they are so huge that they are even greater than the gouging and slashing undertaken by the Liberals when they introduced their infamous six and five program which dramatically cut spending on post-secondary education and made two other further cuts to both health and post-secondary education.

Mr. Speaker, what we are seeing is the end of a dream. When New Democrats forced the federal government to bring in medicare and hospital insurance nearly 30 years ago, it was recognized that Canadians from every part of the country should have similar levels of health care. That is why a national program was designed, so that every province, not just the better off ones could provide health care.

The then Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, who was so much a champion of health care would turn over in his grave when watching what his modern-day colleagues are doing. It was recognized then and it remains just as true today that Canadians should not be penalized by their place of birth or by how poor their parents are. Every Canadian has a right to medical care. It is immoral and unjust to place a higher value on the health and lives of the rich, or those who live in wealthier provinces, than on the health and lives of the poor, or those who live in less well-off regions.

Perhaps the Minister of Health needs to be reminded that he has moved from being the Minister of Defence to the Minister of Health. The defence budget will recognize an increase by some $700 million in this budget, while the health care budgets and education budgets of this country are slashed.

This is a government which prefers guns over health care. It is a government whose priorities are wrong. With post-secondary education in the late sixties, the federal government began a system of transfers of tax points and cash to the provinces. There was a national consensus that young people from every part of the country should have access to higher education.

Young people in Newfoundland and Saskatchewan should not be forced to travel thousands of miles to attend universities in southern Ontario. Young people in Quebec should have access to higher education in their own language rather than travelling outside the province to study in a foreign tongue far from home.

The national dream of equal treatment for all Canadians is being destroyed by the government's actions in this budget. This government has determined that it does not matter who you are, it matters how thick your wallet is. Post-secondary education will no longer be available to bright young people if their parents are poor. Universities and colleges will become the preserves, even more than they are now, of the upper classes. No longer will health care be a right. Now we copy the horrifying

American system where health care is a commodity, the best that money can buy.

It is ironic that while Americans are demanding a health care system like we have in Canada, we are making the choice to have a health care system like they have. We all know the problems that that will create, the numbers of people who are inadequately or not covered by the system and the fact that the rich have private hospitals with luxurious suites while the poor are denied basic health care. That is the direction we are moving in. Americans want our system. Our government is rejecting that system for one which is so flawed.

What is the minister's expertise to determine that people do not get as sick in Nova Scotia as they do in Alberta? Why is he encouraging the privatization of medical care, the creation of two health care systems; one for the rich and one for the poor.

We have already seen from Alberta suggestions that this is the direction in which the health care system should move. We have heard all sorts of pronouncements from the government, both with regard to health care and post-secondary education, about how important they are to the country and about how committed this government is to those two programs.

Actions speak louder than words. When we look at who is going to pay for the government's philosophy, when we look at what the government actually does in pursuing its big business, free enterprise, anti-Canadian policy, we can see who pays the cost.

There are cuts and shifts out the national AIDS program which will make it more difficult for us to fight the war on AIDS which this government has said is such a priority. Twelve million dollars is taken out of that strategy and moved to other places. Support groups in favour of improving health services and looking into research and education in public health lose out by $900,000. Support groups which are advocating health promotion lose out by $150,000. The national health surveillance program which attempts to ensure that Canadians are protected from health hazards and ensures that our health standards are adequate is cut by $12 million. Programs for vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons, one of the most vulnerable groups we have in our society, are cut by $15 million. Support services for welfare recipients, again a group which is severely disadvantaged in our society, have cuts of $2 million. Cuts in programs to address child care problems and to encourage the increase in quality of child care cut by $2 million. Cuts to programs to assist seniors in supporting themselves and in leading a dignified and happy life by $3.5 million.

The legitimate role of the federal government has been traditionally to help the most vulnerable in our society, the less well off. If, as the Conservatives believe, that there is no longer a role for government in this respect, if, as they can attack the poor, the disabled, the sick and the old, who is going to play this role? Is the private sector going to do this for us? That is what the government seems to be suggesting. Is it going to conduct research into AIDS, is it going to assist those people living with disabilities, is it going to investigate aspects of seniors' health care, is it going to help seniors live in their own homes with some dignity and with some happiness? Is big business going to support the support groups which want to investigate measures which can assist in our health care program?

Clearly it is not. So what this government is doing is attacking those very programs and those very groups which can assist us in making our society a better place. The government is saying, if you are sick in Newfoundland, you do not deserve the same high quality of health care as better off Canadians do. It is saying that if you are a student in Saskatchewan you are not entitled to the same high quality university education as you are in rich provinces. The government is saying that health promotion, the fight against AIDS, the disabled, battered women, children, seniors, those on welfare are no longer priorities of this government.

I think we have to assess the philosophy of this government and look carefully at what this government is doing. If we look at the budget we see that there was nothing on the environment. Such a short period of time ago the government was professing great commitment to the environment and to an economic program which paid attention to environmental concerns. Yet as soon as the first budget comes along, after these pronouncements, we see nothing in the budget at all for the environment. We see nothing to address the crisis in Atlantic Canada, a crisis which is going to affect tens of thousands of people in Newfoundland and the maritime provinces, tens of thousands of people in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. We saw nothing in the budget to make the wealthy and corporations pay their fair share of taxes. We saw nothing to help the homeless. Indeed we see cuts to social housing. There is nothing to help feed the 1.2 million children who go to bed hungry in this country.

We see nothing which would have addressed the concerns of the deficit other than those cuts on the least well off in our society. We saw no imagination in terms of adjusting tax rates for the wealthy and for corporations. While corporations can write off to the tune of almost $1 billion their lunches and their entertainment expenses, this government in this country of so much wealth is taxing those people who are earning less than the poverty line.

People that we see in our offices—do not know whether the Tory members see them in their offices—are already suffering and not able to cope with this government's cuts.

In conclusion, this budget fits into the Tory philosophy. It helps the rich and it hurts the poor. The last speaker talked about free trade and the goods and services tax. He wondered why some speakers were referring to these particular measures. Well, it all fits into the same package.

As we have seen from those recent public opinion polls, the government represents only 19 per cent of Canadians, the richest Canadians and not the poorest. Free trade involved us giving up control of our economy and attacking people, the sick, students and the poor. This budget is putting into effect the same philosophy which sat behind the free trade deal into social programs and the way in which this economy will be managed.

We see increased regional disparity. There is no effort in the government's activities to help those less well off regions. The attacks were not quite as hard as those on the richer provinces, but there was nothing to redress the enormous problems of the regions of the country. Members of the government should go out and visit those regions to see the enormity of the problems. Then maybe they would concentrate on addressing them.

There is the privatization of Petro-Canada which will take away our last vestiges of an attempt to control our own oil and gas reserves. There is privatization in the health care system. It has to come, and we are already seeing it because there simply is not enough money going into the public system. We are going to see increased privatization in the post-secondary education too as tuition fees go up and as we see private universities springing up in the country.

We have a two-tiered system which the government is pushing upon on us, one for the rich and one for the poor. There is an Americanization of our programs and an Americanization of our society. It is one in which the rich do well by the government and the poor get trodden on. It is simply not acceptable. The people of Canada are speaking out all over the place. We see it from the public opinion polls today and whenever we see ordinary Canadians in our office and at meetings. The country is sick of these unfair programs which protect the rich and hurt the poor. The government, of course, and members opposite will feel the brunt of it come the next election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, sometimes I am afraid that we, in the House of Commons, have become so insulated against the empty rhetoric of members of the New Democratic Party that perhaps we should stop to think that perhaps somebody else is actually listening to them and accepting some of the material. Let me make a couple of comments to point out a few things to the public.

The NDP constantly takes credit for being the institutors of our health care system. What nonsense! I was a solicitor in the Department of the Attorney General of the Province of Nova Scotia in 1957 and 1958 when the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, who was then the Prime Minister of Canada, was promoting the hospital plan. That was the precursor or our medical care plan for all Canada.

An hon. member: It happened in Saskatchewan in 1952. Where were you in 1952?

Mr. Crosby: He required the consent of six provinces in order to implement the hospital care plan across Canada. He prevailed upon Nova Scotia and the Hon. Robert Stanfield to join with the five other provinces which had agreed to participate. That was the beginning of public hospital care in Canada. It had nothing to do with the New Democratic Party. What colossal nonsense, perpetrating this fraud over a period of time as though some person in the province of Saskatchewan created the whole medicare plan.

An hon. member: Have you ever heard of Tommy Douglas?

Mr. Crosby: Time and time again we are faced with this nonsense. The onus is on members to stand up from time to time, forget the empty rhetoric, and give the facts to the House of Commons.

I want to go after another area of empty rhetoric that the member mentioned, Petro-Canada, the great white father of the oil industry. The executives fly around in the same jets as every other oil company. It has the same rules and regulations for its dealers. It overcharges its dealers on tires and batteries and other accessories. It has the same plans and programs as any other oil company.

I would like to ask the member what will be the loss? Do you know any dealers? Have you ever talked to a Petro-Canada dealer and asked him or her what the arrangements were as opposed to private enterprise dealers? Put that to the test. Ask any Petro-Canada dealer how sad he will be when privatization takes place. Those are the little people who Petro-Canada is supposed to protect, not the corporate executives.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that coming from Saskatchewan, we are both amused and surprised at what the member from Nova Scotia just said. Perhaps the member forgot Tommy Douglas, Woodrow Lloyd and Allan Blakeney. Perhaps he forgot, as this government seems to have forgotten, that Saskatchewan even exists. Saskatchewan was the province which brought into operation hospitalization and ran medicare on its own without any federal support for six to seven years. So let us not hear this nonsense about it. If we look at the history books we can see it.

In terms of the national program, without the lead of Saskatchewan and the New Democratic Party, this country would not have a medicare program. We will be labouring under the same system as the Americans have in which most of our less well-off citizens would not be covered by adequate health care facilities.

An hon. member: A Tory system.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Yes, a Tory system. One which favours the rich and hurts the poor. Let us not hear any more nonsense about the origins of medicare. It is quite clear where the origins of medicare were. They were situated in Saskatchewan and in the CCF, the forerunner of the New Democratic Party, which persuaded the rest of the country that this was a good idea.

Mr. Diefenbaker, of course, played a role in making medicare a national program. Everyone in Saskatchewan, and indeed all of us in the New Democratic Party, would admit to that role. He was supportive of the medicare system as we all know, somewhat to the surprise of his colleagues in the Conservative party at the time, and to the establishment in big business and the medical community. He did play a role and we all recognize that role.

Of course, he would be turning over in his grave at what the government is doing to medicare and what they are doing to Saskatchewan and the other poorer regions of the country. The member opposite knows that. Mr. Diefenbaker was not as neo-conservative as the government is. Mr. Diefenbaker was a traditional Tory who cared about ordinary Canadians, unlike the government.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, yesterday we congratulated our colleague on his expertise in a particular area. Now I have to congratulate him on his versatility. He is on his feet every day expounding words that Canadians want to hear. He struck a lot of nerves across this country.

He mentioned one of our favourites: corporations. He said we should be taxing corporations. I had occasion to ask Revenue Canada a couple of months ago what constitutes a large corporation. I was told $10 million and above. I asked, how do you arrive at that figure? The answer was it was very complex but about $7 million constitutes a large corporation. I asked how one got from $7 million to $10 million. The answer was that one had to err on the side of caution. I thought that was a very interesting answer to what designates a large corporation. One could only hope that the minimum wage and poverty line would be so flexible for Canadians.

The deficit that the Conservative party has suddenly found to be the major problem in the country popped up in December, 1988. In November, 1988, it was no problem at all. We went through a whole campaign and there was not a mention of it. "It is in our financial commitments and we are fiscally responsible". Two months later, all of a sudden, we broke all those promises and now the deficit is a major problem.

As far as the budget process is concerned, the Prime Minister in his now famous book that you can buy for 99 cents at any Coles bookstore across this country, said consultation is very important. The budget process must be a consultative one. It cannot be dropped out of nowhere one night. That is exactly what happened this time. The Minister of Finance was too busy to meet with anybody prior to this budget, breaking a long traditional process. Instead he sent out 50 letters. I think he read three of them. He read the ones from his friends and said this is what we have to do.

I am sure that the vision of the country that the government has is very different from our vision and this member's. He is a very caring politician. What is his vision of the country and how does he think the New Democratic Party would move toward that vision of our country?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question. One thing about us as New Democrats is that, before anybody else and anything else, in terms of our approach to dealing with the deficit, which we recognize is a serious problem and the other problems of the country, we put people first.

There was an old slogan, of course, of the CCF: "People before profits." What that reflected was a desire to give people a helping hand, rather than a kick in the teeth, which is what the government specializes in.

So, we should put people first. We should look for policies which help people, care about people, enable people to live happy and healthy lives, enable people to be educated even though they may be poor, enable people to have health care even though they may be poor, and encourage them to work and have jobs, rather than discourage them. We would help the regions, not hurt them. We would look for the resources to do that from people other than those whom the government looks to for those resources.

The government looks to the poor and the least able to provide the resources to deal with the country's problems and concerns. It leaves those who are most well off, the wealthy, the corporations with tax loopholes for the rich, and so on. That is where we would look for those ways in which we could provide the resources to solve the problems for the country.

Clearly, we would also attack interest rates in a meaningful way, which is simply not what this government is doing. In fact, interest rates are getting very close to the level at which the Liberals had them in their heyday. There is now a gap of almost 9 per cent between inflation and interest rates. At the height of the Liberal hypocrisy dealing with interest rates, the gap was about 11 per cent. We are not very far off from a very similar situation which hurts ordinary Canadians the most.

We would look for places where people are able to provide resources, not attack the least well off in our society.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, let me continue this debate on the budget of 1990 by quoting some of the principles introduced by a Minister of Finance in the House of Commons. These are financial principles adopted by the Minister of Finance.

> First, we must continue to practice fiscal responsibility. We must persist in restraining government spending. We must strive to contain the rise of the deficit—we must rigorously review our priorities to ensure that existing programs continue to serve valid objectives—we must continue to rely primarily on the dynamism and creativity of the private sector as the engine of growth in Canada.

I am sure members of Parliament recognize that as consistent with the thoughts expressed by the Minister of Finance in his budget. But they are, in fact, remarks made by the Hon. Marc Lalonde, when he introduced his budget in October, 1982.

Now the difference is that the Hon. Marc Lalonde as Minister of Finance under a Liberal government did not abide by those principles. He enunciated them in the House of Commons, but he did not follow them in his subsequent financial plans. As a result, we are left with the deficit and debt mess that we encountered in 1984 and we have been trying to fight that situation ever since.

Marc Lalonde was not the only Liberal finance minister guilty of those grave deceptions. Back in the 1960s, the Hon. Edgar Benson made similar remarks in the House of Commons. He said that he intended to continue severe restraint. The government's experience in the previous year and the prospects for the following year forced it to recognize the central problem of the control of public expenditures in Canada at the time. But again, Mr. Benson, as Minister of Finance, and subsequent finance ministers, did not abide by the principles they enunciated.

Now the members opposite in the Liberal party and the New Democratic party criticize us for enunciating those principles of financial responsibility and then abiding by them. That is the difference. They simply used those principles as rhetoric. We use them as a plan of action. So that is what the budget is all about. It is about reality. It is about the realities of the financial situation of the Government of Canada.

Our goal has to be that of getting our economic and financial house in order. Let us compare it with the family. Who would lend money to a family who for 20 years overspent its budget? They bought a new car when they could not afford a new car. They bought equipment for their homes, took vacations, and constantly overspent. Now would any banker or lender want to assist that family in future expenditures? They would say to them, no, that is not the way to operate. You have to go back and get control of your budget. You have to account for your revenues and relate your expenditures to those revenues.

That is very basic financial responsibility and it applies equally to any government or institution. Revenues have to relate to your expenditures. How can anybody complain in the House of Commons or anywhere else in Canada? As the Minister of Finance says: "I will tell you what we are going to do for 1990-1991 and all future years. We are going to relate our revenues as the government to our expenditures and we are going to bring them into balance." How can anybody quarrel with that?

What has happened over the last five years since the Progressive Conservative government took office in 1984. That is exactly what we have done. We have related our revenues to expenditures.

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosby: The member laughs, the member who is a part of the government that in 1984 allowed the national debt to rise to $200 billion. They then say: "Why did you people not do something about it? Why did you not eliminate the debt and reduce the deficit to zero?" How could you possibly do that?

The members opposite and all other members of the House of Commons knows that it has to be a gradual process unless they are willing to cut off social programs.

Mr. Manley: What's left?

Mr. Crosby: They stand in the House and defend social programs and say: "Don't reduce social programs." Then they take away the financial ability to provide those social programs. Now that is hypocrisy of the worst kind, to pretend to defend social programs and to pretend to support social programs and their expansion and to look after needs as they are created in the Canadian public and then to deprive the government of the financial ability to do that. What sense does that make? Does anybody in Canada really believe that that is possible, to continue spending, not raise revenues and allow the deficiency and the deficit to occur year after year? I do not think any Canadian would fail to realize that that kind of process can lead to disaster.

The greatest threat to social programs is a bankrupt national treasury. I defy any member of the House of Commons to stand up and say that that is not the case. A bankrupt national treasury will not provide or support any social program. Just ask somebody from Argentina, Brazil or Poland about that.

People are always talking about eastern Europe. Look at eastern Europe and what is happening with the rise of democracy. But listen to Gorbachev, Walesa and Havel. They will tell you. The lesson they have learned in eastern Europe is you cannot go on spending and not producing. What they are saying to their workers and people is that they have got to be realistic about their economy. People have to work and contribute if they want any benefits from their society. That is what they found out in eastern Europe and that is why they are marching in Prague and in all those eastern European countries. They are marching for democracy, but they are also marching for enterprise because they know that that is the solution to their problem. They know that you cannot take more than you give, as the members in the New Democratic Party are always pretending. You cannot take more out of the system collectively than you put into it. It is as simple as that. If Canadians do not realize that, we are in big trouble.

That is our job, to convince Canadians that that is the situation. How are we going to do that? We have to point out, time and time again, even though the members opposite do not want to hear it, the great disaster that was nearly brought on the country by years of Liberal deficits piling up, detailed, not by members of the Progressive Conservative Party, but by people like Terence Wiells in The Gazette. I read his article dated Sunday, April 23, 1989, where he said: "How did we get into this mess?" and details from Benson on through, year by year, Liberal budget after Liberal budget, leading to deficit. You get sick of saying it, but if people will not listen you have to keep saying it until they do listen because the legacy of years of debt is a financial disaster for Canada. It is an erosion of social programs, the inability to carry on and reach all your national and international commitments.

What does it mean in dollars? Very simply, when we came into office in 1984 there was a $16 billion deficit in program spending. That meant that the amount spent by the government on programs was $16 billion more than the revenue. In 1989–90 there was a $9 billion surplus on program spending. That is, we lived by the principles announced by the Minister of Finance. We said we are going to relate revenues to expenditures and we produced a surplus of $9 billion.

But here is what people have to realize. If you take those two figures, the deficit of the Liberal government prior to 1984 and the surplus that we established over a five year period, and add them together, that is $25 billion. Add that to the current deficit of $30 billion which we are still incurring and the figure is $55 billion. If we had not taken action we took in 1984 and in subsequent years we would have a deficit in this country of over $50 billion.

Can you imagine what that would do to our dollar? It would not be worth 50 cents. People are complaining that the dollar is going down. It would go down right to the bottom, below 50 cents. What would interest rates be? We would be glad to pay 13 or 14 per cent because they would be 26 per cent. What would inflation be with a $50 billion deficit in Canada? Talk about double digit. There is no such thing as triple digit but I can tell you it would go a heck of a lot higher than 11 or 12 per cent that we saw in the early 1980s.

So those are the kinds of problems that have to be underlined and understood by all Canadians or they are not going to understand the programs that the Minister of Finance has introduced, the initiatives that he has taken to right the wrongs. That is why I say the budget is about reality.

Let us talk about the opposite of that reality. Members opposite like to mention the polls. No problem with the polls. We can get back on top, we can go up to 50 per cent or even 60 per cent. All we have to do is restore VIA Rail and its $600 million a year deficit, let the Post Office carry on as it did before and produce another $600 million deficit instead of the $70 million surplus they experienced in the last fiscal year. We can roll back tax increases. We will not require Canadians to pay any more in taxes. We can increase the OAS, the GIS, we can roll back the unemployment insurance changes. We can just fund the deficit on the unemployment insurance plan.

We can go on with all sorts of programs that will bankrupt the national treasury and everybody would be happy. They would think that was wonderful. They would all support the Progressive Conservative government because they would be getting more money in transfer payments. They would have all kinds of services. But for how long? It might last a year, it might last two years, it might even last three years. But sooner or later you have to pay the piper and when the Canadian people pay that piper they will find they are paying enormous interest rates. They are going to have to face the reality that the whole system is going to collapse.

But the government is not going to let the system collapse. They are not going to be misled by the empty rhetoric of members opposite and members of the New Democratic Party. We are going to grasp the realities of the situation and that is why we say the budget is about reality.

I have already indicated the government's record of expenditures and the important things that have been done over a period of time—the down-sizing of the Public Service, the fact that the Public Service, in 1990, is no larger than it was several years ago. There are 12,300 less persons employed in the Public Service of Canada. I have mentioned Canada Post and the fact that they now produce a surplus, whereas years ago there was a $600 million deficit. That is the same in various other areas of activity.

The other important initiatives that we have taken would take too long to list. But let me just leave you with this thought, Madam Speaker, and members of the House of Commons; this has been at a price paid by the people of Canada. We understand that. The people of Canada have been great contributors to this righting of the national economy in terms of taxes. Yes, the revenues of Canada have gone from $70 billion in 1984 to close to $120 billion in the next fiscal year and that is the contribution of the people of Canada. We respect that and we know it was at some sacrifice and suffering. We know that the people have paid more taxes. But I hope they realize that that contribution is going to pay off. It is going to pay off in a solid economy, an economy that is respected not only domestically but internationally all around the world.

We know public servants have paid a price. They have had downsizing and I hope they understand the need and desirability of that initiative. They have taken lower salary increases, below the inflation rate in many cases. That has been a tremendous contribution to the Canadian economy because it shows to the whole Canadian labour force, all working people including ourselves, that that ought to be the test, that ought to be the guiding light.

I think I want to congratulate public servants across Canada for accepting the kind of salary increases that they did a few months ago through the Public Service Alliance. One hundred and fifty thousand public servants accepted a salary increase in the area of 4 per cent. That kind of acceptance of the realities of the economy is what will make Canada strong. We have contributions from the people of Canada in terms of tax increases. We have the special contributions of public servants in terms of downsizing and acceptance of reasonable pay increases.

I think that has led to the present state of the economy. What is the present state of the economy? There have been over 1.5 million jobs created across Canada over the last five years. Those are good, full-time jobs—over 900,000 jobs for women—not part-time jobs but jobs in science and technology, and in other areas, that will be lasting jobs for the future.

We have always said that at the heart of our policy has to be employment of Canadians. I had somebody say to me when I was first elected: "You can talk about inflation. You can talk about a variety of problems. You can talk about high interest rates, but if I don't have a job I can't deal with any of those problems. Get me a job and then I will worry about interest rates, about inflation, about the high cost of living and all the other problems that beset Canadian families." If you do not have a job you cannot even deal with those problems.

That is why we have made employment of Canadians a priority and there have been 1.5 million jobs created. That is why the unemployment rate went down from double digit numbers to 7.8 per cent in January, 1990. That does not mean there is not unemployment in Canada. Of course there is, in Newfoundland, in parts of Nova Scotia and throughout Atlantic Canada and in northern Ontario and elsewhere. We are fighting that on a day-to-day basis through job training programs and a variety of initiatives.

But the government and the Prime Minister will never lose sight of the fact that the thrust and energies of this government have to be directed towards job creation so that every Canadian will have a job. We recognize and have said many times—it bears repeating—that the best social program for Canada is full employment. That is where we should direct our energies.

I do not think anybody would deny that the thrust of the budget is the balancing of revenues and expenditures and the reduction of the deficit. How we reduce expenditures by almost $3 billion is by dealing with the transfer payments primarily. I do not think anybody should deny that and I do not think the Minister of Finance would ever suggest that it be denied.

There are, as has been detailed in the budget papers, very stern measures with respect to transfer payments. Why would the Government of Canada reduce, freeze or limit transfer payments? I think the answer is very obvious, and I think every provincial premier knows what the answer is. The financial situation of the provinces of Canada is much better than the situation of the Government of Canada. I do not know whether I need to detail that, but just so no one will think this is the member for Halifax West, this is a Tory talking.

The Financial Post says the same thing. In an article on February 22, 1990, it says that the provinces will have to do their part. I am quoting: "The provinces are complaining about finance minister Michael Wilson's budget, but he was justified in requiring them to do their part in fighting the deficit. Ottawa has frozen per capita grants for health care and post-secondary education for two years. Until 1977, established programs for financing transfers were strictly tied on a matching basis to the provinces providing health care and post-secondary education. The provinces wanted more freedom and since 1977 they have been able to use the funds in accordance with their own priorities. In some cases, this has been to support their general revenues."

Does anybody think that The Financial Post was mistaken when it published that? If you look at the record you will find ample evidence of what exactly has been going on.

While the federal deficit has been going up and the Government of Canada has been experiencing difficult financial times, the deficits of the provinces, particularly in Atlantic Canada, have been going down. Prince Edward Island has a balanced budget. New Brunswick is heading to a balanced budget. In the 1989-90 fiscal year, Nova Scotia reduced its budget by a windfall of $48 million and has announced that in the next fiscal year it would have a balanced budget. The same can be said about New Brunswick where Premier McKenna said that things were never better in Atlantic Canada in terms of the financial picture and structure. Newfoundland has experienced similar reductions in its deficits over the years.

As a result, in July, 1989 the total provincial deficit of every province of Canada amounted to $3.7 billion. The provinces of Canada all together had a collective deficit of $3.7 billion. Do you know what, Madam Speaker? Accounting for $2.2 billion of that was the province of Alberta where there is no sales tax and where most goods and services are cheaper than in any other part of Canada. The province of Alberta had a $2.2 billion deficit.

I can tell the province of Alberta how to wipe out that deficit. It can wipe that deficit out overnight. All it has to do is the same as the rest of us have done, impose a sales tax. Although I am sure that my colleagues from Alberta are concerned about the deficit, I do not think that anybody has to cry too much about Alberta.

Graphically demonstrated is the difference between the situation with the provinces. In the province of Nova Scotia, compared to Canada, we spend 35 cents of every revenue dollar on interest charges. The province of Nova Scotia spends 16 cents of every dollar on interest charges. The average across Canada is about 12 cents interest per revenue dollar. I guess that proves, does it not, who has the better financial resource in 1990. The provinces do.

The provinces, as The Financial Post and every other sensible and serious financial writer states, have to do their part. They have reduced their deficits because of transfers from the Government of Canada. It is not the Government of Canada, it is not the right hon. Prime Minister or the hon. Minister of Finance, it is the people of Canada. They are the taxpayers, that is where the money comes from. We are simply taking the money of the taxpayers of Canada and giving it to the provinces. Now the time has come for the provinces to take hold of their finances and take the appropriate action. While our expenditures have gone down to the point where there will only be a 3 per cent increase in 1990-91, the provinces expenditures have continually gone up with 10, 11 and 12 per cent increases.

The measures taken in the budget are serious and difficult for Canadians, but they are serious and difficult times. In the end, all Canadians, including the provinces of Canada, will benefit from a balanced budget. They will benefit from financial responsibility because it is only with financial responsibility that you show any concern for the people of Canada.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred favourably to things said by the new President of Czechoslovakia, Mr. Havel. When he was in Canada last week, he said that he believed any country that permitted more than 49 per cent of its businesses to be owned by foreigners was stupid.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he agrees with Mr. Havel on that point.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, Mr. Havel, as you may or may not know, comes from a part of eastern Europe, Czechoslovakia, that has been closed to the rest of the world for over 30 years. You are not allowed to go into Czechoslovakia. When we went there last fall we had to go through all kinds of rigmarole to get into Czechoslovakia. Mr. Havel may find out as he travels around the world that his people are marching in the streets because they have closed the doors and gates of Czechoslovakia for 30 years. They have forgotten what was going on in the rest of the world. Now they will have to face up to the realities of the world and the mobility of capital. Where is Mr. Havel going to get his capital, if he does not seek outside help?

That is not the message I got when I was in Czechoslovakia. The message I got was they want the world to come to Czechoslovakia, they want help. That does not have to necessarily be ownership, there are other ways to control capital. We have said time and time again, you do not have to own, you have to legislate. That is the way you get control.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, there might even be unanimous consent in the House to permit the member to extend his speech. He is making such fine arguments for those of us on the opposition side of the House. For instance, he suggested that Alberta should simply create a sales tax. So much for the government's argument that there are no new taxes in this budget.

There is a $2.2 billion deficit in Alberta, so the member suggested raising a sales tax. I am certain the people of Alberta will be very pleased to hear that this parliamentary secretary, a relatively senior member of the Conservative party as a parliamentary secretary, is telling the people of Alberta: "You need a sales tax. That is what you need". I hope it will be reported widely in Alberta that the urgings of this parliamentary secretary are that Alberta should have a sales tax, that that is what this budget is about is to see that Alberta gets a sales tax.

Second, I want to suggest that the parliamentary secretary's long discussion about the importance of jobs is again fascinating to hear. I would like to hear him talk at great length about that. Then I would like to see him explain the fact that this budget takes us up to an 8.5 per cent unemployment rate from the present 7.5 per cent rate that exists in this country. That is not my projection, Madam Speaker. That is the projection of the Minister of Finance himself. Here is a member who gets up and says the key thing about economics, the key thing about a budget is that it should create less unemployment when his own budget that he is trying to defend creates a 1 per cent increase in unemployment which will fall particularly on his products.

The question I want to put especially to this member because he comes from Atlantic Canada is to ask him to give us some more of his sterling arguments in defence of this budget in terms of an interpretation, an explanation why this government, according to the Estimates, which were introduced today to this House, is going to be cutting the amount of money which goes in programs for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the agency which provides help for his province. Why is there a cut in program activities from $379 million last year to the total for this year of $339 million?

I would be very interested in hearing his explanation why his part of the country should be hit so hard by this heartless budget.

• (1710)

Mr. Crosby: First, let me deal with the matter of ACOA. I direct the member's attention to pages 9 and 10 of Part III of the Estimates dealing with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. He will see as he reads that section that there is no such reduction. The difference in amount to $339 million is explained by the fact that $39.4 million was transferred prior to the Main Estimates to other departments to implement programs, that there will be a reprofiling of 10 per cent of the previous budget, and in fact, the amount available to ACOA will increase. The member can get that information from the Main Estimates. Of course, the member can also read what is said about the future for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency in the 1990–91 fiscal year. It also explains the amounts that have been spent in Atlantic Canada and the programs and the diversity of those programs compared to previous programs for Atlantic Canada.

The point with Alberta, let me try to make this clear so that the member will understand, it is who has the financial resources to meet all the obligations of all the services provided in Canada, including education, hospital care and the whole range of services. The question is who has the financial ability to provide those services?

Is it the Government of Canada taking taxes from the people of Canada, or the governments of the provinces taking taxes from the people of the provinces, or some combination of both? What we are trying to explain to those who do not even want to understand is that right now that financial resource appears to be more with the provinces than with the Government of Canada. In that way the provinces have the possibility to reduce their expenditures, as the Government of Canada has done, to raise taxes, to cut the programs that they may find are not essential at this time. So I hope the member would understand the whole concept of financial responsibility.

We do not want to hurt anybody. We do not want to raise anybody's taxes. We just want people to recognize that financial responsibility is the basis for government services and the continuation of the social programs that I am sure the member advocates.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, this year's federal budget, at least in terms of its size and weight, has a reduction in expenditures. When we found ourselves the other day in the lock-up with four hours to study the document that was roughly a tenth of the size of what we have become accustomed to in budgetary times, we had, if anything, an excess of time.

I found myself as I looked through and considered what was in it actually feeling some sympathy for some of my friends on the other side languishing at the bottom of the polls having the difficult task of trying to persuade the people of Canada to accept the goods and services tax lying ahead of them and also having to take on a budget like this.

Then we came into the House of Commons, sat and listened to the minister read the text that was contained in here. To my amazement, the government members responded with enthusiasm. I suppose I should not have been amazed. Perhaps I am still too new to this place. But I was amazed to see the response that he got.

It reminded me of the story that we have all heard as children about the emperor's new clothes, and how the emperor was tricked into buying what he was convinced was an invisible set of clothes. He put them on and paraded not only before his court but before his people. They were too cowed by the emperor for anyone, except the smallest of their people, to come forward and say: "But the emperor has no clothes".

So when the Minister of Finance stood here the other day and read his budget speech, and his Cabinet colleagues and his back-benchers around him stood and cheered, I could think of nothing more than the emperor without his clothes. The issue that has to concern all of us, above and beyond the budget, is the issue of credibility. The question is whether, as we go into the very difficult times that we are embarking upon in this country, even by the admission of the budget papers themselves, does this minister, does this government have the credibility and the support of the Canadian people to take them into the difficult times ahead?

What does the budget say about the economy. I do not think that the minister in his speech really highlighted some of the things that his own document says. I suspect that the members opposite would not have been standing to applaud had he read, with conviction, words like this from page 43:

> The weakest period is expected to be from the fourth quarter of 1989 to mid-1990 with growth averaging below 1 per cent at an annual rate. The first quarter of 1990 could be particularly weak. No increase in economic activity from the fourth quarter of 1989 is projected and a one-quarter decline in output is possible.

A negative growth in the first quarter of 1990 is what the minister projects in his budget documents. Did he stand in the House and say: "Troops, we are about to have negative economic growth this quarter." Did members stand and applaud?

What does it say about the second quarter? It does not say anything about the second quarter. A recession, in technical terminology, is two-quarters of negative economic growth. We have accepted in the budget document the possibility of one-quarter of economic growth and in the second quarter he does not say what is going to happen.

I suggest that in this document we have an admission by the Minister of Finance of Canada that this country is currently in a recession, and the braying hyenas that sat around him stood and cheered.

What else does he admit in this document? He admits that consumption is going to slow. He admits that personal disposable income will fall. He admits that personal savings will decline. He admits that long-term interest rates will rise. He admits that housing starts will decline. He admits that inflation measured by the Consumer Price Index is going to rise. Underlying his assumption of the rise from 4.7 per cent to 5.1 per cent, he states that this assumes: "The one-time increase in the price level following the introduction of the GST is unlikely to be translated into higher wages." Even though he assumes there will not be higher wages because of the GST, he states that the CPI will rise.

Had he read those numbers out, and they are in his documents, I am not making them up, I wonder whether his colleagues and his back-benchers would have stood and cheered. I wonder whether they have even noticed it.

Then we look in here at the labour market and what does he say? What is the projection? The projection is for an increase from 7.6 per cent to 8.5 per cent unemployment.

I submit that the numbers that the minister has given us indicate that we are in a recession. Would he stand in this House and admit it? The Emperor has no clothes.

What did he say back in 1984? The previous speaker from Nova Scotia was very proud of the new course that this government took the country on after 1984. I went back to that November 8, 1984 economic statement. When I read those numbers and those projections, it was surprising. It evidences a strategy which is at best cynical. First, he made the numbers look as bad as possible, then he projected a worst case scenario, and then predicted how he was going to do so much better than this worst case scenario.

In other words, he said: "Look what would have happened to Canada if those Liberals had stayed in power". He depicted it. He gave the numbers in his 1984 statement. He said: "No, we have changed the course. We have gone a different direction. Here is what we are going to achieve".

He made such a point of trying to make things look bad that he actually overspent his own short-term projection in the fiscal year 1984-1985. You can read the figures for yourself, Madam Speaker, but the actual 1984-1985 results which showed the $38 billion annual deficit that government members love to cite, is actually $3.5 billion more than the minister projected on November 8, 1984. Could it be that every last nickel he could find to spend on anything, he crammed into those few months. Or, is it that he just cannot predict the numbers? In five months, he found a way to overspend $3.5 billion.

Now let us look at his worst case scenario, compared to his actual performance over the years since 1984. He said: "Oh, my goodness, if those Liberals had stayed in power, by the end of this decade federal spending would reach $137 billion. Wouldn't that have been terrible?" In his budget document this week, they have managed to make $143 billion the expenditure. He said: "If those guys on the other side had stayed in power, federal tax revenues would have reached $100 billion". He has managed to get it up to $120 billion. "The debt would have reached $408 billion". He has managed to squeeze that one down, I admit, to $380 billion. Interest on the debt was going to be $34 billion in that worst case scenario. We read this week that it is going to be $41 billion. Has he performed? My goodness, he has performed.

The emperor has no clothes. That was 1984. Four years of Tory government and we go into an election campaign. What does the Minister of Finance tell the people of Canada? He says: "Look at my new clothes. We have spending commitments. We do not have promises. Our promises cost nothing, because the money is all there. We will not touch social programs".

The Prime Minister of Canada says social programs for the elderly will be improved, not diminished. The Minister for International Trade tells the people that unemployment insurance will not be touched. The Liberals say: "look out people, they are going to cut social programs. They are going to cut regional development". The Minister of Finance stands up and says: "Those fellows are liars. They are just trying to scare the people. Look at my good clothes. I have a wonderful robe called regional development programs. Look at my new gloves.

That is social programs". We see now, that emperor had no clothes.

They cannot afford even the things that he said were already paid for, the OSLO project, the Polar 8 ice-breaker. I am sorry, but I thought that money was already put aside. Maybe I misunderstood. Every nickel has been accounted for, that is what he said. But then days after the election, the interest rates in Canada started their sharp increase. At the end of November 1988 the interest rates started to climb. Then we see budget 1989, the Doug Small budget, and what happens? VIA Rail is slashed, the clawback of social programs is introduced, forces bases in various parts of Canada are closed, taxes are increased. What happened in those five short months between the election campaign when everything was rosy and that budget? We wonder why the people become cynical. We wonder why the people do not believe politicians when they stand up and talk to them.

Then there is the goods and services tax. The goods and services tax was that tax that was going to be fair, simple, revenue neutral. Do you remember when the minister described those clothes? He put on the jacket of revenue neutrality. In this week's budget, he says that the goods and services tax is going to help us reduce the deficit. I guess revenue neutrality means something different from the common meaning of those words. It sounds like if it is going to reduce the deficit that it is going to bring in more money than the old tax did. That of course is what we have been saying. It seems we can see right through his jacket of revenue neutrality.

Then the simplicity, he is going to wear the gloves of simplicity he said and held them up, white gloves of simplicity. We can see right through those too. We can see the simplicity that is going to emerge with having two retail level sales taxes in this country. Join me at my local corner store as we go in and take an item off the shelves and go to the clerk who starts to ring it up. There she is, she is 16, it is her first job.

She has to figure out whether the item is taxable under the GST and exempt under provincial sales tax, or maybe it is exempt under the GST and taxable under the provincial sales tax, or maybe it is taxable under both the GST and the provincial sales tax, or maybe it is exempt under both. It is one of those four. Once she has figured that out then you get out the discount coupon you clipped out of the magazine. She says: "Oh, no, not a discount coupon. Let us see, how does that work?" On the GST it comes off the price and then you add the tax. Under the retail sales tax, you calculate the price plus the tax and then you take the discount. So we have the price, minus the discount times 7 per cent, and then we have the retail sales tax added on, that is times 8 per cent, at least in Ontario, but that is with the discount added back in. We have got to add that back. Then we do the retail, but then we have got to take the discount off again. I think she might want to get a job somewhere else.

That is the goods and services tax, and again the emperor has no clothes. Fairness, those were the trousers. I will not describe the fairness, except to remind the House that six times I have asked the Minister of Finance to stand up in this chamber and explain whether or not the move from the manufacturers' sales tax to the goods and services tax represents the largest corporate tax reduction in the history of Canada. He will not answer that question and I defy him to stand up and do so.

Now we get to this budget, two themes: one, we are getting the deficit under control and two, there are no new taxes. That is what this budget is all about. Those are the clothes that the emperor put on in this budget. We are getting the deficit under control. This budget is the pass-the-buck budget. This has nothing to do with controlling the deficit. This has to do with transferring the deficit to other levels of government. In our own municipality of Ottawa—Carleton the elimination of the increase in the Canada Assistance Plan funding alone will cost this region $17 million a year, according to local officials.

The minister has put on the cloak of no new taxes. You cannot fault him for that, I am sure. After 31 tax increases since he became Minister of Finance, plus the introduction of the goods and services tax, how could he have possibly found room for new taxes? It would have challenged his creativity.

But there are taxes, and tax increases. There are the provincial tax measures that will follow from this budget. There are the automatic increases that come from deindexation and, of course, the goods and services tax.

I urge this House and the people of Canada to wonder with the financial numbers that have been presented in this document, with the reality that we are in—recessionary times—whether this minister or this government has the credibility to take Canada on through the times that follow.

If we are in a recession, as I think the minister has told us that we are, I suggest that this budget is the wrong budget for these times.

Mr. James: Madam Speaker, I sat here with a great deal of interest listening to the hon. member speak. I know he put a lot of thought into his speech. He certainly made it fairly interesting in talking about the Minister of Finance having no new clothes and so on.

I guess the thing that he seemed to be working on a lot was worst case scenarios. We did not need to have a scenario in the late 1970s and early 1980s. We had the absolute real thing. I would assume he would remember that the government of the day, being of his political persuasion, took this country into a recession. We do know that. We all went through that.

I most especially went through it in business. I received a notice from the bank every week telling me about rising interest rates until they reached 22.5 per cent. That was real. That was under his government's stewardship. Certainly there was inflation along with it.

I think Canadians knew that also in 1984. That is why they turfed that government out. It was wanton spending. The deficit was certainly an issue, and the long term debt was an issue in 1984. That was real. Canadians saw it and decided that that government could not manage this country. It was into wanton spending. It was moving on into $45 billion or $50 billion a year. It was spending $16 billion more on programs than in collecting revenues. Is that an example of stewardship in terms of Canadians' money? Sure it was.

The credibility of finance ministers in the past was noted by the member from Halifax who pointed out that these ministers referred not only to documents but they said that they were concerned about spending. What did they do? They just kept on spending, attempting to buy elections. That is what went on. Canadians decided that that was enough, and that they were all through with that sort of thing. That government was defeated.

They will look upon this government as having the political will to say: "We have to hold inflation down. We have to cut spending". That is what we are going to do.

The minister said in his speech that the economy is in a period of slower growth. He said that. He put it in the documents and he is up front in saying that we are going to look at a slow growth situation in this coming year. I certainly do not remember the Liberal government of the day telling me and my company that I was going to be paying 22.5 per cent interest. That almost put my business down, as it did so many businesses at that point in time. Talk about credibility. Talk about being cynical. I will tell you we sure experienced that with the Liberal government of the day. Yet this member stands up and is so critical of this government when he should be reflecting on what his party did to this country.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, the member raises very important issues. In my speech, saying that the emperor has no clothes, I did not mean to trivialize the importance of the problems that face Canada. The argument he has made we have heard many times from across the way, not just in the context of this budget debate but in other debates on monetary policy and so on.

There is something that confuses me about government members making those arguments. What it reminds me of is my children. They are very good children. I love them dearly, as everybody loves their children. But sometimes you have to discipline them. Now and then I have to tell my eight year old son to stop hitting his sister. Very often his response is: "Well, she hit me first". Exactly what I keep hearing from the government across the way is: "Well, you did it first".

These problems we face are very important. I have heard nothing in the comments from across the aisle which suggest that the medicine administered in the early 1980s was the wrong medicine. I am sure the hon. member would admit that there was a global recession at that time. It was a recession faced not only by Canada. It was not of Canadian making. It occurred globally. What I have heard him say is that we are administering the same medicine now. He says that it is okay now, but it was not then. That does not make much sense to me.

I happen to think what we need to do to approach our economic problems in Canada is to establish for ourselves what the objectives are and what the key issues are. I agree that inflation and deficits are major economic problems. I agree that we need to address those problems. I believe that employment is also very important. I believe that this budget is a prescription for much higher unemployment, with very significant personal costs to individuals who are affected by it.

I believe that the time has come for Canada to lead the world in establishing environmentally sustainable development programs in this country. Yet in this document I see nothing about the environment. There is nothing to say that the government has any commitment to the rhetoric it has given out on the environment.

I see no evidence here that the important need for more investment in science and technology is going to be addressed by this government. There is a $38 million cut in science and technology.

In the cuts to transfer payments I see great costs, not only to our hospitals but to our post-secondary educational institutions. I suggest that these things do not lie in the area of expenditures. Governments are wrong when they look to cut back this kind of item in order to balance budgets. I suggest that these are in the realm of investments. My friend has been in business. He knows you treat those differently.

In education, it is as simple as this. If we think education is expensive, wait until we begin to absorb the cost of ignorance.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, first I have to tell the member that I did enjoy his speech. It was a well prepared and a well delivered speech.

I would like to talk a little bit about his trip across Canada with the finance committee. Does he see some of the same things and patterns I have seen in travelling with that committee, things that I see projected and increased in this particular budget.

I refer to the regional disparity question, the major regional disparities that have not been looked at in the goods and service tax. We see the increased regional disparities as a result of cuts in this particular budget not paying attention to the east or the west.

I ask him whether he would he agree with me when I say that the finance minister and his wealthy friends are going to end up with all of the clothes of the nation while he strips the majority of Canadians who will end up left bare and shivering in poverty?

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, perhaps, as my friend suggests, there will be more than the emperor with no clothes. What we have in the goods and services tax is a withdrawal of the federal government from the vision of a strong, national Canada. You have it with the GST because transportation costs will be taxed under a federal sales tax, increasing the burden on the regions as they acquire things from the central manufacturing areas and making it more difficult for them to build their own manufacturing base.

You see it in the budget as you see the withdrawal from regional development programs, the fundamental changes to those programs that will make it more difficult for the federal government to play a role in building the regions of Canada. You see it in the cut-backs of transfer payments to the provinces, where the federal government is just going to have to stand back and take a back seat to the provinces in what they do with investments in medicine, health care and post-secondary education.

You see it in things like the cuts to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The minister responsible does not even think that the CBC should be concerning itself with national unity or so he told a House of Commons committee.

This is a budget that is characteristic of a government that is withdrawing from the nation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Regina—Wascana.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, at the outset of my remarks today I was going to say how pleased I am to be able to address this very important subject, that being the debate on the budget. However, given the minimum amount of time I will have today, I will barely get into the subject so I will confine my remarks to the approximate three minutes that I have left.

The thing that we must consider about our budget is that it has no new taxes. The people of Regina have often written to me and, in turn, I have passed on the message to the federal government, as have all of my colleagues, saying that they do not want any more taxes and, believe me, I do not want any more taxes. Not even the NDP wants any more taxes. To that extent, we think similarly.

Now they are indicating to me that that is not their position. Is it their position that they do want more taxes? I mean, that is the converse. I have to expect that that is what they are saying. However, we will let them have the opportunity of really telling us what they mean if they can bring their consciences to the table and make it clear as to whether or not they want new taxes.

It is our position that Canadians do not want new taxes. I understand from the far end of the room that the NDP wants new taxes. We will find out whether or not the public of Canada can tolerate socialism and the obsession that socialists have for sneaking taxes in the back door in direct contrast to the program that our Minister of Finance has attempted to lay before the citizens of Canada.

Canadians want to rid themselves of the burden of increased taxes. At the same time, they want to maintain the same level of social services that they have been accustomed to and this budget in no way, shape or form affects the provinces' capability of delivering those services to their people.

This budget has no new spending plans either. It has no new ways to spend more borrowed money. In Saskatchewan and across Canada people are telling us to cut spending. Members of Parliament have been telling Michael Wilson to cut spending, and now we have the minister's answer. It is: " Yes, I will cut spending and cut spending again. I will do it across the board on a wide range of programs." The Minister of Finance and the Conservative party are listening to the people of Canada and we have acted on what we have been told to do.

At the same time, we have taken the pill to address the cavernous debt that is strangling our ability to be free Canadians. No other political party has the intestinal fortitude or the plain guts to address this problem. It is a difficult time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I must interrupt the hon. member.

[Translation]

It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 84(4), to interrupt the proceedings and to put to a vote forthwith all questions needed to dispose of the subamendment now before the House.

[English]

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost. The hon. member for Beaver River is rising on a point of order.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I would just like it to be on the record that I am in the Chamber at present and am choosing to abstain on this motion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cooper: Our rules are very clear, Mr. Speaker. We come into Parliament to vote either yea or nay. We do not come in to abstain.

That is clearly out of order.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member who just spoke. However, I think that he is either mistaken or he is not living by the same rules he is now quoting.

I recall a vote not six hours ago in which he and all the members of the government party sat and did not vote on a motion that was before the House.

Perhaps the Speaker could clarify what the rules are.

• (1815)

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I also rise on this point of order. There is no such thing as an abstention in the House of Commons. All it means is that the hon. member who was just up bragging about not voting was not here. There is no such thing as an abstention.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise on a point of order to indicate that I was in the House of Commons. As the people of Alberta expect me to do, I was here voting, not hiding out.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think members from all sides of the House will be aware that members from time to time are in their places and choose to abstain. If that is wrong, perhaps the matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business. Until such time as that happens any member is free to vote or not vote if and whenever he or she wishes to do so.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I think there is an important matter here that the House does need to consider.

First, there is the question as to whether or not there is such a thing as an abstention. Our rules do not provide for that.

More important, we have also over a period of time engaged in the practice of attempting to explain votes, to say how we would vote if we were in the House when we arrive late for votes. I think that these matters ought to be undertaken because Parliament has been the place where we come to stand up to be counted. The parliamentary system is set up for a vote that is either yes, you are for it or no, you are against it.

This is not the United Nations which is the only place that I know of that allows for an abstention. It is not a place where we allow for the explanation of how we vote.

Explanations take place during debate on second reading, in committee stage and at third reading. It is inappropriate that we continue a practice that is in conflict with our parliamentary practices.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I do not mind the new found righteousness of the government, but I wonder if the member for Portage—Interlake would explain why he abstained last year on the base closing in his own riding.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will some day make that explanation, but I can assure hon. members that he is not going to make it at this present moment.

It being 6.18 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.18 p.m.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Don Mazankowski (for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion) moved that Bill C-56, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, all members of this House are well aware of the central importance of small businesses to the economy. Only a few months ago, we tabled the first report on small business in Canada. This report drew attention to the vitality and significance of the small business sector in this country. The report also marked the government's strong commitment to the sector and our concern to help small business respond successfully to the challenges of tomorrow's world.

A thriving entrepreneurial sector is a mark of a dynamic economy and in Canada we have a thriving entrepreneurial sector.

• (1010)

We on this side of the House are proud of the government's contributions to create a favourable economic climate for private sector initiatives. Since 1984, more than 150 new businesses have been created every year. These businesses have been incredibly sound. In fact, over the last ten years, more than three quarters of all these new companies survived their crucial first year of operation. Today, roughly 900,000 companies in Canada have fewer than 100 employees. This means that nearly 98 per cent of our companies are small businesses.

[English]

These businesses are job creators. Between 1978 and 1987 small businesses accounted for more than 80 per cent of all net new jobs created in Canada.

[Translation]

I would like to point out again that the growth of small businesses is at the heart of our government's regional development strategy. We firmly believe that local initiative has the best chance of becoming solidly established. The regional agencies like those in Western Canada, Northern Ontario, the Atlantic and the resource regions of Quebec adopt this philosophy.

[English]

Small business is also a significant platform for the economic take-off segments of our society which have often found roadblocks on other avenues to success and to profit.

Women, for example, own almost 22 per cent of all businesses with paid employees. That is up from 18 per cent at the beginning of this decade.

Young people and ethnic groups are also well represented in this sector. More than 100,000 Canadians between the ages of 15 and 24 own their own businesses. That is another incredible statistic.

Also significant is the amount of research and development undertaken by small businesses. In 1987, 67 per cent of the firms performing research and development in Canada had fewer than 50 employees and more than three-quarters had fewer than 100. This is a substantial increase since 1984 and of key importance to the well-being of the economy as a whole.

Such a link between the small business community and research and development is perhaps to be expected since small business people often show the same characteristics as those ready to get into technology development.

They are creative, independent, spirited and ready to take risks.

One of the biggest hurdles which these risk takers have to face is that of obtaining capital, especially start-up capital. That is why we are proposing in Bill C-56 an extension to the Small Businesses Loans Act. The Small Businesses Loans Act is a popular federal initiative which is invaluable in encouraging the start-up and growth of small businesses in Canada.

Being from an outlying region myself, I am in a good position to tell you how important this tool is for regional development.

[English]

The program facilitates loans for the purchase of fixed assets for small businesses with annual revenues of less than $2 million.

These loans can be up to $100,000, though the average loan in 1988-89 was about $38,000.

The government's role is to provide lenders with a guarantee for reimbursement of 85 per cent of any losses incurred on eligible loans. The private sector's role is to assess the risks and deliver the loans.

This is a division of the responsibilities which we believe leaves business free to do its job of looking after business while the government sticks to its role as a facilitator, enabling the private sector to go for growth opportunities.

[Translation]

In 1988-89, about 18,000 companies benefited from loans made under the Small Business Loans Act. If these businesses were located side by side, they would line both sides of a street extending from Toronto to Barrie, Ontario.

About 40 per cent of these loans were granted to help new businesses start up. If these loans had not been given, it is likely that these companies could not have begun operations. That makes this law an essential tool for maintaining the growth and development of entrepreneurship in our country.

[English]

The bill asks for a three-year extension to this highly successful program and provides for a loan ceiling of $2 billion for the total amount of loans registered.

The three-year extension starts March 31, 1990 when the existing act expires.

During the course of the extension we will be continuing our examination of the program to ensure that it meets the needs of small businesses.

We will be looking seriously at ways in which the program could be enhanced by possibly modifying terms and conditions and eligibility requirements. Because of the critical importance of this program, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism will be taking a personal interest in this review.

I ask the House through you, Madam Speaker, to give this bill urgent consideration. Lenders and their small business clients must know well in advance of the March 31 deadline that the program will continue.

It is a popular program. It works. It contributes to the good health and potential of Canadian entrepreneurs.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this debate on a bill that will amend the Small Businesses Loans Act by extending it for another three years, until March 31, 1993. First of all, Madam Speaker, I would like to say we intend to co-operate with the government so that Canada's small businesses will know that on April 1, they will still have the use of this development tool they so badly need.

That being said, Madam Speaker, I would like to provide a little information on developments in this area during the past five years, and especially in this legislation, because some major changes were made in 1985.

Let me say, first of all, so that people will understand the importance of small business in Canada, that these businesses, all of which have fewer than 50 employees, created over 95 per cent of the jobs in this country in recent years, paid 25 per cent of all salaries, were responsible for about 8 per cent of the total value of Canada's exports and are responsible for 25 per cent of the Gross National Product.

To get back to our subject this morning, the Small Businesses Loans Act, the legislation, which has existed for years, is amended from time to time. Its purpose is mainly to help small businesses obtain medium-term loans to finance tangible assets such as land, commercial premises and tools.

Some major changes were made in April 1985 by the Conservative government. The definition of small businesses was amended to include all businesses whose estimated gross annual income did not exceed two million dollars.

Since 1985, an initial fee of 1 per cent of the loan amount may be charged. Before 1985, new businesses or entrepreneurs who qualified on the basis of their sales could borrow up to $100,000, and the loan, granted by the bank and guaranteed 100 per cent by the government, did not entail any charges. In 1985, the government imposed a fee of 1 per cent of the total loan amount, which was one more burden on small business, especially since most of these loans were used by new businesses as start-up funding, and charging them 1 per cent only add to their expenses. We pointed this out at the time.

There were other changes that we felt were also very substantial and to which we vigorously objected. Starting in 1985, the government would guarantee only 85 per cent of the loan amount, while the remaining 15 per cent became the bank's responsibility. We all know how banks operate in this country, Madam Speaker. The banks recovered this 15 per cent from the people who applied for the loans. I can assure you a number of my colleagues and I can name several instances in which constituents who tried to set up a small business were turned down by the bank because they had no credit rating and didn't have enough start-up capital, even if the project was a very good one, and all because the banks had to guarantee that 15 per cent.

This amendment, introduced in 1985, has deprived us of new, good small businesses that might have expanded to become medium-sized and even large businesses, creating jobs in this country.

Madam Speaker, I wanted to mention these facts, and today, the statistics prove we were right. When I look at reports on small business loan activities since 1985, if I look at the first year, the year ending on March 31, 1985—this was the year before the new amendment became effective—that year we had 34,744 loans totalling $1,600,322,008. A year later, the year the new legislation came into force, the number of loans dropped to 23,588, totalling $737 million. In 1987, the number of loans declined further to 21,145, totalling $709,901. In 1988, according to my last report, we were down to 18,640 loans. It was the only program small businesses had, and all this happened because in 1985, the government wanted to reduce the guaranteed amount and charge small businesses a 1 per cent fee for these loans.

When we saw activity had declined 50 per cent, we told the government that created the problem that we felt hundreds of jobs had been lost which small businesses would otherwise have created, if they been able to benefit from the boost afforded by a small business loan.

Madam Speaker, loans to small business were not the only thing that the government cut; there is also the Federal Business Development Bank, which essentially provides, or this morning I should say used to provide, three types of services to business: loan services where it only serves companies that present at least letters of refusal—at least, that is what it should do, but I do not know if it actually does; investment services where it provides companies with share capital for a limited time or helps companies find investors; and management consulting, counseling and training services.

Last year, Madam Speaker, the government cut 50 per cent of the consulting budget and this was the only service that provided young companies with advice and information on good management and thus helped ensure the survival of small businesses in difficulty.

The loans to small businesses should go to small businesses and not to medium-sized ones. But yesterday, we learned that there would again be fairly large cuts in this area.

So we see that the scope of the Small Business Loans Act that we are considering this morning is being reduced and that the loans made to business by the Federal Business Development Bank are being reduced too.

Yesterday, we learned that $18,755,000 had been cut from the Federal Business Development Bank. I think there is something wrong with this government's approach because salary costs are going up by $0.7 million; that is, the civil servants are getting increases while the programs are being cut. We need to keep these programs, Madam Speaker, and not necessarily increase the civil servants' salaries.

I should like to quote from the document entitled 1990–91 Main Estimates, Highlights by Ministry issued by the Treasury Board of Canada: The decreases are: $9.4 million deferred to 1991–92 and reclassified to non–budgetary for the venture capital activity which is for equity financing,—also an additional $10 million.

Last year, Madam Speaker, the governement cut $13 million. This year, $18 million. There is hardly anything left. When we see that the number of loans to small businesses went down from 35,000 to only 18,000, we realize that we do not really have the tools. This government is getting rid of all the tools which are necessary to develop small business in Canada and create new jobs. The statistics clearly show that small businesses create jobs when there is a recession, an economic crisis.

This morning, Madam Speaker, I can give you an idea of the way this government abandoned this sector. It is not only the financing. I am sure all my colleagues will agree that this sector needs funds. If there is a sector in Canada where financing is inadequate, it is the small business sector.

When we think of what will happen to the small businesses following the implementation of the GST, as my colleague said earlier, we understand that there is not enough financing and that the small businesses will get even smaller. I think we can believe John Bullock who predicted in the pre–budget brief he submitted to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) on the GST that small businesses will be wiped out.

If I may quote from page 2 of the document submitted by Mr. John Bullock, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business:

> The small grocery stores and the establishments regrouping food stores and restaurants will be especially affected and will experience tremendous enforcement problems which will compel a great many of them to close.

It's clear! He forsees that as soon as the GST is implemented, a great many corner stores and convenience stores will go bankrupt!

He explained, and I quote:

> They will have to keep a register of purchases.

When the minister suggests accounting will be simple, that there will be cash flow improvements, he comes up with an accounting example that is out of this world, Madam Speaker, because it is not real. Here is what the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has to say:

> —a purchase register will have to kept, referring to each invoice, in order to make a distinction between the sales tax levied by the province and that imposed by the Canadian government. The latter will extend no credit on that part of the purchase price made up of the provincial sales tax. An invoice–by–invoice computation will also have to be made for purchases of services that do not inlcude the GST, such as bank interest charges and insurance premiums.
> In addition to varying rates and exemptions of the GST and the nine provincial sales tax systems, businessmen will be faced with different tax application methods, different bookkeeping systems, different formulae, different returns, different audits, different penalties and different types of tax–on–tax structures. This places an unfair burden on small businesses, but especially the 265,000 retailers and most of the 450,000 manufacturers, wholesalers and service firms involved in retail sales.

Madam Speaker, it is a burden on all small businesses in this country. That was not said by the Official Opposition but by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, and I imagine it knows what it's talking about, since it represents thousands of small businesses.

The federation conducted a survey on the subject after the tax rate was reduced from 9 to 7 per cent. And what were the results of this survey? In the small business sector, opposition to the GST has become even stronger. The survey, carried out in January, 1990, covered a sample consisting of 1,372 members of the federation. Of this group, 68 per cent were opposed, a drop of about 10 per cent compared with the results of the Angus Reid survey. This response shows that small businesses are very much aware of the incredible problems they will face in 1991.

We have a situation that is very serious indeed. It is due too lack of funding and a lack of awareness. When he launched his tax reform. Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) had said repeatedly in this House that he would propose a simple system. Here we have a system that is so complicated that even institutions representing small businesses—that small businesses themselves are talking about closing down! It discourages them from investing, and we all know the kind of sacrifices these people make to establish a family business. They work day and night, the whole family, husband, wife and children. And now we are going to expose them to this administrative nightmare and let them worry about whether yogurt or doughnuts will be taxable!

Madam Speaker, I think this government has completely abandoned small business. This morning, there were rumours that we might get a new Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. He is not in the House this morning, but I hope that whoever is appointed Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism will defend that sector. We need someone in cabinet who speaks for this group, because the way things are going now, if interest rates keep rising and taxes as well, we are going to have a recession. The only sector that will be able to create new jobs in a recession is the small business sector. I hope the new minister will realize that.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to discuss today the changes which I am pleased the government has seen fit to extend to the Small Businesses Loans Act. The act has been beneficial even in the form that it is in to a number of small businesses. I suggest that perhaps it needs expanding. However I will talk about that later.

My friend in the Liberal Party has spoken about the need for a strong minister responsible for small businesses. I understand we still have after the shuffle the same minister for small businesses.

First, I would like to say that we in this party will assist, because we want to assist and we understand how important small business is, the government in ensuring the passage of this bill to committee as soon as possible. A number of people in my party have a great interest in small business and will be speaking on this bill this morning.

However, we can tell the government that we will not be holding this bill up. It has a limit; it must go through by March 31. We feel it is important that the guarantees of the government and its assistance to the banks proceed on schedule to ensure that small business knows and is able to plan for the future. We will be looking at the bill in committee and perhaps pushing a little bit, but will not hold the bill up unduly today.

As I understand the bill does a number of things. First, it extends the period that the government will guarantee loans from April 1, 1990 to March 31, 1993. The principal amount of total loans registered will be set at $2 billion. For small business people looking in the aggregate as they may well understand is the total amount of loans the government will guarantee for the banks or for the lenders.

The bill also provides for a number of technical amendments to clarify a number of things. For example, the various costs which may be charged by a lender to a borrower and which are required to be prescribed in the regulations. It goes on with the manner in which the rate of interest is to be prescribed and changed from time to time, both prior and subsequent to the payment of a claim, and any maturity date to be revised for terms beyond the maximum set out in the act shall require the minister's prior written approval.

I want to put a plug in for the Scrutiny of Regulations Joint Standing Committee between the Senate and the House of Commons. Most people in this House are not aware that committee exists. The people of Canada are not aware that there is a committee which looks at all regulations. Most government departments and many laws in this country are governed by regulations of Orders in Council. All of those are scrutinized by the members and staff of the Scrutiny of Regulations Committee. They look at the possibility of whether they have overstepped their bounds or fallen short of what they are supposed to do.

A number of recommendations were made by the committee where there were variances in regulations and some of the things bureaucrats and departments were doing with respect to the Small Businesses Loans Act. This bill looks at some of those points and corrects what has been pointed out by the Scrutiny of Regulations Committee.

I compliment the government and this department for taking that initiative, and the Scrutiny of Regulations Committee for its tenacious pushing to ensure that the interests of the people of Canada are looked after.

As my friend has done, I would also like to use this opportunity to speak about the small business community within Canada and the importance of that community to all Canadians and to the economy of Canada, present and future. Some of the statistics show us that in the past 10 years since 1980 something like 70 per cent of all new jobs created in this country has been created by small business. That is a very significant factor. It shows, as the parliamentary secretary to the minister has pointed out, that we have already started shifting in this country to an emphasis on small business. More and more the small business community is becoming the backbone of Canada, as I am sure most people realize it has been in the past.

If we look at various studies we find that the small business community creates jobs for Canadians. It reinvests profits from small business back into Canada and the people of Canada. That is something that we as Canadians must strive for. We must ensure that the jobs we are creating are jobs created for Canadians, by Canadians; that the profits we make are sunk into the future of our country and our youth; and that we do not place a major emphasis in the future on large corporations, multinationals that pull their profits out of the regions or areas as they see fit.

If members opposite are looking upon that statement with a little scepticism, I would like to tell them a little story about their own Conservative government in the Northwest Territories. When we met with them in the finance committee, they discussed the future of the Northwest Territories and how the goods and services tax was going to affect the small business or the business community in the Northwest Territories.

What they told us was, yes, although the large business resource sector is a major portion of the Gross Domestic Product of the Northwest Territories, in fact it creates very few of the jobs. Only something like 20 per cent of all people employed work in the resource sector.

What they told us is that most of the profits, instead of going for development and exploration in the Northwest Territories, are being pulled out and used for development in other countries where they feel it is cheaper or easier to develop their resources.

I am using this as an example to show the propensity of multinational corporations, large corporations, to pull their profits out of the country rather than invest them back in. Small business does not do that. Small business I would suggest is the way of the future, and it continues to reinvest in the country.

We as members of the House of Commons and as legislators for the country have to consider our future in looking at assistance for the small business community. This bill is the first step and the first step only in moving toward where we want to be with respect to small business in Canada and the assistance we should give it.

I look at the little we did get in the Estimates and in the budget, and again I have to wonder about the government's commitment to small business. As my friend in the Liberal Party has pointed out, there were $13 million in cuts to management services in the Federal Business Development Bank last year, and in the Estimate we find $18.5 million in further cuts projected for this year. We do not know yet exactly where those cuts are going to come within the Federal Business Development Bank, but any cuts to that area are direct cuts at and to the small business community.

I shake my head and I think maybe the minister and those across should do the same. Where are we going if we continue to cut out programs for a community that is going to create employment for the future of Canada? What are we doing? Why are we doing it? It seems to me and to those members in my party that if we are to encourage employment and a reasonable economy for the future, we have to encourage those who create the jobs and reinvest in Canada. That is reinvestment in the small business community.

I know that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has a number of things that it would like to see done for the future for small business, including perhaps better loan guarantees, not necessarily anything dealing with grants to small business. I think that grants have a place. I do not think it is something to be encouraged. Certainly I think that grants to large corporations can well be cut out. If we are going to consider the grant system, the emphasis of those grants should be on the small business community.

It appears again that it is the small business community as opposed to the medium sized business community where the emphasis should be placed, because a flourishing small business community means a flourishing economy and hope for the younger generation for the future.

Let me turn to what I have seen, aside from the cuts to the Federal Business Development Bank, in the small business community and where this government appears to be going. It seems to be ignoring what I have just pointed out. Let us look at how it has hit the small business community and its policies on high interest rates. When I spoke to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism last spring, he asked me how we could help the small business community.

What the small business community would like is lower interest rates and a knowledge that those interest rates are locked in for a period of time so that it can budget properly for the future. As a small business person there is nothing worse than knowing you are tied to the prime rate and watching the prime rate climb as it is doing at the present and as it was doing in the early 1980s.

Small businesses dropped like dead flies. There were bankruptcies and receiverships when the interest rates climbed. In most cases when they are new and starting up they simply cannot stay viable. As the interest rates climb, more and more of their income and profits go into paying the interest rates on their operating loans and their capital loans. It is not good enough to say that we are guaranteeing you at 1 per cent above prime, because when prime climbs to 15 per cent, to 16 per cent, or to 17 per cent, it makes it an impossible burden for small business persons.

That is the difficulty in having your own business and running it, even with the knowledge that you can make it if you work hard and your family works hard. What about those forces over which the government has control? If interest rates are allowed to climb out of control, you are going to go down and end up as a small business person, with your family, on the dole or trying to get jobs in my area doing anything you can, in the farming community as a picker or whatever, in order to keep food on the table. That is not the way to go. We must have stability for those people to ensure that they are fairly treated.

Let's look at the government's policy on the goods and services tax. I cannot emphasize strongly enough that the goods and services tax is not a tax that is healthy for the small business community. There are no small business people who want the tax in spite of hearing people like Mr. Sabia and Mr. Dodge from the finance department say: "It is going to be simple. There is no problem with administering this tax."

I would suggest that those people sit in an ivory tower. Have they ever been down slogging? Have they ever been down working as these small business people do until late at night and then have to do their books? There is a factor of inheritance in some jobs. Some people go through university and then straight off into the academic world or into government positions where they do not have to worry where that next pay cheque is coming from. The people in small business do. Any little extra that they have to pay out can directly and drastically affect the viability of that business.

The other thing that people who are in the upper echelons of the bureaucracy in the Department of Finance do not realize is that these small business people try to do their own book work because of the difficulty in viability of their businesses. With the goods and services tax they will have the nightmare that we heard about of compliance with all of the added steps they have to go through. To a person designing the system it does not cause any problems, but it does for the business person out there doing it. It causes massive problems. These business people lie awake at night worrying about what they are going to do and how they are going to make ends meet, how they are going to employ a bookkeeper, and the cost to them is horrendous.

This week I spoke to a small businesswoman in St. John's, Newfoundland. She is a manufacturer. She talked to me for three-quarters of an hour discussing some of the problems that were brought down on her not only as a result of the goods and services tax but as a result of some of the policies of the government as far as loans, as far as contracts to the small business community, and as far as the difficulty in dealing with banks in trying to get financing. She told me that there is something that they have not looked at in the goods and services tax or they have been ignoring, that is, the added financial burden to small business people.

For instance, if a small business people do business with the government, it is notoriously slow in paying its bills. It is not uncommon to run a 60-day or 90-day receivable. They have to carry the goods and services tax as a receivable. Until they get their money, it runs on their loans. If they do any type of business at all it means an added financial burden on them. It is unfair, I would suggest. It is shameful that the minister and his henchmen have not considered what this tax is going to do to the small business community.

This woman also pointed out the difficulty in financing. It was interesting. I made a speech last spring on small business pointing out the difficulties that the small business community had in dealing with banks at the present time that do 85 per cent of their financing. I pointed out the difficulties over and above that which women have.

I received a letter from the vice-president of a major bank shortly thereafter pointing out that the policies were policies of equality. That surprised me, so this past year I spoke to a number of business people across Canada and discussed whether they as women ran into any difficulties with the banking community. I have not yet met one who has not had some type of difficulty with the major banks in requirements of collateral. In a number of cases their husbands had to co-sign for their loans. Why?

We know that women are moving more and more into the small business area successfully. As the parliamentary secretary has pointed out, 22 per cent of all businesses with paid employees are owned by women, and that is growing. Our statistics also show us that as women move into the business community they are more successful in those pursuits than are men who start up a new business. They have a much higher success rate, yet they are treated like second-class citizens when it comes to getting loans.

I say to that vice-president of that bank that he may pay lip service and he may point out studies, but the studies I have seen and the people with whom I have spoken indicate that although it is changing it is not changing fast enough.

We have to start treating youth, women and small minority groups equally. Because of the success that women have had in business, it is not good enough to pay lip service and simply say that we are doing everything and they are being treated equally. When we talk to Newfoundlanders and people in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, northern Ontario, British Columbia and elsewhere across the country, we know that they are not being treated equally.

The small business community is required, unlike large corporations or large businesses, to put up more collateral. Even with the Small Businesses Loans Act guaranteeing 85 per cent of these loans, large banks still triple dip. They require personal guarantees, they require corporate guarantees, and they require collateral up to at least three times the amount of the loan. Often they require cross-guarantees of spouses. Yet these loans are guaranteed by the Small Businesses Loans Act up to 85 per cent.

This is where I would suggest the Federal Business Development Bank comes in. If properly managed and directed, it can be a definite advantage to the small business community as a one-stop shop for entrepreneurs, as a place where I as a business person could go to find out what I have to do to incorporate and investigate banking needs, accounting needs, and loan needs. The whole range should be dealt with in one shot and can be dealt with through the Federal Business Development Bank.

In addition, I would suggest that the Federal Business Development Bank could be used not as a lending institute of last resort but as a lending institute to ensure that small business people who are starting up and need capital at a reasonable rate to do so have a viable place to go. I suggest that we can do it if the will is there for the government to do it.

I would like to touch on farmers as a viable small business community before the hour runs out. We as legislators must recognize that farmers are a major small business thrust. We must look at assisting them as small business people in looking at the future of our country. More and more farmers are becoming sophisticated. They have all their books on computers, but like other small business people they need help in training to be able to run their businesses as businesses. The Federal Business Development Bank and the Farm Credit Corporation could have and should have a thrust in this area.

I simply want to encourage this government to pay attention to the small business community, the community of the past, the community of the future, and the community that we in the New Democratic Party say will be able to lead this country into a strong economic future for all Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being eleven o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): Madam Speaker, I would like to insist on the importance of capital for small businessmen, especially the daring Canadians who moved to set up a business and compete with the best. It is clear that small business people constantly view obtaining capital as one of the major challenges they must meet to start a business and make it grow. It is impossible to start a local newspaper, open a motel, even set up a micro-chip factory without financial resources. Therefore, if we want enterpreneurship to thrive in Canada—and who would wish otherwise because it is the prime mover of our economy—we must ensure that small businesses have access to sufficient funds to start up and grow.

Madam Speaker, this is indeed the goal of the Small Businesses Loans Act.

EXTERNAL AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the lack of clear policy and the ease with which this government makes and breaks commitments, not only to Canadians but to the world community, is appalling.

In the House last May the Minister for External Relations said: "As soon as next year, we will increase aid funding which will grow by $800 million over the coming year, and that, Mr. Speaker, is a firm commitment."

Instead, in this year's budget the government is not only spending $116 million less on foreign aid than committed by the minister, but it is putting a 5 per cent cap on increases in official development assistance, so that over the next five years the government will be spending $558 million less onforeign aid. This is in addition to the $1.8 billion reduction in last year's budget.

Canada's foreign aid is a key component of our foreign policy. These continued cuts undermine Canada's credibility and weaken our voice in international affairs.

This government does not seem to grasp the changing nature of the world. In an increasingly interdependent world, world peace cannot be achieved by ignoring the needs of the Third World. Foreign aid is not charity. If the government cannot be compassionate, then it should recognize that Third World poverty has a direct negative impact on Canada's economy, environment and global security.

If the minister understands the linkage of Canada's well-being to foreign aid, why did this minister not vigorously defend the best interests of her program and department? Why do we hear from her only a weak justification for short-sighted cuts?

INCREASED PRESENCE OF WOMEN IN ENGINEERING

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Madam Speaker, yesterday I accompanied the Minister of Science and Technology and the Member for Outremont to the polytechnic school to present engineering students with Canada Scholarships. I took this opportunity to let the public know about the private sector project supported by the Minister of Science and Technology and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, whose purpose is to increase the number of women in engineering.

This project will focus on: the supply of and demand for engineers and the importance of women for supply; the prejudices and challenges faced by women at every level of training and in the workplace; attitudes and practices of peers and institutions affecting women engineers; obstacles, in particular at the school level, blocking women's access to that profession.

This program will be headed by four organizations: the Canadian Council of Professional Engineers, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada. Representatives of women engineers associations, engineering students, university professors, engineering faculty deans and colleges will sit on the 15 member adjustment steering committee that will manage the 18 month project. In addition, the private sector will be represented by the SNC Group, Noranda and General Electric.

An important conference will be held in the spring of 1991 to consider the preliminary findings. The final report and action plans will be made public before the end of 1991.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on the first page of his budget the Minister of Finance said:

> We have a responsibility to our children and grandchildren. To build for them, not to borrow from them.

The government responds to a child care crisis by making promises it never keeps. The Conservative government answers the serious and desperate need for child care by slapping on spending limits and by cutting child care programs.

In British Columbia there are 300,000 children in desperate need of child care services and only 20,000 licensed spaces. These children may be going unsupervised. They could be in the hands of unqualified people. The government has proven again and again that it has no concern for children.

The Child Care Initiatives Fund has been axed in this budget by $1.75 million. If the Minister of Finance really believes that cutting child care is building for our children and our grandchildren, he is sadly incompetent. He should have been cut in the cabinet shuffle this morning.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, if there has been one consistent message from the people of Macleod during the past year it is that we must reduce the deficit. We must control government spending and we, as Canadians, must keep the economy from getting into the kind of inflation we faced in the early eighties under the Liberal government.

Only when we make progress on these fronts can we expect interest rates to fall to more reasonable levels.

I have expressed these concerns here in the House and directly to the Minister of Finance. The budget this week proves that the minister is listening to the people of Macleod and to other Canadians.

In this budget there are no new taxes. Yet there is a reduction in the deficit, in spite of higher than expected interest rates which increased interest costs for the government.

Albertans are prepared to tighten their belts along with all Canadians. None of us like having to pay the bills, particularly that crowd over there, but we all know that if we don't pay our mortgage then we don't have control over our own house.

The people of Macleod support the direction of this budget.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, given the budget cutbacks in Established Programs Financing, Prince Edward Island will lose $4.5 million this year, money that is needed for quality health care and post-secondary education.

The P.E.I. government has said that it does not consider deficit financing to be an option, so Islanders could be facing increased provincial taxes.

The budget papers state that for two years EPF transfers will grow with the population increase of each province, but that there will be no thaw in the EPF freeze.

In case the government has not noticed, businesses and bases are closing all over Atlantic Canada. At best, the population of Prince Edward Island is stagnant. At worst, we will see a continued erosion.

Prince Edward Islanders asked the minister to end the freeze on Established Programs Financing. Islanders deserve the same quality of health care and education as that enjoyed by other Canadians.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, I have good news today for the Canadian people. Hon. Benoît Bouchard has just been appointed to the senior Department of Industry, Science and Technology. His skills and ability will become an asset for regional development at a time when the disparities between the regions need to be alleviated. But if this appointment is good news for many, the fact remains that the people of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area have not benefited fully from his mandate as Minister of Transport.

There was so much foot-dragging on the part of the Quebec Government that a stretch hardly three-kilometre long of the Alma-La Baie Highway has been completed over the past six years. But I give people fair warning that the Conservative representatives of the region will not give up so easily. There are $11 million to be saved by March 31, 1991, and I am willing to constantly pester the Quebec Government to make sure that our region does not lose this money.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, this government has failed completely to bring forward its environmental program. Now it has given up on federal-provincial forest agreements as the way to ensure that our forests are replanted.

Agreements with Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have not been signed since they expired a year ago. In B.C.'s case, this government has sold out Polar 8, our softwood lumber and our fish. Now it has sold out our forest community by delaying the signing of a new forest agreement in B.C.

At the same time as the department is being proclaimed, its budget is being slashed and agreements remain unfunded.

The time has come to put an end to the Tory shell game. The minister should get on with it and sign new agreements now.

S. O. 31

THE BUDGET

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, our government has a blueprint for economic recovery that must be followed despite the outrageous screams of opposition members who in five years and two elections have offered no solutions, no goals, no visions, no direction, and no leadership to the Canadian public.

• (1110)

Our finance minister stated,"this government will continue to do not what is easy or popular for itself, but what is right for the country".

The opposition is prepared to buy its popularity with taxpayers' dollars, as was the legacy of 22 years of Liberal-New Democratic Party governments of the past. What a shameful demonstration of the legacy of that former administration.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, once again in this week's budget the government has revealed its true colours when it comes to science and technology. Thirty-nine million dollars is cut from planned science programs at a time when Canada desperately needs to be increasing science-based innovation to assure our economic strength in the future.

Instead of wasting millions of dollars on propaganda, the implementation of the GST, and the moving of existing facilities and jobs in science out of the national capital, the government should be increasing its commitment to the development of environmental technologies, alternative energy sources and increased base budgets for the research granting councils.

Canada's relatively high growth in relation to other OECD countries belies our economic weakness. The more important measure of our relative economic health is our rate of productivity growth in which we are lagging far behind.

Science, engineering and technology and post-secondary education should not be seen to be expenditure items for government cutbacks. These are necessary investments to secure Canada's future.

For this Prime Minister, promises are cheap. But his real commitment to science and technology is non-existent.

FORESTRY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, who said the government's budget wasn't green? This year it was printed on environmentally friendly paper. Thirty per cent less pulp is needed to manufacture this new paper, which means that 34 per cent fewer logs are used and more trees are left standing. Twenty-two and one-half tons of paper were actually saved.

This solution is even better than recycling, which is commendable but which requires chemicals in order to turn paper into pulp again.

However, this move is not just environmentally friendly. It is also cost effective. The new stock is 20 per cent less expensive than the old. There are also savings in mailings and bulk shipment costs since the documents weigh 30 per cent less.

These days call for restraint and respect for our environment. Michael Wilson and his department deserve kudos for achieving both.

THE CABINET

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister as leader of Canada's marginal party, and enjoying the support of 19 per cent of Canadians, has now decided to give his government a face lift. As all cosmetic surgery, this one is only skin deep.

Harvie, the chair stormer, is now going to be the House Leader. Doug and the slug will be Minister of Transport. Benny and the jet will be the minister of industry; and Tom the fish will flounder elsewhere.

One change is missing from all this. The shuffler should have been the shufflee.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, in 1984-85 the operating balance was in deficit. Ongoing program expenditures were about $16 billion higher than ongoing revenues.

Today in 1990, our operating surplus increases from $8.9 billion in 1989-90 to $14.7 billion for 1991-92.

Mr. Wilson's 1990 budget inspires confidence in Canada's future. This expenditure control plan will put the deficit back on a downward track. It will free up domestic savings to help finance needed investment, diminish our reliance on foreign savings and reduce the burden of the debt for future generations.

The stage has been well set by the Hon. Michael Wilson for sustainable economic growth and a strengthened economy.

REGIONAL DISPARITY

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, northern Canadians are used to cold weather but they are getting sick and tired of being left out in the cold by this government.

Northern communities already face unemployment as high as 85 per cent, astronomical living costs and services which should embarrass southern Canadians. But rather than recognize these special needs, this government clobbered northerners in the recent budget.

The elimination of the Exploration Incentives Program will stifle the mining industry.

Cuts to CMHC will make a disgraceful housing situation even worse.

Cuts to the native communications system will isolate northern Canadians even more.

The cap on INAC funding will halt economic development in Indian communities.

Cuts and transfer payments will mean that second-class status in health and education will continue.

Therefore I call on the government to reverse these disastrous cuts, to at least retain the northern tax benefits for northern Canadians and, most of all, to quit picking on those Canadians who are least able to fight back.

MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I want to be among the first to congratulate the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on behalf of the plant workers and fishermen in Atlantic Canada, and to welcome him to what is going to be a very difficult job.

For a brief period I was one of his critics in his former capacity in Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I quickly came to respect his grasp of issues and admire his capacity to be the advocate for those issues.

He comes to the fisheries portfolio at a very difficult time, a time of great crisis. I believe he has what has been sorely missing from that portfolio—an ability to have an understanding of the issue and to be a strong voice for those issues in Cabinet.

His job is going to be all the more difficult because the Cabinet has overlooked the problem completely by leaving it out of the federal budget altogether.

The crisis can be solved with his leadership. He is going to have to do something in terms of a compensation program for fishermen. He is going to need a strong voice to advocate that Cabinet gets tough with the foreigners, kick them out of our waters so our people can be the beneficiaries of our resources.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I might say that many Canadians will be surprised and somewhat disappointed after his budget last Tuesday to see him still in his place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): In his budget the minister announced cuts of $7.3 billion in payments to the provinces for health care and education. The minister has given no indication that he has even bothered to consult with the provinces on the impact these reductions will have on these essential national programs.

When the minister sat on this side of the House in 1982 he called for conferences by the government of the day with the provinces to establish national objectives. In so doing he said that this has to be done "before we cut spending and before we cause closures of hospitals and cutbacks in post-secondary education". That is what the minister said.

Yet his budget will likely take us back to the bad old days of user fees and extra billing, attacks on the weak, the elderly and the sick.

Again, in this House in 1982, the minister said: "Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments". That is what the minister said. I ask him: Why is not now taking his own advice?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first, may I say I do appreciate very much the gracious good wishes of the Leader of the Opposition. It is what I would expect from him.

The hon. member has raised the question of the transfers to provinces. As I have said in this House before, we are not asking the provinces to make a large adjustment. In the first year, it is somewhere between one-half of 1 per cent, three-quarters of 1 per cent, and about 1-1/4 per cent in the second year. These are not major adjustments that are required of the provinces.

I would remind the hon. member that in 1977 the law was changed by the government of the day, a government which he supported, which removed the linkage between those transfers to post-secondary education and health care. It was done at the request of the provinces so that they could have the flexibility to spend them as they wished.

I think the hon. member would agree with me that in some cases the provinces have cut way back on the amount of post-secondary education. If you cut those same ratios, as we saw back in 1977, you would see that the federal government is supporting in some cases a very high proportion of post-secondary education.

• (1120)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister should know and should remember that Canadians are entitled to equal access to high quality medical care, no matter where they live in this country.

The minister should know that the cuts in payments to the provinces for health care will undermine the principles of the Canada Health Act, an act passed by this House to prevent the erosion of our national health care system, an act which was supported by the minister's party.

The minister is risking a return to user fees and extra billing. Why is the minister not listening to the provincial governments who are saying that the minister is responsible for the mismanagement of our national economy. They are saying to him: "Physician, health thyself".

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is getting very poetic today. He should also look at this from the perspective of the amount of money that we are transferring to the provinces. Some $34 billion will be transferred to the provinces this coming year. That will rise at a rate of 3 per cent over-all for the provinces. That 3 per cent is the same increase in federal government program spending. We are not asking the provinces to do anything more than we are doing for ourselves for our own spending.

The Leader of the Opposition raises the question of the Canada Health Act. That received all-party support in this House. The position of this party has not changed since then. I do not know why he puts that red herring on the table.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, here is what Marc-Yvan Côté, the Quebec Minister of Health and Social Services, thinks of the Minister of Finance and his Budget, and I quote:

> When Michael Wilson claims that his carelessness will not affect health services in Quebec, he sounds more like a guy living on Bay Street than in Quebec.

Madam Speaker, why does the Minister refuse to admit that Marc-Yvan Côté is right when he says that this Budget will have a devastating impact on health services both in Quebec and the rest of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition can pull quotes out of the air. I can also pull quotes out of the air, quotes that have been made by people in recent days saying that what we are asking of the provinces is fair.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): You don't care what Quebec thinks.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The hon. member says I don't care. I do care. That is why I am so concerned about this particular problem.

I can go back to things the hon. member said in 1979 when he was sitting in that chair over there saying: "Why does the government have such a fixation, a preoccupation with the deficit?"

I will tell you why we have that fixation, that preoccupation. It is because in the next five years under the Liberal government the deficit and the debt got totally out of control. They left us with the mess we have today.

I can see that the Leader of the Opposition is still laughing. He still does not understand the problem of the debt, the problem of the high deficit. He still has his head in the sand.

FISHERIES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a mystery question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

I want to ask why this government does so little to protect the Canadian fishing industry.

Yesterday we had the Minister for International Trade saying that they had no choice but to accept the west coast fishing decision. Yet we know that the Americans have passed their own legislation called the Magnusson act which gives extensive protection to their processing industry. However, this government has not done the same. It has not introduced legislation. It has not challenged the American law. It has no plans to help the west coast fishing industry.

The mystery question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this. Why is this government always sacrificing Canadian interests on the altar of free trade?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there is no mystery as to why the hon. member put that question. He put the question not out of any interest for the fishermen of the west or east coast. He put that question because he is driven by a fixation with the free trade agreement and driven by an animosity against the United States. That is simply not an effective way to conduct policy in the country.

In effect, what we have done with the decision that was announced in Vancouver yesterday by my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, is to take steps that guarantee our capacity to apply Canadian conservation measures.

If he knows anything about the problems that the Canadian fishery faces, particularly now and acutely in Atlantic Canada, it is that we have to be effective on conservation measures. The measures that were announced by the Government of Canada yesterday protect the interests of Canada, protect the interests of Canadian fishermen by ensuring that our conservation regimes will stay in place.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the problem is that this poor, benighted minister still does not understand what it means to protect the interests of Canadians.

In saying that, I want to ask him about his great claim about conservation. The President of the B.C. Fisheries Council, Mr. Hunter, has pointed out that the decision the government has acquiesced to will create exactly the same problems on the west coast that the east coast fisheries now has—dwindling stocks, lack of data and giving away the rights of 25 per cent of the fishing stock to the Americans which we are now fighting against the Europeans for doing.

How can this government reconcile the fact that we are telling the Europeans that they do not have rights on the east coast when we have given exactly the same rights on the west coast to the Americans? Does this government not understand that it is putting the fishing industry on both coasts in jeopardy now?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot verify the quote the hon. member put on the record. If the person he cited said that, he too is wrong.

Let me come to the point that the hon. member was trying to make yesterday about an export tax. In his fixation with the free trade agreement and in his determination to be guided in everything by hostility towards the United States, he has focused upon the question of the export tax.

If the man were honest, if the country is interested in an honest debate about the instruments that are available to Canada, the member would admit that we have used an export tax once on softwood. It did not work. It is device that is so ineffective, it has not been used for decades by the government of which he was a part, or by this government.

Indeed, he also knows that if there were to be introduced an export tax in this area of the magnitude that would be effective to do the job, that would break the rules of GATT. He understands that.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You are so stupid, Joe, it is unbelievable. You don't know what GATT means.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, this government said yesterday that deficit reduction comes first, that the deficit comes first before the women of Canada.

The deficit does not come first when it comes to giving $161 million to the government's friends at Boeing.

The deficit does not come first when it comes to spending $14 million advertising the GST, a tax that no one wants.

The deficit does not come first when it comes to giving $114 million more to the armed forces in Europe. But the deficit does come first before the women of Canada.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain why CSIS got an increase of $33 million, yet programs to battered women have been cut? Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain why the boys can have their toys in the military while services to women are axed?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, no battered women's program, no women in violence will be affected at all. What has been taking place to the women of this nation is a crime against humanity. We will continue to fight that vigorously wherever it is found.

We have been bringing forward additional programs for women and against violence, some $40 million from the minister responsible at that time for a very active program.

We have other programming that is very effective for immigrant and visible minority women and for disabled women.

We have a very strong commitment and an excellent women's program. We will continue to be very supportive.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his budget speech on Tuesday the Minister of Finance said:

> We have a responsibility to our children and grandchildren.

• (1130)

The finance minister, if he really feels he has a responsibility for Canada's children, could he please explain why these children have been cut back for support for child care under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Will the minister come to my province? Will he come to British Columbia and explain to the more than 300,000 children in B.C., who cannot get basic child care services, why he has cut programs to the women and to the children of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is distortion there of the facts. The Canada Assistance Program for the province of British Columbia will be limited to a growth, an increase of 5 per cent.

If B.C. wants to spend more than a 5 per cent increase in any of those programs, we are asking them because of the stronger financial position that they are in to finance that increase over a 5 per cent growth rate. This is for a two-year period only to allow us to get over this hurdle of the deficit and the debt problem, after which time we will be reverting to the program as it stands now.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State.

In the lead up to the budget, government leaks implied that most of the cuts were going to take place in concessions to business and in defence, the so-called defence dividend.

In fact, the cuts have hit native groups, women's groups and others who are least responsible for the deficit.

Will the minister explain why those groups, such as women's groups and native groups who have expressed the most concern about such things as the free trade act, the goods and services tax and injustice to women and Indians, are receiving the greatest burden of the most brutal cuts in his department, while those who were not such a thorn in the side to Conservative ideology are receiving no cuts at all?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, when that group across the way was in government, $12 million was the women's program for that five-year period.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): It is your responsibility. Answer the question.

Mr. Weiner: In this current mandate we will be getting and projecting over $48 million. That is quadruple. That is more, not less. Every single program that we are involved in has seen increased growth, increased strength and increased vitality, and we will continue to work actively with those programs across the country.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In last year's throne speech the Prime Minister said: "This government remains committed to a national child care program." And recognized that "the increasing participation of women in the workforce underlines the need for initiatives that promote equality of opportunity in Canada's economic life."

Tuesday's budget not only cancelled some vital programs and services for women but also failed to introduce a national child care program. When will this government recognize that a national day care program is a priority initiative for equality of opportunity for women and quality of life for children?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the commitment of this government has not changed as a result of this budget.

In last year's budget I made it quite clear, speaking on behalf of the government, that we would bring in a child care program within this mandate. That commitment stands.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, a litany of commitments, a litany of promises does not create a rosary of sacred trust.

The cap to the Canadian Assistance Plan will leave thousands of Canadian children without the day care that they so badly need, as most provinces have said.

In last year's budget, this government increased child tax credits to wealthy families and this year's budget breaks the backbone of the day care programs for low and middle income families.

When will this government show that it is truly committed to a national child care program and introduce this program, and not wait until our children are no longer with us?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure I heard the hon. member correctly. There was no increase in the child tax credit to upper income families in the last budget. We have brought in a child tax credit increase in 1988 for those families who are low income families and have children under six years of age. That is still in place. It has not been changed by last year's budget or this year's budget.

Let me underscore the comment that I made just a minute ago. This government is committed to child care. The changes in the budget this week has not changed the child care element of the Canadian Assistance Plan in seven provinces, but we are limiting our spending to a 5 per cent growth rate for the three wealthiest provinces in the country. We are saying to them, if you want to increase your spending by more than 5 per cent, we will ask you to finance that for the next couple of years because of the difficult deficit situation that we have.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, Canadians were shocked when the Minister of Finance presented his budget on February 20 that the aboriginal people were at the top of his hit list. The minister accused me of exaggeration when I asked about the $100 million cut to Indian and Northern Affairs. It does not sound like an exaggeration to me. There was also a $24 million cut in Secretary of State.

I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has eliminated the Native Communications Program and all the native newspapers? Has he cut the Northern Native Access Broadcast Program by 16 per cent? If so, how can he justify this heartless move? The native people of Canada want to know. Will he answer this directly and not be evasive?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would refer the hon. member, if she would care to listen, to page 76 of the budget statement where it says that expenditures for Indian and Inuit programs for health, education, social assistance and comprehensive claim programs will not be constrained. Other grants and contributions in the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program will be limited to an annual—

Ms. Blondin: You can't touch those moneys. You wouldn't dare.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well, Madam Speaker, if the hon. member asks a question, surely she must be interested in the answer to the question. Let me repeat.

> Other grants and contributions in the Indian and Inuit Affairs program, however, will be limited to annual growth in the range of 5 per cent—

That I think is a fair request. It is part of the over-all program of controlling government spending so that we can get the deficit down, get interest rates down and have a healthier economy.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I have once again not received the answer to my question.

My supplementary is to the same minister. There is much dissension and uneasiness across the country among the many Canadians who support and depend on the voice of native newspapers and radio broadcast programs. It was, after all, the Micmac news that brought out the Donald Marshall case.

Why is the minister sabotaging the success of these programs? Is it an attempt to suppress the truth, the power of the word? Will he restore these funds immediately, if he is going to demonstrate the commitment of this government to aboriginal people's livelihood and rights?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, this Prime Minister and this government have made race relations our most important initiative and priority. We demand full and equal participation and full access for each one of our citizens.

We have brought forward increased funding for race relations, increased funding for community support and we are developing initiatives to deal with the very concerns that the member is addressing. From coast to coast we are going to be very pro-active in helping all Canadians develop full and equal opportunities.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance will be aware now, without a doubt, that there are more and more people questioning the basic credibility and the assumptions underlying his entire budget.

We know that the projections were all done before the end of January. Since that time interest rates in the country have gone up by one percentage point. There is pressure now for higher interest rates in Japan and western Europe.

I want to know now whether or not the minister will admit that many of the numbers in his budget are wrong, that his projections are wrong, that the deficit is going to be well over $30 billion in the next fiscal year, and that the interest rates will not come down to 11 per cent? Will he admit that those projections are wrong? Will he tell the Canadian people what is really going to happen in the next year.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is a little déjà vu in this question. It seems to me that in 1984, 1985 and 1986, at practically every budget, every time we have brought out projections with a very limited number of exceptions, hon. members have said that this is going to cost 50,000 jobs, 100,000 jobs, or 200,000 jobs, and that the sky is going to fall as a result of this budget.

A study was done in January that supports this. The projections that have been made by the Department of Finance officials have been very close to the mark and closer to the mark, I might say, than has been the case with the consensus of private sector forecasters that we monitor.

I can give the hon. member further information and reasons why I think that our projections are accurate. I think these are reasonable projections. They are not out of line with the private sector forecasters.

When we stand in the House after the next budget, I will probably be saying exactly the same thing to the same member of Parliament.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, last year the Minister of Finance predicted 10 per cent interest rates for this year. Some accuracy in terms of his projections!

I believe the figures he has given us in the budget are totally unrealistic. It is sheer incompetence on behalf of the Minister of Finance.

In light of what is happening now in Europe and Japan I wonder if the Minister of Finance, unless he is dreaming in Technicolor, can tell us how he is planning to bring down interest rates to a 1990 average of 11 per cent when today we are starting at over 13 per cent.

Can he explain that to the House? If he cannot, can he admit that he is wrong, that the deficit will be indeed over $30 billion, that interest rates will be much higher than 11 per cent, that the unemployment rate will be higher than he is predicting and that the growth rate will be slower?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member said that projections were way out of line last year. Let me remind him that we were projecting a 12.0 per cent level of interest rates for the fiscal year 1989-1990. It will come in at 12.2 per cent, only .2 of 1 per cent out. That is not a bad projection.

The hon. member says that the projections are a way out of line. Our number is 11.1 per cent. The private sector is 11.0 per cent. I do not see where this is a way out of line relative to what the people in the private sector are saying themselves.

The hon. member asks how we are going to get interest rates down. I have told him many times how we are going to get interest rates down. We are going to work very hard to get inflation out of the system. As we get inflation out of the system, then we will be able to get interest rates down. We expect that will happen during the course of this year.

WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I refer to the notice of Ways and Means motion to amend the Income Tax Act as it affects the child tax credit.

The minister has indicated that this measure will allow 730,000 families to qualify for prepayment of the credit.

What exactly will be the effect of this change on a large Canadian family, and how many children will be affected?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, this provision provides for a more generous prepayment of the child tax credit for families with three children or more.

The effect of it will improve the fairness of the tax system and allow people with larger families to receive that prepayment in the month of November. It will also allow 70,000 additional families with a total of about 236,000 children to be eligible for the prepayment.

There is a cost factor in this. It will move the cost of this one year forward, so there is timing element here. The over-all cost to the government will not increase.

NAZARETH THERMAL GENERATING STATION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I would like first of all to congratulate the Minister of Labour for his further appointment as Minister of State (Transport), and to ask him if he will contact immediately the Canadian National immediately to prevent them from making a sale. That crown corporation does want to sell its Nazareth thermal generating station in Montreal for a price that is absolutely, ridiculously unreasonable, a garage sale price.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his congratulations, which I am very pleased to accept. I will endeavour to keep working for the well-being, improved quality of life and prosperity of Montreal Island.

Since my duties as Minister of State (Transport) have just been added a few hours ago, I will look into the hon. member's question and will report to him as soon as the House reconvenes.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister but I would suggest he might want to act very quickly because this sale is to be made to Compagnie parisienne de chauffage urbain and I am told that the deal will be concluded in the next few hours.

I remind the minister that this Montreal heating plant has been posting annual profits in excess of $3 million. It seems to me there is something rather fishy in this sale, given the price.

Since the minister also handles the labour portfolio, I want to ask him whether he will give priority to this deal and what steps he will take to protect the employees who, after 20 years on the Canadian National payroll, will be summarily dismissed by Compagnie parisienne?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I have to give a similar answer to the Hon. Member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. I will look into the terms of this deal in the next few days and endeavour to get back to him at the earliest opportunity.

HEALTH

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. This government is committed to building a $100 million medical lab in Winnipeg. Until today, everything appeared to be in order. Now we get the news that the lab is going to be delayed until 1995. This is another betrayal of Manitoba. The west gets the shaft again. No one in the government is standing up for Manitoba. I think that the senior minister for Manitoba should do the honourable thing and resign.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Is this delay just another way of saying that Winnipeg will never get the lab?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, that assertion is simply not true. While I am not aware of all the details and the allegations which the hon. member has made, to my knowledge this project is still on track.

I suspect that there may have been some discussions with municipal officials. That may have delayed the project somewhat, but I can assure the hon. member that I will get back to him with full details. As far as I am concerned, there is no deliberate delay on the part of the government.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister's words are not going to ease the anger that we feel out there. I remind the Deputy Prime Minister of what fellow westerners are saying: "You play around with the bull and you're going to get the horn". I want to know the government's priorities.

There is money for the Prime Minister to spend millions to travel around the world, there is millions—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member will put his question, please.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, there is no money for the medical lab, there is no money for—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure there is a question. Is there a question for the hon. member to put to the minister?

Mr. Harvard: Yes, there is a question. The municipal officials say there is no reason for delay. I want to know when the government is going to release the funds and get on with the job.

• (1150)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am certainly not going to be threatened by the rhetoric coming from the hon. member.

I would choose to deal with facts, not innuendo and rumour. As I indicated to the hon. member, I will try to ascertain the facts. I can assure him that I will report back to him very quickly.

PETRO–CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs, I have a question for whomever is in charge of the sell–out of Petro–Canada today.

Petro–Canada is expected to report assets for 1989 of something between $6.5 and $7 billion, this after spending at least $7.4 billion since 1976—this is in 1989 dollars—in assembling those assets.

The government now proposes to sell off the entire operation for something in the order of $4 billion, of which it might retain between $3 and $3.5 billion.

Even allowing for close to $2 billion in short and long term debt, doesn't the minister think it is a fundamentally bad deal for the people of Canada to sell their national energy company having a net worth of between $4.5 and $5 billion for $3.5 billion or less?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that confused mélange of figures has everybody in this House and anybody who is watching very confused, probably more confused than the member himself.

An hon. member: Impossible.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We believe the privatization of Petro–Canada will be in the interests of Petro–Canada, in the interests of the taxpayer, and in the interests of the country.

We believe the result of this will be a stronger Petro–Canada. It will have access to new moneys which it can invest in new operations in Canada to develop frontier resources and to new capital that is not available to it today. With the growth which will come from that we believe the result will be a much stronger Petro–Canada and a great help to this country.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, let me try again. A company with a net worth of $4.5 billion to $5 billion is going to be sold for $3.5 billion or less.

Would the minister not agree with First Marathon Securities Limited oil analyst, a chap by the name of James Doak, that given average new equity issues for oil and gas companies from 1983 to 1988 were $2 billion a year in total, I quote Mr. Doak:

The privatization will compete with every other company trying to tap the equity market.

He continued:

They probably won't be able to get a good price for the shares.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, about a billion dollars worth of equity issues were done in the month of January alone.

The Minister of State of Privatization and Regulatory Affairs has said that the sale of the shares of Petro–Canada will take place over a period of time, depending on market circumstances, depending on the attractiveness of the market to the company and to ourselves and of selling into that market.

I would say to the hon. member that his numbers are out of whack. I believe the book value is $4.3 billion and not the $4.5 billion to $5 billion that he is using. I would also say to him that I am glad he is sitting on that side of the House and not on this side when he is deciding what the shares of Petro–Canada are worth.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, on May 23, 1985, the Minister of Finance unveiled the first of his two five–year plans for reducing the deficit. At that time he promised us that by this year our deficit would be $18 billion. It is $30.5 billion, a 69 per cent error in his projections.

The minister cannot blame previous governments. After all, he had the figures when he made this promise.

Second, he cannot blame the economy. In his own words it has been "extraordinary".

Will the minister at last admit that the deficit is a direct result of his own fiscal mismanagement over the past five years?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that sort of provocative statement sends me reeling. I am not sure how to handle it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I believe that the hon. member is not taking account of $10 billion in accounting changes, but we will let that one just slide by because those numbers he does not understand.

Let me point out to him what I said in the budget on Tuesday evening. Eighty per cent of the debt that we have incurred, in other words 80 per cent of the budget deficits that this government has incurred since 1984, relate to the interest compounded on the deficit that we inherited in 1984.

Mr. Simmons: Not true.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We have brought all the other costs of government from an operating deficit of $16 billion to an operating surplus of $9 billion. So we have made considerable progress. As we get that operating surplus up even higher that it will cut into the interest costs we are going to get the over–all deficit under control and it will be—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the minister obviously forgot about those facts. They were out there when he gave us his first five–year plan.

Let us look at the minister's second five–year plan to reduce the deficit that was introduced last Tuesday. He promised us that within five years time our deficit was going to be down to $10 billion. He could not do it in the first five years even though we had an extraordinary economy. Now the minister is telling us he can do it, even though his own policies are driving this country into recession.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association does not believe the minister. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce does not believe him.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there a question please?

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, my question is very simple. In light of the fact that even the minister's good friends at the Business Council on National Issues do not believe the minister, does he himself believe his own figures, because nobody else does?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the simple answer to that is yes I do. I very strongly believe in those figures.

But for all of the concern that the hon. member is expressing about the level of the deficit, where is the Liberal Party in this debate? Where is the Liberal Party in putting forward any suggestions as to how we should be getting the deficit down?

All I hear from the Leader of the Opposition is "Why this fixation on the deficit? Why are they so concerned about the deficit?" The Leader of the Opposition has his head firmly buried in the sand and I think the hon. member has too.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Nunatsiaq, one question please.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, a week ago in this House the Prime Minister asserted that the protection of minority language rights was not an abstract concept in Canada and that this protection was given meaning by the national will of a generous and tolerant people.

This week in a most ungenerous and intolerant action the government the Prime Minister leads announced it will close down eight aboriginal newspapers and financially cripple another seven aboriginal communications groups. Given these devastating cut-backs to aboriginal language programs in the International Year of Literacy and Communications, what kind of protection was the Prime Minister speaking of? Did he really mean protection from this government?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, the department certainly has had some expenditure cuts. That is clear. It is part of an over-all plan to provide us with a secure and prosperous future.

We have heard what the finance minister is proposing for all of us. It pains us to have to say to any individual or any group that somehow others may have to share in the obligation of being supportive. I have commended the efforts of those who have worked in the field. We have a very active race relations program. We have a good understanding as a government of what has to be done in this nation to help all attain a level of citizenship that gets that full participation. We are developing initiatives from coast to coast to address the very concerns that the member is raising.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, one question.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for of External Affairs. The minister mentioned earlier today that Canada must use the instruments that are available in negotiating issues around trade relative to the fish agreement.

The minister knows that after the GATT ruling against our decision to inspect fish at landing, the government decided to go to the free trade panel. At the free trade panel hearing the ruling was that the United States should have access to 10 per cent to 20 per cent. Instead of accepting the finding of the free trade panel, the Minister for International Trade said that the U.S. refused to accept the panel's ruling and drove a harder bargain of 20 per cent this year and 25 per cent in subsequent years.

It is not a question of anti-Americanism. Why did the minister cave in after the free trade panel that he asked for said only 20 per cent and he got bludgeoned into giving another 5 per cent and further down the road? Does the panel stand for anything or is the minister gutless right across the board?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will not talk to the hon. member about gut. Let me deal with the important issue that he raised.

There was a panel finding and there was a response on the part of the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States. The question at issue was that while there was a reference to the percentages, there was also a consideration of Canada's ability to impose our conservation requirements.

An hon. member: Read the decision.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I read the panel. The panel makes it very clear that we would not have the conservation protection under the panel report that we have under the arrangement negotiated by the Government of Canada. What we did was purchase greater protection for Canada to be able to apply our conservation regimes.

That in the long term is of enduring interest and importance to the country.

Mr. Barrett: The other panels will be worthless, and you know it.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to several petitions.

BROADCASTING

CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY CHANNEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, there have been consultations with the three parties and I believe that you will find unanimous consent for the following motion: I move:

> That this House support the principle of the Canadian Parliamentary Channel proposal as presented to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Canadian cable television industry, on the understanding that CPAC will broadcast the proceedings of the House of Commons, as well as any other proceedings that are provided to it by the House.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I know there have been consultations but as of late yesterday afternoon, the parliamentary secretary had undertaken to consult with one of my colleagues, the member for Kingston and the Islands, with regard to the exact wording. My information is that that consultation has not yet happened.

Perhaps in the spirit of co-operation we could undertake that such consultation take place now and notwithstanding anything else, we could give our unanimous consent for the introduction some time later during the day. Perhaps that would be the best policy. Maybe the parliamentary secretary could revoke that motion now and reintroduce it a little later today.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I beg to differ with the hon. member. There were consultations with their membership yesterday. If there is some confusion on their side, fine. We can set the motion aside for now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I have another motion for which I believe there is unanimous consent.

There were discussions concerning the first Monday that we return. Because of some of the problems with the normal provisions for Private Members' Business beginning at one o'clock and we are not able to proceed with Private Members' Business on a budget day, it leaves a gap. Therefore, I move the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, March 5, 1990, the House meet at 1.00 o'clock p.m. for resuming debate on the budget.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I wish to confirm that there have been some discussions with regard to this particular motion. We do concur. We think an additional hour of debate on the budget would be a most appropriate activity for this House to pursue.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, we quite agree. We are glad to see the change of heart on the part of the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I take it for granted that the hon. parliamentary secretary had unanimous consent to move that motion.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, today I would like to table a number of petitions for several thousand people from my constituency of Papineau—Saint-Michel. These people are firmly opposed to the new goods and services tax proposed by the Conservative government. I also want to refer to the requests made by Mr. André Corneau, president of the Association québécoise pour la défense des droits des retraité(e)s et des pré-retraité(e)s of Saint-Michel, who, on behalf of its members, is calling on the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to withdraw the GST which is so unfair to low-income people.

ARMENIAN RIGHTS IN AZERBAIJAN

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I would also like to table other petitions sent to me by the Conseil des droits arméniens du Canada.

These are signed by residents of the Montreal area, specially from my constituency as well as from the ridings of my colleagues of Saint-Denis and Saint-Laurent. They are asking the government of Canada to call upon the Soviet authorities and firmly ask them to recognize the rights of the Armenian people in Azerbaijan.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the pleasure to table this afternoon 24 petitions signed by 1,650 people, who are opposed to the goods and services tax, which they submit is a regressive tax which will cost several thousand jobs to Canada.

Also, Madam Speaker, with your permission, I would like to table 20 more petitions signed by 1,099 residents from my constituency and the Montreal area. These people oppose the new goods and services tax bacause it will cause severe and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to table petitions signed by hundreds of Canadians who object to the federal government's plan to impose a new tax on goods and services which will be unfair to my constituents and all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present today.

One is from constituents of my riding of Comox—Alberni expressing their opposition to the goods and services tax, calling on Parliament to reject the current proposal for a GST and asking Parliament to consider a fair system of taxation rather than the GST.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition from many of my constituents criticizing the government for cutting back on its funding for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. These constituents call upon the Government of Canada to increase support for the CBC so that those areas of the country that rely on CBC will be able to have continued quality service from that organization.

• (1210)

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I also have a petition opposing the clawback of family allowances and old age pensions. The petitioners also ask the government to change its policy on the clawback.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I have another petition certified under Standing Order 36 from a number of my constituents who are asking the government to do a full assessment of the ecological significance of the Carmanah Valley.

With respect to Michel Gratton, I believe that Environment Canada should do a survey of the old growth forests of the whole of the west coast of Vancouver Island, not simply of one valley so that we can examine areas which might be logged, areas which might be set aside in order to optimize logging, raw material supply and the preservation of old growth forests.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table some petitions from my riding and neighbouring ridings: Saint-Hubert, Pierrefonds, Pincourt, Kirkland, Beaconsfield, Dollard-des-Ormeaux, Laval, Delson, Saint-Eustache, Deux-Montagnes, Montreal East and Montreal.

The petitioners ask the federal government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which is against the goods and services tax. It comes from the constituency of the member of Parliament who said this morning that all his constituents liked the GST.

It calls for the Minister of Finance to drop his goods and services tax as an unfair form of taxation, to review the entire taxation system so that we have before us in this country a system of taxation which is fair and equitable and does not fall so heavily on the ordinary people within this country.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, the attached petition is certified correct as to form and content.

I have a large number of names from the area of Creston and Wynndel in my riding, that the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay, that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden and that the government is now trying to tax reading material, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels. The petitioners therefore call upon the government to do away with this tax and bring about a more fair and equitable taxation system.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by 700 to 800 people from the communities of Pelican Narrows, La Ronge, Stanley Mission, Pinehouse Creek, Uranium City, Fond du Lac, Stoney Rapids and Denare Beach, which is most of the people in many of those communities.

They are also protesting the introduction of the GST, called the grab and steal tax. In those communities they already experience double and triple the cost of living of communities in southern Canada. They do not believe the finance minister when he says that when the big companies receive benefits through this tax that it is going to benefit them. They know they will be paying more and would sooner not pay the tax.

Therefore, they call on Parliament to withdraw this tax and to institute a system of fair taxation, especially one that is fair to northerners.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House today a petition signed by a number of Canadians who are opposed to the goods and services tax. They regard this tax as vicious and unfair and call upon Parliament to reject the tax.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition from the Caribou, British Columbia, and also towns in my riding such as Grand Forks and Christina Lake. I add these petitions and the signatures to the thousands I have already presented from my riding alone to the House.

These petitions indicate that the people of Canada and particularly in these areas will not be tricked by this government dropping the GST from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. These people are calling on Parliament to change the tax and to make the tax fairer for all Canadians.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a couple of petitions today, pursuant to Stand Order 36.

The first one addresses the frustration of some people in my riding, particularly in the Trenton area, to Bill 178 in the Province of Quebec. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the city of Trenton for this past week voting against an English-only policy in their community despite the frustration of people, as it is expressed in this petition, and the city's support of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities for its policy of tolerance, civility, amity and generosity throughout Canada with regard to official language rights.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): The second petition I would like to present is again from people in my riding who express their deep and grave concern regarding the proposed goods and services legislation this government is proposing. They ask that that legislation be withdrawn in its totality.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I will be responding to one question today. Perhaps the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell would like to come and carry it down. Madam Speaker, if Question No. 197 could be made in order for return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 197 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, given the volume of material being supplied in answer to that question, I wonder if the Deputy Whip would indicate to the House the cost of answering a question such as that.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I cannot give an exact figure. We have probably 1,400 pages of material, information collected from virtually all departments and involving a huge number of people. I am sure the cost would be in the thousands of dollars.

An hon. member: They will never read it.

CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY CHANNEL

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am advised now that there have been complete and thorough consultations. If we were to put the motion on CPAC, I believe we would have unanimous consent of the House to approve that motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent for the Parliamentary Secretary put the motion to the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I wish to indicate that this motion which adopts the principle of the CPAC proposal has the acceptance and support of my party. By doing so, in terms of the principle, it allows flexibility vis-à-vis the implementation of the proposal.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I will just indicate that we also support the motion. As a member of the committee that tabled the ninth report of the standing committee on privileges and elections, I would hope that the adoption of this motion will not mean that the other very important portions of the report will be ignored.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–56, an Act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, "since 1984, this government has been following a consistent and comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians can benefit from a rising standard of living and a quality of life second to none in the world." That is what the Minister of Finance told us when he presented his Budget this week.

Madam Speaker, I would be curious to know when we will be able to enjoy such a wonderful life. I doubt very much that Canadians are conscious of that at the moment, especially when the Minister goes on to say, and I quote: "This will be a testing year for the Canadian economy. The economic news will not be encouraging in the months ahead. Growth will be slow. Employment is expected to continue growing, but now as quickly as the labour force, and the unemployment rate will rise."

We really have to wonder if we will ever see a strong economy with this government.

[English]

Madam Speaker, with this new budget we cannot congratulate the Conservative government for spending restraints. It is too little, too late. As stated by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, and I quote: "If tax increases had been matched by spending cuts, the deficit would be half of what it is today and consumers would not be paying 20 per cent for consumer credit and small businesses would not be paying 16 per cent for their operating loans". Once again, the Canadian population will be paying for government mismanagement. This Minister of Finance is responsible. How much more can we take?

Madam Speaker, if inflation and interest rates continue to rise in 1990, we will be heading straight for a recession that will have been brought about by the Minister of Finance. In the Budget, the government announced that unemployment would rise and that assistance to business would be limited. As the Minister said: "With limited exceptions, grants will be eliminated and financial assistance will be repayable on more rigorous terms."

How does the government view the future of small and medium-size businesses in Canada? Is he favouring large businesses only when he tells us that to master our future in a changing world, we must expand our capacity to produce and sell Canadian goods and services at home and in markets around the world? Are Canadian small businesses not the very foundation of our regional and national economies?

How does the minister account for his cuts of more than $18 million at the Federal Business Development Bank, which is involved solely in assisting small business? More than half of the bank's budget has been cut, from $34 million in 1989-90 to $15 million for 1990-91.

Madam Speaker, the federal government announced it would abandon its regional development policy, without telling us whether the votes in question would be reallocated to other regional development initiatives or simply scrapped. Is this the beginning of the end for our regions, for the businesses in those regions and especially for the people who want to work there?

[English]

This budget is not serious. How can it be when the minister announces so innocently that "there will be no new taxes in this budget"? How can he say such a thing when everyone knows that Canadians from all provinces will live the side effects of the reduction of transfer payments to the provinces? It is a direct result of the budget presented in this House.

In my province of Quebec each taxpayer will have to pay $582 more because of this new budget. As someone so eloquently said:, "Tory times are tough times" and "Tory times are taxing times". Since 1984 Canadians have been blessed with 31 separate tax increases. What a blessing.

No new tax in the budget but the mechanism is in place for the new one next year.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am very sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I just wondered when she intended to address the bill before the House today, the Small Businesses Loans Act.

I realize she is making an excellent speech, but she is getting into the far more general subject we have been considering all week.

I would appreciate it if the hon. member would concentrate on the subject now before the House.

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, without wishing to contradict you, the GST and the Budget do have a tremendous impact on our small businesses.

[English]

No new tax, as I was saying, in the budget, but the mechanism is in place for the new one next year, the GST, the goods and services tax, the tax the minister says will make low income Canadians better off, the tax nobody wants, the nightmare for small business, as Mr. Bullock of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business said.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, more than 90 per cent of Canadians don't want the GST. Do they realize there is more than meets the eye? Perhaps it is time the minister told the truth about this tax which will come into force in 1991 and will cost all Canadians a lot of money, especially businesses which will have to hire more staff to collect this tax.

Canadians don't want it! The message is loud and clear. Does the minister have a hearing problem?

This tax, as the hon. member for Ottawa South (Mr. Manley) pointed out, is the biggest corporate tax break ever seen in Canada's history: $6 billion in taxes transferred from corporations to consumers.

Canadians do not know if they should laugh or cry. To help secure the approval of his Budget, the Minister appeals to the pride of all citizens by telling them, and I quote: "Canadians have stuck together through testing periods by reaffirming, time and again, their ability to build on the rich diversity of the nation with realism, determination, foresight and understanding."

[English]

When the minister presented this budget, he told the House that the replacement of the existing GST was a key part of the economic plan, that it would strengthen economic competitiveness, contribute to deficit reduction and lead to a fairer sales tax system. He also said that his government was going to continue working with the provinces to seek ways of minimizing the compliance burden of the tax, which is one of the greatest concerns of our small business community. Could the minister explain to the Canadian population how such a fair tax could be such a burden and give everyone a major headache, especially to small businesses?

Madam Speaker, the Minister had also assured us that the goods and services tax would be visible and yet, it will remain invisible! He said that the tax would be simple. I know for a fact that small businesses do not agree. Canada will be the only country with two sales tax systems: one federal and one provincial. Is it really the only way the Minister has found to put Canada on the map?

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business believes that the GST will be a nightmare for small businesses. Maybe the Minister is hiding something from us. Does he have shares in the Bayer company?

Besides causing migraines, the Minister seems to have trouble with his memory. He quickly forgets his promises. Businesses which have to collect the GST would have received some kind of compensation. I did say "would have", because of course this is no longer the case. Again, the minister has not kept his word.

Madam Speaker, through the years small businesses have become the driving force behind our economic growth and job creation in Quebec and in Canada as well. The new and developing small businesses have sustained the economic recovery which followed the 1981–82 recession and created in the eighties, most of the new jobs, that is over 80 per cent.

In 1987, 41 per cent of Canadians working in the private sector were employed by small businesses with less than 100 employees. Add to this the one million unincorporated self-employed workers, and you will see that small businesses accounted for 46 per cent of jobs in the private sector in Canada. The Minister of Finance does not seem to realize the significant contribution small and middle-sized businesses have made to support the economy of our country.

Madam Speaker, the small business community also has the highest rate of job creation. This is something quite significant, especially when the Minister of Finance coldly announces an increase in the unemployment rate for the coming year. From 1978 to 1987, more than 50 per cent of new jobs were created by businesses having less than five employees, which increased employment by 167 per cent.

The small business sector is more than a mere source of jobs. It is also a source of innovation and creativity. The Minister of Finance perhaps might get some training there before he presents his next budget.

Because they want to remain competitive, more and more small businesses are doing research and development. Businesses with less than 100 employees accounted for nearly nearly 20 per cent of R & D expenditures in the private sector. This is significant.

[English]

The Liberal party, contrary to the Conservative government, recognizes the vital role small business has in our economy. We are conscious of the essential part small business plays in job creation in Quebec and in Canada.

We have always supported small business. During the last election we made a commitment to help develop small business through new and creative initiatives, one of which was the setting up of an integrated information network with the help of the Federal Business Development Bank, which has just had a nice cut. A mere 50 per cent of its revenues have gone through the generosity of this Minister of Finance.

What about the assistance the Conservative government is giving, or rather, forgot to give to small business? What about the Small Businesses Loans Act? Does the Minister of Finance need a reminder of its original purpose? It was to guarantee small business loans from financial institutions. But, as we can clearly perceive through this budget, the government does not seem to recognize the importance of small and medium businesses in Canada.

Madam Speaker, traditionally the loan ceiling under the Small Businesses Loans Act has been increased regularly, based on the rate of inflation and the needs of small businesses, That was tradition. But the last time the ceiling was increased was in July 1980—and I repeat 1980—when it was raised from $75,000 to $100,000.

It is high time the Minister of Finance raised the limit from $100,000 to $150,000, all the more so that inflation has gone up more than 50 per cent since 1980. How far should it go before the government acts?

Madam Speaker, I would appreciate it if the minister told us frankly for once whether he wants small and medium-sized businesses to disappear, and whether he is hoping for the announced increase in unemployment? Or, on the contrary, as should any responsible government do, whether he wants the well-being of Canadians. Why is he then neglecting the future of our small and medium-sized businesses? Why has the loan ceiling remained at $100,000 since 1980? Why has the funding of the Federal Business Development Bank been cut by 50 per cent? Is that a Progressive Conservative Party management method? This is something that is not especially reassuring for the Canadian people.

[English]

When presenting his Budget, the Minister of Finance told us that we have "a responsibility to our children and grandchildren," and I am quoting him. Could he now explain how Canadians are to live up to their commitments when he announces an increase in unemployment and when his Budget does nothing to support small businesses that generate thousands of jobs? How are Canadians expected to make ends meet with a tax on goods and services coming into effect as soon as January, 1991? How is the quality of life to be improved for our children and grandchildren when job insecurity, inflation and a possible recession are just around the corner? Could the minister clarify all that? It does seem a bit confusing when one reads the Budget, or is it meant to be this way?

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, it is not, as proposed by the Minister of Finance, by taxing food and services and by neglecting small businesses, except at tax collecting time, that the economy of our country will recover and at the same time improve the situation of Canadian men and women. It is not by shifting the federal debt burden onto the provinces that the standard of living of Canadians will improve. Only by assuming its responsibilities and facing reality can this Tory Government really expect to remedy the situation of the Canadian people. But it will have to see things as they are and not as it would like them to be.

"We are cutting our expenditures without increasing the taxes. The tax pressure is already too great in Canada." That is what the present Minister of Finance said in March 1984. He has certainly forgotten that!

Finally, Madam Speaker, the Minister has repeatedly broken his tax reform commitments. He had promised that his GST would be revenue neutral. It is not. He had promised that his GST would be visible. It is not. He had promised that his GST would be simple. It is not. He had promised that the Crown would compensate businesses for collecting his GST. He changed his mind. How could the Canadian people still trust a Minister who has failed so much in living up to his commitments? How could small and medium-sized businesses hope to survive when the Minister of Finance has cut by over 50 per cent the funds available to the Federal Business Development Bank and refuses to rise the loan ceiling from $100,000 to $150,000, while the inflation increased by over 50 per cent since 1980?

How could we believe a Minister of Finance who claims to "follow a consistent and comprehensive program which should make it possible for Canadians to benefit from a standard of living and a quality of life unprecedented in the world"?

[English]

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, in terms of small business there is a general comment that I would like to make about the lack of support of the government.

First, is the closure of post offices and the effect that has had both on the communities generally and small businesses particularly. The Halfmoon Bay post office would be a prime example to illustrate this. Halfmoon Bay is a small community with a small post office that has served that community. A large number of the people are senior citizens and there are some small businesses. The post office is one of the key communication systems for those businesses in carrying on their activities. The post office with a very high-handed approach has without consultation shut that post office down and, in the opinion of many people there, harmed those businesses and the people who live there showing no concern for them. The argument that they have privatized postal services into small businesses has, in fact, harmed the community and in many cases caused a great deal of difficulty for the small businesses involved.

That post office at Halfmoon Bay has been there since 1883. It is an integral part of the community and serves small businesses there. It was an arrogant process by which the postal corporation shut it down, with the approval of the government, It refused to negotiate with the community on the provision of those services. One business benefits, but many, many others are harmed.

I wonder if the government is taking into consideration, not only the budgetary items mentioned by the hon. member, but its attitude in harming the infrastructure by these postal closures. This process of privatization—cutbacks in services, higher cost services as illustrated by the shutdown in Halfmoon Bay—is causing a serious deterioration in the community, and has a very negative impact on the majority of small businesses.

Does the hon. member have a comment on postal shutdowns and other services that the government has cut back that have caused some serious harm to small businesses?

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I think I would go a little further than the shutting down of small local post offices. Let us talk about the mail superboxes. They have caused great problems for Canadians.

I guess the simplest answer is that I do not have too much to say except that the government just does not care about people. It never has.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in this House to comment on the bill before us which involves amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act and extends that act for another three years. As well, it gives me pleasure to be able to comment on the state of small business in the country, particularly in my province and community.

I think all of us recognize the very vital role that small businesses play in all our communities, be they rural communities, urban communities, neighbourhoods, small towns or whatever, even northern communities.

When we examine what we do with regard to small business it bears thinking that between 1980 and 1988 fully 70 per cent of the new jobs in Canada were created by businesses that employ five people or less. This means that rather than big business which the government tends to promote as being the instrument of growth in this country, it is the small business sector that keeps creating the jobs.

Small businesses are the mainstays of the communities in which they operate. Sure big corporations from time to time sponsor national events, get their names on billboards and so on, but when it comes to the week-by-week, day-by-day sponsorship of hockey teams, provision of prizes for different kinds of raffles that keep the service clubs operating in all these communities, it is the small business sector that keeps all those community activities going and provides leadership.

As well, perhaps most important in this era of free trade and increasing foreign control of our economy, still fully 98 per cent of small businesses are Canadian-owned. I think that is just one more reason that it behooves all of us to support the small business sector.

This bill is essentially housekeeping. It cleans up the act, provides some amendments and extends the period of the act. What bothers me somewhat in this debate is the government claiming that this bill represents its commitment to small business and that it represents the commitment of the Progressive Conservative Party to small business.

I say to you, Madam Speaker, that small business has started to see this government's commitment, or claims of having a commitment, as a joke. I would like to outline the reasons that small business is starting to feel more and more that, in fact, this commitment is not only a joke but a sick joke.

First, the whole tilt of economic policy by this government since it was elected in 1984 has been very decidedly in favour of big business at the expense of small business and local communities. It has done that in any number of ways. It has done it through free trade. It certainly is not going to be the corner store that will be involved in massive deals with New York, Denver or Chicago, or whatever. It is big business that does that, not small business. It stacks the deck in favour of big business.

The deregulation we have seen in many sectors has allowed the big companies to take over sectors where small business used to operate and compete and now are not able to any more.

As well, it affects areas that are essential to small business such as air travel and transportation to remote communities. In fact, what has happened is that all we see now are services to the larger communities. Services to the smaller communities where small businesses are located are disappearing.

The government has chosen to stay on a course of persistently high interest rates that penalize small businesses which have to go outside the family or the community for its money. Big business can raise money internally. It can raise money on the capital markets. The whole system of high interest rates has militated against small businesses, even though they are the ones that keep this country in business.

As well, the tax policies have created a situation where wealth is sucked out of the hinterlands, the small towns, small businesses and the entrepreneurial families. It is concentrated in big cities and big financial institutions, again making it more difficult for small businesses to compete.

The other reason small business sees the government's commitment to them as being a joke is that, more than any other sector, they depend on their customers having money to spend. Without customers who have money to spend and vibrant local communities, small business cannot operate.

I would like to point out what is happening in my own province of Saskatchewan. Finally the central Canadian media are starting to recognize Saskatchewan as being an economic disaster area. In 1988, there were 461 insolvencies, 2,063 businesses disappeared, and only 2,664 businesses were created in that province. That is a net loss of 900 businesses in a small province with only one million in population in just one year.

We see the same trend in my own community of Prince Albert, the major centre in my constituency. In 1987, there was a net gain of 31 new businesses. In 1988, there was a smaller net gain of 18 new businesses. In 1989, there was a drop in the number of businesses in that community of 18. With the way the trends are going, that pattern of businesses disappearing can do nothing but accelerate.

It is no accident that this has happened to the province of Saskatchewan. In the farming community in 1984, when this government took office, there were 67,000 farms in Saskatchewan. Projections are that when the government's term runs out in 1992 there will only be 54,000 farms left, a drop of 13,000 farms in the province of Saskatchewan. That is 13,000 farm families who are not buying their groceries and machinery, who are not getting their hair cuts and so on, in the small communities of Saskatchewan.

Since the government was elected in 1984, 64,000 people have been forced to leave the province of Saskatchewan. People want to stay but economically they are not able to under the government's economic policies. Just in the last year 23,000 people left the province. We used to consider ourselves a have province. In fact, there was a time during the former NDP government we were not getting equalization payments. We had a surplus budget.

What has happened now? We are the second-poorest province in the country. We have 13.9 per cent of our population, almost 14 per cent, living below the poverty line. That is more than one in ten families and nearly one in seven. Certainly people living in poverty are not helping small business either to farm or to keep going. It is no wonder that there are all these bankruptcies and business closures.

Of the 500 towns in that province, 300 lost population in the last five years. It is an utter disaster. Bankruptcies have tripled. What kind of direction do we see from the government now that small business is looking to it for a signal as to what kind of future they can envision and expect?

The government not only predicts but plans for higher interest rates. The rates are now at 13 per cent. As my colleague, the member for Yorkton—Melville said, who can believe the government's estimate that the average next year will be 11 per cent when we are starting the year at over 13 per cent? We are going to have lower disposable income next year and the families in the country, and certainly in the province of Saskatchewan, will have less money to spend and not more. They are already hurting. What does the government say? Because of its economic policies, there is going to be a full 1 per cent drop in the disposable income available to Canadians. With a 5 per cent inflation rate, it means, in effect, that they will be able to buy 6 per cent less goods and services when we already have 15 per cent poverty.

The government expects that in the next several years unemployment is going to grow by 100,000 jobs per year. We know what happens. This fall in income and this rise in unemployment are not going to spread evenly across the country and they are not going to happen evenly in all the communities. They are going to happen in those precise communities that are already in trouble.

So not only do we have what was a localized recession and economic catastrophe, but the government is building into the system and virtually guaranteeing a national recession. That means that the economy of Saskatchewan cannot look for any help from the rest of Canada.

Then we have the prospect of the goods and services tax. Certainly nobody has rallied to fight the goods and services tax like the small business community. I have tabled petitions in the House representing thousands of people in my constituency. I go through the names to see who they are and what communities they represent. Every time I look at a page I am struck by the number of people who represent the small business sector and, in fact, people who have ardently and enthusiastically supported the Progressive Conservative Party in the past. Theirs are the names that are showing up on the GST petitions. They know what it is going to do to them in spite of the claims of the government and the Minister of Finance.

Also I would like to comment briefly on the situation faced by small businesses in the northern part of my constituency and, by extension, small businesses right across northern Canada. Those communities are in the forest and mining areas, and the native communities of the country.

The businesses operating in those communities face a large number of very special handicaps. There are no banks in most of these communities. In the northern part of Saskatchewan there is a bank in La Ronge and one in Creighton. There are 43 communities in northern Saskatchewan, which means that 41 of them do not have access to banking services. There is nothing in the banking system that says in spite of the hundreds of millions of dollars that large corporations pull out through mining and other activities, there is any obligation to provide banking services to those communities. It means that people wanting to start businesses do not have any kind of credit rating. It means that you cannot make a daily or even weekly deposit without driving hundreds of miles, or even flying, to the nearest bank. It is very difficult to run a business under those circumstances.

Regional development programs that assisted northern businesses and, in fact, all the businesses in our region have been gutted. Regional development programs made it possible for small businesses to have access to programs that would enhance forestry and fishing. They could develop economic organizations where they could group together to speak with one voice and to plan the economy of their communities. The kind of grassroot programs that used to be available under regional development programs are gone. Instead, we have the Western Diversification Fund operating just in the big cities. It is clearly tilted toward further support for big business and completely ignores the needs of small businesses in those northern communities.

As well, we see that northern tax benefits are under threat by a task force set up by the government. It is a tax benefit brought in a few years ago and then the government shut the door. It was a tax benefit that recognized the high cost of living and of keeping trained personnel in those communities, the high costs that are associated with living in northern Canada.

As well, the point that was alluded to by the member for North Island—Powell River is a very real factor in those northern communities. Rather than building up the infrastructure of post offices, communication systems, transportation system and telephones, what we see is the government listening to their big business friends who say: "We only need those services in the big cities. We need to provide those services as cheaply as possible to the big users. The people who live in the rest of the country, the vast majority of the land area in this country, can make do and have to make do." Instead of improving, those communities which can make an economic contribution to Canadian life are faced with the lower and lower services and are more and more removed from the mainstream of economic life in this country.

So what do we need? Certainly this bill helps, but it is just a drop in the bucket compared to what small business needs.

First, in Saskatchewan we need a farm program that is not going to centralize agriculture into a few big corporate farms at the whim of the international market. We see the government at the GATT and free trade, selling out the family farm sector. All that means is even more acceleration of the trend to even fewer farms. Predictions are that if the agri-business model takes hold, we might be down to 14,000 farms in Saskatchewan within the next 20 years. That means that thousands more businesses will disappear. In fact, whole communities will disappear.

We need a Bank Act that will do several things. It needs to put small business on an equal footing with big business, both with respect to interest rates and collateral required and with respect to where those banking services are offered. They should be offered right across the country so that we do not keep sucking money out of the small communities and the frontier areas of this country to deposit for use by big corporations in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal.

We need regional development programs that, on a sector by sector basis, build up those resource areas that could make a contribution to the country and its economy. They could then make a contribution to paying off our debt.

We should be reforesting northern Saskatchewan, and all the forested areas that have been clear-cut and are being left to blow away in the wind. We could create a lot of employment and ensure the future viability of business in those communities by planting more trees.

We need to take the environment seriously. Given the small population of the frontier areas of the country, if we took the environment seriously and cleaned up our lakes, restocked the fish, and cleaned up the pollution from old mines, everybody in those areas would be working rather than having 70 per cent to 80 per cent unemployment rates.

Obviously, we need lower interest rates. Interest rates are the biggest killer of small business. We need an end to the GST. We need a recognition of community economic development corporations, co-operatives, and other alternate sources of capital that will allow people in those communities to pool their capital, raise new sources of funding, organize themselves into businesses, and look at business opportunities in their communities. We need new creative ways to do that. What we have seen is that former practices are being taken away. We have to return to some faith in the grassroots of Canada to be able to control its own destiny.

We need to ensure that the customers of small businesses have money. We have to have a full employment policy in Canada. People with welfare cheques and unemployment cheques are not the same kind of customers as people with pay cheques. If there is one thing that small business in the country and in my constituency would like to see, it is more people with pay cheques and fewer people with welfare and unemployment cheques. The people with those welfare and unemployment cheques would like to see that too. There is a coalition of interest there.

Most of all, we need a government with a policy that ends this fixation with big business—this fixation that only big business can help us compete in the so-called brave new world. What we need is faith in grassroots Canada and the communities of Canada to control their own economic destiny, so that every community and every citizen of this country has a personal stake in its economic future.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I was just wondering if the perfect cap to the hon. member's absolutely reasonable and, indeed, incisive remarks, might not be an observation by him as to persons to be found in the gallery.

Mr. Funk: If that is permissible, Madam Speaker, I would like to introduce my mother, Helene Funk, from Saskatchewan; my sister, Carla Sheridan, from Ottawa, and her two daughters, Jessica and Anna.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Speaker being the only person who can officially recognize people in the gallery will be happy to join and transmit greetings.

• (1300)

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, the hon. member raises a good point, but I would like to make some observations about postal shutdowns, particularly, as an example, the Halfmoon Bay postal shutdown.

It is my hope that the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation will also comment on this shutdown. It illustrates the absolute arrogance of Canada Post, particularly in the western region. This particular small post office has been in place since 1883 and is an historical facility in the community. It is interesting that the Canada Post Corporation and the Conservative government would remove that post office without negotiation or without consultation with the owners, two small business people in Halfmoon Bay. They placed their business in jeopardy. They placed the community in jeopardy, as well as the other small businesses and the senior citizens who depend on that post office.

When Canada Post decided to close the post office it sent in a PR flack, a person of incredible arrogance. The reaction of the community to that person was astounding. It is no wonder that the Conservatives are 19 per cent in the polls and dropping because of that kind of arrogance.

The western regional people have to return to the Sechelt Peninsula, to Halfmoon Bay, to discuss with the small business people who run that operation about reinstituting it so that it can once again serve the community and about restoring it to its current position in the community.

The arrogance in the approach of Canada Post toward those small businesses is unacceptable. The rural post office is an important infrastructure and it has to stop the arrogant high-handed procedure where a public relations person comes in and says: "We've decided this is what is going to happen. We are going to close it, and you are going to like it".

Does the hon. member have any additional thoughts concerning the high-handed approach taken on these postal services?

Mr. Funk: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for raising that point. It allows me to expand a little more on the issue of postal service.

In my own constituency we have seen postal services disappear in the community of Henribourg, a community that had had postal service for over 50 years. We have seen a postal service cut-back in the community of Shipman.

In communities in northern Saskatchewan that are rapidly growing, for example the community of Pelican Narrows which has 1,200 to 1,500 residents, we see the postal service operating out of a little hole in the wall that has hardly any heat. There is postal service only three times a week, which makes it very difficult to carry on any kind of economic activity.

This is the case right through northern Saskatchewan. Thrice weekly postal service is what many of those communities have come to expect. There are communities that do not have money order or c.o.d. services, so it is virtually impossible to use the mail for any kind of business.

Furthermore, as a result of the way the mail is routed, mail from the eastern, central and western parts of northern Saskatchewan has to go through the south; some of it through Flin Flon and down to Winnipeg and Regina, then up through Saskatoon and Prince Albert, to get about 100 miles across country. This makes it very difficult for communities to carry on business activities between themselves.

People in northern Saskatchewan realize that to build up the fishing industry, the wild rice industry, the local forestry business or to create business organizations you need to be able to communicate with each other by postal service. Now that is not possible. The postal service is useless. If you wants to call a meeting you have to send out the mail a full month in advance, and you do not get the minutes before the next meeting is due. People in the south just do not realize what kind of constraints businesses and, indeed, community organizations and individuals operate under in these kind of communities when they get the kind of postal service that Canada Post is giving them. It is a high-handed and arrogant approach, not only to the postal service that already exists in many small communities, but it is totally counterproductive if we are looking at building up the economies of these regions which, historically, have been underdeveloped and have had high unemployment rates.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, the example of the Halfmoon Bay post office was one of just incredible arrogance in its shut down and then in terms of the accountability.

I would like to suggest to my hon. colleague that the president of the Canada Post Corporation, and the regional director, have absolutely no sense or feeling for the people who live there. The fact is that post office is an incredibly historical operation there. It is a major support to small business in that community. The high-handed attitude has got to change. The corporation has to get in there, negotiate and attempt to consult with the people involved before making these kinds of decisions about service to the community. Only in that way can the Conservatives hope to stop the drop from 19 per cent to 9 per cent and then right through the floor.

The fact has been mentioned that postal service stations could provide other things such as banking services in these areas. There has been a lot of talk that banks no longer serve many of these smaller communities. There are banking functions that the post office could perform. It could also serve as a government office and deal with pension forms, citizenship forms and passport forms. It could be a representative of the Government of Canada providing a service on a broader basis through those postal facilities to the community and to small businesses.

If there is anything that the Halfmoon Bay case gives us it is an illustration of the arrogance, the high-handed approach and the unwillingness to work with people.

Mr. Funk: Madam Speaker, I totally agree with the member. Not only the case that he describes represents high-handedness and arrogance, but that is true right across this country in many small communities.

As he points out, not only have post offices played an historic function in holding those communities together, they being the centre of those communities, a place where people gather, but there are a lot of government services that people need on a day-to-day basis. They need contact with the Government of Canada and those services could be expanded to operate through those post offices. In fact, I believe that is true in Britain, where post offices are used in that fashion. I think it would be a good model for us. Services could be extended to people who certainly have an equal right to get those services as everybody else.

As long as this government is totally obsessed with running the post office to make a profit what will happen is that it will be run into the ground in the small communities. Certainly a small community post office is not going to be a big money-maker compared to shipping large volumes of mail between Toronto and Vancouver. Everybody knows that. I think it is criminal for us to ignore the infrastructure and service function of the post office just giving it the function of making money for the government.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I know some of the Tories may be concerned about the opportunity to get away on a holiday but I am under the impression that we are here in this House to debate. We have time limits established. I was also under the impression that the Tories consider small business an important element in the Canadian economy. I may be wrong.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, first, we on this side were under the understanding that the debate was to be finished. It has nothing to do with our attitude toward small business which is reflected by the bill that we put forward in the House of Commons. So perhaps the hon.

member would confine his remarks to the issue at hand and not get off on his usual partisan strides.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I am not sure on what pretence the previous speaker gained the floor, but it certainly was not a point of order. Regardless of what understanding they were under, I am under the understanding that the House sits until three o'clock and that this government bill is the subject of debate. I was advised by my whip that members are permitted to speak on it until three o'clock. Whatever impression that Tory house leader is under has not been communicated to me.

I am concerned about small business and that is why I am on my feet in the House of Commons at the time appropriated for debate on this issue and I certainly intend to debate it. While we support this piece of legislation, we on this side of the House are certainly concerned about the differences in the way that small businesses are treated by this Tory government as opposed to how large businesses are treated. Nowhere was that more evident than in the case of the budget speech which recently came down in this House. When you compare how much of the largesse of this government is given to large businesses, this bill is simply a pittance compared to what the government should be doing in order to help small business grow and thrive.

We have heard some fine statements from that side of the House. We have heard that small businesses create 70 to 80 per cent of the employment in this country. We have heard that small business is the most innovative sector of our business economy. We have heard that small business is also the most competitive sector of our economy. Yet, the very little this government does in order to support small business has to be the subject of more important debate in this House than has been the case.

I heard in advance of the budget coming down this week that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Business Council on National Issues were talking about how seriously the deficit had to be cut and what stringent measures had to be taken, even to the extent of cutting grants to business. The newspapers were saying to the people of Canada that here was an example of business sacrificing its own interests in order to cut the deficit. In point of fact, nothing could be further from the truth. There is absolutely nothing in this budget that stops the huge flow of resources from the taxpayer of this country to large businesses.

The amount of tax expenditures made available to large business is absolutely unbelievable compared to the pittance that is made available to small business. The capital cost allowances in this country are the most generous of any country in the developed world. Businesses are allowed to depreciate their equipment and to replace labour with capital at a rate that does not even make sense. They are purchasing unnecessary capital to replace labour because of that generous capital cost allowance that we give them. That is not available at such generous levels in any other country on the globe.

If only we were as generous to small business as we are to the large corporations. Nothing is done in the current budget to change that situation. That constant bleeding of taxpayers' resources into non-productive investment still contributes to the deficit and still contributes to the high price of doing business in Canada. If we were going to be serious about trimming the deficit, we should have taken a look at that area of tax expenditure because it is a serious problem in Canada with which we should have been dealing.

In this country we also permit the borrowings of corporations involved in corporate acquisitions and mergers to be deducted from their cost of business in order to calculate their income tax. It is a virtual government support of corporate acquisitions and mergers. The result of these mergers is generally the loss of jobs, the loss of production facilities in Canada, and the loss of the Canadian economic inventory.

As a result, we tend to lose jobs, we tend to lose production and we tend to lose taxpayers' resources which could be reallocated to trimming the deficit. That is the kind of thing that should be cut. It is a direct concession, a direct grant to large businesses; the kinds of grants and concessions that small businesses in this country do not get. We are not giving small business the kind of service that it should be receiving. We recognize that they are the greatest job creators. We recognize that they are the most innovative sector. We recognize that they are the most competitive sector. Yet, we do next to nothing in order to support them compared to what we do for large business.

Large business in Canada is essentially controlled by a number of small families who also donate to the Conservative and Liberal parties. They consider those two parties wholly-owned subsidiaries when they are doing business with government and doing business in Canada. If we examine business in this country we find that large business in Canada is the least competitive and the least innovative. As a result, Canada is not served well by its large business sector.

We continue to bleed huge amounts of the government's tax expenditures into that sector while getting virtually nothing in return. Part of the problem is that there is too tight a connection between the bureaucrats in the Ministry of Finance and the large business sector. There seems to be an unethical kind of transfer back and forth between those two sectors.

I want to draw attention to an article about Mickey Cohen in a recent Globe and Mail business report which pointed out that as the deputy minister of finance he was responsible for a substantial number of tax concessions made to business. While he was the deputy minister he made available a half-billion dollar tax concession to Olympia and York developments and suddenly, within weeks, he was an employee of Olympia and York developments. There was simply too tight a connection between those groups.

Is that the kind of entrepreneurs we are developing in the large business sector in Canada? While they are working for the government they manufacture tax concessions for their future employers. That has been the problem with the way this government has dealt with large business in this country all along.

As far as I am concerned there has to be more attention paid to small business people. Those are the people who keep our small communities alive. Those are the people who develop the new and innovative products that are going to take Canada into the world economy as a high technology competitor, and yet that is the sector of the economy that is being starved.

Rather than hacking away at programs for native Indians, rather than hacking away at programs for women, rather than hacking away at programs for small businesses by converting their grants to repayable loans in the budget, we should have been helping those sectors because that is where the greatest number of jobs are being created in this economy.

I intend to vote for this bill, but I am certainly concerned about the kind of favouritism this government and the previous government has shown to the large business sector at the expense of small business and individuals.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River) Mr. Speaker, the issue I would like to raise with the hon. member is the role of big business and the advantages it draws compared to those of small business and the need for the public to have some input.

I would like to address to him a matter relating to the P. J. Wooding Ferro chromium proposal for Port Hardy, British Columbia. It is a major business proposal. The company has received about $4.5 million from the federal government and $4.5 million from the provincial government.

The people to be affected by that project have not managed to obtain any positive response from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of the Environment, the minister responsible for western diversification or the minister responsible for Indian Affairs on intervenor funding. It is absolutely crucial, if a business with serious impact is to be developed in a community, that intervenor funding be provided to those groups attempting to explore the environmental and social impacts of such a business.

Without prejudice or without prejudging the particular project, the community has a right to know. There are native people in that area who are concerned about their land claim, about the effect on their traditional way of life. They need money to purchase expertise, to study it, and to input properly into the environmental assessment review panel.

This is such an important area for the fishery on the northern end of Vancouver Island that the community affected by possible impacts must have help from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to obtain technical expertise. The Western Initiative Fund people felt that it was necessary for expertise and input to be given, and that is why we have the assessment review panel in place, but at this point there is an unwillingness on their part to provide technical assistance through intervener funding or direct aid to these groups.

The Department of the Environment, of course, has the crucial first responsibility to give assistance there. Hopefully this intervener funding will come forward. Also, the Environmental Assessment Review Panel has the right to engage technical expertise to assist those groups in their quest for information so that their input to the community can be reasoned, knowledgeable and effective.

This House, the ministers responsible and, I am certain, the hon. member, would concur that it is absolutely imperative that those intervener funds be brought forward and provided to those various communities on the northern end of Vancouver Island affected by this project and that the technical expertise through the assessment review panel be provided so that a full, knowledgeable inquiry into this production process can be made and that proper conclusions on a foundation of good solid knowledge can be provided.

Also, there is a great deal of this project that is hidden by the confidential provisions of contracts and covered up by the Privacy Act. We have to have access to the key elements of that, even if they are considered in camera and confidentially. They have to be brought out where people with the proper expertise can evaluate them and assess the impact to the community.

This is absolutely critical. Citizens can no longer be hoodwinked and kept in blind ignorance about projects that are going into their area. It is absolutely imperative that the committee engage a full range of technical expertise to help the community provide information and that intervener funding is provided. I am absolutely certain that the government would want that to happen as well as the previous member.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the previous speaker for his intervention.

This is a problem that we face with the size of corporations that are doing business in Canada today. If a corporation decides to set up a new operation it has huge resources at its fingertips, resources that essentially have been financed by the Government of Canada through the various tax concessions I was talking about. They can mobilize a series of biologists, engineers, and other people with expertise to inform citizens that the project they have in mind is not going to cause environmental or social impacts that are damaging to the community.

Unfortunately, they can also retain information and hold information in confidence. If we are to have a competent environmental and social impact assessment process, we need the resources and the ability, through the rule of law, to demand that information and also to call to account those corporate employees who are employed on environmental impact statements. Because we do not have intervenor funding from the federal government, those corporations are, unfortunately, allowed to wield a greater amount of power over the environment than they otherwise would be allowed.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the P.J. Wooding Ferro chromium project on the northern end of Vancouver Island is heavily subsidized by the federal government. One of the things that is seriously questioned is the attitude of that company toward organized labour. There is a great deal of concern in the community that the federal government could provide a grant to a company which is prepared to prohibit its workers to organize, to prohibit its employees the right to have a contract with their employer and bargain collectively for their wages and working conditions.

It is important when the government is giving grants, especially to an outfit like the P.J. Wooding Ferro chromium project, that there be an opportunity for organized labour to go in and organize that workforce, to permit them their rights under the law and to bargain collectively for their wages and working conditions.

This absolutely assures that the money from that project, the return on taxpayers' dollars and the return on the resources, accrues to the community of Port Hardy and is not carried away to some other jurisdiction as so often happens with foreign ownership and ownership from out of the region. If they permit organized labour into that operation a better share accrues to the community. Grants from this government should not be permitted to any corporation which attempts to exclude organized labour from that project. This is absolutely critical. It would be my hope that the government would make a statement on that today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec–Est)): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I anticipate two immediate matters. I will hear, first of all, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

ELECTION OF DEPUTY SPEAKER

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons. First, however, I would like to congratulate him and say that we welcome his appointment as the minister responsible for the business of the House. We are confident he will draw on his many skills to work with his opposition colleagues in this House, in a manner that is constructive and in the best interests of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns Standing Order 7(3), which I will read to you. It is about the Chairman of Committees of the Whole—in other words, the Deputy Speaker of the House:

> The Member so elected as Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees of the Whole shall continue to act in that capacity until the end of the Parliament for which he or she is elected, and in the case of a vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise, the House shall proceed forthwith to elect a successor.

Could the minister inform the House whether he intends to consult the opposition, as is customary and in keeping with parliamentary tradition, before moving the motion to elect a Deputy Speaker of the House?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State to Prime Minister and Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, cognizant of the standing order and its requirements, and because of the fact that we had a recess since the elevation of the former Deputy Speaker to cabinet, the Prime Minister has not had an opportunity to have the usual discussions with the leaders of the Opposition. It is his intention to do so, after which he will have a recommendation hopefully agreed to with opposition leaders to bring to the House for election to Deputy Speaker. It is only for that reason that there is a delay.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too want to echo the concerns of my hon. colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. The point he raises is most appropriate.

I also wish to take this occasion to welcome my good friend from Calgary Centre in his new position. It appears as if there is a bit of an Alberta Mafia developing here in the government. We have the member for Calgary Centre, the member for Peace River and the member for Calgary West, all playing a critical role on the government benches. We look forward to an ongoing close working relationship with the team.

BUDGET DEBATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I rise today at the first opportunity after the break on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, to suggest firstly that debate on the budget motion be suspended and, second, to request that you carefully review the government bill currently on notice and determine whether or not the House should proceed with that bill at this time.

On Tuesday, February 20, the government presented its budget and moved the traditional motion to approve the measures it contains. A debate on this motion and the traditional amendments took place on subsequent days of that week.

Since that debate was last adjourned a significant event has in fact taken place. The Government of British Columbia has approached the courts and asked for a ruling on the legitimacy of one of the major components of that budget, namely the Canada Assistance Plan.

Specifically, the province of British Columbia is asking the Court of Appeal to answer the following questions.

First, has the Government of Canada any statutory prerogative or contractual authority to limit its obligation under the Canada Assistance Plan Act, RSC 1970, Chapter C-1 and its agreement with the Government of British Columbia dated March 23, 1967 to contribute 50 per cent of the cost to British Columbia for assistance and welfare services?

• (1310)

Second, do the terms of the agreement dated March 23, 1967 between the Governments of Canada and British Columbia, the subsequent conduct of the Government of Canada pursuant to the agreement and the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan Act, RSC 1970, Chapter C-1 give rise to a legitimate expectation that the Government of Canada would introduce no bill into Parliament to limit its obligation under the agreement or act without the consent of the people and Government of British Columbia?

Those questions are contained in Order in Council No. 287 signed by the Lieutenant-Governor on February 27, 1990.

I have forwarded a copy of the Order in Council and all relevant court documents that I have been able to obtain to the Chair.

We know that the first court hearing on this issue will take place tomorrow afternoon. I hope you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that the House should do all that it can to ensure that this hearing is as fair to the citizens of British Columbia as is possible.

I think it is important at this point for the House to remember the pledge it made some decades ago when it established the Canada Assistance Plan and defined the federal responsibility over welfare assistance, child care and other related issues.

Section 8 of the Canada Assistance Plan Act states: "an agreement may be amended or terminated by mutual consent of the minister and the provinces" and "Canada may at any time give to the province notice of intention to terminate an agreement—the agreement shall cease to be effective for any period after the day fixed in the notice or for any period after the expiration of one year from the date on which the notice is given, whichever is the later."

Historically the House has by convention restrained itself from discussing questions which are before the courts when such a discussion would prejudice the outcome of those proceedings.

I refer of course to the sub judice convention.

Beauchesne's fifth and sixth editions describe the responsibility of members to exercise restraint in the following way:

> Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of record. The purpose of this sub judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

As a result of the cases brought before it the House has a much clearer understanding of the sub judice convention as it applies to criminal cases than civil ones.

But the premise of the convention that everyone is entitled to a fair hearing before the courts without prejudicial debate in the Commons surely applies equally to criminal and civil matters.

I hope you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to explain why I feel it should apply in today's circumstances.

The courts are being asked to judge whether there is a legitimate expectation that the Government of Canada would introduce no bill into Parliament to limit its obligation without the consent of British Columbia. It is also being asked whether the government has any authority to limit its contributions.

These two questions are part and parcel of the motion currently before the House. If the House resolves its approval for the budget, it will be endorsing the authority of the government to limit its contributions.

If the House gives leave to introduce any bill which reduces the Canada Assistance Plan to any or all provinces, it will be asserting that there is no "legitimate expectation that the government would introduce no bill".

How could the adoption of the budget motion fail to prejudice the rights of the citizens of British Columbia to a fair hearing on their questions?

Would it be fair for the government to be given the opportunity to put on the public record four days of evidence without the Government of British Columbia being able to have the opportunity to rebut or question that evidence or forward some of its own?

Similarly, to allow the bill on notice, if it indeed does limit payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, would prejudice the same appeal. It would also breach parliamentary tradition.

Beauchesne's sixth edition at paragraph 508, clause 4 reminds us that:

> The reference of a bill to the Supreme Court of Canada withdraws that bill temporarily from the jurisdiction of Parliament—The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time.

Beauchesne's cites a 1948 ruling that is germane to the question before us at the moment. At that time the Speaker was asked to accept an amendment to a government motion to appoint a joint committee of the House and Senate to consider the question of human rights and freedoms. The amendment proposed would have called for a reference to the Supreme Court of a general question of federal jurisdiction over the freedoms of speech, assembly, et cetera.

The Speaker at that time disallowed the amendment saying that "this amendment actually proposes that the Supreme Court be asked to consider the same matter that the main motion proposes to refer to a select committee. It seems to me that both these propositions cannot be approved at the same time by the House. If the constitutional situation of human rights is submitted to the Supreme Court, it thereby becomes sub judice and cannot be considered by the committee until the court has given its decision. The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time."

I submit that if the debate on the budget motion proceeds, and if the bill currently on notice is in fact introduced, this is exactly what will ensue. Two public bodies, each trusted with responsibilities over justice, will have before them these questions about the legitimacy of the proposed termination of agreements under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Before I conclude, allow me to address briefly the sub judice convention itself. It strikes me that every time a public issue is before the courts, the House is buffeted by opposing whims on how the convention should be applied, whether the convention should be applied, why it should be applied, and so on.

Should such a re-examination occur today, I submit that it should not be material to your decision, Mr. Speaker, or the decision of the House to suspend voluntarily debate on the budget motion.

Nor should it colour your decision on whether or not to allow the bill currently on notice to proceed, because the convention does exist and it continues to be applied.

For example, only last summer, Mr. Speaker, you interjected to remind the House of its self-imposed restraint when members of the Opposition attempted to question the government on its decision to lay charges against Mr. Doug Small and the conflicting evidence given to the House committee.

In fact, since I have been in the House, I can only remember sub judice being applied to prevent the Opposition from unrestrainedly asking questions of the government on topical issues of the day.

Although it may sometimes appear so, the convention does not exist to protect the government. It exists to protect those before the courts.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to protect the interests of the citizens of British Columbia whose elected representatives are challenging, on their behalf, the budget measures proposed by this government.

I ask for debate on the budget motion to be suspended and for any proceedings on any bill regarding the Canada Assistance Plan to be stopped until such time as debate will not imperil the rights of these citizens from British Columbia to a fair hearing.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a couple of comments on the point raised by the member for Kamloops, House leader for the New Democratic Party.

Indeed he may have a point. The government could be breaking the law or possibly has broken the law already, but in my view this is a matter of law and not a matter for the Speaker of the House of Commons to settle. The courts are indeed empowered to look into these matters, and I take it that both provinces at this time have taken measures to make their case in front of the courts.

I am therefore uncomfortable as to whether in your position as Speaker of this House, knowing our traditions and our customs, you should be ruling at this time on a matter of law. I know you cannot.

Therefore I put it simply to the House that although I agree with the member that there could be a good legal case made before the courts for the government breaking or being in breach of its agreements, or of its subagreements for that matter, at this time I must say that the Official Opposition would feel that the matter is a legal one, not one for the House.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State to Prime Minister and Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could just very quickly respond to the opening comments of the member for Kamloops by saying that I hope he does not think that because there are four Albertans involved it takes four Albertans to match wits with one British Columbian or one Ontarian. That is not the circumstance.

I indicated that we had no previous warning of this point of order so I am not in a position to reply in detail, except to dig back into my memory and recall, without the specific citation, previous speakers pointing out the fact that if this point of order were to prevail, then by the simple expedient of filing a lawsuit anybody could prevent the House of Commons from dealing with its normal business. That clearly would be an unacceptable situation. For that reason if for no others—and there certainly are other reasons—I would say this is rather a spurious point of order and probably not worthy.

If the Chair should see in the arguments more merit than is obvious to me at this point in time, I would ask that we have an opportunity to respond in detail. I have to say at this time I agree with my friend from Ottawa—Vanier that this point of order is elaborate and articulate but without merit in terms of substance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a very interesting point. It is public knowledge, as has been repeated by the hon. member for Kamloops, that at least one province is challenging in the courts certain provisions which the federal government has enunciated in its budget speech.

The challenge lies on the side of civil law, not criminal law. The sub judice convention has never been as rigorously applied in civil matters as in criminal matters. Hon. members will know that as a consequence of matters raised by members to me recently, I have had to deal with the sub judice convention with respect to criminal matters, and I think that position is quite clear.

I echo the words of the hon. House leader, that the hon. member for Kamloops put forward a very able argument. I want to consider carefully the reference to a particular ruling which the hon. member cited. I will take that matter under advisement and report back to the House as soon as I can.

However, in the meantime, I do not think it would be appropriate to delay the debate on the budget motion. We are not debating a bill at the moment. I have the hon. member's point. I will give it very careful consideration and will report back to the House as soon as I can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Orders of the Day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO TELEVISE PROCEEDINGS OF COMMITTEE—BILL C-62

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could use this moment to ask my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, if there has been any progress made on a motion to be brought before the House in terms of televising the proceedings of the finance committee which will start later in the day. It is important that we deal with this expeditiously.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, indeed there has been progress. I thought I would wait until Orders of the Day had been called and just before we got into debate, it was my intention to rise on a point of order.

There have been discussions among the three parties, and I believe Your Honour will find consent for the following motion:

That televised broadcasting be authorized of meetings of the Standing Committee on Finance, specifically during the consideration of Bill C-62; an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, Criminal Code, Customs Act, Customs Tariff, Excise Act, Income Tax Act, Statistics Act, and Tax Court of Canada Act;

That such broadcasting be on the basis of the principles and practices now governing broadcast of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Young (Gloucester) (p. 8636).

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My understanding was that the hon. member for Regina—Wascana had the floor at the interruption of debate last time. I am advised that for reasons I assume to do with flight connections he is not able to make it, but he would like to continue his speech later in the day.

I am wondering if the House would give its consent to allow him to continue that speech at a later time during the day, in light of the fact that he cannot be here right now.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, we are happy to consent to the hon. member using any unexpired time he may have had at the conclusion of his speech and the usual period for questions and comments at the conclusion of that speech.

I would also like to say while I am on my feet, Sir, that during the continuation of this debate the speakers from this party will be speaking for 10 minutes followed by a 5-minute question and comment period if that is agreeable to the House.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, certainly we are prepared to give consent to allow the hon. member for Regina—Wascana to complete his remarks, followed by the usual question and comment period.

I too would seek an understanding of the House that, if the various parties wish to divide up the particular slot allotted into a 10 and 5 as opposed to 20 and 10, that would meet its approval.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleagues and friends opposite for allowing the hon. member for Regina—Wascana to continue his speech at a later time today.

Second, I wish to indicate that in our usual attitude of co-operation we would be happy to allow the other parties to split their time as they wish.

We on the government side may consider doing the same, although I am not informed of that at this moment.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just want to take advantage of this atmosphere of co-operation and ask my hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, whether there is any possibility of the government reconsidering and allowing the finance committee to travel so witnesses from various parts of Canada can be heard.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows I am a very generous man, but there are limits to my generosity.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, one thing has been drawn to my attention. The hon. member for Regina—Wascana, as I understand the situation, may have been addressing the House in this debate immediately before the vote was taken on Thursday evening. If that is so, it may be that his time has expired by reason of the interruption and the vote. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could confirm that point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we have had enough negotiation on the floor. We can decide that later.

We will proceed to debate. The hon. member for St. Boniface has the floor for 10 minutes, plus 5 minutes for questions.

The Budget

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured and extremely pleased to be able to address the whole question of the budget this afternoon.

As I begin to do so, I would like to quote for the record a communication I have just received from a colleague addressing this very question. It reads as follows:

> This budget is a true Tory budget. The government's real agenda, about which it said nothing in the last election campaign, is now fully visible, and the vast majority of Canadians are clearly unhappy about the directions in which the government is taking our country. In the last campaign the government did not talk about a deficit out of control. It did not promise reductions to unemployment insurance, health care funding, and education funding. It did not promise a clawback of old age security. When the Liberals said these were exactly the things that would happen, the Conservatives called them liars and fear-mongers.

If we were to ask Canadians today who are the liars and who are the fear-mongers, I suspect we would get a very different answer from the one that would have been given some months ago.

The member of Parliament for Winnipeg North, in an address a few days ago with respect to the budget, indicated that a budget reflects a government's priorities and is really a reflection of its very soul.

I was interested in that particular comment because, in a sense, it has profound implications. How I spend my money is actually a very important statement about what it is that I consider my priorities to be. What is it that is most important and what is it that is perhaps of lesser importance?

If you look at the government's budget from that perspective, you will find some very interesting facts that I want to share with this House. Defence spending will in fact increase by 5 per cent. The operations of CSIS, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, will be increasing by 20 per cent.

I could give some other examples but I believe that those serve to make the point I want to make. It is that there are certain programs of government that will be getting substantial assistance.

Where are the largest cuts being made? To health care and to education. I could mention several others but I am going to concentrate on those two because they happen to be massive.

Let me talk very quickly and briefly about the reductions in transfer payments, particularly those with respect to education. They are even more severe when one looks at them in the total context within which they were taken. Education will suffer from the goods and services tax when it is implemented in 1991.

Hon. members will recall the postal subsidies from which education was exempted. Educational institutions were given these postal subsidies by a former minister of this government for scholarly and research journals. That promise was not honoured. Those dollars will have to be absorbed within current funding. In fact, there will be reductions in funding.

There are reductions in training and retraining. Supposedly that was a high priority of government. There are reductions in expenditures in science and technology. There again we keep hearing the rhetoric about the importance of those particular programs. There are reductions in student aid, which has seen no change since 1984. An administrative fee has been tacked on for those who need funding most.

What is the message being sent to students? The government is saying quite clearly that they have a lot, apart from its other decisions about reducing job opportunities for the summer. It is saying that they have too much. Otherwise, it would not be making those particular reductions.

In looking at education and health, the Association of University Teachers has estimated that there will be 39 billion fewer dollars from 1986 to 1995 in current government projections. With the reductions in 1986, after the government had said that it would not touch the formula, and with the intended reductions in 1989-90, which were not necessary because of the freezes that were imposed during this current budgetary year, there will be 39 billion fewer dollars for Canadians, for the provinces in health and education. There is roughly $9 billion less for education out of those $39 billion. I would suggest that there is well over another $1 billion of additional reductions elsewhere in other cuts.

Let us look at Manitoba alone where there will be 99 million fewer dollars for health and education over the next two years because of this budget. Let me tell you, ladies and gentlemen, you can buy a lot of health and education in Manitoba for $99 million.

Let us look at the message that this government is giving with respect to its reductions in health. What is the message to the elderly and to those who need health care? Obviously, it is saying: "If you do get sick or if you do need health care, it is going to be more costly and risky." Obviously, the supports that were there are no longer there. The system is deteriorating. People are waiting longer for operations and for services that they used to be able to get quickly.

How can the government expect me to say anything positive about this budget when it has attacked two basic programs essential to the well-being of this country, health and education programs? I cannot and will not say anything positive because I think that the government has not only been dishonest with Canadians, it has betrayed Canadians.

Let me come to another point where the government has had some success through exaggerating the statement about no new taxes. If this were not Parliament, I would be calling it a blatant lie because it is. I have to say that it is a false statement.

I would ask you to ask Canadians whether or not they believe they will be paying more taxes as a result of this budget. Ask them whether or not the goods and services tax that will be implemented supposedly in January 1991 is a new tax that will be implemented during the current budgetary year? Ask them whether or not the withdrawals, the reductions in health, in education and in a number of other areas will necessitate the payment of additional taxes to the provinces, to municipalities, and indeed to individual Canadians. I urge you to ask them.

Of course, we have not even talked about the partial indexation of the income tax. My personal indexation will not keep up to inflation, neither will my salary category on which I pay taxes. There will be more taxes, new taxes paid on those measures because the government has not taken the time to change it to accommodate me and many other Canadians who need this kind of assistance.

Another big distortion is when the government suggested that there will be a growth in the transfer payments according to the growth in population. That is not true. The growth will be in tax transfers. It works this way. I quote from a report I received. "The minister is taking credit for increasing transfers which are really part of the existing provincial tax burden while the federal cash share is down. Total cash transfers for post-secondary education are down $54 million". That is the truth of the matter.

Mr. Speaker, the Budget reflects the priorities and values of this government. A budget always reflects the priorities of an individual, an organization or a government.

If we look at the increases in certain budgets, we see a 5 per cent increase for Defence and a 20 per cent increase for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. We see cutbacks in health and education, cutbacks that will affect senior citizens, Canadians who need help and young people who want to work towards a promising future—They say there are no new taxes, which is not true, because the goods and services tax is a new tax. A number of programs enjoy only partial indexation, which is a clear indication that we will pay a lot more taxes—new taxes—on measures that are already in place. Transfer payments to the provinces, to municipalities and to individuals will suffer.

This government claimed there would be no new taxes and that it was entirely fair in allowing certain departments to expand, but it has been extremely unfair in many areas such as health, education, programs for women, aboriginal people, multicultural groups, and so forth.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to my hon. colleague's comments. He joins the masses in opposition to the public outrage against the budget in questioning its legitimacy in a number of areas. The one area I noticed my hon. friend did not mention, because of its very critical importance in terms of the context in which the government places it, is the goods and services tax, a measure which we all clearly oppose.

I just want to clarify one point with my hon. friend. What is the Liberal party's position on the goods and services tax? Is it opposed to the goods and services tax in principle, or just opposed to it for the moment with the hope that maybe later it will have a chance to reap its benefits?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to respond to the question. I spoke very quickly when I made my remarks. I assume that is the reason why my hon. colleague did not hear my reference to the goods and services tax. I did indicate how it would penalize students and a number of other sectors.

If the hon. member will recall, in the very recent past I have spoken against the goods and services tax. I have pointed out a number of areas in the health care sector where it will have a very negative effect, such as with respect to psychology services, therapeutic services and so on.

The hon. member is, of course, trying to have some fun with me and my colleagues in this party. He knows clearly that we were among the first and the strongest and the most vociferous against this tax. It is completely unfair for him to suggest that we are perhaps dancing around, that this is perhaps a disagreement in principle. We have said no. I continue to say no, and I shall continue to say no.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not question my hon. friend's sincerity. I think he probably does believe that this tax is a nasty tax.

I have been listening with care to some of the leadership candidates for his party, Mr. Martin and Mr. Chrétien to be specific, who both have said: "Well, Mr. Speaker, we are not certain. Quite frankly, something has to be done with the tax system and we will look at it some time in the future." I do not want to suggest to my hon. friend that I am being cute with him, because I believe sincerely that he is opposed to this measure.

What I want him to say is that not only is he opposed, not only has he spoken against the goods and services tax, but in fact the Liberal Party of Canada is in opposition in principle and would never as a government some time in the distant future impose a goods and services tax or a national sales tax on the people of Canada. Is he prepared to say that, to set aside his own personal views and represent the party that he does represent?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the leadership candidates. The hon. member would not want me to do that.

On the other hand, if I were a leadership candidate I would be saying exactly what I have been telling you. I would not be changing that for one moment. I cannot speak for the party. I can tell you what the party is saying right now.

The hon. member heard, perhaps, this party's critic this morning on Canada AM who will be debating that with the Minister of Finance tonight in Edmonton. He said it was a poor tax. We are against this tax. We have to look at taxation in a progressive kind of way, and we cannot look at it in isolation. I have not heard any of my colleagues, and if you know of any I wish you would tell me, who have said that they are for this tax.

There may be some who are less passionate, less intense about the negative effects. I suspect that is true about any question, but I have heard nothing but complete accord from my colleagues with whom I associate here on this side of the House on that question. We are against this tax.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, where does one begin to debate a budget tabled by the finance minister? The budget contains many measures which will have a devastating impact on students, seniors, native peoples, low and middle income families, war veterans and small business. The list goes on and on.

The finance minister claims there are no tax increases in his budget. He has simply passed on an $8 billion problem to the provinces. Furthermore, the goods and services tax threatens to become the largest tax grab in Canadian history.

The finance minister claims that deficit reduction is not at the expense of social programs. Yet support for medicare, welfare and day care has been slashed. Support for social and co–op housing will be cut by $165 million over a five year period, compounding the problems of the 200,000 homeless in Canada and the many more who must commit over half their income to rent.

Speaking of the deficit, in 1984 the Minister of Finance announced a five year program of deficit reduction designed to cut the deficit in half by the end of the decade. Despite record economic growth, the minister has failed miserably to reach this target. In fact, he has only trimmed $4 billion from the $34 billion deficit that existed in 1985–86, the first full year of Tory administration.

This government is not only bent on destroying the economy of the country, it is also bent on destroying aboriginal organizations which have become, in the government's opinion, too critical of the current administration. Funding cuts to the Secretary of State's budget have been focused primarily on aboriginal organizations. Never has a budget had a more devastating impact on one group. The government has chosen to attack aboriginal organizations because it cannot stand to hear how dismal its record has been in this area.

One has to wonder why one department with a total budget of $3.5 billion has chosen to attack the aboriginal peoples of Canada. The Secretary of State has to cut $23 million from his budget. In reality, when you subtract last December's increase to the department of $13 million the Secretary of State only needs to cut $10 million. Native aboriginal communication societies are hit hardest. Cutbacks to these organizations represent 65 per cent of the Secretary of State's budget cuts. Is this fair? Of course it is not. The government has chosen to eliminate the one program which has served to inform aboriginal Canadians of this government's inadequate handling of aboriginal issues. This government has in effect silenced the aboriginal people.

In my riding, Wawatay Native Communications Society operates a bilingual newspaper, community radio and television stations and a high-frequency trail radio program for trappers. It currently has a staff of 45 people to cover all of the aboriginal communities in northern Ontario, many of which are remote and isolated.

As a result of the elimination of the native communications program and a cut-back in the northern native broadcast access program, Wawatay will lose 33 per cent of its funding from the Secretary of State. Twenty jobs will be lost and Wawatay's award-winning newspaper will most likely become a unilingual English publication. The high-frequency trail radio program will most likely be eliminated.

Native newspapers in this country have contributed to a large degree to the preservation of aboriginal languages. Bilingual newspapers such as Wawatay News have protected aboriginal languages from extinction. Native newspaper publications have also contributed to the preservation of a very unique and distinct culture by publishing a record of aboriginal traditions and customs. Such a record will ensure that these traditions and customs are not lost.

Aboriginal communications societies have made a significant contribution to literacy. Many more aboriginal Canadians are literate today, thanks to native newspapers. This government has bragged about Canada's participation in this year's International Year of Literacy. In my view this government should be ashamed of its contribution.

This Tory government is attempting to destroy aboriginal peoples. This Tory government believes the aboriginal peoples are a thorn in its side. It believes that aboriginal peoples will just go away if funding is cut off.

Canada's aboriginal peoples are living in Third World conditions. Government members often say that I am exaggerating. I have seen these conditions in which some of our aboriginal people live. I challenge members to visit a native community and see the poverty, despair, drug and alcohol abuse, high unemployment, high rates of suicide and violence. Once they have seen these Third World conditions right here in Canada maybe members will understand why it infuriates aboriginal organizations when their funding is cut or eliminated. Funding for aboriginal organizations is crucial to improving these conditions.

The cut-backs in the provinces' transfer payments used for post-secondary education and health care is a direct attack on social programs in this country. Capping increases in Canada Assistance Plan transfers to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta is an attack on low income Canadians in these provinces. The Minister of Finance has left the provinces with virtually few options —increase taxes or cut services. Students will be forced to pay higher costs toward education. Seniors who are the main recipients of health care in this country will feel the pinch in reduced services. Low-income Canadians will see their already inadequate quality of life eroded even further.

To say the least, one way or another, Canadians will once again be faced with increased taxes as a result of this budget. Whether it be the goods and services tax, the taxation measures from the 1989 budget which came into effect this year or provincial and municipal taxes, Canadians will be paying higher taxes.

There are a number of budget measures which directly impact on northern Ontario. The regions of this country are being asked once more to pay for this government's incompetence in managing economic affairs. Small business and junior mining companies will feel the crunch. I can assure this House that that will mean several hundred job losses in my riding. There is no question whatsoever that this government has abandoned its regional development policy.

• (1350)

The cancellation of the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program is a harsh blow to the junior mining industry in this country. Northern Ontario and northern Quebec will lose jobs as a result. While it is still too soon to tell how effective this program was, the government has breached its promise to protect the junior mining industry. Instead, it has contributed to its demise.

The government should have introduced measures which would have made flow-through share investment more attractive. Prior to this government coming to power we had a flow-through share program which encouraged investment in the junior mining industry. Between 1983 and 1988, 35 mines opened in Canada, 16 of which are located in northern Ontario, thanks to flow-through share investment.

When the government introduced changes to the Income Tax Act in 1987 investor confidence declined. To add insult to injury, the government cancelled the mineral exploration depletion allowance. The Canadian Exploration Incentive Program was designed to reignite investor confidence. It was designed to protect the junior mining industry.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated in a press release on February 21 that the federal government is not abolishing the concept of flow-through shares for exploration. He said that junior exploration companies will still have the option to obtain equity financing for exploration using flow-through shares. How does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources expect junior exploration companies to attract investment when the flow-through share program is inadequate?

Analysis of flow-through share financed exploration has indicates that, on average, every million dollars spent on mineral exploration creates some 21 person years of direct employment. Between 1983 and 1988 this suggests that the $3 billion worth of exploration financed with flow-through shares has generated an estimated 63,000 person years of direct exploration employment in Canada. This alone is proof that the flow-through share program as it existed under the previous Liberal administration was more effective than this government's policies.

Flow-through share funding creates jobs. Given this government's many promises to create jobs, you would think it would be interested in improving this program. Flow-through share funding has led to economic activity in northern Ontario which would have otherwise laid dormant. Flow-through share funding has contributed to regional economic development.

This government has consistently abandoned and destroyed regional economic development since it came to power. It has provided northern Ontario with lip service only. This Tory government will announce some program one year and in the next it either destroys it completely or erodes it to the point where the program is rendered useless.

Regional economic development has become a thing of the past under this government. In his budget speech the finance minister announced that he will eliminate grants to business with limited exceptions. What do these exceptions really mean? Will the government's exceptions be based on financial limits, or based on types of grants?

FEDNOR's future remains uncertain to this day, since we have yet to see the spending estimates for the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. FEDNOR, while not perfect, has served to attract a more diversified economy to northern Ontario. It has served to help small business expand and grow.

I know that my time has expired. I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I expect the people of northern Ontario to hear more on this budget as time goes on.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a question. When we talk about flow-through shares in Canada and in each province, we could also mention that the crash of October 1987 caused consumers in Canada to lose confidence in the mining industry. I am one of those who defend prospectors in Quebec who are trying to find a new program. Every time we find a new program, we have difficulty implementing it. In my riding now, there is a federal office in Val d'Or that will close. This was ordered by the Minister of Finance.

I would like to ask you the following question: Does Ontario now have programs to help mining exploration as now exist in Quebec? According to the 1867 Constitution, mineral resource development is a provincial matter under section 109.

Do you agree that the province of Ontario should do more to help this sector? Because, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, people no longer trust the federal government to help with mining exploration. Even we on this side of the House have to fight every time, every week, to come up with a new program.

Can you tell me whether the province of Ontario has mechanisms in place to help mining exploration in Ontario?

[English]

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. The member for Abitibi has a riding very similar to my riding in northern Ontario. These are ridings that have a lot of economic development initiative and which want to get involved in mainstream economics in Canada. Unfortunately there are some difficulties. One is that Ontario governments, Quebec governments and the federal government are not listening to the regions as it relates to mining.

To answer the member's question simply, I do not think that the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec and, in this case, the federal government have put in place the types of programs that will help the mining industry in Canada to flourish and grow.

What I talked about in my remarks to the House and to the people of northern Ontario is this. If we want regions like northern Ontario and northern Quebec to grow we have to put those types of programs in place.

I have asked my colleagues in Ontario to do something similar to what I have asked the federal government to do, that is to put some initiatives in place like the flow-through share mechanism to allow the junior mining companies to get involved in the industry to the extent of creating employment and getting these mines open. I tell the member opposite that there are 10 mines that are ready to go in northern Ontario but no dollars to put in place to get them going. We have the ability but we do not have the funding. I ask the federal government, as I have asked the Ontario government, to do that for us.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate, appreciating that the other member from Ontario made comments about the fact that the Ontario government has not put in place the mechanisms to allow for the economic development of the mining area in that part of Canada. I recognize he complains that the federal government has not done so either. Yet during the whole process leading up to the current legislation on the goods and services tax, many mining industry executives appeared before the finance committee indicating the positive steps that it would have for exploration development of mines, particularly in Ontario but also in western Canada. So I am a little surprised that the member would comment on that.

I would ask the member to tell us just where and how much money he would like to have the federal government kick into this program. It is certainly very consistent and very common in Ontario that the provincial government of Ontario insists on hiring lots of bureaucrats but does not put any money into programs. Here at the federal level we have a deficit problem. We have to deal with some of the problems that are a legacy of the previous Liberal administration.

I would ask the hon. member just how much money he would like from the federal government. Does he have any suggestions as to how much further he would like us to cut back the provincial transfers to make it possible for this to happen?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being two o'clock the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

YOUTH SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government's nonchalant attitude to Canadian youth is deplorable and unhealthy. Although the 15,000 young people in Ottawa—Vanier, my riding, could count on $528,000 in 1987 when the Challenge summer employment program began, they will have to share 4 per cent of that amount, or $23,200, this year. This is even more laughable because it may cost more to administer the program in 1990.

In past years, Mr. Speaker, the jobs created by Challenge and Young Canada Works helped thousands of young people in Ottawa—Vanier pay for their education. Since the devil finds work for idle hands to do, it would be in the Conservative government's interest to invest this money to keep our young people busy and to educate them, which would help it avoid spending millions of dollars on problems of drugs, alcohol, theft and so on caused by inactivity. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed deplorable that the government is cutting its programs for youth.

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT EXPERIENCE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the announced cuts in the Summer Employment Experience Development Program are going to create tough time for students who want to pursue their education.

The SEED program provides wage subsidies to encourage employers from all sectors to create jobs for high school, college and university students.

Last year in the Ottawa—Carleton area alone, $1.3 million were allocated to the program. This year that amount is being cut by 85 per cent.

Last year 79 jobs were created in Carleton—Gloucester alone. With these cuts, only 91 jobs will be available for students through this program across the whole Ottawa—Carleton region.

In times when fees are going up drastically and the goods and services tax will increase the price of books and resource material, how will students be able to afford an education? The government is denying them employment opportunities and a chance to contribute toward Canada's economic growth.

The government is letting the students down by refusing to invest in our youth and the future of this country.

HEALTH

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in May 1989, the Ad Hoc Committee on AIDS was established. It includes members of the House from all three parties and of the Senate.

The Ad Hoc Committee on AIDS is a voluntary group of concerned people who have come together in a non-partisan way to address one of the most serious pandemics facing our world today. This is a voluntary association of committed parliamentarians, but we would obviously welcome the establishment of a special joint committee of both the House and the Senate.

This week we will begin holding a series of public meetings which will result in recommendations to the government. On Wednesday, March 7, Dr. Earl Berger and Mr. Ian Sadinsky, authors of the Working Document for the Development of a National Strategy on HIV Infection and AIDS will appear before our committee. This meeting will be followed by the appearance of the Canadian AIDS Society on March 14.

AIDS represents a serious crisis in Canada. Much has been done to address the many issues surrounding it but much more work still remains to be done.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in 1963 Linda Macdonald, a young mother of five children, sought medical treatment at the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal from Dr. Ewen Cameron. Instead, without her consent, she was subjected to a series of barbaric medical experiments, including 109 electric shock treatments, being kept in a drug-induced coma, and subjected to a psychic driving tape placed under her pillow.

These projects were funded by the Government of Canada then, as they had been during the 1950s. Linda Macdonald lost the first 26 years of her life. Her lawyer, Tom Berger, has filed an action on her behalf in the Federal Court. I urge the new Minister of Justice to re-examine the decision of her predecessor to deny compensation to Ms. Macdonald and to settle this claim fairly without further legal proceedings.

Despite the white-washed conclusions of the Cooper report and its appalling medical underpinning, Canada has a legal, moral and ethical obligation to Linda Macdonald and indeed to all other victims of these cruel government-funded experiments. Justice must be done.

NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on February 27 I received an urgent message from the Mayor of Umiujaq, Noah Inukpuk, who told me: "The people of the community of Umiujaq, including myself, are suffering terrible hardship as a result of the high cost of living. The pressure on us is incredible. We, the people of Umiujaq, earnestly request that you give voice to our feelings of alarm.

Here are a few examples: a bag of apples that was sold for $2.86 now costs $4.44; bread has gone up from $1.70 to $3.88; a can of evaporated milk, from $1.60 to $2.60; a five-pound bag of flour from $6.13 to $8.36; and pork chops from $10 to $13, and they aren't even fresh".

Mr. Speaker, for several months I have been trying to make the Government of Canada realize that its domestic policy of cutting back on financial assistance is unfair as it affects local air services, as I said in the House on October 23 and 25, 1989.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, prior to the recent budget, Canadians indicated they wanted the debt dealt with by cutting government spending, not by tax increases.

The Minister of Finance met the challenge. He responded by cutting and restraining spending in a number of areas, by imposing no new taxes—the first such budget in 22 years. He managed to exempt major transfer payments to individuals, such as elderly benefits, family allowances, UI and veterans pensions.

Grappling with the legacy of past government overspending is not easy. Those who preceded us never took the unpopular decisions. Their answer was always to borrow some more, to continue to mortgage the future.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister for taking some difficult decisions, for displaying the determination and leadership necessary to face up to the debt problem and to build the kind of financially stable Canada we want for ourselves and for future generations.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, this ad, run in one newspaper today in Canada, cost this government $11,000 for one day. Women's centres are receiving less core funding from this government in an entire year than it is spending on GST advertising. This government's commitment to women is not worth the paper this ad is printed on.

The government is spending $14 million to advertise the GST. Last year the total budget of the Secretary of State's women's programs for one year was $11 million. After this budget, it will be closer to $9 million. The Tories are spending $14 million on propaganda for a tax that no one wants, a tax that has not passed Parliament. They have cut funding to women's centres right across the country that provide support and information to the women of their communities, to battered and sexually assaulted women, to jobless women and to homeless women.

Instead of attempting to silence the voices of women, instead of cutting women's funding by 100 per cent, the GST advertising should be slashed and the Tory government should also be cut by 100 per cent.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party continues to stand solidly with Canadians in opposing this government's 7 per cent goods and services tax.

To date, with our help more than 600,000 Canadians have petitioned this government to stop the GST. Now, the Liberals are giving Canadians from coast to coast a chance to say no to the GST.

Starting Monday, March 12 through to Friday, March 16 Canadians can vote against the GST by dialling 1-900-720-6052, 24 hours a day. That is right. Starting Monday, March 12 through Friday, March 16 for a mere 50-cent toll charge, Canadians can tell this government no to the GST by dialling 1-900-720-6052.

The Liberals once again take the lead in giving all Canadians an opportunity to tell this government that they reject the biggest, most obscene tax grab in Canadian history, the goods and services tax, by calling 1-900-720-6052. Let us give this government the message, "axe the tax".

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the replacement of the structurally flawed and antiquated federal sales tax is being welcomed with open arms by manufacturers all across Canada. In light of the superficial criticism by others, our Canadian manufacturers see it as the righting of a historic wrong. After all, they have been discriminated against under the existing system for some 65 years.

The implementation of the GST will remove the built-in competitive bias of the existing system, increase capital investment and enhance our ability to compete internationally, according to Mr. Jordan Sullivan, President of Strong Equipment of Woodbridge, Ontario.

Armchair opponents of the goods and services tax should revisit their cursory arguments. Certainly an important initiative such as the GST which will provide an instant 1 per cent to 3 per cent price savings for our manufacturing sector should not be a target for shallow criticism.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, this government is taking important steps to control spending, manage the economy and to invest in the very future of this country. This affects all Canadians.

But let us be realistic. How much control of our affairs will we have if we do not deal with our national mortgage? How much control do we have over our destiny if we owe our souls to foreigners? This government is fighting hard to control spending and regain the very sovereignty lost under the years of fiscal indifference and mismanagement of one Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the Liberal Party of Canada.

If Canada loses its sovereignty and its ability to control its own house, the blame will clearly rest with the seeds and growth of fiscal mismanagement of the Trudeau era.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the Tory government is jealous of the popularity of the Liberal Party. It has come up with a new way of recruiting members. Indeed, large numbers of Canadians have taken over riding association executives of Alberta Tory members. They have obviously not done so in order to join the Conservative party, but, indeed, to defeat the government goods and services tax.

By going totally beyond responsible limits of taxation and complexity, and by showing its disregard for the desire of over two-third of the electorate, the government has forced otherwise calm, law-abiding citizens to stand up and say, enough is enough. They have told the government in no uncertain terms, no to the GST.

In addition to phoning the number 1-900-720-6052 in order to oppose the GST, citizens across this country are ready to do almost anything to oppose the GST, including buying membership cards—heaven forbid—in the Conservative party.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, this government was elected six years ago with one vital objective, to get control of our nation's expenses. This objective had and has priority over all others because it must. Any other objective cannot be considered, advanced or planned without first having the dollars to do it.

The environment needs cleaning up. We all agree with that. But it takes more than political will, it takes money. Our poor and unemployed need the tools and education to make themselves self-sufficient and productive. But that requires more than sympathetic rhetoric, it takes dollars.

Our health care system, one of the best in the world, cannot be sustained without an ever-increasing amount of money. We do not have any money. We are in debt up to our eyeballs. But with this budget, we are finally able to stand on our tiptoes, peer over that mountain of debt and see the future, prosperous and self reliant.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are aware that the 7 per cent goods and services tax will dramatically affect their lives for generations to come, which is why 80 per cent of Canadians oppose the government's decision to impose this cruel and punitive tax on the people of Canada.

Unlike the Liberals, while the New Democrats really do oppose the GST, they also, as a party, offer specific alternatives to the goods and services tax. We did detail explicitly what the government should do rather than impose the 7 per cent tax. This is why I am so disappointed that the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, sponsoring tonight's GST debate was not prepared to allow the NDP finance critic to participate.

Is it that the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce are not interested in hearing the New Democrat alternatives to the goods and services tax, or is it their fear that the NDP, who have led the fight against the GST across Canada, would point out flaws not only in the government's tax policy, but also reveal that the Liberals really do not oppose the principle of the goods and services tax, as pointed out so explicitly by their leadership candidates, Martin and Chrétien.

ALBERTA

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I returned to Ottawa today having read an article in The Globe and Mail on the weekend about how Alberta is paying too much for Confederation.

I decided to talk about this article with a member of the government on my return to Ottawa. The first cabinet minister's office I saw belonged to the right hon. member for Yellowhead. Not feeling it appropriate to discuss this with an Albertan, I looked around and noticed that not only is the Secretary of State for External Affairs an Albertan, so, too, is the Deputy Prime Minister, Minister of Agriculture and President of the Privy Council, the member for Vegreville.

Now the member for Calgary Centre, an Albertan, is government House leader. Thinking I better tread lightly, I thought I would speak to the government whip, but lo and behold, he is an Albertan, the member for Calgary West.

With the approval of the member for Edmonton—Strathcona, who sits behind me, and the member for Calgary Southeast who normally sits in front of me, I thought I would point this out to you, Mr. Speaker. On the way to the House I wondered what I would do if the Acting Speaker, the member for Edmonton North, was in the chair. With all of these eminently qualified members in this place, no wonder Alberta does not need the assistance provided to those less fortunate provinces.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the status of women. There appears to be a great deal of confusion between the Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance on the exact impact of the cuts in the recent budget on the existence of some 80 women's centres across Canada.

The minister has stated that she was not sure whether her cabinet colleagues, "were aware of just what kind of services were provided by these centres". The minister knows that these cuts will have a devastating impact on women seeking shelter from family violence, on women seeking education to overcome unemployment, and on women seeking help to overcome illiteracy. Will the minister confirm today that she has persuaded the Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance to restore full funding for these women's centres, or will she admit that she has already failed to stand up for the women of Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think the brightest future for the women of this country is to ensure that we have a healthy and growing economy and jobs so that women can work towards self-sufficiency and independence. That is exactly what the Minister of Finance has brought down in his budget, and it is a budget which will ensure the future economic help and opportunities for the women of this country.

Let me say as well that the record of this government in supporting women in their aspirations is second to none. The $40 million program to assist women in dealing with family violence goes a long way in addressing an issue which had not been addressed in previous periods of times. There is, as well, the appointments of women, and the work that is done in terms of employment equity.

Everything that this government is doing, and everything that I will be doing in working with my colleagues, will be to promote equality for women; to work with my colleagues at the provincial and community levels to ensure that services for women and their issues are addressed in an appropriate manner.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just admitted that she does not consider the women of Canada to be part of our national treasure.

Mr. Epp: She said no such thing.

[Translation]

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

In his Budget, the minister decided for the first time to restrict payments made to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan, without consulting with the provinces and without giving them prior notice as required by law.

The minister knows that children of poor families will suffer the consequences. He ought to know that 48 per cent of poor children in Canada live in the provinces he has targeted.

My question is just this: How can the minister justify his attempts to reduce the deficit if it means the poorest children of our country will suffer.

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is entirely wrong.

The provinces are part of the problem. They have to be part of the solution. I can tell the hon. member that the provinces are not going to suffer. Consider the province of Ontario, for example, which has been spending money at 10.2 per cent per year over the last five years, increasing government bureaucrats by 7,014 people while the federal government has been trimming its deficit and trying to get the debt under control.

The hon. member says that the provinces cannot afford it. That is nonsense. They can. It is only about 1 per cent of their budget. Of course they can help with the deficit fight.

In the long run it is going to help them because it is going to get interest rates down, and that is what they are asking for.

NATIVE PEOPLES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister claims that the provinces are part of the problem. Canadians already realize that the real problem consists of himself and his government.

The government wants to cut all funding for newspapers like the Mic Mac News, the paper that played a major role in exposing the terrible miscarriage of justice in the Donald Marshall case.

How many more cases like Donald Marshall will go unnoticed and unexamined because of this government's cuts to native newspapers and broadcasting? Will the Prime Minister agree today to restore funding for native Canadian media and associations, and stop denying native Canadians an important vehicle for justice and full participation in Canadian society? What is the answer today?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this government's record of support for our aboriginal peoples is second to none in the world.

Hon. members will notice in the budget that there were substantial increases in funding for native social, educational and community development projects, in total amounting to an increase of over 8.1 per cent. In so doing the core funding for native advocacy groups funded by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is increased and not reduced in 1990.

PUBLIC WORKS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, ten days ago in Halifax this government announced the opening of a $1.6 million office for visiting cabinet ministers. The office is in a plush office tower in the highest rent district. Does the Prime Minister find it surprising that the cost of this office is exactly the amount of the cuts to the women's program in the Department of the Secretary of State? Will he undertake today to cancel this office and restore funding to women's programs.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the announcement of regional ministers' offices was made about four years ago. It is to eliminate the proliferation of offices that were held in all the minister's constituencies under the previous administration. We now have regional offices in Vancouver, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Montreal and in Halifax. This has greatly reduced the cost that was incurred in other places.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): It may have escaped the minister's notice but Halifax is not a minister's constituency. I will lend my office to any visiting minister.

My supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women. Eighty women's centres nation-wide need to hear from her. Will she make a commitment that women's programs are more important than superfluous cabinet offices and will she at least attempt to convince her colleagues to restore the women's funding?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have already answered that question. When you look at the record of this government in promoting equality and opportunities for women, we see the record of employment equity, assistance to battered women and assistance to immigrant women.

Those are the issues that we need to address. Women's centres have been providing services and in some cases they have been receiving project funding. My colleague has indicated that he still continues to have funding for over 550 projects. We will be working with him to address the needs across the country and with provincial, municipal and local activities to develop new partnerships in terms of addressing issues of concern to women and the services that are there. It is not only the federal government acting alone, all of society must work together to address those issues.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As he knows, women's centres across the country are being closed. Women's publications have been shut down, women's research organizations have been cut back and there is an attempt on the part of this government to silence the voice of women across Canada, whether it is in Whitehorse, Yukon, Hay River, Northwest Territories, from B.C. to the east coast.

On top of this, last week when the Minister for International Trade insulted the women of Canada, this was supported by the minister responsible for the status of women in saying that his comments were marvellous.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, who in the election of 1984 and the election of 1988 assured the women of Canada that he stood for equality, for social programs as a sacred trust, and that he would see equality in this country, will he keep that faith today? Will he keep his promise and reinstate funding to women's programs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to my hon. friend because I think one of the points that the New Democratic Party has consistently made is that equality comes through economic equality as well. Since this government was elected 1.6 million new jobs have been created and 61 per cent of them have gone to women.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We introduced employment equity legislation in 1986. We increased by 100 per cent the number of women in decision-making positions in commissions and agencies of the federal government. We introduced a family violence initiative of $40 million in June of 1988. We improved job training for women as part of the Canadian Jobs Strategy. We introduced a $25 million program for immigrant women, improved child tax credits for low-income families, a plan for equal pay for work of equal value in the federal Public Service and improved pension benefits for women. That is a partial list of the accomplishments of a government deeply committed to the notion of equality and fairness for women.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women.

Since this government came into power we have 1.5 million children in Canada living in poverty; 60 per cent of female-headed households living in poverty and 1 million children waiting for child care.

The mandate for the minister's department describes the minister's role as one which is "to promote equal opportunities for women in all spheres of Canadian life".

Given that women still only earn 66 per cent of what men earn, given that violence against women is increasing in our society, and given that poverty is more and more a women's problem in our society, it is clear that women are still far from being equal. I ask the minister responsible for the status of women as she sees these cuts being made, how is she going to carry out her mandate?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the lead question came to me from the Leader of the NDP, I assume there is no objection to my responding.

The question suggested there was an increase in the incidence of poverty in Canada for women and families. In point of fact, the exact opposite has happened since this government has come to office.

There has been a decrease of 757,000 Canadians living in poverty since this government came to office. Included in that number are 229,000 women and 259,000 children. In one year, from 1987 to 1988, the total number decreased by 80,000 people.

On the job creation side, 61 per cent of new jobs have gone to women. With regard to reduction of poverty, 757,000 people have been taken off the poverty line and have been made productive members of society. With regard to the participation of women, starting with the Supreme Court of Canada where there was one woman when we formed the government now there are three. Two women were ambassadors when we formed a government, now there are 13. There were three women deputy ministers, now there are 21.

In every area of national life the situation of women has been vastly improved since this government came to office.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

On December 6, all of Canada was in mourning. Fourteen young women had been massacred in Montreal. However, since that very tragic day, the government has closed women's shelters, cut funds for research and cancelled publications.

Now a minister makes remarks insulting Canadian women and another minister applauds him!

Will the Prime Minister finally prove to women that he understands them, that he listens to them and demand that those two ministers resign?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I attended the funeral following that absolutely horrible and tragic event. I personally communicated with all the families concerned. Since then, I have been in touch with some of the parents affected by this enormous tragedy.

I take it for granted that the Leader of the New Democratic Party makes no connection whatsoever between this great tragedy and the administrative action taken by any government. If she did, that would be cause for concern on the part of all members of this House.

The fact is that the government which I have the honour to lead has more than doubled the number of women in decision-making positions in the federal Public Service. We appointed two more women to the Supreme Court of Canada, for the first time in history. When we took power, there were, I think, two women ambassadors; now there are 13. There were three women deputy ministers; now there are 21.

All our actions, Mr. Speaker, have been directed to the goal of more social justice for women in Canada.

Before I was sworn in as Prime Minister of Canada, there were only two women in the federal Cabinet. We now have six. Since last week, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada is a woman, for the first time in our history.

The record shows that we care about women, and we will do more to improve the status of women in Canada.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In June, 1989, the Prime Minister said, and I quote excerpts from his address: "We are going to focus more and more on a competitive society. We will concentrate on long-term investment in people, skills training, education, strategic technologies, research and development."

Can the Prime Minister tell us how his budget reductions in transfer payments, in training and retraining funds, in science and technology expenditures, in research and development activities and in student aid will contribute to productivity in this country, to use his own words: "to the creation of a competitive society"? Can he reconcile those cuts with the creation of a more just and humane society?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, every single thing that my hon. friend has just said is wrong. In point of fact in all of those areas there have been increases. In all of those areas there have not been cuts. There have been reductions in some areas of the rate of growth.

For the last five years, transfer payments by the Government of Canada to the provinces have exceeded 6.5 per cent while we were maintaining our rate of growth in program spending at 3.5 per cent. While we were trying to reduce the national deficit and cutting 12,000 public servants from the payroll in Ottawa, the Government of Ontario was putting 7,000 more on its payroll and increasing its spending at a rate of 10.1 per cent a year.

That is why we have an inflationary problem in Canada and the member should be addressing his question to the Premier of Ontario and not to the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting. If we look at the transfer we find that there is a transfer of funds and tax points. In fact there are fewer dollars.

Some Hon. Members: No!

Mr. Duhamel: There are.

Is the Prime Minister willing to meet Education Ministers and other groups such as the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian School Trustees' Association, to see what negative impact these cutbacks in funding for education will have in Canada? Will the Prime Minister make a commitment today to meet these groups?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had his facts wrong in English and he has them wrong in French. The problem was the same and the solution is the same, in both languages. We are in the process of providing for a new era of increasing prosperity for Canada. We can do more for universities, research centres and institutions across Canada. We have increased our contributions to the provinces by 6.5 per cent annually, while keeping our own increases at 3.5 per cent. I think the provinces must do their share to help the national government and deal with what is basically a national problem. It is not a federal deficit, it is a national one, and all Canadians and all governments have a role to play in this respect.

[English]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On February 15 the Prime Minister said: "It is time—to remind ourselves what it is like to be a minority and to treat minorities with the same tolerance and generosity of spirit that we would want to be treated with, if the situations were reversed."

Does the Prime Minister believe his Minister of Finance upheld this noble sentiment when he eliminated the funding five days later for aboriginal newspapers, severely cut back aboriginal radio and television programming, and terminated and slashed aboriginal political organizations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the native population, next year the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will have a budget of over $3.5 billion, which is an increase of $200 million in one year alone. There has been no cut-back to Indians and natives in this country. There will be an increase of $200 million next year and we propose to do even more in the future.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. I fail to see how the increases he referred to affect the slashing of the program funding for the native newspapers and the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation which has been cut by a total of about $600,000 out of a $2 million budget.

In the same week as the budget cutbacks were announced the new $100 gold coin was unveiled which features Inuit people and the Inuit language, Inuktitut. Will the Prime Minister give real meaning to his expressed desire to protect linguistic minorities by ordering the reinstatement of the funding which has been cut from aboriginal programming so that the new gold coin will not become famous for its depiction of an endangered species?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has said to my hon. colleague from the eastern Arctic, the program of funding by the Government of Canada to Indian, Inuit and all aboriginal peoples exceeds $4 billion and will have increased in 1990 by over 8 per cent on average.

The programs for the move toward Indian and Inuit self-government, the settlement of comprehensive claims, the programs in support of social, health and education initiatives for our native people have all been increased because this government, I and my predecessors, put a very great emphasis on the importance of properly and justly dealing with the needs of our native peoples.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of the Hon. John Efford, Minister of Social Services of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIVE PROGRAMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on April 12, 1985, a leaked cabinet document known as the Buffalo Jump advocated the virtual elimination of many native programs and the virtual assimilation of native people in Canada.

The Prime Minister responded to that document with a letter denying it was government policy, promising to retain native fundings at current levels and saying that prior to policy changes consultation would be held with aboriginal people at the grass roots level.

My question is for the Secretary of State. Is he now implementing the recommendations of Buffalo Jump by cutting funding to native representative organizations and native media without any consultation, contrary to the solemn promise made by the Prime Minister to native leaders in his release of April 18, 1985?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend wrote out the question before he heard the answer given to my Liberal colleague over there.

I will be happy to go back and get my hon. friend the exact number, but since 1985 there have not been any cuts to native programs. There have been increases of hundreds of millions of dollars, $200 million in the upcoming year. Since 1985 there have been increases of hundreds of millions of dollars to the native community in Canada. Each year since this government has been in power there has been a substantial increase in funding for the aboriginal peoples and we propose to maintain that policy intact.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I hope my supplementary question will make it to the Secretary of State who seems to be surrounded by a number of defenders.

In the letter from the Secretary of State to native leaders justifying cuts to native organizations he states: "All areas of government have been asked to decrease expenditures and my department is no exception."

Can the minister explain why, of the $23 million in cuts in his department, $19 million came from native programs? Why is there a concentration on native programs while in comparison, for example, the budget for official languages went up by $8 million? This does not sound like the cuts are being shared equally, either within the government or within his department.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there are no cuts to the DIAND Indian and Inuit affairs program. It went from $1.4 billion in 1984–1985 to $2.3 billion in the current year.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Weiner: That includes $20 million to status Indian organizations. That is not a cut. That is a major increase, including $202 million of increase for this year alone.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Fulton: He won't answer because he's a racist.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. McKnight: Withdraw!

Mr. McDermid: Stand up and withdraw.

Mr. Jelinek: He called him a racist.

Mr. McKnight: Have some courage, Fulton.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: I withdraw what I said, Mr.Speaker. It was intemperate but I felt it.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: I do not accept that as a withdrawal. The hon. member will withdraw it properly.

Mr. Fulton: I withdraw the remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The unification of Germany has vast implications for all of Europe and the rest of the world. What role does the minister see for Canada as a member of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in these negotiations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and the House will know that during the Open Skies Conference a very important agreement was made involving the four countries which had been the great powers involved in the signature of the Potsdam Agreement and the two governments of Germany. That was important because it filled a void in dealing with some of the implications of German unification.

Obviously there has to be the involvement of other countries including, very actively, Canada. We are one of three nations that maintains a troop presence in Germany and consequently have an unusual interest in some of the implications of unification.

Part of that will be done through NATO. Part of it, as the hon. member suggests, could be done in the context of the CSCE negotiations and discussions which will become increasingly important as we proceed toward developments in Europe. There is also the possibility that informal arrangements can be made involving Canada and perhaps some other countries to become engaged in the process that was begun with the two-plus-four formula.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. We know that the talks on German unification have already begun under the two-plus-four formula but given the fact that Poland has serious and well-founded concerns with respect to its boundaries, has Canada communicated to the six countries within the two-plus-four formula that we will not accept anything short of an absolute safeguard of existing boundaries?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would look carefully at the language that was used when the two-plus-four formula was put in place, he will recognize that that language was framed to take particular account of the Polish situation.

I think that is understood by the Government of Poland. I know that is understood by the Government of Poland. But there is no question that there needs to be further precision coming particularly from authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany, and Canada is encouraging the Federal Republic of Germany to give those kinds of assurances.

• (1450)

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can he tell the House why benefits to Canada's war veterans are being cut?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while there have been changes, I can assure this House and the hon. member that there have been no over all cuts at all. In fact, the Veterans Independence Program has increased an enormous 60 per cent or more this year. There have been no cuts.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to test my arithmetic here this afternoon. In his Remembrance Day tribute less than four months ago the minister talked about how much was owed to those who did their duty and more for their country.

No matter what the minister says, the fact remains that money was taken away from veterans and benefits were cut. Something is being taken away from veterans for the first time since the great depression. We should not be taking something away from veterans, we should be racking our brains trying to find something to give them. Veterans deserve benefits and veterans deserve better.

Can the minister tell this House that he will immediately go to the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister and have these shameful cuts rescinded now?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have made it very clear to this House that we support the veterans. For example, we have improved disability pensions, we have significantly increased the prisoner of war allowance, we have expanded the Veterans Independence Program by 60 per cent this year alone, we have reinstituted pensions for remarried spouses. We have negotiated with provinces for additional beds and we have improved health care benefits since we formed the government by 136 per cent.

We have put in more programs and we do not need any lessons from the hon. member or from that side of the House on what we have done for veterans in this country.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the friends of the Tory government will be pleased to hear, after watching today's Question Period, that there have been no cuts in this budget.

In his budget the Minister of Finance announced that he would be capping the Canada Assistance Program for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia because they are "have" provinces. The poor in these provinces are not the "have" poor. The poor in these provinces are just as poor as in other provinces.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would like him to explain to this House how he can justify attacking the poor in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia in this budget.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think you can calculate a balance sheet on Confederation. We are in a particularly difficult deficit problem which is, as the Prime Minister said, a national problem.

The hon. member should look at the deficit situation of the three provinces to which she refers. As a matter of fact, the largest province, the province of Ontario, bragged about a balanced budget—excess funds as a matter of fact. It can proportion the funds which it has to the poor, to health care and to housing and can perhaps cut back some of the fat that it might find.

One per cent of the provinces total budgets will be affected. Actually it is much less than that in year one, it is .5 per cent. In year two it is about 1.2 per cent. Those provinces will have to adjust their budgets by 1 per cent a year. I believe that those three provinces can handle that while at the same time taking care of those who need care in our society.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am very offended by the response from the hon. minister. I am offended because the reason there is a balanced budget in the province from which I come is that that province has squeezed the poor year after year after year.

I suggest that hon. members on the other side go to British Columbia and see the 280,000 kids who have no child care, the hundreds and hundreds of kids on lunch programs at school, the hundreds of kids at food banks and the poverty that everybody on that side of the House sweeps aside.

Can the hon. member really truly in his heart justify that kind of extra squeeze being put on people who have already been squeezed by the province?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, one of the things the hon. member misses is that there will be a 5 per cent increase to the provinces to help these people next year—not a cut as she likes to talk about, but a 5 per cent increase.

This government has a great record of helping those less fortunate, a great record that I am very proud of, as I know all my colleagues are.

The province of British Columbia will receive a 5 per cent increase next year, as will the other provinces that have been capped.

NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The people of the community of Umiujaq, in Quebec, are suffering terrible hardship as a result of increases in the price of food since the Canada Post Corporation increased its postal rates by 30 per cent, 100 per cent, or more.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: While his department is still examining the question of the exorbitant rates set by Canada Post on January 31 this year, could the minister inform the House whether his department intends to consider the serious impact on the health and well-being of Northern Canadians, before the study ends as scheduled on February 1, 1991?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Abitibi for this question which is important not only to the residents of Umiujaq but to residents of northern Canada generally.

The problem arises, Mr. Speaker, because the normal postal subsidy which has been in place for several years is being removed this year. As of January 31, 1990 there have been significant rate increases affecting some northern communities.

My predecessor announced a careful review of the impact of these rate increases on January 19. We are looking very intently at the possibility that there might be any negative impact on northern communities. The Minister of Health is vigilantly watching to ensure that there will be no affect on the health of northerners. We will have a report quickly and remedy this situation as quickly as we can.

TAXATION

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is for the Prime Minister. On January 29 the Minister of Finance said in this House that about $9 billion in federal sales tax revenue comes from the taxation of business inputs.

The Prime Minister knows that this tax is incurred at the corporate level and either absorbed through lower profits or passed on through higher prices, just the same as the corporate income tax.

Will the Prime Minister agree that the shift from the MST to the GST is the equivalent of replacing $9 billion in corporate income tax with an equivalent tax increase at the individual level and constitutes the largest single corporate tax decrease in the history of Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): No, Mr. Speaker, we will not agree with that.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, many times this question has been put and the government refuses to admit the simple fact that by reducing the corporate tax burden in the manufacturers sales tax it has been passed on to individual Canadians.

I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Revenue Canada officials know that for administrative reasons, it will be impossible to implement the GST by next January.

When will the minister admit that implementing the GST in January will be an administrative disaster and that the only reason the government is so adamant about this date is that it hopes Canadians will have time to forgive and forget before the next election?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has been paying attention over the course of the last six to eight months he will know that on a regular basis I have made public announcements, both outside this House and in this House, advising hon. members and Canadians of the progress of the preparation towards the GST, a change in the taxation system that is going to benefit Canada and Canadians, put the Canadian industry on a competitive level playing field with the international community and make Canada stronger, better and more prosperous.

• (1500)

I can assure this House that we are progressing well. We are on track. I can guarantee this House that there will be a smooth launch on January 1, 1991 for the benefit of all Canadians.

FREE TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will put my question to the same minister.

As the minister knows, since the signing of the free trade agreement there has been a major haemorrhaging of the border economies through a 19 per cent increase in border crossings and an 85 per cent increase in purchases registered. As the president of the customs union official said, "Canadians enticed by talk of free trade and low prices are heading south in record numbers".

The federal government is proposing to the provinces that if they accept the implementation of the GST, they can now charge provincial sales tax on these purchases. By adding new taxes to the burden already being exercised upon Canadians, is this the way of solving the major haemorrhaging and spending which is taking place and affecting seriously the economies of our border towns and communities?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member knows anything about the free trade agreement, he will know that the increased congestion at the border has absolutely nothing to do with that agreement. As far as the congestion at the border with the trans-border crossings that are taking place and the difficulties being experienced in several border communities, I will be making a detailed announcement to the Canadian Importers Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and others at a luncheon speech this Wednesday in Toronto.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The minister says it has nothing to do with free trade, but if it waddles, quacks and has feathers it is a duck. In this case it is free trade.

Mr. Speaker, I want to put this question very clearly.

In this year alone we are suffering a $20 billion deficit in our current accounts. That is double what it was last year. Some $3.5 million leaves the economy of this country every hour.

I want to raise this question with the minister: Rather than forcing a new sales tax on Canadians, which will make the haemorrhaging even worse, why does the government not just cancel the tax, cancel the free trade agreement, and give the economy back to Canadians?

An Hon. Member: Can you waddle and quack at the same time?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pass on to the hon. gentleman the opinion of the Ontario Trade Minister Monty Kwinter, who was in Australia and told Australian business leaders that thanks to the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement Ontario represents Australia's best way into the tough North American market. I quote him: "We know the North American market like no one else does and freer trade means we will get to know it better. It makes good sense for both of us".

That was a gentleman who had feathers and quacked like the hon. gentlemen opposite, but he is now quacking in support of the free trade agreement.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.[

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to table a petition signed by Canadians from many ridings regarding the release of Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo who was arrested unlawfully and sentenced to 10 months' imprisonment for exercising his right to return to his native land. Mr. Leo is currently under indictment and still in a Taiwan prison.

The petitioners say that Mr. Leo is a valuable citizen of Canada and a law-abiding taxpayer. They urge the government to take immediate and effective measures to secure Mr. Leo's release.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House three petitions signed by Canadians in my riding of York West.

The petitioners are urging the government to scrap the GST. Not only is it going to hurt average working class families in my riding, but it is also going to undermine and address the serious difficulties the small business sector will have in my riding.

I am pleased to present to the House these three petitions in the hope that the government will listen to Canadians finally, once and for all.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure and the honour to present a petition from my constituents in response to a mailing asking them their opinion on the goods and services sales tax. I must say that thousands of people in Ottawa—Vanier took the trouble to answer this request and that they are vehemently opposed to a goods and services tax. They think that this tax will be hard to administer, unfair to poor and middle-income families and a tremendous burden for small business.

[English]

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of Burnaby and the city of Vancouver, expressing concern that the Minister of Finance has proposed the goods and services tax as an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay.

They note that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place and that the government is now trying to tax reading, hair-cuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

Therefore they call upon the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. They urge the government to cease this proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

In short, the petitioners call on the government to reject the goods and services tax.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from quite a number of Canadians who are very concerned with the goods and services tax.

They call on the government to reject the current proposal for a GST, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to ensure that there be broad public consensus on the sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax and that the government cease with a proposal that will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am today tabling two petitions, one from Matagami and one from Chibougamau, further to the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

The signers, representing isolated communities, are very worried and reject the recommendations of this report which, among other things, would result in many workers losing their jobs.

They feel that the Government of Canada is refusing to adjust to the reality of their daily life, for life is hard in the North.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 175.

[Text]

TAXES

Question No. 175—Mr. Young (Gloucester):

> Does the government intend to change (a) existing excise taxes (b) existing excise duties (c) the nine per cent sales tax advocated in the Goods and Services Tax Technical Paper once this tax has replaced existing sales taxes on (i) tobacco (ii) liquor products (iii) transportation fuels and, if not, is the government committed to keeping these taxes at the existing levels in the case of excise taxes and duties and at the proposed nine per cent level in the case of the federal sales tax as advocated by the government and, if so, does it intend to recoup the difference between current revenues from taxes on each of these goods and those projected under the proposed goods and services tax and what will be the new levels of excise taxes, excise duties or federal sales tax for each of these goods?

Hon. Michael Holcombe Wilson (Minister of Finance): Under the proposed Goods and Services Tax, alcohol, tobacco and motive fuels will be taxed at 7 per cent. In addition, excise levies will continue to apply to these products. Given the deficit situation, it would not be realistic to expect that the government would forego the current excise revenues from these items.

The 7 per cent GST rate represents a substantial decrease from the current federal sales tax rates on alcohol, tobacco and motive fuels. The reduction in revenues resulting from this decrease will be only partially offset in the case of alcohol and tobacco products by shifting the imposition of the tax from the manufacturer's to the retail level. Thus, without certain adjustments to excise levies, federal revenues from excisable goods would decline significantly. Sustaining this loss in existing revenues would make the achievement of a 7 per cent GST rate more difficult.

Accordingly, modifications to the rates of some of the excise levies will be made to protect current revenues. Thus, the excise levies on beer, spirits and wine will be increased from $1.58 to $2.29 per case of 24 bottles of beer, from $3.22 to $3.32 per 750 ml bottle of spirits, and from $0.34 to $0.39 per 750 ml bottle of wine. The federal excise tax on cigarettes will rise from $4.28 to $4.36 per carton, with similar increases in the excise levies on other tobacco products. There will be no changes in excise levies on motive fuels.

On average, the prices of these products to consumers should not change as a result of these adjustments.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The question enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 52

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I find the request for an emergency debate to be very important and I have written down why I am making this request. Let me take a few minutes of the House's time to give the reasons.

[English]

Today, all women across this land are tuning their television sets to hear from their political leaders that the shock, the pain and too often the horror of words and deeds said against them because of their chromosomes will be brought to a halt because of the political will of our country's leaders in this House of Commons.

Men and women alike, must debate right now in an emergency debate on what we can do to refrain the violence against women. Before we can tackle any debate such as the one on the goods and service tax, the funding for women's groups or the proposed new abortion law, we must be able to demonstrate to the people of Canada that violence against women will not be tolerated.

Men and women must be treated fairly and equally and a message must be sent at once to everyone that there is a strong will in the House of Commons from members to push such measures.

In the years since the introduction of the emergency debate, it is most likely the first time a commoner has asked the permission of this House to entrench fundamental rights for a group of Canadians.

Sexism has reached an endemic state in our country. We are to be blamed because we accept sexism against women as acceptable and understandable and then we accept all forms of violence against women. This abuse must come to a halt, and the proper place to begin right now our journey to fight sexism and violence against the women of our country is right here in the House of Commons.

Today, I am seeking the compassion of the Speaker of the House to allow an emergency debate in order to start a new era of equality among all people, especially men and women of this country.

I therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, to permit me to move a motion under Standing Order 52(2):

> That this House do now adjourn to call on all Canadians to set aside their differences and pledge that all men and women in Canada are equal and will be treated fairly.

My motion is seconded by many members on all sides of the House.

[Translation]

And I eagerly and hopefully await your decision.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Jourdenais) has moved that the House adjourn under Standing Order 52 for an emergency debate.

The subject is very serious not only for all hon. members but also for all Canadians. I also note that the hon. member has the support of many members on both sides of the House. As I said, it is a very important, very serious subject, but I must say that it is not appropriate for an emergency debate.

There will be many other opportunities to raise the subject, and I thank the hon. member for Laprairie for his request.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Young (Gloucester)(p. 8636).

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, no doubt you have had an opportunity after the week's break from the duties of this House to refer to Hansard where I made mention in my remarks about how tough this budget was and how this political party has the political courage and guts to deal with a national debt problem, where others just seem to criticize and do not have much of a resolve as to how we should solve this difficult problem.

It is a difficult time to be in government. This country, plain and simple, cannot afford giveaways. Some segments of the population acknowledge this point; others do not. Hence our job is made that much more difficult.

We are listening and doing what must be done. We have made real progress in restraining spending since September 1984. This budget is simply a continuation of our fiscal plan.

Over the past five years we have limited the growth of program spending to an average of 3.6 per cent. This is lower than the rate of inflation and lower than any provincial government. That, I deem, is responsible government.

After a generation of double digit growth in program spending by successive Liberal governments, this responsible budgetary approach was long overdue. Between 1970 and 1975 program spending increased by some 18 per cent; in the next five years, by 10 per cent, a period of restraint I guess; and finally between 1980 and 1984 spending on programs was boosted by 14 per cent a year. This budget will once again limit spending growth to well below the rate of inflation. As a matter of fact, except for the interest payment on the debt, this budget reflects a budgetary surplus.

The effect of this budget and earlier restraint measures announced in December is substantial. Spending next year will be cut by $3 billion, and by more than $19 billion over the next five years. This kind of expenditure control is tough but it is needed. Our future, our children's future, and Canada's future depend on our resolve to act today.

We on the prairies know that inflation must be controlled. We understand the effects of high interest rates. We have lived through the disaster caused by the upward spiral of inflation and interest rates some years ago. We are currently feeling tremendous pressure again, and we feel the effects of a stagnant economy caused by a series of droughts and international trade wars. Some money has been cast our way, but this has not solved our problem. Our problem can be solved only with the co-operation of mature, sound federal economic practice and international trade harmony.

We see the effects of rising interest rates today. This budget is a major step toward reducing the federal deficit which will help ease inflationary pressures. Only by reducing inflation can we hope to lower our interest rates. Lower interest rates will also help us further reduce the deficit.

There is no magical or painless solution to the interest rate problem as my colleagues in the NDP would have us believe. We are a relatively small and open economy. We simply cannot ignore the rest of the world and manipulate our interest rates in isolation. We have to attack the root cause of the problem, and that is of course inflation.

If we fail to control inflation and the deficit we will pay the price. That price is a weaker economy and a weaker government less able to do the things that people want and need. Just as important, we will lose our sovereignty. We could soon see Canada dependent upon the international monetary system. That is something that no true Canadian wants to see, and Canadians have an interest in avoiding it.

The deficit is truly a national problem, a Canadian problem. Therefore it demands a national solution. If we are to restore health to the nation's finances, provincial governments must also do their part. They will also enjoy the rewards of lower inflation, lower interest rates, and sustained economic growth. After all, we do serve the same people.

Substantial deficit reduction cannot be achieved without affecting transfers to the provinces. They are simply too large a part of federal expenses to be ignored. Cash transfers to the provinces alone account for 23 per cent of total federal program spending.

Let us look at the transfer picture. In the fiscal year just ending, tax and cash transfers to provincial governments total more than $35 billion, and these have been growing faster than federal programs generally. They have risen at an average annual rate of 6.5 per cent since 1984–1985. During the same period, spending on federal programs in general has been held to an annual average growth rate of 3.6 per cent, which is well below the rate of inflation.

This year 35 cents out of every federal dollar goes to paying interest on the national debt. The provinces on average pay approximately 12 cents of every revenue dollar toward debt.

In Saskatchewan debt servicing costs are less than 10 cents of every revenue dollar. The Saskatchewan government, under the leadership of Premier Grant Devine, should take great pride in its fiscal record. Given the liability of the farming economy on the provincial treasury and the other factors, it has shown excellent stewardship of the public purse. However, this budget recognizes that transfer payments to provinces cannot continue to expand at the same rates if deficit reduction goals are to be achieved, and they must be achieved.

Under the budget's expenditure control plan transfers to provinces are expected to grow by approximately 3 per cent on average over the next two years, roughly the same rate as total program spending.

The budget recognizes the special circumstances of low income provinces too. Transfer income growth in the higher income provinces is expected to average 2.3 per cent, but in Atlantic provinces it will be some 4 per cent over the two years the regime is in place.

The reductions in the rate of growth of transfers to provinces represent about 1 per cent of total provincial revenue. Federal support to provinces remains large and total transfers will still increase to more than $36 billion in 1991.

The poorest provinces will get more growth than others on top of the significant extra help they already get on a per capita basis. As an example, the substantial nature of past transfers has helped Saskatchewan avoid the kind of deficits shouldered by the federal government. This should not change during the two-year period of transfer restraint. The federal government has been careful to tailor the impact of its transfer restraint measures so as to be sensitive to the fiscal capacity of Saskatchewan relative to other provinces.

The Established Programs Financing to Saskatchewan will be limited to the same per person levels as in 1989–1990 for the next two fiscal years, but equalization transfers, which in Saskatchewan are some 60 per cent of the size of the EPF, are expected to continue to grow normally. This means much faster than other federal spending.

Growth of social assistance transfers to Saskatchewan under the Canada Assistance Plan will also be unaffected, because the budget exempts provinces that receive equalization from the 5 per cent cap on growth of these payments.

The result is that transfers to Saskatchewan under these three major programs which total $1.22 billion are expected to rise in the next two fiscal years to $1.25 billion and $1.29 billion respectively. This is less than the increase projected prior to the budget. It does, however, still represent an average growth of about 2.4 per cent over the next two years.

Federal support to Saskatchewan is going to continue to play a strong, positive role in the provincial fiscal picture. It is worth noting that between 1984 and 1989 provincial government expenditures grew by an average of 4.2 per cent a year, while during that same period federal transfers to Saskatchewan grew by 11.1 per cent annually.

In the next two years the major federal transfer programs will make up close to 30 per cent of total Saskatchewan revenues. In Ontario and Alberta federal transfers account for 20 per cent to 22 per cent of total revenues. On a per capita basis the federal transfers are expected to amount to $1,236 for each Saskatchewan resident in 1990–1991 and $1,269 for the subsequent fiscal year. The same figures for Ontario are $956 and $963.

I am not trying to suggest that these measures will have no impact on Saskatchewan. There certainly will be. However, I believe that the federal and provincial governments must cope with the reality of our present situation. All governments must take actions to ensure that each tax dollar is spent more carefully and used more wisely. All Canadians have to adjust their expectations of what the federal government can deliver, given the present circumstances.

We presently have a national debt of some $350 billion, and it will continue to grow until the year 1995. We can choose to take strong action over the coming years or the matter will be out of our hands.

For residents of Saskatchewan, on balance I believe that the budget can be looked upon as a necessary national effort. It is fair in its demands and promises clear rewards in the form of a healthier economy. Greater financial security for governments and Canadians and a better, more prosperous future for our children are other benefits of this budget.

This budget does much more than reduce transfers to the provinces. It has much to say about continuing restraint within the federal government itself. Canadians want less government and they want less government waste. That is exactly what the government has been doing and is continuing to do with the budget.

The government has placed a great deal of emphasis on restraint and the cost of running the government. Over the past five years this cost has declined by half a billion dollars and is a real saving to the people of Canada. It represents a reduction in real terms of some 25 per cent.

Government leadership in this area will continue. The 2 per cent cap on non-salary expenditures by all departments has been extended to 1995. This will save the people of Canada $450 million over the next two years. Government departments have taken significant steps forward in their drive to reduce waste and improve efficiency. This process will continue and yield further benefits.

Over all, this budget will reduce spending relative to 1989–1990 levels on about 40 per cent of all government spending on programs, but it is equally important to mention the areas of government spending that will not be affected by the budget. A number of areas have been exempted: elderly benefits, family allowances, veterans pensions and allowances, and unemployment insurance benefits. Of course equalization payments and Canada Assistance Plan transfers to equalization receiving provinces are also exempted. In all these exempt programs will receive an additional $6.2 billion over the next two years, yet despite these major increases in funding to those in need total spending will increase at an average rate of only 3.7 per cent over the next two years. As in the past, our Minister of Finance has sought to spread the burden or restraint over a wide base, yet he has kept in mind—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to stop the hon. member at this time, but he has 10 minutes left in his debate because of the time that he started his debate prior to February 23. We have just calculated the time and the hon. member has 10 minutes remaining in his debate, plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can slow down then so that we can all understand what I am going to say, and for reasons of effect, also. I was trying to get as quickly to the conclusion as I could so as not to impinge upon the credibility of your presence here. I will refer back to my notes and hopefully not offend anyone by repeating some very important and meaty matters in my remarks, some very weighty matters.

It is worth taking special note that this budget is about more than reducing transfers to the province. It is about government waste. I made mention of that earlier and I want to emphasize again that this government has done more to prevent waste than any other government before and is courageous enough to want to stick with that.

There have been those who have argued that we are taking the easy way out. I challenge the people who have made that statement because in fact this has not been an easy way out. It has been very difficult. The program to arrive at a deficit reduction formula which will see that Canadians remain happy and at the same time freed from the burden of the national debt is not an easy path at all. As a matter of fact it is very difficult. We say that it will not be terribly popular, but it must be done.

The measures announced in the 1989 budget, together with the spending reductions announced last December and those of one week ago, are absolutely necessary for two reasons. First, they will place the deficit back on a downward path. This will help to free up domestic savings to finance needed investment in Canada. It will diminish our increasing reliance on foreign saving and reduce the burden of debt on future generations.

Second, these measures will contribute in a substantial manner to the lowering of inflation. Only by lowering inflation can we ease the burden on our monetary policy and increase the scope for a downward shift in our interest rates. We simply cannot accept budgetary deficits of $30 billion. The compound interest that we must pay on our debt will suffocate the country. We know that 80 per cent of our debt accumulation since 1984–85 is a result of interest on our cancerous debt. To allow that process to continue would be a grotesque abdication of our responsibility. This budget is a clear indication that we will not stand by and spin this nation into the ground.

I for one—and I am sure there are many—would have liked to have seen us get on a faster path to a balanced budget. However the choices have been made and the path chosen. All members of the House of Commons and all governments must work together to end our nation's legacy debt. It must be the highest priority if we are to pass a strong Canada on to the next generation.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my colleague has made a number of remarks to which I would like to refer. He and others have often identified the supposed high spending of many provincial jurisdictions. In fact Ontario was recently singled out.

My question is as follows: Is it possible that a significant portion of the increased funding by provinces is a result of the cut-backs to provinces in health and education? Those two alone will be over $39 billion between 1986 and 1995. There are also cut-backs to sectors such as agriculture and housing. In fact because of increased poverty which has increased costs to the provinces, is it possible therefore that the increased spending by provincial jurisdictions is a direct result of the reductions in those transfers in a number of sectors?

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to be able to respond to that question somewhat in isolation. I enjoy the conversation that is going on at the far end of the House of Commons. Unfortunately I have to speak while I am on my feet. I would rather choose to listen to see what two experienced colleagues have to say to one another. I do have an answer to at least part of the question. It was somewhat convoluted in that it ties an apparent reduction in federal government spending to an increased requirement by federal governments to come up with extra funding, covering a wide perspective of various budget areas. I will pick two areas in particular that the hon. member made reference to. The two that he made reference to are in the areas of health and education, the perceived reduction in federal government moneys made available to the provinces for those two very important areas.

I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that while the federal government has shown that the rate of growth in transfer payments to the provinces is showing a slowdown, the fact is that it continues to grow.

As a matter of fact, had the hon. member been attentive to my earlier remarks, I think he would have found a relationship between the growth of moneys going to the provinces in terms of transfer payments in direct relationship to how we have had to curtail money that we have spent. He would have seen a very dramatic difference between the two, a dramatic difference to the point where moneys going to provincial governments have increased some 6 per cent per annum where the amount of increase that we have allowed ourselves is somewhat closer in the order of 3.6 per cent to 3.7 per cent.

First of all, to say that we have restricted funding to the provinces is simply not telling it as it is, with the exception of this year as it relates to their expectations in terms of growth of what they had anticipated.

I have been advised that as of last December, the hon. Minister of Finance, in meeting with provincial finance ministers has indicated to them that this is not a sacred cow in that we, as a federal government, are harnessed with this national debt and are looking for ways to address it. As we have had all kinds of communications from our constituents saying: "Do something about government spending", I think it can be safely assumed that those people who have been writing us mean the same thing for their provincial governments. We have taken the bull by the horns, so to speak, and we have shown a decline in the growth of moneys going to the provinces.

It is interesting to note that we make reference to the province of Ontario. I recall hearing a statistic recently to the effect that only 80 per cent of the transfer payments that went to the province of Ontario, generally understood to be required for the purpose of education and health, went to those two departments. The other 20 per cent went into general revenues.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it was with great interest that I listened to my colleague for Regina—Wascana and his statements on the budget. There are a few things, however, that I should mention.

First, his statement that the NDP call for lower interest rates was just an NDP notion. I wish to remind him that the Devine government in Saskatchewan has also called for a lower interest rate policy.

Second, he lauds the leadership of the Devine government in tackling debt in Saskatchewan. I was not able to watch the hon. member's face, but I am certain that there must have been a bit of a smile when he made that statement. Certainly the Devine government in Saskatchewan, as all Saskatchewan people have known, has driven Saskatchewan into its biggest, deepest debt and deficit in the history of our province. It started with a good surplus in 1982, and the last time I tried to estimate it, it came close to around $10,000 per person of debt in Saskatchewan.

I am surprised as well that the hon. member for Regina—Wascana, who has the university in his riding, is not somewhat concerned at the cut-backs which will cost Saskatchewan somewhere between $90 to $100 million in the next two years. It will affect the University of Regina which is in his riding. I am certain the university and students at the university will be making presentations to him to enlighten him of the fact that the cut-backs will hurt higher education in Saskatchewan.

I am also surprised that the hon. member did not mention some of the cut-backs to native organizations. Regina has a major problem dealing with child hunger, particularly among the native community. I am certain the hon. member in his former career as mayor of Regina was very well aware of the problem of hunger in Regina, particularly among the native community. Surely he must realize that this budget will put the extra squeeze on these people.

The last thing I am surprised at, and I would hope the hon. member would make some comment on, is the state of agriculture in Saskatchewan. He knows that the projections are that next year there will be a negative income in the farm community in Saskatchewan. We are facing a serious problem back home. Anybody from Saskatchewan surely has to begin to address that question and the urgent need that farmers in Saskatchewan are facing for some type of support in order to save farm families from going under.

Mr. Schneider: My hon colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle gives me a great deal to comment on, but I do not believe I have as much time as is required to reply.

I am particularly pleased to note that the member has listened with great interest. It probably goes on record as one of the few times he has ever listened to me with great interest and certainly there has been ample reason why he should have. But I welcome that attentiveness to the House of Commons here today.

I have to make reference to a few of the points that I hastily jotted down. He ridicules the provincial government's ability to handle the finances given to it by public trust. What he does not make mention of is that about the time they were elected, the economy of Saskatchewan was headed into a spiral down hill in that we were to experience low prices for potash, uranium and oil in unprecedented proportions. I do not believe that anyone can point a finger at any political party and accuse politicians of having any impact on the world commodity prices for a provincial commodity.

The fourth item that he alludes to is with respect to the agricultural situation. I have a permit book and no one in this House of Commons has to tell me the drastic plight with which Saskatchewan farmers are currently being confronted. It is a terrible problem but thus far all I have heard is people making reference to the problem, no one has a solution. I would greet with open arms and enthusiasm those who can come forward with a solution to the problem. Perhaps we could build a brick wall around Canada, eat our own wheat. That at least will not cause it to be an international problem.

Yes, the University of Regina does cause me very great concern. As I made reference earlier, 80 per cent of the transfer payments to the province of Ontario went to health and education and 20 per cent went into general revenues. There are no controlling factors on the transfer payments that are going to the province of Saskatchewan which will cost the province $33 million. Let us not frighten anyone with this $100 million figure. It will cost the province of Saskatchewan $33 million and as we have to tighten our belts, I think the province of Saskatchewan can do that.

I would entreat the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle that instead of giving us continued hot air, give us a little rain, it will help out agriculture more than any rhetoric.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to rise to speak to what I consider now, after today's Question Period, to be a phantom budget.

As we heard during Question Period, there were no cuts in this budget. I wonder if the people on the other side of the House could tell us whether we are looking at some different documents. Were we not provided with the same information that the government is operating from, or in fact is there a whole bunch of smoke and mirrors when it comes to the budget?

Mr. de Jong: George Orwell is alive and well in Tory ranks.

Ms. Langan: My colleague from this side of the House just pointed out that George Orwell could not have done a better job than the kind of job that was done on the Canadian people in Question Period today.

This budget is forcing Canadians to take yet another step on the economic tightrope that the Tories have stretched from coast to coast for Canadians. We have had the free trade deal, the clawback on pensions, family allowances, cuts to unemployment insurance, privatization of Air Canada, VIA Rail, now Petro-Canada and Telesat, and the goods and services tax.

All of those things have been heaped on top of all of this. When I say "this", I mean the kinds of things that we were raising in the House today.

This is a so-called budget where the finance minister is attempting to finish the job that he started on Canadians six years ago. I would like to comment to the hon. member for Regina—Wascana that Saskatchewan has been accused of being in violation of the CAP guidelines to provide for those in need, and yet there is no recognition of that in the response that we got from the hon. member for Regina-Wascana.

• (1540)

Saskatchewan has one of the lowest welfare rates in Canada and one of the highest rates of infant mortality. I hope that the hon. member for Regina—Wascana will think about those things the next time he rises in the House and explain how this budget is going to help people in Saskatchewan in view of those horrid statistics.

Because my area of concern is social policy, I would like to talk about the social policy side of this budget.

There has been a cut of $51 million over two years for social housing. This, at a time when Canadians in every major city of this country, in suburban communities and municipalities, and in many cases rural communities are finding it impossible to afford housing in this country. Yet, we have had a $51 million cut for social housing.

The federal government has unilaterally decided to freeze transfers to the provinces for criminal legal aid at the 1989-90 level for the next two years, approximately $86 million, at a time when more and more Canadians are unable to defend themselves, to be represented in this great free country because they cannot afford it, because they are living below the poverty line.

The two programs that are most affected by the finance minister's budget are the Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan. Under the Established Programs Financing transfer payments to the provinces for health and post-secondary education are made. How much the provinces lose due to cuts to both the EPF and the capping of the CAP program start adding up very rapidly.

British Columbia, my home province, $102 million; Alberta, $98 million; Saskatchewan, $33 million; Manitoba, $38 million; Ontario, $378 million; Quebec, $220 million; New Brunswick, $24 million; Nova Scotia, $29 million; P.E.I., $4 million and Newfoundland, $19 million.

This is at a time when some of those provinces are under tremendous stress. We have heard in this House in the last few months the stress that the Atlantic provinces are under. This is at a time when Saskatchewan is under terrible stress. The hon. member from across the way wanted to throw in the reason that it was drought. If drought it is, then there is stress in that province. Yet, Saskatchewan is being cut by $33 million.

The only reason that there is a balanced budget in British Columbia is that the British Columbia government has not paid adequate welfare rates, has not provided adequate child care, has not provided adequate school lunch programs for those who are poor, has not provided anything in housing, has not provided any of the social safety net features that we expect through transfer payments. That is why that province has a balanced budget.

Now the double whammy is that their cut is even greater and the very people who have carried the province to make it balance its budget are going to be hit again with another whammy.

Under health care, CBC reported that Quebec's Minister of Health may be forced to stop funding some medicare services as a result of the cuts to the EPF. Marc Yvon Côté says that the government's budget is costing Quebec's health plan $157 million. Mr. Côté wants to drop some services from the universal medicare plan. It would mean more patients would have to pay for some of the treatments and it would mean that that would be right in line with what this Tory government believes should be happening in Canada, that is, the development of a two tier medical system.

British Columbia is already sending heart patients to Seattle for serious, much needed health care. What will the effects of the EPF cuts be to heart patients in other parts of this country? Under the Canada Assistance Plan, transfer payments to B.C., Ontario and Alberta will be capped at 5 per cent more than what they spent in 1989-90. But the anticipated costs are expected to be much higher.

The Canada Assistance Plan came into effect in 1966. It is the federal government's commitment and its responsibility to fund 50-50 the costs of social services and welfare programs in this country. The finance minister is claiming that he is applying the same principle the federal government is using for the clawback of family allowance old age security payments to higher income Canadians. He said that British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario do not need as much help in financing programs as do other provinces.

British Columbia and Ontario, and it is anticipated that Alberta will join in, are taking this government to court, claiming that the finance minister is violating a contract by unilaterally changing the funding formula under the Canada Assistance Plan. The plan requires the government to give one year's notice to the province and requires that the province give its consent.

Under an Order in Council, the B.C. government will be asking the B.C. Court of Appeal whether the terms of the CAP Act of 1970 or a 1967 agreement between the federal government and B.C. give rise to a legitimate expectation that the Government of Canada would introduce no bill into Parliament to limit its obligation without the consent of British Columbia.

It will also ask the court whether the federal government has any statutory prerogative or contractual authority to limit its obligation to contribute 50 per cent of the cost to B.C. of assistance and welfare services.

This government is expected to introduce legislation and, indeed, is introducing legislation to change the Canada Assistance Plan Act before the court rules.

Even Leonard Shifrin, a respected columnist when it comes to discussing social policy, has said that this budget is a load of rubbish.

When the finance minister says that the CAP ceiling affects only the three richest provinces, I think it would be important to more accurately say that it affects one half of Canada's poor, who live in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. After years of chipping away at universality and claiming benefits should go to only those in need, this government has decapitated the one program that is totally targeted to the poor.

Child care is affected in two ways by this budget. One, the government has failed once again to announce a national child care program. Even more important is the effect of this government's decision to unilaterally change the funding responsibility for a federal—provincial program.

The Ontario Attorney General put it best when he said: "Why would any province in the future ever rely on the undertaking of the federal government to fund a program, if as soon as the program is established the federal government can say: 'Now that you are under way, we have changed our minds'". Since the only way the provinces get assistance for any funding to child care is through CAP, concern has been expressed about whether the three provinces will, indeed, be willing or able to increase funding to address the continuing crisis.

In Ontario, 8,000 eligible families are on a waiting list for subsidized care across the province. The Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care was hoping for 5,000 to 5,300 new spaces for children in the province in the next fiscal year. Now they estimate they may get 1,000, and that would be due to the capping of CAP.

In B.C., as I said during Question Period, it is estimated that 300,000 children need child care and only 20,000 licensed spaces are available. What happens to the other 280,000 kids in British Columbia who need child care?

The Native Council of Canada recently reported on the lack of native child care, especially in urban areas, and cited this as a reason for denying natives the opportunity for jobs and education. In Vancouver, it is estimated that there is a native population of 60,000 but there is only one child care centre. It is estimated that 5,000 Indian children are in desperate need of child care, yet there is only one native Indian–run centre called Sundance Day Care Centre.

In response to criticism that his government is neglecting the needs of Canadians and their families, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has always pointed to the child care initiative fund as a shining example of the Tories' commitment to child care. Now they have shown us just how much this commitment means: $1.75 million has been cut from the fund. The department argues that this is only a freeze at the 1989 level of spending, that the $15 million fund was under–utilized, the demand was not there. Advocacy groups on the other hand point out that the criteria applied made these funds almost impossible to get. The funding that is granted for more studies does not supply the needed capital or operating funds to create child care spaces for children. This is the only federal program that is specifically for child care and the government has cut it.

I would like to add at this point a comment about the cuts to the veterans' programs. After World War II there was a national consensus that established that those who had gone and fought on behalf of the country, or those who had been willing to go would indeed be given assistance to reassimilate and to survive in society, particularly those suffering from the effects of war.

I cannot believe that this government could be so cynical as to raise the daily charges for vets in long term care from $8 to $14, almost doubling it, and to cut into the very successful Veterans Independence Program. I would like to also point out that the cut to the Veterans Independence Program is another area where women's programs have been cut because many of those veterans have wives at home and the areas that are being cut are going to make it increasingly difficult for those husband and wife teams to remain in their homes.

The average vet in Canada today is in his or her mid–sixties. Their numbers are diminishing. It is inconceivable to me why this government would cut the programs for the veterans in this country at a time when through attrition those programs are diminishing in cost daily.

In conclusion, it is important for us to note that the cuts in this budget and the way the government has approached this budget are very similar to the way one would try to sucker one's bank manager.

Mr. Speaker, if you or I as small business people went to our bank manager and said: "We have a whole bunch of accounts receivable due us but we are not going to bother about that. We are only going to increase our spending by 5 per cent this year and we are going to try to pay you back and cut down our debt as much as we can, but we are not going to bother those folks who owe us and we are not going to ask those people to pony up what they owe us in accounts receivable.", our bank manager, yours and mine, would think that we had gone off our heads.

This government is introducing a budget. It has all kinds of accounts receivable from 80,000 Canadian profit making corporations that have not paid any taxes, from deferred taxpayers, corporations that have deferred their taxes endlessly and the government increases its budget, cuts in some very important areas where people desperately need the funding, and says to you and I that it is tightening its belt and goes to its bank manager and says: "But we are going to cut our spending where we can".

I would suggest that it is high time this government started asking Canadians on the other side of the economic spectrum to shoulder their fair share of the cuts in this budget and to provide Canada with a balanced budget because I think that it is very important. There is nobody on this side of the House who would disagree with a balanced budget. The difference is the political priority and the priority on the other side of the House is to take the money from the poor, the people who can least afford it, and leave alone the friends of this government. The time has come for this government to share the cost of reducing the deficit in this country and share the cost with its corporate friends, its wealthy friends and not load the burden, yet again, on the poor in this country.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address some remarks to my colleague. I come from Surrey North, which is the fastest growing municipality in all of Canada. If the hon. member has followed any of the news from the lower mainland in the last several months, she will know that there is a tremendous crisis facing the acute and chronic medical care sector in the municipality of Surrey.

Surrey is growing, not only because it is a bedroom community but it is absorbing population from the rest of Canada, people who are coming to British Columbia because of increased job opportunities. This government chooses to limit that province in terms of the Canada Assistance Plan. The government is reducing its transfer payments which is going to put tremendous strain on the province's ability to develop the types of medical care services which are necessary.

At the present time, Surrey hospital has a bed shortage of 400 beds. Since 1971 the ratio of beds to the population has gone backward instead of forward, as it should have, simply because of the increase in population. In addition, some beds which might be available have not been opened because there are no operating funds.

There is a whole series of problems that are facing particularly the urban fast-growth areas like the hon. member's riding and my riding, where because of the lack of funding from the federal government, the provincial government has simply balanced its budget by pushing the cost savings down to hospital societies, school boards, local municipalities, cutting back on welfare services and cutting back on services to the poor. They learned years ago that what this federal government is doing is sloughing off its budgetary problems by reducing the funds to provinces. Years ago, the provinces decided to cut down funding to school boards and hospital societies.

With this type of reduction in transfer payments, what does the member think are the prospects of Surrey Memorial Hospital or similar hospitals getting the necessary funding to solve the 400 bed shortage it has and to adequately staff the beds that they have now?

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I believe very strongly that the prospects are very poor, especially when one looks at the attitude of the government in British Columbia, which has been one of withholding and one of not addressing the chronic problems. In fact, in British Columbia, we have just seen a situation in the hon. member's own riding where there are more students in portable classrooms than many school districts in the province. That is how rapidly that riding has grown.

In fact, the kind of reaction that we are getting from the provincial government is a fancy, smoke and mirrors kind of funding formula for the school board and that is the same kind of fancy, smoke and mirrors funding formulae we see in the area of housing, health care, social services, and just about every other area that is encompassed in people's services.

I would suggest to the hon. member that, given the track record of the provincial government in British Columbia and given the track record of this federal government, the opportunities and the hopes of Surrey Memorial Hospital are pretty slim indeed.

• (1600)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I would also like the member to comment on the question of child care. Last year when the federal government announced it was withdrawing its much vaunted child care program it said: "Don't worry, be happy. You've got the Canada Assistance Plan. You can expand your day care programs, your child care programs in an unlimited way under the Canada Assistance Plan, so be happy, don't worry, there is no problem".

Now it comes along and says to provinces like British Columbia: "Oh, no, you can't use the Canada Assistance Plan to expand child care services to meet the crisis that has developed in the province". What, pray, can the provinces do to meet this? How do they get out of this double bind when the Conservatives one year tell them to use the Canada Assistance Plan and the next year that it will cut it off?

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, again I would like to thank my colleague.

The use of the Canada Assistance Plan for child care has been very limited, to say the least. What we find ourselves with now is a capping of the fund that is being used, not for child care spaces, not to put children in safe care but in fact funding to do yet another study here and another study there. If child care centres which desperately need capital funding, operating funding or a supplement to that can be creative enough to propose a study program that will fit within the guidelines that will maybe give them a little help in running their child care centre, then those centres can count on something. Yet even those funds are being cut. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has consistently said in the House in response to questions from me that in the mandate of this government we would have greatly expanded child care.

At the same time he has also risen in this House and said: "I am going to do more studying". I will again say to members on the other side of the House that if one were to go and make a visit to the Library of Parliament, which is behind this Chamber, one would find the shelves collapsing under the weight of child care studies. What we need in this country is child care programs, not child care studies. We need child care spaces for children who are not being adequately looked after. This budget does nothing to address that.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to stand in this House and address the question of the budget.

This budget is a blueprint, I suggest, to social and economic disaster. This budget, along with past budgets puts this country on a road that leads nowhere, a road that no one wants to travel except this government.

This budget is not only bad for what it does, but is even worse for what it fails to do. Instead of challenging our people, it penalizes them. This government is turning the future not into a promise but into a nightmare. This government through successive budgets, including this one, is dismantling our country as we once knew it, piece by piece, region by region, sector by sector and person by person.

National programs, national institutions, national services, national partnerships and national commitments are either gone or quickly going. I am afraid that the word "national" may never be found in our dictionary again. If we continue down this road we have to be afraid for our country as we know it.

The latest victim in this budget is the Canada Assistance Plan. As we know, the Canada Assistance Plan is the major vehicle by which the federal government and the provincial governments, along with the municipalities, deliver services to people in this country, services such as post-secondary education, health care, day care and other needed services for our people.

Yet this government again sees fit to essentially forget about the historical significance of this country, to forget about the historical partnerships and agreements that have been set up with other provinces because essentially it wants to take its responsibility and shift it to other levels of government.

There are a number of things in this budget that I could speak on, but I want to devote some of my comments to our national commitment on housing or, better put, the lack of, in this budget. The homeless after this budget was presented were not comforted by what was in it. Young working families wishing to buy their first home were not comforted by what was in it. Young single parents looking for affordable housing were not comforted by what was in this budget. They are disillusioned because this government has failed to show some vision and compassion with respect to the housing crisis in this country.

Every weekend when I return to my riding my constituents ask me why the cost of a home in London has risen by over 55 per cent since the Tories took power in 1984. They want to know why millions of Canadians cannot afford their first home. I want to know what the Minister of Finance tells his Etobicoke constituents when they ask him why housing prices in that riding have jumped over 100 per cent in the past five years since his party has been in power.

I want to know how the Minister of Finance explains that increase when the price of a home in his riding rose only 4 per cent in the three years prior to him becoming the Minister of Finance. These astronomical increases in housing prices have occurred all over Canada, from Vancouver to Montreal. But the problem is not limited to large urban centres.

Across Canada the average price of a new home is expected to reach $151,900 in 1990. That means that the average Canadian family would need an annual income of $65,000 or more to reach for the Canadian dream of owning their own home. But in 1988, the average family income was only $46,185. That means that family incomes and salaries must increase by 40 per cent this year before the average Canadian family can own the average Canadian home.

These figures are a clear indication of Canada's growing housing crisis. More and more, Canadians can no longer afford to buy their own home. Rents are rising higher and the cost of shelter is taking up more and more disposable income.

Rather than addressing the problem the federal government is part of the problem. Rather than introducing measures that encourage the construction of affordable housing this government taxes new housing, especially under its new grief and suffering tax, the goods and services tax. To make matters worse, this government has cut spending on social housing by 15 per cent in this budget in the year 1990.

This is not the first time that the Conservative government has cut funding to housing programs. It is ignoring the 1.3 million families living in inadequate housing in Canada. Instead, the Tories have implemented a policy consisting of cutting programs and hoping that the growing housing crisis will just disappear. It is impossible to make 1.3 million families disappear.

At least 50 per cent of all single parents in Canada are raising their children in unacceptable housing conditions. At least 40 per cent of all seniors in Canada spend their final years in squalor.

There are 1.3 million tenant households that must spend over 30 per cent of their incomes to pay for shelter. Even more astounding is the fact that there are over 600,000 families in Canada that must spend more than 50 per cent of their income on shelter costs.

The Minister of Finance admitted in his budget speech that the cost of housing has increased about 10 per cent each year. In some areas, such as Toronto, the price of a home has doubled in just four years. The cost of rents has matched these increases and jumped at an incredible pace.

With house prices rising in the last 10 years, housing construction has focused mainly on luxury homes and condominiums. Home builders have no incentives to construct affordable housing. In fact, governments at all levels impose barriers toward the building of affordable housing. The supply of affordable housing has decreased dramatically in urban centres during recent years.

Rooming houses are being closed. Affordable units are being converted and older downtown neighbourhoods are being renovated for a more upscale clientele. The poor are forced to move, but where can they go? Private developers build for the most lucrative markets, the middle and high ends. There are no incentives for them to build what is needed most—affordable housing. The government must work with the private sector, not against it, to bring onstream affordable housing. High interest rates, taxes, red tape, lengthy delays and redundant regulations are not the answers to our housing problems.

Rental apartments represented just 17 per cent of total dwelling starts across this country in 1988. New private rental construction has virtually disappeared in some centres. While the need for affordable housing has increased at an alarming pace, this government has taken the opportunity to abandon its responsibility.

Here is this government's pathetic record. Just two months after it was elected in 1984, it cut the Residential Rehabilitation Program by $29.4 million and the social housing budget by about $9.6 million. By 1986, RRAP was cut again, this time in half. During this same period total grants and contributions from CMHC would fall by $400 million on an annual basis. The 1989 budget saw the elimination of the rental component of the RRAP program. The government thereby removed essential assistance to landlords to upgrade their properties. Much of the funding for this program went to maintaining our older buildings. Loss of these funds will only hurt the poor, taking away their last source of adequate housing and pushing them into unacceptable living conditions.

In 1986 this government said it was dedicated to supporting social housing. It launched a program to build 5,000 co-operative housing units each and every year. But after three years of failing to meet its commitment, it cut the co-op housing program by 25 per cent, and only 1,900 units were built in 1989. Yet the waiting lists get longer and longer and longer.

What kind of housing program does this government have to offer the 54,000 people in Ontario who are on waiting lists for co-operative or non-profit housing? What government programs are in place for the 14,000 families in Montreal alone who are waiting for public housing? What government programs are in place to help those people in Vancouver, Halifax and even London, Ontario, who are waiting for affordable housing?

Housing costs have increased each and every year at rates higher than inflation, but spending on social housing has been cut by this government time and time again. It has fallen almost 20 per cent in the last five years compared to the 1980-84 period.

The Conservative government has been eliminating the housing programs that are most desperately needed at a time when they can do the most good. This government has again cut the desperately needed funds for social housing in this budget. This means that the 54,000 families in Ontario and the 14,000 families in Montreal will still be on waiting lists for public housing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Are there questions or comments?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his very capable speech indicated some of the nastier cut-backs that the government has imposed on the Canadian housing industry. It is unfortunate that the former minister for homelessness is not here in the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member should know that he should not indicate whether the minister is here or is not here. He knows that he should not do that. I will not dwell on it.

Mr. Milliken: I simply indicated it because I hoped that he would have been here to hear this comment. I know he will read it later in Hansard. I know he is concerned about the housing crisis in Canada, although he is part of a government that has done less than nothing about it.

I wonder if the hon. member for London East would be able to comment on the list of cut-backs that the government has imposed on housing. I know he got through some of them in his speech, but I am sure there are more. Perhaps he could provide the House with a list to simplify the matter for people who want to understand exactly what the government has done.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that very germane question.

The list is so lengthy that perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you might have to get up on your feet and tell me that my time has expired again. Let me tell you that from 1984 to 1990 every successive budget, every successive action of this government has been to cut social housing programs.

I do not have to tell any member in this House that in their communities the waiting lists get longer and longer and longer. It is unfortunate that the government has a Minister of State for Housing for there is no national housing policy. In terms of programs this government is virtually transferring its responsibilities once again from itself to the provinces and in turn to the municipalities.

This country, through its Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has been at the forefront of housing. Since 1984 this government has seen fit to essentially not take its responsibility for social housing very seriously.

On the other hand, it should be noted that this government has taken away the dream for those would-be new homeowners to own their first home. How has it done that? It has been done by not understanding that the average person who wants to buy that first home needs to be encouraged by their government. It needs to put in place programs that will allow them to buy that first home so that they in turn can put their blood, sweat and tears into that home and allow the equity to take care of itself.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that people who in turn have to pay rent are not going to be comforted by this budget whatsoever. As I said, over 1.3 million families in this country need assistance. They are paying more than 30 per cent of their incomes toward a basic essential of life.

We are prepared to work with this government to put in place those necessary housing policies to address the very serious question and a very serious housing crisis that we have in this country for the homeless and others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are over.

Before giving the floor to the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Algoma—Agriculture; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Tiem Canada; the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—Human Rights.

[English]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, this budget is a brutal blow to the north and to the aboriginal peoples throughout this land. There is no comfort for northerners in this budget at all.

"No new taxes," says the Minister of Finance. What a sham. What deception. Northerners know how many times this government has increased taxes since it was elected in 1984—32 times. The big one, the goods and services tax, is right on the horizon. This budget is counting on the revenues from the goods and services tax.

Further, by cutting transfer payments to the provinces for health and education the federal government is forcing the provinces into increasing their taxes. If there is a funding shortfall, the provinces will have to make it up. There will likely be new provincial taxes.

• (1620)

Increased provincial taxes affect the northern territories under the terms of the federal formula financing arrangements. Under these arrangements, imposed arbitrarily by the federal government, the two northern territories will have to increase their taxes if the provinces increase their tax rates. They will either have to raise their own taxes or face a reduction in their annual operating grant.

Increased taxes, whether caused indirectly or directly by the federal government, are new taxes. We know who is responsible; it is the federal Minister of Finance.

The minister cannot escape the fact that by ordering the cut-backs he is just as responsible as those who have to implement the cutbacks.

The current federal government has already cut back on the funding it transfers to the two northern territories. Yukon's transfer payments have been reduced by $9 million this fiscal year, by $12 million next year and by $20 million the year after next. The Northwest Territories has been cut back by $110 million over the next five years. The effect in the Northwest Territories in this fiscal year is a reduction of about $25 million.

According to the N.W.T. government, these cutbacks jeopardize the territorial government's ability to stimulate the economy. The Northwest Territories finance minister has called the federal action a disincentive to economic growth. He went on to say:

> The timing of the federal announcement couldn't have been worse. It comes at a time when there are a lot of critical economic and social issues to resolve in the Northwest Territories, each of them requiring substantial financial investment.

Under the new formula, Ottawa expects the government of the Northwest Territories to increase territorial taxes until they reach and remain consistent with provincial levels. If the territorial government does not increase its own tax effort at the same rate as the provinces, its projected annual operating grant from Ottawa will be reduced.

I want to repeat that these funding arrangements were not reached by agreement. They were imposed by the federal government on the territorial governments.

Also impacting on the north in this budget is the elimination of the Canadian Exploration Incentives Program, which will affect mining exploration. While not as helpful as the flow-through shares program, which was cut two years ago by the current government, it is still a loss.

The north is sick and tired of having to pay more for less. Since 1988 this government's miserly feelings toward the north have been creeping out from underneath the camouflage of concern it has tried to maintain. All the rhetoric about being concerned about the north is just that—rhetoric.

If this government truly cared about northern people, would it have cut back on the subsidy to the Canada Post food mail program to remote northern communities? The Minister of Finance boasted in his budget speech that Canada Post turned a profit. He also said he wants Canada Post and other profitable Crown corporations to turn over more of their profits to the government in the form of dividends. He said that this is to contribute to deficit reduction.

Because of the current government's actions my constituents now have to pay $5 for one litre of milk so that the government can pocket more of the profits of Canada Post. This government is taking food out of my constituents' mouths so it can put more money in its pocket.

If this government truly cared about northern development, would it have cut back the transfer payments to the territorial governments? If this government truly cared about northern and aboriginal people, would it have cut $100 million over the next two years from the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs? Would it have eliminated funding for aboriginal newspapers and cut back on other aboriginal communications? Would it have slashed the funding to aboriginal political organizations? Would it have cut back social housing funds, health funding and legal aid?

This government's obsession with the deficit has blinded it to certain fundamental realities. Yes, we must reduce the deficit, but we must not do so at the expense of the poorer elements of society.

What good purpose is served by cutting funding to the aboriginal communications societies? The government is totally eliminating the native communications program, which had funding of $3.4 million last year. It is cutting back on the northern native broadcast access program by 16 per cent, or $2.2 million.

With these actions, it is causing the death of eight aboriginal communications groups and mortally wounding another seven. The National Aboriginal Communications Society estimates these cut-backs will mean a loss of 100 jobs.

What do these cuts mean for northern aboriginal communications? For the Inuvialuit Communications Society the elimination of the native communications program means a loss of $106,000. With those funds the Inuvialuit Communications Society produces a monthly newspaper for Inuvialuit called Tusaayaksat. The cancellation of this funding means the death of this newspaper.

The 16 per cent reduction in the northern native broadcast access program means a loss of $105,600 to the Inuvialuit Communications Society. These program moneys are used to produce an award-winning television program, Tamapta. The production of this program will now have to be curtailed.

These cut-backs will lead to lay-offs. The Inuit Broadcasting Corporation is going to lose about one-quarter of its funding. It will be cut by about $600,000. The Inuit Broadcasting Corporation will lose up to $400,000 from the northern native broadcast access program. Under this program the corporation produced such series as Takuginal, a children's program, and Takuyaksat, the award-winning series from Baker Lake.

The elimination of the native communication program funding means a loss of about $215,000. These program moneys are used to produce drama, including the popular Super Shamou series.

The corporation will have to cut down on its air hours and close down part of its operation. Staff will have to be laid off in Ottawa and the northern production centres. Throughout the country the story is the same.

The national media do not cover aboriginal issues the way aboriginal people would like them covered, nor as often, nor as in depth as aboriginal people would like. The national media cannot cover these issues from an aboriginal viewpoint. Furthermore, they cannot communicate these issues in the aboriginal languages. Pulling the plug on aboriginal communications is an attack on aboriginal culture.

For the same reason that the CBC was established—to counter the magnetic pull of the American culture—aboriginal media were established as a counter force to the overwhelming dominance of non-aboriginal Canadian culture with its two official languages and multicultural mosaic.

How many Canadians know that there are 53 aboriginal languages in the country? How many Canadians know that these languages are dying? Only three of the 53 aboriginal languages in this country have a good chance of surviving into the next century. These languages were spoken throughout this country for hundreds of years prior to the arrival of the European explorers and settlers. Yet many are in danger of extinction and a major battle has to be waged against their loss. In that battle for cultural and linguistic survival, aboriginal people need the federal government as an ally and a supporter, but the government has turned its back on aboriginal people.

The federal Department of the Secretary of State spends only $1 million a year on an aboriginal language programs. Compare that to the hundreds of millions spent on the two official languages. Even heritage languages, the languages spoken by most recent immigrants, receive more money than the original languages of the first people.

While I am not speaking against the funding of these other languages, I am saying that the government has to give priority to the survival, preservation and enhancement of aboriginal languages.

In this budget not only is the government not providing this critical support, it is cutting off the means for aboriginal people to communicate in their own languages with their own people. Quite simply, the government is contributing to aboriginal cultural demise.

Aboriginal people in this country want to know why the government persists in widening the gap between the rich and poor in Canada. They want to know why the government is cutting programs that need catching up. They want to know why they have to pay with the loss of their jobs when big corporations in this country do not pay their fair share of taxes. They want to know why they are being asked to pay with their culture and language when the socioeconomic gap between aboriginal and non-aboriginal people in this country is still so great.

Aboriginal people in this country are paying with their lives for the government's lack of attention to the health, education, employment and economic needs that exist.

• (1630)

Aboriginal youth are killing themselves at six times the rate of non-aboriginal Canadians. Aboriginal babies die in greater numbers and their health, when they do survive, is much poorer than non-aboriginal Canadians. Aboriginal people live 10 years less than the non-aboriginal Canadian.

The government sheds crocodile tears for aboriginal people, pretending that it really matters or it really cares, but these phoney tears are not going to rebuild the shattered lives and broken dreams and hopes of the aboriginal people, abandoned again by a government which is hostile to aboriginal aspirations and is as bent on aboriginal subjugation as the earlier colonial administrations.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague for Nunatsiaq for his good presentation. Perhaps I could have the hon. Secretary of State's attention for one second. My colleague referred to the native communications program and the northern native broadcast access program. I would like to ask him how these two programs served very specific purposes in the north.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out some things that have been misrepresented or misunderstood by many Canadians in terms of the funding cuts to certain aboriginal organizations.

First, the hon. Prime Minister pointed out earlier that there were no cuts to the aboriginal funding of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as did the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. There are no funding cuts to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development budget only because it is legislated. The government has to raise the funding programs because they are either for reservations, for education, for other mandatory programs, health and land claims. That is the only reason they they are going up, because they are legislated into the law.

Other programs like the native broadcast access program and the communications program have been cut and are being eliminated over the next six months from April. Aboriginal newspapers—such as the Native Press from the Western Arctic—are either going to be shut down or are going to be very hard to operate after April because the funding is being cut. That newspaper serves the aboriginal people in the Western Arctic. There are others all across Canada that serve the aboriginal people in Canada. They are the means for the aboriginal people to learn more about what is happening across the north or across Canada in the aboriginal society.

I think you have to realize that cutting the funding, especially this year being the International Year of Literacy, is a very great disservice to the first people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now over. Debate. The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate on the Budget, especially after what our colleagues opposite said about incredible cutbacks by the government and what this government has done. And especially after what my hon. colleague just said about cuts at Indian Affairs. I find that rather surprising, because last night, I heard Liberal leadership candidates answer a question about what they would do about Canada's debt if they came to power. They all said they would cut government spending. And today, they say the government should not make any cuts. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance pointed out that since 1984, our government has been following a consistent and comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians can benefit from a rising standard of living and a quality of life second to none in the world. This plan had two major thrusts: first, to put the government's financial house in order, something that had not been done for many years; and second, to foster a dynamic, innovative and competitive private sector. The main challenge, of course, was to regain control of the country's finances. The previous administration's legacy consisted of a monstrous national debt. The government's program spending was out of control, and we were faced with an operating deficit unprecedented in this country's history. In fact, fiscal year 1984–85, the year we took over, ended with a total deficit of $38 billion, of which $16 billion represented the shortfall between revenues and program spending. This was in addition to the cumulative deficit built up during the 20 previous years.

To give you a better idea of the size of the problem, the successive deficits incurred in the 10 years previous to this administration show the disastrous progression of our debt. I think it would be useful to look back, to see where it all started and what the result was. At the end of fiscal year 1974–75, the deficit was $25 billion. The next year it was up to $31 billion. By the end of 1976, the deficit was $37 billion; the year after, $48 billion. By the end of 1978–79, we were up to $60 billion. The year after that, we were up to $72 billion. By the end of 1980–81, it was $85 billion. Not bad! The government was rapidly losing control. By the end of 1981–82, $100 billion, but that wasn't enough, and by the end of 1982–83, it was $128 billion. By the end of 1983–84, it was $160 billion, and by the end of 1984–85, the last fiscal year under the previous administration, we had a cumulative deficit of $199 billion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: What is it now?

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, what is it now?

Mr. Larrivée: I will tell you where the deficit is now.

Mr. Gauthier: You doubled it.

Mr. Larrivée: And I will tell you about your debt, the $200 billion debt you left us in 1984–85. I suppose you knew that when you borrow money, you have to pay interest. Everybody knows that borrowing involves paying interest. And before you borrow, you make sure you can meet your payments.

• (1640)

And now going back to the Liberal legacy of $199 billion at the end of the 1984–85. The Government of the day had therefore completely lost control over its spending and, as I said earlier, seemed unaware of the impact interest payments on its huge indebtedness would have on future administrations.

The interests which the Government must pay on this debt—I hope my colleagues opposite are listening—account for the deficit of some $30 billion which it has declared year in year out since 1986. Without this debt, Mr. Speaker, Canada would have no deficit and could even declare a surplus. In other words, we collect enough taxes to pay for absolutely all the services provided by the Government. Our deficits only represent the interests on the debt. Which means that the operating deficit of $16 billion in 1984–85 was eliminated when we took over. The very first year, the Minister of Finance showed enough restrain to achieve a reduction in expenditures in real terms. Since then, the increase has varied between 2 and 2.5 per cent, a significant change compared with the previous years.

Our friends opposite are blaming us for allowing the national debt to grow to apocalyptic proportions. It is like the pot calling the kettle black. We are forced to pay the interests on the debt which the Trudeau Government accumulated during its last ten years of tenure and that is the reason why we must continue in this direction and keep the situation under control. As future progress will be seriously compromised by inflationary economic pressures, we feel we must continue to limit public spending, something for which we need the support of all Canadians. Interest payments on the national debt are still the main component of our deficit and these budget measures will enable us to cut it down to $28.5 billion next year. By maintaining our program we expect to reduce the deficit to $14 billion over the next three years and to $10 billion in the fifth year. This means that in five years the government will begin to buy back its outstanding bonds and treasury bills and that the country will be well on its way towards a significant reduction in the national debt load.

The lower deficit will contribute to reduce inflation and that in turn will bring interests down. This is something for which the opposition parties have been clamouring for quite some time, but then it is due to the problems they left us with. A reduced deficit will make Canada less reliant on foreign lenders, thereby shoring up our national independence.

Canadians made it quite clear in recent months that they expected lower public outlays rather than higher taxes. Their message got through to the Minister of Finance and this is why his latest budget reflects this new trend.

The two-year expenditure control program will affect all areas of government spending, excepting of course income support programs for seniors, families and veterans as well as unemployment insurance and the equalization program and the Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower-revenue provinces.

The growth of expenditures for some programs will be capped at 5 per cent for the next two years. These programs relate to science and technology as well as to native and Inuit people. Opposition members describe this as a catastrophe, yet expenditures will rise by up to 5 per cent.

This applies as well to the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces that do not receive equalization payments and of course also to defence and official development assistance.

Some programs will be frozen for two years. These programs concern established program financing per capita, tax transfers on the income of utilities, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Telefilm Canada, the Export Development Corporation and Marine Atlantic.

Some programs were reduced like the Department of the Secretary of State, small craft harbours and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We also eliminated some projects such as OSLO, for the oil sands in northeastern Alberta, a saving of about $650 million, the Polar 8 icebreaker project, for a direct saving of $84 million in 1990–91 and $62 million in 1991–92.

We also eliminated the mining exploration incentive program. This measure should save us $50 million in 1990–91 and $125 million in 1991–92.

Some management initiatives will be proposed for the sake of better expenditure control. Stricter conditions will apply to the repayment of financial aid given by the federal government to business; such aid will no longer be in the form of outright grants.

The government will continue with its objective of privatizing companies where its presence is no longer necessary.

In keeping with this objective, we will sell our shares in Telesat Canada, Nordion International Inc. and Theratronics International. We will privatize Petro–Canada. This will be done over a period of five years.

A number of Crown corporations and agencies will be wound up, including Canada Harbour Place Corporation, Canadian Patents and Development Ltd. and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

Finally, in addition to the initiatives announced last December, which are expected to contribute $2.8 billion in savings over the next five years, a number of further initiatives are contained in this Budget. They are designed to reduce the cost of government and improve management efficiency.

In all, these measures are expected to save $2.8 billion in 1990–91 and $3.3 billion in 1991–92. Taken together with the spending reductions and management improvements announced in December 1989, the fiscal savings total $3 billion in 1990–91, and $3.8 billion in 1991–92. Over the period from 1990–91 to 1994–95, the cumulative fiscal savings will be well over $19 billion.

Mr. Speaker, this Budget meets the expectations of Canadians. It provides for reducing the federal deficit in an intelligent manner and does not contain any new taxes, at the request of Canadians.

Of course, implementing this expenditure control plan will require patience and understanding on the part of all Canadians, and perhaps especially those who are more directly responsible for the situation facing us today and who so far have kept demanding all kind of increases. They should not forget what Canadians experienced during the 80s when they were faced with spiralling inflation. We cannot afford to bring back the despair, loss of confidence and personal problems caused by interest rates of 20 per cent or more that materialized as a result of this inflationary spiral.

So many businesses had to close down because they could not afford the exorbitant cost of financing stagnant inventory. So many Canadians lost their jobs as a result. So many Canadians lost many years worth of savings invested in their homes when they could not afford mortgage rates of close to 25 per cent. Many Canadians will never forget that time, and that is why today, Canadians are better able to appreciate why we have to deal with inflation and the deficit and do it now. It means providing a sound basis for a secure and prosperous future.

• (1650)

To achieve this, we must follow a clear plan of responsible fiscal and economic policies to reduce inflation and create a better climate for lower interest rates.

In his Budget, our Minister of Finance continues to do, not what is easy or popular but what is right for the country.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that Tory members have to defend their Minister of Finance, but by sheepishly saying that he was doing his best they are only trying to discourage anyone from attempting to find out what this Budget is all about.

First, this Budget is a complete sham, and the Minister seems to be abdicating his responsibilities and transferring to the provinces the burden of the debt.

By passing the deficit on to the provinces, the Minister will hit the poor and the less privileged in Canada. He will also be hitting education programs which, as we know, benefit from transfer payments to the provinces from the Canadian Government.

The Minister of Finance, whom the hon. member is supporting, pushed interest rates up. Since 1988 he has been pushing interest rates up to an unbelievable level. As we know, those interest rates further increase the national debt, something I submit he acknowledges when he quite clearly recognizes that he has been doing extensive research on the level on the national debt over these last 10 years, and he agrees with me that since this Government was elected, four or five years ago, they have increase the debt twofold from some $150 billion to the current $300 billion.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether the interest rates he is justifying so well or so badly will not, in his constituency as everywhere else, have devastating effects on small business loans, on housing he certainly supports as any good member, and if finally the interest rates Canadians have to pay now, nearly 15 per cent for consumers, and this is no joke, 15 per cent interest now, when the prime rate is at 13.50 to 13.75. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member will realize one day that he has to stand up and speak for the average citizens he is representing.

Interest rates are much too high, and what does he do? He supports the Minister of Finance. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are lost causes and this may be one.

I would ask the hon. member what he has done recently to try and convince the Minister of Finance to lower interest rates to a level that might be 2 or 3 percentage points above the American rate, but not 5. Canada cannot compete with a country such as the United States when our interest rates are 5 percentage points above theirs.

So here is my very simple question: What did he do personally to help lower interest rates that are now destroying the Canadian economy, that will lead us down the road to disaster, that is the impending recession?

Mr. Larrivée: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. I think that it is very relevant. He mentioned that I built my argument on debt statistics for the last 10 years, and he said so again. I have been a member of this House for a little over a year, Mr. Speaker, and the same point always comes up: We doubled the debt.

Now my colleague did not follow my whole speech. I explained to him why we were now at around $350 billion. Mr. Speaker, I said why and I think it is elementary that when you borrow money, you must not only plan to pay it back but also plan to pay the interest. It is not given away.

My colleague should explain to us how they were able to borrow year after year such large amounts to finance current operations, which shows very poor management, without planning— Because when he says that we doubled the debt, I suppose that he is accusing us, that he is charging us for the interest on their debt. That makes no sense, or rather it can be explained. When the debt has reached such a point and there are no plans to pay it back, it is quite normal to have such a question and to pass the burden of the interest on the debt to the government in power. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in all our efforts, we must maintain a policy of high interest rates for the simple reason that we are faced with enormous expenditures that must be limited to bring down interest rates which the Bank of Canada is now using to fight inflation.

My hon. colleague should have thought—it maybe too late for them, much too late—but they should have known, having lived through this experience, that by not controlling inflation, by maintaining interest rates at a lower level, and by allowing inflation to rise, they eventually lost total control over a running away inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I would rather support the Minister of Finance interest rate policy rather than have a recurrence of the disaster we faced in 1981–82. My hon. friend should have listened when I mentioned the hardship that situation caused to all Canadians. A great many businesses went under because they could not live with interest rate approaching 25 per cent. A great many Canadian men and women lost their houses because having to renew their mortgages on their house with interest rates as high as 25 per cent, thereby losing their lifetime savings.

An Hon. Member: You must be kidding!

Mr. Larrivée: I understand that I must conclude, and I am sorry to do so referring to hard times we would not want to experience again. And the Budget introduced by the Minister of Finance will eventually solve all these problems.

Mr. Gagliano: It does not solve anything!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister on a very short question or comment.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, just a very short comment. I recall being elected here in 1979 when the deficit was $68 billion. The Minister of Finance then appointed was the present Minister for International Trade. He proposed "short term pain for long term gain". Canada said no. We got four years of Liberal government and the deficit rose to $220 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Cochrane—Superior.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to take part in the budget debate. On a national scale Canadians from coast to coast are questioning the financial policies of this government and the economic situation we are facing. The picture does not look too good.

• (1700)

The public debt has doubled in the past six years of Conservative government. It has risen from $170 billion to $351 billion. In spite of massive tax increases and extensive spending cuts the deficit has continued to rise each year, from $28 billion in 1987–88 to $30.5 billion in 1989–90. The Tories have gone to the taxpayers 32 times for tax increases, either on income through sales tax hikes or through increased fees from government services.

During its six years in power the current government has boosted federal revenues by 70 per cent, from $70 billion in 1984–85 to an estimated $120 billion for the 1990–91 fiscal year. What use has the government made of all these increased revenues and saved expenditures. It certainly missed the opportunity to make meaningful reductions in the deficit during the last six years when we were experiencing world-wide economic growth.

The Minister of Finance has made his own five-year projection. What does he see in the future? He sees a deficit reduction to $10 billion by 1995. Also his calculations show that the net public debt will by then have increased to $452 billion. That is a $100-billion leap from the current total. According to his figures, four years from now Canadians will be paying $41 billion in annual interest on the national debt, precisely what it will cost us this year. Of course this is based on the assumption that the finance minister's calculations are correct. This may be a highly questionable assumption given his seriously flawed forecasting in the past.

For example, he forecast that short-term interest rates would average 10.1 per cent. In fact they have averaged 12.2 per cent which resulted in the government paying $6 billion more in debt charges than it had forecast. The assumption that the Canadian dollar would be stable and that interest rates would miraculously drop has also not materialized. The finance minister's current projections are tied to 9.5 per cent short-term interest rates. Private economists expect levels of at least 10.8 per cent. That difference would add at least $2 billion to the minister's deficit prediction.

On a more regional basis, northern Ontario, particularly my riding of Cochrane—Superior, has suffered repeated financial and economic shocks in the past year. Northerners have moved from one crisis to another. They have had to deal with many issues. The 15 per cent export surtax on softwood lumber has caused the closure of seven mills in small industry towns resulting in high unemployment. The reduction in air service to northern towns will affect the quality and level of services in the areas of tourism, disabled travellers, and people requiring medical services in the south.

The repercussions of the GST legislation will result in an increase in the cost of all goods because of the transportation service factor. The elimination of VIA Rail to many northern communities will impact negatively on the tourism industry. The elderly and the disabled who used to use trains because they were accessible and affordable will not be able to do so any more.

The hike in postal rates for commercial customers using the northern air stage network will further erode the purchasing power of natives. The tax benefit for northern and isolated areas is on the brink of extinction for 37 communities in my riding if the recommendation of the task force report is implemented.

The Canadian Incentive Exploration Program which was to provide incentives of $160 million for the exploration of minerals, oils and gas was recently eliminated after being introduced in 1988. Its cancellation today will serve a terrible blow to the mining industry.

The recent budget also took a swipe at the federal government's regional program in northern Ontario, FEDNOR, which provides specialized incentives for rural small businesses in logging, manufacturing, motel resorts, tourism, as well as professional services such as architects, computer and data processing services. They will now be moving in the direction of repayable contributions when new or existing businesses apply for assistance.

The north does not enjoy the essential services that urbanites do. The communities lack the medical, educational, recreational, cultural, and commercial services at urban doorsteps. Almost all the incentives which encourage people to stay in the north are now being axed.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct your attention to the Department of Forestry for which I am the official opposition co-critic.

On February 23, 1990 the Prime Minister proclaimed the Department of Forestry as a full-fledged department and completed the inauguration with the swearing in of the hon. for Prince George—Peace River as minister. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister on his official appointment.

We now have a Department of Forestry and a Minister of Forestry but ironically a few days before the Prime Minister's announcement the forestry department's budget was slashed by 23 per cent or $47 million. This is incredible.

To add insult to injury, these cuts took place in one of the department's most sensitive areas: federal-provincial forestry agreements. For months we have been urging the government to complete the federal-provincial agreements which are absolutely vital to the viability of the forests in Canada and to the survival of the forestry industry. These agreements are the muscle of the department. Through them the minister can implement federal forestry policy, and he is able to negotiate with provincial officials from a position of strength. If we remove the financial support which came with the agreements, we do not have much left. It is quite evident that nothing has changed. The Minister of Forestry is in the same position as he has been in the last four years.

However Treasury officials have said, according to a report in The Financial Post of February 23, 1990, that this decline in funding is temporary. If and when new agreements are worked out with the provinces, more federal money will be made available through the department. With all these budget cuts one wonders if those funds will ever materialize.

As a member from the province of Ontario I am extremely concerned with the reduction of transfer payments to my province. Health officials are crying for increased funding in order to offer better services. Our educators are faced with having to pass on huge increases in school taxes just to maintain the actual levels of education: $365 million this year and $680 next year. This is shameful. Talk about passing the buck. The government is passing a big buck indeed. The federal government is passing its financial burden on to the backs of the provinces.

A few days ago I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State in which I said:

> I was shocked and disturbed, as were native communities across Canada, to learn that the $3.4M Native Communications Program (NCP) has been eliminated and the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program (NNBAP) has been cut by $2M.
> At a time when there is a resurgence of freedom on a global scale, the Government of Canada is slashing two programs which are vital to the linguistic expression of our native communities and which reflect their culture and tradition.
> Canadians are rapidly realizing the serious problem of illiteracy in our society. The native communities are no different. Their native language is an integral part of their legacy and without the operational funds from the NCP and the NNBAP, the survival of their language is in jeopardy.

Now, after painting a picture of bad economic times caused by this government, the GST is coming along to choke Canadians, and serve the final blow. This one Canadians will not forget.

[Translation]

Mr. Marin: Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to what my friend and colleague from Cochrane—Superior has been telling us about a number of cut-backs. If I may, I should like to focus on the so-called cut-backs in the new Department of Forestry. Just a few days ago, royal assent was given to Bill C-29 to establish a federal Department of Forestry. The new department is the result of a promise made by the Prime Minister in 1984 when he identified the need for a full-fledged ministry, and of a government commitment to husband our forests. During fiscal year 1990-91 the department will give more, not less, support to forestry by spending an additional $4.5 million, for a total of $74.3 million. As my colleague pointed out, forests fall under the jurisdiction of the provinces and we simply cannot ignore that fact. The new department is getting organized and the minister does not spare any effort, particularly with respect to federal-provincial negotiations on a number of programs designed to maintain progress made under previous agreements on forest resources development. The 1990-91 main estimates cannot tell us anything about the outcome of these discussions, but they do indicate that several Economic and Regional Development Agreements are about to expire. This should not necessarily be interpreted as leading to lower regular financial or human operational resources. Two agreements have already been ratified, one with Nova Scotia, $45 million on a 55 and 45 per cent federal–provincial basis, the other with New Brunswick, $91 million also on the same federal–provincial sharing ratio. As well, there was a $3.2 million amendment to the agreement with Newfoundland. Negotiations are continuing with all the other provinces and I can assure my colleague and friend that the federal government is prepared to put about about 55 per cent of the funds required to renew these agreements. These funds will be added to the estimates.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read the announcement made by the minister. The 90s will present many challenges to the forest sector, and the new department will have a role to play in reconciling the recreational, environmental and social values of our forests. The forest industry ranks first among our various exports and it must continue to supply wood fibers while taking into account the other forest values not directly related to timber. The department is fully aware of Canadian public concern in that regard. I believe that with the members of the forestry committee, who are all interested in the future of this department, we will give strong support to the minister.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did not hear a question there, but does the hon. member have a rebuttal? He has a minute left.

[Translation]

Mr. Bélair: First of all, I would like to thank my hon. colleague opposite for his question. Yes, the Department of Forestry finally saw the light of day after six years of promises. Now that it is here, there is a lot of equivocation. I think that, since 12 percent of forests have been cleared with no plans for reforestation and given the increasing number of confrontations between the industry and environmentalists, the government should intensify its efforts to bring them together.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the budget debate this afternoon and I tell you that after a week spent in our ridings, everyone had a week off from Parliament, but I believe that we all worked in our ridings and met our constituents.

So, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I would like to make a speech on what my constituents told me when we met and I must tell you that they have several concerns. Of course, those directly affected by the Budget are concerned about the cuts and all those who are not affected fear that they will soon be by this Minister of Finance. In general, we have a problem, namely the deficit and the national debt. There, I have decided to deal with it in a non–partisan way and maybe make a few suggestions and recommendations to the Minister of Finance and the government.

Mr. Speaker, if we look at the last decade, economists, business people, labour unions and politicans, like all of us here, had two points in common on the deficit and the national debt. The first is that their forecasts never came true from year to year and the second is that the deficit and the national debt are too high. I think that we have proof from this Conservative government which supposedly should have solved—It told the people that it would solve all the economic problems, but we still have those problems. It has not changed much and we saw in this Budget the cuts that it proposed just to come up with the same deficit forecast as a year ago.

Furthermore, there are as many solutions to these financial problems as there are economists, business people, unions and politicians suggesting them. My first question is therefore this: Is a Government elected to have a surplus or to serve the people who elected it? I thing we must answer this question. We are elected to provide the people with services. We need money to provide such services, but what would be the use of money if there were no people. Therefore, we must achieve a certain balance. To do so, as Canadians, we need both financial and human resources.

Let us now have a look at our country. Canada is a country which extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific and up North to the Arctic Ocean. Distances are enormous. Weatherwise, Canada is a cold country. Yet, it has an abondance of natural resources. Canada not only has a very small population, but its population is spread over huge distances. Although inhabited by various ethnic groups, Canada is a predominantly Anglophone and Francophone country.

Compassion and tolerance are the Canadian way of life. In 1990, we have a deficit of approximately $30 billion. Has anybody wondered whether our human deficit is at least equal or perhaps greater than our financial deficit of $30 billion. I think that we should address this issue. Are 26 million Canadians enough to support our standard of living and operate our system as a democratic and modern society?

• (1720)

They keep repeating that our national debt is higher than that of the other industrialized countries. We don't have to go that far, Mr. Speaker. We can look next door, to the south. The United States has a per capita debt that is lower than ours, but its population is eight times as big. Its territory is smaller and its climate more temperate, it costs less to govern that country.

If our debt is too high, is our population a factor? If we had more people, our per capita debt would be lower. I mentioned achieving a balance, Mr. Speaker, and I think that is where a balance is required. We must not only consider fiscal solutions, we must also increase our population in order to achieve continuing economic stability.

Mr. Speaker, I realize I will not have enough time this afternoon to cover all aspects of how to increase our population, but since we are talking about the Budget, taxation and our financial problems, I would like to start by suggesting ways of controlling our annual deficit and reducing the national debt.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada should change its accounting procedures. Our system of accounting is obsolete. Although, as a government, we ask taxpayers who are in business to produce a balance sheet for their company, the Government of Canada, does not produce a balance sheet in its annual report.

We have two types of transactions: revenues and expenditures. There is no accounting for capital investment.

For instance, when the Government of Canada created Petro–Canada, that year the amount spent was shown as expenditures. What did we get at the end of the year? Revenues minus expenditures: a deficit! In the government's annual report, Petro–Canada cost nothing. Nothing! Now that the government has decided to sell Petro–Canada, I think it is important to set the record straight, and I will get back to the matter of Petro–Canada and Air Canada later on.

Just think, Mr. Speaker, if business people had to draft their financial reports according to this system, the vast majority of our businesses would be in the red. And that is because capital investment occurring in the same year would be put down as expenditures, without accounting for the business's capital and net assets.

The Government of Canada, therefore, must produce every year a balance sheet with assets and liabilities, as Auditor General Kenneth Dye has been suggesting for the past three years. He had even developed and submitted to the Government a model of this balance sheet, but nothing came of it. I suggest it is very important to implement his suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the accounting system should operate on this basis, in order to separate operating expenditures from capital expenditures. The cost of servicing the debt should be part of capital expenditures in order to plan and finance a long term reduction of the debt. We must develop a financial plan. For the past six years, we have seen the Minister of Finance re–adjust his forecast every year. We cannot solve our financial problems in that way.

Fiscal arrangements should be considered to reduce the debt. Some Canadians would be willing to pay a little more if they felt that their taxes would be used in part to reduce a debt which is increasing every year. That is what our constituents are telling us.

The current operating budget should take into accounts the political objectives of the Government and determine its policies. The Government should establish its objectives and set up a budget for services. But the whole issue of the debt and the servicing of the debt should be considered in a separate budget with specific policies to handle it.

The accounting system should be set up on this basis so that we can distinguish between operating expenditures and capital expenditures All Canadians they might understand better what the national debt means. The issue is really very complex even for experts, and I am afraid we will have great difficulty understanding all the Estimates the Minister of Finance tables every year.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, servicing the debt must come under the capital budget to allow for the long-term planning of the debt reduction and its financing. The policies involving specific steps to tackle those problems must be understood.

Mr. Speaker, any project with long term market value should come under the capital rather than operating and identified budget. And the method of financing such a project must be specified and identified before it is approved.

Mr. Speaker, if it is decided to build another Museum of Civilization, if such is government policy and if it is determined that we need it, fine, let's do it. But we must determine how much this will cost, and how it is going to be financed, rather than always dip into the same purse. And then, when something is sold, the proceeds are put into the same purse, and at the end of the year the Minister of Finance tells us: "I reduced the deficit by $2 billion." In actual fact, he reduced nothing. As in this case, he did not reduce anything, he merely sold of one Crown Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, it is important therefore that we have a management system that is healthier, better controlled, visible and that citizens can understand.

I realize I am taking some time, but I want to make sure that Canadians and hon. members understand what I am saying, because if we really are to reduce the debt and the deficit, we must take the steps needed rather than the GST or other measures proposed by the Department and the Minister of Finance.

Increasing taxes will not solve the problem. In the end, revenues will decrease because Canadians no longer can afford new or higher taxes.

If the Government decides, under that accounting system to incur a deficit, that is their privilege. They are elected by the people and must be accountable to them. Therefore, they are responsible to the people who elected them, then this is very, very easy. What we are seing is that the Minister of Finance after six years in office is still blaming the Liberals, although we have not been in government for six years and the debt was increased by the Tories.

Earlier I heard the hon. member suggest: You cannot blame us for the interests we had to pay on the debt you incurred. Does that make any sense? None at all. The problems will not be solved that way. Propose solutions. In six years the Minister of Finance has not suggested anything new.

Mr. Speaker, another example is obvious. He has just suggested selling Petro-Canada but he did not say how or what he intends to do with the proceeds. He sold Air Canada. I would like to know how much he got for it. I think that company was worth something. It was not something to get rid of on a whim. How much money did the Canadian government get to reduce the deficit or even the national debt? Nothing! We had to give!

This government is so irresponsible that it gives away its assets. But, if we sell off our assets, we will be left with only the liabilities, which would create serious difficulties. It is therefore important and urgent to change our accounting practices before this government rips off the whole nation and leaves us in dire straits since we would not have any assets. That is what it did with Air Canada and other companies it has already sold and what it will do with Petro-Canada in accordance with its ripping-off policy.

I hope my colleagues from all sides of the House will understand the urgency and call on this government to accept the Auditor General's report suggesting a change in accounting practices and an annual assessment of the replacement cost of all government capital assets as in any business. They should draw up a balance sheet and from there propose policies to reduce the deficit and especially to finance the debt and reduce it, because that takes a long-term plan, as in any business.

Mr. Speaker, when you buy a house, you take out a mortgage and have a plan to pay it off. At present, the Government of Canada has no plan and I think it is urgent. If the minister is serious about wanting to solve the debt problem, he should develop a plan right away.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested to hear members speak on the budget this afternoon. It is amazing to hear the difference in the speeches. Every opposition member has complained about budget cuts—how this budget cuts all the programs, complaining about budget cuts here and budget cuts there. I have to say to myself, as I heard the comedian Yakov Smirnoff say: "What a country!"

I was in my riding last week. The hon. member for Calgary West and I had public meetings. Everyone said: "You gotta cut more. Get the deficit down. You gotta cut". They all tell me that.

Mr. Keyes: Everybody in Calgary says that?

Mr. Richardson: They all tell me that.

The member for Hamilton West has to come out. I invite him to come to the Calgary Stampede and to talk to Canadians who know what it is like to balance a budget.

I also heard the members talking about interest rates and questioning the finance minister's forecast for interest rates in the current budget. It was noted that last year's forecast was not as accurate as in previous years. I do not think any finance minister in any country in the world could have forecast the unpredictable interest rates of the past year.

An Hon. Member: How did they get there?

Mr. Richardson: Well, all businesses and financial institutions forecast interest rates. That is how they predicate their business for the upcoming year.

When I heard criticism of the finance minister's forecast of an 11.1 per cent interest rate over the year, I questioned that as well. I asked the finance minister how he came to that interest rate forecast. I also went to the 20 leading financial institutions in the country. The banks, leading trust companies and brokerage firms also have to do interest rate and economic forecasts across the country. I asked for the average prediction of those 20 leading financial institutions of Canada for the interest rate for the upcoming year. The average prediction was for an interest rate in 1991 of 11 per cent.

If members turn to their budget documents they will see that the finance minister, in fact, has given a very conservative estimate of 11.1 per cent. He is actually giving a higher rate than is forecast by all those leading institutions in this country which make their money in this game.

The government was elected six years ago with one vital objective—to get control of our nation's finances. This objective has had priority over all others because it must. I just listened to my colleague in the finance committee who understands the problem of the deficit. We do not always agree on how we arrived at that deficit, the $200 billion legacy left to us by the previous government. Any other objective cannot be considered, advanced or planned without first having the dollars to do it.

The environment needs cleaning up. We all agree to that. It cannot be done without money. It takes more than political will.

Our poor and unemployed need the tools and education to make themselves self-sufficient and productive. That requires more than sympathetic rhetoric. It takes dollars.

Our health care system is one of the best in the world. It cannot be sustained forever without an increasing amount of money. We do not have that kind of money any more. We are in debt up to our eyeballs. With this budget, we are finally able to stand on our tiptoes, peer over the mountain of debt that has been created by previous administrations, and see the future as prosperous and self-reliant.

Every homemaker, business person and every Canadian knows that they can only spend what they earn or they will go into debt. Eventually, that debt has to be paid. Everyone who has been in debt knows that to pay it off requires some sacrifices. With consistent and concerted effort the interest and principal can be paid off and the slate wiped clean.

In 1984 when this government came to office, it was clear that our financial situation was such a mess that there could not be any quick cure. The national debt was $200 billion and the previous government in the previous year spent $16 billion more on government programs than it collected. I would like to tell you just what that means. We came into office in 1984. Not only did they have a $200 billion debt that they had been adding to for the past 10 years, they also had expenditures away up here, built in, indexed expenditures and revenue way down here. That is the legacy we were left with in 1984.

First of all, not only did we have to bring that revenue up and hold those expenditures before we could have a balanced budget, after the mess we were left by the Liberals, we had to get to that point before we could start to pay off the national debt.

An Hon. Member: At 20 per cent interest.

Mr. Richardson: Exactly. They are racking up these revenues.

An Hon. Member: Where have you been for six years?

Mr. Richardson: I will tell you where we have been for the past six years. The member asks where have we been. Where we have been is getting Canada out of the hole created. It is not a quick cure. It took until 1987 for Michael Wilson to bring forward a surplus in the operating account of this government. As this budget shows, we have a continued surplus again, $9 billion surplus this year. By 1995–96 we will be able to attack the principal on the national debt.

Within three years we turned that operating deficit around to a surplus. This year the government will collect $9 billion more in revenue than it spends on programs, that is a $25 billion turnaround, a remarkable achievement in such a short period of time.

Having an operating surplus does not yet get us out of the woods. We still have an accumulated debt of $350 billion, the result of 20 years of deficits, the original $200 billion left to us by the spend-crazy former government, plus the compound interest on that debt. Indeed, 80 per cent of the increase in the debt since 1984 is accounted for by interest charges alone. That explains why despite a growing operating surplus, we have a $30 billion deficit this year. It is all interest.

For anyone in debt there are three choices: increase earnings, cut spending or sell assets. The government has used all three of these methods to make the substantial progress we have made to date.

In the 1970s and early 1980s revenues to the federal treasury were declining because of arcane tax rules, exemptions and loopholes, ad hoc tax cuts, the endemic flaws in the manufacturers' sales tax and the direct and indirect impacts of the 1981–82 recession.

In November 1984 we introduced measures that have increased revenues to the same levels, on average, that were earned in the 1970s. These measures have helped bring down the national deficit from $38.3 billion in 1984–85 to $30.5 billion in the 1989–90 budget, nearly $8 billion. Relative to the size of the economy the deficit has declined to 4.7 per cent of the GNP in 1990, a drop of 45 per cent.

We have increased revenues, not by gouging taxpayers but by cleaning up the system. We have made it fairer and more reliable. Implementation of the goods and services tax is a crucial part of this process. Our tax reform policies have worked. There is not much more that needs to be done on that front. That is why there are no new taxes in this budget.

This budget concentrates on spending cuts and decreases in government spending. This is neither new nor surprising. Getting spending under control is an integral part of eliminating deficits and giving us the flexibility to attack the debt.

In every budget year we have been in office this government has reduced spending and kept its growth in check. That is why we now have an operating surplus. Seventy per cent of the deficit reduction was achieved by government spending restraint. Only 30 per cent was the result of revenue increases.

The growth of spending on all government programs and services since 1984 has been kept well below the growth of the economy and the rate of inflation. The money used to meet the cost of the government's operations has been cut from $17.4 billion in 1984 to $16.8 billion today, despite a larger workload. The public service has been reduced by 12,000 person years to the same size it was in 1973, despite a 20 per cent increase in Canada's population.

People have said to me: "Well, that's fine. You tell me you have cut the civil service since 1984 and reduced the civil service by 12,000 people, but haven't departments just replaced some of those people by contract positions?" No they have not. When we removed those person years from government departments, we also took the budget that paid for those people. If anybody wants to hire somebody on contract in their department today they have to find the money from some other source within their department funding.

With tight discipline and good management, program spending has dropped from 19.5 per cent of the economy in 1984 to 16 per cent this year. This is its lowest level in almost 20 years and equivalent to a $22 billion reduction in spending. Since 1984, government program spending has increased by only 3.6 per cent per year, significantly less than the 4.3 average rate of inflation. Controlling government spending has not been easy or painless.

Programs have been eliminated, including the Canadian Home Insulation Program, the Petroleum Incentives Program and the Cape Breton heavy water plants, among others.

Family allowances and transfers to the provinces had their growth restrained and measures to better target the transfer of money to individuals have been implemented. Payments to Crown corporations have been restrained. The government has sold or reduced its holdings in 18 Crown corporations and eight others have been dissolved. Other Crown corporations such as Canada Post were told to shape up. The post office has turned a $400 million annual deficit into a profit and is continuing to improve its service.

Defence and foreign aid budgets were reduced. Direct subsidies to businesses were scaled down. Make no mistake. This government has cut spending. Last December, the President of the Treasury Board announced further steps to eliminate waste, improve efficiency and save $1.4 billion over the next three years. This was done in part by imposing a freeze on federal government construction in Ottawa, travel restrictions for members of Parliament and public servants, and closures of parliamentary restaurants and some government agencies.

This budget continues that work with its two year expenditure control plan designed to save $2.8 billion in 1991 and $3.3 billion in 1991–92. Together with the President of the Treasury Board's cuts announced in December, these actions will save $19 billion by 1994–95.

The expenditure control program exempts transfers to persons. Pensions, family allowance and unemployment insurance payments will not be affected. There are no cuts to veterans pensions. Following the lead of the successful western diversification program, which is headquartered in Edmonton, the budget takes a more business–like approach to business by eliminating grants and making loan repayment measures more rigorous. This places the emphasis on investing in economic development and not giving handouts to the private sector.

Petro–Canada will be sold. The government will wind up a number of Crown corporations and agencies whose functions can be handled efficiently and effectively by the private sector.

Grants and contributions paid by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship and by National Health and Welfare are being cut. The plan also caps the growth of a number of programs to 5 per cent a year for the next two years. These include the Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces of B.C., Ontario and Alberta and represents about 1 per cent of the total provincial budgets in those provinces.

Federal support to provinces remains large and the total transfers will still increase to more than $36 billion in 1990–91. My province of Alberta is one of the fiscally stronger provinces that will be affected by the cap, but only if the province chooses to increase spending on social assistance by more than 5 per cent this year. If it does so, then it is no doubt better able to bear the extra cost than the federal government. I was pleased to hear from Premier Getty that the province of Alberta will be able to absorb those cuts with no increase in taxes.

Payments to the Alberta government under the Canada Assistance Plan will still go up from $2.3 billion in 1989–90 to $2.4 billion in 1990–91 and to $2.45 billion in 1991–92. On a per capita basis, Ottawa will still transfer back $972 for every Albertan in 1990–91 and $979 the following year. Obviously, there is an effect on Alberta as a result of this budget. We must bear in mind that this year 35 cents of every federal dollar goes to paying interest on the debt. The provinces, on average, pay only 12 cents of the revenues toward debt. Federal and provincial government efforts must be made to ensure each tax dollar is spent more carefully. The effects can be coped with as all Canadians adjust their expectations of what the federal government in the current circumstances can be expected to do.

This is a tough budget, but it had to be. Continued expenditure reductions while maintaining the level of revenue will bring us to a point in 1995 where our operating surplus will cover that year's interest on the debt. Then and only then will we be able to start paying down that massive debt which has impeded our flexibility and stifled our economic growth.

We have implemented measures in the past six years that have put us on the road to recovery but it is a long, long road and there are many pitfalls along the way. The measures to date, the spending restraints and the stabilization of revenue have worked and will continue to work if we do not lose our nerve.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a very peculiar situation as I am not sure whether I am in the same House as I was in Question Period. I heard cabinet minister after cabinet minister get up and deny that there were any cuts. They said there were no cuts, that there were only increases in expenditure.

An Hon. Member: Including the Prime Minister?

Mr. Karpoff: The Prime Minister also said that. I now have the hon. member congratulating himself and his Tory colleagues for the tremendous cuts in expenditure. Who are we to believe? More critical, who are Canadians to believe? The Prime Minister says one thing, you say something else, the Minister of Finance says something else and Canadians are left bewildered. The member passes off the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan. Alberta can absorb the increase in income assistance rates. What happens when the unemployment rate goes up another 2 per cent as predicted by the Minister of Finance and the demand increases for people on income assistance? What happens when the impact of the cuts in UIC take place where thousands and thousands of British Columbians in my home province have been disentitled to unemployment insurance and therefore have to go to income assistance? How is the province going to absorb that?

In the last five to ten years, the province of British Columbia has balanced its budget on the backs of the poor by cutting income assistance, not maintaining it, by actually cutting income assistance payments; by reducing their transfer payments to hospital boards, to post-secondary education facilities and to school districts. This is going to accelerate with this type of a budget.

The member says a wealthy province can absorb it. Maybe Alberta is in a position where there is an out migration of population. B.C. is in a position where there is an inward migration of population plus a settlement of immigrants coming to this country. Our population is going up and yet our revenues from the federal government are being capped.

I want the member to explain the discrepancy between what he says and what the Prime Minister says. Also, could he explain why he feels there will be no impact on services, particularly services that relate to income assistance, child care, post-secondary education and health, which are under tremendous stress in the province of British Columbia. The one thing I do agree with that the member said is the incompetence of the Liberals. It is true. Their fiscal incompetence is only surpassed by the Conservatives fiscal incompetence.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the member has taken the time to agree with me that the federal budget has taken a course of restraint. He objects to the cuts. Perhaps he would not be well received in my riding.

I was pleased also to hear the hon. member congratulate the government of British Columbia for another successful budget and for balancing its budgets over the past years. If we had similar restraints shown in provincial budgets across the country as we have in British Columbia or in Alberta, the economy would be in much better shape. I think particularly of the Government of Ontario which continued to raise their level of expenditures by over 10 per cent a year during a boom period, creating inflation and adding to the level of interest rates.

I commend the member for his acknowledgement and credit given the British Columbia government for maintaining a balanced budget, even in difficult times.

I should comment on his point with regard to what has been cut and what has not. People are no longer buying this garble of NDP members and others trying to mix numbers around. What we are saying is that the government has a serious debt problem, one that has been created in this country over a period of 20 years. We are resolving that problem. The record stands for itself. We are attacking the national debt. The only way to do it is to hold down that rate of increase of expenditures to cut the level of increase of expenditures as we have done while maintaining a stable level of revenue to attack the national debt. We have succeeded.

The Minister of Finance has done a remarkable job in holding down that level of expenditure while maintaining a level of revenues that, in the game plan laid out in his budget address, will allow us in the next three or four years not only to pay the interest on the national debt, but to begin to attack the principal on the national debt.

This is a remarkable achievement and a remarkable budget.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. friend, who sits on the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship with a number of us from both sides of the House, some questions related to that department.

I will quote from the budget. I am not making up this figure. The Tory budget has cut $23 million from this year's Secretary of State budget. This means it has cut essential programs for women, aboriginal programs—$90 million we heard today in Question Period—and, of course, the funding for multicultural programs, including advocacy groups and community programs. Last year they cut out the SILT program for language training which was essential for new immigrants to settle into Canada and cut 15 per cent per year for advocacy groups.

In addition to this, I assume the government still has plans to set up three new bureaucracies, a new multicultural department, a race relations foundation and a heritage language institute that would take a lot of money.

I would like to ask him, first, how he thinks cutting $23 million allows enough money for the minister to carry out the mandate of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act? In my view, it is just sheer tokenism. There is no way he can do it, much less set up a new department.

I would also like to ask him about the increasing intolerance, bigotry, and racism that have been documented in this country. Well over 50 per cent of Canadians say it is on the increase. How does he think this is going to be dealt with when the government is cutting back the very community front-line programs and advocacy groups that are there to deal with this? They are the only hope to get some real movement to improve inter-cultural and inter-racial programs and relations in Canada.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her thoughtful question. She is well aware that she and I perhaps share much of the same opinion on this issue, which is probably unusual because on many issues, particularly finance, we do not.

With regard to her question about the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship's policies on racial intolerance, the minister responsible has done a remarkable job in this area with the budget constraints he has had. I know the member would like more money going to advocacy groups across the country to put their particular cases. What the minister has done, and continues to do, is to influence groups already existing in society, police services and any number of government departments, and to bring racial tolerance into the mainstream of Canadian life. He has not relied simply on advocacy groups, although many of them have done an effective job. Across every department of government he has used his influence and the influence of his department to consider this as an over-all government concern, rather than limiting it to his own department. In doing so, within the budget restraints he has, he has done a remarkable job.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is with real anger that I rise today to participate in the budget debate for 1990. Both as a New Democrat spokesperson for the status of women and as the member of Parliament for New Westminster—Burnaby in British Columbia, I find that this budget is really deeply offensive.

This is the second year in a row that the Secretary of State's women's program has reeled under severe cuts by the government. This year women's centres and publications have been targeted for total funding cuts of 100 per cent. Every single last penny of core funding for these organizations that provide their communities with valuable information is gone. Women's centres funding has been cut to zero. That is the best example of the Tory commitment to the women of Canada. It is zero.

Women's organizations have been providing for next to nothing the types of information and services which will cost provincial governments millions of dollars to take on. Women's centres are often the first places that battered and sexually assaulted women turn to for help, information and direction. Women's centres show the women in their communities what resources are available to them. They operate largely with dedicated volunteers.

We have not achieved equality for women in our society. Women still make up the majority of the poor in Canada. In the world, women make up the majority of the poor. Women are still not safe in the streets or in their homes. There is so much more yet to be done to achieve true equality for women in our society. Women are challenging the traditional economic structures that have kept them in their place, in our place.

We are challenging the attitudes of the economics of violence. We are being silenced by a government which is, at best, ignorant and, at worst, hostile to our efforts. We are being muzzled.

By attacking women's and native communications' research, the government hopes to keep women and native people uninformed. This is a prime mechanism to silence these growing movements, the opposition to the Conservative attack on the poor, women and disadvantaged. The government is attempting to silence the voices of women and native people.

The Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women received a 20 per cent cut this year. It released an appropriate media statement entitled: "A woman in justice—but no justice for women". It said that the appointment of a woman Justice Minister cannot substitute for financial support for women's equality efforts. The government appoints women who will parrot its policies, despite their principles and, perhaps, despite their better judgment.

The government has spent more money funding strip clubs than women's groups. It has loaned $17 million to 38 strip joints. The total budget of the women's program last year was $11 million. The women's program funds hundreds of women's resources all over the country.

The Canada Assistance Plan which funds social assistance but also funds shelters for battered women was dealt a blow in this budget. The Tories slapped a spending limit on British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario CAP funds. Shelters for battered women today must turn away one of every two women who appear begging for a space. What is the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan going to mean for these women? Where will they go?

The Canada Assistance Plan is also how child care is funded in our country. In my home province of British Columbia, 280,000 children are in desperate need of child care right now. There are 20,000 licensed spaces. The Tories promised us a brand new child care program before the last election. Instead, it is cutting back on child care. These cuts really do make me angry because they go hand in hand with a $114 million budget increase for the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe. When the Berlin wall has crumbled, when the spirit of openness and co-operation exists now among eastern European people, the Canadian government is stepping up its military forces in Europe at the expense of women, at the expense of children, at the expense of native people and the poor of Canada.

The Tory government increased the budget for security intelligence, increased the budget for CSIS, by $33 million while taking $1.6 million from the women's program. This is in addition to last year's cuts to women's programming of $2 million. The government's priorities are truly disgusting.

This budget, according to the government's own projections, will lead to higher unemployment, to the tune of 100,000 jobs lost per year. This budget contributes to lower disposable income for Canadians. The government clearly does not care a bit about how its policies affect real people's lives, it deals with economic policy in the abstract. Women have to find jobs and they discover that these jobs are hard to find. They discover federal employment equity programs with no teeth to them at all. Women have to find child care and discover waiting lists of up to a year and sometimes longer for a subsidized space.

Women will have to start paying the GST on hygienic products, on children's clothing, on boots, on winter coats, on muffins, on hydro bills and on heat. Let the finance minister hand his "no new taxes" line to the women of Canada who will have to start paying the GST on almost every item and service that they buy.

How can employment equity work in a period of cut-backs when people are being fired, not hired? Employment equity is a program for the hiring and promotion of women and minorities. Because of seniority, those left with jobs after massive job losses are mostly white males. Hiring freezes guarantee that women and minorities will not be hired.

The 1990 budget stands alongside the 1989 budget in which the universality of family allowances and old age pensions was destroyed and where the unemployment insurance system was cut back almost beyond recognition.

The Tory agenda has not created prosperity but misery. The biggest lie ever told was that the Conservatives are good economic managers. We in Canada are now on the brink of a recession. This is where Tory economic policy has led us.

I would like to take a moment and talk about something of which my colleagues on the other side may be unaware. It is the notion of principles. I can see that the members on the other side are squirming and muttering. They may be saying, "Well, we have principles too", and to be fair, I suppose they do. They might, when in doubt, put the burden on working Canadians, put the burden on middle-income Canadians, or a tax loophole for the rich is a vote at the ballot box.

However, there are some ideas which might be a bit more radical for this government. I thought it might consider the principles of fairness and equity. I thought it might consider something honourable like the value of a promise. Evidently I was expecting too much and I will tell you why.

A couple of years ago, the government decided to award some frigate building contracts. As there are excellent and productive shipyards in British Columbia, these shipyards were hopeful that they would receive some of these contracts. These companies and their workers were not asking for a lot. They did not want all of the frigate contracts, they only wanted to be treated fairly by the federal government. Let us look at how the federal government dealt with the people of British Columbia and let us look at the notion of fairness.

Did the B.C. shipyards get half of the contracts? No. Did they get a quarter of the contracts? No. Did they even get one of the contracts, Mr. Speaker ? No, not one contract for British Columbia. For some reason, the logic of which truly escapes me, the Conservatives thought it would be fair to give each and every one of these frigate contracts to eastern shipyards. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you can appreciate that the people of British Columbia were very upset at this blatant example of favouritism. They were angered by the cavalier manner in which the federal government dismissed them. Canada is a far-flung country and it is hard to believe that Ottawa really cares about the regions of Canada when one can see such reckless decisions being made.

Keep in mind that this is not an administration that governs. This is an administration that reacts. Somehow, surprised at the furore that this snub created in my province, the Tories did what they always do. They scrambled about and they made yet another of their "sacred trust" promises. They said: "No, of course we did not forget about British Columbia. We will give your shipyards the Polar 8 contract". Now, just a short time later, we see those words were just so much hot air. The budget wiped out this promise to B.C. It cancelled the Polar 8 contract.

We see how much the finance minister cares about British Columbia. We see how the Tories govern. They make one promise to get elected and rescind that commitment when the whim suits them.

I would like to remind the government of one thing. It is not a whim to want to be employed. It is not whimsical to fight to keep your shipyard in your province viable. The finance minister may be talking about some abstract numbers in a ledger book, but what I am talking about is reality and real people who want jobs.

His government has failed the people of British Columbia. This government has said to my home province: "Your jobs are expendable". He has said to them: "My government is not a government that operates on fairness or on equity". It is a government which picks and chooses which promises are convenient to keep and which are to be discarded like old Tory election pamphlets.

Where are the voices of the 12 government members of Parliament from British Columbia? What about the four cabinet ministers who come from my province of British Columbia? What influence do they have with this government? It appears the answer is very clear. They have no influence as far as the people of British Columbia are concerned. The Tories have abandoned B.C.

The Tories have long toyed with the lives of all Canadians and this budget is just one more example of the Tory disregard. Under this budget, the finance minister has given the green light to forcing more and more Canadians into unemployment. He has approved plans which will see incomes falling in the next two years. These are not just idle threats thought up by naysayers. These are projections from their own budget documents. If more unemployed poor Canadians is his idea of prosperity, I really think that he should recheck the definition of the word.

The minister also froze the Canada Assistance Plan payments for British Columbia. Of course, this will hit the hardest on those who have the least. The poor in British Columbia are not less poor than the poor in other regions of this country. They hurt just as badly. They line up in the food banks. I have seen them. I have been there. I have seen the food banks in British Columbia simply and solely for women and children. As I said, this will hit hardest on those who have the least. People in any province who battle poverty need help in breaking out of the poverty cycle.

What the minister has done is to take the poor of British Columbia and to say that they are expendable. It is fundamentally and morally wrong to treat Canadians in this way. The lives of Canadian women and men are not numbers to be pushed over from one column of the ledger sheet to another. They are not statistics to fill up some glossy Department of Finance budget document.

Canadian women and men are people struggling to keep their jobs in the face of industries closing down and moving southward because of the Mulroney trade deal. They are individuals struggling with the burden of 32 tax increases since this government came into power and since we have had this finance minister. They are senior citizens who are struggling to make ends meet, who watch the government hack away at their old age security programs. They are single parents living below the poverty line who will now have to pay another 7 per cent on their children's clothing, on their children's boots and coats. They are workers in a shipyard in British Columbia grappling with the question: did the Conservatives knee-cap their industry out of sheer ignorance? Or was this a deliberate attempt to kill off this valuable industry in British Columbia?

I have also thought about that question and I cannot really decide what is going through the minds of those on the other side of the House. I do know one thing. I know that we cannot afford to have our jobs taken away. I know that we cannot afford this GST, this regressive form of taxation which will fall on the backs of middle-income Canadians and poor Canadians. Poor and middle-income Canadians will pay the same amount of tax on a pair of shoes that the millionaire on Bay Street will pay. I know that we cannot afford that. We cannot afford the high interest rates that this government has brought us nor the high unemployment rates.

As a matter of fact, Canadians can no longer afford to be governed by the Tories.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in face of the growing national debt, I would like to ask the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, does she believe that any cuts in any government program ought to be undertaken?

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, there are countless tax write-offs that are available to large corporations under this tax reform that the government has talked about for a number of years. They have just introduced legislation that will make it more attractive for rich Canadians to salt money away into an RRSP, where lower-income people do not have this advantage. There are a number of areas, if the government was really serious about cutting back on expenditures. The increases to the military budget are one avenue that the government certainly could have looked at with a fresh eye.

What this government has chosen to do is target the women and the native peoples of Canada. It has chosen to attack any environmental programs that may have had some significance. It has chosen to try to silence the voices of the women of Canada. It has chosen to try to silence the voices of the native people. That is a deliberate strategy, because the women and the native people in this country have been fighting back against this government's arrogance, torture and lack of consideration for women and the disadvantaged in our society. It is a deliberate strategy because it does not want to hear from these yappy women any more who have been telling it that they do not want these Tory programs, they do not want to have the big heavy foot of the Tory government on their necks any longer.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, it will not go unnoticed that the hon. member decided not to answer the question. What she would like to put before the House is a list of little fox chases that might distract some people. She mentioned that there could be more cuts to national defence. She herself would know that national defence is not an agency simply to be prepared for a hot war. We must also be there to protect our country against international polluters, to protect our ocean resources, to protect against drugs coming into this country, to protect against terrorism. If the NDP had their way and did away with the Department of National Defence, the country would be vulnerable to all those international attacks.

The member gave the specific example of shoes, saying that the rich and the poor would pay the same tax. Since today there is a 13.5 per cent tax on the manufacture of leather products, does she not believe that it might be somewhat more purposeful for those in lower income families, who will be better off after the GST is in place, to pay only 7 per cent rather than 13.5 per cent, or has she some mysterious view that 13.5 per cent is smaller that 7 per cent?

Ms. Black: It is interesting that the member on the other side would raise that question. There is absolutely nothing that indicates that prices will come down when the MST comes off. There is nothing to ensure that prices will drop by 13.5 per cent. I will be very surprised if right across the board prices come down by 13.5 per cent and go up by 7 per cent.

When we talk about the people who will be paying taxes on their shoes, we are talking again about a regressive form of taxation that puts the burden on the middle income earners disproportionately. This is not fair taxation. This is regressive taxation. Canadians recognize it for what it is and they are fed up with it.

An Hon. Member: What is your alternative?

Ms. Black: Our alternative has been tabled in the House. It makes a lot of sense. Why do you not take the time to read it? You might learn something.

The member asks me about the Canadian military, and stated that the Canadian military was necessary to fight pollution, to protect our fisheries, and for a number of other things that I do not even recall.

We had a major oil spill in December of 1988, in my province, right after I was elected. I toured the devastation on the east coast of Vancouver Island in a helicopter. It was horrific. There was no military there. Members of my party called for the military to come in and help with the clean-up. I also recall that there was no military helping with the tire fire two weeks ago in Hagersville, Ontario.

There was absolutely no sense to the member's question. He knows what this government is doing. He knows that once again the Tories are putting the burden on the backs of middle income people, women and children.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have two more questioners. The hon. member for Dauphin—Swan River, and the hon. member for Surrey North. I will recognize the hon. member for Dauphin—Swan River.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I have been here five and a half years now and I keep hearing over and over again from NDP members about average Canadians. Every time I hear a speech from one of them, I receive confirmation that they have no idea what it is like out there in the real world.

There were some very tough decisions made in the 1990 budget. There were choices that had to be made. What is right is not always popular. This government could be the most popular party this country has ever seen if we opened up the cheque book and wrote a cheque to everybody who demanded money. But that would not be the responsible thing to do.

I think it is a very sad commentary on the NDP policy that to solve every problem, you throw money or write a cheque. That is their solution.

During her speech, the member for New Westminster—Burnaby mentioned principles. I do not question her principles. I do not question the principles of any member of this House, and I do not like having my principles questioned because I am a member of the government. Let me tell the member the basis of my principles.

I have three teenage children at home who will soon be in the workforce. They are going to wonder in the years that I was in the House why I did not support policies that got government spending under control so that my children and my grandchildren are not paying for a debt that I incurred while I was a member of the House of Commons. I will repeat the question that my colleague asked. If we are going to control spending, where do you do it?

We had an NDP government in Manitoba for eight years that never cut back spending anywhere, but increased taxes, the highest we have ever seen in the province of Manitoba. So we have seen how the NDP can talk about policies and theories. We have seen them in action in Manitoba. It does not work.

Ms. Black: The member opposite said that they had tough choices. I agree that they had tough choices. But I have to really question how they came to their answers. He talks about cuts that they had to make. There also were increases in this budget. There was an increase to CSIS in the amount of $33 million. There was a $14 million advertising budget for the GST, a tax that no one in this country wants. It has been made very clear that people see this tax as an unfair tax.

• (1820)

The cuts to women's programming were $1.6 million. When you look at the increases to CSIS, the security system for Canada, and the massive budget to advertise this regressive taxation, the GST, $1.6 million looks like peanuts in comparison to these increases.

Therefore, the choices that were made, the cuts that were made, were very deliberate. Again, they are cuts to silence the voices of women. They are cuts to silence the voices of native people. They are cuts to silence the voices of the disadvantaged. I have got news for this government. If it thinks that is going to work, it is wrong. The women of this country are angry. They are very angry, and the voices will not be silenced.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): The member mentioned the fact that the 19 previous Tory members became known in the last Parliament as "the silent 19". Now they have become known as "the invisible 12". They are nowhere. They are not here to defend the rights of British Columbians when it comes to the GST, to defend the rights of British Columbians when it comes to free trade, to the UIC cuts, to VIA cuts, and now to the budget.

The Tories keep talking about what we would do to make sure there was a balanced budget. I would like your comments on just one piece of legislation that was introduced recently. The tax give-away to the wealthy was increased under RRSPs by another $400 million a year for people earning over $86,000 a year. What they are doing is giving their rich friends more tax concessions. Next year RRSP contributions alone will cost this country over $11 billion. Who benefits from it? It is people earning over $50,000 a year.

Members opposite can talk all they want. They can mutter and moan. The reality is, if you wanted to balance this budget, there are a lot of ways. Stop your tax concessions to your wealthy friends. Stop the tax concessions to the large corporations and quit attacking the poor. Quit attacking women.

I would like your comments on that one program alone. Would you, if you were a government person, stand up and say: "We are going to cut women's programs." At the same time, give a tax concession to those earning over $86,000 a year, which will cost an additional $400 million a year?

Ms. Black: My colleague from Surrey makes a very good point. It is honestly very difficult to understand the workings of the minds on the other side of the House. At the same time as they are saying women must receive these drastic cut-backs in their budgets and that native people must lose their funding and will no longer receive funding for newspapers and communications, they are increasing the tax deductions for the wealthy of this country. It makes no sense. It is not fair.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this budget debate.

This debate is about choices. It is about resolve and commitment. It is about having the presence of mind to take a hard look at the harsh realities we face. The choice is there before us to meet our responsibilities head on, or to look the other way. For too long we have seen governments follow a policy of looking the other way. This was not a viable alternative in the past and it is definitely not a viable alternative now. The test is here. It is before us and we have got to face it with resolve and commitment. We have to dig down deep within ourselves and muster up all of our resources to address the formidable and dangerous monster that menaces our every move. That monster is the national debt.

Every day that the debt goes unchallenged is a day that the debt grows stronger and we, as a nation, grow weaker. It is an undeniable fact that the fight with the debt is a zero sum game. For too long it was allowed free rein. It grew into a powerful force with which to be reckoned. We all know that the reasons for the debt's growth was the adherence to unsound financial policies that had charted a course of destruction.

In 1984, Canadians made the choice to fight that monster of a debt. They wisely chose the Conservative team. Under the leadership of the Prime Minister, Canadians have seen a government forge a battle plan that shines with vision and great foresight. This is the sixth budget that we have seen under this government. It is similar to the other budgets in that it is consistent with the government's comprehensive plan for economic renewal. This budget illustrates yet again that this government, this Prime Minister and this finance minister are committed to matching words with action. This government has shown its ability to meet a situation head on, assess the problem, consider the options and choose the correct plan to follow.

In 1984, the government did just that. We saw the mess that the country was in. We saw the danger that lay waiting for us. If we did not change our route, Canada was headed for big trouble. It has not been easy, but through adept planning, the Minister of Finance has been able to put a stop to the great impetus that drove the debt. The trend toward deficit spending was reversed. The position of the government was changed from that of weakness to that of strength. It surely has not been easy.

As mentioned by the finance minister, when we came to government in 1984, we had to fight two deficits. The operating deficit in 1984 was $16 billion. There was $16 billion between the cost of the programs and the revenues collected. Making matter worse was the second deficit, more than $20 billion needed to be borrowed annually, simply to service the accumulated debt. So what we had was a total deficit of $38 billion. It was not a pretty sight.

The propensity was for this deficit to continue growing and something had to be done to turn the tide. The Minister of Finance assessed this situation, drafted a comprehensive plan for economic renewal and charted a course for Canada's future. The plan comprised attempts to turn the operating deficit into a surplus. The tide has been turned. We have gone from an operating deficit of $16 billion in 1984, to an operating surplus of $9 billion today. That is a significant turnaround of $25 billion in five years. That is one deficit down an one to go.

While we are wrestling with the operating deficit, the service charges on the debt are compounded steadily. Today we have a debt load of some $350 billion. Eighty per cent of that growth since 1984 or $120 billion of it has come from the accumulated interest on the debt that was already there when we came to office. That means that this year alone, payments will run to $40 billion. Quite rightly, people say, "Who cares as to whose it was, it is yours now". That is precisely what we are saying and that is what is in this budget.

This is a serious problem. It calls for a serious answer and I can tell you that this budget is just the answer needed. This budget proposes to continue the increase in operating surplus to reach $31 billion by 1994–95. This budget proposes to decrease the budgetary deficit to $10 billion by 1994–95. This is in light of an increase in budgetary expenditures of $22.1 billion to $165 billion in 1994–95. What this means is that the Minister of Finance is well aware of the various commitments that have to be met.

It seems that time and time again critics lose sight of the need to deal with the deficit and the debt problem. If not stopped now the debt will continue to grow and the ability of this government to address the needs of Canadians will be diminished considerably.

The members opposite all say: "Don't cut spending". Yet the people at home tell me that we did not cut enough. With the debt out of the way it will be possible for the government to begin providing Canadians with the real choices that they want so badly.

Critics of this budget cry foul. They say that the minister and this government have betrayed Canadians. They say that sacred trusts have been broken. This is not true. The government has continued in its policy of restraint and good management. When critics talk about the expenditure control laid down in this budget they obviously miss the point. They are blinded by their bias. Because they are so used to spend, spend, spend when it comes to federal budgets, they are simply not able to consider the principle of control when it comes to expenditure.

It is not that difficult to grasp. When dealing with debt you must consider that you cannot go on spending in a haphazard way. Expenditure control means just that—control. The government is not cutting willy-nilly. It is controlling what it does spend. Some programs have been constrained to a 5 per cent annual growth. That means in the case of the Canada assistance programs they can only grow by 5 per cent although the entire federal government spending has been held at less than 4 per cent. In fact this year's federal spending will rise by only 3 per cent.

It seems to me that this is not an unreasonable limit to suggest. It is definitely not a cut by any means. Some programs have been frozen for the next two years. In the case of the established programs funding this puts the onus on the provinces to employ better management when they are distributing the money that they now receive. They will still receive increments in case of population growth.

Some programs have been reduced. Areas such as Secretary of State, multiculturalism and citizenship have been affected. Critics cry that this government lacks commitment. This government is creating a department of multiculturalism and citizenship. This does not sound like a lack of commitment to me.

Some programs and projects have been eliminated. The Canadian Exploration Incentives Program has been eliminated. The Polar 8 icebreaker has been cancelled, and the support to the Other Six Leases Operation, or OSLO, as been cancelled. In light of the changing circumstances that are taking place in the world the completion of these projects would not produce the results that they were intended to produce. As such, it is simply not prudent to continue at this time. As beautiful and as labour intensive as buggy making might be, it is not prudent in light of technological changes to continue production in competition with motorized vehicles.

Significantly, we are proposing to privatize Petro-Canada. For years we have heard calls for privatization. Many of these calls have come from the chairman himself. I say if Mr. Hopper, the man who runs the company, does not know if the company should be privatized, then I would submit that no one knows. But members of the opposition say: "Man, it is terrible. You should not do this". What we have here is a company that will be allowed to borrow money on the open market instead of coming to the government and asking for funds from the taxpayer. What is so wrong with that?

We see before us a prudent budget. The changes are prudent and realistic. There is nothing untoward in this budget unless, I dare say, it does not go far enough. That is what the people at home are telling me, it does not go far enough. Yet I listened to my hon. friend from British Columbia ridiculing the fact that we are cutting some of the expenditures. The people I have listened to in British Columbia are saying: "You did not cut enough".

The members also cry foul and say that this budget goes too far. They say that this is what the majority of average Canadians believe. I would submit to you that the opposition is wrong, Mr. Speaker. The average Canadian is smarter than that. We know from the explanation of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech that to implement cuts instead of restraint would result in a definite negative impact on the Canadian economy. To impose rash cuts would not be prudent, at this time or at any time. That is why it will take us well into the mid-1990s just to address the deficit problem. We will not be able to tackle the debt until after the deficit is out of the way.

We know that it will be a long and drawn out process. In fact, the members also say, "You have had six years, why have you not erased it already?" It cannot be done overnight.

We know that we must work within a realistic framework. Yet what I hear from the critics is that this government is out of touch with reality. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, who is out of touch with reality when they harp at the government to continue to spend more money, when there is not the money coming in?

It is those folks opposite who are out of touch with reality. These are the same critics who talk about the need for more spending without thinking about from where the money will come. They want action but they do not consider the consequences, and they say they represent the majority of Canadians.

In my most recent householder I provided my constituents with the opportunity to tell me what they thought about government spending on the debt problem. I provided them with an abbreviated balance sheet of the public accounts and asked them to consider what was being done and what they thought might be reasonable areas of change. This was a difficult exercise because I had to condense the public accounts into one source. A great deal of information was left out but, nonetheless, a message came through loud and clear.

That message was: Cut back government spending. My constituents were not asking us to spend more, they were asking us to spend less. The perception was that spending in many areas was too high. The prescription was not tax increases but a reduction in spending.

This seems to bring two problems out into the open. The first problem is that perhaps many people do not understand what is involved in government spending. The second problem is that a significant portion of the people that I hear from usually want me to cut the other guy but not them.

The first problem seems to be one of communication and that can be easily rectified. The second problem seems to be one of attitude. Unfortunately, attitude is not so easily changed. Canadians have been conditioned to expect the government to be there for them from the cradle to the grave. They seem to think that the government can somehow access an unlimited amount of money to help them.

What can we do? We have avoided the calls for across-the-board cutbacks of 5, 10, 15 or 20 per cent. We have opted for restraint in most cases. In this our sixth budget we have continued in what is proving to be a successful approach to fiscal responsibility. It is a slow, painstaking process but it is sure and it does not cause undue damage to anyone. We are dealing with the government's finances in a reasonable way.

I say to my constituents of Fraser Valley East, to all Canadians and to this House that it would not be prudent to make across-the-board cuts of from 5 to 10 per cent, as attractive as that might have seemed. This is just as true when it comes to spending. It would not be prudent to continue spending in a reckless manner. A balance must be achieved.

That balance is what has been presented to us in this budget. The minister has felt the pressure from both sides. Programs and commitments must be continued. The minister and the government feel the pressure from those who call for cuts. Spending must be restrained. The minister and this government feel the pressure from those who would have more spending, yet the minister and this government persevere.

There is a way to achieve the balance needed to meet commitments and to deal with spending in a reasonable manner. This Minister of Finance and this government are committed to ensuring that we follow the best route for Canada. We have seen that commitment in the past five budgets and we see it again in this budget. We see a serious response to a serious problem. The government must be disciplined and compassionate at the same time. We are dealing with a national debt here. It is not simply a federal debt. That is why the government has asked the provinces to share in their responsibility. Again we hear the critics cry foul.

It is not unreasonable to ask the provinces to hold the line on the Established Program Funding for two years. I say it is not unreasonable to continue to limit to 5 per cent the growth in the Canada Assistance Plan. It is not unreasonable to cancel certain projects and make management decisions that include privatization. No, this is reasonable beyond a shadow of any doubt. We are committed to certain programs and that commitment stands, but we are also dealing with a serious debt problem that must be dealt with lest our ability to meet our commitments diminishes entirely.

Yet we have amendments made to condemn this government. It is preposterous. There are no tax increases in the budget, yet we are to be condemned for imposing increased tax burdens on Canadians in this budget. This hits of course at the GST which replaces an archaic and a counterproductive federal sales tax system in place today.

We have imposed limits and management has been tightened. We are condemned for abandoning health care, post-secondary education, veterans and regional development. We refuse to interfere with the Bank of Canada's interest rate policy and we are condemned.

We are acting prudently, and we are to be condemned. It is amazing. Instead of giving money away as if it grows on trees, we are providing repayable contributions, a system that has proven to be very successful in the Department of Western Diversification. Members also say we are abandoning our commitments to regional development.

It seems that the only ones abandoning anything are the members opposite. They are abandoning their senses.

I cannot forget that the New Democrats want to condemn us for failing to protect the environment. I tell them to wait until the Minister of the Environment brings forward his policy paper later this year. Then let us talk about failure.

An Hon. Member: We waited months and months. He was going to bring it forward in April.

Mr. Belsher: That is fine. It is a long document and it will take time to prepare it.

They say that we are failing to protect the family farm. The Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture is spearheading a comprehensive policy review of the whole agrifood industry that will put the family farm on stable and fertile soil. That does not sound like failure to me.

This government has reformed the income tax system. We are providing more actual cash-in-hand to low income Canadians than ever before, yet we are accused of abandoning those who need assistance with child care.

We are helping Canadians, not hindering them. These are successes, not failures. The sky is blue, it is not red. Water is wet, it is not dry. The truth is the truth, despite what members opposite would have Canadians believe.

This government has provided leadership on all fronts. We have worked hard to achieve prosperity for all Canadians. We have been constructive when the policies of the opposition have been destructive. We have acted responsibly with commitment and consistency.

This budget builds on our previous successes and sets the stage for future growth. I believe that time will prove yet again that this government has acted as it always has, in the correct and prudent manner that Canadians have come to respect. I would have it no other way.

I for one would be glad to vote in favour of this budget. I would encourage members opposite to vote for this budget if they really care about our country and what the national debt is doing to it.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. government member opposite said, and I quote: "The members opposite say we should not cut spending". What drivel. What nonsense. Let us get the facts straight.

Here is another fact for the hon. member. For example, if we want to talk about cutting spending, let us talk about the federal Department of Public Works which directed the purchase of a facility for a Customs and Excise training facility even though Customs and Excise said that the facility in question did not suit its purposes. The facility located in the newly-appointed Solicitor General's riding was purchased for $5 million. As the Auditor General stated in his recent annual report to Parliament: "In our opinion, the initial contracts did not provide for a realistic evaluation before the decision to proceed. When the construction began in 1986, it was to meet needs established in 1976 and not re-examined at all since then".

Although the consultant's report stated that the property would be adequate and some renovations required, the cost of the renovations has so far been $35 million—on a building that cost $5 million.

The Auditor General also states that there are many loopholes existing in the income tax system which the government could close. These are loopholes amounting to $350 million. Can you believe it? So for a government that preaches this new-found fiscal responsibility, six years of this fiscal responsibility, when all we see are problems we now see these measures. Would it not be easier to have a look at these needless expenses rather than replacing a bad tax with a regressive bad tax? Has the hon. member had a close look at the Auditor General's report? Has he examined government waste, how government money is being spent needlessly, as in this case, on a $5 million building, $35 million in renovations? Has he had a look at all those situations—

Mr. Richardson: What about the $200 billion?

Mr. Keyes: We have already heard all the arguments from this hon. member over here screaming, "$200 billion, $200 billion". Let's get realistic. Six years have gone by and all we get is a doubling of the debt. It makes no sense. So here is a suggestion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member has to put his question. Put your question, please.

Mr. Keyes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, it is a sensible question. We all know where the debt is.

Mr. Richardson: Ask the question.

Mr. Keyes: The Speaker has asked me to ask the question. The hon. member to my right is getting all excited and all in a tizzy. The question is a legitimate one. Has the member looked at the Auditor General's report about all the waste, loopholes and problems in an attempt to roll that into a fiscal plan to try to reduce that debt and deficit? Has the hon. member done that?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing up the Auditor General's report. If he were to go back and read some of the reports himself he would see that the Auditor General has been complimentary of this government and the way it has followed his recommendations. That is in the 1987 report.

The gentleman also brought up a point about a specific expenditure. Yes, there will still be problems. I readily agree that there will be problems and there will continue to be problems to be identified. It is an ongoing thing. However, what the Auditor General has recommended in his report does not deal with dollars in such a way that would get a handle on the national debt and the amount of money it is costing to service the debt.

The fact is that when we came into office in 1984 the structure was in place for spending $16 billion more than was coming in. That is what was inherited. We have had to turn that around. As I said earlier, we have been able to make a $25 billion turnaround. Now $9 billion more is coming in than is going out in programs. It is still not enough. So we are saying no more raising of taxes, let us go at the expenditure side but all we hear is "foul, foul, foul" from the other side.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the speech of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East this afternoon. I thought he was trying to tell us a great deal. He mentioned in the last part of his speech that the government had a very comprehensive farm policy. I was surprised to hear that because I read in The Globe and Mail this morning that the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Grant Devine, cannot even keep his own farm. Mr. Devine says in an interview with Geoffrey York of The Globe and Mail Regina service:

> My farm, like everybody else's, is in trouble. Everybody's working as hard as they can to keep it all together.

The article goes on:

> Mr. Devine refuses to give details of the financial troubles on his farm, but he acknowledges that his family is finding it difficult to make payments—

The member says the government has a great farm policy. The Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister have always responded to demands from Mr. Devine. For instance, in October of 1986 the government responded with $1 billion. When the Premier was in financial difficulty he phoned the now Governor General, the then Minister of Justice, to demand $1 billion in the face of that situation.

• (1850)

Here we are four years later and, according to The Globe and Mail report, the premier is facing the loss of his farm. He put out a press release demanding that the government provide $1 billion to Saskatchewan alone, even though there is a problem in Manitoba, Alberta and in areas of southwestern Ontario.

I wonder why this budget has a comprehensive farm aspect to it, according to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. I looked through it. I could not find anything except that the transfer payments to most provinces were being cut. However, according to the member this is a comprehensive program. If there is a comprehensive program for agriculture, where is it in this budget so that we can save the farm of the premier of Saskatchewan from being lost?

I hope that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East can explain this. He says that it is in the budget, that it is a comprehensive program. We want to know. I know that neither the Deputy Prime Minister nor the Prime Minister want to see the premier of the province lose his farm.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to know that the member opposite is so concerned about the farm of the premier of Saskatchewan.

I guess what the member opposite has failed to realize is that there have been several years of drought in Saskatchewan. In fact there have been six or seven years of drought in Saskatchewan. Consequently, there certainly is a cash flow problem in the family farm.

Thinking back to what I said in my speech, I said that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture was spearheading a comprehensive policy review of the whole agrifood industry that will put the family farm on stable and fertile soil. I did not say in my speech that this budget was addressing the family farm or agriculture alone. I said that these were some of the things that this government was doing. That is what this is about.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to get this opportunity to ask a question of the hon. member.

My colleague talks about no new taxes. What is the goods and services tax going to be called when it is implemented in 1991, unless you intend not to implement it? What about the partial indexing and the deindexing? Is that in fact not going to require new money?

If the member disagrees with me with respect to the following, check with the premiers please. Will the reductions in transfer payments not in fact require additional new taxes of provinces, municipalities or individuals? Will it, or will it not?

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, this budget does not have any new taxes in it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Belsher: These people opposite obviously were not listening or did not read the budget that the minister gave in this House.

The GST bill that is now in committee has different lines of revenue in it. That is a replacement tax which will come in next January. Yes, the EPF funding is capped at this year's level for the next two years. It can grow if there are population shifts, but it is capped.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. I believe that there is unanimous consent to call it seven o'clock and go into the "late show".

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on November 20, I put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture to draw to his attention that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool had called on the Prime Minister to provide funding to the extent of some $500 million to support the western grain industry. That figure reflected a resolution passed by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. Similar demands have been made by farm groups in Manitoba, where there was a very severe drought in the southeastern part of the province, and by groups in Alberta where there was a drought, as well as by groups in southern Ontario where there was a drought this past year.

That resolution went on as well to demand that the government not unilaterally cut government programs. That is what has been going on this past year. Some $500 million in government programs have been cut. Everything from the Canadian Dairy Commission, to the rebate for farm fuel, to support for advance payments, to western programs for crop insurance and eastern programs for crop insurance have all been cut in this past year.

The situation has been exacerbated as well by the United States Export Enhancement Program. That enhancement program was supposed to guarantee that the United States or Canada would not use export enhancement programs without due consultation and consideration of each other under the free trade deal. Yet it goes on and on and on. We see sales of wheat being made to Russia, China, Algeria and other traditional customers of Canada. With gay abandon the United States is not only stealing away those markets from Canadian wheat producers but is driving down the world price of grain.

We see a demand by the premier of Saskatchewan who, as I said earlier in debate today, is facing the loss of his own family farm, according to a press report this morning in The Globe and Mail. He is demanding additional funding to compensate farmers not only for the drought but for the very low commodity prices in farm grains as well as the overriding debt problems. These are debt problems which have also been noted in a recent press release dated February 26 by the Ontario Corn Producers which points out: "Ontario farmers' financial turmoil deepens".

The press release goes on to outline the fact that farm debt review boards are facing larger numbers of farmers under financial stress and that the price of corn and soybeans this fall will not meet cash flow because the commodity price is below the cost of production.

We have a triple whammy here with drought in many areas of the west and some areas of the east, serious farm debt problems and the problem of very low commodity prices. We are now within two or two and a half months of the planting season and we should not have to wait around for months for the government to make a decision on this.

Every time we raise this matter with the Deputy Prime Minister and with the Prime Minister we are told that they are gathering data, that they are consulting, that they have committees working and that they are considering the matter. In fact, the budget itself has a crippling impact on this because massive amounts of money—several hundreds of millions of dollars—have been taken away in transfer payments to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. If the government proposes a cost-shared program with the provinces then it will have that much less financial capacity to carry out a special program of assistance for farmers.

Of course they have taken away the advance payments, so $4 million or $5 million of cash flow was not available this past winter interest-free. It was available at 12.75 per cent interest but not available interest-free as it has been in the past.

The government must stop pussy-footing around and respond to the demands of groups like Ontario Corn Producers, soybean producers, the three prairie pools, and the Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta governments, all of which see a desperate need for an injection of cash into the western grain economy. A crisis has been brought on by these three elements of extended debt, low commodity prices, and the export enhancement program in the United States driving down the world price of grains and wheat while at the same time taking away Canadian markets.

We have a very serious problem facing agriculture in this country. There are a number of additional concerns such as marketing boards and so on, but just dealing with the western and eastern grain industry it is time to act now if the government really wants to see a crop seeded this year. Moisture levels are very low because of lack of moisture in the fall and this winter. Still, without that cash injection into the economy of Canadian agriculture, there will extreme difficulty in planting crops this coming spring. Within two or two and half months of that season, surely that is enough lead time for the government to realize that it is essential to make a commitment now.

I know that the parliamentary secretary is in the House tonight. I know he is committed to agriculture. I know that he will want to announce it unilaterally. He will not want to leave it to the Prime Minister or to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture. He will want to announce it himself here tonight.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do hate to disappoint the hon. member, but I am always very happy to defend the government's record on agricultural trade and support for our farmers in this great country.

The hon. member is partly right when he says that the trade war between the U.S. and the EEC is continuing. We are still pressing the United States to stop using its export enhancement program and the EEC to restrain its use of export restitutions or subsidies. With world prices up there is no need for the export enhancement program so we are urging them both to stop using the programs.

It is also true that the trade war is not nearly as intense as it was a couple of years ago. The U.S. has eased off on export subsidies from a high of $74 a tonne in 1986 to a level of about $12 to $20 a tonne today. At the same time the EEC has reduced its export restitutions from $185 a tonne to about $80. In terms of net levels of subsidies there has also been progress.

Australia, for example, has reduced its subsidies by about 33 per cent, the U.S. by 31 per cent, Canada by 27 per cent, the EEC by 24 per cent, and Japan by 4 per cent. There has been some progress notwithstanding the fact that it is not happening as quickly as we would like it to happen.

The Special Canadian Grains Program was put in place in 1986 and 1987 to compensate producers for low world prices caused by the trade war. Since then the world situation has changed. Stocks are low, subsidies are down, and prices have increased to levels well above the levels at the height of the trade war.

Canadian Wheat Board final payments have increased from $134 per tonne in 1987–88 to $197 per tonne last year. This is a 50 per cent increase in price from one year to the next. The initial payment for spring wheat for 1989–90 has been increased from $155 per tonne in April to $165 per tonne today. The ability to make an interim payment and final payment worth about $295 million to Saskatchewan farmers is an indication of the higher average prices for wheat the Canadian Wheat Board was able to obtain on sales in 1988–89.

Therefore justification for an ad hoc payment to producers for 1989 cannot be made on the basis of low prices caused by the trade war. As for 1990, it is still too early to tell precisely what the prices will be. However, given the low world stocks, prices are expected to remain reasonably strong.

During the 1986–87 crop year the world price of wheat had fallen to a low of about $130 a tonne as a result of the trade war between the United States and the EEC. For the 1989–90 crop year world prices had recovered to about $200 a tonne.

Low world stocks and higher prices have lessened the impact of the trade war. Both the volume of exports assisted with the export subsidies and the size of export subsidies have declined since 1988.

For example, total sales under the export enhancement program have declined from a high of 22.7 million tonnes or 64 per cent of total U.S. wheat exports in 1987–88 to 20.4 million tonnes in 1988–89 or 53 per cent of total U.S. wheat exports. For the first seven months of this crop year, export enhancement sales have totalled just over 5.8 million tonnes.

Nevertheless, despite the easing of the trade war, we recognize that these underlying causes are still present. That is why we are continuing to work through the GATT multilateral trade negotiations to resolve these trade problems.

Along with other members—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. parliamentary secretary's time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

TIEM CANADA

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am here tonight because I want answers to important questions which I raised some time ago. There are no partisan politics involved whatsoever.

TIEM Canada was set up to assist small and medium sized businesses, initially to start up new businesses and later also took on the role to expand certain operations or businesses.

The questions that are of most importance obviously are those that involve public funds. Where is the roughly $12 million in interest-free start-up loans? Is it being paid back because this particular company was shut down? What about the CEIC funds for jobs created, supposedly close to $6 million? Is this being recouped? Third, what was the Federal Development Bank involvement in this operation? Were any funds lost?

Those are the basic questions and the most important ones. I want to refer to my question as it appeared in Hansard of December 15, 1989, at page 6991. It reads as follows:

> TIEM Canada was a national company located in five cities including Winnipeg. TIEM was designed to assist small and medium sized businesses. It received huge amounts of public funds. In May this year it closed its doors.
> Why did the ministers involved in providing huge amounts of public funds refuse to renew its contracts?
> Why didn't those departments, including the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and the Federal Business Development Bank, renew these contracts and why won't they give us the report on this company's performance?

The minister indicated at the time that he did not have the file with him and would get back to me later. I accepted that. By the way, part of the evaluation has been provided.

I wrote as a follow-up to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on January 4, and I also wrote to the minister responsible for the Federal Development Bank on that same day. Here are the questions that I raised at the time:

> Why did the government decide not to renew its contracts with TIEM?
> How much was provided, in contracts or otherwise, by your department to TIEM?

Will you make public any evaluations of the viability of this investment which were made prior to funds having been provided?

What, if any, communication occurred between the Federal Business Development Bank and the Department of Employment and Immigration with respect to the closing of TIEM?

Will you make public the performance evaluation which your department produced before cancelling its contracts with TIEM?

I did receive a reply from the Minister of Employment and Immigration on February 6, promising a lengthier response. It was really a letter of acknowledgement. I did receive a letter of reply from the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank on January 19, 1990, which redirected my correspondence to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

I point this out because I was surprised that the minister would retain the question in the House of Commons, yet receive my letter and then redirect it.

I received a reply from the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism on January 24. Basically it describes what the operation is; something that I knew. It indicates that this had been attempted in a number of other countries, for example the U.S. and the U.K., and people wanted to know whether or not it would be useful here.

These were not responses to my question. Again, I wanted to know what public funds were in fact used to support this operation and whether they were in fact recouped. I have identified three possible departments involved.

To be more specific, here are the questions of greatest interest that now fall out of all of this: What evaluations were done of TIEM's business plan before providing DRIE funding? Will these evaluations be made public? Was any of the $11.8 million invested by DRIE repaid? What accountability was attached to the funds? Was there any monitoring or site inspection? What criteria were applied to select this company, TIEM, for funding?

How could one company in its development stages be able to get funding from two separate government departments plus, from what I can gather, the Federal Business Development Bank? Was bank financing not available or was it refused? Has there been any action taken against the principals of TIEM Canada to recover the $11.8 billion start-up loan. Has any minister followed up whether or not CEIC agreements with TIEM required the company to return paid job credit amounts for jobs created if these jobs did not continue after two years take place?

Will the minister confirm that as reported to us the job credit amount was approximately $14,000 per job created? What is the status of the Vancouver based business development group? I am told it was owned by TIEM that had secured original ownership through government financial assistance as part of the over-all financial package.

There was, I believe, $2.7 million allocated by TIEM to the Manitoba small business growth fund. What happened to this money? Was any TIEM money applied to Capidem, a $10 million venture capital fund in Quebec? What is the status of the approximately $1 million in investments made by TIEM in various entrepreneurial activities throughout the country?

I terminate by saying that a number of questionable operations were occurring. I can detail those if it is of use to the government. Was the government aware that it was funding in fact an operation that did not have a business plan or was not meeting its own criteria or reaching its job targets?

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the member has obviously raised many more new questions than I could possibly answer in three minutes. I would like to say on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration that I am pleased to be able to discuss the renewal of the TIEM Canada contracts.

Employment and Immigration Canada's funding of TIEM Canada was provided through the innovations program. The objective of the program was to support pilot projects which test new initiatives and approaches to labour market problems before applying such approaches on a larger scale.

In any experimental initiative the risk of failure is present and many trials will have negative results. When Employment and Immigration Canada entered into a contract with TIEM Canada, one of the purposes was to test the effectiveness of a six-part approach to the establishment and successful operation of new small businesses.

The six elements of the approach were:

(1) the TIEM centre was conceived as the initial step. The entrepreneur and the business concept would be screened and, if accepted, the entrepreneur would receive preliminary management training, legal accounting, and marketing advice.

(2) Entrepreneur growth fund—TIEM was to work with investors to raise money for investment and start-up companies.

(3) The business opportunity program—business opportunities in specific communities were to be identified and matched with appropriate entrepreneurs.

(4) Business and technology centre—TIEM was to work with government and community representatives to establish business incubators in each TIEM location.

(5) Targeted employee training service—TIEM was to work with existing training organizations to provide skilled employees for the emerging small businesses.

(6) The community advisory board—TIEM was to establish a volunteer group of community and business leaders who would act as a sounding board for the local TIEM centre and its entrepreneurs.

A second purpose of the agreement was to test whether or not a private enterprise such as TIEM Canada, using the six elements and with initial government assistance, could become profitable in selling its services to new businesses. After three years of operation, which is the maximum duration of an innovation's contract, TIEM Canada managed only to implement fully one of the six elements: the TIEM's centres located in several urban locations.

• (1915)

The contract stipulated that the company was to become financially self-sufficient after support under the Innovations Program expired. The company did not successfully make such alternate financial arrangements and it was clear that TIEM could not continue its activities without ongoing federal government funding. Following an evaluation, Employment and Immigration Canada concluded that the objective of its contracts with TIEM had not been met and would not be met if the contract was extended.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on April 17, 1985, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into effect. The government appointed a special committee on equality rights around that time, an all-party parliamentary committee to examine the implications of Section 15 of the Charter of Rights and to determine what laws and policies must be changed to ensure that equality was a reality for all Canadians.

I had the honour of serving as a member of that special parliamentary committee on equality rights. The committee reported to this House in the fall of 1985. In a unanimous report concurred in by the five Conservative members of the committee, as well a Liberal member of the committee and myself, representing the New Democratic Party, the committee made a series of strong recommendations to ensure that the words in Section 15 became a reality for all Canadians.

One of the recommendations was that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to include specific provision for the concept of reasonable accommodation, to ensure that minorities, particularly visible minorities, should have their concerns recognized in law. Indeed, the Canadian Human Rights Commission submitted a special report to Parliament urging that action be taken on this. In the spring of 1986 the government indicated that speedy action would be taken to implement that recommendation. As well, in its response to the special parliamentary committee on equality rights and to that unanimous recommendation, the government dealt with the issue of discrimination based on sexual orientation.

The unanimous recommendation of the special parliamentary committee was that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to add sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination to the other grounds. The committee went on to recommend that the Canadian Armed Forces and the RCMP bring their employment practices into conformity with the Canadian

Human Rights Act, as amended, to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

The government responded to that recommendation on March 4, 1986, four years ago yesterday. What was the response? The government stated it believes that one's sexual orientation is irrelevant to whether one can perform a job or use a service or facility. The Department of Justice is of the view that the courts will find that sexual orientation is encompassed by the guarantees in Section 15 of the charter. Finally, these words: "The government will take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination in relation to all areas of federal jurisdiction."

It was four years ago that that commitment was made to all Canadians, not just to lesbians, gay men and bisexuals, but to all Canadians. Four years later, we are still waiting for that promise to be kept.

The courts have indeed ruled with respect to the inclusion of sexual orientation in the Charter. Indeed, in November 1989 in the Federal Court of Canada, Trial Division, Mr. Justice Dubé ruled that Section 15 should be read as if it implicitly included sexual orientation. Judge Dubé said that sexual orientation is not a prohibited ground listed under Section 15 but "—in my view, it is an analogous ground recognized by provincial and territorial human rights acts as well as by the House of Commons parliamentary committee on equality rights."

He pointed out that a characteristic common to the enumerated grounds is that the individuals or groups involved have been victimized and stigmatized throughout history because of prejudice mostly based on fear or ignorance, as most prejudices are. Certainly, that is the case with respect to the lesbian and gay community.

There have been a number of advances in the last four years. A tribunal of the Canadian Human Rights Commission has recognized a relationship between two men for purposes of bereavement leave. As well, there are a number of challenges before the courts. Jim Egan and his partner of 42 years, Jack Nesbitt, are seeking the spousal allowance under the provisions of the Canadian pension regime. That case is going to the courts. Karen Andrews is seeking health insurance for her partner of some nine years. Derrick Dwyer and a young woman, a former officer, are challenging the policies of the Canadian Armed Forces, one of the last major bastions of institutionalized homophobia in this country, the Canadian Armed Forces.

It is ironic that I, as a gay man, could one day become the Minister of National Defence—the Prime Minister's ultimate nightmare—but I could not join the Canadian Armed Forces today. That is surely unacceptable in this country.

Last June, the Minister of Justice promised legislation to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act. We are still waiting. There is strong support for this amendment from many groups. The ad hoc committee on AIDS, chaired by the hon. member for Rosedale, has unanimously recommended that the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation must be added to the Canadian Human Rights Act to help us in our struggle against this terrible epidemic.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the former Minister of Justice, the member for St. John's West, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, many churches, labour groups and others, are calling upon the government to keep its promise.

Finally, I want to call upon the new Minister of Justice, recently appointed, the member for Vancouver Centre, to move on this as a priority. She personally promised, during the election campaign, her constituents in Vancouver Centre that she would support this important amendment.

We have waited far too long for equality in this country. We have been infinitely patient and it is time, surely, that the lesbian, gay and bisexual community in this country was treated with full dignity, equality and respect. It is time, indeed it is long overdue, that this government moved on this important promise to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is committed to the principles of social justice and equality. To give effect to this commitment, the government has undertaken a range of initiatives including the introduction of the Employment Equity Act. In many other areas the government has moved on a pro-active basis to address issues of equality and social justice.

In the area of equal pay, it is the law at the federal level, as provided by the Canadian Human Rights Act, that men and women be paid equal pay for work of equal value. In addition, Labour Canada has an equal pay program to ensure that equal pay is implemented in the private sector. The Treasury Board, as well, has a large scale joint union–management project under way to identify and correct any pay deficiencies in the Public Service. The government is committed to the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

The hon. member will know that the government is committed to eliminating sexual discrimination from all areas of federal jurisdiction. The position of the government is that employment and advancement in the federal Public Service and in all government services are equally available to all individuals without regard to their sexual orientation. The government is examining the issues that arise in these circumstances because we know they are of concern to Canadians.

The government is committed to amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to incorporate the principle of reasonable accommodation. Consideration is being given to the best way of doing this. The government is examining this and a range of other issues relating to the Canadian Human Rights Act, including suggestions made by the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

The government is moving as quickly as it can to complete its review of these matters. The government continues to demonstrate its commitment to the principles of equality and social justice and to give effect to these principles on a pro–active basis.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from Matagami concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Matagami is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient as it concerns the northern tax benefits system. It offers no encouragement to people in the North and no incentive to make use of northern resources.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of Council 4302 of the Knights of Columbus in Springhill, Nova Scotia.

These people, almost 2,000 in total, are in disagreement with the goods and services tax and are tired of being challenged and laboured by increased tax burdens. They calling upon Parliament to drop this unfair, crippling tax that has as its target low and middle income Canadians.

In addition, I have a second petition from individuals and constituents of the federal constituency, like the previous one, of Cumberland—Colchester, primarily in the Amherst area. They are also in opposition to this particular goods and services tax. They call upon Parliament to rescind the particular matter which is before Parliament at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition to this House on behalf of Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo, a Canadian citizen who has been persecuted for political reasons in Taiwan.

The petition calls upon the government to use its good offices in the Canadian Embassy in Japan and the High Commission in Hong Kong and to send a representative to Taiwan to assist Mr. Leo in protecting himself against this improper, unfair, undemocratic and inappropriate attack on freedom of speech.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of constituents from the constituency of Kamloops who are totally distressed that the government continues to proceed with its goods and services tax.

They point out at some length all their concerns, including the fact that it will erode their purchasing power, that it will tax critical items such as heating fuels, and that it is regionally discriminatory because it will be on transportation costs. They go on and on.

The petitioners are asking the government, even at this point, to reconsider what it is doing and to go back to the drawing-board and start all over.

BALTIC STATES

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition in the House today concerning the Baltic States of Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia. Canada has not recognized the illegal annexation of the Baltic states by the Soviet Union.

Whereas Canada is a signatory to the final act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe which affirms the principle of self-determination of people, the petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to acknowledge favourably the aspirations of Canadians of Estonian heritage who stand united in their support of the Congress of Estonia, which will convene in Tallinn, Estonia, on March 11 and 12, 1990.

Canadians of Estonian heritage will be attending that particular conference and participating in it. The petitioners will express their collective will at that conference of the Estonia people as to their future for freedom.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians who live in the area where I grew up, the County of Haldimand in southern Ontario.

They feel like many British Columbians that the goods and services tax is a completely unfair and punitive tax. They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

They want to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax this would not be a massive government tax grab.

They call on the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty on behalf of citizens of Saskatoon to present a number of petitions, all dealing with the goods and services tax.

These people feel that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place. They call upon the government to reject the goods and services tax and to bring forward a tax system which is fair to all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a number of petitions signed by constituents of my own riding, including people from Riverside, Newton, Guilford, Whalley, Port Mann, Bridgeview, Green Timbers, Port Kells, Johnston Heights, and Fraser Heights. They are all asking the government to abandon its proposal for the goods and services tax and to bring in fair and equitable taxation.

I also would like to inform the House that I have a large number of other petitions which were done spontaneously by citizens in the ridings, both small businesses and seniors, but unfortunately they were not in a form that could be certified by the House.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my duty and privilege to table 68 petitions which have been certified correct as to form and content.

The 1,443 signatories from Thunder Bay, Nipigon, Kakabeka Falls, Dorion, Hurkett, Red Rock, and other areas in the region I represent strongly oppose this government's proposed goods and service tax.

These constituents call upon Parliament to reject in full the misguided, regressive, nonsensical consumer tax that the government proposes to implement on January 1, 1991.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present this petition for people living in my district of Cardigan, P.E.I. who strongly oppose this tax.

They believe it will hit Canadians with higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment, wherefore the undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to reject this goods and services tax.

Routine Proceedings

VIA RAIL

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions signed by residents of the various communities in my riding calling upon the government to live up to its promises to keep VIA Rail as a transportation system in Canada and urging it to restore the system to its fullest.

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes. (a) and (b)—See attached chart.

PROVINCE	(a) TOTAL NUMBER OF HOMES	(b) AMOUNT ($000'S)
Newfoundland	3	300

Question No. 212—Ms. Black:

For the last year for which Statistics Canada has figures, for the (a) Atlantic (b) Quebec (c) Ontario (d) British Columbia region, what proportions of male and female passengers were carried by VIA Rail?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Statistics Canada reports:

SALES TAX INVENTORY REBATES

Question No. 219—Mr. Bird:

Under the new Goods and Services Tax, will Canadian businesses receive a refund for taxes that they have paid on existing stocks and inventories as of January 1, 1991, and if so in what way (a) are the inventories to be evaluated (b) will tax refunds be calculated?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, under the new Goods and Services Tax (GST), eligible Canadian businesses will receive a rebate of the federal sales tax paid on goods for sale, lease or rental in inventory on GST implementation day.

(a) The method used to evaluate the inventory will be the same as the method adopted for income tax and financial statement presentation purposes. Rebates in respect of gasoline and diesel fuels will be a specific amount per litre, based on the per litre FST rate on these items on December 31, 1990.

(b) The calculation of inventory rebates will be based on prescribed rebate factors in all cases. There will be separate rebate factors for gasoline, diesel fuel, motor vehicles, construction materials/equipment for buildings, and for other taxable goods. The gasoline and diesel fuel rebate factors will be applied to the volume of the inventory, that is the number of litres of product. All other rebate factors will be applied to the tax-paid inventory value of goods for sale, lease or rental.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN FUNDING

Question No. 223—Mr. Gardiner:

Have any organizations or government departments in the riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley received Canada Assistance Plan funding and, if so (a) what are their (i) names (ii) addresses (b) in each case, what dollar amounts have they received?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Canada Assistance Plan contributions are not paid to individual organizations or government departments in respect of individual parliamentary ridings. The Canada Assistance Plan reimburses provincial governments 50 per cent of eligible costs incurred in respect of shareable social assistance and social service programs as defined by the Act and Regulations. No funds are paid directly to individual organizations or departments.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

S. O. 52—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Tuesday, January 23, 1990, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier rose on a point of order to express concerns about the operation of certain aspects of Standing Order 52, which is, of course, the Standing Order pertaining to emergency debates. In the ensuing procedural discussion, the Chair heard comment from the hon. member from Kamloops, from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader and from the hon. member from Glengarry–Prescott–Russell.

[English]

At issue was the disposition of a number of applications for emergency debates of which notice had been given for the previous day, Monday, January 22, 1990. Members had been precluded from proceeding with these applications on that Monday because the House adopted a motion to move to Orders of the Day.

In the spirit of co–operation which sometimes prevails in this place it was agreed that those applications would be deemed to be before the House the following day. They were dealt with on Tuesday, January 23, on that basis. That agreement was made subject to the express proviso that it not constitute a precedent.

The Chair undertook to reflect upon the interpretation to be accorded to this aspect of Standing Order 52 and to deal with the intricacies of the procedural matter at another time. The Chair is now prepared to share with the House the results of that consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. members are all familiar with the provisions of Standing Order 52, by which a member may seek permission to move the adjournment of the House in order to debate a "specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration". These emergency debates as they are known are held only when a number of hurdles as spelled out in Standing Order 52 have been crossed. In particular, Standing Order 52 (2) provides that any member wishing to move the adjournment of the House under the terms of this Standing Order must give to the Speaker, at least one hour before raising it in the House, a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed.

[English]

The items of concern addressed in the procedural exchange on this issue may be conveniently and fairly, I believe, summarized as follows.

First, concern was expressed that when a motion to move to Orders of the Day pre–empts reaching that point in Routine Proceedings at which leave to seek an emergency debate may be sought, the system is then short–circuited and the opportunity to present an application is not protected.

Second, it was contended that any notices to the Speaker requesting an emergency debate which are precluded from being presented on a given day should be held over and called on the next day when applications pursuant to Standing Order 52 would normally be reached.

• (1120)

In response to the first point I think it should be emphasized that the decision to move to Orders of the Day is one which is made by the House usually on the basis of a recorded division, presumably with full knowledge of the consequences, whatever they may be, of doing so. That being so I do not think it incumbent upon the Chair to second guess the decision of the House and its ramifications, and I would decline any invitation to do so.

As to whether notices of intention to request an emergency debate should be held over and called at the first opportunity, I have severe reservations in this regard.

The specific and important matters requiring urgent consideration, according to Standing Order 52(1), call by definition for immediate action or decision or attention. If that immediate attention is not accorded, it stands to reason that the nature of the matter may change. A delay of even 24 hours may serve either to diffuse or escalate the situation so that it is no longer an emergency or, conversely, it is even more critical. For this reason the Chair is reluctant to institute what would be a new practice of holding over such notices.

This reluctance is enforced by the consciousness that were notices to be held over, some hon. members may for a variety of valid reasons not be prepared to proceed with them on a subsequent occasion.

Furthermore, the Chair is sensitive to the fact that hon. members may wish to retain for themselves the prerogative of resubmitting notices, because in framing each successive application they have the opportunity to capture with precision the changing elements which give rise to the request for an emergency debate and which may bear heavily on the ultimate success of the application.

I would ask hon. members to remember that on a number of occasions when applications have come to the Chair and I have decided not to proceed with an adjournment of House business for an emergency debate, I have often remarked that it would not be appropriate to do so, and I use the words "at this time". The reason for that, of course, is that circumstances can change very rapidly, especially in an area where there is concern with respect to the necessity to have an emergency debate.

[Translation]

The Chair is pleased to have had this opportunity to relate to the House the considerations which have informed its decision to continue the existing practice with regard to notices submitted pursuant to Standing Order 52.

[English]

I thank hon. members for their assistance in this matter.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Young (Gloucester) (p. 8636).

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, later today we are to vote on an amendment presented by the Liberal finance critic, the member for Gloucester, which sets out clearly and concisely why we believe this budget should be defeated.

Liberals reject this budget for the same reasons that Canadians reject it. This budget is a blueprint for a made in Canada recession. This budget creates new taxes, despite the minister's claim that this is a no tax budget.

This budget abandons the federal government's responsibility for health care, veterans, post-secondary education, and regional development. This budget in fact widens the gap between rich and poor, between rich and poor regions. This budget is an attempt by the Minister of Finance to shift the spotlight of blame for the economy away from himself and on to the provinces.

With this budget the Minister of Finance is trying to avoid his responsibility for the economic mess which he himself created. He is attempting to transfer that responsibility to the provincial governments and to low and middle income Canadians.

He is doing it because this is a government which thinks that Canadians can be fooled and manipulated into thinking that someone else is responsible: that it is the provinces, the workers, the students, the poor, the opposition parties, past governments, or heaven knows who else got us into this mess.

I can tell the minister that Canadians are not going to be fooled. Canadians can see right through this shallow attempt to avoid responsibility.

What it comes down to is that Canadians simply do not believe anything this government says any more.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Canadians know that this is the same Minister of Finance who in 1984 said "We will not raise taxes" but who has raised taxes a total of 32 times and by billions and billions of dollars since 1984.

"Tax increases," he said, "were necessary to reduce the deficit and the public debt". But the public debt has skyrocketed. The Minister of Finance started with a public debt of $170 billion in 1984 and has more than doubled that to $351 billion in only five years.

Canadians also know that in 1985 the minister said that by 1990, this year, the deficit would be $17 billion. He missed that mark by over $10 billion. Now he is saying that by 1994–95 he will have it down to $10 billion.

Quite frankly, Canadians do not believe the Minister of Finance's optimistic projections; they have heard it all before.

All the minister's projections are based on his assumption of an interest rate of four to five percentage points lower than what it is today. This is the Minister of Finance who has been supporting and agreeing with the Bank of Canada's current high interest rate policy. If the minister would show some leadership to bring those rates down, maybe more people would believe his projections.

Canadians know that this Prime Minister is the same one who said that pensions were a "sacred trust never to be tampered with" and who then attempted to deindex old age pensions and is now trying to claw back seniors' pensions.

Canadians know that we are talking about the same Minister of Finance who called us liars in the last election campaign when we said that he would cut funding for health care, education and regional development but who is now doing exactly that.

When the Prime Minister was asked some 10 days ago at his first press conference in three years why his was the most unpopular government in Canadian history, he had no real answer. He refused to acknowledge the fact that if his government is the most unpopular government in history, there is good reason for it, starting with himself and the Minister of Finance.

The Prime Minister should not only have been apologizing for the misleading and fraudulent behaviour of his government; he should have announced a reversal of that behaviour, starting with the withdrawal of this budget.

In August 1989 the Prime Minister said, and I quote: "We are going to focus more and more of our attention and resources on long-term investment in people, education, literacy and the upgrading of skills". This budget does exactly the opposite.

This budget is nothing but recycled Reaganomics, a theory already discredited and abandoned in the United States but still believed in by this Tory government. It is a new form of trickle down theory, applied to provincially administered programs such as health care, education and welfare.

What the minister is saying to the provinces is: "I am going to cut your funding down to a trickle, and I do not care if health standards go down. I do not care if family service payments go down. I do not care about the human costs. That is not my problem". That is what the Minister of Finance is saying in his budget and that is what Canadians do not want.

The minister seems surprised that the provincial governments object to his transparent attempt to stick them with his problem. He seems surprised when they say that taking $7.3 billion from the provincial treasuries for health care and education will have a negative impact.

• (1130)

Of course it will have a negative impact. It will have a dramatic and negative impact on the ability of provincial governments to deliver what Canadians look on as national programs.

He is weakening the ability of our national government to ensure national standards on health care and education. He is weakening the rationale, the need for a strong national government. In his budget, the Minister of Finance is weakening the basis for national unity in Canada, and at the worst possible time.

Let us consider what Don Getty, the premier of Alberta—one of the few remaining Tory premiers—had to say about this budget: "I am not sure who is speaking for Alberta in Ottawa, but I think there is obviously an effort here in a way that I think is unfair to unload the federal deficit on the provinces." He obviously does not think much of the member for Yellowhead or the Deputy Prime Minister. He does not know who is supposed to be speaking for Alberta in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, Marc-Yvan Côté, the Quebec Health and Social Services Minister, had the following to say about a statement by the Minister of Finance that cutbacks would have no impact on the provinces, and I quote: "When Michael Wilson claims his mismanagement will have no impact on health services in Quebec, to me he sounds more like a guy from Bay Street than from Quebec City."

In any case, Mr. Speaker, the minister can hardly be expected to know what impact cutbacks will have on the provinces since he did not consult them. And how can the minister reconcile today's actions with what he said when he was on the other side of the House? In 1982, he stated that consultations with the provinces were imperative before any budget cutbacks that would involve closing hospitals and reducing assistance to postsecondary education. He also said that we should not turn hospitals, universities and colleges into a battleground for federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker, when I asked the minister why he didn't take his own advice, he had no answer. This tells us a lot about the new era of federal–provincial harmony and reconciliation announced by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, the 1990 Budget undermines national unity at a particularly unfortunate time.

[English]

Neither did the Minister of Finance bother to consult the provinces about his cuts to the Canada Assistance Plan. That is the program with which the federal government shares with the provinces half the cost of social assistance in this country. Even for Tories, this budget sets new lows for heartlessness.

We have a situation where thousands and thousands of Canadians are lining up at food banks across this country, where 1.2 million children are living below the poverty line, where thousands of single parents are struggling to feed and clothe themselves and their children, where thousands of elderly Canadians face the indignity of having to rely on private charity for basic necessities and where thousands of the working poor are facing increasing roadblocks to a decent standard of living.

This government is making things worse for the poorest of the poor in this country, not better.

First, the government is trying to eliminate the federal contribution of $2 billion to the Unemployment Insurance Plan. It is tightening the eligibility criteria by increasing the number of insurable weeks required in most cases and by decreasing the number of weeks of benefits, so that if the jobless are able to benefit from it, it is for a shorter time. Mr. Speaker, the government is quite a help—!

Finally, to those who have used up their benefits and must turn to welfare, the Minister of Finance is saying, "Yes, I am reducing the Canada Assistance Plan and transfers. Too bad, but that's how it is! The international financial community for which I must polish my image is more important to me that the children you have to feed". That seems to be the Finance Minister's thinking.

Mr. Speaker, the minister is not satisfied with failing in his duty to protect the disadvantaged. He is violating the agreement with the provinces whereby he bears half the cost of welfare and other social measures under the Canada Assistance Plan. Is it any wonder that the provincial governments are taking the Finance Minister to court? This is unprecedented in the history of these agreements.

[English]

The needs of low and middle income Canadians is not something this government ever cared about. If we add up all the tax measures since 1984, the numbers are shocking. It is a catalogue of unfairness.

Let us look at the impact on a one earner family of four people. If they are at the poverty level, $23,600 a year, the tax increase has been 61 per cent. If they are at the average income level of some $45,000 a year, the tax increase has been 29 per cent. But if they are people who could be considered to be rich, earning above $100,000 a year, the tax increase has been only 8 per cent. That is not fair. Canadians know it is not fair. That is why Canadians are rejecting the economic policies of the government. They know also that the goods and services tax will add to the unfair tax burden on middle and lower income Canadians that was created by this government.

The Tory philosophy is the Darwinian survival of the fittest approach, and according to the Tories, the fittest seem to be the very rich and the very big corporations.

In 1991 the government will collect $2.4 billion less in corporate taxes than it predicted last year. This fits in with the over–all reduction in the corporate share of total federal revenues which accounted for 13.2 per cent of all revenues in 1984–85, but only 10.4 per cent in 1990–91.

Speaking of gifts to corporations, the government is also preparing to give away Petro–Canada. This corporation was set up by the Canadian government to serve all the people of Canada. It was supposed to be a vehicle to ensure that Canadians benefited from the tapping of new energy supplies and greater Canadian control of the energy sector. It was to be our window on the industry. But since 1984, the government has dramatically reduced Petro–Canada's role as an instrument of public policy. With this budget it is closing the window and giving away even more Canadian control of our energy sector.

How is the government treating disadvantaged regions? For example, how is it responding to the crisis in the fishery in Atlantic Canada? Obviously, the Minister of Finance is taking his cue from the Prime Minister who said, and I quote: "There is no crisis in Atlantic Canada".

Instead of helping Atlantic Canada in this budget, the minister is beginning to put an end to regional development grants. The reason for this is simple. The Conservatives signed a trade deal—a very bad deal—with the United States. The United States wants to have regional development grant assistance ended in this country. The Minister of Finance is not even waiting for the subsidy negotiations to start. He is giving the Americans what they want before they formally ask for it and Atlantic Canadians are going to pay the price.

So are the people of British Columbia who are being thrown out of work with the cancellation of the Polar 8 ice-breaker. Again the government made ringing commitments about not putting a price on the defence of our Arctic sovereignty. What happened? It did put a price on it. Suddenly Arctic sovereignty was too expensive. I think the Mayor of Esquimalt was speaking for all Canadians when he said: "I'm angry because they lied to us. We really feel betrayed." The betrayal does not end there.

We now have a desperate crisis in western agriculture and the government is silent. There is nothing in this budget to deal with this crisis in spite of the urgent pleas of one of the other remaining Tory premiers, the premier of Saskatchewan, whom we heard on television last night.

• (1140)

The crisis in western agriculture is, like the crisis in the Atlantic fishery, a crisis, a matter of concern for all Canadians. This government is silent. It is doing nothing.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister is taking the same attitude toward women's groups. He has made outright cuts in the budgets for programs that are essential to battered and mistreated women or that are used to promote equal opportunity for women and remove the historic social injustice done to them.

These funds were used to remove obstacles to full equality for Canadian women.

[English]

Equally shameful is the treatment the minister has meted out to the aboriginal people of this country. He is slashing funding for native groups, funding which supports native broadcasting and native newspapers. What the minister, however, callously overlooks is that native broadcasting and native newspapers perform a vital service, a service native communities cannot be without. As was pointed out by my colleague, the member for Western Arctic, the minister has forgotten that it was the native newspapers that continued to expose the facts that led to the reopening of the Donald Marshall case and intensified the fight for native equality in our justice system.

Liberal governments understood that less advantaged Canadians needed help to make sure that their voices were heard in the formulation of public policy in this country. We helped establish and fund advocacy groups to do that. We did not always like what we heard from them. We were not always comfortable when they told us that this policy or that policy needed to be changed. But we believed that they had a right to be heard. The point is, we set up and helped fund these groups so that as a government we could make decisions which incorporated the views and aspirations of the widest number of people and so that these groups could inform and challenge other Canadians and each other.

This government does not like to hear criticism. This government does not like to be told that a certain policy direction is not working or is hurting a particular group of people. The government's answer is simple: shoot the messenger. Silence the groups that deliver the bad news by cutting off their funding. That is not only mean, it is also short-sighted and ultimately counter-productive.

Perhaps the ultimate in short-sightedness is the failure yet again of the government to bring in a child care program. This government has been promising a child care program for nearly six years. Canadian parents and Canadian children are still waiting.

Writing in The Toronto Star last week about the Prime Minister's 1984 election commitment to create a child care program, Doris Anderson, former chairperson of the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women stated: "The lies were so preposterous, even for a politician, that we almost believed them".

Remember the last election? The Minister of Finance said all of his spending commitments were taken care of. He said they were not promises. He said the money was already set aside. No problem with child care. It would start the day the government was re-elected.

But that was then and this is now. The minister put Canadian children on hold once again. Not only is there no new national child care program but instead, in his cuts to the provinces for the Canada Assistance Plan, the Minister of Finance is reducing the limited money there already is for provincial child care spaces. No new program and even less than there was before for child care across the country.

This budget is not only a further betrayal of the children who are our hope for the future, it is also a betrayal of those whose sacrifices helped ensure that all of us had a future in a free and democratic country.

Many of our war veterans in long term care will have to pay thousands of dollars more for board and lodging as a result of this budget. That is over and above the doubling of those fees in 1985 by this Conservative government.

That is a shameful way to treat those brave men and women who were willing to lay down their lives for this country. They fought for us when we were in need. We should be fighting for them now when they are in need. We should not be forcing them to pay more just because the Minister of Finance failed basic bookkeeping. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we in this party will not abandon the war veterans of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): We will also not abandon the low and middle income Canadians, including veterans, who are going to be hit with the biggest and most regressive new tax in our history, the new 7 per cent goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister boasts of bringing in a budget with no new taxes. He no doubt thinks that we should thank him for it, that Canadians should be dancing in the streets. It is a big joke. No new taxes, my eye! The government increased Canadians' tax burden in at least four ways. First, it cut $7.3 billion from transfers to the provinces, forcing the provincial governments to raise their taxes. The minister is passing the buck, seemingly unaware that federal taxpayers are also provincial taxpayers. With his new budget, they will have to pay and pay and pay.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the deindexation of individual income tax introduced by the Finance Minister in 1985, Canadians will pay 3 per cent more this year and lose 3 per cent of the tax credit. Thirdly, Canadians will pay $2.1 billion more in additional taxes in 1990 because of the measures in last year's Budget. The government's clawback of old age pensions and family allowances means the end of universality.

Mr. Speaker, the surtax on individual income climbs to 5 per cent. The excise tax on gasoline goes up another cent a litre. A whole series of other measures takes effect this year.

[English]

To say that this is a no-tax budget is like saying that just because people do not celebrate their birthdays they are not getting any older. I have to say that, as the months go by, this government is getting older but it sure is not getting any wiser, nor is it getting any fairer.

This brings me to the fourth new tax the minister does not include when he calls this a no-tax budget. I am talking about the new goods and services tax, the unwisest and unfairest tax of all. When the Minister of Finance launched us down the road toward this new tax he made a number of commitments about what kind of a tax it was going to be. He set out a number of tests which he promised the new tax would meet or there would be no such new tax.

One of the first preconditions the minister set out for his new tax was that it needed provincial co-operation. He said such a tax would be unworkable without it. How many provinces have signed up to totally integrate their sales tax with the federal government's? Not a single one. Now, according to the minister, provincial co-operation which only a few months ago was vital is not really necessary and he is proceeding with his tax without provincial co-operation in any event. Yet the minister wonders why Canadians do not believe what he says any more.

The next commitment was that the new tax was going to be simple. Instead of a simple tax, the minister has given us 323 pages of legislation filed with so much convoluted language and so many complex mathematical formulae, it is not simple at all. No wonder the head of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business calls this tax a nightmare. It is no wonder that the most recent issue of Small Business magazine contains a poll showing that only 4 per cent of their readers, who are all business people and who were supposed to be supportive of this GST idea, are willing to accept this tax.

If this tax goes through, Canada becomes the only country in the industrialized world with two sales tax systems. That means two calculations at every point of sale in all provinces except Alberta. They do not like this tax there at all, as we see on television night after night.

It means two sets of books and two sets of remittances, one to Ottawa and one to the provincial capital. Just to make sure everybody fills out the right forms in triplicate and sends in the right amount of tax, this government is hiring a veritable army of some 4,000 new tax police just to collect this new tax.

What about the great promise that the new tax would be visible? That commitment did not last long either. Now the minister says he cannot deliver on that promise to make it truly visible, to have it show up on bills, prices on the shelves and on cash registers. He says he cannot do that by law. He now says that the Constitution prevents him from doing that. The question Canadians are asking is: "How come it was possible when he made the commitment but now it isn't? The Constitution has not changed. Was the minister not being honest when he made the commitment, or is he not being honest now?".

What about the promise to reduce the income tax rate on middle income Canadians when he brought in his new goods and services tax? The minister has broken that promise. The tax rate will stay the same.

What about his promise to eliminate the 3 per cent surtax on income tax when the new sales tax came in? He did not eliminate it, he raised it to 5 per cent.

What about his promise that the new tax would not be inflationary? It was a strange promise to make in the first place because how can a tax that raised the price of everything by billions of dollars not be inflationary? Of course the minister has set out the most hopeful scenario in his budget documents, predicting that there will only be a 1 per cent or 2 per cent impact on inflation, and that will only happen during the transition period.

I do not think anybody believes that either.

I say the minister is not telling the whole story. He is making an assumption about how business will respond to the changeover from the current manufacturers' sales tax to his new tax. His assumption is that every single business in Canada now paying the old tax will adjust every single price to reflect only the new tax by taking out the old one. It is beyond belief that every business will take out the current 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax from their prices and pass on all of the resulting benefits from this reduction to their customers immediately or even over a longer period.

Furthermore, why should Canadians sit by quietly and watch their purchasing power be eroded by this new goods and services tax on everything sold in this country? Workers have already told the Minister of Finance that they are not going to allow their purchasing power to be lowered by this new tax and one can well understand their point of view.

What about the effect on the economy of the government's proposed goods and services tax? In his budget documents, the minister himself is predicting higher unemployment and lower growth, in fact almost no growth in the coming year. By the minister's own admission, we are heading into an economic slowdown but he is pushing ahead with this new goods and services tax anyway.

As the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra well pointed out in this House on January 29 of this year, speaking in the second reading debate on the GST legislation: "This tax could well push us into a recession".

Another memorable commitment made by the minister about his new tax was that it would be what he called "revenue neutral". He said it would not raise any more tax than the existing manufacturers' sales tax. Most Canadians hoped that meant they would pay the same amount, that it would just be collected differently and that it would not be a massive tax grab, which it has turned out to be.

If you look at the current budget documents, you can see that the government admits that in 1991 alone, if this tax goes into effect, it will collect $1.9 billion more than it had predicted, even after giving an adjustment of several billion dollars to business for their inventories on which they had already paid the old manufacturers' sales tax. So much for the minister's claim that his goods and services tax would be revenue neutral.

Also, consider the fact that in 1984, when this Conservative Government was sworn in, the federal government collected about $8 billion from Canadians with the manufacturers' sales tax. But in 1991, if the goods and services tax goes into effect, the government will collect about $23 billion or three times as much in sales taxes as were collected in 1984. The minister can talk about "revenue neutral" as much as he wants, but the simple fact is that Canadians are going to pay three times as much sales tax in 1991 if the GST goes into effect as they paid in 1984. That is an enormous tax increase no matter how you slice it.

Yet, the Minister of Finance continues to insist that all families earning less than $30,000 will be better off with this new tax. According to a recent study by the respected Institute for Research on Public Policy, about one third of all families making under $30,000 a year will be worse off with this tax. This study also shows that for all income groups, with the GST 83 per cent of all families will either face no change or will be worse off.

You can see why this government wants to do everything in its power to shut down debate on this new tax. It has imposed closure to force second reading of the GST legislation through this House. It is simply not listening to the vast majority of Canadians who are telling the government to scrap this tax. Canadians want to be heard on this issue. They deserve better than they are getting from this Conservative government. Canadians deserve to have their views heard. They deserve to have their views respected.

We Liberals want to give Canadians that opportunity to be heard. To date we have presented, here on Parliament Hill, some 600,000 signatures against this tax. Now, during the week of March 12 to 16, next week, we will add to this petition drive by setting up a national telephone hotline number to give every Canadian taxpayer, every Canadian, the opportunity to call and say "no" to the GST. All they have to do is call 1–900–720–6052, and they will be able to register their opposition to this goods and services tax.

Some hon. members: What was that number again?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): That number once again is 1–900–720–6052

It is essential, Mr. Speaker, for all Canadians to call 1–900–720–6052 to let the government know about their opposition to this general sales tax, a harmful tax for all Canadians, for our economy and our country.

• (1200)

[English]

We, in opposing this tax, are inviting all Canadians to register their opposition to it. Obviously, the message of Liberals and of Canadians to the Prime Minister is, "Scrap this tax now".

Budgets are supposed to be about building for the future. Budgets are supposed to be the application of the government's vision for a stronger and a fairer Canada. Budgets are supposed to be blueprints for economic growth and development. Budgets are supposed to represent our collective response to the needs and aspirations of all Canadians.

This Conservative budget is none of these things. This budget is nothing but a prescription for a made–in–Canada recession. It will dramatically widen the already growing gap between the rich and the poor in this country, and between the rich and poor regions of this country. As my colleague the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte said a few days ago, it is a battle plan for a war between the provinces and the federal government. As I said earlier in this speech, that is something that we do not need now. This is the worse possible time to put further strains on the unity of this country. This government should have presented a budget to strengthen our unity, not to begin tearing it apart.

For disadvantaged Canadians, this is not a budget of hope; it is a budget of despair. It is a budget which demonstrates that this government's priority is not compassion for the disadvantaged but a ruthless attempt to cover up its own mismanagement by putting an ever–increasing burden on the backs of veterans, women, natives, students, as well as the sick, the unemployed and the elderly, those least able to defend themselves.

This is a budget which attempts to stifle dissent and undermines our economy by undermining the basic social programs we are proud of and believe in, such as health care and education. It is the budget of a government that is attempting to shift the blame on to others for its own incompetence and its own mismanagement.

This is a budget which deserves to be defeated. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we Liberals on this side of the House intend to do everything in our power to do just that, to defeat this budget. I believe that even if the Tory majority prevails in votes in this House, Canadians will vote against the whole sad record of this government and will soundly defeat this government in the next election. I believe Canadians will long remember this budget and, as a result, the Conservatives will long regret their decision ever to have presented it to this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville on a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, there has been a long-standing tradition in the House that with unanimous consent and if the member agrees, we can ask a question or two. I wonder if I could ask whether there is unanimous consent to ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Mr. Gauthier: Just a minute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There either is consent or there is not consent.

Mr. Gauthier: Can I speak to this?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No. Is there consent to ask the hon. member for Windsor West a question?

Mr. Saint-Julien: No.

Mr. Gauthier: Let the record show the Tories said "no".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Minister of Supply and Services on debate.

The Budget

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to rise and address the House this morning regarding the budget. We have just heard a spell-binding speech—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Duhamel: There's an honest Tory.

Mr. Dick: You will realize there are many honest Tories over here. However, the speech was rather ineffectual, negative in all matters and it did not have one positive thing to say. It talked about "spending, spending, spending" which was the Liberal habit and how we got into this difficulty. It did not talk about restraint or cutting in any areas which we have to do, as everyone recognizes. Most of all, it was completely bankrupt in that it did not have one fresh, new idea.

Like everything else the Liberals have produced in the last five and a half years, they do not have any new ideas. I can honestly say that my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party do have innovative new ideas. They are somewhat left of Mr. Gorbachev's in most cases but, on the other hand, they would only bankrupt the country. However, they are innovative and new and the Liberals cannot even find that.

The Liberals are the ones that promise this and that and that they are going to be very up and up. They are the ones, if you think back to the seventies, who said we would never have wage and price controls. They said they would never increase the tax on gasoline by 18 cents a gallon, then they doubled it to 36 cents. I remember when they said they had wrestled inflation to the ground. I remember when they said they would have no referendum on sovereignty association; there was one. I remember when they said separatism was dead; it is not dead.

They have continually misrepresented the facts. In the last election campaign they even said that Canadians were going to lose medicare and their old age pensions. This was far from the truth and they were called to the point on that.

I have been looking forward to my opportunity to speak on the budget so that, along with some of my colleagues, I can present some of the facts and truths with regard to the current national picture. I have listened to the debate over the past days and I must say that in listening to the opposition I have come to fear that their objective analysis has been sacrificed for political expediency. That is always the case in political debates, but the facts have been mercilessly trampled in a rush to try and get the negative headline. Let us look at just a few of these facts.

In 1984, my colleague the Minister of Finance, introduced our agenda for economic renewal. We have been moving to implement that plan on a consistent basis ever since. The plan is aimed at such sensible objectives as reducing our budget deficit, controlling the growth of the national debt, removing obstacles from Canada's economic growth and encouraging innovation and competitiveness in the business sector.

Our plan is working. There are factual independent measurements of its progress. There have been some 1.6 million new jobs created in Canada in the past five years. Of those, 85 per cent are full-time jobs and 58 per cent of them have been filled by women. The unemployment rates have dropped in every region of this country since September of 1984. Youth unemployment has dropped as more and more young people have joined in our economic renewal, a renewal that is being been led by progressive and successful businesses and industries.

In the keystone province of Ontario, investment spending has been strong and the province's gross domestic product has grown substantially with an annual growth rate of 4.7 per cent since 1985.

When the people of Canada rejected the spendthrift government in the general election of 1984 and decided instead to bring this government to office, that federal Liberal government was spending $16 billion more each year on programs than it was collecting in revenues. There was a massive operating deficit. That is how the Liberals manage finances. They thought they could spend their way to happiness.

Today, instead of an operating deficit, we have an operating surplus. The amount by which revenues exceed program spending is $9 billion. That is a $25 billion turnaround in five years. When we took office five and a half years ago the national debt was about $200 billion. That represented nearly half of the nation's gross domestic product.

When the party opposite took office in 1980 the public debt amounted to $85 billion. In their four short years before we took office they had increased that debt by 250 per cent to $200 billion. It has grown from $200 billion, by 75 per cent, to $350 billion in the five years since we have taken over. Eighty per cent of the growth of the national debt during our five years in office has been as a result of the compound interest pressure on the original $200 billion debt we inherited in 1984. These are economic realities which the opposition may not understand.

Our plan has included policies designed to make Canadian businesses more competitive in what is increasingly a global market-place. We have deregulation of the energy, transportation and financial services sectors, privatization of government enterprise, and reform of the income tax system. We have entered into a free trade agreement with the United States and introduced measures to improve the flexibility and skills of our labour force. We will contribute nearly $1.7 billion to job creation and labour force adjustment this year. At the same time, we have tackled the federal government's longstanding financial mess.

The annual deficit has been reduced by about $9.5 billion below its level in 1984–85. Our goal is to continue to reduce that deficit and, all being well, by the year 1994–95 we will eliminate the government's need to borrow from the market-place.

Let us talk about government spending for a moment. Some people have suggested that the government has not been serious about reducing its expenditures. When John Turner was the federal finance minister, growth in government spending averaged 20.2 per cent annually. Even in the last Liberal government, from 1980 to 1984, growth in government spending grew by 13.5 per cent. In the last five and one-half years under the present Minister of Finance we have held growth in program spending to below the rate of inflation, at 3.5 per cent. Over the past five years expenditure restraint has provided the largest share of deficit reduction.

If we look at it another way, relative to the size of the economy, program expenditures have fallen three percentage points over this period. They used to consume 19.5 per cent of gross domestic product. From 1984–85 to the present year they have dropped to 16.5 per cent.

If we had continued that wasteful spending attitude which the Liberals had in 1984, at the present rate, at the 19.5 level, we would be spending $22 billion more this fiscal year than we actually are. In actual expenditures, this government in five and one-half years, has lowered the cost of government operations. Overhead on light, heat, wages, telephones and computers has fallen by 10 per cent. I suggest that not many businesses could fall in that category.

We have been prudent. We have trimmed the size of the public service. It has been reduced by 12,000 person-years. It is back to the level it was 17 years ago, in 1973. As I mentioned, in the four years ending in 1988-89, the growth in federal program expenditures averaged only 3.5 per cent a year. This contrasts with an average annual growth of some of the provincial governments, taken as a whole, of 6.54 per cent, led by Ontario which is fuelling inflation in this country with an inflationary high of 9.5 per cent.

I mentioned the reduction in the size of the federal civil service. This compares very favourably when viewed in the context of what is happening in Queen's Park. You would think the provincial government would have learned. But no, when the Liberals were chased out of Ottawa as the government in 1984 they showed up in 1985 behind Mr. Peterson's Liberals in Toronto. Lo and behold, while this government has struggled to trim the Public Service by 12,000 people, the Liberals in Ontario have expanded their operations with a reckless abandon, increasing the provincial public service by 7,000 people. I guess that is what they call Liberal job creation. It has now put people on the public payroll.

While Ottawa has tightened its belt, some of the provinces—notably Ontario—have increased their spending, oblivious to the economic realities staring them in the face. This has caused inflationary pressures in Toronto and the golden horseshoe of Ontario. This has helped to increase interest rates.

The trouble is that all other parts of this country are paying the price for the inflationary pressures caused by the Liberal government in the province of Ontario. There is one monetary policy in this country. All the other provinces have to pay the increased interest rates that are necessary to try to cool out the inflation caused by the ridiculously high expenditures of Mr. Peterson's government in Toronto.

Some of our critics have claimed that restraining federal transfer payments to the provinces will harm the delivery of important social services. I think we should set the record straight. If the province of Ontario were to reduce its Liberal spendthrift ways by only one-half of 1 per cent in year one and by 1.25 per cent in year two, it would easily meet its budgetary requirements. That is just 1 per cent over two years.

Let us be clear on some points which members usually try to hide. We are restraining expenditures. We are not erasing them. The figures speak for themselves. Direct transfers to other levels of government rose from $23.8 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are sending over a little lukewarm water for the minister. It might help his throat. It's an old Ukrainian remedy.

Mr. Dick: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. If you have an old Ukrainian remedy to get rid of my cold completely, I would like to take that. You should patent it, Mr. Speaker. You might do very well.

Mr. Marchi: Send us over a bucket.

Mr. Nault: Yes, we are having trouble swallowing it too.

Mr. Dick: That's not a bad line. You should try it on the stuff that your leader gave out today.

Direct transfers to other levels of government rose from $23.8 billion to $25.1 billion. That is a 5.2 per cent increase. In this budget we have increased payments which go directly to individuals by more than 7 per cent. They are going up to $35.8 billion in total. Transfer payments from the federal government have risen over the last year by nearly 5 per cent and combined they now total $72.6 billion. That is nearly half of all federal government spending.

Our critics say, quite irresponsibly I might add, that we are attacking post-secondary education. It seems to me that they concentrate their gaze on what is known as the EPF, or Established Programs Financing. This is money totalling nearly $10 billion. It was the Liberal government in 1977 that stopped directing the payments for specific services and no longer tied it to medicare or education. The provinces were told they could spend it on building roads if they wanted to.

It seems that the Liberals have forgotten in the last 13 years, but it was they who changed the formula and undesignated the money under the Established Programs Financing. Since then, the actual use of the federal money by the provinces is up to the provinces. They can do with it what they want. It is unqualified funding used by the provinces according to their particular priorities.

However, the fine print, which the opposition and the provinces conveniently overlook, will show also that the federal government provides additional support over and above the EPF, support of $11 billion through tax transfers. Therefore, federal EPF transfers to the provinces for 1990–91 total about $21 billion. That is 5.5 per cent higher than it was last year. Where is this crushing blow that the provinces are talking about?

Ontario, for example, will receive transfers under EPF and CAP of $9.3 billion in 1990–91. That rich province of Ontario that squawks all the time, that spends like a drunken sailor, is going to get $9.3 billion from the federal government. That is up from $9.1 billion last year. In the year 1991–92 it will increase to about $9.5 billion.

In addition to this, there is nearly $8 billion in equalization payments which go to the poorer provinces. This is primarily used by those provinces for health care and post-secondary education, but these payments are unaffected by the budget. In fact, they have nearly doubled since 1984. If we are attacking those most in need, how is it that federal spending on native and Inuit programs has nearly doubled since we came to office in 1984?

On page 76 of the budget, in the second paragraph, it indicates that in 1984–85 there was $1.4 billion spent on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That has grown to $2.3 billion in 1989–90. How is it, I ask again, that the total of important federal payments for the services Canadians need is rising by 5.5 per cent? How is it that expenditures for health care, education and other social assistance for natives has not been constrained? I think we can easily see why the nation's richest provinces—notably Ontario—are the ones that do the complaining.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are asking them to spend responsibly for a change and to share in some of the difficult decision-making that is required to put the country on a sound fiscal footing. This is the basis for their complaint. In one major program, the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government provides funding on a fifty-fifty cost-sharing basis to the provinces for social services—essential welfare and similar services. The rate of growth for the CAP assistance to the rich province of Ontario in the last few years has been increasing at an average of 14 per cent per year.

The government has controlled its program spending to 3.5 per cent for five years now. The federal government was leading all the provinces, whose profligate spending was at 9.6 per cent or higher in the last three and a half or four years. We are asking the provinces to control their spending, to reduce the pressures on inflation, to reduce the pressures on the tax dollars. We have held the growth of payments such as CAP for the province of Ontario, and also for the other rich provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, down to 5 per cent. So we are asking them to control their spending and keep it down to 5 per cent instead of the 14 per cent rate that Ontario had been spending at in the last few years.

That is why Queen's Park is squawking. They have not been able to manage their finances for the last three or four years without massive infusion of federal funds at a time when federal resources are becoming scarce. They thought that the federal treasury was an infinite source of cash; cash for life. Well, it is not, and we are asking them to tidy up their government spending habits.

This government, this Prime Minister and this Minister of Finance have acknowledged reality. It comes down to the fact that Ontario will only be affected by this lid on CAP if it chooses to increase its spending on social assistance at a rate of more than 5 per cent this year. If it does so, then we are saying they should pay the costs. If it does not, then they will have it within their own budget.

To further point out the absurdity of this complaint it must be stated that all other provinces, those not as fiscally strong as Ontario, B.C. and Alberta, will continue to have open-ended, unrestrained access to CAP funding to meet any growth in expenditures eligible for cost sharing under CAP.

Important funding continues to be transferred to the provinces. It continues to grow. The difference in this budget is that the provinces which are in the position to absorb a reduced rate will be asked to do so. There have been no cuts in payments made directly to people. In fact, these have increased, as I pointed out, by about 7 per cent.

I could use an hour to recite the many programs we have put in place to help Canadians to assist themselves, to recite the list of difficult decisions we have taken to address the debt crisis we face, tough decisions—not politically popular but tough decisions—that are taken for the betterment of Canada.

Many governments are frequently fond of speaking of the future. The fact is that the future is now; it has arrived. The bottom line is that there is a $41 billion drain on the Treasury to meet the public debt charges. The federal government alone cannot build a sound fiscal base for this country. It cannot do so if some provinces continue to chip away at this base with inflationary overspending, such as the province of Ontario has done. It should be obvious that this is a supragovernmental issue. It involves all governments, not just one. We are doing what is right for the country.

Some members of this family must stop acting like spoiled children and do their part. I would suggest that David Peterson and the province of Ontario stop acting like spoiled children. I do not think that by asking the rich provinces to give some thought to value before spending the money the federal government gives them is asking too much.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, further to the minister's last comments, I would like to talk about "spoiled children". I may remind the minister, and this concerns his departmental responsibilities, that yesterday he was asked in the House why the government had set up offices for the government's most important ministers in various regions across the country, at a cost of about $1.6 million, which is exactly the amount cut from women's programs, which, if I am not mistaken, supported 80 centres. These centres helped women in this country deal with problems in their daily lives.

Does the minister feel that women are among what he called the "spoiled children of this system," because they are complaining, and rightly so, about this government's complete indifference to their problems? How can he justify a decision he made as the minister of his department to spend $1.6 million on large ministerial offices in big office buildings in Halifax and elsewhere? How does he reconcile that with the fact that women are now saying: You don't have the right to cut $1.6 million from programs which are there to help women take care of themselves and achieve a better understanding of what they can do with their lives? How can you reconcile cuts in women's programs with this excessive spending to accommodate the government's most important ministers?

[English]

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting question. I tried to answer it in yesterday's Question Period, when I pointed out that about four years ago the government announced it would open up regional ministerial offices rather than have the exorbitant spending of the previous government whereby many ministers opened up very expensive departmental offices in their own constituencies or the nearest city to them. That is what the Liberals had done.

I also want to point out that these are offices which are available to all ministers to use whenever they are in that area. We have tried to consolidate and lower the costs in total. I think it was a very wise and sensible way of trying to go ahead and do that.

Mr. Gauthier: Why cut the women's programs?

Mr. Dick: Now, the member asks why we cut certain programs. Decisions are made. It was not in my ministry. There are other ministries to which he would perhaps like to put the question. Ministers put priorities on things. Certain programs, over a period of time, perhaps are not as high in priority as other programs. I point out to the hon. member who just spoke that it was this government which recognized the difficulty of battered women and battered wives and put up the $40 million. His government never did it in the 14 years it was in office. It was this government which did that for the first time when we announced $42 million. So remember that for a change. You did nothing most of the time except spend money ridiculously.

Mr. Gauthier: What bloody nonsense.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that I would get a very clear answer to my question. I find it particularly alarming that there is a stubbornness on the part of government members who are unable to admit and accept that one of the reasons for spiralling costs in some provinces is that transfer payments were cut in 1986 and they continue to be cut. This means that the provinces will have to pay more.

There is an inability to admit, or perhaps to understand, that the transfer is both cash and tax points. Tax points do not put a whole lot of bread on the table.

• (1230)

Mr. Dick: They don't?

Mr. Duhamel: No, there is not and I would challenge you to debate that publicly.

Mr. Dick: I would sure like to have a few of them.

Mr. Duhamel: There is an inability to accept that certain provinces are growing rapidly and some of the increased costs are wrapped up in that growth.

I am appalled that you would not be fair to another level of government, and I would suggest that if you feel as strongly as you do I could put in a call and organize a debate between Mr. Peterson and yourself or Mr. Nixon and yourself to see who is right.

The hon. member and some of his colleagues have mentioned the choices that they have had to make and there is a suggestion that they have been tough choices. Let us look at some of those choices: Defence: 5 per cent increase; CSIS: 20 per cent increase.

Mr. Dick: You call that an increase, you have to call cap an increase too. It's the same 5 per cent.

Mr. Duhamel: It is not. You misunderstand it completely. I am shocked that you would not understand it, and we can debate that if you want.

How is it that you chose to cut transfers to health and education and you gave increases to defence and CSIS, and I mentioned the percentages, 5 per cent and 20 per cent? Would you not be rather concerned that these cuts that you have undertaken in health and education will affect young people, the elderly, the sick, the veterans, women, our aboriginal people, regions?

Would you not agree with me, and this is not intended to be unparliamentary, I will be very gentle here, that it is a bit of a wimpish kind of decision to exercise those choices, because picking on children, the elderly, the sick, women, aboriginal people, veterans, people who are not well represented, people who come from small regions does not demand strong decisive action. Would you not agree that people who did that could easily be called wimps?

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to hear that the hon. member recognizes what the Liberal Party always has been and that is wimpish, because the Liberal Party has caused the difficulty for all of the disadvantaged in this country. The Liberals spent money so fast and so carelessly that in the long run, if we did not correct the situation over the last five and a half years and during the next three years, those are the people who will be disadvantaged in this country in the years to come.

Let me be more precise. It is the province of Ontario which has exceeded spending by 9.5 per cent, an amount which is increasing, and is the most inflationary of all the provincial governments. Ontario has 3.8 per cent, 4.2 per cent unemployment in the golden horseshoe and cannot even find people to do some of the jobs there because of the high rate of employment. It keeps on pumping more money into the system which also causes the Bank of Canada to increase the interest rate to try to cool the inflationary pressures which hurt Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, northern Saskatchewan. The Liberals do not care about that. They only care about the cities. That is the way their governments were in the past as well.

The member stated that there was an increase of 5 per cent. We cut back defence spending—I think it is $280 million over the next two years, limited to a 5 per cent cap which will take care of inflation. That is the same 5 per cent cap that we are cutting back the Canada Assistance Plan. That will not be allowed to grow by more than 5 per cent. Same thing. It covers inflation for Ontario, B.C., and Alberta.

Mr. Duhamel: Health and education.

Mr. Dick: The member forgets that in 1977 when the Liberals were in power they traded away for a couple of tax points the tie-in of EDP programs to education. Those do not mean the same thing any more. They are not tied to that. The provinces, 13 years later, would like to tie it to that. But they were told then that they would be entitled to spend it on highways, if they wanted to. They could spend it on hospitals, or they could spend it on education, but they were not required to. So that tie is no longer there as a result of the Liberal change in 1977.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, and I believe it will be a 10-minute speech, plus five minutes for questions and comments.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that I am able to take part in this debate today. I am not doing it with a sense of satisfaction because when I look at this budget, and in spite of the fact it is stated there are no tax increases I am very embarrassed, as I am sure most Canadians are, about the shabby way that this budget treats our veterans.

There are 1,500 veterans in all who will be affected by this budget. It is going to cost them an additional $17.3 million. It will cost them an extra $240 a month in 1990 and $420 a month in 1991, with another $18 million cut over the next two years for heavy spring cleaning and housekeeping for veterans. This affects 60,000 veterans under the Veterans Independence Program.

I must remind this government that veterans paid their price when they walked into battle for all Canadians.

In 1985, the Conservative government doubled the board and lodging rate to $240 a month, and yet this is the first time the rate has been changed since the program was established in 1949. It is certainly not acceptable in my mind and in the minds of my constituents to cut the financial assistance for all these institutionalized veterans' room and board, home nursing and housekeeping by $35 million. Our veterans made their contribution and the government should not be betraying their sacrifice in such a callous way.

This 1990 budget also leads to cutbacks for our post-secondary school education and health services as funding for these universal programs will be decreased by $22.1 billion by 1995. This budget could well be the start of the systematic erosion of our Canadian health care system by this federal government. Our universities will be forced to admit students on the merits of their bank accounts rather than on their marks.

The federal government is quickly putting post-secondary school education beyond the grasp of many Canadians. The Canadian Federation of Students estimates that this cut will increase tuition by approximately $2,000 a year for the individual.

Cutting $423 million in the post-secondary school budget for 1990-91 will be the equivalent of shutting down the University of Western Ontario, Fanshawe College and Lambton College for almost two years. It must also be remembered that this cut comes on the heels of an announcement last week that the Student Summer Employment Program would be reduced by $296 million over the next five years.

In terms of credibility, in the 1986 budget the Minister of Finance predicted a deficit of $12 billion for the fiscal year 1990-91 in a favourable economy. Despite the excellent economic growth of the last seven years, the minister is now projecting a deficit of $28.5 billion. This is more than twice his estimate of four years ago. Now this minister expects Canadians to believe that despite the highest interest rates in seven years; projections of 1.3 million more workers being unemployed, and overall lower economic growth the deficit will be down to $21 billion in 1992-93 and $14 billion in 1993-94. So much for his predictions. Clearly this government is abusing the faith of the taxpayers who have contributed immensely through huge tax increases and decreased government services.

If the only way the minister can manage to reduce the deficit to less that $30 billion is to increase the provinces' costs by $2.5 billion over the next two years, he has clearly mismanaged the government's finances. Either he has shifted the burden onto the backs of the veterans and the students, or onto the backs of the provinces and transferred this responsibility to the provinces.

We have also spoken in this House on a good many occasions of what is happening across rural Canada. I have to speak out on this today during the budget debate. I look at what happened as a result of the budget one year ago, the list of cuts that took place and the programs that were discontinued. There is nothing in this budget to enhance the livelihood of the people living in rural Canada. With the hardships that have unfolded over the last month and a half to two months, it is unbelievable that this government could be so callous.

For example, in the budget of 1989, $60 million was added to farm costs, $300 million was cut from several long-standing farm programs, and the federal budget last year cost the prairie farmers alone $1,000 each. The budget list of cuts last year was: $200 million from crop insurance, $60 million from the at and east legislation under the Department of Transport, rail branchline rehabilitation program $48 million, grain and crop advance payments $54 million, dairy exports $12 million, commodity based loans $15 million, and the Canadian Dairy Commission $10 million.

Those are actual cuts in programs that have served the farmers of this country very well over the years. To cut them at a time like this when farmers are facing tremendous economic downturns in the prices they receive is not acceptable. When I look at what has happened to compound this problem across the rest of Canada, I have to wonder just where this government is taking us.

I look at what has happened in pork production across Canada, exports to the United States have dropped dramatically in the first three weeks of January alone this year. Last year there were 12.5 per cent less producers in the province of Ontario than the year before. In Middlesex county there were 13.9 per cent less and in Lambton county 12.45 per cent less producers in one year.

This industry is being very hard-hit by the government, its programs, and particularly by the free trade agreement with the United States and the lack of an agreement with the United States that the U.S. trade remedy laws would not apply to Canada and to our exports. In the words of the Clayton Yeutter, "those laws remain intact and secure". On top of that, the Americans passed the omnibus Trade Bill in the fall of 1988 that makes a mockery of the whole free trade agreement.

Across Canada there is a forecast drop in farm income of 39 per cent for the year 1990, Manitoba will drop 87 per cent, Alberta will drop by 66 per cent, Ontario will drop by 8 per cent, but Saskatchewan's realized net income will drop by 101 per cent.

I am sure we all heard the Premier of Saskatchewan on television last night, begging for help from the federal government, help that is not forthcoming, unless the government gives him another billion dollars to help him through the next provincial election. This is what happened a few years ago. Let us see if it happens again. If it does, we are going to be demanding that this help be available to all Canadian farmers.

I want to go a little further and make a comparison about what is happening here in Canada, where we are asked to compete for world markets. I want to put it on record that under the United States program of acreage set-asides and the target prices and deficiency payments, United States producers have a distinct advantage over our Canadian producers. All we ask is for a similar payment now that is comparable to that of the United States. Let us have it for the Canadian farmers to keep agriculture as a viable industry, to keep these people on their farms so they can produce a crop this year.

If the U.S. deficiency payment is 60 cents a bushel, and that is what is forecast for this year for corn, about half is available at the time of sign-up for the program which is this month of March. That money is in their pockets so they can buy the input items needed for crops, whether fertilizer, chemicals, pesticides, herbicides or seed.

If the average yield is 120 bushels per acre, the United States producer would receive that $36 an acre this month. Converted into Canadian funds, that averages over $40 an acre the farmer will receive this month to help him through this tough period. We do not have that in Canada, because this government has failed to realize the need that we have to compete in world markets. If we are going to compete in those world markets, we have to have equal programs.

I also wish to point out the costs of these inputs are 25 per cent greater in Canada than they are in the United States. Canadian farmers do not have the support from the government. Under the current crop prices, they cannot even cash flow their input costs or their anticipated returns after harvest. It is simply not there. Consequently, the lending institutions in Canada are refusing operating loans to our Canadian farmers for this year in numbers that are unprecedented in Canadian history. It is worse now than it was in the 1930s. Last night we heard on television that one third of the farmers in Saskatchewan are in deep financial trouble and another third are in serious trouble.

We in the Official Opposition have spoken of these issues time and time again in this Chamber. We spoke of the cut-backs in the agriculture expenditures in the leaked budget of last year and the impact on the rural economy, but to no avail. I suppose with the pending election in Saskatchewan this year, this government will again come to the rescue and provide a bail-out so our fellow Tories can continue their mismanagement of the economy in that province.

Times are tough in other sectors of the Canadian agricultural economy and farmers in all provinces need help. Farmers in Alberta, in Manitoba and in Ontario need help at this critical time of year when they are gearing up for planting. I ask this government to now make food security in Canada a matter of national security. I ask the government to act now to save this once vibrant agricultural community so that Canadian consumers will have an abundant quantity of good, wholesome, high-quality Canadian food available to them.

I ask this government to dissociate itself from the current manipulative free market system of our neighbours to the south, where the commodity exchange is being sued by American farmers for manipulation of prices, where their export enhancement program puts downward pressure on world prices. In fact, their acreage set-aside program and target prices actually impact very heavily on our world prices.

I ask this government to give notice of withdrawal from the free trade agreement and recognize that nature alone dictates that there is no level playing field.

I ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw this budget, prepare a new one, one that recognizes the importance of our resource industries that have been decimated by the policies of this government, a budget that will ensure the availability of those resources for future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, particularly when he spoke about the credibility of the projections of the Minister of Finance and pointed out that three years ago the Minister of Finance projected that the deficit would be something like $14 billion and now it is $28 billion. It is very easy for the minister to give glowing assessments of what he is going to do four and five years in advance but they never seem to materialize.

The hon. member is an experienced member and I am rather new in this House. I would like him to comment on the fact that, if my memory serves me, the Minister of Finance based his projections for the budget deficit on an interest rate of 10.5 per cent. Unless I have missed something in the last two or three weeks, I think that the actual bank rate is in excess of 13 per cent.

When one looks at the implications for the economy of a 3 per cent interest rate miscalculation by the Minister of Finance, the difference between 10 per cent and 13 per cent is a 30 per cent miscalculation. What impact does the hon. member feel that that has had on the deficit? What impact does he feel it has had on the farm community, particularly on farm debt, farm operating costs and farm borrowing? In fact, are many of the problems that farmers now have not due to the miscalculations of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Ferguson: I want to thank the hon. member for the question, Mr. Speaker. He is absolutely right. The terrible mistake by the Minister of Finance and his miscalculations are such that we should demand the resignation not only of the Minister of Finance but his advisers, because this is at the root of the problem with the rural economy. We have interest rates that are 5 per cent higher than those in the United States. Our input costs on production costs alone are so much higher than those of the United States. When the interest rates are added on, it puts us in a position where we simply cannot compete as effectively for the world markets.

I strongly suspect the government is trying to keep the interest rates up to appease the corporate structures that want a higher dollar, and whether or not that is part of the free trade agreement we will probably never know. However, if the dollar is allowed to float down to perhaps the mid-seventies, then our exports will be far more competitive on world markets and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this budget debate today. This budget is just the latest wedge that widens even further the gap between the two Canadas. There are two Canadas growing in this country and they have been growing since this government took office. I am not talking about linguistic groups. I am talking about the wealthy Canadians and the poor Canadians, the rich and the poor Canadians, those who have and those who do not have. This budget is the latest massive wedge that widens that gap.

Let me take my own area, for example. I am not going to talk about the government's lack of action on the most critical issue and that is the fishery. I am not going to talk about the fact that there was no mention at all of the fishery, not even the word fishery was mentioned in the budget, nor were there any funds for dealing with that most serious crisis. I am not going to talk about that resource. I am not going to talk about the offshore oil. I am not going to talk about the fact that there is no ongoing development at Hibernia which would create jobs in the area which has the highest unemployment rate in Canada. I am not going to talk about the Lower Churchill. I am not going to talk about the fact that although the Prime Minister promised five times on the floor of this House in the last Parliament to develop that particular resource, it is not going. It is not producing hydro power, it is not producing economic and industrial development and jobs. I am not going to talk about that resource, or the fishery, oil, or hydro power. I am going to talk about the most important resource that we have, and that is our young people.

What this budget did was to widen the gap between our young people and their access and opportunity and young people elsewhere in the country. I am going to talk about Established Programs Financing. The government will say there were no cuts, there is an annual increase in Established Programs Financing. The reality is that the gap is growing between what the government promised and indeed what the government contracted with the provinces for transfer payments for education and health. That contract between the two powers was abrogated unilaterally by the Government of Canada and the Minister of Finance because he said: "You will not get the money you had expected, you had anticipated, we had promised, we had contracted with you."

In my own province that is $162 million over five years that goes to pay for education and health. Thirty per cent of that amount goes into post-secondary education. That means the Minister of Finance in Newfoundland is going to have to find $50 million over the next five years that he had expected the Government of Canada to pay. He fully expected, as a result of the five year agreement, an agreement entered into by two levels of government, that he would get that money. He is going to have to find that money somewhere, because that province and that government has committed to post-secondary education as a priority, as an absolute necessity, if we are ever going to break out of this mold that we are in.

Not only did the Minister of Finance take away—or however you want to define it or describe it—$50 million from the students of Newfoundland, but in addition the Government of Canada has cut by 35 per cent the summer employment program that gives summer employment to hundreds of students in my province and in my riding that helps to finance their post-secondary education.

Third, the government has put what it calls an administrative fee, but is really a 3 per cent tax on Canada student loans which 50 per cent of all students use to help pay for their food, lodging and tuition fees.

Therefore, there is the cut in the Established Programs Financing, the cut in the summer employment program, and a 3 per cent tax on Canada student loans.

I also want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, how the government will treat students under the goods and services tax. Students with earned income of less than $6,900 will not be eligible for the goods and services tax credit. They are going to be taxed along with everyone else. They will not be exempt. This will be an additional financial burden. Sales from university bookstores will be fully taxable by the goods and services tax. Student transportation by bus, train, taxi, ship and plane will be fully taxed by the goods and services tax. Renters will not get a rebate from the goods and services tax, although purchasers of new homes, people who have their education, people who are married or young couples who want to buy homes will be able to get a rebate. Students who rent apartments or live in boarding houses will not get a rebate under the goods and services tax. Meals and take-out food will be fully taxed by the goods and services tax.

The first part of that wedge is the wedge that the minister has driven between young people in my area and in the rest of Canada. An education, I want to point out, is not a cost but an investment. Let me go on to other aspects of this.

The women's program has been cut. There will be women's groups who will not be able to survive. We have already seen a number of women's organizations that have shut down in Canada because of the cut to the funds of the Secretary of State.

Let me point out the double difficulty that women find themselves in. Seventy per cent of all part-time students in this country are women. If we relate that to the point that I was making about the cuts in post-secondary education, we will see that women now are not doubly disadvantaged but triply disadvantaged by the effects of this budget.

One of the most fundamental ways in which women achieve equality is through education. There is a direct correlation between the amount of education you have and the amount of money you make in this country. If women are ever going to be able to become equal and independent, they have to have access to education. What this budget does is to say: "Shut down your offices. Shut down your affirmative action, but also you are denied further access to post-secondary education." I think that that is the real sin of this particular budget.

Let me get onto a third group that is less powerful and less rich in this country, and that is the native people. I heard the questions yesterday in the House of Commons and I heard the minister talk about increases to DIAND. Sure, there are increases to DIAND for land claims. However, the question that was not answered by the Secretary of State is why he sat at the table and allowed his native programs to be cut. Twenty-three million dollars was cut out of the program of the Secretary of State, $19 million of which was for native people.

There was a newspaper in Main, Labrador in English and Inuktitut that goes all along the northern coast and provides a voice, a meeting place and an educational tool, an expression for native people in northern Labrador. It has been completely wiped out, completely shut down, and the staff have been laid off. Your voice is muted. Your voice is cut off. Your voice is expendable because it is less powerful. The radio station in Main, Labrador in both languages of English and Inuktitut, again provided a voice for the voiceless, some political power, some expression.

What people in the south do not understand is that we are inundated with Vanna White, with American sitcoms. It is bad enough for people who live in the south, the amount of choice they have, given the CBC, but when you live in the north it is doubly difficult to survive as a culture and as a people with the sea of programming that comes from the south. Those native newspapers and radio stations gave people in the north a way to talk back.

There were a lot of other things that happened, not just in this budget but outside this budget. Let me just tell you about one more thing, Mr. Speaker. The Post Office has said to people in the north: "You can no longer ship food through the mail." My colleague, the member for eastern Arctic raised that matter a while ago. You can ship Ski-doo parts through the mail. If your Ski-doo breaks down you can ship a fan belt or a part of your engine through the mail. You can ship any of that through the mail. But you cannot ship milk. If your baby is sick, you cannot ship milk through the mail. That is what this government has done to people in the north.

It is a vicious circle for us. We are being punished because of the hot economy of Ontario, yet more and more of our people are moving to Ontario every day. We do not want that. We want to have a way to survive in our own area as contributing Canadians and not receiving Canadians.

This budget does not help people who are weak and powerless in Canada. This budget drives a larger wedge into the ever-widening gap between the two Canadas, the rich Canada and the poor Canada, the powerful Canada and the powerless Canada, the have Canada and the have-not Canada. This government has got to be called to account for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have five minutes for questions and comments after three o'clock today, if he wishes.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1.02 p.m. the House took recess.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs says that there have not been any cuts to the Veterans Independence Program, yet the department itself is saying that it will save $9 million a year by cutting out heavy house cleaning for veterans.

There were only 19,000 veterans in 1989 who applied for any kind of housekeeping assistance from Veterans Affairs. Either there are a lot of wealthy cleaners in the country or the veterans are not being told the truth. I think that there is a good deal more that is being cut than just the heavy house cleaning which the government says is being cut.

The freedom and dignity of veterans to be able to remain in their own homes as long as possible is a right and not a privilege depending on the size of the deficit in this country.

Veterans have fought for their country. They have paid enough. This is the time to honour veterans, not to short change them as this ungrateful government is doing.

OPEN HOUSE CANADA PROGRAM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Open House Canada was to fund reciprocal group exchange projects for young people across the country and thus increase the awareness of young Canadians in the Abitibi area of their national identity and their desire for unity.

One of this program's priorities was to organize exchanges with rural or isolated communities in Canada, and there was also a special focus on the disabled and the economically disadvantaged.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has dropped this program for direct exchanges between schools effective April 1, 1990, and Le Tremplin secondary school in Malartic is one of the victims.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's isolated areas deserve to see this program maintained. It is a sad commentary that this country's isolated areas have once again been hit by cutbacks.

TELEMIRACLE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the people of Saskatchewan rallied to support the fourteenth annual Kinsmen Foundation Telemiracle. The telethon raises money to help those in Saskatchewan with physical, mental and emotional disabilities.

This year's effort successfully raised $1.8 million, which is down just slightly from last year. However, given the slow prairie economy it is obvious that we cannot judge the size of the peoples' hearts by the size of their wallets. Under the present economic conditions the level of support for Telemiracle is a tribute to all Saskatchewan people.

I am told that the Kinsmen Telemiracle continues to lead the world in contributions for charity on a per capita basis.

It is apparent that Saskatchewan remains a place where people really do care about their neighbours and their communities. I know that the money raised will be put to good use and that next year's Telemiracle will be bigger than ever.

Congratulations, Kinsmen.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, Associate Chief Justice Jerome of the Federal Court, Trial Division, ruled yesterday that the initial humanitarian and compassionate hearing for persons in Canada's 100,000 refugee backlog is illegal and wrongful because the minister's restrictive guidelines contradict Section 114(2) of the Immigration Act.

This means that claimants ought to be admitted on any kind of humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

In view of the huge and growing $200 million mess caused by the government's unconscionable delays and mismanagement of the refugee claims, I call on the Minister of Employment and Immigration immediately to direct immigration staff to use the broad guidelines for long-term de facto residents in Canada as the only basis for all humanitarian and compassionate review of backlog cases.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, after 17 days of stubborn resistance the Hagersville tire fire is finally out.

Day after day I watched heavy equipment operators and volunteer fire-fighters work long hours in smoke, heat and mud. They left their jobs and their farms to fight the fire. Evacuees were taken in by friends and family.

The people of Haldimand—Norfolk have really shown us the meaning of community.

We have learned a lot about environmental disasters in the past three weeks. There is still a lot to be learned with the clean up and determining what environmental damage still may exist.

What is abundantly clear is the competent way in which the volunteer fire-fighters did their jobs and conquered the blaze. On behalf of the residents of Haldimand—Norfolk and members of the House I extend our gratitude and thanks for a job well done.

In recognition of the dedicated teamwork that is characteristic of volunteer fire-fighters across Canada, I would ask members of the House to support my motion to increase the present $500 tax exemption on honorariums these fire-fighters receive when it comes before the House. It is the least Canada can do to recognize the great contribution these volunteers make to our country.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, one of Canada's efforts to go global has met with success in Japan recently with the sale of 250 tonnes of beef to that country. There is also the potential for further sales in this major growth market outside North America.

The Canadian Beef Export Federation has opened an office in Tokyo. This is seen as a positive step by Japanese companies, one which will facilitate information dispersal and promote new ideas.

Agricultural producers must continue to look to the Pacific Rim countries as potential future markets and initiate the promotion of our many agricultural resources.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, where is this government's sense of justice and reality in the priorities it chose for spending cuts?

Democracy is threatened by the slashing of $23 million in Secretary of State funding for native people, ethnic minorities and women's programs. These cuts will eliminate community services, publications and advocacy groups that are essential for powerless groups struggling to achieve equality.

At the same time as $23 million is being cut from these citizen organizations over $23 million will be spent to cover program expenditures of the decadent, unelected, patronage ridden Senate of Canada.

Women's programs which operate on a shoe string were cut by $1.6 million, while $1.6 million will be spent just to renovate committee rooms of the Senate. Women's centres that provide sanctuary, support and services for abused women, visible minority and immigrant women, poor women and those who are working long hours for equality will be forced to close, while $1.6 million desperately needed by these women will be spent to replace red carpets and gold trimming for an outdated, redundant Senate.

I call on this uncaring government to celebrate International Women's Week by changing its priorities and reinstating funding for women's programs and women's centres across Canada.

Let's abolish the Senate in favour of citizen democracy.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, last week the Canadian Coast Guard held a public meeting with residents of Grand Manan Island to discuss plans to destaff the lighthouse on Gannet Rock.

This light located in the middle of the Bay of Fundy is an important navigational device for the hundreds of ships travelling to and from the Port of Saint John. The Irving Oil Company alone ships over 50 million barrels of crude oil through the shipping channels for processing at the refinery.

Fishing and tourism are the pillars of the economy for the residents of Grand Manan. An accident in the Bay of Fundy could cause an environmental disaster in the region and effectively wipe out a way of life that dates back over 100 years.

I urge the Minister of Transport to listen to the concerns raised by the people of Grand Manan and ensure the points they have brought forward will be taken into consideration prior to any final decision on the future of the lighthouse on Gannet Rock.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, Canada's crisis in research, science and technology has been further aggravated by the government's decision to cut science and technology spending by $39 million and to reduce transfers to the provinces for education.

The national consortium of scientific and educational societies representing over 500,000 researchers and students is on Parliament Hill this week to tell us that the Prime Minister's rhetoric about doubling our R and D effort is simply not enough.

If Canada is to meet the challenges of a changing world, we must act now.

I urge all members to meet with the consortium and hear its recommendations.

(1) that there be no further reduction in transfers for post-secondary education;

(2) that the matching grants policy be incorporated into the base budgets of the granting councils and that these budgets be doubled;

(3) that R and D performance by the federal government be increased, not diminished; and

(4) that financial barriers to higher education in Canada be eliminated.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, last night the finance critic of the Official Opposition, with one wave of his verbal wand, branded several members of the Tory back benches as being among those who opposed the GST.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I stand before you to say that I, the member for Selkirk, support the goods and services tax and, more important, the policies of the government and my colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance.

I say this as a member of the unduly generalized Tory back benches.

• (1410)

The goods and services tax has several advantages which the manufacturers' sales tax does not possess. One of the greatest strengths, of course, is the fact that it will benefit this country and not its foreign competitors. For this reason and many more I support the GST.

I believe the time has come for the Liberal Party to start presenting its own alternatives to the manufacturers' sales tax and stop grandstanding on an empty platform.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this Tory government has stifled debate in the House of Commons on the goods and services tax. It has ignored hundreds of thousands of people who have signed petitions against the GST. It has paid no attention to the thousands of Canadians who have protested the proposed tax through letters and rallies even in the riding of the hon. member who just spoke. The Conservative government does not care what Canadians think about the GST. It just spends money to advertise a tax that has not yet gone through Parliament.

The Liberal Party of Canada will continue its battle against this regressive tax. Unlike the Tories, we care about what Canadians think. We want to know how many Canadians oppose the GST.

The Liberal Party is sponsoring a national week of protest against the GST from March 12 to March 16. During this week Canadians from across the country can call 1-900-720-6052 to register their opposition to the tax.

Mr. Crawford: What was the number, Joe?

Mr. Fontana: If Canadians dial 1-900-720-6052 between March 12 and March 16, they will be sending the Prime Minister a clear message that this tax is unacceptable. Together we must make this government listen to the voice of Canadians.

Call 1-900-720-6052.

TAXATION

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada were able to view clear and distinct choices of the fiscal and taxation plan for Canada as enunciated by the three parties during and after last night's televised debate.

The Conservative plan was well presented and thought out, showing that through a combination of spending restraint, personal income tax reform, corporate tax reform and sales tax reform, combined with increased economic activity in both our domestic markets and offshore markets, Canada would resolve its economic difficulties.

The Liberal plan calls for another study of taxation in Canada. All the previous studies done by the Liberal Party while it was in office would again be ignored and we would embark on a very expensive, probably useless new study.

We would include in this a review of not only taxes under federal jurisdiction but also those under provincial and municipal jurisdiction. As is Liberal policy, the result would be a massive intrusion into the affairs of others by an even bigger central government.

Then there is the NDP. It wants to continue its policy of increasing personal income taxes. Its aim is to kill the goose so that Canada can become a Third World country.

I am happy to say that I support the first plan. Carry on, Mr. Wilson.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that when Canadians start calling the Liberal line on the GST they should be asking what position of the Liberal Party is that particular person supporting.

This morning in the House the Leader of the Opposition would not say whether or not he would scrap the tax if his party won the next election in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, you could choose a Liberal for almost any position. If you want to scrap the tax, there is the leadership candidate from Hamilton saying yes she would scrap the tax. We also have the finance critic for that party saying they would scrap the tax.

On the other hand, Jean Chrétien, the guy who might win the leadership of that party, is saying: "I don't know what I would do if I became prime minister. I may indeed keep that tax".

We also have a Liberal Party document of a few years ago which states that they believe in a value added tax.

Then we have that great leadership candidate from York Weston who is endorsing a flat tax, as is his colleague for Broadview—Greenwood who stole the idea from Peter Pocklington of the Tories in Alberta.

Canadians are asking: Where does the Liberal party stand? Which one are we to believe? What will they do?

BALTIC STATES

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, freedom and democracy are triumphing throughout the world. Across eastern Europe and most recently in Nicaragua people have voted against communist rule and in favour of democratic freedom.

Nowhere is the spark for freedom burning brighter than in the Baltic States. I was honoured to visit Lithuania as a guest of the Canadian Lithuanian Community and the Lithuanian freedom movement, Sajudis, to observe their historic elections. The results of those elections sent a clear and unequivocal message of change.

I join with all Canadians in congratulating the people of Lithuania for the elections and for their 50 years of struggle for freedom. The struggle may not yet be over, but the light of freedom is in sight.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister will know that this year Environment Canada says there is a strong possibility of drought in the prairie provinces.

1988 was so dry that proper moisture levels have not returned to the soil. A dry fall in 1989 and a lack of snowfall this winter may mean that the soil will still be unable to recharge its moisture content.

Yet, despite this imminent possibility, the government has cut funding for the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program from $788 million down to only $21.3 million, a drop of more than 90 per cent.

Why has this fund been cut more than 90 per cent when there is a real possibility that 1990 will be another year of serious drought for our western farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I genuinely appreciate—and I am sure all Canadians will appreciate it—the hon. member's interest in this very important issue. I hope, when the appropriate time comes to act on behalf of the agricultural industry and the prairie regions, that I will have the full support of the hon. member.

As he knows, we have responded in a very major fashion to the difficulties in the agricultural sector all across the country, but more particularly as it relates to western Canada. There has been a record pay-out in drought assistance of some $850 million. Improvements were made to the crop insurance program. There were enhancements for multi-year drought situations.

We are now in the process of mailing cheques out to the three prairie provinces on the basis of the multi-year disaster benefit program. Alberta and Manitoba have received. The figures for Saskatchewan are not in. As soon as they are in there could be payments going out on supplementary drought up to $80 million.

I should advise the hon. member as well that we are looking at what further assistance might be required.

Also, we are looking at what assistance might be required in terms of providing money, cash flow, to ensure that the crop can be put in as well as the long-term interim support programs.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not whether he and the government will have the support of the Official Opposition on this matter, but whether he will have the support of the Minister of Finance. That is the big question.

I have another question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last night the premier of Saskatchewan spoke on television and indicated that he had spoken with the Deputy Prime Minister and that the Deputy Prime Minister had agreed, and I quote, "to work out the farm financial crisis".

The Deputy Prime Minister knows that the farm financial crisis affects farmers in many provinces, not just Saskatchewan.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister assure this House and the farmers of Canada today that any financial assistance program for farmers will be available in all the provinces and not simply be confined to one province?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to the House before, we have put together a federal-provincial review committee to assess the impact of the shortfall and to assess the application of the existing programs, that is the multi-year disaster benefit program which was an enhancement to the crop insurance program incorporated last year.

We also have improvements to the crop insurance program currently before the House which will provide more long-term enhancement for crop disasters arising from drought and other weather conditions.

I can assure the hon. member that as soon as the reports come in from the federal-provincial monitoring committee which affects the industry right across the country we will assess it, look at options and come up with an appropriate program that will be cost shared as has been indicated by the respective Ministers of Agriculture of the provinces.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope western farmers and other farmers across Canada will not have to wait as long for any special program as the fishermen of Atlantic Canada have been waiting. They have hurt a lot and they have got nothing so far.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Saskatchewan also said that, together with the Deputy Prime Minister, he would be meeting representatives of our major financial institutions, to determine ways of helping farmers who are having trouble restructuring their debts.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Can he guarantee that the government will make the banks and various loan institutions help our farmers restructure their debts? Can he also guarantee before this House that he will take action before all family farms in this country have disappeared? Could he answer this question right away?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that I have met with the premier of Saskatchewan. It is recognized that the problem in Saskatchewan is very critical because of the drought and because of its particular type of agriculture, which is basically grain and oilseeds.

The problem is threefold. First, there is the issue of the current shortage of cash to get the crop in. Second, there is the long-term debt situation. Third, it relates to the long-term income support program which is part and parcel of the agricultural review.

As the hon. member should know, the grain stabilization programs and the safety nets that have been in place have been put through the supreme test. We are in the process of re-evaluating and re-examining in an attempt to come up with better safety nets. That process is ongoing.

Whatever we do in the course of providing long-term income support, we hope that it can lead to a longer term support system.

In so far as his reference to the banks is concerned, yes, we do meet on a regular basis. Inasmuch as we have met on previous occasions with the banks and other lending institutions, we will be undertaking the same thing to ensure that there is that kind of compassion to which the hon. member refers.

I should also point out that the farm debt review board was an initiative of this government and that process has gone a long way to alleviating some of the difficulties and the hardships as they relate to farmers who are found to be in serious difficulty in defraying their payments and dealing with their long-term debt program. We intend to continue to work in that regard as well.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the two ministers responsible for immigration, I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, in a landmark ruling, the Federal Court ruled that the government's system to process the over 125,000 refugee claimants in the refugee backlog is illegal. This ruling serves to confirm the concerns that we on this side of the House have been expressing and raising with the government for months on end.

In light of this fatal blow from the Federal Court, will the government do the right and appropriate thing and abandon its current refugee backlog clearance system and replace it immediately with a fair, more efficient, more humane administrative review, something that the Official Opposition had asked this government for over one year ago?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has not yet had an opportunity to study the reasons for the court's decision, as the court has yet to release those reasons. It would therefore be premature to comment upon the possible impact of the decision.

However, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and her officials have had an opportunity to review Justice Jerome's oral reasons, and appropriate decisions will be made quickly as to how the government will react.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to also congratulate the minister who has been elevated to cabinet with new responsibilities. Not to undermine his appointment, the refugee claimants, the system and Canadians deserve a better answer.

I would like to put my question again to the Deputy Prime Minister. The government cannot run or hide from the reality that the backlog system has been universally condemned, whether by the NGOs, the parliamentary committee or the legal entities of our country.

Given that only 6 per cent of all claimants have been processed, that it will take six years to clear the backlog at the present rate at a $200 million expense and at an increased human expense in terms of human misery, why is the government stubbornly refusing in the face of this mounting opposition simply to repeal and fix not only a broken system, but a system that has now been rendered illegal by our courts?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that each person in the backlog has made a claim to be a convention refugee and therefore is entitled to a decision on the merits of that claim. The primary question, therefore, continues to be one of refugee determination.

This government is aware of the concerns of backlog claimants and of the interest of Canadians in seeing this issue resolved. We will respond to Justice Jerome's decision as quickly as possible but cannot at this time engage in speculation which can only add to the uncertainty experienced by backlog claimants.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the recent budget the Minister of Finance and this government cut $3 billion from programs which aid battered women, the regions, support post-secondary education and provide minimal assistance to the poor, as well as other programs that address those areas in our society.

At the same time tax breaks for large corporations were allowed, and I cite some examples. Brascan earned some $262 million last year and paid not one cent. Edper Enterprises made $52 million and paid not one cent. Fletcher Challenge made $24 million and paid not one cent.

Is it not now time to introduce a minimum corporate tax so that everyone pays their fair share?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a result of a number of decisions that this government has taken both in corporate income tax reform in 1987–88, as well as a number of other times during the course of the past five years, we have removed many, many tax loopholes that large corporations have been using. There are reasons individual corporations that are profitable are not paying taxes.

If she wants to identify a specific tax provision that she wants to see removed that allows for these corporations not to pay tax, one of them being the fact that they have losses in previous years and carry forward those losses to apply against current year profits and apply their taxes on that, then let us listen to and hear what she has to say.

I hear again that she is calling for a corporate minimum tax of 20 per cent. Small businesses pay a corporate tax of 12 per cent. How is she going to deal with the thousands and thousands of small businesses which are only paying 12 per cent tax?

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. In his budget, the Minister cut transfer payments for health and postsecondary education by about one billion dollars this year and 1.5 billion for next year.

Meanwhile, deductions for business meals and entertainment have been maintained. These deductions represent a total of nearly one billion dollars annually.

Will the Minister of Finance finally decide to abolish these deductions which are unacceptable and make the government lose such vast amounts of money?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these deductions are important to businesses competing with the United States that have that precise same tax deduction. We need a tax system in Canada that is competitive with the United States. This is very important to the creation of jobs in Canada.

If we are to have a corporate tax system that is not competitive with the United States, that has higher tax rates than the United States, then a very simple result will happen.

• (1430)

Companies are going to settle in the United States. They will create new investment in the United States and with that jobs will be created in the United States and not in Canada.

If the New Democratic Party policy is to move jobs from Canada to the United States, then that is exactly what will happen with the policies that she is proposing.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the biggest policy which has moved jobs from Canada to the United States is the trade deal and the minister knows that. I also remind the minister that the United States has a minimum corporate tax.

In 1987, when the Minister of Finance introduced the budget he said and I quote:

> Our fundamental strategy in reviewing the corporate income tax is to ensure that profitable corporations pay their fair share. We must further reduce the source of the problem by cutting back special corporate tax write-offs.

In spite of that promise, corporate profits that escape tax have grown from $15 billion to $27 billion since he took that job. How does the minister justify these tax cuts to large corporations when he is asking every Canadian to pay an extra 7 per cent through the goods and services tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised four specific points in that question and I want to address each one of them.

First, in the last couple of years we have had very high levels of investment in this country directly related to companies getting ready for the free trade agreement, and that has created jobs here in Canada. It has created a more competitive Canadian economy precisely as a result of the free trade agreement.

The second point that my hon. colleague makes is that there is a corporate minimum tax in the United States. She is correct. There is also a much higher tax rate on small businesses in the United States. Is she proposing that we increase the tax rate on small business so we can have a corporate minimum tax here? I do not think so but that is the result of the question that she has asked.

The third point I make is that corporations today are paying more tax, including corporations that were not paying any tax before. Her colleagues have asked in the past how a bank teller could pay more tax than the bank itself. As a result of corporate income tax reform in 1988, banks today are now paying hundreds of millions of dollars of corporate tax, directly as a result of corporate tax reform.

The final point that I would make with my colleague in response to her question is that corporate profits are down this year. That is one reason why corporate taxes are down. If she looks at the effective corporate tax rate this year compared with 1987 she will see that the effective corporate tax rate is up this year compared to three years ago.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, the Deputy Prime Minister. Last November I asked the minister what action he was prepared to take in light of the demand by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and other groups like the Ontario Corn Producers to assist in the farm financial crisis facing farmers right across the country. Since November the situation has worsened: moisture levels are low, world grain prices are low, farm debt is worse and interest rates have risen.

Why do the Deputy Prime Minister and the government refuse to act in light of this tragedy facing Canadian farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is not refusing to act. It is very active in assessing the magnitude of the difficulties and trying to bring about and look at a number of options.

We are still waiting for the preliminary crop data from the province of Saskatchewan so we can send out the supplementary drought benefit payments which are due to them as a result of the enhanced crop insurance program that we put in place last year. We must have that information before we can accurately define the problem. When we accurately define the problem we will accurately provide a solution.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in 1986 the Prime Minister provided $1 billion when the Premier of Saskatchewan was facing a political disaster in the middle of an election campaign.

Now, tens of thousands of farmers face the loss of the land, including the premier himself. With seeding only two months away, can the minister say when he is going to act? Is he going to respond to the demand the premier made last night that at least $500 million be provided for spring seeding, which is only a couple of months away, so that these farmers can get ready for the crop year? Will he provide the equivalent proportionate amount of money to other farmers across the country? Will the Deputy Prime Minister respond?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member earlier, we are assessing the magnitude of the difficulty and are trying to devise some options that will respond to that difficulty.

As I indicated, we are eager to send out supplementary drought cheques. The cheques have gone out to the province of Manitoba and the province of Alberta under the multi-year disaster program. Saskatchewan could be receiving up to $80 million under that particular program depending upon the figures, when they come in.

We are also looking at what might be necessary in terms of short term cash flow necessity, as well as the longer term income support which hopefully can be tied into a long term safety net proposal that is currently being discussed by a special committee that was set up. We are not stepping away from the problem; we have not in the past, we are not today and we won't in the future.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. He has just heard his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, commit to providing major assistance to farmers across Canada as they face drought conditions, financial debt problems and increasing international competition.

I have a very simple question for the Minister of Finance. Where is the money going to come from? The Minister of Finance has cut the drought assistance estimates by $736 million. He has cut the reserve fund by 47 per cent. He has committed to the financial markets to hold the deficit line at $28.5 billion to meet his interest rate projections. There is no flexibility, no reserve and no contingency.

Will the Minister of Finance guarantee today that he will live up to the financial commitment?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what I will commit to today is that I will not go through with the spending record of the former Liberal governments: 1969 to 1970, 1970 to 1974, 17.9 per cent annual increase; 1979–80 to 1984–85, 14 per cent.

We have held our spending at 3.6 per cent. We are committed to holding it this year to a 3 per cent increase.

Mr. Crawford: Answer the question, Mike.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The answer to the question is that we have taken the prudent action of having reserves that are in our spending program this year so we can respond to contingencies like my colleagues talks about in the agricultural sector—

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): When?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —like colleagues opposite have asked on the fisheries issues. We have moneys—

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): We haven't seen it. We have gone bankrupt.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well now the hon. member's mouth is moving faster than her brain.

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): Do something. People are going down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is simply blowing in the wind. He knows that his government has made commitments to bail out fishermen. He is now saying they have money in the reserve fund for the farmers, but he has cut the reserve fund by 47 per cent.

There is no money there to meet these commitments. We want to know when this government is going to speak straight with the Canadian farmers and when it is going to answer the premier of Saskatchewan who said the federal government has now declared war on the prairie provinces? When is this government going to stop declaring war and start helping the fundamental farm and fish sectors of this economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we have demonstrated clearly in the past that when there is a problem we will address it. We have indicated clearly that there are amounts of money in the reserves. When the consultation process described by the Minister of Agriculture has been completed, then we will be in a position to announce that.

In the case of fisheries, when consultations are completed on the question of fisheries, then we will be able to announce the additional—

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): When? You said that a year ago.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Now the hon. member from Yarmouth keeps yelling over there, and she should realize that we have already—

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): You don't know. You don't see the people.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, maybe you should advise the hon. member that it is hard to hear when her mouth is going all the time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I note in his responses on the agricultural question that both he and the Minister of Finance seem to think what they have is a problem with an old drought.

I would like to switch their attention to a more current problem, the problem of not being able to be competitive with the United States because our assistance programs do not match theirs, something the Minister of Finance alluded to, and the problem of the continuing escalation of the war between the Americans and the Europeans to reduce world grain prices.

Canada had an almost statistically average crop last year and yet incomes are falling to the point where there is less than zero realized net income expected in the province of Saskatchewan this year. Where is the aid that the Deputy Prime Minister has been promising would come in recompense against those grain wars? We have six weeks until seeding starts and banks are refusing to give money to farmers until they know where they stand. When will he announce, who will get it and how much will it be?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question and the sincerity with which he asks it. I can respond in an equally sincere manner.

The fact of the matter is that we have put together a federal–provincial committee to assess the situation and to look at the application of existing programs. Quite frankly, unbeknown to most farmers, they are going to be receiving supplementary drought assistance payments as a result of the multi-year crop disaster enhancement that was put in place.

We are looking to see how that will fill that particular void. We are looking at ways and means of coming up with some cash flow to help farmers put their crops in. We are looking at the long term income system and hopefully that can be tied to improvements in the safety net.

This government has responded to the international price wars in the past. It is prepared to do so again. But I remind the hon. member that the level of enhancement has reduced quite substantially. In 1986 and 1987, the EEP was subsidizing grain and oilseeds to the tune of about $200 per tonne, today it is about $80 per tonne. The United States is subsidizing under the EEP about $20 per tonne. In the meantime grain prices have increased between 1986 and 1989 by roughly 50 per cent.

All of those things have to be taken into consideration and I am sure my hon. friend will realize that you cannot merely pull a figure out of the sky. We are assessing the magnitude of the problem, we are assessing it accurately and we are going to respond in an accurate and full manner.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. minister is trying to do something. He said so numerous times in this House and thousands of other farmers believe him as well. But the banks will not lend money on that. When is he going to put some dollars up so that we can decide whether we are going to have farmers putting in crops or farmers leaving the farms. That is what it has come to as far as most of the banks are concerned right now.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that we have been working on this matter since the first of the year. The initial reports are coming in but I remind him again that at the present time we are waiting for crop insurance data from the province of Saskatchewan to complete the payments under the multi-year disaster program. This is the kind of information that we need. We are now in the process of looking at what the initial prices will be and I am sure my hon. friend will recognize that all of those things have to be taken into consideration before a full solution can be provided.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The Banff Chamber of Commerce reports that business in its area appears to have slowed down this winter, in part due to the VIA Rail cuts. VIA has received many proposals for the privatization of a system to supply rail services between Calgary and Vancouver.

When can the people of this area expect the resumption of a continuous rail service, a service which is crucial to their livelihood and which was promised to them by the previous minister?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I am a little nervous when the opposition claps too.

I wish to advise the member that proposals for privatization have been received. The bids closed on January 15. I am advised that VIA is examining the bids, and they expect to be in a position to make a recommendation to the government by the end of March.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Immigration my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Federal Court quashed Conservative legislation that was supposed to deal with the backlog of applications for refugee status.

The minister is aware that the refugee backlog is estimated at more than 100,000, and that many claimants have been waiting for a decision for three years. The saddest cases are those where parents have been separated from their children for several years, pending a decision allowing them to enter Canada.

Mr. Speaker, is the government at least prepared to allow these children to be reunited with their parents who have sought refuge in Canada, until a decison has been handed down in their case?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we are of course aware of the judgment that was handed down yesterday by the former Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Justice Jerome. We are now looking at the situation and considering the judgment, and we will give our response as soon as possible.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Immigration.

It is wrong to keep human beings waiting so long without a decision, and it is even worse to keep them separated from their young children. This problem requires a humanitarian approach, not a legalistic one.

The Standing Committee on Immigration conducted a long study on this matter and put out an important report in December in which it made serious recommendations to the government to improve the refugee situation.

Will the chairman of the committee call a meeting of the committee as soon as possible, call the minister before the committee and have her explain to the committee what she is going to do about this decision of the Federal Court and impress upon her the recommendations of the standing committee to speed up this process?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the steering committee of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration will meet in order to study the judgment handed down yesterday by Mr. Justice Jerome, as well as other business to be undertaken by the Standing Committee including the Estimates which are also on the agenda for tomorrow. Of course, tomorrow, we will start analysing the report we tabled in the House on the refugee backlog which is directly related to the judgment.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Why did he say yesterday that there were no cuts in veterans' benefits when reduction in the veterans' independence program in the words of the recent budget at page 84 "will save an estimated $18 million"? Why?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday they were talking about budget cuts. I mention again that there were no cuts in the actual dollars of expenditures in the department, and in fact with the veterans' independence program, there are major increases in that spending.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister, who said: "I assure the hon. member that there have been no cuts made at all".

• (1450)

The government's own documents state that the veterans receiving assistance under the veterans independence program, which is designed to care for them at home, will no longer be reimbursed for heavy housekeeping services to the tune of $18 million.

The average age of Canada's veterans is 70 and this is an essential service to them. This $18 million cut is counter to the aim of this program. I would like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs why he has allowed this to happen.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to repeat, the heavy housekeeping unit of that program is in the veterans independence program. That particular program has been increased 66 per cent in this year's budget.

I want to say to the hon. member that there will be no additional costs to any veteran for moving from his own home into a hospital, and we can guarantee that. We can ensure that because each of these charges is means tested.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. At a time of declining east-west tension and limited defence dollars, can the Minister of National Defence explain the utility of continuing to invest over $1 billion, including more than $300 million this fiscal year, in the air defence system known as ADATS, a system plagued by many failures and deficiencies, while at the same standing back and allowing the Polar 8 ice-breaker program to be axed?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member draws attention to a capital expenditure for equipment that is needed. I would like the hon. member to understand that the low level air defence is designed to defend Canadian men and women and Canadian air pilots—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): In Europe.

Mr. McKnight: —and Canadian assets in a stationed atmosphere, particularly in central Europe today. As the hon. member knows, it is something that was lacking, it is something that will continue to be important, it is something that we will continue to do in an acquisition point.

The hon. member suggests that there are problems with the ADATS, but I can tell him that there is an opportunity where other countries are looking to purchase the very same equipment that he is being critical of in Canada.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in the first place, this equipment is designed to be used in Europe and only in Europe. Within the next couple of years in all likelihood our troops are going to be back here in Canada. More important, Oerlikon has had to fire managers on the project, quality control has been condemned by the United States Defence Department, and markets are non-existent. The Netherlands, South Korea, Finland and Turkey have all turned it down. Now I have a report in my hand from the United States which states that it is working at only 5 per cent efficiency.

Why is the Minister considering going ahead with this wasteful program that is probably going to lead nowhere and for no purpose?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his assertions that other countries have not made a decision to acquire the low level air defence that is produced by Oerlikon is taking initial tests out of context, and making decisions and attributing them to other countries. He mentioned the Netherlands.

To my understanding, and maybe my colleague the Minister for International Trade could substantiate this, that decision has not been made by the government of the Netherlands. I ask my colleague to have patience.

Mr. Karpoff: A billion dollars worth of patience?

Mr. McKnight: No. What hon. members have to understand is that the men and women who serve in Canadian forces desire and need protection. Low level air defence was not available to those men and women. It has been developed in Canada. It has jobs for Canadian men and women. It has brought employment.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): They are coming out of Lahr.

Mr. McKnight: Now the member says we are coming out of Lahr. Obviously, he has made a decision before the rest of the allies.

NAVIGATION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As the minister is aware, there is a proposal by the coast guard to de-man the lighthouse on Gannett Rock, which is off Grand Manan in the middle of the Bay of Fundy. It is a very busy navigational area and shipping lane.

My question to the minister is simply this: is the proposal to de-man this lighthouse a final proposal? Will it be accepted by the government and, if so, what assurances can the minister give us that the environmental and navigational concerns being expressed will not be compromised?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know the interest my hon. friend has in this particular issue. There have been consultations between the coast guard and local people who are interested in the issue. I understand that they are examining the issues and it should be finalized in the very near future with the concerns of the local people taken into account.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE EDUCATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

It is a fact that the government cut $4.1 million from the Heritage Language Education Program in 2,000 schools.

I ask the minister to explain to the Canadian people why this government is committing $6 million and establishing an institute at the same time that it is cutting educational programs. Is what the government is proposing an empty shell?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, reductions are always difficult. The budgets of our two departments were reduced by about $23 million. Times are tough. We must do something with our deficit to ensure a more prosperous, more secure future.

Our duty is to deliver programs in the best way possible and we shall continue to do so.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): My supplementary is directed to the same minister, Mr. Speaker. I refer to the Multiculturalism Act of 1988. The government's stated policy is to preserve and enhance languages other than English or French.

In its budget the government has cut financing for heritage language schools. This flies in the face of its own stated policy. Why?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, restraint is always difficult and we certainly had to be sure in evaluating all the priorities of the department that we were continuing to provide Canadians with the best possible service. It is about time that heritage language schools stopped being marginalized. Others can participate and contribute to their growth and development.

Our commitment to multiculturalism is very clear from what we have done in terms of our Race Relations Program Community Support and Participation Program, and the Canadian Heritage Language Institute that will be established. Some funding has been reduced but there are significant amounts of money that are still there for heritage cultures and languages.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister said that since 1985 there have not been any cuts to native programs, yet the budget completely does away with the native communication program which funds very important projects like the Mic Mac News, the only major native newspaper east of Montreal.

Why is the government giving the impression that it is helping the Micmac people when all it is really trying to do is silence them?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House yesterday, the government continues to help all of the native people of Canada and to increase funding by $182 million in the coming fiscal year in the form of increased program funding for health, education, social and economic development programs directed to the native people across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: A very short supplemental.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, just last month the Marshall inquiry said that the Micmac people should have a greater voice in Nova Scotia. What kind of reward is that? What kind of greater voice is this when the government is cutting out the Mic Mac News? Why is the government stifling the voice of the native people? It is cutting programs. Admit it, and correct it.

• (1500)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will examine the Estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, he will find that core funding for all of the native organizations in Canada has been preserved and that the programs will continue to serve the best needs and the requirements of the native peoples of Canada.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Young (Gloucester) (p.8636).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Labrador had completed his speech. The question and comment period following the member's speech is now available to members. Since he is not in the House, on debate, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity, unexpected though it is at this very moment, to participate in the budget debate. I am very proud to have the opportunity to address this House on what I consider to be an outstanding 1990 budget.

Following a steady course since 1984, the Minister of Finance has again constructed a budget for the coming fiscal year which directs Canada toward financial integrity and economic responsibility. In so doing, the government will be compelled to introduce some difficult and initially unpopular expense control measures, but for the first time in more than two decades we have a federal budget with no new taxes.

Thus, we see a budget plan that responds to the demands and the needs which have been expressed by Canadians. For many months now, the message from all parts of the country has been clear; continue the attack on the debt and the deficit, but intensify the strategy to cut spending and do not increase the tax burden at all. This budget reflects that strategy in very strong and sound ways.

In actual fact, however, if there is any one major criticism which I have heard about this budget, it is that the budget does not go far enough. The national will for financial discipline is very strong indeed and the average citizen fully supports a government mandate to put our financial house in order. What that average citizen demands, though, is evidence and commitment that the measures which have been taken will truly be applied to solve Canada's financial problems, and not merely used to support or expand government spending programs. This budget provides such assurances in a very clear manner.

First of all, it confirms the accuracy and integrity of the current year's Estimates, which will result in a deficit of $30.5 billion as predicted one year ago. This is a remarkable accomplishment in its own right, because the past year has been fraught with unexpected economic adversities such as persistent inflation and high short-term interest rates. Fortunately, the economy has remained relatively strong, employment has remained at high levels and government revenues have increased as a result. Longer term interest rates have declined somewhat to help moderate government debt service expense. The net result is that the 1989 deficit forecast is right on the money, which is a continuing basis for confidence in the 1990 Estimates and in the five-year forward projections which accompany it.

The budget aims for a steadily falling deficit over the next five years and onward to balanced budgets and eventually, I hope, to surpluses after that. The deficit will be $28.5 billion in the new fiscal year and $26.8 billion in the 1992 budget. It is predicted that we shall be able to start redeeming bonds and paying down some of our national debt in the 1994 period.

Just imagine for a moment—that will prove the first time in 20 years Canada has actually lived within its means for a full fiscal year. What stronger or clearer commitment could any government make in response to its financial mandate.

The deficit targets for the next two years deserve special mention because they reflect significant provisions of $2 billion in extraordinary expense in each of those periods to pay major start-up costs of the goods and services tax program as it replaces the federal sales tax system commencing on January 1, 1991.

These costs will really be significant benefits to many Canadians—advance rebates of almost $1 billion as promised to low-income families before the GST even commences in December of this year, and about $3 billion to Canadian businesses for GST rebates on existing FST-included inventories and for one-time payment of transitional expense up to $1,000 per business.

Here is hard evidence of the practical benefits which the goods and services tax program will bring to low-income Canadians and to many small and large Canadian companies. We have clearly budgeted $4 million, with cheques to be issued over the next 24 months. Here is hard evidence also of the deficit reduction progress really to be found in this budget.

Without these extraordinary one-time expenses, the next two years would be $2 billion lower in each case. Once those expenditures are out of the way, the subsequent diminishing deficit projections between 1992 and 1994 become all the more credible at $21 billion, $14 billion, and $10 billion respectively. Truly we can now see light at the end of Canada's financial tunnel.

That this 1990 budget marks a crossroads in Canada's financial affairs has never been in doubt, and the directions to be taken have been hotly debated in every corner of the country. The options have been advanced in a variety of policy formats: new taxes, moderate spending, drastic expense cuts, lower interest rates, higher inflation, a lower dollar, increased exports and so on. But in my view, the proper course has been selected.

With our national debt at $350 billion and growing at the rate of almost 10 per cent per year—and it could touch as high as $.5 trillion before we turn it around—this government is taking the tough tack through perilous waters, where the reefs have names like "recession" and "inflation", but where also lies the charted course toward calmer financial seas and toward fairer winds for future economic growth.

The restraint measures of this budget should help to contain inflation, which in turn should help to moderate interest rates, which then in turn should also stimulate renewed economic growth within our stable capacity to manage it.

I feel confident that this approach is the right one, that recession can be avoided and that stability and new progress will be achieved. This budget is not only a tough and a responsible one, it is also a fair and a sensitive one. Again, to ensure emphasis, it bears no new taxes. But even more important, there are several critical exemptions for people from the expense-control plans, namely, elderly benefits, family allowances, veterans pensions, and unemployment insurance payments. These constitute a continuing shift of the budget and taxation burden off the shoulders of low-income Canadians and are consistent with such measures introduced in previous budgets of the Minister of Finance and in tax reform bills.

Slowly but surely taxation relief and social security are being put in fair balance in Canada for those most in need of them.

Perhaps the most telling and yet sensitive policy initiatives for expense control in this budget are to be found in restraints applied to provincial transfer payments. As was expressed so well in a Montreal Gazette editorial last week, the funds for all levels of government come from the same ultimate taxpayer, so it is nonsensical to expect federal transfers to provinces to remain untouched when they constitute such a major item of federal spending.

To their credit, many provinces have been balancing their budgets, but this becomes a sort of phantom accounting when large portions of their revenue come from a federal budget which is on the edge of insolvency. Clearly, the provinces' transfers are part of the national financial problem, and so they must realistically be part of the solution. As a result, Established Programs Financing has been frozen per capita at 1989 budget levels and Canada Assistance Plan transfers will be limited to a growth of 5 per cent annually in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

What is most significant in terms of this budget's fairness and sensitivity is the fact that all other provinces which qualify for equalization payments will be exempted from the CAP limits, as will the equalization program itself be exempted from the expense control plan. Equalization payments will continue to flow to the provinces in the same proportions as they have traditionally.

These exemptions are an innovative recognition that regional economic disparities and imbalances do exist in Canada and that reciprocating advantages must be provided to fairly balance the application of economic policies. This is not possible with some options such as interest rates where selective application would be non-viable but the unbalanced approach to restraint measures as used in this budget do go far to achieving a fair balance of economic policy right across Canada. For example, total federal transfer payments to Atlantic Canada will grow at the rate of 4 per cent in the coming year while they will also be held to a rate of only 2.3 per cent in Ontario. That does seem fair, given the comparative levels of economic activity between Atlantic Canada and Ontario.

In fact, in my own province of New Brunswick, the Liberal government of Premier McKenna has publicly expressed acceptance of, if not support for, this 1990 federal budget. Although the new restraint measures do have significant impact on New Brunswick to the tune of $25 million in 1990 and almost twice as much in 1991, nevertheless these reductions amount to less than 1 per cent of total provincial revenues.

By contrast, the aggregate of all federal transfers to New Brunswick year after year, account for more than 40 per cent of all New Brunswick's budget revenues. As in New Brunswick, so is the case with most other provinces. No group should be more vitally concerned about supporting the financial health of the federal government than the finance ministers of those provinces and their premiers.

The opposition financial critic has been quick to claim that restraints on provincial transfers will lead to higher taxation by the provinces. His case is weak in the extreme. For example, in New Brunswick the provincial government indicates that it should be able to balance its own 1990 budget and acknowledges that program spending restraint to follow the federal example may be the most reasonable course. Perhaps federal Liberals should consult with their provincial colleagues to learn and understand that small "c" conservative financial responsibility is conventional wisdom these days in Canada and that big "C" Conservative financial policies are receiving strong public support.

One of the best cases to be made in this regard is the disciplined containment of federal program spending over the past five years at 3.6 per cent annually, less than the rate of inflation. By comparison, the provincial average over that same period has been almost twice as high at 6.4 per cent with some provinces, notably Ontario, increasing their spending at rates well over 9 per cent.

Simply put, the federal example of program spending restraint is the best in the nation and has been posed in this budget as an essential challenge for the provinces to emulate. Far from promoting increased taxes, this budget sets a model for financial discipline. The federal example of 3.7 per cent restrained growth in program spending over the next two years clearly demonstrates to the provinces that more can be done to limit expenditures.

In the same context, the premature conclusions by opposition representatives that a two-year freeze on EPF transfers will directly result in cuts to education and health are invalid. As they well realize, or should know, EPF funds are no longer restricted and the provinces have been using this money in a variety of ways for several years. In effect, EPF is now virtually block funding and does not hobble the financial flexibility of any province to select its own spending priorities. There is simply no valid reason why education or health should become special targets as a result of this budget.

To the contrary in fact, the granting councils, the National Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Medical Research Council, which provide research support to universities, have been specifically relieved from the 5 per cent CAP applied to other areas of science and technology in this budget.

It is very significant that these granting councils have been specifically relieved of the 5 per cent limitation applied to all other areas of science and technology and that should be recognized by those in the fields of education and health as a very significant and appropriate measure in the budget.

The provinces will bear close to one-third of the $3 billion expenditure savings contained in this budget, which is a moderate share in a major national mission toward financial responsibility, particularly considering the fact that funding to the provinces over the past five years has consistently consumed 23 per cent of all federal program spending in cash terms.

As federal debt has risen to support these and other major costs, the federal budget for debt service has grown to 35.1 cents of every revenue dollar. By comparison, the average provincial debt is serviced by only one-third of that amount or 11.8 cents of every revenue dollar. Even in Atlantic Canada provincial debt service is less than 15 per cent of revenues. So again, simply put, the provinces rightly share the benefits of the federal purse and they must also rightly share the burden of the debt against it.

For my own province of New Brunswick, it is worth noting some of the key implications of this 1990 federal budget. Total federal transfers will increase to New Brunswick by almost 4.5 per cent in 1990 and will total well over $1.5 billion, more than 40 per cent of the total provincial budget. No direct cuts have been made, except that per capita EPF grants are frozen for the next two years at current levels. This represents less than 1 per cent of New Brunswick budget revenues and is a restraint on future expectations and not on present funding.

Federal transfers will average approximately $2,100 per citizen in New Brunswick during the coming year, the third highest in the nation after Newfoundland and P.E.I. Major federal projects in the province remain uninterrupted, notably the frigate construction program in Saint John and the combat training centre at CFB Gagetown. By contrast some multibillion dollar projects were totally cancelled in other parts of Canada. As announced late last week, the ACOA program, which is so vital to Atlantic Canada, has not been reduced and, in fact, additional new areas of activity such as marketing will be supported and funding limits have been extended to provide for larger projects.

On balance, therefore, and particularly by comparison with larger more affluent provinces, this budget recognizes the special economic circumstances of New Brunswick and the entire Atlantic region.

As most Canadians understand, our country has been living beyond its means for a long, long time. That is what deficit financing means, spending more each year than we are prepared to pay for or can afford. To the credit of this government, in 1984 it recognized the dread disease of deficit and debt in Canada and embarked upon an agenda for economic renewal as a long-term course toward cure and recovery from our nation's financial illness. The facts of their success are revealing, particularly in operating budget terms when you separate debt service from operating revenues.

Mr. Speaker, I am coming quickly to a close. In 1984 we were not even remotely covering program expenditures and we had an operating deficit of $16 billion as part of the total deficit of $38 billion. In the current year now ending, only five years later, we shall have an operating surplus of $9 billion, unfortunately still as part of a continuing total deficit of $30.5 billion.

The striking reality is that we have achieved major progress in bringing program spending under control. In that five-year period an operating deficit of $16 billion has been turned to a surplus of $9 billion, a net gain of $25 billion.

Time obviously does not permit me to address the many other important issues and detailed Estimates contained in this budget. I have described the features which I believe bear special mention.

Over-all, this budget is another major move in a consistent direction toward financial integrity for Canada and it is one which I endorse and support fully.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great intensity to the member's speech. I want to ask him two basic questions. One deals with the issue of confidence that the Canadian public has in the Minister of Finance.

Last year when the minister presented his budget, he said that the interest rate would be 10.5 per cent at this time. It is now closer to 13.5 per cent; an error of 30 per cent. Three years ago the Minister of Finance said that by this current year the deficit would be reduced to about $14 billion. It is closer to $30 billion; an error of 100 per cent. Now the Minister of Finance is giving nice rosy projections as to what is going to happen in 1994 and 1995. Why should the Canadian public believe him when his previous predictions turned out to be totally unreliable? Second, the government keeps saying that there is a need to reduce the deficit, to cut spending. I want to ask the member how, in light of the need for reduced spending, government members can support the bill as they did last week? How can they bring in a mass tax concession in terms of increased RRSP contributions for the wealthy, increasing it by another $400 million for those earning between $50,000 and $86,000, bringing the total tax concessions on RRSP contributions to people earning in excess of $50,000—which is the the same as losing taxes—to $11 billion this year? If there is such a shortage of money, why did the government proceed to give more tax concessions to its wealthy friends?

I want those two questions addressed. What confidence does the public have in the Minister of Finance? His predictions in the past have been totally erroneous. Why, if there is a need to reduce the deficit, is the government still giving away tax concessions to its wealthy friends?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, the public of Canada does have extreme confidence in the Minister of Finance, and well they should have. The Minister of Finance last year predicted that the deficit in 1989–90 would be $30.5 billion. He has been faced since that time with a number of extraordinary circumstances, such as increasing inflation and increasing interest rates. Yet, he is coming in right on the money at $30.5 billion. His predictions over the history of his tenure have been exceedingly accurate on balance. I believe there is good cause, particularly given the improvements in the operating surplus position as I have described in my remarks, to believe that we will see the deficit predictions that he has made met on the money—$26.8 billion in 1991, $21 billion in 1992, $14 billion in 1993 and $10 billion in 1994.

Just imagine, in 1994 the deficit will be cut by two-thirds from present levels and the government will be in a position to start redeeming its bonds and paying down its debt for the first time in a quarter century. The people of Canada will have immense confidence in this finance minister for decades after that.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury said something that has me somewhat puzzled. In fairness to him, the subject is education. His government, on the one hand, has instructed the Canada Manpower Centres to put emphasis on training in a province like Newfoundland where those who complete the training have no jobs to go to. That is not a euphemism. That is not a catch phrase. It is not a partisan phrase. It is a fact of life. They do their training, they go to the community colleges and take computer training to do all kinds of things and then they turn around and there are no jobs for them to go to. The emphasis on training might be good for Toronto and other parts of Canada but it is certainly not good for my constituency in Newfoundland and, I would suggest to the hon. member, maybe for parts of his area.

The other half of this coin is that this training that the Manpower Centres insist on precludes the smaller communities from employing its people on the small infrastructure development projects that certainly were in vogue when I first became a member of Parliament. That employment, in some cases, is the only means of qualifying for UIC. They are the only jobs that they can get, so you get community infrastructure and you get jobs. But that is all gone now because they have to go off and do training and in some cases the people cannot qualify. Communities end up with no infrastructure. So right now there is no aid package for the economic crisis and no jobs for job development programs.

On the other hand, this government says that it is bent on training, but the Minister of Finance, in his budget, has put together what is considered to be, by most people in the business, a loss to the post-secondary education of $9 billion by 1995. I cannot understand this dichotomy. Where are we heading? Are we for training and education or are we not?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, as someone once said, if you think education is worthless, try ignorance. The facts are that Newfoundlanders are not ignorant and Newfoundlanders recognize, I am sure, as even the hon. member recognizes behind his rhetoric, that training, innovation and creativity do constitute the solution to some of the structural economic and unemployment circumstances in which we find ourselves, such as the fishery.

If the resource is gone, depleted through a variety of causes, we cannot simply reside there in blissful dependence forever on any government. I do not believe Newfoundlanders want that. I believe Newfoundlanders do want training, they do want to be educated and pointed in new directions. That is what is going to happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to thank the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden who, as a long-time experienced member of this House, has agreed to allow me to speak before him.

Mr Benjamin: It will cost you.

Mr. Blais: I know I am going to pay for this, but he will have the tremendous experience of listening to my speech.

Mr. Benjamin: You should stay for mine.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to participate for the first time as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in the budget debate. Needless to say, it is with much enthusiasm and confidence in the future that I approach this new mandate which the Right Hon. Prime Minister has given to me. I would like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and this House that I will fulfil my new responsibilities to the best of my knowledge and with a great deal of energy. I will also continue to discharge the important responsibilities of my position as Minister of State for Agriculture with the same interest and dedication.

The Budget tabled in this House on February 20 by the Hon. Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, is quite in keeping with the policy of fiscal responsibility that our government has pursued for the past five years. This Budget brings us closer to our objective of reducing the deficit by 1994 while taking account—and I think this is important—of the immediate needs of people of modest means. This is a big challenge, a difficult challenge, but I believe that we now have all the tools in hand to meet it.

When we came to power in 1984, the economy and public finances were in disastrous shape. I do not need to remind this House of what the size of the deficit, the unemployment rate and inflation were then then, and also the interest rates that had ruined many of our businesses.

• (1530)

Correcting this situation, Mr. Speaker, required more than cosmetic measures and improvised policies. It took a long-term policy, a real action program to put Canada back on the road to economic prosperity. That is what we proposed then. The Minister of Finance, the same one as today, offered Canadians a comprehensive, articulate, multi-year plan that would enable Canadians to prepare the future.

This plan, Mr. Speaker, was based on two main thrusts, two priority areas for action: first, restoring the public finances and second, creating a favourable climate for measures to stimulate economic growth.

We therefore took strong measures to reduce the deficit which then was approaching $40 billion, as you will recall. We first attacked public expenditures, especially program spending which at that time was more than government revenues and was growing at a frightening rate of 14 per cent a year. At the time, people would say that the government was borrowing to pay for the groceries.

Over the next five years, this growth rate in program spending was brought down to 3.6 per cent. That was real belt-tightening. It would have been difficult, really difficult, Mr. Speaker, to be credible when we asked Canadians to tighten their belts if the government for its part took the attitude that it could continue to spend more than its income by increasing its spending inconsiderately. We therefore began by tightening our own belt as a government.

We also reduced the size of the Public Service by 12,000 person-years. We have in fact returned to the 1973 level; the size of the Public Service is what it was 17 years ago, with the result that today government spending is less in dollar terms than it was five years ago.

Mr. Speaker, we also transferred to the private sector Crown corporations that no longer met the objectives for which they had been created and that also were running deficits. Today, not only are these companies no longer a burden for the government but they have become prosperous enterprises contributing to Canada's economic growth. It was a step we had to take. We took it and we will continue to do so over the years, Mr. Speaker.

If we had not introduced these measures, the government's Budget would be $22 billion more than it is today. However, to turn around the economy, we not only had to put our financial house in order, we also had to adopt measures that would allow the private sector to develop its potential for growth.

That is why we adopted a policy to deregulate major economic sectors such as energy and transportation, to name but a few.

We replaced the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which does not arouse fond memories, with Investment Canada.

Our initiatives have produced results, Mr. Speaker. The economy has expanded for seven consecutive years. Our job creation rate has been the highest of all industrialized countries except Japan. The purchasing power and after-tax disposable income of Canadians increased dramatically. These are facts and figures that speak for themselves.

However, we also had to open up new opportunities for our economy, at a time when world trade is becoming global and increasingly powerful trading blocks are being formed. That is why we negotiated a free trade agreement with the U.S., which gives our products and services secure access to the richest market in the world and which will lead—the figures from independent agencies are there to prove it—to a sustained 3.5 per cent increase in our economic output. A lot of money, a lot of investment and a lot of jobs are reflected in this figure, Mr. Speaker.

I realize that many of our friends across the way will continue to drape themselves in the Maple Leaf, in order to oppose free trade. They don't know or pretend they don't know that in the past year, prospective investment has increased by more than 11 per cent, that business has been urging us to speed up elimination of tariffs and that Canadian companies are eager participants in our programs to promote sales in the United States. These are unmistakable signs, Mr. Speaker.

Obviously, when you have run the country on a hand-to-mouth basis for 15 years, it is not always easy to understand what is involved in long-term management of public finances which keeps the future in perspective. That is what we are doing. We are giving our companies and our workers the best possible tools to get ahead in a world that is becoming increasingly competitive and where no one is going to give it all to us on a silver platter.

The tax reform that will come into force next year is also a case in point. The new goods and services tax will rid us of a tax system that is obsolete, unfair and extremely harmful to the Canadian economy. It will give us a modern tax system, one that already exists in 48 countries across the globe. It is a system that, whatever people say to the contrary, will help low- and middle-income Canadians improve their lot.

The goods and services tax will help achieve three goals: reduce the deficit, stimulate the economy and make our tax system more equitable.

Mr. Speaker, we are well aware that certain measures are not very popular at first. This is to be expected when aiming for long-term benefits, and in any case, we are certainly not trying to win a popularity contest. That is not why we were elected, Mr. Speaker. We were elected to govern with a long-term perspective, in the best interests of Canadians.

The future demands that we act responsibly. First of all, we cannot afford to leave to future generations, to our children and grand-children, the debts that we ourselves incurred. We must ensure that Canadians will continue to have one of the most advanced health care systems in the world, social programs that are among the most generous of any country, and a modern education system. We must also be able to respond to the new challenges of the future, such as protecting the environment.

If we are to be successful, Mr. Speaker, we cannot wear blinkers. We must have a vision of the future and the courage to defend that vision, even at the risk of becoming unpopular.

Reducing the deficit and the national debt is not the end-all and be-all, but it is the only way to provide for a prosperous economy and a better future for Canadians. It is the only way to have the flexibility we need to make real choices. We cannot make real choices when one-third of every dollar collected by the government goes to pay off the debt. If we let this percentage increase, we may compromise our future by reducing that flexibility, thus becoming increasingly vulnerable and, in the long run, unable to maintain those programs to which I was referring and which are so much a part of our lives.

The Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance keeps us on the track of budgetary responsibility. The government will continue its expenditure control plan. We will save $7 billion over the next two years and nearly $20 billion over the next five.

• (1540)

We have asked Canadians to make many sacrifices in recent years. There is no easy way to reduce the deficit. We have done everything we could to keep the impact on Canadians to a minimum. We announced no new taxes in this Budget. Exempted from the expenditure control plan are all income security programs and most transfers to the provinces, especially the poorest provinces receiving these transfers.

Few programs have been eliminated or reduced. We preferred to cap growth of government spending in most areas, as a signal to the public and to the provinces which must realize that inflation, which has not yet been beaten, is no accident. It is not just a figure that appears once a year or once a month and tells us we have an inflation rate of 5 per cent, 4 per cent or 6 per cent. No, this figure happens to be the sum total of various factors produced by the provinces, the private sector, unions, government—the federal, provincial and municipal governments—when they fail to take the necessary steps to keep their spending below the rate of inflation. That is the only way we will be able to reduce and control inflation.

The government will also continue to introduce new measures to make its activities more efficient and less costly. Thus, increases in departmental operating and maintenance budgets will continue to be capped at 2 per cent until 1994–95. A meager 2 per cent, as has been the case since 1986–87.

Mr. Speaker, our message to Canadians is clear. Leadership in reducing the deficit has come, first of all, from the government, as all the figures have shown. In the years to come, we will continue to tighten our belts, as we have been doing for five years. We will be able to say, with pride—the government can often be accused of saying: Do as I say and not as I do. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker. We have set an example.

Before concluding, I would like to say a word about how my department, Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, intends to fulfil its mandate for fiscal responsibility.

My department is one of those which have done the most in recent years to increase productivity in the federal Public Service. My department has met all the expenditure reduction objectives set by Treasury Board. Thanks to office automation, rationalization and privatization, staff cuts of up to 30 or 35 per cent have been achieved in some services and our cost recovery policy has increased revenues by about 92 per cent since 1984. We realized that Canadian companies and Canadians could pay for some services from my department. They pay and it is normal and legitimate.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, my department's mandate is to ensure that the market operates efficiently and fairly. In that regard, we have a particular responsibility to help companies be more competitive. Therefore my department will have an important role to play in the coming years in building a strong economy which will enable our companies to stand out and benefit from the development opportunities that free trade and tax reform in particular provide us.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, consumers for whom I am also responsible will ultimately benefit from a more competitive, more productive economy. Consumers will benefit from it in the end. It is important for Canadians because at some point all of us without exception are consumers in this country. I think that what we are doing for consumers' benefit is important.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the Department of Agriculture which has also done more than its fair share. Its budget for the next fiscal year has just been reduced by more than $400 million. The end of the assistance program for crop losses due to the 1988 drought and the cancellation of the policy to set the domestic price of wheat, to mention only these two, will enable us to make substantial savings.

The budget under consideration is in keeping with our fiscal responsibility commitment. We can no longer afford to come up with the kind of budgets like those where our Liberal friends would forecast a deficit of $2 billion or $3 billion and end up with $17 billion in the red. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, they would not even look twice at the expenditures and increase them by 14 or 15 per cent in all departments. This explains why we are now in such a tight fiscal situation and must tighten our belts even more to get our economy back on track. I am sure the budget of the Minister of Finance will help us achieve our objective. Canadians are in for a long and difficult period, but as members of the House it is our responsibility to make them understand that if we want to keep our country free and independent, and if Canadians want to remain proud of the social programs we have set up over the years, this can only be done with a budget like this one, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my Hon. colleague's comments. I should like, however, to develop further the notion of a "vision of the future" which he raised.

Quite recently, a friend of mine mentioned that the budget of an individual, an organization, a government or a private enterprise greatly reflects the priorities of this individual or group. In a sense, it is an image of his or its soul, because the way I spend my money is indicate of the values I hold dear.

Now, when I consider this budget, I note that the Government increased by as much as 5 per cent the funding of a number of departments, including National Defence. I think it increased the funding for Intelligent Service by as much as 20 per cent. Other fundings were either limited or frozen. For instance, this budget comes down very hard on the old, the sick, the veterans, the young, the natives, Canadian women, and a number of regions: their funding were either frozen or allowed a limited increase. I am referring of course to the health care and education programs.

Moreover, taxes will increase, and I just wonder how the Minister can claim with such fanfare that there will be no new tax, when the Governement has announced that the GST will be implemented in January 1991, unless of course it plans to withdraw it, which would be very good news for Canadian men and women.

My question to the Minister is this: If you followed my argument don't you think that serious self–examination is in order for the Government when it claims that its priorities are really what Canadian men and women need?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just given us an example of a syndrome that is also found among some members of the Canadian public, and I am referring to the "not–in–my–backyard" syndrome. It is true that a budget must reflect priorities. Our priorities are reflected in the fact that we are capping spending increases in areas that are not particularly sensitive or vitally important, and we have protected all components of our social programs from these cutbacks. I would say the hon. member is again showing the kind of attitude I fail to understand. He says that the CSIS budget, and in fact I was responsible for CSIS until last week, was increased by 20 per cent. What the hon. member tends to forget is that the Department of Employment and Immigration is being criticized for not being quick enough in processing refugee cases. To process these cases, however we have to hire people to process security files—

Mr. Duhamel: Twenty per cent more?

Mr. Blais: Yes. We have to hire people for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, we have to hire people to deal with this backlog of 100,000. Nearly half of question period was on this issue alone. At the same time, people object and question why the increase in the budget of the Department of National Defence is limited, but when we cut 14 military bases across the country, they are the first to come and ask the government not to cut military bases in Canada, not to cut this item or that. It is always the same story. We all want cuts but not in areas where we are affected, never in our priority areas. That is why the government, Mr. Speaker, has shouldered its responsibilities and faced this reaction which is to some extent legitimate from people who say, "Well, I don't want you to cut in my area." We have to make drastic decisions, cut everywhere, as is normal, exempting some areas such as social spending and spending in the most disadvantaged provinces.

I think that answer is quite appropriate and reflects the government's priorities, Mr. Speaker, because a budget, as you said, reflects a government's priorities. You will find them there, because we are not imposing any new taxes. The GST which was announced previously will be fairer for Canadians, which you refuse to admit. You simply say that this tax is not right for Canadians. But you forget to say how it could be replaced. You forget to talk about the present tax which is applied to manufactured products—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the period for questions and comments has now expired. Debate. The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to your attention—and you may wish to make a mark on the wall—that for the first time in 21 and a half years, I am not going to say anything about transportation today. As much as I would love to let you hear my Crow rate speech again, I will not do it.

I am sorry my colleague cannot stay to hear my speech, because it is going to be magnificent.

Mr. Blais: I am going to read it in Hansard.

Mr. Benjamin: I want to touch briefly on interest rates, the deficit and the debt, plus an area that I am responsible for as critic for my party, namely, veterans affairs. I apologize for not notifying the minister that I would be here to do that today. I hope he is watching in his office.

I recall in 1981–1982 when interest rates got even a little higher than they are now—

Mr. Redway: Quite a bit higher.

Mr. Benjamin: —hearing the members of the Official Opposition, including the present Minister of Finance, berate the then Liberal government daily about the folly and the fallacy of a high interest rate policy; the folly and the fallacy of trying to prop up the Canadian dollar.

Every time somebody wants to know what our dollar is worth compared to the U.S. dollar, it is like the old Vaudeville joke, when one lady asked the other one: "How is your husband?" the other lady said: "Compared to what?"

We have been through this before historically. The government could accomplish its same deficit reduction as proposed in the budget by dropping interest rates. Using the Minister of Finance's own projections, every 1 per cent drop cuts the deficit by $1.7 billion in year one, $2.6 in year two, $3.1 billion in year 3, and $3.5 billion in year 4. The normal spread between interest rates in the United States and Canada is around a 3.0 to 3.5 per cent rate difference. But we are running at 5 and 5.5 per cent difference now.

I do not understand this nonsense. I am just an innocent stubble-jumping prairie boy. The minister complains that he is fighting inflation, but he has raised interest rates over the past year to the point now where the Bank of Canada rate is over 13 per cent, and the rates are anywhere from 14.25 to 15 per cent on consumer loans or mortgage loans depending on who you go to. Since he was the one who complained vociferously when the Liberals did this, why didn't the minister arrange with the Governor of the Bank of Canada to lower interest rates by 1 per cent immediately and over the next year another 1 per cent? With that mechanism alone, he would have wiped out the deficit in four years. If it meant bringing in foreign exchange controls or pegging the dollar, fine, let's do it.

On that note, I want to say for the benefit of my hon. friend, that we did that for six years during the Second World War. We financed that entire war without any foreign investment, without any foreign capital. Canadians did it by themselves.

Mr. Redway: There is only one difference, there is not a war.

Mr. Benjamin: Why don't we have a declaration of peace and use the same methods now as we used then? It takes courage and it takes flying in the face of the old line party conventional wisdom.

If the deficit and the debt at the end of the Second World War in early 1946 were translated into 1990 dollars, it would be half again higher than our present national debt and our deficit. Thank goodness, because we had to rebuild our entire economy, we had full employment and we wiped out those debts. By 1956–57 they were paid off. My victory bonds and Canada war savings certificates were redeemed, and the same with all other Canadians.

During the Korean War, Lester Pearson pegged interest rates and imposed foreign exchange controls. In 1959–60, John Diefenbaker did exactly the same thing. The Americans did not like it, but tough cookie. We kept inflation down and we kept a relatively high employment rate. If you really want to wipe out the national debt and bring the deficit down to zero, and if we are lucky show a surplus, you have to follow a policy of full employment. I will leave it at that.

As a veteran and one who was most honoured when asked by my previous leader and the present one to be the critic for veterans affairs, I never thought I would live to see the day that a government of any kind would attack veterans. I have been here as you have, Sir, since June, 1968. Every member of Parliament in every year since then, every political party that had representation in this House agreed, and there was never any question about it, that we will never be able to fully repay them. It was sacrosanct. It was not as much as we could do or should do, but it was the minimum we must do.

• (1600)

Now we have the obscenity of this mealy-mouthed, chiselling of our war veterans. I do not understand it.

The government in the past two months has spent $3 billion of our money to do what? To prop up the Canadian dollar. Why in God's name would it want to prop it up? Every time it keeps the Canadian dollar high, it hurts our grain sales, grain exports, livestock exports, forestry products, fisheries, potash and sulphur; you name it. That is what has got us into difficulty.

Our trade surplus is the lowest it has been for God knows how long. But imagine. The government spent $3 billion of our money to prop up the Canadian dollar. Frankly, if it is at 83 or 84 cents right now, I would say put it down to about 75 cents compared to the American dollar. That would be a neat way to compete with the Americans on their export enhancement program on agricultural products and how they have been doing us out of markets on grain sales because all those international contracts are in U.S. dollars. Then we would show them where the bear sat on the buckbrush.

The fact is that one of the items to reduce the deficit picks on veterans. I did not even think a hard-hearted Tory like my hon. friend across the way would stoop that low. I just did not believe any of them would do that.

The Department of Veterans Affairs will raise rates for board and lodging for veterans in department controlled beds in long-term care and the heavy housekeeping component of the veterans' independence program will be cancelled. If this country and this government are that hard up and that desperate that they have to pick on our veterans, there is something wrong with our priorities, particularly the priorities of the government.

There is a means test on whether or not veterans will pay board and lodging in a government operated veterans home or a home operated by a provincial institution or a private institution. If a veteran who receives $820 a month of $9,840 a year, is paying no board and lodging, as long as he is not a victim of war wounds he will have it go from zero to $240 this year. Next year it will go to $420.

Do you realize, Sir, that that incomes test is $2,000 a year below the poverty line? As a minimum criterion the incomes test should be no less than the poverty line and it should go up each year according to inflation.

Under the incomes test a married veteran will get $1,234 a year which he is allowed. That comes to $15,808. The poverty level for a married couple in Canada is $19,250. The income test for the married veteran who requires long-term care is $4,000 a year below the poverty line.

There have been remarks made both inside the Chamber and outside the Chamber. I want to express my extreme sadness. One noted and honourable spokesman for a veterans organization in Canada said the other night on television that some of these guys even leave a an estate when they die.

Is that not terrible? Is it not terrible that they were able to put away a few dollars to leave something for their children and the grandchildren? What the devil is wrong with that? We encourage every other Canadian to do it. We give them tax breaks to do it, but we do not do it for veterans. My goodness, if they are going to leave an estate, that is not terrible. They should be allowed to leave that.

The married veteran in long-term care is allowed $1,057 a month if his spouse is at home. There is a comfort allowance for him and his spouse of $128 a month. This is under the old Tory incomes test. Next year the pensions will be indexed upward by 5 per cent, but the board and lodging rates rise as well. Why bother with the increase in either one? The married veterans will still be allowed their $1,057 a month and their comfort allowance, if you can call that comfort, will remain at $128.

What cuts are involved? This year the board and lodging rates go from zero to $240 for about 1,300 veterans and lesser amounts for a larger number. Next year they go to $420 a month based on the rate of the lowest province in Canada which at the moment happens to be Alberta. It is a way for a province to be encouraged to pick up some extra money and raise its rates, which will immediately raise the board and lodging rates veterans have to pay. There is no maximum. That $240 and $420 are not maximums.

The government deleted the heavy house cleaning allowance. It was twice a year. Even if they cut it down to once it would be all right. All of us can remember when our mothers house cleaned in the spring and fall.

The whole family had to pitch in and work. My dad washed the ceilings. The kids had to clean up the basement and wash walls. We all had to do it. But how is a 70 year old or 80 year old veteran who wants to stay out of long-term home care supposed to do that heavy house cleaning? The government kept the light house cleaning. He or his spouse could do some of that, or perhaps both, or get the kids in to help. When it comes to washing walls and ceilings, I do not want to see an 80 year old veteran trying to get up a ladder to wash a ceiling.

• (1610)

Then there is cleaning the drapes. Have you ever sent drapes to a dry cleaner? Dry cleaning is eliminated too. If you do your drapes once a year you know what the bill is like. Also cleaning attics, basements, garages and/or outbuildings. By the way, would you believe there are still places in Canada where they have certain kinds of outbuildings; some are one holers and some are two holers. Any home improvements, including stripping and sanding of floors, replacing and laying new carpet and chimney cleaning. Do you want to see a veteran in his seventies trying to clean his own chimney?

Good God, what are they doing? What do they think they are doing? Better still, why do they not think about what they are doing?

All parties and every member of this House since 1945 have said and agreed that we could never fully repay them. How come this government and this Parliament are going quietly—a lot of other members and I are not going to be quiet—to acquiesce to this kind of cheap chiselling on people whom we have agreed for five decades we can never fully repay? What in God's name is the government doing?

I have a document that was sent to the Regional Director General of Operations of the Pacific in Vancouver. I do not blame civil servants; they have their orders to implement government policy. When veterans have called and said "well, how come you did not tell us before", they have said it was because they did not know it was in the budget. There was no advance warning.

I want to conclude by referring to the increases. Yesterday the minister tried to say there were no cuts. I sent my cat to the vet the other day and we got him cut. I can tell my neighbours that that cat ain't cut. No matter which way you cut it, the veterans have an increase in their board and lodging and they have a decrease in the veterans independence program. If that ain't a cut, I never saw a cut cat in my life.

This country has no business chiselling in this area. In hundreds of other places people are making over $86,000 a year and get all the benefit of the new breaks in the RRSPs. I guess them that has gets.

I want to say that we are going to make sure that every veteran in every branch of the Legion and Army, Navy and Air Force veterans all over this country knows about this. They do not have the details. We are going to give it to them, and then they can give it to this government. I hope if the government does nothing else about this stupid budget, it will at least withdraw the provisions regarding the veterans of Canada.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to a number of things my colleague spoke about. I must say that I hope his passionate plea on behalf of veterans does not go unnoticed across Canada. I think it was eloquent and certainly put forward very clearly what is being done to the veterans and the fact that this country owes them so much.

I want to go back and talk about a couple of other things he mentioned: the question of interest rates, inflation and the dollar. The government keeps saying it has to jack up the interest rate to bring down inflation.

Somehow I got mixed up. I thought really half the problem of pushing up inflation is high interest rates. I will use one example. In housing right now interest rates are at 13.5 per cent instead of the 10 per cent that the Minister of Finance promised a year ago. This means that on a $100,000 mortgage monthly payments are $250 more. That is inflation, $250 more. The person has to earn nearly $500 to have $250 in his pocket. He has got to demand $500 more in wages. That is inflation.

My feeling is that inflation is being caused by the high interest rate policy. The government can continue to jack it up to 20 per cent, but it is not going to bring down inflation. In fact, it is just going to continue to push it up. I would like the members comments on that.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is as usual 100 per cent correct. He is just repeating what the present Minister of Finance said to the Liberal Minister of Finance in 1981 or 1982 about high interest rates. That government of those years and this government are the architects of their own problem. The more you raise interest rates, the more you increase the deficit.

When the Minister of Finance cries about how much of the government's expenditures have to go to pay interest charges, you would think he would phone Mr. Crow and say: "We have to do something about this". Oh, no, Mr. Crow increases the interest rates and then the Minister of Finance comes in here and says: "We have a problem. We have to cut back on veterans and a whole bunch of other outfits". All he had to do was cut back interest rates. Over the next four years, by just knocking it off 1 per cent this year and another 1 per cent next year, the accumulated reduction of the deficit will hit $10 billion. What more could you want?

If foreign investors want to take their money out tell them: "Fine. Get out. Go. We will do it ourselves." We did it for six years financing a war effort, the likes of which many other countries were never able to accomplish in proportion. That is one of the key items. The government allows interest rates to go up increasing its own deficit, and then it expects us, after paying higher interest rates, to take the cut-backs that it proposes also.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague a question that is not perhaps directly related to the budget but certainly is related to his deep interest in veterans affairs.

As a Korean veteran myself, I also would like to say that I notice most members in the House tend to refer to veterans as he and perhaps this is something where we should be a little more correct, too. I am sure there may be many service women who are interested in the points that he was raising.

As he was talking this afternoon, I was looking through some correspondence and happened to come across something from one of the senior members of the Korean Veterans Association. It is still very concerned that Korean veterans have not been properly recognized by the Government of Canada. I wonder if he would care to comment on that. I would be interested in any suggestions that he has.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I take the admonition of my hon. colleague.

Ms. Mitchell: A friendly admonition.

Mr. Benjamin: A friendly admonition. She has given them to me almost weekly. I never meant anything by being forgetful and not mentioning that there were thousands of women who served loyally in the Second World War and the Korean War, between those wars and since.

• (1620)

It is true the veterans of the Korean War are still being short changed. There are a few others. I have tried for years to get the Government of Canada, since 1968, to recognize the veterans of the Mackenzie-Papineau Battalion of the Spanish Civil War. There is less than 200 of them left. They are all in their eighties. One of them, a good friend of mine in Regina, passed away a couple of months ago. He tried to get recognition for years.

Every response I got about them from every Minister of Veterans Affairs was: "Well they were soldiers of fortune." They did not get paid. They paid their own way over there. They were the first ones to fight the fascists. Most of them volunteered for the Canadian forces when the Second World War started, and we still do not recognize their contributions from 1936 to 1939.

Another group we still do not recognize is the merchant marine. We lost more merchant marine men than we did from the Royal Canadian Navy in the Battle of the Atlantic. I have had excuses from Ministers of Veterans Affairs ad nauseam that they were getting commercial pay. When we checked into that, their commercial pay was the same or less than what members of the Royal Canadian Navy were getting. The government still refuses to recognize them.

I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to my colleagues in the House on all sides it is about time again—and we have done it before in other instances—that we made up as well as we can for these errors of omission and commission. Let's once and for all recognize those merchant seamen, the veterans of the Spanish Civil War, and do more for the veterans of the Korean War who are now almost to an age like me.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said in his recent budget: "to ensure a strong economic foundation for the future we are moving forward with the broad plan that we set out in November 1984". Unfortunately, Canadians are skeptical of the ability of the government to put its own financial house in order.

On the positive side, and we are pleased to announce on the positive side, that we in the Reform Party are glad to see that Petro–Canada is finally going to be privatized, but we also wonder why it has taken six years. Business should be involved in business, and government should be involved in government. While we are pleased to see Petro–Canada being sold, we wonder why the government is going to continue to burden this operation with the bureaucratic laws of a Crown corporation and not allow it to function like any private sector company should.

We are glad to see industrial and business subsidies being cut; we advocated this last year. Of course the Chamber of Commerce and business communities in Canada were asking for the same thing. However, we do wonder why the energy sector has been singled out.

We were also glad to hear the government borrow a line from our neighbours to the south and say: "Read my lips, no new taxes", to sell this budget. However, given this budget's substance, I believe this statement either to be irresponsible at very best, or insincere at the worse.

I note that unemployment insurance premiums will be up by 18 per cent over last year, supposedly without increasing taxes. Nor can we forget that not only did the government announce in December new surtaxes, it also has brought in Bill C–62, the new GST, which is waiting to become law before the next budget.

On the negative side, Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that the budget's bottom line is what I expected from the government. I expected a deficit around last year's projection of $28 billion, although it is still $500 million higher than even that. This budget makes the assumption that last year's course was correct. I contend it was not and still is not.

I certainly was amazed that defence was not reduced because of the events in eastern Europe. Bases in my riding were bracing themselves for cuts in light of what has been going on around the world. I certainly expected foreign aid to be reduced. There were no cuts there. Cuts in projected spending are not cuts in actual spending. It is ludicrous to suggest that a 5 per cent cut on growth is a spending cut. It simply is not.

After much talk about reductions and spending cuts, program spending will in fact increase by $3.1 billion after an increase of $5.5 billion last year. Of 29 departments, 22 had their budgets actually increased. Only 7 were reduced. If we look at what occurred in these 7 departments, we will see that the Secretary of State actually increased after the non–recurring payments to Japanese Canadians are removed. Agriculture fell, but as a result of last year's budget. Actually there are only 5 of the departments which show cuts and only 2 of those 5 will show substantial cuts.

We are disappointed that the evidence is that cries over cuts are merely a reallocation of funds within and between programs to make this seem like a tough budget. We see that the budget of the Office of the Co–ordinator of the Status of Women increased by 11 per cent, the Governor General's office increased by 13 per cent, the Senate is up by 8 per cent and general operations of the government are up by 15.8 per cent.

Again it is disappointing that in this budget there are no cuts to the cabinet, to ministerial office staffs, no cuts to limousines, no slashing of parliamentary travel budgets or MPs' perks and no cuts in middle management. Again we see in this budget, sadly, no example of restraint at the top levels.

I do say again, because I do remember that in December the President of the Treasury Board announced symbolic cuts, then they decided over a weekend not to save taxpayers' money or interest payments or to reduce the deficit, but rather to sell an unpopular tax that is to come in at 7 per cent because they knew it certainly could not sell at 9 per cent.

That is one of the problems with the government's attitude toward deficit reduction. It is a reaction to some outside force, not the result of an internal conviction. Over a weekend, they miraculously found $2 billion worth of cuts to sell the GST at 7 per cent. How many years had it cost us, the taxpayers, these $2 billion? How much has it added to our debt? How much has it added to the interest payments this year alone? How much more is there to cut which they do not feel compelled to cut?

I will give you a fact, Mr. Speaker. For every $1 which this government could have cut in 1984 when it was voted in to do just that and continues to spend that $1 in 1990, the government has accumulated $8.58—$6 in principle and $2.58 in interest. It will add 85 cents in interest to this year's deficit, and these are all very conservative estimates.

If it did not cut that $1 again this year, it will cost Canadians at least $1 in interest next year and will have added $10 to the debt—10 times the original amount of that $1 in 1984.

This budget may not in itself include any new taxes, but it paves the way for future tax increases. This budget fails to tackle the seriousness of our deficit by eliminating non-essential spending now and their associated costs later.

That is why I believe this budget is insincere. It is the government's attempt to sell the GST once again, but this year's budget lays the groundwork for justifying raising the GST rate because spending is not cut enough.

The finance minister has been in the job for nearly six years. When he started the deficit was $38 billion. The fiscal year which we are now ending shows a deficit of $30.5 billion. Next year's forecast is for $28.5 billion. After seven years of Tory management, we will see our deficit reduced by less than $10 billion. Then suddenly, according to their projections, in four more years we are expected to believe that the deficit will be zero. Canadians can only believe the government for so long. The government can only say for so many years that the deficit will be zero in four years. To Canadians it seems as if tomorrow never comes.

If we look back to May 23, 1985, when the finance minister tabled his first budget, he predicted the deficit under several scenarios for the period ending with the 1990 fiscal year.

Under the finance minister's most optimistic scenario that he gave us for the economic growth over the first five years, the deficit would have dropped to $18 billion this year, not $28.5 billion. The growth in the economy was better than the period of his best scenario. While the economy grew by 20 per cent over this period, revenues grew even faster. Their share of the Gross Domestic Product outpaced the minister's projection from 16 per cent to 17.5 per cent. Despite all this extra revenue did the deficit go down? No. In fact, interest rates were usually lower than expected in most years. The fact is that spending increased. It did not fall as a percentage of the economy as expected. Spending is the true culprit. This government is the guilty party by not cutting spending enough since 1984.

• (1630)

Just because the government has vocal opposition in this House lobbyists outside the House, most of whom are paid by the government, are fighting every dollar cut, saying what has been done is too extreme. These comments do not mean that it is too extreme. There should be a national interest and a concern for our future economic stability, more future than just looking toward the next election.

It is a shame when only the finance minister and the Treasury Board see the deficit as a serious problem and the national concern it is. Other cabinet colleagues see themselves as advocates for special interests rather than national interests. Before this budget cabinet ministers threatened if a special interest were cut, and then announced victory when it was not cut. All the cabinet should be united in deficit reduction because it is a national concern. Otherwise, how do you expect Parliament and the country to be concerned with it?

That is why every major program for which there is a special interest in cabinet is preserved, even though we cannot afford it.

The government says reducing the deficit will help reduce inflationary pressures and along with them interest rates. I agree with this statement, but only as long as government spending and taxing is such that it is geared not to spend in inflationary areas.

I have asked for a regional breakdown of revenues and expenditure to demonstrate that the government's fiscal policies could help ease inflation. Otherwise, the use of monetary policy is the equivalent of the government throwing water on the whole country to put out a fire in the furnace it is itself stoking. The government will not provide a regional breakdown for me. Either it does not have it, which is highly unlikely, or it does not want to release it, which is far more likely. Government spending must be such that it helps reduce and not fuel inflation. Unless it provides a breakdown, Canadians are left asking this question: What are they hiding from us as Canadians, is it incompetence or inequality for the regions?

Fairness does not mean spending the most on central Canada because all things gravitate to the centre of the universe where the most votes are, incidentally, in politics. The government steadfastly refuses to show us its spending to demonstrate that it is fair.

In this budget it has been estimated that approximately 40 per cent of the cuts directly affect Alberta. Albertans are not unwilling to make sacrifices. We all know that they sacrificed a great deal in the early 1980s under the National Energy Program. There are several areas where Alberta is being hit specifically. There is the public utilities income tax transfer, OSLO and CEIP. Under the NEP and the PGRT the energy sector did suffer. Now we are seeing it happen again. Albertans are feeling apprehensive about the Minister of the Environment's new environmental agenda. Will this slap a heavy hydrocarbon tax on Alberta? Albertans do want spending cuts, but Albertans want fairness in the cuts and equality of sacrifice right across the country.

British Columbians are asking why the Polar 8 has been cancelled while none of the Canadian patrol frigates are being cancelled, especially the three subcontracted to central Canada.

Alas, neither does there seem to be any sense of fairness for the provinces selected for reductions in transfer payments. Apparently, the most fiscally responsible were selected for that. We did not see a sense of fairness four days before the budget, when no doubt the cuts had already been finalized, the minister surreptitiously agreed to voluntarily pay $90 million in payroll taxes to the Ontario government, a tax which costs the federal government $400 million annually in lost revenue. Why, in the name of fairness, did the government agree to this tax payment four days before the budget? How is this fair to Alberta and B.C., two other of the "have" provinces?

Not only do the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces raise the constitutional impropriety of the federal government legislating in areas of provincial jurisdiction, but the federal government, even with these reductions, continues to dictate standards without providing access to the tax base to finance the high standards demanded. Furthermore, passing the blame to the provinces simply does not solve the problem of tax increases at the provincial level or unnecessary federal government spending.

Let me deal with some of the fiscal uncertainty that this government has created by failing to reduce the deficit. It has affected interest rates and the value of the dollar. All products of the government need to borrow greater amounts for our debt. It is not the other way around. Furthermore, the government's inability to get the deficit under control has meant the competitiveness of our industry and the entrepreneurial capital of Canadians is being taxed away to pay foreign debtors and to upwardly distribute tax revenue to those Canadians who can most afford to lend money.

Since this government has been in office, the reliance on foreign debtors has more than doubled the original amount. As the government taxed more of Canadians' income and left them with less and less to reinvest in their own country, foreign capital had to substitute for the deficiency in the economy each year. To attract and pay for foreign capital, our competitiveness is hurt with the high dollar and high interest rates needed to attract these resources.

I see no recognition of this program in this budget, nor any attempt to deal with the very real problem of the government taxing away and spending away our international competitiveness to fund programs at the expense of our future competitiveness as a trading nation and our ability to compete under the free trade agreement. The finance minister stated that these are all powerful reasons for holding to the plan we started in 1984. They certainly are. But they do not explain why this government has deviated so far and long from its original plan which would have given us a deficit of $18 billion.

The government itself treats deficit reduction as a more partisan game than anyone else in this House. To its opponents it says: "You are fiscally irresponsible socialists", and then pats itself on the back and says: "Well, compared to the other guys, look what we've done". For myself, the Reform Party, many Canadians and, sadly, international observers in the financial markets are saying: "You were in office, not your opponents, and you have not done much".

The government's words and deeds on deficit reduction do not balance, so how could its budgets?

The government should have controlled our deficits so as not to leave a huge financial burden of debt to our future generations, but it did not. Under the transfer payment changes we see a dearth of research dollars. Young people, our human capital, will get the wrong signal that they are neither important to, nor supported by, government. Surely, developing brain power and technical specialists is the best long term deficit reducer for this country. No responsible government should want to leave a legacy of economic destruction and neglect to our posterity, just as no responsible government wants to leave a legacy of an environment ravaged by our neglect. The Reform Party believes strongly that both policy outlooks are inseparable for any party which sincerely believes in responsible government.

The government's sad refusal to acknowledge its lack of progress will not help to reduce deficits, nor will its protestations to calm international markets, nor will a litany of statistics created to disguise the facts. The instability of our dollar, rumours of downgrading our bond rating and high interest rates to finance the deficit are all signs of the lack of progress.

This government is responsible for the size of the deficit. It has been in office for six years. It cannot blame the size of the deficit and level of interest payments on the previous Liberal administrations of Pierre Trudeau, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, or whoever.

The Reform Party outlined in the 1988 election the cuts that should be made to get the deficit under control, all to unnecessary programs. However, sadly, these cuts are no longer sufficient. I regret to say that it has taken too long to tackle the issue of unnecessary spending. To control the deficit now will require cuts to programs that all Canadians need, not just want.

My party has been accused of wanting to cut medicare. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Yet we have seen this government cutting millions in health and post-secondary education. Soon the question will not be: What can we afford to cut? but, desperately: What can we afford to keep? That is the state that we are in. Health and post-secondary education are what we need to keep, not cut. Even under the finance minister's current projections, which are optimistic at best, interest payments will just level off. The projections after two years are in fact a fantasyland of projections, low future interest rates, low unemployment and high economic growth which this budget does little to build the fiscal foundations for.

This government is leading us to the brink of economic ruin proclaiming: "We have been doing a great job". But the international community knows otherwise, and Canadians know otherwise. All the signs are there for nervousness.

Earlier this afternoon the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said: "Canadians say, Cut, cut, cut, but don't cut in my backyard". We are at the point in Canada now where in my home province of Alberta people are saying: "We are willing, personally, to take cuts". Sadly enough, the cabinet ministers themselves are saying in reaction to the gathering storm clouds of economic warning: "It's all perception, the problems out there. I'll be hanged if you will cut spending on my particular program and I'll be hanged if I'll be hanged". Unfortunately, perception aside, reality lies in front of us. Reality lies ahead. This country will be hanged if they don't.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that must be the vaguest speech that has been made in this budget debate.

I was interested in the hon. member's references to sincerity. Of course the test of sincerity is whether she is prepared to back up her rhetoric with an indication of particular areas in which she will cut. She indicated that she did not think there had been cuts enough in agriculture. I wonder if she will tell us what programs in agriculture she thinks should be cut.

I would also be interested in her responding to this very simple question. Does she support the continuation of the OSLO project? Does she support the continuation of the Polar 8?

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I have to say that I am certainly flattered to have a senior cabinet minister here to listen to my speech and to ask some very appropriate questions.

First, I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, and make it public to the House, that we issued a press release from my office last year saying what cuts we thought could be made. I also have to say that I received a personal phone call from staff of the senior minister. He certainly knows some areas in which the Reform Party and I personally have advocated cutting. I think that certainly is no surprise, and we could go on and on.

I have been accused of having simplistic answers to budget control. I know there are no easy answers to budget control. I am probably the only opposition member in this House who will give credit where credit is due to this government. I stand sometimes on a lonely road on this side of the House, but I certainly am willing to do that. That is positive. I am glad to give credit where credit is due.

We have had meetings both privately and publicly with people about the OSLO project. They are in the vein that it is unfortunate because the prices are so low now. The meetings we have had for people are saying: "We are very sorry that the government has to cut out on this, but if there is no confidence in the private sector then it simply will not work". Again, we are willing to say that unless oil prices come up again the government probably made the right decision.

What I did say about the Polar 8 is that maybe there is no need for the Polar 8 as the government thinks. What I was discussing was the apparent discrepancy for the people in B.C. They have had promises from senior cabinet ministers saying: "This will be done, we promise. Trust us". They are finding difficult the discrepancy between the Polar 8 being scrapped and seeing other frigates still in continuation in eastern or central Canada.

Please remember that we are willing to give credit where credit is due.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I heard "maybe" and I heard "if". Is she in favour of OSLO, yes or no? Is she in favour of Polar 8, yes or no? What are the cuts in agriculture that she is proposing? We want a straight answer to a straight question, not "maybe", not "if".

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, people in the agricultural sector are saying "yes", not "if". They are saying: "Yes, we will be willing to take cuts if there are cuts unilaterally across the country and if there is equality of sacrifice".

Yes, Polar 8 can be scrapped, but not just scrapped indiscriminately. This is what I am hearing from people.

This government simply needs to get back on its feet. We are in financial disaster in this country. I do not like to see Polar 8 being cut. I do not like to see OSLO being cut.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear some of the comments from the member for Beaver River.

She talked about national interests and about special interests. The Reform Party is on record as advocating cuts to the bilingualism program. Does she consider that a special interest or a national interest?

Is she willing to recommend cuts, as has been advocated in the past, to multiculturalism and to race relations? Are those national interests or are those special interests?

Does she want to cut across the board, as some Reform members have suggested, which would mean 10 per cent or 20 per cent across the board, cut pensions, cut health care and so on.

The member was very interesting in her speech. She talked about singling out Alberta and then said: "We are willing to accept cuts in Alberta". She cannot have it both ways. Have we singled out Alberta or not? Are we willing or not to share the burden? Could she answer those questions for me?

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I have just been accused of being vague. I have to say forgive me, but I was told by the hon. minister that I cannot answer questions. I simply have to confess that I did not even understand some of those questions.

We are talking about Alberta here. Albertans are willing to make sacrifices. We are talking about special interest versus national interest. My hon. friend would know that official bilingualism as it stands from this end is a national interest. Yet we see it simply does not work in practicality across the country. We see, unfortunately, many groups coming forward making statements such as: "We do not like this heavy-handed approach from on high".

I said quite clearly in my speech that the Reform Party is against health care being cut. What we are specifying against universality is for instance in day care where we simply cannot afford it. We need to target these programs for people who need them.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Beaver River would hearken back to the beginning of her speech when she criticized the government for only having substantial cuts in five departments. She then referred to further cuts being possible in agriculture. I wonder if she had included agriculture as one of those departments that has had substantial cuts given that in 1988–89 its Estimates gave it $3.2 billion. This year's Estimates give it $1.9 billion, which is a drop of $1.3 billion or a cut of 40 per cent.

Is agriculture one of the five that got substantial cuts, or is she looking for larger cuts than that to qualify as substantial?

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. What I did say in my speech, and I will read it again so that the hon. minister can understand it as well, is that the budget of the Secretary of State actually increased after the non-recurring payments to Japanese Canadians are removed. The Agriculture budget fell, but that was as a result of last year's budget and the drought assistance programs that happened.

That may clarify that for my hon. friend as well. The actual dollars went down in Agriculture because of the huge lump sum that was helping out those who were suffering from drought.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, as always the privilege is mine on behalf of my Nepean constituents to participate in debate here in the House of Commons on this particular occasion and of course on the budget.

During the House break this past week I had the opportunity to speak to many of my constituents and discuss the effects of the various budget measures being imposed by the present government.

Despite what the finance minister has relayed to the people of Canada, this budget is full of tax increases. This budget will relentlessly pursue a brutal and discriminatory high interest rate policy. It will widen the gap between the rich and poor. It will respectively end regional development in Canada as Canadians have known it. The fallacy of no new tax is the most blatant act of deception.

This government has lost the vision of this country, or maybe it has never realized what Canada is all about.

This budget indicates that the government has no sense of responsibility for the framework of Canada as we know it today.

Let us look at a few areas. First, the government has not made any significant moves to cut its own spending. Let us take a look at one area, the PMO.

When the Liberals left office in 1984 the cost of the PMO was $6 million and there were 104 person years of employment. Upon taking office the new Prime Minister increased the budget of the PMO by close to $1 million and added 16 more person years.

What is happening today in 1990? We tried to find out what the figures were today. Unfortunately, we are now not able to get a clear idea of how much the PMO has increased staff and spending this year because they have come up with another new accounting trick to hide the number of people on staff. The PMO has decided to eliminate all political staff from the accounting in the 1990–91 Estimates so that the person years of the PMO are listed as nil. This trickery is a blatant attempt to hide how much the PMO is costing Canadians and how many more people are now employed by the Prime Minister to figure out more ways to trick Canadians.

Federal funding for universities through transfers to the provinces, since 1983 has been cut by $8.9 billion. The 1990 budget cuts alone for health care and education are a reduction of $7.3 billion in payments to the provinces. Yet the minister has never consulted with anyone to determine the effects of these drastic measures.

Funding for post-secondary education should not be seen as an expenditure. Education is an investment, a necessary investment in Canada's future.

Has the government looked at the damaging effects the reduction in research and development funding will have? By passing the responsibility for funding and performing R and D to the private sector Canada runs the risk of jeopardizing long term scientific commitments.

Some $39 million is cut from planned science programs at a time when Canada desperately needs to be increasing science-based innovation to ensure our economic strength in the future.

The social housing budget in the next five years will be reduced by $165 million. This is at a time when the homeless in Canada number 200,000, or 1 per cent of our population. In addition, the GST will cause new house prices and renovated home costs to increase.

The most callous of budget cuts is to our veterans. How can the Minister of Veterans Affairs say, and I quote: "The budget will have a minor impact on veterans"? The long term care costs to Canada's veterans will be increased by $35 million. Does this government have any conscience at all?

Women's programs will be seriously affected. Budget cuts to core financing for 80 women's centres across the country will most likely see many of them close. Many of these service women in rural areas. These agencies act as referral centres for women on issues of friendship, native groups and battered women. They provide essential services to women at a time when violence is being recognized as one of the most pernicious forms of behaviour against women.

Cuts in social housing will affect women. The majority of poor women in this country are single mothers.

Once again, corporations get off easy in respect of the corporate income tax. In the 1990-91 fiscal year the federal government is expected to collect $2.4 billion less than predicted a year ago. Had the government collected what it expected from corporations, it would not have had to cut its expenditures by $2.8 billion this year in its budget.

Astonishingly, though, when the business sector is so adamant about deficit reduction, the minister has chosen to lighten the burden of corporate taxation since the Conservatives came into power. Whereas corporate taxes accounted for 13.2 per cent of total federal revenues in 1984 and 1985, in 1990-91 corporate taxes will account for only 10.4 per cent of federal revenues. Who is picking up the slack in between? It is being picked up by the low income and the middle-income person.

This projected trend is all the more difficult to comprehend, given that the corporate sector will be a major beneficiary of substituting the GST for the MST. Even assuming that removing the FST is fully passed forward to consumers, the corporate sector will still save some $6 billion in taxes on goods and services. Further, in 1991-92 manufacturers will be refunded more than $2 billion for the FST paid on inventories. Stage two of tax reform is very beneficial for the corporate sector.

One of the most incredible deficiencies in the budget is one that does not affect my ratepayers, but it does affect the national economy, in particular the Atlantic economy. There is no new money in the budget to address the fisheries crisis in Atlantic Canada. I say, shame on you on the government side of the House. This is a region of Canada that is so dependent on this industry.

Since this government came to power in 1984 unprecedented revenues—over $120 billion in six years—were realized through economic growth. Yet for a government which insists it is interested in deficit reduction, it certainly missed the opportunity to make meaningful reductions in the deficit during those years when we were experiencing world-wide economic growth. What did it do with this 70 per cent revenue growth? What was the $120 billion used for? We do not know, and the government is not telling. It certainly was not for deficit reduction.

Canadians across this country are fed up with this government and its practice of raising taxes—33 times in five years. Yet it has not reduced its own costs. Revenues can be raised by means other than a GST, Canadians are saying. Scrap the tax and let us get down to the basics of running this country, and running it the way it should be run.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the excellent speech made by my colleague. She certainly covered a lot of ground in a very short time. I commend her on the conciseness and the punch it contained in such a short time.

I want to comment on that part of her presentation in which she said that the most callous of all cuts were the cuts made to veterans. I find it singularly distracting and somewhat disappointing, if not incredible, that in discussing this in Question Period with the Minister of Veterans Affairs two days in as row the minister has said that there are no cuts. I am having a lot of trouble with that. Obviously, veterans organizations are as well because I, as the veterans affairs critic, am getting an awful lot of comment and reaction from one end of the country to the other. Veterans cannot understand how a minister can say there are no cuts and on the other hand they are losing a total of $35 million.

I note in a book authored by the President of the Treasury Board entitled Managing Government Expenditures that it talks about savings of $8 million and $10 million in the period 1990–91 will be obtained under the Veterans Independence Program which is designed to keep the veterans at home so they do not have to go to hospitals. By restricting the range of services that are funded, this is how this $18 million will be saved.

I think the important thing to remember here is that the average of a Canadian veteran is 70. This cut-back on the Veterans Independence Program which involves heavy housekeeping is very important to them if the aim of the program is to be upheld.

I commend my colleague on her use of the term callous. I can only hope that the comments by my colleagues, other people on this side of the House and perhaps even some on the government side of the House about the callousness of this particular cut will make the Minister of Veterans Affairs see fit to go back either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance to see if he can make some amelioriation or some adjustment to restore this benefit that has been taken away from veterans. This is the first time since the Great Depression that anything has been taken from veterans.

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague and comment on his remarks. I think the old saying goes that if you repeat a story often enough you begin to believe that what you are saying is true. I am beginning to think that the minister responsible for veterans affairs has repeated to himself and to his colleagues often enough that there are no cuts to the veterans in this country that he himself is beginning to believe it. That is unfortunate because I know that there are cuts. Those veterans know that there are cuts.

I wonder how many people in this House of Commons have visited a veteran in a veterans' home in their area. The one here in Ottawa is called the Rideau Veterans' Home and is on Alta Vista Drive. I would invite you to go and visit a veteran and to see the accommodation for the ones who are in the home where we are increasing their charges in this home. Sure, less than $300 a month is paltry for the government. They think this is a minor inconvenience. But to those veterans who are living on a very limited pension it is a major expenditure for them. It is not so much for the ones who are living in the home, but the ones who are able to live in their own homes and are now going to lose their housekeeping funding money that was being provided to them before when they cannot get out and shovel their driveway, clean their windows or do the basic necessities that you and I can do because we are still able-bodied people. Again I say, shame on this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Cardigan.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to address some of the problems facing Prince Edward Island and, in particular, my riding of Cardigan.

My riding is predominantly rural, made up mostly of farmers, fishermen and small businessmen. Most of the employment in the area is seasonal, and as a result UIC benefits are extremely important. With so much seasonal employment in P.E.I., it is necessary to find a way to reduce our reliance on unemployment insurance. One program, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, known as ACOA, was established to create more long-term, stable employment. However, the 1989–1990 and the 1990–1991 budgets have done much to reduce the effectiveness of this program.

Last year the budget of the Minister of Finance cut a large chunk out of the ACOA budget. And if that was not bad enough, this year all grants for the program have been completely eliminated. This, in effect, has reduced ACOA to a simple bank, nothing more. The purpose of ACOA was to attract business through incentives. Now that these incentives no longer exist, business interest in the program is on a decline, dramatically.

Prior to the budget, the government promised aid to the Atlantic fishery in this, its time of crisis. Many references were made to the need for substantial aid to the area, the same as was given to the western grain growers. However, as we now know, the budget contained nothing for the fisheries industry. This gives a clear and unequivocal signal to Atlantic Canadians that the Prime Minister and the government he leads do not consider the fisheries crisis a priority. Otherwise, the government would have acted as quickly as it did in the western grain crisis.

Within the next six months, the P.E.I. fishery could find itself in a crisis situation, just like that occurring in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. The recent U.S. legislation restricting lobsters under 3.25 inches will cause irreparable damage to the island fishery and economy. This legislation will affect 80 per cent of our lobster exports to the U.S. market. The impact is enormous, considering the lobster industry employs 10 per cent of my province's labour force. It represents 80 per cent of the Island fishery and accounts for 25 per cent of the Island's exports. In essence, the province's second largest industry is on the verge of collapse, should negotiations to repeal the law be unsuccessful.

The problems in the fishery on the Island do not stop there. Nearly every month I receive letters from local fishermen alerting me that yet another wharf or harbour is badly in need of upgrading or repairs. These small craft harbours are vital to the long-term viability of the Island fishery and, therefore, must remain, at a minimum, operable.

It has been noted by many industry officials that the current small craft harbour budget is ridiculously insufficient to meet the current needs. The recent budget cut of $4 million to this program illustrates this government's failure to recognize the gravity of this very serious situation.

Several years ago my riding of Cardigan was held by the Hon. Dan MacDonald, an outstanding Canadian war veteran who lost both an arm and a leg defending Canada in World War II. He represented Cardigan and Prince Edward Island with great distinction. With Dan as Minister of Veterans Affairs, the department developed a more human touch because he was aware of the veterans' needs, for he also was a veteran.

It is very sad to see the damage that six years of Tory government can bring. More than 5,000 aging veterans, who by illness or injury are confined to chronic care hospitals will now have to pay more than $3,000 each for their beds. This is a slap in the face to all veterans across Canada. This government has clearly lost all semblance of humanity, the most recent example being the regrettable action against our war veterans. Veterans should be treasured, not destroyed, most Canadians would surely agree with me on this point.

During the last six years, the government has not dealt sufficiently with the question of post-secondary education. Recently the government has stressed that the need for an educated labour force and better training. Therefore, WOUld it not make more sense to provide these institutions which train and educate, with more financial assistance to meet these goals? Instead of increasing financing to post-secondary institutions, the government saw fit to cut the Established Programs Financing.

In effect, this will force students in Prince Edward Island's only university and only college to pay more for their education. Prince Edward Island is in a depressed region, and currently over 75 per cent of all Island university students must take out loans to support their education. The budget will certainly make this figure rise. In light of this, this government's commitment to education and training is certainly in shambles.

The cuts to Established Programs Financing will also affect the ability of the health care system to perform at its present level. To maintain its present level of service in the health field, the provincial government must increase taxes. This would certainly seem to contradict the minister's statement of "no new taxes".

The flip side of this is that if taxes are not increased, then the level of service must be reduced. Could this be the beginning of harmonizing our Canadian and American health systems, to put Canadians on the same level as the American health system? The people of Cardigan certainly hope not. We know, and the government knows, that Islanders and all Canadians will not permit this attack on our medical system.

I would like to turn my attention to the Prince Edward Island tourist industry. Each year Prince Edward Island attracts 800,000 visitors. They come to watch Anne of Green Gables and other performances at Confederation Centre of the Arts. They come to see the beautiful scenery and historic buildings such as Province House known as the birthplace of Canada. Of course, visitors come to enjoy beautiful beaches, excellent seafood and our fine P.E.I. potatoes. Our tourist industry could take a severe plunge in fortunes, beginning this year, when the tourist season goes through its first year with the devastating VIA Rail cuts in effect.

Also, it has been predicted that nationally, 30,000 jobs will be lost as a result of the government's infamous GST. In Atlantic Canada, with about 10 per cent of Canada's population, that translates to about 3,000 jobs. The Tourist Industry Association of Prince Edward Island has formally denounced the GST as being potentially disastrous for the industry in Atlantic Canada.

The GST will do two things for certain. It will increase taxes, and it will cause the loss of thousands of jobs, not only in Cardigan, not only in Prince Edward Island but all across Canada. This is something of which the government should surely be ashamed.

Finally, I wish to thank you for the time to express, through me, the views of the people of Cardigan of this budget.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his comments.

I want to review with him a number of the difficulties that his province has experienced. Perhaps he could tell me which one has had the most disastrous effect on this small Island.

The closing of the military, of course, was one that has caused great anxiety among the people of Prince Edward Island.

• (1710)

He referred not only to the current fishing difficulties, but those that he anticipates. He also made reference to the budgetary implications, the reductions for the veterans and how badly we and many other Canadians feel that they have been mistreated. He also referred to health reductions that will have an impact upon the elderly and those who are not well, as well as the reductions in education which will have an impact upon our young people who are seeking to build a better future for themselves, the province and country.

I have also been told that these reductions are now having some negative effects upon the elementary and secondary sectors, particularly of small provinces, because they do not have the funds to try to keep the health and post-secondary infrastructures that are already in place.

Finally, the hon. member mentioned tourism and the impact the goods and services tax will have on that, quite apart from the increased taxation that will result because of the reductions to health and education. I would ask him to comment on those measures he believes have had the most disastrous and negative effect on the people of his constituency of Cardigan, or on the province itself?

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, I would think that probably what would have the most devastating effect in my area is if this law passed by the U.S. is allowed to remain in place. If we cannot get this law that restricts lobster under 3-1/4 inches from entering the U.S. market, it will be disastrous for the fishermen in Cardigan.

There is no question that the reduction of funds to health and education and the loss of our military base have removed dollars from Prince Edward Island and the Island economy, but with this this move in fisheries, it will be totally devastating to our fishing industry.

There are many other problems, of course. With cuts to small craft harbours, we now have many harbours all around the Cardigan that is desperately in need to repair. But if we cannot sell the fish, it will be a disastrous decision, so we hope to God the free trade panel will do some good.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to endorse the over-all thrust of this budget. It is a responsible budget. It is a sensitive budget, and it is a budget that is geared to the realities of today and Canada's position in a competitive global market-place. It is a budget that seeks intelligent compromise and balance between sound money management and the demands of a society which has learned the addictive art of constant gratification. This is a budget that imposes restraint but it is not a budget that bruises or punishes.

Some hon. members opposite will disagree. Lacking real targets for criticism, they will seek shadowy targets, bogeymen with which to frighten the public. But this budget contains no bogeymen. Even so, we heard a moment ago and we will continue to hear impassioned speeches about how the federal government has transferred its problems on to the backs of the provinces.

Some will complain that the provinces will be forced to cope by cutting, spending or by raising taxes. No doubt, that is true. No matter how you slice it, every dollar that we spend as governments, whether we are the federal government or the provincial government or the municipal government, comes out of the very same pocket, yours and mine and the fellow across the way.

But worse, and in my opinion far worse, is that every dollar that we spend beyond our ability to pay comes out of those same pockets, but not just on what we have earned today but on what we will earn tomorrow and what our children will earn and, if we keep it up at the same pace, what our grandchildren will earn.

There is no magic bottomless pitcher here spewing forth money in an endless stream. There is only you, me and these hon. members across the way, and what we can produce from the sweat of our labours. Whether it is the federal government, provincial government or the municipal government, we all have an equal responsibility to curb spending and manage the taxpayers' dollar more efficiently.

To suggest somehow that the movement of the tax burden from one level of government to the other will somehow affect the bottom line, what you and I pay as individuals and as taxpayers, is sheer nonsense. No matter who spends, no matter what level of government spends, the same guys pay, you and I and the fellow next door.

Currently, 35 cents out of every federal dollar that the federal government collects goes to service the debt. Only 12 cents of the provincial tax dollar goes for the same purpose. Does it make sense for Canada to borrow even more money to pass on to the provinces? Is that not just a shell game, like we have heard? Does the freeze on the established funding program not simply expose that shell game? The expenditure reductions announced in this budget are absolutely vital to Canada's future.

Let us just take a look at our country from a broader point of view for the moment. Those of us who have done business abroad or who have travelled abroad have come to realize that Canada has been living in a dream world for the past couple of decades. We have lost touch with that stark reality of life that is there for most of the world's population. That reality is that you have to work for what you get and you cannot live forever beyond your ability to produce. Sometime, someone has to pay the piper and that time is now.

We are indeed a rich nation, richer beyond the wildest dreams of many, but even Canada cannot afford to spend without regard for the future because we must ultimately pay for that kind of philosophy, and to do so we are forced to rely on other countries, countries who manage their resources more successfully than we do.

Let us just ask ourselves why these countries are prepared to lend us their savings. Is it because we are nice guys, because we are good people? I am afraid not. There are simple economic reasons. Foreign lenders give us money to cover our profligate spending because they can make money on their investment. It costs us plenty to borrow. The cost of this borrowing robs us of our ability to pay for the things that will add to our wealth, that will enhance our competitive position tomorrow. That is the position that we have lost through the tremendous tax burden that we place on our citizens and on our business community.

Mr. Speaker, do not believe for a moment that even these money markets are willing to fund us indefinitely. In fact, insecurity about Canada's economy has prompted comment from the international monetary people in the past. The message is straightforward and clear cut: Get your fiscal house in order; stop spending beyond your means.

What does that mean to us? It means that if we refuse to listen, if we fail to take exactly the kind of measures that have been announced here in this House on February 20 by the Minister of Finance, then we can expect continued pressure on our interest rates, we can expect an erosion of confidence in Canada as a good place to invest. We can expect a reduction of confidence in Canada as a mature responsible nation which has earned a right at the decision-making tables when international affairs are being discussed.

Today no country can afford to live in isolation. What we do, even in our internal affairs will have an international impact. That in turn will impact upon us. We must learn to co-exist in a market driven society prepared to respond to the subtle checks and balances that are a natural part of that system. We must have the flexibility as well to respond to international conditions as they shift and change, as they are shifting and changing even now. But a country so deeply in debt that more than one-third of its tax revenue goes into servicing this debt, cannot have this flexibility and the freedom to do these things. A country that has mortgaged its future cannot possibly be in total control of that future.

Mr. Speaker, is that the kind of country that Canadians want? I think not. We pride ourselves on being in command of our future and some claim indeed that the 21st century belongs to Canada. But that is difficult to believe when it looks like we could enter the 21st century in hock up to our necks.

In fact, unless we take hold, unless we take strong, fearless measures to reduce our debt we could enter that century bankrupt. A nation's strength and autonomy is based on its wealth. Without financial resources a country is weak and vulnerable, defenceless against foreign incursions of all kinds. Being broke is one thing, being heavily in debt is quite another, because when you are in debt your vulnerability becomes public property. Everybody knows that you are in trouble. But some will argue that Canada has always been in debt. We built our nation on the debt incurred to build the railway, they will say. But I say there is a vast difference between a fledgling nation borrowing to build its infrastructure and a mature country borrowing because it cannot manage its vast resources and live within its means.

We hear a great deal about our social programs and every move toward sensible money management is held up as a deadly threat toward these programs. Let us examine the issue in the clear pure light of reason. First of all, why do we have social programs? Well, the answer is simple. Social programs are a natural emanation of an enlightened society's will to deal with an innate fact, the innate fact of inequality. Our social order compels us to provide sustenance and assistance to members of the group who cannot temporarily or permanently provide for themselves. I do not think many people would disagree with this basic philosophy.

Where the quarrel begins is over when this assistance should actually kick in. Should we be giving social assistance to the middle class? When I was a young girl, taking any form of social assistance was something to be avoided at all costs. Today it seems that things are different. We have taken the basic premise of social assistance to a point that it is not only potentially harmful but is also beyond what we can afford to support in many cases. We have done this in the mistaken belief that there is some unlimited source of income to be tapped for this.

Well, there is not. The government's only source of income is you and me. It is not true that you can tax the corporations, tax the rich, tax the tax avoiders, and somehow suddenly solve the fiscal shortfall. Indeed, Canada has already taxed corporations to a level that is bordering on the uncompetitive, and to increase the pressure simply forces companies, Canadian companies along with others, to move their assets elsewhere.

Some members opposite will not like to hear this but business is in fact our only source of wealth in the kind of society that we have in place today, and business is highly mobile. If conditions in a certain jurisdiction are unbalanced, unfavourable, business simply picks up and moves on and so does personal wealth.

Look at what has been happening in China and in Hong Kong. Ever since it became clear that the People's Republic of China would take over Hong Kong in 1997, large corporations and the wealthy have been quietly hedging their bets, setting up conduits through which they can move their capital quickly and efficiently if things get tough. Well, much of that money has already moved to Canada because Canada has been seen as a stable economy under a not-too-restrictive government with a reasonable monetary policy. But all we have to do is tighten the screws on that policy through heavier regulation and taxation and just watch that capital leave the country seeking a more favourable climate.

So tax the rich, tax the corporations more, tax the tax avoiders if you can catch them—the net is so tight in Canada right now that very little escapes. In the end what do you have for this exercise? Ultimately, probably less than you have today because you have driven the wealth producers out of the country.

The answer is balance. We must accept that there are some things that we cannot afford. We must accept that there is a need to better manage the resources that we have. We must accept that a balance has to be struck, and in fact balance is what the minister has sought and has achieved in his monetary policy since 1984. Balance is what I believe the minister has achieved in this budget.

Let us look at the budget for a moment. What does it really do? Well, for one thing it does not raise taxes and that is very good news for a citizenry that has been feeling squeezed by several levels of government. So no new taxes. No additional taxes is another step in my opinion in freeing up choices for Canadians. The goods and services tax which replaces a pernicious tax on manufactured goods is the first step in that exercise.

Next, the budget reduces spending through programs of restraint across the board. Social programs are not affected and in fact services have received actual dollar increases.

The Opposition has zeroed in on the transfers to provinces. Opposition members claim that the freeze on the Established Programs Funding will somehow lead to the total collapse of the Canadian education and health systems. Both are matters of provincial jurisdiction so that takes quite a leap in logic.

Provinces will not get less than they get right now. In fact, the have-not provinces like those in the Atlantic region or Manitoba will continue to receive dollar increases in line with the growth in the economy over the next two years through the equalization transfers. It should also be noted that since 1977 provinces have made their own decisions over how their established programs funding is spent. I repeat, provinces can use their EPF transfers which were originally earmarked for health and post-secondary education in any way they see fit. If health care and post-secondary education in Canada are suffering, perhaps provincial governments would like to examine their own spending priorities or reorganize the way they manage their budgets.

What else is in this budget? More good news. Grants to businesses will be reduced and replaced by repayable loans. Businesses themselves have been suggesting this, and why? Well, because grants and subsidies distort the market-place and contribute to a dependent, non self-sustaining commercial infrastructure that undermines the integrity of our economy. The government is getting out of business. This is excellent news.

Significantly, Petro-Canada will be sold, transferring state control to the hands of the public and repeating the remarkable success story of the Air Canada sale. It is right to sell Petro-Canada to Canadians as individuals. It is wrong for the state to control such an important conglomerate and to acquire its control through the use of tax dollars. State-owned, state-controlled businesses present an element of unfair competition to natural enterprise. They tend also to be inefficient, or dictatorial or both because they do not have to depend on the vagaries of the market-place and respond.

Since its incorporation in 1975, Petro-Canada has grown into a multi-faceted giant whose tentacles extend into many areas that are generally very well served by the private sector. So it is time to return the assets of Petro-Canada to the people who, as individuals with market-driven incentives, will manage those assets far better than can government. In addition, funds raised through the sale of shares can assist the newly emerging, commercially-owned Canadian company to capitalize purchases to keep it appropriately competitive with international interests.

The government is also selling Telesat Canada and winding up the affairs of a number of other Crown corporations that have outlived their usefulness or their original purpose.

The government has also addressed its spending right here at home. Today the civil service is at the same manpower level it was at in 1973 and wage restraint continues to be the order of day with federal public sector increases running at about 3.5 per cent, well below the cost of living. The government has closed tax loopholes.

The government continues to wage war on waste and redundancies. Since 1987-88, the government has been running an operating surplus which now stands at $9 billion. This is a clear indication that the fiscal policies of the Minister of Finance are working. Whether my hon. opponent likes to admit it or not, they are working.

I have to conclude by saying that this budget is a prudent budget and it is a sensitive budget. It recognizes Canada's conceits and respects them, but it is a budget that nurtures the disadvantaged while spurring on the strong and the enterprising. The hon. minister has done a wonderful job in trodding a delicate line toward a goal of a stronger Canada. I commend his efforts and I applaud his courage. He has done what is right over what is expedient.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the member's attention a couple of things she certainly has not talked about. In my community of Surrey North, which is the fastest-growing community in Canada, there are problems. One of them is housing and the affordability of it. I would like her to set out for me clearly what things in this budget are going to help the affordability of housing. What things are going to bring down the interest rate by 5 or 6 per cent, which is necessary to get housing under control?

What about the fact that the social housing program has been totally gutted? CMHC has now been turned into an agency that is nothing more than an insurance broker for the private sector. The Conservatives have totally abandoned any concept of affordability in housing, any concept that the country has a responsibility to provide housing for people on middle or low incomes. They are simply concerned about making sure that those friends of theirs who wish to flip property for massive profits are able to do so.

Second, she says there is no harm in this budget. In my municipality we have a 400-bed shortage in hospitals. Some of the existing beds are not being opened simply because there are not enough operating funds. Since 1971 we have gone backwards in terms of the ratio of hospital beds to population. The provincial government is not, with a cutback from the federal government, going to increase its funding. It is having enough difficulty maintaining its funding. It is simply not going to come up with the additional dollars. It is a federal government responsibility to ensure that there is universal health care in this country.

I would like her to comment on those two things. What are the positives in this budget to assist families, first-time home buyers to obtain affordable housing? Second, try to explain to me and to the people of British Columbia why this is not going to be a blow to our serious health care crisis in the province.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his multi-faceted question. First of all, the tone of his question suggests that he believes in that myth that I was speaking about earlier, that somehow money grows on trees, that if you take the dollar that we collect as a tax collector, by splitting it into three pieces like many fishes, you can make it grow into something beyond what it is.

In fact, it makes no difference whether the dollar is coming from the federal government or the provincial government or the municipal government, it is all coming from you. When you ask what the government has done to do this, that and the other thing to assist this person and that person, the fact is we are taking the dollars out of your pocket and we are cutting them up as governments and telling you how your dollars should be spent. The hon. member may feel that that is appropriate where he comes from, but there are many Canadians who not only do not feel it is appropriate, they simply cannot afford to have it done anymore. When 50 or 60 cents of your wages come out of your pocket and go into taxes you have to have some concerns.

Second, the hon. member asked about housing. He says that the government has abandoned a lot of programs that had to do with assisting first-time home buyers and so on. He is quite correct in that. The government is abandoning a number of assistance programs for middle-class people under the expectation that Canadians are strong enough, that they are confident enough and that they have the ability to fend for themselves, just as they did when I was a girl growing up. They have just stopped learning to do that in the last couple of decades when a philosophy prevailed in this country that somehow you could get something for nothing.

You cannot get something for nothing in this world. You can only put off paying what you owe today until tomorrow. The hon. member is suggesting that somehow we should put off until tomorrow paying what we owe today, what we owe for yesterday and what we owe for the day before because somebody else did a lot of profligate spending. Already our children are in debt up to their necks because of that kind of philosophy. If we keep it up our grandchildren will be in debt up to their necks and there will not be a country called Canada because we will not have the strength, the ability or the resources to be able to command our own future.

I would suggest that if it is true, as the hon. member says, that there are people waiting in line for hospital beds in his province of British Columbia, perhaps the provincial government should take a look at how those hospital beds are being funded and find more creative and more productive ways of seeing that the health needs of the population are met. Clearly, the way governments are doing it right now and the way governments have been doing it for the last little while, has not been working. We are spending more and the services are getting less. There must be another alternative. I do not think the reasonable alternative is to take taxpayers' dollars and turn them over to bureaucracy and suppose that all our problems are going to be magically solved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A short supplementary, the hon. member for Surrey North.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the member says that people should be able to look after themselves with regard to housing. How does a young family earning $35,000 buy a house in metropolitan Toronto or metropolitan Vancouver? The member is worried about give-aways. Why did she vote last week to give away another $400 million in RRSP contributions to people earning over $50,000 a year? The total budget cost to this government is now $11 billion in RRSP give-aways to the rich. How do you justify that to the single-parent families trying to buy a house? What they have done is they have taken money from the poor and given it to the rich. That is the Tory philosophy.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should listen to what he just said. He suggested that somehow we are taking from the poor and giving to the rich. I am not sure how he works that out. If the poor are as poor as we are being told they are, they do not have anything to give. In fact, that is not the way it works. The way it works is that the resources we have are generated by the business people, the people who this hon. member would like to see driven out of town on a rail. If we do that, we will not have any resources. You cannot take from the poor to give to the rich. The poor have no resources. It is a silly question.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have been in the House for most of the day. To say that some of the speeches I have heard today are incredible is putting it mildly. The speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the parliamentary secretary, is a case in point. I could go into that in detail, but there was another one that was even more unbelievable, and that was made by the Minister of Supply and Services earlier today.

I would like to deal with some of the points he raised in his attempts to defend this disastrous budget that the Minister of Finance has imposed on Canadians. He had the gall, and I can only describe it as unmitigated gall, to try to compare the Government of Canada with the Government of Ontario. He tried to do it in a way that suggested that the Government of Ontario was the one that looked bad, not the Government of Canada. It was, as I say, an unbelievable speech. I thought that he displayed a certain riskiness in making this comparison. I would like to draw on that comparison in a way that is perhaps less favourable than the minister intended.

First, he suggested that the Government of Ontario was somehow less responsible fiscally than the Government of Canada. He suggested that because government spending had increased at a slightly faster rate than this government's had, therefore, somehow it was less responsible.

It is hard to imagine that coming from the minister who, of course, was using figures that could only be described as suspect. He did what the Minister of Finance has done repeatedly in this budget. He draws on figures that show increases in program spending only, not over-all government spending. They somehow think that program spending is different from over-all government spending. Everyone knows that is not so. If the government is short of money at the end of the year, it has to borrow. We have a borrowing bill before this House now. If the government is short of money, it is going to borrow the money and it does not matter whether it was program spending or whether it was to pay interest on the public debt. The fact is the money has to be borrowed from somewhere. This government, with its profligate ways, has run up the national debt in this country to heights unknown before, absolutely astronomical heights.

We sit here and listen to speeches from members on the Conservative side. It sounds as though each speech has been written by officials in the Department of Finance because they all beat the same drum, they all say the same thing over and over and it is silly nonsense. They cite all the deficit figures for the years up to 1984, and then they stop. Why do they stop? They stop because they are so ashamed and embarrassed of the disgraceful record of this government. I see the minister shaking his head. He knows I am right.

Anyway, to go back to the Minister of Supply and Services, he said that the Ontario government had grown excessively while the federal government had cut back. Well, there is a good reason why there has been growth in Toronto in the Ontario government. Ontario has a Liberal government. It has a government with a heart. It does not have a brick for a heart, or a heart of stone. It believes in helping the people that it was elected to serve. It cares for its people. Instead of throwing them out of work, it creates jobs and it is creating them in the Ontario civil service.

Second, Ontario had a budgetary surplus this year. The ministers forget that. This was not a case of a mismanaged economy like this one. The Ontario government generated a surplus this year because it has managed its affairs so prudently. That is the result.

Here we have a record deficit of $30 billion for the fourth year in a row under the Conservatives. It was higher before that. Yet they have predicted $28 billion for four years. They have been wrong every time and the minister will be wrong again this year. Watch it. He will be wrong again, he will be low, and he will be wrong next year.

In 1985 he told us that the deficit this year would be $15 billion. What is it? Double that. How wrong can you be? The man must be mad or something. He has no comprehension of figures. The Treasurer of Ontario knows what he is talking about. He predicted a small deficit. He got a small surplus. That is what you call prudent fiscal management and I wish that the Minister of Finance would go to Toronto and take some lessons. He needs them.

I want to point out that the surplus of the Ontario government is not on operations; it is over all. It is after paying the interest on the debt of the province of Ontario. This government keeps talking about its operating surplus. That is hogwash. This government has a huge debt, $30 billion of deficit this year, and it keeps talking about an operating surplus. What a lot of poppycock. You do not hear that sort of talk in the Ontario legislature. When they talk about a surplus they talk about a surplus, and they mean surplus, they do not mean this phoney operating surplus that this Minister of Finance spouts about in his budget speeches and illustrates with tables and graphs.

Ontario has a treasurer who knows what he is doing and I suggest that the facts indicate clearly that this government has a Minister of Finance who does not have a clue what he is doing. He is wrong on every prediction he makes. He is wrong on every estimate he has made in every single budget he has introduced. All his figures on interest have been wrong. All his figures on the national debt in every year have been incorrect and every projection he has made for every other year has been wrong.

Mrs. Dobbie: You keep saying the figures are wrong. What are the figures?

Mr. Milliken: I will tell you again. If the member had been here two minutes ago she would have heard me say what the figures were. In 1985 this same Minister of Finance predicted that the national deficit for this year would be $15 billion. It is $30 billion, double what he predicted. What a disaster. I wish the hon. member had been here for the preceding four years to try to help him out. She might have straightened him out, but it might have been the wrong way.

The government of Ontario has been saddled with additional programs because of the cutbacks that have been announced by this government over five years of mismanagement so it has had to hire more people to do the work. This government says it has laid off 11,000 civil servants. The government of Ontario has hired 7,000, according to the Minister of Supply and Services. This government has cut back services to its citizens; the province of Ontario has enhanced its services.

What a comparison the Minister of Supply and Services dares to make. And he is a member from Ontario. He must be delighted he lives in a province that is so well managed compared with the way the Government of Canada is mismanaged by the Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member.

It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 84(5), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment which was negatived on the following division:

ETHIOPIA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as most members of the House know, Ethiopia is again close to facing another brutal famine. Already people are dying by the hundreds, and it is anticipated people will die by the thousands.

We are pleased to hear that Canada has agreed to provide additional moneys for food aid, but time is running out and the food is not yet reaching those in need. The international press reports of desperate conditions and significant change in the Ethiopian situation. Many people wonder how many years of famine are going to continue in Ethiopia before the situation changes.

At this time the solution is not only that of food aid, but that of politics. The Government of Canada must offer its good offices and reputation to help the people of Ethiopia come to terms with the fact that the country is no longer governed as it was in the first famine. The government has lost legitimacy and the rebels in the two provinces are now significant actors. It will take not only food aid but a major role in the Security Council and other international institutions for Canada to help with a solution.

We plead with the government to take a more active role in helping the people of Ethiopia and encouraging the international community to get more involved.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, an Environics poll carried out for the Department of Transport shows that people living in the greater Toronto area are two to one in favour of adding additional runways at Pearson International Airport.

This is in opposition to the poll I carried out in my riding last summer which showed that residents directly affected by the airport are almost two to one against expansion.

Out of 2,168 people polled, almost double the number polled by Environics, 37.4 per cent were in favour, 2 per cent were undecided, and 60.6 per cent were against.

I believe the apparent discrepancy in these two surveys can be attributed to the fact that those people polled by Environics are not people who live within the same proximity to the airport as the residents of my own riding of Brampton—Malton.

If we are to determine the effects of expansion on surrounding communities then we must ask those people who will be profoundly affected by expansion. Distortion of this important fact is not acceptable.

NICARAGUA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, last week's election in Nicaragua was a democratic event that owes its existence to the Sandinista revolution. We can be assured that, had the American backed Somoza never been overthrown, democracy would still be a stranger to Nicaragua. So would literacy, community health care, land reform and the absence of death squads, to name a few of the benefits brought on by the Sandinistas.

Nevertheless, the people of Nicaragua cried uncle under the combined burden of the trade embargo, mistakes made by the Sandinistas themselves, and the prospect of continued war with the Contras, given the widespread expectation that Washington would not have been as gracious as Ortega if its side had lost the election.

We must hope now that Mrs. Chamorro and Daniel Ortega will be able to build an understanding based on their once mutually shared abhorrence of pre-revolutionary Nicaragua. There can be no return to those days. Essential to preventing this is the total and immediate disbanding of the Contras, something that only Washington can ensure by cutting off the Contra support and in doing so showing its respect for the views of both Chamorro and Ortega.

This having been done, negotiations about the army in Nicaragua and other issues could proceed. In the meantime, the Canadian government should continue to keep Nicaragua an important country in its development aid programs and urge President Bush to do the right thing.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to report to the House that the Town Council of Outremont has made its position clear on the language question. The resolution passed at the public meeting on March 5 this year sets forth the town's present policy and its intention to continue to provide services in English, as necessary and appropriate, to its English-speaking minority.

I may add that the resolution passed by the council is practically identical to a resolution passed in English by the Municipal Council of Elliot Lake.

I join the Mayor of the Town of Outremont in expressing the wish that the resolution will be well received by the community in general and its individual members. This resolution demonstrates, above all that economic excuses often hide serious psycho-social deficiencies with respect to human values. Bigotry and racism all too often go hand in hand.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my concern over the fiasco of low level flights in Labrador.

As associate critic for northern affairs, it is my position that we should be striving for a responsible development of our northern regions. However, this government has failed to consult Innu and Inuit Canadians properly before taking this decision to bid for a NATO training base and increase the number of low level flights in the region.

The present government seems to be falling into the habit of creating commissions to study the impact of its decisions after the fact. It did this with VIA Rail as well as with the environmental assessment of low level flights in Labrador. These actions epitomize the classic syndrome of putting the cart before the horse. Proper and comprehensive consultation must occur before decisions are implemented.

The attitude that "the sound of jets is the sound of money" only exemplifies the short-sighted approach that we should be trying to get away from.

It seems somewhat regressive that we would be creating the world's biggest battlefield in this era of closer relations and increased co-operation between east and west. Moreover, the increase of flight activity coupled with the sonic boom effect would endanger the wildlife and infringe upon the lifestyles of the thousands of people who inhabit the region and indeed would disrupt the delicate balance of the environment.

EDMONTON CONFERENCE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Edmonton was host to the great debate last Monday. It was sponsored by the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce as part of its debt reduction conference.

I would like to thank the Edmonton chamber for sponsoring the conference. They studied the debt situation in a responsible manner and came up with some thoughtful solutions. We all know who won the debate. I can quote CJCA panellist, Professor Tom Powrie, who said: "Michael Wilson won hands down".

Or perhaps I should quote David Bailey, the editor in chief of the Edmonton Sun who bluntly said: "Doug Young lost it".

The Edmonton Journal columnist Mark Lisac thoughtfully remarked: "Spectators saw Liberal finance critic, Doug Young, take on one of the real heavyweights in Canadian politics and get pounded into impudence."

Albertans love blood sports. Let's do it again.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome you and all Canadians to what will become a regular feature on Wednesdays. The NDP will present the corporate welfare bum of the week. Each week we will choose one winner from three nominees of large corporations that have not paid their fair share of taxes.

The nominees are Bramalea Limited. This property company did not pay any taxes from 1984 to 1988. Its net income increased in that period from $11.2 million to $41.2 million, but still no taxes paid.

The second nominee is another property company, Trizec Corporation which paid only $600,000 in taxes both in 1987 and 1988. Its net income for 1987 was $101 million. In 1988 it was $90 million.

Our final nominee is Hees International which, you guessed it, did not pay a penny in taxes from 1981 to 1987.

Now, for our winner—the envelope, please: The winner of corporate welfare bum of the week, Hees International.

The judges felt that this financial and management services company deserves the title as it seems to do little else than own other companies. Not to worry if our other two companies might feel slighted, Hees owns them—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, Canada recently reached an agreement with the United States on the implementation of the free trade panel report on the export of unprocessed British Columbia salmon and herring. Under the agreement U.S. processors now have the right to buy, if they choose, up to 20 per cent of B.C. unprocessed salmon and herring this year and up to 25 per cent over the next three years.

Of this agreement, UBC professor Dr. Peter Pearse, who headed a royal commission into the B.C. fishery in 1981–82, said: "No foreigner is going to be able to take west coast fish unless they have been caught by a Canadian and a Canadian fisherman chooses to sell them. Last year, under the then existing rules, Canadian processors purchased more American fish for processing in Canada than vice versa.

All the evidence is that free trade in raw fish creates more jobs in Canada, not less. The Canadian fishing industry has shown it can compete on the world market and it is up to them to remain competitive".

With the combination of continued government management of the resource and private initiative to process and market the resource, the fisheries will remain strong and viable for the benefit of all British Columbians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

When the Premier of Saskatchewan spoke on television earlier this week, he said:

> When the federal budget was introduced, additional pressures were put on our province. The immediate effect was a drop of $33 million in transfer payments from the federal government. Over the long term, an annual shortfall of about $100 million will occur at a time when the people of Saskatchewan can least afford it.

The premier went on to say that the budget, in combination with the Americans stealing our traditional wheat markets, and I quote: "amounts to the world declaring economic war on Saskatchewan".

Will the government listen to the Premier of Saskatchewan, declare a ceasefire in its economic war with Saskatchewan and the other provinces, and withdraw its misguided budget?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member understands that there is no economic war, using his terms, when we are transferring to the provinces $34 billion next year. We are increasing those transfers by 3 per cent, which is the same as the increase in the federal government programs.

We are asking the provinces to share in this national problem of getting the deficit down. We must ask them to do that because of the size of those transfer payments. They represent about one-third of our program spending. We are asking them to be a one-third part of our expenditure control program. I think that it is only fair what we are doing.

He talked about the problems with international subsidy wars. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has commented on those on many occasions. We are doing what we can, in international fora, in the trade negotiations and in the summit discussions where the Prime Minister has represented us. In many, many ways we are dealing with this international subsidy war problem.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke of an economic war with Saskatchewan waged by this government, the term "economic war" was used by Premier Devine, a Conservative premier, in a speech on television. If the minister has any concerns about those words, he should take them up with Premier Devine.

In his speech, Mr. Devine also said:

> I told the Deputy Prime Minister Saskatchewan people need a half a billion dollars right now to get ready for the spring seeding, and another $400 million just to compete with the unfair subsidies of foreign governments. I also told Mr. Mazankowski Canada needs a billion dollar contingency fund to keep us from becoming casualties in subsidy wars.

What specific answer will the government give to this plea for help from Saskatchewan, or will the minister just have to admit that the government still has no plans to help the farmers of Saskatchewan and the farmers across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Premier of the province of Saskatchewan would not be taking any lessons about how we might help farmers from the hon. member himself who has recently become interested in this matter as a result of Premier Devine's intervention.

As I indicated to the House yesterday—

Mr. Gauthier: You are really scraping the bottom of the barrel.

Mr. Mazankowski: As I indicated to the House yesterday—

Mr. Gauthier: What a cheap shot.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure why the House leader for the Liberal Party is so sensitive—

Mr. Duhamel: Because it was a cheap shot.

Mr. Mazankowski: —when we are discussing a very important issue. We are discussing a very important issue here.

Mr. Duhamel: Be serious.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am serious, and when it comes to agriculture this government or this party has always been serious. It has in the past, it is today, and it will be in the future.

• (1420)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is clear from Premier Devine's speech that he certainly is not persuaded that the Deputy Prime Minister and his party have always taken such a concern for agriculture in this country. If that were the case, why did Mr. Devine feel it necessary to make that speech?

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Devine made his speech two days ago, but for the past two months it has been public knowledge that the Atlantic fisheries are in trouble, and the government has had plenty of time to organize a recovery program.

Mr. Speaker, although the Prime Minister was in Halifax yesterday, he failed to take this opportunity to announce a fisheries recovery program for the region.

Why didn't the Prime Minister announce a recovery program yesterday for the region's fishermen and processing plants?

This crisis has gone on far too long. When are we going to see this government come up with a real action plan?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the hon. leader of the Opposition would care to recall this country's recent history with respect to fisheries, he would realize the Liberal Party is hardly in a position to tell us what to do since it is responsible for everything that led up to what has now become the Atlantic fisheries crisis.

The Prime Minister has refused and this government refuses—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Valcourt: They don't like the answer. They ask intelligent questions, but they don't want an answer!

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new Fisheries Minister, and I want to take this opportunity to wish him every success in his new post.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robichaud: There has been a lot of talk about special assistance programs for communities affected by the Atlantic fisheries crisis.

The Prime Minister and other ministers have referred in very general terms to generous programs involving billions of dollars. The minister himself said last week that the Prime Minister had not made any promises. Last night, however, when faced with unruly demonstrators, the Prime Minister repeated his vague promises.

Is the new minister at liberty to tell us whether there will be a special aid program with additional funding, or is he going to give us more of the same and blame it all on somebody else, as he did just now?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the communities I visited last week and the groups I spoke to do not consider the $130 million the government gave to these communities a few months ago to be a "rehash".

I can tell the hon. member that in my consultations last week, and not to my surprise since I know Atlantic Canadians, not one group asked me or asked the government to throw money at the problem.

We have a serious situation in the Atlantic region. The government has already given a preliminary response. We must consider the Harris report; we must also consider how in the future we can best avoid a situation like the one we are now going through.

Furthermore, in recent months, the government has put in place mechanisms to come up with these solutions. And if the hon. member wants to know if action will be taken, the answer is yes. Measures will be announced as soon as they have been decided.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it is still a "rehash" and what is more, we have to wait for it.

[English]

In the case of fishing communities that are losing their whole base of support when large companies decide to pack up and leave, will the minister exercise his authority and prevent the companies from transferring their boats and licences to other ports, so that these communities can continue to live from the sea and still be there when the stocks return to normal? Will he exercise his authority?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am quite amazed at the member referring only to the people affected by those announced plant closures.

Of course we are not talking about the thousands of employees who are already working in other plants that do function.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Where?

Mr. Valcourt: In Lunenburg and other areas of Atlantic Canada.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Only in Lunenburg.

Mr. Valcourt: Any quick fix for the Liberal Party; it is famous for that. I do not think that is the way the way to deal with this matter now. There is no quick fix for a serious problem.

It is all right to blame us in the House and to blame the government for the situation, but as I said in Atlantic Canada—and every premier agreed with me, including Mr. Wells, Mr. McKenna, Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Ghiz—we have to work together and be the architects of the solution together.

We win nothing by just having mud thrown at us supposedly for being responsible for a situation which developed over a long period of time. We want good solutions and that is what we are striving for.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On December 13, 1989, the Prime Minister made a commitment to Atlantic Canadians that the government would respond to the crisis in the Atlantic fishery, and I quote, "with exactly the same kind of generosity and enthusiasm" that was shown to western farmers.

Will the Prime Minister assure Atlantic Canadians that the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program that he referred to yesterday will ensure that Atlantic Canadians can remain employed in their own communities? Will he tell the House today what measures will be taken and exactly when?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises the question of an adjustment program, but there is more to it than that.

As the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has just indicated, the government responded initially with a $130 million package designed to deal with the immediate hardships encountered by those in fishing communities in Atlantic Canada.

We are now in the process of preparing an important response to the Harris commission which deals with conservation and other important policy measures to ensure that the resource is no longer depleted in the future and remains an asset for Atlantic Canada.

Third, there is a dimension to it which we are going to deal with in an Atlantic Canada adjustment package particularly designed for the fishery which we hope, following the minister's discussions with various premiers, fishing leaders, union leaders and plant owners, will bring a definitive solution for fishermen in Atlantic Canada.

What we do not want to do is repeat some of the experiences of the past which solved the problem for a brief period of time and then caused it to recur again. We want a definitive solution in the interests of the people of Atlantic Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister.

I have to say that Atlantic Canadians need a definitive solution too, but Atlantic Canadians are now without jobs. This problem has been known for a long time. It is not a new problem and the Prime Minister knows that.

Similarly, the crisis for Canadian farmers is not a new problem and it continues to get worse. This year in Saskatchewan alone the farm income is expected to go down 101 per cent, a negative farm income.

With spring seeding around the corner, the government says it is studying the problem. Farmers cannot wait for another study. They are losing their farms now. Will the Prime Minister act immediately to implement a specific farm support program?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course it is an urgent problem and of course it is important to assess in a precise way the magnitude of the situation. Mr. Devine and other provincial governments are working together with us in doing just that.

As I indicated to the House yesterday, supplementary drought payment cheques are being distributed right at this very moment.

I want to remind the hon. member that the government's support for agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan is very great. It is very huge, as a matter of fact. For every dollar that the Saskatchewan government puts into agriculture, the federal government has put in between $10 and $12.

• (1430)

Now that is a pretty solid record and certainly does not say to me that the Government of Canada is avoiding the problem. It says to me that the Government of Canada is very cognizant of the problem. It has a solid track record and we are going to work with the provinces in trying to provide the kind of solution to which the hon. member refers. I hope that we will have the support of her and her party when we bring it down. I am sure that we will.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for fisheries said that this government does not want to do a quick fix. Well, farmers in the west and people in the Atlantic region are seeing no fix.

My final question to the Prime Minister is very specific. When will western farmers and Atlantic fishermen receive the long promised support programs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government responded very generously to the needs of farmers across Canada in the past and we have responded as well to the fishermen. We are working, as the minister has indicated, very closely with the producing provinces which are confronted with the kinds of problems that Premier Devine has described.

I have just returned from meetings in Atlantic Canada yesterday, including—

Mr. Robichaud: Very friendly meetings.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, very friendly meetings, apart from a few of my hon. friend's friends who were there.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to bring to members' attention the presence in the gallery of the Hon. C. Stephen Rogers, Speaker (Designate) of the British Columbia Legislative Assembly and Mr. Mark Rose, Opposition House Leader.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, this week the Premier of Saskatchewan estimated that one-third of the farmers of Saskatchewan are facing an immediate debt crisis and an additional 20,000 farmers are worried about the possibility.

Can the Minister of Agriculture tell this House today what assistance the government will provide for Canadian farmers, or is he waiting for an election to be called in Saskatchewan before he acts?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House yesterday and again today, we are working very closely with the provinces in trying to put together a package that will respond to the needs to which the hon. member refers. I hope that we can do that in a time that would clearly demonstrate the government's intentions, with the support of the provinces, hopefully before spring seeding.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, since January 1 export prices for wheat have dropped by $10 per tonne. Yet grain stocks are at the lowest level they have been for many years. The minister refuses to recognize that his blind belief in the free market system, that no longer exists, is destroying the family farm in Canada.

When will the minister stop acting like a bushleaguer of international trade and fight fire with fire by introducing Canadian programs to combat American and European export subsidies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am almost tempted to talk about bushleagues but I won't because this is a very serious matter.

The hon. member knows that we have responded in the past and we intend to respond now because of the impact that the price war has on the income situation of all farmers who are producing grains and oilseeds. I think the hon. member is also aware that while the subsidy war still continues it has been reduced somewhat substantially. The Europeans, for example, were subsidizing to the tune of about $200 per tonne. Today it is about $80 per tonne. The United States, under their EEP program, is subsidizing in the order of about $20 per tonne.

In fact, since 1986–87 grain prices have strengthened and we certainly do not support the kind of price war that is going on. We are doing everything that we can in our power to resolve this trade dispute through the MTN negotiations and that will certainly provide the long term solution.

We have, as a government, supported the farmers on the deficiency that occurred as a result of the trade war and we are looking at that again along with the drought program, the shortfall in cash to put the crop in, and all the other things related to that to develop the kind of package which I am sure the hon. member will support.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission, Peter Lush, who was appointed, by the way, by the Prime Minister, is both the listing agent and owner of a real estate firm selling property which the harbour commission wants to buy.

The Commission has already purchased land from the same real estate firm of which Mr. Lush was a member when he was a member of the harbour commission. Would the Prime Minister not agree that this is a blatant conflict of interest?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will know that the Hamilton Harbour Commission operates at arm's length from the government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: It is financially self-sufficient. My hon. friend is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Is that short arms or long arms?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Why, it's almost independent.

Mr. Lewis: They either want to hear it or they don't.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Lewis: I do not want to dredge up any old allegations that might embarrass my friends opposite. This issue was thoroughly reviewed by the commission at the time the original allegation was made and we are satisfied that there was no conflict of interest.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, old allegations on a new member of Parliament won't cut the mustard.

The Hamilton harbour commissioners were established by an act of Parliament. That act of Parliament states quite clearly that the corporation shall not have any transactions of any pecuniary nature either in buying or selling with any members thereof directly or indirectly.

Back in 1986, Peter Lush admitted that he would not become a harbour commissioner if it meant giving up the listings his firm had. That is property, of course, that the Hamilton Harbour Commission was interested in buying.

Does the Prime Minister not agree that Mr. Lush has one of two options: He either gives up his listings or he resigns from the commission.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend has any information which impacts on conflict of interest which he is prepared to give, I suggest that he give it to me. Otherwise, why doesn't he see if he has the nerve to make that same allegation outside the confines of this House.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in a statement in Halifax yesterday the Prime Minister expressed scepticism that NATO would proceed with the Goose Bay low-level test flight facility given the reduction of tensions in eastern Europe.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given widespread Canadian opposition to the facility and the disastrous impact it will have on the way of life of the Labrador Innu, will he exercise Canadian sovereignty on this issue rather than passively leaving the decision to NATO and, in the interests of the Innu and all Canadian people, cancel its bid to NATO for the low-level test facility?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the NDP members will have to make up their minds. On the one hand they ask us to promote job creation in Newfoundland and Labrador. When we try to bring in thousands of jobs for the benefit of Newfoundland and Labrador, they are the first people to be opposed before it even has an opportunity to be examined carefully by the people in Newfoundland and Labrador.

• (1440)

The Government of Canada, as a member of NATO, was approached with a proposal which we agreed to submit to environmental review and to cabinet consideration if NATO decided to proceed.

I indicated yesterday in Halifax that in light of recent developments, I personally—not NATO but I personally—was somewhat sceptical as to whether the entire project would, in the light of these new circumstances, appear. My hon. friend cannot take yes for an answer.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): It is seldom that we get yes for an answer or any answer at all from that side, Mr. Speaker.

Given the disastrous cuts to native programs in the department of the Secretary of State, would the minister not consider it advisable to create jobs in Canada and that rather than stripping native organizations of their leadership, cutting out native media altogether, eliminating the basis of native broadcasting and eliminating friendship centres, the place to create jobs would be in those programs rather than in a test flight facility that the Prime Minister himself considers obsolete and is sceptical about?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not consider it obsolete at all. I did not express a view in regard to any degree of obsolescence. I simply responded—

Ms. Mitchell: You're obsolete.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, my hon. friend says I am obsolete. Hang on to your hat. In 1992 we are going to make the NDP obsolete in this country.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

On March 2, a Canadian Armed Forces CF-18 broke the sound barrier in the Gatineau—Hull—Aylmer area.

Can the minister tell us what regulations the Canadian Armed Forces have for CF-18 pilots concerning flights in Canada? Will you communicate with Canadian Armed Forces officials to prevent a recurrence of such an incident?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I can inform him as to the regulations that govern supersonic flight. According to CFP 100(3), Supersonic Flights—I know the hon. member for Brant would know that by heart but I wanted the rest of the hon. members to know.

Mr. Speaker, this is important. The member asks a question that is important.

> Aircraft shall now be flown at supersonic speeds:
>
> a. except in an emergency or when otherwise directed by the CDS or an OCC;
> b. below flight level 300—
> c. at any altitude within 25 nautical miles of a built-up area—
> d. unless directed by a NORAD controlling agency.

The hon. member brings this issue to our attention and I will bring to the attention of the House that the pilot in question, because of the investigation, has been grounded and appropriate action will be taken.

ENERGY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy. This year's energy Estimates show a $246 million cut for conservation and alternative energy. How can the minister support these cuts when this government says that a clean environment is a priority?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there were cuts made in the budget for my department in a number of areas and that is supported by me. I take responsibility for those cuts. It was necessary to do so to bring down the deficit and have the economic well-being that we need in order that energy can grow as an economic factor.

Also we have to move away from the direction of the former government, through its NEP, in that we had vestiges of the NEP. Namely, if there is a dollar to be found let's spend it because we will have energy efficiency. That is just not the way to go.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the United States is very concerned about its deficit and it has increased spending in this area. Without continued government leadership and support we are going to lose our lead in this whole area to the United States and Europe.

Will the government stop discriminating against alternative energy through its taxing and spending and give alternative energy the priority it deserves?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I find that passing strange from that member. I was in Charlottetown a few weeks ago where the biomass project was put into place on which we spent $7 million per capita. That was one of the highest expenditures for alternate energy in Canada. I wish she would start saying thank you for those kind of things rather than the kinds of things she is saying.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Immigration and it concerns the Federal Court decision which ruled that the minister's refugee backlog system is illegal. Irrespective of whether the minister has read the court decision, she knows full well that there is much confusion over the present status of that system.

Can the minister clarify for the House whether the current backlog system is conducting business as usual, or whether she has issued directives through her officials to suspend those operations until that system is changed or abolished altogether?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member, who should not have to be reminded of this, that the judgment did not concern the whole of the backlog review system. The case challenged a single part of the backlog clearance process, which was the frontend humanitarian and compassionate criteria, the guidelines that went out.

This backlog clearance was established to deal with claims in the refugee status and the determination remains the primary issue. I want to remind him of that.

I can tell him that within the department the backlog clearance system is proceeding. The interviews are continuing to take place, but the decisions on those interviews are being held in abeyance until we see the written reasons for the judgment.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker that answer is simply incredible. If the front end is bad, what makes you think that the back end is going to be good? It is like arguing that you take the front end of a car off and expect it to run.

The Federal Court has rendered a decision—

Mr. McDermid: Which end are you referring to?

Mr. Crosbie: Which end are you speaking from?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the minister. She has a responsibility to take this Federal Court decision in the serious context that it was given. Does she not believe that, together with the other condemnations of her system, this judicial ruling is serious enough for her not to continue with business as usual, but to suspend those systems currently in place, to try to develop a system that is fair and to try to give justice to individuals who have been waiting in this backlog for some four to five years? Does she not think it is time that she wakes up and smells the coffee and does something about it?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that if I did what the hon. member is suggesting those people would have to wait an awful lot longer. The approach we are taking was actually endorsed by the standing committee. It is the right approach for dealing with the backlog.

I would also remind him that one of the reasons that there are so many people waiting is that the members of his party in the other place, not for the last time I may add, held up something so that thousands and thousands of people were added to this backlog.

• (1450)

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns Mr. Justice Jerome's decision that the minister's guidelines were illegal and wrongful because they contradict the Immigration Act. This is not the first time that this government has bungled on this matter, either before the Senate's work or after the Senate's work.

I would ask the minister whether, in view of the hardship visited on people for some years now, including the members of her own immigration staff, and in view of this added delay for which she is responsible through that guideline, she will direct her staff to prepare a speedy system for landing all persons in that backlog according to basic criteria of health and security.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is really interested in fairness, he will know that the case-by-case review we are conducting on the backlog is consistent with the legislation now in place which is functioning for people who are arriving in Canada today. A case-by-case method is the most fair way of dealing with people in the backlog.

It is our view, in keeping with natural principles of the rule of law and case-by-case, that this is the way to conduct the backlog despite the difficulties. Our job is to try to overcome any of those difficulties in the process as they arise.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that her $100 million two year program has now become more like a $600 million six year program. Therefore, the fairness that she undertook is simply not available to these people who must wait and to the whole immigration department which is being disrupted by this program and the drain on its staff.

Therefore, will the minister do what I requested before. Will she at least undertake to use the broad guidelines for de facto, long-term residents of Canada which had been in place and operating for years until she interrupted them with her narrow guidelines? Will she direct her staff to begin today to use those broad and lawful guidelines for all persons in the backlog, including the several thousands who were wrongfully rejected?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to clarify this for the hon. member. I do believe he really does know that the guidelines that were established at the front end of the system did not mean that if people did not meet those guidelines they were expelled from the country. It simply meant that they went to the next stage in the process and there is, at the end of that process, another humanitarian and compassionate review.

We have bent over backward to ensure that this system is fair. That does not mean that there may not be ways that we can improve the process, and I am always looking at ways to do that. But to suggest that this has disrupted my entire department is totally wrong and out of context because the department has worked very hard to ensure that this system will work. I can assure the hon. member that we are going to do everything in our power to make sure that it does.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I want to begin by congratulating her on assuming the portfolio and wish her well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise important unfinished business with her. When the royal commission investigating the Donald Marshall case, the Micmac Indian, reported its findings of racism underlying the federal system of justice and, in fact, the Canadian system of justice, I asked the minister's predecessor to reply to the 20 recommendations that were made for action by the federal government. The minister then replied that he was waiting for the Government of Nova Scotia to act.

The Government of Nova Scotia acted; it acted a month ago. Racism is too urgent for delays like this. I want to now ask this minister to reply to the recommendations which were made for federal action.

Ms. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his good wishes which I accept with pleasure.

I believe that the hon. member's characterization of the response of my predecessor is not quite correct. The former Minister of Justice made it very clear that the Department of Justice is reviewing the recommendations of the Donald Marshall inquiry and will provide a full and comprehensive response quite independent of what has been done by the Nova Scotia government.

We have participated in the creation of a panel which is reviewing the conduct of judges in Nova Scotia. I would like to add also that, aside from any initiatives that the Department of Justice may take, this is a subject of which the Government of Canada has not been unaware.

With reference to other departments, in my previous portfolio the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development engaged in some very interesting initiatives in this area recently, putting out, if I may speak on behalf of my colleague, a report on native policing, for example, which is now out for consultation broadly in the Canadian public. As well, provisions for negotiating self government also provide some opportunities for looking at questions of the administration of justice.

I think the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry are extremely important and require the kind of deeply considered review that the Department of Justice is now undertaking. I look forward to bringing forward the response of my department to the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate a considered review by the department, but the province of Nova Scotia, which had about 60 recommendations to look at, was able to respond a month ago.

I want to ask the minister in particular, what is her response to the recommendation for the establishment of an independent review mechanism for cases of wrongful convictions which could have been used in the Donald Marshall case or which could, for example, be used in the case of Fred Ruddick who is also arguing that he has been wrongfully convicted?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree that that is a very significant recommendation and would represent a significant change in the way the federal government has dealt with those cases in the past. It requires due consideration.

The reason the Nova Scotia government was able to respond more rapidly to the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry is that under the Constitution of Canada the administration of justice is under provincial jurisdiction. It is, therefore, able to make much more direct responses to those recommendations.

We will consider all the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry and report at the earliest possible opportunity.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister has frequently said that international pressures drive up interest rates in Canada. During the past months interest rates have risen rapidly in Japan and Europe and have remained high in the United States. The minister nevertheless claims, in his recent budget, that somehow in Canada interest rates will be reduced from 13 per cent to 11 per cent and then to 9 per cent.

Will the minister explain how he will achieve those forecasts against the international trends?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first let me welcome my colleague to one of his cameo appearances in the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are neighbours. We can talk like that to each other.

The hon. member has raised a very important issue, that is the level of interest rates in this country. We have pointed out our concerns about inflation and the reasons why we believe our interest rate policy is an appropriate one.

Inflation in 1988 was 4 per cent. In 1989 it was 5 per cent and earlier this year it was 5.5 per cent. Clearly there are pressures there that we must deal with.

I am confident, though, that we will be able to see some turnaround in these inflationary pressures and, with that, we will be able to see some reduction in interest rates consistent with the projections that are put out in the budget.

I would point out to my friend, as he and others have pointed out to me in the past, that we do have some room to manoeuvre here in relation to other countries. A year ago the interest rate spread between the United States and Canada was 1.75 per cent. It is now 4.75 per cent, so that gives us some opportunity to get rates down if the inflationary performance does warrant that.

• (1500)

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his kind words. I should have preferred that he had once again referred to things that I have written about his policies, since my royalties go up each time he does so. The result is that I am probably the only person in Canada who ever benefits from his budgets.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLaren: I would remind the minister that he has been consistently wrong during his six years in office, wrong without exception about his interest rate forecasts. The minister knows that as well as I do. He has never once made an accurate forecast about interest rates in this country.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member, given the fact that this is the last question, to put his question.

Mr. MacLaren: The minister has said, contrary to his earlier statements, that he does believe that international pressures help drive interest rates in Canada. Therefore, will he agree that the interest rate forecasts in his budget are already unrealistic and that Canadians can expect another budget before year end?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the fiscal year has not started. I do not know why we are talking about another budget before year end.

What I would draw to the hon. member's attention, since he does have some idle time these days, is the publication put out in January which discussed the Department of Finance projections in relation to the actual outcome and also in relation to the forecasts that are made by a group of private sector forecasters that we monitor regularly.

The Department of Finance is number two of the 25 private sector forecasters. Clearly our record over the past five years has been a very good one.

I might also point out that the deviation on the budget deficit for this government in the last five years has been $2.6 billion. For the previous five years under the Liberal administration, it was some $26 billion or 10 times the deviation from the projections that we put out. That gives an indication of the accuracy of our forecasts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEETING WITH AFRICAN NATIONAL CONGRESS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a week ago today, I had the distinct privilege, on behalf of Canada, to meet with Mr. Nelson Mandela on his first voyage outside South Africa since he was confined to prison 27 years ago. I want to report to Parliament on our conversations, and also on my brief visit to Namibia, in whose struggle for independence Canada has played such a vital role.

Lusaka, Zambia is the headquarters of the African National Congress in exile. Mr. Mandela came to consult with his national executive, some of whom he had never met. He wanted also to meet those countries and institutions which have played a leading role in the struggle against apartheid. The Prime Minister, whom I represented, was one of the first invited to Lusaka, which is a sign of the respect that Canada has won among the people on the front lines of the fight against apartheid. That is a tribute to the resolve of people throughout this House and across the country. But it also creates a responsibility for Canadians to continue our leadership in new circumstances which, while more promising than the decades of impasse on apartheid, are also more challenging and complex.

[Translation]

The House knows the changes which have swept South Africa in recent months:

—the historic Harare Declaration of the African National Congress which accepted the desirability of peaceful, negotiated change in South Africa;

—the election as President of South Africa of F.W. De Klerk, a man who seems committed to initiating real change;

—the unbanning of the African National Congress;

—and the triumphant release of Nelson Mandela from prison on February 11.

The stage is now set for historic progress towards a truly democratic and non-racial South Africa. But we have only just begun. The state of emergency is still in force. Political prisoners remain detained. The pillars of apartheid remain. As Kenneth Kaunda said in Lusaka, Mr. Mandela is now free, but he is free only to live in an apartheid system.

[English]

I think it important that Canadians understand the spirit in which Nelson Mandela approaches this phase of events in South Africa. He referred to his meetings with President de Klerk, and the Ministers of Justice and Constitutional Affairs of South Africa, and said he is convinced that they are true reformers who seek a new social contract in South Africa. But, he noted, these are but three men who face the same party structure responsible for the development and the maintenance of the repressive regime of apartheid. They deserve to be encouraged, but neither he nor the world could ignore the history of the national party or the forces of retrenchment which lie in waiting. Mr. Mandela believes that pressures must be maintained until real change occurs. Expressions of intent are not enough to warrant relaxation of pressure.

Mr. Mandela was unambiguous on this issue: the greatest assistance which could be offered by the outside world to the African National Congress is to maintain sanctions. Indeed, he spoke of intensifying sanctions, and I have asked him to indicate where and how he thinks this should occur.

• (1510)

Commonwealth heads of government, in Kuala Lampur last year, agreed that Commonwealth pressure would remain unyielding until there was "evidence of clear and irreversible change." The Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers, which I chair, will meet in Nigeria, in May, to assess the evidence of change. The African National Congress has agreed to work with us in that process.

The headquarters of the African National Congress will return to South Africa and the organization, unbanned, will lead the effort to secure a non-racial democracy in South Africa. Thousands of ANC members and followers will have to be relocated inside South Africa. Offices will have to be established. A new infrastructure must be built. The ANC, at the same time it is negotiating, will also have to focus on equipping the black leadership in South Africa for the responsibilities of economic management and political governance.

The ANC asked me for Canada's direct assistance in meeting the costs of its reintegration into political life inside South Africa. I noted the firm policy of successive governments of Canada not to support political parties in other countries. We will, naturally, continue to support specific humanitarian, education and other programs which meet the needs of the ANC. A delegation from the African National Congress will come to Ottawa within a month to discuss specific areas of co-operation.

I also made the point that there are thousands of private citizens in Canada who would want to support the return home of the African National Congress. This resource should be tapped, and I have initiated discussions with representatives of the three parties in Parliament to identify individuals and strategies which can be offered to the ANC to help them secure substantial private Canadian support.

A great challenge facing the ANC is to level the playing field as it approaches negotiations with the government. The South African government will be able to draw on all the wealth, expertise and resources which apartheid has put at its disposal. The ANC is dispossessed and disadvantaged in this regard. Successful negotiations will require a greater equality of resources and expertise. That is an area where Canada can help.

Finally, the ultimate success of a non-racial South Africa will depend on the capacity of both blacks and whites to exercise both political and economic power. Economic exploitation lies at the heart of apartheid and, by and large, black South Africans have been shut out of the experience of running industries and businesses. Therefore, I told Mr. Mandela that we will look urgently at additional programs to provide potential black leaders of industry with practical experience in running large corporations in both the private sector and the public sector.

In their telephone conversation of February 13, the Prime Minister invited Mr. Mandela to visit Canada. He has suggested that it might be appropriate for Nelson Mandela to address this free Parliament. Mr. Mandela looks forward to coming to Canada to express directly his appreciation of the support of Canadians.

The impression I took away from two days of meetings is of a man who is strong, serene, wise and generous. He is a person of principle, but also of practicality and flexibility. To emerge from prison after so long a punishment and to retain an understanding of the concerns of his jailers is extraordinary. Mr. Mandela disproves the notion that history is made only by impersonal forces. The course of South African history will be determined in large measure by this man and by his counterpart in Pretoria.

Canada will maintain sanctions until there is clear evidence of irreversible change in the apartheid system. But we intend also to encourage President de Klerk in his courageous and moderate course. Foreign Minister Pik Botha has written to me suggesting that Canadian experience might be particularly helpful in developing negotiated solutions for South Africa. I have responded by proposing that Mr. Ted Lee, the head of our legal branch, and Canada's former Ambassador to South Africa, visit the region to assess areas where Canadian expertise might be of use. I made it clear to Mr. Botha that any expertise we might offer must be available to all parties in the negotiations. Mr. Lee will be in South Africa in early April to consult with the government, the ANC and other relevant parties.

The nature of the South African challenge has changed. The opponents of apartheid outside South Africa must be as sensitive and generous in encouraging the process of change as Nelson Mandela has been in leading it. Canadian non-governmental organizations have brought great honour to Canada in their fight against apartheid. I will be meeting with them within the next two weeks to discuss how Canadians together can best pursue this fresh prospect of finally ending apartheid.

After my meetings in Lusaka, I paid a brief visit to Namibia, which will celebrate its hard-won independence on March 21. Canada will be represented at the independent celebrations by my colleague, the Minister of External Relations and International Development and by a small all-party delegation from Parliament. For years, Namibian independence was a hostage to apartheid; now Namibia is leading the way for its neighbour South Africa. It is a remarkable example of a successful transition to a non-racial democracy, of the holding of successful free elections, of the drafting of a constitution without peer in Africa. The Namibian success points to what is possible when reason overcomes emotion and compromise replaces prejudice.

During my conversations with President-elect San Nujoma and his ministers-designate, I expressed both Canada's congratulations and our intent to continue to contribute to the development of a stable and prosperous Namibia.

When I was called to the platform to welcome Nelson Mandela to Zambia, President Kaunda said that Canada, though far away, had earned the right to be considered a "front line state" in the fight against apartheid. Because we are a western democracy, a diverse society, a successful economy, our role may be even more important in this sensitive new phase of the campaign to establish a non-racial democracy in South Africa.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—St-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend to the minister our appreciation for his willingness to address the House, whenever possible, on matters pertaining to foreign affairs.

We Liberals welcome the minister's efforts to meet with Nelson Mandela at an early time. It is important that Canada maintain a high profile in the international effort to persuade South Africa to abandon apartheid. The Liberal Party is currently of the view that recent developments, while encouraging, cannot mask the reality that apartheid is still practised as a rule of law in South Africa. Therefore, we share Mr. Mandela's view that now is not the time to relax sanctions against the South African government.

We on this side of the House feel no need to soften our opposition to apartheid and those forces that support that policy now that Nelson Mandela is finally free. I know the minister will agree with our position stated recently by our Leader that "Apartheid cannot be reformed. It must be abolished."

I know the minister would also agree that will only be possible if the South African government moves to lift the state of emergency, release all remaining political prisoners, and repeal all legislation which give the legal framework to institutionalize racism in South Africa, including the Population Registration Act, the Group Areas Act, the Land Act, as well as the entrenchment in law of segregated health care and education and the homeland system.

• (1520)

As Canadians, we cannot be satisfied with the stated good intentions of the de Klerk government, including its support for negotiations with the African National Congress. As recently outlined by the South African President on February 2, we know very well from experience that promises to hold negotiations are no substitute for actually sitting down at the table. Negotiations once begun can always be broken off.

I suggest, therefore, that the acid test of the South African government's commitment to abandoning apartheid—the only test that Canadians should abide by in considering any change to our sanctions policy—would be their actions during these negotiations, including their position on repealing apartheid legislation.

I would hope that the minister made these points, or will make these points, clear to the South African government so that there can be no misunderstanding as to where Canada stands now on this issue.

As to the minister's suggestions to Mr. Mandela that he consider renouncing the arms struggle as an instrument of the African National Congress in its battle to make South Africa a truly democratic and non-racial society, Liberals support that view. I will remind the minister that our leader, Mr. Turner, made that point very clear in his meeting with the ANC president, Oliver Tambo when Mr. Tambo was in Ottawa three years ago.

The Liberal Party would like to encourage the minister to follow through with his offer of continued assistance to ANC sponsored projects in South Africa and other programs designated to help the victims of apartheid. We would hope that these efforts are not compromised because of the government's continued cuts in foreign aid.

As far as the African National Congress as a political party, I want to assure the minister that we will certainly co-operate with his effort. We are willing to participate in whatever actions or non-partisan committees that could be created for this effort. Therefore, I want to inform this House that Senator, the Hon. Alasdair Graham, has been designated by our party to participate on our behalf in any discussions leading to the creation of a private, non-partisan Canadian group of supporters for the ANC.

I do hope that these private efforts will not be a substitute for whatever actions or direct help that could come from the Canadian government in other activities that are not of a political nature.

Finally, I would like to make a short comment on the minister's visit to Namibia after his meeting with Mr. Mandela. Like all Canadians, we share a sense of joy in the birth of that nation to be officially celebrated on March 31. We will move immediately to extend a hand of welcome to Namibia, to the councils of the Commonwealth and the United Nations. I would also hope that the Government of Canada would consider Namibia a priority for continued economic assistance.

I am concerned, however, about the continued uncertainty surrounding the status of Walvis Bay, the only major seaport in Namibia. I would have expected that the minister discussed this matter while in Windhoek, making clear Canada's view that South Africa must return control of that port to the Namibian people.

As I did not hear the minister speak to this issue in his statement today, I would like to ask him if he could inform the House as soon as possible what is happening with that situation, and what Canada could do to help facilitate Namibian efforts to gain control over this port, so clearly vital to their economic growth.

In closing, let me thank the minister on behalf of many Canadians, not only members of Parliament but Canadians throughout the country who appreciate his work and his effort as Chairman of the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers. What he is doing is very important and appreciated. But I want to remind him that the work is far from being finished. There is still a lot to be done. It will take skill, determination and certainly not to conclude too quickly that the work is over. I wish him well in his efforts.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking the minister for making a statement in the House, as is his habit, and a welcome habit at that, it gives everyone an opportunity to comment from time to time and to hear each other out on a variety of issues.

All of us felt a tremendous sense of relief and celebration on February 11 when Nelson Mandela was finally released after 27 years in prison. Events surrounding that day and other events in South Africa remind me of the biblical passage which speaks of setting the captives free and giving sight to the blind; the captive in this case being Mr. Mandela and the blind being the white community in South Africa. We hope that the vision of the white community in South Africa will continue to improve and grow towards the day when we have a non-racial democracy in South Africa. We hope that captives will continue to be freed and that all political prisoners in South Africa very soon will be released.

I was mindful, while listening to the minister, of the opportunity I had along with other Canadian parliamentarians, including the hon. member for Waterloo who is here in the House today, to meet with members of the ANC in Lusaka during a visit to that city on our way home from Namibia in September last year. Many of the people we met with on that day for lunch had not been able to be physically present in their homeland of South Africa, for periods of almost as long as three decades. I am very happy to think that many of them may be able to return to South Africa and that Canada, either through the government or through the arrangement that the minister spoke of through fund raising in Canada, might be able to facilitate that return, both of those individuals and the ANC now that it is longer banned in South Africa.

The minister made the point that what has happened so far is only a start and certainly this is indisputable. The structures of apartheid remain. As I mentioned before, there are many prisoners still to be released who are still detained, and the state of emergency remains. All these things remain to be done.

Nevertheless, I do not think anyone would contest that this is a period of great hope and expectation. That period of hope and expectation is largely related to the remarkable person and personality of Mr. Mandela. I think in many respects he was an unknown as long as he was in prison, but having been released, has now emerged as a person with a strength of character which in a variety of ways may just be able to bridge, along with the obvious abilities of Mr. de Klerk, what sometimes seems like an unbridgeable gap in South Africa. We hope that these two people and others will be able to successfully contend with the forces in both their camps and be able to come to a successful negotiation in the near future.

With respect to sanctions, it is not just a question of maintaining sanctions. It is also a question of more effectively enforcing those sanctions which are already in place. This is something that I know that the committee which the minister heads has addressed itself to and which it should address itself to even more thoroughly in the upcoming meeting.

• (1530)

It may also be a question of intensifying sanctions, something the minister acknowledges in his statement, if indeed that is what Mr. Mandela and others come to request. If that request is made, then I would suggest that the government would have to consider complying with that request. That remains to be seen.

These will be difficult times in the homelands. I was just looking at the news before I came into the House and saw that violence has broken out in another homeland, in addition to the violence that already broke out in Ciskei.

There are going to be a great many negative images as well as positive images on the television screen and in the news about South Africa. We should be clear that none of what we see should dilute our resolve to see the democratization process through, and that this is a time for a great deal of patience and understanding.

The minister spoke of the reception which Canada received in Lusaka and the honour which has been brought to Canada. I would like to emphasize that the honour which has been brought to Canada and the honour in which Canada is held by the leadership in Africa with respect to the anti-apartheid struggle is due in large part to a variety of Canadians all across the country; and to non-governmental organizations, churches and coalitions that have been struggling along for years trying to bring attention to this problem.

In many respects, without wanting to be too partisan about it, they have been pushing governments to take the lead and to do more. Certainly, their work has paid off in what the Canadian government has done so far and what we hope the Canadian government will do in the years to come. It is because ordinary Canadians have been seized with this issue and have refused to drop it that governments over the years have been forced to pay attention to this issue. It is no less so in the United States of America where black Americans have made this an issue which has forced successive American governments to pay attention. In this respect I was glad to see that there was a relative absence of self-congratulation in the statement. The credit that has come to Canada in terms of the anti-apartheid struggle is a credit that belongs to a great many Canadians and belongs more to the people of Canada than to any particular government.

I was also interested to see the theory of history embedded in the minister's statement when he said that Mr. Mandela had persuaded him that history was not the result of impersonal forces, and that sometimes people can make a difference. I think that is true.

Unfortunately, I feel that way about our country at this point, only on the opposite side of the fence. I feel that way about the Prime Minister. I think that had we a different person in charge of the country, the country might have a better chance of surviving. But persons do make a difference. In this case it is a negative one.

I would like to say a word about support for the ANC. I am aware of the arrangements being sought by the minister with the three political parties in Canada. I presume that will proceed to some kind of conclusion. But the minister made an interesting point when he said that successive Canadian governments have refused to support political parties in other countries. I think that is a worthy tradition. The government should have used that principled position as a basis on which to criticize the action of the United States in Nicaragua when it chose to fund a political party outside the United States of America, in this case the opposition which recently won the election. The minister will know that I asked him to do that in committee. I still have not heard any words of criticism in that regard. If this is a principle worthy of upholding in Canada and by the Canadian government, perhaps it is something we should suggest to our neighbours.

With respect to Namibia I would like to begin by congratulating the great many Canadians who have been involved in that struggle and, of late, those many RCMP officers who I am sure had an incredibly different experience in Namibia, some of whom recently received an award as a result of their work there. Perhaps some day members of Parliament might have an opportunity to sit down with some of the officers who served there. I think it would be a good idea to get a feeling for the experience they had.

Namibia is one of the great successes of the United Nations, of the international community and of reconciliation. I remember coming out of Namibia in September feeling myself that this thing was going to work, and that the only thing that might cause it not to work was people continuing to mistrust each other. There were certain people who could not believe that South Africa might actually allow this thing to happen. There were other people who could not believe that SWAPO would not think up some devious, violent scheme to intimidate voters in particular areas of the country.

I think those of us who came out of Namibia at that time had the feeling that people had come to the point where they were willing to trust, willing to forgive in many respects, and willing to take a chance on the future. That worked. I hope that is the kind of spirit which is now informing and instructing the change in South Africa. Indeed, I hope it is the kind of spirit that is informing and instructing what is happening in other places around the world where people are seeking their freedom.

I am thinking now of Lithuania where I happened to have a chance to be just a week and a half ago. I think a similar kind of spirit exists there, a spirit that I hope Mr. Gorbachev will respect when the day finally comes—as I am sure it will—when the new Lithuanian Soviet makes some declaration or move toward independence.

The Namibian example, if you like, cannot be uncritically transferred. However, it is a model that needs to be adapted to a variety of different situations whether in Cambodia—

Mr. Prud'homme: Palestine.

Mr. Blaikie: I hear an hon. member saying the Middle East. I wonder if the minister had an opportunity to meet with Mr. Arafat when he was in Lusaka to discuss with him events in that part of the world where we know so much work needs to be done. The spirit that seems to be motivating and helping to resolve so many other conflicts in the world has yet to really manifest itself in the Middle East.

Perhaps if the minister had the opportunity he could say either in the House or at some other point whether he had a chance to talk to Mr. Arafat at that point. Watching the news we saw on the same screen the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Yasser Arafat and Nelson Mandela. Considering all the things I have heard in the last ten years said about the NDP when we got up to say encouraging things about these characters and when I consider some of the things said by the minister himself, I sometimes wonder how fast the world can change.

It is not just in the Soviet Union; it is right here in Canada. People are embracing and hugging people with respect to whom they were formerly quite critical of others for even saying good things about them.

A great many good things are happening in the world. Namibia is one of them. We hope that as a result of the release of Nelson Mandela that South Africa will be added to that list and subsequently many others as the world finally comes to the realization that W. H. Auden was right when he said that we must love one another or die.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to establish a precedent. However, a question was raised with regard to Walvis Bay. If the House is agreeable, I would be prepared to report very briefly on conversations with respect to Walvis Bay.

Mr. Blaikie: And Mr. Arafat?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): And Mr. Arafat.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I did discuss the question of Walvis Bay with both representatives of the government-elect of Namibia and with representatives of South Africa present in Namibia.

I have the impression that the matter is under fairly active discussion between the two parties. I had the impression that neither wanted it to become again, at least for the moment, a matter of active public debate. Thus I did not push it publicly.

• (1540)

The position of Canada is clearly known by both sides, which is that Walvis Bay belongs to Namibia. I think the House would agree that the best way to resolve the problem is by agreement between the parties, and that may well be under way.

Among the people at the meeting to greet Mr. Mandela at, I think, the specific invitation of Mr. Mandela, was Mr. Yasser Arafat. I took the opportunity to speak to him briefly to encourage the PLO to continue the course of moderation that it has demonstrated in the Middle East.

I also indicated to him that I thought it would be helpful if he would take one further step along that path of moderation and lead to the withdrawal of Article 19 of the Covenant of the PLO.

It was not a lengthy conversation, but I thought it was useful to take advantage of our presence there together to exchange words.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be agreement of the House for me to make a brief comment as one who has lived in Africa and who has been following this issue.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not seem to be agreement.

Routine Proceedings

PETITIONS

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to present to the House. The first is to indicate that names are still coming in from citizens of Canada regarding the clawback of the old age pension and the family allowance.

I have 47 more names to add to the thousands that have already come in from the city of Regina in which these citizens humbly petition the House that this clawback undermines the fundamental principle of universality of Canada's social programs and discriminates against recipients of Old Age Security and family allowance benefits by making them bear an unfair burden of tax irrespective of geographical location or other factors.

Wherefore the undersigned petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to abandon this proposed measure which singles out Old Age Security and family allowance benefits.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I have 15 further petitions on another matter which will not die and which will remain alive for many years to come in which some 1,238 Canadians petition Parliament to rescind the cuts to VIA Rail, to re-equip VIA Rail and to allow it to function in a manner which will allow it to succeed. These reductions in budget and service could lead to the disappearance of one-third of Canada's railway system.

They therefore request Parliament to maintain VIA Rail as Canada's present national network, to upgrade the system with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 with petitions containing several hundred names of petitioners from various parts of Ontario, mainly southwestern Ontario, who are totally opposed to the GST.

They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax. In addition to that they want reform of the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

I therefore present these petitions on their behalf. They have been certified by the Clerk of the Table.

BILL C-43

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36. The petition of the undersigned residents of Ontario who number over 800 humbly show that each and every child is a unique human being and deserves to be protected by law from the first moment of his or her life and that Bill C-43 would legalize the killing of unborn children and give to them no real protection under law, wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to defeat Bill C-43.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my duty and honour to table more petitions on behalf of a Canadian citizen, Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo, who was arrested unlawfully and imprisoned in Taiwan. These signatories are in addition to the thousands of others that have already been tabled in this House.

The petitioners urge the Canadian government to take immediate and effective measures to secure Mr. Leo's release, including some of the following steps that they want this government to take: one, issue a public statement expressing Canada's concern over Canadian citizens' rights being violated; two, instruct the Canadian embassy in Japan or the High Commissioner's office in Hong Kong to send a representative to Taiwan; three, appoint a lawyer to handle his case; four, request Canada's allies which have representatives in Taiwan to assist with the case.

The petitioners are disappointed that the government has not responded to previous petitions. I ask through you, Mr. Speaker, to seek the government's immediate action in this case.

BILL C-43

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to table this afternoon. All have been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

The first one is signed by 29 residents, primarily of the community of Thunder Bay which I represent, but also includes the former member for Oshawa, Ed Broadbent who has signed it as well.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject any proposed restrictive abortion law and to enforce the Canada Health Act by withholding transfer payments to provinces that do not provide universal access to abortion services.

I might add that my son, Adam, also signed that petition. It is a nice thing to know that one's child follows in his father's footsteps.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions signed by residents, primarily of the riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan, all dealing with the proposed goods and services tax. These residents who have signed the petitions at the Top Buckle Ski Shop, the senior citizens apartment on Donald Street, Johannen's Variety, Art's Junction, Thunder Bay and the Atikokan Legion all call upon this government to reject the goods and services tax and to find a more appropriate way of raising government revenue.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present some petitions with the signatures of 15,323 people. They have been certified under Standing Order 36. These people come from Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia and want to retain the uniformity of the RCMP uniform.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP by retaining the uniformity of the dress code with all the recognizable colour and trappings that have such great historical value for this country. The pride and esprit de corps should not be jeopardized by any concessions to religious or ethnic minorities which result in changes to this truly great police force and its proud traditions in uniform.

This brings the total signatures for these petitions that I have presented in the House to over 140,323.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from Matagami concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Matagami is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient as it concerns the northern tax benefits system. It offers no encouragement to people in the North and no incentive to make use of northern resources.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition signed by dozens of constituents in Kingston who are opposed to the goods and services tax proposed by the government.

They call upon Parliament to agree with those of us who sit on the opposition side of the House to oppose the goods and services tax, to reject the goods and services tax and to vote the bill down.

I know that in presenting the petition some of my colleagues on the other side of the House are facing pressures from their constituents to follow our good example and do likewise.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present certified correct under Standing Order 36.

The first one has to do with the continuation of the VIA Rail service. As I pointed out before, this is a timely petition since Vancouver Island has been able to retain, through court action, the VIA Rail service on Vancouver Island by having the Supreme Court of B.C. declare that this is a condition by which British Columbia entered Confederation and that should Canada decide to cancel passenger service there it would be a unilateral breach of the terms of union and B.C. would end up out of Confederation.

These petitioners are calling on the government to eliminate the reductions in budget and service and improve the Vancouver Island version of VIA Rail.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I also have two petitions relating to the goods and services tax from various points in my constituency on Vancouver Island in which the petitioners call on the government to do away with the goods and services tax and to bring in a tax which is more fair in its application rather than taxing the poor and consumers more heavily than the rich.

That petition is signed by approximately 150 to 200 people, adding to the thousands of petitions I have presented in the past on this issue.

FORESTRY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a third petition which relates to the forest resource development agreement that is in danger of being scuttled by this government and yet has provided needed forest restoration in British Columbia and also needed jobs in the forest industry in British Columbia, plus the prospect of jobs in the forest industry in British Columbia's future by replanting our forests and making sure that we have a thriving stand and a solid working forest in that province.

NUCLEAR FREE ZONE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a final petition that calls on the government to set up a nuclear free zone in British Columbia that would allow no ship carrying nuclear weapons to be given access to our ports and waterways, that the designation include passages through our waters en route to Nanoose Bay and in all the waters around the Canadian Forces maritime experimental and test ranges near Nanoose Bay, British Columbia, and that all governments be required to provide, in advance of their arrival, assurance that ships visiting our waters carry no nuclear weapons and have no nuclear reactors on board.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have no record of this petition being certified, but I am sure it would be supported unanimously by this House.

TAXATION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition certified by the Clerk of Petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is my pleasure and duty to table this petition in the House which is signed by residents of my constituency, particularly from the communities of Edam, Saskatchewan and Big River, Saskatchewan, who attended meetings that I held in those communities.

The petitioners note that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

The petition calls on Parliament to reject the current proposals for the goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax for wealthy individuals and corporations.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, question No. 241 will be answered today.

[Text]

PURCHASE OF AUTOMOBILES FOR THE OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Question No. 241—Mrs. Gaffney:

Did the government purchase any automobiles for the Open Skies Conference it hosted in February of 1990 and, if so (a) what number (b) at what cost (c) what will the government be doing with the automobiles now that the Conference is over (d) if the government intends to sell the automobiles (i) to what persons (ii) in what locations (iii) on what dates (iv) at what cost will they be sold?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): No automobiles were purchased for the Open Skies Conference.

However, sixty-five Chevrolet Lumina sedans and fifteen Chevrolet vans were leased from General Motors of Canada Limited for the total sum of $1.00. All vehicles will be returned to General Motors for their inventory.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. 19.

P-19—Mr. Boudria—November 24, 1989

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the current list of all companies, strip clubs and other similar establishments to have received funding or loans directly or indirectly from the Federal Business Development Bank since 1972.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the document requested cannot be released under the Federal Business Development Act, Section 37(2) and the Access to Information Act, Sections 19 and 20, and the Privacy Act, Section 3, which preclude the release of information which is not general in nature and which, by its release, could allow or result in direct personal financial gain or loss by a person or a group of persons.

All the bank's relationships with its clients are commercial and as such are subject to the commercial confidentiality principles implied by the above sections.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

• (1600)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that the Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-19 be deemed to have been adopted?

Mr. Cooper: No. I ask that it be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the parliamentary secretary knows, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is away today.

The point I want to make is that this request for details of funding is surely in part public. Mortgages are registered as security for this funding in most cases. The hon. parliamentary secretary must know this and surely, if the mortgages are public documents, there is no reason why the parliamentary secretary should not give the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member wishes to have it transferred for debate. He can make his points then. Thank you.

I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 33 minutes.

Mr. Milliken: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, some three weeks ago, on February 14, I rose on a point of order in connection with these Motions for the Production of Papers and I pointed out that these matters have been long delayed.

One of the earliest of my notices was placed on the Order Paper on October 25. The parliamentary secretary made an undertaking. I could quote his words. I do not think it was just because it was Valentine's Day that he was so pleasant, but he said, as reported at page 8324 of Hansard:

I think the member has made a reasonable request.

And I thought I had too. He continued:

I will investigate to make sure that my hon. friend gets a very decent answer to his question, and I will get it for him as soon as possible.

I have been patiently sitting here since February 14, three weeks ago, and I still have not received any response whatever from the kind-hearted parliamentary secretary. I know that he would not want to participate in a cover-up, but I suggest that the denial of information to Parliament effectively is a cover-up of the government's program. They have an obligation to answer to Parliament and give us this information. We are not getting answers at all. We have only had one dealt with today and the notice was put on the Order Paper for that one on November 24.

I respectfully request the hon. parliamentary secretary to give the House the information to which we are entitled. In fact, for the one he has dealt with today he has refused the information. I think it is evidence of an attempt by the government to cover up the facts and to stop Parliament from having access to the information that Parliament is entitled to have.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member I am a little confused. Was he referring to his Question No. 214, or was he referring to Motions for Papers P–16 and P–18?

Mr. Milliken: I am referring to Motions for Papers P–16 and P–18. Those are the same motions I referred to in my point of order on February 14, Valentine's Day, when the parliamentary secretary was so kind–hearted.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I was kind–hearted because it was Valentine's Day and I was thinking of my sister who celebrates her birthday that day. It put me in a very good mood.

The bottom line is that in looking at the information I have it looks as though those two motions should be dealt with fairly soon. I gather that they are with the chiefs of staff from the two departments and I should be seeing them relatively quickly. I will do my best, as I always do for this particular hon. member, to try to get them in as quickly as I can.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

This is a debate on the budget, as Your Honour has heard, the principal financial statement of the government, and there is not a single member of the government in the House to hear this debate. I think it is an outrage and they have an obligation to be here.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, two people can play the game when we get into the question of absence of members of the House of Commons. Even though he has not been here that long, the hon. member has a lot of parliamentary experience. He knows that comment is out of order.

Second, I also want to say to the hon. member that we have been dealing with petitions and a number of things. We will have our ministers here in the House to make sure they listen to this important debate, because we believe it is important.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, just to re–emphasize the point. Indeed, it would be nice if a minister of the Crown could listen to one of his own members, who is commenting in a debate that is of very great importance to Canadians, the budget. We would like to have one minister in the House; two if they could. That would be ordinary and customary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my friends that it a custom that we always try to accommodate. I have certainly sent out word to get in a couple of ministers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we can carry on with debate with the hon. member for St. Catharines.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I might indicate that my intention is to have a 10–minute speech and a 5–minute question and answer period and share my time with one of my colleagues.

I am pleased today to take part in the debate approving in general the budgetary policy of the government. This is the sixth budget brought in by the Minister of Finance, and he has continued his record of fiscal responsibility to deal with the legacy of debt left by the previous administration, while at the same time creating the climate for non–inflationary economic growth.

As a result of policies aimed squarely at spending restraint, the government has reduced the deficit from its peak of $38.3 billion in 1984 to $30.5 billion in the last fiscal year. That is a decline of almost $8 billion, and this decline is to continue. Just as important, direct borrowings of the Government of Canada in capital markets are also down about $8 billion since 1984.

In the April 1989 budget the government set out a five-year plan to cut the deficit in half by 1993-1994, to eliminate government borrowings in capital markets after that year, and to begin to pay back government securities, Government of Canada bonds, and other debt instruments securing the debt.

This budget confirms the fact that we are still on a course to meet the goals set out in the last budget. First, it will ensure that the deficit continues on a downward track. Second, it will help to create the conditions needed to ease inflationary pressures. This will lessen the burden on monetary policy and increase the scope for interest rates to come down. Lower interest rates will contribute to further reductions in the deficit, and this will set the stage for the economy to make the transition to strong, sustained growth.

There are three basic points I wish to speak to with regard to the budget. They are interest rates, government spending, and the impact this budget will have on my home province of Ontario. As I mentioned previously, and contrary to what those across the House would say, the high level of interest rates is only a symptom of the over-all problem we face in Canada. The real problem is the underlying inflation which drives up interest rates. There is no magic wand with which to lower interest rates. This would only serve to fuel inflation, thus compounding the problem. If we do not deal with these inflationary problems at this point in time, we could see a return to the economic conditions which persisted in the early 1980s. This includes the recession we know so well that was created. The painful lesson of despair, sinking confidence at home and abroad, and the personal hardships endured by all too many Canadians during that period will not be repeated.

There are may people in my region concerned with the high interest rates. The automobile manufacturers see the high interest rates and the resulting high value of the Canadian dollar as a very real impediment to their ability to compete in the car market. People who work in the construction industry see residential housing and all of their projects affected by high interest rates. Some would even say that the high value of the dollar concerns those merchants who see individuals going to the United States seeking better bargains. These people would like to see interest rates reduced immediately, but they do not want to see the return of the spectre of inflation and high interest rates approaching 20 per cent, haunting them again as it did in the early 1980s. They want to see the cause of high interest rates removed in order that rates will come down and stay down and that their future security will not be threatened. Non-inflationary growth is the goal that this budget helps to accomplish.

The government has set in place a number of policies in order to expand the potential of the economy for non-inflationary growth. This budget with its emphasis on expenditure control, as well the policies of privatization and deregulation, the free trade agreement, the retraining programs under the Canadian Jobs Strategy, and the replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax with the goods and services tax will result in the potential growth of the economy expanding to 3.25 per cent to 3.5 per cent from the present 2.75 per cent which existed in 1984. Without these changes there was even a danger that the potential for non-inflationary growth in the economy would contract.

Intertwined in this entire matter is the question of expenditure reduction in order to deal with the annual deficit and ultimately the national debt. The national debt is approaching $350 billion and interest on that debt for the current year will be approximately $41.2 billion. Over the last five years the government has managed to turn the deficit in program spending to a surplus of approximately $13 billion. The deficit this year will be $28.5 billion. The budget sets us on a course to continue reduction in this annual deficit in order that we can provide more flexibility to the government to protect programs that Canadians desire.

Presently we spend approximately 35 cents of every tax dollar taken in on interest on the national debt. It is generally acknowledged that approximately 80 per cent of the debt is held here in Canada by our own citizens. However, we still have to this debt to those individuals who hold Canada bonds, treasury bills and other Government of Canada securities. This results in an income redistribution program from the taxpayers to those individuals who can afford to buy the Government of Canada securities. This is obviously a type of income redistribution that no one in the country wants. If this process were allowed to continue we would see the government merely taking tax dollars from its citizens and repaying it to individuals who can afford the securities. We would not be able to fund the programs which Canadians want and we would not be able to provide any new programs such as those for the environment, child care, or any other area. The only way continue to attack this problem is through expenditure reduction. The budget tabled by the finance minister is aimed at achieving these goals. It reflects what is necessary in Canada today, living within our means. We cannot continue to spend money we do not have.

These expenditure reductions are being shared by all individuals in Canada. This causes difficulties for people everywhere. The easy course would be simply to continue spending and as a result increase the annual deficit and the national debt and put the day of reckoning on the backs of our children. I do not want to leave that legacy to my children. It is difficult, but I was not elected to be representative of convenience, supporting only those policies that are currently popular and easy. We have to look to the future and ensure that it is a bright one, not clouded by debt inherited by these children from their parents, with the added responsibility of supporting their parents as well. It is incumbent upon the government to take a leadership role and follow a course of action that is responsible both to the people we represent and to future Canadians.

The expenditure control plan outlined in the budget is designed to spare those individuals who personally cannot afford to see transfers reduced. Examples are old age pensions, spouses' allowance pensions and the unemployment insurance program which are exempt. Also exempted are the equalization program and Canada Assistance Program transfers to those provinces receiving equalization. There has also been a freeze in EPF funding. The provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta are being asked to shoulder a larger proportion of the expenditure reductions at the present time because of their more prosperous positions. Ontario must bear its share of the load because it stands to benefit greatly from a healthier national economy.

Ontario has a great responsibility within Confederation. The debt is a national problem and the country is counting on Ontario to help with its share of this burden.

Since the government took office it has been totally committed to being responsible with spending from the public purse. In that light, it is quite frustrating to see Ontario increase its spending in the last five years by close to 10 per cent per year and increase its public service by over 7,000 individuals, while the federal government has held its own spending to about 3.6 per cent per year over the same period and reduced its Public Service by 12,000 person-years to levels equal to those of the 1970s.

As I mentioned previously, the federal government is paying 35 cents of every revenue dollar just to cover the debt charges.

Critics have said that the freezing of the EPF funding will have a negative impact on the areas of health care and post-secondary education. It is interesting to note, however, there have been no conditions attached to this funding since 1977. The province is free to allocate the money in any manner it wishes. It cannot be said that it goes directly to health care or to post-secondary education when one realizes that the spending of the Government of Ontario increased at the rate of 10 per cent per year. I am sure that they will not have to increase their taxes or increase their deposition, but they can follow the lead of the federal government and cut their expenditures and reallocate their priorities in order that health care and post-secondary education receive the commitment that it should.

The other important fact for Ontario residents is that no new taxes have been proposed in this budget. My constituents have been quite clear in their expectations that expenditure reductions be undertaken and that taxes are not to be increased. The Minister of Finance has definitely listened to the people.

The overriding concern in the country today is the deficit and the national debt. Some people say that the government is preoccupied with this problem and they want to return to the easier, more comfortable days when the government simply ignored the matter and continued its spending and put off the day of reckoning to another generation. This is the easy way out. We cannot return to those policies without inflicting a great deal of damage on the country. This budget illustrates that this government is prepared to stay the course, to see the reduction of the deficit and the ultimate repayment of the debt. This is the only action that will ease the inflationary pressures in the economy in order that interest rates can be reduced to an acceptable level, secure programs which Canadians value and set us on a course for sustained growth. This is the type of economic conditions which all Canadians want to create, and they want to see the leadership and courage necessary to ensure that these goals are attained.

This budget will take us into the next century in a strong position to take advantage of the increasingly competitive climate to which we are proceeding in the world. We do not want our children to look back and ask the question why we did not have the courage to deal with the problem when we knew it existed. Indeed this budget shows the courage to make the tough decisions and to do what Canadians have asked: be a government that looks into the future and implements the policies necessary to secure that future.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in my hon. friend's comments. I do not know how he can some of the things that he did with such a straight face, because I am not sure that Canadians are buying it. I have a number of questions for him. Perhaps he could answer them more specifically.

The member talked about this budget and its assumptions. Every major group in this country has questioned the very assumptions that this budget talks about, namely interest rates at 11 per cent. The member knows that current interest rates are 13.5 per cent, that growth rates are unrealistic and that the Minister of Finance has admitted the budget will increase unemployment rates.

Five budgets ago the same Minister of Finance had indicated that if everything had been as he predicted in 1985, the annual deficit would be $15 billion today. Yet we know that he was dead wrong then and is dead wrong now, because we still have a $30 billion deficit.

I wonder if the member could also answer for me why he believes—and he comes from Ontario—Ontario should be penalized. Is it because it is doing such a good job, because it has a surplus in its budget or, as he indicated, because it is spending too much? Which is it? Why penalize the prosperous parts of Canada that in fact make it possible for this country to provide services to the rest of the country?

How could he say to the Canadian people that there are no new taxes in this budget when it specifically mentions the GST to the tune of $1.9 billion and also mentions those other tax measures that were in previous budgets, such as the deindexing of family allowances, personal exemptions, and so on?

I wonder if the member would be good enough to give the straight facts to Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for St. Catharines has two minutes.

Mr. Atkinson: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to answer the member. Ontario has not been penalized in this budget.

Mr. Fontana: A 5 per cent cap; that's a penalty.

Mr. Atkinson: Ontario has been asked to share in the consideration of the reduction of the problem. Ontario has had its spending increased by an average of 10 per cent over the last five years, every year. Obviously a period of restraint would have been in order. Why did it increase the public service by 7,000 people? It was not necessary. All these programs have come into effect. It seems that whenever a Liberal government gets into office the spending starts all over again.

• (1620)

It was very interesting to read the results of the debate that occurred Monday night, how the Minister of Finance was up against the representative from the Liberal Party and how the editorial said that it was no contest whatsoever. It went on to say that there is no alternative to the GST being offered by the Liberal Party and asked what is going to happen? It certainly has not come out yet. We are still waiting for it. The editorial went on to say that getting the Liberals back into office and having a GST would be like giving matches to pyromaniacs. I think that is a fair characterization of what would happen.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the budget debate, particularly since I had the opportunity earlier this week, on Sunday evening and Monday, to be a participant in the excellent national exercise put on by the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, a national conference on deficit reduction.

There are three ways in which a country can lose its sovereignty: when it disintegrates internally or from external threat, when it loses its sense of self, or when it loses control of its economic agenda.

This government has put in place long-term strategies to meet each of those challenges. National reconciliation leading to Meech Lake which will bind our country together, honouring and nurturing our cultural institutions, and the agenda for economic renewal announced November 8, 1984 and followed since.

The Meech Lake Accord is at a crossroads of success. Beyond the text and principles of the accord itself the very idea of Canada is being questioned, not just Canada as we know it, because if any significant portion of our country does leave Canada is gone perhaps forever.

We have a fundamental debate going on. What is Canada? Why Canada? What price, Canada? We are at risk of losing our sense of self. We are constantly at that risk. We need a strong national broadcasting system, public, private, educational and community, to show each other to ourselves to foster a Canadian consciousness. We need to encourage in born Canadians the same awe, pride and humility demonstrated weekly in dozens of citizenship courts throughout the land by those who take the oath of allegiance. All of this is for nought if we lose our way economically.

The budget of February 20, 1990 is another logical step toward freeing Canada from the stultifying strait-jacket of debt which threatens to remove our freedom of purpose. If we had not taken stringent action on February 20 there is a scenario which overwhelms one. We would have had interest rates rising to the 13.5 per cent to 16 per cent range over the next two to three years. We would have had a $20 billion long-term overseas placement of debt which in itself would have required a substantial increase in the personal tax and/or extensive cuts in social spending and universality.

There are a great many challenges before us. They have been met in this budget to some extent, but I submit not to the fullest extent. We had measures affecting my own home province of Alberta. We had the announcement of the termination of the federal government participation in the OSLO project which does not necessarily signal the end of that project.

Mr. Fontana: The minister said it was gone.

Mr. Edwards: The engineering studies will continue and as proposed in the original OSLO agreement there will be a review in July 1991 to determine the economic viability of the project at that time.

I listened with interest to my friend from the Niagara Peninsula talking about the Ontario situation and the transfers to Ontario. Alberta is in precisely the same position as Ontario vis-à-vis this budget in terms of the transfer payments. Further to that, our two provinces are affected identically in terms of the elimination of the incentive program for the oil and mining industries. We are all sharing. We are asking the provinces to share in the burden that we have assumed ourselves at the federal level. The economic agenda has comprised the free trade agreement, the privatization initiatives and tax reform. My friends were just debating the question of the debate last Monday night which, again, was done under the auspices of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Gauthier: A select crowd at $100 apiece.

Mr. Edwards: The crowd was select. It was Canadians from coast to coast on national television.

Mr. Gauthier: Read the Edmonton Sun.

Mr. Edwards: Here is the verdict from a journalist of The Edmonton Journal, Mark Lisac, who is not known as a fan of the current Government of Canada. He wrote:

> The next time the Chamber of Commerce invites Finance Minister Michael Wilson it should have him pick on someone his own intellectual size, or somewhere close to it.

The article continued:

> Wilson did well on a radio phone-in show earlier in the day too. I don't know how the GST idea stands up after his visit to Alberta, but we sure saw a demonstration of political leadership.

With all the budget and all the tax reform there is an underlying concern in the nation. It is summarized in a letter I received in my office just the other day from a constituent who wrote:

> I wish to respond to your reply to my wife's McDonald's GST Coupon, which was an eye opener for myself.

> Subsequent to your explanation I have jumped off the "Band Wagon" of resistance to the GST in view of my enlightenment.
> Because I was not aware of all the factors and considerations associated with MST and the GST I naturally resisted change and seemingly unwarranted tax. After discussion with my wife and with an urgent desire to protect our children's future we have decided that we would prefer to see GST applied to restaurant meals at a higher rate rather than having a higher GST rate applied to basic groceries and goods. We do appreciate the need for GST if our commitment to lower the deficit is sincere.

There is the nub of the entire debate. My sense of the mood across the country, particularly in Alberta, is: "Look, we will support this idea of tax reform if you folks are serious about wrestling the deficit to the ground". That was reinforced by the work of the national conference on deficit reduction held on Sunday and Monday of this week.

The summation of the findings of the various committees of that conference was as follows. On the issues of government administration, the advice of Mr. Joe Martin, the rapporteur of that particular committee, was that government should get out of operations and back into governing; that all Canadians should recognize, all of us, the limits of government; that there should be an elimination of duplication among levels of government; that certain privatization initiatives should take place, such as the privatization of airports; that the following services should be contracted out: tax collection, prisons and payrolls; and that consideration should be given to turning Public Works Canada and Supply and Services Canada into Crown corporations in order to put their operations on a more rational basis.

The distinguished economist Dr. Maureen Farrow reported on social programs. She came to the observation that many of the programs which we have in place today were founded in the 1960s and met a 1960s situation. They were programs designed to frustrate regional adjustment to a dynamic economy. She said that incentives must encourage adjustment and universality should be amended and shifted to targeting. She favoured addressing the insufficiencies and the inefficiencies in such programs as health care. As well, she felt that all social programs should be capped as of today in current dollar terms, that governments should then re-allocate the diminishing thought using in-house skill sets, that time and notice should be given to Canadians in pension schemes so that they could make adjustments to real market conditions. No more indexation, said she, and all Canadians should begin to manage their expectations.

An hon. member: It must have been a Tory caucus meeting.

Mr. Edwards: No, this was not a Tory caucus meeting. This was a national conference on deficit reduction.

The summation of the conference was given by the distinguished management consultant and financial adviser, Mr. W. D. Grace, who chaired the economic affairs committee. He concluded that the Government of Canada should immediately put a cap on spending at the current $103 billion, that there should be appointed a non-profit broad-based body to publicize the deficit to condition Canadians to the problem that is before us, the threat of the debt, and then evaluate and publicize all items of government spending. I believe that the Auditor General would be of great assistance in this regard.

I summarize the findings of the National Conference on Deficit Reduction held in Edmonton this week to indicate to friends, particularly friends opposite, that it is not a grinch budget that we have before us, but rather that a strong body of Canadians are calling for a further diminishing of the expectations of Canadians and what the Government of Canada does for them and to them.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, my friend from Edmonton quoted a couple of articles from the Edmonton newspapers. I know he has read the poll that was done by the Edmonton Sun in Edmonton, of Edmontonians, and the verdict was that indeed the critic for the Liberal party won the debate hands down. Eighty-nine people said "yes", at least 50-some said "maybe, Mr. Wilson", and the others were not too sure.

I want him to be honest and fair with us and tell us that indeed the press does have this balanced view and approach to the news. As a former broadcaster I know he would want to be fair. Would he not agree with me that indeed the Liberal critic, The hon. member for Gloucester, indeed won that debate.

I have a second question for him. He talked about fairness. He talked about sharing and the fact that this budget addresses the problem of sharing among Canadians. Will he explain to me how a poor person living in Edmonton, a poor person living in Alberta, or one living in Ontario differs from a poor person living in the maritimes? Is not poverty equal all over the country and should be addressed in terms of poverty levels, not whether you live in one province or the other?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the questions of my friend opposite. In response to his second set of questions, the whole idea of tax reform as we have it before us now is designed to impact favourably on lower and middle-income Canadians. It is a demonstrable fact which no one, including the renowned Liberal finance critic, has been able to rebut. Canadians with an income of less than $30,000 will be better off after tax reform than before.

Insofar as Albertans are concerned, as the Minister of Finance indicated in the debate on Monday night, the manufacturers' sales tax siphoned $685 per Canadian, per Albertan, out of the province of Alberta. The goods and services tax will mean a net increase of $5 for the average Canadian out of Alberta. But in terms of economic growth, and this is what our Liberal friends forget, the tax reform measures moving from the MST to the GST are the greatest net benefit to the province of Alberta, with projected economic growth of just under 3 per cent as opposed to the national average of something under 2 per cent.

My friend refers to polls that were taken following the debate. I was not aware of the one he refers to but I would refer him to the one taken by K 97, another distinguished Edmonton medium, which found that 98 per cent of those who watched the debate found that they did not believe the Liberal finance critic. They did not believe him, let alone saying who won the debate.

Now, if you were to examine the Edmonton Convention Centre floor you would find that even the most distinguished caretaking and custodial staff have not been able to remove the gore of the Liberal finance critic from that floor.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at the opportunity to express my concerns regarding this budget.

Along with my colleagues I am honoured to represent in this House the voice of Canadians whose needs and concerns have been ignored by the government in its plans. When I look over this budget I see negative, regressive policies in almost every area. What really jumps off the page is the way that a supposedly national government is making the most vulnerable groups of Canadians bear the brunt of its mania to cut the deficit. These groups include veterans, women, natives and people who live in geographically and economically isolated regions of Canada.

The Minister of Finance is very fond of telling Canadians that we must all join in the effort to cut the deficit and the public debt. Average Canadians suffered under last year's budget and will continue to suffer under this year's budget as well as under other policies introduced by this government.

My colleagues on this side of the House have done a very thorough job of showing how this budget will hurt Canadians without doing much to help our deficit and debt situation, so I intend for a few minutes to discuss several areas of special concern to me and my constituents.

While all Canadians view the government's policies and plans apprehensively, Atlantic Canadians have even more reason to be suspicious of this government's action. In the weeks leading up to the 1990 budget we remembered how our region was hammered in last year's budget. Having given our pound of flesh last year we dared to hope that the government would make some attempt to help the Atlantic region as it enters an economic crisis of unprecedented proportions. I refer not only to the fisheries crisis, but also to our high unemployment level, to the effects that the base closures and reductions are already having on our economic growth, to the slashing of our rail services, to the changes to the unemployment insurance program and to the fundamental sense of alienation on the part of Atlantic Canadians. We feel this way because we have seen no evidence during the past year that the government cares about this region. The failure of the government to include an Atlantic aid package in this budget plus its continued neglect of regional development only deepens the feeling of anger and of alienation.

Last year's budget promised continued high levels of regional development spending, but what followed was cut-backs to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, which the government tried to disguise by stretching ACOA's mandate without allocating more funds. Having seen through this smokescreen one can understand why Atlantic Canadians are suspicious of the government's plans for the continuance of ACOA. The recent budget announced that ACOA grants would be eliminated and that ACOA would only provide loans in the future. This was unacceptable, since entrepreneurs in the region need the government's support in their endeavours more than their counterparts do in central Canada, for obvious reasons. So, the government modified slightly its harsh stance by announcing that changes will be made in ACOA's project funding criteria, which will allow it to provide grants in some cases and which will raise the ceiling for direct contributions to projects. This is a positive move. However, to prove that it has a firm commitment to Atlantic development, the government must stop sending out mixed signals. Regional development policy is fundamentally altered on a regular basis. It seems to follow a patchwork strategy and constant change means that the Atlantic business community is always having to second guess itself. This is hardly a sound regional development strategy.

Atlantic Canadians are receiving very clear signals that the government is abandoning our transportation infrastructure. First, the government killed VIA Rail which is vital to a region which needs affordable, accessible rail travel.

Now it starts to whittle away at Marine Atlantic, the Crown corporation which operates ferry services in Atlantic Canada. Marine Atlantic will lose over $9 million in the next two years, a move which will result in either reduced services or higher fees, neither of which is good for passengers or business in this region. Prince Edward Island's economy in particular will suffer from this decision.

Another step in the government's abandonment of the region's transportation infrastructure is the cut-back in small craft harbours. The program will lose $29 million over the next five years. As well, the budget announces that the government will: "implement alternative management and operational policies for existing harbours". Are we to infer that this means the privatization of small craft harbours or higher user fees for fishermen? This simply cannot be borne. Our communities are already under siege.

"Under siege" is a good way to describe how all Canadians feel about the budget cut-backs in Established Programs Financing which contributes to provincial health care and post-secondary education.

If a budget is a symbol of a government's priorities and values then this measure is a sad comment on the soul of this government. The finance minister's rallying cry that we must all help to fight the deficit takes on a whole new meaning. He means that deficit reduction will be carried on the backs of the young and the sick.

Let me add my voice to the chorus of outrage against this government's appalling lack of compassion and respect for veterans. It cannot be stressed enough that Canadians owe these men and women a debt which can never be fully repaid. They fought or were willing to fight for their country only to see now the government which claims to represent that country turn on them. In our time of need they were there. Where is the government in their time of need? The government plans to charge board and lodging to approximately 1,500 veterans under long term care and it will increase the rates for those already paying. The government carries this outrage one step further by eliminating the heavy housecleaning program that helped veterans live in their own homes. This government intends not only to deprive veterans of affordable long term care but of their dignity and independence as well. Having already fought for Canada, veterans should not be enlisted in the so-called war against the deficit.

All Canadians are questioning why they have been drafted to fight a war that they did not instigate. The Conservative government has had six years of economic growth and increasing revenues, but we have also had six years of Tory mismanagement of Canada's economy and finances. Now, as the country slides into a recession, we are hit with another bad news budget. The Tories will say it could have been worse, and Canadians shudder at the very thought.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has raised many interesting points in his budget discourse. I have a comment and a question for him.

The debt that the government inherited in 1984, roughly $170 billion, of course has suffered the evils of compound interest over the years, and about 80 per cent of the additional debt that has been added is due to that interest factor. The debt, as we all know, now stands at around $350 billion a year which is appalling by all our standards. To service that debt this year will take interest of roughly $41 billion.

As has been pointed out in this Chamber this afternoon, that money mostly will be paid to Canadians. It will mostly be paid to Canadians who hold Government of Canada bonds and treasury bills. Now, these are not in general poor Canadians. They are generally wealthy Canadians. They are wealthy investors who have had the extra money to invest in treasury bills and bonds.

It seems to me that this is a massive transfer of money from taxpayers to wealthy investors. I do not understand why the opposition members are not hollering about this amazing transfer of wealth from the have-nots to the haves. They keep saying the Tories are doing things for their rich friends. But this is wrong. This is bad social policy to be transferring tax money into the bank accounts of the wealthy.

Would my hon. friend not agree that this practice has to end quickly? If he does not accept the government's way of doing it, what is his alternative?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his comments and questions. As we talk about ordinary Canadians and wealthy Canadians, there are many ordinary Canadians who buy Canada Savings Bonds, and pick up money in this way.

My concern about the whole deficit reduction plan in general is, as I have said in many, many speeches in this Chamber, that we have heard this hue and cry every day about deficit reduction. We hear about putting more debt onto the middle and low income people. I still have not got an answer to the question that I have raised so many times, about why, when we went through a period of five years of great economic growth where the government had billions of dollars in surplus funds, we are in this deficit situation today.

Why was it not at least taken care of at that time instead of letting it grow so that that transfer of money to wealthy Canadians continued on through that period?

I know that ordinary men and women out on that street, everybody, is concerned about this debt. We wish that we could wave the magic wand, but I am afraid that is not possible. We all have to suffer this burden and do everything we can to bring it down.

My question over the last number of months has been why greater concern was not paid to this from 1984 to 1989. Suddenly, through no fault of the government in particular, the economy is going into a tailspin. Now, at all costs, we have to do things that we should not be doing at this time in our lives. We should not be raising interest rates. We are into a tight economic situation and at the same time the poor are taxed even further because we have to reduce this deficit. I just cannot understand why it could not have been done earlier when times were better.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the annual statement of the Minister of Finance reflects the mind and the heart of the government of the day. In this context, budget '90 reflects to Canadians the lack of candour of this Tory government and the uncaring attitude with which it treats the most vulnerable members of our society.

Where, one may ask, is the evidence? I refer my hon. colleagues to the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance. Referring to the expenditure control plan of the government, he said:

> In designing the measures we were sensitive to the financial circumstances of individual Canadians as well as governments. We have exempted major transfers to persons. These include elderly benefits, family allowances, veterans' allowances and unemployment insurance benefits.

The truth has to be fully said. This government has just finished hitting these programs this past year, and it has recently pushed through this House the clawbacks on baby bonuses and old age pensions and the unemployment insurance restrictions, despite great concerns raised by the Liberal opposition. Now this government has the gall to proclaim that it has exempted these benefits from the cuts in this year's incoming budget.

This is the first piece of evidence of the hypocrisy of this budget.

"There will be no new taxes in this budget", said the Minister of Finance. Does this government really think that Canadians can be made to believe that the GST which is becoming more properly known as the gouge and squeeze tax is not an inherent part of this proposed budget? All provincial governments have complained about this proposed tax measure. This government has responded by passing to the provinces the burden of greater expenditures to maintain their social programs at current levels. The provincial governments therefore face the unpleasant task of having to increase their own taxes. This is the second set of evidence of this government's hypocrisy.

Parenthetically, this government has in the last six years introduced an average of five different tax increases per year, now a total of 32 tax increases over this period of time.

The third piece of evidence for lack of candour on the part of this government is reflected in the action it took last December when it withdrew its promise to reduce the tax rate for middle income Canadians. On top of this the surtax was increased from 3 per cent to 5 per cent.

There are many more signs of this government's lack of candour. Due to the time constraints allotted to me, I can only discuss one more piece of evidence and it is very relevant to the question asked by my colleague from the government side to my colleague who just spoke before me.

The Tory government has portrayed the impact of our national public debt as though it entails the same burdens and dangers as the debts of private individuals and business companies, of provincial and municipal governments, and of a host of Third World developing countries.

• (1650)

The total national debt is not essentially the same as these other debts. Professor Ruben C. Bellan, an Emeritus Professor of Economics writing for Policy Options, issue of January–February, 1990, reminded us that only one of the categories of obligations comprising the total national debt truly corresponds to the types of debt I have alluded to above.

What are the facts? In 1988 the government paid the Bank of Canada $2.110 billion as interest on bonds it held. The bank, after taking into account its operating expenses for the year, handed over $1.938 billion back to the government. The government did not point out that it got back 92 per cent in revenue of the interest paid by the Bank of Canada.

The government also failed to point out that it collected a lot of revenue from the same Canadian public to whom it paid billions of dollars in interest on the bonds that Canadian taxpayers hold. They are not necessarily wealthy Canadians. A significant number of ordinary Canadians like to save with Canada Savings Bonds.

The Minister of Finance said:

> This year alone interest payments will cost us close to $40 billion, equal to $1,500 for each and every Canadian.

The minister failed to advise us that a significant component of this debt paid was returned to the government as revenues through the Bank of Canada or as taxes collected from Canadian bond holders. He failed to advise us that the government paid interest to non–Canadian residents on only 16 per cent of bonds denominated in Canadian dollars and that the debt owing to non–residents in 1988 which was payable in foreign currencies was only 4 per cent of the total national debt. Failure on the part of this government to fully disclose all essential financial information and analyses is tantamount to misleading the Canadian public, that is, that the total payment on interest are debts paid without corresponding government revenues.

In other words, the government magnified the fear in the belief that we could buy this budget even if it is a budgetary policy sans sensitivity and heart.

This government has used the absolute magnitude of the total national debt as an excuse to sell this heartless budget, invoking that ultimately we would not be able to pursue our social policies and programs.

As Professor Bellan points out, if one looks at the facts they contradict frequently made statements that the consequences of federal budget deficits are completely negative, "that they are responsible for high interest rates and inflation, that the government's borrowing to finance them 'crowds out' private borrowers from the country's capital markets."

The financial and fiscal history of Canada in recent times does not corroborate the assumptions of this government. The series of large deficits that has occurred since 1981 has been accompanied by a reduction in the Canadian rates of interest and inflation rate, and by increases in the amount of capital made available to the private sector by the country's financial institutions".

In fact, when the record is further considered, it becomes obvious that large deficits have not severely limited policy options. Professor Bellan has correctly pointed out that "Canada's national debt has increased 70-fold since 1939 and interest payments are now 200 times higher than what they were in that year. Yet, in 1939 the federal government did far less for Canadians than it does today." Indeed, today the government of our country maintains three major programs—unemployment insurance, family allowances, and medicare—that did not exist in 1939 and contributes far more to education and welfare.

Speaking of welfare and other forms of social assistance programs, this government has tried to excuse itself for capping the Canada Assistance Plan ceilings by saying that the cap only affects the three richest provinces.

Well, we know that the Canada Assistance Plan is the funding program for welfare payments and services to the poor and that half of Canada's poor live in those three richest provinces. Therefore, they stand to suffer, as correctly observed by Mr. Leonard Shiffrin of the Winnipeg Free Press, issue of March 1, 1990.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this government has not been fully candid with Canadians. Not only has the government not been candid, but it has conveniently excused itself to be a government without a heart. It has recently started to chip away at the universality of our social programs and now it has decided to start killing the one program that is completely targeted to the poor. The poor stand to suffer even more when they want to pursue further education and when they get ill.

The freeze on transfer payments in the proposed budget is another blow to Canadians. Three times since 1986 this government has imposed measures that have reined in Established Programs Financing.

If this trend continues, if this Tory government continues its assault on transfer payments to provinces, Ottawa will cease to pay a single penny for medicare in any of the 10 provinces by the end of this decade. When this happens, medicare as we know and cherish it today, will be dead and each province will have its own different health scheme. In each province the system will become segregated, much like it is in the United States. For the rich there will be a first-class private system. For the poor there will be inefficient, underfunded, overcrowded health care system.

Ten years ago the federal government paid for 51 per cent of the cost of medicare in Ontario. Under this government, it is now 37 per cent. After this new budget, this percentage will continue to decrease.

Transfer payments from Ottawa for my home province of Manitoba are depended upon for 38 per cent of its revenues. While health programs have been increasing between 7 and 9 per cent per year, the transfer payments which cover this vital program have not been increasing at this rate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North on his excellent speech. One of the things I know he has listened to this afternoon is a lot of talk about how popular the goods and services tax is becoming in Alberta. In his province, in spite of the Minister of Finance's protestations that there are no tax increases in this budget, the people of Manitoba, I have no doubt, are awaiting with dread the imposition of the goods and services tax this government has proposed.

I am sure he will have read in the Supplementary Estimates C, that were tabled by the President of the Treasury Board earlier today, that the Department of National Revenue is requesting authorization from Parliament to spend an additional $100 million, $82 million of which is for the Customs and Excise branch. I assume, although I have not got the details of these expenditures, of course, that these are to pay for the tax police to administer the goods and services tax and to pay for the additional office space required by these tax police so they can exercise their functions, gouging and screwing this money out of the Canadian people.

I noticed that the Department of Taxation is getting an extra $20 million. I assume that is for more tax police there.

Are these measures ones that are popular in Winnipeg North?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the comments. Certainly, the constituents of Winnipeg North are adamantly opposed to the GST.

In fact, it is popularly known in my constituency as the gouge and squeeze tax.

I would like to point out to my hon. colleague and particularly to the opposite side that the real danger in this budget, which has failed to claim that the GST is part of its underpinning, lies not so much in the numbers that are now threatening most of our social programs, but in the trend it establishes. That is not my original view. It was the informed opinion of The Citizen in the February, 21, 1990 issue.

I have just learned from the Estimates today, if I can follow the comment of my colleague, that the proposed budget wants to cut about $2.5 and $1.75 million from the National Health Research and Development Program and from the Child Care Initiative Fund. These are programs involved in securing funds for AIDS, for natives, for alcohol, drug and sexual abuse programs, programs for seniors and children, and those directed against family violence. It demonstrates that this government has misplaced priorities. The first to suffer will be the most vulnerable sector of our country.

If I may conclude, Mr. Speaker, if this government really cared about Canadians it would not be decapitating fundamental programs for the sick, the poor, the homeless, the natives, the seniors and the students. Instead, it would be candid with Canadians about the full meaning of our total national debt. It would not exaggerate the burden of interest payments and high inflation and use it as an excuse. Instead, it should institute stimulative fiscal polices that will guarantee the well-being of Canadians today and tomorrow.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my friend and colleague, the associate critic on health for our party, said something very important and I think it bears repeating. Perhaps if he has a minute or so he could essentially explain and expand on his statement that he feels that universal health care, as we know it in this country, may very well be in peril because of what has happened with respect to the reduction in transfer payments to the provinces.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his pointed question. The Minister of Finance on several occasions has said: "We have only cut, we have not decreased". In Manitoba, in this current 1989-1990 budget, there has been a decrease of at least $3 million in the total budget for transfer payments.

Ms. Frances Russell, a learned columnist of the Winnipeg Free Press, has estimated that if we continue this trend by the end of this decade there will be no more universal publicly funded non-profit medicare. So I would say that if this current trend continues this government is signing the death certificate of medicare.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. whip for the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, as you will know, yesterday in this House, by consent, my colleague the member for Regina—Lumsden, accommodated a minister of the Crown by reversing the speaking order. It is a common courtesy that is extended in this House from time to time.

I am advised that in the rotation today inadvertently we may have been deprived of our normal speaking position. It is my understanding that there have been three members of the government and three members of the Liberals speaking in order and we had assumed, quite frankly, that the member for Comox—Alberni would be the next speaker for us and he had planned accordingly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have already talked to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni. I mentioned to him that the way the rotation is today we recognized two members of the Conservative party for 10-minute speeches and two from the Liberal party. Now that the Associate Defence Minister is here she is going to be recognized and then I will go to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

Yesterday I was very lenient with the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden too. He got about 28 or 29 minutes for his speech, talking about leniency. The Chair is trying to be lenient with everybody in the House, particularly with the opposition. The Associate Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to share my views on the government's recent budget. As Associate Minister of National Defence I am going to speak briefly about the budget and Canada's Armed Forces. But first I would like to discuss the budget as it affects Canadian women in my role as minister responsible for the status of women.

The government has made a very clear commitment to the women of Canada since it was first elected in 1984. We have honoured this commitment, not just in promises but with real and substantial action.

Since 1984, the number of women in decision-making positions in commissions and agencies of the federal government has increased by 100 per cent. We have set in place a plan for equal pay for work of equal value in the federal Public Service and we have improved the pension benefits for Canadian women.

When we were first elected there were only three women deputy ministers. Today there are 21. Prior to our first election there were fewer than four women ambassadors. Today there are 13. Back then, in the old days, there was only one woman out of the nine on the Supreme Court. Today there are three.

The changes for Canadian women go even further. There has been a decrease of about 757,000 Canadians living in poverty since this government has been in office. This number includes 229,000 women and 259,000 children.

On the job creation side, 61 per cent of the new jobs that have been created have gone to women, a higher ratio than the average entering the workforce. This government improved job training for women to the Canadian Jobs Strategy. We have introduced a $25 million program for immigrant women and improved child tax credits for low-income families.

In 1986, we introduced employment equity legislation, and I sat on that committee. In 1988, we introduced for the first time a $40 million special program initiative to deal with family violence, an issue which causes me a great deal of distress, as I know it does colleagues on all sides of the House.

I am now one of six women in the federal cabinet, when we were first elected there were only two. For the first time in Canadian history there is a woman Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and I congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

This government has not neglected the women of Canada. In fact, we plan to do even more and we will do more.

While we must continue to address the needs and rights of Canadian women, we also must address the threat of a large and growing national debt. It must be brought under control if we, as a country, want to continue to grow and prosper. We must continue to reduce the deficit if we are to build a secure future for all Canadians, men and women.

We all know that deficit reduction is not without its pains. All Canadians are contributing to this national effort in order that we secure our economic future. To achieve a lower deficit we need to build a new national partnership that works with an economic agenda and a plan for the future. This budget is part of such a strategy.

A lower deficit means lower inflation, lower interest rates and less of a debt burden. A lower deficit also means we will have more flexibility to make choices about our priorities as Canadians. We will not be bogged down by that debt. For example, we will be able to invest in new programs for the environment, for regional development, for the advancement of women or to lower taxes.

Reducing the deficit is part of a long-term economic plan that is building a stronger and a more competitive economy which is essential for the advancement of women and for their equality.

Canadians have told this government that they want spending cuts. I know my constituents have, as I know they have across the country. We have listened to those Canadians and we have acted on their wishes. In fact, to date, 70 per cent of our deficit reduction has been on the spending side.

As well, as part of the strategy and part of this year's budget, some $1.6 million has been cut from the women's program budget of the Secretary of State. I want to clarify that. Although it is in my colleague's budget I am concerned and involved in that issue.

Some people have said that this will mean the closure of women's centres across the country. I want to make it clear that this government is not closing women's centre. The women's program was not designed to provide funding for social services. That, in effect, is what has happened in certain parts of the country where federal government funding from the Secretary of State has, in effect, been used for the provision of social services, a responsibility, I think we all recognize, of the province.

So we have to find new partnerships and assist these centres, where they are providing essential services which are not otherwise available in communities, to continue to work with their local communities in partnership with provincial governments and other sources. In fact, the women's program will work with these centres to help them find other sources of funding.

Under the women's program, under the project funding, there will be increased funds and it is expected that well over 500 projects can be funded, a number of which will obviously be delivered by women's centres. In fact, some of the women's centres in Canada have operated purely on project funding. Other women's centres in Canada have not indeed received any federal funding but have received their support from other levels of government and from the community.

I also want to make it clear that we are not sacrificing local groups at the expense of others. National funding, for example, is not gaining at the expense of local. In fact, four of the national groups have had their core funding discontinued which is in line with the policy to move away from core funding and supporting project funding which requires, of course, accountability for the individual projects.

In addition, the Secretary of State will be redeploying core funding to project funding by reducing four other national groups' budgets by 20 per cent. This redeployment will enable their program to respond to the needs of the most disadvantaged women's groups across the country. When we talk about those we think of the aboriginal women, the new immigrants, the visible minority women and the disabled women, those who really are at a disadvantage and who obviously need the focus of attention the most.

In addition, I am sure that you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that this government continues to support the work of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which will be reporting to me, in order that they continue their research, their advice and their advocacy role.

It is worth noting that even after the reductions to the women's program by the Secretary of State, there will be $9.6 million in that program, which is a considerable amount of money and certainly more money than existed when we took office in 1984. It is well over the $8.4 million available at that time. With this money my colleague says that he will be able to support over 500 projects focusing on areas of family violence, economic equality and social justice.

In spite of these cuts, and we know that all areas of government have to participate in this, this government remains committed to the women who need help the most—women who have the double disadvantage of being immigrants, members of visible minorities, women with disabilities and aboriginal women. Those programs in the Department of the Secretary of State remain and some, in fact, have increased funding and will be able to assist, either through women's centres or other programs, work and projects for women in those groups.

We are also committed to ending violence against women, or working towards that. I am not sure we could ever say we can end violence in our society, but we obviously have to work in assisting those women who are victims of violence and work towards eradicating the causes as well.

The reduction in the women's program will not affect our participation in the government-wide initiative to address family violence. These initiatives, led by Health and Welfare Canada, along with five other participating departments, represent a commitment of $40 million over five years by this government. Of this initiative, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has $22.2 million for capital funding of 500 shelter units.

I can assure the House that this government will continue to support and address the needs of all Canadian women. There are other areas that we will look to in my new areas of responsibility. I will work with my colleagues to identify and address those issues and initiatives that we can move forward with to ensure that women work towards, not only full equality but independence and self-sufficiency in our society. That, I think, is a goal that we all, men and women, share together.

I also have responsibilities with another department and I will move on to that. I would like to spend a few minutes talking about the 1990 budget as it relates to the the Department of National Defence. We now find ourselves in a world which is very different from that which we knew a few short years ago or even a few months ago. As a result of the dramatic changes in Europe and the fiscal restraints here at home, we are conducting a review of our current defence policy to ensure that this policy and our program remain sound. The very positive nature of the changes in Europe allow us to take the necessary time to ensure that this review will be thorough and ultimately in the best interests of Canada.

Canada welcomes the prospect of a free and democratic Europe, where the possibility of war, we hope, will be virtually eliminated. This prospect is what we and our allies have been working toward for nearly 50 years. Its development is a tribute in part to the collective efforts of the individual countries of NATO and the members of their armed forces. Canadian servicemen and servicewomen, as well as the civilian employees of DND, should be proud of their contribution to this process.

In our defence policy review, we will examine how we can best fulfil Canada's defence needs in light of our current fiscal realities and in the ever changing international situation.

Needless to say, this review will prove to be a complex process during such a tumultuous time and it is too early to speculate on its outcome. However, I can say that its purpose is to ensure a realistic mandate for the Canadian forces and the resources to do the job.

Obviously we have our work cut out for us. We must reconcile the present fiscal restraints with the still pressing task of reducing the gap between the military commitments and our capabilities in these rapidly changing times.

We are committed to protecting Canada's interests, namely, to contribute to collective security and defence and to play a key role in international peacekeeping. In this role I think not only Canadians but people around the world have recognized the tremendous impact that we have had and the contribution that we make.

As the world changes, so does Canadian society and so must the Canadian forces. Such changes are often difficult but unavoidable.

The Canadian forces are redefining their place in Canadian society and it remains our job to make Canadians understand the crucial role that they will continue to play in the protection of these interests.

I see the maintenance and protection of Canada's interests as a key role for DND. Part of that key role perhaps goes beyond what Canadians traditionally think of when they think of defence.

We need to protect our resources and our territorial integrity.

We must inform Canadians about the role of defence in maintaining our interests.

We must explain to Canadians not just what we are doing now, but what needs to be done and DND's importance in establishing and maintaining sovereignty over the second largest country in the world.

The protection of Canada and Canadians goes beyond boundary patrols. DND must also become more involved in the war on drugs in this country.

The Department of National Defence is committed to doing its part to aid other departments of government in the interdiction of drug traffickers. We are working with the RCMP to track unauthorized or suspicious vessels and aircraft.

In addition, DND has become more involved in protecting our environment.

In 1989, when the forest fires raged through Manitoba, the Canadian forces airlifted close to 6,000 Canadians out of threatened areas within a matter of days. We could say that thousands of lives may indeed have been saved by DND personnel through this initiative.

DND is able to respond to situations like this because we have the equipment and skills to provide security to our country and our citizens.

Now, more than ever, Canadians must come to understand that national defence can and does affect their lives in many positive ways. DND is not and never has been a one-dimensional institution.

Prior to the finance minister's budget there has been a great deal of speculation about the impact of the 1990 federal budget on the Canadian Armed Forces. Some had said that the government had planned to cut our money, affecting upwards of 15,000 members. Others had said that we should reduce or eliminate our resources in Europe. These people were wrong. At this crucial time when our department and our armed forces are being asked to become more flexible and more involved in a wider variety of activities, it would be unwise to allow our numbers to be cut back below a minimum level.

• (1720)

In brief, the defence budget will be reduced by $210 million in this fiscal year and a further $270 million in the following year.

These budget cuts mean that increases in defence spending over the next two years will be limited to 5 per cent, and with inflation currently at the level of more than 5 per cent we will not enjoy real growth but will merely hold the line against inflation in the coming years. Some have called for much deeper cuts. Quite simply, Canada still only spends about 2 per cent of its GNP on defence, compared for example, to the United States which spends about 6 per cent.

There is also a new buzzword in the air; the "peace dividend". Canada has enjoyed this dividend during the past decades, but more dramatically when defence bore the brunt of the government's deficit reduction in April of last year with a $2.74 billion reduction over five years. In fact, when combined with this year's reductions, we have suffered a cut of $3.4 billion over that period.

Canada simply does not have the flexibility which some of our allies enjoy, without seriously damaging the operational effectiveness of the Canadian forces. Yet, we have been able to act in, I think, a responsible fashion to the current fiscal demands.

There will be a reduction of about 1,500 in the size of the regular forces over the next few years. The size of the national Defence quarters will be scaled down and we will reduce our defence liaison staffs in London, England, and in Washington. In addition, reductions in the size of the DND civilian workforce can be expected. No further base closures are expected and capital projects currently under way will likely proceed. But in any future scenario the replacement of equipment for the Canadian forces must remain a high priority.

I would like to remind the House that this government is not prepared to place our sovereignty or security at risk. The current and projected defence budgets represent what this government believes is the essential minimum necessary to safeguard Canada's vital interests.

I would like to say a word as well about the reserves who are such a vital part of this role. We still intend to increase their numbers, improve their equipment and training, assign them to essential and specific tasks and continue to reduce the disparities between the regular and the reserve forces.

We all have a role in helping to resolve the deficit. This government has taken tough but decisive actions. The measures we have taken reflect the seriousness of the situations. We have acted in a responsible fashion.

This budget will build on the achievements of the past five and a half years by working to ensure a more prosperous and secure future for all Canadians. As we achieve more control we will gain greater flexibility and independence of action to act on priorities.

Reducing the deficit will ease the inflationary pressures and create the climate for lower interest rates. This, in turn, will reduce our reliance on foreign investors and strengthen our sovereignty as a nation. The direct results of these actions will be a healthier fiscal position, a healthier economy.

This budget will cut the deficit by half by 1993–1994. It will put the country on a clear path of substantially reducing the burden of debt. Solving our deficit and our inflation problems now will let us build for a secure and rewarding future. It will mean a responsible government with the financial room to manoeuvre, to maintain valued programs and take on new challenges. It will mean a dynamic economy that provides rising living standards and new opportunities.

This budget will mean a confident country that is competitive abroad and in control of its own destiny at home.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the last part of the minister's speech. If I may ask you to depart somewhat from your role at National Defence and make a connection with your responsibility for the Status of Women, when considering the budget cuts, how do you perceive the future role of women within our armed forces, at National Defence? Will they go back to office work? Will your budget cuts affect those who entered the armed forces most recently, including women? How do you think women will perceive of your dedication to promoting their status in our armed forces?

As you may have suspected, I am thinking of what happened out West when you congratulated another cabinet minister on his extremely degrading comments about one of our colleagues in the House of Commons. How do you expect Canadian women employed in the armed forces to count on your support, considering budget cuts totalling several million dollars and your comments in Western Canada about the Minister for International Trade?

[English]

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to what I think is a very important issue and one that I have in just over the past year been very much involved in, that is promoting the role of women within our armed forces.

As the member may be aware, a number of trials had taken place over the previous years to work at integrating women into all roles and occupations in the armed forces. Prior to that time women had been excluded from many trades and occupations because they were said to be non-combative and that women could not do those jobs. That work had been proceeding and there had been actions taken before the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal and the decision of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal last February was that all trades and occupations should be open to women.

I fully supported that decision and, as you know, the government accepted that decision and said we will proceed with its implementation. I am really pleased to see what is developing within the armed forces. It is not easy because there are areas where women have never been involved before. But I look, for example, at the air force. We have the first two women fighter pilots. I think they are the only ones in the world. We have women in all areas of the air force, even as helicopter pilots. As I go across the country and speak to them, they basically are saying that it is really working well. They are not being discriminated against. They really feel they can aspire now to the highest positions.

Within the navy we face some challenges. There were some real concerns about how it would work with women being on ships and away for perhaps 30 days. There were concerns for the families back at home as well. We have addressed those. We have tried to concentrate on building up enough women on any ship. Having just one woman on a ship would make it very difficult. We will convert ships slowly and that is working out very well.

Within the army, women are now applying for and being accepted in all the trades and occupations. There are some difficulties in the infantry. We have had a number of women apply who have gone to training and have either dropped out of training or have not been successful. It is an extremely physically demanding occupation. I have been out in the field and it is very strenuous. Many women really do not want that kind of work but some are succeeding. It is going to be important to build up enough of a mass in order that we can really address those issues.

Several months ago I appointed a minister's advisory board on the integration of women in the armed forces. It is made up of very excellent men and women from across the country who will be monitoring the integration of women and advising me on what is happening and if there are problems so that we can make sure that this fully works. We have one of the few armed forces in the world that is actually doing this and many other countries are watching us. So I am very excited by this.

In addition, we have to recognize the special problems and the family responsibilities that many women have. I convened a conference several weeks ago on social issues and the Canadian defence. It is very important for an organization such as ours, the largest government department,—we impact the lives of several hundred thousand people—to really be aware of what the social issues are, the social change that is occurring in society and how we as an organization can be ahead of the game, whether it is family issues, technology issues, or the role of women.

We brought together academics, business people, military people, all sectors. The whole process was very exciting. I see it as the beginning of a process to influence and sensitize our people and other people about what we can do as an organization. I hope that as an organization we are going to be in the very forefront in many of these areas.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I offer my congratulations to the new minister who is responsible for the status of women. It is the first time she has spoken in the House under her new responsibility and I welcome her to that role. I know that we will be working closely together and I shall have a number of questions for her.

The recent budget is a real attack on women. This budget has cut the funding by 100 per cent to almost 80 women's centres across Canada. These women's centres are often the first place a women turns to, a woman who has been battered in her home, a woman who has been sexually assaulted on the street, a woman who has been sexually assaulted in her home. Often the first place they go to is a women's centre. They go to these women's centres because there are dedicated volunteers who have worked in the community, who have correlated information on support services, information on transition homes, and information on counselling services. This is where most often an abused woman will turn to find out what resources are available to her in her community. It is a big step when that woman makes that break through into a woman's centre. Now many of these centres are going to close because of the draconian measures of this government in its budget.

One out of every two women who turns up at a transition home today is turned away because of lack of space. The minister spoke about Project Haven and spoke about the commitment of this government to battered and abused women. But we know that already one out of every two women has the door shut to them when they turn up there, sometimes with their children, looking for sanctuary.

At the same time, this government has increased the budget by $33 million to CSIS. It has increased the budget by $114 million relating to the minister's other responsibility to the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe, at a time when the Berlin Wall is crumbling, at a time when eastern European countries are looking to a more democratic way of life.

I would like to ask the minister how she can justify her position as minister responsible for the status of women in the light of what this government is doing to women? This government is trying to muzzle women. This government has its foot on their throats, and wants to shut women up. How does the minister justifies her role in that government and in that cabinet that is silencing the voices of women?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister has only two minutes to answer the question.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her good wishes. I know we will have differences of opinion but I think there are many of these issues we are dealing with that are not really partisan issues. I hope men and women in all parts of this Chamber do care about them and that we can work together. I know particularly on the concerns of women we do share that real concern.

First, I would like to say to the hon. member, because perhaps there is misunderstanding in some areas, that the budgets of the transition houses are not affected by the recent changes in the budget. What is affected is the core funding to the women's centre, which was designed under that program for education and advocacy work. I recognize what happened over the years is that some of them obviously get involved in providing service.

Perhaps this is a good time to make the recognition that the Secretary of State does not have the money to do that. That is not his mandate. His mandate was advocacy, and I think that advocacy has worked very well.

The mandate for looking after and providing services, whether it is counselling or support services for women is the responsibility of a broader group of other levels of government and other programs. We should be addressing those, not just through the Secretary of State's budget, because it does not have those kinds of resources. That, indeed, if I can say to the hon. member, is where we are going to be working with our colleagues at the provincial level, and with colleagues from other departments.

As I mentioned earlier, the family violence fund is there. We will be looking at resources through that. We are looking through other resources in the Secretary of State's department to assist aboriginal and visible minority women.

Could I also say to the hon. member that it has been said there are 77 women centres affected by these reductions. I think approximately 44 of those are in Quebec where the amount of money that is provided by the federal Secretary of State is a very nominal amount of money. It varies $6,000 to $8,000. It does not mean that they will close because most of their resources come from other sources.

In British Columbia and Newfoundland, where the primary resources have come from the federal government and the provinces have not been participating to date, we obviously have to look for new partnerships to ensure the provision of services to women, whether it is through women's centres or whether it is through other agencies and communities. This provides us an opportunity to look at these issues. I have been concerned that quite often it has only been poor women who have been looking at these issues. We need to get a lot more women involved and they are going to get my help. I can tell you the women are going to get my commitment to help with these problems and I ask for your support.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret the hon. minister's time has expired. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as it works out, I am very pleased to follow the Associate Minister of Defence in this debate on the budget.

When you look through the concerns that are facing Canada today, I think if you polled Canadians, you would find that 100 per cent of the people in Canada are concerned about the budget. They are concerned about the deficit that this country is facing and what the implications of that deficit are, both for ourselves operating in the present and for our children in the future. What is going to be the future for them if they have to bear the tremendous weight of this deficit that has been built up over a series of governments right through the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s.

In facing the issue of the deficit, we realize on this side of the House, as do members on the government side, that there are basically three alternatives that the minister can take in order to deal with the deficit. He can raise taxes.

Mr. Milliken: Which he has done 31 times.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): The Tories definitely know how to raise taxes. My colleague says they have raised taxes 31 times.

Mr. Larrivée: To pay their debt.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I was always under the impression that when you took over a house and took over the mortgage, it is now your debt, and you are the one with the responsibility for paying the debt. You assumed the mortgage. You have the responsibility, you have the power, and you are supposed to be developing the programs. It is too late to blame the Liberals. We all know that they were at fault in the previous government. You guys are at fault now and you have the responsibility for dealing with the issue now.

You have raised taxes. Thirty-one times since 1984 this Tory government has raised taxes. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, from the point of view of the people on this side of the House, there are no further opportunities to raise taxes on the poor and the middle income people in this country.

I am not saying that there is no opportunity to raise taxes, because there are those who, over the last five or six years, as a result of the Tory preference for raising taxes on the poor and middle income people, have escaped taxes altogether.

The wealthiest people in this country, the highest income earners in this country, have actually received a $1,000 dividend on their taxes from this Tory government since 1984. Why is it that the rich get paid and the poor pay more under a Tory government. It is because it is a Tory government.

• (1740)

The other group that got away with paying taxes over the last several years from 1984 until 1990 is those 80,000 to 90,000 profitable corporations, some of the ones that were mentioned by my colleague from Nickel Belt this morning as the top award-winning corporate welfare bums. In spite of the fact that they make profits, in spite of the fact that they do very well, thank you very much, as a result of the tax relief that they are granted, they end up paying no tax at all. As a result, the tax burden in this country is not distributed fairly and a large section of the income earning population of Canada, which has the ability to pay sufficient taxes to help pay down that deficit, is not paying their share. That is why we have such a serious deficit problem in this country.

The other thing that could be done in order to trim the deficit is to cut expenditures. The minister who just spoke is an example of an area of the Canadian government where we can cut expenditures. We all have to take a little bit of the pain when we are talking about expenditure cuts. In this budget, not everybody is sharing the pain equally.

We had a legitimate right to believe that there was going to be a peace dividend as a result of the reductions in tensions in eastern Europe. Even in the United States and in other of our NATO allies, people are looking at the opportunity for this peace dividend to re-orient their economy, and reduce the heavy expenditures. After all, the expenditure to maintain the defence component of NATO is $957 billion annually. A small percentage of that expenditure would wipe out poverty in Canada this year. A small percentage of that expenditure would wipe out some of the most serious diseases plaguing people on this globe that result in thousands of children dying every single day of starvation and diseases like dysentery which is caused by poor food and water supplies, or the lack of food and water supplies.

With $957 billion our defence system could take a very small percentage of that cut, reallocate it towards other programs, towards helping our children, towards eliminating poverty, towards providing the services that my colleague for New Westminster—Coquitlam was talking about. We could have done a great service to the people of Canada had we taken advantage of that defence dividend in this year, without undermining the effectiveness of our armed forces in doing the things that our armed forces should be doing, and that is protecting Canadian sovereignty, cleaning up the problems of the environment that have been created in Canada, and using our forces deployed internationally at the behest of the United Nations for preserving peace throughout the world and further creating, as a result of that investment in defence forces, an additional peace dividend that we could reap again at home to re-invest in social programs.

One of the ways to deal with this deficit is raise taxes on those who have not been bearing the burden all along. The second way to deal with the deficit is to take advantage of that peace dividend and cut some of the programs that we no longer need as a result of the changes world-wide. The third way to deal with this deficit, and this was an option available to the Minister of Finance, was a gradual reduction in the interest rates that are established in this country. Everybody in this Chamber recognizes that interest rates are far too high. They are stifling our economy. They are making it impossible for people of modest means to buy housing. As a result, it is a serious problem in economic development at home. We need a reduction in interest rates.

In the weeks leading up to the announcement in the budget, I think that a scam was perpetrated on this country by the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and by the Conservative Government of Canada. I will tell you what the scam was. I think it was based on a number of planted stories and a number of actions by government which led Canadians to believe that the burden of deficit cutting was going to be shared equally among all sectors of the Canadian economy and among all sectors of Canadian society. That is precisely what has not happened in this budget.

Let me tell you what the scam amounted to, Mr. Speaker. First, there were the planted stories. You will recall the series in The Globe and Mail and in other newspapers, the interviews with military officers at the Canadian Forces Base at Lahr, interviews with students at the military and officer colleges, interviews with members of the general staff who expressed their concern and uncertainty about what was going to happen to the Canadian Armed Forces in the future, and how they were going to fulfil their role after all the cuts they had taken in the past. That planted story seemed to indicate, and left Canadians with the impression, that the military was going to share its burden in terms of cuts in order to attack the deficit. That was not the case.

The other story that was planted, was the story about the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Business Council on National Issues attending public meetings and making statements that, yes, business has to take its fair share and bear its share of the burden in terms of cutting the deficit. Some editorialists even suggested that this was a self-sacrificing attitude on the part of the Business Council on National Issues—it would have been the first demonstration of such an attitude—and on the part of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. In fact, nothing was further from the truth. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Business Council on National Issues said that that grants to businesses should be cut or should be converted to repayable loans.

The biggest draw on our resources and on the taxpayer's resources, is not grants to small businesses, the most innovative, employment intensive, product developing businesses in our economy. The biggest drain on the resources of the Dominion of Canada and its exchequer is the drain of the tax expenditures to huge corporations with absolutely no productive results in terms of increased employment or increased economic and industrial capacity. That has been identified, even by the Nielsen report, as the biggest drain on the resources of this country. Every member on the other side knows that is one series of expenditures that was never touched by the government in this budget. As a result, that group of people, the largest, wealthiest corporations in our society, in our country, do not pay their share. As my colleague from Nickel Belt pointed out, they do not pay any taxes at all in terms of 80,000 to 90,000 of those corporations.

What the people of Canada were looking for in terms of this budget was a little fairness in spreading the burden of that deficit equally among all people in society.

The women's centres in Port Alberni in my riding and in Courtenay will shut their doors on April 30. Courtenay has already shut down now, because the staff does not have time to help women because they are out trying to raise money. In Port Alberni, they are going to be shutting their doors on April 30.

The women's centre in Port Alberni received a generous grant from the federal government of $26,000 a year. Its contribution to fighting the deficit was 100 per cent of that grant.

As my colleague, the leader of the NDP pointed out yesterday, Fletcher Challenge, a major forest company operator in British Columbia, paid zero taxes. What is its contribution to the deficit? As my friend from Nickel Belt pointed out, Hees International, a very profitable corporation, paid zero taxes. What is its contribution to the deficit?

Those were simply planted stories that implied that the defence department was going to be paying its share. It was a planted story that implied that big business was going to be paying its share. Guess what? Those folks did nothing to shoulder their share of the burden of that deficit.

• (1750)

The most cynical scam that was perpetrated on the people of Canada was done by the Minister of Finance between January 11 and January 18 when he dumped the interest rate in Canada by about 29 basis points. I think he did it on purpose. His purpose in doing that was to panic the currency markets in order to suggest to Canadians that if we reduced interest rates it was going to result in a problem of a declining dollar and serious problems with our currency.

Why did he dump the interest rates at 29 basis points all at one go? If the minister had adopted a more gradualist approach, he could have lowered interest rates by the same amount and more without disturbing the currency markets, without giving them the sense that there was going to be a free fall in interest rates and a free fall in the Canadian dollar which would have created problems with our trading partners, especially in the United States which reacts poorly to a low Canadian dollar. Why did the minister do it? I think it was an attempt to deceive Canadians into believing that interest rates could not be reduced by dumping them all at once instead of taking a more gradualist approach.

Having perpetrated those three scams on the people of Canada, the minister then brought in his budget. It was a very deceptive kind of budget. Having set the stage through those planted stories and through interest rate drive, the minister then tried to imply to Canadians that we were all going to bear the burden equally. But in fact some bore the burden more harshly than others.

I would like to talk for a moment about the budget of the Secretary of State and how it relates in particular to aboriginal organizations. The government has not been too happy with aboriginal organizations over the last little while because they see the impact of federal Conservative policies on their people. Mr. Speaker, you and I know that aboriginal organizations represent some of the poorest of the poor people in Canada, some of the most disenfranchised and powerless people in Canada, people who have a claim under our Constitution for recognition of the role that they played in the development and the history of this country, and they are not recognized in that Constitution. They are people with a legitimate case of unfinished business that needs to be negotiated with this country.

Over the years, the Prime Minister has recognized that, the Parliament of Canada has recognized that, but in this budget the government has put an end to its recognition and support for aboriginal organizations in Canada. Essentially, the government is implementing the Buffalo Jump provisions of the Nielsen report that was brought down in 1985. The government is saying that native Indians and aboriginal groups are no longer entitled to the support of the Canadian people, that they are going to have to go it on their own, and as far as this government is concerned the policy with respect to aboriginal people is integration, assimilation and cultural annihilation. That is the policy of this government with respect to Indian people.

How do you do it? First of all you wipe out their leadership. In that same Secretary of State's budget that eliminated 100 per cent of some of the women's centre core funding across Canada including two in my riding, the budget of the Assembly of First Nations, the leadership organization of the status Indians of Canada, was wiped out to the tune of 100 per cent. Was there any consultation in advance? No consultation. Was there any discussion in the words of the Associate Minister of Defence in terms of generating new partnerships for fund raising? No discussion about new partnerships. Was there any discussion about getting project moneys, even though you do not have the core funds to operate an office or hire the people? There was no discussion.

The Prime Minister made a promise on April 18, 1985, denying the Buffalo Jump document was government policy and saying that he intended to carry on an important relationship with native people and that there would be no cuts in funding without prior consultation. Were any of the promises of the Prime Minister kept? Absolutely not one of those promises was kept. This was a direct attack racially motivated against the native people of Canada.

In the Secretary of State's budget, what is the excuse that the government has for cutting all of the funding of native print media, about $3.4 million? As the clock ticks, that is the interest on our debt. How can these people possibly be accused of contributing to the deficit? With $3.4 million, they employ 108 people who will end up on unemployment insurance as long as it exists and then on welfare. These people have been trained as a result of their journalism experience as journalists, reporters, printers and other technicians involved in that trade.

In the native broadcast media as well, people will end up out of work and programming will be cut back. All of the work that these people have done to improve native literacy, to protect native languages and to communicate between native society and Canada's society as a whole in order to reduce racial tensions and increase tolerance between peoples is going to be wiped out with a stroke without a bit of consultation between this government and those groups.

What other possible explanation is there? These people are not the people who are responsible for the deficit. Their pittance of $9 or $10 million contributes next to nothing to the deficit compared to the drain on our resources through tax expenditures to large corporations and the failure to tax profitable corporations. These people are not responsible for the deficit.

The only explanation for the cuts sustained in this budget by native organizations is that this government, for political or other reasons, opposes the native Indian people of Canada. It is attempting to suppress their leadership and ability to communicate with the rest of us Canadians the legitimacy of the grievances they have against us, grievances based on historical claims to this country, claims to self government within our Constitution, and to be treated equally in terms of health care, social programs and their participation in Canadian society. It is a direct attack on native people, in the very same way that this government has taken the attack against women in this country.

The minister mentioned that women's centres had become involved in the provision of social programs. That is a complete and utter falsehood. Absolutely false. I have gone down to the women's centres in my riding and talked to women. They cannot afford, on a $26,000 budget in the case of the Port Alberni Women's Resources Society, to be providing social programs. How can they do it out of $26,000? It does not make sense. It is a silly, inane comment. It is a silly criticism of the role of women's centres.

Those centres provided resources in terms of help and direction. They referred people to social services and they gave women the confidence, the courage and the ability to take advantage of those services.

This budget is a bad budget. It is not going to deal with the deficit. Canadians are not going to respond to it as something that deals with the deficit, because it does not allow Canadians to shoulder the burden of that deficit fairly. Some people are paying more than others.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to partake in this important debate today on the budget that was introduced by the finance minister just a few short days ago.

This budget is the sixth by the present finance minister. It is a continuation of this government's commitment to our fiscal plan as outlined in the election of 1984.

If we take a look at the election of 1984, and why we came to power and defeated the former Liberal government, it was simply because of the Liberals mismanagement of the economy in the years running up to 1984.

In 1984, when we took office, government spending was completely out of control. No matter how hard or how strongly the opposition members want to argue that point, they cannot argue it convincingly because spending was completely out of control. They were unable and unwilling to manage the economy of this country. The Canadian public ousted the Liberals in 1984 for a very good reason. We have stuck to our agenda of attempting to come to grips with the problems we inherited in 1984. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will go through some of the problems we inherited and the steps we have taken to rid ourselves of those particular problems. It has not been easy and it will not be easy, but we are going to do it.

• (1800)

If we were to check the record of Liberal government spending over the 15-year period between 1970 and 1985, we would see it reveals that the Liberal Party increased program spending by 18 per cent between 1970 and 1975. It increased spending by 10 per cent in the next five years and, on average, something in the order of 14 per cent per year between 1980 and 1984. There is no economy or country in the world that can sustain that kind of growth in spending. Canada was no exception.

The continued borrowing on the part of the Liberal government got out of control. What happened, Mr. Speaker, as you and everyone in this Chamber can well remember, is that it led to 20 per cent inflation rates. A 20 per cent inflation rate in itself is bad enough, but that was coupled with double digit interest rates.

What happened? The economy went into a tail-spin and continued in that tail-spin. The reason is that the Liberal Party never wants to come to grips with reality. It wants us always to take the sugar-coated pill, to buy our way out of trouble. Fiscal responsibility means absolutely nothing to that party.

For those years that I have mentioned, what that party did was simply the same thing a young, undisciplined child would do if he or she were given a credit card with no sense of responsibility and no sense of what a citizen should do. That is exactly what that party did. It led us down the golden path, only to find at the end of it that there were certain realities we were facing.

Consequently, when we inherited the government in 1984, we had a $200 billion plus debt.

Mr. Milliken: No, you didn't. It was $170 billion.

Mr. Thompson: They can argue that we did not have it. I ask them to talk to anyone who is an accountant, anyone with a sense of responsibility and let them check the books. It was a $200 billion plus debt that we inherited. It does not take a rocket scientist to understand the problem we inherited.

We inherited a $200 billion plus debt at interest rates over 10 per cent. What are we talking about? We are talking about paying interest on a burgeoning debt that was just impossible for the Canadian people to continue to bear.

We took steps immediately to correct that because it is something that we cannot climb out from underneath in a short period of time. We have been in office since 1984, and there is not a Canadian here who will say that we have not taken steps to correct that situation.

The difference between us and members of the Liberal Party is simply that they will take the easy road out. The easy road out is to do absolutely nothing.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The easy road in.

Mr. Thompson: That is exactly it, the easy road into power. He could not have said it better, coming from the opposition party itself. The easy way into power to do absolutely nothing, to stand back and let the economy roll on. They stick their heads in the sand, something for which they are famous and which they have done for the last 20 years, but they do absolutely nothing about it.

What do they want to do? In the final analysis, if they do nothing they are just passing the problem on to their children and their grandchildren. Mr. Speaker, you are old enough to have grandchildren. Maybe I am not and maybe some of the guys doing all the hollering are not. However, believe me, if we had not come to power and if we did not come to grips with it, it would have been their grandchildren who would have inherited this debt.

• (1805)

The figures are alarming. I will go through some of those a little later.

I would like to talk now about our plan for the future. It is one thing to cut expenses, and we have done a good job on that; we have cut expenses. Some of them have been troublesome and difficult to deal with as none of us want to lose services. It is difficult. As the man said, "cut expenditures and cut expenses and cut programs, but don't cut programs that involve my province or involve me as an individual. Lay it on to somebody else".

That is exactly what we are doing here with the GST. I want to try to bring this into the light because part and parcel of this budget is the GST in a sense. We have to come to grips with expenditures, but on the other side we have to come to grips with the revenue side of this thing: the raising of dollars to pay for the services which Canadians want and need.

What is the Liberal Party telling us about the GST? I think most of its comments can be summarized and are reflected in the recent debate between its finance critic, the member for Gloucester, and our finance minister when they met in Alberta on Tuesday evening, I believe it was. What it was, again, was simply false promises. The finance critic's response to the GST on national television when the Minister of Finance asked him "would you scrap the GST" was simply: "Absolutely, absolutely, we absolutely would". Three times he used the word "absolutely" until he had to spend the night in Edmonton and think about what he had said. Then, the first thing on Wednesday morning when they put a television camera in front of him, he took those words back.

Why? It was because some of the Liberal candidates seeking the nomination for the leadership of the party disagree. Why do they disagree? It is because they know that reality is staring us in the face. Reality is staring Canadians in the face, and we have to come to grips with it.

To give an indication of what reality means, yesterday I was speaking to my brother who lives in Fredericton, New Brunswick. He did not have an opportunity to vote for me because obviously he lives in a different riding. I cannot pretend that my brother has always been a Conservative; maybe he is not at all. One thing he said to me yesterday was: "Gee, it must be difficult for you, Greg, when you go back home and you have all these pressing issues on the table". He talked about the difficulty with the budget. He talked about the GST. As far as the GST is concerned I said that what I feel when I go back home now is that Canadians are realizing there are no options there.

We have to give Canadians more credit than what the opposition party is willing to give them as to their level of intelligence. Canadians know that if you spend money you have to be able to pay the bills. That is something members of that party have not realized and will never come to grips with. They are not going to change.

Let me quote from an editorial which appeared in The Edmonton Journal about the debate on the GST between our party and the Liberal Party. It refers to the finance critic and states: "His views expose the empty posturing and promises made by that Liberal Party". That is what it is. The article stated that the finance critic, Mr. Young, entered the debate burdened with all the old Grit spending baggage of the Trudeau years. No one could have expressed it any better.

Members of the Liberal Party talk about what they will do if they form the government.

• (1810)

I will tell you what they will do if they form a government. They will do what they have done every time they have ever formed a government. They allow us as a party to make the tough decisions that have to be made. They then say that they are going to dismantle what we have done. We can go through many of those election years where we actually handed the election to that particular party because we were willing to tell the Canadian people the truth, and they did not want to tell them the truth—never have told them the truth.

Mr. Milliken: Always have.

Mr. Thompson: Listen to that. The member himself does not believe it because he has a big smile on his face. He is smiling. He doesn't believe it.

The debt that we inherited in 1984 was a problem for us as a government. No one can deny that we have done a good job in managing that. By the year 1993, if we stay the course—and our party is determined that we are going to stay the course—our borrowing requirements in 1993–94 will be a zero. Our borrowing requirements will be absolutely zero. The Canadian people are demanding that we take action, and we have taken action.

I am proud to stand here and say that I support the government on this budget. I support the finance minister. And the Canadian people support us.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member seems to blame all problems faced by his government on the previous Liberal government, who have not been in power for six years, I would like to ask him how many more years his government requires to deal with the problems that they have not been able to face over the last six? The debt has doubled, deficits are at the approximate same level as they were when they took office. How many more years does this government need before it will learn how to manage the economy?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping my hon. friend would ask that question. It simply points out that they never listen.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that about two minutes ago I mentioned that by the year 1993–94 our debt requirements or our borrowing requirements will be absolutely zero. That is exactly the point I am attempting to make. The answer to the question, if he can do anything at all in terms of simple grade school arithmetic, is that it is a 10 year period. If we keep them out of office for 10 years we will have accomplished our goal. We will have reduced our borrowing requirements to absolutely zero.

I am going to ask the hon. gentleman to go back to grade school, or at least get his calculator out because I am convinced that my grade four son could come up with the figures he is asking for.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise today as the representative for Selkirk to speak on the government's budget of February 20, 1990.

The key to understanding this budget is understanding the debt. Our national debt is $350 billion. It is what we owe the investors who lent the previous government money to help it pay in a small way for the effects of the recession and more so for its runaway program spending which was rising at an annual rate of 12 per cent. When spending begins to exceed revenue so significantly the result is what we have right now, a debt crisis.

Make no mistake, we have to repay this debt. We either do it now or our children will have to foot the bill, with interest. As a father of three children, I do not want them to inherit this burden. You might well ask why we in the Conservative government have not paid off the debt. After all we have raised taxes and have had five years of strong economic growth.

Well, that is a fair and important question. In 1984 the debt was $200 billion. Even though the government was in debt it was still spending more on programs than it was taking in in taxes. It is borrowing more money just to pay the interest on the debt. It is as if you go over your limit on your credit card and you have a cash advance from your credit card to pay your debt on your credit card. It makes no sense to me.

• (1815)

The bottom line was we inherited a government that was $200 billion in debt, borrowing money to pay the interest and spending more on programs than it was taking in in taxes. What have we done about it? We recognized that the first step towards paying off the debt was to eliminate the operating deficit. We had to stop spending more money than we made. We cut spending, we raised taxes and we closed loopholes.

After just two years we eliminated the operating deficit of $16 billion. We have today an operating surplus of $9 billion. Seventy per cent of this $25 billion turnaround is the result of reduction in government spending. Unfortunately, all the time we have been working to eliminate the operating deficit the interest on the original $200 billion has been accumulating. Interest alone on the debt since 1984 has been $120 billion. Eighty per cent of our debt today is a result of the previous government.

Sometimes we are criticized for blaming the previous government for the debt problem. That does not wash. The fact of the matter is we are sitting on a mountain of debt incurred by our predecessors and the facts bear that out. Our opposition is asking us why, after five years, we have been unable to fix the mess they gave us. We, as a government, get enough criticism for the things that we have actually done, never mind getting it in the ear for policies we had no influence over.

I hear complaints from numerous constituents about government spending. Several months ago I polled the views of my constituents on the national deficit. I asked two questions. The first was: "Are the government deficits and the accumulated national debt a serious problem to you? If so, should the government raise taxes? If so, which ones?". Second, "Should the government cut program spending to reduce debt?"

I asked these questions to determine the economic issues that were of the greatest concern for my constituents. I would like to address the concerns raised by the people of Selkirk and to illustrate how this government has responded to their concerns in this budget. Ninety-six per cent of the people who responded stated that the government's deficit and the national debt are of serious concern to them, but 45 per cent said the government should not raise taxes. We as a government have listened to the concerns of Canadians. There are no new taxes in this budget. Of the 55 per cent who said the government should raise taxes, 82 per cent stated that the corporate tax should be raised.

This, in fact, was accomplished in the 1989 budget. A significant amount of revenue will be raised through the large corporation tax, for instance. The changes in taxation to this sector are expected to raise an additional $1 billion.

Sixty-eight per cent of the respondents said no to the federal government reducing transfer payments to the province of Manitoba. Substantial deficit reduction cannot be achieved without affecting transfers to the provinces. They are simply too large a part of the federal expenses to be ignored.

In the fiscal year just ending, tax and cash transfers to provincial governments will total more than $35 billion. They have risen at an average annual rate of 6.5 per cent since 1984–85. During the same period spending on federal programs in general has been held to an average annual growth rate of 3.6 per cent, which is below the rate of inflation. Under the budget's expenditure control plan transfers to provinces are expected to grow by about 3 per cent on average over the next two years, roughly the same rate as all the other program spending.

The EPF transfer to Manitoba will be limited to the same per person level as it was in 1989–90 for the next two fiscal years. Equalization transfers, which in Manitoba are more than EPF, are expected to continue to grow with the national economy. This means that they will grow much faster than other federal spending. Growth of social assistance transfers to Manitoba under the Canada Assistance Plan will also be unaffected because the budget exempts provinces which receive equalization from the 5 per cent cap on growth of these payments.

• (1820)

The result of those transfers to Manitoba under the three major programs, which in 1989–90 total $1.7 billion, are expected to rise in the next two fiscal years to $1.8 billion and $1.87 billion respectively.

I am not suggesting that there is no effect on Manitoba.

There is.

The reduction in the rate of growth of transfer payments represents just under 1 per cent of the provincial government's revenue. But I believe the effects can be coped with as federal and provincial efforts are made to ensure that each tax dollar is spent more carefully, and as all Canadians adjust their expectations of what in current circumstances the federal government can be expected to deliver.

Returning to the survey responses, 66 per cent stated that agricultural spending programs should not be reduced. The farmers of Beauséjour in my riding of Selkirk will be glad to know that there have been no reductions to any federal government agricultural program. Farmers in Manitoba have already received their cheques on the basis of the multi-year disaster benefit program.

The last major point I want to raise is the fallacy that we have not done our part, that the federal government has not cut enough of its own budget.

We have reduced the Public Service by 12,000 person-years. We are governing in the 1990s with 1973 staff levels because we are managing more efficiently. We have reduced the deficit as a percentage of the GNP every year since 1984, from a high of almost 10 per cent to below 4 per cent. We have kept our spending below the rate of inflation every year.

That is a better record than every province and better than even the private sector. However, I would like to make special mention of the government of Manitoba which has been among the leaders in low percentage increases in its program spending.

The federal government has done its part to cut the deficit. We have got the scars and popularity to prove it.

In conclusion, the budget is fair in its demands and promises clear rewards in the form of a healthier economy, greater financial security for all levels of government and for all Canadians. It offers a positive future for our children.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on the second Tory budget since my election. There are many things that can be said about this budget. I would like to address them under the general theme of fiscal management or, more accurately, the lack of it since the government came to power.

The finance minister is approaching his sixth year on the job. The effort that was tabled on February 20 demonstrates the signs of a man who has never learned the fundamentals of the job, or has simply just given up trying.

I was a federal public servant in Ottawa when the finance minister released his agenda paper on November 8, 1984. The paper proclaimed:

> The growing public debt has become a severe handicap to economic progress and the most serious obstacle to economic growth. Continued high deficits and growing debt will increasingly undermine confidence, put upward pressure on interest rates and reduce prospects for growth. Moreover, they increasingly constrain the federal government's ability to discharge its responsibilities for over-all economic management and effective economic leadership.

The agenda paper warned of the consequences of the debt if it reached the feared level of 1990-1991 of the $400 billion it projected as its unacceptable scenario. The minister promised strong leadership directed at attacking the national debt and bringing down high deficits.

It is true deficits were unacceptably high in the two or three preceding years as Liberal governments struggled to guide Canadians through the worst economic recession of the post-war era, a recession that was global in scope and which was the culmination of deep-seated inflationary pressures, not the least of which were two major world energy shocks in the 1970s.

• (1825)

Even though world economic conditions were unfavourable for Canada throughout the seventies, annual budgetary deficits either in absolute terms or as a percentage of GDP were never as consistently high as during the last five years under this government. The previous Liberal governments before the Tories came to power had begun to turn the economy around and to bring unemployment and inflation down.

Moreover, with world oil prices falling and the U.S. economy experiencing strong growth, this government had the relatively easy task of presiding over a generally buoyant economy due mainly to more favourable trends around the world.

As the Minister of Finance knows, this was the ideal time to bring deficits down to zero, reduce the national debt and to provide room for lower interest rates to prolong the recovery. But what did the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the government do during this period? They fiddled, flustered, fulminated and raised taxes 31 times, increasing government revenues by over $170 billion over this period.

What happened to the national debt? It just mushroomed. It ballooned. During the last five years and up until the forecast in the 1989 fiscal plan for 1991, the debt grew to some $379 billion—almost the $400 billion the Minister of Finance predicted in his worst case scenario back in November, 1984.

What did the Minister of Finance do in the intervening years? He gave more tax breaks to his corporate buddies while cranking up taxes on ordinary Canadians. He promised expensive toys to the military, such as the nuclear submarines. He promised billions for major energy projects. He promised to maintain the UI program and to invest in a new child care program for all Canadians.

During the last election campaign the Minister of Finance assured Canadians that all these promises were not promises but spending commitments and fully accounted for within the fiscal framework. Then came the election and Canadians were suddenly advised that, no, the cupboard was bare. There was no money for a national child care program. There was no money for the Polar 8 ice-breaker. There was no more money for regional development. ACOA was going to have to be reprofiled. The government would have to bail out of its unemployment insurance program, after being a financial partner in this program for the past 50 years.

We were told that Canadians would have to pay a massive new sales tax, the goods and services tax, which would tag an extra 7 per cent on to the price of virtually everything we buy. This tax was no longer revenue neutral but was designed to fight the minister's new deficit reduction fervour.

Now we have the February 20 budget, the budget of a tired finance minister in a tired government.

Let me read a few choice morsels from this document. "The deficit for this year is on track at $30 billion". That is what this budget document says. The finance minister now regards a $30.5 billion deficit as an accomplishment.

Then the minister stated: "I am proposing a two-year expenditure control program that will affect all areas of government spending with the exception of income support programs for seniors, families and veterans, unemployment insurance, as well as the equalization program and Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower income provinces".

What he then sets out to do in typical Tory fashion is to attack the economically less powerful members of our society—the veterans, native people, students, those he missed in the April, 1989, budget—and to pass off his government deficit problems on the backs of the provinces.

Here is another quote: "Implementing the expenditure control program this year will require the patience and understanding of Canadians". That is the understatement of the century.

Here is the classic capitulation. "The economy is in a period of slower growth. This is not surprising, nor should we try to avoid it".

Higher interest rates and a higher dollar caused by five years of fiscal mismanagement are driving Canada into a recession and we should sit back and enjoy the ride.

Finally, one more quote from the budget: "This is the future we have been building since 1984." This is the budget of a Minister of Finance who has given up and is too proud to admit it. It is an admission of defeat. It is a cryptic call to the Prime Minister for a portfolio change. I urge the Prime Minister, be merciful to your faithful friend and to Canadians; withdraw this budget and give the minister another job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Skeena.

PRIVILEGE

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a most serious matter of privilege. The matter deals with the human rights of a Department of National Defence scientist by the name of Dr. Mendoza, and the Human Rights Commission of Canada is seized with that part of it.

The matter involves my rights as a member of Parliament because records indicate that the investigation by the Special Investigations Unit of the Department of National Defence involves telephone calls to my office, including my Prince Rupert, British Columbia, office. If members of Parliament cannot make and receive calls from the public and private, then we have lost the vital thread of our democratic freedoms.

Second, the matter involves the rights of all members of this House. One of the documents from Colonel McCullough suggests that Canadian law be violated, in fact that it be violated by the Minister of National Defence during Question Period. This cuts to the core of the operation of the most senior democratic institution of Canada.

Third, it involves the rights of all members as one of the documents revealed a view by the Department of National Defence that "the House" should not be advised of the specifics of these investigations. This view is one that challenges the basic building blocks of any parliamentary democracy.

There is a further matter involving the Department of National Defence and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but because of the sensitivity of that part of the file it will have to be held until an in camera meeting can adjudicate upon it. Let me simply say in relation to that that it clearly violates the spirit, if not the specifics, of Canadian law.

• (1110)

If you will give me a moment, Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the specifics of just a few of the documents on the record because I think it will give all members of the House some idea of the severity of the question of privilege that is being raised today.

There is a document called "Chronology of Correspondence with Hon. Jim Fulton MP for Skeena concerning CB Defence Activities", and it lists the dates of letters, September 27, 1983, from Fulton to Mendoza, requesting information on teratology toxicity studies under contract on HI–6.

It then goes on, and I will not give you all of the details but it lists letters from October 11, 1983; November 29, 1983; December 19, 1983; May 10, 1984; and February 27, 1984. These are letters either between myself and National Defence or the minister at the time, in the case of this correspondence to Jean–Jacques Blais. The list goes on to show February 12, 1985 from myself to Dr. Mendoza and May 28, 1985.

Some of these letters were answered by the Right Hon. Joe Clark, some by the Hon. Erik Nielsen who was then Minister of National Defence, and some by the Hon. Harvie Andre who was Minister of National Defence. Some are from myself to the Hon. Jake Epp. Some are from myself to the Minister of National Defence dated August 3, 1988 and November 7, 1988, and answered by the Hon. Perrin Beatty. A letter of December 8, 1988 is answered by the Hon. Perrin Beatty. A letter of December 9, 1988 from myself to the Department of National Defence was answered January 18, 1989 by the Hon. Perrin Beatty. A letter of December 19, 1988 was answered April 4, 1989 by the Hon. Perrin Beatty.

There is then a document stamped "Confidential", Annex A to D Police Operations, dated March 1989:

25 Mar 88, Mr. Fulton interviewed by CKO–FM radio, Ottawa where he answered questions about chemical studies at DRES.

That is Defence Research Establishment Suffield.

20 May 88, Change of Circumstances Report on Connolly–Mendoza was initiated by Dr. Kimbell, Chief DRES. 27 Jun 88, SIU–

I have learned that is the Special Investigations Unit.

—responded to Dr. Kimbell's request for investigative assistance. Dr. Kimbell provided names of persons possibly involved in the information leak.

27–30 Jun 88, SIU review of background information indicated that Dr. Connolly–Mendoza was the prime suspect.

29 Jun 88, Request for assistance sent by SIUS Calgary to SIUS Esquimalt and Ottawa in an attempt to ascertain telephone numbers of Mr. Fulton. List of long distance calls billed to DRES also obtained."

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The minister is rising on a point of order. I hope the hon. member will realize that he went a little further in his argument before I intervened. When we get back to him I would hope he would keep that in mind.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to jump to conclusions, but at this point in time all of the information the hon. member is talking about is news to I assume everybody on this side of the House. Certainly I was not aware of any indication of something coming.

I have not yet heard any accusation or suggestion of how the member's privileges have been interfered with. He talks about a list of correspondence that goes back in time and by implication of some behaviour that I assume he is going to establish at some point in time interferes with his privileges as a member.

I guess my request is to expect that there be some reasonable response in a reasonable time. I need to have some information from the hon. member as to what accusations are being made so that the required calls can be made to people who might have information and be able to respond. Otherwise we have, in essence, a kind of one–sided accusation with no opportunity to respond and that might create an inaccurate impression which I do not think is in anybody's long–term interest.

I guess my request is that he establish the accusation as quickly as possible so that we might undertake the necessary investigations on this side to be able to respond.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to comment that I was listening attentively to this intervention and feel that you should decide whether there is a question of privilege here, not the leader of the House on the government side.

In the past you have given us occasion to comment on these matters. I was waiting for the member to get to his point so that we would indeed be able to share with him this very important point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has risen. I am sure that he, as has your Speaker, has been listening with very great care to the information which the hon. member for Skeena is giving us.

I must say that it might be helpful, and I say this to the hon. member for Skeena, because given what clearly seems to be the gravity of the situation I have no intention of cutting the hon. member for Skeena off at any point. I am going to listen to what he has to say, but I think there is some merit in what the hon. House leader has said.

I wonder if just at this moment the hon. member for Skeena could sort of summarize or capsulize exactly what is the point of privilege. I will certainly hear him as he gives us what seems to be the evidence he wants to put in support of the point. I think it would be helpful and I think the hon. minister is on good ground here. He obviously has been listening very closely. He obviously wants to make inquiries. He has said, and we must accept his word, that this is coming as news to him.

If the hon. member could give us the point I will certainly hear the rest of the evidence. There is no question about that, but in courtesy to both sides of the House I think the suggestion of the hon. House leader is appropriate.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have sifted out as many of the documents that I felt were not particularly relevant to the three points of privilege as I could. These are chronological documents prepared by the Department of National Defence. They refer directly either to me or to the Minister of National Defence, or to proposals for the Minister of National Defence to pursue during Question Period.

To deal specifically with the first one, which is where I believe my privileges have been tampered with most directly, it is in relation to the accessing of calls made to my offices. I will just list those in particular, and then I will go on particularly to the one that refers to the Minister of National Defence. I think these are the key ones.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the hon. member. I have been listening as carefully as I think other members have. The suggestion on a memorandum that the hon. member apparently has that someone was trying to get the telephone number of the hon. member is something which I want to hear a little more about. That could or could not be, depending on all of the story, a question of privilege.

If there are other events in this chronology which the hon. member also wishes to bring to my attention as breaches of privilege, could he tell me what they are? Then we will see how far it is necessary to go in reading the evidence. It may well be that the hon. member can table all of this material with me. Of course it would be made available to the hon. House leader and the House leader of the Liberal Party.

If we could just ask the hon. member to address right now the question of the alleged breaches of privilege, then we will hear him out.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I will do that very quickly. The concern that I have is this:

> 27 Jul 88, MWO Ireland, SIUS Calgary, swore an information before Judge Laven in Calgary Provincial Court to obtain search warrant to search Alberta Government Telephone offices at Calgary for records of long distance phone calls charged to Connolly–Mendoza's residence phone. The warrant was issued and executed.
> 2 Aug 88, Alberta Government Telephone records obtained. Check revealed that during Mar 88, a phone call made from Connolly–Mendoza's residence to Mr. Fulton's constituency office in Prince Rupert.

Then there are references to the Official Secrets Act, which I will come to if you want me to pursue the phone calls.

• (1120)

The most severe matter, I think, in these documents involves the rights of all members of the House. It is a document from Colonel McCullough which I will provide for the record. This is a document between Colonel McCullough, the Director General of Security, and Captain Jean Genest, ADJT SIU.

Mr. Speaker: What is the date on that document?

Mr. Fulton: This document is dated April 25, 1989. It reads:

> I instructed Captain Genet, in the absence of both CO SIU and DCO SIU, to contact Maj Olexa and ensure that any electronic record of the 14 Mar 89 interview of Mendoza was preserved as real evidence in respect of this developing quagmire.

This is the key document. It is: "Department of National Defence, File No. PSIF 438 558 462. Record of Conversation" between Colonel W. J. McCullough, Director General of Security and Below. "Subject: MND Enquiries. Details: Discussed variously with: a. Capt Roy, DG Info— c. LCol Jones, DSC in person", then a name is blanked out, "MND staff. In essence—" a name is blanked out, "—says MND would like to expose Connolly–Mendoza in the House today if" blank "questions Minister on: a. political questions in 14 Mar 89 interview" name blanked out, "prerogatives as a Member. 3. We worked on several approaches designed to demonstrate that the Department has acted responsibly in this case. Unfortunately, that might necessitate abrogation of Dr. Connolly–Mendoza's rights under the Privacy Act."

You may recall that particular period of time, Mr. Speaker, in that my office on the Hill was burgled. Seven days later this scientist, with whom I had had correspondence always through ministers, was picked up and taken to a hotel in Alberta where he was interrogated seven days after the burgling of my office.

The only member of Parliament who was involved in questions in the House regarding this matter was myself. These other documents refer to Dr. Pauline Jewett in earlier parts of the investigation, but she was no longer in the House in March 1989. So these documents refer directly to me and they refer directly to a suggestion that the Minister of National Defence might want to violate the law during Question Period, which I think is a pretty severe suggestion to come from—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I want something to be very clear here. I take it from what the hon. member has said that he is not suggesting that the then Minister of National Defence had necessarily agreed to any suggestion or had made any breach of any law of Canada. Do I understand the hon. member clearly? The hon. member is referring to a document that has come into his possession which suggests that somebody somewhere, in writing to somebody within some kind of system of the Government of Canada, has made these suggestions.

I will hear the hon. member a little further.

Mr. Cooper: He has put a lot of names on record without a reason at this point.

Mr. Speaker: Well just a minute. I think I can anticipate the minister.

I have the hon. member's point with respect to trying to obtain the hon. member's telephone number, for whatever reason. One might divine what the reason is.

It seems to me the second point the hon. member is trying to make is that he has a document which suggests that somebody on the Public Service side of the Government of Canada has made a comment which would imply that a minister of the Crown might be advised to do or not do something in the House which might abridge the privacy rights of Dr. Mendoza. Is that the hon. member's point?

I will hear the hon. minister who seems to be concerned here.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, just to pick up on that very quickly, on the first point where the hon. member talked about the possibility of a breach of privilege he talked about an investigation into Dr. Mendoza where an affidavit was sought from the court; in other words proper procedure was followed, by these investigators to find out the telephone records of Dr. Mendoza. The fact that Dr. Mendoza may have at that time had telephone conversation with the hon. member seems hardly a point of privilege, but I will let the Chair look at that.

But on the second question, he seems to have a document which describes potential strategy being worked out by some officials that might be deployed by the Minister of National Defence in terms of dealing with a particular political issue. But as I heard the hon. member, as they devise the strategy they seem to be saying that unfortunately this strategy would involve violating the law. You are able to conclude from that, if you choose, that they went ahead anyway. If there is evidence to support that I would like to hear it. Or, you can conclude that they have sat down, worked out a strategy and found that unfortunately they could not proceed with it because it violates the law, which is hardly a condemnation.

I am still waiting for an accusation, if you will, some evidence of action by a member of the government or a member of the Public Service to infringe deliberately on the privileges of the hon. member. By standing up and relating these names and talking in a general sense, implying a kind of conspiracy perhaps and referring to a burgled office and by implication saying they are related, yet without evidence to support that, one could see where at least Colonel McCullough is having his name slandered to a degree here without any evidence being presented so far that he was part of some conspiracy to prevent the hon. member from fulfilling his duties as a member of Parliament, which is what privilege is all about.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, if I had been allowed to put everything down in context I think it would be easier to explain. In the record of conversation I quoted it says the Ministry of National Defence "would like to expose Connolly–Mendoza in the House today if" blank "questions Minister on". Then it says that that would require abrogation of this man's rights under the Privacy Act.

But let me go on to point out in the same memo where it suggests that the House of Commons should be dealt with. It says:

> Dr. Connolly Mendoza was interviewed by Departmental investigators from Calgary on 14 Mar 1989. The interview took place in Medicine Hat, Alberta, Dr. Connolly Mendoza's place of residence. The interview, originally planned for 13 Mar 1989, was deferred one day to permit Dr. Connolly Mendoza to consult with legal and other counsel—
> It would not be appropriate for me to report to the House the specifics of such an investigation. Of course, the member may write to me, but I cannot guarantee full response.

At some point I have been involved over the eight years that I have in questions where I have been misled by answers from the government side, by governments both Liberal and Conservative, on this matter. There has been the Barton inquiry and so on. When one takes the time to look at the documents that I now have, in sum, one can see that there is something going on that is violating the rights of the members of this House.

I do not know on what grounds the Official Secrets Act was launched, but it is quite clear that part of that investigation involved me as a member of Parliament and conversations that I had had, because it is quite clear that they had gone with a search warrant and obtained the record of calls made to my offices, not only here I suppose but clearly in Prince Rupert.

The points that I want to make I think are best made if I am allowed to put the context of some of these documents down, but I rest the matter in your hands. Giving it out by bits and pieces I do not think allows for the seriousness of the matter to be really understood.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can assist the House. What I would like the hon. member to do, if it seems to be an appropriate suggestion, is to put together the documents which he has and let me have them. I think, in fairness, those documents should also be delivered to the hon. House leader and to the leader of the Liberal Party. Let us do that at this point. The hon. House Leader may be able to find information or he may very well want to respond, as may the hon. member for the Official Opposition. But I think that I would be in a better position to know just how to proceed with this if the hon. member could give me that information.

• (1130)

I am taking the hon. member's point seriously. However, I think that that is perhaps the most useful thing to do at the present time. If the hon. member will agree to that, that may be the best way to assist the House. I am in the hands of the hon. member for Ottawa Vanier who is speaking on behalf of the Official Opposition and, of course, the House Leader. I invite comment, if it is necessary, but it seems to me that this would be the appropriate thing to do at this stage.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, just a question for clarification. It is my understanding that should the member for Skeena provide you and the House leaders for the government and the Liberal party with that documentation, at some point you will then allow the matter to return to the House for further argument.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party that that is exactly what I intend.

The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly prepared to do that so long as there is an understanding, and I am sure it can be arrived at, that these will not be considered tabled documents. I will provide them to them as long as they are not made public. There are problems, and I am sure as soon as the two members and yourself see them, Mr. Speaker, you will see why some of them simply cannot be made public because they are people who would be harmed by so doing.

Mr. Speaker: I am impressed and I am grateful for the comment that the hon. member for Skeena has just made because we may be dealing here with very sensitive information indeed. That does not mean that we should not deal with it, but the caution that the hon. member has put forward is one that all of us, as members of the House of Commons, can understand.

I will hear the hon. House Leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with your suggestion. I appreciate the comments from members of the New Democratic Party that they also concur, and you certainly have my assurance that these documents will be kept confidential for the reasons that the hon. member gave.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wish to make a statement?

Mr. Gauthier: No, Mr. Speaker, except to say that of course we will respect the confidentiality of the documents also.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I hope that people who are watching will see this as an example of how serious people on a serious matter can deal in a co-operative way. I thank the hon. member for the intervention, I thank the hon. House leader for co-operation and the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition. I will receive the documents. I will be in contact with all three parties and we will return to the House at an appropriate time.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, on a point of order.

Routine Proceedings

POINT OF ORDER

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY SPEAKER

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on a totally unrelated matter, I rise on a point of order to seek an indication from the government as to its intention vis-à-vis an appointment or a selection of a new Deputy Speaker. As of last Friday the current Deputy Speaker was moved on and upward into cabinet and that position in effect has remained vacant.

At the House Leaders meeting earlier this week the matter did receive some attention. It was suggested by my colleague, the member for Kamloops, that perhaps now was the time, given that there was a vacancy, to take the next logical step in the democratizing of this House and have the position of Deputy Speaker elected in the same way, Your Honour, that you were elected.

Mr. Speaker: Before there is any response, I cannot help but remind the House of the words I have just listened to. The former Deputy Speaker I am sure is considered by all of us to have fulfilled those duties with great distinction. I want to say on the record that he fulfilled those duties on behalf of all of us with great distinction.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan says he was moved "on and upward". As Speaker of the House, yes he was moved on, but I am not prepared to say that he was moved upward at all.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I tend to agree with your point that the Deputy Speaker did not move upward. I would like to remind members that we do not have a former Deputy Speaker. We still have a Deputy Speaker until he is replaced. To use the words "former Deputy Speaker" is wrong. If we have any suggestions to make to members of the NDP in their perhaps seeking the position of Deputy Speaker, we would like to have a conference on that.

Mr. Andre: The House leader of the Official Opposition made one of the points. Technically, there is not a vacancy. Appreciating the fact that the Deputy Speaker currently may not be available to share the duties that Deputy Speakers usually do, I will be having discussions with the hon. member and the Official Opposition, hopefully very soon, to discuss how we might proceed.

In terms of the question of election, we should appreciate that the procedures we now use for the election of the Speaker and so on were as a result of the recommendations of the McGrath Commission on Parliamentary Reform. We are following those. If it is appropriate to reconstitute some such commission to look at further changes, that is another question. At this point in time, I think we should carry on with the excellent recommendations of that commission which we now have in place.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

TABLING OF NOMINATION

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State to Prime Minister and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a nomination which was recently made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(2), it is deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Mr. Waddell: I wonder if the government House Leader would indicate who the nominee was.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Communications nominates Fernand J. Belisle, of Kinburn, Ontario, to be a full-time member and vice-chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission.

STATUS OF WOMEN

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I am indeed proud to rise today on the occasion of International Women's Day to make my first formal statement in this House as Canada's minister responsible for the status of women.

Traditionally, International Women's Day has been an opportunity to reflect on the progress made to advance women's equality. Indeed, there is much we can celebrate in this regard. Women in Canada today have access to an unprecedented range of choices and opportunities in employment, in the roles and relationships they wish to pursue, in the lives they want to lead.

[Translation]

However, women know that they must remain vigilant, not only to protect the gains they have made but also to pursue the objectives that are still necessary for them to achieve equality.

[English]

The women of this country know that equality is much more than the absence of discrimination. Equality governs one's over-all well-being, one's ability to live life to the fullest. There is no such thing as equality for some; true equality means equal treatment and equal opportunities for everyone in all spheres of life. It is toward that goal of true equality that all of society must be dedicated.

[Translation]

The women of Canada recognize how vitally important their efforts to achieve equality are, not only to the current generation but to all generations to come.

• (1140)

[English]

We want the best for our children, our daughters and our sons. We want them to grow and to thrive in a society characterized by harmony and tolerance. We want our children to be free and able to find fulfilment in whatever life path they choose. At the same time, we also want the best from our children. As parents, we invest in our children's lives, not only our hopes for their individual success and achievement, but also our dreams that they in turn will take up the banner to work for the betterment of their own society and the generations that will follow them.

Let us be mindful of our Canadian society of the future as we set our sights on the new decade and the work that must be done to eliminate the remaining obstacles to women's equality.

[Translation]

Today we applaud the fact that women's roles and aspirations are growing and expanding at an accelerated rate.

[English]

Those in our society who are dedicated to serving women's advancement toward equality must not only keep pace but also be flexible enough to move and adapt as the goals of Canadian women change and broaden.

To respond to the challenges facing women today, new methods and new approaches are required that are based on co-operation and mutual understanding. New partnerships are required among all the parties who play a role in women's lives, partnerships involving business, organized labour, non-governmental organizations, community and voluntary groups, and all levels of government working together with women to achieve equality and a better, safer and more tolerant society.

Our government is strongly committed to women's equality. The progressive legislative changes already put in place provide a solid basis for further action. Our government will continue to work as a full partner to ensure and promote the rights of women in this country to full and equal participation in our society.

[Translation]

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to speak for the Official Opposition on the status of women, on this International Women's Day.

[English]

I listened with interest to the words of the hon. minister responsible for the status of women and I congratulate her on her new responsibilities. I must say that I found it interesting as much for what she did not say as for what she did. The button that we were given before coming into the Chamber today is a shame. A black button on dark suits will not be seen anywhere in Canada. I would have thought she would have withheld this button from even being sent on.

The institutional framework which has been put into place since 1970 has facilitated progress on a wide front for women. In unprecedented numbers, women entered the paid workforce. The so-called traditional family mould where the man went to work while the wife stayed home with the children has been broken decisively to the point that by 1986 it applied to only 16 per cent of Canadian families.

Although individual women have achieved in the workplace and have had great successes, the status of the average woman, although improved, leaves a lot to be desired. We still have a long way to go to achieve true equality in the workplace. As long as the wages of women are lower than men, as long as women are treated as a workforce that is available at low wages in bad working conditions, we still will not have equality in the workplace. As long as women have to carry the double burden of working and taking the full responsibility for the family, we cannot have equality.

I am afraid, and I say to the minister in her position that this government's most recent budget shows just how vulnerable the silent majority in Canada is. We have seen this government begin to dismantle the institutions women have struggled so hard to put into place. Funding was almost completely eliminated for some 80 women's centres, often the first line of defence against physical and mental abuse.

Day care is still considered to be a woman's issue. Perhaps that is why this federal government felt safe to renege on its promise to enact national day care legislation. This very day we see day care workers in Halifax and across Canada striking because they are paid so little.

If we continue to allow this government to cut at the infrastructures women need, such as the Canada Assistance Program which funds day care and is being cut in three rich provinces, if we continue to see an unemployment insurance program that in many areas of the country allows women to get into the workforce to be cut back or to put a harder emphasis on it, and if we look at the employment equity bill that this minister was involved in, we will know that the condition of women has gone downhill.

We will also know that it continues to allow the simmering across Canada of impressions. We do not need ministers who continue to use women as the butt of sexist jokes, nor do we need ministers who put up with it. I do not want to say anything about the new first for a woman minister of justice, but the abortion bill is a harsh piece of legislation for any person. It is a contestable piece of legislation. In other words, we will allow the continued simmering across Canada of attitudes that allow violence and hate against women in the home and in the workplace. This government has to wake up to that. We cannot have situations such as that which happened at the University of Montreal.

The nicest thing that I have learned being a woman in the working world and in the world in general is that it is enjoyable to have challenges and experiences and to be able to do exactly what everybody here in this House achieved by an equal process. There were no barriers. But that is not what we see out there. We need fair play in the home and we need fair play in the workplace. We will not achieve it unless we are vigilant.

In the words of Sylvia Gold of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women:

[Translation]

> The watchword for Canadian women in the 1990s is vigilance: vigilance to recognize new threats to the social, economic and legal status of women.

I do not wish to continue, but it gives the direction the government should follow and we do not see that today. We see that the status of women does not attract this government's interest.

[English]

I say to the government and the new minister that the 1990s taking us to the year 2000 will be a full challenge for this government and for all governments in Canada, and will improve the situation of the women right across Canada.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise today to respond to the minister's statement on International Women's Day. I am pleased to have that opportunity. In reference to some of the comments that my colleague from the Liberal party made about the button that we have today for International Women's Day, perhaps the colour of the button denotes something about the budget that this government has just brought down.

I want to congratulate the women of Canada for their dedication to achieving real equality for women. I also rise to join my voice with theirs against this government's agenda for women, which the minister barely mentioned.

The minister talked about an unprecedented range of choices for women, but she did not mention that this government is currently in the process of taking away the fundamental choice for women. With its Criminal Code abortion law, the government is taking away the right to choose the fate of our own bodies and our own lives.

The minister talked about a partnership with voluntary groups. She failed to mentioned that core funding for over 75 voluntary women's groups has been completely withdrawn by this budget. She did not mention this government's constant attack and undermining of the women's program from Secretary of State. For the second year in a row there are big cuts to the women's program budget.

• (1150)

She did not mention this government's refusal to meet with the umbrella organization which represents over 600 women's groups in Canada. Will the government meet with that organization this year?

She talked about a government strongly committed to equality for women. I would like to know where is that government. It is certainly not the government that I see on the other side of this House.

The Minister did not mention that under the government's draconian economic policies the wage gap between men and women has actually increased.

She failed to state that in this budget the funding mechanism for social assistance, the Canada Assistance Plan, has been strangled for three provinces, including my province of British Columbia. This is the program that funds child care. Canada has made international commitments to the principle of child care. Canada has failed to deliver on them. This government has failed to deliver on that.

The Canada Assistance Plan funds shelters for battered women. That has been capped in three provinces in Canada. The shelters that are so desperately needed will not be provided. The minister has failed to report that this government deindexed the family allowance program and put an end to the universality of income support for mothers.

The minister said that she was proud to rise today to make her first formal statement in the House of Commons as the new Minister responsible for the Status of Women. Is she really proud of what she is saying? Is she proud of this government's shabby record on women's issues? I cannot believe it. I hope not.

The minister talked about equality. I say and the women of Canada say that this government does not really know the meaning of the word equality. This government is attempting to silence the voices of women. Our voices will not be silenced. We will join together. Women will continue their struggle for true equality. Women will continue their struggle for social and economic justice for all in our society.

INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY FOR FRENCH SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

TABLING OF FIFTH REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN SECTION

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the fifth report on the activities of the Canadian section of the International Association of French Speaking Parliamentarians.

Since the chairman of the Canadian section was unable to attend the meeting of the international executive, held in France from January 28 to 30, 1990, I had the honour of representing the Canadian section on that important occasion.

As the Canadian section's representative, I therefore welcome this opportunity to table the report on this meeting, and I may add that it was a very interesting experience, and that I was very much impressed by the quality of the proceedings I attended.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I have five petitions with 1,354 signatures. Your petitioners object to the goods and services tax because this new tax will be hidden in the sale price and apply to practically everything Canadians will buy, and because implementing this new universal tax on goods and services will create serious and undue hardship for low- and middle-income Canadians and put an additional burden on small business.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present the following petitions of the undersigned residents who bring their grievance to the House and to you, Madam Speaker, to provide a remedy.

The petitioners state that since September 1984 the Conservative government has imposed 31 new taxes and tax increases; that since September 1984 the manufacturers' sales tax has been increased from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent; that the government wants to impose a new general goods and services tax of 7 per cent. This new tax will be hidden from Canadians and will be applied to virtually everything they buy. They feel that the imposition of this new GST will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians as it is very regressive. They are also angry because the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business.

Therefore, they ask the Liberals, on behalf of Canadians, to strongly impose this new GST tax which is an unprecedented grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Therefore, I deposit for your information a group of signatures in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Madam Speaker, I also have a number of petitions which it is my duty to present in the House. These petitions come from my constituents in St-Paul-de-Kent, Cap Pelé, Merry Corner, Cocagne, Moncton, St-Charles, Buctouche, St-Louis-de-Kent, Paquetville and from places throughout the riding.

I also have a number of other petitions, all on the same subject, which object to the government's tax proposals. Your petitioners humbly ask Parliament to reject this new tax on goods and services.

[English]

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): I also have another petition from people in my riding, particularly from Pointe du Chêne, Shediac, and Shediac Bridge who want to express their views on the protection of life and say that at the present time there is no law in Canada to protect the life of the unborn child from conception to birth. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life.

[Translation]

WESTMORLAND RURAL REGION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Madam Speaker, I also have a few other petitions from people in my riding who want to see the riding's rural areas separated from the Moncton urban area for the purposes of unemployment insurance. Certain changes have been made but the rural area of Westmorland is still classified as part of the Moncton urban area, and is thus at a disadvantage.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by people from Milk River and Warner, Alberta, who share, with the majority of Canadians, sentiments concerning the proposed GST, sentiments which can only be expressed as great opposition to the imposition of this sales tax which, as we know, they do not have in Alberta. The petitioners claim that this will be an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians in Alberta and will hit them not only with higher taxes, but will produce higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

I encourage people to participate and continue to oppose this very regressive tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to inform the House that, because of the ministerial statement, government orders will be extended by 15 minutes beginning at one o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, since you have just announced that the House will be sitting 15 minutes past the normal adjournment time for lunch I wonder if the government might consider—I know the NDP members are agreeable because I did consult them—sitting through to two o'clock so as to give members of the House an opportunity to debate the budget. This being the last day, I think it would be a good idea if as many government and opposition members could comment on the highlights and let Canadians know that we are opposed to such a regressive and ill-conceived budget.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, of course we on this side always like to see adequate time for debate. I am wondering if the House leader for the Liberal party is also willing to take the extra 15 minutes tonight that would be consumed by bells and pass the motion on division.

We voted on the opposition amendment. We voted on the NDP amendment. Perhaps what we could do is pass the motion tonight on division which would give us another 15 minutes as well.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I find that absolutely unacceptable. We want to vote against this budget, whether it is at six o'clock, seven o'clock or eight o'clock tonight. We do not care. We will sit later today if the government wants to and debate this very bad budget.

In terms of voting on it, we will sure as heck stand in our places against it.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I too want to indicate that we will be here standing in our places voting against the dastardly budget of this government.

There are still a number of members from all caucuses who still have not had an opportunity to participate in the budget debate. Surely, it would be appropriate to add on the few minutes that there are between the end of this morning's session and the start of Question Period in order for them to have an opportunity to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is not unanimous consent.

At the end of yesterday's sitting there was still 10 minutes left to members of the Official Opposition. I will then recognize the hon. member for Mount Royal.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, there are so many worrisome concerns that need to be addressed in this uncaring budget presented as a no-tax increase budget, which is far from forthcoming on the part of the minister or the government. It is hurtful to Canadians in need of shelter. It is hurtful to Canadians who need better education facilities and better health facilities.

My colleagues are looking at these various areas that all need careful examination and should be reconsidered. However, there are some things about this budget that are even more shameful.

There is the supposed cut in the defence budget, the absence of anything on the environment, or anything to deal with drugs, with illiteracy, with child care and today, in particular, which is International Women's Day, the cuts to women's programs, the cuts to the CAP that ensures a day care program—in fact the absence of day care is really a tragedy. However, I wish to focus and participate in this debate particularly looking at communications and culture. That is the perspective I would like to address.

First, let us look at native communications. Cuts to the native communications programs at the Department of the Secretary of State which account for the major cuts in that department will affect 16 native communication groups across Canada. Hardest hit and actually wiped out will be the aboriginal language newspapers, many of which have been given six months to close down their operations.

The Inuit Broadcast Corporation says that this program cut wipes out basic communication services for thousands of native Canadians living in small isolated communities. A service most Canadians take for granted is broadcasting and newspapers in their own language, something which just seems so normal. This government has sent a clear message to the founding peoples of Canada. The message is: you don't matter.

With respect to the provisions in the government's budget on the privatization of our telecommunications sector, the privatizing of Telesat Canada shows that it is still trapped in a market force ideological view. It also shows that it has failed to learn that our communications system works well because it has been carefully crafted over many decades. It works well because it all fits together.

You cannot simply remove one element, one wall from the house, without considering the whole system. This government obviously has no vision for Canada, except how to dismantle it. Petro-Canada is another example of that.

Telecommunications are just as important an economic force or an economic lever for Canada that is required and needed for us to be able to move forward into the 21st century. From this government it has been promises, promises for a national telecommunications policy for the last five years. Yet we have had no follow-up on that and no follow-up on the Supreme Court decision that would ensure that this vital sector remains in the federal domain.

However, within this vacuum the government wants to privatize Telesat, a cornerstone of our communications system, purely for profit motives and not from a public policy mandate point of view. It is disgraceful.

It is easy in difficult financial times for governments to slash expenditures on culture, to see it as an extra, as a frill. But I believe that it is in these very hard times that this sector should be supported. These products, these creations, these manifestations of expression of our inner selves need to be promoted and protected, for culture is what a country says to itself and about itself, as well as to others, whether it be through the creative medium of the theatre, film, television, novels, recorded entertainment, painting, architecture, ballet or dance. It is what makes a people interesting. It gives us a presence, a sense of worth, a sense of self-respect worthy of attention on the world stage. It is how the people of a country express their dreams and hopes, and how they talk about their past and their future. It is what they care about.

Culture is about the conservation and appreciation of the past, of our diverse backgrounds, of our heritage. But it is also about the future, about innovation and creation, the creative imagination of who we are and what we want to become.

We believe as Liberals that investment in the arts is an investment in Canada's future. It is a common language that binds and builds for a stronger Canadian society.

We believe that cultural endeavours contribute to what Edward Blake once so aptly described as the cultivation of the national spirit. We could certainly use a good dose of that building of national unity, of shared dreams across this land.

The Canadian vision is not new, but it is just with preserving, cultivating and promoting it which will bring the kind of nourishment and encouragement that is required. It seems to be absent from the leadership across the floor of this House.

I would like to say that Canada's cultural community's contribution to nourish the mind and the soul of its people has been diminished with the revelations of this government's budget and the unveiling of its Estimates. Canadians deserve better.

A recent Department of Communications working paper stated that the impact of vibrant cultural exploration, of striving for creative excellence on performance in all forms of research, creative analysis and innovation is vital to Canada's competitiveness as a society.

We are also told by the Department of Communications that the cultural sector has out-performed most other sectors of the economy in the creation of jobs over the past two decades, and that Canadian cultural attractions have been recognized as powerful assets in the development of tourism.

The value of the economic activity created by cultural endeavours has also been recognized. This is an industry that grosses in excess of $9 billion and directly generates 150,000 jobs.

As well, the employment training and job creation aspects of the cultural sector are impressive. It is labour intensive. Its workforce is highly educated and mobile. The sector's strong contribution to tourism and economic development has resulted because of support reflected in federal, provincial and municipal policies and programs.

• (1210)

It is unfortunate that this government in its latest budget is not continuing that support. At a time when the strength of our cultural life is becoming more and more important and much more deeply appreciated to identify us as a very important and independent nation among the family of men, I find this government's pretence for the support an unconscionable smokescreen.

Just add the planned impact of the GST on this whole service sector—hotel bills, restaurants, taxis, theatres, movie houses, health and sports spas, country fairs, folk arts, museums, libraries, books and magazines. As people pay the tax on the stamp for the postcard they bought, to which the GST has been added, to write home, they are going to be writing: "Don't bother to come. Go elsewhere, otherwise you will be taxed from gas to food to entertainment. In fact, you will be taxed to death".

Any pretence that this government has a cultural policy was put to rest with the Wilson budget. The Conservatives once again took aim at the CBC with cuts of $20 million over the next two years to its capital equipment budget. This comes after $140 million in cuts and 500 in staff reductions. We will have to wait to see if the CBC will be able to continue to provide high quality delivery of programming, not to mention Canadian content.

I would remind you, Madam Speaker, that last night at the ACTRA Awards we saw cuts and clips from Switchback, one of the programs which was just recently cut.

Furthermore, the $13 million in freeze over the next two years to Telefilm, coming after the decimation of tax incentives for film and video productions, no film distribution bill and no film policy show that this government has no intention of building, let alone sustaining, a Canadian film industry.

This government has pulled the guts out of our most pervasive and cultural mediums—the film industry and public broadcasters. They are the instruments that shape the intellect and the imagination of Canadians, and we are not providing any Hollywood alternatives.

With respect to provincial and municipal spending, if you look at the figures of Statistics Canada, Madam Speaker, you will see that provincial governments spent a total of $1.34 billion on culture in 1986-1987, 60 per cent of which was financial aid to artists and cultural institutions. At the municipal level, municipal governments also sustain the arts. They spent a total of $774.8 million on arts and culture, which represents 17 per cent of total government expenditures at all levels.

With the cuts that are going forward in the federal-provincial transfer grants, there is the potential for a domino effect, and cuts in the fields of cultural production at both the provincial and municipal levels.

As well, an announcement by the President of the Treasury Board in December eliminating existing arrangements for municipalities on radio licence fees for mobile radios used in emergency services, such as ambulance, fire and police, as well as for public works and transit vehicles, increases their costs. Presently, the municipalities pay a flat fee of $236 for one base station and one mobile radio. For example, Orillia will now go up to $6,535. The city of Vancouver will pay $70,174—70 times more than its current budget.

I will tell you that if you have these kinds of increases for fire, ambulance and police, they will be pitted against support for the arts.

I would like to conclude by saying that Canada's cultural life has been impacted negatively by this Conservative government. It will long remain one of the worse legacies to Canada, if you examine it across the centuries.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend's speech on the budget. She touched on a number of areas having to do with the Department of Communications.

On the issue of the Radio Act items which she just touched on, I wonder whether or not she supported those measures in committee. I believe she did. That was a bill which passed through this House in 1986, if I am not mistaken.

On the question of the privatization of Telesat, I understood my hon. friend to say that it was being privatized for a purely profit motive and that there was no policy purpose in the privatization. I would ask her whether or not she agrees that Crown holdings should be privatized when no policy purpose remains in the government holding.

I would also like to ask my hon. friend what her view is of telecommunications policy. Would she like to have the telecommunications bill in the House at the same time as the broadcasting bill is in the House? Or would she rather wait until it is in the other place?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, am I allowed an hour? I thank my hon. colleague, the parliamentary secretary, for his questions.

He well knows with respect to his third question—I will go backward with my responses, if I may, although my policy does not go backward—concerning a telecommunications policy bill being in the House at the same time as the broadcasting bill, I think it would make good sense. We would be able to look at both. I had asked the minister, if the parliamentary secretary will recall, as we were in the process of examining the broadcast bill, that if his telecommunications bill was not ready, then at least could he deposit a white paper or a draft bill so that we could look at both bills and understand the interaction between the converging telecommunications and broadcasting fields. I think it would have been a good idea.

If he wants to withdraw a terrible broadcast bill now, I would be prepared to look at—

Mr. Edwards: You wrote half of it.

Mrs. Finestone: Don't faint! I wrote half of it. The half I wrote, I like. The half you did, I do not like.

Let us move on to Telesat. I would suggest to the hon. parliamentary secretary that there is a place in public policy for an integrated telephone and telecommunications system. It would be a telephone system that would be universally accessible and affordable. It is through the controls inherent in Telesat that we could ensure that.

With respect to the Radio Act, I would ask the hon. parliamentary secretary and the government to go back to look at the amendments and the arguments I brought forward. They were specifically related to two things. The first was volunteer services and the potential for taxation in fire departments and other sectors which have equipment which uses mobile phones in the voluntary sector in small rural areas, for example, snow removal equipment. The second was the impact on municipalities. We saw the potential there during the course of dealing with that bill. I tried to bring forward an amendment. However, I received an assurance from the minister of the day, who is not the present minister, that the municipalities would not be impacted negatively. You can see how much that word was worth in today's market-place.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Mount Royal for her presentation. Since today is International Women's Day, I wonder if she could talk a little about the cuts and how they are going to affect women in the field of communications.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I wish there were more women involved in the broadcasting industry, in the CBC, at the National Film Board, in the infrastructure of those organizations which should be reporting under the concept of the Employment Equity Act. Unfortunately, we do not have enough women, as we do not have enough visible minorities, within these particular structures, whether it is private sector broadcasters and cable companies or the public sector broadcasters.

The employment equity bill, Bill C-62, passed through the House. That bill punishes a corporation if it does not deposit a plan of action, but it has no financial penalty within its purview. A positive step forward was not enacted. That is one of the reasons why the government has not been effective in the promotion of women in the arts and culture scene.

• (1220)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the budget debate. I also had the privilege of speaking in the debate on the first budget of this government back in 1985. I was proud then of the steps taken by the government in that budget. I am proud of the fact that we have stayed on the course that we set for ourselves at that time. I am proud that today's budget continues in that tradition.

We have had to do a number of things, none of them, I am sure you would admit, Madam Speaker, are easy. We have had to restrain the growth of certain government programs. We have had to freeze others, reduce some and eliminate still others. But all of them are continuing Canada on the course that was set by the Minister of Finance in late 1984, that is, to tackle the deficit.

We have heard a lot of criticism from the members of the opposition. When I think of being a member of the opposition—and I have never had that experience—it seems to me it would be an easy job to do. They oppose all attempts to control government spending. They oppose all attempts to increase government revenues. To top it off, they propose nothing.

I take it that is a theory of theirs to regain popularity and to regain the government of this country. It did not work for them in 1984. They know it did not work for them in 1988. I am going to suggest to them again, and they can remember me saying this to them here, it is not going to work in 1992. Canadians want a government that is willing to take the kind of tough decisions that the Minister of Finance has been taking these past six years.

I would like to talk a little bit about some of the elements of this budget. One of them is the freeze on EPF, Established Programs Financing, which has been frozen for the next couple of years. I would like to speak specifically with respect to my home province of Ontario.

The first point I would like to make is that it is not that the federal government does not support provincial government services. We do. We believe provincial government services are important. In this budget alone we will contribute over $30 billion to the provinces to help out in the area of provincial concerns.

When we are trying at the federal level to deal with a deficit that is over $300 billion, certain questions have to be asked. Some of those questions are these. Who is in the best position to help out in the funding of provincial services? I can tell you that I know that the province of Ontario can help out.

Let us face the facts. For 43 years the province of Ontario had a Progressive Conservative government that managed this province very well. Since 1984, assisted by the policies of this government, there have had boom times in the province of Ontario. So is the province of Ontario able to help share the burden of providing provincial government services? I think it is.

I can tell you that we certainly got a boost the day before the budget. I noticed the provincial treasurer in Ontario—and I am reading from an article in The Globe and Mail of February 20—had just discovered $952 million in "unanticipated revenues". That was certainly a boost in sharing the burden of provincial services, one that I am sure all of us in this House appreciate at a time when the federal government is trying to come to grips with this difficult deficit.

Madam Speaker, you have heard in this Chamber on many occasions complaints from members of the Liberal party in particular. They complain about the Conservatives referring to the time when they were in office. You have heard it many times, and I heard it just recently on Tuesday afternoon. A Liberal member of Parliament was complaining. He said: "Why do the Tories always bring up what we did in government? Why do they always want to talk about the Liberal record? Why do they not talk about what they have done?"

I can tell them that I am very pleased to talk about the Conservative record, and I will talk about the Conservative record. I have always wondered where I heard that complaint before, that plea, that bleating not to talk about our record here. I remembered where it was. It was from the days before I was a member of Parliament when I was a legal aid duty counsel. I used to represent people on bail hearings. Very often the last thing in the world people who are up for bail wanted to have discussed in court was their record. If you had their record, many times they would say: "Well, that was so many years ago. Do we have to talk about what happened in the past?" That reminds me of the Liberal party. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, I am pleased at all times to talk about the Conservative record in 1984, 1985, 1986, right up to 1990. That is the difference between a Liberal and a Conservative. They do not want to talk about what they did in government because they are ashamed of their record.

On the subject of the Liberal record, let us talk about it a little bit. When we took office in 1984 the deficit was over $200 billion. Just the interest on that $200 billion is now $120 billion. So we have $320 billion of debt left to us by the Liberal party. If members of that party want to know how long I am going to talk about it, I will talk about that Liberal debt until it is paid off by our children and grandchildren. That is the length of time that Canadians should remember, and remember after that if they ever consider voting Liberal again. That is how long they should remember that debt. We are still waiting for those Liberal party solutions to this problem.

I was interested to hear that the former Liberal Prime Minister of this country is coming out with a book. I am sure it will be very helpful to the discussions going on in Canada today.

I am going to tell you about the chapter I want to see. If the former Prime Minister of this country, Mr. Trudeau, has so many great ideas as to what this government should be doing, I want to hear what he has to say about the deficit. He and his policies created that $200 billion deficit that has grown to $320 billion. I think it is reasonable to hear what he has to say in terms of being helpful in solving this problem that we all face.

I think that Canadians can accept the directions that have been taken by the Minister of Finance. When people point out to me that we are down in the polls I always say to them: "You don't change economic policy in this country on a month-to-month basis depending on what the polls say".

As well, I tell them that if irresponsible spending would keep you in power, if spending money that you do not have, if spending money that you have to borrow would have kept anybody in power the Liberals would have been in power in a one-party democracy forever. But it did not work for them, and it is not going to work again in the future.

When I talk about Liberal spending—and I love to do it—I am reminded of so many examples in my area of the Niagara Peninsula. I remember for instance one woman telling me after I was elected: "You know we had a project here, a very worth-while project. We received a cheque from the government and we didn't even ask for it. We hadn't even applied and it arrived in the mail". I said to her: "You know as worth while as some of these things are I can tell you, Ma'am, that the days of spending money, of passing out money without people even asking for it are unfortunately coming to an end".

I see I have only a couple of minutes left. I can tell this House for the benefit of some hon. members in the Liberal party who question whether the Conservative party is behind the Minister of Finance that the members of this party are behind the Minister of Finance. They are behind the policies that he has taken in 1990, just as we have been behind him since 1984. Not only is that good for the Conservative party and is going to keep this party in government, we know it is good for Canada.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to hear the hon. parliamentary secretary make a fire and brimstone speech in trying to fire up the troops. I can understand they need it when their riding associations are being taken over by anti-GST forces that want to force out the members of this House on the Conservative side who are voting for this silly legislation. They are trying to fire their members out; they want to replace them. I can understand his nervousness and his attempt to fire up the troops and say that the members are all behind this bill because they know they are going to pay a price for supporting this budget and supporting the disastrous policies that this government has instituted over the last five years, policies that have cost the Canadian people billions, and the hon. member knows that.

• (1230)

The hon. member talks about his anxiety to discuss Conservative policies and his willingness to defend the record of incompetence for the last five years. Would he discuss with the House the level of tax increases that we have had? Would he produce the figures on the additional revenue that this government has gouged out of the Canadian public in five years of economic mismanagement and compare the amount it has taken from the people with the size of the deficit?

Let us examine what it has called budget reduction. We keep hearing, and I have heard it at least three times during the course of this debate, that 70 per cent of the cutbacks in the deficit are a result of cuts in government spending. I would like to hear how much of it in fact was the result of increases in taxation which the Conservatives have gouged out of the Canadian people. That is the figure we should be looking at in this House. That is the figure the hon. parliamentary secretary should be referring to. I invite him to come up with those figures now. Perhaps he does not have them.

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the member who raised the subject of tax increases. He specifically referred to the GST and challenged me to defend Tory tax increases.

I can tell the hon. member, I do not shy away from them at all. I have said here that there are cuts in government spending, there is restraint in growth in government spending, there have been changes in tax and there have been tax increases in the last five or six years. I have been pleased to defend them because I know it puts Canada on the right track.

I was at an all–candidates debate in the 1988 election and somebody thought they would pin me down by asking: "How could you have gotten rid of the home ownership savings plan? What possible reason could you have?". I said: "It is for the money. The federal government is in financial difficulty. " That is why we have had to overhaul the tax system. That is why we have had to make cuts in government spending, because we know it is necessary.

Now the hon. member talked about the GST. I am going to tell you something. I was more than passing interested in the debates the other night between the Minister of Finance and the Liberal critic on the subject of finance of the GST. I love to look at newspaper articles and certainly to see newspaper articles from the province of Alberta. Just let me give a few examples of what they were saying in Alberta after the finance critic from the Liberal party spoke. One of the editorials in the Edmonton Sun stated: "No new ideas". It was referring to the Liberals. "No new ideas".

The Edmonton Journal states: "A Grit's empty promise". That is what is thought about the Liberal finance policies here. The Edmonton Sun referring to the Minister of Finance, "Mr. Cool should be happy". It says: "Liberal hedges debate pledge. Wilson's leadership shone in GST clash".

In the Globe and Mail: "Confusion increasing over Liberal GST stand". Why should that be any different than anything else? Why should it be any different than the Liberal Party on Meech Lake or free trade or deficit reduction? That is just par for the course. But I will be fair, maybe the Liberals are just confused about the big ticket items. We are behind the Minister of Finance. Maybe the Liberal critic should talk to his colleagues and figure out where they stand on the GST.

The Globe and Mail got it right. I would be glad to table this if any of the hon. members would like me to. Certainly I would be pleased to send this out to any of my constituents.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is over.

[Translation]

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Outremont.

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Madam Speaker, last week, since the House was not sitting, I took advantage of this opportunity to talk to my constituents in Outremont.

I wanted to know more about their concerns, their expectations and their problems. Although age and interests vary, on the whole, the people of Outremont are concerned about the environment, income stability, interest rates, employment, immigration and the future of their community.

I also heard some comments, not always very favourable, on the Budget brought down on February 20 by the Minister of Finance Although not everyone was satisfied with the Budget, all the people I talked to saw the Budget and the minister's agenda as an expression of the government's will to provide even more efficient management and to bring the deficit and our national debt under control.

Madam Speaker, this is the Progressive Conservative Government's sixth Budget, and once again, it reflects the government's thoroughly consistent and serious approach to meeting its objectives. It is the culmination of five years of hard work during which the government has reviewed and updated regulatory procedures, revamped our tax system by lowering tax rates and eliminating loopholes, abolished trade barriers, improved manpower training programs and turned around the country's economic situation.

Despite gloomy forecasts, over 1.5 million jobs were created since the beginning of our term, and among the major industrial countries, only Japan's economic performance outshipped ours. However, to provide for an even more prosperous future, we must eliminate our deficit and reduce the debt, making Canadians less vulnerable to the impact of interest rates and to inflation which is a threat to us all. They will feel more secure and will be able to operate even more effectively.

We must act now, in a manner that is both effective and compassionate, to control our debt while maintaining the programs and services we cherish. This is the only way we can preserve a climate conducive to maintaining our economic, social and psychological development.

To act now, Madam Speaker, means ensuring that the electorate, the citizens of Canada, become even more aware of their important role in determining the future of their country and our society.

Previous Liberal governments encouraged Canadians to depend on government and often forced them to do so. After the war, the central government was given a mandate to help the country and its citizens recover from a situation that had destabilized the economy. We had to reconvert from a wartime to a peacetime economy. This position was sound because we had a vigorous economic recovery. The reconversion went well. However, instead of letting Canadians continue to become more dynamic, the government decided to keep on exercising power by controlling the economic levers rather than trusting Canadians. It wanted to keep the leading role and increase the process of centralization, thereby keeping the spotlight on its supposedly brilliant performance.

Under Mr. Trudeau, who claimed to have contempt for nationalists, the government and he showed a distrustful nationalism towards the Americans and the obvious differences among the provinces. This mistrust resulted in undue control and supervision, as with the Foreign Investment Review Agency; the nationalization of several industries could only lead to increased dependence.

He succeeded in developing passive behaviour and discouraging, if not killing, creativity and innovation. Everywhere people showed "sweet indifference".

We reached the point, Madam Speaker, where someone who was thinking of starting a new project would first find out what grant programs were available. By repeating that people had rights, we made them forget that they also had duties and resources. We were depriving them of the pride that comes from doing something oneself. We were preparing poorly for future challenges.

We all know that in a competitive world like today's, only the most inventive and most able to benefit from their environment can win.

Experts think that the latest Budget is reasonable, courageous and responsible.

• (1240)

Bernard Landry, the former PQ Finance Minister, described it as a very good budget. He even said that, under the circumstances, it was a tremendous achievement.

Personally, I suggest that this budget opens an era of individual initiative enhancement. It emphasizes the responsibility of institutions, groups and individuals. It is a perfect tool which will allow Canadians to build up their self-esteam based on their own achievements.

Needless to say, the Government will continue to help the most destitute regain their self-sufficiency, increase their awareness of their self-worth while relying if need be on Government programs and services.

Like all the other Members of this House, we, of the Quebec caucus, have emphasized the areas where the Government could continue to improve its administrative efficiency and we shall continue to work toward the implementation of spending restraint.

Finally, the Government will especially seek to improve further the productivity of the governmental process by working toward a closer relationship with the Public Service. We carry out a very careful selection of Government employees and we are anxious to hire the best candidates. By encouraging a climate more conducive to dialogue in the face of a common objective, our Government will successfully reach its goal which is to ensure future generations a superior quality of life.

Madam Speaker, you will note that I am not referring to figures as such. I feel that this Budget is as much, if not more a reflection of a management philosophy as an ideological position.

As a matter of fact, Madam Speaker, I have stated before in this House that culture comes before economy. From such a statement stems also the fact that a realistic budget must reflect reality as closely as possible. If it is true that a person could not mortgage his or her health with impunity, it is also true that a society could not indefinitely mortage its future. A balance must be achieved. All individuals must put their psychosomatic portfolios in order. Human nature has its needs which no one can disregard.

The Canadian society had reached the point of no return. The machine was starting to overload as a reaction to the consecutive budgets which, before 1984, had resulted from unrealistic expectations, as if the country would never reach the bottom of the barrel, as if there would be no end to growth for growth's sake.

Well, the Canadian people, in their wisdom, have asked this Progressive Conservative Government to stop this hemorrhage. But for a great many years the Minister had to live with past commitments and deal with the law of inertia. Before a crisis, is upon us the minister did talk a Budget which will put an end to this downtrend and put us on the road to recovery.

Madam Speaker, although the Budget may seem tough, the Canadian people generally want it. It is a common sense budget we should all be proud of.

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the opportunity to ask him some questions which might help me clarify a few points for the benefit of my constituents. I have the feeling that I drew the attention of all members of the House the day I rose to ask for a grant on behalf of the Missing Children network. Six-odd months later they finally did get a grant for three jobs, I believe. Jobs, jobs, jobs and the creation of many jobs are issues we often hear about in the House. I do not recollect the exact figures because I think they are not quite correct. When I talk about three jobs in my riding I am referring to three part-time jobs, and that works out to only one job over a 12-month employment period. Would the hon. member for Outremont explain how he can boast about creating so many new openings when in most instances these are really part-time jobs? We might get a more realistic figure if we were to divide by three.

Mr. Hogue: The question of my opposition colleague raises an interesting and important issue. Indeed it is a basic issue, and all members of the House and all Canadians, I would suggest, have to take a stand and endeavour to find the most acceptable solutions to such a wide-ranging issue. Surely my colleague does not expect me to play the role of the various ministers who have the mandate, the responsibility and, perforce, the wide array of knowledge to respond specifically to such a question. As I understand the question, it has to involve more than three part-time jobs in the riding of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville because the same thing happens in the riding I represent, just as it does elsewhere across Canada. Indeed, similar concerns and questions are raised in the various university faculties where applications for scholarships or labour income support cannot all be fully entertained.

I conclude therefore that the question of my colleague raises a broader issue. This is why at the end of my remarks I said it was a question of—I will not use the word ideology—but a question of philosophy. Either we decide to centralize even more and, willy-nilly, the people will identify with a process of dependency. This wall-to-wall theory did prevail in Quebec over a number of years. We even saw a Quebec Finance Minister who, after having favoured this wall-to-wall program approach for some time, decided that there was a price to pay for always expecting the federal and provincial governments to have enough money. This redistributed money must come not only from the pockets of Canadian citizens but also from the work they get paid for. Part of their pay is taxed by the government and returned to them as services. This distributive justice operates across the country.

• (1250)

To conclude, in answer to your question, I repeat: it is a matter of philosophy. The Minister of Finance and the Progressive Conservative Party have more faith in decentralization and believe that individual drive combined with group dynamics will increase production. The return on investment is bigger than with centralization, as we experienced it, fortunately or unfortunately, under the Liberal government of Mr. Trudeau, which made our population more dependent and more passive and led to less creativity and innovation.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, this year's budget will be remembered as a budget of half truths and deviousness. It is a near-sighted budget without any vision of the future, a budget that hurts the under-privileged and that does not even try to avoid the impending recession.

The Minister of Finance claims the deficit is now under control. Can we believe him? Since this Tory Government was first elected in September 1984 the national debt increased twofold from $170 billion to the current $350 billion.

The Tories' mismanagement of the economy is reflected in the somber outlook for the current fiscal year. Unemployment inflation, and interest rates will jump up and international financial markets have lost confidence in our dollar.

We are verging on recession, yet the Minister of Finance suggests we should not try and avoid it.

The minister claims there is no new taxes. He simply passed on to the provinces an $8 billion debt. And certainly the GST will be the worst tax grab in Canadian history.

The minister claims that deficit reduction is not harming social programs. But he is cutting health care and social welfare. Social housing funding is cut $165 million over five years, making more serious the situation of the 200,000 homeless Canadians and all those spending more than half of their income on rent.

To cap it all, the minister claims the budget is fair. But regional development assistance is cancelled for all practical purposes, as the Americans wanted.

More than 5,000 veterans under palliative care because of old age will have to pay more than $3,000 each for their hospital beds. Natives once more are the target of budget cuts. Official Development Assistance once more is cut. At the same time, large corporations are getting governement tax handouts while defence expenditure, still at a high level, do not reflect the new world political situation.

The budget tabled by the Minister of Finance is unfair and near-sighted. It ignores today's economic problems and includes no agenda for the new decade.

[English]

I want to continue by looking at the budget in some detail. As the co-critic for forestry for my party, I think it is important that we look at the forestry sector as well. To do that, I want first to quote from the Minister of Forestry on the establishment of the new forestry department. I think it is a credit to the government and to all parties here that we passed such a motion in the House to develop such a department.

The minister states in his communiqué: "The creation of the department is an acknowledgement of the government's firm commitment to our forests". That sounds good. The words are nice, but the record shows that in the government's budget last year, the one that was supposed to be committed to forestry, it cut the forestry department's budget by 11.9 per cent. This was a new department cut by 11.9 per cent.

This year, funding has been cut by $47.6 million from $206.9 million, which is a reduction to the total of $159.3 million. If we look at the forecasted expenditures of $231.4 million, the reduction is 31 per cent, a reduction of $72.1 million. One wonders where that commitment is. Words are nice, but the action is not there.

If we examine the forestry department closer and look at the agreements, I must say that the government was wise in renewing the forestry agreements in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. That is a positive step in the right direction. There is nothing wrong with that. However, there are four other provinces whose agreements expired last year, namely, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. What is the government waiting for?

This year agreements will expire with Newfoundland, Quebec and British Columbia. The Estimates will show that there is no money put aside for any new agreements. We must wonder what type of commitment this government is sold to, or whether it is just going to give us some words?

The minister stated in his budget tabled in the House on February 20 that there will be no new taxes. It is hard to believe. When we look little further into the budget, it deals with says something along the lines of sales tax reform. It also has: "The Impact of the GST". I find it hard to believe that he would say that there are no new taxes. We never had a GST before. The government plans on implementing it in this fiscal year, and it says that there are no new taxes.

When we add to that the cuts to the transfer payments to the provinces, there will be tax increases. If there are not there are certainly going to be program cuts, so it is hard to believe that someone could say that there will be no new taxes.

While I am on the point of taxes I would like to read a paragraph from the Liberal minority report that summarizes my thoughts on the GST quite plainly. "The GST proposal would create economic disruption, increase taxes on average families, introduce an unprecedented level of complexity into the tax system, impose further hardship on low income Canadians, remain hidden from taxpayers, shift the tax burden in several important ways in Canadian society without the government fully understanding the long term effects of the shifts, cause financial difficulties for provincial governments and harm many sectors of the Canadian economy." Anyone wishing a copy of that quotation may contact my office. But that sums up what the Liberal Party feels about this GST. It also sums up what most small businesses and most people in Canada feel about it.

When we were in government we talked about fairness too, but at least our words meant something. We were fair. At least we attempted to be fair. Let us look at the budget document a little more closely and study the revenue table. The parliamentary secretary a while ago was talking about the Conservative record and how proud he was of it. Let's look at that record.

When the Conservatives took over in 1984, the percentage of personal income tax revenue was at 41.3 per cent. In other words, the government received 41.3 per cent of its revenue from individuals through income tax. In 1988–89, that figure, lo and behold, is up to 44.3 per cent and rising. But if we look at the corporate sector, in 1984 the percentage it paid was 13.2 per cent and now—it is hard to believe—that percentage is down to 11.3 per cent. Individuals are paying more and corporations are paying less. It does not seem to gibe with fairness.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I apologize to the hon. member. I was advised that the hon. member was sharing the 20–minute period. As the hon. member has said, he started at 10 minutes to one o'clock. I would ask the hon. member to sum up, please.

Mr. Arseneault: Madam Speaker, you are right, 10 minutes was the allotted time. I apologize to the Chair.

[Translation]

I move, Madam Speaker: That this sitting be extended over the lunch hour to give an opportunity to the largest possible number of members to speak on this bad budget.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There not being 15 members rising in objection to the motion, according to the provisions of Standing Order 26(1)(6), the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion (Mr. Arseneault) agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's comments were interesting, to a certain extent, although I did find them rather surprising, especially when, in his capacity as co–critic for Forestry, the hon. member mentioned agreements that had not been renewed but are now being discussed. He referred to his own province of New Brunswick, in the Maritimes where he acknowledged the government had injected quite a bit of money. His criticism, however, was mainly directed to various cutbacks in the departments, and he made a point of saying that the Conservative Government had doubled the deficit since 1984. Is the hon. member aware of the fact that when his party, the Liberal Party, came to power in 1968 after 100 years in Confederation, we had a cumulative debt of about $18 billion and no annual deficit, and that the first annual deficit occurred in 1975, when his party was in power, and that their government was the first one to have a deficit, and that in 1980, the annual deficit was $11.5 billion? In 1984, when Canadians dumped the Liberal Party, there was an annual deficit of $38.3 billion. The cumulative debt at that time was $200 billion. Was the hon. member aware of that? And did he know that in 1984, there was an operating deficit of $16 billion? And here I am not referring to the debt. This year, however, is the second year we have had an operating surplus, now $9 billion, down from an operating deficit of $16 billion. Did the hon. member know that?

Mr. Arseneault: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He certainly asked a long question with many statistics. I want to tell him that the government's statistics are rather confused, more than ours. I want to assure him that our party did not raise taxes 31 times since 1984, certainly not.

I thank the hon. member for his question. He certainly asked a long question with many statistics and I shall answer him that the government's statistics are somewhat confused, more than ours. I want to assure him that our party certainly did not raise taxes 31 times since 1984. I would also like to tell him that the deficit, or rather the debt, doubled under the Conservative Party. That is a fact.

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): It is because of interest rates.

Mr. Arseneault: It is not due to interest rates. You are the ones who raised these taxes; it is your fault, it is your government, and you are going to pay for it. I have just come from Alberta and I must tell you that you will pay for it because the people of Alberta have had enough of you. The same goes for New Brunswick, and I must add something. You mention agreements, that it is good for New Brunswick, but we are all part of a single country and we should share all together, the whole country. You should not conclude one kind of agreement with some provinces and another kind with some other provinces. We should share. That is the Liberals' philosophy, but it is not the Conservatives' philosophy. It is not your government's philosophy and therein lies the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is now terminated. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mrs. Callbeck).

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I too would like to take part part today in this budget debate on the last budget which the Minister of Finance has just submitted.

I want to do so in the context of a province that has not yet fully recovered from the last budget, the one that we had in 1989. My province certainly well remembers the last budget because it dealt such a blow to the people of Summerside, in fact to all Islanders, when it was announced that CFB Summerside would be closed.

As Islanders, we have a special pride in the quality of life that exists in our province. Our predominantly rural outlook allows us to maintain a sense of community and unique values which cannot exist within an urban environment. Prince Edward Island has often been called the million acre farm because rural activities flourish from one end of our Island to the other.

We are very proud of our lifestyle, but I can tell you that we certainly are concerned with the government's policies which consistently erode rural life in our province.

We were very proud of Canadian Forces Base Summerside and proud to be part of Canada's national defence program. Last year, the budget really devastated Prince Edward Island with its arbitrary decision to close CFB Summerside. Today, on March 8, practically a year later, we still do not have any firm commitment from the government.

I have addressed the House many times on the issue of CFB Summerside. The government has to come to terms with the enormity of its decision to close the base, and it has to take responsibility for that decision.

The loss of this base has caused severe hardship, economically, socially and emotionally, in Summerside and the whole surrounding area. The government has been asked time and time again to take responsibility for the decision to close the base, and yet the federal government refuses to listen.

A budget has been brought down and still it contains no special help for the people affected by the closure of CFB Summerside. This closure announced last April would cost the area approximately 1,200 direct jobs, an annual payroll of approximately $40 million, or more than 2 per cent of the total provincial economy. Certainly our pride as Islanders has not diminished, but our faith has been shattered.

• (1310)

The government's 1990 budget contains measures which will certainly cost Prince Edward Island millions of dollars. The largest cut will come from the money that we will be losing under Established Programs Financing. My province will lose approximately $35 million in five years and about $12 million to $13 million within the next two.

The federal government started cutting these payments back in 1986. The cuts up to 1990 were to have totalled $11 million, but now on top of that we have another $12 million to $13 million, and that is all within two years.

In his budget speech the finance minister spoke about building a secure and rewarding foundation on a solid foundation. That foundation is education, but the government has been eroding that foundation persistently since it came to office and it has truly put this country's future at risk. This policy error is even more serious for a province like Prince Edward Island which needs a well trained workforce to lead it into the 1990s and beyond and to self-sufficiency. With continual cuts to education and the neglect of the Canada Student Loans Program, Ottawa is condemning my province to a future of dependency on the federal government. It is bad policy, it is bad economics, and it is bad for Prince Edward Islanders.

This budget also contains a reduction to Marine Atlantic's operating subsidy of approximately $9 million over a two-year period. This is only the most recent cut for this Crown corporation. Since 1985 the government has effectively reduced Marine Atlantic's subsidy by $52 million. Now 37 per cent of the cost of operation for Marine Atlantic comes from the users of the system, so 63 per cent comes from government subsidy. Here again this subsidy is being reduced. That means that Marine Atlantic will have to cut services, cut expenses, or increase fares. Only time will tell whether rates will have to be increased again.

The list of program cuts which affect my province and therefore impact on our economy is lengthy. There is the cancellation of the Postal Services Review Board. This comes at a time when Canadians need a forum to voice their concerns about Canada Post. Certainly across Prince Edward Island many Islanders are upset with Canada Post's policy to close rural post offices. This review board provided an independent body to keep an eye on the state of the postal service in Canada.

Another aspect of its mandate was to help Canada Post achieve its objectives. It certainly leaves the question: what is Canada Post's objective? Here again, it convinces Islanders that the government is eroding our rural lifestyle.

The cut in funding to the Veterans Independence Program is yet another example of where the government places its responsibilities. It plans to streamline this whole program. It is going to cut $18 million out of the program, and that is money that could provide a great deal of care and assistance for those in need.

The intent of this program is to assist veterans in maintaining or improving their quality of life by helping them remain healthy and independent. Without proper funding this program cannot provide the necessary services to veterans who so willingly provided their services. As Canadians we owe a great debt to our veterans and certainly they deserve to be treated fairly. In my province we have close to 1,200 veterans who are in need of the Veterans Independence Program, and approximately 200 of them live in my riding of Malpeque.

The list continues with cuts to programs under the Department of National Health and Welfare. The loss of funding to this department will also contribute to the undermining of the quality of life of Prince Edward Island.

I see that my time is running out. I have a great deal more to say about this budget, and certainly I will be speaking at a later time in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I listened to some parts of the hon. member's speech with great interest. I just want to refer to what she said about her province of Prince Edward Island. If I am not mistaken, she said that, since 1985, we have cut several million dollars if not fifty million or so. How did she get to that conclusion considering that since 1984 up until the last budget, transfers to the provinces increased on average by 6.5 per cent and that this budget provides for an increase of 3 per cent in transfer payments? If she can, would she be kind enough to tell us at the same time what were in percentage Prince Edward Island's expenditures in those two periods, 1980–84 and 1984–90?

[English]

Ms. Callbeck: Madam Speaker, in answer to the first question, when I say cut what I mean is that we had Established Programs Financing funding in place that was supposed to increase according to a certain formula every year. The government has gone back on the amount of increase. That is what I am talking about. Expenditures are going up every year. There is inflation. The province felt we had a program in place and the government has cut back on that.

In answer to your second question with regard to the expenditures, I do not have them presently here on my desk but certainly I would be glad to get that information to the hon. member.

• (1320)

[Translation]

Mr. Hogue: Madam Speaker, I listened to our colleague from Malpeque very closely and with real interest. With your permission, I would like to ask her a question that might widen her consideration of the matter.

I remember what she said and quote her own words:

[English]

We are very proud of our lifestyle. She repeated that information twice.

[Translation]

I think all of us, in Quebec, in the Maritimes and in western Canada are as proud as she is of our way of living.

I will get to my question shortly, but I too would like to go back to 1975 and quote words to our colleague. The then Minister of Finance said: "Last week, the Prime Minister—he was talking about Mr. Trudeau—referred to the extremely difficult situation we are in. He did not promise any quick or easy solution because there is no such solution. However, he showed the way to go to bring back to the country its opportunities to survive economically in a world where survival must keep on subscribing to the principles of responsibility, we must not give up, we must continue to play a leading role." And the minister back then in 1975 gave Canadiens a sure indication. Mr. Lalonde said: "We must—

Mr. Gauthier: Let us hear the question.

Mr. Hogue: It will come, but I had to put in perspective.

Some hon. members: Get to it.

Mr. Hogue: Yes, I will, give me just two minutes to finish what I was saying.

The Minister of Finance said: "We must cut expenditures." And Mr. Trudeau, back from Bonn, was making an about-turn, talking about government restraints, imposing them, but in any case, the debt kept piling up.

[English]

We are very proud of our lifestyle, but someone has to foot the bill.

[Translation]

How would you reply to that, Madam?

[English]

Ms. Callbeck: Madam Speaker, certainly I can tell the hon. member that we on Prince Edward Island are very proud of our quality of life. I would invite the hon. member to come to the Island any time and experience firsthand what I am talking about. As far as the—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time for question comments has now expired.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do think we have a problem in the House when during the question and comment period, be it a five or ten minute period, members who just spoke and who are supposed to be the object of questioning are subjected to what we just saw. Government members get up to make speeches and extenuating statements which do not give the member who made his speech a chance to reply. I think that is unfair.

Possibly we should refer this whole question back to a committee of the House so we can come up with an answer to the problem which has been with us for the last while. Indeed questions and comments have to be short questions and short comments. Otherwise, the whole process of making a debate in this House is becoming a monologue for the government to put its propaganda on the record, and I object to that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I understand the hon. member's reaction very well. However, I feel that he should also realize that for some time, when we consider bills like this one, for example, the various parties have the habit or prefer dividing the 20-minute period into two 10-minute periods, which in fact leaves only a 5-minute period for speakers to answer questions or comments following their speech.

I think that the hon. member would agree with me that a 5-minute period is really very short for everyone to have a chance to express themselves.

The hon. member for Malpeque (Ms. Callbeck) took a little more than 10 minutes, which I let her do to finish her speech. We had two minutes for the first exchange and then three minutes.

Obviously, I think that everyone would gain if the period for questions and comments following a speech was really used for short questions and short comments followed by short answers as well.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, a few minutes ago, there was a motion to continue the debate. I was very kindly asked to make a contribution, and I therefore welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on the latest Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance because—I won't be long—it is an excellent Budget and you will see why.

First, somewhere in the Budget it says, and I quote the conclusion:

Mr. Gauthier: What page?

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Just a minute, I will get the text if I could just have a few seconds. On page 16 of the French text, in the conclusion, it says in the first sentence, Madam Speaker:

> A nation's true sovereignty is determined by the ability of its people to shape their own future.

Mr. Gauthier: Sounds great!

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Yes, it does, and this reminds me of the upcoming press conference with your former prime minister on March 20. He says—the press is already reporting his comments—that the Free Trade Agreement is a worse threat to our sovereignty.

Speaking of the Americans, I will try to be objective about this. According to an American sociologist, the Constitution of 1982 is a worse threat to Canadian sovereignty. Not the Constitution as such but the fact that we enshrined the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. When we compare American and Canadian institutions, we see that here in Canada, with its Anglo-Saxon tradition in our institutions, here in the House of Commons, for instance, we have a collective hierarchy where rights and privileges are given collectively. In the United States they have the Bill of Rights and the emphasis is on amendments and individual claims. In this particular area, however, Canadians have been assimilated to a far greater extent. Taking a closer look at the Machiavellian schemes of your former prime minister, his purpose in enshrining the Charter was to direct challenges against Quebec's Bill 101.

Madam Speaker, that being said, what damaged our sovereignty most is the deplorable state in which the economy was left by the Liberal Party in 1984.

As I said to the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, remember that in 1968, because history is important—To plan for the future, we must understand the past. In 1968, a hundred years after Confederation, our national debt was $18 billion. No annual deficit. No constitutional problems. Everybody was part of the constitutional family. The country was in fine fettle. At the time, we were paying 12 cents on every tax dollar to service the debt and we even had enough to pay back part off part of the capital. After 1968, the first time the Liberal Government incurred a deficit was in 1975. Five years later, in 1980, we had a record annual deficit of $11.5 billion. From 1980 to 1984, the previous government went from bad to worse. No cutbacks, certainly not! It increased government spending at an average rate of 15.1 per cent annually, when it already had a deficit of $11.5 billion in 1980. Since 1984, we have managed to bring this average rate down to 5.2 per cent.

What is even more astonishing, Madam Speaker, is that if we do not include the cost of servicing the debt, the previous government increased program spending at an average rate of 13.9 per cent, and this was only for its operating budget. All those election goodies were part of the 13.9 per cent. Since 1984, however, we have managed to keep increases in program spending down to an average of 3.5 per cent. This year, the increase will be only 3 per cent, well below the rate of inflation.

From $11.5 billion in 1980, the annual deficit grew to $38.3 billion in 1984. This was too much for Canadians. After 100 years we had a deficit of $18 billion. In 1984, it was up to $38.3 billion. When we consider the operating budget alone, without the cost of servicing the debt, it is a real disaster. The operating budget indicates what the government collects in the form of taxes and income tax, and what it spends.

In 1984, the operating budget plus interest charges amounted to a deficit of $38.3 billion, but the operating budget alone showed a deficit of $16 billion.

In 1989-90, we turned this operating deficit of $16 billion into an operating surplus of more than $9 billion, and in fact we did this two years in a row. In the 1990 Budget we are forecasting a surplus of $13 billion for next year's operating budget. Granted, we still have a deficit of $30.5 billion. It is simple arithmetic. With the debt you left us in 1984, and this was $38.5 billion annually, a cumulative $200 billion since 1975—imagine, in ten years, less than ten years, $200 billion worth of debt! If we consider our present debt, $350 billion, $120 billion of that goes to service it, so over the past five years, 80 per cent of our debt consisted of the cost of servicing it. How can you accuse us of doubling the debt when today, Canadians are not really getting their money's worth, because they are paying the bill in tax dollars, and besides, we have an operating surplus of over $9 billion. I don't know whether you are good at arithmetic, but we mentioned earlier what percentage of the debt actually consists of interest charges.

Can you imagine, we would need a budget surplus in excess of $40 billion! And if ever we reached that level the deficit by then would be well over $600 or $700 billion! You have not even an inkling of the predicament your government left us in, yet today you have the nerve to tell us we doubled the deficit. As a matter of fact we will double it again in the next few years because, if you attended school long enough, you must have learned that we operate in a compound-interest environment. As if this were not enough, remember that when we attempted to reduce some programs—like de-indexing old age pensions—we were faced with endless protests, parades and demonstrations accusing us of being heartless slashers. You never did co-operate—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I should like to remind the hon. member that his remarks should be addressed to the Chair rather than directly to his colleagues. I have tried to be discreet about it. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): With pleasure, Madam Speaker. It is all the more pleasant to look at and address such an understanding person.

As I was saying, Madam Speaker, not only did we double the deficit the Liberals left us—from $200 billion in 1984 to $400 billion in the not too distant future—but in all likelihood we will double it over again even before we begin repaying the capital, given the unimaginable debt the Liberal Party saddled us with. First things first, we have to pay the interests on the debt if we want to pay back the capital. Still we must go on and this is what I have in mind when I talk about an operating budget. In the last two years and over a five-year period we went from minus $16 billion to plus $9 billion. We have a surplus right now. That is the kind of thing which bears repeating. For five years now we have been criticized for every cut-back, yet now we are told we have doubled the deficit. Well, Canadians deserve an explanation. The fact is that the belt-tightening approach of the government has now given us credibility on the international scene, and we want to put a light at the end of the tunnel so we will eventually pull out of the doldrums. Lets us face it, one or two generations will not be enough to restore the country back to the healthy condition the Liberal Party found it, for example from 1968 to 1975 and even 1980 when they were in power. Madam Speaker, a few generations of Canadians will be needed to help us reach that ideal situation.

Throughout the budget debate a good many references have been made to the reduced payments to the provinces, and just a moment ago the hon. member for Malpèque (Mrs. Callbeck) had a lot to say about that. The hon. member for Restigouche-Chaleur (Mr. Arseneault) also mentioned that the federal government was "passing the buck" by shifting its deficit to the provinces. As far as I am concerned, Madam Speaker, I obviously am from the province of Quebec. We must see things in the proper perspective. Again, since 1984 when we took power, the increases in transfer payments to the provinces have so far always been about 6.5 per cent. This year, the Finance Minister said that for the 40 federal departments, the spending increase, not the cuts, but the spending increase would be about 3 per cent. The same goes for the provinces. The hon. member for Malpeque just said, "Yes, but we had long-term programs planned, which means that we have to readjust." Look, we have an annual budget and that is what the provinces and their finance ministers as well as the Minister of Finance of Canada have to work within.

Do you know, Madam Speaker, how much we pay annually in transfers for the three main programs to the province of Quebec? It is about $10 billion. Bringing the increase from 6.5 per cent to 3 per cent this year will save about $221 million. But this saving must, again, be taken in context: the transfers will still increase, but by 3 per cent, not 6.5 per cent or so, the same as for all departments.

We must remember that the transfers to the provinces are for three main programs: for equalization, it is a very complex formula which is applied in full. The second program is the Canada Assistance Plan. The province of Quebec will have no reduction for these two programs because, unfortunately, Quebec is considered a poor province for this purpose. So those two transfer programs have no cuts. The $221 million affect the third program which is the Cash and Tax Point Program. For the province of Quebec $221 million represent 0.6 per cent of the Quebec Government's expenditures during the last fiscal year, or 0.7 per cent of their last estimates. So when they refer to unloading into provincial yards, things must be put back into context. This is unfortunate, because Quebec is a wrong example in the sense that as far as spending growth is concerned, and this is why I put the question to my colleague from Prince Edward Island, the growth rate in Quebec is in the order of 4–4 1/2 per cent. This is not outlandish as compared to Ontario's 9 1/2–10 per cent growth rate. What I mean is, provinces also are part of the problem.

A majority of them spent more than the inflation rate, and the Minister of Finance has led or intends to lead back provinces, which also is the aim of the exercise, to a program spending growth rate that is more appropriate to the state of the economy. Because if the predictions made by the Minister of Finance are accurate and the economy resumes a normal cruising rate, who will benefit if not the provinces? It is therefore important in this exercise that not only Canadians as such but also institutions, governments also do their share, ensure that citizens are aware of the enormity of the legacy we had to tackle, willy nilly. It is not a matter, Madam Speaker, of suggesting how smart and how bright we are, because the figures speak for themselves. From a $16 billion deficit on program expenditures, we have succeeded over five years in achieving a $9 billion surplus, and for next year the forecast is $13 billion. But as you see, we still have a long way to go to level off and then start repaying the principal which—as unbelievable as its may be—will top the $600—$700 billion mark. Imagine the interest rate on that level of debt!

Madam Speaker, when they speak of forfeiting sovereignty, this is first and foremost what is implied—the economic situation. And when they suggest that in spite of what the Minister of Finance said that there is not tax increase they keep referring back to the GST, Madam Speaker, everyone knows and you know in particular that tax reform, this new goods and services tax is aimed essentially not at creating a new tax per cent but at replacing the existing federal sales tax which would you imagine has been around since 1924, and which, as early as 1944, was the target of a royal commission report calling on the government of the day to amend it, to abolish it and to reform it.

For over 45 years, governments have been trying to replace this unfair and inadequate taxation system with a new one. That is the purpose of the GST. Let us not forget that Canada is essentially an exporting nation; 80 to 85 per cent of everything we make is exported to countries with a GST-like system. Producers in those countries are not penalized by a domestic sales tax like ours. How can we put our own manufacturers at a disadvantage when we are essentially an exporting country? It is contrary to common sense. If ridicule could kill, Liberals would have disappeared long ago.

We are trying to return to a rational economy and to promote our national growth by allowing Canadians to compete on a level playing field. This is how we will create more jobs for our people who, as workers and consumers, will pay a consumption tax.

The solution is not imposing a surtax on four or five products such as gas, tobacco and alcohol which are now taxed at up to 84 per cent. This shows a definite lack of imagination in finding new ways of taxing people. Our present tax is unfair and inadequate, since most of our trading partners have this form of taxation. It is called for, particularly in light of the current free-trade policy and the opening of world markets. It is important that this government act responsibly and offer the Canadian people an adequate tax reform leading to the prosperity we all want.

Mr. Arseneault: Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the minister for his speech and his energy. I also wish to make a few comments. If my colleague would look at table V on page 142 of the Budget document, he would see that in 1984, when his party took power, personal income tax represented 41.3 per cent of total government revenues, whereas now it is up to 44.3 per cent. On the other hand, corporate income tax went down from 13.2 per cent to 11.3 per cent. Personal income taxes went up while corporate income taxes went down.

I agree with the hon. member that we have a problem with our debt our deficit but I also think that the solution—and I don't believe that the government is insensitive—is not to cut social programs. That is absolutely unnecessary. There are other solutions to consider.

My first question is simple: Can you explain that table? My second question is related to International Women's Day. I would like you to explain why $1.4 million has been cut from the Women's program as announced in the Budget this week.

Mr. Tremblay: Madam Speaker, I do indeed thank the Hon. Member for Restigouche-Chaleur for his question, because caution is required when we deal with figures. Of course, between 1984 and 1988, there was an increase from $41 billion to $44 billion, and we know why. It is clear. The Government is faced with a huge debt. It is compelled to raise taxes. The Government did not invent anything. But it has discovered a new way to collect revenues.

• (1350)

That is the interesting part. In the second column, under "Corporate income tax", the budgetary revenues went down, as he said, from 13,2 to 11,3. As you know, madam Speaker, we have tried very hard to reform our tax system by eliminating a great many loopholes. A great many more corporations are being taxes: On the other hand, we must not overlook the fact that corporations, under a capitalist system, must show profits. Just the same, if we raised the tax rate to 25 per cent instead of 13 per cent, corporations would charge consumers 26 per cent, because they need to show at least a one per cent profit. Otherwise, they close down.

This is the difficult challenge the Minister of Finance had to face and he did it in an outstanding fashion by lowering the tax rate to make our corporations more competitive, while widening its scope, by eliminating the loopholes and by taking into account the consumers' ability to pay.

Finally, I must say I am as unhappy as he is about the $1,4 million cut to the women's centres. In my own riding, Madam Speaker, there are three women's centres whose representatives came to my office asking what they were going to do. I told them that clearly, as citizens, they had to carry their share of the burden. But theirs are not the only cut in the budget. There are 39 other departments.

Except that, and it is very important, that is where the Hon. Member should take action. Personally, we shall try first of all to show some imagination in dealing with these women's needs which we know and are aware of. We must achieve a balance between our ability to pay and our desire to provide deserving programs which we perhaps cannot afford.

As far as women are concerned, I can tell you that I have been in touch with the two Ministers concerned, namely, the Secretary of State and the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and we are going to make use of other programs to make sure that the women's centres, at least in my own riding remain as unchanged as possible.

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I want to participate in this debate even though I am not usually accustomed to participating in budget debates for several reasons. I know there are many colleagues on both sides of the House who would see themselves as being much better informed and more competent to participate in this debate.

I believe this debate is of particular importance to the country and to all Canadians. I think it is important because it represents, if you like, the fruition of a long process of trying to retrieve fiscal and financial responsibility in this country, a responsibility which started to slip away many years ago under the previous government.

I am not going to spend a great deal of time this afternoon talking about that because I think it has been well documented by many of my colleagues. I do want to make the point very clearly regarding the situation which faced this new government back in 1984.I was not a member of the House at that time, but an observer. I could see that the situation was one which was most unpalatable. It is set out very clearly in the budget document recently produced by the Minister of Finance where he sets out that five years ago program spending exceeded revenues by some $16 billion. I wonder how it can be that members opposite who were part of that government or supporters of that government can, with such alacrity, criticize this budget for attempting to re-establish fiscal responsibility on the heels of the kind of legacy left to this House and to this country.

In the five intervening years, we have seen a shortfall on program spending revenues of $16 billion being converted to a $9 billion surplus. That means a turnaround of some $25 billion in just five years or an average of $5 billion a year.

I cannot, for the life of me, think why many people on all sides of this House are not applauding what is an extraordinary turnaround with respect to the financial management of this country.

When I listen to members opposite complaining from the time this budget was delivered that too much has been done in this area, methinks they do complain too much, that they are going for what many people in public life often do, a kind of short term political response which will, in effect, produce real long term damage.

If we were to take seriously the comments made over the past few days on this budget debate—and the comments have been consistent, I have not read or followed each and every speech but comments like too much of this has been cut and too much of that has been cut—I wonder what kind of a budget we would have ended up with? That same dreary criticism has been repeated over and over again during the course of the past five years as this government has tried to put the financial management of this country in order.

I want to say to all members that while a lot has been said and written about the last election, in which I did participate, about what was the key motivating factor that produced a second majority for this party, I firmly believe that the underlying cause was responsibility, responsibility for the financial management of this country. That is the issue that needs to be addressed in this debate, not the specificity of one particular program cut or change as against another but in fact the bottom line responsibility of this government. I have heard far too little. In fact, I have heard virtually nothing spoken to that matter.

On page 1 of the budget, the Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

> Every additional dollar of deficit we incur today means an increased burden of debt for future generations. We have a responsibility to our children and grandchildren. To build for them, not to borrow from them.

Surely that is the underlying theme of this budget. I would say that there is no member on our side of the House who is happy with each and every aspect of this budget. We have just heard my colleague from Lotbinière state his concern about the program cut on one particular aspect. We have heard others. We have heard almost repeatedly in Question Period and in debate. It may even be that over the course of the next few months and years there may be ways found to cushion or find new support for programs that are well worth continuing.

Fundamentally, what is at issue here is whether or not the country will have the capacity to deliver on all the programs to all the millions of people, provinces, regions and territories for which we have ongoing responsibility. If we give up for the sake of one, two, a dozen, or even 100 specific criticisms, we forfeit the right to govern because we do not exercise our responsibility in any kind of sensible or acceptable manner.

I have to say, as one who has sat here in opposition through half of the 1960s and virtually almost all of the 1970s, that is what we witnessed. We had to try to recover from that terrible legacy of financial and fiscal neglect.

The Minister of Finance said at page 13 of the budget, and I quote:

> I have stated on many occasions that it would be irresponsible of our generation if we took the easy option of simply passing our deficit burden to our children. It would also be irresponsible to leave them a legacy of environmental neglect.

These are the two issues which concern me mightily about this budget and this debate, whether it is one of fiscal neglect or environmental neglect, I believe the basis of this budget is a firm foundation for the future for ourselves, for our children and for our grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members under Standing Order 31.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join with Canadian women and men on International Women's Day to celebrate the many achievements and contributions of women to our society.

Over the years, women's struggle for their rights as workers, mothers and citizens have helped bring about landmark political and social reforms.

Since our government's mandate began, our partnership with women and women's groups has resulted in many social reforms. Senior women have seen a substantial improvement in their standard of living and quality of life. They have benefited from pension reforms designed to ensure women's fair and equitable treatment in their later years.

Policies initiated by our government have also helped to provide women with opportunities to more actively participate in the economic life of the country and to contribute to its economic prosperity.

I applaud the efforts of Canadian women in bringing these and other issues of concern to the forefront. I believe that such efforts will continue to enhance the status of women and strengthen their important role in Canadian society.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the present session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights draws to a close, and it appears that it will once again pass without producing a resolution on the Indonesian occupation of East Timor.

Despite repeated endorsement by the UN of the right of self-determination and in glaring contrast to the United Nations General Assembly declaration for the 1990s to be the UN Decade for International Law, the Canadian government refuses to condemn Indonesia's actions and show leadership in support of the rights of the East Timorese people, turning a blind eye to massive human rights abuses—abuses which have included a forced sterilization program against East Timorese women.

Tomorrow also marks the thirtieth anniversary of the Chinese occupation of Tibet. As a new spirit of independence and self-determination sweeps the world, for example as it has in Southern Africa and the Baltic states, it is shameful that the Chinese occupation of Tibet continues without significant international attention being paid, as is likewise the case with East Timor.

In both cases, Canadian silence should end, and Canadian respect for international law should be revived.

FORESTRY

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the future of this country depends on our ability to implement sustainable development policies which will protect our resources in years to come. To date, we have seen no commitment from this government, and judging from recent reports, it is unlikely that we will see one. The government's lack of commitment to reforestation in this country is shameful. It has still not renewed the forestry agreement with the province of Ontario.

In 1985, more than $75 million was spent by the federal government over four years to regenerate our forests in northern Ontario. Now it appears that Ontario's forests will get a small slice of the $40 million this government has offered for regional development.

This government has stalled long enough. It is time for it to make a real commitment to regional development and to our forests. I urge the government to renew the Canada–Ontario Forest Resource Agreement immediately and to provide the necessary funding to get the job done. It is time the government put its money where its mouth is.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Premier of New Brunswick announced the expansion of the Trans-Canada Highway.

As we all realize, the future prosperity of New Brunswick depends upon a good transportation system. Confidence in the economic future of my province is on the rise, and yesterday's announcement clearly indicates this confidence and, yes, confidence in where we as a nation are going.

Quoting Premier McKenna: "We simply must have financial support from the Government of Canada to finish our upgrading project. I believe the federal government will participate in our efforts to upgrade our major highways."

I support the premier's remarks and point to the budget before this House which will assist the province of New Brunswick to realize its full potential.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, on this 8th day of March, the International Women's Day, those 52 per cent of the Canadian population will have an opportunity once more to show this Conservative Government they oppose the regressive goods and services tax, the GST. Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday next, from March 12 to March 16, we Canadian women, our families and friends can register our opposition and say no to the tax through an electronic petition. The all important phone number to remember is 1-900-720-6052.

I therefore ask each and everyone to dial 1-900-720-6052 and say no to this Conservative Government. We will have none of your GST.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased to rise on the occasion of the International Women's Day to pay tribute to all women in my constituency, in Canada and throughout the world and say how much I am proud of Canada's role as a world leader in promoting women's rights.

Our presence for a third consecutive term on the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women strengthens our international role. Now working in a special, extended session in Vienna, the Commission is reviewing the implementation of the prospective action strategies for promoting women that were approved in Nairobi and endorsed by all Members of the United Nations during the World Women Conference held in 1985. Canada played a key role in approving the strategies and is actively pursuing their successful implementation.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's commitment to promoting women throughout the world will go a step further in October next when we host the third Commonwealth Conference of Ministers responsible for the status of women. Three cheers for women!

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, International Women's Day was first celebrated 80 years ago today at the International Conference of Socialist Women. It is a day inspired by the struggles of working-class women who went on strike in the early part of the century to protest dangerous working conditions and exploitive wages. Today the struggle continues for economic, social and political equality.

In Canada, the government has chosen to commemorate International Women's Day by scheduling a budget debate in this House, a budget in which women's centre funding is cut 100 per cent and the funding mechanism for social assistance, for child care, and for shelters for battered women is strangled in three provinces of this country.

On International Women's Day, this government should implement its international commitments as a signatory to the United Nations treaties, not just talk about them, implement them to improve the status of women in Canada. It should not be undermining women's equality in Canada and misrepresenting itself at the international level.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, since today, March 8, is International Women's Day, we have the opportunity of drawing attention to women's status, accomplishments, concerns and expectations. 1990 is a significant year for women as we are celebrating the 50th anniversary of Quebec women's right to vote. The government has made women's equality one of its priorities. The Employment Equity Act, the reform of the Divorce Act, the employment programs exclusively for women are but a few examples of the numerous initiatives taken to improve the lives of women in Canada.

International Women's Day is also a time to think of the work we still have to do to attain equality in every sector and to eliminate all remaining forms of discrimination.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on this day designated International Women's Day, there are a myriad of issues that need to be addressed. However, I would like to take this opportunity to focus on violence against women.

Women, who make up half of the world's population and work two-thirds of the world's work hours, constitute the highest number of the world's poor and abused. They are clearly undervalued economically, socially, and many times as human beings.

Violence against women, which includes assault, mutilation, murder, infanticide, rape and cruel neglect, is perhaps the most pervasive yet least recognized human rights issue in the world. It is also a profound health problem, robbing women of their physical and emotional well-being, both vital to achieving widely held goals for human progress, especially in the Third World. Study after study has shown that women's sense of self is critical in reducing infant mortality and to birth spacing.

• (1410)

Violence against women cuts across all cultures and all socioeconomic groups. In Canada, at least one in eight, or as many as one million Canadian women every year are abused by men with whom they are living. Yet we see the Conservative government not only cutting the women's programs but cutting some 80 women's centres that provide support and information to battered and sexually assault women, and to jobless, illiterate and homeless women across Canada.

Women are targets of violence because of their sex, and it remains a powerful obstacle to human progress. Measured by human costs alone, female violence is worthy of international attention and action, but has seldom been raised at that level, much less addressed.

Setting aside a day to recognize women is important symbolically, but without action it is rendered pointless and ineffective. I call on this government to stop paying lip service to women's rights and reinstate funding vital to Canadian women and to press the international community to recognize violence against women as an important human rights issue.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, International Women's Day, is particularly significant this year since women will celebrate three important events in 1990: the 20th anniversary of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada, the fifth anniversary of the coming into force of the equality clause in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the 50th anniversary of Quebec women's right to vote.

Today I am proud to emphasize the priority our government gives to women's economic and social development. Some of our initiatives show our serious commitment to women's progress: a 100 per cent increase in the number of women in decision-making jobs in the federal public service, the appointment of two women to the Supreme Court of Canada, the introduction of a pay equity program and now, for the first time in our history, a woman has just been appointed Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this International Women's Day is designed to remind us all of the importance of equality and equity for women, a principle our government is strongly committed to.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the late seventies, a Manitoban was seriously harmed when a confidential Department of Transport report found its way into the files of the Manitoba Public Insurance Corporation.

Mr. Ken Podolsky had been involved in a serious accident in 1976 and was cleared of responsibility by an RCMP investigation.

However, based on the Transport Canada report, a study to find out more about this kind of accident, and which guaranteed confidentiality and which was for the department's use only, the corporation came to the conclusion that Mr. Podolsky was 75 per cent responsible for the accident.

In a letter to me, the former Minister of Transport indicated that it is not clear how this report was released. I believe that the Minister of Transport has a responsibility to find out how this information got into the wrong hands. I would ask him to undertake a review of this case immediately. Canadians need to know that when their government guarantees confidentiality, it is a guarantee that can be trusted, that can be counted on.

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, this House often pauses to recognize distinguished or well-known Canadians who have died. On Sunday, a young Cree woman from Saskatchewan died in the prison for women in Kingston. She committed suicide. She was the third young, Saskatchewan woman in the prison for women who has committed suicide in the last year.

Two years after this institution was built in 1933, the first report that called for the end to this institution and the closing of it was published. Subsequently, there have been 10 reports that have called for its closure.

I ask the government and the new Solicitor General to make a firm commitment today on International Women's Day that this institution will be closed forthwith and that no longer will the women of Canada and the people of Canada have to put up with this institution. It is a national disgrace and it is time it was closed.

CHILD CARE SERVICES

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, on March 2, I had the honour to announce, in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Beatty), a contribution to the Saint-Jérôme junior college under the Child Care Special Initiatives Fund. The money will be used by the CEGEP de Saint-Jérôme to conduct its innovative project on video feedback aimed at developing a self appraisal method for day care workers. The workers would be able to monitor their interaction with children and to evaluate their own work.

The instruments will be tested in five day care centres.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the CEGEP de Saint-Jérôme is the first French speaking junior college in the Quebec to offer a program for day care workers. The funded project shows once again that college's dynamic contribution to the improvement of day care services.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. As we all know, today is International Women's Day. It marks the progress women have made in overcoming barriers to their full equality, but it shows the extent to which those barriers still remain. Nowhere is this more evident than in the gap between the rhetoric of the government and its actions when it comes to support for women.

In its most recent budget, the government cut some $1.6 million from its women's program. Yet it had the nerve to send across Canada a glossy, expensive poster on International Women's Day. As Carol Greene of Canadian Women's Studies said: "The cost of this one poster project could have kept one women's centre open for a full year."

I ask the Secretary of State, will he today, this International Women's Day, show that there is some sincerity behind the government's rhetoric and enable the 80 women's centres across Canada to stay open by restoring their funding? Will he do it today? Yes, or no?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, today is indeed International Women's Day and it is a day when we celebrate the progress that women around the world have made over the past 80 years in achieving equality, and nowhere more so than in Canada.

The basic way in which women can achieve true equality is having the opportunity to have jobs. The best way to ensure they have jobs and good paying jobs, is to ensure a healthy economy. This budget is to ensure for the future of women, the future of our children, that they will have that equal opportunity for their own future self-worth and their future economic benefit.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will note that the Secretary of State, who controls the women's program, was not able or willing to stand up and answer my question.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women said that the cuts to women's centres are: "are an attack on the heart of the women's movement".

I ask the Secretary of State, if he and the government are committed at all to women's equality, will he stand up today and say he is restoring the funding for the women's centres that are the heart of the women's movement?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, it is very important that the hon. member understands the progress women are making in this country and the role that this government has played in ensuring that progress.

It is not only the Secretary of State's department which assists in the funding of women's programs. It is all departments of government. It is the $40 million program to assist in reducing family violence. It is the $25 million to assist aboriginal women. The Secretary of State will continue to fund and assist aboriginal women, visible minority women, disabled women through all of its programs, to assist advocacy and education.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, still no answer from the Secretary of State. Canadian women have already given up on the minister responsible for the status of women. It is clear that there is a lot of sound and fury but no action for Canadian women.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition could put the question.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): So, Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In the last election, the Prime Minister promised Canadians a national child care program, but the government has not kept its promise. In his Budget, the Finance Minister set a ceiling on the funds used by the provinces to provide child care services. He also cut the child care initiative fund from $15 million to $13 million.

I ask the minister why the government did not take the opportunity provided by this International Women's Day to restore these funds, to keep its promise and to announce a national child care program today. Why does it not give such an answer, if it really cares about the interests of women in this country?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I guess one has to expect when the hon. gentleman gets up that he will use a gimmicky sort of question like that to suggest that we should unveil a new national child care strategy because it is International Women's Day.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: The hon. members opposite ask questions and then shout down the answers.

The government remains committed to putting in place a national child care program. I would point out to the House that if it were not for the obstruction of the Liberal Party of Canada, that program would be in place today. It died on the Order Paper in the Senate because of the Liberal Party of Canada.

That program will be in place during this Parliament. In addition, we continue to fund child care through the Canada Assistance Plan and through the child care initiatives program. All of these are important measures which have been taken to provide child care for Canadians.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, on a day that celebrates women around the world, it is disheartening that in Canada women are having to fight barriers at the highest level. We recently heard a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada say that the courts are biased against females. Now we have the Secretary of State slashing the budget for women's programs. If that is not enough, we have the President of the Treasury Board refusing to recognize the value of women's work.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister or Deputy Prime Minister support the efforts of the Human Rights Commissioner of Canada and direct Treasury Board to correct the inequities for 70,000 public servants who are being cheated out of thousands of dollars in wages?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. colleague that first of all it was this government, not any former government, that made the first moves to correct the pay inequities between males and females in this government.

After five years of a joint study with the unions, and after the unions had walked out of the study, we took action, $317 million in retroactive payments and pay adjustments of $76 million a year to correct those pay inequities that were determined by that study.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am not one to be unfair and to question or put down progress, but I have to say that there is unfinished business.

My supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board. As the minister knows, on January 23, as he mentioned, the Public Service Commission of Canada withdrew from the joint union–management study of equal pay for work of equal value.

Will the minister co–operate and give his commitment that Treasury Board will recognize all of the recommendations of the five–year joint study prepared by both sides and give those female employees the wage adjustments and the retroactive pay to which they are entitled?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I just mentioned that we had moved to correct the pay inequities, a five–year study with concrete results at the end.

I would like to quote Mr. Yalden of the Canadian Human Rights Commission who, when interviewed, said: "On the substance of this thing, I was pleased, very pleased to see that the government was going to, after five years of talks and studies, put its money where its mouth is: $317 million in back pay is a lot of money and we think that's an excellent move in the right direction." That was stated by the chairman of the commission.

Ms. Blondin: I didn't say it wasn't. I said it was unfinished business.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Figures released yesterday suggested that the government has sunk over $111 million into its program to get the goods and services tax off the ground, some $15 million of that on government propaganda and $85 million on furniture and computers.

This does not seem to make sense to the women of Canada who have seen this same government slash those very programs like social housing, cutting spending on health care, post-secondary education, core funding for women's centres across the country, the very programs that could give Canadian women access to equal opportunities in our society.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister to explain to the women of Canada, on International Women's Day, what are the priorities of this government. What are the values of this government? Are computers and propaganda on the goods and services tax more important than equality for women in this society?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the priorities of this government are very clear. My colleague, the minister responsible for the status of women, has stated very clearly the breadth of the women's programs that we have brought in during our term of office, the increase in the funding that has gone to those programs.

At the same time, we do have other obligations that we must look after. One of those is to bring in a goods and services tax so that we can continue to finance the programs that are so important to Canadians whether they are for women, whether they are health and post-secondary education, regional development, or any of the breadth of programs that Canadians look to us as a government to provide.

We are making preparations for the goods and services tax consistent with parliamentary practice for many, many years.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question is for the minister responsible for the status of women. Her government will spend $1.6 million just to renovate a Senate committee room. The same $1.6 million is the amount that the government will cut from women's programs. Forty-one centres will close in Quebec, for example. And the $44,000 that will be spent on the Governor General's limousine would be enough to keep four centres open. How can the minister accept such an order of priorities from her government without crying scandal?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had some concerns about how the Senate is spending money. I am anxious to hear her suggestions as to what we can do about the Senate.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister responsible for the status of women.

Clearly, the colleagues of the minister responsible for the status of women do not want to answer to the women of Canada. I ask the minister, how is she going to fulfil her mandate to promote opportunities for equality for women in this society when her government has cut back on social housing, women's programs and on the very jobs that women hold? Women work in women's centres. Women work in child care centres. Women work in native friendship centres.

Will the minister explain how she can fulfil her mandate to the women of Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the leader of the NDP has asked this question.

One of the things that we are celebrating today on International Women's Day is the fact that there are now so many women in positions of influence and authority, and indeed that she is a leader of a major political party in this country.

That is the kind of progress that we want to see for women. We want to see them progress in terms of economic equality. The best way that can help them is to have that healthy economy. In fact, there are one million more women working today in Canada, earning money, being able to be self sufficient, looking after their families, than there were when this government took office in 1984.

• (1430)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Collins: I am going to work with my colleagues to ensure that continues. I am going to work with my colleagues on the issues of family violence.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. This morning we heard from representatives of the National Council on Welfare and the National Anti-Poverty Organization. They stated very clearly that they wanted members of Parliament to vote against the goods and services tax proposal that is before Parliament.

Will the minister admit today clearly that he has misinformed the Canadian people and that, in fact, as studies indicate, as the anti-poverty league indicates and as the National Council on Welfare indicates, families in Canada with incomes under $30,000 will be worse off under his GST proposal than they are now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): No, I do not accept that conclusion at all, Mr. Speaker, and we made why very clear in the GST documents.

In the committee meeting this morning did the hon. member put out the alternatives that he has for the goods and services tax? Is he telling the members of the committee that if his party ever got into government it would scrap the goods and services tax? Is that the policy? Or are there going to be some more weasel words in there that they will scrap the Conservatives goods and services tax? Will the Liberals put in another consumption tax?

What about the wealth tax that the member is talking about? Are we going to have a wealth tax? Is that wealth tax going to be on the family farm? Is it going to be on small business, on private homes, on bank accounts? What sort of wealth tax is he proposing? What sort of consumption tax is he proposing? Or is he going to increase income tax rates as he was saying out in Edmonton?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, although the GST bill has yet to be passed by Parliament, the government has already spent over $100 million on it.

Since in his budget, the Minister announced some pretty dramatic cutbacks in programs for aboriginal people, students, veterans and the woman of this country, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance how he can justify spending over $100 million on propaganda and planning for a goods and services tax that has been massively rejected by all Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope you took careful note of how quickly my colleague ran away from the substance of the GST issue because he did not want to put anything else on the table. As soon as I raise the question of alternatives, he turns tail and starts to talk about the moneys that we are using to prepare for the goods and service tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He knows full well that a government has the responsibility to make preparations for legislation that is before the House. That is a practice that has been quite consistent in Parliament for many years. When Parliament is considering legislation it is the responsibility of the operating departments involved to make the preparations, to put the planning in place, to put the assets in place, to be able to fulfil the responsibilities when that tax comes in.

We have made it quite clear that the goods and services tax is a fundamental principle of this government. It was referred to in the Speech from the Throne last year. It has been a part of two budgets and these preparations are very consistent with parliamentary practice and the policies of this government.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it concerns the obscene plan to spend in excess of $100 million to set up and sell the GST, the most unpopular policy ever imposed by a Canadian government on its own people.

It has been reported that Revenue Canada has already leased expensive office space across Canada to administer the GST, a tax that has not even been approved by the Parliament.

How can this government, at a time when it is slashing programs for veterans and closing women's centres right across this country, justify wasting taxpayers money to set up expensive offices to house his tax police when this regressive and unfair tax has not even been approved by the Parliament of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me draw my colleague's attention to the fact that it is not just while this party has been responsible for the government of the country but in the previous Parliament in 1980 to 1984 in the case of the Petroleum Gas Revenue Tax Act, the Forward Averaging bill, the Share Purchase Tax Credit, the Refundable Business Investment Tax Credit and the increase to the child care expense deduction, the government of the day, the Liberal Party that he supports, made expenditures in anticipation of legislation being passed because a government does have a specific responsibility to do that.

Colleagues have complained about this, but let me refer the hon. member to the Auditor General's report where he said: "The government will need to give the planning for the GST the priority and the resources required to ensure the successful delivery of this major initiative." The successful delivery starts on January 1, 1991 and we must be prepared for that.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the minister's defence of his government's policies and his own tax policies would be laughable if it weren't so pathetic.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Can the minister tell us whether or not his department has conducted any studies to determine the compliance costs of administering the goods and services tax, what level of non-compliance he expects, and how his own tax police are going to treat those poor, small businessmen and women who run afoul of this ill-conceived, complex and unfair tax? What are you going to do? Is the minister going to—

Mr. Speaker: I think we have the question.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might be interested in knowing that part of the resources that we will be devoting to the goods and services tax are to help Revenue Canada people meet with small business people in their offices to help them understand the goods and services tax, how it affects the cost of their purchases, how it affects the prices of their goods and services so that they can be in a position on January 1 to be able to comply with the tax.

Surely my hon. friend would support this type of assistance to the small business community.

BILL C-43

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the new Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Justice has indicated publicly that she is in favour of women being able to determine their own reproductive choices.

On International Women's Day will the minister listen to the women of Canada who are saying to her and to her government that the abortion bill will limit women's access to abortion in this country? Will the minister listen to women's organizations across this country who are saying that women must have the fundamental right to choose whether or not they will bear children, and will she withdraw this criminal legislation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I question whether the hon. member's question is in order. The bill has had second reading in the House and the government's position on the bill has not changed, notwithstanding the change in the incumbency of the Minister of Justice.

I have made my personal views on reasons for supporting the bill very clear in my speech in the House during the second reading debate and will be pleased to discuss the bill further with the standing committee at the end of its deliberations.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I think I heard that the answer to the women of Canada was no, that she will not withdraw that bill. Polls tell us that 62 per cent of Canadians are opposed to this government's plan to recriminalize abortion.

The minister, as I said earlier, is on record as saying that she is in favour of choice for women. The minister, as I said earlier, is on record as saying that she is in favour of choice for women. Is this the ticket to the inner cabinet, compromising one's own personal views?

• (1440)

Some hon. members: Shame, shame!

Some hon. members: Withdraw, withdraw!

Some hon. members: Cheap, cheap.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member would know that the implication of that remark is clearly not acceptable in this House because that kind of retort can turn this place into absolute disorder. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, if you deem that it is necessary, yes, I will withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for her supplementary.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, we know that access to reproductive health services is already a problem for women in this country. The Canadian Medical Association has indicated that if this bill passes this House access will become worse for women in Canada, that doctors will be frightened of criminal repercussions. Will the minister on International Women's Day, this week or next week, listen to the women of Canada? Will she listen to the doctors of Canada, and will she withdraw this bill?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the bill is before committee, before the parliamentary process. I think this is hardly a time to engage in a debate in Question Period on the merits of the bill. I have stated very clearly in this House my reason for supporting the bill personally before I became responsible for it. I hold the same opinion now and I will be expressing that same opinion on behalf of the Government of Canada in front of the standing committee.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. He will recall that last August the Supreme Court ruled that telecommunications falls under federal jurisdiction. He will also recall that his government tabled a bill to put that court ruling into effect. Some western provinces were not too happy and Quebec is now sabre-rattling. This is a very key interprovincial field and has now been declared a federal jurisdiction.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister prepared to exercise federal leadership to ensure that federal jurisdiction is maintained and ensure that this key sector is not going to be Balkanized or fragmented? When is he going to bring that bill into the House and ensure federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to the hon. member. As the member knows well, there is a bill before the House now, Bill C-41, which relates to the three prairie provinces. However, the minister has given an undertaking to all his counterparts, including the Quebec minister, that there will be a broad-based telecommunications bill introduced into the House in due course.

It is important that he conclude his consultations with the ministers involved before that is done, particularly the three prairie ministers and indeed, if necessary, the Quebec minister.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the parliamentary secretary that the Prime Minister, who I think has something to say in this country, said we will simply not allow our system of communications to be fragmented and broken up by different regulations.

[Translation]

My question was supposed to be directed to the Minister of Communications, who seems to have forgotten his commitment to a national telecommunications policy, made when he was appointed Minister of Communications five years ago. My question is this: What is the minister's policy? Did the parliamentary secretary say—? We are still waiting. And meanwhile, will the bill to implement federal jurisdiction be passed? Why is the minister dragging his feet? Whom is he trying to accommodate and why?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, when the minister announced the new Canadian telecommunications policy last October, he said that in the months to come he would table a bill to implement this policy which is based on a unique federal regulatory system. The bill is almost ready to be tabled.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

MINING INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Finance Minister's budget terminated a $126 million mining incentive program, breaking a 1988 promise to maintain the Canadian exploration incentive program until the end of 1990.

Why has the minister's government broken its promise and why is it turning its back on the Canadian mining industry?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member asked me that question because yesterday in a question to me she said that this year's energy Estimates show that a $246 million cut for conservation and alternate energy was in place.

Quite frankly, the hon. member was wrong, dead wrong. I do not know what kind of research she does, but the following were the cuts in the Estimates: There was a change to CDIP, which was the forerunner of CEIP, of $215 million; there was a change to CEIP of $20 million, and that goes back to the question she asked today. There were others relating to energy savings in alternate energy, which had been announced 18 months before, of some $10 million.

Suddenly the $10 million mushroomed yesterday to $246 million. The hon. member was dead wrong then and her numbers today on CEIP are also wrong.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): I certainly would like to have a copy of those figures, because we researched this very thoroughly.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. The government not only breached a promise, but a legislative guarantee. Why did the minister not provide the required legislated six months notice provided for in the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program Act to exploration firms before cancelling the program?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to send the hon. member those figures. She will find them in the Estimates tabled by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. members: Yesterday.

Mr. Epp: Well, I was asked the question yesterday, that is correct. It was wrong yesterday and it is wrong today. I guess if she insists on it, it will be wrong again tomorrow.

On CEIP, the effective date was February 19. The Minister of Finance and I are looking at examples of those who are caught within the framework regarding how we can handle the obligations they have in the market-place. We will grandfather it.

Obviously, this comes down to one issue. By the way, if the hon. member reads the various editorial comments, most importantly in The Northern Miner, she will find that even people who know the mining industry, who are in the mining industry, who first of all criticized CEIP, then said that we should get rid of CEIP because it was not working and often seen more as a tax saving process than actual work for the industry. It is for those reasons that it has been done and it is for those reasons we will grandfather it in a fair way.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I have two suggestions that will not cost her a cent and will help women greatly.

Despite Canada's support for UN conventions that oppose discrimination, she will know that immigrant and visible minority women in Canada still experience double discrimination right here in Canada. Domestic workers face exploitation and abuse and low paid jobs with little time off and no future.

Will the minister introduce enforcement mechanisms to protect domestics from abusive employers? Will she also make it easier for domestics to become landed immigrants?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member is a little bit out of date. As I have announced publicly, we have already undertaken a review of the foreign domestic program. The foreign domestic program is an improvement over the kind of entry level job that we had before it was introduced. It is not working as well as this government would like it to work even though there is provision in the program for upgrading of training and landing of people who come as domestics. I want to improve the program further.

• (1450)

We have undertaken extensive consultations with immigrant women's groups across Canada, including a couple of groups from the hon. member's own city. I hope to be announcing changes to the program in the not too distant future.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the minister that women's groups indeed are still writing of their concern in this area and we want action. Today would have been an ideal day to have that action.

Immigrant women who need language training while they are at home with their young children find that the Settlement Language Training Program of the minister's department is a good program but is really too selective in choosing participants and training programs lack continuity.

Will the minister consult immigrant women's groups about this matter and will she adopt guidelines to make this important program more effective?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again this is a program that was introduced by this government. Language training for women who remained at home was something that had not existed before. It was introduced as a pilot project and is in the process of becoming a permanent program with additional funding. We will continue, as we have from the beginning, to consult with immigrant women's groups across Canada to ensure that we continue to make it better.

Let me remind the hon. member that the programs for women, and particularly immigrant women and women in some of the more sensitive areas of doubly disadvantaged groups, are not something one waves a banner for on International Women's Day. They are something we work at every single day, all year long.

EQUALITY OF WOMEN

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women. Since 1984 women in this country have been looking to this government for leadership in establishing a greater degree of equality and fairness in our society. Can the minister tell this House what this government has done and what this government is prepared to do to help the women of Canada attain the equality they seek and deserve?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question. Unfortunately it would take me an hour to outline the kinds of initiatives that this government has taken and will be taking to ensure equality.

Let me just mention a couple taken in the last five years, things that I have been involved in as a Member of Parliament which I think have been terribly important. There were the amendments to the Indian Act to give native women back their rights. There were the amendments to the Family Orders Enforcement Assistance Act to ensure that we can go after those who abandon their families. There has been the introduction of employment equity. We have heard today from the Minister of Employment and Immigration on the work for immigrant women.

There are a whole variety of initiatives, legislation and actions which we have undertaken and will continue to undertake to ensure women's equality in this country.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the minister asked for the facts. Well, they are clear and they are on the record. The Chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission, Peter Lush, admits that he is in a conflict of interest. He has declared that he would not have become a commissioner if it meant giving up his exclusive listings which the harbour commissioner was interested in.

Why doesn't the minister advise the Prime Minister to put Mr. Lush out of his misery and call for his resignation?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am going to repeat the suggestion I made yesterday. If my hon. friend, who wishes to slander people within this House, has evidence of a conflict of interest why doesn't he present it to me and I will look into it?

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister is telling Canadians that an appointed commissioner can also be an exclusive agent for property the Harbour Commission wants to buy. In effect, this minister is telling Canadians, "Listen boys, you can have your cake and you can eat it too".

How can the minister assert that such behaviour meets the Prime Minister's standards regarding conflict of interest?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there was an allegation of conflict of interest at an earlier time which was fully examined and vetted by the counsel for the Harbour Commission and it was found that there was no conflict of interest.

If my hon. friend has evidence of a conflict of interest, why does he not go outside the door, why doesn't he leave his parliamentary immunity and go outside and make that allegation? Make the allegation outside.

INVESTMENT CANADA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House assume that the appointment of a new Minister of Industry, Science and Technology signals a major change in government policy. We congratulate the new minister on his promotion. We only hope that industry does not go the way of the VIA Rail.

Last year, foreigners took over a record 376 Canadian corporations in the first nine months alone. Last year, foreign companies brought into Canada $3.4 billion, but they took out over $22 billion in interest and dividends alone.

When is this government going to say no? When is it going to stop this fire sale of Canadian companies? When is it going to stop this haemorrhaging of Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his comments. I particularly appreciate the word "promotion". We never know in this job whether it is a promotion or a demotion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) Investment Canada which, as the hon. member knows very well, deals with any foreign investment in Canada has done a very good job since 1985 and it will continue to do so. In the case to which my hon. friend refers, he knows very well that the Energy Board of Ontario has also to give its consent. I believe that it would be normal practice to await the recommendation of both before making a decision.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, as for Investment Canada's record, since it was formed in July of 1985 there has been not one single turndown. The score card now reads: Foreigners, 789; Canadians, zero.

Is there one single Canadian company that this government is not prepared to see fall into the hands of foreigners?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, regrettably, the hon. member is wrong in his assertion that Investment Canada has not refused any investment proposals. During the two years that Investment Canada proceeded under the Liberal Party there was no major refusal either.

SEXUAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and I want to congratulate her on her appointment as Minister of Justice.

Four years ago this week, the Conservative government responded to the unanimous report of the Special Committee on Equality Rights by promising that the government will take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination in relation to all areas of federal jurisdiction.

In view of the fact that lesbians and gay men continue to be victims of discrimination, of harassment and of increasing levels of violence, and in view of the recent call by the ad hoc parliamentary committee on AIDS for urgent action on this recommendation, when will the minister's government finally move to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation?

• (1500)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes on my appointment.

The hon. member will be aware that the Canadian Human Rights Act is now under a comprehensive review in the Department of Justice. My tenure in the department is not sufficiently long that I am able to give him a full report on the status of that review.

I think it is important to point out that the government's commitment in 1986 with respect to sexual orientation was to do whatever is required. The government has taken the position that it is covered by Section 15 of the Charter.

I hope to report further on the review of the Canadian Human Rights Act as soon as it is ready to be reported to the House.

Mr. Speaker: A short supplemental, please.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, of course Section 15 of the Charter does not apply within federal private jurisdiction.

My supplementary question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence and the Minister responsible for the status of women.

The minister knows that the Canadian Armed Forces has a policy of overt discrimination against lesbians and gay men. The minister herself, as a member of the equality rights committee in 1985, condemned that policy.

In view of this discriminatory policy, when will the Government of Canada finally move to end discrimination based on sexual orientation within the Canadian Armed Forces? When will the Armed Forces follow the lead of the RCMP and stop discriminating against men and women who happen to be lesbians or gay?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware that it was my predecessor in this position who suspended certain aspects of that policy pending a government-wide review of policy on this issue.

As my colleague has indicated, that review is still under way. Of course, when it is completed, our department will be involved in it and will be responsible for implementing the results of it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Opposition would like to ask the usual business question. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): You have read my mind, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the government House leader—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member speaking to me said: "You have read my mind". I thought to myself, I do it all the time.

Mr. Gauthier: You must be getting headaches.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the government House leader what business he will bring to the House next week. Can he tell us what business he intends to bring to the House tomorrow, next week and until Thursday, if possible?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, we will complete debate on the budgetary policy, and tomorrow, Friday, we will begin debate, at the report stage, on Bill C-5, and then proceed to second reading of Bill C-57.

Next week, I intend to proceed with government order No. 21 concerning Bill C-21, and then with debate, at the report stage, on Bill C-48.

Next Thursday will be an allotted day.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the government's announcement concerning the business for Monday next when I take it we will be dealing with the message from the Senate concerning Bill C-21.

I should like to make a request of the government, and I do this in good faith. A notice to the House is usually given with respect to every government initiative that I know of. The notice to the House gives the government's position or what the motion will be. Thus there is notice given to the members of this House as to the position to be debated.

In the case of the message here, I think it is quite acceptable that it has been the tradition of the House that the minister speaking first in the debate will speak to the message given by the Senate and then will propose a motion at the end of his remarks, at which time opposition members and those other members interested have to respond.

For the sake of good and possibly more effective debate, would the minister be willing to give notice tomorrow on the Order Paper of the government's position vis-à-vis the message from the Senate so that we can adjust our speeches accordingly?

Mr. Andre: If we could have assurances of good and meaningful debate, I would give the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition all the notice in the world. However, I see no advantage in terms of accomplishing what we want to accomplish by trying to surprise the House by way of the contents of that motion. I will endeavour to give as much warning as I possibly can in terms of that motion.

Suffice it to say it will not be that we accept the amendments from the Senate. However, I will endeavour to supply the details as soon as possible, quite probably tomorrow. There is no desire on my part to keep it as a surprise until Monday.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, could the government House leader indicate to us whether one of the items that will be before Parliament next week, in addition to the items that he has already raised, would be the introduction of the legislation promised by the Minister of the Environment dealing with the environmental assessment review process. Will that be tabled next week?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member the assurance that it will be done next week. I can give him the assurance that the Minister of the Environment is proceeding with it as quickly as possible and we will bring it forward as quickly as possible. I cannot assure him that it will be ready next week.

POINT OF ORDER

BUDGET DEBATE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Monday, March 5, 1990, the hon. member for Kamloops rose on a point of order to suggest that the debate on the budget be suspended and that the Chair review the government bill currently on notice entitled "an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures", and determine whether or not the House should proceed with that bill at this time.

In his submission the hon. member noted that the Government of British Columbia has approached the Court of Appeal to ask for a ruling on the legitimacy of one of the components of the budget, namely proposed changes to the Canada Assistance Plan Act and the responsibility of the Government of Canada under its terms.

He also noted that historically the House has by the sub judice convention restrained itself from discussing questions which are before the courts when such a discussion would prejudice the outcome of those proceedings.

In his presentation the hon. House leader for the New Democratic Party made reference to Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 508(4) which states:

> (4) The reference of a bill to the Supreme Court of Canada withdraws that bill temporarily from the jurisdiction of Parliament—The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time.

He also referred to the ruling upon which this citation is based.

As I indicated on Monday, I have given careful consideration to this reference, the ruling and the proceedings on which this citation is based, that is the citation which was given to me as the basis of the argument put forward by the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party. I wish to speak to this in some detail, and I will return to it in a few moments.

I would, however, like to thank the hon. member for his submission. As well, I would like to thank the hon. government House leader and the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for their comments. All were helpful to the Chair.

I would first like to make a few remarks concerning the sub judice convention and the right of the House to legislate. Then I will deal with the citation in Beauchesne's.

[Translation]

It is accepted practice that, in the interests of justice and fair play, certain restrictions should be placed on the freedom of members of Parliament to make reference in the course of debate to sub judice matters and that such matters should not be the subject of motions or questions in the House. Though poorly defined, the interpretation of this convention is left to the Speaker. In Canada, the word "convention" is used as no "rule" exists to prevent Parliament from discussing a matter which is sub judice, that is "under the consideration of a judge or court". The acceptance of a restriction is a voluntary restraint on the part of Parliament to protect an accused person or other party to court action or judicial inquiry from suffering any prejudicial effect from public discussion of the issue. While certain precedents exist for the guidance of the Chair, no attempt has ever been made to codify the practice in Canada. Though the First Report to the House of the Special Committee on Rights and Immunities of Members, presented to the House on April 29, 1977, provides some guidance for the Chair, uncertainty still surrounds Canadian practice.

• (1510)

[English]

The purpose of the sub judice convention is twofold: to protect interested parties in a court proceeding and to maintain a separation and mutual respect between the legislative and judicial branches of government.

In Canada there are some situations in which the application of the sub judice convention has been fairly straightforward. All of the principal procedural authorities, including Erskine May, Bourinot and Beauchesne, agree that the convention does not apply to bills as the right of Parliament to legislate must not be limited.

This has been confirmed in the House by a ruling of October 4, 1971. In that ruling Speaker Lamoureux noted that no legal proceeding initiated in a court of law in Canada, be it by way of writ of mandamus or any other writ, should prevent the House of Commons or Parliament from continuing or even initiating the discussion of legislation.

In that same ruling he also pointed out that should the House take the view that the sub judice convention applied to bills, the whole legislative process might be stopped simply by the initiation of a writ or legal proceedings in one or other of the courts of Canada. This, he noted, would place Parliament in an intolerable situation.

[Translation]

Where criminal cases are concerned, the precedents are consistent in barring reference to such matters before judgment has been rendered and during any appeal. As I noted on Monday, I have had to deal with the sub judice convention with respect to criminal matters before, and I think that position is quite clear.

[English]

Our practices as regards civil cases are less certain, however. The Chair has warned on various occasions of the need for caution in referring to matters pending judicial decisions whatever the nature of the court.

However, on February 11, 1976 Speaker Jerome ruled that no restriction ought to exist on the right of any member to put questions respecting any matter before the courts, particularly those relating to a civil matter, unless and until that matter is at least at trial. This view I reiterated in a ruling given on December 7, 1987.

As the debate on the budget is generally wide-ranging and touches upon all aspects of the government's budgetary policy, members are at liberty to debate or not debate whatever aspect of the motion they choose. Therefore I must rule that the sub judice convention does not apply in the present circumstances.

Speaker's Ruling

In his submission the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party made reference to citation 508(4) of Beauchesne's sixth edition which, as I noted a moment ago, states:

> The reference of a bill to the Supreme Court of Canada withdraws that bill temporarily from the jurisdiction of Parliament—The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time.

I have to say to the House that having heard that in argument it immediately gave me great difficulty because there sits a statement which, at least on the surface, seems to be clear indeed and seems to be very much in favour of the proposition being put forward by the hon. House leader. I must say that whatever side of the House one might be on on this question, a citation like that in Beauchesne's would I think completely justify the argument being presented to the Speaker.

This citation is apparently based on a ruling by Speaker Fauteux given on April 12, 1948, at page 344 of the Journals. Citation 508(4) is a truncation of Citation 338(4) of Beauchesne's fifth edition, which is itself a truncation of Citation 153 of the fourth edition. If members are having some difficulty with this I assure them so does the Speaker. Truncation is a polite way of putting what could be put in other terms.

I now quote:

> The reference of a Bill to the Supreme Court of Canada withdraws that Bill temporarily from the jurisdiction of Parliament. On April 12, 1948, the Prime Minister moved that a select committee be set up to consider, inter alia, what is the legal and constitutional situation in Canada with respect to human rights and fundamental freedoms. Mr. Diefenbaker moved in amendment that, in order to assist the committee, the government submit immediately, to the Supreme Court of Canada such questions as are necessary to determine to what extent the preservation of the fundamental freedoms of religion, speech, press, assembly and the maintenance of constitutional safeguards of the individual are matters of federal jurisdiction. The Speaker said: "This amendment actually proposes that the Supreme Court be asked to consider the same matter that the main motion proposes to refer to a select committee. It seems to me that both those propositions cannot be approved at the same time by the House. If the constitutional situation of human rights is submitted to the Supreme Court it thereby becomes sub judice and cannot be considered by the Committee until the Court has given its decision. The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time. For this reason I feel bound to rule the amendment out of order.

Having reviewed Speaker Fauteux's original ruling and the matter under debate in 1948, I have concluded that there is a serious flaw in the Beauchesne's citation in the fourth edition which has been compounded in the fifth and sixth editions. That of course refers to the word truncation which I mentioned earlier.

I do not feel that the citation is at all applicable. As the case before the Speaker in 1948 dealt with a motion and not a bill, I would like to summarize the situation then and set the record straight as regards this citation in Beauchesne's.

[Translation]

On April 9, 1948, the House began debate on a motion to set up a special committee to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the manner in which those obligations accepted by all member states of the United Nations might best be implemented in Canada. This was the same motion as a resolution passed by the House in the previous session on Monday, May 26, 1947 and was based on a report of that committee which recommended that a Joint Committee be set up early in the next session to continue the study of this matter.

[English]

During debate on the night of April 9, 1948, Mr. John George Diefenbaker proposed an amendment to the motion that the government immediately submit to the Supreme Court such questions as were necessary to determine to what extent the preservation of the fundamental freedoms of religion, speech, press, assembly and the maintenance of constitutional safeguards of the individual were matters of federal jurisdiction.

On Monday, April 12, 1948, debate on the motion and the proposed amendment resumed. The Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who was then Minister of Justice, rose on a point of order to challenge the procedural acceptability of the amendment of Mr. Diefenbaker, arguing that since the amendment did not add to the duties, functions or purposes of the committee but directed the government to perform a duty, it was a separate motion and not an amendment.

In addition, he also argued that the function of the committee was to consider what the legal and constitutional situation was in Canada with respect to human rights.

• (1520)

The object of the amendment was to take this function away from the committee and place it instead with the Supreme Court of Canada. If that reference were made to the Supreme Court, the matter would then become sub judice and the committee would be unable to proceed during the time the matter was to be considered by the Supreme Court. The two proposals could not exist in the same resolution.

[Translation]

In his ruling, Speaker Fauteux accepted the arguments of the Minister of Justice, that the proposed amendment would ask the Supreme Court to consider the same matter that the main motion would refer to a Committee. He stated:

> It seems to me that both those propositions cannot be approved at the same time by the House. If the constitutional situation of human rights is submitted to the Supreme Court, it thereby becomes sub judice and cannot be considered by the committee until the court has given its decision. The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time. For this reason, I feel bound to rule the amendment out of order.

[English]

As we can see, the emphasis in Speaker Fauteux's ruling was that the amendment proposed by Mr. Diefenbaker was a distinct proposition which should have been dealt with by means of a separate motion and therefore was out of order. The implications in the citation in Beauchesne's fourth, fifth and sixth editions, which casts the problem in terms of the reference of a bill to the Supreme Court, implies that the House is prevented from dealing with legislation on any matter before the courts.

I have no quarrel with the argument that was put on the basis of the citation. If I had been in the same position as those who had to consider the matter, I most certainly would have taken that citation and used it as the basis of an argument.

However, this in my view is an extraneous commentary by Beauchesne. The wording of the citation in the subsequent editions compounds the error. In addition, there is a clear contradiction between citations 338(3) and 338(4) in the fifth edition and citations 508(3) and 508(4) in the sixth edition. In the former citations in both editions it specifically states that the convention does not apply to bills. Citation 338(3) of the fifth edition, which is repeated in the sixth edition, is based upon the 1971 ruling of Speaker Lamoureux to which I have already referred.

Having examined the precedents carefully and having reviewed the Canadian practice on the sub judice convention, the Chair has concluded that there is no legitimate basis for it to intervene as the hon. member has suggested.

However, I would like to thank all those members who participated in this discussion, and in particular the hon. member for Kamloops for raising this most interesting matter and allowing the Chair to clarify these issues. Again, as I have complimented the hon. member in the past, the argument was succinct, to the point, and very cogent indeed.

I have given this matter a lot of very serious consideration and I hope the House is satisfied with my judgment.

The hon. member for Skeena is rising on a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be succinct and brief and cogent. This is a matter in which I hope you will take the time to review the record.

This is a matter concerning a motion involving a request to have an inventory of Canada's old growth forests taken and to set aside 12 per cent.

I took this motion to the environment committee where we were hearing witnesses on the matter. For reasons that were never put on the record, the chairman, the member for Rosedale who is here, chose not to put the motion to a vote. At that point I sought the advice of the Table here and was advised that the motion was in order. I sought the advice of the Deputy Speaker and was advised that it was in order.

Yesterday afternoon at four o'clock I chose to take the same motion to the subcommittee on forestry chaired by the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury, who is also here, and tried to put the same motion.

The point of order I wish you to look at, Mr. Speaker, is whether or not it is appropriate for the Chair of a committee to refuse to allow a member of the House to even put a motion. The Chair refused to allow it to be put, at which time I appealed. It was a tie vote which was subsequently broken by the chair.

It seems to me that the point of order or question of privilege, which ever it may be, that needs to be reviewed is whether or not it is improper to rule out of order a motion that has never been allowed to be put. It seems to me a rather bizarre ruling for the chair to take and one that certainly does not allow a member to peruse his or her democratic rights as a member of the committee.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member for Skeena is referring to the forestry committee meeting of yesterday or the environment committee meeting of the day before. There seems to be some confusion. Perhaps he would want to clarify that.

I would be quite happy to refer to the record of the committee which met on Tuesday. As the member will know, we began at 8.30 a.m. to hear six witnesses and it ran with some intermission for the House and other matters until the time of the vote on the amendment to the budget motion.

The member brought the motion to me and did not have an opportunity either to present it or speak to it until we were literally adjourning because of the vote in the House on the amendment to budget.

At that time as the member will recall, and I have the transcript before me, before the hon. member for Skeena even put the motion I said: "While on the motion, Mr. Fulton, I have had a brief opportunity to examine it. I think the committee is in a considerable difficulty as I read the motion. It in many ways has repeated the motion that you yourself presented in the House which then came to a vote and was defeated. I think that I would like to take the whole matter of the motion under advisement".

That is basically what I said. I think I repeated it several times. I will not burden the House with repeating it. I made it very clear to all members of the committee that I would look at it to make sure that it was in order.

At no time did I rule the motion out of order and the motion was of course not put. I was prepared to give a ruling at nine o'clock this morning. Unfortunately, the member for Skeena was not present. In respect for his interest in this issue I stood the motion until such time as he is present. At that time I am prepared both to make a ruling and to deal with the motion.

I am sorry that the member did not confer with me at any time since the meeting on Tuesday to know that that would be the case.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the member has taken the time to clarify. I think there is more on the record that could be read. I simply want to make it clear the concern that I have is not with the environment committee, although the member would certainly want to make clear that I did distribute the motion in writing to every member of the committee more than an hour prior to requesting that the vote be taken. I think the record will confirm that.

The point that I was raising was in relation to the ruling out of order of a motion. It was in fact exactly the same motion, but it was ruled out of order before it could ever even be read into the record. It was never even allowed to be put before it was ruled out of order.

I see the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury here. Perhaps he would like to explain how it is that a motion that has not been put can be ruled out of order.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury, who is by the way a very fine fishing companion of the Speaker, wishes to engage in this debate, I will of course permit him to do so. I must counsel all members of the House that this is going beyond either privilege or order, but I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for that kind commendation. Even the hon. member for Skeena would recognize that a fine fisherman is never all wrong.

The hon. member for Skeena came to the meeting of the forestry subcommittee yesterday for the first time. He came and gave me veiled warnings or advice as to what he had in mind.

I heard the first paragraph of the motion, which was exactly the same motion he had presented the day before to the environment committee at which I was present, as were at least two other members of the forestry subcommittee. It was apparent what the motion was.

We had before us four citizens of British Columbia, all of whom we had suspected were going back last evening. We had two hours to hear them. I suggested to the hon. member that our forestry subcommittee had a very specific reference from the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries. It did not include dealing with a matter such as that. The very first paragraph of the motion made it clear that it was not within the terms of reference of our subcommittee. Thus I ruled it out of order. The hon. member appealed and sought the support of the committee which he did not receive.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: First of all, the hon. member has now made clear to the whole nation exactly what motion he wished to put forward and I suppose the nation can stand in judgment on whether or not it is accepted. There seems to be some indication from at least one of the chairmen of one of the committees that perhaps after some discussion the hon. member might find that his motion would be accepted. I thank the hon. member for his intervention.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap has given me written notice that he will be unable to be present to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Friday, March 9, 1990. Since it has been impossible to arrange for an exchange of positions in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94, I instruct the Table to place this matter at the bottom of the order of precedence.

Private Members' Hour shall therefore be suspended and, in accordance with Standing Order 94, the House shall continue with the business before it prior to the said hour.

Mr. Gauthier: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: I have just heard your ruling or your comments, Madam Speaker. I have personal reservations concerning two items slated to come before the House during Private Members' Hour. There are two bills, items numbers 3 and 8, which come from the Senate, that is S–11 and S–9.

Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the House might be prepared to proceed with the consideration of these two bills so we could dispose of them. We are given to understand that somebody has decided we cannot go ahead with these items because a recorded vote might be called. If that is the reason, I should like to know because I think we could deal with both Bills S–11 and S–9 in short order tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am sorry, I was delayed at the Table when these discussions began and I missed part of it.

Perhaps I might offer a solution to the House. Could we have the consent of the House, if it would be in order, to call S–5 for Private Members' Business even though the hon. member would not be here? I have been involved with that bill and could work with him on it. Perhaps we could go by consent to deal with S–5 which is the one regarding the Salvation Army.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to derail the proposal but before I could grant unanimous consent I would like to have an opportunity to do a quick review because I did not hear you in the only language I understand, which is my problem not that of the House, but I would like an opportunity to consult if I could.

Mr. Gauthier: For the assistance of members, Madam Speaker, I just want to remind members that indeed when a member cannot proceed with the appropriate motion or bill at the time of the calling of that bill, I understand the clerks telephone other people down the list to inquire if they are ready to proceed.

The exception is when a motion or a bill is up for a vote. According to my understanding of the rules, that cannot be moved up higher on the list than it is at that time.

My only question to you, and that is why I raised it, is that S–11 and S–9 are Senate initiatives which are not necessarily going to be the objects of a vote here, unless somebody has decided somewhere without my knowledge, and I thought we could proceed tomorrow with study of those two items. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, for clarification, could the parliamentary secretary indicate exactly which Senate motion or bill that he wants brought forward for discussion tomorrow? Is it S-5 or S-9?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, it is S-9, an act to amalgamate the two corporations known, respectively, as "The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada East" and "The Governing Council of the Salvation Army, Canada West".

There have been considerable discussions on this bill between the three parties and it was my understanding at the last conversations, although none of them are current to these proposals, that all three parties were supporting the bill and that it would go forward without a vote. I do not think we are proposing anything that causes any problem to any party in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I thank all hon. members for their help. The problem is as follows: as far as S-9 is concerned, the hon. member in whose name the bill stands has refused for us to proceed as he will not be able to be here. So, that settles the question as far as S-9 is concerned.

Bill S-11, as the House may realize, is in front of the committee. We could not proceed with S-11, which is why I had to instruct the Table that we could not proceed with Private Members' Business tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before Statements by Members and Question Period the Hon. Member for Rosedale had the floor. He had three minutes left.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, in the few minutes I have remaining I will simply deal with a couple of matters which I had been addressing before we moved to statements and Question Period.

In looking at this budget it is very important to realize that it is a federal budget. It is a budget that recognizes that, in this country particularly, the national management of the country's economic good health cannot happen in some kind of an isolated vacuum.

There are two charts which I think speak loud and clear about the necessity of achieving some kind of fiscal balance in this country which is very important to our future economic and social health. One relates to program expenditures. On page 127 on the English side of this budget presentation, there is a very interesting graph which depicts the statistical situation we are in.

In the course of the last five years, since the mid-eighties, there has been an average increase in provincial expenditures for program activity of some 6.4 per cent, while on the federal side it has been held to 3.6 per cent, which is almost half the provincial average. In some cases, that expenditure has been a good deal higher, particularly in the province of Ontario, where it has been closer to 10 per cent, at 9.5 per cent.

If we look at the opposite page, showing the situation in respect of debt charges, the picture becomes even more dramatic. It is well known to everybody in this Chamber, and in fact now to many in the Canadian public, that our federal debt charges are 35.1 cents; that is one-third of every dollar. But the average on a provincial basis is a little over 10 cents, 11.8 cents. That is a dramatic difference.

The figures on those two charts tells us something. For the better part of the last five years, we have been in a situation where the federal government has been carrying an inordinate load in almost every aspect of program activity and expenditure. What has been attempted over the course of the last five years is to redress that balance in some kind of responsible manner.

We have put caps on some programs, not all, and in particular in those provinces which are in the strongest fiscal position to take it, in order that we can achieve some kind of balance.

• (1540)

I think that is very important. A lot has been made of the fact that there are no additional taxes in this budget, but I would say it is almost as important in terms of the future that some kind of balance is being attempted.

Over-all, this is a budget that is as much for the future as it is for the present. I have heard virtually no acknowledgement of that from the opposite side of the House. They have spent their time attacking the budget for doing the very kinds of things that are important to our future. I think our future is important, as I said, not only for economic reasons, but obviously for environmental ones.

I referred to the importance of the environmental legacy. We will have major responsibilities on our plate for the next 10 years in the environmental area. We will in no way be able to meet them unless we get our fiscal house in order and that, I believe, is the priority in this budget.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions and comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Montmorency—Orléans.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orleans): Madam Speaker, at the outset of my brief remark I would certainly like to pay tribute to the Minister of Finance who for a number of months has been defending day after day with competence and authority, this government's monetary policy. Day in and day out, during each oral question period, the Minister of Finance in his calm and competent way has been defending the political will that is at the core of this government's action, the will to stabilize government finance.

In that respect, I am very pleased to praise the performance of the Minister of Finance who last Monday, during a coast-to-coast TV debate in Edmonton, literally thrashed the Liberal finance critic.

Let me simply quote from the numerous observers who chose the Minister of Finance as the winner, as for instance Mr. Mark Lisac from the Edmonton Journal who said: "Next time the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce invites the Minister of Finance they should choose as an opponent someone of his intellectual calibre, or of a comparable intellectual level."

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise on this sixth and last budget day to say how much I personally endorse and will vote for this government's fiscal policy.

What I find most interesting, although little known to the Canadian public, is that for a fourth consecutive year, this government I am proud to be part of will record a surplus on its operating budget. It is very often forgotten that, obsessed by the national debt, in the day-to-day government operations, if we add up revenues and expenditures, this Conservative Government, contrary to the previous Liberal governments, has been recording a surplus for some years. The surplus for this year is $9 billion and for fiscal 1990-91, it will be $12 billion.

But, and therein lies the problem, we were left with a poisoned legacy, a legacy that the opposition across the aisle and especially the Official Opposition—either through bad faith, blindness or absent mindedness chose to ignore, namely heavy debt we have inherited and which has doubled in a matter of six years. I am not afraid to acknowledge that. But 80 per cent of that twofold increase are due to compound interests on the debt—they are not of our making. And in that respect, it is interesting to note the comments— As you know, I am a former newspaperman, Madam Speaker, and it is interesting in that respect to quote from people who are not on the Conservative Party payroll. I am thinking in particular of Claude Piché, of La Presse, who is commending the Conservative Government for their efforts in stabilizing public finance. This is what he has to say: "We may lament on the current financial situation, especially the debt, but the only thing we can blame the Conservatives for is the promise they made when they were in opposition to tackle the debt cancer. They did not succeed but—and this is important—nobody can say they did not try. And on this point, he said that the debt was the fault of the Liberal government, which between 1970 and 1984 increased spending at an average annual rate of 14 to 17 per cent, while the latest Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance provides for a spending increase of only 3 per cent. This means a net drop in spending, if we account for inflation. If we consider that inflation was around 5 per cent, the government's real expenditures have dropped 2 per cent.

I doubt anyone could do better today, in these difficult times, with a budget that does not hit the disadvantaged or people on low incomes. I stand by what I just said. And I think that with our GST proposal we are doing something to protect those who are least advantaged, people earning less than $30,000. I hear the leader of the NDP rushing to defend senior citizens. When I talk to my seniors, I tell them that this is the kind of tax reform no previous governnment had the guts to introduce, a reform that was recommended by many commissions in the past 40 years, and that we are going to implement this reform even if it is unpopular in the short term, and that they are protected. Popularity is not important in the short term. A real politician is interested in the long-term view.

By the way, I have some news that might interest you, Madam Speaker. In the latest issue of Business Week which is now on the newstands, we see that the Government of Ontario, which objected very strenuously to the Free Trade Agreement, is paying for a $600,000 ad. It consists of 8 pages of advertising marked Ontario, with a photograph of the Premier who says how important it is for Americans to take advantage of free trade and come and invest in Canada.

[English]

"Under the free trade agreement, most goods move between Ontario and the U.S. without tariffs."

[Translation]

Here is what I think: the Liberals do not have the guts to risk losing popularity in the short term. You know, undertaking a tax reform never brings popularity. They will be the first, in two or three years, to recognize the validity of this tax reform and of the goods and services tax.

That amuses me, Madam Speaker. It was reported in the newspapers the other day that one of the leadership candidates, the hon. member for Lasalle—Émard, promises to scrap the GST if he becomes prime minister. And if you take the time to read the article, you will see this: "When we come into office in 1992, I will send the GST back to the drawing board", says Mr. Martin, and here comes the interesting part, and I quote: "if it has not already been integrated with the provincial system and if it is possible to abolish it." That kind of political courage is hard to beat. Yesterday, the Globe & Mail could not do better than this:

[English]

"Confusion increasing over Liberal GST stand."

[Translation]

It is utter confusion. The Liberal leadership candidates are talking as if there were no deficit problem. They bluster about the environment, youth and so on and so forth, but when they are asked what their proposals are on this capital problem, zilch. Bury your head in the sand as much as you want, that will not make anybody forget these figures: each newborn Canadian is $13 400 in the red. The interest charges on the debt accumulate at the rate of $1,300 a second. I have now been on my feet for four minutes, Madam Speaker. The interest costs for those four minutes have been $12 million. Such is in practical terms the problem we have to face. I think it is extraordinary—

Mr. Robichaud: The cost is much higher.

Mr. DeBlois: I very much appreciate the comments of the member across the way. I think it is extraordinary that the Minister of Finance has succeeded—personally I would have gone even further—in his belt-tightening approach and I think he acted with proper judgment. This year he is asking the provinces to make a special effort.

You will even notice the average rate of increase in provincial expenditures has been about 6.5 per cent for a number of years while those of the government to which I am proud to belong have been increasing at the rate of about 3 per cent over the past four years or so. Can you beat that?

• (1550)

In this regard, Madam Speaker, I believe we demonstrated responsible management. Along the same line I was using a moment ago, there is an editorial in the last issue of Les Affaires entitled: The poisoned legacy of the Trudeau team, signed by columnist Jean-Paul Gagné, which says: "The national debt which was $321 billion on March 31st, 1989, will exceed $350 billion on March 31st of next year. Out of the $152 billion added to the debt since 1984, only 32 billion can be charged to the Mulroney-Wilson administration, but it is still too much. The balance, $120 billion, comes from compounded interest on the debt left by the Trudeau team". It is important that people know that. We are stuck with this cancer, we are stuck with this poisoned legacy. We are trying, we are waging our political future on our will to improve public finance, and I hope that members opposite, whether from the Official Opposition or the NDP, will present alternatives. We are proposing a fiscal reform which, I sincerely believe, will in the end win us consideration and respect of Canadians who will see the value of our reform.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, let me at the outset apologize for being unable to put this question in any language other than English. It is my own failing.

I listened through translation however with fascination as the hon. member detailed his claim that all of the people he is talking to in his home riding and his home province are in fact in favour of la TPS, that the support that it enjoys is commensurate with his estimation of its propriety.

This, I must confess, quite puzzles me because it is my understanding that the results of a Gallup poll undertaken in the province of Quebec that were published about a month ago, showed about 70 per cent of Quebecers in strong opposition to the—

An hon. member: Who is right?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I am getting to that. Madam Speaker, it is an intolerable thing when one is heckled by one's own benches.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair must agree with the hon. member on this point. I would also like to remind the hon. member, if I may, that this is only a five minute question and comment period. To allow the member who just finished his speech to answer, maybe the hon. member for Edmonton East would put his question.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Forgive me, Madam Speaker. I shall proceed with celerity. Acknowledging that, for example, his children must be expected to support their father as must his spouse and presumably other members of his family, I am wondering where he gets the rest of these people who are so obviously out of tune with the 70 per cent overwhelming majority of Quebecers.

[Translation]

Mr. DeBlois: I would like to thank the colourful Member for Edmonton East for his question. In fact, it is a very easy one to answer. If you ask people: "Are you in favour of a goods and services tax?", I would be the first one to say no. But, if you let me explain— New Zealand's experience in this regard is very interesting. As that country's former Minister of Finance told the Finance Committee, three months before the GST was introduced, 66 per cent of New Zealanders were against the tax. Two months later, the proportion was reversed: two thirds of the people supported the GST. We are willing to bet that, once the GST has been implemented and the opposition has stopped its witch hunt, people will see that the world did not come to an end and that, on the contrary, we will be better off thanks to increasing exports and to a much more consistent and balanced tax reform.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, today I am making my maiden speech as the elected member of Parliament for the riding of Chambly. I would like to take a moment to say how proud I am to be here among my colleagues, several of whom I already know on both sides of the House. I would also like to thank those who helped me get elected in the riding of Chambly and especially my wife, Michelle, and the militant women in the riding.

In Chambly, we have been particularly affected by the budget of the Minister of Finance and we believe that, in a sense, this budget is what we would call a separatist budget. I will explain.

It is separatist in the sense that the government is trying to shirk its obligations towards the provinces. It is a strange way to sell federalism and it is even the opposite of what I call profitable federalism.

Regarding the importance of the Meech Lake Accord, even in today's context where Newfoundland has proposed to withdraw her support, we, in Chambly, like many others in Quebec think this rejection of the agreement is directly tied to the Finance Minister's budget. I will explain why the Wilson budget does a bad job of selling federalism to Canadians.

One resident of Richelieu in my riding of Chambly, a farmer, told me the Wilson budget is a little like a man who brings his family to a restaurant, tells them to order whatever they wish, eats and drinks more than anybody else and is quite content, but sneaks out when time comes to pick up the tab. He is nowhere to be found. That may happen once or twice, perhaps, but after that people will no longer be tempted to share a table with that man. That is how that farmer sees the Wilson Budget.

As far as I am concerned, I see the Budget in the context of the social contract that we, the voters, have with the government. Obviously, I am referring to the social contract which Jean-Jacques Rousseau described as a relationship between the government and the people that should be based on freedom and equality. And I find that the Wilson Budget violates that social contract for different reasons.

In Quebec, for example, there is the GST. I have listened to my hon. collegue for Montmorency—D'Orléans. I admire him for his command of the French language and his so wonderful accent from Orléans Island, but I cannot agree with him on the GST because it seems that in my constituency, the GST is now turning the middle class into and endangered species. It is an unnecessary tax for we have other means of balancing the budget.

• (1600)

The cuts in federal transfer payments to provinces threaten the health of seniors. I have talked with seniors in retirement homes in my riding and these people's concerns are very real. They fear the GST, but that's not all. When I think about the social context in which we live, I fear for seniors, for middle-class people, for our youth, for our students. I think that with the cuts in transfer payments to the province of Quebec, we are mortgaging the future of our youth, especially with regards to postsecondary education. This will have disastrous consequences for our society in Quebec.

So the government puts the burden on middle-class Canadians, who are directly affected by the GST, on seniors and on our youth. Very few people escape these measures.

What a reward for Quebecers! Madam Speaker, the hon. Minister of Finance had a choice. I still remember, some time ago, when he said: "You had the choice". He was talking to Mr. Turner. But this time, it was the Tories' turn to choose. They could have presented an honorable budget respectful of all Canadian citizens, a fair and equitable budget. But they chose not to. It would have been possible because my Conservative friends always ask what are the alternatives. I can name a few. Instead of increasing the defence budget by 5 per cent, they could have cut it by 10 per cent. The US Pentagon has already decided to go that way.

Having spent three years in the armed forces, I know we could save a lot of money in the Defence Department. Sure we could save money, up to $1.2 billion. If we lowered interest rates by two per cent, we could reduce our deficit by $6,2 billion in three years. But I do not ask for the Bank of Canada Governor's resignation because I do not want to stir up a constitutional crisis. However, I think that the government could try to convince him to lower interest rates by at least a few points because right now, there is a five point difference between Canadian and American rates. Never has there been such a gap. It makes for a dangerous situation!

I agree with this proposal made by members of other parties. I remember that even Mr. Chrétien from the Liberal Party said that interest rates should come down.

I am not saying that this idea only come from the New Democrats, or only from the Liberal Party. Even Mr. Bourassa, the premier of Quebec, agrees and he is an economist.

I think you will find there is a consensus on the interest rates being too high and that the Conservatives and this government not having the monopoly of truth should ask themselves: Have we made a mistake here? That's it! Ask yourselves that question instead of saying: Ah, we made the tough decisions, the unpopular decisions. You should not wear a lapel badge saying that you are unpopular because people do not understand you. I for one believe that you are not popular because people understand you too well. They understand that your budget is not in their interest.

Another thing that could be done with this budget would be to levy a minimum corporate tax. I was sitting here and heard the Minister of Finance say: Listen, that is difficult because how can we possibly rate small- and medium-sized companies, major corporations and so on? I think that decision has already been made in the United States; and we have seen precious few American companies go bankrupt as a result of the minimum tax levied against them by Washington.

I noticed with interest last month's increase in the number of bankruptcies in Canada over the previous month, in a country where we have no minimum corporate tax, but with the coming recession we have had 30 per cent more bankruptcies than in the past.

Of course the new approach I am suggesting to the federal government calls for courage, the kind of courage which will restore voters' confidence in federalism. Talking about federalism and courage, I should like to refer briefly to the Meech Lake Accord if only because it did take a certain amount of courage on the part of the government to support Meech Lake, and I commend them for that. It did take some courage from all three political parties here in the House—the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party—to vote in favour of the Meech Lake Accord.

We understand René Lévesque's message that it was worth the risk.

When I quoted René Lévesque, you said: Good heavens, quoting a separatist during a constitutional crisis! I don't see it that way. Let me quote what Mr. Lévesque said in September 1984. I think it sounds very brave and very relevant today. He said: "If federalism could be made to work better than it does, if it could be improved, wouldn't this stifle our basic option and put sovereignty on the backburner? In any case, there is an element of risk. But it is an attractive one, and in any case we cannot afford not to take that risk".

In today's situation, some provinces are not prepared to take that risk, including Newfoundland, and perhaps New Brunswick and Manitoba.

I believe that Canadians must once again find the courage to set aside partisan considerations and their fear of taking this risk. We must support Meech Lake.

• (1610)

As for me, as the member for Chambly, I intend to support Meech Lake, which is the best way, I think, to regain confidence in federalism. I intend to stand up for Quebec, but within the Canadian confederation. I intend to support the Meech Lake Accord and to oppose the GST as well as the new budget tabled by the Minister of Finance. This is the very best way I have found to serve my constituents.

On February 12, the constituents in Chambly sent a very clear message to this House, in Ottawa, which I hope my colleagues on the other side have understood. My constituents are calling for change on the tax issue, including the GST, and on the budget very recently introduced by the Minister of Finance.

And finally, I intend to continue to oppose any action by the federal government to transfer its obligations to the provinces and to make them pay for its blunders. I will oppose that kind of action today and I will oppose it as long as I will sit in the House of Commons. But that will not prevent me from congratulating the government on its good moves. And when the best interests of Quebec are threatened, I will be the first to criticize the government.

[English]

For my English-speaking friends, I would just like to say that it is with great honour that I come here elected as the first NDP Member of Parliament from the Province of Quebec and from the riding of Chambly. It is with a great deal of humility and excitement that I come before you, my peers, in order to explain to you that in Quebec we are an intelligent province. We are an intelligent people and we are a tolerant people.

I am an English-speaking Quebecer elected in a riding 90 per cent French. I speak French with an accent. I find that the chaleur humaine—once again I actually forget my words in English—but the feelings of belonging and a full feeling of being a Quebecer—as an English-speaking Quebecer, I have that in my province. I am not an oppressed minority. I believe in Quebec. I believe in the Meech Lake Accord and my party believes in the Meech Lake Accord.

I believe that in Parliament all three parties have distinguished themselves when it came to the crunch and the moment to vote, which was a most important moment here in Parliament, by putting aside the partisan question, the fear of the unknown, and the false fears, and we said: "The minimum conditions of Quebec must be met. Quebec is important for the rest of Canada. We want Quebec integrated in the Constitution." I am proud of that, and I believe that the other political parties here can be proud of that also.

I trust that in the future Mr. Mulroney will be able to deal with Newfoundland, Manitoba, and New Brunswick so that finally Quebec will gain its place in the Constitution.

[Translation]

Mr. Couture: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the honorable member for Chambly. Our government has slowed down the growth rate of spendings from 14 percent in 1980–84 to 3.6 percent in 1984–88; the latest budget will reduce it further from 3.6 to 3.2 percent. I would like to know what better solutions the honorable member for Chambly has to suggest.

Here is the second part of my question. Instead of a federal sales tax that is hidden, destructive, and very harmful to all Canadian businesses, the smaller ones in particular, I again ask the honorable member for Chambly what his alternative would be.

Mr. Edmonston: First, madam Speaker, about the GST, I must tell you that I do not trust statistics and polls too much, especially not that from government, because I much prefer those from independent sources. A leading article published in The Wall Street Journal on December 26 has made quite an impression on me. My honorable colleague has surely read that article. It was entitled: Ducks Fly North. This fascinating article showed that, after five years in power and despite the fact that its revenues have doubled during that time, the Mulroney government was on the brink of bankruptcy. The Wall Street Journal, this bible of the American businessman, so to speak, has in fact criticized harshly the Mulroney government for its management of Canada's finances. I would suggest that my honorable colleague read the article in question. It was so harsh that the Finance Minister had to write back to The Wall Street Journal to ask for some kind of retraction, which the paper never agreed to offer.

As to the second part of the question, namely how to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, you must understand that it has been increased from 9 to 13 or 13.5 per cent—I am not sure which—by the conservative government, which is responsible for this misfortune striking all Canadians. There must be an alternative to the GST which, according to the increasing number of studies done on this issue, is a dangerous fiscal policy, hurts most Canadians and only benefits the business sector.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the hon. member on his election and on his maiden speech. I remember very well his work as a consumer advocate in Quebec when I was Minister of Consumer Affairs. Obviously, he has continued his good work over the years.

I want to put this question to the hon. member. He is aware of the fact that the budget freezes EPF transfers to the provinces to the extent of $7.4 billion. The cost of the two–year freeze will transfer a burden of $7.4 billion to the provinces. He, like myself, lives in the province of Quebec. We have seen the present situation of health care in the province: emergency wards filled with patients, and nurses on strike because they cannot get a decent wage. I am familiar with the west end of Montreal.

Would he give a lesson to the government members and tell them what these cuts in EPF will mean to health care on the south shore of Montreal, the hospitals, the centres, and the CLSCs, so that they will know what damage is being done to our province by this budget?

• (1620)

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce for his question. I think it is an appropriate one.

First, I would like to say that the GST has had an incredible effect, almost to the extent of making the Prime Minister's prediction that he was going to make a national reconciliation. He has reconciled the government. He has reconciled the population against his government.

It is incredible in the province of Quebec, and I think I probably represent the latest survey by my presence here. I believe that you can easily see that the discontent is so serious that it cuts across party lines. It cuts across linguistic lines. It cuts across the geography of Quebec. I guarantee that if the government does not take the GST away, it will have a tough time finding a safe Conservative seat in the next federal election.

I spoke with Michel Clair, who is the former President of the Treasury Board of Quebec, and who is presently the President of le Centre d'accueil du Québec. He gave me some very distressing figures which would respond specifically to the question of my hon. colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Michel Clair has said that the loss of transfer of payments will mean, first, $300 million this year and $600,000 next year, lost to Quebec. That is almost $1 billion we are losing.

When the Minister of Finance says that there are no new taxes, there are new taxes. He also told me—I have seen this in recent reports in the papers—that what is occurring is that the Quebec government is going to have to make up the difference. Right now the manufacturers have addressed some of the responsible bureaucrats from the provincial Ministry of Finance to see if they cannot get a 6.5 per cent goods and services tax on a provincial basis in Quebec. Those are the taxes of the Wilson budget from the Mulroney government.

Another point I would like to make is that the number of people who are distressed and the overloaded emergency wards are terrible. It is unacceptable. This is going to get worse and not better, according to Michel Clair, because these people will either be turned away or will have to wait unduly across the province because the money is not there.

[Translation]

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the hon. member for Chambly on his election and on his maiden speech. He said that the Wilson budget was a separatist budget, a budget that is not good for federalism and that is against the social contract. He also said that his constituents are against the GST. I want to tell him that my constituents on the west coast are also against this budget. I think that, finally, we have found something that unites our country.

[English]

In other words, we finally found something recently that unifies the country and that is the opposition to the GST.

I want to ask the hon. member a double-headed question. First, he issued alternatives such as a minimum corporate tax, lower interest rates and lower defence spending and I wonder if he had any other ones. Also, I wonder—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Unfortunately, the time for questions and comments is now over. There was a minute-and-a-half left. I thought the hon. member could use it, but the time has now expired.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, on this side of the House, we must ask why this budget, three years after the publication of the Brundtland report, ignores sustainable development. Why, since 1984, is the government retreating on environmental protection? Why does the Environment Department, including this year's increase, receive less than 1 per cent of the federal budget, slipping from fifteenth to sixteenth place on the list of allocations, department by department? That is a shameful record in contrast with the many declarations by this government on sustainable development, including that signed in 1989 by the Prime Minister in The Hague firmly committing Canada to the principle of sustainable development.

We heard about the cancellation of federal funding for the OSLO oil sands project. Why? To save money, not to save the environment. Because of the deficit, not because of global warming. In fact, the energy minister recently assured the oil industry that if oil prices go up, the federal government may again spend millions of taxpayers' money.

The Calgary Herald in a commentary a few days ago called for a realistic assessment of what Ottawa's pull-out means for the future of OSLO and oil sands developments. I quote:

> —it changes the situation very little, if at all. Ottawa will continue to pay its share of the roughly $140-million worth of engineering work that will take the project to blueprint stage sometime in 1991.

The Prime Minister signed the Hague Convention on Canada' behalf. Canada is committed to slowing down climate warming. Why then does he not stick to the promises he makes abroad on environmental issues and start reducing our dependence in future on fossil fuels? Why is the Government of Canada not capable, despite this tired and unimaginative regime, of delivering on what Canadians are demanding in poll after poll, namely, action to protect the environment and global climate, to implement sustainable development, to integrate the economy with the environment, to anticipate and prevent instead of reacting and curing, and to deliver social programs where sustainable development requires it. Surely, we have the skills. Surely, there are models, in Sweden, the Netherlands, in Norway.

At home, Canadian proposals are emerging all over the place, including the tax on environmental nuisance, proposed by the Quebec Union for the Conservation of Nature, le Groupe de recherche appliquée en macro-écologie. It would be a tax on carbon emissions which could eliminate the need for the goods and services tax, and at the same time help reduce carbon dioxide pollution which leads to global warming.

In his first budget in the 1990s, the Minister of Finance fails to put on notice polluters and fails to encourage those who do not wish to pollute. What is he waiting for? What is preventing him from applying green ideas to Canada's tax system? Why is the Minister of Finance not exempting from the goods and services tax products approved as environmentally friendly by the Environmental Choice Program? Why is he not shifting, instead of slashing, funds for the advancement of renewable sources of energy? Why is he not strengthening Canada's research capability in environmental technology? Why is he not accelerating tax write-offs for investments made by business in industrial processes which would reduce pollution? Why is he not developing incentives for the reduction of waste to help municipalities in their Herculean efforts?

The fact that no actions are being taken tells us that the government has understood only that there is a vote-getting opportunity in the environment. It has stopped there. It has not recognized that glowing rhetoric on the environment must be supported by concrete actions. Thus, it allows itself, and quite rightly so, to be accused of political opportunism. A good example is the budget speech.

On the one hand, the Minister of Finance says: "Canadians want action to protect our environment", and then the so-called environmental action plan which was to be announced at the same time as the budget as an economic as well as an environmental statement is postponed. We learned also that the plan will be fiscally responsible. That is an ominous signal that the Minister of Finance intends to handcuff the Minister of the Environment.

Evidently this government does not understand what sustainable development means. The environment and the economy are seen as separate and competing forces. The government pays lip service to sustainable development but does not want to make tough decisions. Clearly sustainable development ranks very low in this government's priorities.

It is not by accident that the environment department receives less than one cent of every federal dollar spent. It is not by accident that the Winnipeg Centre for Sustainable Development, promised in September, 1988, by the Prime Minister at the United Nations, is still waiting announcement. It is not by accident that the environmental agenda was rejected by cabinet. It is not by accident that this government pays only lip service to renewable and non-fossil fuel forms of energy. It is not by accident that Petro-Canada is to be sold because the government does not recognize its value in developing alternatives to fossil fuels in the future.

This government's attitude to the environment is summed up by the Minister of Finance himself, as reported at page 8609 of Hansard, when he says that as long as the deficit is at the current level "We will not have the money to spend on health care, on post-secondary education, on the environment, on native affairs or on any of these policies".

He goes on to say that if he can reduce the deficit in five years only then will "we have billions of dollars more money either to cut taxes, look after maintaining and improving these programs or look after new initiatives such as the environment".

The environment should, in his opinion, wait five years. Well, a major environmental wave will sweep the Tories out of office by 1992. It will not wait five years.

This budget is silent about Canadians whose survival depends on fish. Globally we have not practised sustainable development harvesting of our fisheries. If we take the necessary but tough conservation measures now, then in a few years we will have thriving fishing communities in Atlantic Canada again. In the meantime though we must support the coastal communities by way of social programs to ensure a stable life until the resource recovers. Instead, the Minister of Finance remains silent on a burning social issue.

The Minister of Finance in this budget has abandoned social programs. His message to the provinces is clear: "You are on your own". His vision of Canada consists of one word, "deficit".

Canadians must watch out now. Ottawa is retreating in true Meech Lake fashion. The provinces and municipalities are asked to carry the burden. You, who may be in need of housing, family services, health care, women's services, you name it, do not look any more to Ottawa. The solution of social issues has to come from elsewhere. Lower your sights. Look at your provincial capital. Canada, in true Tory fashion, is just a community of communities. It is no longer a strong and proud federal nation. What an abdication of responsibilities.

A long time ago, and yet it could have been yesterday, William Lyon Mackenzie King said this about the Conservative Party: "Tories, allow me to congratulate you, your feet are at last on the people's necks." Yes, their feet are on the people's necks, but only until the next election.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who has just spoken. He mentioned carbons and carbon dioxide. I wonder if he would expound on what this government is doing to try to overcome that and play its part in the international community.

For example, reforestation agreements with six provinces have expired. They have not been renewed. Does the member know whether these are going to be renewed or not since forests are a great asset when it comes to overcoming carbon dioxide and of course for the health of the environment generally? Our fisheries are being depleted. What is the government doing about this? At the United Nations, Canada seems to have been dragging its feet on ratification of the Law of the Sea. Rivers and harbours are polluted all across Canada.

What is the government doing? Does it have a concentrated effort afoot to try to cure some of these things? Is it really doing anything about forestry projects in this country? Is it doing anything to encourage forestry on the international scene. Deforestation is taking place and we need to do something in order to overcome the very serious carbon dioxide problem in the world.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for his question. In brief, the answer is that concerning planet warming and CO2 pollution the government is making high-sounding, well-phrased rhetorical declarations abroad. It is cutting research relevant to the subject. It is continuing to fund our dependence on fossil fuels by way of support of mega projects, as in the case of the engineering studies on the OSLO project. Finally, it is not renewing the forestry agreements, which I am sure the hon. member is extremely interested in, with the major forest-growing provinces, namely, Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this Conservative budget, let me start by saying that it is a total fabrication to suggest, as the Minister of Finance and other Conservative members have done, that the government's budget policy does not include any tax increases.

The minister's speech on February 20 did not directly mention any new taxes. However, that speech is only part of the government's budgetary policy. The total budgetary policy of the government includes a deluge of taxes beginning with the goods and services tax which is presently being pushed through this House, the bill being in committee at the present time.

In addition to the goods and services tax, we have surtaxes dating back to 1984, the clawbacks on old age security and family allowances, and the increases in contributions for unemployment insurance as a result of the government's Bill C-21.

So while the minister's speech on February 20 might not have mentioned any new taxes, the budgetary policy of the government, of which that speech is only part, is full of tax increases. The goods and services tax alone has been described as the biggest tax grab in Canadian history.

If the bill is passed as it stands and goes into effect in January of 1991, the government will be able to raise, through that tax alone, $1.7 billion in the fiscal year 1991-92. The federal government's tax revenues have increased by $48 billion since 1984 as a result of the budgetary policies of this Conservative government.

I have mentioned that those tax increases have taken the form of surtaxes, de-indexation, tax rates, by the clawback on old age security and family allowances which legislation is also going through this House at the present time. By the way, the clawback on the old age security and the family allowances will benefit the government by $2 billion.

While the government is raising this massive amount of money in taxes, what has happened to the deficit? As my colleague who spoke before me pointed out, everything this government does is an attempt to deal with the deficit. But despite that massive increase of $48 billion in taxes since 1984, what has happened to the deficit?

In 1984, the national debt was $170 billion. In March, 1990, this month, the national debt is $350 billion. The national debt has doubled since this Conservative party has come to government.

Mr. Hopkins: It has more than doubled.

Mr. Allmand: More than doubled, my hon. colleague says. The Canadian people might very well wonder what has happened to the massive amount of moneys that have been raised by the government in new taxes since 1984.

• (1640)

In addition to the tax increases that have resulted from the budgetary policies of this Conservative government, the government has also cut deeply in essential services that Canadians need. It has frozen the Established Programs Financing policy, through which policy we fund post-secondary education and help the provinces fund medicare and hospitalization. By freezing the budgets under the EPF programs for two years the government will charge the provinces with a bill of $7.4 billion. In other words, the provinces will lose $7.4 billion that they would have otherwise received if the government had not put that freeze on the EPF program.

What does that mean for the provinces? We are not talking about trivial services here, we are talking about hospitals, doctors, physiotherapists, and nurses. I put a question earlier to my newly elected colleague from the province of Quebec. Those of us who live in Quebec know the situation in our hospitals. We know about the crowding and how the emergency wards are crowded with patients that should be in beds. We see line-ups of people at doctors' offices. We know that services are not being performed that should be performed. We had a massive strike by nurses during the past year, nurses who should be paid at a much higher rate but are being paid, in our province, at a lower rate because the funds are not available. How much worse will it be as a result of these cutbacks in the transfers from the federal government to the provinces?

Other speakers in this debate have mentioned post-secondary education. If there is one thing that should never be cut, no matter what the economic situation is in the country, it is education. If times get tough in a family, the last thing we do is take the kids out of school, sell the home or scrimp on medical care. We may cut back on luxuries, on holidays and things like that, but we do not cut back on education. As a nation we should never cut back on education either because education is the basic infrastructure which will lead to economic growth in this country. It is by having a highly educated and highly skilled population that we will increase the productivity and the productive capacity of this country.

So when the government says, on the one hand, that it wants to cut back on the deficit, it seems rather strange that the very policies which will help cut back on the deficit are the policies the government is cutting back. The government is cutting back on education and training which in turn lead to an increase in productivity and additional revenue for the country, which would in turn cut back on the deficit.

In addition to the cuts in transfers to the provinces for medicare, health care and education, the government is also putting a lid on the transfers to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia under the Canada Assistance Plan. That will cost those provinces $155 million. Here we are talking about such things as day care, corrections and welfare payments to mothers with children who cannot work. The cutbacks amount to $165 million for social housing when we have 200,000 homeless people in this country. There are cutbacks to our native peoples in their core programs and cutbacks to women's centres. As a result of this budget the government is shifting a burden of over $7 billion to the provinces.

We must consider this budget in the light of the social and economic conditions which are prevailing in this country at this time. Whenever we put questions to members of the government about the social and economic conditions in the country they love to refer to what they say is the great increase in jobs that have been created since they came to power in 1984.

I refer you, Madam Speaker, to a report, which came out on February 14, 1990, just a couple of weeks ago, put out by the Economic Council of Canada which is called Good Jobs, Bad Jobs. What does the Economic Council say about the jobs which have been created in this country in recent years?

First, it says that over 70 per cent of Canadian workers are now employed in service industries. Later the report points out again that over 50 per cent of the jobs created in service industries are in low paying, minimum wage, non-unionized jobs where there is no training, no future and no benefits. The report also says: "Over-all, the growth of these employment forms is undermining the economic security of a significant and growing portion of the work-force. In the long run this may even have negative consequences for the fabric of Canadian society."

That is what the Economic Council has said. It is not what the Liberal Party is saying, although we have been saying that for many years now. I have been saying that in the House when I put questions to the ministers for employment. I have asked them about the quality of the jobs that they say they are creating, Can a person start a family, build a home, build a new life when they are working only 12 hours a week at a minimum wage? No, they cannot. So you have to look behind those unemployment figures.

By the way, the rate of unemployment now has gone up for four consecutive months and we will get another report by Statistics Canada tomorrow on the unemployment situation. Many expect that it will continue to go up. As a matter of fact, even the Minister of Finance has predicted that the rate of unemployment will increase to 8.5 per cent in this year. Yet he stands pat, he does not change his policies for economic growth, he does not change his policies for job creation, and he does not change his policies with respect to unemployment insurance.

We have another recent report as well which says more or less the same thing. This report is put out by the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. This is an advisory council set up by the Minister of Employment and it is equally critical of the government. It says: "After nearly six years of economic recovery many regions of the country continue to experience double digit unemployment and some have not yet regained their pre-recession employment levels. Although there have been many new jobs, many of these are in the part-time, low paying service sectors."

This is an advisory council to the government appointed by the Minister of Employment. Its report says that many of these policies will have major negative effects which will be experienced in the regions of Canada. The policies to which it refers are cutbacks in regional development, reduction in the growth of transfer payments to the provinces for health, social welfare and education, changes to the unemployment insurance program, closure of Canadian Forces bases, lower subsidies to VIA Rail, lower subsidies to the CBC and postponement of the Polar 8 icebreaker program.

Here we have two independent advisory councils, the Economic Council and the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, both telling the government to do exactly the opposite of what the government has done in this budget.

I understand that my time is up. In addition to containing massive tax increases, the budgetary policy involving massive tax increases, in particular the goods and services tax and cutting back on essential programs in health care and education is also a recipe for recession. If the government continues along the lines that it is going, it is going to push this country over the precipice into a major recession.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, I take it from my colleague's comment, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, that he did not read some articles from the Journal de Montréal which reported that the former Parti Québécois Minister, Mr. Bernard Landry, had phoned the Minister of State for Finance to tell him that that budget was quite a feat, a very good budget and that Mr. Wilson was the best Finance minister Canada ever had.

I would also ask our colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce to comment on the budget of one of his former colleagues, who, when he was Minister of Finance back in 1981, stated, as reported in the The Ottawa Citizen of Saturday December 19 1981, that he had to modify his budget because it was incorrect.

• (1650)

Madam Speaker, among others things, I have here, in this press clipping, 16 different amendments made by the then minister of Finance, the honorable Allan MacEachen. May be, he could compare or share with us his comments on the difference in credibility between the present minister of Finance who, I think, for the last five years, has proven his capacity to make responsible budgets to correct the mistakes of the previous Trudeau government which left us a $200 billion deficit and the situation that we know while the then government was saying: "We will never freeze wages." It is the same government which, a few months later, when it was in office, put a freeze on wages and prices and so on, increasing the tax on gas which rose from 18 cents to over a dollar. Maybe he could comment on the good times when he was a colleague of the then minister of Finance, M. MacEachen.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, with respect to the praise given by the ex-Minister of Finance for Quebec, Mr. Landry, who was a minister of finance for the PQ government in Quebec, I never had any confidence in Mr. Landry when he was the minister of finance in Quebec and neither did the people of Quebec because they threw that government out, including Mr. Landry.

As a matter of that, that PQ government led by Mr. Levesque, of which Mr. Landry was the Minister of Finance, wreaked economic havoc on the province of Quebec. If Mr. Landry is praising the Minister of Finance for his budget, I would caution the Minister of Finance from taking that praise too seriously.

My hon. colleague, who is the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration and with whom I work frequently, quotes articles and editorials from newspapers praising the budget. If he wants to get into a game of matching editorials with editorials I could bring into the House a pile of them, which would be four or five times greater than his, condemning the budget. As a matter of fact, if I had time I would start reading them. I have here a whole booklet full of editorials and comments by various associations, groups, newspapers and commentators condemning the budget.

No doubt there are some groups in this country, such as the Fraser Institute and others, which think this is a wonderful budget. Most right-wing Tory-thinking organizations think it is a wonderful budget because all they have in mind is the deficit. Reduce the deficit even though you kill our post-secondary education system, even though you throw people out of hospitals. No matter what you do, protect the rich and kick the poor in the ass.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace, I know, has a lot of editorials and documents that would be of interest to members. I wonder if there would be consent to have them printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Mercier.

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Madam Speaker, on February 20, the Minister of Finance brought down his 1990 Budget. I want to congratulate the minister on another job well-done.

We all know that the economy of the country is based on growth. As a country becomes more prosperous, its economy improves.

When we came to power in 1984, the economic situation in this country was deplorable. We had a national debt of $200 billion and a deficit of $38 billion. Canadians gave us a clear mandate to turn around the Canadian economy. That is what we have done, it is what we are doing now and what we will keep on doing.

Reflecting the wishes of Canadians, since 1984 the federal government has introduced structural reforms in the economy in order to enhance our competitive position and improve our potential for expansion and for creating jobs. This strategy has produced some impressive results. In Quebec, for instance, 356,000 new jobs were created. Unfortunately, our potential for growth is eroded by a crushing debt that has mortgaged the future of generations to come, and this, Mr. Speaker, is the fault of the Liberals who left us this crushing legacy.

An hon. member: Ha, ha!

Mrs. Jacques: Shame! The hon. member should realize this is no laughing matter.

No, it is because of you that we are at the point where we have to make budget cuts to deal with this lamentable situation. People criticize us and you criticize us too.

We must therefore reduce the debt to ensure sustained economic growth.

Canadians know that the measures taken in this Budget are necessary to avoid a recession or a disastrous future for all of Canada.

Madam Speaker, I admit that some of these measures are difficult, but they are also absolutely necessary. We will be able to see the positive result of these budget cuts by 1995 when the deficit will be down to $10 billion.

Our government preferred to reduce expenditures instead of raising new taxes. Indeed, Madam Speaker, this Budget has no new tax. Seventy per cent of the actions taken to reduce the deficit apply to spending. We reduced the size of the Public Service by over 12,000. We intend to privatize Petro Canada because that will enable people to own shares in it directly. Cuts will also be made to some privileges of public servants and parliamentarians. Government subsidies and assistance will also be reduced. Some programs will be reduced, others will be eliminated. We are also proposing several changes which will considerably improve the income tax system and make it fairer for all taxpayers.

But, Madam Speaker, we made sure that the most important social programs such as family allowances, benefits to seniors and veterans and unemployment insurance were spared. We recognize our people's essential needs and are striving to ensure that low-income Canadians are affected as little as possible by budget restrictions.

Budget cuts are not always easy to make. Everybody says: "Go ahead and cut but not in my backyard, not in my pockets." How can you take measures that will not affect people? The Liberals have left us in an economic chaos, which I find appalling. By electing us in 1984 and re-electing us in 1988, the Canadian people have given us a clear mandate: reducing the deficit! But if people want us to reduce the deficit, I ask them to do their part. It is not always easy. The situation resembles that of a man who tells his wife that his week's pay was cut. Instead of going to the hairdresser twice, the lady will go only once. Of course, the husband would like to tell his wife to have her hair done everyday, to hire someone to do it at home. But they cannot afford it. But if they keep on saving, one day perhaps, they will be able to hire a housekeeper or some help.

So the important thing is that we must all work hand in hand, help one another and reduce the deficit. We do not have the choice, as I said earlier, it is a matter of economic survival. We decided upon those measures in the best interest of Canadians. Our country's prosperity depends largely on our determination to tackle right now our deficit problems in order to control inflationist tensions. It is with a government like ours, a government that is not afraid to act, that we will succeed in building our country. We will succeed because we have the unfailing support of the Canadian people. It is not by throwing grants left and right, as the Liberals did in the past, that we will buy our seats. Because you know, Madam Speaker, we did reduce the deficit. Listen, I have a very good example for you. When I was first elected in 1984, through the Canada Works Program, which we all know and which has been changed since then, I had $2 million to spend in my constituency. That's awful! We now manage with $700,000 for each constituency. Can you imagine that! Our Conservative government has cut more than one million dollars per constituency. Listen, before the election, my opponent was giving enormous amounts away to churches, half a million at a time. Don't you find that unusual when our people are in need? I found it simply terrible that we would squander money away like that, and then my parish priest was mad at me because I had no money left for him. You don't buy people that way. I thought it was awful.

• (1700)

Madam Speaker, foremost among the budget objectives are the cut-backs which will make it possible to bring the deficit down to $28.5 billion in 1991, then in the three years after that it will be reduced by half, down again to $14 billion. By 1995 it will stand at $10 billion and at that time we will regain control over our economy.

Madam Speaker, there being no ready–made solution to the ever growing national debt problem, the steps taken in this budget are therefore essential if we are to bring lasting economic prosperity to this country.

The priority of our government since 1984 has been to get a handle on the deficit and the national debt while restoring better control over our finances. Such was the mandate given to us by all Canadians. When we came into office, forecast program expenditures were $16 billion more than revenues. Now, the government's expenditures are $9 billion less than its revenues. This turnaround of more than $25 billion makes all the difference and proves that we know how to manage our finances.

Significant economical progress has been made because we have controled program and federal service growth. Budgetary initiatives, combined with better management and the implementatioon of the goods and services tax make up the government's economic strategy to restore our country's financial health and improve our economic performance on the international scene.

This budget takes into account the economic situation in Quebec. I want assure Quebecers to know that the extra help they receive through equalization payments will remain untouched. Neither will it be affected by the 5 per cent limit imposed on federal transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan. In fact, major transfers to Quebec should increase overall by some 3,2 per cent in 1990–91, and 3,4 per cent in 1991–92.

In sum, Madam Speaker, Canadians have adjusted well to the changes introduced by this government. The number of jobs created and our numerous achievements prove that our policies are working.

Our mandate is to restore Canada's financial balance, and because of that we are committed to reducing the waste that was a major contributor to the debt. We will keep on making the changes that are needed as long as this country's economy has not stabilized.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I am proud to be part of a government that does not balk at taking drastic measures where needed. This government is not concerned with its popularity when the welfare and future of Canadians are involved. We therefore will keep on acting in the best interests of all.

[English]

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. colleague's response to the federal budget and heard her itemize several components of the budget that we have been held in criticism of over recent days. I cannot help but think, given the limited amount of time a member has in the House of Commons to comment on a particular matter, that there are certain components of her speech which should be emphasized and perhaps highlighted.

I take this opportunity to express to her my concern and also my appreciation for the time and effort she has spent on this speech. I wish she would take this opportunity to comment perhaps from la belle province on a couple of points of her speech that would be of great interest to Canadians generally who are having Quebec presented to them in a misunderstood way.

I particularly make note of her comment with respect to the fact that this government to which we both belong has fielded a budget this year showing that in effect we have a program surplus. However, we are harnessed with this cancerous debt we have inherited that stifles our very sovereignty and we cannot act as Canadians should.

Therefore, I would like to ask her to comment some more on the good government that has resulted in us giving this operating surplus to the citizens of Canada. If the hon. member has any other highlights that she may have overlooked with respect to how this budget affected Quebec, I think it would be in Canada's good interest to know.

[Translation]

Mrs. Jacques: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from Regina—Wascana for his remarks and also for his question.

I would like to tell him that, as was said a few moments ago, this budget is indeed a good thing for all Canadians. Obviously we have to take drastic measures in order to help Canadians reduce the deficit, all that because the Liberals wasted money in the past and left us with a debt that affects our country today.

The budget is also good for our economy in that foreign investors will come to Canada and create jobs for our youth. We know that, if we reduce the deficit, young Canadians will not come into this world with that huge debt hanging over their head, as my colleague from Montmorency—Orléans pointed out. I think that is an important measure to ensure a strong economic future for Canada.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would comment positively or negatively and give her true feelings with regard to the cuts to women's programs in the budget. Is she in favour of that?

[Translation]

Mrs. Jacques: Madam Speaker, I thank my honourable colleague. I cannot tell you whether I agree or not with those cuts in women's programs. But there is one thing I can tell my Liberal colleague. It is because of your wasteful ways that we have to make those cuts.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Does the hon. member still agree with the statement the Minister of Finance made back in August 1984 when he stood up in Toronto and said that as a government the Tories in Canada would never cut the deficit by increasing taxes, that the only way they would go about cutting the deficit would be by cutting government programs? Would the hon. member comment on the authenticity of that remark in today's atmosphere.

[Translation]

Mrs. Jacques: Madam Speaker, I thank my collegue for his comment and question.

I simply want to tell him that we have not raised taxes in any way in this budget. We have taken means to cut federal government spending in an effort to reduce the deficit.

Again, my dear collegue, we had no choice in view of the legacy you had left us.

[English]

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would first like to thank the hon. member for Jonquière for relinquishing his spot in order for me to correct the record on some of the erroneous comments made with regard to measures in the budget affecting veterans.

Certainly I am pleased to enter this debate, because it gives me the opportunity to answer the critics who for purely partisan reasons are trying to create unfounded fear among Canada's veterans. That is simply unfair for them.

• (1710)

Nothing could be further from the truth. This government has always been extremely generous to veterans. These are not just fine words. They are borne out by the facts and by the figures which speak for themselves. Expenditures directly to and on behalf of the veterans of Canada have risen from approximately $1.2 billion in 1984, when we came to power, to over $1.5 billion this year. We have made a great number of improvements in veterans' programs, passed enlightened legislation and new benefits, and we are going to continue to do so.

These include a much more responsive pension system, increased compensation to former prisoners of war, benefits for veterans' widows and their families, and the opening up of a very popular program, VIP or Veterans Independence Program, for veterans who served only in Canada.

This government has great respect for our veterans and has been putting that respect into practice every year since we took power in 1984. This year we will be operating with another record budget. Some cut, Madam Speaker!

From that background, let us look at the budget changes which have been preoccupying my friends opposite.

First, I want to talk about the room and board charges, because I think that is an important issue. Let me immediately refute one cruel exaggeration of the effect of these changes which has been unfairly promoted by some. I have heard idle speculation about increases for veterans who lost legs in the war. That is utter rubbish. Nobody in an institution as a result of a war related injury will pay a penny; not now, not on April 1, 1991, and not at any time.

Charges for those veterans who are in institutions because they require long-term care were first introduced in 1949, at a rate at that time of $120 a month. Today's equivalent of that $120, 41 years ago, would be $750 a month.

More than 70 per cent of all non-pensioned veterans are presently paying the $8 a day charge, but because of inconsistent regulations the other 30 per cent are paying nothing. Many veterans have objected to this unequal treatment. Why should 70 per cent of the veterans pay, and 30 per cent not pay? The changes were made after consultations with veterans groups who, incidentally, agreed to correct these inequities and this unfairness. On April 1, 1990, everyone will pay the $240 a month, $8 a day, for their board, for their lodging, for their recreation, for their laundry, and for nursing services. We think that that is a pretty good buy. Everyone will pay except veterans who are in institutions because of war related disabilities. I repeat, they are paying nothing now and they are not going to have to pay in the future.

We have also given notice that the rate will rise to $420 a month on April 1, 1991. That will be the lowest rate charged by any jurisdiction, any province in Canada, and that will work out to $14 a day. On the face of it, it may seem a lot to pay $14 a day for board, lodging, accommodation, nursing care, recreational care, laundry and all the other good things you get, but not if you realize that it has never been raised for six years. In fact, this $14 per day charge is only a small fraction of the $130 a day it really costs on average in Canada to operate a chronic care bed. That is right, that is what the cost is: $130 a day and our veterans are being charged now $8 a day. That is about $4,000 a month or almost $50,000 a year for us to keep a veteran in long-term care or a chronic care bed in Canada.

In addition, the Dominion President of the Royal Canadian Legion and the Chairman of the National Council of Veterans Associations of Canada have said that they find these levels of board and lodging charges fair and reasonable, reflecting as they do the lowest rate available anywhere in Canada.

Doug Fisher who is a veteran and also a veteran of this place—incidentally, he was a New Democratic Party member of Parliament in this place—wrote about the rates that my department charges, in a recent column in The Toronto Sun. He talked about the money he was left by a veteran who had spent some years in one of our contract beds. Doug Fisher, who writes for the Canadian Legion magazine and many veterans publications stated:

> The value of this veteran's estate, including liquid cash, had burgeoned in the institutionalized years because DVA levied such low charges. This resulted in a bonus for the deceased's heirs but it was certainly unfair to taxpaying citizens.

I want to underline that members can be certain that every veteran in our institutions now receives and always will receive adequate financial protection.

We want institutions to be a last resort and so do the veterans. They are much happier living in their own homes. But when there is no other alternative, we make certain that no veteran is financially worse off as a result of moving from his or her own home into an institution.

We have income protection features built into the regulations, and we will monitor these features to ensure that they provide adequate protection to the needy veteran who might be on war veterans' allowance.

This government has increased spending on health care for veterans by 136 per cent since 1984. This is something the veterans greatly appreciate and that the government is very proud of.

I want to talk about the Veterans Independence Program. When I hear our critics talk about cuts to VIP, I have to ask myself if they really know what they are talking about. VIP expenditures have increased by over 60 per cent in this year alone. They will more than double in another four years. It has been a soaring success under this government and will continue to do so. The Veterans Independence Program is working and it is keeping the veterans in their own homes for a longer time.

All that is happening is that heavy housekeeping, or what is otherwise known as spring cleaning, is being removed from the lengthy list of services still available to the veteran. However, where there is a legitimate health or safety requirement on the part of a particular client for the provision of a service presently found under heavy housekeeping, I want to assure this House, and indeed the veterans community, that Veterans Affairs will ensure that service continues to be provided to the veteran in need.

Of course normal day to day, week to week house cleaning will go on. The lawns will be mowed, the snow will be shovelled, the ice will be cleared from the steps, the laundry will be done. The Veterans Independence Program will continue to go from strength to strength.

As Doug Fisher pointed out, we have extended the program. He stated:

> DVA has chosen to cut payments from the VIP program only for—annual house cleaning. Better than narrowing eligibility or capping client numbers.

That is exactly right.

This government's record on behalf of veterans can be found both in our increasing budgets and in the praise I receive across the country from veterans who think DVA, as they call it, is giving them their best ever service.

Veterans in other countries—I have talked to a lot of them, and I suggest the Opposition should talk to the others—are always saying that Canada has the best veterans' programs in the world. That is the way it is now, and that it is the way we are going to keep it.

It was repeated by Doug Fisher that we provide the best programs, the most enlightened legislation, the best benefit programs for veterans in the whole wide world, and we are going to improve on that as well.

• (1720)

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, let us leave no doubt about the minister's final statements. The veterans' programs in Canada are the best in the world, but the veterans' programs in Canada have always been the best in the world. The hon. member mentioned only now and in the future. I want to point out to him that it was Liberal governments in the history of this country that brought in the best veterans' legislation in the world for all Canadians, and to a large extent the veterans are benefiting from those to this day.

I want to ask the minister a very serious question. I know he has a very humanitarian feeling toward these things. I have discussed them with him many times. Is there any movement on the part of the government to extend the Veterans Independence Program to the spouses of veterans? As the minister knows, that is a big question in the minds of veterans. They worry about what is going to happen to their partners after they leave.

Is there any movement on that? Does the minister see any future move on the part of the government to extend that program to spouses of veterans?

Mr. Merrithew: Madam Speaker, I do want to comment and I will respond to the hon. member's question. Before I do, I just want to say that my predecessor, the Hon. George Hees, introduced many, many new programs that were not there when the Liberals were in power prior to 1984. I just want to mention that for the record.

This government improved disability pensions. We significantly increased prisoner of war allowances. We expanded the Veterans Independence Program to make Canada Service Only vets eligible. We reinstituted pensions for remarried spouses. We negotiated with the provinces for additional beds all across Canada, and health care benefits have increased 136 per cent since we came to power in 1984.

I know the hon. member is also very interested, coming from a military riding, with regard to the VIP going to spouses. That has been a concern of the Legion and other veterans' groups such as the National Council. It is a matter that I feel very strongly about. It is under consideration by the department now. Hopefully, we will have some news about that particular program in the future.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, at the beginning of his speech the minister was complaining about certain remarks. As far as I know, no member in this House, on any side, made the kinds of remarks he attributed to certain people, either inside or outside this House.

The second point I want to make to the hon. minister is that in my experience here for nearly 22 years, and from my reading of the activities of Parliament, the only department in the entire ministry of any government since the First World War that is non-political and non-partisan is the Department of Veterans Affairs. That is the only one. Every time an improvement has been made, opposition parties of all political stripes have applauded the government of the day. There is no argument about that.

In the case of the incomes test for veterans' board and lodging, for a single veteran the incomes test is $9,840 a year. That is $2,000 below the income which the government accepts as the poverty line. In the case of a married veteran, the incomes test is $15,808 a year which is more than $4,000 a year below the poverty line.

I am not going to argue with the minister about the incomes test, whether or not we should even have one. However, would the minister agree that in terms of the incomes test it should be at least no less than and should probably be slightly more than what the poverty level is? Would he agree to that?

Mr. Merrithew: Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member is interested in veterans affairs. He has had a sincere interest for a very long time, and I thank him for his support when we needed that as well.

When these changes were made—and I am telling the House this and the veterans' groups—they were made after consultation based on the matter of inequities and injustices. The problem is, number one, 70 per cent were paying $8 a day, 30 per cent were not. That is patently unfair.

The other thing is we have 5,000 veterans in beds in institutions. We have 600,000 out there paying their taxes and trying to tough it out in society itself. They were concerned about the inequities of the charges as they were applied to the people who happen to be institutionalized, because some veterans were institutionalized solely because it was much cheaper to be in an institution than to be in their own home. We thought that was patently unfair, there was an inequity, an unfairness, and an injustice and we wanted to correct that.

We do, as the hon. member mentioned, protect the income of both single veterans who are in institutions, as well as people with spouses. We treat our veterans better than any other country in the world in that regard as well.

Mr. Benjamin: We know that. That's not what the argument is about.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The time for questions and comments is over.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, may I ask for unanimous consent to continue the question and answer period for at least another five minutes?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I hear that there is not unanimous consent.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke).

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, like my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, I want to say very clearly that the phoniest thing that is being said in this entire budget debate is that there are no increases in taxes.

Here we have a whole list of increases in taxes as a result of what this government has done to the provinces of Canada. Taxes are paid by the general public. If this government is not big enough to pay its own bills and it is going to pass them all over to the provinces, the provinces still have to get the money from John Q. Public. It is a poor way of managing the finances of this nation when you do not live up to your own obligations.

Government members are claiming that they are great financial managers. They feel that they are the only ones capable of managing finances in this country.

I want to point out that in March 1984 the national debt of this country stood at $160 billion. At the end of this fiscal year, March 31, 1990, the national debt will stand at $350 billion, which is an increase of $190 billion. Approximately 45 per cent of the national debt today is attributable to the previous government, 55 per cent of the national debt as it stands today is attributable to this government that claims to be great financial managers of this country. That is one thing that should be laid on the line for the government.

For example, in 1985–86 the government's deficit was $34.4 billion. In 1986–87 it added another $30.6 billion to the national debt. In 1987–88 it added another $28.1 billion to the national debt. In 1988–89 it added another $28.9 billion estimate to the national debt, and heaven knows what it will be in 1989–90 because the figures of the Minister of Finance are not accurate and have not been accurate in recent years. It could go as high as another $30.5 billion estimated. Those figures are garnered from the minister's own Department of Finance. This budget is in keeping with the recent Tory initiatives, its regressive taxation and its cumulative assault on the structure of social security in this country.

Unemployment insurance has been attacked. My hon. friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who has been very active in this area and who is a great defender of the average worker in this country, has spoken at considerable length on this. We know that the unemployment insurance program came into force in 1940 as a result of the Rowell-Sirois commission report of 1937. It was to be managed by the federal government. Eventually, the federal government contributed considerable sums of money to the UI program to help the unemployed across this nation.

Now, after several years of an understanding that the federal government is a partner and that the federal government must do its part to help the unemployed of this country, we have the federal government pulling out of the UI financial structure entirely. The government has become the managers only, but who is going to pay the differences? The employers, the small businesses across this country are going to have to make larger contributions to make up the difference. The employees are going to have to make bigger contributions to make up the difference.

The privatization of what has been a very successful mixed economy comes into play here because this government is selling off Crown corporations that have been built up over the years with taxpayers' money. Now, they are being sold when there is a complete industry in place. There is no risk in building up a market for the products. There is no risk in having to go out to hire special help because the employees are already in place, whether it be engineers, technicians, nurses, or whatever. They are all there in the structure. Even trade missions around the world have by these companies. Everything necessary for sales production is in place. The government is selling these off for private enterprise when they could be an asset to the taxpayers of this country in returning funds to the treasury of Canada.

We in this country still have a further alignment with the United States in order to make free trade easier. This government is aligning itself with U.S. policy. Anything that the United States wants it to do is fine, it is just a matter of how high the government will jump to please the United States.

This budget brings into the open this Tory government's multi-year plan to terminate the federal role in health and post-secondary education. The government is dumping the load on to provincial governments.

There is another thing that the government is dumping on to provincial governments, in an indirect way, by dumping a bigger load for post-secondary education and medicare. In my own province of Ontario, for example, Mr. Nixon, the provincial treasurer of Ontario had a surplus this year in the provincial budget. But what happens? After the Minister of Finance was finished with the Ontario budget, Ontario had a deficit this year of nearly $500 million. That was as a result of the irresponsible attitude of this federal government in dumping its debts over on to the province of Ontario.

There has always been a great deal of comment about highways in eastern Ontario, for example. I want to comment on the additional debt that this federal government has bestowed on Mr. Nixon, the provincial treasurer of Ontario and, indeed, on to the people of Ontario.

Transportation and highways in eastern Ontario have always been an issue. We had Conservatives in power in the province of Ontario for 42 years, from 1943 to 1985. I remember when I first came here, the Hon. Joe Green, who was then Minister of Agriculture, the then member for Renfrew South, got up in this House and he called Highway 17 the goat trail of eastern Ontario. That was about what it was.

In the last four and a half years when we have had a Liberal government in Queen's Park there have been all kinds of complaints and talk about road conditions in eastern Ontario. Everybody knows that these things cannot be built overnight. But the provincial government of Ontario has made a decision to four lane Highway 16 from Highway 401 into the National Capital Region. When that is completed in four or five year's time it will be the first time in history that the city of Ottawa, the national capital of this country, has ever had a four lane highway into it from southern Ontario and the Toronto, Windsor, Hamilton, and Kitchener areas.

We go on to take a look at this cut, this nearly $500 million that is being passed over to the province of Ontario. There have been further comments about the Ontario government not doing enough work in eastern Ontario in transportation. The Government of Ontario just recently made another multi-million dollar announcement to extend the four lane highway, the Queensway, beyond Arnprior up the valley.

My only comment on that is that I hope it operates better than the Queensway. I say that because it takes me as long to drive from Cobden, Ontario, to the end of the Queensway as it does to come from the end of the Queensway to Parliament Hill.

Here is another expenditure of over $400 million for Highway 416. It will be another $250 million for the first two phases up the Ottawa Valley, going north on Highway 17. All this was done in this very short period of time, in four and a half years. The other part of the highway will be upgraded.

I want to put this in perspective. The extension of Highway 17 up the Ottawa Valley that has just been announced is costing half the amount of the national debt that this government has unloaded on to the provincial government of Ontario. If it had that $500 million on its own that it is now going to have to levy additional taxes to make up for paying the federal debt, it could have extended the highway north. Or it could have taken the whole thing and had a surplus of $100 million left over after building four lanes of Highway 416 from Highway 401 into the national capital from southern Ontario.

Madam Speaker, I see you are giving me the signal here. I think it is time we started looking at these things in terms of what the bad management of this government is doing to the financial structure, both federally and provincially in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Couture: Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member of the Liberal Party to compare the two preceeding governments. Under one, from 1980 to 1984, current operating expenditures increased at an average rate of 14 per cent, and in 1984 the deficit was $39.3 billion; the other, from 1984 to 1988, achieved an average increase in expenditures of 3.6 per cent and managed to bring the deficit down from $39.3 billion to $28.1 billion. Through good management, in the new budget, we expect the increase in operating expenditures to be no more than 3.2 per cent.

I would like the hon. member to compare both governments and tell us which is the best.

[English]

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, if we want to talk about an administration that had some human values to it it was the one we had between 1980 and 1984, certainly not this one.

• (1740)

I appreciate the hon. member asking me that question. I think it is a very pertinent one. I would like to point out to the hon. member that we had a world recession in the early 1980s. This government opposite has had some of the best economic years in recent decades to bring in taxes and meet its debts, and it has not been able to do it with the best economy going. That is part of your bad financial management again.

With world recession and with markets falling apart around the world, for many nations in the early 1980s, there was a large number of people unemployed in this country. The Liberal government of the day did not turn its back on John Q. Public. It did not cut medicare. It did not cut post-secondary education and destroy the future of the youth of this country. It kept those up. It also looked after the unemployed in this country, as well as the senior citizens. There was no clawback. This was a human government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: I am glad when members of this government get up and ask questions like that. I am really happy to lay it on the line. I was here. I know what the feeling was out there across the country. We travelled the country in those days. I will tell you, we did not have senior citizens lining up in front of the Peace Tower on Parliament Hill with elderly people telling the Prime Minister of that day that he had lied to the Canadian people, because he did not lie to the Canadian people. He looked after them. They know that. They remember that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, this is a return to the same kind of logic that party used back in the days of the Trudeau government. There is no question about it.

If you look at the record, what did they burden us with? They burdened us with 20 per cent plus interest rates, and double digit inflation. They left us with a debt which, if any reasonable person examined the books with respect to, would see that it was $200 billion plus. It was a burden of debt that no country in the western world could sustain. That is what they left us. That is the legacy of the Liberal party.

The members to my right do not want to listen to that. That is the absolute fact. They left us with a debt that was crippling. They do not want to address it.

What do they want to do? They want to turn back the clock to the same kinds of policies they used in the 1960s and 1970s. Those were the kinds of policies that put us in the position we are in today. We are going to make the tough decisions that have to be made to bring this country into line.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now terminated. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Nipissing.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this debate, briefly, for two minutes.

On February 20, I listened attentively to the Minister of Finance as he presented his sixth budget. I must say that I was disappointed with the latest episode of "as the debt turns". My first impulse was to move a motion to protect an endangered species, namely, middle income Canadians. It is an endangered species because this government seems to get a kick out of seeing how many Canadians it can put below the poverty line.

What is the plan the minister speaks of when he says that since 1984 this government has been following a consistent and comprehensive plan? We would like to know what the plan is.

This government has subjected Canadians to 32 separate tax increases since 1984. Personal income taxes have increased from $29 billion to $56 billion since 1984. The national debt has more than doubled from $170 billion to $350 billion since 1984. The manufacturers' sales tax, the so-called silent killer of jobs, has been increased four times from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent since 1984.

Corporate taxes have decreased from 13.2 per cent to 10.4 per cent, as a proportion of a total tax revenue, despite the fact that we have experienced five consecutive years of economic growth.

Also, in northern Ontario this measure will widen the regional disparity in this country because of the cutbacks in the regional development programs. This is going to have a tremendous effect on northern Ontario, especially at a time when these regions need them most. As mines close in northern Ontario and fisheries shut down on the east coast and the prairie farmers suffer, this is not the time to be cutting back on the programs of regional development.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry. I must interrupt the hon. member.

[Translation]

It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 84(6), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the main motion now before the House.

[English]

The question is on the motion of the Minister of Finance. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Tuesday, February 6, 1990, the hon. member for Kamloops raised a question of privilege claiming that the Department of Finance had acted in contempt of the House in its recent publication and distribution of a brochure on the goods and services tax.

In presenting his argument the hon. member recalled the situation that arose last fall when the former Leader of the Opposition raised a question of privilege challenging the right of the finance department to advertise information about the proposed goods and services tax, without due regard to the role of Parliament in approving such a tax. He maintained that this new case was similar because, in his words, "the Department of Finance was employing a communications strategy in advance of a House of Commons decision". Such a campaign, he argued, could only be prejudicial to the work of the committee which, as he put it, is charged with amending the GST bill.

[Translation]

For his part, the Government House Leader pointed out that the brochure prepared by the Department of Finance did not assume that the GST proposal had already become law. The minister assured the House that all advertisements and information material prepared by the department since the ruling of October 10 have heeded the Chair's warning about due regard for the role of Parliament.

[English]

The October ruling, as hon. members will recall, found the advertisements of late August on the GST to be cavalier and almost bold in tone. In particular, the offending passage declared that "on January 1, 1991 the federal sales tax system will change". Furthermore, readers were requested to save the advertisement, since it served as a notice of the new tax system. The Chair found that these advertisements had been ill-conceived but that they fell short of offending the strict definition of contempt.

[Translation]

The hon. member from Kamloops claims that the recently printed brochure offends the dignity of Parliament in a similar fashion and that the action of the Department of Finance amounts to a contempt of the House.

[English]

I have had an opportunity to examine the brochure. On page 1, the very first sentence of the text reads: "Legislation to implement the goods and services tax (GST) is currently before Parliament". The text goes on to state that on January 1, 1991 the government proposes to eliminate the existing federal sales tax, FST, and replace it with the GST.

Such language is quite different in tone and substance from the advertisements of last August, and in the opinion of the Chair in no sense vitiates the debate on the GST in this House or in committee.

How the government seeks to promote its policies may well be a matter of concern to hon. members and to the Canadian electorate. At the same time, it cannot be denied that the government has a right to communicate with the public about its policies and programs. Indeed the government has a responsibility to inform Canadians about what it is seeking to do, particularly on issues of great complexity or controversy.

• (1010)

The role of the Chair is not to judge the nature of or the necessity for such communication. The Chair is strictly limited to examining cases where the role or dignity of Parliament may be diminished and to take whatever action is necessary to keep that from happening.

In the case before us the Chair finds that the role of Parliament has been duly acknowledged, and that there is no affront to the dignity of the House.

I thank hon. members for their contribution to this particular matter.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to consideration of Bill C–5, an act to amend the Railway Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Bill McKnight (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McKnight (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this bill was last debated on Friday morning, January 26, when there were not many more people in the House than there are here this morning. Nonetheless, there are many of the same faces who are vitally interested in this piece of legislation.

I just want to take a few moments to thank the legislative committee for its work under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Peterborough and the other members who sat on the committee, and also to read into the record the names of communities that wrote in an submission.

The county of Camrose, the village of Donalda, the village of Edberg, the village of Big Valley and the county of Stettler will ring a bell in your heart, Mr. Speaker. I can see a smile on your face already as you recognize them. I have never been to any of those places, but knowing the size of them it reminds me of where I was born and raised back on the prairies myself.

What we have before us today in third reading is a piece of legislation that amends two sections of the National Transportation Act. That act was passed in 1987. We are aware of a single company on which it has an effect, that is the Central Western Railway. For this reason we want to pass it today and send it on to the other place so that it will be brought into conformity with the National Transportation Act.

I am sure my hon. friends opposite will have comments to make on this piece of legislation.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I too want speak for a few moments on Bill C–5.

The parliamentary secretary is correct. We had a good, constructive session of the legislative committee on this bill. The work of the committee was undertaken in a responsible fashion.

Canadians should understand that Bill C–5 applies to one short line railway company in Canada, the Central Western Railway company. It applies to no other railway company. More to the point, in future this bill will have no implication for any other railway company in Canada.

The Central Western Railway, located in Alberta, is the only railway company which through the luck of the draw is not part of the new provisions contained in the National Transportation Act provisions for short line railways. That is because the Central Western Railway came into being before the NTA was passed. Henceforth, all short line railways will be treated in an identical fashion. Because of the luck of the draw and getting out of the gate early, previous to 1987, those regulations for short line railways do not apply, that is the jurisdiction does not apply to the Central Western Railway.

All this bill attempts to do is to treat this company in exactly the same fashion as every other short line railway in Canada. We could have a debate in the House about the evolution of short line railways. We could have a philosophical discussion in the House about whether or not the evolution of short line railways is a good or bad thing, but that is another question. Given that we have a set of regulations that apply to all other short line railways, should one company be treated differently? I think it is the conclusion of sensible members of the House that the answer is no, it ought not to be treated differently.

For the record, because I do not believe in pretending there was no objection, there was an objection to this bill, a fairly strenuous objection to this bill. It was made by the executive secretary of the Canadian Railway Labour Association, Mr. Ed Abbott. He indicated the association was in the middle of a discussion regarding jurisdiction by the union for that railway. Mr. Abbott has done exactly as any union representative should do. He has looked initially at the position of the employees of the railway and their rights. He has been determined to ensure that their rights are maintained and their jobs preserved. That is the job that any union should do, and that was the initial focus point for Mr. Abbott's interjection with respect to Bill C–5.

Members can say, notwithstanding the valid objection by Mr. Abbott, that we are satisfied. We have heard firsthand from a representative of all of the employees that the employees in question support Bill C–5. The workers believe, and say so unanimously, that they now have a very constructive working relationship with the Central Western Railway. They believe the unique and small nature of this company with such a small number of employees is conducive to a positive working environment. More important, for Canadians generally, the safety record and standards of this company are indeed good and have been maintained.

It is worth pointing out to Canadians who are wondering about the evolution of short line railways that at least in the case of this railway, without prejudging what may happen in the future, this company has pumped a very substantial amount of its revenues in the few years it has been in operation into upgrading the line. It bought the line from one of the two giants of Canada and it has spent millions upgrading that line in a short period of time. In fact, as much as 35 per cent or 40 per cent of the revenues of the company have been immediately pumped back into ensuring safety and improving safety. That backdrop is important.

Members of the committee have heard from the employees. I might add that the employees were unanimous in wanting this bill passed. It is in their interest, in the interest of the company, and in the interest of the region the company serves, the short line route. We have also heard from the village of Donalda, from the village of Big Valley, from the county of Camrose, and from many other communities and farmers served, and happily so, by this short line railway. They would like to see Bill C–5 passed to allow this railway to continue its work, to clarify the question of disputed jurisdiction quickly, and to allow it to grow and build.

It is worth pointing out and acknowledging as well that we initially had some union representation, and we understand that representation. Not only are the employees satisfied, not only are the communities affected satisfied with the operation of this railway, but I received a copy of a letter from Mr. Gordon Wright, member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta—and I am not used to promoting New Democratic members of legislative assemblies—who is as aware as I am and who has written an excellent letter.

Like many of us, he well understands the prerogative of the union to represent its employees. Like many of us, he is sensitive to the right of the unions to intervene in these types of circumstances. Also, like many of us, he has judged this case on its merits. He has read no more into Bill C–5 than there is and no less, and he has come to a conclusion. We can understand the sensitive position he is in as a member of the New Democratic Party that in fact the swift passage of Bill C–5 is an appropriate act for Parliament to undertake. I will not quote from the letter.

We in this party support Bill C–5. We want to take an opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Tom Payne, President of the Central Western Railway who is truly an example for all of those doubting Thomases across Canada that Parliament can work from time to time. Mr. Payne has single-handedly come to Ottawa, single-handedly made his case to all three caucuses, all three parties, without the help of high priced lobbyists, without the help of high priced lawyers, without the help of political opportunists. He has appealed to the inherent—occasionally it is there—common sense of members of Parliament. His odyssey here in Ottawa and hopefully the passage of this bill today is a tribute to the common sense of Parliament and a tribute to the inherent belief that a single Canadian can from time to time move mountains and make this place work in a sensible fashion.

We will be supporting Bill C-5. We encourage all members to do so, and we hope it will be swiftly passed by the Senate.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-5 was read for the second time in this House on January 26, I stated that this legislation had more far-reaching consequences than the government wanted us to believe.

While it is true that the Canadian Western Railway Corporation provides what is described as a good service to many farmers in Alberta, and while it also true that this service is essential to farmers of this region, what I tried to point out to this House before is that Bill C-5 has more far-reaching implications than to allow this small railroad company to avoid entanglement with many levels of legislation which is according to its owner threatening its survival.

In committee, the owner of the Canadian Western Railway and labour representatives testified, which reinforced my opinion that Bill C-5 should not be passed and that if it were not passed it would not result in any injury to the farmers of that region who need this branch line to get their grain shipped to the coast.

Before I again explain to this House why I oppose this bill, I would like to point out a few things that will hopefully show farmers in that region of Alberta how the passage of Bill C-5 should not—and I stress that point—affect service to them.

Without Bill C-5, the CWR received a $1.7 million grant to commence the operation of this branch line. According to the owner of this company, the money was paid to CN as a down payment. Some of it bought equipment, some of it paid pre-start up operation costs. That is a pretty substantial sum of money to help a company get started. Without Bill C-5, CWR has managed to cuts the costs of operating the railway line and that made it cheaper to haul the grain.

When testifying before the legislative committee studying this bill, the owner of the railway in question stated:

> This line was a high cost line. In the hearings, it was shown to be one of the higher cost lines on the Canadian prairies, operating at a cost in excess of 44 cents per tonne per mile for the grain carried. All costs into the system have progressively lowered themselves from the first year of operation; we are now costing the system approximately 22 cents per tonne per mile.

That does not strike me as a company being in an impossible situation. It seems to be doing very well. Why Bill C-5, then?

The lines and tracks used by CWR were constructed between 1909 and 1911 by the Canadian Northern Railway. Shortly thereafter, the Canadian Northern Railway, like many of the regional railways built during the railway boom of the late 1800s and early 1900s, found itself in financial difficulty and by the year 1919 the Government of Canada acquired ownership and control of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

The portion of the line under consideration in Bill C-5 was the former Canadian National Railway's Stettler subdivision. Its primary function then—and it is the same now—is to transport grain from the elevators along the line to CN's main track for delivery to the ports in Vancouver. This line has been designated as an integral part of the basic railway network and became protected against abandonment until the year 2000.

It is to be argued then that the Central Western Railway remains connected with other provinces and continues by its main function to be advantageous to Canada.

There is much more at stake than allowing a small company to fall retroactively under the National Transportation Act proviso for short line railways. Again, we must wonder about the intent of Bill C-5. Because of the far-reaching implications I have mentioned, and the need to protect this railroad line, I would argue that in effect the passage of Bill C-5 would be to the disadvantage of grain farmers rather than to their advantage.

The federal government has been generous toward the CWR in the past, but without federal involvement can we assure the grain farmers that the railway will be able to continue to operate? It seems to me that these days this government is more inclined to cut grants rather than to give them. When the government is reduced to slashing funds to such groups as veterans, women and natives, as well as transfers to the provinces, how can grain farmers be assured that this railway company will be able to continue on its own?

I would like to go back to the question of why Bill C-5. It has been argued, as I pointed out before, that if the Canadian Western Railway had come into existence 39 days after it did, that being the time that the new National Transportation Act came into play, it would not the face legal entanglements that it faces today. That is not exactly true.

The jurisdictional problem would still have been raised, as it has been by the railway unions representing the employees on the Canadian National Railway, for successor rights pursuant to Section 144 of the Canada Labour Code.

Furthermore, if Bill C-5 were to pass, federal jurisdiction over Central Western could be upheld on the basis of Section 92 (10) (c) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

The Canada Labour Relations Board has held that the Central Western Railway fell under federal jurisdiction. That decision was upheld by the Federal Court of Appeal. The company appealed this decision. The appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is scheduled to be heard on March 19, 1990.

• (1030)

The government has been quite efficient this time in trying to get this legislation through the House. It could be argued that such zealousness might prejudice the court case should the bill become law before the Supreme Court has been able to hear the case. I hope that this is not the intent of the government in trying to pass this legislation as quickly as possible.

I raised the question of safety as well during the last debate. I would like to raise it again.

We were assured that employees of the Central Western Railway hold an "A" card under the uniform code of operating rules and that their examination had been filed with both provincial and federal authorities. I pointed out before, and I would like to point out again, that should Bill C-5 tip the scale and should ultimately CWR be declared outside federal jurisdiction, there would be no guarantees that this railway would continue to be governed by the federal safety standards once the railway is declared to be wholly provincial.

I put to you the concerns of unions in that matter. Their questions were these. Would the employees be protected from having to work in unsafe conditions due to long hours of duty? Would they be covered by the mandatory rest order? If the Canada Labour Relations Board decision is upheld, the unions argue that Central Western Railway employees would be protected by the rest provisions of the agreements that were in place on the Canadian National Railway prior to the purchase of the Stettler subdivision. These agreements give employees the right to book rest after 10 or 11 hours of duty.

It was pointed out in the submission of the United Transportation Union to the legislative committee that there is a distinct difference between a contractual right and the whim of an employer to force an employee to work long hours. It was pointed out as well, and here I quote verbatim, what was submitted by the UTU:

> These contract rules and government regulations not only protect the employees but also serve to protect the public along the right of way and we believe that not only the Central Western but any other short line railway should be required to comply with these standards.

In closing, I would simply urge this House to consider the few points I have mentioned in my speech but that I would like to highlight once more.

The Canadian Western Railway seems to be a profitable business venture and its financial health does not seem to be in jeopardy as we speak.

There is a matter of an appeal still to be heard before the Supreme Court at a later date and this House should let this judicial body arrive at its decision without any possible, even if unintentional, interference from this House.

The safety of workers might eventually be at stake if safety measures are not clearly established and controlled.

Finally, grain farmers who depend on this line for movement of their crops must be secure in the knowledge that they would not be at the mercy of a small, although right now financially healthy, business venture.

There is more at stake than the dream of a small businessman. There is the future of workers and farmers to consider.

I encourage this House to stand with me and oppose this bill. I have no intention of supporting it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

INTEGRATED CIRCUIT TOPOGRAPHY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bill McKnight (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C–57, an act to provide for the protection of integrated circuit topographies and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in my place today to begin second reading of Bill C–57, the integrated circuits topography act.

Integrated circuits as perhaps some members know, and probably most do not know, are really the building blocks for tomorrow's technology. These are little microchips that are used in everything from washing machines, video cassette recorders to military hardware and the space arm. Integrated circuits are the heart of modern information, communications, computing, entertainment, manufacturing, medicine, space exploration and research technology.

Although ICs, as they are called, represent only 5 per cent to 10 per cent of the value of many end–use electronic systems at the point of market entry, they really determine 90 per cent of the function and performance of such systems.

Canada's industrial competitiveness is closely tied to our ability to tap into integrated circuit technology, and our businesses have been quick to take advantage of the speed, efficiency and compactness that ICs provide.

The most recent figures indicate that Canada's consumption of ICs embodied in finished products amounts to more than $1 billion. Our consumption of individual circuit pieces such as silicon chips is over $600 million.

Although Canada is a heavy user of integrated circuits we are not yet a major producer. Our production of ICs in 1989 is estimated at some $300 million. Of that figure only $80 million worth is for market sale. The remaining $220 million is used by companies for their own in–house needs.

As an industrial nation, we rely upon the rapid development and diffusion around the world of integrated circuits. We turn to foreign suppliers, such as Japan, which produces some 46 per cent of the world market, or the United States which supplies some 44 per cent.

But businesses in Canada have carved out a small but lucrative share of the international market. There are some 25 companies in this country engaged in the design or design and manufacturer of ICs. These companies range from the giants of the industry such as Northern Telecom and Mitel to small scale designers and fabricators.

Although the Canadian industry supplies less than 1 per cent of the world demand for ICs, our companies are developing world–wide reputations for their ability to fulfil specialized niches.

Some Canadian firms have become international leaders in designing and fabricating ICs used in the telecommunications industry, a sector in which Canada's technological achievements are second to none.

In 1988, Canada exported $750 million worth of telecommunications equipment, 55 per cent of which went to the United States.

Other niches include the ICs used in hearing aids and amplifiers. Linear Technologies Inc. of Burlington, Ontario is estimated to have captured about 45 per cent of the world market.

LSI Logic Corporation, whose head office is in Calgary, has carved out a market niche by maintaining very close contact with its customers and being able to provide them with prototypes of new chip sets or with application–specific integrated circuits in as little as one week.

The strength of the Canadian integrated circuit industry lies in the entrepreneurial spirit of our businesses. Canadian companies have proven themselves able to deliver world-class design services and innovative quality products.

What the industry requires is intellectual property protection that will both encourage and protect innovation. The legislation we have before us today protects our designers from unauthorized copies being made of their products.

At the same time that the law provides a high level of protection for our designers and manufacturers, it does not impose a regulatory burden on the industry or upon the government. The intellectual property rights under this bill will be self-enforced. Designers or manufacturers who believe that their rights have been infringed can apply to the courts to recover damages.

The legislation will bring Canada in line with the protection that is being attached to integrated circuit topographies in the countries with which we trade. It will both serve the interests of Canadian designers at home, and ensure that their topography is protected within the jurisdiction of our trading partners.

• (1040)

Our major trading partner in integrated circuits at the moment is the United States which supplied approximately 83 per cent of Canada's imports in 1987, and was the destination of 89 per cent of our IC exports.

The United States passed the Semiconductor Chip Protection Act in 1984. This act grants Canada interim protection but the legislation is drafted in such a way that Canadian designs will only be protected on a permanent basis in the U.S. if we prepare and pass similar legislation in order to protect circuit topography in our country.

Clearly, it is within Canada's interest to provide protection here, and to ensure that our IC topographies are protected abroad. None of the existing intellectual property statutes, including the Industrial Design Act, the Patent Act and the Copyright Act provide the protection and flexibility required.

This government's decision to enact specific and specialized legislation to grant intellectual property protection is in keeping with current international trends in intellectual property rights.

A clear international consensus has emerged to treat intellectual property in chip topography as a sui generis, regime outside the framework of traditional intellectual property legislation, such as copyright or patents.

As well as putting Canada on an equal regulatory footing with other countries, providing protection for topography will help to attract domestic research, production and marketing of IC products. It will also make Canada a more inviting place for international designers and manufacturers to invest.

Under the FTA Japanese and other IC manufacturers may wish to establish operations here in Canada. The creation of an integrated circuit is a major industrial project requiring the investment of millions of dollars. That kind of investment is less likely without a law to protect against the manufacturing and marketing of unauthorized copies.

The legislation before us provides adequate protection for our manufacturers and ensures potential investors as well as our trading partners that Canada is a safe place to develop IC technology. In preparing the legislation the government has benefited from an extensive series of consultations.

Price Waterhouse submitted a study of the Canadian integrated circuit industry in April 1986. One year later, Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, along with the Department of Communications released a study paper for the interested and expert public outlining the scope of the proposed legislation and asking for advice and comment on a number of recommendations.

In consulting widely with those working in the IC field, the government has recognized that technology moves rapidly and that expert advice from those in the know is essential if we are to provide legislation flexible enough to keep abreast of this rapidly changing area.

I would like to take this opportunity on behalf of the minister and the department to thank all of those who participated in these consultations. They have helped us draft legislation that is an innovative and timely response to rapidly unfolding developments in information technology, international trade and intellectual property.

In order to be protected under the integrated circuits topography act, a topography must be original. Its design must be the result of an intellectual effort and not the mere reproduction of another topography or a substantial part thereof. Topographies that are commonplace among designers or manufacturers of integrated circuits are not protected by the act.

Subject to specific exceptions, the integrated circuits topography act gives the rights owner of an original topography control over the following: first, the unauthorized copying of a protected topography or any substantial part of it; second, the unauthorized manufacturing of an IC product incorporating the topography or a substantial part of it; third, the importation or commercial exploitation of a topography or a substantial part of it or of an IC product made without the consent of the IC owner; and, fourth, the importation or commercial exploitation of an industrial article which incorporates an IC product that embodies a protected topography.

I am sure that it is crystal clear to everybody. When they read Hansard, maybe it will become even more clear.

In short, the legislation enables the designers and manufacturers of an IC topography to control unauthorized reproduction, distribution and importation of infringing technologies.

The legislation provides for the full range of civil remedies, including injunctions, damages and exemplary damages.

The doctrines of first sale and exhaustion of rights apply to IC products manufactured anywhere in the world and put on the market with the authorization of the rights owner. After the first lawful sale, the topography owner has no statutory right to control its lawful use, rental, resale or redistribution. This will permit parallel imports of technology, and will facilitate diffusion of the design.

In order to design business with the secrecy it requires to protect the expensive investments needed to research and develop their topographies, the disclosure requirements for compulsory registration have been kept flexible.

Authority is given to the Governor in Council to adopt flexible deposit requirements so that the applicant may refrain from disclosing information protected by trade secret and other confidential information.

Under the act, an original topography can be protected for as long as 10 years. Applicants are given a two year grace period following first commercial use of the circuit before registering the topography.

The protection commences at registration. However, if the applicant has taken advantage of the grace period, either for the full two years or less, then the 10 year term of protection is computed as beginning following the first commercial exploitation anywhere in the world either of a chip that embodies the protected topography, or of an industrial article incorporating a chip that embodies the protected topography.

Mr. Speaker, this will be very clear when you read it carefully in Hansard.

Consistent with usual industry practices, marking of IC products will be required only to allow identification of the product so users can determine whether in fact it is registered. These features of the legislation reduce the regulatory burden of the legislation while providing full protection to designers and manufacturers.

The three exemptions to the statutory rights provided by the act go further to create an environment in which the transfer of integrated circuit technology can proceed without impediment.

The first exemption applies to the unauthorized copying of a protective topography for purposes of teaching and research.

The second exemption allows a protected topography to be copied as a first step in a process of analysis and redesign. It also allows topographies created by this process to be exploited if they themselves are original.

This exemption encourages competition and innovation by allowing reverse engineering. This is a process in which a product is taken apart and then reproduced in order to discover information about it. Then another topography is created based upon the original design, but with sufficient modifications to meet the originality requirements of the act. Reverse engineering is a vital feature of the growth and development of the Canadian and the world IC industry and helps in the free market in semiconductor chips and the spread of chip technology.

The third exemption allows anyone to reproduce a topography, or manufacture or import an integrated circuit for either a private or a non-commercial purpose.

A defence in an infringement action is also given to innocent infringers who were unaware and had no means to find out that an IC product had been manufactured without authority.

This bill will provide the protection and the flexibility the Canadian IC industry needs. It will keep us in line with our trading partners and provide an environment for investor confidence.

I would like to remind the House that providing intellectual property protection for our industries is but one element in the government's industrial strategy designed to keep Canada on the leading edge of international competitiveness.

At the same time that we are protecting our innovators, we are taking steps to make sure that their products move quickly from the lab bench to the shop floor. In the past months, the government has introduced several major programs to ensure that Canada's industrial future is a high-tech future.

The designers and fabricators of ICs will benefit from the Strategic Technologies Program which promotes networks and alliances, particularly in the areas of pre-competitive development of technology and its diffusion to Canadian industry.

• (1050)

Information technology, of which circuit topography is a vital component, has been identified as one of the three strategic technologies targeted by the program. The others are biotechnology and advanced industrial materials including silicon and ceramics which are of interest to the integrated circuit industry.

As well, the integrated circuit industry in Canada will benefit as a result of the national Network of Centres of Excellence program that is a key component of the government's InnovAction strategy.

Through the Network of Centres of Excellence program, a consortium of 12 researchers from nine Canadian universities will receive $14 million to research and develop micro-electronic devices, circuits and systems for Ultra-Large Scale Integration. These researchers will respond to the technological challenge of squeezing more than 10 million functioning electronic components onto a microchip layer smaller than a fingernail and thinner than soap film. The technology is expected to become the mainstay of the next generation of telecommunications and computer systems.

The Canadian integrated circuit industry has room to grow and to pioneer new innovations. It has proven to be a leader in telecommunications, in finding new ways to serve the specific needs of customers, and in seizing international market niches.

Canadian firms are moving ahead in such areas as analog ICs for speech and handwriting recognition, machine vision, robotics and industrial process control. They are contributing to the progressive miniaturization of IC technology.

The legislation before us gives the integrated circuit industry in this country an essential tool to remain competitive, to attract investment, and to ensure that our products are protected in the markets of our trading partners.

It is legislation that responds to the needs of the industry for adequate protection. It gives them the tools to protect their interests and investments without undue regulation or without the restrictions that would hamper technology transfer.

I hope that the members of this House will join me in supporting a bill that is important to our future as a high-tech nation. The future holds tremendous promise and potential. Our integrated circuit industry is ready to seize that promise and fulfil that potential.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put what this statute does into layperson's words. So that people know what these little microchips are like, they are layer upon layer of circuits with silicon covering. It is a bit like designing a high-rise tower. The officials, when they explained it to me, gave the analogy of a high-rise office tower. Somebody has to design where the pipes go through, the water, and all of these systems. That is what these bright people do in this integrated circuit topography.

But without having any patent protection they tend to move off to other countries to do that where there is already patent protection for them. What this bill does is to give to the 25 companies that are spread out across this country, in many of the ridings of hon. members in all three parties, patent protection so they will make the investments here and build these microchips here so we can play a part in that world industry. It is the industry of the future and the words of which I do not even understand. However, I understand the concepts. It is real, and I guess we have to get into it.

Certainly, young people understand it. I know that when my son and daughter they sit down at their computers seem to understand this stuff instinctively. Frankly, think I would rather hire somebody else to do it for me.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, one never knows in the practice of federal politics in Canada what one may be doing on a given day. I must say that to be before the House today to speak about integrated circuit topographies is a very pleasant surprise for me.

I am happy to say that we are able to support Bill C-57, which gives protection to integrated microcircuit topography. I am also happy to say that perhaps because I am younger than the previous speaker I do happen to understand what it is, largely because of my previous occupation when I had the task of acting as lawyer on behalf of some of the companies in the national capital region which engage in the design and production of integrated microcircuits. I am aware that this is a very important aspect of our high technology industry.

We are supporting this bill, but I think the presentation of it in the House today gives us an opportunity to think about a few other things which are related, not just to the microcircuit technology itself, but to Canada's role in the globally competitive world. What we face at this time is a challenge to our ability to increase our standard of living, to maintain our standard of living and the kinds of advantages that Canadians have come to enjoy. That challenge arises not so much from within as from the world outside our borders.

It is true that Canada has achieved very high levels of growth of economy in relation to other OECD countries. What Canada has failed to do in comparison with many of our competitors is to increase our rate of productivity.

In Canada we lag behind our major trading competitors in growth in productivity. This reflects the fact that for many years now in Canada we have failed to invest to the extent that we need to do so in education, research and development, and science-based innovation.

While we welcome a bill like Bill C-57, which is going to give protection to some of the high-tech companies both in the national capital region, of which I am proud, and in other parts of Canada—we need it and support it—it is too little, too late.

What we need in Canada is a government that has a vision for science and technology, a government that has some clue where it wants to go in the world.

Why can we not set as a challenge for Canadian industry to be the best in the world in environmental technologies by the year 2000? Why are we not setting up within the Government of Canada a plan of action to move us forward in the new technologies?

Why is it at a time when we are suffering from shortages in the high technology areas of skilled and qualified people we are cutting back transfer payments for post-secondary education? Why is it that we are going out to compete in the world with an arm tied behind our back?

The reason is that there has been a lack of vision and willingness to act. Bill C-57 is great and we support it. What we need is more bills like it and more initiatives to show the way to the future for Canadian industry and Canadian technology.

It is with a great deal of scepticism that we hear that the Prime Minister of Canada is receiving an award for his contribution to research and development.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Manley: When compared with eight comparable countries, our gross R and D expenditures as a percentage of GDP is the lowest at 1.42 per cent. Our industry funded R and D as a percentage of GDP is the lowest at .76 per cent. Government funded R and D is the second lowest at .34 per cent. In terms of government performed R and D we are at about the middle. In higher education R and D we are the lowest at .32 per cent. In terms of the number of domestic patents granted per hundred thousand inhabitants we are the second lowest, and on it goes.

These are trying times and difficult times. We need to compete in the world and we need the tools to do it.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have been weathering the cold icy practices of this Conservative government, but I want Canadians to take heart because spring is on the horizon.

Canadians are against the proposed goods and services tax. The GST is truly regressive. However, it is the Liberal Party that is giving Canadians from coast to coast an opportunity to say no to the GST. Canadians can help fight this GST any day of the week next week by picking up the phone and dialling 1-900-720-6052. That registers their no vote to this GST.

Canadians know that this government and this Minister of Finance have raised their taxes 32 times since taking office, yet they have not managed to bring the deficit under control. Although the Minister of Finance has called the present manufacturers' retail sales tax a silent killer of jobs, it did not stop him from raising the tax from 9 per cent in 1984 to 13.5 per cent today. Canadians also know—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton.

TRADE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, Sarnia—Lambton, like a number of border communities across Canada, is in transition. A number of recent developments, including the implementation of the free trade agreement, has fostered many new conditions and changes in our community.

Within this context I have joined with other government members who represent border communities to form an ad hoc border issues committee. The group is studying the issues and problems which have a particular and profound impact on border regions such as Sarnia—Lambton. Tariff and duty collection, GST rebates for foreign tourists, cross border traffic, and personal exemptions are just a few.

It is my hope that the committee can develop positions and possible options which may help the government address the problems which we face collectively. I believe that the committee's activities will help alleviate the special circumstances which confront those of us who reside in border communities.

TIBET

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, one year ago marshal law was declared in Tibet. Since that time Tibetans have been subject to indiscriminate arrest, beatings, pass laws, surveillance by troops armed with automatic weapons, and jail sentencing up to 20 years for advocating independence in Tibet.

Thirty-one years ago saw the popular uprising in which thousands of Tibetans were cruelly killed by Chinese security forces. There has been no improvement since that time.

Two years ago I stood in this House and asked the Canadian government to support the demands of the Tibetan people. Nothing has changed. Tibetans are still seeking their independence and their freedom. They are still seeking basic human rights. Canada should not wait any longer. Tibetans have the right to self-determination and Canada must respect and support their cause.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this week's budget debate proved to the Canadian people a number of things. Two points in particular were crystallized in the course of exchanges. The first is that the opposition parties have yet to return from fantasy land and are still seeking magic wand solutions to problems they are unwilling to face in the real world.

The second point is that our government is firmly committed to showing leadership in bringing our deficit problem under control and managing the Canadian economy. There are no easy answers to the question of fiscal responsibility and this Minister of Finance has taken the measures necessary to ensure that our children and our grandchildren are not burdened with the debt created by the previous government.

WORLD FIGURE SKATING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express the pride I know is shared right across Canada over Kurt Browning's victory at the World Figure Skating Championships.

I remember quite well sitting with Ed and Lucille Broadbent in Calgary at the Olympics when Kurt competed for Canada. He went on to be the first skater to perform a quadruple jump in competition and his resounding victory last year in Paris put him in the great Canadian tradition of Donald Jackson and Brian Orser. Now he is the first Canadian man to win two world figure skating championships.

I think Kurt did us the proudest when he led the Halifax arena in the singing of O Canada. That was one of those rare electric moments, moments that are so important in these days of strained unity. Isabelle Brasseur's and Lloyd Eisler's silver medal and the stellar performance of the Duchesnays are making this a world championships for Canadians to remember for a long time.

I know the members of this House join me in saying thank you for making us all so proud while at the same time offering encouragement and best wishes for those Canadians still competing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

STUDENTS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to commend the efforts of the student leadership group at the Lord Selkirk Regional Comprehensive High School in my riding of Selkirk.

This group is committed to developing their skills in peer counselling. As a result of a work shop which the student group attended, they realized their need for further training in this area. Thanks to our government's national drug strategy program, a significant grant has been provided to the school. This grant will prepare these students to be peer counsellors for sessions geared toward chemical dependency topics.

I applaud both the efforts of the students and our government in this important endeavour.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General of Canada has been attempting to avoid the issue of turbans in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for almost a year. As early as April, 1989, the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police recommended that turbans be permitted. The former Solicitor General promised a decision by the end of February, 1990, but he was incapable of making up his mind. The Prime Minister replaced him.

The new Solicitor General must act. The Prime Minister now supports turbans in the RCMP, according to recent press reports. The delay in decision-making in this matter is exacerbating race relations across Canada. We in the Liberal party urge the Solicitor General to stop dithering and show some leadership, leadership that this government so sadly lacks.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I was preparing some notes for a presentation on the Nova Scotia economy the other night and even I was surprised at the positive numbers. I would like to put them on the record.

From 1985 to 1989, unemployment in Nova Scotia has declined from 13.6 per cent to 9.9 per cent. The Gross Domestic Product has increased every year from 1984 to 1989. Building permits have increased every year from 1984 to 1989 after a decline in the early 1980s. Exports have increased every year since 1984, with an all-time record in 1988. Investment has increased steadily with a record investment of $4.7 billion in 1989, encouraged by the leadership of ACOA.

Yes, we do have some problems and challenges in Atlantic Canada, but these actual numbers paint a very positive picture for Nova Scotia.

CBC FARM BROADCASTS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to George Price, one of agriculture's finest champions and a golden voice in broadcasting who is scheduled to retire from CBC Radio this June.

For the past 31 years, listeners across Canada could hear his parliamentary items during the daily radio noon show. He has survived many rounds of CBC cut-backs. He has watched as some stations sliced time from the farm show. He has seen commentators leave without replacement and he has watched many food and farm reports become resource reports. Now with his retirement his position will be cut and that hurts. It hurts George to know that his work is considered unnecessary, but it hurts rural Canada too.

It is a further slap in the face from a government that has been steadily reducing communications funding and services to rural Canada. Rural Canadians need informed and accurate reports on events that shape their lives. CBC may be reflecting what the government wants when it makes this cut but it is not what rural Canada needs.

CANADA AND INDOCHINA

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, Canada's Cambodian community was both saddened and distressed when it heard about the statement on Indochina made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) in the House of Commons on January 25.

A few days ago, I had the pleasure of meeting, at my office, a delegation headed by Mr. Sarindeth Duy, President of the Khmer Association for National Action, who, with other members of this groups, including Simon Yim, Buddhi Klok, Seng Phlang and Chan Dara, expressed their concern about the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because Canada, which so far had always been neutral and had taken a very independent position on this matter, now seemed to be siding with those who had caused such widespread persecution in that country.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about what is taking place in my country. My parents were born and raised in Shawville, Quebec, not 50 miles from here. My dad homesteaded in southern Saskatchewan. He and mother farmed there for 60 years. I was born in the "dirty thirties". I know what drought and depression are. I am Canadian. This is my country, the best country in the world. But it seems there is a constitutional depression. There is a drought of ideas. We are tearing ourselves apart.

• (1110)

I, for one, do not want this to happen. We need to bind our country together into one united Canada. The constitutional discussion revolving around the Meech Lake Accord seems to have reached an impasse. I would encourage all 11 of Canada's first ministers to reconsider their positions. There has to be a way of resolving our differences.

I would compliment the Premier of British Columbia for trying to find alternatives to bridge the gap. We must be creative. We must do our utmost to find a way to affirm who we are, and to confirm that we are all equal partners. I beseech Canada's first ministers to meet and keep meeting until this impasse is resolved.

There is a place for all provinces in Canada, just as there is a place in the provinces for Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, why has the federal government repeatedly refused to challenge the national lending institutions in Canada by declaring a moratorium on farm foreclosures and by initiating realistic debt restructuring in the Canadian agricultural industry.

Rather, the government has facilitated the process of dispossession through the Farm Debt Review Act, which was deliberately structured in such a way that the Farm Debt Review Board is unable to arbitrate settlements between farm debtors and their creditors.

As a consequence, the lending institutions remain unscathed and are now in legal possession of thousands of acres of farmland, millions of dollars worth of farm buildings and assets, and the levels of repression grow daily. The dispossessed, once people of the soil, farm families proud of their abilities to produce and pursue a rewarding way of life, are migrants or tenants of the corporate masters on land that has, in many cases, been in their families for years.

When will the government intercede to stop this corporate take-over of farms? Stop the lending institutions from profiting on the unfortunate circumstances in which some farmers temporarily find themselves.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is not often in our lives that we encounter historic moments when our own convictions may truly constitute leadership toward an important national purpose.

The Meech Lake Accord presents such a moment, and the unity of Canada is such a purpose. As we contemplate the frustrating discord to which the Meech Lake debate has now deteriorated, it is timely to reiterate our individual convictions that the Accord presents a unique opportunity for Canada to become whole and to renew our collective resolve to help make it so.

[Translation]

To me, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that Canada needs Quebec and Quebec needs Canada.

[English]

As colleagues in all corners of the House, we reflect the unity that is Canada. In the critical weeks which remain let us individually and collectively intensify that reflection upon the Meech Lake deliberations in every way that we can.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House to speak to a very urgent matter which concerns the people in the riding of Chambly, and more specifically, the residents of Saint-Basile-le-Grand. I received a resolution that was passed unanimously by the town council of Saint-Basile-le-Grand, which says that the people of this town feel they have been abandoned by the federal government with respect to the storage of PCBs that were partially burnt in a fire eighteen months ago. These people would like the government to set up a joint committee that would settle the storage problem once and for all and deal with the problem of adequate compensation for the people of Saint-Basile-le-Grand, because these people feel they have been abandoned by the federal government.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the crisis that we are going through in the fishery now demands immediate attention from the government.

We have a new minister, and we wish him well. He has received the reports of the Harris and the Haché committees. Now is the time to act. The government must manage those stocks in the future on behalf of all Canadians because it is a national resource.

Also, I remind the government that the principle that has been followed up to now is an adjacency principle and that, while it is a national stock, those closest to the resource should have priority. In my own area of Labrador we have the greatest resources in the world off our shores; yet, some of the most disadvantaged fishermen in Canada.

I call upon the government in the new management plan to reaffirm the principle of adjacency and to give priority to those who live and make their livings near those stocks.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, since its birth in 1867, Canada has experienced a number of problems. There are problems today, and there will certainly be other problems in the future. Canada's anglophones and francophones have not always shared nor will they always share the same vision of this country we call Canada.

[English]

But, over–reacting to all our constitutional problems does not help Canada, does not help Quebec or any other province. Despite all the historical difficulties this country has experienced in the past, all members of this House on both sides of the issue must remember that Canada is still a wonderful place to live, to bring up a family and to build a better future for our children.

COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the people of the Six Nations have gone through a number of environmental crises over the last few weeks: asbestos found in their schools, contamination in their drinking water, air contamination resulting from the Hagersville fire.

All this time the community newspaper, known as The Tekawennake has enabled the people of the Six Nations to keep informed of these issues.

In the last budget the Secretary of State has cut funding for these community newspapers, and I call upon him to reconsider his decision to make these cuts in order to help these community newspapers keep open the lines of communication that are much needed on the reserves.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. In light of the growing concern as to what is happening in this country on the matter of constitutional change, exactly what is the Prime Minister doing in a positive way at this time to bring about constitutional change of a kind that is broadly acceptable to Canadians generally?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, the Senator who is the Minister of Federal–Provincial Affairs, and other ministers have been in ongoing discussions and consultations with the premiers and other officials of the provinces in an attempt to draw together a better degree of consensus and understanding so that there may be some basis for advancing this particular issue.

I am sure the hon. member is referring specifically to what occurred in the legislature in Newfoundland yesterday, and the notice of the intention of the government of Newfoundland to revoke the resolution that was previously passed.

I should remind my hon. friend that the Prime Minister and indeed all first ministers had given the Premier of Newfoundland an undertaking that the Meech Lake Accord or any variation of it would not be implemented until the legislature in the province of Newfoundland would have an opportunity to reconsider the matter and express its approval or its disapproval. In return the Premier of Newfoundland had agreed that the legislature would not in the meantime rescind the resolution that has already been passed in the legislature of Newfoundland. We can only expect that commitment to be upheld and honoured.

While it is included in the Speech from the Throne, there has not been any specific date as to when it may be rescinded. Therefore I think that it offers the opportunity for further discussions and consultations to continue.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have been talking about the mood in the country generally. In light of what the Deputy Prime Minister has just said I want to ask him if the Prime Minister will call an immediate first ministers' conference on this very important matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the good intentions of my hon. friend I am not sure the word "immediate" would be appropriate, inasmuch as I think there would have to be some movement and some indication that the parties are coming closer together.

• (1120)

Hopefully the result of the ongoing consultations and discussions will result in drawing closer together all the parties involved to bridge some of the divergent views.

At an appropriate time, the Prime Minister may very well consider the very valuable suggestion the hon. Leader of the Opposition has proposed. Perhaps, at an appropriate time that might be the logical course. It is very much in the Prime Minister's style to try to build a consensus on these important issues. I think he would agree that there probably has to be some further groundwork done before that could take place.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why he and his government do not think there is any value in providing an opportunity for the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister to sit around the same table and discuss the situation. I also want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why he won't give Canadians a chance to hear about the government's plans in this respect, considering that the deadline for adopting the constitutional mechanism is June 23, which is not far off. We need more information on an issue that is vital to the future of this country.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting for one minute that there is no value in the proposition advanced by the Leader of the Opposition.

What I am saying is that it is a matter of timing and at the appropriate time, perhaps that might be a logical course of action. As well, I can assure the hon. member that at the appropriate time the Prime Minister will be outlining the further approach the federal government will undertake to help resolve the impasse.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. Will the government at least recognize that it was an error, as we pointed out three years ago, to regard the Accord as a seamless web to which only egregious errors could be admitted. Will he recognize that there should be public participation, that the concerns of western alienation, the concerns of the northern people, so many of the concerns of the economic union of Canada, over the last three years all of these matters should have been considered?

Will the Deputy Prime Minister agree today that the consideration of the constitutional reform will be enlarged so that there will be some assurances that all of these concerns will be dealt with?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is outlining a new version of the official position of the Liberal party. It would seem that way.

This was a resolution that was passed by the House of Commons. It was supported by all political parties and the government is very grateful for that. While it was never suggested that the proposal was perfect, it was clearly suggested that it formed a basis for bringing together in a constitutional framework all the provinces and addressed many of the issues that required addressing.

It set the stage for the resolution of further ongoing constitutional issues, such as Senate reform, greater participation by the provinces in the appointment of the Senate and greater participation in the appointment of members to the Supreme Court, plus certain flexibilities that in a more accurate way reflect the diversity of this country. We felt, and obviously 10 of the then premiers felt, that this was the first step and was important enough to advance the whole cause of constitutional reform to more accurately reflect the reality of Canada.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, what has become clear over the last three years is that the Canadian people are not prepared, and for good reason, to accept the promises of the Prime Minister to deal with events subsequently. That is the reason we are urging and ask now that the Prime Minister show leadership again. Call the first ministers together and develop a concrete method of assuring that these subsequent stages will be arrived at in good faith and that they will be gone through.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and this government have shown leadership in advancing the Meech Lake Accord. I regret that the hon. member is now having some second thoughts about the support of his party. That is regrettable. I indicated earlier that the—

Mr. Speller: You are playing politics.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member suggests playing politics. It is his own colleague who is trying to inject politics into this. Maybe once the junior member has been around here for a little while he will realize the difference between politics and sincerity.

What is happening is that the consultation process is going on, as I indicated to his leader, in the hopes that there can be a drawing together of the opinions in bringing the parties together in an attempt to follow through perhaps with a first ministers' conference. We are certainly not ruling that out. I indicated that I appreciated the recommendation by the Leader of the Opposition and suggested to him that at an appropriate time that might be a possible course of action.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say on behalf of our party that we urge the government to hold a first ministers' meeting as soon as reasonably possible on the future of the Constitution and Meech Lake.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. There is now a constitutional impasse in this country and a great deal of concern about the unity of Canada from one part of this country to the other.

On February 23 in the national press theatre the Prime Minister held a press conference. He said in part: "I will be meeting very soon with Senator Murray and I will be talking to some of the first ministers, no doubt. I will let you know as the events unfold".

Is the Deputy Prime Minister in a position to bring the House up to date on what has happened in the last two weeks? Premier Wells said yesterday that he had not heard from the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister been meeting with Senator Murray? Has the Prime Minister called the first ministers? Can the Deputy Prime Minister bring the House up to date on what has happened in the last two weeks since he held that very important press conference?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the tenor of the hon. member's question and his expressed concern for the national unity of the country. I can say on behalf of my colleagues in the House that the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has always been in the forefront of providing leadership on behalf of his party and the constituents which he represents in promoting national unity.

The senator has travelled across the country, as he was instructed to do, on the basis of the agreement reached at the first ministers' meeting in November. He has been in the process of exploring possible accommodations, including the idea of Premier McKenna's parallel accord.

The dialogue among all the provinces is continuing. It is going on at this very moment and has been going on at the level of the Prime Minister and the premiers, various cabinet ministers and officials. I want to assure to the hon. member that the federal government has not given up in this very worth-while process. We will continue to work and I am sure at the appropriate time the hon. member and other members of the House will be brought up to date.

The developments of yesterday and recent developments have obviously caused a greater sense of urgency. I want to give him the assurance that we treat this as an urgent matter and will invite the participation—and I am sure the Prime Minister would agree—of all hon. members, as we have in this House before. It is more than simply a government initiative, it is an initiative by Parliament, it is a resolution that has been supported by Parliament and we respect and appreciate the support from the hon. member and his party.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether or not the Deputy Prime Minister can tell us if during the last two weeks the Prime Minister has been in touch with other first ministers in this country? There are a few confusing signals coming out of this as to whether or not the Prime Minister himself has been in touch with First Ministers. Is the Prime Minister willing to look for some mechanism, to seek some accommodation of some of the concerns and some of the suggestions regarding Meech Lake?

• (1130)

The Deputy Prime Minister knows, of course, that in this House there is very strong support for the five conditions of Quebec. He knows about some other concerns and some other suggestions.

Has the Prime Minister been in touch with the First Ministers? If he has not been in touch, why has that not happened, or will he soon be in contact with them with a view to having a First Ministers' conference, if necessary, to resolve the impasse?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge he has been in touch with all of them. I know he has been in touch with a lot of them and my understanding is that he has been in touch with all of them. I know that the senator has been in touch with all of them. I know that other cabinet ministers have been involved as have officials been involved in this process.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are attempting to look for an accommodation. If it is timely and appropriate and if there is a drawing together of the parties and the divergent points of view, I am sure that the Prime Minister would convene a First Ministers' conference.

However, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, I am not sure that the timing is appropriate right now. I think there has to be some further work done and I can assure the hon. member that that is going on.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that the main factor that is contributing to the concern in this country about the Meech Lake impasse is the government's silence.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House when the Prime Minister will report to the House on what his government has done to get out of this impasse?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is really unfortunate that the hon. member would make that observation because I think many hon. members and, indeed, the country know that the opposite is true. We have not only been not silent, we have been consistent, and the Prime Minister has laid out in very clear and concise terms—

Mr. Speller: Where have you been speaking?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks me where I have been speaking. I would not expect him to have the energy to follow me around the country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: I want to assure the hon. member, as I assured the member for Yorkton—Melville and the Leader of the Opposition, that the work is ongoing and will continue. As far as the Government of Canada is concerned, while there are some difficulties at the present time, that does not for a moment lead us to believe that this issue cannot be resolved.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the revelation that the government is indeed recruiting RCMP officers to enforce the proposed goods and services tax.

I have in my hand a copy of a memo that was sent to the RCMP on December 13, 1989, recruiting individuals to assist, and I quote: "in the development and implementation of an intelligence unit aimed at gathering information and maintaining an intelligence data base on tax".

How can this government possibly explain this deceitful and unsettling development? Are small business people now going to have to watch their alleyways for undercover agents in trench coats and dark glasses?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this government has made it very clear that it believes in the fundamental honesty of Canadians to deal with their tax matters in a very honest way. We do know, however, that there are some people in the country who will take advantage of tax systems.

What has been proposed here is no tax police, nothing in that order, but a precaution to ensure that the measures developed in this new GST system are appropriate, taking into account the possibilities that could arise through tax evasion and fraud.

I think that this sort of precautionary measure is supported by Canadians because if there is not the precautionary measure taken it just puts a greater tax load on honest taxpayers in Canada, which is certainly not appropriate.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister and it concerns the same bulletin. I quote again from the bulletin:

> With the introduction of this new tax as with any such far-reaching program, the opportunities for fraudulent activities are of concern to us.

Over and over again in this House the Minister of Finance and his colleagues on the front bench have indicated that the GST is a simple tax and that there would be no great problem with compliance. If so, how can the minister possibly reconcile this tax police recruitment bulletin and campaign with his rhetoric of simplicity echoed daily by himself and other members of his front benches?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely clear that the goods and services tax is a simpler tax than is the existing federal sales tax which has 22,000 separate special deals between Revenue Canada and the taxpayers. So clearly the complexity of the old system is prone to tax avoidance and tax evasion and one of the reasons for moving to the GST is to try to avoid that.

But in any system, in any country, there are opportunities for tax evasion. Tax evasion is breaking the law. The GST will be in place. It will be a simple, far less complex tax system, but people can still break the law.

If my hon. friend from Dartmouth is saying that he is quite comfortable letting Canadians break the law, if he is quite comfortable encouraging the government not to take precautionary steps to stop people from breaking the law, then I think that it is a very interesting policy that he proposing for the Liberal Party of Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that the tax is so simple. I am sure it has not escaped the minister's notice that he is going from 75,000 taxpayers who pay the MST directly to about 1.25 million businesses that are going to be collecting the new tax. Is that simplicity?

I would like to ask him a question on the same point. Given the reference to fraudulent activities and given the fact that billions of dollars go back to businesses through the GST system, through the input tax credits, will the minister indicate to the House how much his department anticipates will be lost to the revenues of Canada through fraudulent activities given the size of the business input tax credits that will exist?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the design of this goods and services tax will avoid the loss to which my hon. friend is referring. In the system that we have today the total consumption tax is centred on 75,000 taxpayers. There are great pressures on those taxpayers to try to minimize their tax liability. That surely would suggest to me that the existing system is much more prone to tax avoidance than the new system which will be more equitable because it is broadly based and because there are not unfair advantages given to some people in a tax system who are not taxed and others who are.

That is one of the key benefits of moving from the existing system, which is prone to that sort of avoidance, error and evasion, to a new system which is far more equitable.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I take the minister's answer to mean that he does not expect any loss through fraudulent activities and therefore he begs the question of why this memo has gone out saying that the government anticipates fraudulent activities and needs to hire tax police in order to prevent it.

I would like the minister to explain why, if he is not going to lose anything through fraudulent activities, the government is out trying to hire people with RCMP credentials to prevent loss through fraudulent activities.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the naivety of my friend is stunning. Does he think that everybody in this country is going to be perfectly honest? Does he think that everybody who is going to be a part of this tax system is going to be fully honest and not do anything wrong?

Mr. Manley: I asked you how much you thought you were going to lose and you said "nothing".

• (1140)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I hope nothing and that is precisely why we are taking these precautionary steps to see whether there are differences in this tax system which the experts on fraud in the RCMP should bring to the attention of Revenue Canada.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Don't you know that yet?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend from Windsor says don't we know it yet. These are things that we have been working on for some while with Revenue Canada, with the RCMP and will continue to do so because we believe we do have a responsibility to honest taxpayers to ensure that dishonest taxpayers, of which unfortunately there are a few, do not take advantage of the system.

[Translation]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Conservatives' Mr. Shaight-from-the-cuff has spoken! Yesterday the Chairman of the Finance Committee admitted that the only way to raise new taxes was to hit the middle class. Will the Minister admit that this is true, and that his philosophy behind the GST is to hit the middle class as hard as he can?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, I do not agree with that. I would say to my hon. friend that in income tax reform in 1988 we introduced a number of changes in the corporate income tax system that will increase the effective tax rates on corporations. It will result in a number of corporations paying tax which previously did not pay tax. These are things which I think my hon. friend would support which will result in a much fairer tax system.

We have done the same thing in personal income tax reform as well through the years to remove a number of loopholes, a number of tax breaks that were in the personal income tax system that favoured people in upper income brackets. So the result is that after tax reform there will be a greater burden of tax on both upper-income people and corporations.

TAXATION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact the details which were given to the committee yesterday by tax experts showed very clearly that the various cost of living gaps which the government has built into the tax system lead to reductions in the percentage of tax paid by higher-income groups as compared to middle-income groups. It is the middle-income people in this country who are carrying the burden, and the minister has to recognize that.

Is the minister not prepared at this stage to take some initiatives to see to it that those at the top of our income scale start to pay a fair share? These initiatives could include eliminating the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption, putting an inheritance tax back into place, and seeing to it that wealth taxes exist. Is it not possible for this minister to be fair to middle-income and lower-income Canadians and not just to favour the rich?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to a minimum tax on corporations. His party has been talking about a 20 per cent rate. What is he going to do with the 12 per cent rate that is charged on small corporations, small businesses that make up the vast majority? About 90 per cent of the companies in Canada are small businesses. Is the member going to support an increase in the tax rate of 12 per cent to 20 per cent just to satisfy his philosophical interest?

He talks about a tax on wealth. There is a deemed realization on the capital gains of people when they die. That provides revenues to the Government of Canada on the death of people. Is he saying that he wants a wealth tax on top of that? That would be double taxation. Is that fair?

I ask the hon. member to consider the effects of wealth tax. In 1972 when inheritance taxes were removed in this country, they raised something like .07 of 1 per cent of revenues. The key reason for that is that upper income people are able to tax plan their way out of paying those wealth taxes. The result is that the wealth tax is paid by those people with middle incomes who cannot afford the tax help from the expensive lawyers and accountants.

The reason we have followed this philosophy of taxation is because it is fairer for Canadians.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and concerns the assistance plan for workers in the fisheries industry, which the government intends to set up right away. Will one of the plan's priorities be to keep the jobs in fishing communities so that the workers will be there as soon as the fisheries get back to normal? Will the jobs be there, in order to keep the people in these communities?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the hon. member, with her experience and representing a riding where the fisheries are extremely important to her constituents—I would have thought that the present crisis in the Atlantic fisheries would have made her consider whether the solution, whether the programs to be implemented should be aimed at improving the fishermen's income or whether we should put the emphasis on creating jobs in this sector. This is a fundamental issue. Do we want to keep using the fisheries to create jobs or do we want to make the fisheries an economic activity that will be worthwhile for the fishermen? I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that after only a week and half in this department, I was surprised to see that our Atlantic fishermen have incomes that are well below those of most Canadians and that 41 per cent of their income is derived from unemployment insurance. I think these are some fundamental questions that must be addressed.

[English]

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister has to learn not to turn the question back here. He is the minister now. He is going to have to work with his colleagues and find solutions.

All I asked was that with the assistance this government is providing will he allow programs to keep the people there. We know the situation will return to normal. We know that there will be a need for those people to be there? We want to keep the people there. I do not care about unemployment insurance. Most of the people in southern Nova Scotia did not always need unemployment insurance when the fishery was healthy.

Will the minister use the money that is coming in a project to employ fishermen to help his department—which will not listen to fishermen—with the scientific research in the Scotia–Fundy? We need an assessment of stocks before we start saying what we are going to do. We do not know what the stocks are like there and his former department would not listen to the fishermen.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am still looking for the question.

If the hon. member would give me a chance, I will answer her question.

[English]

The member said that now I have to make the decisions. Well watch me. I think you have heard that before. We will be making the decision.

However, if you ask me today to again tell Atlantic Canadians that we will guarantee that every person who has a job in the plant today will have that job tomorrow, I cannot make that promise. It would be fooling them.

Everyone talks about overcapacity in harvesting. We talk about overcapacity in the processing plant. And the member is grandstanding on the issue and telling me to ignore this. Well, I will not.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the government assured me yesterday that a broad based telecommunications bill will be introduced in due course, but added a little caveat that the Minister of Communications still has some consultations to be concluded with the provinces. Given that the business community and consumers are very worried and anxious, and given the Prime Minister's stated support for ending fragmentation of telecommunications interprovincial regulation—given all this—will the Deputy Prime Minister show federal leadership today and direct the Minister of Communications to table the bill next week? Will he give the assurance that unfettered federal jurisdiction found in Bill C–41 will be included in its integrity?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to respond to the hon. member's question. No, I do not believe that the Minister of Communications will be tabling a bill next week because he has undertaken to meet with some of his provincial counterparts next week. That is a necessary step prior to the tabling of such a bill. That is a commitment made by the minister at the outset of the telecommunications policy, as the hon. member said yesterday, some five and a half years ago, and he is honouring that commitment of consultation.

Once those consultations are satisfactorily concluded, and that is now in sight, then a bill will be introduced.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the parliamentary secretary assiduously avoided committing to Bill C–41, which is the federal jurisdiction. I find that very regrettable. I sincerely hope that it was just by omission and not commission.

Does the Prime Minister realize the risk to federal jurisdiction that the Minister of Communications has permitted in the new broadcasting bill? Does he realize that Keith Spicer of the CRTC has clearly warned in unequivocal terms that federal authority shall be challenged before the Supreme Court and we could fritter away broadcasting activities if the activities of cable and television stations are allowed to be split as the minister is doing in the new Broadcasting Act? Is the government going to chance the dissipation of this key area of federal jurisdiction as well?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of abandoning federal jurisdiction in any of these areas. Bill C–41, to which the hon. member refers, is before this House. The principles contained in Bill C–41 are the lifting of the Crown immunity of the three prairie provinces' telephone companies. Those principles will be enshrined in the new telecommunications bill, but there will be consultation and discussion beforehand, as I know the hon. member would expect there to be.

With reference to the chairman of the CRTC and his comments on the broadcasting bill, that bill, as the hon. member knows, is before a legislative committee and she has ample opportunity to state her view there.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the new Solicitor General. He has on his desk a longstanding report from the Commissioner of the RCMP in respect of Sikh turbans, a recommendation that members of the Sikh community who are members of the RCMP be permitted to wear turbans.

He now has the public recommendation of the Prime Minister, his boss, on exactly the same subject. The year–long delay in implementing the recommendation of the Commissioner of the RCMP has seriously exacerbated the racial tensions in this country and has hurt the very distinguished Sikh community in Canada.

Will the Solicitor General now stand in his place and assure this House that the recommendation of the Commissioner and the Prime Minister will be accepted?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of unnecessarily delaying a decision on this particular issue.

As I indicated a few days ago, I am completing my verification of all the facts and points that have been made by the interested parties with respect to this particular issue and I will make a decision very soon.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister with respect to his responsibilities for the direction of the RCMP, the Correctional Services of Canada and CSIS.

Yesterday the RCMP conceded in Halifax that it had bungled the issue of policing in Nova Scotia. Will the new minister indicate to this House that he intends to take some real leadership in ending discrimination against native people in the Correctional Services, in our prisons, in policing and in the direction of CSIS?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows very well my feelings with respect to aboriginal people. As a former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I think I have had sufficient first-hand experience to know what the issue is all about.

I have always supported, not only the fact that there should be no discrimination whatsoever in general but that in particular there should be no discrimination with respect to aboriginal people. I believe that this government has been making every effort possible to correct whatever wrongs may have been done in the past.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship. Canada is now going through a language crisis. Yesterday, I learned that the Court Challenges Program, which was to stop at the end of March, would be extended for about four months. I would like to ask the minister why the government is hesitant to make a firm commitment to Canadians that the Court Challenges Program will be available to them in coming years.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there is no hesitation. I said very clearly that the program was very beneficial. I also indicated that I had met with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, to consider all the recommendations made by the Standing Committee of the House. We will have details soon, after I consult my colleagues. In the meantime, we announced that the program would be extended for four months and we are now having final discussions with the Canadian Council on Social Development, with Mr. Hunsley, so that it will continue to administer this program for us.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Court Challenges Program has been with us for 12 years. It has been very useful to Canadians in helping them defray the costs of going to court to try to establish their basic constitutional rights in equality and language.

The government has given the program a four month reprieve. Will the minister give a commitment in this House today that after July 31, which is the end of the four-month commitment, there will be a program helping Canadians to have access to the courts and to have the assistance of the federal government in achieving those rights before the courts?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated publicly on numerous occasions how I personally felt about the program and how beneficial I felt it was.

We have received an excellent report from our standing committee with some 19 recommendations from what I remember. Each one of them has been reviewed very carefully and will be responded to very shortly.

Just recently a new Minister of Justice and Attorney General for Canada has been appointed, who I am very pleased has joined us. I am sure that she will be taking cognizance of this particular file. We will be bringing that forward as soon as we can.

INVESTMENT CANADA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for industry, I should like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The government continues its unprecedented high interest rate and high dollar policy. The government has cut its support for science and technology, research and development, small business, education, training, and even for export financing.

Could the government tell us why it is deliberately going out of its way to help Canada's foreign competitors by putting down and suppressing our Canadian businesses and our Canadian workers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in that question is a mélange of inaccuracies.

First, science and technology spending has gone up since the government has taken power at a greater proportion of program spending than existed under the previous Liberal government.

Second, the spending on the National Research Council is going up this year over last year.

Third, in terms of foreign investment to which the hon. member is probably referring, Investment Canada will be taking a look at the Consumers Gas issue if that is what he is thinking about. I hope the Ontario Energy Board will make its recommendations on that matter, as well as the Quebec energy authorities.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, let us look again at the score card of Investment Canada: 789 approvals, zero disapprovals. That is Investment Canada for you.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Peterson: The problem is that Canada continues to have the highest level of foreign control over our economy of any country in the world and this level, under this government, continues to go up.

How much of Canada must be sold off to foreigners before the government will come to its senses?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I was in New York two days ago. I opened Business Week magazine to see a supplement in it from the Premier of Ontario calling for more foreign investment in the province of Ontario and calling for Americans to take an interest in the new free trade context.

What we have today is a lower unemployment rate than we had last month. It has just gone down one-tenth of 1 per cent. Investment interest within Canada and outside Canada is strong because of the strength of our economy.

PRIVILEGE

TABLING OF REPORTS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, one of the principles of parliamentary democracy is the requirement that ministers of the Crown are responsible to the House. Indeed, it is a well-known principle that ministers must maintain the confidence of this House at all times. Another part of it is that ministers have an obligation to report to Parliament. Various Crown corporations share a similar responsibility.

The House maintains records of annual reports, budgets, capital budget presentations and other documents required to be presented in the House from time to time by Crown corporations and government departments. When one looks at the list of those reports that are supposed to be tabled in the House, one can see what is missing. I had the opportunity to examine the records and noticed there is a report that is late and has not been filed. I am getting conflicting information on it.

I raise this matter because I believe the failure of the government to live up to its responsibilities and table these reports in a timely manner constitutes a contempt of the House. The requirements for the tabling of these reports are contained in the Statutes of Canada. They are not just resolutions of this House which alone would be very effective; they are in the law.

The Minister of Supply and Services is wagging his head. I do not know if he agrees or disagrees. I hope he does agree. I hope he listens because he may have some responsibility for some of these late filings.

I am not going to read the list but, according to my calculations, for the period of 1988-89, 73 Crown corporation reports ranging from corporate plan summaries to capital budget summaries and so on were tabled late in the House.

Those corporations are responsible to the House through the ministers who sit opposite and they ignore this problem. It floats around and these things are not done. Most were only one to four days late, but many were up to eight months late.

The point I am making in respect of those items is that those ministers who sit in the House have a responsibility, a very solemn responsibility. They have taken an oath of office to serve their Queen and do their job. Serving their Queen involves reporting for Her Majesty's Crown corporations of the country. They are not producing these reports on a timely basis.

The one I want to raise, Mr. Speaker, is Atomic Energy of Canada Limited which was required to table its capital budget for 1989–90 on May 30, 1989. It still has not been tabled.

I made inquiries. I contacted the legislative branch and the Library of Parliament and was told that it had not been tabled. I contacted Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and was given the information that it had been forwarded. They were surprised in fact that it had not been tabled. They thought it had been long ago.

The question is: Where is this report? Where is the responsible minister? Why is the minister not dealing with this issue and making sure that the Statutes of Canada are complied with and that these documents are brought in a timely way before the House?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, through you, that the responsible minister take control of this situation, examine the legal requirements in the Statutes of Canada and ensure that these reports are brought to the House. If they are not brought here, I suggest most strongly, Sir, that it constitutes a flagrant contempt of the House. It shows the arrogant attitude that the government displays in its dealings with the House of Commons.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State to Prime Minister and Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands sometimes gives me the impression he has been reading old editions of Hansard and some of my submissions to the House of Commons.

I did not have the nerve to suggest it was a question of privilege, which it obviously is not, but I do recollect raising a substantial point of order. The Liberal government of the day flagrantly showed contempt, or what have you, by not filing the annual reports, documents and so on required in various Statutes of Canada. I remember working myself up into a rather fine state of indignation and outrage at the arrogant Liberal government. For the life of me, I cannot at the moment recall what retort the then House leader and now Leader of the Opposition in the Senate gave to me, but I remember I did not get very far. Somewhere in the records, there is an excellent retort from the then House leader of the Liberal government, now the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

That being said, with respect to the specific question of the report of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for which he is looking, I will talk to my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to determine what reason might be given for the delay. I can think of some right now because of changes that are occurring. Rather than present an inaccurate report that meets the deadline, he may well be delaying to have a more accurate report even though delayed.

I hear the hon. member's submission. I humbly suggest that his claim that this represents a huge contempt and a breach of his privileges as a member will be found from the precedents with which I am familiar not to have any basis.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with interest to both the point raised by the member for Kingston and the Islands and the response from the government House leader. It just goes to show you that things do not change.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond, first to the comment, the gratuitous and unctuous comment, from the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, but it is the government House leader I would like to deal with.

I thank him for the offer to deal with the question of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, but in view of his vast experience in this matter and having raised apparently similar issues as a point of order, perhaps that is where he made his mistake. He should have done it as a question of privilege, because I am sure Your Honour will find this is a contempt of the House. I hope that he will urge his colleagues to comply with the law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will take all of these comments into consideration and have another look at the matter. I know the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has forcibly mentioned exactly what has to be done as far as the government is concerned, and I think we should carry on now and go to Routine Proceedings.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

It contains the signatures of over 150 Canadian seniors. They reside not only in my riding of Hamilton West but in Dundas, Burlington, St. Catharines, Stoney Creek, Brantford, Scarborough, Unionville, North York, Grimsby, and Fenwick, just to name a few.

They state that since 1952 Canadians made additional tax payments for the sole purpose of funding the old age security programs and not for the purposes of balancing federal and provincial government budgets.

They request that the federal government immediately affirm the right to all Canadians to receive universal access to benefits of old age security payments by cancelling plans to introduce a clawback tax regime on old age security payments.

POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will been with me, because I have several petitions signed by students from the University of Ottawa and elsewhere, in which your petitioners wish to inform the House of theirs views on overcrowded lecture halls, deteriorating laboratory equipment, a lack of library resources, the student-teacher ratio, elimination of certain courses, and deteriorating buildings and facilities. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a situation that is typical of many postsecondary institutions in Canada.

These students would like the House of Commons to urge the Government of Canada to hold a top level federal-provincial conference that would establish financial responsibilities at both levels of government with respect to postsecondary education and put a stop to the shameful neglect of higher education in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have about 20 petitions to table today, and I appreciate the attention of the House.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rose yesterday to read into the record petitions from hundreds and hundreds of petitioners who are very upset with the goods and services tax. They find it is regressive and repressive. They are concerned that it is a hidden tax. They are concerned that they will not be able to meet their bills, and they are very concerned with the potential for higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

In my riding there are many poor people. What I want to say is that the members of the riding of Côte-St.-Luc, Hampstead, Snowdon, Côte des Neiges and the town of Mount Royal plead with this government to withdraw this really repressive tax.

POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of tabling today a number of petitions submitted by the Canadian Students Federation, in which your petitioners ask the House of Commons to urge the Conservative Government to stop the erosion of quality and accessibility at universities, colleges and postsecondary institutions in this country.

Local students, including students from the University of Ottawa and also students from Montreal, signed this petition because they consider that the Goverment of Canada has a major responsibility in this area and that it must support and assist the efforts of the provincial governments.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, if you allow me, I have more petitions sent to me by my constituents, further to the one I presented a while ago, against the government's decision to impose a goods and services tax. These petitioners want to present their point of view to the House of Commons so that it will ask the Conservative government not to implement this goods and services tax which would be extremely hard and extremely tough on the poorest people in our society.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several constituents of Windsor West who are opposed to the GST and ask the government to reject this tax.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by approximately 700 residents, primarily of Thunder Bay, Ontario, but also residents of Red Rock, Dryden, Murillo, Red Lake and Sioux Lookout, all in northwestern Ontario.

These petitioners point out that the proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay, that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national burden. They call upon Parliament to reject any such tax.

I want to add that I have been assisted in the collection of these petitions by the residents of Patterson Court, a municipal non-profit housing facility, and by one of the local bowling alleys, Galaxy Lanes which are very upset.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition on the goods and services tax to you. It contains 1,003 names. The petitioners say that the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation because it does not take account of taxpayers' ability to pay.

Mr. Speaker, the petitioners demand that the government cancel its plan to implement a goods and services tax which would shift the whole tax burden onto ordinary Canadians by means of a regressive consumption tax and that it really go about reforming the present Canadian tax system.

[English]

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions on behalf of people from Welland, Minden, Vanier, Orleans, Ottawa, and Dunnville who decry the proposed implementation of the goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that it is an extremely regressive and unfair form of taxation in that it hits the people who are least able to pay that kind of a tax. They also point out that the government has not addressed the present tax system and enforced it in the way it ought to be, which would be amuch fairer tax system than the government is proposing.

They also decry the fact that reading materials, haircuts and home heating fuels will be taxed. They ask that the government withdraw this unfair and iniquitous tax.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition to the House from over 2,000 people in Victoria where the flowers even bloom today ahead of the rest of the country. We are very proud of that.

This petition reflects the overwhelming feeling of the people of Victoria that the GST has to be rejected. It calls for a reform of the tax system to include the introduction of a wealth tax and a tax on polluters. It calls for a reorganization of government spending priorities in a way which ensures that our basic priorities in education, health, regional development and environmental protection are maintained, without imposing a tax on the majority of Canadians but by imposing in on those who have the full ability to pay.

INTEGRATED CIRCUIT TOPOGRAPHY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C–57, an act to provide for the protection of integrated circuit topographies and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate on behalf of my caucus in what is a very important debate.

We have been chuckling to ourselves this morning in the House about the technical nature of the integrated circuits and what have you, but a remark of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs during his presentation this morning made me think. In fact I asked him whether it was a play on words when he talked about crystal clear.

The reality is that we have gone far in this world and in this country in particular in the development and utilization of technology. We have gone from crystal radio sets, which I remember putting together as a young child, with vacuum tubes and transistors, and then into very rudimentary integrated circuits. Now we are into circuits which are so complex and so powerful that they need the protection of law. With the amount of time, energy and resources put into the development of a circuit, we need the ability in law to protect the person or the company that did it from theft of the idea.

I say that my caucus supports this particular legislation, Bill C–57. I am very pleased that this bill is before the House to extend intellectual property rights to a scientific community which has been waiting for this bill for many years. We had anticipated that these measures would have been included in the much anticipated phase two of copyright reform. Instead of doing it piecemeal on a specific area, we should have had phase 2 brought forward so that we can deal in a proper way with copyright.

It has been five years since the government promised to reform copyright laws. As far as we know, it has only gone a quarter of the way. Even now, there are still some problems that have been created. What the government brought in was a package of the least controversial aspects of what is a very difficult issue. I make no bones about that.

We are concerned that the government seems incapable of managing a solution to the very real problems of copyright reform. It seems content to leave Canadian schools, artists, users and creators in a legislative no–man's land, or should I say, no–person's land, while it dithers over copyright.

I will not take very long, but there are some things I want to put on the record. This act seeks to provide intellectual property protection to the topography of integrated circuits or ICs, as they are known in the industry, known commonly as chips or semi–conductor chips.

I was interested to find that there are 25 Canadian companies that design and/or produce chips. In 1989, Canadian production of IC products was estimated at $300 million.

The Canadian industry is involved primarily in the design and fabrication of customized and semi–customized chips. It is especially so in producing IC products for the telecommunications industry, one in which Canada is a world leader. It is an industry that has a chance to grow in the regions of this country, and no longer has to be located in the golden horseshoe of southern Ontario or the industrial areas of Quebec. It can be located in the Atikokans of the world, or the Sioux Lookouts, and communicate directly by satellite to provide services.

This industry is involved in the production of leading edge technology and high value–added products. Canadian firms producing semi–conductors need to be protected. At least 15 nations, including the United States, Japan, various European nations and the Nordic countries have provided specific intellectual property protection for semi–conductor chips.

We will give our full support to this bill but we want to take this opportunity to remind the government that it has not helped other leading edge Canadian firms such as Connaught and Lumonics.

The electronic circuits of an IC product are contained in a three–dimensional hill and valley configuration known as a topography.

This bill will provide protection to the design of the topography rather than to the functions performed by the circuit or the circuit itself. The act will provide protection to owners of rights by giving them exclusive statutory rights to control certain actions. The legislation will provide exclusive rights with regard to the unauthorized copying of a protected topography or substantial part of it; the unauthorized manufacturing of an IC product incorporating the topography or a substantial part of it; the importation or commercial exploitation, which includes a sale lease offering or exhibiting for sale, lease or commercial distribution of a topography or a substantial part of it, or of an IC product which embodies a protected topography or a substantial part of it and, finally, the importation or commercial exploitation of an industrial article which incorporates an IC product that embodies a protective topography or a substantial part of it.

The exemptions to this protection are that the owner of a product will have no control over its use, sale, rental or redistribution once it is sold. Unauthorized copying is permitted for the purposes of teaching and research and it is permitted in the process of taking apart an IC to design a new topography. This act will protect chip technologies for up to 10 years.

One of the things that may occur in the committee stage of this legislation is a specific review of those exemptions to see whether, irrespective of the consultation process that has gone on to bring forward legislation, there are still aspects of those exemptions that perhaps need some tightening up. I do not have any specifics, but it is a question I raise in the context of second reading debate.

Finally, we are encouraged that the government is moving to protect Canadian industries on the leading edge of new technologies. This is also another opportunity to once again highlight the government's lack of action in protecting firms like Connaught and Lumonics, which I mentioned earlier.

• (1230)

In both cases, the arguments were made by the government and the business community that both firms needed infusion of capital to continue to do their research and development efforts. They were both sold to foreign firms. It does not matter which foreign firms they were sold to. The fact that they were sold to interests outside Canada is the key element. It was done so because it was argued that Canadian buyers could not be found.

If the Government of Canada is serious about ensuring that these leading edge industries remain competitive and innovative, then its needs to find domestic sources of capital to ensure that we retain control over these vital economic resources. If we do not take those steps, all the copyright legislation in the world will not protect Canadian designers and inventors, because they will not be here. They will be in the United States.

Remember what happened with the Avro Arrow? We lost our leading edge in the aviation industry as a result of another Conservative government. We lost the human resources that were involved in the development of that product. We are seeing it happen time and time again.

It is great to provide copyright legislation to protect the leading edge industries in the IC field, but at the same time we have to make sure that we have the economic protection so that we do not see those inventions or creations never happening here in Canada again.

That is my contribution on behalf of my caucus. I look forward to completing the second reading debate and moving on to other matters.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would reiterate the position taken by my colleague that the Liberal caucus supports this bill in principle, although there will undoubtedly be a serious discussion on the details of the legislation at committee stage, if our experience with Bill C–60, the copyright bill, is an experience upon which one can rely. There were so many amendments that I lost track of the numbers. There were well above 50 or 60 amendments.

It is extremely important and I argued this at the time of the copyright bill, which had been five and a half years in development and perhaps many years before that, that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the present House leader, should have taken more interest in his part of the bill. It was a shared bill between communications and culture and the minister. He paid no attention to the fact that in this world of rapidly changing technology, the semi–conductor chip was one of the most important and key elements to be reviewed and revised under the copyright law.

The minister did not see fit to pay attention to his duties and so it went unattended to. Here we are with little patchwork quilts coming in. There are major areas of copyright legislation that are uncovered. For example, there is the whole question of our educators and the problems that they are facing, and school children and teachers in the classrooms or in the libraries reprography photocopying which, according to this bill or the old bill, is against the law, and they are subject to fines. I wonder what is going to happen with this bill.

I would caution anyone who presumes to think that they can put this into a legislative committee and it will be a one, two, three affair. The semi-conductor chip has a memory. It is an integrated circuit of topography. It is key and vital to the industry. In my own riding, Paramax is very well known for its role in the development of high technology in the telecommunication field. I have been very impressed with what they are able to do.

I would like to tell the minister and the members of this House that there is a great amount of work that has been done in the field of cable and broadcasting technology. You just have to go and see what Videotron has developed in the way of Videoway. We must protect these people, and consider what will happen if we allow our borders to be open to American and foreign interests without considering the Canadian potential for this wonderfully growing field of great technology. We have been leaders in the past and with research and development we will be leaders again in the future, as long as we protect our interests.

It is about time this government recognized what can be done in the field of technology, but how important well written copyright is.

I caution the government and I suggest that it pay a great deal of attention and care and bring in phase two. Why is it leaving our people in contempt of court? Let us know what to do about spontaneous news. Let us know what the exemptions are under reprography rights and let us not put people in jeopardy. It is not fair to our children, it is not fair to our educators and it will not be fair to our businessmen.

I would suggest a quick look at this bill because there is a very serious error in one of the clauses which allows, indeed encourages, increased foreign presence in the Canadian market in this particular field, and I think this is a serious issue. I would say to you, Positron, in my riding, watch this bill. I would say to you, Videotron, in the cable industry with the most exciting new technology, watch this bill. Come and read it and compare it with the old act and make sure that the intellectual property is properly protected.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is agreement to call it three o'clock.

SALVATION ARMY ACT, 1989

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-9, an act to amalgamate the two corporations known, respectively, as "The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada East" and "The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada West", and to make necessary provisions regarding the charter of the amalgamated corporation, as reported (with an amendment) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I have advised both opposition parties that the hon. member in whose name this bill is has been unavoidably detained by airplane schedules. I ask the consent of the House to move this particular bill so that we can proceed with debate today.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper (for Mr. Cole) moved that Bill S-9, as amended, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper (for Mr. Cole) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make some comments on this particular bill.

The organization that is the subject of this particular bill is represented very strongly across Canada. In fact, I did some research on its background. It is a very rich background that I will not go through here, although I think it is worth while to recall some of the dates involved, to give some indication of just how steeped in our history the organization called The Salvation Army is.

It first came to Canada in 1882. It was introduced by a group of very dedicated people. The corps first really sprung up in smaller towns in Ontario.

• (1310)

As an indication of the kind of movement that the Salvation Army had, just five years later the religion, as I would prefer to call it, was being practised from Victoria, British Columbia to St. John's, Newfoundland. In relative terms, that was a very short time for a religion or a particular movement to spread across any country.

There are a number of milestones worth pointing out. In 1886, the organization was a rescue home for fallen girls, as it was called. In 1891, the Salvation Army opened its first prison-gate home. In 1905, a Salvation Army officer became the first Dominion Parole Officer.

This is an organization of great stature in our country. Today, the Salvation Army maintains both a social and a religious or evangelical purpose. It is a recognized church with close to 130,000 members.

In my travels across Canada, in the Bermuda area and other parts of the world, I have been very impressed with the kind of work the Salvation Army does. If I may be permitted a personal aside, the very first duty I had to perform after being elected in the riding of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception was to attend a dinner given by the Salvation Army in my hometown of Bonavista. It was at that dinner that I committed my assistance to the movement and some of the projects it is interested in because of my belief, faith, and the way I have been touched by what it has done in its time in Canada, especially in the smaller villages and towns of Newfoundland where the movement is particularly strong.

Across Canada there are parole supervision agencies, the well-known Harbour Light Centre for alcoholics, Sunset Lodges, Grace Hospitals, fresh air camps for youngsters and programs for drug addicts. In my riding there are two camps which the Salvation Army through hard work has put together. It continues to supervise the youth activities. In fact, some of these camps double for activities which involve senior citizens and other like organizations of a recreational nature.

To summarize, the indication that the Salvation Army has put across is that it is a willing hand in a time of need. I am familiar, as I am sure anybody who has been associated with the organization is, with its motto, "With heart to God and hand to man". I think all of us have a lot of time for the kind of work that this particular organization does. It is for that reason that it has such great stature in our country.

My concern in reviewing the information that I had on this bill was that we simply did not make amendments to an existing organization that could come back and perhaps make life difficult for the Salvation Army. I just had to review for my own benefit precisely what this amendment was doing.

The Salvation Army as a church has what is called the core managing board, which does not have the ownership of the property within which it performs its function. All that ownership rests with the corporation which is called the governing council of the Salvation Army. In simplistic terms, I understand that this council has to be set up in order to have ownership of the property and the many organizations which represent real estate to which I have made reference. This is opposed to the Salvation Army movement itself, which as a religious movement would not have title to these particular properties.

The governing council was split in two in 1916 when there was formed a separate territory called the Canada West in Winnipeg, which was a special regional organization.

In 1930, because of severe economic conditions and, once more, because of the business of trying to amalgamate and save administrative dollars, the army amalgamated this group. The senior leadership moved to one centre in Toronto without having made the change in the legislation.

In simple terms the legislation, as I understand it, has never caught up with the reality of the reorganization that took place in 1930. The officers of the governing council are the same for Canada West and Canada East. For purposes of tightening up the structure and ensuring the tidying up of the corporate legislative details, the Salvation Army brought forward this bill, which it hopes to see passed as soon as possible.

It is my privilege on behalf of my colleagues, and I hope all members of the House, to say that any reservations we had have been discharged. I hope that in passing this bill we will allow an organization that is running for the good of mankind to run a bit more smoothly from the administrative and legislative side. We are quite happy to proceed with this bill.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to offer my appreciation to the hon. member for York—Simcoe who has worked so hard on this bill. It is very unfortunate that he got caught in the plane delays which affect every one of us who are here trying to serve this House. I appreciate his giving me the consent to proceed with the motion.

Second, on behalf of all members of this House, I wish to say how much we appreciate the work of the Salvation Army or, as it is more affectionately called, the Sally Ann. It has definitely created an attitude in this country of credibility, of kindness and a spirit that all of us would do well to imitate and reflect upon.

I often think of one soldier I talked to who is about as hard and cynical a man as I know who regularly referred so kindly to the Sally Ann officers who had cared for him and helped him during the times of war.

I also want to say that I appreciate the co-operation of both the Liberal and NDP members and how much they have helped us in proceeding with this bill. I know that the House does want to express to the Salvation Army our continued support for its work and our appreciation for what it does for so many Canadians who, from time to time have suffered hardship. It has demonstrated leadership.

On behalf of all of us in the House, I pay a special thanks to the Salvation Army. We are honoured to be able to proceed with this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will suspend the sitting until two o'clock this day.

At 1.18 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have had it with the government's misguided industrial policy that makes them victims of a rather perverse economic strategy. More workers lost their jobs through layoffs last year than in any other year since 1982. That alarming increase in plant closings means that over 9,700 jobs lost last year will be gone for good.

Moreover, anticipated workforce reductions is greater than in any similar period during the last decade. To make matters worse, new jobs in generally low paying service sectors accounted for 93.7 per cent of all jobs created.

More and more Canadians are forced to take on additional part-time jobs to make ends meet. Those holding such jobs increased by over 45 per cent in the last 10 years. Good jobs are being lost and little is being done to replace them.

The 550 workers at Inglis in Toronto are a case in point. Fewer than 100 have found jobs since the plant moved operations to Ohio. Where are the adjustment policies for them? Where is the industrial strategy to reintegrate them into the economy? They and others want work. Why is the government deliberately creating conditions for increased unemployment?

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, Canada has started implementing an environmental clean-up program in the Arctic.

About 5,000 old fuel drums were collected and shipped south, as part of the first clean-up phase.

General waste management practices in the Arctic are now being reviewed. The federal government will consider and test practical methods for waste reduction, waste treatment, incineration, recycling and waste removal.

There is a wide variety of activities in Canada's North isolated though it may be.

Environment Canada maintains a network of weather stations, air pollution monitoring posts and a national park reserve.

Now that research has shown that air pollution from the temperate zones is now contaminating the far North, Canada is trying to deal with pollution on a much broader scale.

For instance, the federal government has concluded co-operation agreements with the U.S.S.R. concerning the Arctic, reduction of air pollution and environmental problems in general.

Mr. Speaker, we are now working on a new agreement with all Arctic countries in order better to protect the environment in the North.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, there was very good news from Ottawa for Canadians this past weekend. Because it was good news, it did not show in the headlines.

This February, employment increased and unemployment actually decreased to 7.7 per cent, even though February is usually a low point in the labour cycle. Two conclusions can be drawn from this. First, while Canadians may not be enjoying boom times right now, we have not had to face the severe recession that many have been predicting.

Second, we should all remember that when the previous Liberal government left office in September 1984, usually a month of maximum employment, the unemployment rate was 11.6 per cent. Now, the unemployment rate is down to 7.7 per cent in mid-winter. What this proves is that whatever the doomsayers and negative nigglers might say during Question Period, this government is following the proper economic course for Canadians. Also, any connection between headlines and reality is slim, at best.

FORESTRY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the most severe forest fires to hit Canada this century happened last summer in northern Manitoba. In all, 2.6 million hectares of land burned in Manitoba. Forests, lakes and wildlife population were all devastated. There were 23,000 people evacuated from their homes and communities. At that time, the Prime Minister went on record on television with an offer of generous help from Ottawa. He said Ottawa would help to cover the enormous cost of fighting fires and evacuating people.

I want Canadians to know that now that the bills are coming in, the Prime Minister is backing off. The fires in 1989 cost the people of Manitoba $72 million. Under normal disaster relief formulas, Ottawa should pay half of that cost, which amounts to over $36 million. Instead, the Prime Minister is offering to pay only $17 million.

What happened to the Prime Minister's generosity? Did it vanish when the cameras were turned off? There is no question that Ottawa should pay its fair and generous share of the cost of fighting last summer's fires as promised. The people of Manitoba, after all, are still watching and they will not forget.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women is holding its annual symposium today and tomorrow on the theme of Women's Place in the Economy. The President of the council says: "We are at a crisis point. Women are under siege". The President of the National Employment Network, calls this an anti-woman government on the attack to the feminist movement.

This is a good time to recall the record of this government on issues that keep women poor. A national day care program has been abandoned. Bill C-21 cuts unemployment benefits and hurts women disproportionately. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women refuses to accept an amendment that would have given equal access to training programs for women.

The government, which should be leading the way in enlightened employment and pay policies, instead is perpetuating sexual stereotyping and negative attitudes. It hurts women by withholding pension reforms that are its obligation under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. For months it has left the Court Challenges Program in limbo. After cuts last year to women's programs, the latest blow is the slashing of federal funding to women's centres while hundreds of thousands of women across this country are beaten daily. Women are not deceived by empty rhetoric. They want action.

SPORTS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the sports community is reacting to the "English-only" trend, and Quebec francophones involved in cross-country skiing feel very strongly they have been humiliated.

At a committee meeting, it was decided that from now on, Quebec would withdraw and stay away from all competitions, whatever their size, held in cities that had passed unilingual resolutions.

The city of Sault Ste. Marie, which has given the "English-only" trend new importance, hosted a Canadian championship two years ago. In the present circumstances, the winner, Pierre Harvey, would have been unable to take part.

The Quebec federation wants to remind the Canadian association it has a duty to ensure that Quebec is respected as a province. In future, it will be up to the executive to make sure it selects sites where our rights will not be trampled on.

Mr. Speaker, last summer I attended the Saskatoon Games where I saw a fantastic organization that functioned in both official languages.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this week, throughout Canada, around the clock, Canadian men and women will dial 1-900-720-6052 to object to the goods and services tax.

I urge Canadians to support the national campaign against the goods and services tax which will take place from March 12 to March 16.

This telephone petition will enable all Canadians to vote against the GST and express their dissatisfaction. Vote massively againts the GST!

Say no to the GST by dialing 1-900-720-6052.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the House the issue of acid rain. Last June the President of the United States, George Bush, introduced legislation that would see acid rain emissions from industrial sources cut back nearly half by the turn of the century.

More recently the United States stated in principle that they were ready to agree to that legislation after successful negotiations were completed between the White House and the Senate. This is only the latest in the long list of successes for our government since 1984 on the issue of acid rain.

Our own country set a prime example. Agreements were made with the provinces affected by acid rain to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions by 2.3 million tonnes per year. Lead is to be removed from gasoline emissions by December 1, 1990. New emission standards have reduced the amount of pollution from cars and trucks. The list goes on.

This is evidence that all the time and effort put forth by this government and especially by our Prime Minister to address this problem to the President of the United States is finally meeting with success. Only by Canadians and Americans working toward the common goal of acid rain reform can we realize a cleaner, healthier environment for all North Americans.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, today my colleagues and I met with representatives of labour groups from across this country. They brought the message once again that the government's plan to destroy unemployment insurance will not be accepted.

The government's response to the Senate does nothing to respond to the serious concerns of people from across the country who have appeared before committee after committee.

Bill C-21 is bad legislation. At the very time when workers most need income protection, whether they live in Canso or Saskatoon, the government is cutting benefits and increasing hardships for thousands of families.

The Senate amendments do not go nearly far enough toward maintaining the kind of program this country so desperately needs. This government should listen to the people, do the honourable thing and withdraw this bill.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have heard from friends and fellow members of the Ogden Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion who support recent changes to the board and lodging charges for long term care for Canada's veterans. They know that these changes correct an inequity where the majority of veterans pay $240 a month while others pay nothing for the same service.

Veterans across the country will now be treated equally. Veterans with low incomes or disability will pay less than $240 a month or nothing at all. Veterans will continue to pay the lowest rate for long term care in Canada because the maximum amount is set at the lowest rate charged by any province. These changes do not affect veterans' pensions and allowances which continue to be generous and fully indexed. For example, married veterans are guaranteed $1,185 a month before deductions, and single veterans are guaranteed $585 a month before deductions. Veterans also receive Old Age

Security and, if they are eligible, Canada Pension Plan benefits.

I am proud to acknowledge that no nation—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, Canadians can now vote against the proposed goods and services tax. Starting today the Liberal party is calling on all Canadians to join a week long electronic telephone campaign against the imposition of this regressive and obscene tax grab.

You can register your opposition to the GST by dialing the anti-GST hot line, 1-900-720-6052, 24 hours a day from today until Friday, March 16. For a mere 50 cent toll charge Canadians can personally count themselves in to the growing movement across this country that is saying no to this unprecedented raid on their pockets.

The Liberal party is now giving Canadians from coast to coast an opportunity to tell this government once more with feeling "Axe this tax". Just dial the anti-GST hot line at 1-900-720-6052. That is 1-900-720-6052. Do it today!

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, more and more Canadians are starting to ask the very simple question: where does the Liberal Party stand in terms of the GST if they are elected after the next election campaign? We have one candidate who says she will scrap the tax. There is one candidate who says a flat tax. There is one candidate, Jean Chrétien, who says: "Well, I don't know what I would do". Now, according to the Winnipeg Free Press, there is a prominent Liberal leadership candidate who says he would retain the GST. "It would be irresponsible to repeal the tax at that point", says Tom Wappel, a leadership candidate for the Liberal Party of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest Canadians should telephone the Leader of the Opposition's office to ask where the Liberal party stands on the GST. The phone number is Area Code 613, number 996-5084. Call the Leader of the Opposition. Ask where to call.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate Commonwealth Day and it is very fitting that we welcome the joining of Namibia on March 21 as the fiftieth member of the Commonwealth.

Her Majesty, The Queen, is head of the Commonwealth. I would like to read two brief paragraphs from her message:

> Every year, when we celebrate Commonwealth Day, it reminds me that we are celebrating something which is quite unique. Nothing quite like the Commonwealth has ever been created or evolved before. Its comparative lack of rules, its human richness and its geographical diversity, make the Commonwealth as hard to define as it is easy to criticize—it appeals to the young as much as to the old, to peoples and nations at all phases of political, economic, cultural and social development, to reformers and lovers of tradition alike.
>
> On Commonwealth Day especially we greet each other as members of the biggest and most unusual family on earth.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and it relates to the government's policy for improving Canada's science and technology performance, in particular the role to be played by the National Research Council of Canada.

The new president of the NRC wrote last month to the Chair of the Science Council that the National Research Council: "intends to limit its involvement in basic research—to that required to maintain a minimal scientific insurance policy for the nation".

Does the Acting Prime Minister agree with his new NRC president that the NRC should play a minimal role in science and, at this time in Canada's history, why is the government forcing the NRC to play such a minimal role?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the government is not forcing the National Research Council to do anything. The National Research Council is doing exactly what it should do. It should review its mandate from time to time. It should recognize that universities now exist and are the main thrust for basic scientific work in this country. The National Research Council will do what is required in terms of basic research so that it can fulfil its general mandate to support science and technology in this country.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I hope the minister has heard about the transfer cuts.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the same letter, Dr. Perron, president of the NRC, proposes a policy and strategy for privatization of the National Research Council. Is the government prepared to let the National Research Council be privatized?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the National Research Council of Canada is not going to be privatized.

I think what may hurt my colleague so much is that the National Research Council of Canada is prepared to sell some of its services to industry if industry wants to buy it. That seems to me to be a good deal.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, if that is the policy of the government, I suggest that the minister head the president of the NRC off at the pass when he is writing letters that say he is proposing a policy of privatization.

As recently as the budget last month, the government cut science and technology spending by $39 million and cut transfer payments for post-secondary education by over $2 billion. Canadians are left wondering what has happened to the Prime Minister's promise of increasing Canada's R and D spending to 2.5 per cent of Gross Domestic Product?

Does the government still intend to fulfil the Prime Minister's promise to increase R and D spending to 2.5 per cent and, if so, can the government explain how it intends to increase R and D performance while cutting spending?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows as well as anyone in this House that if we are going to increase R and D total spending in this country, industry must pick up a fair part of it. Let me remind the hon. member that in 1980, the government of the day was spending, excluding debt payments, 4.65 per cent of total program spending on science and technology. That government let that run down to 4.46 per cent. This government brought it back up to 4.89 per cent, the highest it has been in 10 years.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and pertains to the historical events happening in Lithuania.

It is clear that the situation in the Baltic States is very different, indeed very unique from that of the other republics in the Soviet Union. Successive governments have refused to recognize the illegal annexation of those states.

Will the minister bring a long-standing policy of non-recognition to its logical conclusion by supporting an all-party resolution that recognizes Lithuania as a fully independent, sovereign republic? I can tell the minister that I have had discussions with the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and he, on behalf of his party, would be willing to support such a resolution.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to look at the resolution that was proposed by the hon. member and the member for Winnipeg Transcona. Certainly, that would be a resolution that would be acceptable to me and to members of the government.

We join with the hon. member in recognizing as historic the democratic decision that has been taken by the people of Lithuania, and now by their Parliament. The position of the Government of Canada, as he has correctly said, has been to recognize the political sovereignty of Lithuania.

We now enter into a very important phase in which there will be a discussion as to how the de facto occupation by the Soviet Union will come to an end.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that co-operation and leadership. I am wondering if he could go a step further because yesterday my riding which was linked by telephone to Vilnius where the newly elected Lithuanian Parliament voted unanimously to change the Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic to become the independent democratic Republic of Lithuania.

In addition to the resolution, would the minister today give full recognition to the Republic of Lithuania by giving it full diplomatic recognition?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the House was pleased that the hon. member, his colleague from Winnipeg Transcona, and the member for Scarborough Centre were able, in private capacities, to be in Lithuania to watch the elections and report back to their caucuses.

I have had some conversations with some of the members respecting those developments. This is an historic day. I have discussed with Soviet leaders, prior to the vote, the attitude that they would take.

I have received specifically from Mr. Shevardnadze can undertaking that there would be no crackdown. I think all members of the House would agree that we should encourage the Soviet Union and Lithuania to move as speedily as possible toward a situation which recognizes the de facto and de jure sovereignty and independence of Lithuania.

SCIENCE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Science who has been recently elevated, for which I congratulate him.

I wonder if he would elevate himself to answer this question. The Prime Minister is to receive an award tonight for scientific leadership from the Weizmann Institute.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, those on the other side seem well informed. Perhaps they can tell us why this award was received. Is it for cutting Canadian expenditures for research as a percentage of the Gross Domestic Product from 1.4 per cent in 1985 to 1.32 per cent in 1989? Is it for cutting the government's share of science and technology expenditures by 4 per cent over four years? Or is it for cutting the EPF transfers in support of universities? Which of these constitutes scientific leadership?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his congratulations. In turn, I would like to congratulate the Prime Minister on receiving this award.

There are no doubt many reasons why the institute decided to award the Prime Minister this distinguished award, many of them no doubt are centred on the fact that this is a Prime Minister who established the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology and chairs it for the first time ever in Canadian history.

This is the Prime Minister who, working with that board, established the Canada Scholarship Program, the Centres of Excellence Program, and who managed to put in $350 million or more into the industry-university matching grant program. This is the Prime Minister who ensured, as I said to my hon. colleague just a moment ago, that we went from 4.46 per cent in 1984 to 4.89 per cent of total program expenditure on science and technology in 1989. That is not a bad record.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the quality of excuses is not strained, and I can understand why there was such a lack of enthusiasm on the other side with respect to the award. But let us look at the record.

On February 8, the parliamentary secretary to the hon. minister promised that there would be no new cut-backs at NRC.

An Hon. Member: What is the supplementary?

Mr. McCurdy: Do not get too agitated over there, you will get your turn some other time. We have a document to which my colleague in the Official Opposition referred which states that in this correspondence between the head of the NRC and the former head of the Science Council the next five year plan for NRC will propose a strategy of privatization and divestiture and planned reductions in permanent employees at NRC. How can he reconcile that to the statement of the parliamentary secretary to the hon. minister and to any significant thrust in the direction of building up Canada's R and D capacity?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague makes the same mistake that many others do: if you cannot build it up in an government institution, then it does not count. There are many things that NRC does that could be done equally as well outside NRC. There are many things that NRC has been doing over the past 30 years that can best be done some place else. That is exactly what they are looking at.

I am amazed that the opposition does not want to see the National Research Council look at its future in terms of the reality of the present, but then it has never been one to face reality.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the minister's problem is that we understand and all of Canada understands what is going on in terms of science policy in this government. In fact, what he sees in the future is a past which is a good deal lesser in terms of expenditures and resources provided to NRC.

The new five-year plan proposes "—a limited amount of basic research at NRC". We already know that basic research funding in the universities has been suffering significantly. Where is it going to transfer it to? To save money at NRC—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not realize that the funding for the granting councils has gone up this year. The funding for the university research granting councils was one of the things that went up as they were supposed to. They are up 8.6 per cent this coming year. They have gone up every year since the government came into power. They will continue to be treated well on the research front.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, but in his absence, I shall direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last Friday, we saw the good will of the House to the Meech Lake Accord. The Prime Minister said last week that there was nothing more he could do to save the Meech Lake Accord, and the Premier of Newfoundland, Clyde Wells, said that after consultations, he had discovered that there were no consultations, contrary to what the Deputy Prime Minister told us last Friday. I would therefore like to know whether the Prime Minister is doing something to save the Meech Lake Accord. If not, is he now prepared to enter into consultations and to schedule a meeting with all his fellow first ministers to try to save the Meech Lake Accord?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House on Friday, the Prime Minister, Senator Murray and indeed federal officials are working very hard on this particular issue. There is serious work that is going on.

I indicated last Friday that until such time as there appeared to be some move toward greater consensus among the divergent views of the three opposing provinces it would seem rather untimely to bring all the ministers together under the auspices of a First Ministers' Conference. That has certainly not been ruled out. It was not ruled out on Friday, and it is not ruled out today.

We hope that during the course of the discussions which will be ongoing that progress will be made. If sufficient progress is made that would result in bringing about a greater degree of consensus, to the point that perhaps it would be useful to bring all the ministers together in a formalized way, that is certainly a matter that is being considered.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Deputy Prime Minister is being contradicted by the Prime Minister himself, who said last week that he had done everything that he could and that there was nothing further that he could do. The Deputy Prime Minister is saying that there are consultations going on.

Can he assure us that in spite of what the Prime Minister said last week he is in fact leading these discussions and he is prepared to call his colleagues, the first ministers, together to try to save Lake Meech? To us it looks as if the Prime Minister is waiting to create a crisis or until a crisis emerges, and we do not want that to be the case.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, let me make this abundantly clear. I think that all members of this House, including the hon. member's leader, the leader of the New Democratic Party, the chief spokesman for the New Democratic Party and members on this side of the House, would agree that the Prime Minister has provided outstanding leadership on this particular issue.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I could get political but this thing is too important, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister is still providing leadership and, in close consultation with all the key players in this particular issue, he is attempting to work toward bringing about a greater consensus and hopefully some form of an accommodation that will move the Meech Lake Accord ahead.

I do not share the pessimism the hon. member displays with respect to the question that he put. I can assure the hon. member that the senator, federal officials, the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister's office and other members of cabinet are working very hard to make progress in this particular area, and I am convinced that we will.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and concerns the conflicting stories about GST police.

On Friday, the minister denied that this department was recruiting a large number of RCMP officers as GST police. Yet, on the same day, Mr. Bob Quinn, a spokesman for the minister's department, confirmed that several hundred investigators were being recruited.

Was the minister aware of the bulletin circulated by his department recruiting RCMP officers for the GST and, if he was, why did he deny this information on Friday?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have asked two former RCMP officers to come and help us set up a unit that will look out for any potential tax fraud possibilities within GST, as within any tax system anywhere in the world from the day the taxes came into being in this country and around the world.

I want to make it very clear that the bulletin to which the hon. member refers is a normal letter that we sent out in December, I believe, to the RCMP, asking it to provide us with names so that we could hire two people on a six-month basis to set up this unit.

I want to make it clear that the unit is strictly for the protection of the majority of Canadians for the reasons that the Minister of Finance outlined on Friday. There will be no tax police. That may have been the case in previous governments before the introduction of the taxpayers' bill of rights. That is not the case today.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I refer again to the statement from Mr. Bob Quinn, a spokesman from the minister's department who confirmed that several hundred investigators were being recruited.

Why should we believe this minister who obviously is contradicted—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is stretching the question a little bit. I ask him to put the question briefly.

Mr. Pickard: There are conflicting pieces of information on how many people will be hired as investigators. Why is there conflicting information in this minister's department?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there is no conflicting reporting in this department. The only conflict appears to be between the ears of the hon. member who just asked the question.

As the Minister of National Revenue I am telling this member, this House and Canadians that there will be no tax police. There is going to be an investigations unit, as any tax system in the whole world must have, for the various reasons outlined by the Minister of Finance and others on Friday and in the past and which I am confirming here today.

However, I am telling this member and this House that we have only asked for support on a six-month basis from two former RCMP officers to set up this unit.

There will be no tax police. I cannot make it any clearer than that.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Today I met with representatives of labour groups from across the country, a coalition representing four million people who were denied an audience with the minister, no doubt because they oppose the minister's plan to privatize the unemployment insurance program. This is just another symptom of the government's insensitivity to its critics and the real problems facing Canadians.

For example, the minister is well aware of the crisis—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister not understand that the Atlantic cannot afford to lose this support? Will she withdraw Bill C-21 today?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, not only will I not withdraw the bill, but the hon. member is clearly out of touch.

I quote from The Evening News of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, which points out that the proposed new legislation is sensitive to the various regions of Canada. "We have been questioning for a number of years now the actual value of the Canadian Senate and the huge price tag that goes with it. The new UI legislation is far from perfect but few government programs are. By delaying the matter any longer the Senate is only hurting average Canadians from coast to coast".

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. It is fairly obvious that the minister can score very high points around this place for being the best dressed female MP, but she does not score very high points—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

By his own admission outside the House, the Minister of Transport said he was not aware of the facts which called into question the blatant conflict of interest the chairman of the Harbour Commission has put himself in.

An Hon. Member: That is last week's news.

Mr. Keyes: An hon. member next to me says that it was last week's news when his own minister did not know what I was talking about.

Now that he has made his inquiries, does he agree that the Prime Minister's appointee to the Harbour Commission must either resign his appointment or give up the listings on the property that the Harbour Commission is interested in buying?

• (1440)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is the third day in a row that my hon. friend has chosen to raise this matter in the House rather than make his allegation outside. One should look very carefully at parliamentary privilege and treat it for what it is. It is a privilege not to be abused.

I said that I am reviewing the matter. I am reviewing the matter, and we will take the appropriate decision in the very near future.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, maybe I can help the minister along. The conflict is obvious to all. The harbour commissioner appointed by the Prime Minister cannot provide leadership as chairman and represent the real estate firm which is trying to sell land to the Harbour Commission. He cannot do both. He is in conflict.

The Prime Minister's own conflict of interest guidelines are being violated. The government's own act of Parliament is being superseded. Does the minister not agree that if he does not demand the resignation of the Harbour Commission chairman, the minister must request, at the very least, that the Auditor General investigate the relationship between the commission chairman's real estate firm and the Harbour Commission?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said we are looking into the matter. As far as the Auditor General's suggestion is concerned, I think one would find that the Auditor General does not go off on those types of investigations based on unfounded allegations.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

We in Atlantic Canada have for a period of time been demanding compensation for the current fisheries crisis. The government promised financial aid consistent with the aid given to western farmers. The farm aid was taken from a special emergency fund.

If there is an aid package, will the money come from the emergency fund? If not, where will the money come from?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not get that question.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

We in Atlantic Canada have for a period of time been demanding compensation for the current fisheries crisis. The government promised aid consistent with the aid given to western farmers. The farmers' aid was taken from a special emergency fund.

If there is an aid package, will the money come from the emergency fund? If not, where will it come from?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the game I think it is more important to determine whether there will be a package than where the money will be coming from.

One thing is certain. When we came up with the first $130 million, members did not go around Atlantic Canada asking where it was coming from. When we come up with a response to the situation facing the fisheries in Atlantic Canada, if it requires funds they will be made available.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Would the minister avoid robbing Peter to pay Paul and guarantee that financial aid will come from new moneys and not moneys that are currently in place?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will never rob Peter to give to Paul. I am not a Liberal.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, as has already been brought to the attention of the House, there is an all-party agreement to pass a resolution recognizing the legitimate right of the Lithuanian people, as expressed by their elected representatives on March 11, to declare the independence of the Republic of Lithuania.

The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned in his response to an earlier question that he had spoken to Soviet leaders before this event. Has he an intention to speak to them now, after the event, and will he be communicating any formal message to the Soviet Union with respect to the Canadian position on Lithuania?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very constructive suggestion. Whether or not I speak to Mr. Shevardnadze personally or directly, we will certainly communicate not only the decision of this Parliament, assuming the resolution discussed during Question Period is adopted by Parliament, but also some other comments that we think might be appropriate and helpful in achieving a situation where there is the de facto right of Lithuanians to control their destiny.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, will the minister be directing officials in his department to begin plans for economic co-operation and other relationships with Lithuania separate from the Soviet Union in the way that the department is now considering relationships with Poland, Hungary and other countries in east and central Europe?

Does he intend to give that sort of instruction to his department to lay the foundation for the day when this independence is fully realized and economic co-operation with Lithuania which they will need can be established?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly instruct my officials to take account of the historic developments which have come to fruition and to a point over the weekend and to do that in a way that contributes in as constructive a way as we can to the de facto exercise of sovereignty that may soon be a matter to which Canada can make some tangible contributions.

FISHERIES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Will the minister flex his muscles and do something about the zebra mussels which are infesting some of the Great Lakes, in particular Lake Erie, and Lake St. Clair?

They are plugging up some of the water intakes of the municipalities and also creating problems with the Walleye spawning beds in Lake Erie.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the hon. member that the Minister of Transport has issued new guidelines with respect to the dumping of ballast prior to ships entering the Great Lakes system. I am informed that these guidelines are being complied with much more effectively than they have been in the past.

We believe that if we can secure the co-operation of the ship owners and the ship captains in question it will do a great deal to reduce the amount of zebra mussels coming into the Great Lakes. That of course is very much in the interest of the ecology of the area.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Last week Denison Mines in Elliot Lake announced that it is going to be laying off 28 per cent of its workforce, some 450 people. This comes on top of the lay-offs announced recently by Rio Algom Mines where some 1,600 people will be laid off during the next 12 months.

Could the minister say what action plan the government has developed to cope with these lay-offs to assist the workers, the community and the families that are going to be so adversely affected by this bad news?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I understand the member's sensitivity to this issue. I know that his area like some others has been harder hit than the rest of Canada.

The industrial adjustment service people are working very closely with both Denison and Rio Algom, with management and with unions in both cases. The management people of Denison will be meeting with the unions and with other levels of government, as well as ourselves, to formulate some ongoing programs and to take advantage of some of the programs that we have.

This is a designated Community Futures area, as the hon. member knows, and we will be doing our best. There is of course additional funding available as a result of the new legislation on unemployment insurance.

• (1450)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister knows that a community this size cannot lose over 50 per cent of its labour force without very extensive support from government.

Would the minister be willing to make a commitment today that the federal government would cost share with the provincial governments a special new action plan to save jobs, to create new jobs, and to provide for community adjustment?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, through FEDNOR there has been a number of plans developed in regions of northern Ontario that have run into particular economic difficulties. I am certainly quite prepared to discuss it with my colleague.

I should say as well that the programs we have in place in some of the other communities in northern Ontario have had a very positive impact. Nevertheless, I recognize that this is a serious situation for Elliot Lake. Between FEDNOR and my department there will be a number of things that we will be able to approach them with.

GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The National Advisory Board on Science and Technology recommended to the Prime Minister doubling the budgets of the granting science councils.

Also, federal funding of Canadian universities stands to suffer if proposed freezing of transfer payments to provinces proceeds.

Now that the Prime Minister is about to receive an international award for science, is the minister prepared to double the budget of the granting councils and to reconsider his plans to freeze further transfer payments for post-secondary education before the Prime Minister accepts the science award?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, every scientist in this country knows that the granting councils have been treated very well indeed under existing circumstances. Their budgets are going up next year. We have done the matching fund with industry and universities, some $350 million over the time period. The granting councils were given a $200 million injection over a time period. They have had a stable financial regime for the first time over the last five years. That is not bad.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister responsible for science appears to deny the precarious situation of scientific research and education in Canada as assessed by the National Consortium of Scientific and Educational Societies.

If the government's five-year matching grants policy is allowed to terminate this year, NSERC's budget for 1991-92 will effectively be cut by $79 million.

Would the minister commit the government in the House today to renewing the matching grants policy?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there are really two separate questions there. One is whether the funds that are in there for the matching grants will remain there. That is a question the Minister of Finance will have to consider next year. I think they will, but that is his problem.

The second question is whether that matching grant policy will be there. Does the hon. member really want this particular matching grant policy to stay in place? I don't because I don't think it is the right one. I want something else.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As he knows, Nova Scotia Power Corporation plans to proceed with the Point Aconi coal fired electrical power plant. The project will produce acid rain as well as 1.5 million tonnes of carbon dioxide per year and $500 million in long-term debt.

Since this project has not been properly evaluated for either its environmental impact or the energy alternatives to it, is the minister prepared today to request that these two matters be evaluated before any further contracts or consideration of the project are made?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Point Aconi plant is within the jurisdiction of the province of Nova Scotia. The province has specific environmental considerations within its jurisdiction. As well it has to deal with having constant and increased power needs.

In large measure the member's two-part question should be addressed to those provincial considerations.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are starting to wonder how we are going to get a 20 per cent reduction in carbon dioxide levels by the year 2005 if these kinds of projects continue to proceed and are described as being solely in provincial jurisdiction.

The Government of Nova Scotia provided funding to the same study that the minister did, "Study on the Reduction of Energy Related Greenhouse Gas Emissions". The study found a variety of measures which (1) reduce carbon dioxide emissions, (2) save energy, and (3) save money, $150 billion for Canada.

Why is the minister not encouraging the province of Nova Scotia which could in fact have billions of dollars in net energy savings rather than $500 million plus in long-term debt? What is going on?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the member again is very selective in what he does. It is correct that ministers of energy asked for studies in respect to reduction of CO2 emissions. There was one study commissioned by the task force which made that claim, a claim which was turned down by the task force and its report to ministers. I think the member should first take a look at that.

Second, there are two points to make. Energy ministers will be meeting in Alberta on April 2, to look at these issues and at how we can move toward the targets relating back to the 1988 Toronto Conference.

I think it is also fair to Canadians that as we move toward those targets there has to be a blend. My colleague, the Minister of the Environment and I are concurrent on this issue, that is, what are the trade-offs? I think Canadians also have to know the trade-offs.

I say very directly to the hon member that I have heard his party and others—and that is valid—ask time after time what we are going to do about jobs, for instance in Cape Breton, and what we are going to do about the displacements we have in those economically depressed areas.

I am not going to accept a policy simply because some task force or some study rejected by the task force has said we can do it, before looking at what happens economically to those areas and to those Canadians as well. I do not think Canadians should expect any less from an energy minister than to do exactly that.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

On Friday and again today there were questions put to him as to whether the government was hiring tax police to deal with the GST. I noted his earlier response, but my question relates to the process involved.

Will the process for dealing with tax investigation, any fraudulent activities relating to the GST, be any different under the GST process than it is now under the FMST or indeed under the Income Tax Act?

Is the minister proposing to do anything that would infringe on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms or indeed the taxpayers' bill of rights put forward by one of his predecessors, now the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no. We are taking precautionary measures against potential fraud, as is the case in any tax jurisdiction in this country and around the world. Any activities that we will be undertaking will be done in accordance with normal and regular procedures in this country. They will be done in accordance with the taxpayers' bill of rights. To do otherwise would be irresponsible.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to apologize to the Minister of Employment and Immigration if I said anything that was not correct.

An Hon. Member: A sexist comment.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, for my sexist comments. I withdraw those remarks.

The minister has heard from many Canadians in eastern Canada who have problems with Bill C-21, as well as from the west and northern Ontario. The bill has come back from the Senate and it contains some good suggestions, but a lot of Bill C-21 is unacceptable.

Is the minister prepared to introduce a new bill in the House that will include all those good things which have been approved by the Senate and which we and many Canadians support along with variable entrance requirements?

Will the minister introduce a new bill and forget about Bill C-21? Let it sit on the shelf.

• (1500)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in the hon. member supporting suggestions that were made in the other place. It is certainly a new approach for him.

I would also suggest that public support for Bill C–21 is really very strong across Canada. There is support from the public and this shows up in a number of ways. There is support for our plans to shift unemployment insurance funds from passive to more active programs.

The misconceptions that are out there have been helped by the hon. member and others in his party. When he sees what we come up with when we respond to the requests from the other place, I hope he will be satisfied and will support us in what we are doing.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

OBSERVANCE OF ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, today I have the pleasure of joining with members from all sides of the House and one–quarter of the world's people in observing Commonwealth Day.

The modern Commonwealth has been central to the growth of Canada's role in the world and remains a key element in its external relations. It gives Canada partners in Asia and Africa with whom it shares a heritage of British political and legal traditions, and with whom it can communicate through the English language. It strengthens historical ties with the English–speaking Caribbean and widens ties in the Pacific. It deepens our understanding of the problems of developing countries and provides the opportunity to make an important contribution to technical and development assistance. It also provides inspiration for Canada to seek parallel institutions which would cement ties in the French–speaking world.

Canada's annual contribution of some $40 million to official Commonwealth organizations chiefly serves to assist developing and particularly the smaller countries of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth connection facilitates Canada's own development aid program and the effective use of Canadian aid. In 1989–90, Canada will have directed close to $1 billion of bilateral and multilateral development assistance to some 50 Commonwealth countries or territories.

I also wish to draw special attention to the Commonwealth Distance Learning Agency based in Vancouver. This Commonwealth collaboration in distance education, created through a Canadian initiative at the 1987 Commonwealth heads of government meeting, promotes the exchange of information, training, technical assistance, and research in the application of distance education techniques at post–secondary and vocational levels in the developing Commonwealth countries.

The meeting of the Commonwealth heads of government in Kuala Lumpur last October reviewed the multi-faceted activities of the organization and addressed major international political and economic issues ranging from the situation in the Middle East to the world economic situation and the full integration of women in all aspects of economic, social and political life.

To further the Commonwealth's work toward gender equality, Canada will host the third meeting of Commonwealth Ministers Responsible for Women's Affairs. I am pleased and honoured to be able to welcome my counterparts from other countries to this meeting. In the spirit of Commonwealth co-operation, we will continue to work on issues such as structural adjustment and violence against women.

[Translation]

The meeting in Kuala Lumpur showed that the Commonwealth not only holds consultations on the major world issues but also takes concerted action to deal with them.

[English]

Considering recent events in South Africa, due credit has to be given to the leading role played by the Commonwealth in pressing for the opening that we are witnessing, particularly the unbanning of the African National Congress and the release of Nelson Mandela which we so heartily welcome. At Kuala Lumpur, heads of government expressed their hope for a negotiated and peaceful settlement in southern Africa and agreed to the maintenance of existing sanctions as a way of exerting continued pressure for fundamental political change.

I also want to take advantage of this occasion to praise the Canadian delegation which contributed so wonderfully to the enhancement of Canada's image at the recent Commonwealth Games in Auckland. I am particularly happy that Canada will remain active in this strengthening of Commonwealth sports through its participation and chairmanship in the working party that has been constituted by the Commonwealth Secretary-General. We look forward to hosting the 1994 Commonwealth Games in Victoria, British Columbia.

We all rejoice in the return of Pakistan to the Commonwealth last October, which can only strengthen Commonwealth collaborative action. In addition, Namibia's imminent entry, which will bring Commonwealth membership to 50, serves to reaffirm the value and relevance of the modern Commonwealth.

I have left to the end the tribute that I would like to pay to Secretary-General Ramphal. He will be relinquishing his post at the end of June after 15 years in office. Sonny Ramphal's leadership and devotion proudly strengthened the Commonwealth and its contribution to international stability, progress and justice. We are all in his debt and we wish him well.

Finally, I want to reiterate this government's support to Sonny Ramphal's successor, Chief Emeka Anyaoku, whose extensive record of effective service to the Commonwealth portends a mandate of achievement and success in the year's to come.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to deliver a statement on the Commonwealth on this special day of honouring it as an international organization.

The Commonwealth is a very unusual international organization. Once an empire, it has become an institution comprised of nearly one-quarter of the world's population. Almost every race, religious faith, culture and level of economic development can be found in the Commonwealth fold. Composed of 50 independent states, its members range from aligned to non-aligned and have all shades of ideological opinion.

The Commonwealth is an essentially multinational body of equal sovereign members with a common concern for international peace and a commitment to the economic development of member countries. Consultation and co-operation govern this association.

The Commonwealth's ties are informal and diverse. It possesses none of the attributes generally attached to an international political association. There is no constitution. The association does not encroach on the sovereignty of individual members, it has no common foreign policy and does not require its members to reach collective decisions or to take united action. There is nothing formally or legally binding the member states together.

Yet the Commonwealth is a very compatible organization. This can be traced to the fact that all member states were former British colonies in one way or another. Members share the basic traditions of respect for the British parliamentary democracy, the rule of law and the rights of individuals and minorities.

The Commonwealth has been doing for years what similar organizations are just starting to accept and to implement. Members do not strive to solve political problems, but work towards reducing strains and easing tensions in order to provide a framework in which differences can begin to be reconciled. The Commonwealth if definitely given to practicality. It can deal as effectively with the great problems of the day as it can with everyday problems.

The heads of government in the Commonwealth meet on a regular basis. These meetings are often the testing grounds for ideas. The results of such meetings are often noteworthy. For instance, the Declaration of Commonwealth Principles and the establishment of a fund for technical co-operation in 1971, the Lusaka declaration of 1979 opposing racism and racial prejudice, and the Melbourne declaration of 1981 expressing a determination to end global poverty and inequality.

• (1510)

Countries small and large have a voice within the Commonwealth. Twenty-six member states have populations that number less than one million. The Commonwealth is often the most significant link these countries have with the rest of the world. The Commonwealth is, as a result, the best advocate for the special needs and problems of these small countries. As virtually every region of the world is represented in the Commonwealth, it is easy to see that membership helps more than it hinders.

"India has contacts with southeast Asian states which no other Commonwealth country can match. Canada has an unrivalled knowledge of the United States; Britain has knowledge of Europe. Jamaica has a special advantage in understanding the countries of the Caribbean" and so can advises others. This becomes important as we move towards increasing global trade.

Both Canada and the Commonwealth have benefited from our membership. Not only have we helped to preserve the association in times of crisis and supported all its programs, but we have been led to change some of our attitudes, especially those towards the Third World.

I recall attending a Caribbean Commonwealth Conference in 1973 as an observer with two former MPs, Senator Heath Macquarrie and the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, Lincoln Alexander. At the beginning of the conference, the chairman stood up and said: "We want our three Canadian friends who are here as observers to feel free to intervene in our proceedings any time they wish to speak, for Canada is the best friend the Caribbean Commonwealth countries have in the world. Great Britain is next. And after that we don't even enumerate them."

On that trip, I flew to a cadet training camp to visit with 30 Canadian cadets who were there to train for a month with other cadets from Commonwealth countries. The Jamaican pilot who flew me in informed me that he had received his training at Portage la Prairie in Manitoba. This is just another concrete example of the co-operation that goes on within the Commonwealth.

On that same day, we received word that the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent had passed away. I brought this to the attention of the chairman of the Caribbean meeting and the first item of business was a moment of silence in his honour. One could sense the sincerity and the warm feeling extended towards Canada.

In a world where division often reigns according to ideology, race, region, level of economic development or religion, the Commonwealth is necessary. It manages to ignore group interest and help bring about a global solution to common problems. The Commonwealth is proof that through consensus a great deal can be achieved. Prime Minister Nehru of India's statement in 1949 sums it up perfectly: the Commonwealth "brings a healing touch to a sick world."

Today we extend our best wishes to the other 49 members of the modern day Commonwealth. We extend the hand of friendship and co-operation to them in order to continue to help them make the Commonwealth a great human and political organization, and an outstanding example of international co-operation and friendship for the entire world.

The Commonwealth has a tremendous amount of wealth of knowledge and understanding to offer to the rest of the world and is a great basic factor in pulling various peoples of the world together in harmony.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise on behalf of my party and pay tribute to the Commonwealth on this Commonwealth Day, and to pick up where the minister speaking for the government left off when she extended her congratulations to Sonny Ramphal, the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, for the work that he has done over the years. Mr. Ramphal is to retire, and we wish his successor well.

However, I also want to note in a personal way that I had the opportunity to hear Mr. Ramphal on a number of occasions and have always found his speeches and his analyses of the global situation to be among the best that I have ever heard. I listened to him last October at the annual meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I would recommend that speech to the minister and to all ministers of the government, because its analyses of the global environmental situation and what needs to be done, and done in a hurry, runs contrary to the policies of the government. It is one thing to congratulate Mr. Ramphal; it is another thing to pay attention to what he has to say. I would hope that someday we might see that kind of attention being paid to the policies which Mr. Ramphal advocated.

I am thinking particularly of the greenhouse effect and his concern about that, but also his concern about another Commonwealth country, Bangladesh, which stands to suffer a calamity if all the predictions about greenhouse warming and rising of the sea level are true. The delegates from Bangladesh become desperate when they contemplate what the possible consequences of the greenhouse effect might be. We should keep their situation in mind when we are making decisions about hydrocarbon policy and various other things to which this government does not yet seemed to have caught on.

The British Commonwealth is the outcome of a process of decolonization. It is basically what is left over after the decolonization of all the former British colonies. As the hon. member indicated earlier, all members of the Commonwealth, with the exception of Britain, were formerly British colonies. What we need to keep in mind when we think about the Commonwealth, is that decolonization does not have to be the end of relationships. There can be constructive ways for former colonial countries to relate to their now decolonized neighbours or, for that matter, distant neighbours.

The process of decolonization with respect to the Commonwealth is completed with the independence of Namibia, something which all of us welcome and which a number of us have had an opportunity to comment on in the House.

The process of decolonization outside the British Commonwealth has not been completed. In fact, there are new and more recent forms of colonization that have to be addressed, whether it is the colonization of East Timor by Indonesia or Tibet by China. There are numerous examples of existing colonization, to which at this particular time in history, we should be turning our attention. Why not make it a clean slate, and let us pass into a new era of history in which nations are no longer colonies of other nations.

Presumably, later we will have an opportunity to pass a resolution with respect to Lithuania. I would invite Soviet leaders and politicians to think about new ways in which they might relate to the various parts of what has been called their empire, whether or not that is the appropriate way to describe it.

It seems to me that all those things should to be considered when thinking about the Commonwealth.

One of the things that I hope for the British Commonwealth as progress is made in South Africa, assuming that progress comes to fruition and we see the creation of a democratic, non-racial democracy in South Africa, is that then the Commonwealth might be able to turn its attention to other regimes in the Commonwealth, which have literally got away with murder. While every one has been preoccupied with South Africa, there is not a member of Parliament who has not been approached at one time or another about political oppression in various Commonwealth countries.

It does not serve anyone well to have the sort of idyllic view of the Commonwealth that was expressed just before me about this being a group of nations that respect British parliamentary tradition and British law, and all those sorts of things. That would be nice, except the fact of the matter is that in many of these countries in Africa and Asia, these kinds of things are not respected. I hope that soon the Commonwealth will proceed to a point where no longer will we turn a blind eye to some of these things and begin to address the human rights violations that are going on in various Commonwealth countries.

• (1520)

For example, I am reminded of the persecution of Ahmadi Muslims in Pakistan. The minister raised the question of Pakistan's re-entry into the Commonwealth. I think this is a good thing. It is also an opportunity for members of the Commonwealth to express to Prime Minister Bhutto and to others that the kinds of things which are going on in Pakistan with respect to the Ahmadi Muslims are unacceptable to Canadians, as are many other things that are being perpetrated by other Commonwealth countries.

The Commonwealth serves the purpose of being an opportunity to get together, to have an entirely different form of forum for communication and sharing of concerns, but it also ought to be a place where various governments are challenged, not in a self-righteous way, but challenged to live up to the very ideals which the Commonwealth itself says it holds dear. I would hope that the government would see its way to continue to use the Commonwealth in that way.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, during Question Period there was a disposition, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, that a motion could be put at this time, with the unanimous consent of all members, dealing with the situation in Lithuania. I wonder if there would be disposition at this time to proceed with such a motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the world witnessed another historic event when the newly-elected Lithuanian Parliament declared a reborn, independent, democratic Lithuania.

Therefore, it is a great honour for me to introduce this all-party resolution, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley North and the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

The resolution reads:

> Be it resolved that this House recognize the legitimate right of the Lithuanian people, as expressed by their elected representatives on March 11, to declare the independence of the Republic of Lithuania.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. With your permission, I would like to say a few additional words.

The Public Accounts committee today tables an important report on Emergency Preparedness Canada. The theme of the committee's report is securing improvements in Canada's peace time emergency planning measures.

The committee raised two major concerns: first, that emergency planning at the federal level clearly identify who is in charge; and second, that the responsible agency complete the development of comprehensive plans for national emergencies such as catastrophic earthquakes and chemical or nuclear accidents.

Among the committee's key recommendations are the adoption of a plan to designate lead agencies for specific national emergencies and the setting of clear deadlines for the completion and testing of all national emergency plans.

In particular, the committee called upon Emergency Preparedness Canada, in conjunction with the provincial governments involved, to complete the national earthquake plan. This plan, which has been brought to an interim stage of completion, has been developed for British Columbia but would also be applicable to high-risk earthquake zones elsewhere in Canada.

Emergency Preparedness Canada has been requested to respond to the committee's report on March 31, 1991, because we want to see what action has been taken. This response is timed to coincide with the Auditor General's follow-up audit so that the committee can benefit from the Auditor General's assessment of the progress being made in implementing its recommendations.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present to the House of Commons a petition signed by more than 250 Canadians who are opposed to the government's legislation concerning the GST, especially with respect to books, magazines and newspapers.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Lebel-sur-Quévillon in Abitibi, further to the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

Lebel-sur-Quévillon is undoubtedly an isolated community and for that reason, the signers of this petition consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inappropriate to the purpose of the northern tax benefit plan. It does not encourage settlement of the North and resource development there.

[English]

BILL C-43

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to submit a petition containing 549 signatures of women across Canada who are petitioning the Government of Canada in support of legislation which would effectively protect the life of the unborn and establish the principle of the sanctity of life and its protection without distinction as to stages of development. These 549 signatures are in addition to close to 210,000 previous signatures in petitions from women across Canada submitted earlier.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to present the first of many petitions with respect to gun control that are being circulated in my riding and throughout metropolitan Toronto.

The 620 petitioners request the Minister of Justice to revise the gun laws of this country; to ban the possession of all guns by anyone except for law enforcement officers, security and military personnel in the performance of their duties, and those other members of society who require a gun, other than automatic or semi-automatic firearms, for legitimate purposes and have successfully mastered a training program and a psychological test satisfactory to the Minister of Justice, the provincial attorneys general and the association of chiefs of police.

The police and the public overwhelmingly want tough gun laws.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 45 of my constituents in the Southwest Arm area, from Southport to North West Brook, including Gooseberry Cove, and in the Clarenville area including Hillview, St. Jones Within and other areas.

My constituents are very concerned about the effect that the goods and services tax will have on them. They are particularly concerned about the 31 new tax increases that have taken place. In particular, because of the level of income that is represented in this part of my riding, they feel that the imposition of this new GST will cause serious and unfair hardships to low and middle income Canadians.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House today. The first is from residents of the Prince George, B.C. area and the Dome Creek area who call upon Parliament to reject the recommendations of the report that was provided to this House on the northern tax allowance.

They call upon the Government of Canada which has stated in previous answers to questions that it will be studying the tax allowance and responding quickly, we trust.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the second petition relates to and is tied in actually to the most successful convention that New Democrats had this weekend in Vancouver under the leadership of Mike Harcourt.

This petition is signed by residents of Burnaby and Maple Ridge area who call upon the government and Parliament to renew the forest agreement between Canada and the Government of British Columbia. There are 19 days remaining in this agreement which the Minister of Forestry said some time ago he would have signed. It is time he signed that agreement today.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the attached petition has been certified correct as to form and content.

This petition is from residents of the Creston and Wynndel area in my riding. The federal-provincial forest resource development agreement has advanced the regeneration of our forests and helped to provide employment for hundreds of individuals in the effort to replenish the forest resource for future generations. We the undersigned encourage the Parliament of Canada to renew this important agreement with British Columbia and therefore provide for renewed commitment to restock our forest lands, advance forestry research, promote silviculture and assist the forest industry to develop the new products and markets that will provide us with forestry jobs for the future. The petitioners urge that this agreement be signed now.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of a number of farmers from Saskatchewan who are concerned with the orderly marketing system in this country and the direction that this government is taking with respect to the future of agriculture. Specifically they are concerned with respect to the future of the Canadian Wheat Board and the fact that this government has removed oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners call upon this government to put a vote to the producers of this country to determine whether or not they want oats under the Canadian Wheat Board.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 210 and 227.

[Text]

EDC LOANS IN SUPPORT OF PURCHASE OF MILITARY TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 210—Mrs. Stewart:

Are any EDC loans supporting purchases of military technologies and, if so, in each case (a) to which countries (b) for what amounts (c) what technology is being funded?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Insofar as External Affairs and International Trade Canada (EAITC)/the Export Development Corporation (EDC) are concerned, the reply is as follows:

EDC is currently financing a number of transactions involving military technology as described in Group Two of the Export Control List. In each case, the required export permits have been obtained under the authority of the Export and Import Permits Act. As the dealings of Canadian companies with EDC are exempt from public disclosure under the Access to Information Act, it is not considered appropriate to release specific details.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PRODUCT SHOW

Question No. 227—Mr. MacWilliam:

1. Was there any government expenditure for the 1990 British Columbia Product Show, which was held in Vancouver on January 29, 1990 and sponsored by Western Diversification Canada and, if so, in total, what amount?

2. Was a contract tendered for the staging of this Product Show and, if so, by what method?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): 1. The total federal government expenditure for the 1990 British Columbia Product Show, which was held in Vancouver on January 29, 1990, was $50,656.03.

2. The "staging" of the Product Show was provided through a call-up against a Regional Individual Standing Offer (RISO). The standing offer was awarded by the Department of Supply and Services through a competitive tendering process based on price and technical merit.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call government orders I wish to inform the House that because of ministerial statements government orders will be extended 20 minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

On the Order:

Government Orders:

February 21, 1990—Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State to Prime Minister and Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I rise to initiate the response from the government to the message from the other place respecting Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The message from the other place came back with some nine amendments. On behalf of the government I have to state that it objects to several amendments proposed by the Senate because it guts the bill, violate its principles approved by the Commons and it transgresses accepted constitutional boundaries of the Senate's role on government bills coming from the Commons.

First, I would like to note Standing Orders 79 and 80 of our House and Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, formerly the British North America Act.

Standing Order 79(1) of the House of Commons, which has been in place since Confederation states, and I quote:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

This simply states the long standing constitutional precedent that a Royal recommendation dictates and must precede any appropriation of funds and any deviation from that by way of amendments would, in fact, be out of order and not permissible under that Standing Order.

Standing Order 79(2) states, and I quote:

> The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

And 79(3) states, and I quote:

> When estimates are brought in, the message from the Governor General shall be presented to and read by the Speaker in the House.

Standing Order 80(1) states, and I quote:

> All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

That is a Standing Order of this House in place since Confederation. Standing Order 80(2) states:

> In order to expedite the business of Parliament, the House will not insist on the privilege claimed and exercised by them of laying aside bills sent from the Senate because they impose pecuniary penalties nor of laying aside amendments made by the Senate because they introduce into or alter pecuniary penalties in bills sent to them by this House; provided that all such penalties thereby imposed are only to punish or prevent crimes and offences, and do not tend to lay a burden on the subject, either as aid or supply to the Sovereign, or for any general or special purposes, by rates, tolls, assessments or otherwise.

In other words, it states absolutely and clearly in the Standing Orders that only this House, not the other place, only this House ,in all questions of supply, namely taking the funds from the Consolidated Revenue Fund has the right to decide how they are to be spent, not the Senate, under any circumstances at any time since Confederation. That is a Standing Order of this House.

That Standing Order does not stand in isolation. Clause 53 of the Constitution Act of Canada states:

Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Clause 54 states:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address or Bill is proposed.

Nothing could be clearer than that in terms of the constitutional authorities of this House, and solely this House, to deal with tax and spending.

Notwithstanding that, these rights and powers of the Commons vis-à-vis the Senate with respect to legislation and amendments to bills have been seriously and substantially breached by the Senate amendments before us now.

• (1540)

[Translation]

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly obvious the Senate has exceeded its role and that on the whole, its amendments alter the very foundation of the government's changes as set forth in Bill C-21. The scope of these amendments and their financial impact on Canadian taxpayers are unacceptable, coming as they do from a group of non-elected senators who are not accountable to anyone for their actions.

[English]

It is absolutely incredible in this day and age when everywhere around the world non-elected bodies are being disposed of left, right and centre. In South America elected legislatures and executives are in place where previously we had non-elected groups. In eastern Europe non-elected parties in power are being thrown out of their various legislatures.

But here in Canada, we have a non-elected group which cannot accept the results of the 1984 election stating that it will not let this elected Chamber do what it was elected to do, namely, deal with the spending and raising funds.

The hon. member—and I await his address with interest—says the Constitution can do it. He says that legally, the Senate can kill a bill. Legally, the monarch can kill a bill. Legally, the Governor General can amend and kill a bill. Legally, the Governor General can do that but never would because the Governor General learned in 1925 that this is a democracy and Governors General do not do that. We need to teach the same lesson to the other place.

An Hon. Member: You have no mandate.

Mr. Andre: I hear talk of mandate. Would the hon. member tell me what mandate the Senate has to do what it has done? What mandate? From whom? What deity bequeaths to these has-been Trudeauites the right to decide the agenda of this country? What deity has prescribed that right to them? They are Liberals? Does that give them a right? The God-given right to say: "To heck with the House of Commons. The House of Commons amounts to nothing. We shall decide in the Senate. We, after all, are appointed by Pierre Elliott Trudeau. This gives us a moral authority beyond mere election in a ballot. This gives us the authority to decide. We may have been tossed out in 1984, but we are still in power, by golly, and we are going to exercise that power". Yes, Sir, only a Liberal could say that without blushing. I will admit the hon. member for Beaches is blushing a little bit.

An Hon. Member: Broadview—Greenwood. Say it with respect.

Mr. Andre: Broadview—Greenwood. I am sorry. I am sorry you are not running. You are a lot better than the other bunch that is up there.

I am aware that the other place historically has not accepted the Constitution and our Standing Orders. It continues to claim and has continued to claim in the past that it has some authority.

If I may I will quote from a book by Mr. F.A. Kunz entitled The Modern Senate of Canada which deals with the period up to 1963. We have not had any political scientist look at the Senate since then and I can understand why not.

Page 338 of Mr. Kunz's book states:

> While the right to refuse or reject is admittedly within the legal powers of the Senate, for the reason that public money cannot be spent or taxes imposed except under the authority of an act of Parliament—

The Senate claims that since it is a part of Parliament, that gives it the legal authority to reject. I would say again, as I said earlier, the Governor General is a part of Parliament as well. The Governor General has that same legal authority but, of course, would never exercise it.

Kunz continues:

> —which implies the consent of the Senate, the House of Commons has taken the view that the provision in section 53 of the BNA Act which requires that the entire bill on which the ultimate law is founded must originate in the Commons prohibits the Senate even to amend money bills downward; for if the Senate amends, then the bill passed by the Senate is not the one that originated in the House of Commons. This attitude, which is incorporated in SO 63—

That is now Standing Order 80.

> —of the Rules of the House of Commons, in effect equates the financial powers of the Senate with those of the House of Lords at the time of Confederation, when the Lords were restricted by constitutional conventions but not as yet by the statutory provisions of the Parliament Act. In contrast, the Senate's stand crystallized in the so-called Ross Report of 1918, which served both as a summary of past practice and as a guide for future action, has always been that of the two restrictions on the rights of the House of Lords which the House of Commons by its Resolution of 1678 tried to impose, namely the denial of the right to originate and the denial of the right to amend money bills, the BNA Act adopted the first in Section 53 but did not mention the second and that this proved that the Fathers did not intend the Senate to follow the practice of the House of Lords and not to amend a money bill—
> But these arguments and counter-arguments respecting the Senate's financial powers, although theoretically interesting, are now-a-days little more than examples of academic pedantry and to discuss the Senate's right to revise the Government's financial program in terms of conflict is really to present a very misleading picture of its functions in the modern state. On the contrary, the Senate has acted in full understanding of the meaning and implications of responsible government and accepted as binding upon itself the proposition that it should not unduly disturb what has come to be called "the balance of ways and means"; or, as Hopkins says, "that it would be inadmissible to tamper with the overall financial program submitted by the Government in its budgetary proposals in such a way as to effect a material change in the budgetary surplus or deficit envisaged therein."

This applied to Senators in the other place right up until 1984. What big constitutional changed occurred in 1984? A bunch of Trudeauites got transferred from here over there and they forgot that there was an election which changed where the power should lie. That is all that happened.

In 1963 we have an authority saying that previous Senates have never acted in the way this one is acting. This one has gone back to pre-1678, and they are talking about a modern Senate!

The reality remains that the Commons must, at times such as the present circumstances, reassert its rights to the Senate. It is our responsibility to make such objection. We owe it to the democratic principles upon which the country is based.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The absolute basic grounds on which the Senate must respond to the Commons' will is the fact that this House is elected and the other place is not. That is the foundation of our Canadian democratic system. The reality is in fact understood and accepted by the Senate, we believe.

In recent examples of Senate messages on bills, members will recall that ultimately the Senate acknowledged this truth. The senators proposed their amendments, they got our response, they may have made a second effort to ask us to accept some of their amendments, but, as Senator Frith, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the other place, has put it so well, and I believe I quote his words: "There may be 100 reasons why we should not in the Senate yield to the House and only one reason why we should, and if that one reason is that the Commons is elected and the Senate is not then that is reason enough to yield".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1550)

Mr. Andre: Government is being firm on this principle because it is so absolutely basic to the integrity of our system of responsible government, with a capital R, within a bicameral federal Parliamentary system.

The consequences of allowing the Senate to proceed in its course unchallenged, essentially to change the parent Unemployment Insurance Act in sections opened up by Bill C–21, are horrendous implications for democracy and responsible government.

To give one example, in looking at Senate amendments 7 and 9, there is a fundamental deviation from, in fact a wholesale gutting of, one of the principles and the manner of funding which is at the heart of Bill C–21. The effect of implementing these amendments would be an additional expenditure by the government of $1.75 billion above what was planned for in the 1989 budget—

An Hon. Member: Outrageous.

Mr. Andre: —and approved in votes by this House and as reflected in Bill C–21, and its royal recommendation. I urge hon. members to look at page 30, of the April 27, 1989 budget papers, where the finance minister is explicit about UI premiums financing all UI expenditures.

It would be an horrendous thing to imagine that this House would allow the other place to upset budgetary calculations and projections by almost $2 billion.

An Hon. Member: What is democracy anyway?

Mr. Andre: The hon. member from the back row says: "What is democracy anyway". If the Senate speaks, who cares about democratic principles. The hon. member does not care much about democratic principles, obviously, by his bellowing from the back row there.

My point is simply that our Standing Orders and practices, and our Constitution and its history give the Commons the right and duty to set the spending priorities of the government of Canada. That is absolute. It is not, and never has been, the role of an unelected, unresponsible Senate to interfere with or override it.

Yes, the Senate can legally, perhaps, defeat, delay or amend downward a supply appropriation bill. But it never has. Just as the Governor General can legally kill or amend a bill. But the Governor General never has. The Senate can amend, and it has done so, usually with government approval, bills which had a royal recommendation, but never in modern history, if not earlier, in a fundamental way, with dramatic consequences for what has been called in the Senate, the balance between ways and means. In short, never in defiance of the terms of a royal recommendation, and that is what has been done by the Senate in this case.

I want to focus on the government's position that Bill C–21 is a money bill, with a royal recommendation which appropriates money. The House of Commons must assert in messages to the Senate, when required as in the present case, that the degree of amendment to such bills, by the Senate especially if not just the Commons, must be properly circumscribed. Given the record of Senate practice in the past half century or so and learned commentary on it we must ask ourselves about the extent to which the Senate can alter, in opposition to the House, a government bill, particularly one based on a royal recommendation as Bill C–21 is.

Given the wording of the royal recommendation and the past interpretations by the Speaker of our Standing Orders 79 and 80 which deal with financial procedure, at what point in the specific content of a bill with a royal recommendation does a limit on its ability to be amended become clear, especially any amendment that would, if implemented, redirect the raising or spending of revenue, into or out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund? In other words, what limits, with an eye to impact on the CRF, are there to amendments to a bill like Bill C–21?

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands walking by muttered something about, not if it did not need a royal recommendation in the first place. He seems to be implying that the bill was out of order when brought in in 1921 by having a royal recommendation.

Mr. Gauthier: He did not say that. Those are your words.

Mr. Andre: The bill does need a royal recommendation.

An Hon. Member: It doesn't. Your amendment does.

Mr. Andre: This is a money bill. An amendment to change the amount by $1.75 billion, to introduce a call on a Consolidated Revenue Fund by $1.75 billion does not need a royal recommendation? That is absurd.

My remarks are just an overture to what can be expected to be heard from the Minister of Employment and Immigration who will be talking in more substance about the details of the bill when she participates in the debate on a motion I will introduce shortly. But it is clear that what the Senate has proposed dramatically upsets the principles of the bill and dramatically upsets the financial posture brought forward by the Minister of Finance in the budget of April, 1989. It is beyond the purview of the Senate to do that.

I submit that this House is entitled to take exception to the extent to which the unelected Senate has tried to transform the bill sent to it into something fundamentally different. I am aware of the tradition from Westminster cited in Erskine May, Twenty-first Edition, on page 513. He states:

> No objection can be taken to a Lords amendment on the ground of being outside the scope of the bill, or otherwise as to its orderliness—

Then there is the provision—

> —except so far as sanction by way of a financial resolution is concerned—

This was not a ways and means bill, but it did have a royal recommendation which limited money put into play by the bill. The appropriation of public revenue "under the circumstances in the manner and for the purposes set out" in the bill. The royal recommendation says that moneys will be appropriated and spent in the manner and for the purposes set out in the bill.

It is clearly out of order for the other place to say that it will spend it in a different manner and for different purposes than those set out in the bill presented to the Senate by this House. That is clearly out of order.

The principles or purposes of Bill C-21, were and are, to end government financing of the unemployment insurance, to restrict entry to and claim upon the program and to use money from the fund to purchase training programs. The Senate has gutted two of these three principles.

I do not create this submission about the Senate role. One of our prime reference works does. It is called, and I referred to it earlier, The Modern Senate of Canada by F. A. Kunz. It reviews specifically the period from 1925 to 1963. He says "The Senate's unique sense of political self restraint"—that was prior to 1963, not post-1984, obviously—is the result of many factors, including "the self-consciously subordinate position of the Senate in the framework of responsible government, its remoteness from the real centre of political controversy—he means the hustings, the Commons, the ridings—the relatively high average age of its members, the feeling of security engendered by tenure and the intentional laxity of its party organization". He states:

> The ruling spirit of the Senate is a spirit of moderation, of fair play, of due independence, of political self-restraint, with a latent determination at the bottom of all discussion and debates not to go beyond a certain limit, not to abuse the constitutional power which resides in the Chamber, giving way even when acquiescence is lacking, and abstaining from pushing the course or objection to the point of obstruction.

That is how this scholar described the Senate from 1925 to 1963. I do not know what words he would use to describe the Senate since 1984.

• (1600)

In his look at "The Senate versus the Executive" he concludes that the elected Commons has pre-eminence. He says: "The Senate as a parliamentary institution has made no articulate attempts to erect a defence for certain economic and social principles in contradistinction with the express wishes of the elected representatives of the people."

I would cite Bills C-27 of 1977 and C-14 of 1978, and the process of Senate disposition of them, as relevant precedents to this situation. The Senate passed them in all stages in one day. These were bills which made very significant changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Imagine, in 1977 and 1978 that august body down the hall passed those bills, in all stages, in one day, bills which made profound and significant changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Now, it does not seem to view that as the way to operate.

What has happened? The mere fact that an election or two happened to intervene is no reason why that same bunch should not stay in power. After all, they are Liberals, are they not? They have been given this authority by the deity to rule and mere elections do not change that. After all, they are members of the Liberal Party of Canada. They do not let mere elections of a bunch of commoners change what is going to happen in this country. That is absurd.

Later, Kunz reminds us that the historic interpretation made in the Commons about the weight of Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution is this:

> Public money cannot be spent or taxes imposed except under the authority of an Act of Parliament which implies the consent of the Senate; and the provision in Section 53, which requires that the entire bill on which the ultimate law is founded must originate in the Commons, prohibits the Senate even to amend bills downward; for if the Senate amends, then the bill passed by the Senate is not the one that originated in the House of Commons.

That is axiomatic. All bills which would spend money or raise taxes must originate here. That constitutional provision becomes ludicrous if in fact the other place is able to gut it and say that it will not pass anything but its gutted version. Then what of this authority that the House of Commons possesses by virtue of the Constitution and a few centuries of tradition?

I find it absolutely astounding that for the potential opportunity of short term political gain the opposition parties apparently—I say apparently, we will see what they say in debate; I do not want to pre-judge—are quite willing to dismiss and ignore a few centuries of democratic tradition because there may be an opportunity for some short term political gain.

As I said before, this discussion gets into pedantry because the Senate had not acted so. From 1925 to 1963 the Senate never acted so, and it did not act that way from 1963 to 1984. For 60 years, roughly, we had a Senate that recognized we lived in a democracy. But then the damn democracy went and elected people from the other party. It was an outrageous thing they did, and they did it twice. These protectors of the public in the Senate must prevent the mob in the House of Commons from getting its way.

All that remains is for me to establish that Bill C-21 is in fact a money bill. It is, and I will explain why. Section 53 of the Constitution Act, 1987, provides:

> 53. Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Bills referred to in Section 53 are commonly referred to as "money bills". That is to say that they deal with what is raised by way of taxes. We know that we need a Ways and Means motion passed by this House before we are able to raise taxes. They deal with what is spent, public revenue. We know that in order to do that we must have a Royal Recommendation. The Means and Ways role and the supply role both must be established by this House of Commons, preceded in one case by Ways and Means motions and on the outside, if you will, a Royal Recommendation. We cannot raise money without a Ways and Means motion by this House. We cannot spend it without a Royal Recommendation.

It is very clear. This is a prerogative of the House of Commons and only the House of Commons, and not the Senate. To tamper with that in any significant way is clearly and absolutely unacceptable in a democracy.

Again, I can see that legally the Senate may be able to do this. The Government General legally can do that. But in a democracy it is intolerable for either element of Parliament to act against the wishes of a democratically elected House of Commons.

Section 53 prohibits the Senate from amending money bills. In this regard, Standing Order 80 of the House of Commons declares:

> 80.(1) All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills,—

Only the House has the right to direct, to limit and to appoint.

> —the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

That is from our Standing Orders. It would be in contempt of this House for hon. members to stand up and say that they do not care what Standing Order 80 says, they intend to agree with the Senate's butchering of this Standing Order.

As I have indicated, the term "money bill" refers to a bill that appropriates any part of the public revenue or imposes any tax or impost. Any appropriation, tax or impost is a money bill. In other words, Section 53 applies with respect of any bill that proposes to authorize an expenditure of public money or to impose any tax or impost. In the case of a bill authorizing the expenditure of public money, the authorization may be direct, as in the case of an appropriation bill, or indirect, as in the case of a bill that authorizes or requires something that entails the expenditure of public money.

If you see Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada, Third Edition, 1903, at page 626, he states:

> As a general rule, public bills may originate in either House or whenever; but whenever they grant supplies of any kind, or involve directly or indirectly the levying or appropriation of any tax upon the people, they must be initiated in accordance with law and constitutional practice.

Section 53 of the British North America Act, 1867, expressly provides:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

• (1610)

Some instances of bills considered to be money bills are given in Erskine May Parliamentary Practice. I am referring to the 19th edition, page 758, 1976: (a) provisions extending or altering the purposes of a previously authorized expenditure; (b) provisions increasing the amount of a previously authorized expenditure, which is found at page 759; (c) remissions of amounts paid on account of debts, taxes or fees due to the Crown, which is found at page 756; and (d) provisions increasing a charge by the extension of time, found at page 757.

I think that should prove it, but people still argue is Bill C-21 a money bill? One argument that may have been expressed at the Senate or its offices was that since expenditures under the UI Act are paid from a special levy on employers and employees for that purpose and since no general tax revenues were appropriated to pay for these expenditures, there was in effect a separate fund which should not be regarded as public funds or the public revenue.

In response, I say that the UI account is not a separate fund from the CRF. All accounts received under the UI Act on account of premiums are paid into the CRF and all amounts paid as or on account of benefits and assistance under Section 26.1 are paid out of the CRF. I refer members to Sections 113 and 117 of the UI Act.

The CRF is public money or public revenue. In this regard it can be noted that the CRF is defined in Section 2 of the Financial Administration Act as meaning "the aggregate of all public moneys that are on deposit at the credit of the Receiver General". Public money, in turn, is defined as meaning:

> All money belonging to Canada received or collected by the Receiver General or any other public officer in his official capacity or any person authorized to receive or collect such money, and includes
> (a) duties and revenue of Canada,
> (b) money borrowed by Canada or received through the issue of sale of securities,
>
> (c) money received or collected for or on behalf of Canada, and
> (d) all money that is paid to or received or collected by a public officer under or pursuant to any act, trust, treaty, undertaking or contract, and is to be disbursed for a purpose specified in or pursuant to that act, trust, treaty, undertaking or contract.

The point is this. The fact that money raised for UI Act expenditures is raised by a special levy on employers and employees does not mean the moneys are not public moneys or public revenue. There are several provisions in Bill C-21 that have the effect of either directly or indirectly imposing a charge on public funds. These provisions create special new and distinct charges on public funds. These include Clauses 2(1), 9, 14(1), 19(2), 20 and 50(1).

I expect that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will speak to these very important provisions which must be protected when she enters the debate later. The only point I underline now and again is that this money bill has been unacceptably gutted and perverted by some of the Senate amendments.

[Translation]

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall what the former Leader of the Opposition said a few years ago, when the Senate tried to force the government to amend the bill to amend the Patent Act. He said at the time:

> That the House of Commons should prevail, and that this was the position of the Liberal Party.

[English]

Those were the words of the previous leader of this party who stated explicitly in this House that at the end of the day the will of the elected House of Commons must prevail. That is the clear position of the Liberal party. I hope that party with its great democratic tradition will remember those words when it comes to voting on this motion.

Therefore, I move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendment 4(A) made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, but disagrees with amendments 2(A), (B) and (C), 3(A) and (B), 5(A) and (B), 6, 7 and 9 because this House believes that they contradict the principles of the Bill, and violate the traditional legislative role asserted by the Commons in fulfilment of its obligations under Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, as fitting for the unelected Senate on money bills, for the following reasons:

All of them are in contradiction of the fundamental principles contained in C-21, which are:

(I) a shift to full financing of the UI program though employer and employee premiums;

(II) a reduction of work disincentives in the UI program;

(III) an increase in the Government's flexibility to meet the changing needs of UI claimants, to use UI funds to purchase training or provide ancillary income support and to provide access to other active employment measures in accordance with the rights and needs of claimants.

[Translation]

Amendments 2(a), (b) and (c) would restrict the innovative use of U.I. funds for developmental purposes by restricting the Commission's flexibility in purchasing training courses, providing mobility assistance, promoting self-employment and providing claimants with positive work incentives, including bonuses and temporary earnings supplements. This amendment offends principle (iii) mentioned above. It limits the governments's power to provide active employment measures to claimants.

[English]

Amendments 3(A) and (B) would restrict the ability of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission to design developmental uses benefits and to administer the referral process in ways which are sufficiently flexible to meet the evolving needs of UI claimants, while safeguarding the rights and entitlements otherwise available to UI claimants under the UI Act. Again, this contradicts principle (III).

Amendments 5(A) and (B) would relax the stricter penalties imposed on UI claimants who have quit a job without just cause. This alters principle (II).

Amendment 6 would require that costs associated with third-party training be charged to the new developmental uses portion of the UI account, thereby reducing the funds available to train UI claimants. This contradicts principle (III), as it reduces the government's ability to provide claimants access to active employment measures.

Amendment 7 reinstates Consolidated Revenue Fund responsibility for financing a portion of regional benefits. This contradicts principle (I) of Bill C-21, which requires employee and employer funding of all UI program expenditures.

Amendment 9 would maintain the current programs financing provisions for self-employed fishing benefits. This offends principle (I) above, which ensures that the program must be funded from employer and employee premiums.

And that this House agrees with the principles set out in parts of amendments 1, 4(B), (C) and (D) and 8, but would propose the following amendments:

Amendment 1 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out line 40 on page 13 and substitute the following:

Appeal under Section 79 or 80.

(9) For greater certainty, the courses or programs referred to in subsection (1) include courses or programs in basic skills and literacy."

Amendment 4(B) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out line 4 on page 16 and substitute the following:

Made under Sections 24 to 26.1, and

(III) showing the estimated or, where available, the actual expenditures made under this Act in each province for each of the three years preceding the year to which the plan applies, and"

Amendment 4(C) be amended to read as follows:

"Add, immediately after line 6 on page 16, the following:

(2.1) In the Estimates of the expenditures referred to in subparagraphs 2(A)(I) and (II), the plan may include the estimated expenditures to be made in each province".

Amendment 4(D) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out line 18 on page 16 and substitute the following:

Day.

(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the plan for 1990 shall be laid before Parliament not later than three months after the coming into force of this section."

Amendment 8 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out line 1 on page 33 and substitute the following:

53. Subsections 130(3) and (4) of the said Act are".

That is the motion I put to the House for consideration. I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that the end of the day has come and that it is time for the will of the House of Commons to prevail.

• (1620)

Just by way of information to give some indication of how much discussion has gone on so far in this matter, we have previously debated this legislation at second reading for 13 hours. We debated it in committee for 118 hours. We had report stage, we travelled and there were witnesses. We had report stage debate here for seven hours and third reading debate here, for 145 hours in total.

This committee had 233 persons representing 204 groups appear before it. They travelled to Sudbury, Toronto, Jonquière, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Moncton, and Vancouver, virtually around the entire country.

The Senate has had the bill for some extended months. It also heard many, many witnesses.

I think it is time that the will of the democratically elected people of Canada as expressed by this House of Commons be allowed to prevail and that we move on to other subjects.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Guilbault)—Money laundering; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception (Mr. Mifflin)—Veterans Affairs; the hon. member for Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso (Mr. LeBlanc)—Fisheries.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it may be true that there were 13 hours of debate in this House on this bill last fall. We are starting today a debate and we have only had a little more than an hour on a message from the Senate which I think did a terrific job of looking at that bill, as rightly it should. It recommended to this House changes which it has a constitutional right to do. By constitutional obligation it has a right to look at this and give us its opinion. There is nothing wrong with the message we got from the Senate in terms of its constitutional acceptability. I do take exception to the minister wanting us to believe that there have been 153 hours of debate. That is not what we understand debate to be. There have been 13 hours in this House, and that is about it. I hope he gives us that much time on this message.

First, before addressing the comments and reply of the minister, I would like to remind him that Bill C-21 is an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act. This is not, in our view, a money bill. It reduces the charge on the public treasury rather than being a bill that stands by itself. I will get to the arguments that were put by the department when I get to that question of whether indeed this is a money bill, yes or no.

I want to make a couple of comments before I get into the meat of the matter. We must remember that Canada, unlike the United Kingdom, is a federation. We do not have a unicameral parliament. We have the House of Commons that proposes and we have the Senate that can propose in certain circumstances.

In 1867 there were those in this country who opposed the establishment of the Senate. They wanted a Parliament constituted strictly on the basis of representation by population. Those persons, we will recall, were mostly from Canada west, which is now Ontario, my province. They did not prevail. They did not win their argument. The other provinces refused to agree to a Parliament in which one province, in this case Ontario, was expected to be dominant.

Those of us who come from Central Canada, as it is called, either Ontario or Quebec, must recognize, however, that members of the House of Commons are elected and have a most important role to perform, namely, to represent the people of the other provinces against a central majority dominated House of Commons. It is quite possible, and we have heard some arguments today, that an elected Senate could be far more effective than the present one. We are not debating that here today. I, for one, believe that an elected Senate would be more effective. However, until we do have an elected Senate, the Senate as now constituted must perform the tasks assigned to it by our Constitution.

I come directly to the question. Are the amendments before this House put by the Senate of Canada unacceptable to this House, either because they contravene our Standing Orders, as was alluded to by the minister, that is, Standing Order 80(1), or because they contravene Sections 53 or 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867?

I could not find anybody in the Senate who said: "We accepted Standing Order 80(1) of this House". That Standing Order is quite clear. Standing Order 80(1) states:

> All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies—

I underline the words "aids and supplies" because that is very important to my argument.

> —ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

• (1630)

The question we have to answer is whether Bill C–21 deals with aids and supplies such as described in Standing Order 80(1). In my opinion clearly it does not. We need not to revive the old argument between the House of Commons and the Senate, the dispute over whether Standing Order 80(1) prevails.

If we go into the authorities and look at Erskine May, Erskine May says: "Charges upon the public revenue are of two kinds." I think it is important that people understand that there are two kinds of charges against the public revenue: charges payable out of money to be provided by Parliament, that is, moneys to be voted year by year. That is the ways and means motions and supply motion under which we operate every year. That is one way.

Then there are charges upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund as a second source of supply. The charges payable out of the money to be provided by Parliament under the moneys that are voted every year are authorized every year by the regular appropriation acts of this House. The charges upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund are called statutory expenditures. That is what Bill C–21 addresses. It is not the aids and supplies argument but the statutory expenditures.

Historically, the Crown was expected to pay the annual costs of the Public Service from the income from Crown lands and the like. When this proved inadequate the Crown turned to Parliament for aids and supplies, that is, for financial supplements to make up the total requirements for each year. It is to the regular appropriation bills that Standing Order 80(1) refers.

At Westminster the bills granting aids and supplies are presented by Royal Assent by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The same thing happens here in Canada. A bill must have a royal recommendation to be called a statutory expenditure. Once we clear that up we must address the other kinds of charges I just alluded to as statutory expenditures.

They do not begin with a request for supply, nor are they dealt with according to the Standing Orders of the Business of Supply. Before 1968 they began with financial resolutions moved in a committee of the whole House. The terms of such resolutions were recommended to the House by the Governor General and in 1968 the preliminary resolution stage was dropped in Canada. Since then, the royal recommendation is communicated to the House in the manner prescribed in Standing Order 79(2).

Bill C–21 was introduced with a royal recommendation as prescribed by Standing Order 79(2), not with a royal recommendation presented in the manner prescribed by Standing Order 79(3). I think it would be of some assistance if I read Standing Orders 79(2) and 79(3):

> (2) The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.
> (3) When estimates are brought in, the message from the Governor General shall be presented to and read by the Speaker in the House.

I think one must accept that Bill C–21 is not a bill supplying aids and supplies. Standing Order 81 does not apply to it, but Standing Orders 79(2) and 79(3) apply.

Having said that we have to address the constitutional question. Are these amendments put by the Senate out of order because of Section 54 of the 1867 Constitution Act? Bill C–21 is a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1970, 1971 and 1972.

I remind members that the original bill was Bill C–229. It became the Unemployment Insurance Act. It was read the first time on March 10, 1971. That is the original bill which this Bill C–21 wants to amend. The appropriation sought by the bill was recommended by the Governor General and there was an appropriate royal recommendation.

If we look at the clauses of Bill C–21 which the Senate proposes to amend, every one of those clauses could have been moved in 1971 as an amendment to Bill C–229 by any private member of this House. None of those clauses of Bill C–21 seeks to increase the amount or to change the purpose of an appropriation in any way in conflict with the royal recommendation of March 10, 1971.

It follows that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C–21 do not offend that recommendation. If Bill C–229 adopted by this House on March 10, 1971 were in order, we believe the Senate amendments before this House today, in 1990, which in no case go beyond the appropriation made by the bill originally are in order. Given the fact that all the provisions of Bill C–21 could have been moved in 1971 as amendments to the original Bill C–229, one must ask why Bill C–21 was introduced in this House with a royal recommendation. Bill C–21 was introduced into the House on June 1, 1989 and the royal recommendation attached to it read:

> Her Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in the measure entitled An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

When the officials were questioned in committee on February 5, 1990 as to which clauses of Bill C–21 in their opinion required a royal recommendation—in other words, why Bill C–21 which is an amendment to the original bill required a royal recommendation—their reply was that no analysis had been made by either the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission or the Department of Justice to ascertain which of those clauses did indeed require a royal recommendation. If any clause required it, we did not find out. They did not know. If none of the clauses amended by the Senate require a royal recommendation in our view, it follows that in so far as those clauses are concerned the royal recommendation of June 1, 1989 is irrelevant. That was the basis of the argument in the Senate.

• (1640)

The Speaker of the Senate found the arguments so convincing that he ruled squarely on Erskine May. He found that indeed the amendments were in order and that they did not impose an extra charge on the public treasury, that Bill C–21 was not a money bill but indeed reduced the charges on the public treasury and therefore was acceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to talk about the amendments or rather the amendment that the government has accepted, Amendment 4(a), and a few more that they accepted with amendments at the same time that they rejected very important amendments which we thought would restore some fairness for Canadian workers in terms of their rights, as we see them, to unemployment insurance benefits.

I would like to talk about the nine amendments proposed by the Senate which we think greatly improve Bill C–21. We do not claim that these proposals are excellent. There is no pretention of excellence but we claimed, Mr. Speaker, that it was possible to improve the bill and it was in that spirit that the Senate made these nine amendments.

As I was saying, the Conservative government, through its minister, showed its intention to make very complex changes to three of these amendments: training, including literacy, the department's plan for regional benefits and fishermen's benefits.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate, Liberal members will elaborate on these amendments and give arguments for broadening them, we hope.

Amendment No. 5 on penalties and Amendment No. 7 on the government's withdrawal from UI funding were rejected by the government. The government intends to oppose Amendment No. 2 on training, the "Henry VIII" clause, Amendment No. 3, Amendment No. 6, privatization, and No. 9, benefits taken over by the government.

For the Senate, Mr. Speaker, these nine amendments are an acceptable compromise on a bill which has many flaws. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, that most of those who spoke in committee and in this House tried very hard to make the government understand the problems with this bill.

I shall explain to you, Mr. Speaker, not in numerical order but in my order of priority, the reasons for each of the amendments made by the Senate.

Concerning the government's withdrawal from the unemployment insurance program, Amendment No. 7, many witnesses who appeared before the committee on Bill C–21 were unanimous in saying that this measure was the most significant of all the proposed changes. Therefore, concerned about the considerable problems which this change might cause, the members of the Senate Committee have proposed Amendment No. 7 to keep section 118 in the Unemployment Insurance Act so that the government would have to fund not all but half the cost of extended regional benefits from general revenues and not the UI account.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that one of the reasons why the government withdrew from funding the program was the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. When it signed the agreement, the government either did not think, or simply preferred not to tell Canadians, that the United States might consider the unemployment insurance program as a kind of hidden subsidy. To observe its part of the agreement with our American neighbours, the Conservative government had no hesitation in withdrawing completely from the program's financing. To harmonize—that is the term being used—its operations with the United States, this government did not think twice about putting the whole financial burden on Canadian workers and by the same token, had no hesitation in shirking its social and economic responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge hon. members to read the latest issue of the magazine Relations. It contains an article on Bill C–21 by Henri Sader, "Le salaire de la peur". I won't have time to read it to you, but I strongly urge hon. members to read it. I think this article is very worthwhile, and if I had time, I would quote from it at length to make my case. However, I think all hon. members received this publication at their offices. I advise them to read it.

In 1971, the federal government started funding regional extended benefits, the extended benefits paid under section 25, job creation, and section 26, training, as well as net benefits paid to independent fishermen. More specifically, the government started financing benefits to cover the difference between the real unemployment rate and a rate of 4 per cent. Under Bill C–21, the Unemployment Insurance Fund will pay benefits only when the unemployment rate rises above 6 per cent. The government will no longer finance extended benefits based on the regional unemployment rate, fishermen's benefits or its share of manpower programs. In the United States, Mr. Speaker, this bill would make Canada the only industrialized country with a system to which its government did not contribute a cent.

Bill C–21 repeals section 118 of the Act, which concerns government contributions to extended benefits, and also subsection 130(3) which concerns government contributions to net benefits paid to independent fishermen. This change, I think, is a sign that the government is not intent on improving the unemployment insurance system but on harmonizing with our American neighbours while trying to cope with the deficit.

In fact, what this Government has done is save $2.2 billion at the expense of employees who see their unemployment insurance premiums increase from $1.95 to $2.25 on each $100 earned and at the expense of the employers whose share is or will be 1.4 times that of their employees.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to remind the hon. members that, on November 8, 1984, the then Minister of Employment and Immigration, Miss MacDonald, stated, and I quote:

> Any substantial increase of the premium rate would bring about additional costs which would be difficult to bear for the businesses and which would hinder job creation in the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, that leading Conservative cabinet minister was speaking for the government in those days.

In my riding, Ottawa University will be one of the first to be hard hit by such measure.

• (1650)

Indeed, Ottawa university will be forced to seriously review its budget for it will have to pay $400,000 more into the Unemployment Insurance Fund. Mr. Speaker, this may be peanuts for a multinational but, for a university operating on already limited budgets, additional expenditures of the sort have a devastating effect on the progress of an institution already hardly hit by other measures as negative as the one imposed by this government.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote also a comment from the Ontario Coalition for Social Justice. Laurell Ritchie said and I quote: "One can raisonnably expect that, by 1993, when much bigger premiums will be necessary to sustain the Fund, the employers who are now contributing the largest share to the Plan will have managed to ask first of all for new reductions."

Another important argument was raised by Mitchell Kosney of the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, and I quote: "This bill removes a major and significant impetus for the government's commitment to full employment policies and on the unemployed and economically depressed regions and workers caught in the growing and ever-increasing number of poor quality, low-paid jobs."

Let us now deal with Amendment No. 8:

[English]

Let us deal with the fishermen's benefits amendment. The Senate committee also brought forth three amendments relating to fishermen's benefits. In 1956 the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended to extend coverage to self-employed fishermen. Section 130 of the Unemployment Insurance Act provides that the Unemployment Insurance Commission may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make such regulations as it deems necessary to establish and operate a scheme of unemployment insurance for self-employed persons engaged in fishing or activities incidental to fishing.

Fishermen's unemployment insurance premiums go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and benefits are paid from that fund. The government therefore finances from general revenue the difference between the benefits paid and the premiums collected from self-employed fishermen. That is the government's contribution and in 1988 it amounted to $248 million. Some 35,000 fishermen benefited from this program.

By repealing Section 130(3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, clause 53 of Bill C-21 ends all direct government financing. Fishermen's benefits would in the future be paid from the unemployment insurance account which will funded solely by premiums. The effect is to withdraw government funding of fishermen's benefits and to ensure that expenditure for these benefits is treated on the same basis as expenditure for any other benefit.

There are dangers to the elimination of the status of self-employed fishermen and to cutting back the payments that they will receive. Since the unemployment insurance account would now be responsible for all fishermen's benefits, pressure could be expected to develop from other premium contributors to reduce these benefits and even possibly to eliminate the special status of self-employed fishermen under the act.

In 1988, fishermen paid approximately $18 million into the fund and received roughly $269 million in benefits. The government, therefore, made up the difference from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of some $251 million.

Mr. Earl McCurdy from the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union stated:

> Business groups will be fighting tooth and nail in the years to come to take the position that, since the government is out, they regard themselves as having to subsidize fishermen's unemployment insurance—and they will say "that is not fair and we want out."

Therefore, the Senate is asking the government to continue to finance benefit payments in excess of premiums collected. We believe that would be justified.

The second part of the amendment proposed by the Senate would also have the effect of reducing the vulnerability of fishermen's benefits by making any change to the regulations dealing with self-employed fishermen, subject to the approval of Parliament.

At the present time regulations concerning fishermen's benefits can be changed without Parliament's approval. Unemployment insurance benefits to fishermen could be revoked by the approval of the Governor in Council only.

The amendment proposed by the Senate provides that to stop a motion which proposes to modify the regulations concerning fishermen's benefits, the signature of no fewer than 15 senators or 30 members of this House of Commons would be required.

Members of this House will remember that a similar clause was inserted in Section 87 of the Official Languages Act. We did that a year and a half ago. It was good then. Why can we not do that today? For regulations can be changed at any time by Order in Council, why not have public scrutiny? Why not have this transparence in regard to a program of such importance? We have it in the Official Languages Act. We think it would be a good idea to have it in regard to regulations affecting fishermen.

The final part of the Senate amendment will repeal subsection 130(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Subsection 130(4) provides that the whole section dealing with fishermen's benefits may be repealed by the government by simple proclamation. That subsection, originally introduced in the 1971 Unemployment Insurance Act, was intended to record the transitional nature of Section 130 of the act until:

> —the plans being developed to protect self-employed fishermen against the uncertainties inherent in the primary fishing industry are ready for implementation.

That is from the White Paper on Unemployment Insurance in 1970, page 11.

Indeed to give the cabinet that power to revoke or to change the regulations without consultation with Parliament was supposed to be an interim measure. However the fishermen's special status, well deserved by the way, remained largely unchanged and still today is transitional. The proposed amendment to the act would make it permanent and would eliminate the uncertainties inherent in this act. To this effect the Senate committee report says:

> Your committee believes that in view of the crisis in the Atlantic fisheries, concrete steps should be taken to protect the benefits now provided to self-employed fishermen and to provide assurance that the government is in fact committed to the maintenance of this vital program.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in 1977, the Unemployment Insurance Plan adopted a variable entrance requirement which tied the number of insurable weeks of employment required for benefits to the unemployment rate. To be eligible, those who lived in a region where the unemployment rate was less than or equal to 6 per cent had to have at least 14 weeks of insurable employment. In all regions where the unemployment rate was greater than 9 per cent, a minimum of 10 weeks of work was required. Every year, the government presented legislation which was adopted by Parliament to extend the variable entrance requirements. In 1989, the Conservative government refused to continue with this formula, Mr. Speaker; it refused in the House to extend this variable entrance requirement for Canadian workers. The Conservatives refuse to pass this legislation, thereby penalizing thousands of jobless Canadians.

The Conservative government has contemptuous attitude towards unemployed Canadians. The Conservative government had a choice between maintaining the present support for the unemployed and adopting an attitude of confrontation with the Senate.

• (1700)

And good God, Mr. Speaker, with the minister's statement today, we know what decision they have made. They decided to go for a confrontation with the Senate.

The Prime Minister chose to abandon the unemployed, proving once again his indiferrence to the less fortunate in our society. If the Prime Minister were in good faith, Mr. Speaker, he would have allowed the bill extending the variable entrance requirement to pass as was proposed in the House not very long ago, in January.

Passing Senate Bill S–12 would have enabled workers who lost their job to still be eligible for the existing unemployment insurance benefits after January 6, 1990.

Mr. Speaker, we deplored it at the time and we still deplore the government's attitude to Canada's unemployed.

Bill C–21 proposes to introduce a modified version of the variable entrance requirement. Instead of 10 to 14 weeks, 10 to 20 weeks of insurable employment would be required. All regions with unemployment rates of 6 per cent or less would require as many as 20 weeks of insurable employment, while only those regions with an unemployment rate of more than 15 per cent would retain a minimum entrance requirement of 10 weeks.

Bill C–21 proposes a new, 62–region system. Under this system and the new entrance requirements, according to the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C–21, claimants in 45 regions would require more than 14 weeks of insurable earnings, while the minimum 10–week entrance requirement would apply only in 8 regions.

However, under the old variable entrance requirement rules, the minimum would have applied in 32 of these regions. Of the 13 regions in Atlantic Canada, only 5 would qualify at 10 weeks, under Bill C–21, as compared to 12 regions under the old rules. That is more than twice as much, Mr. Speaker.

Bill C–21 also changes the benefit structure. In most cases, the proposed change will reduce the maximum duration of benefit entitlement. For instance, according to the information given in the Senate report, claimants in central Nova Scotia, Sherbrooke, Hull right next door, St.Catharines, Sudbury, northern Ontario, southern Manitoba, and Regina would lose up to 13 weeks of benefits. More than 3 months of benefits would be lost by workers who are seeking employment.

Mr. Speaker, claimants in Halifax, Calgary and Vancouver would lose up to 12 weeks of benefits. Workers in St. John's, Newfoundland, Saint John, New Brunswick, Fredericton, Moncton, Quebec City, Trois-Rivières, Montreal, Chicoutimi, Ottawa, Windsor, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Victoria and Vancouver Island would all lose up to 11 weeks of benefits.

Surprisingly, claimants in regions with an unemployment rate of up to 12 per cent would lose up to 11 weeks, while regions with an unemployment rate under 4 per cent would lose only 3 weeks. It is difficult to reconcile this outcome with the professed objective of Bill C–21, which according to the government, and I quote:

> —was designed to ensure that there would no impact in areas where there was high unemployment.

I was quoting Mr. Barry Carin, Assistant Deputy Minister, Employment and Immigration, from his testimony on February 1, 1990, before the Senate Committee.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the amendments to entrance requirements and benefit duration provided under Bill C–21 will have a very definite impact on many of the regions I just mentioned.

[English]

Bill C–21 will hurt the unemployed in just about every region of the country. The federal government, in the document Success in the Works presents some estimates of the impact of these new measures. In Table 13 in that report, on page 25, we see that the age group hardest hit by Bill C–21 is 25 to 34, absorbing a $450 million reduction in benefits or 38 per cent of the cuts. Table 15, at page 27, shows that 530,000 unemployed Canadians would be affected by the new bill to a total sum of $800 million. The government calls this "savings". This is the biggest attack on the backs of the least fortunate of our society.

Let me remind you of what the Prime Minister said in the last general election. I want to quote because this is very important. In The Sunday Star of October 16, 1988, he said:

> As long as I am Prime Minister, social benefits will be improved, not diminished, by this government.

So much for that. Now this same government is saying to Canadians that it will save $800 million on the backs of these 530,000 Canadians who would be affected by this legislation.

We must keep in mind that these government numbers are based on assumptions. What I have just quoted I have taken from the government's own books. We must keep in mind that they are based on assumptions which will affect Canadians more onerously than anticipated. We can certainly question these figures of the government. That is the role of the opposition.

I just want to quote the firm Global Economics which was commissioned by the Liberal Party of Canada to examine the proposed changes. The conclusions of this study differ significantly from the government's study.

Whereas the government predicts a $1.2 billion decrease in unemployment benefits—$800 million in benefits lost plus $450 million in penalties—the Global Economics study forecasts a drop of $1.5 billion, that 775,000 Canadians will lose benefits with an average loss of $1,486. This loss of benefits is most pronounced in Newfoundland, with an average loss of $2,429; Prince Edward Island with a loss of $2,373 and New Brunswick with a loss of $2,011. Atlantic Canada and Quebec will be the hardest hit. Quebec will lose $507 million as a result of this bill. Nationwide, 80 per cent of the net losers will be earning less than $25,000.

The Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives also produced a study which yielded results much closer to those of Global Economics' than those of the government. This study concludes that the decrease in benefits will amount of $1.8 billion, as opposed to $1.2 billion predicted by the government.

The regional impact on the Atlantic provinces will be much worse than the government predicts. The provinces are pessimistic about the effects of C-21. In Newfoundland, according to the provincial study, 19,000 people may not meet the new strict entrance requirements. The Minister of Employment and Labour Relations, Ms. Patricia Cowan is quoted as saying:

> Bill C-21 is probably the most devastating thing to come our way in Newfoundland and Labrador, for a long time.
> Without immediate attention, this bill will condemn not hundreds, but thousands of Newfoundland families to uncertain futures where poverty and welfare will be commonplace.

Since the last general election, the Conservative Government has slashed regional development to the Atlantic provinces, has dismantled VIA Rail, has done nothing about the crisis in the fisheries and has pushed, with all steam ahead, on Bill C-21, regardless of the consequences.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 provides for a major transfer of funds from the Unemployment Insurance Fund to training programs. This is one of the major objectives of Bill C-21, which provides that every year, the minister will table in Parliament a plan explaining where the funds will be spent.

The question is, and it is a very important one, where the funds earmarked for training programs will be spent. This question is particularly important since there is no provision in this respect in Bill C-21. No one knows where the funds will be allocated.

What happens if Nova Scotia loses $40 million in benefits when Bill C-21 is passed? Will the province recover those funds in the form of training programs? Will Quebec recover $507 million in lost benefits? Noboby knows. The Minister of Employment and Immigration is unable to answer these questions. The deputy minister said in committee that he did not expect any radical changes in the distribution of funds. The government does not seem to know one way or another and is not prepared to provide the necessary explanations.

The Senate committee proposes an amendment to provide more information on the transfer of funds from the Unemployment Insurance Fund to training programs. Amendment No. 4, which was partially accepted by the government, would make it possible to control distribution of funds, to determine how losses and compensation are shared among the regions. To simplify comparisons between previous expenditures and proposed expenditures, the Senate committee recommends that the plan should indicate expenditures for each of the three years preceding those to which the plan applies. That seems to make sense and it is not terribly complex.

Bill C-21 just says that the plan would have to be approved by the Governor in Council and there is no guarantee that parliamentarians could speak on the planned expenditures and the allocations of funds in the affected regions. The legislation should include a provision that parliamentarians could not only consider the plan but also approve it, Mr. Speaker.

Amendment No. 1, which the government has accepted in principle, concerns literacy training. Mr. Speaker, illiteracy, poverty and unemployment are closely related. Recent estimates show that one Canadian in four is totally or functionally illiterate. Nicole Boily of the Canadian Institute for Adult Education told the Senate Committee:

> (The problem you raised of) young people who drop out of school and who are doomed to short-term, unskilled jobs without any security (is a very real one throughout Canada). —We cannot neglect those who already find themselves in this difficult situation.

Still quoting:

> I think it is very important that we provide basic education for young people.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a strong negative correlation between education and unemployment. I want to quote Tracy Westell of the Ontario Literacy Coalition who said recently:

> —there is a clear connection between lack of education and unemployment. In the regions in Canada where unemployment is high, the rate of illiteracy is also very high.

Mr. Speaker, according to Bill C-21, unemployed people who receive UI benefits will not be eligible for literacy courses; if they took such courses, they would lose all their benefits. This defies all logic. How can the workers of tomorrow face the technological challenges of tomorrow if they cannot acquire the most basic knowledge?

I think that the government, by saying that it supports the principle, is changing Bill C–21 a little and we will see what happens in the coming days, Mr. Speaker, so that we can comment further on this change.

Senate amendment No. 1 would allow workers entitled to unemployment insurance to enrol in basic training courses, including elementary level proficiency courses, while remaining eligible for benefits. They propose that Bill C–21 lines 37 to 40 be striken out and replaced by the following, and I quote, Mr. Speaker:

> For greater certainty, the words "course or program of instruction or training» in subsection (1) include a course or program of instruction or training in basic skills or literacy.

Again, Mr. Speaker, to me this seems logical and essential.

I now go on to amendment No. 5. Some of the Unemployment Insurance Act provisions prescribe that a claimant is disentitled for a given period of time for refusing suitable employment or quitting the job without valid reasons.

Under the existing statute a claimant may be disentitled to benefits for a maximum of six weeks. Bill C–21 provides for a much stiffer penalty, ranging from a minimum of seven weeks to a maximum of 12 weeks, double the current maximum.

Mr. Speaker, there is no minimum under the existing law. In addition the proposed legislation would authorize the UI Commission to reduce the rate of benefits to 50 per cent of insurable earnings, down from 60 per cent now. Finally, any part of the disqualification period which has not been served might be deferred for six years.

According to the government figures the new provisions would make it possible to save—Mr. Speaker, I imagine that means "saving" for the government—$450 million whereas 250,000 unemployed workers will lose a minimum of seven weeks of benefits. How can the government justify such drastic treatment of the unemployed? How can the government justify forcing an unemployed worker to wait for up to three months—twelve weeks—before drawing his UI benefits?

Doesn't the Minister know that the big losers in her reform are poor, that 80 per cent of them earn less than $25,000?

An Hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Gauthier: Three months without pay can be very difficult when one does not have any savings, Mr. Speaker. Isn't it a little too long?

Maybe the minister can live for three months without any income coming in but the unemployed Canadians she proposes to penalize unfairly cannot afford it. That is why we hope the government will change its mind and accept the Senate amendment.

Harassed workers will be afraid to quit their jobs. Harassed workers who know they will lose everything if they quit their jobs or look for employment elsewhere will certainly hesitate and even suffer from fear of losing all benefits and other forms of income for themselves and their families for three months. We find such a severe penalty on families earning less than $25,000 unfair and almost inhuman.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the Senate would set the maximum disqualification period at six weeks and the period for carrying forward any portion of a disqualification not served at two years instead of six.

We know it is not perfect but we think it is reasonable since there is no definition of just cause in the legislation to determine whether workers have valid reasons for leaving. Moreover, the disqualification period is two weeks on average in the case of a resignation.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to talk about Amendment No. 2, allocations of funds from the Unemployment Insurance Fund to training. Although we approve of the idea of offering workers some form of occupational training to increase their capacity to earn a living, we nonetheless find absurd that the government would have to draw from the Fund in order to finance training. We suggest that the governement should not finance training programs by cutting Unemployment Insurance benefits.

• (1720)

As Mrs. Hélène Chauvigne, from Mouvement Action–Chômage de l'Outaouais québécois, pointed out when appearing before the Committee: "Nothing assures us that the people whose UI benefits will be reduced are going to benefit from the training they will be paying for".

To quote another witness, Mrs. Shirley Carr, president of the Canadian Labour Congress: "If the Bill is adopted, we believe, and we have grounds to believe, that the $2 billion in UI premiums which would be redirected to training programs will be used for a large part to replace the Canadian Jobs Strategy. Worse still, that money could be used to finance the relocation of the unemployed, the wage subsidies for businesses and other programs that will be of no help to the unemployed or to the communities".

Mr. Speaker, the first objective of the unemployment insurance plan is to provide income support to workers temporarily out of a job. To use the funds of the plan to buy "training courses" or to strart a business is, in our opinion, contrary to the first objective of the plan. In all fairness, these initiatives should be financed by general revenues, that is to say out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

That is the reason why the Senate committee proposes to strike out lines 13 and 14, as well as lines 38 to 45 on page 14 of Bill C–21. To strike out line 8 and substitute "graph (1)(b) may provide that" on page 15. Amendment No. 2 would prevent the allocation of moneys from the unemployment insurance fund to training.

Furthermore, the fact that the government is prepared to give up to $15,000 to people willing to relocate in areas where unemployment in lower is evidence of the importance, for the government, of "relocation" of people out of regions which are less developed or where industry is cyclical. This approach in Bill C–21 would lead to depopulation of the regions most affected by unemployment. What the gouvernment is proposing is exile from underdeveloped areas.

What is even more troubling, if we follow the rationale of the government, is that claimants would be financing their own moving with the savings realized by cutting benefits. That is why the Senate is opposed to this clause and proposes to strike out lines 34 and 35, on page 14, and substitute the following: "tunities for employment are greater, or moving to".

Mr. Speaker, the Senate Committee also found unacceptable that in Bill C–21 the normal appeal procedure should not apply to the administrative decisions governing the new training methods. We felt that this provision could prove detrimental to the victims of discrimination and minorities. To grant a right to appeal decisions made on the basis of these provisions would be to respect the principles of justice and fairness normally accepted in this country. Therefore, lines 44 and 45, on page 14, as well as lines 1 and 2, on page 15 of Bill C–21 should be struck out.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to amendment No 3, the so–called "Henry VIII" clause. If the Government intends to adopt a policy requiring the unemployed to finance their training programs, it should make sure that the regulations are consistent with the essential provisions of the legislation in this area. We suggest that granting of such discretionary powers on a fund approaching $2 billion is unjustified. The provisions respecting the establishment and operation of the assistance scheme described in Paragraph 26.1(C) are an important component of Bill C–21. They represent the main benefit for which the unemployed would foot the bill following the very significant cuts in their benefits. Yet, the unemployed could not rely on the new schemes offered because under clause 26.1(3), the Unemployment Insurance Commission would have full authority as far as the detailed definition of these schemes is concerned.

This paragraph states that "any scheme established under subsection (1) may, with respect to any matter, be different from the provisions of this Act relating to that matter". If it is called the Henry VIII amendment, it is because there is nothing in this bill which makes it possible for the administration to legislate when there is no provision authorizing it.

As was mentioned by Nicole Boily, from the Canadian Institute of Adult Education, "this paragraph opens the door to infinite possibilities the limits of which would come apparently from the fund's budget".

So, amendment 3 would strike out lines 1 to 6, page 15, of Bill C–21.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to talk about amendment 6 as it relates to the contracting out and privatization of certain activities.

Bill C–21 would give the Commission the power to delegate to third parties certain tasks under the Unemployment Insurance Plan. According to clause 49 of the Bill, any amount payable by the Commission for such services would be considered implementation costs, not subject to the 15 per cent limit applicable to training courses. Inevitably, this would further reduce the Unemployment Insurance Fund moneys used to guarantee income security for the unemployed and constitute a further step towards privatization.

While denying that the privatization of UI is a priority, the government is privatizing it by the back door. Moreover, after imposing a 15 per cent limit on expenses other than income security benefits, why would the government create a loophole through which one could circumnent its own policy? Currently, payments to third parties come from the Labour Force Development Strategy. With Bill C–21, these expenses would be paid for by the Unemployment Insurance Plan.

The Senate Committee recommends to strike out lines 37 to 43, page 31, and lines 1 to 6, page 32. Amendment no. 6 would not prevent the making of agreements with third parties but would insure that expenses incurred under such an agreement would be paid for by the unemployment insurance account reserved for expenses not related to income security.

[English]

In conclusion, we have heard from many groups and organizations. Today the Liberal caucus heard the joint statement of the labour coalition of unions on Bill C–21. I recommend this reading to all members of the House. I think it is a very interesting position.

I was hoping a government member would ask me to read that, but since they do not insist on me reading it, I possibly could table it for their edification. I could have it printed as an appendix to Hansard, if they will give unanimous consent.

As my friend says, those who can read may want to read this document. It is a very interesting one, put out by the coalition on Bill C–21. If you insist, Mr. Speaker, I could read it into the record. I will leave it to a member of my caucus to do that and to comment positively on it some other day. I am sure there will be unanimous consent for us to recognize the importance of the contribution that the unions play in opposing Bill C–21.

Although many groups, organizations and Canadians from every section of Canada, have maintained that Bill C–21 should not be adopted, the Senate has proposed those amendments which the government should take into consideration and accept for the benefit of all those who would be affected by the proposed legislation.

These amendments brought forward by the Senate would assure a continuation of government contributions to the Unemployment Insurance account and recognition of the federal government's responsibility for regional unemployment. They would also ensure that self–employed fishermen are given continuous protection under the Unemployment Insurance program, and that claimants residing in high unemployment regions are granted better income protection.

By way of these amendments, Liberal Senators sought to reaffirm the principle that unemployment insurance should be used for income maintenance and not for training courses and financing entrepreneurial activities which should be provided in our view, by the government.

I want to thank the Senate for its very important contributions. We will participate in this debate in the hope and with the wish that the government will see the light, will find its way to accepting all of the amendments. To that effect, I move, seconded by the member for Kingston and the Islands:

> That the motion be amended by
> (1) deleting the words "amendment 4(a)" in the first paragraph and substituting the words "amendments 1, 2A, 2B, 2C, 3A, 3B, 4A, 4B, 4C, 4D, 5A, 5B, 6, 7, 8, and 9" therefor; and by
> (2) deleting all the words after the words "Commission Act" in the first paragraph.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will take the amendment under advisement and rule on it later.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the main body of my speech, I cannot help but comment on the choice of words of the minister when he introduced the motion and the way he referred to the Senate and what he perceived the Senate as having done to Bill C–21. He referred to gutting and violating. It is no surprise to me that those are words he would choose after having gutted the Unemployment Insurance Act and violated the Canadian public.

In my speech after the introduction of this bill, I referred to the Dalton gang of Barbara, Michael and Brian riding into town to loot the UIC vault. Now it appears that they are having a shoot-out with the Liberal Senate and unemployed Canadians across the country are running to get out of the cross-fire.

The government response to the Senate does nothing to respond to the serious concerns of people across this country who appeared before the House committee. They told the government that blaming the unemployed for unemployment just is not acceptable. They told the government that they had believed the government when it promised during the last election campaign that it would not touch unemployment insurance. They felt betrayed and that they had no recourse but to look beyond the House of Commons for assistance.

It is not surprising then that the government finds itself in this position. It did not listen to the groups that told it of the devastating and harmful impact of Bill C-21. It did not listen to recommendations of an all-party committee, after the Forget Commission, nor did it listen to the minority report to the Forget Commission itself. The government did not even listen to the minister's own advisory committee which, in report after report, recommended enhancing the UI system, not destroying it. That this government does not listen will be no surprise. It should also come as no great surprise that the Liberals do not listen very well either.

Granted in this package of amendments we do find some things which could be supported, such as allowing people to collect UI during basic literacy training. That is something the New Democratic Party has supported all along. Extended benefits for fisheries during this time of crisis is also something we could support. But these amendments, taken as a whole, still represent a fundamental cut to benefits and support for the unemployed.

The government is tinkering, it is putting sugar coating on a poison bill, to quote the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. Therefore, we cannot support it.

Had the Liberals really wanted to offer an alternative to Canadians, they had the opportunity. Hundreds of groups appeared from across the country and offered good and solid advice. The Liberals have never been friends of unemployment insurance and during their mandate ushered in cuts to benefits and significant withdrawal of federal money from the program.

Let us review some of the Liberal record. In 1976, the Liberals reduced the maximum coverage from 75 years of age to 65. The Liberals also reduced the benefit rate for claimants with families from 75 per cent of insurable earnings to 66 and two-thirds. In 1977, they increased the number of weeks needed to qualify for UI from eight weeks to between 10 and 14 weeks. In 1979, they further reduced the benefit rate to 60 per cent.

The Liberals also began to require that some people pay back UI benefits and made a further increase to entrance requirements for new workers and people who had been laid off in the previous year. Finally, in 1980, the Liberals began to withdraw funding from UI and to shift more and more of the costs onto workers and employers.

Everything contained in this government legislation before us was ushered in by our Liberal colleagues in this House and by their colleagues in the Senate. There is no real friend of the unemployed there.

The Dalton gang, Barbara, Michael and Brian, have not spent much time riding the range since the bill was introduced. Perhaps the sun got into their eyes and has clouded their vision as to the desperate situation workers face in all parts of the country due to their free trade giveaway, tax grabs and cut-backs. Let us clear away the mist.

Since this bill was introduced, we have seen a crisis in the Atlantic fishery. Here the government proposes to get out of funding benefits for people engaged in fishing. The government proposes to use part of the premiums it collects in the Atlantic to pay for the Community Futures Program, a program the minister's own advisory committee says does not work very well. The minister, in defending her bill before the Senate, tells us that, according to her own experience, people in Newfoundland could find jobs if they had to. Maybe the minister has spent time looking for a job in Newfoundland and maybe she could share her experience with the Newfoundland Deputy Minister of Labour and tell him where the jobs are, because he has said categorically that his studies show they do not exist.

In Ontario, with free trade sucking jobs south of the border, this government will put people off the UI rolls and onto the welfare rolls. That is not much of an improvement. It is not an improvement at all, because this government has just decided to cut payments for welfare because these people live in a rich province. I suspect that the people living in the rich province who will not be receiving unemployment insurance and who will be on welfare are really not aware how well off they are.

• (1740)

In Quebec, we have seen a significant rise in unemployment, but if this bill were in place today, thousands of workers there would have less time to find a job before their benefits ran out. In the west, in my own province of Saskatchewan, Premier Grant Devine has felt it necessary to put forward his own aid package as it is clear that the federal government has nothing to offer farmers in distress.

As I see it, this government has only one option. It is time to stop playing cowboys with the Senate and start taking responsibility for the mess they have made in this country. They should stop trying to blame unemployed workers for the crisis the government has created. This government never had a mandate to change UI legislation in the first place. It should introduce variable entrance requirement legislation to give relief to workers in areas of high unemployment. The government should accept the federal court ruling on parental benefits and introduce extended maternity benefits as well.

If it truly wants to support basic literacy training while people are on UI and support special benefits for people who fish, we will support it, providing that these initiatives are tied to variable entrance requirement legislation and not this harmful, poisonous bill.

Finally, the government and the Liberals should pack up their toys and call it a day. The Canadian people are tired of their games and, frankly, so are we. Someone has to tell this government enough is enough. Someone has to say no to a bill that cuts benefits to people who need them most, and no in response to the Senate, no to the Liberals who have not listened and are no real friends of the unemployed, and a final no, because it is the fourth time closure has been introduced on this bill, an unprecedented disregard for democracy.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like to rule on the admissibility of this motion, just in case the hon. member may have a subamendment. If he would please take his seat for a minute.

I believe the motion is in order. I will rule it admissible.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Fisher: An hon. member from across the way stated: "the safety net of unemployment insurance and welfare programs is there just for the times we are now experiencing. Let us leave that safety net in place and recognize that there will be an increase in cost there". That is the quote from the hon. member across the way.

Will Michael remember his words, sit down with his colleagues, Barbara and Brian and stop trying to turn the social safety net into a tightrope?

In conclusion, I would reiterate that this bill must be withdrawn.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member who just spoke for some clarification. I am having a little difficulty understanding the position of the New Democratic Party on this. The member on the one hand disagrees with the Liberal Senate and on the other hand disagrees with the government and says the bill has to be withdrawn. That is very nice and we agree with him that the bill has to be withdrawn but the fact is the government is not withdrawing it.

We are dealing with a motion now to go back to the Senate. If the member had listened to the motion that was read he would realize that we are dealing with a government motion that purports to approve one of the Senate amendments but disapproves of the others. While we are reluctant to say that the Senate amendments are all that are needed to this dreadful bill, and we agree that it should be withdrawn, we have to deal with the motion now on the floor.

I am wondering if the member of the New Democratic Party by his participation in the debate today is urging the Senate of Canada to reject this bill and if he feels that that is an appropriate course.

Mr. Fisher: I thank the member for the question, Mr. Speaker. What I am urging is that the government listen to what the Canadian public has said. I know the minister went through a long litany: "No, no, no." Repeating words three times can become a habit I guess. It is contagious.

The Canadian public told the government over and over again that these changes to unemployment insurance were absolutely unacceptable. The Canadian public told the government that to reduce the benefits which people would receive under unemployment insurance and to increase the amount of time a claimant had to work in order to qualify for them was unacceptable.

These changes, together with a smoke and mirrors explanation that education was going to be increased, left the implication that anyone who was unemployed, even anyone who never had a job, would be able to seek training now that the government was making these changes. Of course, that is patently untrue.

Although there may be a slight increase in the number of people who will be able to receive training as a result of the changes to the unemployment insurance, there was no assurance that anywhere near a significant number of people would receive any amount of significant training at all. As a matter of fact, if anything, it came to a point where they were dividing those who had never been employed and were hoping to find employment through training, and those who were insurably unemployed. The government is actually I think seeking to divide and conquer that way.

Certainly, for those who had never been employed the money that the government is now purporting to have available for them is money that it had previously put into unemployment insurance. It is now going to be giving to these people with no assurance that any significant number of people would be trained as a result of that, and no assurance that they would be able to find jobs as a result of that training. It is just the old game of smoke and mirrors.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): As I understood the question, the hon. member was asked whether or not he thought the Senate should reject this bill. I am really curious to hear the NDP position. It is a simple, straight question and I am wondering if the hon. member would answer it for us.

• (1750)

Mr. Fisher: Imagine this, Mr. Speaker,is it at all possible that we have a collusion here between the Liberals and Conservatives on the issue of unemployment? Obviously not.

I would be more than pleased to answer the question and I now will. What we are saying and what the groups of people who spoke to you this morning said, these changes are nothing but cosmetic. They will not suit the situation at all. They are unacceptable. Bill C–21 is the issue and Bill C–21 has to be defeated.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have quotes from the joint statement of the labour coalition on Bill C–21 and I am sure the member was given a copy this morning. I invite him to read it attentively. This is signed by Shirley G.E. Carr, President, Canadian Labour Congress; Louis Laberge, President, Quebec Federation of Labour; Jim McCambly, President, Canadian Federation of Labour; Gerald Larose, President, Confederation of National Trade Unions; Kitty O'Callaghan, President, Canadian Teachers Federation; Lorraine Pagé, President, Quebec Teaching Congress; Kathleen Connors, President, National Federation of Nurses' Unions; Louis Lacroix, President, Canadian Conference of Teamsters. They state:

> The Senate amendments improve the Bill, but they do not go nearly far enough.
> If the government does not withdraw the legislation, we believe the Senate should kill the bill.

Does the member understand that? Does he approve that the Senate should kill the bill?

Mr. Fisher: I think it is an excellent idea if the Senate kills the bill. Kills the bill. The amendments which the Senate has brought in do not go anywhere near far enough.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. Minister of State for Employment and Immigration.

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, first, I have notice of closure to deliver:

> I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on the motion of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons in relation to amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, and on any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in recent months you have been exposed to impassioned rtheoric on Bill C-21. You have heard all kinds of comments, ranging from very objective on one side of the House to more subjective on the other. You have heard the worst epithets one can address to a piece of legislation. And a special committee of the other place was appointed to study our bill.

As was to be expected, a majority of the members of this committee condemned the intent of the changes we want to make in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Some of the proposals from the other place, Mr. Speaker, may be very worthwhile. In fact, this government has once again shown its flexibility by offering to accept certain amendments, including those on fishermen and literacy, areas we consider to be among our top priorities.

Unfortunately, a number of other recommendations were made without any thought for Canada's financial resources. It is easy to make commitments, especially when one is not elected and when managing Canada's economy is the least of one's concerns. This reminds me of the 1984 election campaign. In fact, Mr. Speaker, some of the senators who are opposed to Bill C-21 were part of the same government that left us with government finances in a very precarious state. Fortunately, since 1984, Canadians have opted for responsible government.

As I was saying, I remember the 1984 election campaign, when a party leader who has since left the House resorted to similar arguments during a televised debate: No, he said, not $30 million to improve the status of women, but $300 million. Of course the Prime Minister's answer was: My friend, where is your magic wand?

You will recall that our ex-party leader quickly changed the subject.

[English]

Whoever said that history repeats itself was perhaps capable of time travel, because that is exactly what is happening in this House. Once again, our hon. colleagues in the other Chamber are suggesting a solution that would contribute to increasing the national debt: spending public funds wastefully. They have a regrettable tendency to assign a monetary value to a problem rather than seeking the problem's true cause and applying sound and lasting remedies.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I must admit I have trouble understanding the logic of the liberal majority in the other place. On February 14, Senator Jacques Hébert told La Presse that the Liberal senators had no intention of having a long, drawn-out debate on Bill C-21.

In the same breath, Mr. Hébert said that personally, whatever his colleagues would do, he was ready for a long, hard fight. I simply don't understand.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that the House of Commons has a duty to consider a matter that concerns the majority of the citizens of this country. It is not a place for flaunting one's moods in front of the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, instead of designing strategies to break down the democratic process, the senators would have been well advised to really scrutinize the Bill before them. All of us on this side of the House know that political and economic observers in this country, while reasserting the need for training our manpower, recognize that the proposed changes will make unemployment insurance into the scheme it was intented to be in the first place. These observers recommend that we go ahead with Bill C-21. Opinion polls show the majority of Canadians are also in favour of this bill.

Unfortunately, we are back to where we started four months ago. In the meantime, our government had to abandon the idea of approving throughout the country variable entrance requirements for unemployment insurance benefits to claimants, wherever they live in Canada. Consequently, every worker must have worked 14 weeks before being eligible to benefits.

Mr. Speaker, every day, hundreds of people are denied their legitime right to UI benefits, because of little schemes like this, because of this obstruction which paralyzes the regular business of the House.

I simply cannot accept senator Hébert's comments about Bill C–21 not taking regional disparities into account.

The more the senators delay Bill C–21, the more harm they do to areas in Canada where unemployment is very high; the more they delay implementation of programs to reduce the gap denounced by Economic Council of Canada, the more the workers in these very regions will be penalized. Mr. Speaker, do we have to remind members that with Bill C–21 workers in regions with a high unemployment rate will be eligible to unemployment insurance benefits after only ten weeks of work?

If Bill C–21 had been enacted before January 1st, I know full well that the unemployed in areas with high unemployment would be treated more fairly.

Again, our reform is sensitive to fluctuations in the unemployment rate.

[English]

For example, in Corner Brook and Gander, Newfoundland, where the unemployment rate is in excess of 17 per cent, the variable entrance requirement prescribed by Bill C–21 would be reduced to 10 weeks instead of the 14 weeks currently in force. The same thing will apply in at least 14 other regions across the country.

[Translation]

Meanwhile, the democratically elected government has to wait for the other house, composed of non–elected senators, to let go of Bill C–21 and to let us take our responsabilities as members who have been elected to represent and manage this country.

By accusing the government of not taking regional disparities into account, the other house pleads ignorance and refuses to accept the democratic and economic changes that have occurred in our country over the past 12 years.

Again, the variable entrance requirement, which is one of the main amendments proposed in Bill C–21, takes regional disparities into account. One really has to wonder if senators have read the bill.

• (1800)

Mr. Speaker, when we announced our intention to end the tripartite funding of unemployment insurance, the Liberals in the other place once again tried to stir up the masses. Without going into the reasons why we were stopping our contributions to the UI Fund, they cried treason and claimed that the government was "abandoning ship".

I just heard an explanation that is totally false. Our decision to withdraw from UI funding has absolutely nothing to do with the free trade agreement that we signed. Once again, it is obvious that they have not done their homework. How can the government fund UI? Go on borrowing year after year, thereby increasing the deficit and the taxes to pay this growing debt? That is totally absurd and irresponsible. Another falsehood coming from my colleagues opposite and in the other place is that UI will be cut. That is really overstating and misrepresenting it. How many times do we have to repeat that Bill C–21 will not reduce the scope of the UI Plan at all? We are not cutting anything. Instead, we want to reallocate $800 million from the UI Fund to training programs and assistance for relocation, entrepreneurship and re–employment. This is no doubt the measure which best illustrates the distinction our government makes between funding active and passive measures. Providing funds to maintain the dependency of recipients on the state is a passive measure.

[English]

Upgrading advisory services, providing access to courses, and paying extended benefits to those who participate in training programs: such measures are what we mean when we talk about giving an active aspect to one of the most important programs in Canada. We believe that it is unacceptable for employers to be short of qualified labour at the same time so many people are looking for fulfilling jobs.

Even in my riding we are searching for these kinds of people. We are seeking to introduce strategies and mechanisms designed to encourage beneficiaries to get off the Catch–22 and achieve financial independence. As many people have understood, we are stressing long-term lasting solutions.

[Translation]

The late Félix Leclerc appreciated the irony of a certain kind of government we will have no part of. "The best way to kill a man" he used to say, "is to pay him for not working". Our mandate is to find ways to help the unemployed find in themselves the resources that will change them into more dynamic individuals, because the challenges ahead require the involvement of this country's total human resources.

Mr. Speaker, if that political will of ours keeps on being labeled an abdication of our responsibilities, as the other place suggests, this is bad faith and bad partisanship.

[English]

I would like to mention another set of changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which millions of Canadians are impatiently waiting to see adopted. I am talking about the in-depth changes to the current maternity, sickness, and parental benefits program. These matters are of special importance to me. Because of the important human dimension of the relevant measures in Bill C-21—

[Translation]

The bill provides for the maintenance of 15 weeks of maternity benefits during the period surrounding childbirth. Added to this are an extra 10 weeks of parental benefits to natural or adoptive parents. Under the flexible provisions of the new legislation in some cases the total period of combined maternity, parental and sickness benefits available to parents could be extended up to 30 weeks.

What did the special committee of the other place have to say on that? A lot of good, blended with the cynicism that permeates the whole report. The government should have done so much sooner, or so they said. My answer is that this government works seriously, using in depth analysis and, more importantly, consultations with all the parties involved. When the government decides to bring in amendments, it does not do so within the narrow context of a single aspect of the Act. This is because, quite simply, all the provisions in the Act are interdependent.

Our concern as far as the unemployment insurance is concerned, goes back many years ago, following the tabling of the Forget Commission's report whose findings did not probably meet the expectations of the time. Then there were the Grandpré Commission's recommendations which greatly inspired the government's Labour Force Development Strategy. The very thorough consultations carried out by this Commission throughout Canada had emphasized the urgent need to intensify the training and retraining of our labour force, in order to fully benefit from all the opportunities created by the Europe 92 free trade accord, in short, the globalization of world markets.

Our Labour Force Development Strategy is made up of an admittedly rather complex package of measures the scope of which compels us to look beyond the beginning of the 21st Century. It would be asking too much than to expect the unconditional support of the other place whose members include many who have been influenced throughout their lives by governments whose views did not go beyond their constituents' immediate concerns. That was really the issue over these past few months, during the endless debates surrounding the proposed amendments to the unemployment insurance legislation.

As other government speakers, I have tried to convince the elected and non-elected oppositions that all our actions dealing with labour-related issues will now be interconnected. The amendements to Bill C-21, therefore, are no exception, because they are consistent with the main themes which presided over the establishment of our Labour Force Development Strategy.

Employers' and employees' organizations have all expressed almost the same concern. Morally, we do not have the right to let our labour force lag behind that of other industrialized nations. As competition intensifies, it would be a mistake to close our eyes to the reality of world markets.

Training, retraining, skill improvement, increased flexibility on the part of both employers and employees are all vital concerns shared by public and private sector major representatives. But how could we meet their demands if the other place puts us in a totally disabling legislative straitjacket?

[English]

The time for discussion is past. It is time to act. We are trying to implement the principle which we have stated but, yet again, the other place is blocking us at every turn.

I deplore that we are being prevented from taking our responsibilities as the lawfully elected government. Time is running out and we are still not doing enough to give Canadians the tools they need to handle the challenges of the 21st century. It is unacceptable that for months at a time we should be forced to discuss the spirit and the letter of any proposed amendment to an act. I feel that we are currently being forced to take part in a pointless masquerade. I am very much afraid that this endless argument is making a mockery of the democratic exercise of power.

[Translation]

Ultimately, the government alone must be held responsible for actions it takes with full knowledge of the facts.

If time proves us wrong, we will bear the consequences according to the rules of the game. But our policies will have to be judged by the people, not by an unelected partisan group who tarnishes the reputation of an institution.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleages to make every effort to bring this debate to an end as soon as possible.

Thousands of people, employers, unemployed, unemployment insurance claimants, workers over 65, workers who desperately need training, in short the whole working community, are watching the House of Commons.

I am confident that if we take the proper decisions, in the interest of the majority, we will make up for the time that has been lost and help give Canada back the dynamism that has so often and so eloquently marked its history.

• (1810)

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Minister, we have met this morning in caucus representatives from all Canadian labour unions from coast to coast. You mentioned earlier that workers seem to support the government regarding this Bill and asked us not to allow the Senate to block the passage of the Bill. This morning however, the unions and their representatives begged us to make sure to ask the Senate to kill that legislation which they consider as somewhat prompted by the US because they see it as a subsidy. What do you think of all the unions in our country stating that you are yielding to US entreaties on account of the free trade deal? Does that not bother you that all the workers in this country have asked for the opposite of what you have asked this House?

Mrs. Vézina: First I must say that we are not reacting to what the United States are asking us to do. When we began the unemployment insurance reform we knew full well that skilled workers are in very short supply and that the reform would enable us to improve the skills of workers while they seek employment. I have here an article from my riding where the unemployment rate is unfortunately too high, 15 to 20 per cent, and where people say it is not easy to find skilled labour. They are trying to get a paper mill going and looking hard for workers, carpenters, welders and plumbers. Everybody wants them, but there are not enough qualified men and women. We are talking about plumbers and welders, and these are trades for which workers could be retrained. The government is aware that we need direct training.

We know very well that our system is too passive, that we must make it more active. And we also know full well that we need this reform to create longer-lasting jobs for the future to be able to compete on tomorrow's market. The reform has to be a concerted effort on the part of employers, employees and the private sector, and that is what we are working on. It is a reform, and in its latest report the Economic Council of Canada again stressed the need for more training, and they even suggetsed that our active unemployment insurance scheme be turned into a work insurance system. As a responsible government that is what we have been working on since 1984. At long last this reform will enhance the skills and abilities of Canadian workers. Wherever the unemployment rate is high our reform takes into account the particularities of each region. There is no reason why we should apologize for a bill which comes to grips with the reality and which was drafted after consultation with the various interests of the private sector, the employers and the employees.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the minister referred to helping workers in her last response. I would like to ask the minister a couple of questions. One, how will the forcing of workers to pay for training benefits help those workers in the future?

The government pays a share of that training cost and it is now talking about privatizing. In fact, Bill C–21 does privatize training and puts the burden of training on the backs of the workers and their employers. That may be the kind of active, as opposed to passive, effort the minister is talking about, the workers carrying that burden on their shoulders as opposed to the government sharing that burden.

The minister referred to the Economic Council of Canada asking for these changes. I have heard suggested today that the Canadian Labour Congress and the labour coalition are interest groups that do not represent what the government wants represented. Second, I would like to ask whose interests the Economic Council of Canada represents and why the government is listening to them instead of the four million workers the coalition of unions represents who presented their views today and the government would not hear?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, we are listening to the workers. Before going into politics in 1984, I worked with employees in the professional sector. There is a growing need for training across Canada. With unemployment insurance reform, we are trying to put in place a labour force development strategy.

Unemployed workers do not pay for their own training. On the contrary, it is employers and workers who are paying for an insurance against future hardships.

As we know full well—and I'm sure you will agree with me—, all social workers admit that training must be provided and that co–operation is essential. That is what we are trying to do. We must ensure that the government has a role to play but that the strategy is defined by the private sector. That is why we have set up advisory committees to give us a training strategy. We are trying to meet current needs while preparing for the year 2000. We, Canadian men and women, must be competitive in the new markets and be ready to face these new challenges.

[English]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I am really at a loss for words when I listen to the minister give an explanation of what should be taking place in the employment sector. She has been representing the government sector for five years and recognizes the problems of underemployment, lack of skills training, and lack of skilled workers. She can stand there for five minutes explaining that now, after the government has cut out $770 million over the last five years in training programs, it has seen the light and is going to talk about what it is going to do with our labour market.

I cannot believe that the minister actually has an ounce of sincerity when talking about what we have to do in the country with our labour pool. She admits that in her own riding she has an unemployment rate of approximately 15 per cent. The only thing I can say is shame on her and shame on the government for the kinds of conditions that she is decrying. She has been in a position to do something about them over the last five years. It is a lot of poppycock and claptrap that we are hearing from this government.

One thing that should be made very clear, and there is no one in the House who does not believe it, is that we have to become more competitive by having a better trained labour market and that the government has to be proactive. It does not become proactive by turning around, cutting training programs, getting out of the labour market, getting out of its contribution and commitment, its fiduciary trust that it has in this particular program, and then stand up before this House, saying say that it represents all kinds of Canadians. A coalition that represents 4 million labourers in the country asked us to do something to get the government to pay attention.

Members of the government stand up and read the same speeches we heard at second reading, report stage, and third reading. I can see the parliamentary secretary to the minister here doing the same thing. He listens to the same stuff that we have been listening to over the course of the very little bit of debate that we were allowed.

I cannot believe that a government which asks for support at the same time turns around and, at the very first instance that we can have an opportunity to discuss this on substance, says: "We are going to impose closure once again". Let's stop this nonsense. If we are going to have a debate on substance let us get onto it. Let us get busy and talk about what we have to do with the unemployed.

Maybe, just maybe, it would be instructive for members on the government side to understand who the unemployed are in this country. If we are going to be talking about doing something with our labour market, then let us see what we have to do. Let us take a look at the figures that it has to address if, in fact, it is going to have any basis for making some of the assumptions that it is going to make.

Quite frankly, over the course of the last five years we have seen an enormous decline in the creation of good jobs. I pointed this out earlier this morning in a statement in the House. The government refuses to recognize that the free trade agreement has anything to do with the realities of the moment but we have lost 9,700 full time, good, solid jobs. These are the kinds of jobs that the minister says are lacking in her own riding. She cannot get plumbers, she cannot get welders. Where in the heck has she been for the last five years as a representative of the government? If the government is going to do something, do something worth while. Do not give us this garbage saying: "We are going to put $800 million into training".

• (1820)

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what that $800 million represents? It is coming out of premiums that are paid by both employees and employers. The government is washing its hands of the whole affair. What it is doing is increasing the proportion of moneys that it is going to take out of those premium payments in order to finance the obligations that it should have been meeting under Canadian Jobs Strategy programs.

For the edification of the members opposite, I add that the Estimates indicate that funding under CJS is approximately $1.5 billion. If the government goes through with Bill C–21, it will make itself a predator of up to an additional 15 per cent of funds from those premiums, funds that will equal $1.8 billion.

I dare say that if we are going to be talking about confidences and trust, then the parliamentary secretary opposite will attest to the veracity of what has been going on. Moneys have been removed from government contributions and taken from premiums to be allocated where? To those same programs that are still being cut. The government looked at a surplus in the unemployment insurance scheme last year, ruled that is was surplus and said: "We are going to remove our contribution".

The parliamentary secretary knows that quite well. His minister stood up before the House and said: "You know what? We have to reform the unemployment insurance system". Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? Because we are in a deficit situation, not because we need to develop our labour market nor because we are getting together with private enterprise and labour.

Madam Minister might pay careful attention that those groups who called for complete withdrawal of Bill C–21 this morning represent 4 million Canadians. She does not need them. Her party does not need them. Her government does not need them. It does not need anybody. It is standing at 19 per cent in the polls, but that is okay. They are non–believers anyway. Maybe, in the next election, many of those people of the 4 million and up will take a look at what is going on with this particular bill, and the debate on this bill, and will decide to teach the government a lesson in numbers.

Certainly the government has indicated that it cares not a whit about literacy programs. It cares not a whit about preparing those workers who are in a disadvantaged position throughout the entire country. I do not know how many times we have stood before the House and pointed out to the Minister of Employment and the Minister of State that the illiteracy rate in this country among adults is one of the highest in the western world. We cannot possibly be competitive unless we address it.

What does the minister do? What does the Minister of Finance do in his latest budget? Cut programs. Where? Where they hurt most and where they do the greatest damage. We had an opportunity to do something for native Canadians, for Canadians of all origins and for Canadians who are crying for some kind of government program, direction and vision that says: "Look, we are going to provide a job". What kind of job? This is the government that five years ago said: "We are going to create jobs, jobs, jobs". What kind of jobs have we got? We have a 45 per cent increase in the kinds of jobs that are part–time, dead–end, marginal, seasonal and rely on help agencies.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism ought to be interested in this. He is one of the guys who is defending a 7 per cent increase in the goods and services tax that is going to do a heck of a lot to destroy even those types of jobs that are maintained by an unemployment insurance system. They give an opportunity to provide people with the occasion to live in their area of origin and preference in this country, and maintain the population in the regions of Canada not close to Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and some of the other major centres.

We have to do something reasonable and worth while to maintain the opportunity of Canadians to move around the country, Canadians with full rights, full opportunities and full access to the equalities of the occasions and opportunities provided by our government. If our government is to make a sincere effort to ensure that all Canadians have equality of access then it has to be serious about an educational training program that takes into consideration the obligation to do what is right, to do what it must do in order to develop an industrial labour policy for all Canadians. My colleague from Saskatoon—Dundurn, who served on the legislative committee with me, knows very well that even those skilled labourers in Saskatchewan have very little opportunity in terms of finding a job in their own areas, even if they are skilled.

In times of recession such as this, there are, on average, 2,000 labourers per month leaving that province looking for greener pastures elsewhere. They will not find those greener pastures in Toronto where the average house costs $272,000 and where one needs a $70,000 down payment to qualify for a mortgage.

I do not know if we can take seriously some of the arguments we have heard from the other side of the House. The House leader talks about the illegitimate nature of the resolution of the Senate which states that the bill is fraught with problems and it is going to make the bill a little more palatable.

The minister says that the Senate has the legal and constitutional right but should not exercise it. I have never heard such garbage in my life. This government must think that everybody is stupid. It is certainly operating as if Canadians do not care. Canadians have a stake in this country and they want to see the government take action to ensure that their future is secure, that their future looks auspicious down the road and provides an opportunity for their kids as well as for every other person's kids.

There is a lack of concern and arrogant disdain with which the government treats all arguments regarding the variable entrance requirements, absolute scorn which it heaps on members on this side of the House, and I dare say from the NDP as well, who indicate there are some positive ways in which this government can give some kind of direction and purpose. That kind of scorn cannot be allowed to continue, especially under the guise of fighting members of the other place who have a duty, an obligation and a constitutional right to throw this bill back into the lap where it belongs. The Senate says: "Look, get it done and get it done right".

The government refuses to acknowledge a constitutional obligation in law, as well as in practice. Since 1941, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, our whole social security system, that income maintenance system that is the unemployment insurance, requires three parties: labour, industry and the government. But our government cavalierly opts out of its obligation. I do not know of a Canadian who would turn around and say "Yes, I applaud that because it allows you to pilfer some money out of the fund and to reduce a deficit which you have been so lax and incompetent in handling over the last five years".

I cannot believe that there would be one Canadian who would say that this government recognizes constitutionality. It pompously indicates through the House leader that it is the oracle of truth and that it understands constitutionality.

I cannot believe that there would be one Canadian who would for one moment accept a government that takes more than 3 per cent from the contributions to the fund and raises that to 15 per cent and accepts that that would be a constitutional, legal or moral thing to do. I am sorry if I mention morality. It is something that obviously is not in the vocabulary of members on the government side. Members opposite are probably ignorant when it comes to looking up that definition in the dictionary. Lest I become too sarcastic and I do not want to stray from the item at hand, the purpose of this particular debate is to point out that the other House has done the House of Commons and the people of Canada an enormous favour by suggesting that this bill be reviewed in its entirety. We should not be concentrating merely on the variable entrance requirement. This thing is flawed in principle because it does away with the whole concept of government responsibility in the area of income maintenance and social security.

• (1830)

Government members opposite have laughed and they have scorned. They have put down any interventions by members on this side of the House who have suggested that perhaps there has to be a reason, a rationale, some sort of philosophy behind the government's desire to kill a system that has been an integral part of the Canadian character.

What is that objective? What is that philosophy? My friends on this side of the House, I think know only too well. They read the papers, but we are not allowed to accept them as any source of veracity. They read all the documentation that comes forward from the government researchers, from government institutions, from government departments, but we are not allowed to accept those as any sources of truth. The Minister of State for Employment and Immigration just told us: "Well, listen, none of that stuff matters". We cannot go to those areas. We cannot talk to our own researchers who tell us what Americans tell us, that is, with this bill the government is intending to ensure that our social security system falls in line with the American system.

What is it designed to do? It is designed to take into consideration all the negotiations regarding subsidies and to pre-empt any discussions on subsidies that we should be conducting sincerely and properly for the interest of all Canadians.

If there is any other reason, then all we have to do is listen to the minister's own words when she said: "We are only doing this because we have to cut the deficit". It is either one or the other. They are going to cut the deficit on the backs of all those Canadians who have relied on this because they have contributed to it. They have paid taxes to maintain a system of social security because they felt that was an obligation on their part as taxpayers and Canadians. They have done that as employers and as employees because they felt that was their obligation under this tripartite agreement.

We have a government with such arrogance that it turns around and not only walks away from the deal but then spits in the plate from which it has eaten and says: "We are doing this for your own good". If it is doing this for our own good, the best thing that it could possibly do is to pack up and resign. Passing bills such as this in jack-boot fashion, closure after closure after closure, and then coming in here and giving us this poppycock about a hundred hours of debate across country is just absolutely mind boggling. There is not a Canadian out there who actually believes for a moment that these people are capable of telling the truth. There is not a one.

At no time like the present do we need pro-active legislation by a Government of Canada. I see none in this bill from this Government of Canada. I see none coming out of that ministry, that department which says that it shall create conditions, not only that will decrease unemployment but improve the level and quality of employment.

The minister sits here and tells this House that because there is 15 per cent unemployment in her riding and because there are one or two positions available for plumbers and welders that this is absolutely shameful. She says that we are going to make sure that over one million Canadians who find themselves in the unfortunate position of being either underemployed or unemployed bear the brunt of the government's desire to cut the deficit at the expense of all those who rely on a system in order to maintain whatever lifestyle that they have in whatever part of Canada.

I am not talking about people who live in St. Paul's or Forest Hill or Rosedale. I am talking about average Canadians, average Canadians who are quite happy to work daily, to take on part-time jobs. I pointed out that there has been a 45 per cent increase in the types of jobs being taken by people who feel a need to take on a second job to maintain their lifestyle.

Those people are crying for an industrial and economic strategy that is sorely and evidently lacking in this legislation. Yet the department, the government, the Prime Minister and his cabinet have decided they are going to take this club called Bill C-21 and with that club they are going to beat into submission all of us who are so unfortunate as to find ourselves at the mercy of those who would give us, at their whim and their will, the kind of jobs that are going to decrease in number progressively, as we have seen with the increase in the unemployment rate steadily over the course of this year, and in quality.

I thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that my time is running out. I would have loved to have given more to the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I don't know where to begin. I want to ask the hon. member three short questions and then he can fly for 17 minutes.

First, I want to ask him about the Global Economics he is wont to quote when he speaks about unemployment. Global Economics appeared before the Senate committee and recommended, contrary to what the member has said, that Bill C–21 be passed. It weighed the goods and the bads and said: "There is more good in this bill than there is bad". Therefore it urged the Senate to pass it. I would like him to comment on that in view of his previous comments about Global Economics.

Second, I want to ask him about the comments he made concerning the reduction in moneys for the Canadian Jobs Strategy. If he looks at the Main Estimates, Part III, 1990–1991, he will find there is $1.7 billion, the same as there was last year. There is no reduction in the Canadian Jobs Strategy at all.

Third, he mentioned something about Liberal researchers doing a comparison between the Bill C–21 legislation and the American system, and somehow it is all going to work out. I would like to see an analysis. We have an analysis of that. There are 52 different systems in the United States. I would like to see that Liberal analysis. I do not think he can put his money where his mouth is.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I do not think if we are going to wax in oratory we need to take the bait from every tick that falls upon us.

However, since we were talking about moneys in the Estimates, Bill C–21 refers and is directly relevant to the Estimates of 1989. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would take care to take a look at the context under which we are actually debating this bill.

The parliamentary secretary may wave papers around, but it is not going to change what departmental officials and his own minister said before the committee. What they said before the committee in substance is what I repeated to you just a few moments ago.

As for Global Economics recommending that Bill C–21 fraught with evils as it is be accepted, it is one of those cases where you are either given a gun or a knife and you are asked to do yourself in; you are told to do the quicker of the two.

There is an organization, a coalition of labour representing four million Canadians that said this morning absolutely we should not accept the bill. Should I as a member of Parliament who is supposed to be attuned, like the hon. parliamentary secretary, to the whims of people be listening to Global Economics and not to four million Canadians? Is that what he wants me to do?

• (1840)

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member with a great deal of interest. He certainly laid into the Conservatives, and rightly so.

The question I want to put to him is this: Is it not a fact that there is not a single principle in Bill C–21 that the Liberals themselves did not violate between 1974 and 1980?

Is it not a fact that in 1976 the Liberals reduced the maximum age for coverage from 70 to 65? Is it not a fact that the Liberals in 1976 reduced the benefit rate for claimants with families from 75 per cent of insurable earnings to 66 and two–thirds per cent, and they followed that up in 1979 by reducing it to 60 per cent?

Is it not a fact that they reduced the maximum weeks of benefits from 51 to 50 weeks in 1977? Is it not a fact that they removed the eight–week minimum attachment, the variable entrance requirement, from 10 weeks to 14 weeks in 1977? Is it not a fact that the Tories learned from the Liberals how to chop unemployment insurance and how to create hardship for the unemployed in this country?

The Tories did not learn that all by themselves. They had the models right across from them for 10 years, and now they are just carrying out the Liberal agenda. Is that not a fact?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, the only thing I can say is out of deference to the age of the hon. member: I can only assume that he has done his research and that he is talking about historical events. If he is talking about historical events, we might perhaps take a look at what happened in 1789 and 1848 and then take a look at the reasons people from his party had to play second fiddle to the organizations which he purports to represent but which came to our party to look for assistance. Four million Canadians coming to the Liberal Party for assistance on unemployment insurance must be a good sign that we are doing the right thing.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, my esteemed colleague has just spoken rather eloquently. When he was questioned by my colleague from the NDP, who should be known as the pope of the north, I guess we should be reminded that over the weekend the New Democratic Party sold its environmental principles so it can put on whatever hat it needs as it goes along.

As far as our colleagues on the other side are concerned, they can wave all the papers they want. They know what they can do with those papers. They can take them and put them on that part of their anatomy where paper belongs.

As far as my esteemed colleague over here is concerned, I know that he wanted to say more in his speech but because he ran out of time he did not have a chance to address the very pressing issue of education and training. He did not speak on that as much as he wanted to.

I would like to ask him how will Bill C–21 affect the training of our young people so that they can come into the job market and take their rightful places Canada. Would my esteemed friend please address that?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the deference which he shows me.

In a word, not a whit. Not only does Bill C–21 not address the problems of education and training. What it does is wash its hands of the whole affair and says that the department will have an opportunity to determine what it will at some time in the future subject to some consultation, consultation which we have yet to see. No proposals have come forward. The minister herself has thrown up her hands and has said that the government refuses to do anything until this bill is passed and that until this bill is passed the government will be unable to come up with any kind of solution.

What my hon. colleagues knows, because of his former career, is that education is important and absolutely fundamental to creating a competitive labour force. The minister addressed this and admitted it in her introduction of her labour force development strategy way back last April when said that 60 per cent of all jobs in the coming five years will require five years of post–secondary education and training. She does not address that in Bill C–21. All we have is some airy–fairy statements of some proposals that may emerge somewhere down the road, but it does not address the fact that the problems exist here today and have existed for five years.

What the government has to decide, and I can tell my hon. friend through you, Mr. Speaker, that it is no longer a question of simply saying, as my esteemed colleague opposite says: "This is a provincial matter. We wash our hands. Let us be Pontius Pilate about this". It is not a factor any more. It is not going to solve the problem by simply going off and buying some training programs over which it has no control and with which it has abdicated all interests in the development of the economy and labour.

The government has to have the courage to get involved in the training, get the programs together and do the proper consultation, but do not tell me it comes out of Bill C–21. Get your act together and do not give us a line.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is nice to speak in the House where there is a little chat–back and a little bit of action.

I rise in support of the motion put forward by the government House leader. While there are some ideas which we can agree with in the message from the other place, there is a basic conflict between most of these amendments and the intent of Bill C–21.

Bill C–21 has been held up long enough. The needs it addresses are too important to justify prolonged argument over detail. For this reason we believe that the responsible course is to recognize valid concerns of the Senate. However there are recommendations proposed by the Senate which we cannot accommodate. I want to discuss these briefly now, starting with amendment 2(a) (b) and (c).

The government is determined to do more than passively accept unemployment. We must help unemployed people get back to work and make it possible for them to contribute to the growth of this country. For this reason we have proposed to expand the present uses of unemployment insurance to provide training for more people, to allow for more people to retrain their skills while unemployed and to help people get back to work faster.

Basically the Senate amendment says that it is okay for the government to use unemployment insurance funds to write income support cheques but not for anything else. In other words, they close the door on the so-called developmental uses. To put it less bureaucratically, they close the door on helping people to do more than just survive on unemployment.

A main goal of Bill C-21 is to assist the return to the workforce of people for whom unemployment is not an unchangeable fact of life but a condition which could be changed if certain obstacles were removed.

For instance, people who live in depressed areas where there are no jobs could move to areas where there are jobs, if they could only come up with the money to do so.

For instance, there are people who could find work in their own communities, if only they had the necessary skills.

For instance, unemployed experienced, energetic UI eligible people could realistically be self-employed if they could only get the helping hand to get started, people who in the long run might create more jobs for others.

Under Bill C-21 the government should have the option of using money from the UI funds to help people over these hurdles—to pay for training, to help with moving expenses, and to help launch small businesses.

Let us all be clear on two points. First, the funds spent this way would be well invested. A few thousand dollars spent in one year conceivably could save tens of thousands of dollars in future claims over the years. Second, given the deficit, this funding cannot be financed out of general revenues. The Liberal Senate amendments before this House obstruct these—

• (1850)

Mr. Samson: And you are putting them out of work.

Mr. Kempling: Do you want to rise and speak? Why don't you not get up on your feet and speak?

The Liberal Senate amendments before this House obstruct these principles in general and in detail by insisting that we fund them from the central revenues where no money is available, and they would kill them at birth. In the case of relocation assistance, they require that no one be helped to move to an area with better opportunities until there is a firm job offer on the table, but this creates a catch-22 situation. How likely is it that an unemployed worker at one end of the country will be able to line up a definite job at the other end of the country? We would like to be more flexible and more realistic in this regard.

Amendment 3 from the other place deals with the right of appeal. We have such a right at the present time. If you believe you are a victim of an unsound decision about UI benefits you can appeal to the board of referees. This amendment goes further. It would extend the right of appeal beyond the benefits to the new developmental uses.

This is mixing apples and oranges. The question as to whether I entitled to x number of dollars for x number of weeks under the act when it arises lends itself to a judicial resolution.

Questions about whether a move to a given area at a given time will improve job prospects or whether training will be productive involve the informed judgment of counsellors in consultation with applicants. They must relate to the circumstances which vary. This amendment would complicate decision making. It would obstruct counselling. It would slow down the process to no useful end. The people who would be hurt the most would be unemployed Canadians trying to get back to work.

Amendments 4(B), (C) and (D) from the other place are also for the most part unhelpful but with modification provide basis for agreement. The Senate wants us to specify year by year, province by province, economic region by economic region, what we will spend on developmental use, and where we will spend it. They want an accounting after the fact that we can provide. They want a detailed account before the fact not only for each of the 10 provinces but for each economic region. We believe in planning too, and Bill C-21 allows for it within the limits of practicality and reality. It is pretty difficult to look into an area before the fact and in some of the remote areas in particular to try to estimate what is going to happen there.

The reality is that between the time you make your plan and the time the new fiscal year comes around situations can change, and they can change quite dramatically. Markets can change. Product lines and skill requirements can change. Superimpose that on the fact that for UI planning purposes there are no less than 62 economic regions in Canada, each with different needs and situations. Locking yourself into too detailed a blueprint, one drawn up a year in advance, is not the way to meet those needs effectively. To be truly and effectively responsible we need the flexibility that Bill C–21 provides.

It comes to this: we cannot agree to a proposal that would set plans in stone a year ahead and which in any case would be speculative. We are prepared to meet the concerns expressed in the Senate amendment by elaborating the yearly plan to incorporate more detail but not beyond the limits of what is practical. That means an estimate, not a plan covering the 10 provinces and the 2 territories.

Amendment 4 (D) would make the planning process a political football. Each plan each year would be the subject of a debate in both Houses subject to rejection by either or both.

Furthermore, we note that if either House does not act within 10 sitting days the regulations would expire. In short, we are asked to approve not only the hobbling of the planning machinery, but to sanction a veto by the other place on regulations that can affect the livelihood of thousands of Canadians who need our help.

Amendment 5(A) from the other place concerns the qualification period for people who, without just cause, leave one job to go to another.

Here again distinctions are essential. Many people who quit their jobs in this way do so because of intolerable conditions or other compelling circumstances. There are many reasons a person should be allowed to leave a job without a penalty. That is not the issue. The issue is not even the right of anyone at any time to quit a job without just cause. The issue is whether the people who do so should be supported by all the people who pay unemployment insurance premiums, whether these people should pay a bill which has been running at more than $1 billion a year.

The related issue is whether the deterrents now in place to discourage this practice are effective. Bill C–21 will increase the deterrents. One way it will do it is by setting the disqualification period at seven to twelve weeks. The amendments proposed by the Liberal senators on the other hand favour the status quo. They would keep the deterrents at their present inadequate level. In effect they support those who want to use UI as a free ride at everyone else's expense.

Amendment 6 from the other place is about third party contracting. Bill C–21 envisages the use of third party contractors to services such as training administration. Logically, we say, their operations should be funded from the same source as Canada Employment centre administration, from the general UI fund. The Senate amendment would require these administrative expenses to be paid out of the 15 per cent portion of the UI fund earmarked for training relocation and other development uses. Obviously every dollar spent on administration would be $1 less for developmental measures. We do not think that is a good amendment.

Amendment 7 from the other place runs counter to one of the main goals of Bill C–21, namely, to train more workers and counter the wider consideration of reducing the federal deficit. In the April 1989 budget the government announced its decision to put UI on a self–supporting basis. Continuing to support it from general revenues is not an option that is consistent with cutting the deficit. The money just is not there.

In effect Bill C–21 says that those who benefit from the UI program should pay for it. That means not just Canadian workers but Canadian employers. The Senate amendments reject that approach. It says that drafters are "mindful of the government's stated goal of deficit control". Mindful or not, it requires that the government, a convenient euphemism for the Canadian taxpayer, should shoulder 50 per cent of the cost of what are commonly referred to as regional benefits.

This amendment is inconsistent with deficit reduction. It contradicts the principle that programs should be paid for by those who benefit from them; in this case employers and employees. We have an even more basic problem with this proposal. The House of Commons cannot accept an argument which essentially says that although the government has the constitutional right to reduce the deficit in abstract terms, the right evaporates when we get to specifics, that the Senate can stop the government from cutting the deficit by reducing spending on any given program. We cannot tolerate that.

I pass now to Amendment 9 from the other place. The situation of commercial fishermen in Atlantic Canada particularly is virtually unique. Their work is seasonal. Their resource base and their markets are fickle. The industry is plagued with overcapacity. The uniqueness of the fishing industry is recognized in the unemployment insurance system. Special regulations cover the people who work in it. The continued existence of these regulations is not in question. The issue is whether we should accept the proposition that these regulations be subject to review, debate and approval or rejection in the House of Commons and the Senate. The issue is whether we give the Senate a new power under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the power to veto these regulations. That change is neither necessary nor desirable.

• (1900)

Senate amendment No. 9 concerns the funding of fishermen's UI programs. At present, fishermen put in $1 of UI premiums for every $20 they draw out in benefits. That is a function of instability, which it goes with the territory. The issue is which particular funding source the money should come from.

To sum up, some of the ideas coming to us from the other place merit consideration. We can accept them without difficulty. Others run 180 degrees counter to the intent of this government and, more important, to the will of this elected House. We want to move to a solvent soundly-based system and do so in ways consistent with reducing the deficit. These amendments obstruct that effort.

We want to modernize the system to meet current needs. These amendments cling to the status quo. We want a more flexible system and these amendments would entrench rigidity. We want to remove disincentives from the system and these amendments would perpetuate them. We want the UI to function both as a bridge back to employment, and as an important income support. These amendments run counter to that goal. We want to address the urgent national need to develop our human resources to meet the needs and the challenges of the decade ahead. These amendments ignore that issue.

Finally, we want the will of the elected members of this House to prevail. These amendments would frustrate that will. For all these reasons, I support this motion by the government House leader and I urge my fellow members to do the same thing.

Mrs. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. I just cannot see the hon. member if people rise around her. The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): I am standing, Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. The hon. member travelled across this country with the committee and, on many occasions, turned his back on the workers who were making presentations. It is in the transcripts of the committee hearings that he felt that these workers were vested interest people and were not really representative of Canadians.

We just heard the Minister of State telling us that in fact this government listens to the workers. If the government does indeed listen to the workers, could he indicate to us which workers in this country it listens to, when and how?

Mr. Kempling: I hardly know where to begin, Mr. Speaker. There is a fallacy out there—

Ms. Langan: If you listened at the committee you would know.

Mr. Kempling: Do you want me to answer the question? There is a fallacy out there with people in the NDP. They think every worker in Canada belongs to a labour union. They don't. The vast majority of workers in Canada do not belong to a labour union.

We did listen to the brief put forward by the CLC. We listened to it about 75 times across this country.

Ms. Langan: You didn't hear them.

Mr. Kempling: We heard what they said because the same brief was repeated 70 times, I am sure, from coast to coast, by every local labour council in the country. We heard what they said. We did not agree with it. The bulk of what they had to say was based on an interpretation of some figures by Statistics Canada that were interpreted by Global Economics. They all quoted that.

The hon. member who asked the question spent endless time in committee pirouetting on the head of a pin trying to get people from Statistics Canada to agree with her interpretation of the numbers put forth by Statistics Canada. She tried to get a member of the staff of Statistics Canada to agree with her and he said he would not put that interpretation on it at all.

The reason why I did not take too much account of some of the things that were said was because they were based on a wrong interpretation of the numbers that we saw. We had a different interpretation. We believed what we read into it. We did not believe the interpretation put on it by the member, by the CLC or by many others who came before us.

What amazes me is that when Global Economics appeared before the Senate committee, they went through all their brief and as it states in the record, said: "After having said all this, in the final analysis we think the Senate should pass this bill. There is more good in it than there is bad and it is better for the country to get it passed and into place."

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that the Canadian Labour Congress and the other unions that asked to speak to the government today represent four million workers. If you take the average number of families in this country, we are talking about 14.5 million Canadians for whom those people were speaking.

I would like to talk about the numbers that the hon. member has dismissed out of hand, saying that his interpretation was not the same as other people's interpretation. Not one time, in the House, in the committee hearings or in the hearings in the other place, has the government been able to prove that the Canadian Labour Congress, StatsCan figures are wrong. Not once has the government proven that any one of the figures given to us were incorrect.

I would like to ask the hon. member if the Canadian Labour Congress and that group of union leadership represents 14.5 million Canadians, and his government cannot specifically disprove the CLC's figures, how he can stand in this House and say that he is representing the needs of the people of Canada.

Mr. Kempling: That is the most disjointed question I have ever heard. The member should go back to the hearings we had here in Ottawa. She was there. She spent endless time questioning the deputy minister and the representative from Statistics Canada and they gave her the interpretation they put on those numbers. They certainly did not accept hers. Hers are the same as those of the CLC and we just do not accept them.

Ms. Langan: Disprove them.

Mr. Kempling: Can you give proof? You have not given any proof at all. All you have done is take some numbers which have been interpreted by the CLC and say that is truth. I say it is not truth.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to clarify what he has said about the whole question of benefits for self-employed fishermen. This is one of the very key elements of the Senate report, as I understand it, and basically the intent is to preserve, as the parliamentary secretary knows, the government's contribution for this component of UI benefits.

What is the parliamentary secretary's view and what is the government's commitment to unemployment insurance benefits for self-employed fishermen. Are these fishermen going to remain part of the unemployment insurance program or is this the first step toward getting them off the program and off benefits? I would like to ask him that, in light of the crisis which is facing the fishery in Atlantic Canada.

• (1910)

Mr. Kempling: Everyone knows there is a crisis in Atlantic Canada with the fisheries. We are all aware of it. We all regret it. Fish do not vote. We cannot tell them where to come. We have accepted that amendment in the Senate proposal to put the regulatory portion of fishermens' benefits into the statute. That is one of the amendments we have accepted, and I think that is a good amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, just a few words concerning the resolution before the House today. I must say the reaction of the Government of Canada to the Senate proposals is really one that says it does not care about the unemployed in Canada. The Government of Canada, by reacting the way it has to the Senate proposal, is saying that it wants to cut people out of the unemployment insurance system.

The Government of Canada wants to discriminate against people from one part of this country. It does not care about the high unemployment areas of Canada. Bill C–21, should really be entitled "What side of the line do you live on"?

The government has refused to address the issue in its response to the Senate. Under the previous legislation, a repeater, which is what the majority of people are, and if they lived in an area where the unemployment rate was higher than 11.5 per cent, in order to qualify for unemployment insurance they needed only 2.5 months in a qualifying period.

Under this bill, if you live in a region of Canada in which the unemployment rate is below 15 per cent, you need more than 10 weeks to qualify. That is quite a basic change, is it not? That is quite a saving of money by the Government of Canada.

Under the existing law, if you live in an area in which the unemployment rate was below 11.5 per cent, you need more than 10 weeks to qualify. Under this bill, if you live in a region in which the unemployment rate is less than 15 per cent, you need more than 10 weeks to qualify.

The Senate objected to the fact that the government has rewritten the unemployment insurance boundary lines in Canada. In other words, when a person now walks into the unemployment insurance office, under this legislation the unemployment insurance officer will ask where that person lives. Never before was that question asked in a high unemployment area. The unemployment rate in high unemployment areas undoubtedly was always over 11.5 per cent. But now, with this change, in an area that has less than 15 per cent unemployment you need more than 10 weeks; over 15 per cent, you need 10 weeks.

The government decided to rearrange the lines. It put a metropolitan area in the middle of a zone so that if you live two miles away from a city, then you are going to need what they need in the city to qualify. Then it drew other lines in each province in such a way that it separated economic zones.

Let us look at high unemployment areas, for example. People there work on a boat on the high seas; a lake boat in central Canada; an airplane that flies over the ocean. They work in the woods in the middle of nowhere; or in a mine somewhere. That is regional employment. Mr. Speaker, I have just told you what the vast majority of people do in the high unemployment areas. They do not work in their community. They work in areas away from their community. Invariably that is the case.

Now, under this new legislation, you qualify depending on where you live. Let us take, for example, a group of people who are working in the forests and have to apply for UI under this new legislation. If they live along a short stretch of road at Northern Arm, one small community and Phillips Head, another community a mile away, the qualifying UI rate varies. You qualify in one community but you do not qualify in the next community.

It is discrimination based upon where you live. It neglects the fact that the majority of people in rural areas of high unemployment do not work where they live. That, Mr. Speaker, is what the Government of Canada failed to address in the proposal from the Senate.

The Senate, in its response, went half way and said there is too much of a problem in making qualifications depend on each province and on which side of the line one lives on.

The Government of Canada drew the lines in a very unusual fashion. In Newfoundland it drew it along the old roadbed of the railway. We have heard the expression, "Which side of the tracks do you live on?". That expression, under this new legislation, really hits home because now it is "which side of the roadbed do you live on?"

Depending on what side of the line one lives, if you do not have enough weeks to qualify, the government has a training program in which you can qualify. That is, if you have not worked for the previous 30 weeks you can qualify to be trained for something. Someone who works in the woods cannot go into the training program to learn anything about the woods. That person has to learn about something else like carpentry, or electricity for the next 16 weeks, at a low wage.

For those who do qualify under this legislation, the government will apply clause 21 of this legislation, which is not insurable employment at all. You end up at the end of the system, on welfare.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MONEY LAUNDERING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue a question I raised in this House concerning criminal organizations that use modern financial services to hide the illegal source of their funds, and the means at the disposal of governments and financial institutions to control to some extent those transactions by making money laundering activities more difficult for criminals and to help enforcement bodies.

• (1920)

Mr. Speaker, billions of dollars of drugs profits cross the Canada-US border each year in order to be laundered in this country's financial institutions.

The process will accelerate as the United States strengthen their money-laundering control legislation in their jurisdiction.

As you know, the existing legislation in Canada does not address that problem. The Banks Act includes some provisions on setting up and maintaining information files, as do the acts regulating other financial institutions.
